My hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Butts) has referred to the powers given to the Dominion Coal Company. Those people operate a very large coal mine under the provisions of the Coal Mines Act of Nova Scotia which permits any lands required for mining purposes to be expropriated. Well, to operate a coal mine you must have miners and you must have houses for the miners, and you can very easily persuade the Minister of Mines of the province that if you need to build houses for the accommodation of your miners you should get the necessary land. It was for such purposes as that, expropriatory powers were given to the Dominion Coal Company. Now, the running of coal mines, or like operations, is in the public interest, and everything should be done to encourage the enterprise and help it along. But that is entirely different from undertakings of a purely private character, and for the reasons I have given I think the minister should not be too ready to grant rights of the kind to a private individual.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not able to comprehend the argument, still less the distinction, raised by the leader of the Opposition. He seems to think that it is right and proper to grant to a large corporation engaged in developing coal mines the expropriatory powers necessary to that development, but entirely wrong to grant them to an individual, say, or a small corporation, desiring to utilize a water power. In my judgment, one is exactly on the same ground as the other. I am finding no fault with the Nova Scotia legislation, although I hope that legislation does not vest the power absolutely in the coal mine owners, but maintains governmental control. If it does, then it seems to me it is justified, and this legislation rests on the very same, if not, indeed, on a higher ground. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) says that in the case of a public utility the expropriatory power is all right; but that with respect to a private property the expropriatory power, even although governmentally controlled, is all wrong.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. member does not want to misrepresent me? I say that the delegation of the expropriatory powers is all wrong, whether for use by a corporation or by an individual. I think we ought to have uniform legislation granting to people who come within this legislation the right to expropriate under certain conditions to be enumerated in the statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very true. I think the class who would come within it would be public utility users. If not, I do not know what distinction my hon. friend would draw when he is making his classes.

Mr. BUREAU: I object to the power being delegated from this Parliament to the minister to give to any individual or corporation the right to expropriate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Our legislation for the last forty or fifty years gives that power.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not make it any the better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Parliament could not carry out its duties if it had to pass an Act for every expropriation that might be required.

Mr. BUREAU: That is misrepresenting my point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what point my hon. friend is raising then.

Mr. BUREAU: I will get for the minister our Quebec statute so that he may read it.

That gives to all individuals who come within its provisions the right to develop water-power with the right to expropriate. They do not ask for a separate commission; they classify the water-powers wherein this right of expropriation can be taken advantage of. I am contending that we should pass a general law enacting that when a corporation or an individual comes within certain conditions therein specified, such corporation or individual shall have the right to exercise expropriation powers. I do not know if I have made myself clear. It would be a general law covering expropriation powers, and defining in what cases the expropriatory right can be used, whether by an individual or by a corporation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It only shows that I have understood my hon. friend all along. The Quebec Act defines in what cases expropriation can be used. What is the class of cases? The first class of cases is where development is for public utility purposes, If not, what is the general characteristic of the class? There is no other I ever heard of or that the hon. member suggests. We say here that wherever it is shown to be to the public advantage that the expropriatory power should be exercised it can be exercised; that is all. That is really the Quebec legislation. My hon. friend from Cape Breton says it is all right if a corporation, it is all wrong if an individual. Take the Grand Rapids river in Manitoba, where there is tremendous water-power. A company has a lease of that power and purposes a large development. There is an area of land below the falls which will be flooded if further development of that power takes place, and consequently that area must be expropriated. It is private property. It is quite true that the company are not there for the good of their health or the good of the community; they are there to make money. But is the community to be advantaged by enabling the owner of a little swamp land below the falls to deny the development of the whole water-power in the Grand Rapids river?

Mr. McKENZIE: Buy his land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good. He says: "I want a million dollars an acre." What are you going to do?

Mr. McKENZIE: Arbitrate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose he says: "I will not arbitrate."

Mr. BUREAU: Let him come under the law instead of under the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose he will not arbitrate?

Mr. McKENZIE: If I was satisfied he had been offered a fair amount of money for his property and would not accept arbitration, then I would be willing that some extreme measures should be taken. That power should be held in reserve for cases of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly the Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no reservation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, this is exactly the Act. I have made a convert of the hon. member. The Act forbids expropriation to be exercised by any company or individual until the facts are laid before the minister and he approves of the expropriation. That can be changed to the Governor in Council if the hon. member desires. But no one would suggest that you should come to Parliament because somebody up on the flats of the Grand Rapids river refuses to accept the value of his land or to arbitrate.

Mr. BUREAU: No one suggests that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what it amounts to if my hon. friend sticks by his argument.

Mr. BUREAU: My argument is that the right of expropriation should not be determined by the minister or the Governor in Council, but should be defined by law. That is the whole thing in a nut shell. My hon. friend need not cloud the issue. You ought to have a separate Act specifying in what cases the right of expropriation can be exercised and under what powers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what cases should it be exercised, and in what cases should it not be exercised?

Mr. BUREAU: I can tell the hon. gentleman after he makes his surveys, and so on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On what principle?

Mr. BUREAU: That every man should have the same rights under the law, instead of having to go to the minister to get his rights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What characteristic class can expropriate and what class cannot?

Mr. BUREAU: The volume of power they can develop and the use to which it may be put. If for waterworks or something of public advantage for a municipality, or for the development of an enterprise of any kind, well and good; but if you are going to let a man develop sixteen, eighteen or twenty horse-power for his own purpose, I say that should not be allowed. I would make a classification of that kind to show what the minister may do under his regime. That man, I should judge, should not be entitled to go to work and for his own personal use be able to expropriate his neighbour's property. It depends on the conditions where the water-powers are located. That can be classified easily; we do it in Quebec. We go to the courts, and I think that is preferable to the Minister of the Interior or the Governor in Council, for the courts after hearing the evidence are in a much better condition to give a satisfactory decision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The classification the hon. member gives is by the amount of development of water-power or by the use to be made of it. If for distribution for public utility purposes, then he would allow expropriation. There might be only a hundred horse-power developed, but certainly it is in the public interest to develop it. Is 100 horse-power to lie forever unused merely because of the obstinacy of a single individual, and are we to sit by helpless? You cannot classify these matters in the way the hon. member suggests. However small the horse-power may be, it may be distinctly in the public interest to have it developed, rather than allow it to lie dormant merely owing to the obstinacy of an individual landowner. The power may be exercised harshly, but that must be left to the Governor in Council, because you cannot isolate every individual case and determine whether expropriation should be exercised there or not until you have the facts before you. So I submit to the hon. member that the Bill is most convenient and most useful and safest in its present form.

Mr. BUREAU: It is no use arguing the point any longer, but that is just what I deny; it is unfair.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—cancellation of entries, leases, etc., in certain cases.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these provisions in section 8 subject to the Railway Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where the expropriation is by the Crown, it is under the Expropriation Act; otherwise it is under the Railway Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—joint development of two or more water-powers:

Mr. ROBB: What is the explanation of this clause?

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The basic idea of clause 9 is to secure the best use that can be made of falls that are close together. We should be able to make our regulations so that adjoining falls may be developed together, because that is the most economical method and requires a smaller capital investment. For example, the reservoir for the one may serve the other. On the Ottawa river we have no jurisdiction with regard to powers, and there is one province on one side of the river and another on the other, each with different regulations. By reason of these two conditions there is a very uneconomical power development. A large amount of capital has been invested by separate companies developing powers closely adjoining, whereas the proper and sound development would be a unified one, with one large plant producing power at much less capital cost and, consequently, at less cost to the consumer.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—surveys, measurements, etc.:

Mr. McKENZIE: Are there any records or reports showing the water-powers in Canada that are owned by the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, we are rather proud of the progress that has been made in our water-power inventory. At a recent conference in Great Britain held under the auspices of the British Government, a survey was made of the potential and developed water-powers in all portions of the Empire—and, indeed, in other countries—of the progress made in inventoring water-powers and securing data of the requirements for their development and use, of the various mineral and other resources in the neighbourhood, etc., and it was freely acknowledged that we had made more progress than any other part of the British Empire, and that our information was in much better and more available form.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the department any policy in regard to the selling of water-powers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not sell water-powers, nor shall we have authority to sell them under this Bill. They are leased, and as yet they are not leased with the primary object of obtaining revenue. The aim of the Government is to secure the cheapest possible distribution of power. Fifty cents a horse-power of developed power is what is charged now. For a time at all events it is probable that the principle of charging nominal rental will prevail. We maintain control of the enterprise from the beginning.

Mr. McKENZIE: What provision is there against a man getting a water-power and holding it idle and undeveloped?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The regulations now deal with cases of that kind, so far as our regulatory power extends—and that regulatory power will be more ample under this Bill. But at the present time any one leasing water-powers has to develop according to the conditions of his lease. He must in the first year expend so much and in the second year so much. He must have so much power up to a certain time and he must sell that power in accordance with the regulations.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have in Sydney what is known as a Utilities Board, a body which regulates the price of water-power or of anything that is a public utility, and to which application may be made for adjustment of complaints or disputes as to charges, and so on. If the water-power owned by the Dominion were developed in a province, would the industry or institution agreeing to sell that power be subject to the regulations of the Utilities Board of that province?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That question is a very important one and will be before the Committee shortly when section 10, sub-clause (m) is under consideration. I am disposed to the opinion that as it is the development of a Dominion property, the Dominion has full jurisdiction in relation to everything incidental to that development and that any regulations we made as to rates, and so on, would be valid. We assume their validity by this clause (m) of section 10 and propose to act upon it. But that section also contains power to devolve that authority upon any provincial utilities commission or other body provincially appointed. They can exercise the authority which originally is ours if it is convenient that they should—and in my judgment it would very probably be convenient.

Mr. ROBB: How much power has been leased at the price of fifty cents per horsepower of developed power?

Mr. MEIGHEN: About 100,000 horsepower. I desire to move that sub-clause (b) of section 10 be amended by striking out the word "developed" in line 35, and by adding the following as sub-section 4:

The Minister may enter into co-operative agreements with the authorities of any of the provinces for the making of steam measurements, the carrying on of investigations and the collection and publication of data respecting water and power resources and the best method of utilizing the same.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—director of water-power:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to amend clause 11 by striking out the words "a duly qualified engineer," in lines 31 and 32, and replacing the said words by the words "an officer."

Mr. ROBB: I do not think the minister is improving the Bill very much. He is now asking for permission that will enable him to appoint a barber, for example, to do the work of an engineer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not like what might be called professional legislation. I do not like legislating into any body of men the right to say: We alone can be
5 p.m appointed to a certain office. It is obvious that an engineer should be appointed to this office. It is an engineer, and a very capable one, that holds this post now, but I do not like the principle of engineers being allowed to say to the Government: You have not power to appoint anybody but us and now do the best you can.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think we should leave everything in except the word "engineer." If the minister says "a duly qualified officer," I should not have so much objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree to that.

Mr. McMASTER: I suppose all Government appointees are presumed to be duly qualified for the positions to which they are appointed.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope I have made no mistake. This work is the work of an engineer, and I think the term "a duly qualified officer" means that he must be qualified for doing work of that character.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to replace the word "engineer," in line 32, by the word "officer," so that the clause will now read:

All investigations and surveys and all undertakings shall, subject to the control of the minister, and for the purposes of this Act, be under the direction of a duly qualified officer to be designated the "Director of Water-Power."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—powers of Governor in Council:

Mr. ROBB: I was wondering whether there was anything the minister had forgotten in this clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope not.

Mr. McMASTER: As this is a very wide reaching clause, it might be well to go over it paragraph by paragraph.

On section 12—paragraph (b):

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister mean to go over private lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is one of the purposes of this Bill. We have to go over private lands or our water-powers can not be used.

Mr. McKENZIE: I thought that the expropriatory power with which we were dealing in clause 7 was the safeguard against any impediment of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That clause provides the condition upon which we go on private land and use it, but this is the power to go on it and take it. The regulations will say what may be done with private lands, but if anything is done, it must be done by expropriation. That is, there must be compensation.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would not the Expropriation Act provide the procedure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It provides the procedure for expropriation, but this says that the regulations we make shall cover this subject. That is, when we are making our regulations as to the development, transmission, distribution, sale, exchange, disposal or use of water-power, those regulations may contemplate development, transmission, distribution, sale, exchange, disposal and use over private lands, but if, for the sake of carrying out the regulations, we have to have private lands then, of course, the expropriatory clause applies.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister says that this does not give him any greater power over private lands than what is contemplated by clause 7.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. McMASTER: Let me suggest a verbal change which I think will make the clause clearer. I move that the words "of water-power" be struck out at the end of the paragraph and inserted after the word "use" in the second line of the paragraph. The paragraph would then read:

For the development, transmission, distribution, sale, exchange, disposal or use of water-power through or over lands of the Dominion or any other lands.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is better. I accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

On paragraph (h):

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to amend paragraph (h) by adding after the word "dividing" in line 26 the words "and collecting."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McMASTER: I notice something that strikes me as awkward drafting in so much of the legislation that is brought down and that is putting in part of the predicate at the commencement, then some adverbs or adverbial phrases, such as "from time to time," and then finishing the predicate. For instance, paragraph (h) reads "for the purchase or taking over of works already constructed, and for the dividing from time to time of the cost of constructing, etc." It would be better to say "for the purchase or taking over of works already constructed, and for the dividing of the cost of constructing from time to time, etc." I have noticed that several times, and I think the draftsman's attention should be called to it. I do not wish to delay the Committee by moving an amendment now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it might be better if it came after the word "operating." I beg to move that the words "from time to time" be struck out of lines 26 and 27 and inserted after the word "operating" in line 28.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Mr. NESBITT: Reverting to paragraph (b) is there any danger of our interfering with municipal rights?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The Dominion has power to legislate with regard to its own property, including all the use that can be made of it, and embodied within that power is the power to legislate upon everything incidental to the use of its own property. Of that there can be no dispute, even though it may involve the passing over of private lands.

Mr. NESBITT: Why the "development, transmission and distribution?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the property that is being developed is our own in fee simple in right of the Dominion. If it were not for that, we would not have the jurisdiction.

Mr. BUREAU: I notice that this is not restricted to Dominion lands. It says "over lands of the Dominion or any other lands."

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the development of our water-power we may require other lands, and inasmuch as the water-power is ours we have the right to legislate in regard to anything incidental to its development.

Mr. McKENZIE: Coming back to the point of law my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) has raised, I wish to be sure that I clearly understand the minister. That incidental power is conferred upon the Dominion Government in connection with the use or development of any public utilities—public works, for instance. But if the Government should go privately into the development of water-power exclusively for its own use, I question very much if it would have the right of passing over private lands just as if it was a case of building a railway. In the provinces, if a railway runs along a mile or ten miles of the public road, we have the power to build another post road alongside to take its place, because that is incidental to the building of the railway, but I am not so clear that the Dominion Government could exercise this power if it chose to go into the development of water-power exclusively for its own use.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I quite apprehend the difference. Perhaps it is this: If the Dominion owns a water-power and is developing it as a public undertaking, then the power to do anything incidental to its development is clearly vested in us.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But if instead of developing it as a public undertaking, we lease it to a pulp-mill, for instance, my hon. friend contends that we cannot grant that pulp-mill the necessary incidental powers which will enable it to use the waterfall. If that is my hon. friend's doubt, I cannot agree with him. I think the Dominion has power to make whatever use it desires of its own resources, either by itself directly or through the agency of the lessee.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly, the Government can exercise its incidental powers when it is a case of the greatest good for the greatest number, but I am not at all so clear as to the Government's right when it is a case of developing a saw-mill for private purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) has raised a question with regard to paragraph (b). Section 12, condensed, will read as follows:

> The Governor in Council may make such orders . . . . . for the development, transmission, distribution . . . . . over lands of the Dominion or any other lands, of water-power.

What would those orders be limited to? Apparently they are not to be limited to Dominion lands, because it clearly says "any other lands."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I can make the section any clearer than it stands.

Mr. BUREAU: It is too clear. It covers everything and everywhere.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Only in so far as is requisite to the transmission of the developed power; that is incidental to the use of the power itself. If the power is not to be used entirely at the point of development it must be transmitted, and we have the power to provide for its transmission and distribution, even if in its transmission it has to pass over private lands. All of that is incidental to the use of the power, and we have jurisdiction to deal with it under the constitution. We enable the Governor in Council to pass regulations as to the transmission of the power involving the passing over private lands.

Mr. BUREAU: As it stands now, the Governor in Council could make orders for the taking over of the streets of municipalities and for putting posts upon them for transmission purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume that the Governor in Council could exercise that power tyranically, but it would never be in our interest to do so. We must assert the right that is ours. This is our property, and we must not put ourselves at the mercy of provincial legislatures. We are simply asserting our right; we have asserted it in statutes innumerable ever since Confederation. We asserted it in the Railway Act, in the Irrigation Act, in the Dominion Lands Act, ever since 1887, and this is simply another assertion of the same kind; but in the exercise of it we would endeavour to conform to the utmost extent with any provincial necessities.

Mr. BUREAU: Far from asserting our rights, I think we are abandoning them. It provides that these matters shall not be regulated by statute but by the Governor in Council. We are abandoning our rights; it is the same old story relating to the Bill which my hon. friend is laying aside to get stale or have us forget about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If this is abandoning rights, the hon. gentleman abandoned them in 1897 and again in 1906.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister is advancing the same defence, that two wrongs make a right. When he cannot stand upright on the northwest corner of a hair he falls back on precedent, and endeavours to make us believe that he can convert two black balls into a white one. We are now in a period of reconstruction, and the Government must not forget that important fact, and if we are going to reconstruct at all, we had better proceed on sound democratic principles. Let us not abandon any of our rights. We should not encroach on private or provincial rights by reserving to individuals any arbitrary power. Let us do things as a Parliament and not delegate to the Governor in Council the rights and powers that belong to the House of Commons.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not rise to object to the clause, but I would like to know what the clause means.

Mr. ROBB: If the minister finds it necessary to regulate the passage of logs and timber, will he also require a regulation to put in fish ways in these dams? I cannot find provision for that in the Act, and it is most important.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is left to the operation of the general clause at the end.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is not this matter of fish ways provided for by the Fisheries Act? There are such regulations in the Fisheries Department, and we shall have to be careful not to enact anything that will conflict with the other statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it were deemed wise we might exercise the power provided in subclause (p).

for any purpose deemed necessary for giving full effect to the provisions of this Act.

I think that representations would be made to the Marine and Fisheries Department with regard to any fishery obstruction, and they might take steps in the matter.

Mr. ROBB: I have in mind a firm of mill owners who constructed a dam of cement without providing a fish way and after it was constructed the Marine Department drew their attention to this omission. It is a question whether they had the right to put in the fish way, and that right might as well be provided for at once in this clause which regulates the flow of timber.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that the Fisheries Act requires a fish way to be provided where a dam is built. Our regulations would provide that a fish way should be provided. We have the power to make such regulations under the clause I have read.

Mr. McMASTER: What would be the position in regard to the regulations made under section (k) in a possible conflict with the rules and regulations which are laid down in the province of Quebec in connection with boom companies? We have considerable legislation determining the relative rights of lumber men on slides, and there is also provision for the forming of boom companies. I would take it that on a tidal river under control of the Dominion these regulations would override the provincial law. Am I right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think not, because this Act would not apply to such a case, as evidenced by section 3. It applies only to Dominion water-powers and lands and properties used in connection therewith.

On paragraph (m):

Mr. BUREAU: I should like some explanation in regard to the controlling of bond issues, and the appointments of a special commission to regulate and control the stock and bond issues. There exists in every province, I believe, a public utilities commission which has the control of those things, and this seems to contemplate a double service or at least a duplicated authority in the regulation of these matters, which is not in the public interest. It would not promote the advancement of any public utility as much as if there were one control.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is why the word "designating" is used—"for the appointing or the designating of the board or commission." For instance, Mr. Macdonald in Manitoba is Public Utilities Commissioner and we could either appoint him, or designate the Public Utilities Commission of Manitoba as the proper authority. I do not think it would be well, whether this Act contemplates it or not, to put ourselves wholly in a position where we must appoint only the public utilities commission of the province; because it is conceivable that the commission might act arbitrarily with regard to our property. Possibly there might be a provincial development competing with it, although it is not very probable. But the intention is to appoint the Public Utilities Commission, which is in the nature of a court of the province, as the controlling factor.

Mr. BUREAU: The case may be reversed: If this Dominion Board is competing with a private utility, it may be arbitrary in its proceedings. The objection that my hon. friend laid at the door of the provincial commission might exist in the case of a similar federal body.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we appoint a federal board it would have no jurisdiction at all over property provincially developed—property developed by, or entirely within, the province—

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —so the case could not be reversed. I think it is conceivable that a provincial commission which exercises authority over some provincial developments—for example, over street railways and other enterprises of that character—might act arbitrarily with regard to our property.

Mr. BUREAU: Hardly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is very unlikely.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the Dominion Government anticipate developing water-powers in the different provinces as a federal enterprise, or is it simply putting itself in a position under this Bill to control those rights and be able to sell them? I can see at once that if the Government, as a public ownership enterprise, is going to develop power and sell it to cities, towns, and individuals in the different provinces, a very serious situation is going to arise at once. Because if we can absolutely control this development by the Government in a province we can say that it shall be exempt from taxation. The Government can say, for example, "Any works that we construct in the province of Nova Scotia shall be free from taxation; we shall not be subject to school rates or any other rates in the province". That certainly cannot be contemplated, because when a property is built in a province it becomes ipso facto, I think, subject to the regulations of that province, so far as taxation is concerned for provincial purposes, etc. I point out to the minister that if the minister is going to develop these powers and intends to keep everything incidental to them within his own control he is bound to encounter a great deal of difficulty. If the minister is going to develop power on a large scale say, in some part of the province of Nova Scotia where the Government might own land, he might have a considerable village there consisting of men employed by the Government, having houses and requiring everything that any other village in the province would require. Now, if that village is entirely subject to the control of the Dominion Government the Provincial Parliament could not legislate in regard to it at all, and the provincial regulations in regard to assessment and all that pertains to the running of a city, town, or municipal district, would not apply. I think it should be clearly understood the moment any condition of that kind develops that community would be subject to the laws of the province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has forgotten for the moment section 3, the application section, which defines the area within which the Act shall apply. Nova Scotia water-powers would not come within it, consequently as to his province, or, indeed, any except the three Western Provinces, the point he makes could not arise.

Mr. McKENZIE: But it can arise in the West.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It can arise in the three Western Provinces. As a general matter of policy, we had not intended, and do not now intend, governmental development of these water-powers as Government undertakings. We intend to exercise control through a leasehold licensing system, but there may be specific instances where Dominion development is right and may be undertaken. For example, in Banff Park, which we own, it is indeed probable that there should be, and will be, a Dominion development to take the place of the present steam boiler that is utilized in the park. Then it is quite possible, as well, that in connection with the Winnipeg river power sites there may be a Dominion storage plant laid down—that is to say, the reservoir utilizable in connection with all the powers there may be Dominion owned; that is under consideration and may be a development of the future. So that while there may be exceptions, and very important exceptions, the general rule is to administer under private leaseholders licenses.

Mr. McMASTER: I want some further information about paragraph (m), because it seems to go very far. In saying that I do not wish to be regarded as opposing the principle of the paragraph, because I am rather favourable to it. The provision reads:

For regulating and controlling the stock and bond issues of persons establishing or conducting undertakings.

I think, first of all, the sort of undertakings should be mentioned; it must be undertakings in connection with power development.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Undertaking" is defined in the Bill.

Mr. McMASTER: Then perhaps it is not necessary to incorporate a definition in this paragraph. However, I would ask if the Government contemplates controlling a case such as this: Suppose a company acquires a certain Dominion water-power, by license or otherwise let us say, and manufactures boots and shoes, not conducting a public utility. In that case is it contemplated that the Government should supervise the company's issues of stock and bonds?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not necessarily; I should not think so in a case such as the hon. gentleman mentioned. But suppose the company is one that desires a power on the Grand Rapids say, a tremendous power, and it is the only one in the whole district. It may be the part of wisdom on the part of the Governor in Council to take control even to the extent of supervising the stock and bond issue in order to prevent concessions, so-called, given by the Crown, being exploited on the market for merely jobbing or private purposes. That is the idea. The stigma that frequently comes back on the administration is not that the concession itself originally was improper, but that it was used for improper purposes in order to exploit the public. We desire to shield ourselves against such an occurrence as that in advance.

Mr. McMASTER: You do, however, practically take such power under this paragraph?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: If any company wishes to develop power obtained from the Dominion Government for the purpose of furnishing motive power for its industry, it may have to lay all its internal financing before the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a thing that may work both ways. My hon. friend says he wants to protect the general public from being fleeced by the issue of stocks?

Mr. MEIGHEN: And protect the department too.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. BUREAU: The department would not be affected very much; it owns the power and if the parties did not live up to the terms of their lease the department could cancel the lease and grant the privilege to somebody else. But there is another thing: We must not forget that it is within the power of the Governor in Council in such cases as these to ruin a man also. The Governor in Council might say to that man when he wants to make certain improvements that are necessary: No, this is the end of your bond issue, and we cut your credit therefore to the wall. The power to do that ought not to exist. I think the public are well able to take care of themselves. When they are fleeced they do not cry it from the housetops, but generally conceal the fact.

I think they know well enough that water-powers have been generally well developed, and they know what the possibilities are, and I think it would be hampering the proper administration of the undertaking to have such a clause as this. I understand that the Government may think they are impeccable, but, on the other hand, the public does not seem to think so. This restriction would prevent the sale of bonds at as a high a price as otherwise might be secured because there is this power of the Governor in Council to step in and regulate or handle the stock over the heads of the directors, or of the stockholders. I do not think it is wise to insert such a clause.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not opposed to the idea that the Government should retain control of valuable privileges which it disposes of to anybody; but I do see the danger which has been pointed out by the member for Three Rivers. Let us suppose that the Governor in Council were not fair in regard to the limitations placed upon the proposed issue of stock and bonds; the company would be without redress. The Government, representing the people, would be judge and jury and one of the parties to the case.

Mr. BUREAU: Safety first.

Mr. McMASTER: I would ask the minister to consider the wisdom, in such a case as I have outlined, of giving to the company which is asking for the privilege the right to appeal to the Supreme Court from the decision of the Governor in Council. I think the minister will understand what my fear is, that a company might possibly consider that the regulation was too onerous and was not giving it a fair chance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This power would be exercised mainly in the case of the establishing of undertakings. That is to say, as a part of the negotiations for the acquirement of the lease certain stipulations will be laid down. Now, the company knows it must abide by those stipulations, and if it does not want to do so it does not need to take the lease; consequently it could not complain of any hardship. It might be, though, that a company having acquired its lease, desired afterwards to change its stock issue, so as to readjust itself on a proper financial foundation, and I do not think it would be taking any chances in submitting that stock issue to the control of the Governor in Council. Without this clause that company might take its concession and get far enough away, and by exploiting the public, cause a hue and cry to be raised that the public resources were being squandered to enable friends of the Government to make a profit. We want to insure ourselves against that in advance. The mere terms upon which a stock or bond issue may be made do not involve the possibility of confiscation, or what was once called "conscription of wealth." It is merely a matter of regulation—something with regard to which, if the company's intentions are honest, it is not going to be deprived of, its legitimate rights. Otherwise, of course, there should be an appeal to the Exchequer Court. But this is not a case of that nature. It does not contemplate that the Governor in Council shall have power to wipe out the company's property at all; it merely gives power to stipulate what stock and bond issues shall be made, and the like of that. So it seems to me there is scarcely any necessity for appeal to the Exchequer Court. I would have no objection to it but for the fact that it would very probably render cumbersome and, consequently, not of much value, the power we seek here.

Mr. PARENT: The regulation does not seem to control the salaries paid to those managing the company. There might be restrictions as to the amount of securities, bonds and stocks, and at the same time enormous salaries might be paid to the officers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think we ought to regulate that. That is merely a matter of internal management. All we want to guard against is that they do not take our concession as a mere promoting enterprise.

Mr. McMASTER: I can understand that sometimes it may be a little troublesome to have an appeal, but let me draw to the attention of the Committee this fact. Some time ago a price for newsprint was set by the Governor in Council, and, whether it was well founded or not, a very strong protest was made by the pulp-mills of this country, with the result that the Government thought it wise to appoint a commissioner to sit as judge and decide whether the price limitation was just. On the one hand we want to avoid—and the minister is trying to do that, and I absolutely approve of his action—the dissipation of the public domain in private hands by exploiters who make for themselves money which should belong to the people; but at the same time I think that any safeguard should be effected in such a way that the parties will feel they have had a square deal, and if they are dissatisfied with the decision of the Minister of the Governor in Council, an appeal to the Supreme Court will convince them that they are being fairly treated.

Mr. BUREAU: We all know that railways are about the most useful public utility we now have, and in the charters of the railway companies we stipulate that they shall not bond their railways more than so much per mile. Why not insert in the leases or licenses granted by the Government that the maximum amount of bonds to be issued shall be determined per horsepower? That would regulate the thing completely. We do not meddle with the stock of railway companies, we let them issue it as they want to. As to their bonds, we limit their borrowing capacity to so much per mile. There we have a unit, as we have a unit here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think a moment's reflection will convince the hon. member that that will be impossible. For example, a company formed to develop power on the river at the Lake of the Woods would first of all perhaps develop, say, 10,000 horsepower, but the company must be organized with a view to an ultimate development of 100,000 horsepower. Now, if you are going to regulate their stock issue on the basis of power development you would have to be regulating their issues all the time, because they are developing their power from year to year.

Mr. BUREAU: Not on the developed horse-power, but on the estimated horsepower. The railways do not borrow their money on the constructed mileage, but on the mileage specified in the charter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the company would have to make its stock issue simply on the basis of whatever potentiality there was in the river on which they were operating.

Mr. BUREAU: Not necessarily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So many circumstances might intervene that you could not possibly adopt any rule. It may depend on the purpose they are going to use it for. For example, if they are going to contribute their power for thirty or forty miles —and in the case of the Lake of the Woods Company they may very shortly be distributing electric energy up to sixty or eighty miles—then they will require a greater capitalization—

Mr. BUREAU: That would be within your power to provide for.

Mr. MEIGHEN:—than they would if they were going to use it merely for the running of a mill on their own property. You get back to the investigation of each individual case, as surrounded by its own circumstances.

Mr. BUREAU: There is provision here for surveys to determine the potentiality of the water-power and what it ought to be leased for. I suppose in the lease it is stipulated that these people shall be obliged to develop so much horse-power. That could be the basis for determining the bond or stock issue—if the power is for a mill, say so many thousand dollars per horse-power; if it is for distribution, increase the amount per horse-power, just as we regulate the issue of bonds by railways according to the difficulties of the ground they have to traverse, the number of bridges they have to build, and the cost of the land they have to acquire for a right of way. The man who takes out a lease is going to state to the Government what the power to be generated will be used for, and the Government is going to bind that man to do certain things within a certain time under penalty of forfeiture. The purpose for which the power is acquired is well-known; therefore it would be easy for the lessor to determine, according to his judgment and according to the potentiality of power and the service to be rendered, the amount of bonds that should be issued per horse-power.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You cannot set in advance the value of this power. Different sites require different kinds of development, and we cannot arbitrarily fix in the Act a minimum or maximum—

Mr. BUREAU: Not in the Act, in the lease. Instead of saying "regulating and controlling," say "determining in the lease" the amount of stocks and bonds which may be issued.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we do that in the lease, then the provision stands and cannot be changed. We want to be able to change it as the development proceeds. I think the provision is all right as it is.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think so.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Has the Federal Government power to expropriate water-powers in the eastern provinces? I know it has so far as some of the western provinces are concerned, but I should like to know with regard to Ontario and the east.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it has not.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the minister intend, then, to leave this sub-clause as it is?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is better as it is. If we bind ourselves only to make the regulation in the lease as to what stock issues shall be made in each individual case, we should have to change the lease in order to enable a larger issue. I move that section 12 be amended by adding after the word "undertakings" on line 13, page 8 of the Bill, the word "and."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was not in the House when section 4 was dealt with. This section is capable of taking away all that people may have acquired or owned by prescriptive right and have held in their possession for, say, sixty years. I do not think it should go that far. In many places throughout the country squatters have acquired certain rights by holding property a long term of years, and it would be a pity to deprive them of those rights.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I may point out that this clause was carried with a slight amendment: The word "Dominion" was added after the word "water-powers" on the first line. It applies now only to Dominion water-powers.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is what I had in mind. Certain powers and lands may belong to the Dominion so far as legal title is concerned, but persons may have acquired rights with regard to them, and to be deprived of those rights would be a very serious matter for these people. This Act knocks everything out unless such people have a grant from the Crown.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think such people have any right to a water-power unless they have a grant from the Crown. Prescription, of course, does not run against the Crown, as the hon. member knows. It is true that the Crown recognizes squatters' rights, but it would be hard to imagine how a man could acquire squatter's rights on a water-power.

Mr. McKENZIE: Suppose a man has a mill, and that he has a race, as it is called, from the river or from a fall to his mill; and suppose he has been operating that mill for twenty, thirty or sixty years. Would it not be very serious for him if that power was cut off from his mill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not say that. We simply assert that this is our property —and it is ours whether we assert it or not. That man cannot say that he owns it. We are not taking anything from him that he owns. He is merely an interloper, a man who has assumed to use a property of the Crown without saying "by your leave." He does not get any prescriptive right. Consequently, we take no right.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister must recognize the fact that in any province in Canada sixty years' possession is absolutely good against the Crown. The term used to be twenty years, but the famous Emmerson land case from New Brunswick reversed the old law. That is the law in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and, I think, in Ontario. What is to be said after a man has had possession of such a right as I mention for sixty years if that right is to be taken away? Even if he has had possession for a shorter period, I do not think the arbitrary measures which the minister desired to take should be tolerated. If a man went away into the woods and built a mill which was of the greatest possible utility for the settlement and he owned that mill for a long time, he should be considered as improving land in the West. The rights of squatters have always been considered, and they have been paid for any improvements they have made. The same right should be extended to any man who has acquired using powers of that kind for a long time, and who has meant no harm by his action. He should not be ruined by the application of this law, but should have some consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I must take exception with the hon. member on his law. In New Brunswick there may have been provincial, or even pre-Confederation legislation which acknowledged, even as against the Crown, a possessory title after twenty years at one time and sixty years now. But apart from statutory concession, there is no prescription as against the Crown, and there is no statutory concession in Dominion law, so that there cannot be any prescriptive right in the three provinces to which this Bill applies. Therefore, the section as it stands takes away nothing that the holder has.

Mr. McKENZIE: Even in that case, does the minister think that the Government should stand absolutely on its legal rights and take away a man's property without any consideration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This does not say that it shall be taken way. It is not his property now. It is quite true that if we found a man in possession and properly using a water-power and that he had used it for a long time, that man would have the preference as regards the leasing of that power, but all this Bill says is: We now assert that this property is ours. We do not say that we will throw the man out. It is for us to say what we shall do with the property.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the preamble carry?

Mr. BUREAU: I should like to know where the preamble is in this Bill. We do not want to carry a thing that does not exist.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill does not need any.

Mr. BUREAU: Then we do not need to carry it.

The CHAIRMAN: Certainly there is no preamble to the Bill, but in a Bill in which there is no preamble, an opportunity for discussion of the principle is always given on the enacting clause. An enacting clause is in this Bill as in all others.

Mr. BUREAU: Bourinot says that there shall be the title, the preamble, and statement of the enacting authority, so I thought I would not vote for a thing that did not exist.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the enacting clause carry?

Enacting clause agreed to.

HOUSING SCHEME—$25,000,000 LOAN.

STATEMENT BY HON. MR. ROWELL AS TO POLICY OF GOVERNMENT.

Loan of $25,000,000 to provincial governments to encourage the erection of dwelling houses in congested districts throughout Canada, on the terms and conditions set forth in the Order in Council of the 3rd of December, 1918—the amount of loan to any one province not to exceed the proportion of the said $25,000,000 which the population of the said province bears to the total population of Canada, as shown by the last federal census.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL: As this proposal constitutes a very important part of the Government programme of reconstruction for this year, it is but due to the Committee and the country that I should briefly outline the proposals of the Government. The members of the Committee will recall that during the four years of the war, building operations so far at least as they related to the building of private houses, largely ceased in many cities, while in others they were very materially curtailed. So that we find ourselves at the close of the war in arrears in the normal erection of dwellings in our principal cities throughout Canada. Besides this, the war had the effect of stimulating early marriages. A large number of young men, who enlisted from the English-speaking provinces, married earlier in life than was the custom prior to the war. Not only did large numbers marry in Canada, but many thousands married in Great Britain, and they are now returning to Canada with their wives. These married soldiers, particularly those who enlisted in the larger cities and a number of our towns, are finding it exceedingly difficult if not impossible to secure homes on their return to Canada, with the result that there has been a very great demand for increased housing accommodation. We all recognize that the home is the unit of the nation, and that it is in the national interest that a man may have opportunity to rear his family in a comfortable house of his own, equipped with modern sanitary conveniences. The fact that a man owns his own home undoubtedly induces him to take a more practical interest in the affairs of the country and thus tends to the strength and stability of our national life.

Good housing has a great deal to do with good health. It has a great deal to do with the whole character and tone of the community, and we in Canada should guard against the repetition of what has happened in so many of the cities of the Old World where slum conditions have developed with consequent deterioration in the character of the population. However, the primary reason why the Government decided to take action was the demand for increased housing accommodation due to the return of the soldiers to Canada, and that fact made it a matter that came within the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament and one in which the Government must take a very lively interest.

Another consideration was the importance of providing employment, under conditions that would really add to the national wealth and the strength of the nation, for the many men who might be thrown out of employment through the cessation of war activities. Obviously, if building operations could be stimulated on a substantial scale in many of the cities and towns of Canada, suitable employment for workingmen would thus be found at remunerative wages, which would prevent the growth of unemployment and so safeguard the national interest. For these reasons the Government decided, after the conference held with the provincial premiers who gathered in the city of Ottawa about the latter part of November last, to take action along the lines indicated in the resolution.

Before going into the resolution I should like to point out that action to secure the same object was taken by the Government of Great Britain. Action for not quite the same object, but dealing with the housing problem in another aspect, was taken by the United States. The British Government, as hon. members will recall, for many years, by its legislation and by its administrative measures, has been endeavouring to improve the housing accommodation in the United Kingdom, and one of the existing departments there has been organized with a view to providing advice and assistance to municipalities throughout Great Britain in laying out improved sites for town planning and in erecting houses along modern lines. That machinery has been utilized as the basis for the British Government's present proposal. What is contemplated is the erection of three hundred thousand houses—that is the objective, the minimum number, the British Government has in view. The British Government is not erecting these houses itself, but is loaning money to municipalities throughout the country that will embark in municipal housing schemes. It is also loaning money to housing companies, with restricted dividends, on favourable terms, in order that they may erect comfortable houses for the workingmen of Great Britain. I believe it is estimated that those houses will each cost on an average about £500, or $2,500. Hon. gentlemen will see what an enormous expenditure it would involve on the part of the Government of Great Britain if no less than three hundred thousand houses are erected at an estimated expenditure of $2,500 each. But the British Government look upon that expenditure, which is a loan, as I have explained, to municipalities and housing companies, as not only being in the national interest but as being necessary in order to improve social conditions. I know we all realize that conditions in Canada are very different from conditions in Great Britain, but nevertheless there is a shortage of houses in the Dominion for people of moderate means which this proposal is intended to meet. Personally, I do not think the federal, provincial, or municipal governments can contribute more largely to improve social conditions than by aiding in a housing programme which will ensure the erection of suitable houses equipped with modern conveniences, and with adequate breathing space and playgrounds around them where children may have an opportunity of breathing the fresh air of heaven. I do not know of any way in which they can contribute better to the social welfare of the country than by adopting this method.

With these objects in view the Government passed an Order in Council on the 3rd of December, 1918, to give effect to the decision which was arrived at at the Interprovincial Conference. I have had a large number of copies of this Order in Council distributed to hon. gentlemen so that they may have the opportunity of carefully studying its provisions. The Order in Council which was made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, recites the reasons for making this loan. First, it refers to the Interprovincial Conference recently held in Ottawa between premiers and other members of the governments of the several provinces and members of the Dominion Government. One of the important objects discussed at the conference was that of creating better housing conditions for the industrial population of our larger centres. Then it is pointed out that owing to the cessation of building operations during the war there is at present a great scarcity of housing accommodation in most of our cities, and that this condition will become intensified with the return of our soldiers from overseas and their re-establishment with their families in civil life and occupation. The Order proceeds:

In view of the national importance of the matter, which touches vitally the health, morals and general well-being of the entire community, and its relation to the welfare of returned soldiers and their families, together with the fact that the carrying out of such a policy on a substantial scale by provincial governments would afford considerable employment during the period of reconstruction and readjustment of industry following the war, the minister recommends as follows:

And the Committee will see here the practical proposals upon which the vote is asked to be granted:

1. That the Minister of Finance be authorized under the provisions of the War Measures Act upon request of the government of any province of Canada to make loans to such government for the purpose mentioned.

That is the purpose I have already outlined in the preamble:

2. That the aggregate amount to be loaned to all provinces shall not exceed $25,000,000 and the amount of loan to any one province shall not exceed the proportion of the said $25,000,000 which the population of the said province bears to the total population of Canada.

3. That the loans made hereunder may be for a period not exceeding twenty years, with the right to any province to pay off the whole or any part of the principle of the loan at any time during the said term.

4. That interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, payable half-yearly shall be charged upon advances from the dates thereof respectively.

5. The Minister of Finance may accept bonds, debentures, or such other form of security as he may approve evidencing the indebtedness of any provincial government for loans made hereunder.

6. Advances shall be made from the War Appropriation.

7. Advances may be made as soon as a general scheme of housing shall have been agreed upon between the Government of Canada and the government of the province applying for a loan hereunder.

I would like to point out in passing that the rate of interest at five per cent is a lower rate than the rate at which the Government could borrow the money. The Government to that extent was rendering direct practical assistance towards the construction of houses under this programme. If the provincial governments loan at the same rate of interest, it means that the working man, particularly the returned soldier, will be able to acquire his house and lot at a rate of interest on the investment very much below the rate at which he could possibly secure it under existing conditions from private sources.

Of course, at the present time—indeed, at any time a workman could not expect to get nearly the full amount necessary to purchase the property and erect the house. If he did get the full amount it would be only by means of a second mortgage on which he would have to pay a very high rate of interest. To arrange for a rate of interest of not more than 5 per cent on the total amount that he is called upon to borrow from the Provincial Government is a very substantial contribution by this Government to the building cost.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Is it intended to restrict the provinces to that rate of interest, or to give them liberty of action to charge more if they so desire?

Mr. ROWELL: We have not imposed any restriction on the Provincial Governments, but I understand they are loaning at that rate. We all recognize that the cost of building at the present time is greater than it was before the war, and it is greater now than we hope it will be when we get back to anything like normal conditions. Therefore the man who builds a house at the present time is called upon to put more money into it than the property may be worth in four or five years when values come back to something more approaching normal. Consequently, if the State is to encourage the building of houses at this time it is necessary that it should make some contribution. When it has arranged for repayment of the loan over a period of twenty years and fixed the interest at 5 per cent, it seems to me, the Government has rendered substantial assistance.

The other clause to which I desire to draw particular attention is No. 7:

7. Advances may be made as soon as a general scheme of housing shall have been agreed upon between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province applying for a loan hereunder.

The Government had in view not only assisting the provision of houses, but the importance of insuring that those houses would be of a certain standard as to size or rooms, air space, size of the site, and sanitary conditions. In short, they had in view the direct object of improving the housing conditions, particularly in our larger cities. Therefore they stipulated that before any money could be advanced a housing scheme must be agreed upon between the Provincial and Federal Governments.

In order to work out the provisions of that Order in Council, that is, to take up with the Provincial Governments and endeavour to agree with them upon housing schemes, a further Order in Council was passed on the 12th of December, 1918. Hon. members will find it in the pamphlet already distributed. By the way, this Order also was made on the recommendation of the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White). It says:

> The Minister observes that in view of the national importance of adequate and suitable housing accommodation, which affects vitally the health, morals, and general well-being of the entire community, it is desirable that the financial assistance thus provided should be utilized at the earliest possible date in the provision of the housing accommodation contemplated by the said Order in Council.
> The Minister further observes that it is therefore desirable that a Committee of the Cabinet should be appointed to be known as the Housing Committee, which shall be authorized to take up without delay with the several Provinces of Canada the question of their need for additional housing accommodation and the housing programme they have in view in order to secure an early agreement with the said provinces under which the said moneys may be utilized for housing purposes.
> The Minister therefore recommends:—
> 1. That there be constituted a Committee of the Privy Council known as the Housing Committee, consisting of the following members:—
> Hon. Mr. Rowell, President of the Privy Council;
> Hon. Mr. Robertson, Minister of Labour;
> Hon. Mr. Maclean, Vice-President of the Reconstruction and Development Committee of Canada;
> Hon. Mr. Crerar, Minister of Agriculture.
> The Honourable Mr. Rowell is to be Chairman of the Committee.
> 2. That this Committee formulate the general principles which should be followed in any housing schemes in order to secure the results aimed at by the said Order in Council.
> That the Committee communicate with the Governments of the several Provinces of Canada in reference to the matters above mentioned with a view to agreeing with the Governments of the said Provinces, respectively, upon any such general schemes of housing, so that the moneys provided by the said Order in Council of December 3, 1918, may be applied for the purposes contemplated by the said Order.
> 4. That the Committee be authorized and empowered to do and perform all such further acts as may be necessary in order to carry out and give full effect to the said Order in Council of December 3, 1918.
> The Minister further recommends that the said Committee be authorized to secure the assistance and co-operation of Mr. Thomas Adams, the Town Planning Expert of the Commission of Conservation, and of any other person or persons specially qualified to advise or assist the said Committee in carrying on its work.

Pursuant to that Order in Council, the Committee did take up the question of the principles to be embodied in the housing schemes which the Federal Government might be asked to approve. Drafts of those principles were furnished to all the Provincial Governments, and received consideration at the hands of those Governments. Some modifications were suggested, but on the whole the principles as laid down and submitted by the Committee were accepted. An Order in Council was then passed setting out those principles. The members of the Committee will find this third Order in Council at page 9 of the pamphlet. The important clause of this Order is No. 2:

> The Housing Committee observe that they have submitted the general principles to the Governments of all the provinces, and requested suggestions from the said Governments, with reference thereto, and after duly considering all such suggestions, the Committee submit the following statement and report, and recommend the approval thereof by Your Excellency in Council, and further recommend that upon approval, copies of said memorandum be furnished the Governments of the said Provinces of Canada.

Now, what are these principles which underlie the Government's housing policy and which must be embodied in the policies of the different Provincial Governments? You will find a statement of the object the Government has in view at the top of page 10:

> (1) General object in view.—The object of the Government in making provision for a loan of $25,000,000 at 5 per cent to the Provincial Governments for housing purposes is—(a) to promote the erection of dwelling houses of modern character to relieve congestion of population in cities and towns; (b) to put within the reach of all working men, particularly returned soldiers, the opportunity of acquiring their own homes at actual cost of the building and land acquired at a fair value, thus eliminating the profits of the speculator; (c) to contribute to the general health and well-being of the community by encouraging suitable town planning and housing schemes.
> (2) Promotion of Housing Schemes matter for Provincial and Municipal Jurisdiction.—The provision of houses, so far as it may be regarded as a public duty, is a matter which comes more properly within the jurisdiction of the provinces and municipalities, and in ordinary circumstances, the question of what regulations should be imposed, and what policy should be adopted, in regard to the administration of housing schemes, are matters for these Governments. As the Federal Government will lend the money on the general security of each province, it is not necessary to impose financial regulations as to the means which should be employed to safeguard the loans.
> Conditions on which Loans will be Granted by the Federal Government.
> Having regard however, to the responsibility incurred by the Federal Government in providing the money, and to the object for which the money is proposed to be lent, loans will be made to the Provincial Governments on the following four conditions:—

1. Approval of General Provisions.—Each province shall prepare and submit to the Federal Government for approval, a general housing scheme; setting out the standards and conditions to be complied with in connection with local housing schemes. The general scheme of each province should include a schedule of minimum standards in regard to grouping of houses, provision of open spaces, sizes and heights of houses, sizes and heights of rooms, provision of light and ventilation, heating, lighting, character of materials, etc., which it is proposed should be enforced as the minimum requirements for health, comfort and convenience.

Each province, before it can obtain a loan from the Federal Government, must submit its housing scheme, setting out the particulars with regard to the administration of its own housing proposals.

The second condition is in regard to the maximum cost of dwellings. As the object of the Federal Government was to ensure that workingmen particularly returned soldiers and men of limited means, should have the full advantage of this loan, the Government decided that no money loaned by it should be used for the building of large houses for people who could well afford to build their own houses. The Government, therefore, imposed these restrictions as to the amount that could be loaned on any house:—

2. Maximum cost of dwellings, etc.—The object of the Federal Government being to facilitate the erection of dwellings at a moderate cost suitable for working men, particularly returned soldiers, it is necessary to place a maximum on the amount which may be loaned per dwelling, and the following maximum has been fixed having regard to the conditions existing in the different Provinces.

(a) Detached or semi-detached dwellings with walls constructed wholly or partly of frame, stucco on frame, brick veneer, inclusive of the capital value of the site and necessary local improvements:—

With 4 or 5 rooms exclusive of bathroom and summer kitchen, $3,000.

Having regard to the present cost of building, it was considered that that was a fair amount for a house of that size and character:—

With 6 or 7 rooms exclusive of bathroom and summer kitchen, $3,500.

(b) Detached, semi-detached, groups of three or more or duplex (cottage flat) dwellings with walls of brick, hollow-tile, stone or concrete and roofing of fire-proof materials, inclusive of the capital value of the site and necessary local improvements:—

With 4 or 5 rooms exclusive of bathroom and summer kitchen, $4,000.

With 6 or 7 rooms exclusive of bathroom and summer kitchen, $4,500.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Does "dwelling" here mean a building which may contain several families, or a building which will contain only one family?

Mr. ROWELL: A dwelling containing only one family. Provision is made for flats, which, of course, may contain two families. With reference to the limitation of the amounts that may be loaned to any one building a house of the character mentioned in this condition, the provinces which so far have taken advantage of the scheme have accepted these limits, except Ontario. Ontario originally fixed their standards at a lower figure than this. They put the maximum amount that might be expended in a building at a somewhat lower figure than ours.

Mr. BELAND: Before the Order in Council was passed?

Mr. ROWELL: After the Order in Council was passed. All we require is that the amount shall not exceed the amount stated; those who take advantage of the loan may accept less if they see fit. I say, Ontario fixed their maximum at a lower figure than this, but since then they have revised their figures and have now fixed as their maximum the figures mentioned in this Order in Council:

(3) Ownership of land.—Public money may be advanced for building houses on sites owned by:—

(a) The Provincial Government or municipality.

(b) Housing Societies or Companies comprising groups of citizens associated to promote good housing, supplied with proper improvements; such Societies or Companies to have not more than a statutory limitation of dividends payable on stock of 6 per cent.

(c) Owners of lots for the purpose of erecting houses for their own occupancy.

The reasons for limiting the use of the Government money to loans on properties of the classes mentioned were the following. In the first place, if the province itself or the municipality was prepared to undertake a housing scheme, to provide dwellings at cost for workingmen and returned soldiers, we were glad to advance money for that purpose. If they did not agree to go into it for themselves, or if they went into it only partially, and public-spirited citizens who desired to improve housing conditions and who were prepared to limit their dividends to six per cent would form housing companies in order to promote good housing, the moneys might be loaned to such housing companies. But it was not the intention to lend the money to men interested in real estate speculation or to builders for speculative purposes. Then the terms of the loan follow:

(4) Terms of years for repayment of loans.—The Federal loan will be repayable by the Province over a period of twenty years. Provided that in order to encourage the erection of more durable buildings, and to bring the financial terms within reach of a large number of workers, the period of 20 years may be extended to 30 years in respect of any portion of the loan which the Provincial Government may decide to re-lend for thirty years for such purposes as purchasing land or erecting buildings under the above class. Repayments by the Provinces on account of Federal Loans may be made quarterly if so desired, or otherwise as may be agreed upon.

These are the four conditions which the Federal Government imposes in connection with loans to any of the provinces. But we have recommended to the provinces that they themselves should impose certain standards in their housing schemes, and the provinces which have taken advantage of the loan have largely followed these standards.

Mr. McMASTER: What provinces so far have taken advantage of it?

Mr. ROWELL: Ontario and British Columbia have submitted their housing schemes, and these have been duly approved. The province of Quebec has submitted its housing scheme, and only one small matter requires consideration before it is approved. Manitoba has submitted its scheme; the general principles have been agreed upon and I believe it is about to be approved. New Brunswick passed the necessary legislation last session; it has prepared its scheme, which is now under consideration. Nova Scotia passed an Act at the last session of its legislature to take advantage of the loan, but has not yet submitted its scheme.

Mr. McMASTER: All their schemes must be based upon this?

Mr. ROWELL: They are all based on this; they must comply with the four conditions. Before these conditions were laid down they were submitted to all the provinces for their consideration and for any suggestions which they might like to make before the conditions were agreed upon. I believe that Prince Edward Island also has submitted its scheme. Alberta and Saskatchewan are the only two provinces which have not intimated that they intend to take advantage of the loan.

Mr. FIELDING: In the case of the formation of a housing company as described by the minister, the company may remain the landlord provided they do not take a dividend in excess of six per cent?

Mr. ROWELL: That is correct. I shall not go through the various general principles and standards which are recommended to the provinces. Hon. members will find them on pages 11, 12, 13 and 14 of the Order in Council. I will, however, mention two which appear to be of particular importance. Number 1 is:

Acquisition of Sites, etc.—The success of the housing movement depends upon the acquirement of suitable land at its fair value, and at a cost which working men can afford to pay. It is essential, therefore, that statutory provision shall be made by the provinces for a cheap and speedy method of compulsory taking of the land required for housing purposes. To facilitate proper planning and to secure economy in connection with housing schemes comparatively large sites should as a rule be chosen so as to permit of comprehensive treatment. Such sites should be conveniently accessible to places of employment, means of transportation, water supply, sewers and other public utilities.

It is the first part of the clause to which I direct attention. All who have taken an interest in this question of housing, particularly for workingmen, must realize that one of the difficulties in our larger cities is the very high cost of land, especially in the majority of our larger cities. Add to this the high cost of building, and you have such a charge upon the workingman's income as to make it difficult for him to live in such a house as he and his family should be entitled to live in. If you must proceed by expropriation of land for a housing scheme—I am speaking now particularly from the standpoint of Ontario, with the laws of which I am familiar—if you took proceedings under the law regarding expropriation, and you had finally to pay what might thus be decided, after hearing experts on both sides, one boosting the price up and the other trying to beat it down, you would delay the operation of the scheme so that you would not secure the desired result. The Government, therefore, suggest this proposition. I know Ontario has adopted it; I do not know how far the other provinces have done so, but they have provided a cheap and speedy method of settling the value of property where they require to expropriate. The other principle to which I desire to direct attention is No. 4 which reads:

Limit of income of persons to be provided with dwellings.—In order to ensure that the money shall be loaned to those who most need it, no person in receipt of an income exceeding $3,000 per annum should be eligible as a purchaser or tenant of a house erected with the aid of Government funds in any schemes carried out by provincial governments, municipalities, housing associations or owners of lots.

We do not stipulate that as a condition, but we suggest to the provinces that they should stipulate it as a condition in order that a man of means, who can afford to pay a higher rate of interest and get the money from private sources, should not use this money which is intended for different purposes.

Mr. CAHILL: Have the provinces not done so in contracts they have made?

Mr. ROWELL: I think Quebec has imposed it as a compulsory condition. Some of the provinces have recommended it to the municipalities. I do not at present sufficiently recall the different housing schemes to speak accurately.

Mr. CAHILL: These are only recommendations and do not necessarily form part of the contract between the Dominion Government and the provinces?

Mr. ROWELL: No, but the majority of the provinces have embodied them in their housing schemes, and in the majority of cases they are imposing them on the municipalities.

Mr. CAHILL: I thought the minister said that only Quebec had done so.

Mr. ROWELL: I am speaking generally of the scheme. Quebec has imposed this particular condition, and some of the other provinces have made it a recommendation. I cannot recall what each of the provinces has done.

Mr. SHEARD: Is there any process of law in contemplation by which, when a workingman pays the $3,000 or whatever the amount may be for his house, he can sell it at some future time to any one he chooses?

Mr. ROWELL: We do not impose any conditions as to that. The Provincial Government must decide that matter itself in dealing with the municipalities.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In the event that Alberta does not indicate its intention——

Mr. McMASTER: Will the hon. member speak louder? We on this side cannot hear what is being said.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Talk less, and you will hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think that is a most discourteous remark in answer to a very reasonable request.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In the event—

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. McMASTER: I would ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The point of order raised by the hon. member (Mr. McMaster) seems to be that he has drawn upon himself a discourteous remark from an hon. member upon the other side of the House. One of the rules of the House and of the Committee is that members should always address the Chair. If the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) had first addressed the Chair, there would have been no possible occasion for the remark and I am quite willing to draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. H. A. Mackie) to the fact that he also should have addressed to the Chair any remark which he desired to make. I did not understand that his remarks were directed to the hon. member for Brome nor that he said anything derogatory to the reputation or honour of the hon. member.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In the event that Alberta does not indicate its intention of taking the benefit of this money which is to be paid over to the provinces in proportion to population, what will the Dominion Government do regarding that province?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not see that the Dominion Government can do anything. This is a loan to the provinces, and it cannot be lent to any individual nor can the vote here be divided. If the province does not take advantage of this at once, it is up to the people of that province to endeavour to get their Government to take advantage of it.

Mr. COWAN: Has the minister received any communication from either Saskatchewan or Alberta as to why they have not accepted this? Have they any particular objection to the housing scheme? Is it not a fact that in those western provinces, for instance, in the province of Sas-

9 p.m. katchewan, that the big trouble is not that they object to the scheme—for I think practically everybody is agreed to it—but that they find it difficult to put it into operation because the municipalities have not power to deal with the loaning of money as the scheme provides because they have to go to the burgesses before they could lend this money? Is not that a fact?

Mr. J. R. WILSON: I think I can strengthen the point. Apparently, under this housing scheme as drafted the Dominion Government lends the money to the provinces, putting the responsibility on the provinces. The Provincial Government of Saskatchewan, as I understand the matter, wishes to pass the financial responsibility on to the municipalities or the cities, and the cities at the present time, owing to rapid development in the past, have pretty well taken up their borrowing powers and do not think they should assume this additional burden, as they look on it as a national scheme. That is the crux of the whole situation.

Mr. ROWELL: I have heard, through the premier of Saskatchewan, that that is the view of some of the important municipalities in that province. The difficulty, however, as to their exceeding their borrowing limits is one that could be met by legislation of the province. Their borrowing limits are fixed by the legislature of the province, and if it was considered in the interest of the province that their borrowing powers should be enlarged for this particular purpose I think the legislature would have the right to do that.

I have only one word to say in conclusion, and then I shall be glad to answer any further questions. It is a matter of gratification to the Government that the proposals they have submitted to the provincial governments have been received so sympathetically and that the Provincial Governments have evidenced a desire to co-operate most heartily with the Federal Government in working out the plan. Our proposal here is being watched with the greatest interest in the United States. The National Government in the United States did not proceed on the lines on which we are proceeding. As a war measure, they started in themselves to build a large number of houses, primarily for their own employees in connection with the various national enterprises upon which the United States had embarked. They have spent tens of millions of dollars in erecting houses themselves, and have certainly put up some very creditable houses or flats for their employees in the city of Washington and other places. It will be of interest to the House, I am sure, to know the views of one of the leading firms of architects in the United States who had charge of the housing programme of the Ordnance Department. Upon receiving a copy of our proposals the firm of Mann and MacNeille expressed their view as follows:

> We wish to express our unqualified admiration for the completeness, practicability and simplicity of the administration methods outlined in the data received from you. We believe this to be the most practicable step toward the provision of good housing by Federal co-operation which has yet been taken in any country.

That is the testimony of leading architects in the United States who have been concerned with the work of the United States in providing houses for their own employees. With that information, I submit the matter to the Committee.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Did the Government of Alberta give any reason to this Government for not adopting this scheme?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think so. My recollection is that they simply intimated that they did not desire to take advantage of the plan at the present time. I do not recall the exact phraseology, but that was the substance of it.

Mr. CAHILL: The Orders in Council quoted in this pamphlet refer more particularly to the returned soldiers, but in the general recommendations there is no reference made to him. There is absolutely no provision whatever for the returned soldier in the agreement between the Dominion Government and the provinces.

Mr. ROWELL: The returned soldier was the whole reason for the programme.

Mr. CAHILL: But no provision is made for him direct.

Mr. ROWELL: Had it not been for the returned soldier there would have been no housing programme at all.

Mr. CAHILL: At the risk of sending the minister into heroics again over the returned soldier, I would ask if there is any provision in the contract between the Dominion and the provincial Governments whereby the returned soldier, or even the labouring man, has any preference over anybody else. What is the contract? We want to know what this money is being voted for. As it is now, we are simply handing over the money to the provincial governments without any contract at all.

Mr. ROWELL: The whole programme is induced by the necessity or desirability of making provision for the returned soldier. The question whether the returned soldier alone should receive the benefit of the scheme, or whether it should apply to the returned soldier and other men similarly situated, is a matter left to the provinces. The scheme submitted by the province of British Columbia, as I recall it now, is limited absolutely to the returned soldier.

The Ontario scheme provides for both, within the limits here mentioned as to the amount of loan, the ownership of the property, and income.

Mr. CAHILL: If all the provinces limited the scheme to the returned soldier, is there any too much money to take care of him alone? There are something like 300,000 or 400,000 returned soldiers, and when they are taken care of how much money will there be left? If this scheme is for the returned soldier, let that be understood, and let us make an agreement to that effect with the provinces. If not, why quote the returned soldier for the sake of handing over this money from the Dominion Government to the provinces. The Government claims to make the loan for the benefit of the returned soldier, but he is left out of the contract entirely.

Mr. COWAN: I hope we have not reached the point in the Dominion of Canada where we have no faith in the Provincial Governments giving proper or even preferential treatment to the returned soldier. I am prepared to take the Government of Saskatchewan on faith, even though their politics are not of the stripe that mine have been in days gone by. I believe no provincial government in Canada, Quebec included, would do anything else but put the returned soldier in the first place in all its legislation. I do not think there is any reason why we should go into heroics over the attitude any government takes in this matter. I think the principle of this Bill is exceedingly good, and although our Government in Saskatchewan have not signified their intention of taking advantage of it, our people are quite prepared to do so. The only difficulty, as I have already stated, is with the municipalities, and our absolute inability to take advantage of the scheme owing to our present liability. I wish our Provincial Governments had the power to pass an Order in Council removing all these difficulties, so that we might take advantage of the scheme immediately. I think this scheme is a mighty good one, for two reasons. In the first place, the returned soldier is getting the money at a very low rate of interest, lower than he could get it anywhere else. In the second place, he is getting the full amount of money he requires to build his home, and thereby become the very best type of citizen. I do not care who the man is, if he owns a home he is a better citizen than he otherwise would be. For these two reasons, I wish to see the plan made operative as far as possible. As to the difficulties in Saskatchewan, I think the Government ought to make every effort to have them removed as soon as possible, so that our returned soldiers may be able to take advantage of this plan.

Mr. ROBB: Before we go into a discussion of the details I would draw the attention of the minister to the fact that this loan is granted under the authority of the War Measures Act, as provided by Order in Council passed on December 3, 1918. That Order in Council recommends:

> That the Minister of Finance be authorized under the provisions of the War Measures Act upon request from the Government of any province of Canada to make loans to such governments for the purpose mentioned.

Now from a notice of motion that was given by the Acting Minister of Justice a few days ago, we inferred that the Government had some doubt in their minds as to the legality of the War Measures Act when peace was signed, and I am not clear as to whether or not this proposed legislation will not fall down unless the minister brings in a Bill for this Parliament to ratify the scheme.

There is another point. The scheme provides for four classes: Provincial governments, municipalities, housing societies, and the owners of lots. I inferred from the minister's remarks that all the provinces except Alberta and Saskatchewan have signified their willingness to take advantage of this sceme. Representatives of Saskatchewan have told us in the House to-night that that province is not able to take advantage of it because the borrowing powers of their municipalities are exhausted.

I read somewhere recently that a member of the Saskatchewan Government had given another reason why this project of the Dominion Government did not appeal to them, and that reason was that building would be rather expensive. But it was said that if this Government gave an assurance that the 7½ per cent extra duty would be taken off the project might appeal more readily to the province of Saskatchewan. It seems to me that this is a good time for the Government to make a statement of policy. They are advancing $25,000,000 for the purpose of building houses throughout Canada, and this 7½ per cent tax will add very considerably to the cost of the labourer's houses. I think it would have been better and more in order had the minister, before introducing this scheme, brought down the Budget so that we might know the fiscal policy of the Government in this regard.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I supose no member of this House would take much pleasure in opposing this proposition outright when it is represented as being something to help the returned soldier. But we are bound to examine the proposition and see what is really in it. It is a proposal to build houses—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—costing about $3,000 each, and to lend $25,000,000 for the purpose. A very simple calculation will reveal the fact that if the houses were all up now at a cost of $3,000 apiece and were used to accommodate families averaging five in number, we should have done something for 42,000 people.

Mr. McMASTER: To be exact 35,710.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Well,we may split the difference and say around 40,000. The houses are not all up now, and I do not know whether the minister can give us any idea how long it will take before the provincial governments will have come into agreement with the Dominion Government and started the operations at all. So that, after all, it is not possible to represent this scheme as one of hurricane relief to any housing conditions needed to make returned soldiers comfortable. I very much fear that the scheme partakes of the nature of a pill to cure an earthquake, if there is any housing condition of a serious character to relieve. I sympathize very much with the last remark that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). What I think the country is looking to this Government for, and what it will look for to any government that may rule the destinies of this nation in the immediate future, is something in the way of fundamental reform. Now this kind of social welfare relief—I desire to make myself clear—will be better the sooner it takes effect, and I repeat that this thing seems small. It seems likely to be tardy, and I do trust the Government will try to couple with this, which no one wants to oppose, something very much more substantial when the Budget comes down. I have an idea, Sir, after seventeen years in this country which I began by putting up a shack of some kind in six weeks that did not cost very much and was built without help by way of loan from any government,—I have an idea that if this country were properly governed, and its wealth properly distributed, as far as it can be distributed, by wise acts of governments, every man with much in him would soon get his own house. The reason he does not do so is that there is too much wealth in the hands of few and too little in the hands of many, and it is possible for the Government to take steps, through proper fiscal arrangements, to alter this state of affairs. As I said, I do not want to offer any flat opposition to this or any other measure of the kind that seems to offer a chance of some kind of relief to the conditions that are unfavourable amongst our population. The fact of the matter is that we have too much paternalism in a country like Canada, where you have a continent of resources and only eight millions of people. There is a tendency in the Government to imitate, I think, whatever they see being done in other countries under post-war conditions. The minister has been in England and I am perfectly sure he has given a great deal of sincere study to the conditions there; but I want to put it to him that in the British Islands there are forty-five millions of people living on what are practically two pin points compared to the immense area of natural wealth we have here; and measures that are suitable for the relief of conditions which have grown up during centuries in England may be entirely unsuited to us in Canada. We may want to go back in the history of the world to find out what Britain was doing for her population seventy years ago when she destroyed tariffs and repealed the corn laws. It might be better if we got our inspiration from that period. I throw that out as a suggestion that should be helpful to the Government, and hope they will communicate it to the Minister of Finance. And I want to tell the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) that if he would take that prescription he would find that it was not a pill to cure an earthquake but that it would operate almost immediately in giving the people social welfare, neither in clauses nor in preambles, nor in health bills, nor even in a tardy and small housing scheme, but social welfare in their stomachs and upon their shoulders and on their feet. For that is where the people want primarily to feel social welfare. They want it at once, and I agree with my hon. friend from Chateauguay-Huntingdon that they ought to get much through proper fiscal arrangements. I hope I shall not be taken as being very truculent in my criticism of this scheme. The figures I have given, are, I am sure, correct when they are brought up to date by my hon. friend from Brome.

Mr. McMASTER: I made a mistake. The hon. member's figures were arithmetically correct. I was dividing by thirty-five hundred.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am charmed to think that I should have excelled my hon. friend in accuracy. He is invariably very careful in these things. I generally deal more in principles than in details, but we may leave it at, say, 40,000 people, approximately. It would be well for us to reflect that if the houses were up to-morrow, that is all that we should be doing for the people under this scheme; and to get that done we will have to get started and get the Provincial Governments into line quickly. I do not oppose the measure on principle, but I would like to see something bigger and better from the Government pretty soon; and a lot of the folks in the country, in Winnipeg, for instance, feel the same way.

Sir HERBERT AMES: If I may be permitted to bring the thoughts of the hon. member and the Committee back to the subject under consideration, I would like to offer a few observations with respect to the general question covered by this proposal, and the broad methods outlined by it. For twenty-five years I have been deeply interested in the matter of the housing of the working people, and have had some personal experience which may perhaps at this juncture, be of some value to the Committee.

I want in the first place to congratulate the Government upon this venture in, I will admit, entirely new and untried fields, but a venture which I hope will be received by the provinces in the spirit in which it is made, and a venture which I hope may bring fruit from co-operation with all those other organizations whose assistance is necessary to make this a success. I have listened with very close attention to what the minister has said, and I have read the memorandum which he has submitted with some care, and I must say that in one respect I feel disappointed in the proposed measure. I am quite willing that the returned soldier should be assisted in securing a home; I am quite willing that the workingman should find it possible to build a residence in the outskirts of a city; but I feel that this money, if it is to do the most good, should be expended in the centre of the big cities where the slum conditions exist. The proposition as it at present stands, I think, does not meet that need.

I had occasion some years ago to make an intimate social study of the constituency which I represent in Montreal, and I know that the conditions which were found then still persist to-day, and probably will continue to persist until they are dealt with by the Dominion or Provincial Governments in a drastic way. There are districts in the constituency I represent where five hundred human beings live on an acre. There are blocks in the constituency I represent where, if every man, woman and child in that block should go and stand shoulder to shoulder they would make a line entirely round the four sides of the block on the four streets. When you come to undertake a building scheme in an area like that, what do you find? You find that the properties are held by scores of proprietors. You may acquire a little space here, by paying for it; you may acquire a little space there; but you cannot acquire an area that will be sufficiently large to let light and air into the district and thus do some real benefit. There will always be some proprietors who will hold you up for a large amount or will not sell at all—and I am very glad to see that this Bill not only contains the necessary financial provisions, but also the power of expropriation which is absolutely necessary if you are to improve any of the slum areas of our great cities.

Now the city of Montreal, as hon. gentlemen know, lies between the beautiful mountain and the still more beautiful river. The space available for habitation is limited, unless you go away out to the north or away out to the west. There are immense industries down near the water front. These industries employ large numbers of men, women and children. They open early and they close late, and the working people have to be at their employment sometimes before sun-up in the morning, and remain there until after sun-down at night. They cannot live three, four, or five miles out in the suburbs in the beautiful little homes you propose to build for them; many of them being night workers as well, they must live in the centre of the city near their work. I remember twenty years ago in my city making an industrial census of an area which contained thirty thousand people, and ascertaining the wages, the rents, the sanitary conditions, the number of rooms occupied, the death rate, the crime rate, and a great many other figures in connection with it. Then, after ascertaining what was the social condition of the thirty thousand people that lived there, we were able to put up a certain number of model dwellings in the place where they were most needed, and where the largest number of people had to dwell to be near their work. And more, as a result of the study we were able to determine what rent they could pay, the number of rooms they would be able to occupy, and the class of accommodation they should seek; and I want to say as one who has had experience with this problem that there is no work that a human being can undertake in a big city that brings in greater returns of satisfaction than an investment well placed for the housing of working people. You sometimes are told that they do not appreciate property of that kind. You sometimes are told that they will not pay the rent. That has not been my experience. I cannot say that the properties have yielded six per cent, but I can say that there is never a vacant house for more than a week, and that there are forty families who are always grateful and self-respecting.

I would like to see many of the areas in the city of Montreal that are slums wiped out. I would like to see it possible for a building corporation, or an individual, or a group of citizens, to select the worst area there is in the city, wipe out four or five blocks, and re-plan those blocks so that there would be plenty of playground space, so that all the courts would be paved, and so that there would be elbow room for the people that live in that block. I do not think you can do that under this Bill.

As far as I can see this Bill provides that the houses must be practically individual houses. Suppose you start to build individual houses in a congested part of the city of Montreal. You cannot put one of these little cottages on a lot less than twenty-five feet front by eighty feet depth. There is an area of two thousand feet right away. You would have to pay at least $2.50 a foot for that property. That would represent an immediate expenditure of $5,000, and if you put another $2,500 into the building, which is the smallest amount you could possibly use to house a family, you have a total of $7,500 to provide a dwelling for one single family. The only way in which that can be done is by erecting buildings of a size sufficient to enable three or four families to live one above another. In that way you can spread the cost of your land over the four families, and you can bring it within the allowance that is permitted here. It would seem to me that instead of using our money out in the suburbs, where there is already plenty of air and light, in building nice little houses with a garden patch and plenty of space around them, which would be done by the ordinary speculator and land developer anyway, we should do what these other men will not do—go into the heart of the city, take the most congested area you can find, and use this money in turning a place which is a byword and a hissing in the neighbourhood into a place where a hundred families can live decently, comfortably and under conditions that would put them near their work, enable them to send their children to school, and enable them to live in a comfortable and happy way together.

I think the Government has made a splendid advance in this direction, but I would like it to give serious consideration as to whether this scheme is really meeting the congested city area difficulty. We speak of building for the returned soldier. Well, this, in a sense, we do. Still, I do not suppose that these houses are to be exclusively retained for the returned soldier; the necessity for them is in a large degree created by the return of the soldier. Now, I know from the returns of the Patriotic Fund that during the war a great many families doubled up; that is, a couple of soldiers' families lived together. Now that the men are coming back we have the same report from every one of our large cities: they cannot find homes for the re-constituted soldiers' families.

In Toronto in our rest rooms we keep families for a long time while the ladies of the Patriotic Fund search up and down the streets trying to find a place where they can be housed. And one of the most difficult problems we have in Montreal is to find adequate accommodation for the newly linked up and reconstituted families that have returned from overseas. So I trust the Government will get on with this scheme as speedily as possible, for the present condition will grow worse unless it is quickly remedied, and the sooner we get it remedied the better it will be for this country in the years to come.

There is one canny feature in connection with the scheme that I cannot help admiring from the financial point of view, in that it involves no addition to the permanent debt of the country. The Government, it is true, is providing $25,000,000, but it is loaning that sum, and whatever it adds to the debit side it will add to the credit side, and consequently the net debt of the country will not be increased. Those who view with alarm the very rapid increase of our national debt will be glad to see that at least one expenditure is bound to be reimbursed. Therefore so far as the investment feature is concerned no criticism can be coming to the Government. But I trust they will arrange to utilize a fair share of this money for the purpose of wiping out those blots on our modern civilization which every large city has to-day—the old broken-down buildings, held by some speculator at a rack rent, unfit to live in, and yet not condemned and not removed, but which, if replaced with decent dwellings, would support a contented population.

Mr. MORPHY: May I ask for a little light upon this subject? I have the pamphlet published by the Government showing the principles upon which the Act is to be administered, and on page 11 I find under the heading of "General Principles and Standards Recommended for Consideration in Schemes," Section (4), which reads:

(4) Limit of Income of persons to be provided with dwellings.—In order to ensure that the money shall be loaned to those who most need it, no person in receipt of an income exceeding $3,000 per annum should be eligible as a purchaser or tenant of a house erected with the aid of Government funds in any schemes carried out by provincial governments, municipalities, housing associations or owners of lots.

I take it that if a man has $50,000 in vested at 6 per cent, bringing him in exactly $3,000 a year, he can take advantage of the scheme; but if he has $3,001 of income he can not. My mind has been all along directed to the idea that this scheme was to help the man who had no money of his own; but if it is to help the man with a capital of $50,000 capable of investment at 6 per cent, I am going to oppose it. I would like the minister to tell me if he intends to apply the scheme to a man who has $50,000, which at 6 per cent would bring him in an income of $3,000.

Mr. ROWELL: No, it is not the intention. I do not know whether my hon. friend was present when I was explaining that these general principles and standards are recommendations to the provincial governments for embodiment in their schemes, and those governments determine as between themselves and the applicants what class shall be eligible. The class intended is men of limited incomes those earning not more than $3,000 a year. I agree that it might be urged that that figure should be lower, but the Minister of Labour,—who knows labouring conditions pretty well,—was strongly of opinion that we should make it as high as $3,000, and we have put the limit on that basis. He no doubt hopes there are working men who now earn or will earn that income. It is not intended that the moneyed man should get a loan, and I am quite sure no provincial government would make a loan to the class of men the hon. member has referred to

Mr. MORPHY: Why put in that figure expressly unless it is intended to be operative?

Mr. ROWELL: That means earned income. My hon. friend has to interpret that in the light of the whole scheme. The whole scheme is limited to working men, particularly returned soldiers. Working men who earn that income is what is understood in the paragraph quoted.

Mr. MORPHY: I have no quarrel with helping the working man, but I think the Bill should be framed to help the poorer working man, not the working man who has got an income of $3,000. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the working man who earns $3,000 a year is able to get his own home without asking the Government any questions about it. I think his individuality would carry the strength and pride which would make him want his own home without asking any paternal help from the Government. It seems to me that the scheme should be limited to the class of working men earning from $1,200 to $1,500. Those men would no doubt need help. A working man earning $1,500 a year—and there are many of them—might be very thankful to take advantage of this scheme because of his family conditions, the expense to which he is put, and so forth. But to say that a man in receipt of an income of $3,000 should be eligible would probably leave the Act open to a rush of that class, who would take up the money in the various centres—and it could not be reasonably refused with this clause standing upon the Government's advertising matter—with the result that the man for whose benefit the Act would be put upon the statute-books, as I see it, would be crowded out, and with the further result that we would be forced later on to enlarge the scheme because the money already provided had been taken up by a class who did not need it and had not any right to be helped.

Mr. ROWELL: I quite agree with my hon. friend that men of means should not be entitled to take advantage of the provisions of the Government loan. I would again draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that this is simply a recommendation to the provincial governments, that in no case should the money be loaned to a man who earns more than this specified amount. It is within the competence of the provincial governments to limit the amount to $1,000, $1,200, or $1,500—whatever they may determine. We are simply fixing that limit as a safeguard. I think the figure might be fixed lower; however, it was fixed at that amount. The provinces have the same object as the Dominion Government in keeping the money for the class for which the loan is provided, and may limit the amount as low as they like.

While I am on my feet may I answer the question put by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) with reference to the form of the proposal; and also a question suggested by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) and my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames)? The order is under the War Measures Act, and if any money had been advanced before Parliament met it would have been advanced under that Act, because that was the only authority the Government had for taking such action. But it so happens that no money was advanced; in other words, the provinces did not put themselves in a position before the meeting of Parliament to take advantage of the scheme. Therefore the advance will now be made by the House, if the House votes this amount, on the terms set out in the third Order in Council. The War Measures Act has no effect on it one way or the other.

Coming to the next question my hon. friend suggested, that this should be deferred until after the Budget. I do not think he was really serious. My hon. friend from Red Deer emphasized that suggestion too. I quite recognize that the question of the tariff may have a bearing upon the cost of living and the cost of materials. I am under the impression, however, that the bulk of the materials that would enter into the construction of an ordinary house are produced in Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the minister suggest that the tariff has nothing to do with the price of goods which are produced in Canada?

Mr. ROWELL: I did not express any opinion on that point.

Mr. BUREAU: It was merely insinuated.

Mr. ROWELL: I shall have an opportunity of expressing my opinion on that point when the Budget is brought down. I have the greatest respect for the opinions of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). I almost always find myself in agreement with him, but I am not wholly in agreement with him on this matter. If the result of this proposal is to provide houses for forty thousand people, it will be a very real factor in the solution of the housing problem in our cities. Moreover, by erecting a good type of workingman's house, sanitary in all its appointments, with a breathing space around it, under the conditions outlined in these Orders in Council, you set a standard for workingmen's houses which should affect—experience shows that it does affect—all other workingmen's houses erected in the same town or city. You improve the general character of the workingman's house when you have a good type of house erected, because men prefer the better rather than the less favourable.

My hon. friend thinks that there is a danger of our copying legislation enacted in other countries without considering whether it is adaptable to our own country. I cannot agree with him in that. I frankly recognize that the adoption of some policy in Great Britain is not necessarily a reason why it should be adopted here, the conditions in the two countries are, as my hon. friend has said, very different. We have this immense expanse of territory; we have these great opportunities in Canada; but the startling and the disappointing fact is that notwithstanding the potentiality of these great unoccupied areas we are rapidly developing slum conditions in our larger cities. I think that we should profit by the experience of Great Britain. My hon. friend has paid me the compliment of assuming that I have looked into this matter. I tried to get all the information I could when I was in Great Britain in reference to their housing policies and programme. I visited some of their garden cities and discussed the matter with experts of the British Board of Trade. In 1915, when in Great Britain, I discussed with Right Hon. John Burns, who was then President of the Local Government Board and who had direction of the housing scheme, the various pieces of social legislation which the Lloyd George Government had introduced in Great Britain. I said to him: "Suppose we decided to make a start in Canada on this social legislation, which one of your various measures do you think we could adopt with the greatest profit?" Without a moment's hesitation, he said: "Housing and town planning." He went on to say that he was astonished beyond measure to see the conditions in some of our cities. He mentioned particularly what was known as "Shacktown" in the northern part of Toronto. He emphasized the fact that in a well laid-out district, where the people live in clean and comfortable houses, you have people who are more law-abiding and better citizens than they would be if they were brought up amid disorderly slum conditions. These things have a real effect, he said, upon the character of the people—upon their outlook, upon their respect for and observance of the law. That really is one of the fundamental questions to which my hon. friend has referred. I do not doubt that the other is a fundamental question; but I believe that the provision of good, clean, sanitary houses is fundamental to the best social conditions in this or any other country.

In my investigation into this matter I have actually looked into the housing conditions in my own city of Toronto. In the winter of 1914, when unemployment was very conspicuous, I took occasion to visit many of the homes in the poorer districts of the city. I went in and talked to the people, I saw the conditions under which they were living; and I have no hesitation in saying that it is a disgrace that with all our natural resources and advantages, such conditions of housing and poverty should exist. It is our bounden duty, by every possible measure that we can adopt, to try to improve these conditions.

My hon. friend has suggested that one particular measure might solve the problem. To-night is not the time to enter into a discussion of that question; we shall get that on the Budget. Only as a justification for this measure, not in answer to my hon. friend on the other point, I suggest that although Great Britain has enjoyed the benefits of free trade for the last sixty or seventy years, she does experience these conditions of unequal distribution of wealth in a most acute form. In other words, that one measure to which my hon. friend referred has not brought about an equitable distribution of wealth. I agree that measures should be taken to help meet the condition; we cannot go on in the future with the unequal distribution of wealth that has prevailed in the past. I believe that that unequal distribution is in a very substantial measure responsible for the world-wide social unrest. We must recognize the fact that in the future division of the results of the joint effort of labour and capital, labour must have a larger share, and any wise administrative act that may be carried out with a view to bringing about this result will tend to improve and stabilize social and industrial conditions.

The hon. member (Sir Herbert Ames) said that he thought these proposals did not meet a condition which existed in Montreal. This scheme does cover the duplex house—the two-story house—which is almost a standard house in certain sections of that city. With reference to the larger problem that my hon. friend has suggested, I recognize its great importance. He has made a real contribution to the discussion in what he has told us of the situation in his own city and of the steps which might be taken to relieve it. But I am rather of the opinion that a condition of that kind is a question to be taken up and dealt with by the city itself. That is the way these questions have been dealt with in Great Britain. Whole sections of the city of London have been cut right through with a view to opening up a highway between certain sections of the city. The result is that they have cleared out the old houses in the district through which this street runs, and by appropriating the land and laying it out with this fine highway running through it they have been able, through the increased selling value of the land bordering on the highway, largely to recoup themselves for the expenditure incurred in that connection.

I am rather of the opinion, while I do not know the conditions in Montreal, that if any one took up the proposition and undertook to clear up certain of those sections, and lay them out in improved style, the city should not be a great loser by the cost of doing it. In other words, the return, under the improved conditions, should compensate the city for the outlay in clearing up the situation.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Might not some of this money be made available for that purpose?

Mr. ROWELL: I suppose the only reason is this, the reason which the hon. member has mentioned, that this sum will not do everything. Certain limits must be placed upon it. My hon. friend might suggest that the Government should vote more money for this purpose; but the Government, having regard to the many demands on it, thought this was a fair amount to provide. I cannot say whether, if the Quebec Government requested that we should endeavour to meet the situation, the Dominion Government might not see its way to consider the matter, but at the present time we have had no request from the Quebec Government to deal with it in that way.

In conclusion, let me say one word in reference to the observations of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) as to the provinces taking advantage of this scheme and how soon they will put up houses. Two or three weeks ago, I wired the premiers of all the provinces to find out how much of this sum they would need this year, with the view that if they did not require the whole of the $25,000,000 this year, I might reduce the estimate in view of the other very heavy charges on the country. The replies I received from all the provinces that are taking advantage of the loan indicate that they will require the full amount, and some of the provinces are, I am glad to say, adding a substantial sum themselves to the amount they are receiving for this housing scheme.

Mr. PARDEE: Is any specified sum to be given to each province?

Mr. ROWELL: Ontario, at an early date, stated $2,000,000, but I think it has increased that amount. I cannot give the exact amount, but it is increasing the amount by a substantial sum. Ontario was, I think, one of the provinces that intimated that it would require the whole amount and would be glad if more was available.

Mr. PARDEE: How will the loan be apportioned?

Mr. ROWELL: Each province gets its proportion according to population. I have heard that Quebec is also putting up an amount. I am not officially informed of the fact, and therefore I cannot submit it to the committee.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: The object of this resolution is practically to expropriate land and start new suburban residences, and in that case probably many streets would have to be laid out. Sewers would have to be put in and a considerable amount of money spent in engineering, architectural designing, and so on. Is it the intention ultimately to apportion all this on the cost of dwellings to the working men?

Mr. ROWELL: No. While municipalities may have the power to spend this money in developing suburban areas, there is no obligation on them to do so. The money might be spent in the heart of the city in unoccupied areas available for buildings, just as it might be spent in suburban areas. With reference to the case mentioned by my hon. friend, that is a question with which the province would deal absolutely. Under the Ontario system, where local improvements are provided, a certain percentage of the cost is assumed by the municipality and a certain percentage charged to the lots, and I presume that law would apply to any sections laid out under these proposals.

Mr. PARDEE: I am quite in sympathy with the principle of this resolution, but it appears to contain some incongruities. In connection with the question raised by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), I think the Government has gone too far in that section in putting the maximum income of those to whom this scheme may apply at $3,000. Let me take the minister's own words for it. If I understand aright the principle of a Housing Bill, it is to help those who are in congested districts and who are more or less, or who may be classed as, the poorer portion of the population. They are necessarily the poorest class of the population; otherwise they would not reside in the congested districts. Taking that as a premise, may I refer to the illustration given by the minister himself, that when he asked John Burns what measure of social reform he would most gladly recommend him to apply himself to, John Burns immediately mentioned a housing scheme. The Housing scheme in Great Britain is, I understand, applied to the class of people I have mentioned. If that be so, is it right to bring down in a resolution or a Bill a principle that those men who are earning incomes to the extent of $3,000 shall be entitled to come in under exceptionally good conditions?—to apply to the Government, to receive their loans, and to get the amount that they are allowed to get under those resolutions, while those who are not nearly so well off are not allowed to do so? Does not that mean that a man who is earning $3,000 a year is in a much better position to apply for and obtain this loan. and as a consequence will get more out of it than any other man will? I think that is unquestionably so. Let us take Shacktown, for instance, which the minister mentioned. I have been there and I wonder how many of those people are in receipt of an income of $3,000 a year. If they were, they would not be living in that district and in that class of houses. This loan should be applied with a much smaller maximum income than is here set out. It is true, the minister says, that the Provincial Government has a right to make it less, but we all know that Provincial Governments—and my experience is that they are all much alike in this respect—if they have the right to take advantage of a maximum in a Bill will take it, and will say: The Dominion Government gave us the right to go as high as

$3,000 and we shall do so. I strongly urge upon the minister—and I am not criticising in any hostile spirit—that the maximum ought to be considerably reduced, so that it might and would apply to those who are much more in need of the assistance which this resolution will give to them than those who receive incomes amounting to $3,000. I think that would be the right thing for the Government to do, and under those circumstances they would be helping the class of people who are much more in need of help than the people to whom this resolution would, at the maximum rate, apply.

Mr. M. CLARK: I am sure the Committee will agree that we have had from the minister a very sympathetic speech and a speech of great debating excellency. I rise only to clear myself from a misapprehension which I should have not expected to arise in his very clear mind. I have frequently met the same argument in other quarters, but I was a little disappointed to hear it from the minister. He seemed to think that I suggested that by some fiscal arrangement the milennium could be brought about. That was not in my mind by any means. He pointed out that under a certain fiscal arrangement in Britain there are slums, and inferentially he argued that slums are the product, perhaps, of that fiscal arrangement.

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. M. CLARK: Well, that they have not been cured by that fiscal arrangement.

Mr. ROWELL: They have not been cured by it.

Mr. M. CLARK: While that fiscal arrangement has been in existence in Great Britain, to my hon. friend's intimate knowledge as well as to my own, it has made the people so prosperous that before the war they were drinking intoxicating liquors as beverages to the sum of $800,000,000 or more. That is conduct on the part of the people of Great Britain which I am sure meets with the absolute disapproval of my hon. friend; but his disapproval does not alter the fact as to their conduct, nor does it alter the sum that has been spent in that way, nor does it alter the other economic fact with which he is very well acquainted, that if people spend too much money on intoxicating liquors out of comparatively limited incomes they will very likely get into slums under whatsoever fiscal arrangement they may live.

I wanted to clear myself from the misapprehension which appears to have arisen in the mind of my hon. friend. I have no panacea for society, I have no panacea for poverty; none of us have. It might easily be argued on very high authority that there is no panacea for poverty because we were told by a very high authority two thousand years ago that the poor we have always with us, and a straining of the interpretation of that statement might lead us to think that we always will have them with us. While we do have the poor with us, their poverty is produced by many causes, and none is more potent in Great Britain than that which I have mentioned, which is totally unconnected with any fiscal arrangement. I was anxious to make a contribution, if possible, from the back benches to the wisdom and effort of the Cabinet, and I am sure my hon. friend will allow me to clear myself from possible misapprehension on this point.

Mr. BUTTS: Are we to understand that under this Bill a man living in a county like my own with large coal mining and steel manufacturing industries, if he is able to acquire half or a quarter of an acre of land, can apply to the Government and receive a loan to the amount of $3,000 for building a house? The reason I ask is that I have some land myself, and I was just thinking that if I were to distribute it among a number of indiscriminates perhaps I might get some money out of this Government that I never expected to get.

Mr. ROWELL: I am afraid my hon. friend would not qualify under this Bill. He would have to apply to the provincial government and satisfy them that he was a workman and came within the conditions set out.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I am not altogether in accord with this measure, because I believe with the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) that the object should be to remove slums. If that were the object, so far as the West and the cities of the western provinces are concerned, we have no slums. There is only one alternative to consider, and that is the one which was put forward this evening by the minister, namely, that most of the money should be spent in assisting the returned soldier. If that really be the object, the distribution of money proposed under this legislation is improper; the distribution should be in proportion to enlistment instead of in proportion to population. In that case the province of Alberta would be entitled to a greater share of this appropriation than we shall get under the present proposals. If it is not the object of this legislation to assist the returned soldier, let the money be diverted to the cities to remove the slums and establish better social conditions.

I ask the minister to take into consideration my suggestion that the money should be paid to the provinces in proportion to enlistments, and not in proportion to population. Inasmuch as he has stated, and it is amply demonstrated in the Orders in Council that have been passed, that this plan is primarily for the benefit of the returned soldier—the appropriation is made from the War Vote—then let the provinces that have given the most men to fight for their country get the most money.

Mr. McMASTER: The first remark I have to offer to the Committee is that this debate plainly shows the impropriety of the way in which this legislation was introduced. Although we all recognize without the slightest reserve the ability of those gentlemen who compose the Cabinet Committee that dealt with this matter in council, this debate has showed very clearly that there are in this House opinions and views and experience which would have been valuable to the Government in drafting this legislation. Why was this plan effected by Order in Council instead of being introduced in this House by a Bill founded upon a resolution? It will be stated that Parliament was not sitting. Why was not Parliament sitting in the month of December? Parliament rose in the latter days of May, 1918; the armistice was signed in November, but Parliament was not summoned to meet until almost the end of February. I believe that the Government should not have launched upon a scheme absolutely new in this country, an absolute departure from anything the Government had done before without consulting the representatives of the people. I believe that if the Government had consulted the representatives of the people they would have got a very much better plan than the one before us to-night.

My next submission is that this discussion is more or less of an academic character. The scheme must be worked in co-operation with the provinces. The provinces have been consulted upon a plan prepared by Order in Council and many of them have formulated their schemes on the plan submitted to them Therefore, although the minister kindly pays the closest and most courteous attention to our suggestion, after all the matter is largely concluded, and it is practically impossible for us at this time, even if we were able to convince the minister that we were right, to change the plan. That only goes to prove how well it is to stick to sound constitutional usage, and not to attempt short cuts. Very often the shortest road to any objective is the travelled road —the road which is lighted by the lamps of experience.

There were some good suggestions offered by the hon. member for St. Antoine whose contribution to the evening's discussion was most valuable. I agree with the minister on that score, but he seemed to think that the member for Red Deer had been beside the point because he had spoken about fundamentals. Suppose that instead of being called upon to give his opinion upon a national question, the member for Red Deer had been summoned as a physician and had found the patient lying on the bed in a superheated room suffering from fever, while the member for St. Antoine was busy administering a small homeopathic pill. And suppose the member for Red Deer had ordered the windows to be thrown open to let in the air. Would he have gone beyond his duty as a medical practitioner? I do not think so, and my opinion is that he was absolutely within his province as a member of the House when he said—and I agree with every word that he said—that the present measure is a mere palliative, and that this country can never prosper under the application of palliatives. It is just as if a man came in hungry after a hard day's work and were offered a little cube of beef tea. We have overcrowding in this country in some of the large cities, and this proposal will not obviate such overcrowding. Men will live near their work if they possibly can, and what the member for St. Antoine said is absolutely right, that putting up nice houses of $3,000, $4,000 and $4,500 in pleasant suburbs will not remove congestion in the congested parts of cities. What are the slums due to? They are due, I take it, among other things to a bad system of municipal taxation. I think this has more to do with congestion than perhaps almost anything else, and that is something that is not in the purview of this House. Then I believe that effective means of transportation have a great deal to do with slum congestion; and thirdly slum congestion in our large cities is, I think, due to a false and unsound economic practice which this country has been following for thirty years and more. This is a time of reconstruction, and it is a time for the Canadian people to examine these questions to the very core and make up their minds as to what is the right thing to do. I am afraid that this is a mere palliative. We have all sorts of plasters in the pharmacopoeia and this is almost a shinplaster. If we take the average cost of houses at $3,500—they run as I understand it from $3,000 to $4,500—I am afraid that at the present cost of building, the houses will probably cost nearer the larger than the smaller figure. But let us take the next smallest figure as our basis, $3,500. If we divide the $25,000,000 by $3,500, we have 7,142 houses. Let us suppose that the average family will consist of five persons, and we shall have 35,710 persons to be accommodated. Now, this is not restricted to the returned soldier; anybody can get it by meeting the necessary requirements. As it is not mentioned that the applicant is to be a returned soldier, the authorities administering the Act must of necessity take applications as they come forward indiscriminately as to whether they are returned soldiers or not. If they did not, they would not be carrying out the intention of the legislation. I think that if we find housing accommodation for two or three regiments we shall be accomplishing as much as we can expect, and therefore I am very much afraid that we are going to spend a great deal of money and will not help the returned soldiers to any large extent. The member for St. Antoine said that we would not be increasing the financial debt by this system. Well, if all the money is well laid out and is all paid back we shall only lose the difference between what it costs us to borrow the money and what is paid back, but meanwhile we shall increase the debt although the net debt will not be increased by a large amount. I am not altogether opposed to this measure, although I do not think it is a wise one. I am thoroughly convinced that under our federal system it would be infinitely better for such matters as this to be dealt with by the municipalities or the provinces. If that is not done you are going to have the spectacle which we see now of trying to suggest types of houses for half a continent with climates and local, physical and geographical conditions altogether different. The plan which has been laid down for houses may be quite suitable to Nova Scotia and be absolutely inapplicable to Alberta, and this, I think is a very serious defect. It is centralization as against decentralization and as a rule in matters of administration I prefer the system of decentralization. Of this I am thoroughly convinced and my words are borne out by what the Minister of Labour said yesterday or the day before in another place, that we cannot expect to have lower cost of living in Canada until we get more people on the land. And if you are going to endeavour by governmental aid to effect a return to proper living conditions, it is your duty to encourage the flow of population from the city to the soil, which will not be done by this project. The scheme does not contemplate the building of farm cottages for farm servants, and I think that one thing that would help the development of rural life in Canada would be this assistance to farmers where necessary, in the furnishing of proper building accommodation, in order that a man who had a liking for country life might find proper accommodation for himself and his family. I believe that one of the obstacles that keep people from rural pursuits is the fact that the young man who goes on the farm has to live with his employer, very often to the disadvantage of the latter, as well as unpleasant to the hired man, who likes to have a time for himself away from his daily work. But the great obstacle to the development of farm life is the fact that the hired man cannot look forward to marriage because he cannot get a house of his own with facilities for founding a family. I believe that this proposal is absolutely wanting; that it fails to go to the root of the matter in view of the fact that it makes no provision for the development of proper living conditions in the rural parts of the country.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member (Mr. McMaster) has just said that the proposal is unalterable in its terms. I did not so understand the minister who is in charge of the proposal. Am I to understand that the matter has not yet been crystallized in the form of legislation, that the negotiations with the provinces are almost in a tentative state at present, and that nothing is absolutely and finally agreed upon.

I suggested that it would be well to reduce the application of the Bill so that a man with an income of $50,000, on a six per cent basis, could not take advantage of it, and the minister said that that sum might well be reduced; therefore, I assume that it is still within his power to assure the House that the point will be taken up and dealt with. If so, the argument of the hon. member falls to the ground. I would like the minister to assure me as to that point and also to give an assurance that he will reduce the sum, I would say, to an amount not exceeding $1,800.

Mr. MICHAUD: Make it $1,000.

Mr. MORPHY: I would not like to go any further than that just now until I have some stronger reason for doing so. With regard to the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMaster) in regard to this country following a false economic policy, I would invite his attention to the slight divergence of opinion between him and his leader (Mr. McKenzie). I should think that the quarrels on that side—

Mr. McMASTER: I did not catch the hon. gentleman's remark.

Mr. MORPHY: I would invite the hon. gentleman's attention to the divergence of opinion between himself and his leader, who claimed that he was not an extremely high protectionist, and I understood got a scolding from some of his friends because he dared to make such a statement in this House. The quarrel, Mr. Chairman, is on the Opposition side, and I think that the hon. gentlemen sitting there should settle it between themselves.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not lose any sleep over it.

Mr. MORPHY: I will not lose any sleep over it, and I do not think anybody else will, even if the row is a noisy one. We can continue on lines that have been settled by the country and maintain a fiscal policy that both political parties have agreed upon for many years past. I do not think there will be much trouble about it, adapting the policy, as it always has been adapted, to the amelioration of conditions of hardship, and to the betterment of conditions in places where they can be bettered. I would like the minister to state now, if he can, whether or not the proposition can be limited to a man who has got an income of, say, $1,800 a year?

Mr. ROWELL: I would point out that the clause to which the hon. member refers—in fact all the clauses under that head, from 1 to 12 inclusive—are simply recommendations to the provincial governments. If he will turn to page 14 he will see it is expressly provided that additional recommendations may be made from time to time, as experience is gained and comparative information is collected, from different provinces. It is open to the Federal Government at any time to make new recommendations to the provincial governments in connection with any of the twelve or fourteen conditions referred to.

Mr. MORPHY: My objection still stands, notwithstanding a reading of the provisions of the Bill. If a provincial government knows that this Parliament has approved of the larger sum there will be a tendency to work up to it. If the provincial governments know that the smaller sum is the maximum there will be a tendency to work to that; and I feel, recognizing the human elements of governments, the friendships that men form with ministers, and the avenues that get them "next" here and there, that men of wealth will get in under this scheme, although the minister will admit to me that he does not intend that they should. If it is possible to so arrange with the provincial governments that no man possessing $50,000, which on a six per cent basis would bring him in an income of $3,000, can get in under this housing scheme, I want it done. It seems to me that the limit of $1,800, based on the investment of $30,000 at six per cent is not intended to be covered by this scheme. I do not believe the country is looking for a man who owns that much money to be assisted in the way proposed by this Bill. Therefore I want to know now, if the minister is at liberty to answer me, whether it is too late to make the change I have suggested.

Mr. ROWELL: First, I do not think any change is necessary to meet the point my hon. friend mentions. It would not be in accordance with the principle upon which this Bill is framed for any provincial governments to allow a man under such conditions to take advantage of the scheme. The whole thing is predicated on it being help for the workingmen. At the same time, if my hon. friend thinks the plan is open to that interpretation I have not the least objection to communicating with the provincial governments, and to point out that it is not the intention of these regulations, or the view of the Government, that in administering them the money shall be expended in the way referred to. It is quite open to us to do that. We have not deemed it wise to impose any of these features as conditions; they are only recommendations. The provinces are borrowers; they must take a certain measure of responsibility. If we are granting money to them outright we should define exactly what the conditions are; but we have only felt justified in suggesting four main conditions, or rather recommendations. I say to my hon. friend now that I will draw the attention of the prime ministers of the provinces to the fact that this question has been raised in the House, point out that it is entirely contrary to the whole spirit of the regulation, and state that we do not expect the money to be expended in any such way.

Mr. MORPHY: Just one word more. The pamphlet which I hold in my hand is entitled "Housing in Canada. General Project of Federal Government." It is printed by the King's Printer, and I presume is issued at the instance of the Government?

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so.

Mr. MORPHY: It is set forth in the section I have already read:

> No person in receipt of an income exceeding $3,000 per annum shall be eligible as a purchaser or tenant under this scheme.

Now, inferentially that says, as plainly as language can do so, that a person who has got an income of not more than $3,000 can get in under the scheme. If the proposition is sent forward in that shape to the provinces, they will say: "Your own data furnished by yourselves, gave us the latitude to let Mr. John Brown, who has got $50,000 out at interest at six per cent, and earning not a cent more than $3,000" (providing possibly he was a returned soldier) "come in if he complies with all the other condtions." I do not think that is the intention of the Government; it surely cannot be. It is declared in this very paragraph that the money shall be loaned to those who most need it. I do not think a man who owns $30,000 or who has $50,000 could possibly need any assistance from the Government. I think it would be monstrous that he should be allowed to get such assistance, and yet the propaganda published by the Government says that he may.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: We in Western Canada, particularly in the city which I represent, when the Order in Council providing for this housing scheme was passed early in the year, were very much taken with it. But since that time, conferring in our cities with our Provincial Government as to how the scheme is to be worked out, we find that it does not seem to be making the progress expected, and does not appeal to our people so strongly as it did at the first blush. In Western Canada our country is new, and our cities are of recent growth, and we have not the slums that exist in some of the eastern cities which have been mentioned this evening.

Nevertheless, we have an acute shortage of houses. In my own city since the House assembled I have had to get permission from the Public Works Department for the use of the local immigration hall to house returned soldiers and their families, there being no places of residence available.

What our people object to is that although this is taken hold of as a national scheme, it is hardly fair that the municipality should be saddled with the financial responsibility, that is, to the extent of reducing its borrowing power. Apparently the policy as propounded by our provincial government was for them to accept the money from the Dominion Government and pass it on to the city authorities, that money then becoming a charge against the borrowing power of the city. Now, during the past four years all public works in Western Canada practically ceased, with the result that at the present time many public works are needed, and the municipal authorities feel that the urgency for those public works is so great that it will take up pretty well all their borrowing powers to finance them. Therefore they do not wish to load those borrowing powers with this extra burden, viewing it as a national scheme.

I would like to ask the minister if he thinks it possible in any way to so work out the scheme that the money can be advanced the same as it is in Great Britain, the national Government taking the full responsibility of advancing to the municipalities, leaving them to administer the loan? Our people view with some little apprehension the present high cost of building material, and they feel that in four or five years there will be a considerable depreciation in property corresponding with the depreciation in the prices of building materials, with a possible loss to them. In the British housing scheme the Government bears 75 per cent of that loss. To sum up, I have here a clipping from a newspaper which gives the views of our cities as expressed in a resolution passed at a convention held to discuss this matter. It reads:

> Resolved that this meeting of delegates from towns and cities in the province of Saskatchewan is of opinion that the proper housing of the workers and returned soldiers at this time is extremely urgent and is a national question, and requests the provincial Government in cooperation with the other provincial Governments of Canada to bring the matter before the Dominion Government and urge it to assume all responsibility in financing housing schemes, the municipalities being made responsible only for administration.

I received a communication a few days ago from an association in our city requesting me to bring this to the attention of the Government. At the present time, so far as we are concerned, unless there is some change of our view point, it seems that we are not likely to take any advantage of this scheme, although when it was first mentioned our city of Saskatoon went so far as to make application for a loan of $500,000; but when they found it was to be made a direct charge against their borrowing power they felt it was not of such very great advantage to borrow from the Government. At the present time we could borrow $500,000 from other sources, but might have to pay a cent and a half more interest.

Mr. ROWELL: I have listened to my hon. friend with very great interest. He has presented very clearly the views of the people of Saskatoon as they have been communicated to us. Let me point out that this matter first came up at the Interprovincial Conference at the instance of one of the provinces to see if the Dominion Government would loan the money. All the provinces were represented. Hon. Mr. Martin, Hon. Mr. Motherwell, Hon. Mr. Dunning, and Hon. Mr. Turgeon representing Saskatchewan. The matter was discussed, and the Dominion Government decided that it would make advances to the provinces, imposing certain conditions which I have outlined. Therefore it is a provincial scheme with Federal co-operation.

With reference to imposing an obligation on the municipalities, this Governmeut does not impose any such obligation. This Government loans the money to the province. The province itself may loan it direct to the applicants for loans; it may loan it to housing companies, citizens organized for the purpose of erecting suitable houses, or it may loan it to municipalities; it may loan it to private individuals, or it may buy land itself and develop it. The province has full and complete jurisdiction over the matter, and it is purely a question between the municipality and the province as to whether any obligation should be imposed upon the municipality.

With reference to the Government changing its policy and loaning to municipalities or handing the money over to them for administration, I can only say that the Government has considered the representations which have been made to that effect. We have not seen our way clear to adopt that suggestion and I think my hon. friend will agree that the Government would be assuming a very great responsibility if it turned over large sums of money to various municipalities throughout the province for them to administer without having any direct control over such administration. It would be changing the whole basis upon which this policy is framed.

As to the high cost of building, and the fact that there might be some loss consequent upon building at the present time while we all hope that present conditions will not become the normal condition and that the cost of building will be reduced, I am afraid that there is not the evidence of a decline in the cost of building which a good many people thought would come about after the signing of the armistice. In view of the rate of wages being paid and being demanded, and in view of many other considerations entering into the cost of building, it does not seem probable that we shall get back for many years to come, if ever, to the conditions which prevailed prior to the war. Therefore, people should not be deterred from building at the present time. A private citizen seeking to borrow the whole amount necessary to build a house—as he could under this scheme—could not get it in my hon. friend's province at less than over eight per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: Could he get the whole amount on any terms?

Mr. ROWELL: Probably he could not get it on any terms. But assuming that he could go into the market and get the bulk of the money, it would cost him eight per cent for at least fifty per cent of the amount required, and he would have to pay a good deal more for the next twenty-five or thirty per cent if he was able to obtain it. That means that the total loan —if he could get it— would probably cost him nine or ten per cent. When he gets it under this scheme at five per cent on the twenty-year payment plan, the Government is contributing twenty-five or thirty per cent of the cost, because of the lower rate of interest. I think the cost is not likely to be reduced below that figure for many years to come. A workingman who builds a house within the next few years with money borrowed at five per cent for twenty years and with the right to pay back principal and interest will not be a dollar out of pocket and will be in no less favourable position than the man who builds his house three, four or five years hence. In fact, I am inclined to think that he will be money in pocket, on the basis of that rate of interest and plan of repayment.

The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) objects, first, because we did not bring down a Bill when Parliament met, instead of taking action by Order in Council; and, second, because, he says, this is only a palliative. Why did we act before Parliament met? For several reasons. First, the provinces wanted to know what the Dominion was going to do in order that they might formulate their own plans. Second, the provinces wanted to know at once the terms on which they could get the money. Third, if housing was to be proceeded with this spring, it was necessary that the provinces should have this information at once in order that they might proceed with their plans. Fourth, the soldiers were returning; they were in need of houses, and it was essential that progress should be made in providing houses for them. An additional reason was that employment might be available this spring to help meet the anticipated serious unemployment because immediately after the armistice was signed last November the majority of the people looked forward to a serious condition of unemployment. The Government felt, therefore, that in order to meet the conditions it was well within their power to agree with the Provincial Governments to make these advances on the terms they did.

My hon. friend referred to the question of orders in Council. I admit that the question whether the Government should act in a particular matter by Order in Council or by a Bill is a proper one for discussion and for legitimate difference of opinion. I promised the committee the other evening, when we were discussing the Northwest Mounted Police Estimates, that I would make a statement with regard to the matter of Orders in Council. But we went on to discuss other points, and I passed over it. As the hon. member for Brome has brought it up on this occasion, I shall say a word on the subject now.

I think it was an article in Le Devoir that first brought forcibly home to me the enormity of the offences which I was committing as President of the Council in grinding out so many Orders in Council. It was stated in that paper that more Orders in Council had been passed in one year while I was President of the Council than had been passed in eighteen or twenty years previously. I think the number of years stated was eighteen or twenty; in any case, it was very many years. I really commenced to think that I must be a very bad man indeed if so many Orders in Council were being turned out while I was President of the Council.

Mr. BELAND: I thought Le Devoir was the minister's organ?

Mr. ROWELL: Well, not recently—to put it mildly. Upon seeing this statement of Le Devoir I was interested in looking the matter up, and I got some figures from the Clerk of the Privy Council. I went back for ten years; let me read the figures. Nobody who has been a member of the Privy Council, as the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and some other members opposite have been, takes seriously this talk of "Government by Order in Council". You might just as well say that municipalities should not legislate by by-law.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I point out the difference? On matters of simple routine, of course, we must pass Orders in Council; the Government is carried on by Orders in Council in matters of routine. But when you rule by Order in Council on a question of policy at a time when Parliament is in session you are making a mistake from the constitutional point of view.

Mr. BUREAU: It is legislation by Order in Council that we object to.

Mr. ROWELL: I am glad to have my hon. friend's statement that we carry on Government by Orders in Council. That is the way the Government acts.

Mr. BUREAU: You carry on Parliament by Order in Council.

Mr. ROWELL: I will touch on that in a minute. As I say, that is the way the Government acts; it is the manner in which the decision of the Government is given on matters of routine and on matters of policy. In the same way a municipality acts by by-law or resolution; the Cabinet acts by Order in Council or by Minute of Council approved by the Cabinet. Now, what is the record? In 1908, 4,832 Orders in Council were passed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With all due deference to the minister, may I say that these statistics are purely childish?

Mr. ROWELL: It is very well for my hon. friend to say so, because they completely undermine all that he has said on other occasions.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh, no.

Mr. ROWELL: I will give the figures, anyway. I have told my hon. friend that the occasion for my looking up the figures was because of the statement that so many more Orders in Council had been passed recently than had been passed in previous years. The figures are as follows:—

Year.	Orders in Council passed.
1910	4,769
1911	5,732
1913	6,728
1914	5,815
1915	6,245
1916	7,282

Mr. CAHILL: How many of those Orders in Councils were passed under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ROWELL: I have not the figures of that. There would, no doubt, be a substantial number, but the great majority of them in every year are purely routine. My hon. friend knows that not an Order in Council can be passed unless this Parliament has given the executive authority.

Mr. DUFF: By closure.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend was not in the House when that Act was passed. The War Measures Act, under which action has been taken, was passed unanimously, if I remember aright, by the House of Commons. There was not a dissenting voice, and the Government has acted only under an Act passed with the unanimous consent of the Parliament of Canada, and passed for the very purpose of giving to the Government power to act in case of emergency during the progress of the war. In passing this particular Order in Council, the Government were simply exercising that authority. My hon. friend may say that a measure like this should have been held over and dealt with by this House. That is perfectly legitimate criticism, and men may honestly differ as to whether that may be the case or not. I take the view, and I believe the Government will take the view, that they were justified in the action they took under the conditions that existed at the time.

With regard to the remark made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that this was a mere palliative, I shall not argue the matter further. It is a good deal more than that. All these social measures are matters of vital moment affecting the social and industrial welfare of the people.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am very sorry to see any minister obstructing his own Estimates, and if I could, by Order in Council or otherwise, restrict the minister's time or put him under closure, I think he would get his Estimates through very much more quickly. It is a great gift and a great privilege to have masterful command of the King's English, but sometimes it is rather a drawback to be so generous in the use of it, as sometimes we find the President of the Council. If I had any advice to give him, it would be to be a little more sparing in replies. He will always find opportunities to continue speaking for the next six months if he will reply to everybody who seems to be seeking information.

Mr. ROWELL: I thought it a matter of courtesy to my hon. friends on the other side.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is such a thing as too much courtesy. I am very glad to find courtesy, and I have no reason to complain of the courtesy of hon. gentlemen on the other side. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy)—and I am sorry he is not in the House—thought that he had occasion to refer to myself and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), by saying that we were not on friendly terms.

He is entirely misinformed; he is almost lacking in information in that regard as the President of the Council is about this Housing scheme. Let me assure the hon. member for North Perth that, while there are many things on which he could with profit look over to this side of the House for information and light and guidance, when he is looking for quarrels and schemes and divisions and subterfuges, he can find plenty of that in the Government and in the benches on his own side of the House without coming over here. Let me assure him again: The Opposition is getting along quietly, nicely, with the very best of feeling, not only amongst themselves, but with their friends on the other side of the House.

I refrained purposely from saying anything about this housing proposition, as I really had no fixed ideas about it, simply because of the way in which this has been put through. It is a new idea, a new scheme, a new principle in this country, and whenever people launch upon a new principle, the matter should come before Parliament and be threshed out in the form of a resolution and legislation passed based upon that resolution. That is the constitution and the safe way to proceed. The President of the Council says that he finds many Orders in Council passed in different years and not many more since the war than before. That is not the question, and as the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has said, a comparison of those figures does not make us any wiser. We do not complain that the War Measures Act was passed, that that power was given to the Government, but we claim that the Government has put constructions on that Act and has done things under it which they should not have done; that they have strained the powers which were given to them under that Act, and that the powers given to them under that Act should be interpreted by the Government in the light of the reasons for which that Act was passed. It is a well known principle that history must be read according to the conditions at the time at which it was written, and Acts of Parliament ought to be construed by courts or Governments according to the reasons for which they were passed. Will the President of the Council, with his training as a lawyer, say that Parliament, when this Act was being passed, had in mind that it should be used for the purpose of putting railroads into liquidation or appointing receivers for railways put into liquidation? No man would think of such a thing at the time; but the President of the Council, and the rest of the Government, have used this Act for that purpose and for many other things equally as bad. We on this side of the House say that there is no justification whatever for using the War Measures Act for any portion of this housing scheme except one. The minister would be perfectly justified, and the people of this country would justify him, in using that power in order to provide homes for returned soldiers, if that is necessary. The minister's department is not the department in which returned soldiers should be looked after. We have a Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, with a minister at the head of it, and it has all the necessary machinery and ought to look after the returned soldier in every phase of his requirements. Why not, then, leave the housing of the returned soldier to that department? If it is in a position to bring in here proper information as to the scale of housing required in the different cities and towns for the returned soldier, and if those requirements are properly set forth in Parliament, there would be no criticism at all. But here is a scheme which does not touch the returned soldier more than any body else. Everybody and everything are put into the boiling-pot, and, as has been pointed out by some of the supporters of the Government, the wealthy man, the capitalist can take advantage of this scheme to get cheap money and build houses which he can rent at any price he thinks fit. I submit—the minister is not to blame for this—that the Government has not the information on this subject which they should have. They simply jumped at a conclusion, passed an Order in Council under the War Measures Act, and accepted the scheme of the provinces whatever it was. The members on this side of the House have often complained of the armies of commissions that have been appointed by this Government for different reasons, some of them good, some very bad. I submit that during the last ten years no scheme has been submitted by a Government in this country that would more fully justify the appointment of a commission to inquire into and report on the conditions than this very subject of housing. A commission is travelling through the country to-day on the very proper mission of ascertaining the social and industrial conditions of the country, and I submit that one of the matters that that commission could legitimately and properly inquire into is this very question of housing. They would then be able to tell the Government what was really required, and the minister could bring down to the House information that would be of value and which would justify us in agreeing to the expenditure of this money. But that information is not here, that inquiry has not been made. Without the slightest intention of being unkind or lacking in courtesy, let me say that in my judgment we are not in possession, much less is the Government in possession of the detailed information that they should have about this scheme before launching upon a loan of $25,000,000 of money which they have not got. If they had the money it would be all very well, but they have to borrow this money from somebody else, and then lend it to somebody else who is going to lend it to somebody else. It is only in the most extreme and necessitous cases that we should undertake to spend money in view of the financial conditions of the country to-day. If we can by any possibility get along as we have been getting along for the last ten or fifteen years, let us try to do so until the financial condition of the country improves. It is represented to us by members of the Government who have addressed themselves to the question of national finance that we are short some hundreds of millions of dollars of what we need. In face of these conditions we find the Government proposing to borrow $20,000,000 for highways, $25,000,000 for housing, and from $25,000,000 to $100,000,000 to create trade with foreign countries. The debt of this country is something over two billion dollars; our revenue is falling off, and our sources of revenue are less promising. These are the conditions which the Government should take well into consideration before launching upon schemes to borrow money which we can do without. The hon. member for Brome has very well said that a housing scheme belongs naturally to cities and provinces. The laws to-day are too lax respecting the way in which concerns who hire men look after them. In the province of Nova Soctia, though it is not very large, we have thousands upon thousands of working men, and as a rule they are very well housed. In the town of Glace Bay in Cape Breton, you will see thousands upon thousands of workmen's houses, each with its plot of land and all the equipment necessary for comfort. The different companies for which these men work are obliged to keep the houses up in that style, or they could not get the men to work for them. If the manufacturers and other large employers of labour throughout the country were given to understand that one of the conditions under which they would be permitted to hire men and carry on their business was that their employees should be properly housed, we would be beginning at the right end. We would be dealing with the people who had the power to bring about the right conditions, and if it was necessary, money could be lent to them. That would be better than beginning where we are beginning now, because from what information I have been able to gather from the minister, a poor man cannot take advantage of this plan at all. It is mere talk so far as the poor man is concerned. If anybody wants to borrow money from the Government he must show that he owns the land and that he is in a position to make a start. It is very much like going to a land company to borrow.

Mr. ROWELL: Perhaps I did not make myself clear if I left that impression on my hon. friend's mind. The man who owns the lot may borrow the money. The whole plan is based on the view that the provincial government may buy property and sell it again. The provinces, of course, accept the responsibility. We impose no limit on the provinces, but the provinces themselves in a good many cases do impose some limit. Ontario, for instance, loans 85 per cent of the total cost of the land and the house. This whole scheme is designed just for the purpose of aiding the working man of limited means.

Mr. McKENZIE: All I have to say in conclusion is that I am in hearty accord with any scheme that will provide a home for the returned soldier, if it is gone about in the proper way and if the soldier is not kept waiting too long. In my part of the country I do not think there will be very much trouble about the returned soldier. Most of them came from the steel and coal works and from the farms. The soldier who left the farm, when he comes back, naturally wants to go back to the farm if he is physically fit, and it is the same with the coal miners and the steel workers. So we have not had very much trouble in Nova Scotia in that respect. If we were having trouble we would be very glad to have provision made. Of course, it may be quite different in other places. If the minister in co-operation with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, could formulate a concrete scheme for accelerating conditions which would help the returned soldier and his family to be properly housed he would have the hearty co-operation and sympathy and support of hon. members on this side of the House. But in view of the financial condition of the country to-day, I am not in favour of a general housing policy upon which we have not sufficient information.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many applications have been received from returned soldiers?

Mr. ROWELL: We only loan to the provinces. The applications are made to the provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the minister not know the number through the provinces?

Mr. ROWELL: No, the provinces do not return that to us. The provinces act on the applications—Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. BUREAU: I desire once more to protest against the manner in which we are called upon to vote this $25,000,000. This expenditure ought to have gone through the usual channel. The item in the Estimates says that this $25,000,000 is to encourage the erection of dwelling houses in congested districts. In the discussion that has taken place this evening suggestions have been made that the money could be used to buy suburban lots or to create new subdivisions, to have new towns planned, and so on. My hon. friend contends that it was necessary to invoke the War Measures Act and pass an Order in Council. I think he is going too far. The Order in Council was passed on 3rd December, 1918, but the armistice was signed in November, 1918, and the War Measures Act, as has been remarked by my hon. leader, did not contemplate such things as this. If any power can be derived from the War Measures Act in connection with the present measure, it is under section 6 of the Act, the marginal note of which reads, "Special powers of Governor in Council." The general clause of the War Measures Act says that it shall cease to have force and effect upon proclamation of the Governor, duly published, that the war is at an end. Section 3 of the Act says that the provisions of section 6 shall only be enforced during the war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended. We need not quibble on words. We know very well that to all intents and purposes the war ceased with the signing of the armistice, and in fact demobilization started from that time. The Order in Council was subsequent to that, and there is no justification whatever for the Government introducing this estimate based on an Order in Council. Generally when the Government want money they introduce a resolution and a Bill is presented. The resolution is discussed and the Bill is put through its various stages, and when it is agreed upon it becomes a concrete statute and every citizen of Canada can refer to it and know where to find it. I do not want to bore the Committee but I certainly desire to register my protest against this procedure, and will go further. We have not been credited on this side of the House with a superabundance of loyalty, but I may say that we never created such a condition of things as to make the representative of the King in this country falsify himself or break his promise. Yet this is what the President of the Council is doing to-day. On the 20th of February, 1919, an extra of the Canada Gazette contained the following:

Ottawa, Thursday, the 20th February, 1919.

This day, at three o'clock, p.m., His Excellency the Governor Genaral proceeded in state to the Chamber of the Senate, in the Parliament Buildings, and took his seat upon the Throne. The members of the Senate being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being present, His Excellency was pleased to open the Second Session of the Thirteenth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following Speech:—

In this speech I find the following·

Your attention will also be invited to Bills providing for aid in the construction of highways, etc.

I pass that paragraph. The other paragraph says:

Bills will also be submitted for the promotion of vocational education; for the creation of a Department of Public Health; for promoting better housing conditions throughout the Dominion by loans made for the purpose to the several provincial governments, and for the validation by Parliament of Orders in Council prohibiting the importation and manufacture of intoxicating beverages,— and so on. It will be observed that in this speech by the Governor made to both Houses of Parliament it is promised that during the present session a Bill will be introduced providing for a better housing scheme. But what have we to-day to discuss? We are called upon to discuss an item which occupies about five or six lines in the Estimates, and no Bill has yet been introduced. Will my hon. friend explain why the promise contained in the speech from the Throne has not been kept, and why he is now proceeding by Order in Council when section 3 of the War Measures Act limits the general powers contained therein to the end of the war, the provisions of section 6 being in force, to use the words of the Act, only "during the war, invasion, or insurrection real or apprehended?" My hon. friend knows as well as I do that the war has ceased, and if he did not know, the great rejoicings that occurred at the signing of the armistice would certainly convince any one that at least it was taken for granted that at that time the war had come to an end. And when that time arrived section 6 of the War Measures Act which gave special powers to the Governor in Council ceased to be of effect. My hon. friend so well understood that, and that it was necessary to confirm the Order in Council of 3rd December and have its provisions embodied in legislation, that he advised His Excellency the Governor General to include in the speech from the Throne the promise that a Bill would be presented in order that there might be no equivocation as to authority and that the House could understand the matter fully and discuss it in detail. As has been remarked by some one preceding me, this is a new departure in policy, it is a new experiment, and my hon. friend the President of the Council will agree with me that we cannot discuss this measure which is before us to-night in pamphlet form as adequately as we could a Bill. When a Bill gets its second reading it goes before the Committee and every section is discussed, and we can get all the information that we require. But this thing is in the form of a recommendation, and absolute power is vested in the Governor in Council, notwithstanding the promise made in the speech from the Throne that the matter would be left to be dealt with by Parliament in the form of a Bill.

There is another ground for objection. The President of the Privy Council knows as well as I do—because by reason of his position he is aware of the Orders in Council that go through—that it is very hard for any one to keep track of all the Orders in Council that are passed; whereas when legislation is submitted in the form of a Bill members are enlightened and cannot plead ignorance. It is not difficult, however, to plead ignorance of Orders in Council, because I have known some of them not to be published until three and four months after they had been passed. For these reasons I protest for the hundredth time—even at the risk of being considered a bore, because while I sit here I will not allow one of the prerogatives that belong to Parliament to be invaded without registering an objection—at the course which has been followed. I claim that under the War Measures Act power could not be derived on the 3rd of December to pass an Order in Council such as the one that has been passed in this case. The only word in that Act which would justify it—and I will read the clause from the Act for the information of the Committee—is the word "welfare." That word was not intended to be coupled with such a scheme as the present—I do not use the word in any offensive sense, and perhaps it would be better to say "plan." Now section 6 of the Act reads as follows:

> The Governor in Council shall have power to do and authorize such acts and things, and to make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may, by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion, or insurrection, deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada.

I consider that the word "welfare" is the only one in the statute which would give them authority to pass such Orders in Council as we are now considering. Under those circumstances, I desire to register my most emphatic protest against it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the minister will see that the information contained in the printed pamphlet which he gave us this evening is very important. That pamphlet we only received when he began to speak upon this item of $25,000,000, and nobody on this side has had any opportunity of reading it. I simply glanced over the pamphlet here and there, but I have not been able to fully digest its contents. I think, therefore, it would be advisable to let the Committee rise and proceed with this proposal a little later on when we have had the opportunity of fully studying what is proposed. When the minister comes down with a proposition to vote $25,000,000 for a proposal of this kind, he should not complain if it does not go through the first evening. I think he will be treating the Committee fairly by letting us have a little spell to study the information which he has placed in our hands.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend may have overlooked the fact, but printed copies of these Orders in Council were distributed and placed in the boxes of hon. members more than a month ago. If hon. members have not read them, it was not because they did not have ample opportunity to do so. I had hoped that after such a full discussion as we have had to-night the item would be allowed to pass. On concurrence, of course, my hon. friends will have the opportunity for further discussion, but I would like to get the item through to-night and make that amount of progress.

Mr. BUREAU: I remember getting one of these pamphlets, but members receive all sorts of literature during the session, and when I saw 'the little frills" on the front page of the document. I did not imagine it was of an official character. I therefore laid it aside and never thought of it again until I saw it being handed around this evening. I was greatly surprised to find Orders in Council enclosed within such a handsomely illustrated cover. Members are not used to that, so it may be regarded as a justification for some of us not paying as much attention as we might have done to the pamphlets when we first received them.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has drawn attention to the fact that a measure on this subject was promised in the speech from the Throne. If that is the case does not the minister think the Government should implement that promise and bring down a Bill dealing with this vote? If the Government intends to do so this resolution will have to stand until that intention is fulfilled. If it is not proposed to do so, we will have to deal with the resolution just as it is, and that will be the greater reason for reasonableness in permitting us to have a little further opportunity for consideration and discussion. This publication is signed by the President of the Privy Council and anything which bears his signature ought to be good reading. Moreover, if we are better informed on the subject there will not be the same need for asking questions. The hon. gentleman should let the committee go now. When the hour of half-past eleven comes it is time to go to our homes; to sit any longer is only impairing our usefulness for another day. We can sit here until six o'clock to-morrow morning if need be, but we should be good for very little that day. I think we do a fair amount of work each day, and it is not making an unreasonable request to ask that the committee rise now.

Mr. BUREAU: I would suggest that the Government bring in a Bill and redeem the word of His Excellency the Governor General, as given in the speech from the Throne.

Mr. ROWELL: It is not the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill, because this vote covers the whole situation. This is to provide for a loan to the provinces. If what is proposed here were the carrying on of a large administrative work under some new department the situation would be different; but this is a loan under certain conditions defined by Order in Council. If there is any further information I could give I would be glad to furnish it. I want, if possible, to get the vote through to-night and if more discussion is desired, it can take place on concurrence.

Mr. BUREAU: Are we not engaging the credit of the Government to extent of $25,000,000?

Mr. ROWELL: We are voting $25,000,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Are not we engaging the credit of the country to that extent?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, we are obligating the country to the extent of $25,000,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Then why not follow the ordinary procedure of introducing a Bill, since the Government promised to do so in the speech from the Throne.

Mr. MORPHY: I have listened to this discussion about a Bill, and it seems to me that if one were introduced, it would only contain one clause to this effect: It shall be lawful for this Parliament to lend the provinces of Canada $25,000,000 to increase the facilities for housing the people. What else could there be in it? I was rather pleased to know that the minister had taken so much pains as to distribute a pamphlet to members which gives more light and information about this particular subject than we ever have about any Bill. I do not think the criticism of hon. gentlemen as to the introduction of a Bill is very well founded, or has much cogency or force.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not observe the promise of the Governor General? Why make him false to his promise?

Mr. COPP: What will the Dominion Government contribute towards this scheme in the difference between the interest it will receive and the interest it will pay?

Mr. ROWELL: The Victory Loan was floated at 5½ per cent, and this is at 5 per cent.

Mr. COPP: Have you made an estimate of what the expenses were in connection with the Victory Loan?

Mr. ROWELL: The cost of the Victory Loan is a fixed matter, regardless of whether we loan the money this way or apply it to another purpose.

Mr. COPP: Has the minister made an estimate of what would be the cost of this particular loan?

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. COPP: Will the minister state whether he has made any investigation or estimate as to what extra staff will be required by his department to carry on this work—what it will cost the country?

Mr. ROWELL: We have availed ourselves of the services of Mr. Adams, who is already with the Conservation Commission, and we have also availed ourselves of the services of two other gentlemen, one on the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the other in the Department of Public Works, who have been loaned for six months for the purpose of carrying out this work with the provinces. We expect that so far as this important end of the administration is concerned it will be over in six months. Then I think we have two additional officials, one for six months and the other for three months, their terms expiring concurrently, to take this matter up with the different provinces and arrange details.

Mr. COPP: That is all very well as to the number; I asked as to the amount.

Mr. ROWELL: The whole expense, including the payment of salaries of the men who are in other departments and are being paid in the meantime in connection with this work, I estimate will not exceed $10,000.

Mr. COPP: Then the cost to the country will be that much more. I notice on page 8 the minister further recommends that all expenses incurred by the committee be charged to the War Appropriation Vote. That refers to the expenses my hon. friend has already mentioned?

Mr. ROWELL: That is correct.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister has not answered my question as to the reasons why the Governor-General changed his mind and proceeded in this way.

Mr. ROWELL: This comes up in the Estimates, and it then comes up in the Supply Bill. It is covered by the Bill in that way. While my hon. friend is fair in his interpretation that a special Bill was implied, this is the method which the Government proposes to carry out the policy; and they think this is all that is required, simply a lump sum of $25,000,000 to be loaned to the provinces.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister would never suggest that a Supply Bill was mentioned in the speech from the Throne?

Mr. ROWELL: No. I said my hon. friend might fairly infer that there was to be a special Bill; but the Government decided that this was the best method of carrying it out.

Mr. BUREAU: Was that determination taken since the beginning of the session? The Government must have had some doubts as to the validity of the Order in Council under the War Measures Act for the reasons I have cited, and I suppose in the moment of recognizing the rights of Parliament the Council wavered and said: We are going to bring down a Bill now; we are having the other Orders in Council ratified. That I think would be justified by the War Measures Act, like the sale of intoxicating liquors, etc. The Bill mentioned in the speech from the Throne was not a Supply Bill, but a Bill for legislation, and that is what was meant, and there can be no other interpretation given to it. But the session went on, things were running smoothly, I suppose my hon. friends got more courage, and they said: We are going to bluff it through the House anyway, whether we make the Governor-General lie or not. I want to know the reason why that course was taken. There is the promise of the Governor-General to introduce a Bill for that purpose, and who is making him false to that promise I want to know?

Mr. CAHILL: How did the Government arrive at the conclusion that they should loan this money to the provinces at 5 per cent—or one-half per cent to one per cent less than we are really paying for the money—and not make a stipulation with the Provincial Governments as to the basis on which they should loan the money? The Provincial Governments are not obliged to loan it at 5 per cent; they may charge 5½ or 6 per cent. Then there is no stipulation that it shall be loaned to soldiers; it may be loaned to a provincial government, and that government may loan it to any person. As a matter of fact the two larger provinces are getting the greater part of the money, and they are getting it at a price less than the Dominion Government can borrow it on the market. How does this advantage the returned soldier when you simply let loose the money to the province; or the real poor labouring man who needs the money, when you let the province make its own arrangements with a city or a company or some private individual? I think the Government should explain that phase of it to us. We have not had an opportunity of reading this, as my hon. friend from Three Rivers pointed out. I saw this thing in my box, but, as you know, our boxes are filled up every day with temperance literature or something else which we throw into the waste paper basket, and this pamphlet went with the other stuff as far as I am concerned.

Mr. COPP: How many provinces have taken advantage of the scheme so far?

Mr. ROWELL: Ontario and British Columbia have submitted their schemes which have been approved. The Manitoba plans have been agreed upon, but the Order in Council has not yet been passed. Quebec's plan has been agreed upon except as to one minor detail, the question of the repayment of the money. New Brunswick has passed legislation and its plan has been agreed upon. Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have passed Acts, but their plans have not yet been submitted.

Mr. COPP: It looks as if not very much work will be done during the present summer.

Mr. ROWELL: So far as this Government is concerned, we have expedited the matter in every possible way; if there is any delay, it is not on our part. But Ontario is going ahead very rapidly, as also is British Columbia. I believe it is the intention of Quebec to do the same.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the Government received any intimation from the returned soldiers' association that they are agreeable to this legislation?

Mr. ROWELL: The returned soldiers' association strongly approved of it. The request came from some quarters that we should lend direct, but we could not see our way clear to do that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have an inquiry from a returned soldier in Nova Scotia who wants to know how he can participate in this scheme. I am told that Nova Scotia requires that the municipality guarantee the loan to the province before a resident of that municipality may take advantage of it. That returned soldier, then, must call a meeting of the county council in the county in which he lives. The county council meets in April and January of each year, so that he will either have to call a special meeting or wait until next January. Then, if he secures the guarantee from the county council he will have to go to the province; the province will, in turn, guarantee the loan to the Dominion, and I suppose the money will then be available. If he has to go through all that, it looks to me like a cumbersome method of getting the money. I should like to know whether I am right in this, because I want to give my returned soldier the information.

Mr. ROWELL: If he is a workingman and comes under the terms of this proposal, it is a question between the Government of Nova Scotia and the soldier himself whether he gets the loan direct or through the municipality. We do not pretend to dictate how the province should proceed in that respect. If he is a farmer, even in a small way, he would likely come under the terms of the Soldier Settlement Act, in which case he could borrow direct.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In that case the money would not come from this fund?

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. ROBB: The minister is appropriating $25,000,000 to be distributed among the different provinces on a per capita basis. He says that only two provinces have actually taken up the scheme; others are negotiating. If only three provinces accept, will the $25,000,000 be distributed among the three?

Mr. ROWELL: No, the Bill expressly provides that they can only get their per capita share. The balance of the vote will lapse if the other provinces do not take advantage of the loan.

Mr. PEDLOW: I object to this item and to the method of introducing this proposal before the House. I object because there has been a lack of vital information regarding this proposal, because the scheme is utterly lacking in proper safeguards, and because certain provisions contained in this beautifully printed document are absurd. The minister has told us that certain agreements have been entered into with two of the provinces. It is only fair that these agreements should be placed on the Table.

Mr. ROWELL: They were placed on the Table some time ago.

Mr. PEDLOW: This is the first intimation that I have had of it. Of course so many things occur that it is impossible to follow them all. Indeed it is impossible to hear a good deal of what is said in the House. I repeat that I object to the method by which this subject was introduced. Legislation by Order in Council has of late been the rule, notwithstanding the figures submitted by the President of the Council tonight. There is no sense in bringing this matter before the Committee now, because the deal has already been put through. Why insult members of the House by spending a whole evening discussing it when it is to be put through no matter how we discuss it? Arrangements have already been made with the provinces on the basis of the terms contained in this document. It is like the case where the judge of a divisional court was about to render a decision One of the lawyers rose up and said: "Your honour, I would like to address the court." The court said "Well, you may go ahead and address the court, but it will make no difference anyway." We address this Parliament, but no matter how much we protest, that will make no difference anyway, because the decision has already been arrived at by Order in Council. I heard it stated on the floor of this House that this was specially designed for the benefit of the returned soldier. It is nothing of the kind. Under the terms of this scheme, any one who has an income not exceeding $3,000 per annum can qualify for a loan; in fact, many members of Parliament could qualify for a loan. Our salary or income for our services here is the magnificent sum of $2,500 per session, and we could apply for a loan under this scheme and build in the city of Ottawa a house which we could occupy for a few months in the year and which would be convenient. I suggest that we incorporate in this measure a provision that members of this House may qualify for a loan to build a residence in Ottawa for use during sessions of Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: And free from taxes.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is another feature of this resolution that I should like the minister to explain. Will he define what is a "workingman"? I should like to know where the line is drawn. The resolution puts the maximum income of those who may apply for a loan at $3,000, and as we are paid $2,500 per session for working about fourteen hours a day, I suppose we could qualify as workingmen under the terms of this proposition.

I should also like to refer to the case of a man who is in good circumstances in life and has, say $42,000 invested in mortgages and that class of security upon which he is receiving 7 per cent per annum. Such a man could qualify under the terms of this arrangement for a loan of $4,500, and he would be a very foolish man if he did not do so, because he could borrow that sum from the Government at five per cent and lend it out at seven per cent, and on the transaction he would net the nice little sum of $90, which added to his handsome income of $2,940 obtained from the investment of $42,000 at 7 per cent, would increase his income to $3,030. Notwithstanding that fact, he could still qualify for a loan under this proposition. Unless proper safeguards are thrown around this scheme as to the manner of making the advances, this loan will go into the hands of the capitalists of the country as well as of members of Parliament who are now about to vote upon the subject.

In view of the statement made that the British Columbia and Ontario Governments have already accepted contracts submitted to them by the Federal Government, it is evident that the operation of this scheme has already begun. Why then bring this matter into this House for discussion when the operation is already settled independently of the House of Commons. It would be just as well for the House to be dismissed as to ask us here day after day to discuss measures that have already been settled by Order in Council. We are mere rubber stamps, and I did not intend to come here to be used as a rubber stamp or anything of that kind. The brains of Parliament are not always included in the section of the House to the right of the Speaker; there are some brains on this side of the House, and they might be of advantage occasionally in matters of this kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. PEDLOW: Hon. members need not be in a hurry, as it is early yet. In view of the statement made previously this session in this House as to the enormous liabilities we have already incurred and the enormous shortage that has been admitted, a shortage, I understand, of over $100,000,000 that is staring the Minister of Finance in the face, and that no doubt is causing him a good deal of worry and is partly responsible for the delay in bringing down the Budget, the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) should hesitate in pressing this scheme to a conclusion to-night. In view of all that, I think the time is inopportune for enforcing this proposition, and besides the amount the Government has decided to invest in this scheme is ridiculous. It will provide, on the basis of an average cost of $3,750 per house, which is the average cost of the four schemes under consideration, for the nine provinces about 629 houses to each province. It will not relieve the situation to any extent; It is a mere drop in the bucket. The House would be well advised to delay this scheme until a proper scheme is got into operation and until a more opportune time arises when money is more plentiful. I heard the acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) state that he would have to appeal to the country during the coming year for a loan of not less than $350,000,000. If the Government go on throwing around the money already received by way of loan from the people of this country, as has been the custom for the last month or so in this Parliament, I fancy they will have a difficult problem ahead of them to raise another loan, and whether it is called a Victory loan or a Peace loan or anything else, the Government will have difficulty in enthusing the people in the matter. I had a good deal to do locally with regard to raising the last loan, and I know from experience gained at that time that the Government have quite a difficult proposition ahead of them, especially in view of the manner in which the money is being spent. The Government is giving $25,000,000 to the provinces without agreements that we know anything of and without proper safeguards. They have advanced $25,000,000 to buy merchandise to send to Roumania, $25,000,000 to buy merchandise to send to Belgium, and an unlimited amount for France and Great Britain, and they have also decided to appropriate $25,000,000 for good roads. I am not finding fault with some of those schemes, but a limit should be put to the amounts, especially when many of them are amounts which are not surrounded by proper safeguards and on which the Government is taking a big chance making a big gamble. I think the funds subscribed by the citizens of this country deserve better protection than they seem to obtain.

Mr. ROBB: Before we proceed further, or before we adjourn, I desire to draw to the attention of yourself, Mr. Chairman, and of the minister in charge, that this loan of $25,000,000 to provincial governments is asked for on the terms and conditions set forth in the Order in Council of the 3rd December, 1918. Article 6 of this Order in Council reads as follows:

Advances shall be made from the War Appropriation.

Inasmuch as we have already voted the War Appropriation of $350,000,000, I submit that the minister is asking for a duplication of that vote, and I think he should report progress and adjourn until he has time to consult as to the legality of this vote.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension. That was under the War Appropriation Vote. The new Vote is not the War Appropriation Vote but the Demobilization Vote. The War Appropriation Vote under which that was payable expired on the 31st of March last, and we have no authority to pay this out of the $350,000,000 Demobilization Vote.

Mr. ROBB: The minister will admit that there appears to be some conflict between the two, and I am not sure but what the country will think he is asking for a double vote.

Mr. ROWELL: I think they are quite clearly defined. Expenditure could only be made under the War Appropriation Vote up to the 31st of March last. We have no authority to spend this money under the Demobilization Vote.

Mr. CAHILL: I think the minister should be generous enough to report progress. Every Friday night we seem to land up against some large appropriation, and I suppose it will be the same at the end of the session. Last session we passed some $60,000,000 on the last night. We have spent a good deal of time this week discussing various matters which if they had been discussed at this hour of the night would have had a very small audience, even of Government supporters. We have only been informed of what this vote actually means this evening, and I think it is only fair that the minister should accede to the wishes of the leader of the Opposition and the Opposition generally, and I think also of many of his supporters. A large vote like this requires careful consideration. We have got into the habit of talking of tens and hundreds of millions of dollars, but the day is coming when we shall have to meet the interest on our investments and repay our loans. I think it would probably be the means of facilitating legislation in the future, as well as right now, if the minister would report progress.

Mr. ROWELL: When the leader of the Opposition made the same request I gave my reasons for hoping that we would pass this vote to-night. If there is any further information required, I shall be very glad to facilitate a discussion on Concurrence. I want to have regard to the views of the leader of the Opposition, but I was hoping that we would reach the point where this item would go through to-night.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have no desire to obstruct any of the business of the House, on the contrary, I want to facilitate it as much as possible. I would say to my hon. friend, who is getting to be rather an old member of this House now, that I have been a member a long time but I have never heard anything discussed on Concurrence, and if he has nothing to promise us but that, there will not be much discussion, unless an innovation is to be made. However, whenever the House gets in a bad temper, as it is beginning to get now, I never get very much satisfaction, and I am content to let the item pass.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell, the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. Saturday.

Monday, May 19, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

TRANSATLANTIC FLIGHT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Has the Government any definite information regarding the reported successful flight of Mr. Hawker, the Australian aviator, who is said to have reached the Irish coast? If this is a fact, will the Government convey the congratulations of this country to both the successful aviator and the Australian Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have no official information, but it was brought to my attention that a despatch had been received stating that a successful flight had been made by this aviator, and before leaving the office I dictated a suitable message of congratulation to Mr. Hawker and to his pilot. Should we have official information later we will be glad to convey it to the House.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Has the Government any further report in connection with the Winnipeg strike? I observed in the papers on Saturday that a request was made that the Minister of Labour should go to Winnipeg, and I should like to know what action has been take in the matter.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (for the Minister of Labour): There is nothing particularly new to report in respect to the Winnipeg strike other than what has appeared in the newspapers. The situation, however, continues quite serious. The bakers and milkmen have been carrying on their business since yesterday, and with certain limitations the restaurants are open to the public. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Robertson) leaves for Winnipeg this evening. He considers that the situation would not have been advantaged had he left sooner.

nay, between Tadoussac and Labrador, were deprived of communications with the other parts of the Dominion of Canada?

2. If so, when did his services begin?
3. When did his work end?
4. What amount did he receive for said services?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: 1, 2, 3 and 4. No mention of John Ridley of the town of Cornwall on the records of the Military Service Branch, or Dominion Police Branch.

GRANTS TO ENCOURAGE PRODUCTION.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens):

1. What were the conditions under which the grants of money were made to the different provinces in 1918, to encourage greater production?
2. What amount of the $5,000 granted to Prince Edward Island did the said province receive?
3. Did Prince Edward Island make any return to the Federal Government stating how the said grant was expended?
4. If so, how was the said grant expended?
5. If not, has the Government of Prince Edward Island to make a return showing how said grant was expended?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR:

1. Financial grants were given by the Federal Government to each of the provinces to assist in a campaign for greater production during the year 1918.

Such grants were given conditional upon equal amounts in each case being provided by the Provincial Governments over and above the sums that would ordinarily be expended in agricultural propaganda by the provinces.

The total amount appropriated for use in each province was to be expended by the provincial authorities in the manner best calculated to secure increased acreage in cereals and the maximum production of live stock.

The situation in each province was carefully gone over and studied by representatives of the Federal and Provincial Departments of Agriculture as to the most effective means of getting the desired results.

General publicity, the holding of public meetings, formation of local Production and Labour Committees, assistance in special circumstances in securing fertilizers and seed, encouragement in cultivation of "War Gardens" and vacant lots, enlisting of the "Soldiers of the Soil," special attention to the hog and sheep industry, effective distribution of farm labour, were matters that received the most attention. No general uniform method of using the grant was followed, but rather, special adaptation to the individual needs of the several provinces. The arrangements for the method of expenditure of the Federal grants in Eastern Canada were in the hands of Dr. J. W. Robertson, and in Western Canada in those of the Hon. C. A. Dunning, Provincial Treasurer of Saskatchewan, and Mr. J. D. McGregor, of Brandon. Mr. Dunning and Mr. McGregor were both members of the Canada Food Board.

2. $2,500.

3. So far no return received.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Yes.

4. Has Major Pomerey been on active service during the period of the war?

5. If so, when, and where?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Major A. L. Pomerey is temporarily assisting as an inspector and valuator in the Eastern Townships.

2. From May 1, 1919. By the Soldier Settlement Board.

3. At the rate of $150 per month while employed.

4. There is no record of this officer having been on active service during the present war.

1. Were any prizes taken by the H.M.S. "Niobe" during the war?

2. If so, how many and what was their estimated value?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What amount of money was paid by the Government, or any government departments or commissions appointed by the Government, in connection with the Canadian War Loans since the commencement of the war for the following years: 1914-15-16-17 and 18, respectively?

2. To whom was it distributed?

3. What are the names of the different persons, or firms, to whom these amounts were paid?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

DOMINION WATER-POWERS.

Bill No. 94, respecting the Dominion Water-Powers—Hon. Mr. Meighen—read third time.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals), the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

That it is expedient to extend the time within which the Saint John and Quebec Railway Company is to complete the construction and equipment of its line of railway from a point at or near Centreville, in the county of Carleton, to a point at or near Andover, in the county of Victoria, to the thirty-first day of December, 1921, both with respect to the agreement entered into under the authority of section three of The Saint John and Quebec Railway Act, 1916, and also with respect to the subsidy agreement made under the authority of section six of the said Act: Provided that the said extension shall only be granted with respect to the first-named agreement after the consent of His Majesty on behalf of the province of New Brunswick has been obtained.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minster explain?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is merely to extend the time for the completion of that part of the St. John and Quebec railway between Centreville, in the county of Carleton, and Andover, in the county of Victoria, New Brunswick. The House passed a similar Bill this session, but it omitted to include the part of the road between Centreville and Andover.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain why it is necessary to bring this before the House instead of going to the Railway Committee for an extension of time?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is a railway that is being built by the New Brunswick Government. It is a line that was to have been built from the Transcontinental railway to St. John, and the Dominion Government have taken it over and are operating it on a percentage basis. The New Brunswick Government have not completed the road as yet. The New Brunswick Government have asked that the time for completion be extended. The House will remember that Bill No. 5 of the present session was passed authorizing an extension of time for completion from Gagetown to a point on the Canadian Pacific at or near Westfield. The Bill should have included that portion from Centreville to Andover. The New Brunswick Government have drawn our attention to the fact that in the Bill as passed we neglected that portion, and have asked us to introduce and pass this Bill to allow the time for completion of the whole line to be extended to the 31st December. It is not customary to send Bills of this kind to the Railway Committee, because this is merely an extension of a Government line.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. J. D. REID moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 117, to authorize an extension of time for the completion of the St. John and Quebec railway between Centreville, in the county of Carleton, and Andover, in the county of Victoria, N. B.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BIOLOGICAL BOARD ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. J. T. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), Bill No. 102, to amend the Biological Board Act, was read a second time, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Duties of board:

Mr. COPP: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The object of this Bill is merely to remedy an error that was made quite unintentionally in 1912 when the Act was passed. It is to give the necessary authority to the deputy minister and the officers under him, without in any way interfering with the work of the Biological Board. Clause 5 in the Act of 1912 was prepared in rather an ambiguous manner, and this is simply to straighten it out.

Mr. COPP: Does this give an officer the privilege of going all over the country to investigate this question?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No, the object of the change is simply to give the deputy minister, and the officers under him, the necessary authority to engage whatever scientific and technical officers, they may in their judgment deem most fit.

Mr. COPP: To investigate this matter?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply. Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Department of Immigration and Colonization —Salaries, including $6,000 to Deputy Minister, $2,500 for promotion and salary of W. R. Little as Commissioner of Immigration for Eastern District, $139,767.

Contingencies, $35,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain these items?

Mr. CALDER: There is an increase in the amount asked for. During the year the quarantine service was transferred to the Immigration Department, necessitating an increase in the staff. This department, as in the case of other departments, has several clerks who have been carried on the temporary staff for a period of years, and some of these have been made permanent. The balance of the additional amount is accounted for by promotions to the staff and statutory increases.

Mr. CAHILL: It seems unreasonable that the expenditure of this department should be increased by such an amount when there is very little immigration coming into the country. The minister might explain what his expectations are with regard to immigration and colonization; if there is any colonization work being done, or any in prospect, and what he has in mind with regard to immigration. The minister might also explain whether he expects to continue admitting Mennonites, Hutterites and Mormons to Canada, or whether he expects to obtain some other class of immigrants. If he does not, this vote should be decreased rather than increased.

Mr. CALDER: The work of the office in Ottawa has, in a sense, very materially increased during the last year or so. In addition to bringing people to the country, there has been cast upon the department the duty of closely scrutinizing those who have been passing backwards and forwards between Canada and the United States. In that regard at least the department has never heretofore had as much work to do. The increase in the expenditure is necessary for that reason. As to immigration generally, I think there is very little chance of our getting many people from Europe in the near future. Shipping conditions are such now and will so continue for some time that we cannot look to receiving any great number of immigrants from Great Britain or from the continent of Europe. On the other hand, we are continuing to receive a very large number of people from the United States, which last year amounted to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 60,000. The year before that the number was about 75,000, and I would not be at all surprised if this year we will have approximately from 75,000 to 100,000 residents of the United States entering Canada for settlement here. It is very difficult at the present time to anticipate what the condition is going to be in regard to immigration from Europe. I am inclined to the view that as soon as conditions become a little more settled we may look for a very large immigration from Great Britain, and possibly from the Northern European countries. As to that, however, one can only guess, because of the present unsettled conditions in those countries. I think we may look forward to a continuing immigration from the United States when we consider that country has now a population somewhere in the neighbourhood of 115,000,000, that the natural increase of population there is very large, and the amount of land available for settlement purposes is very greatly restricted. I think the natural growth of the population of the United States, in addition to the number they receive from outside countries, will have a tendency, for some years to come, to cause a very large number to migrate to Canada. So long as there is available in Canada large areas of arable land suitable for settlement I think we may expect that movement to grow.

Mr. MICHAUD: Will the minister kindly explain the vote in connection with immigration for the Eastern District? What does this comprise?

Mr. CALDER: During the year the outside service of the department was placed on a different basis. Canada has been divided into three immigration districts, the Eastern District, the Prairie District—called the Western District, I think—and the Pacific District. Each of these districts is in charge of a commissioner whose duty it is to see that the immigration law is enforced by all the officials under him. The Eastern District comprises, roughly speaking, all of Canada east of the Great Lakes, and is in charge of Mr. Little, formerly an official of the department here, who will have under him a staff of one hundred and fifty or two hundred.

Mr. MICHAUD: I would ask the minister to bring to the attention of Commissioner Little the fact that the position of Immigration Agent at Clair, Madawaska county, has been vacant for four or five months. I understand that the Collector of Customs has taken hold of the duties temporarily, pending the appointment of a new agent. It is urgent that an appointment should be made immediately, because during the summer a number of undesirable people come into Canada from the United States. Immigration into that district has to be watched very closely; immigrants of this kind often have to be returned. The Collector of Customs has not the time to give proper attention to this work, and the appointment should be made without delay.

Mr. CALDER: I am not personally acquainted with the situation there, but in all cases of this kind the necessity for having a permanent appointment made is carefully gone into by the department. If it is found necessary that an appointment of that kind should be made in the case my hon. friend refers to, the matter will receive immediate attention.

Mr. EULER: I gather from the remarks of the minister that immigration into Canada is now largely into the West, and consists of people who are going upon the land. I suppose that they come largely from the Western States. If that is the case, does the department still maintain agencies in the large cities of Eastern United States, and if so, for what purpose?

Mr. CALDER: That phase of our immigration work can best be considered under the main vote providing for the salaries of all our agents in United States and elsewhere. We still have our agents in the eastern part of United States. Last year we closed the Philadelphia agency; all the others that were previously maintained are still in operation.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister has not told us anything about what is being done in connection with the colonization end of his department.

Mr. CALDER: It was provided last year that only returned soldiers should settle on Crown lands lying within a distance of fifteen miles from the railways. Outside of that, homesteading is still being carried on, principally in Northern Saskatchewan and Alberta. As to Eastern Canada, we are still carrying on publicity work as through our agencies in the United States. I understand that a number of people have been induced to come from New England and settle in Northern Quebec during the last six months or so. Our agencies in the Eastern part of United States have been securing very good results in the way of inducing persons to migrate to Canada and settle on lands. I am inclined to the view that the results in that direction will be very largely increased in the near future.

Mr. CAHILL: Of the 60,000 immigrants who came in during the last year, about what number belonged to the sects that have been under discussion in the newspapers during recent weeks?

Mr. CALDER: We have not endeavoured to keep a record of the religious denomination of those who have been entering the country; we know them simply by nationality.

Mr. CAHILL: The newspaper reports gave the number of Hutterites and Mennonites who came into the country as varying from 30,000 to 60,000. They stated that some of the Mormons who came in have taken up Indian Reserves that were taken from the Indians last year, and that the greater part of the immigration last year consisted of that class of people. Surely the minister can give us within a few thousand the number of Hutterites and Mennonites who came into the country last year.

Mr. CALDER: I should only be guessing, because we have not kept a record of that kind. I asked the officials of the department for a statement along that line, but I have not been able to obtain it. I have been told—I do not know whether it is true or not—that the total number of Hutterites on this continent does not exceed 2,500; and only a certain proportion of these —what proportion I cannot say— have entered Canada. The movement of Mennonites has not been very large; I imagine that not more than five or six hundred came into Canada during the past year.

As to the Hutterites, probably one thousand entered Canada; that would be the limit. I have seen no statement in the press to the effect that 25,000 or 30,000 of these people have entered Canada. I am absolutely sure that that statement is very greatly exaggerated.

Mr. EULER: Did any of the Mennonites who immigrated into Western Canada come from the Western States or the Eastern States, and was any actual investigation made as to their character and habits? I know nothing about the Hutterites who have been confused with the Mennonites.

Mr. CALDER: The great majority of the Mennonites who entered Western Canada came from Kansas and neighbouring States, and very few of them came from the Eastern States. I cannot see the necessity for making an investigation. Unfortunately, there are Mennonites and Mennonites and those who live in Western Canada know the conditions existing there. Some of the members of the Committee know that quite recently I received a visit from six bishops belonging to that sect, who stated that they represented some 10,000 souls in the three provinces of Western Canada. They belong to the old colony of Mennonites, that portion of the sect that is absolutely opposed to sending their children to the public schools. They have been in the West for thirty, forty, or fifty years, and as members of the Committee probably are aware, the Provincial Governments in the West have had all sorts of trouble in endeavouring to induce those people to take advantage of our public school system. Unfortunately, however, they have not seen their way clear to do so, and it is that very fact that has given rise to the agitation in Western Canada for the exclusion of those people from the country until such time as they are prepared to observe the education and other laws of the country. It is very unfortunate this condition should prevail, but there it is. I am well acquainted with many of our Mennonite settlements in Western Canada and with the people, and those who have broken away from the old ideas are law-abiding, moral living people; they have no bad habits; they are great producers; they are making great progress from many standpoints, and they make very desirable citizens. But so long as a large section of those people hold out against coming under the education laws of the Western Provinces, an agitation will prevail to exclude them from entering Canada.

Mr. EULER: I would make no defence whatever for any class of Mennonites who object to sending their children to the ordinary public schools, and I am rather surprised to learn that Mennonites in Western Canada raise that objection. I would not be at all surprised to learn that all Mennonites do not so object, because Mennonites who now live in Alberta came originally from Waterloo county, and in Waterloo county Mennonites make absolutely no objection to sending their children to the ordinary schools; I do not think the thought ever entered their minds to have separate schools for themselves. They speak a language of their own only amongst themselves, it being known sometimes as Pennsylvania Dutch, a combination of English and German. These people have lived in that county for a hundred years, and they have never raised any objection to their children going to public schools. Is the chief cause for desiring to exclude the Mennonites from Western Canada the fact that they are not inclined to permit their children to attend the public schools, or is it because of their objection to compulsory military service? They are moral, industrious, honest and make very desirable citizens, as I am sure any hon. member who ever came into contact with the Mennonites as we have them in Western Ontario and saw their farms and the result of their work and intelligence, will admit, although he might find fault with them for objecting to compulsory military service. As the minister states, there are Mennonites and Mennonites. Of the old Mennonites, there is an off-shoot called the New Mennonites who have somewhat different religious beliefs, and to my personal knowledge many of the new Mennonites volunteered for military service in this war. I have not with me a letter that I received the other day, shortly after the previous debate we had on the Mennonite question, but it was written by a man well known to me and he made this statement, which I have no reason to disbelieve, that in Toronto a certain Mennonite congregation sent to the front more men voluntarily than any other congregation in that ultra-loyal city. That must have been from the branch known as the New Mennonites, and there is amongst those who are now settled in Ontario a tendency to become more assimilated with the general population, that being especially the case when they go into the towns and cities. I should like it to be understood that if the Mennonites in Western Canada object to sending their children to the public schools, there is a distinction between them and those living in Western Ontario.

Mr. CALDER: I assure the hon. gentleman that what I stated is the case.

Mr. EULER: I am not questioning the word of the minister.

Mr. CALDER: There are some thousands of Mennonites of the old sect who stand out absolutely against sending their children to the public schools.

Mr. EULER: Are they in Alberta?

Mr. CALDER: I am not sure whether any of them reside in Alberta, but they reside in large numbers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It is only fair that I should explain to the committee the reason for this objection on their part. Before these people ever came to Canada, away back in the early seventies they sent certain delegates here from Russia. Those delegates sat down with the Government in order to ascertain the conditions under which they might be allowed to come and settle in Canada. The negotiations were held in 1872, and in 1873 an agreement was reached, the Government of the day, by an Order-in-Council, practically guaranteeing those people that they would be allowed to establish religious schools of their own, and they claim that it was by reason of that agreement that they came to Canada. Of course there were other conditions as well. Along through the seventies and the eighties they established and maintained schools of their own.

These schools are of a very primitive character, teaching practically nothing but the Bible; the English language is not used and there are no text books at all. Those who came here nearly fifty years ago and their descendants have maintained right along that they had a right to expect the Government of Canada to live up to the agreement that was then made. Now it is held, and I am inclined to think properly held, that the Government of the day had no authority to enter into any such agreement. The Government had no control over the school system of the province of Manitoba, and I doubt very much if they made provision for any such class of schools in the Autonomy Acts when the other provinces were established. At any rate, all the three Prairie Provinces maintain that so far as their public school system is concerned they do not propose to allow that agreement to stand in the way. They insist that these settlers shall send their children to the public schools, and it is the controversy over this problem that has given rise to the very intense feeling in Western Canada against the Mennonites as a class.

Mr. COPP: I see an item of $5,000 for the Director General of Public Health, which formerly was included in the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture. Is this salary for work in connection with the Department of Public Health which was legislated upon recently?

Mr. CALDER: In the Act creating the Department of Public Health there is a clause to the effect that when created the department will take over certain services from the different departments, and provision is also made that the salaries of the officials concerned shall go over with them, so that the item voted will be available when the department is created. This particular officer will go over to the Public Health Department, and his salary will go over with him.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is the minister aware that the Mormons who are entering Canada and building homes here for themselves, have left wives in their homes in the United States? If that is a fact, I should like some explanation from the minister.

Mr. CALDER: I am not aware that it is a fact.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I note with some disappointment that the minister apparently is not attempting to make any reduction in his Estimates. There is an increase over last year in practically every item. Now we all know that immigration has very much decreased, and we would naturally expect the expenditure to decrease, or at all events remain stationary. I find by page 72 of the public accounts that in 1908, when a large number of immigrants were entering Canada and we were carrying on an active propaganda in Europe and the principal cities of the United States, the expenditure of the department was only $960,000, whereas in 1917 it was $1,181,000, and in 1918 $1,211,000. The expenditure seems to be increasing with the decrease in the number of immigrants. It seems very unsatisfactory, and I should like the minister to explain this inverse ratio and why no attempt has been made during the last three or four years, when practically no immigrants were coming in, to reduce the expenditure of the department.

Mr. CALDER: I have not the figures at hand, but the statement of my hon. friend is scarcely accurate. For 1914 or 1915, the expenditure of the department ran as high as $1,900,000, whereas our total expenditure under the head of immigration last year was only a little over $1,000,000, which meant a decrease in the neighbourhood of $900,000. The staff has been very materially reduced during the last three or four years. In 1914 or 1915, I forget which year, but it was the year of our highest expenditure, we had a staff of 780. That has been cut down to about 450 all told. During the past year there has been a very material decrease of about 100 in the staff in Canada which has made possible a saving of about $100,000 in salaries alone.

There is one feature that is liable to be overlooked, and that is that under the law we have established a condition that makes it absolutely necessary to have a string of officials right along our border from ocean to ocean, and this service must be maintained whether immigrants are coming in or not. We must have a man protecting a point south of Montreal, let us say, all the time whether five or fifty or one thousand immigrants are coming in, and the same is true all along the border. We have by law made it necessary that certain work must be done along our whole border, and the staff must be maintained. With regard to our Old Country service, while the staff has not been very active in actual immigration work during the last three or four years there is no other portion of the public service that has been so busy. They have had responsibilities placed upon them entirely outside of the usual round. For months past they have been engaged in arranging shipments for soldiers' dependents to Canada. That work is very complicated and very difficult, and will continue for some months to come. Notwithstanding this, there has been a material reduction in our Old Country staff. In the United States, where we have some twenty-one agencies, two or three offices have been closed, and the staff has been reduced by about ten. We must maintain this service to prepare for the movement that is bound to come shortly. One point we must bear in mind is this: When you have trained a man in this work, you cannot afford to let him go if he is a good man, and the mere fact that immigration has been somewhat dormant during the last two or three years is no reason why we should dismiss from our service men who have been with us for a good many years and are qualified to carry on this work. I think every effort has been made to reduce our expenditure to the lowest possible point; and while certain increases are provided for here, it does not necessarily mean that the money will be expended. If there should be occasion to spend the money wisely during the year, then the sum is necessary for the purpose.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have no doubt the figures I gave the minister are correct, because they are from the public accounts, but we have not yet an estimate of what the minister intends to spend during the current year. I presume he has on his desk some statement showing this amount, and if he has we can judge whether he has made any reduction from 1918.

Mr. CALDER: I think we might very well leave that discussion until we come to the general expenditures of the department, including those under the head of Immigration and Colonization. We are dealing here merely with the estimates of the department itself. When we come to the other estimates I shall be prepared to give some information.

Mr. CAHILL: In previous years the Immigration Department had free lands to offer settlers. What has the minister in mind now as an inducement to immigrants to come to Canada? Of the immigrants that came last year—some 60,000—how many went on the land? I would like to know the minister's views in regard to settling immigrants on land more than fifteen miles from a railway. Are immigrants permitted to settle on any Canadian Government land regardless of distances from railways? The minister would hardly suggest that the strike in Winnipeg is an inducement to labourers to come to Canada, nor would it be contended that the high prices of lands adjacent to railways in Western Canada and held by speculators is in the nature of an inducement. If this department is not in a position to do immigration or colonization work we should re-name it, and vote sufficient to provide for the policing of the boundary, as the minister has pointed out. We should know what we are voting for.

Mr. CALDER: The inducement that is held out to people looking for homes in a new country must be very obvious to hon. members. We have enormous resources in this country; on a conservative estimate, the amount of arable land in this country suitable for settlement is at least one hundred million acres, scattered all over the provinces. Our homestead lands adjacent to railways—I am speaking of federal lands now—have to a very large extent been settled on. But there is an abundance of other land, valued at from $15 to $20 an acre, and this is a fact that is easily brought to the attention of prospective settlers. Those who have been coming to Canada from the United States during the past few years have not been seeking homesteads to any great extent, but have been purchasing this land fairly freely. It is estimated that in Alberta and Saskatchewan alone there are about 25,000,000 acres of this kind of land which, so long as it does not exceed $25 or $30 an acre, will be quite an attraction to those who are looking for farms in a new country. The work of the department is to inform intending immigrants of this fact. This is being done in the United States through our agencies, and by advertising, publicity campaigns and various other means, and it is partially as a result of the activities of the department that settlers are coming to Canada. In Eastern Canada, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, and to some extent in New Brunswick, there are still areas of land suitable for settlement, some of which will require a little development. But, nevertheless, conditions are such that the possibilities of making homes in northern Ontario, northern Quebec, and New Brunswick may be made attractive to those desirous to settle in a bush country or a country that is partially wooded. We are now in negotiation with the governments of these provinces, and have in mind the preparation of plans whereby the possibilities of settlement in these three eastern provinces may be brought before those looking for new homes in a country such as northern Ontario and Quebec. I have no doubt at all that if the plans for that work are carefully prepared and the necessary publicity work is carried out, a good many settlers can be induced to go into those regions in Eastern Canada. I think the hon member knows of quite a number of settlers who have gone into northern Quebec. I purpose to have a survey of the situation made this summer in order that we may know exactly the facts, and by consultation with the governments of Quebec and Ontario, and by necessary co-operation, we hope to be able to conduct a publicity campaign in Great Britain and the United States that will aid in the settlement and development of those portions of Eastern Canada to which I have referred. I have already had several interviews with members of the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Governments, and I trust that we shall be able to assist in the development of those provinces in the way of settlement.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the minister any idea where we shall get settlers for Northern Ontario? What countries does he expect settlers to come from? It is pretty well known that the British Isles will not furnish settlers for Northern Ontario, because immigrants from that country prefer to keep in the older settled districts or go to Western Canada. I have no doubt there is a possibility of getting a certain class of settlers for Northern Ontario to fill in that large district between the east and west on the Transcontinental and Canadian Northern. Has the minister in mind any particular settlers he expects to be able to induce to go into that country?

Mr. CALDER: I have not; but I would not be so certain that British people would not go there.

Mr. CAHILL: So far they have not done so.

Mr. CALDER: Probably not. It may be that they are not acquainted with conditions, or possibly they have ideas that are not altogether favourable, regarding that part of the country. The fact may not have been properly placed before them, but at any rate I can see no reason why British people should not be induced to settle in Northern Ontario or even in Northern Quebec. After all, when we look back in Canadian history we find that it was British stock that went out into the wilds in the early days, and there should be no reason whatever, if proper conditions were estabblished, why people from the British Isles should not settle in certain portions of these provinces.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Are the people of alien enemy origin such as Germans and Austrians who have been resident in the United States for some time allowed to come into Canada as immigrants?

Mr. CALDER: Under the law as it now stands any person who is an enemy alien is not permitted to enter Canada no matter where he comes from. If a person who came originally from Austria to the United States became a United States citizen, he would no longer be an alien enemy. He would be a citizen of the United States.

Mr. CAHILL: I would like to know where the $15 an acre land is that the minister speaks of. I have some knowledge of Western Canada and of land values there. I am afraid that if the minister's agents in the United States are telling people that they can buy land within a reasonable distance of a railway at $15 an acre they are misleading them because there are very few places where you can buy land at $15, $20 or $25 an acre within any reasonable distance of a railway. Before the minister increases his expenditure upon immigration to any great extent he should try and make some provision whereby the land can be loosened from the grip of the speculators in Western Canada who are holding it for a rise in price, using the Immigration Department and the money of the people of Canada to bring in customers for that land, to the disadvantage not only of Canada but particularly of Western Canada. We have railways running through territory where the land is all held by speculators. We have national railways running through Canadian Pacific land. You cannot buy that land for anything like $15 per acre. Any that is within any reasonable, or farming, distance of a railway is being held at $25, $30, $40 and $45 per acre. The price and the cash payments are so high that it is almost impossible for a man with little means, say $2,500 or $3,000, to get upon that land, even to get a quarter section, because the holders want a big cash payment and it takes a considerable amount of money to get stock and implements. I noticed in the press this morning that the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department have in the neighbourhood of 5,000 applications from soldiers for land and that something like 1,900 have been dealt with. If this land is so plentiful that we can afford to look for immigrants throughout the world, the soldiers should be able to get land more readily. If we have no land why are we spending money to get people to come in here to add to the number of unemployed and to go upon strike? If there is not enough work now for the people who are in the country, why should we be looking for other people to come in here and increase the difficulties that we have upon our hands? I am afraid that Parliament is living in a fool's paradise at the present time. I believe that the strike condition is very much worse than the Government consider it to be. We were told by the ministers that they were not in communication with Winnipeg and that the information they had about the strike came through newspaper reports. If that is the condition, instead of sitting here voting away money for immigration, we should be looking into the fundamental reasons for this unrest and particularly for the reason why we are not able to get people on the land and why they are flocking into the cities. I had expected that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, after more than a year and a half at the head of this department, would have had some very definite ideas about immigration and colonization. I thought he would have evolved a plan, that he would have come to the House and told us that he did not think we could satisfactorily handle any more immigration for the present year, and that he had solved the land problem so that people could get on the land instead of being encouraged to flock into the cities working for less than a living wage, with the high cost of living outstripping their salaries and wages. If the minister does not get any more information than he has given us he is not spending this $1,500,000 of the people's money very intelligently.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I wish to say to the minister will perhaps enable him to give the House more information when he brings down another item in connection with immigration. It is rather startling to find that this department is costing so much money. I took occasion last year to remind the minister that his department is merely a subdivision, something like the situation in which a farmer finds himself when he divides his hundred acres of land between his two sons; there might be enough for one but not enough for either when he divides his substance between them. For many years we found that this work was being attended to by one department, but when it became necessary to provide for the younger son, the patrimony was divided. This younger son, in the person of the Minister of Immigration, should realize that this department is not necessary at all. At all events, it was not found necessary until an extraordinary condition arose in this country. The minister should handle the affairs of the department with great care so that no person would have any reason to say that his administration was characterized by any degree of extravagance. But as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), the extraordinary condition exists that as the number of immigrants falls off the cost per capita ascends. That is a condition which should not exist and one for which the minister should give some satisfactory explanation. There is another phase of the new department which should receive attention and that is that the minister should have everything at his finger ends in connection with it. It is only about two years old. He started on the ground floor with everything new. He is the creator, the promoter, the advancer of his department and he has been with it from the beginning. He is not like a man who took charge of a big department after it had been growing for many years and from whom it might be unreasonable to expect a knowledge of all the various details. Here is a department that started into operation with himself at the head of it. He ought to know all about it. There should not be any underground workings in connection with it with which he was not familiar. I am more or less disappointed with the degree of familiarity and knowledge of his department that he displayed in connection with these items. I suppose the minister is a busy man, has a great many things to do and that he possibly did not anticipate the questions that would be asked, but I would expect more details and greater capacity to answer the various proper questions that have been submitted to the minister. The minister tells us that there are other items under which we would have wider scope to deal with the lands that we have in the West, but, now that he has entered upon the matter himself, I would say that when he comes down again he ought to tell us in a systematic way, dealing with every province by itself, how much land the Government has to be disposed of for settlement purposes, where these lands are, at what price, under what arrangements are they available for settlement, how far are they from railways in the various provinces and particularly the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I do not understand that the Government has very much acreage in British Columbia, and possibly not a very large acreage in Ontario—in fact I do not know whether the Government possesses any land in that province. I also wish to state to the minister that I think there has been a very poor system followed in disposing of Government lands in the West. For that the minister is not at all responsible, but it is possibly not yet too late to establish a better system. I think that only certain areas of land should be set off for settlement, and until they have been disposed of and occupied, settlers should not be allowed to run away hundreds of miles from the railway by reason of a whim or fancy of their own, when the lands in those far-off districts are no better than those which are available closer to the railways. By establishing a system of that kind settlers would be located together, within range of a railway station, and we would not be called upon, as we are now, to build a larger mileage of railways than constitutes a fair proportion per capita for the population which we serve in that country. I would suggest to the minister that he should carefully inquire into the way in which this land is disposed of, and that he will see to it in future that the allotment of the land is carried out on a proper basis having regard to the railway accommodation which now exists in the West. It would be far better in the interests of settlers themselves to follow out some such plan, because they could get their grain and other products more easily shipped. It would likewise be more satisfactory for the communities that are growing up, because they could have schools, religious services, and other facilities more easily provided when they are in settlements or villages. This is a matter which I wish particularly to bring to the notice of the minister.

The minister has observed that we have large quantities of land in the West. I am glad to hear that such is the case, because my understanding was that the Government had been disappointed when it came to take an inventory of the Government lands that were available in connection with the settlement of soldiers on the land. I am informed—I cannot say whether this is official or not—that the Government discovered when looking for land to give to the soldiers, that it did not have nearly as much as it thought it had, and now finds it necessary to expropriate lands which companies have bought, or have received as railway subsidies, and which are being held possibly for speculative purposes. When the minister comes before the Committee again he may be able to tell us, if such comes within his department, what the policy of the Government is in respect of such lands. I would like him, in fact, to give a general idea of the policy of the Government as to the disposal of lands which it owns and which will be dealt with in connection with immigration purposes. There is, of course, a close alliance between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Immigration and Colonization, and I am not expecting the minister to answer questions regarding matter which more properly come within the purview of the former department.

Mr. COWAN: I do not have to apologize for the Minister of Immigration at all, because he requires no apology. I have known him sufficiently long to realize that he is quite capable of handling his own department without any assistance from me. I must say, however, that I have been watching his administration of the department for the past year, and while during that period he has chopped off the heads of one or two of my political friends who were appointed to office on my recommendation some years ago, and to that extent I feel some regret, yet I have to admit that in pursuing this policy he has succeeded in effecting a very great saving to the country and in placing, as I see it, our immigration system in a much better condition than it was before. I think the minister was absolutely right, wherever he found an old Tory or an old Grit in office who had not enough to keep him busy, to dispense with him, and that is exactly what has happened.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. COWAN: That is my opinion, whether other hon. gentlemen agree with me or not. The expenses of the administration of the department probably are a little high, and the leader of the Opposition is quite correct in drawing attention to past expenditures when there was such a tremendous rush to this country. I wish to draw his attention, however, to this: A great deal of the trouble we have in Canada to-day is due to the fact that we did not have in former days sufficient supervision over immigration with the result that men came into our country who should not be admitted. We have these men to-day; they constitute the problem which the Minister of Immigration has to deal with. We are to-day paying for the follies of past administration, and I think it is absolutely unfair to charge it up to the present minister when it is the men who preceded him who were guilty of the wrong-doing.

For my part, I wish to see a vigorous immigration policy continued. Hon. gentlemen in the East may be quite content to sit down and suck their thumbs and do nothing to help the country, and it looks to me as if that is what has happened in some localities in the East. In the past year I took a trip through the province from which the leader of the Opposition comes and also through New Brunswick. It was the first time I had visited that country, which I expected to see so completely filled with people that it would be without opportunity to make any large increase to its population. But I was amazed to find mile upon mile of what looked to me to be exceedingly good land, with apparently no settlers. The thought was forced upon me that the people in that part of the Dominion were awfully deficient in that element of virtue which we call progress. It is about time that the Minister of Immigration from the West went down into that part of Canada to wake the people up a little bit, because it seems to me they have a magnificent country and they are making very little use of it compared with what they might. We in Western Canada do not intend to sit down and wait for immigrants to come in of their own free will under the system which has been followed in the Eastern Provinces in days gone by. We know that we have a mighty good country, and until we get it peopled we cannot expect to have the social conditions which we would like to have, because scarcity of population is very disadvantageous to contentment. We have millions upon millions of acres of fine land. It may be true that a great deal of this has gotten into the hands of private individuals under the wrong policy which was followed in the earlier days. But is the Minister of Immigration going to sit down and do nothing to overcome those conditions which have been thrust upon him? I say no. And if he does I can assure him there is nobody in the country who will more vigorously oppose him than I. I quite agree that the endeavour to get immigrants from the Western States is a correct policy.

The best settlers we have in Western Canada to-day came from Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the Western States. Thousands of people are crowding in from the United States. These people are very much like ourselves. In the early days, when they started to come, they had a very peculiar notion of British institutions. Many of them thought they were coming to live under—well, almost what you would expect from the Czar of Russia of those days. They believed that we were a mere colony, and that we got our laws and everything else from the King of England. Of late their notions of Canada have been entirely changed; they now know that they enjoy the same justice and the same liberty that they enjoyed in the United States. Hundreds of townships are settled by people from the American side. We are glad to have them, and I hope that the minister will continue the policy of trying to induce such people to come to Canada. There is any amount of land in Western Canada for thousands of immigrants from such places as I have mentioned, as well as for our returned soldiers. If we are finding a little difficulty in getting just the land that the returned soldiers want, that is not the fault of the land. The land is there, and it is up to us to evolve a system under which it will be made available. I am confident, from what I hear, that we will satisfactorily settle that problem very shortly. In the meantime, the Committee ought to give the minister a very substantial vote in order that he may further the objects of his department. I am quite prepared to give him a year in which to evolve a proper policy, and to give him even longer than that to remedy the defects that he found in his department as a result of the maladministration of years gone by.

Mr. CALDER: The leader of the Opposition as much as intimated that in his judgment a department dealing with immigration and colonization is like a fifth wheel to a coach; that there is really no necessity for it, and that the department was created to make provision for somebody. In my judgment, there is greater necessity for this department than there is for any other department in the public service. No matter of Government is of as much interest to the people as is immigration and colonization. When you consider what the condition is to-day in Canada—I endeavoured to make that clear in the statement I made to the House when the Immigration Bill was brought down—you must come to the conclusion that this matter should have received the attention of the Government long ago. We should have had a department of the Government in charge of a minister of the Crown who was prepared to give his entire time and energies to that part of the public service. Why have we in Canada only about 8,000,000 people, while south of the line the population is about 115,000,000? Simply because the question of the settlement and development of this country has not been properly dealt with by past Governments. There is exceedingly important work to be done, and if that work is carried out as it should be and if the necessary appropriations are made available to the minister in charge of the department, whoever he may be, in order that he may carry on his work properly, results will be secured that will re-pay Canada a hundredfold for any expenditures that are incurred. The matter has been too long neglected. True, we had an Immigration and Colonization branch of the Interior Department, but scarcely any one knew it was in existence. One minister after another paid but passing attention to it, because he had larger and what he considered to be more important duties to attend to. But if this country is to come into her own; if it is to be developed as it should; if we are to get the kind of immigration that we should, then this subject must not be neglected as it has been in the past. We have an abundance of room. Opportunities are lying around in every part of Canada, in land settlement as well as in the development of our resources generally. The problem which stares the nation in the face will never be satisfactorily dealt with if we pursue a niggardly policy; unless the moneys necessary for this work are made available, we shall go on drifting as we have gone on in the past. Other countries are looking for settlers. New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa know the value of this class of work and have been spending two or three times what Canada has been spending for the development of their countries. If we are to compete with them; if we are to get our share of the immigrants from the Motherland, we must be prepared to spend the necessary money.

The hon. gentleman said that I have not brought down the information asked for. Well, it is difficult to anticipate the range of questions to be asked on an occasion of this kind, but I endeavoured to give as much information as I had at hand, and I think I have fairly met the demands for information. I have been asked to bring down a statement of the quantity of lands available in every province. May I point out to my hon. friend that even the people in his own province do not know that? Not a single Provincial Premier or Provincial Government could answer that question. At the conference we had here last November, I suggested to the Premiers of the provinces that they put on their Statute Books at once a law providing for an inventory of the natural resources of their respective provinces. Some of them have done so; some of them have started to obtain this information. But at the present time, fortunately or unfortunately, neither the Dominion Government nor the Provincial Governments have real knowledge of the amount of land that is available for settlement in the different provinces. I trust that arrangements will be made by all the provinces at an early date to obtain full and reliable information on this subject.

I agree with the leader of the Opposition that some serious mistakes have been made in the past so far as land settlement in Western Canada is concerned. We have allowed settlers to drift all over the country and to settle in places many miles from railways; and the difficulties of the Western Provinces have thereby been seriously multiplied. If a plan could have been devised in the past under which settlement would have gone forward as railway development went forward, it would have meant a great saving of expense and trouble in a hundred different directions. But I wish to assure the Committee that that is no easy matter. As long as vacant lands are there, it is most difficult to hold people from going on to them. We have such things as squatters' rights, and if those lands are available anywhere within fifty or sixty miles of a railway, and if they are first-class lands, the squatter is going to get out on that land if he possibly can. That has been the experience in all the provinces of western Canada, so that I doubt very much, even if the Government desired to do so, it could have prevented settlement of that character.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the lack of land for Soldier Settlement. That, of course, had reference only to homestead lands within a reasonable distance of railways. In Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, there is an abundance of homestead land, although not all of first class character, but the great bulk of it is not within easy reach of existing railway facilities, and it was because those in authority here felt it would be unfair to ask soldiers to go to lands lying more than fifteen miles from a railway, that provision was afterwards made whereby those returned men might secure purchased land instead of having to go out long distances from railway facilities.

The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) referred to the price of land in western Canada and apparently thought I was far out in my calculation as to what lands were worth. I believe I have a fairly accurate idea as to what lands are selling and being held at in the West. Two days ago, I sold for $15 an acre a piece of land I had held for ten or twelve years, and it is not more than four miles to a railway and it is good average land. I will not say that figure will represent the average price of land in western Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the minister intend to settle in Ottawa for good?

Mr. CALDER: My home was not on this land that I sold. The average price of land in certain localities in western Canada will run as high as $25, $30, and up to $40 an acre. The price depends very largely on the locality.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This morning I was told that the average price was $20 an acre.

Mr. CALDER: I can take the hon. gentleman to old settled regions in Western Canada where good agricultural land can be purchased at from $15 to $20 an acre. In the southwestern portion of Saskatchewan lands are held as high as $30, $35, $40, $45, $50, and even $60 an acre, but in Western Canada a great deal of land can still be purchased at from $15 to $20 an acre. That, however, is not the point. In dealing with the question of land settlement and colonization, we are bound to consider the fact that conditions vary greatly in all the provinces, and a policy that would be practicable for the Prairie Provinces might not apply to British Columbia or to New Brunswick. The problem is, after all, very largely a local one. The Dominion Government owns land only in the three Prairie Provinces; it does not own Crown land in the other provinces of Canada; and while the Federal Government should establish the machinery and the agencies whereby we may induce people to come to Canada, and while the nation as a whole has a very large interest in this problem, we must not overlook the fact that every provincial government that owns its own Crown land, outside of the Prairie Provinces, has a very large interest in this problem. It was for that reason that last fall we had a conference with the provincial premiers at Ottawa to discuss the matter thoroughly, and we decided upon the fullest co-operation with them. In a comparatively short time now, when the present abnormal conditions cease, I have not the slightest doubt that all the provinces in Canada will be quite willing to co-operate with the Federal Government so as to secure the greatest possible results in this field of endeavour. I am satisfied that with that co-operation, with a wise expenditure of money, we shall be able to secure large results in the way of immigration into this country and in the settlement of our vacant lands.

Mr. CAHILL: I quite agree with the minister that we should have a very much larger population; but we have been getting immigration into this country for the last forty years, and I should like the minister to tell me, if he can—and I believe he could if he wanted to—the reason why we have not increased our population more rapidly, having regard to the number of immigrants we have secured and to the natural increase in our population. In the last forty years, we have lost upwards of 8,000,000 of our population by emigration. During that period we received over 5,000,000 immigrants, and that immigration, along with the natural increase in population, should have given us a population of at least 16,000,000 people to-day, but we have only about 8,000,000. Apparently our immigrants were coming in at one door and going out at another; we were simply a station on the way to the United States. If we kept our immigrants in Canada, the Canadian born people went to the United States. The minister has in mind increasing immigration, and that is a very good policy, but before he can hope to make a success of immigration and colonization, he must find out why people who come to Canada from foreign countries do not remain in this country. At the present time, there are over 1,000,000 Canadian born citizens in the United States, and they have been going out of Canada every year for many years. The only time that we held our immigration to any extent was between 1900 and about 1912, during which period we made some progress, but previous to that time we were losing not only a number equivalent to our immigration, but a large portion of our natural increase. After 1900, we began to retain some of our immigration and some of the natural increase, so that in one census period our population increased by over 1,500,000. It is questionable, however, whether we have increased in the last ten years. The minister is asking for an increased appropriation to spend on immigration, and he must have in mind that when he gets an immigrant here he is to keep him. How does he purpose doing better in the future than we have been doing in the past with practically the same fiscal arrangement, the same form of Government and the same internal conditions generally?

What leads the minister to believe that people are going to stay here in future instead of going to some other country, as they have been doing in the past? What greater inducements have we to keep them here now?

Mr. CALDER: There is only one thing will induce people to stay in a country, and that is contentment.

Mr. CAHILL: Nothing makes contentment but good government.

Mr. CALDER: You must have such conditions that those who come here will be content to make their homes here. Those conditions are, of course, very broad and comprehensive, embracing a multitude of things. We have not been losing our agriculturalists in this country. Those who have been leaving are mainly urban people; or, if agriculturalists have been leaving, it is because they wished to enter business or engage in industry. I presume that the very large emigration from this country has been very largely due to the rapid expansion of the trade and commerce and industry of the United States in every direction, which has made opportunities for our young men to enter business, and I dare say that condition will continue. I quite well remember when I visited my old home town in Western Ontario after living in Western Canada for some time, that the old boys whom I used to know had practically all gone to the United States to enter business, because the opportunities there were very much greater than in Canada. In my judgment, what we need in Canada more than anything else is an increased rural population, and I quite agree with the hon. member that we must establish in this country—and this applies to the Provincial Governments and Municipal Governments as well as to the Federal Government—conditions that will make our rural people content and prosperous and happy, because unless we do that we can never succeed in holding them. The question how it shall be done is a very complex one. The Provincial Governments have a very large duty to perform in that direction; the municipalities, if you will, have also their duties, and the Federal Government has its duty to perform. The question of good roads has a very important bearing on the problem; the question of education, the extended use of telephones, the establishment of social centres, and a hundred and one other things have to be considered, and I am free to admit that the fiscal policy of the country also has a marked bearing on the question. But the main thing is this: If we are going to get and maintain a rural population in this country it is absolutely essential that all parties concerned should combine to make conditions in the rural districts such as will lead to the contentment, prosperity and happiness of the rural population.

Mr. EULER: I think the hon. member for Pontiac has directed attention to a very serious question, perhaps more serious than the Government realizes, and that is the question of keeping the immigrants we already have. It is all very well to induce new immigration, but if we continue to lose those we already have our last condition will be worse than our first. An amendment has just been made to the Immigration Act which I felt was just a little too stringent, and I believe the result will be simply this: Some of our people in this country will convey to their friends at home news of the stringent regulations now existing and the disabilities under which they labour in this country as a result of certain steps on the part of this Government, and then we shall not obtain the immigration we otherwise might have had. To-day we are pretty well circumscribed as to the countries from which immigration can be drawn, practically the only country from which we can expect immigrants being the British Isles. One hon. member a week or so ago urged that no immigrants should be admitted from the southern countries of Europe. That suggestion was pretty far-reaching and was not adopted. The Central Empires, Germany and Austria, will no longer be permitted to send immigrants to this country. The manhood of France has been so much depleted that there is no possibility of our getting immigrants from that country. I am very doubtful, indeed, whether we shall receive a large immigration from the British Isles for some time to come. As the minister must know, the United States to-day, instead of receiving immigrants, is losing its immigrants. It may be true that those they are losing belong to a class which the United States does not care to retain, but it may be otherwise. I saw by the papers a few days ago that already steps have been taken by no fewer than a million people in the United States to return to their old homes; I do not know whether all these people are aliens, or whether any or all of them were naturalized. The paper went on to state that an exodus was expected from the United States of 5,000,000 people. If that is true, I should like to know whether the minister has any knowledge of a similar movement among our population. If it is true, it would probably not be the men who are settled on our western farms who are leaving, but the people from our cities and towns. After all, we have a population of only seven or eight million, and I firmly believe that the Government ought to make every effort to keep every immigrant who shows possibility of developing into a good Canadian citizen. It would be a pity if the Government directed its energies towards bringing in one immigrant, while at the same time it was losing two immigrants that had already settled here just for want of a little effort to induce them to stay. Has the minister any knowledge of any large amount of emigration from this country such as apparently is the case with the United States, and if so, what efforts are being made to retain these people?

I entirely agree with the minister that the one thing we want in this country is more people. We have a debt of two billions of dollars, and I do not see how we can meet our exceedingly heavy obligations unless we fill the country up with people who will develop its natural resources. I think our energies should be directed along that line, and we should also remove the restrictions under which the people of this country have been labouring for several years, in order that people who are now here will be content to stay and others who are desirable may come.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As my hon. friend from North Waterloo has said, this question of immigration is certainly a most interesting one in view of the peculiar circumstances in which the country finds itself to-day. We shall have to be very careful with regard to immigration in the future and see that we build up in our western provinces, and throughout Canada generally, a real Canadian citizenship. It is appalling to think, first, of the number of native Canadians, and, secondly, of the number of immigrants who have been brought to Canada with good Canadian money, who have left this country during the last thirty or forty years.

Sir Richard Cartwright, referring to the number of persons who had left Canada within a certain period—I think he meant the decade between 1882 and 1892—said that Canada had lost as many immigrants, whose entrance to this country had been advertised and paid for, as the Americans lost soldiers during the whole of the Civil war. A Canadian has only to travel to Boston to find that that city is practically an annex of Nova Scotia; and if he went to Chicago he would find there between 30,000 and 40,000 Canadians, both French and English, who, I know as a matter of fact, are a power in municipal and Congressional elections. Some years ago my hon. friend Senator Dandurand and I were delegated at Sault Ste. Marie to represent Canada at the semi-centennial anniversary of the Sault Ste. Marie canal. In the afternoon we were called upon to address a gathering at which the Vice-president of the United States the late Mr. Fairbanks, was also present, and I was rather surprised when we were requested to speak in French. To my profound astonishment I discovered that in that gathering of about ten thousand people there were at least 5,000 French Canadians. That was in the State of Michigan which is partly French. West Bay city and many other cities, not to speak of the city of Detroit, are largely populated with Canadians. And if you went to Philadelphia you would come across so many Canadians from Hamilton and London and Toronto that you would be under the impression that you were in Canada. In fact, the entire United States to-day is dotted with Canadian Clubs, and you cannot go into any city in the United States in which there are Canadians to any appreciable extent without finding a Canadian Club. These clubs are fashionable institutions. This will show that there is in the republic to the south of us a very large population of Canadians of both races and if what my hon. friend said a moment ago is true, and I believe it is, that we cannot hope to get from Europe as many immigrants as we got before the war, I think we should turn our attention to the Canadians who are in the United States, and who to-day, knowing the value of Canadian lands and appreciating their country as they do, would be only too pleased to return to their Mother Country if sufficient inducement were offered. I may speak particularly of those Canadians settled in the United States who belong to my own race—the French Canadian. I think I am within the mark in stating that there are in the United States to-day at least two million French Canadians. The largest French cities in America outside of Montreal and Quebec, are New England cities—Lowell, Fall River, and many others, where there are French Canadians in every municipal council, in every legislature, on the bench and in every profession. And I know from the members of the Canadian hierarchy that they are obliged to supply the clergy of the United States with French Canadian priests. The cause of the emigration of the French Canadian to the United States is very well known. First of all, the French Canadian is adventuresome, and was so under the old French regime. The King of France had to enact severe laws to restrain the French Canadians, or Canadians as they were called in those days from leaving the settlements. The term "French Canadian" dates back only twenty or twenty-five years. In the old days, even under the French, there was quite a marked distinction between a "Canadian" and a "Frenchman." Montcalm in his letters to the minister in France always refers to the Canadians as the permanent inhabitants of Canada, and to the French as the men in His Majesty's troops. We all know the history of the famous coureurs des bois under the French regime. They were always away from the lands in quest of the fur trade with the redmen and by reason of that peculiar love of adventure these Canadians were encountered in every part of the continent, in the Mississippi Valley, near the Rocky mountains, in the wilds of Kansas and down to New Mexico. Later on, under the British domination you found them in Illinois, Pennsylvania, and roving all over the continent. In the forties quite a large number of French Canadians left for California, lured by the discovery of the gold mines there; and again they were attracted by the discovery of the gold fields in Australia. Later on in the seventies, as the minister said a moment ago, the industrial unrest in Canada was responsible for a considerable emigration of French Canadians, to the New England States, with the result that in all these cities in Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and New York there are large colonies of my fellow countrymen. They have succeeded, but it is surprising to know that a large number of those French Canadians would like to return to Canada. Better circumstances and a keener appreciation of the surroundings of the old homestead appeal to their imagination, and I know that if a real movement were instituted to draw from that large population some settlers to Canada, the hon. minister would undoubtedly find there a very interesting field. There are some societies and some members of the clergy who are deeply interested in bringing back to Canada as many as possible of that population, and I hope that my hon. friend will encourage that movement because it is a healthy one. The French Canadian is essentially a good settler. History proves that. Those Canadians belong to the oldest stock in Confederation and should be encouraged to return and settle on the old homesteads. There is one society in Montreal, and, if I mistake not, there is one in the city of Ottawa, and there is, or was some years ago, one in Quebec. The Quebec Government has done something in the way of subsidizing these societies, but as the question of repatriation is under the control of my hon. friend, I expect he will do his little share towards achieving what I consider would be quite a success. My hon. friend said a moment ago that the province generally did not know the value and extent of their land fit for cultivation. I believe his statement is right. It has only been in the last few years that we in the province of Quebec have realized the richness, the enormous value of our resources in lumbering, pulp manufacturing and wheat growing in the new district of Abitibi. Since the National Transcontinental railway has reached this far away region quite a population has settled there and I am told that this district is certainly full of promise. I know as a matter of fact that the Quebec Government intends to co-operate with the Dominion in connection with the land settlement of our soldiers. My friend, the Premier of Quebec, was here on Saturday and I was speaking to him about Abitibi. He then said to me that his policy was to direct, as far as possible, returned soldiers to take up lands in that new district. The Government of Quebec has accepted the views which were expressed by my hon. friend at the last Dominion-provincial conference and are willing to co-operate with him towards the land settlement of our returned soldiers. Once more let me say that I expect that my hon. friend will do something towards the repatriation movement of the French Canadians. It is really sad to think that there are in the United States such a large number of our countrymen, not only French Canadians but English Canadians. This is a great loss to Canada and if we can induce even a small portion of the large Canadian population which has settled in the United States to return, I think it will be the best work performed by the Immigration Department.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have one further word to say in reply to the remarks made by the minister as to the information he possessed about lands in the different provinces. He thought he was answering me by saying that my own province of Nova Scotia could not tell what lands it had. That is no answer. It is nobody's business what lands they have in Nova Scotia. The lands there do not belong to the Dominion of Canada. We do not pay out any money to survey land in Nova Scotia. They are not looking for immigration. The Immigration Department pays no money to bring in immigrants to Nova Scotia and has never taken any interest in whether immigrants come to Nova Scotia or did not.

Mr. CALDER: I was down to the province of Nova Scotia not very long ago, and I had an opportunity of discussing the whole question with practically every member of the Government for four or five hours, and they were very much interested in it. While they have no Crown lands left, there is an agricultural situation in Nova Scotia that, they realize, requires attention. It is only within the last week or two that I had a communication from Mr. Cumming, who is head of the Department of Agriculture there, and he was very anxious to know what stand we are going to take to assist settlement on the abandoned farm, or the semi-abandoned farm; that is a farm which is not cultivated up to its full use. They have that trouble in Nova Scotia just as they have it all through Southern Ontario. One of the real problems in the older portions of Canada, and not only in Nova Scotia, is the question of getting a real, live new settler who will take the place of the person who is working a farm in a half-hearted way. In addition to that, you have the abandoned farm. That is a question that has grown up all through the older part of Canada, and you have there an aspect of this question which requires the most serious consideration, not only on the part of the local Government, but on the part of the Federal Government as well.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister has not answered my point at all, and he is absolutely wrong in saying that his department or the Interior Department, or any department of the Government, have ever paid one dollar towards immigration in Nova Scotia. They have not an acre of land within the limits of that province, and they have no immigration policy in regard to it. Consequently, when I am asked about the ownership of land in Nova Scotia, I answer we have no land. Under the Dominion Government, we have been for the last fifty years paying land surveyors to make surveys, maps have been laid before members of Parliament and the people showing the lands that we have in the different provinces, with different colourings on these maps, to indicate the lands we have for sale; those which are cultivable and fit for agriculture, the lands that are under the control of the minister, how much of these lands is owned by the provinces, and how much is available for settlement. Yet, the minister tells me I do not know what I am talking about, and that I do not know the state of things in my own province. That is no answer; it is a mere subterfuge. We would naturally expect the minister to be able to answer. Millions of dollars have been voted by this Parliament for the purpose of ascertaining how much land we have in the different provinces and what amount of that land is fit for settlement.

Mr. CALDER: Is the hon. gentleman speaking of Federal Crown lands?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not talking of any one class of land. It must be perfectly clear to the minister—I am speaking of the land owned by the Canadian people, by the King, in the right of the Government of Canada. That is the kind of land of which we have been making surveys. That is the kind of land that the Department of the Interior has been dealing with for the last fifty years and in regard to which they must have absolute information in the department.

Mr. CALDER: Surely.

Mr. McKENZIE: But the minister sneers at me when I ask him how much land we have available for settlement in these provinces. He answers by asking how much land we have in Nova Scotia. What difference does that make? There is this system of surveys the system of the allocation of lands, in the different provinces on which we are spending millions of money. We are ascertaining the quality of the land, the location and extent of timber limits, waterpowers and everything that appertains to our vast properties in the West. Under these circumstances have we not the right to ask the minister how much is available for immigration and settlement? A minister of the Crown who is the head of a department whose officers are all over the country getting this information, and which has its agents working from coast to coast selling this land, should be supposed to be in possession of that information and it is hardly to be expected that he will answer a question of that kind by saying: Why should you ask for such information when your own department of coal mines in Nova Scotia would not be able to supply you with similar information. We have, as incidental to the department of the provincial secretary in Nova Scotia, a sort of a little side show in the form of the Department of Agriculture which is not a department by itself. It pays some attention to immigration, but we have no well organized immigration department in Nova Scotia.

I am sorry that the minister should have replied in this way instead of answering my question as to the knowledge which we should possess in this House of what lands the Government have in the West. He has not answered that question except by referring me to what is happening in the Maritime Provinces. Let me say to the minister that it is essential to getting immigrants to come to this country and keeping them here that we should keep our word to them and deal fairly and honestly with them. I charge the minister with having knowledge of the fact that immigrants came into Canada under the pledge of a statute of this Dominion which told them: "When you enter Canada and become naturalized, you become a British subject; the pledge of the King is handed down to you by that statute, which is that you shall always be dealt with as a British subject."

We had thousands of those people in this Dominion in 1917, but notwithstanding this pledge the Minister of Immigration was a party to violating the statute, breaking the pledge of His Majesty the King to the King's subjects, by depriving them of the franchise. Instead of allowing those people to enjoy the franchise the Government disqualified them and told them: "You are British subjects, you have taken the oath of allegiance, this statute guarantees to you all the rights of British subjects, but nevertheless we are not keeping the pledge of the King to you in extending and continuing to you these rights." Far be it from me to say that you should extend any rights to any man who shows any sign of disloyalty to the King; I would be just as bitter as anybody in saying to any such person coming to Canada: "There is no room here for anybody but a true loyal subject of the King." But what are we to do in the case of a man who comes here and takes the oath of allegiance and behaves in an absolutely right and proper manner in connection with every duty he is called upon to perform. As long as such a man does that he is entitled to the due fulfilment of the promises which were made to him. There were thousands of people in Canada in 1917 against whose loyalty not one black mark could be found; all that could be said was that they came here from countries that are possibly now at war with us, but they took the oath of allegiance and have observed to the letter every duty which devolved upon them. Nevertheless the sins of the fathers were visited upon the children to the third and fourth generation; and the Minister of Immigration, knowing that these people did not deserve it at his hands, was a party to cutting them away from that which is dearer to a man almost than any other right that he possesses—the right of participating in the government of the country in which he lives. I hope the minister will always keep in mind that whatever promises we make to immigrants coming to Canada shall be observed to the letter, particularly when we solemnly sit down here and pass a statute in which we grant certain rights to newcomers. That statute received the consent of His Majesty the King, and it then became the law of the land; and we should be very careful and have the very best proof that it is necessary to break away from the pledges and promises therein set forth before we adopt such a policy. I submit, therefore, to the minister that his department should bear in mind that people coming into Canada should be allowed to enjoy those rights and exercise those privileges which have been promised to them, so long as they will do and maintain on their part what is expected of them as British subjects. I submit that has not been done on the Government's part in the past, and it accounts to a very great extent for the smallness of the immigration entering Canada just now from countries beyond the seas. Because, the Britisher from the United Kingdom, although he is a British subject, does not like to see others unfairly treated, and does not care to go to another country which he understands has treated immigrants as immigrants coming to Canada have been treated. The minister says I was very wrong in saying anything about the synchronizing of the formation of this department with the organization of the Unionist Government. I venture to tell him that the Unionist Government had very little in mind in regard to immigration and colonization at that time. It was not a period when immigrants were entering Canada or when commercial interests were very greatly thought of. That Government was organized for one purpose, and one purpose only; and it is vain for the minister to tell me that after the Department of the Interior had for fifty years been managing all the branches pertaining to this work, that it dawned upon him in the middle of the war that it was necessary to create a new department to handle people that were not coming to Canada. I have my own views about the matter, and the minister has his; but when he makes a statement, and I make another contrary to his, the circumstances of the case strongly confirm my assertion as to the synchronizing which took place at the time of the formation of the Unionist Government.

Mr. CALDER: I hope that in rising to speak for a few minutes in reply to the leader of the Opposition, I shall not be accused of blocking by own Estimates—

Mr. McKENZIE: That will be the next thing.

Mr. CALDER: —as was a certain minister the other day. I am very sorry that I misunderstood the leader of the Opposition in reference to his question as to the amount of land available in Canada for settlement. I was viewing the situation from this, and I think from the right standpoint; that the whole question of settlement and colonization does not apply merely to federal land, it is being equally applicable to all Canada. When the hon. gentleman asked if I had information regarding the land available for settlement I naturally assumed that he had in his mind the whole of Canada, not merely that portion of it which happens to be the federal domain. I wish to assure him that I was not endeavouring to escape his question by any subterfuge, because if the Department of Immigration and Colonization is going to prove of service to Canada, that service must be to the whole Dominion. It is not right that the Federal Government should pass laws and expend money merely for the settlement of those portions of Western Canada in which it has lands. It is from that standpoint that I have endeavoured to approach this problem, and it was from that standpoint that I had a conference last fall with the representatives of all the provinces in Canada and endeavoured to secure their co-operation in connection with it. It appears to me that what the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has said is quite correct; we have found a new Canada because in the northern part of Quebec there is valuable territory that we did not know existed a short time ago, and the same is true to a large extent of Northern Ontario. The province of British Columbia is in my judgment the richest province in Canada, but it has not had the agricultural development it should have. I took this matter up with the various provinces and endeavoured to ascertain their available land resources for settlement purposes; but I have found that neither here at Ottawa, nor in the records of their own Provincial Governments, was there anything like a reliable or accurate record of one of the principal resources that we have in this country—that is land fit for settlement—I endeavoured to prevail upon them as to the necessity of our getting an inventory of this land just as quickly as we possibly could, and all the premiers and their colleagues who were present concurred in that. Some of them have already passed laws with a view to securing that inventory. In tackling the question of the settlement of Crown lands, lands in the possession of the provinces, and privately owned lands, we must first find out what we have. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said, I may point out that when I was in Nova Scotia I found Premier Murray and all his colleagues intensely interested in this question so far as Nova Scotia was concerned. We spent four or five hours together at Halifax, considering the problem from every standpoint. They realize that the land of that province is not being used to its full capacity; that good lands are only half used, some of them not used at all, and they want to devise ways and means whereby that land may at the earliest day be used to the full. So that in the old province of Nova Scotia, where the Crown lands are all gone, there is an immigration problem. We must not forget that the expenditures made by the Federal Government in the past for immigration and colonization have not been made for Western Canada alone. It is true that the majority of the settlers have gone into Western Canada, but in the propaganda that we carry on in the United States and Great Britain and that was carried on in the various countries of Europe, no attempt has been made to deal only with one portion of Canada. In any case, if that has been done in the past it certainly should not continue in the future. The Federal Government must be impartial in this matter; it must treat all parts of Canada alike. We must have a national policy not a sectional policy. It is of the utmost importance that the closest co-operation should exist between the Federal Government and the provincial governments; that in this House should deal with the matter not from the local but from the national standpoint, and that whatever work we carry on outside of Canada should be carried on from the national standpoint, not from the standpoint of settling only those lands in Western Canada that belong to the Crown.

Mr. McKENZIE: For the last fifty years we have been devoting our time, our money and our attention so far as immigration and colonization are concerned to lands which Canada owns in the West—because Canada does not own lands anywhere else. If the Government will announce that their immigration policy has been changed and that it will now embrace the whole of Canada, that is another matter. But we have never heard that the policy of the Government with regard to immigration has been changed. I do not think that there is any authority in the minister's department to take the moneys voted by this House and spend them in any province in which the Government of Canada, as such, owns land. My theory is that these moneys are voted for the purpose of dealing with lands owned by the Canadian people through the right of this Parliament. No one realizes more than I do the great necessity of developing an immigration policy in Nova Scotia. In that province much splendid agricultural land is inviting cultivation. The difficulty is that there are industries to which the people go more readily than they go on the farms. They like to work in the coal mines, steel works, factories, and so on; they are not so willing to stay on the land. If the minister can do anything to make agriculture more interesting to immigrants or to the people who now live in Nova Scotia than it is at present, no one will more heartily give him the honour that is due him than I will. I trust that if it is the policy of the Government to extend their immigration policy they will have the greatest possible success in my own native province as well as in every other old province to which they may extend their energies.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Have not the industries to which my hon. friend referred had a very beneficial effect in recent years upon the farming communities in their various localities?

Mr. McKENZIE: No doubt they have had a beneficial effect. But in Nova Scotia we do not produce more than ten per cent of the food that is necessary to maintain the people in those various industries. We buy Ontario beef and Prince Edward Island beef and agricultural products. It is pretty hard to keep a Cape Bretoner or a Nova Scotian at work on the farm; he finds it more congenial to take up other work. But farming may be made more attractive to these people, along the lines suggested by the minister.

Sir SAM HUGHES: When I visited Nova Scotia quite a number of years ago, the complaint was that the people were being attracted to the New England States as labourers and that the farms were deserted. An old farmer who had several hundred acres of splendid land near Tatamagouche, in Pictou County, pointed out that his sons had all gone to Boston and were getting ready money engaged in street work in that city, while his farm remained untilled. I happened to visit that locality on a later occasion and found the grandchildren working on the farm. I understood that there was quite a return of the people to the land in that part of Nova Scotia. I agree that the farmers should be encouraged to settle on the land in the older provinces as well as in the new provinces.

Salaries of agents and employees in Canada, Great Britain and foreign countries, $575,000.

Sir SAM HUGHES: A number of years ago, when Hon. Mr. Sifton was Minister of Interior, immigration agents in the United States were permitted to act as land agents, and settlement agents. That policy was highly beneficial to Canada, and resulted in the bringing in of a good class of settlers. Is there any restriction now on their acting also as land agents?

Mr. CALDER: For some years past our agents in the United States have received very specific instructions to have nothing whatever to do with the sale of lands.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is a great mistake.

Mr. CALDER: They have been acting under those instructions for a number of years, and they concern themselves almost entirely with the settlement of homestead lands. Within the past six months or so I have reviewed the situation, and not very long ago I came to the conclusion that all those agents should be permitted to receive inquiries with respect to privately owned lands and those inquiries should be forwarded to associations which have recently been created in Western Canada for the purpose of dealing with them. It is only within the last month that there has been established in each of the Prairie Provinces an association representing private owners of land, and we have made arrangements whereby all inquiries reaching our offices in the United States will be forwarded to those associations. As the Committee will understand, the situation to-day is very different from what it was ten or fifteen years ago when an abundance of homestead land was available throughout the West. The landseeker from the United States is to-day looking rather for a piece of land which he can purchase within existing settlements than for outlying homestead lands, and consequently, we are creating machinery, both in the United States and Canada, whereby the prospective landseeker may be put in touch with owners of land who have them for sale.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope that amongst those agents in foreign countries the minister will find his way clear to appoint one in Belgium. We have already an agent in France; the Hon. Philippe Roy is the Canadian Commissioner in Paris, and as the minister stated a moment ago, after the tremendous loss of life suffered by France during the last war, we cannot expect the French Government to facilitate the work of any immigration agent, but in Belgium, I am informed, that there are good prospects for immigration. Before the war a movement was on foot to send immigrants from Belgium to Canada and the minister knows that the Belgians belong to the better class of immigrants. As gardeners around the large cities, such as Toronto and especially Montreal, the Belgians have done wonders, and if inducements could be put forward, I believe the refugees especially who are at present in England would willingly come to Canada. I think there are in the Northwest one or two Belgian colonies, one being in Manitoba. The province of Quebec has in Brussels an agent, Mr. Langlois, formerly a journalist in Montreal, who is, I believe, publishing a paper called "Belgique-Canada," the first issue of which I saw the other day. The future seems to be very bright from an immigration standpoint, and I would urge upon the minister to appoint somebody in Brussels to act in conjunction with Mr. Langlois. Some years ago the Hon. Mr. Sifton, now Sir Clifford Sifton, appointed two agents in Belgium, and for a while we had quite a stream of immigrants from that country. If the Belgium is not a farmer, he is so thrifty and industrious that he is capable of adapting himself practically to any business in the country and from all points of view he is a very desirable immigrant.

Mr. CALDER: I quite agree with the statement made by the hon. (Mr. Lemieux). As a matter of fact, for many years we have had an agent at Antwerp and we have obtained many very desirable settlers from Belgium. According to my latest information—and I have made official inquiries—the Belgian Government will not, in the very near future, look with very much favour upon any effort made to induce its people to leave their own country. I am sure hon. members can quite understand the reason for that, because Belgium has also lost a large portion of its population, and conditions in that country, as a result of the war, are far from being what they should be and the Belgian Government are anxious that the country should be rehabilitated and put on a sound basis agriculturally and industrially as quickly as possible. So far as all that class of immigration work is concerned, that is, as regards Belgium, France, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, all those countries in northern Europe, all that we can do at the present time, because shipping under any circumstances will not be available until after September or probably after even October, is to have a very careful review made of the situation. Some person must visit those countries and get in actual touch with the situation so that we may have first hand knowledge. When that is done, we shall have the facts and we shall know what action can be taken, but until that review is made I doubt very much if any action could be taken. Until our soldiers and their dependents are home—and that will take some months yet—there will be no shipping available for such immigration.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I understood the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) to say that a periodical was being published in Brussels to induce immigrants to come to Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. TWEEDIE: What kind of Canada is Belgian-Canada?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a paper published in Brussels.

Mr. TWEEDIE: What land is Belgian-Canada? Have we any Belgian-Canada? I think if any periodicals are being published to induce people to come to Canada the sooner such periodicals drop any national or sectarian designation the better for the country. If people want to publish periodicals and call them "Canada," let them call them "Canada," but I do not think there is any reason why they should be called "Belgian-Canada," or any other Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend misunderstood me. It is a review published by the agent of the province of Quebec residing at Brussels, under the title "Belgique-"Canada," or in English "Belgium-Canada." The review discusses the problems of the two countries, their resources, etc., and invites capital. It is not sectarian in any way. It is similar to the publication we had in Paris some years ago called "Paris-Canada," which was the organ of the Commissioner in Paris.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I misunderstood my hon. friend. I thought he called it "Belgian Canada." I should like to know what is the policy of the department with regard to the immigration offices which are now being closed down throughout Western Canada. If all these are to be closed up, how will the Government handle immigrants to that part of the country?

Mr. CALDER: During the year we have closed some twenty-one immigration halls which existed in the older parts of Western Canada, because their usefulness had passed. We are keeping open the halls which are nearer the homesteads areas in Northern Saskatchewan and Northern Alberta. We have also found it desirable to close down offices at places like Regina, Saskatoon, Lethbridge, and Medicine Hat, simply because there was no work at these places for our officers to do. In the old days when homesteaders were going into these parts they had plenty of work to do, but now the homesteads in those parts have all been taken up, and it is not necessary to maintain offices any longer in the older-settled portions. We are, however, maintaining our offices on the outskirts of the homestead areas. With regard to settlers on private-owned land, these people generally have money, and the man with $3,000 or $4,000 or $10,000 in his pocket does not require much assistance or advice from the ordinary immigration agent. Most of these settlers are from the United States and know just where they want to go, and what they want, as a rule. Consequently, the time has passed for the maintenance of a large number of these offices, and during the year we have closed several of them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many offices are there in the British Isles?

Mr. CALDER: Twelve: London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Birmingham, York, Carlisle, Cardiff, Bristol, Belfast, Dublin, Peterborough. None of our Old Country offices have been closed. The staffs in the provinces, however, have been cut down to the minimum. The London office has had a great deal more work to do in connection with soldiers' dependents.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You should get as many agents as possible among the Scotch Presbyterians.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COPP: This item, "Salaries of agents and employees in Canada, Great Britain and foreign countries," represents not only a large amount but also an increase over last year. It would be interesting to know the number of agents we employ in foreign countries, and what countries, and also the expenses in connection with the different offices and the results that have been attained—this last being the important point.

Mr. CALDER: During the last fiscal year the total expenditure in salaries in Canada, the United States, and Great Britain, amounted to $544,685. Of that amount $212,433 was expended for salaries of officials at such interior points in Canada as Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and St. John. Salaries paid to boundary officials amounted to $183,164.

Mr. CAHILL: Is that extra?

Mr. CALDER: The salaries are all included in this $575,000. Last year we paid our officials, placed at many points along the international boundary from coast to coast, $183,164. Salaries paid in the United States amounted to $82,013, and in Great Britain $67,072. In the United States we now have 22 offices which have been in operation for a number of years. These offices are at Detroit, Saginaw, St. Paul, Grand Forks, Watertown, Spokane, Syracuse, Kansas City, Indianapolis, Milwaukee, Omaha, Columbus, Harrisburg, Des Moines, Biddeford, Great Falls, Boston, Bedford, New York, Portland, Manchester, N.H., Chicago and San Francisco. At each of these points we have a chief agent. There are twenty stenographers and six other clerks. The staff in these 22 offices number in all 48, and the salaries amounted to approximately $82,000. Last year we closed three offices in the United States, one of those three being in Michigan, one in Philadelphia, because we felt there was really no necessity for their continuance. As regards the result of the work in the United States, I said this afternoon that the number of immigrants that arrived last year in Canada was about 60,000, and in the previous year about 75,000. In Great Britain we have twelve offices, eight in England, two in Scotland, and two in Ireland. On the continent all offices were closed shortly after the war. We had an officer in Antwerp and a staff in France. Our agent in France died some months ago, and no appointment has yet been made. The work in England during the last year or two has been confined very largely to repatriation in one form or another. During the past six months our staff has been extremely busy in connection with the return of soldiers' wives and children to Canada, and the staff at London has had to be increased in order to take care of that work. Our staff in the outside offices have also had considerable work. The dependents of our soldiers are pretty well scattered over the United Kingdom and there is a good deal of work involved in arranging for transportation and so on. The total expenditure in the department last year for salaries was $544,000. We are now asking for an expenditure of $575,000. I cannot say at present what provision will be made by the Civil Service Commission in connection with the reorganization of our Outside Service. I do not know what schedules will be brought down. Our outside staffs will be re-organized and classified salaries will be provided, and I would anticipate that in the new arrangement some increases in salaries will have to be provided. During the year I have had to provide for a number of increases in salary. In our Outside Service there was no provision for the ordinary annual increase that the Inside civil servants receive, and when I came to look into the matter I found a great many anomalies that had to be adjusted in fairness to a number of first-class officials who had been in the department a good many years. We may as well be frank about the matter; we all know that in the past the Outside Service was to a large extent treated from a purely political standpoint by all Governments, and in the result many men in the service were not treated on an equitable basis. When I began to ascertain what was right and proper in these cases, I found it necessary to make many re-adjustments, and as a result our whole service outside has been very much improved. I think there is a better spirit, and I am confident that we are getting to-day in our immigration service in Canada, the United States and Great Britain far better work than has been secured for many years, simply because these little matters which had been neglected for a considerable time were attended to.

Mr. COPP: Since the minister has been in the department has there been any reduction of officials?

Mr. CALDER: Our service in Canada and the United States has been very carefully overhauled. The department was created in December, 1917. We then had an outside staff of 459. In March of this year we had a staff of 344, a decrease of 115. These figures were obtained in this way. We closed 21 halls and the salaries of the officers who were in charge of these halls, and who were retired amounted to $8,590. Most of them were simply caretakers. I found these halls open and expenditures going on for fuel, light, heat, repairs and so on, while many of them were not used at all. In a number of cases not a single immigrant had been in these halls for months. Something less than ten are still open. I do not mean to say that if we find it necessary in connection with our work these expenditures might not increase again, but I shall see to it that these halls are not reopened or kept in operation unless there are immigrants to be accommodated in them. At various interior points, such as Saskatoon, Moosejaw or Regina, in past years, when we were dealing with homesteaders in large numbers, we found it necessary to have agencies established. We have decreased the staffs of these agencies to the extent of fifty-two persons. These persons had been kept at these offices continuously for years practically after the work that they were appointed to do had very largely ceased. They were retired and their annual salaries amounted to $50,070. During the war we found it necessary to appoint a number of officials whose duty it was to issue permits to those who were leaving Canada to enter the United States. We have retired twenty of these officers with an annual saving of $14,350. Our boundary staffs were also overhauled and as a consequence thirty-one officers were retired representing an annual saving of $31,300. A number of officials resigned, some were transferred to other departments, and one or two died. In that connection we retired thirty-seven officials representing a saving of $32,490. This makes a total reduction in our staff of 158, representing an annual saving in salaries of $136,800. That is one side of the account. We found it necessary to make some appointments.

Mr. BELAND: You could dispense with those officials?

Mr. CALDER: I would not say in all cases, because some were transferred to other departments, some were retired and others were appointed in their places. But there were 158 retired. Now, I am going to give those who were added, and that will show the net reduction in the staff. In the case of boundary inspectors, there were thirty-four. Amongst those there were some officials retired where they should not have been retired. A further investigation showed that nine of these men were absolutely needed. That makes a total of 43. Deducting that number from the 158 we have a net reduction in the Outside Service of 115 officers representing an annual saving of $98,340. In the United States we closed three offices and retired ten officials, the net saving there being about $6,000.

Mr. BELAND: But the vote asked for is a larger vote than last year?

Mr. CALDER: We have had to make a good many adjustments in the salaries of officials who are left in the Service.

Mr. BELAND: Increases?

Mr. CALDER: Yes. We have found it absolutely necessary. We found that a large number of our men were in receipt of salaries of $900, whereas the American officials are in receipt of salaries from $1,500 to $1,800. We found we simply could not retain the right kind of men in the Service with that condition prevailing. We found it necessary to assure the efficiency of the Service, as well as to retain our men, that there should be many increases.

Mr. COPP: I understood the minister to say that during the past year there were about 60,000 immigrants partly from the United States and partly from European countries.

Mr. CALDER: Practically none from European countries.

Mr. COPP: All from the United States?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We have been told that a good many people left Canada for the United States but we have not had any figures to show what the number is.

Mr. CALDER: We do not keep any figures of that kind although it might be desirable to do so. We endeavour to keep a very careful record of those who come in and who declare their intention of remaining in Canada, but we have no records of transients moving backwards and forwards.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What is the name of the agent at Snowflake in Southern Manitoba, and the salary that is being paid to him?

Mr. CALDER: Mr. Nesbitt. He is getting a salary from this department of $600, and I am told he also receives $600 as customs officer, making his total salary $1,200. The Immigration and Customs Departments endeavour at a great many points to make arrangements whereby one official can carry on the work of both departments.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Is the minister aware that the man who occupied that position before Mr. Nesbitt was appointed held it for twenty years? He began with $200 and, after the lapse of twenty years, it amounted to $600 or $700. He was appointed originally in connection with guarding the forest but afterwards became a customs officer, and for twenty years served this Government as faithfully as any man ever served his Maker. In addition to being a customs officer he performed duties for the Immigration Department at $100 a year. About the 3rd of last October he received notice from the Government that he was dismissed, and his dismissal took effect at the end of the previous month, so that he was removed before he got notice. I took the matter up with the Customs Department, and they wrote me a very curt note that the offices had been combined for economy's sake. Now we discover that his successor is receiving $600 or $700 a year as customs officer, and is paid an additional $600 a year by the Department of Immigration, whereas the man who served his country faithfully for twenty years at a salary of $600 or $700 a year was dismissed for economy's sake. I am free to state that I do not think the minister knew anything about this little job, or the Minister of Customs either; I think it is a little bit of trickery on the part of some official. Mr. Conner held the position for twenty years; raised a family of ten children in this country; farmed anywhere from four to five or six quarter-sections; bore the burden and heat of the day during all these long years; did his duty for his country and was proud of it; guarded the boundary just as faithfully as if he owned the country; and during the long term he held the office turned in every dollar of revenue he could collect for the Government. Yet he is dismissed and that dismissal took effect two or three days before he received the notice. The statement made to him, and also to me, was that it was done for the purpose of economy. Now we find when the showdown comes in Parliament that the salary for the new appointee has been pretty nearly doubled, and James Conner, a faithful servant, is turned adrift. I do not blame the minister, because I do not think he really knew what had happened; but if this kind of thing has occurred in many other cases it is no wonder there is great discontent among civil servants. I appeal to my hon. friend the member for Lisgar (Mr. Bolton), in which constituency Mr. Conner lives, to bear out my statement. The hon. gentleman knows him as intimately as I do, and said to me that a more decent man did not live in the province of Manitoba. I think it is the most shameful treatment I ever knew to be meted out to any official in this country.

Mr. CALDER: I am not acquainted with the facts in this case and the statement from the hon. member for Springfield will certainly have to be inquired into.

Mr. RICHARDSON: An apology ought to be sent to Mr. Conner.

Mr. CALDER: This is the first knowledge I have received of the facts as stated. In so far as our department is concerned, Mr. F. H. Nesbitt is the inspector at Snowflake, and he is in receipt of a salary from us of $600. I am informed that he also receives $600 from the Customs Department, but whether that is correct or not I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I happen to know that.

Mr. CALDER: Then the case will have to be inquired into. Our department had nothing to do with Mr. Conner's appointment, or, I daresay, with the dismissal. Apparently it was decided that one official could carry out the work at this point. I cannot say what the motives behind the dismissal of Mr. Conner were, but I shall certainly take the earliest opportunity of inquiring into it.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I have received a letter from the Commissioner of Customs saying that the motive for Mr. Conner's dismissal was economy, but whereas this man performed the duties of two offices for $700, another man is foisted into the position at $1,200. I do not know anything about this Mr. Nesbitt, but I understand he was engaged in Winnipeg. When the deluge came, and lots of people had nothing to do, wires were pulled to get Nesbitt appointed at Snowflake. So they got rid of poor old Jimmie Conner, than whom there never lived a more decent man. Mr. Conner, who had served his country faithfully for twenty long years, and was as competent a man as could be got, was thrown out of the job even before he received notice. The thing is an outrage and ought to be inquired into. Certainly the least Mr. Conner deserves is an apology and reinstatement to his former post.

Mr. MICHAUD: How long ago was he dismissed?

Mr. RICHARDSON: He got his notice I think on the 3rd of last October, and he was dismissed on the last of September; he was dismissed before he got notice that his services had been dispensed with, and on the alleged ground of economy.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Who dismissed him?

Mr. RICHARDSON: That is what I am trying to find out. I made up my mind that the only way we could correct a thing like this was by exposing it on the floor of Parliament. I do not know who dismissed Mr. Conner, but I do know that the Commissioner of Customs wrote to me that his dismissal was on the ground of economy. The new man, instead of getting only $600 or $700 as poor Conner did is receiving double that amount.

Mr. DUFF: I think now is the time to probe this matter to the very bottom. The hon. gentleman may say that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization was not aware of it, but he is responsible for every official dismissed or appointed in his department. We have a right now to inquire on what ground Conner was dismissed, and the other man appointed in his place.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Mr. Conner was a Customs officer before he took up work for the Department of Immigration. My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Bolton) says that it was the other way round; but the facts are just as I have stated. Mr. Conner got anywhere from $200 to $600 a year extending over this long period of twenty years, and then he was thrown out without due notice, and not even thanked for his services.

Mr. COPP: The hon. gentleman says he was a capable officer?

Mr. RICHARDSON: As capable a man as ever stood in leather shoes. And he guarded the boundary just as faithfully as if he owned the country.

Mr. CALDER: I can assure the Committee that the question of readjusting the staff of the service is by no means an easy one. I attempted the task, and I think I have succeeded fairly well, but I presume I have made a great many enemies for myself. That I expected and will have to let it pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Will the minister promise me to look into the matter and see that justice is done?

Mr. CALDER: If the hon. gentleman will pardon me a minute I have something to say to the Committee, and I think it is very important that I should say it. I want to speak very plainly and very candidly. In my opinion, the public service of Canada needs to be cleaned up in very many places, and in taking any steps in that direction, a minister is largely dependent upon those upon whom he casts the responsibility of making the necessary inquiries. When the inquiry is made and the minister receives the report, considers it and applies to it the best judgment that he can, he must act in accordance with that judgment. I do not care who the minister is, if he were the angel Gabriel himself, he would land himself into all kinds of trouble when he took any steps in this direction. That has been my experience—although, I say, I do not mind it.

Mr. COPP: And you are not the angel Gabriel.

Mr. CALDER: I am not the angel Gabriel; I do not profess to be. But about one hundred and fifty persons have been retired in one way or another from the Department of Immigration—and if hon. gentlemen think that I have kept myself out of trouble, they are very much mistaken. I am quite satisfied that in the interests of the department and of the country generally I did the proper thing. I should like to see the same thing take place in connection with every other department of the Government. Possibly in doing that certain mistakes will be made; possibly an occasional injustice will be done to somebody in the service. If so, it is only right and proper that the matter should be called to the attention of the minister concerned and that the necessary inquiry should be made. Not in this particular case, but for the purposes of the investigation that I caused to be held in the Outside Service, I engaged the services of two men, one of whom was Mr. A. B. Cook, of Regina. A return was brought down early in the session in connection with the matter. Mr. Cook was sheriff in Regina for many years. I have known him for twenty years or more and, as the member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) knows, he is an exceedingly competent man. I suppose that no office in Saskatchewan is as well organized and as well conducted as Mr. Cook's office. I asked Mr. Cook to come here and help me in this work, on the understanding that he would view the matter purely from a business standpoint and hew strictly to the line regardless of politics or any consideration other than that of the public interest. With Mr. Cook I sent Mr. Percy Reid, an official of the department of long standing who knows our service from coast to coast. These men went over the ground not in a perfunctory way, but very thoroughly indeed. They got actually in touch with nearly every one of these officers, checked up the work they were doing, and made a report as to what they thought should be done in the public interest. Just what report they made with regard to the particular office referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) I do not know, because I have not the report with me. It is possible that in our negotiations with the Customs Department it was decided to drop this man, who had previously been in the employ of the Government. I assure my hon. friend that, having regard to the statement he has made, I shall take the very earliest opportunity of looking into the merits of the case, and if an injustice has been done I shall do all that I can to see that it is rectified. More than that I cannot say.

Mr. DUFF: I understood the minister to say that whatever changes were made in his department were made by him or his officials. I was under the impression that all appointments were made by the Civil Service Commission. Are there two ways of making appointments—through the minister and through the Civil Service Commission—or only one?

Mr. CALDER: I was speaking of retirements, not appointments. Retirements are made not by the Civil Service Commission, but by Order in Council, if the man in question was appointed by Order in Council. Appointments, of course, are made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. DUFF: Was Mr. Conner's successor appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. CALDER: If Mr. Nesbitt was previously in the Service, he would merely be transferred. Transfers are arranged by the department, not by the Civil Service Commission. We quite frequently find it necessary to make transfers.

Mr. DUFF: Was Mr. Nesbitt transferred, or was he newly appointed?

Mr. CALDER: I understand that he was transferred.

Mr. RICHARDSON: As I understand the thing, this man Nesbitt, with a whole lot of others, was loaded on the public service. There was absolutely nothing for these men to do, and when the time came for reorganization, a job had to be found for them. I exculpate the minister; I know him too well to believe that he would do anything of that kind; I do not think he knew about it. But the job was put up somewhere and this man was foisted on the country at an increased salary. I omitted to say that this splendid old man Conner, told me that had they put a returned soldier in there, he would not have said a word; he would have been perfectly happy. But to know that another man had been put there at twice his salary, on the ground of "economy," made his Scotch blood boil—and I do not wonder. The minister has kindly said that he would look into the matter and see that justice is done. When will we get a show down on it?

Mr. GAUVREAU: Next session of the House.

Mr. CALDER: Not next session. When I told the hon. member that I would have this matter inquired into at once, I meant it.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I know, but what about action? Will Conner have any chance of getting back his job?

Mr. CALDER: That all depends upon the circumstances. The hon. gentleman has put forward one view; I have no doubt he believes his view to be correct. Nevertheless, he will agree that in a case of this kind a proper inquiry must be made and the facts ascertained. Whatever action is taken will be based upon the facts and the circumstances. Not knowing the facts, I could hardly promise that any particular thing will be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I take it that if my statements are discovered to be perfectly true and in accordance with the facts, and Conner is found to be an A-1 man and to have served his country as I have stated, he will be reinstated in his job, and that an apology will be made to him for his dismissal. As for Nesbitt, let him go "where the woodbine twineth," if necessary. He was not rendering any real service to the country and should have been dispensed with anyway, as thousands all over the country ought to be wiped out.

Mr. McKENZIE: How can the minister promise re-instatement? That is a matter for the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CALDER: Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Well, there you are. What would the leader of the Opposition, as a "brither Scot" suggest?

Mr. CAHILL: Were these forty-three appointments made by the Civil Service Commission? How does the minister explain the additional expenditure of $25,000 when he has 115 less employees? Are they to be accounted for by the dismissal of officials and the appointment of others in their places at twice the salary? I should be glad if the minister would explain also why it costs so much to maintain the service in Canada as compared with the service outside of Canada. There is an item of approximately $450,000 for salaries of employees in Canada and about $150,000 for employees outside of Canada. I notice also that the service in Great Britain amounts to $1,500 per office more than it does in the United States. Is that accounted for by larger salaries or larger staff?

Mr. CALDER: As I have already explained, we have twelve offices in the old country as compared with twenty-two in the United States.

Mr. CAHILL: But the offices in the United States cost $4,000 per office and the offices in Great Britain cost $5,500 per office.

Mr. CALDER: The cost would depend upon the staff carried.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the staff?

Mr. CALDER: I pointed out that we have in the United States twenty-two agents, twenty stenographers and six clerks, making a total of forty-eight, whereas at the present time in the whole of Great Britain we have a staff of sixty-eight. In our London office, we have three first-class clerks, twenty second-class clerks, eleven third-class clerks, and two messengers. At our outside points in Great Britain the staff usually runs from one to three, there being not more than three in any office. The hon. gentleman inquired why the expense in Canada was much greater than in Great Britain or the United States. In Canada, we have 140 boundary inspectors, the salaries running from $900 or $1,000 to $1,500. That fact in itself will explain the reason why the salary cost of boundary inspection work in Canada is heavier than the cost of salaries paid in Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. CAHILL: Besides the salaries of boundary inspectors there is an amount of $350,000 for other salaries in Canada.

Mr. CALDER: I have already explained that we have a series of interior offices. Our Montreal office, for instance, has necessarily a pretty large staff in order to look after our work in connection with entries and deportations.

Mr. CAHILL: Principally deportations this year.

Mr. CALDER: No, they look after all entries. A careful record is kept of all persons entering Canada; then there are many rejections which have to be inquired into thoroughly, and there is also the question of deportations; so that it is necessary to have these interior offices which carry on this work. After the inquiry that was held this year, I am satisfied that there is no unnecessary staffing of our offices in Canada. We have the staffs down to practically a working basis, and the adjustments in salaries have been such as to make the situation fairly satisfactory.

Mr. CAHILL: There is an item of $212,000 for salaries in Canada, and, according to the minister's statement, there is a saving of $98,000, presumably on 115 employees, but in place of that $212,000 there is no saving on the boundary inspectors getting $183,000. According to the Estimates there is an increase of $25,000, so that there is a difference of practically $120,000 of increases to employees in Canada. What percentage of increase would that be? How many employees are there?

Mr. CALDER: I have not been quite able to follow the hon. gentleman. It is true that we have made a net reduction at the rate of $98,000; that is, if these people had all been retired at the first of the year, there would have been a saving in annual salaries of $98,000, but these changes took place at varying times of the year, so that there has not been that net saving. On the other hand, as I have already explained, we have found it necessary to adjust salaries in our outside service in Canada, and while any increases have been for comparatively small amounts, they make a large aggregate. These adjustments would have had to be made anyway, and when the salary schedules are brought down by the Civil Service Commission still further increases in salaries will have to be made if we are to retain these men in the service. We cannot expect to carry on these services at the same rate of salaries as were paid prior to 1914, and consequently we must look for increases of this kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is it the intention to extend the work in Great Britain during the coming year, or simply to maintain the staffs that have been there during the past year? Now that the war has ended it is important that the greatest possible attention should be paid towards bringing immigrants out from Great Britain, provided that people intend to immigrate from the old land, and I think much more attention should be paid to bringing immigrants from Great Britain than from the United States. The policy enunciated by the minister this afternoon would almost lead one to believe that the old policy is still going to be followed of paying more attention to Western Canada than to the older provinces. I have always advocated that it is not in the interest of Canada to have immigration controlled by the Department of the Interior. I should like to know if anything is going to be done towards supplying men for labour, particularly for the farms, in the old provinces. I would make special reference to Ontario, because there is no question that at present there is altogether too much land under cultivation in that province in view of the number of people who are there to take care of it.

Mr. CALDER: I think we shall find it absolutely necessary to increase very largely our expenditure in Great Britain if we expect to receive any immigration from there, not in the immediate future, but one or two or three years from now. In other words, we must arrange now for the necessary publicity and propaganda work to be carried on to secure results some time hence. That work costs money. During the war our expenditure in Great Britain for advertising and publicity was cut down to practically nothing, for reasons which must be apparent. We have carried a certain small expenditure, but that has not affected the situation. To get results, you must plan ahead. As a matter of fact, probably the most effective work that is being done in Great Britain is the work we do among the school children. Practically every person who is interested in the immigration movement realizes that. The seed sown in the mind of the child at school will bear fruit when he comes of age. That class of work costs money, and we shall have to expend money in Great Britain in a fairly large way, and begin right now, because we are a little behind time, if we want to get results either next year or the year following.

I am very doubtful whether we shall secure much farm labour from Great Britain. Only some fifteen per cent of the population of Great Britain is engaged in agriculture, and every effort is being made by the State to keep every possible man on the land and get others to go on it. It seems to me, therefore, we shall have great difficulty in getting farm labour from Great Britain. I can assure the hon. gentleman, however, that every effort will be made in that direction, because I thoroughly understand the need of that class of labour in Canada. I also thoroughly agree with my hon. friend that a large percentage of those people, if they can be induced to do so, should be encouraged to settle in the older provinces of Canada. Our policy shall not be sectional; it should be nation-wide. In co-operation with the provinces we should endeavour to work out some plan whereby any immigration coming will be distributed as evenly as possible throughout the whole of Canada.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I was told to-day that there was a demand for 5,000 farm labourers in Canada, but that there was great difficulty in getting men for the work. Should not that situation be taken care of by the returned soldier? Does he indicate any disposition to take up that kind of work?

Mr. CALDER: I do not know exactly what the situation is in regard to farm labour, but I am told that in Western Canada it has very much improved, and that there is not the dearth there was a month ago. I understand the problem is being very well taken care of, but just where the labour is coming from, I do not know. Some time ago it was thought it would be necessary to import farm labour from the United States, but the situation has changed, and recently we have not had any request from the Western Provinces for a move in that direction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Just a word with regard to the prospect of immigration. The hon. minister says, not in the immediate future, but in a year or two or three from now. The expenditure has been made in Great Britain already. We have had an army overseas for the last four years that has been carrying on propaganda work there which is bound to have its effect in the immediate future. The majority of the men our soldiers have come in contact with over there in the army, so far as I can learn, have signified their desire and intention to come out to Canada if they can possibly arrange to do so. I do not think it is necessary to launch propaganda in the schools or anything of that kind. I think the Department of Immigration will find that during the next few years, indeed, right in the immediate future, their efforts will be taxed to the utmost to take care of the people who desire to come to this country from Great Britain, notwithstanding all the efforts that may be made to retain them over there. There is a condition of affairs existing in the old world at the present time the effects of which no one can at present accurately determine. The condition of affairs in this country to-day is such that I can well understand the reluctance of the Government to take a stand that would aggravate it in any way. But we should not close our eyes to the situation; it is one that will have to be met. Canada is suffering as no other country in the world has ever suffered, for people to till its soil. Under the conditions that exist to-day it is absolutely impossible to keep farm help on the farm; they have been going into the towns and cities faster during the last few months than at any time in the past, notwithstanding the crying demand for men to till the soil. This is an artificial condition of affairs. You are eliminating competition in many walks of life in the industrial centres. Not only are you to-day threatening to limit or curtail competition in the rural districts, but you are being asked to enact legislation that will discourage production of foodstuffs. The demand is being made here in Ottawa, and in all the cities throughout Canada, that agricultural products should not be permitted to be exported from this country.

I could not help reflecting upon the statement made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) this afternoon that only about ten per cent of the food consumed in the province of Nova Scotia was raised in that province. We are practically reaching that condition of affairs in the older provinces generally, and if this condition continues Canada will soon be an importing, instead of an exporting, country for many essential and important food products.

I have some figures here for 1911 which show that a very serious condition obtained at that time—and do not forget that the immigrants that come to Canada do not by any means all remain here. The report of the High Commissioner for Canada shows that in 1907 151,216 British subjects came to Canada, and 33,691 returned to Great Britain. In 1908, 81,321 came to Canada, and 39,866 returned, or almost fifty per cent. That was the condition of affairs which existed for many years. We have been boasting about the tremendous immigration to this country but it has been to a large extent only transitory, from one-third to one-half going back again. Since the war we have been at a standstill in this matter, and our agricultural industries have not only been stagnant but have been going back. It may be that we have increased production, but the agricultural conditions of the land, particularly in the old provinces, is most regrettable. The bad farming that has been carried on through these years in order to produce as much as was possible is to-day showing its effects, and the results in the future are bound to be worse than at present. If this condition continues and the price of labour in the cities and towns still goes up the cost of living will not be reduced but will go higher. No other result is possible from the conditions that prevail in Canada and elsewhere. I appreciate the difficulties with which the minister is confronted. Possibly he may have some well defined policy in mind which it might not be in the public interest to announce at this time, we may as well face the issue as it is. We have either to lose our present standing as an agricultural people, or we must put forth great efforts to the end that the people in Great Britain who intend to come here shall be enabled to do so even if assistance must be given. That may not be a popular thing to say in the towns and cities, but it is a fact which will have to be faced. I am glad that the Immigration Department will be under the control of a minister who will devote his entire time and attention to this great and difficult question which will confront Canada from now on.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: They say that the only thing you can do with a prophet is to disbelieve him, and I must say that I do not anticipate the flood of British immigrants to this country that my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) expects. I do not know what conditions in Britain he refers to that are going to induce that flood. I was speaking to a commercial gentleman from Manchester a few days ago and he told me that it was tolerably well understood that in Britain they have already re-absorbed into civil occupation eighty per cent of returned soldiers. As an illustration of how that re-absorption is taking place, it might interest the Committee, who may not have noticed the figures, to know that in the month of January the shipping tonnage turned out on the Clyde was 15,000; in February it was 22,000; in March, 40,000; and in April, 86,000. I have given the figures without the odd numbers, but in thousands they are correct, or my memory has undergone a more sudden failure than I had reason to suspect. Eighty-six thousand tons constituted a record for April for the Clyde with the single exception of the month of April in which the steamer Aquitania was turned out. I have given the broad fact about the reabsorption of returned soldiers into civil occupation, and a local illustration of what is going on there; and on these grounds I very much doubt if my hon. friend's prophecies will be fulfilled in the immediate future. It would be difficult for him to find an inducement for these people to come from the Clyde, where occupation is being taken up with such haste and avidity, to settle, let us say, in Winnipeg at the present time. I would rather stay on the Clyde, and so would my hon. friend if he were there. To my hon. friend the minister, whose patience and good nature have been the subject of my admiration since I came into this House shortly after eight o'clock, I would like to offer a suggestion, which is not of a critical kind, but is of a helpful and constructive nature, in regard to the getting of immigration from Great Britain. I want him to take advantage of his closer proximity to the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), to impress upon that somewhat obdurate individual the need of an immediate, substantial and generous cut in the tariff against British goods. I wish he would explain to the Minister of Finance—and I wish that hon. gentleman would give to that explanation the same wonderful concentration of mind that he shows when eating the heart out of a document or carrying on the omnivorous reading that we all know he does,—that if vessels from Great Britain were encouraged by a lower tariff to come here with British goods, there would undoubtedly come commercial travellers who would observe this country and see the magnificent opportunities it offers, and there would follow immigrants to this country. If he would only explain all that to the Minister of Finance, his Budget might send his reputation higher than it stands even at the present time, and might astonish us all. I may be mistaken, but I feel perfectly certain in my own mind that immigrants would follow the goods; that farmers would be made out of the immigrants; they would raise other goods from the soil to pay for the goods brought in, and we would have cargoes coming and cargoes going. Capital would come with both goods and immigrants, and you would build up a great trade and a useful immigration without a single agent in Britain—just by a simple method of cutting down the tariff. This could be accomplished if only we could first operate upon the mind of the Minister of Finance.

Contingencies in Canada, British and Foreign Agencies, and general immigration expenses, $775,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: I see there is an increase of $225,000.

Mr. CALDER: This item covers the general expenditures of the department in Canada, Great Britain and the United States, including such matters as advertising, printing, general expenditures, apart from salaries, at sea ports such as St. John, Halifax, Boston, and New York, and our offices at places like Winnipeg, Montreal, etc. It covers the deportation expenditures, boundary inspection expenditures, hospitals, locating of settlers, inspection of employment agencies, inspection of British immigrant children, general expenses and bonuses. There is a range of general expenditures covering our offices in Canada, Great Britain and the United States for such items as rent, fuel, telephones, express, temporary help, and all other expenditures of that class. The heavy item in these expenditures is advertising and printing. Last year we spent $216,000 in advertising and some $34,000 in printing.

Our deportation expenditures amounted to $12,000; boundary inspections, $37,800; and general expenses $72,700. All told, our expenditures under this head last year were $501,900; we are asking this year for a vote of $775,000. Whether or not that money will be expended will depend very largely upon conditions. We may find it necessary to increase our expenditures in Great Britain. Our general expenditures there have been comparatively small. Notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), I am convinced that it is necessary that certain general expenditures should be carried on. While it is true that Canada has been well advertised during the period of the war, nevertheless we will find it necessary to carry on certain work there if we are to control immigration in any sense at all. Let me illustrate. It is estimated that at the present time, there is a surplus of 3,000,000 women in Great Britain. Let us take down the bars and invite these women to our shores and we will get them by the hundreds of thousands. It is very desirable, especially in the near future, that there should be a selection made, that we should not invite to this country people who are going to aggravate the situation existing at the present time. You cannot do that unless you expend money to control this immigration. While it is true that thousands of people may desire to come to this country, we must see to it in so far as possible, that those who come are assured of employment. We simply cannot afford to have our cities flooded with people who cannot secure employment. In speaking of the general expenditures we could very easily use $100,000 in Great Britain for carrying on very necessary work. We are also increasing our expenditures in the United States and I think probably here in Canada there is certain very useful work that might be carried on. We must consider the problem of endeavouring to get some of our people out of our cities and back on the land. If by a wise expenditure of money we can cause a movement in that direction the money will be well spent. While we are asking for an increased amount of something like $200,000, it is not the intention to expend that money unless we find there is an opportunity for expending it usefully. Last year we took a vote of $1,135,000 and I think our expenditures were in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000. We have under-expended the vote by about $130,000. It is difficult at this time, with conditions as they are, to forecast with any degree of certainty or accuracy what our expenditures in the field of immigration may be during the coming year. The Government must have some latitude in that respect. Conditions will likely change very considerably in the next three or four months, and we should be prepared to meet those changed conditions. If we find the situation such as to enable us to wisely expend money in that direction, the money should be available.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount was spent on advertising last year, and what check is there on advertising? How is the advertising done in Great Britain and the United States?

Mr. CALDER: The amount expended on advertising in the United States last year was $209,509.73. Our advertising for a period of years in the United States has been carried on through two advertising agencies, the Touzalin Agency and the Western Newspaper Union. In addition to those, Rand, McNally & Co., and one or two small concerns, have done some advertising, but it did not amount to very much. I recently received a report which states that the work carried on has been quite satisfactory and that we are securing results. In Great Britain, the advertising carried on last year totalled only $6,483. Since the war broke out there has been very little possibility of getting immigrants from the Old Country, and we thought it advisable to close down our advertising there. I would judge that in past years our advertising in Great Britain must have been comparatively heavy. I cannot give the figures now.

Mr. CAHILL: Was this expenditure of $209,000 in the United States an increase over former years?

Mr. CALDER: There has been practically no increase. It has been running about the same amount from year to year.

Mr. CAHILL: Has there been no decrease?

Mr. CALDER: No, it has been running in the neighbourhood of $200,000 a year.

Mr. CAHILL: Are these yearly contracts?

Mr. CALDER: I think so.

Mr. CAHILL: Why did the minister spend as much money in the United States last year, for instance, as in the year previous on account of advertising for immigration, when he does not expect to get the results that were obtained before? Why not cut down the advertising there as well as in Great Britain? It seems an extraordinary amount to spend for this purpose.

Mr. CALDER: There is a great movement of people at the present time, and has been for years past, from the United States to Canada, whereas during the past three or four years it has been impossible to get immigrants from England or the continent of Europe on account of shipping conditions. The shipping conditions now are such, and will be for months to come, that we cannot expect people to come to Canada from Great Britain. On the other hand, there has been nothing to interfere with the immigration work between Canada and the United States.

Mr. CAHILL: Nothing more than that the United States being at war the younger people were not allowed to leave that country. Would it not have been economy to take that fact into account, and that we were not likely to have many people moving from the United States to Canada—at least not young people, who are usually the ones that leave?

Mr. CALDER: To a certain extent what the hon. gentleman says is true; that is, that we might naturally expect a smaller immigration from the United States than in previous years, and as a matter of fact that is the way it turned out. Nevertheless, we did receive somewhere in the neighbourhood of sixty thousand people from the United States last year, and some seventy-five thousand people the year before, and there was every indication last year that there might have been a very much larger movement. However, there is the other viewpoint: In the field of immigration you cannot always get results immediately. That is, you must carry on your publicity work in such a way as to so affect people that they will move probably in two, three, or four years from the time when they first began to read about Canada. I feel that we must keep up our publicity work with that object in view. As a matter of fact, I think we should have expended a larger amount of money in Great Britain for the same reason.

Mr. J. ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres) (Translation): May I enquire from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Calder) to what nationality belong the leaders of the Winnipeg strike who, according to newspaper reports, have just set up a Soviet or Bolshevik government?

I am informed on reliable authority that the leaders in that movement are, without exception immigrants from Great Britain, born in England and who have come to Canada directly from England.

I am pointing out the fact, so that our immigration agents in England may be instructed to put a stop to such immigration.

Should the hon. gentleman be in possession of the facts, perhaps he will deem it proper to acquaint the House with them.

Mr. CALDER: I am very sorry that I could not follow the hon. gentleman's remarks, but I understand he made inquiry as to the nationality of those who are responsible for the present situation in Winnipeg. I regret that I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman that information. If the wires were not down I might possibly be able to get the information which he seeks, but I am afraid the situation just now is such that we will have to wait a little while before it can be obtained.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT (Translation): If the hon. gentleman will take my advice, and seek information, I may suggest that he communicate with the Commissioner of the N. W. Mounted Police who has supplied us with some facts in that regard. I trust that at the next sitting of the House, the hon. gentleman will be in a position to enlighten us in regard to that matter.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount of money was spent for advertising in Canada last year, and what amount does the minister anticipate will be spent in this country in the next fiscal year?

Mr. CALDER: The total amount spent on advertising in Canada last year was $955.67.

Mr. CAHILL: I cannot quite understand why this item should be increased by $274,000 this year. I do not think the minister expects to spend a great deal more in the United States in advertising, but he does anticipate making a much larger outlay in Great Britain. He has also intimated that he is going to spend some money in Canada for advertising if I understood him correctly?

Mr. CALDER: There is a possibility.

Mr. CAHILL: A considerable amount of Government money has already been spent in Canada, and I hope the minister is not holding in this item a "slush fund" to be expended in this country to provide advertising for the "Consumers' Periodical," which the Government hopes will continue friendly. I cannot understand why the Immigration Department should spend money in this country to any great extent for this purpose. If that is what the increase is for I think it would be well not to vote it, I think we can do very well without it. I am of opinion that enough money has been spent in Canada in advertising by this Government.

Mr. CALDER: I referred to the fact that it might be advisable to make certain expenditures in Canada with a view to causing a movement of our people from the towns and cities into the country. That does not necessarily mean advertising. There is one class of expenditure we are not going into at all now that would be most effective in carrying on immigration work, viz: through lectures and films. The suggestion has recently come to the department that in the United States, Great Britain, and Canada, we should establish a service of that kind. If once established it is going to cost some money. I doubt whether we would be able to accomplish anything effective in that direction unless anywhere from $75,000 to probably $125,000 were expended. Yet, that class of advertising—because that is what it really is—would be the very best the Government could carry on. You can convey a message, or represent a scene through the moving pictures in a way that cannot be effectively done by other means. There is another class of work that has been cut off during the past few years in United States and Great Britain, and that is the use of lectures. We have not had any lectures given in the United States for some years past, nor have we had any in Great Britain, and it seems to me that if the opportunity presents itself we can very wisely spend some money in that way. The proposed increase in this vote is not entirely for advertising, although I think we will have to do some more of it. I am sure we will have to expend money on publicity work in Great Britain; but there are many other directions in which money can be spent for the purpose of carrying on very necessary immigration propaganda.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Might I ask whether in this vote of $775,000, any money has been provided for emigration from France and Belgium?

Mr. CALDER: The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) raised that question and we had a full discussion of the situation this afternoon. I do not wish to delay the Committee, and if the hon. gentleman will refer to Hansard to-morrow he will be able to read the discussion. However, if he wishes to further discuss the matter I shall be only too glad to do so.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not wish to enter upon any discussion, but merely to learn whether any provision has been made for emigration from those countries?

Mr. CALDER: This vote will cover any expenditures necessary for that purpose.

Administration of Chinese immigration—salaries and contingencies, $32,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister hinted the other day that there was to be a change in the law with regard to Chinese immigration. Has any new policy been adopted?

Mr. CALDER: Since I made that statement in the House I have not had an opportunity of discussing the matter further with my colleagues. This matter, of course, involves a question of policy which must be carefully considered. Personally I am convinced the proper thing to do is to abolish the head-tax. It is quite possible that later in the session an announcement will be made.

Relief of distressed Canadians in countries other than the United States, $6,000.

Mr. COPP: This is the only item which does not show an increase. How much was expended last year?

Mr. CALDER: Between $1,600 and $2,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: How does the minister get authentic information with regard to Canadians who are in distress in a foreign country, and how are they provided for?

Mr. CALDER: Such cases, if arising in Great Britain, are usually brought to our attention by the British Consul. I had a case before me the other day of a Canadian who was stranded in the Argentine and wanted to get back to Canada. Then, there was a case recently of a Canadian away over in Assyria. Of course, we have a number of cases in Great Britain. They are reported to us and if they look like cases where assistance ought to be given, aid is granted.

Exhibitions—salaries and general expenses, $50,000.

Mr. COPP: What exhibitions are these?

Mr. CALDER: This work was transferred to the Department of Immigration early in 1918. In the United States we make a number of exhibits in State and county fairs. Occasionally we have very large exhibits.

Mr. COPP: Exhibits of what?

Mr. CALDER: Almost entirely agricultural. We are preparing small exhibits to be seen by callers at our own offices. We are putting the same kind of exhibits in our United States offices. We are preparing also small exhibits for schools in the United States and Great Britain. This work is very useful and interesting and very helpful to our propaganda.

Mr. COPP: Is this a new work?

Mr. CALDER: No, it has been carried on for years, varying from time to time according to requirements. I went over the matter with our chief official from the United States and officials of the department here and decided what would be a reasonable programme for this year. It is estimated that this amount will take care of the work we have in mind.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT (translation): Could the minister tell us how much money was spent, last year, with respect to those exhibitions?

Mr. CALDER: $25,000.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT (Translation): Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Department of Marine and Fisheries—salaries, including Deputy Minister at $6,000, Assistant Deputy Minister and Naval constructor at $4,500 each, $241,650.

Mr. COPP: There is quite an increase here.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The increases are the usual statutory increases, with the exception of two. We ask that the assistant deputy minister and the naval constructor each be given an additional $500. The duties of the assistant deputy minister have been exceptionally heavy, due to the shipbuilding programme and to the extra work arising from the war. The same applies to Mr. Duguid, the naval constructor. Both men are excellent officials in every way, and I hope that the Committee will agree to the small increase in salary that we ask for them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is the naval constructor responsible for the naval ships that were built during the war?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Ocean and river service—maintenance and repairs to Dominion steamers and ice-breakers, $1,500,000.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hon. members will notice that this is the same amount as was voted last year. Twenty-five ships in all are being operated.

Mr. ARTHURS: I should like to call the attention of the minister to the wages that are being paid on some of the boats, particularly in the lighthouse service. I have special reference to a boat plying out of Parry Sound in the service of the Department of Marine. The answer I received from the department was that wages were being reduced on the Great Lakes, and that they could not afford to pay ordinary deckhands on that boat more than $35 or $40 per month. In view of the high cost of living and the general increases in salaries, a wage of from $35 to $40 per month is entirely inadequate and should be increased.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: While I do not know at the moment whether they are receiving as low a wage as that, I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Examiners of masters and mates, $18,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain this appropriation?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The appropriation last year was $16,500, so that there is an increase this year of $1,500. This increase is to provide for the increase in the cost of nautical supplies and other necessities in connection with the service and for the remuneration of examiners.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: At what points are there examiners?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We have examiners at Halifax, Quebec, Yarmouth, North Sydney, Charlottetown, St. John; in the inland waters division, at Toronto, Collingwood and West Selkirk, Manitoba; in the western division, at Vancouver, Victoria, Nelson, Edmonton and Prince Rupert.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many men passed their examinations last year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The figures are as follows:

	Number of examinations.	Number of certificates issued.
Halifax	80	78
Quebec	30	26
Yarmouth	26	26
North Sydney	21	16
Charlottetown	2	2
St. John	6	6
Vancouver	23	23
Victoria	26	25
Toronto	44	41
Collingwood	2	2
Nelson	2	2
West Selkirk, Manitoba	4	4
Total	266	251

Since the war started, there has been a gradual falling off in the number of persons applying for examinations for masters' and mates' certificates.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where are those examination papers prepared? Is there one universal authority for the preparation, the papers then being distributed to the different centres for the purpose of the examination?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is a competent officer called an examiner in charge of each of those places, but if an examination is going to take place for a captain or mate, the examinations would be exactly the same in each of the places that I have mentioned.

Investigations into wrecks, $12,300.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This is the same amount as was voted last year, and it is to enable the commissioner to carry on the necessary investigations when wrecks occur.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many wrecks were there last year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Thirty, including strandings.

Expenses of schools of navigation, $8,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: How many schools are conducted in the Maritime Provinces, and where are they established?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There are schools at St. John, N.B., under Captain Owen as instructor; Halifax, under Captain John Simmons; North Sydney, under Captain James Sutherland; and Yarmouth, under B. R. Hilton.

Mr. McKENZIE: What are the salaries paid to those teachers?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Captain Owen gets $75 per month; Captain Simmons, $100; Captain James Sutherland, $75, and Captain Hilton, $66.66. Captain P. L. Lachance, at Quebec, gets $50 per month. Captain J. E. Murphy, lecturer at Yarmouth, gets $250 per season, and Captain George C. Coles, lecturer at Collingwood, Ont., gets $250 per season. Then Captain Charles Eddie, of Vancouver, gives his services free.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the teacher at North Sydney get paid the year round?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I think he does.

Mr. McKENZIE: This work, I believe, takes his whole time. I know Captain Sutherland personally, and he is a very good navigator and an old sea captain, although not a very old man. He is a very capable man, and as regards making a good average of passes from the pupils that attend his school, he has done well. He has a wife and family, and as he is afflicted with rheumatism he is not very capable of doing other work than attending to this school.

Now, $75 a month is not much with which to pay rent and board himself and his family. The captain himself never said anything to me about it, but his wife did, and I promised to bring to the notice of the minister that it was pretty hard sledding for him to get along on his present salary.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I thank the hon. member for drawing attention to Captain James Sutherland's salary. It does seem rather small in these times, and I shall be very glad to give the matter my very best consideration.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are these teachers allowed to charge any fees to their pupils?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Everything is free.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Last year, if I remember rightly, there was a proposal to amalgamate the Navigation School at Halifax with the Technical College. Have any steps been taken in that direction?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Navigation and the Technical Schools have been amalgamated. We are paying Captain Simons, as instructor, $100 a month.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are our certificates recognized by the English Board of Trade?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Our certificates are recognized the same as the British certificates.

Registration of shipping, $6,000.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is an increase of $3,000 over last year's vote, due to shipbuilding activities in Canada which necessitated all the ships being registered.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the minister a list of the ships registered during the past year, with their tonnage, distinguishing between steam and sailing vessels?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry I have not that information at hand, but I will try and get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: I understood the minister to say that this increase of $3,000 was due to having to pay the registrars for registering the new ships. I was under the impression that the owners of ships paid the registration fees. I know we have to do so in some parts of Nova Scotia. When a ship is launched, it costs the owner from $15 to $25 to get her registered. Is the minister aware of that fact, and what are the registrars paid for other work, such as transferring ships?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member is quite right. I am asking for the travelling and office expenses in connection with supervising the registry of these ships.

Mr. DUFF: In Nova Scotia the owner also pays the travelling expenses when the registrars have to travel to ascertain the ship's dimensions.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The expenditure for 1917-18 was $2,615.90. The reason for the increase this year is that we have to supervise the registry of these numerous ships, and that entails considerable expense. If we were back in pre-war times, when not nearly so much shipbuilding was going on, the expenditure would be about $2,000.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. DUFF: If it is for the travelling expense of officials sent out from Ottawa I can understand it, but I could not understand our voting this amount for the local registrars.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is not for the local registrars, but for the expenses of the officials sent out from Ottawa.

Mr. McKENZIE: If a man was launching a vessel at Sydney, for instance, who is the local official there who would take the dimensions and certify to the capacity of the ship?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The registrar is Mr. F. I. Stewart, whom I think my hon. friend knows very well.

Mr. McKENZIE: I had a sort of a notion that it was somebody in connection with the Customs that did it; but I understand it is a specific appointment by itself?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, it is a specific appointment.

Inspection of live stock shipments, $3,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Where are these shipments inspected?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The duties of the inspector are to carry out the regulations in regard to the health, security and safe carriage of live stock on ships. At points where no inspectors are appointed, the port warden or chief officer of Customs are ex officio the inspectors. No clearance is granted to ships carrying live stock unless a certificate is issued. During the season of 1917 a very large number of horses were shipped from the port of Montreal to France—1,455 in all.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We all know that some years ago live stock were allowed to be landed in Great Britain, but had to be slaughtered shortly after their arrival. It is now reported that there is a complete embargo against entrance of live stock into Great Britain, which is in violation—not of any specific agreement—but of the announcement that some improvement would be made in the conditions. I would like to know what the situation is at the present time.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member will repeat that question when the Minister of Agriculture has his Estimates before the Committee I am sure he will receive the information. It does not come within my province.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the minister any control over the provision that is made for the shipping of stock from different ports? At certain seasons of the year there is considerable live stock shipped from the port of North Sydney to Newfoundland, and people there who are interested in the prevention of cruelty to animals complain very often that cattle are not provided with proper shelter. When they come by train and have to wait for a day or two or more for the boat, sometimes they suffer considerably through exposure and lack of proper attention. At the request of a gentleman from Antigonish who was in the cattle business I brought this matter to the notice of the Department of Agriculture last year, when I was told by the Minister of Agriculture that the Minister of Railways had to do with such accommodation. I wish to bring it now to the notice of the minister as I see he is providing for something in connection with live stock at these places. Is there any person at the port of North Sydney whose business it is to inspect cattle that are shipped to Newfoundland?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Department of Marine has no control over live stock that is landed on the wharves at North Sydney. Our regulations apply to live stock when on board ship. The Minister of Agriculture was quite right last year when, in his answer to the hon. member, he said that the taking care of cattle on the wharves at North Sydney was in the jurisdiction of the Minister of Railways. Our regulations with regard to cattle on board ship cover:

1—The number of live stock the ship is adapted to carry.
2—The number actually on board for intended voyage.
3—That the arrangements for carrying live stock are approved by inspector.
4—That the shelters or fittings are substantial enough to ensure safety of live stock for the voyage.
5—That ship is seaworthy.

Our jurisdiction begins and ends in seeing that live stock are properly taken care of when on board ship.

To continue subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec, Maritime Provinces and British Columbia, $35,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: To whom is this subsidy paid?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The department is subsidizing two wrecking plants, one at Quebec and the other at Esquimalt, B.C. The subsidy to the Quebec Dredging and Wrecking Company is $25,000, and that to the British Columbia Salvage Company, $10,000. This is to enable the companies to maintain an adequate plant to assist effectively vessels in distress in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on the British Columbia coast. We think it wise to have these wrecking plants ready in case a steamer should run ashore or be in distress in any way.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What has this wrecking plant at Quebec done during the past year to save property?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I regret I cannot give a detailed answer. I can only say generally that the Quebec Wrecking Company has the steamer Lord Strathcona and such other plant as may be required to the satisfaction of the Department of Marine. Some ships have run ashore and others have been wrecked, but I cannot give the name of every ship and the number that have required assistance from the company. This is a vote that has been taken for a number of years.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This is a large subsidy, and there is a question in my mind as to whether it is justifiable that we should spend this money unless we are getting results. We have wrecks frequently on the Atlantic coast in Nova Scotia and I have never heard of this company operating there, or being of any service on that coast. As we are asked to vote $25,000 to this company I think it should be shown that some service that is worth while is being rendered. The Government steamer Voyageur was in the ice in the St. Lawrence river below Quebec last January, and the Prince Edward Island ferry was called upon to take it out. But we did not hear that the wrecking plant of Quebec had shown up at all. I keep some track of these matters, and have not heard of a single instance during the past year in which this wrecking plant has been serviceable. I would not feel like voting for a continuance of this subsidy unless the minister could show that some useful work was being done.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not think I should have much difficulty in doing that. Owing to the aids to navigation by various governments for a number of years, and the depth and safety of the channel, we have had very few wrecks indeed in any part of the St. Lawrence channel. The Quebec Salvage Company are supposed to render assistance to any ships in distress from Quebec to Belle Isle and I think it would be a very unwise policy not to vote this sum. We have to keep a wrecking plant ready in case a large and expensive passenger or freight ship should get out of the channel or run on the rocks. We could hardly say that we did not anticipate any accident, and it is no argument to say that we should not have a plant ready to help expensive ships because accidents are not frequent. With regard to the Canadian Government ship Voyageur, de did not ask the Prince Edward Island ferry to go to her assistance because she would not have been of substantial use. Of course, she had considerable difficulty in getting from Quebec to Halifax in January but she succeeded, with the assistance that was given her by the Government ice breakers. I hope the Committee will see the necessity for this vote. One keeps fire insurance on a building not because he is anxious for a fire but because of the necessity for protection. The same argument applies in this case.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister is not altogether informed on this question. They did call on the Prince Edward Island ferry to help the Voyageur out of the ice. I know that fact myself, and the Minister of Railways or some of his officials can give the particulars of the matter. They did not get assistance from the Prince Edward Island ferry because the Department did not wish to expose the boat to any risk. It is an extraordinary thing that we should be paying a subsidy of $25,000 for a wrecking plant at Quebec and that when the Voyageur was in the ice for several days endeavouring to get to Halifax nobody ever thought of getting that wrecking plant to help her. The Canada and the Montcalm had to be sent up to assist the Voyageur. The Quebec Wrecking Plant was not heard of at all.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: For the very good reason that our arrangement with the Quebec Salvage Company is for the season of navigation only. When the season of navigation closes the Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Plant is not supposed to perform any service until navigation opens the following season. We had both of our ice breakers with the Voyageur and we had asked the Prince Edward Island ferry to hold herself in readiness if we wanted her to go to the rescue of the Voyageur, but happily that was not necessary. I cannot impress upon hon. members too much the necessity of having this vote go through for the Quebec Salvage Company, because to be without a wrecking plant when there is such a large amount of shipping passing up and down the St. Lawrence would be a very serious thing.

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

Mr. J. D. REID: One of the main reasons for maintaining this wrecking plant is that it helps to keep down the insurance on vessels coming up the St. Lawrence. Both Lloyds and the British American Shipping Company insisted on having a wrecking plant ready at any time in case of anything happening to a vessel.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We had a wrecking plant on the coast of Cape Breton some years ago but the subsidy was discontinued and we never missed the plant. We have been able to get along just as well as before.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Last year the Quebec Salvage Company were the means of saving the large White Star transport, the Winnifredia. If we had not had the salvage plant I am quite certain that ship would have been a total loss.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What wrecking equipment has the company?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is rather difficult to anticipate all the questions that may be asked by hon. members. But, I may say that they have a very modern wrecking plant in addition to the steamer Strathcona. I have not before me a list of the plant but I can get it if necessary.

Mr. J. D. REID: They have the steamer Strathcona, a large schooner, pumps and everything necessary in connection with a wrecking plant.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What are the names of the persons interested in the Quebec Salvage Company?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The late Mr. Andrew Allan was president of the company, the Canadian Pacific have an interest in it, and also the Allan line.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have no objection to a proper wrecking plant being maintained on the St. Lawrence. I think it is a very proper precaution, and I hope the minister will on some later occasion be able to give us a proper description of that company, and show that they are provided with all necessary plant. But I am sorry to say that, although we have splendid navigation and fine harbours in Eastern Nova Scotia, some times we have wrecks. We have wrecks on the west coast of Newfoundland which must be attended to from Cape Breton, the nearest point, and around the eastern side of Cape Breton on the Atlantic where steamers sometimes have the misfortune to get into difficulties. It is no consolation for the shipmaster or owner whose ship is ashore at Gabarus, for instance, in the eastern part of Cape Breton, to know there is a wrecking plant at Quebec, because that is too far away. The Government used to give a subsidy to the Dominion Coal Company, or as it is known now, the Dominion Steel Company, who had, and still have, powerful tugs of their own, and also had steamers but these were commandeered during the war—I presume they will soon get them back again. That company used to assist wrecks and get a subsidy. I always thought until to-night that the subsidy was continued. I cannot very well understand why it was discontinued, because they were rendering very excellent service. Is there any substantial reason for the discontinuance of that subsidy? I am not talking about the desirability of the company getting the money, but I am looking to the security that shipowners would have.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The subsidy referred to by the hon. member was granted before my time. It was not in my Estimates last year, nor is it in the Estimates this year. But I will look up the records. I hope to be either on Naval or Fisheries Estimates to-morrow, and I shall be very glad to give the hon. member more information with regard to this matter than I have before me now.

Mr. TOLMIE: As far as the Pacific coast is concerned, the subsidy paid to the wrecking outfit there is very much appreciated. The company receiving that subsidy renders valuable service and has succeeded in saving a number of very valuable ships.

Mr. DUFF: I notice that the item covers wrecking plants, "Quebec, Maritime Provinces and British Columbia." But there is nothing for the Maritime Provinces, and so the item does not represent the facts quite correctly. However, I am not finding very much fault with that. If a subsidy is necessary on the St. Lawrence and the Pacific coast a subsidy should be granted for the protection of shipping on the Atlantic coast. We have more business on the Atlantic coast than there is in the gulf of St. Lawrence or on the Pacific coast. If you are going to give subsidies to wrecking plants in the St. Lawrence and in British Columbia the harbours of Halifax and St. John should have plants for the protection of shipping on the Atlantic coast. I would like to say a word of appreciation for what the Department of Marine and Fisheries does to help shipping on the Atlantic coast. Whilst we have no wrecking plant, if they have a steamer anywhere within 150 miles they send her to the assistance of a vessel in distress. We have to give the department credit for that. They have rendered valuable service both around the Magdalen Islands and at other points. In the absence of the minister some few days ago I asked the Acting Minister if the department is sending a steamer to the Magdalen Islands this spring to help vessels there in case they get into trouble. There are about a hundred ships up there. About three weeks ago there was a great deal of running ice about Grindstone island and at Grand Entry. It seems to me that if it is possible at all one of the Government vessels should be sent up there to look after these ships while they are in the North Bay and also fishing in the gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The steamer Stanley is on her route now placing the buoys, and from the information we have so far received the steamers in the ice are getting along all right. If that should turn out not to be the case we will be very glad to send them whatever assistance they need. Referring to the Dominion Steel Company, I have just been informed that the reason they discontinued work some four years ago was because they stated they no longer wished to perform any wrecking work, therefore the subsidy was no longer granted to them. Mr. Brookfield, who up to the time of the Halifax explosion owned and operated a large dry dock at Halifax, had a very modern and up-to-date wrecking plant, but unfortunately when the explosion took place his plant was destroyed. Another company, called the Reid Wrecking Company, are sending a wrecking equipment down to Halifax, and we hope before long to come to some arrangement with them, so that they will be in a position to look after the salvaging of any steamships off the Nova Scotia coast, just as the Quebec company does on the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If the minister will explain just what this wrecking company did, and how much money they made, we will have a much better idea as to whether it is necessary to make this expenditure or not.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I was about to explain that the earnings of the Quebec Salvaging and Wrecking Company from their working plant amounted to $105,843.65. The Dominion subsidy is $25,000, which brought their total earnings up to $130,843.65. I have the details of the expenditures here on salaries and wages, supplies, repairs, insurance, depreciation, interest, etc. They made a profit of $9,786.70. Our contract reads that the Dominion Government shall get one-half of whatever the profits the companies make, and the Government's share is $4,893.35. I will be very glad to-morrow to give the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) every detail in regard to the plant, pumps, tender, etc. I will also give him the number of wrecks and other details.

Mr. COPP: Has the Government any control of the cost of operating this plant, and of the charges made?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, absolute control. The company cannot issue any schedule of charges until it is first approved by the Minister of Marine.

Unforeseen expenses—$5,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is there an appropriation available for supplying uniforms to the officers of the steamer Champlain which plies between Murray Bay and Riviere-Ouelle wharf? Last summer I happened to be passing on the steamer nearly every week, and it seemed to me that the uniforms of the officers were absolutely worn out; they were of a shabby yellow colour, in fact, every colour except navy blue. I wrote to the department about it, and they told me that new uniforms had been supplied to the officers the previous fall. To my mind that is not satisfactory. If the uniforms, for one reason or the other, are not in good condition, I think they should be replaced at once, and new uniforms issued. Between three and four thousand people from all parts of Canada, and from different points in the United States, go to Murray Bay every summer and I think it is a poor advertisement for Canada to have the officers of the Champlain uniformed as they were last summer.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No provision is made for buying uniforms for the officers and crew; they have to provide their own uniforms.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am informed that last year and the year previous some of the officers were given uniforms by the department, and the department's answer to my letter stated that uniforms had been supplied to them the year previous.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is quite true that up to a year ago the department did provide uniforms. However, at that time it was decided on the recommendation of the officers in charge that the Government should no longer do so. Since then the officers and men have had to provide their own uniforms.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will that policy be adopted by the department in the future?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: All Government policies are subject to the will of Parliament. We will be very glad to hear any suggestion from hon. gentlemen, but at the moment that is the policy which has been decided upon in this matter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have a suggestion to offer with regard to the steamer Champlain. When we were considering the Estimates of the Railway Department I advanced the same suggestion in connection with the service which is to-day in operation between the south shore and the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Next summer, on the first of July, the Quebec and Saguenay railway will be finished and in operation. Therefore, the steamship service will not be as necessary as it formerly was. I think it would be well if the department were to place the Champlain on a new route, for instance, between Murray Bay and Cap à l'Aigle, St. Fidèle, and St. Siméon, and then across to Tadoussac. The navigation is good for the steamers at all times, even in the worst season in the fall, and if this is done the people in the district will reap the benefit of the new railway; otherwise they will not have the necessary facilities to connect with the railway. Then once or twice a week, when the weather permitted, the Champlain could cross over to Fraserville and thus give accommodation to people on both sides of the river. At the time I put the question to the Minister of Railways he told me to take the matter up with the department, and that is the reason I have brought it forward to-night.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I do not want my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) to have the only say in this matter, because it touches my riding also. I would like to have the boat touch first at Riviere du Loup which is not far down, and then proceed across to Tadoussac. This would provide communication between the north shore and the south shore, for which the people on both sides of the river are asking at the present time. The Champlain could also touch at Cap à l'Aigle, St. Fidèle, St. Siméon, Murray Bay, and across to Rivière Ouelle. It would be a nice round trip, especially during the summer, would pay well, and furnish ample accommodation to all the people on the south shore.

We used to have a service between the north shore and the south, even during the winter, but the little boat that was there has been taken away. If the minister can see his way clear to have this communication re-established, he will be given credit for his action by the people in that part of the country.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am obliged to my hon. friend, and also to the member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) for bringing this matter to my attention, particularly in view of the fact that the Quebec and Saguenay Railway is now finished. I will discuss the matter with the Minister of Railways and see if we can meet the views of the hon. gentlemen.

Amount required for two boilers for C.G.S. Montcalm, $70,000.

Mr. COPP: Last year an amount was required for the same purpose. Is it for the same boilers, or have they to be replaced again?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We could not put the boilers in last year; this amount is being voted again this year for the same purpose.

Amount required for one steamer for buoy and lighthouse service in Maritime Provinces, $150,000.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I wish to amend this vote so that it will read as follows:

Amount required for two motor patrol vessels for buoy and lighthouse service in British Columbia, to replace vote 205 for amount required for one steamer for buoy and lighthouse service in Maritime Province $150,000—$50,000.

Now that the war is practically over, some of the steamers that had been requisitioned by the Naval Service are free, and so I am asking for only $50,000 instead of $150,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I received a letter a few days ago from a Mr. McDonald in my county, advising me that he had picked up a buoy off the west coast of Inverness. Is it the policy of the department to compensate persons who save this valuable property?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It has always been the policy of the Government to pay at a reasonable rate, for any service rendered; but the department would have to be satisfied that the service was really rendered. Perhaps the hon. member will write me about the matter to which he refers.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I have already written the department.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. McISAAC: Has the minister received a communication from the crew of the steamer Brant, which is engaged in this service around the coast of Prince Edward Island? They complain that their wages are lower than those paid to the crews of other steamers engaged in similar work, and that while the wages of other crews have been increased, theirs have not. Is the minister disposed to meet the demands of these men?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: These vessels are graded in various classes. The crew of the steamer Brant are paid the same wages as the crews of steamers in the same class.

Mr. McISAAC: Has there been any increase in their wages during the last two or three years?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes. I remember asking for a list of officers and crews on the various Government steamers, and the salaries were all increased according to rank. That is, captains got a little more than ordinary seamen, but there was a general increase to all officers and men on Government vessels.

Mr. DUFF: How many steamers has the department on the Atlantic coast for the purpose of laying buoys and serving lighthouses? I call attention to a letter I wrote the department some time ago during the absence of the minister and his deputy, with regard to the necessity of placing two automatic buoys in the bay and harbour of Lunenburg. Lunenburg is the most important harbour on the Atlantic coast, outside of Halifax; large numbers of ships go in and out of that harbour both in summer and in winter. But the harbour is not properly buoyed, and if the matter is not attended to there may be a bad accident. Ships come in in the middle of the night; sometimes when they get part of the way in they have to put to sea again on account of the weather. I have known ships to come into the bay, go out again and have to remain out four or five days before the weather permitted their coming into the harbour. The department should not hesitate at the expense necessary to provide one or two buoys in a harbour like that. The only answer I received from the gentleman in charge of the department at the time was that the Lighthouse Board would not grant my request. But I think that I know more about the harbour of Lunenburg than the Lighthouse Board does. Some of these ships have crews of twenty men, and it would be a terrible thing if any of them ran on the rocks in the harbour and serious loss of life and property resulted.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The steamers engaged in placing buoys on the Atlantic coast are the Arranmore, the Stanley, and the Lady Laurier. With regard to the placing of additional buoys at the port of Lunenburg, such matters come under the review of the Lighthouse Board, although they always come to me after that board has decided whether or not the expenditure is necessary. I shall be very glad, however, to look into the matter brought up by my hon. friend.

River St. Lawrence, ship channel, $478,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is this for?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The vote is the same as last year. It is for dredging, maintenance and operating of the dredging fleet, and so on. A good deal of dredging is done on the St. Lawrence route, especially on the north channel from Quebec to Grosse Ile.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this new work or is it keeping clear the old works that were completed some time ago?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is at present a thirty-foot channel at low water from Montreal to the sea, but we are deepening that to thirty-five feet, and that is what this dredging fleet is proposed to be engaged on during the coming season.

Mr. PARENT: Not long ago I saw in the newspapers that such large steamers as the Olympic and Aquitania drew too much water to admit of their coming up the channel as far as Quebec. In speaking of this matter to different navigators and pilots, I find that any of those men could have easily brought those ships up to Quebec. I should not like the impression to be spread abroad that such vessels as those I have mentioned could not use our Canadian ports on account of drawing too much water. If such a statement as I have seen in the press is not correct, I presume the minister can make a statement to that effect, so that such bad news will not be sent abroad.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have not seen the press report referred to, but no doubt it referred to a question asked by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) as to why the Aquitania that brought troops from England and disembarked them at Halifax and then went to New York, did not go up to the port of Quebec. I told him at that time that I had not seen the press report, but I have since advised him that it was due to three reasons: First, the owners had the ship destined for the port of New York, and not for the port of Quebec; second, the rate of insurance would, unfortunately, be higher if the ship came up the St. Lawrence route; and third, if one of those ships like the Olympic or the Aquitania reached the Beaujean bank at low tide they would have to wait until the tide would rise suffiicently to admit of vessels of their draught passing. But there is no doubt at all that the largest steamer afloat can come up the St. Lawrence river to the port of Quebec. There is ample water all the way along until they reach Beaujean bank, and if they would wait until the tide rises they would not have any difficulty in getting over that bank. I have, therefore, no hesitation in making the statement quite clear for the public that those large steamers can come provided the owners want them to come to the port of Quebec.

Lighthouse and coast service—salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $540,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I see that the amount is the same as last year. In my county there are many lighthouse keepers, and a number of them have asked me to endeavour, if possible, to secure an increase in salary for them. The cost of living, of course, affects these people just as much as any other. These lighthouse keepers have to endure great hardships all the year round; most of them are isolated in little houses along the coast and subject to the perils of the sea, and I do not see why they should not have increases just as the deputy ministers and others. I am making this plea for these men in my county as well as for those in other parts in Quebec and elsewhere along the coast where the same conditions prevail.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Last year, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) will remember, in my Supplementary Estimates, I brought down an additional amount of $55,000 for lighthouse keepers, and that is incorporated in the amount of the expenditure for 1918-19 and also for this year, making $540,000 in all. I agree with the hon. member that lighthouse keepers ought to get an increase in their salaries in view of the high cost of living. Unfortunately, I was ill when the Main Estimates were being considered by the Government, but I hope to be able to persuade my colleagues to allow me to include another amount for lighthouse keepers in my Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. COPP: Have petitions been forwarded to the minister from different lighthouse keepers throughout the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. COPP: Quite an organization was started, and I understood from petitions and letters I received from different lighthouse keepers that they were practically promised this increase; that all they had to do was to lay their case before the department, and I understood they did so.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member is quite right. The department has received petitions from coast to coast, and as I stated a moment ago, in view of the extremely high cost of living, the salaries are inadequate, and I think the Government would be justified, and the Committee also, in voting, when my Supplementary Estimates come down, an additional amount to be distributed amongst the lighthouse keepers.

Construction of lighthouses and aids to navigation, including apparatus, submarine signals, and providing suitable boats for carrying on construction work, $400,000.

Mr. McISAAC: I made a request for an amount for the erection of a small lighthouse on a pier at Little Sands, King's county, P.E.I. I know the request was made too late for the Main Estimates, and perhaps the minister would be so good as to place an amount in the Supplementary Estimates for this service.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I shall be glad to look into the matter, and I think possibly we can take it out of the vote we are asking for now.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In my constituency there is an island called Ile-aux-Coudres. It is about four miles from the shore, and the people from this island have to go up to Baie St. Paul, which is the nearest point for getting to the district of Quebec and other places on the north shore. The man who carries the mails has a little ship of his own, but it is not very good, as his means are not great. Would it be possible for the Department of Marine to co-operate with the Post Office Department so that each could have a vote in the Estimates to pay this man for carrying passengers as well as the mail? At the present time the passengers all cross in this man's boat to the north shore when he brings the mail over which he does twice a day. During the winter season from October to April, the weather is very rough and in this small boat the passengers are in considerable peril. I know the people would be very grateful if a vote was included so that a suitable boat could be got.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is a matter that the Postmaster General would have to look after, but if my hon. friend will write to the Postmaster General and let me have a copy of the letter I will confer with him and see what can be done.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The minister is in possession of a petition from the fishermen of Grand Etang, in the county of Inverness, asking for a light. Grand Etang has developed into quite an important port. There must be from fifty to sixty large vessels fishing from this port, two steamers enter it twice a week, and a number of schooners. The harbour was only opened a few years ago. At present there is only one light, and it is practically no assistance to vessels seeking entrance at night; it is an artificial harbour, and the entrance is very narrow. I wrote to the Department some time ago about this matter, and I have had several interviews with some of the officers of the department during the absence of the minister and his deputy. I think the minister's officers will agree that I have not troubled them very much about matters of this kind, but in this case a light is essential, and I should be very grateful, as I am sure hundreds of people along that shore would be, if the minister would take this matter into his consideration, and have his officers make a report. I understand that a steamer goes down there once a year distributing oil to the lighthouses, and carrying officers of the department. I should like them to gather the necessary information with respect to the representations I have made, because I know when the minister has the facts he will see to it that this light is placed.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have already had the facts placed before me, and I fully agree as to the necessity for a lighthouse at that point. At the first meeting of the board I shall bring the matter to their attention, and I hope they will recommend the placing of a lighthouse at Grand Etang.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The Lighthouse Board is made up of members from different parts of Canada, I understand.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will personally see that it is attended to.

Signal service, $60,000.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This is a very old service. Stations have been established to report the movement of ships, weather conditions, etc., by means of telephone, wireless and telegraph. The system extends from St. John, N.B., to Cape Race, Nfld.

Administration of pilotage, $200,000.

Mr. PARENT: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This money is required for the ports of Montreal, Quebec, and Halifax, which come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Marine. I hope in the very near future to introduce a Bill seeking to bring all the pilotage systems in our important seaports under the authority of the Minister of Marine, and I shall be glad to give all the information asked for on that occasion.

Mr. LOGGIE: May I refer to the report made by Thomas Robb, James N. Bales and J. W. Harrison, commissioners who were appointed to report on the pilotage districts of Miramichi, Sydney, Louisburg, Halifax, St. John, Montreal and Quebec. The report has been received by the department, laid on the Table, and distributed to members. I direct the minister's attention especially to the recommendations regarding the Miramichi district. I was very glad to hear the minister announce that he proposes to introduce a Bill to bring certain of our great national ports under his department to a greater extent than has been the case in the past. The recommendations of the commission regarding the Miramichi district are as follows:

That the condition of the pilotage in this district has been found to be exceptional and the earnings of the pilots during the year 1917 have been exceedingly low, owing to the falling off of deal shipments by water, from the ports in this district. That it is most urgent that something should be done whereby the individual earnings of these pilots may be increased, and with this in view we strongly recommend that the number of pilots be reduced so as not to exceed twelve, and to accomplish this aim will require the retirement of four of the oldest pilots, whose ages range from 71 to 74. The enforced retirement of these men your commissioners consider will entail a certain hardship as they are well preserved and still active. Having these conditions in mind we recommend that some compensation be made to these men annually, to a sum not exceeding $300, for the remainder of their lives; but this shall be understood not to extend to any pilots who may hereafter be retired in this district. This will be in line with the precedent created by the Marine Department in the Quebec Pilotage district when reducing the number of pilots in that district a few years ago.

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

The next paragraph refers to the Admiral Beatty, the vessel that is used in connection with this work, and sets out the fact that recently one of the vessels was lost at sea, and hence is no longer available for the work. The concluding paragraph is as follows:

That an additional five per centum per annum be deducted from the gross earnings of the pilots of this district for the purpose of creating and maintaining a superannuation fund for the pilots retiring in the district.

The average income of the pilots for six months or during open navigation is about $750 per man, but owing to war conditions in 1917 the net earnings of each pilot were reduced to the nominal sum of $150. It is no wonder the commissioners say that something should be done in this matter. The conditions are very exceptional, and I am glad that the minister is considering the case of Miramichi, which is one of the greatest waterways in Canada. I am sure that a large number of ocean vessels will load there this year, and from this year's operations I have no doubt the men will receive a fair remuneration. But the whole situation is very unsatisfactory. The evidence shows that only three or four of the pilots are below the age of 60. The majority are between 60 and 70, and three or four of them are over 70. It seems to me that it would be reasonable to retire men of that age and not allow them to be in charge of valuable property. The loss of one vessel would more than counterbalance any reasonable provision that might be made for these men, and I hope that when the minister is reconsidering the matter he will give his earnest and considerate attention to the claims of the pilots on the Miramichi river. I do not think he would go very far afield if he accepted the suggestion of the Commission, and granted a small amount, not to exceed $300, as compensation to these three men between the ages of 71 and 74. I trust he will see his way clear to vote a certain sum as the nucleus of a pension fund to which the pilots could pay so much annually out of their earnings, so that in the future when a pilot reaches a certain age he can be superannuated.

Mr. DUFF: Do these pilots on the Miramichi river devote all their time to piloting vessels in the navigation season, and are they paid from the ships they pilot?

Mr. LOGGIE: Under normal conditions they devote all their time to the pilotage business during open navigation. The fees are paid into a common fund and the money is distributed pro rata among the pilots, less expenses for collection and distribution. The average earnings under normal conditions are about $750 per man, but during 1917, and probably the same will be true for 1918, their earnings were only nominal because practically no ocean vessels came to the Miramichi to load. I would like very much to have the Marine Department administer the work instead of having it done by a local commission.

Maintenance and repairs to wharves, $12,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What wharves are these?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This item is for the general maintenance and repairs wherever necessary to wharves, under the Marine Department.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Can the minister mention a few wharves under the supervision of the Marine Department, to differentiate them from those under the Public Works Department?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: All wharves after they are completed by the Public Works Department come under the jurisdiction of the Marine Department. The expenditure for the past year in the different provinces was as follows: Nova Scotia, $104.47; Prince Edward Island, $97.81; New Brunswick, $5,561.05; Quebec, $1,646.67; Montreal District, $1,210.66; Ontario, $985.01; General account, $414.22; a total of $10,019.89. Each year new wharves are transferred to the control of the Marine Department from the Public Works Department.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What do these repairs consist of? Are they gross or minor repairs?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is an informal arrangement whereby repairs up to $50 are performed by the Marine Department and larger repairs are referred to the Department of Public Works.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are two wharves in my constituency, one at Baddeck and the other at Iona. They are wharves that I always contend are used in connection with the Intercolonial railway. The only connection between the Intercolonial railway and the county of Victoria is from Iona to Baddeck. The Government built the Iona wharf for the railway, because the rails ran down on the wharf. The cars are shunted down to the end of the wharf and from the cars the freight is put into the boat. The Government accept freight in all parts of the continent of America for that point, and have to deliver that freight at Baddeck. They could never do without a wharf, and have built a very fine one at Baddeck.

There is no charge on the wharf at Iona where they receive the freight from the boat and from the railway while there is a charge on landing at Baddeck. These wharves are practically a part of the railway system and without the wharf at which they could land these goods at Baddeck the railway could not receive the goods. I had that wharf built—at least that wharf was built when the Laurier government was in power and I had something to say about the patronage. There is a very excellent wharf built at Baddeck. The farmers and people generally,—particularly the farmers—complain about this little tinkering charge of 25 cents, 50 cents or $1 on their freight. It does not amount to very much but it does not leave the wharf free as it used to. The wharf at Iona is free and the same rule should apply to the one at Baddeck. I have brought this up before, but I believe the same charges are still collected at Baddeck.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend is quite correct. The wharf at Iona comes under the Minister of Public Works and no wharfage dues are collected. The wharf at Baddeck comes under Marine and Fisheries Department and we charge wharfages. I realize that it is rather inconsistent for one department to make a charge and another department not to do so. I will be very glad to look into it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to bring to the notice of the Minister of Railways that his wharf at Iona is in a very bad condition. The outer block was destroyed by the force of the sea some years ago and it has not been fixed. For that reason cars cannot be run out to the end as they used to be. I was surprised last year to find that it had not been repaired.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am glad the hon. member has brought that to my attention. When I come before the Committee with my Estimates I will have some information in connection with it. I will nake a note of it.

Amounts required to pay pensions to the following retired pilots:—Ls. R. Demers, Jos. Lapointe, Paul Gobeil, Barthelemi Lachance, Alphonse Asselin, Chas. Normand, Nap Rioux, Elzear Desrosiers, Hubert Raymond, Arbel Bernier, Laurent Godbout, Adelme Pouliot, Edmond Larochelle, L. E. Morin, A. T. Simard, Joseph Plante, Victor Vezina, J. G. Dupil, Raymond Baquet, Alfred Larochelle, Theophile Corriveau, Alphonse Pouliot, Emilio Couillard, Treffle Delisle, David Dumas, Alfred Goudreau, Onesime Noel, F. X. Desmeules, Adjutor Baillargeon, Joseph Pouliot, Arthur Baillargeon, John A. Irvine, Camille Bernier, $9,900.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain that item?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: A few years ago there were found to be too many pilots in the Quebec district and in order to reduce the number from 116 to 75 an arrangement was made by one of my predecessors, Hon. L. P. Brodeur, as a result of which an Order in Council was passed in 1906 providing that those pilots who were retired should receive a pension of 300 a year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the number been reduced this year? How many are there now?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Sixty-one.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many last year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: About the same number, I think, but I am not sure. There has been a certain amount of criticism from other parts of the payment of this pension, but the Order in Council is there and the pension has been paid since 1906.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It seems unfair that the pilots of Quebec should be pensioned whilst the pilots on the rest of the coast are not provided for. Is the Order in Council going to be continued? Do not these pilots earn a lot of money and is there not a fund by which they provide for retired pilots out of their own earnings?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, the Quebec pilots have a pension fund; in fact, all the pilots have with the exception of those of Miramichi, of which the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) spoke so eloquently. But they have, in their wisdom, not provided any funds for pensions; the Quebec pilots have. In addition to that, this pension has been voted by Parliament each year since 1906, and I do not see how we can avoid paying it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister does not see any way by which we can escape paying this money every year. Has he any plan by which we can get rid of it?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I took this matter up with the Quebec pilots within the last two or three weeks, because the Royal Commission that was appointed over a year ago to look into the pilotage system at the leading seaports drew my attention especially to the fact that the Quebec pilots were paid this pension, whereas the pilots in other ports were not. I am trying to make arrangements for another year, if at all possible, whereby we will either give pensions to the pilots in all the other principal ports or else the Government may refuse to ask Parliament to vote this amount for the Quebec pilots. It is a matter that I have under consideration at the present time, especially in view of the report made by the Royal Commission.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am not advocating pensions for the pilots in all the other ports, because I think it would involve a considerable expenditure, and I am not sure that it would be justified. But I think the department is making a mistake in treating the St. Lawrence pilots differently from pilots in other parts of the country. I think this was due to the system of patronage that existed, and may still exist, whereby too many pilots were appointed in the St. Lawrence, with the result that they were crowding one another, and the country had to take the load and bear it. I regard that as a blunder. I would like to see some arrangement by which this could be struck off altogether instead of spreading it all over the country. That would seem to me to be the better plan. We cannot afford to be throwing away money, as money is now very scarce. Economy is absolutely necessary at the present time. Spending money unnecessarily is the sin of extravagance, which is like the sin against the Holy Ghost; it should not, and it will not, be forgiven by the people.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I would not like the hon. member to think that I favour granting pensions to the different pilotage systems throughout Canada, because I do not. I did endeavour to cancel the pension that has been given to these Quebec pilots since 1906, but I have to pay due regard to what has come to be termed "a scrap of paper." The Order in Council is there, and it contains no limitations at all. It says that these pilots are to be paid $300 per year if their number is reduced to seventy-five and they reach the age of sixty-five.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Who appoints the new pilots?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Department of Marine. I am doing my best to get this matter remedied, but I must frankly admit that I do not see very much chance of doing so. The Order in Council is so clear and explicit in its terms that there seems nothing for it but to give this pension.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am sorry to have to take exception to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair). If this Order in Council was passed by the late Administration, it must have been for certain good reasons and after due consideration. As the minister has well said he is face to face with a certain condition which was created by a previous minister who was aware of the special circumstances in the province of Quebec, and who, after weighing the circumstances, decided to establish this fund and make these payments. I do not see how the Government can very well get out of the payment now. If the pilots of other parts of the country have not been able to secure a pension I am very sorry for them, but they should have looked out for themselves and asked to be included in this Order in Council at the time it was passed. It is not too late to do that now when Orders in Council seem to be so popular with the present Government. It would be easy enough to pass an Order in Council providing pensions for the pilots of other provinces, and I would not object to it. It is only reasonable that these men, after their long service for the department, should get some consideration. I do not think the amount should be reduced, and personally I would be in favour of the same consideration being extended to other pilots.

Compassionate allowance to Mrs. Robert McMenemy, widow of the late light-keeper at Otter Head, Lake Superior, $500, and compassionate allowance to Mrs. Wm. Sherlock, widow of the late lightkeeper at Michipicoten Island, east end, Lake Superior, $1,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What has the minister got to say about this?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is a compassionate allowance for the widows of these men who lost their lives in getting from their stations to the shore.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I suppose the same allowance is open to persons similarly situated in other parts of Canada?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Meteorological Service, including magnetic observatories, grants of $500 each to Kingston and Montreal Observatories, also allowance of $400 to L. F. Gorman, observer at Ottawa—$210,880.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the increase for here?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Salaries.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Result of the high cost of living?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I suppose so.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are the salaries of all the officers increased, or only some of them?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is quite a long list of them. The increases are from $150 to $200; and the director of the service, Sir Frederick Stupart, gets $1,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain why the different items are mentioned in the vote?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is a grant of $500 to the observatory at McGill university, and another of the same amount to that at Queen's university, Kingston. An allowance of $400 is made to L. F. Gorman, the observer at Ottawa.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is the minister getting results from the Meteorological Service?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, most excellent results. Reports of the weather conditions are sent all over Canada.

Mr. CHISHOLM: And storm signals?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Marine Hospitals, including grants to institutions assisting sailors—$75,000; shipwrecked and distressed seamen, $3,000.

Mr. DUFF: I draw the attention of the minister to the fact that while we are increasing the salaries of other people something should be done for the keepers of marine hospitals, and the medical men who attend them. I wrote a letter last year in regard to the staff of the Lunenburg Marine Hospital, and I was told by the department that they could not increase the salaries. The high cost of living applies to these officers as it does to everybody else. The allowance they receive is small. It seems to me that these officials have to perform a great deal of work, not only in Lunenburg but wherever there is a marine hospital. The physicians have a great many patients to attend to, and their salaries should be increased proportionately with those of other officials. That applies also to the keepers of the hospitals, whose salaries have not been raised for a good many years. I would ask the minister to take the matter into his serious consideration and see if some increase cannot be granted.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will take the matter into consideration.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: A large amount of money is collected from shipping at the different ports, and I understand it is applied for the purpose of maintaining these marine hospitals. I would like to know what the revenue was last year, and how the fund stands at the present time?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We have a credit to the fund of $291,572.51. During the past year extraordinary demands have been made upon the Marine Hospitals owing to the influenza epidemic, and the expenditure has been greater than usual.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In view of the fact that there is such a large amount to the credit of the fund, something more should be done to make provision for distressed seamen. For a number of years I have been bringing to the attention of the Government the case of the town of Canso and vicinity, where there is a good deal of shipping but where no proper provision is made for the care of seamen. The banks lie off Cape Canso, and this port is the main refuge for fishing vessels. Large numbers of ships go in there for shelter, for bait, to land supplies, and so on. Many sailors frequent that port. Dr. McGarry has been appointed a physician there to give some attention to the sailors, but I am told by him that the department refuses to pay for the drugs. They give him a pittance for looking after the port, which is quite inadequate, and then they compel him to pay for the medicine he gives to the sailors. He has taken the matter up with the department, but no attention has been paid to his letters. The price of drugs has increased enormously during the last few years, and it is not fair that the doctors should have to pay for them under these circumstances. The number of cases that the doctor at this port has had to attend to has also increased, but apparently no interest is taken by the department in the necessity for providing medicines for these sick sailors. The ship-owners are paying the money; the minister is accumulating the fund—I do not know what he is doing with it. But no improvement has been made, at that port at all events, in the method of taking care of sick seamen.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I shall be very glad to give as favourable consideration as possible to the case of Canso, and also to the matter of the expenditure for medicine. During the war we probably have not been as generous as we should have been under peace conditions, but in view of the fact that we have this surplus in the fund, I shall be glad to take the matter up.

Mr. DUFF: The medical officer at Lunenburg drew my attention to the same matter. He has had to pay for his own medicine, and as the cost of drugs and medicine has increased about three hundred per cent during the last three or four years, it takes practically his whole salary to pay for medicines.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Who is the medical officer at Cheticamp and Grand Etang?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We have no officer there.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What has it cost the department to pay the bill for these two ports?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We would have to look up the Auditor General's Report to get that information.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Has any attempt been made to get the doctor there to accept an appointment as port physician? I am particularly anxious to get that information. I wish to corroborate what the member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) and my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) have said with respect to drugs. The position taken by the department in this matter is ridiculous. My hon. friend says that the cost of drugs has gone up three hundred per cent. Yes, it has— and a thousand per cent in many cases. If there is much sickness, more than the amount allowed to the doctors for their services in these ports would be taken up in paying for medicines. Representations have been made to the department during the last two years with regard to this very matter, but none of the doctors seem to receive any consideration. The doctors simply cannot afford to give the men the best kinds of medicine, which to-day are exceedingly expensive, unless they are compensated therefor.

Steamboat inspection, $87,827.77.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Reference has been made to the service carried on by the steamer Champlain in my county. I understand that this steamer was taken off the service last fall and the year previous because she was not in a seaworthy condition and some repairs had to be made to her engine and boilers. I am told on good authority that this steamer, which was acquired by the Government fifteen or sixteen years ago and has voyaged in rough seas and rough weather most of the time, cannot be trusted at all seasons and in all weathers. For service on the route that I and the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) have suggested to-night, it would be well for the department to see that the boat is properly inspected and put in seaworthy condition in the spring, or even in the fall, so that she may remain on the service during the whole of the season when the people are most in need of her services. About the month of October the people on the north shore are absolutely cut off from all communication. If this boat was put in order during the early summer or early in September, she would be available at all times during the winter season.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Can the fishermen along the coast participate in the Sick Mariners' Fund?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: They can if they are engaged on a vessel that pays sick mariners' dues; otherwise they cannot.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That is one thing that I have been trying to put before the department during the last few years. It is very unfair not to permit the fishermen along the coast to get the advantage of this Sick Mariners' Fund. There is no reason why a change should not be made in the law with a view to enabling the department to permit these fishermen to participate in the fund. Let them collect so much from the fishermen, who are ready to pay a reasonable amount in order that they may get the benefit of the fund. There could be no better way of using the surplus at present to the credit of the fund than to improve the treatment of these sick fishermen. Although I am not a very apt politician, I remember that a policy of that kind was promised to the fishermen of that part of Nova Scotia a good many years ago. The fishermen were promised free medical treatment if they would support a certain party. If they offered that policy as an inducement, they must have regarded it as acceptable to the fishermen. I know that it would be acceptable to them; it would be a splendid thing for them. In my own port of Margaree, where there are perhaps one hundred and fifty fishermen, it would be a splendid thing if these men could have the advantage of the Sick Mariners' Fund; I am sure that they would be glad to contribute to the fund in order to obtain the benefit of it. I suggest very strongly that the minister, who is disposed to look kindly on these suggestions, give this matter every consideration.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I would be glad if it was possible, but the Sick Mariners' Fund is raised, as no doubt the hon. member is aware, by dues paid by steamship owners, and the fund is for sick mariners only from ships that pay those dues. The fishermen are outside of that, and it would not be permissible, under the authority that we have for sick mariners' dues, to pay any of the fund out to fishermen.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I quite understand that, but is it not practicable to get authority to do this? I think this is a splendid idea.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The idea is good. I do not know whether I can get the steamship owners to agree to it, but I will endeavour to do so.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend referred to an old pledge given in 1911 that if the Conservative party were returned to power, the fishermen would have free medical attendance. Is the department going to carry out that pledge?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is a bit of past political history. All I know about it is what my deputy has just whispered in my ear now. Of course, I am not responsible for promises of well known gentlemen during election time.

CONFERRING OF TITLES ON CANADIANS.

CORRECTION OF CLERICAL ERROR IN REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

On motions being called:

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, my attention has been directed to a clerical error in the report I presented to this House in reference to the question of titles some few days ago as a result of which one of the clauses of the report may have an ambiguous meaning. I am therefore going to move, so that the intention of the Committee may be expressed:

That clause (b) of the report be amended by inserting the words "and of a" after the word "distinction" at the end of the second line of clause (b) and inserting the word "or" after the word "distinction" in the fifth and sixth lines of the said clause (b).

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: How will the amended clause read?

Mr. NICKLE: If the amendment is carried, the clause will read as follows:

(b) "To provide that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to ensure the extinction of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, and of a dignity or title as a peer of the realm, on the death of a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada at present in enjoyment of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, or dignity or title as a peer of the realm, and that thereafter no such title of honour, titular distinction, or dignity or title as a peer of the realm, shall be accepted, enjoyed or used by any person or be recognized."

The object of the amendment is to make the clause read as the Committee desired and to remove the ambiguity from it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it not unusual to pass a motion of this kind without having a day's notice?

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe it is customary to pass such a motion where it merely corrects what is obviously a clerical error. I understand that is all this motion purports to do.

Motion agreed to.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to ask the hon. Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) if he has any news as to the conditions at Winnipeg.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (for the Minister of Labour): There is no material change in the situation at Winnipeg.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I might say further to my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) that our advices are to the effect that the municipal, provincial, and Dominion authorities are all co-operating and that measures have been taken to ensure the maintenance of law and order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What to do—to surrender?

FAMINE IN INDIA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): As relating to a matter of very considerable interest at the present time, I would like to ask if the Government has any information to give to the House and the country on the prevailing famine in India.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, a committee of public spirited citizens in Toronto some time ago organized for the purpose of collecting relief for the sufferers from the famine in India and at their request the Government communicated, through the Imperial authorities, with the Government of India tendering this relief and inquiring whether relief in grain or cash would be the more acceptable. Two communications have been received in reference to the matter. One is that the Government of India gratefully accept the offer of the Committee and express a wish for cash rather than grain. Another statement has followed. After stating that the attention of the Government of India has been drawn to certain statements which appeared in the Canadian press to the effect that millions of British subjects are starving, they point out that the statement is not correct and they send the following statement which they ask to have made public:

"Food position in India though undoubtedly grave has no resemblance to descriptions in Toronto circular which is exaggerated and in many parts untrue. Owing to failure of autumn rains, to serious epidemic of influenza which attacked two-thirds of the population, and accounted for six million deaths, and to absence of large number of young men on military service, area sown with winter crops very short. This, in conjunction with general rise in wages and in standard of living, with inflated currency and reflex action of world prices, has caused foodstuffs to rise to unprecedented prices causing hardship to many sections of the population. But resisting power of people is greater than ever before and although prices are double those of famine year of 1900 number of relief in April was only 337,000 against five and a quarter million in April 1900. Plague is less virulent than usual and no report either from private or official sources of any deaths from starvation have been received. Though there have been food riots in some places they are not as stated in circular of daily occurrence. Thanks to excellent monsoon in 1917 walls in most parts are still holding water, mails are delivered regularly and business is brisk. Stocks of food grains are low but special measures have been taken to conserve supplies and wheat has been imported from Australia. Given normal monsoon there should be enough food until autumn crops are in sight. At the same time low stocks and excessive prices have created situation which is causing great anxiety to Government of India and serious hardship is undoubtedly being experienced by many sections of population." End.

The Secretary of State for India adds that season such as now being experienced in India inevitably occasions suffering and privation to poorer and more helpless classes and gives ample scope for private charity in addition to State relief.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who is the author of this essay?

Mr. ROWELL: That is a cable from Lord Milner sent at the request of the Secretary of State for India to be made public here in Canada.

CONFERRING OF TITLES ON CANADIANS.

DATE FIXED FOR DISCUSSION OF COMMITTEE REPORT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to name Thursday as the day for discussion by the House of the report of the Committee upon Titles, Honours and Decorations. I have conferred with the Chairman of the Committee, and the date is entirely agreeable to him.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the discussion take up the whole day?

Mr. McKENZIE: In what form will this discussion come up?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There will be a motion by the Chairman of the Committee for the adpotion of the report, and the discussion will be upon that motion.

THE BIOLOGICAL BOARD ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill No. 106 to amend the Biological Board Act—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne—read third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT CONSOLIDATION.

On motion that the House go into Committee on Bill No. 19 to consolidate and amend the Railway Act:

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister explain the necessity of an amending Bill?

Hon. J. D. REID: The Bill that we are going into Committee on is the consolidation of the Railway Act. We did pass a Bill to amend the old Railway Act which now stands for third reading. If this Bill goes through its third reading, I intend to withdraw the other Bill.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (Algoma East): Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a letter I have received from Winnipeg under date of April 11, 1919, referring to a matter that came before the Special Committee that dealt with this particular Bill. The letter is as follows:

> Enclosed please find a clipping from to-day's Manitoba Free Press, which states that Locomotive engineers in some instances deliberately kill cattle on the railroad tracks. I, for one, repudiate such a statement, and these people should be brought to time and made to prove their case. Such a statement should not be allowed to go unchallenged, and I trust that as you are an ex-railway employee in engine service, and know the danger of such an undertaking, you will see your way clear to have this matter remedied. I think our standing as a body of men is above such reproach and should not be dragged down in this manner.

Not being a member of the Railway Committee, I do not know who made the statement complained of, but I cannot conceive of any hon. member making such a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have very grave doubts as to whether the hon. gentleman is in order in raising a discussion upon the mere motion, that I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee on a Bill. The hon. gentleman would be in order in bringing this matter up in Committee.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered that this Bill has been before the House of Commons and the Senate during the last two or three sessions. A special committee of this House took evidence from a great many persons interested in the different sections. This Bill contains altogether 461 sections, and with the exception of 35 sections no changes have been made in the original Bill as passed by this House and the Senate. I thought we might take up these sections in which no change has been made either by the House or the Senate, and after passing those come back to the 35 sections which have been amended, some in the Senate and some in the House. If that suggestion meets with the approval of the Committee perhaps we can make faster progress than by taking up the Bill clause by clause. Of course, if we come to any clause on which any hon. member wishes to take issue we could take it up and dispose of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the hon. minister give us the clauses which were amended?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have a list of the clauses in which no changes have been made, and also a list of those in which changes have been made.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister give us the list of clauses in which changes were made?

Mr. J. D. REID: The following are all the sections in which changes were made by the special committee. Sections 2, 5, 6, 10, 26, 39, 40, 80, 151, 179, 240, 250, 255, 262, 282, 285, 323, 325, 345, 347, 358, 364, 371, 373, 380, 381, 382, 383, 402, 409, 429, 436, 438, 439, 444.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Is there no change in 374?

Mr. J. D. REID: No.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It has been changed since the original Act was passed.

Mr. J. D. REID: Oh, yes. There are two clauses that the member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) wishes to discuss. Then, of course, there is the power clause, with reference to the dispute in Toronto. Nearly all the others are clauses to which, I think, no objection will be taken.

Mr. McKENZIE: Which are the two clauses that the member for East Lambton wishes to deal with?

Mr. J. D. REID: 3 and 258. They are with reference to placing Canadian steamships under the Board of Railway Commissioners

Mr. McKENZIE: Are they still in the Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: The special committee passed them without any change. Clauses that any member wishes to take objection to, we could allow to stand and discuss with the 35 clauses to which amendments have been made.

Mr. CAHILL: I suggest that the minister put on Hansard the amendments that were proposed, but defeated; also the clauses to which amendments were proposed, such as the power clause, and sections 34 and 258, that the member for East Lambton refers to. These are contentious clauses, although they have not been amended. We do not want to have it understood that only these 35 clauses which have been amended are contentious. Let us put in one class all the clauses that were amended and all that are contentious or in respect of which proposed amendments were defeated; then we can go ahead with the rest.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not before me the amendments that were proposed in the special committee, but I have had printed all the amendments made in the special committee. I have three copies here; the others will be here in fifteen or twenty minutes, and a copy will be supplied to each member. If, in considering the non-contentious clauses, we come to a clause which any member wishes to discuss, we can let it stand and deal with it when we come to consider the sections to which amendments have been made or which any members wish to discuss. I think that the whole discussion will come down to four or five important matters. There is the Toronto matter, the telephone question, the matter of railway crossings—there are not more than four or five altogether. So that if the Committee will pass the clauses to which there are no objection we shall save time.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is quite proper that we should take up first and get through with these non-contentious clauses. What has become of this contention between the Niagara Power Company and the city of Toronto? I could never understand why it was imported into the general Railway Act. However, it is in the Railway Bill, and I should like to know how the matter stands.

Mr. J. D. REID: When this Bill was before the House three years ago the House adopted a clause with reference to that matter. When the Bill went to the Senate the Senate amended that clause, and they amended it again last year. Last year's clause was put in by the Senate this year. It is section 374, which reads in part:—

> Any specific powers inconsistent with the provisions of this section and conferred on any company by any special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada or of any province shall not be affected by the provisions of this section, but if any municipality complains to the Board that any company whether incorporated by special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada is exercising its powers oppressively or in bad faith the Board may hear such complaint and if it sees fit supervise the exercise of such powers: Provided always that whenever any company incorporated by Special Act of the Parliament of Canada acquires the assets of a company operating within a municipality, which said municipality has the right by agreement to purchase any of the assets of such company, then and in every such case the municipality may enforce its rights under such agreement as fully as if such purchase had not been made and may enforce against such purchaser the provisions of such agreement as if it were the original party entering into such agreement with the municipality.

That is the way it came from the Senate, and the special committee passed it as it came from the Senate. Although this clause is in the list of those to which there are no amendments, still, when we come to it, it is for the Committee to say whether they will accept the Senate amendment as passed by the special committee, or whether they will further amend the clause.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know I have no right to go to the middle of the Bill to ask about this clause, but I want the Committee to have some general idea as to how the matter stands between the two contending forces. Can the minister tell me whether they have reached any conclusion?

Mr. J. D. REID: The matter stands exactly as before. The Toronto city authorities were not satisfied with the clause as it now stands in the Bill, and I do not know that the others were very well satisfied either. This is a kind of settlement that the Senate thought might probably be fair to both parties, but it is now for the Committee to say whether they will concur with the Senate or amend the clause further.

Mr. McKENZIE: We certainly have nothing to do with settling the dispute. We are creating legislation under which the parties can negotiate. That is about as far as we can go.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is the situation exactly.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—definitions:

Mr. J. D. REID: We were to take up first the non-contentious clauses.

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but we shall have to take the clauses in order and postpone the consideration of those that we do not desire to discuss at present.

Mr. J. D. REID: Very well. Let clause 2 stand.

Section stands.

On section 155—scheme may be filed in Exchequer Court:

Mr. McKENZIE: This section deals with insolvent companies. In the last two sessions when this Act was before us the Bankruptcy Act was not in contemplation. What bearing will the Bankruptcy Act have upon this section?

4 p.m.

Mr. J. D. REID: We will let the section stand.

Section stands.

On section 2—definitions:

Mr. J. D. REID: We now return to the clauses that were allowed to stand. Some of them are not contentious. In paragraph (b), subsection 4 of section 2, strike out the word "minister" and substitute therefor the word "Board." Under the Railway Act, returns were heretofore sent to the minister; now they are to be sent to the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. McMASTER: Why are they not sent direct to the Dominion Statistician?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are sent to the Dominion Statistician as well.

Mr. BUREAU: Do these returns appear in the annual report of the Minister of Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, these are the regular railway statistics. Sections 380 and 381 are amended so that the statistics are sent to the Dominion Statistician and to the Board of Railway Commissioners. The former will publish them; the latter will have them for their own information.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: With reference to subsection 14, I may say that in Alberta a justice of the peace has jurisdiction over the whole province, but this subsection as drafted limits the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace to the "district, county, riding, division." I should like, therefore, to have the word "province" inserted before the word "district" in the second line of subsection 14.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not say "justice" means a justice of the peace, and stop there? The jurisdiction is defined by the local legislature.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What I want to avoid is that there shall be no dispute as to the jurisdiction of our justices of the peace if they take cognizance of the matters mentioned in section 2.

Mr. BOYS: That would not be satisfactory to Ontario, because our justices of the peace are appointed for the county, not for the province.

Mr. BUREAU: The jurisdiction of a justice of the peace is defined by the statute. It must be so defined in Ontario.

Mr. BOYS: Only for the county.

Mr. BUREAU: Then when you come before a justice of the peace who has not jurisdiction under Dominion statute, you can simply raise the question of his jurisdiction. But I think the word "justice" should be defined as follows: "Justice" means "Justice of the Peace." That is sufficient.

Mr. J. D. REID: The clause as it stands in the Bill is the same as it has been in the previous Acts for a number of years. This is an exact copy.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: That is no reason why we should not amend it now.

Mr. MOWAT: If the word "province" is inserted before the word "district," that would cover the whole case.

Amendment (Mr. H. A. Mackie) agreed to.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I omitted to refer to subsection 13. This should be amended so that when a judge is authorized to do any act or make any order, he shall be deemed to act not as persona non designata, but he shall have all the power of the court, acting for the court, especially in directing other persons to be notified, or in making amendments, or in regard to expropriations where it appears that there are separate and distinct interests, and where one sum is offered for compensation for the whole land, and the company should make separate offers to each, so that if one person accepts, he may get out of the proceedings and not be compelled to have his interest diminished by reason of the cost of arbitration, which cost he cannot, under the circumstances, avoid. If the Committee will permit me to refer to clause 215, it will be seen that under that clause application may be made to the court or to a judge for directions. For instance, paragraph (c) reads:

A notification that within ten days after the service of this notice, or, where the notice is served by publication, within one month after the first publication thereof, the party to whom the notice is addressed does not give notice to the company that he accepts the sum offered by the company, either he or the company will be entitled to apply to have the compensation fixed by arbitration as provided in the Railway Act, 1919.

In the definitions, an owner is the person who is capable of granting title, but it is quite possible for a person to have an interest in land under agreement of sale, which, in the western provinces, is similar to a promise for sale in Quebec, and not to be able to give title. At the same time, he has an interest in the land, and it might be possible for him to accept the amount offered to him separately, if a separate amount were mentioned for him. Under present circumstances, he is not able to do that, and if any other person who is interested in the land desires to create a great deal of costs or trouble, the person who would be willing to withdraw by accepting a certain sum of money is compelled to stand the cost of an arbitration and possibly the cost of an appeal. In the case of a judge as defined, should there be an appeal, this circumstance arises: If one of the parties is dissatisfied and gives notice of appeal, the first thing that is discussed is that the judge is persona non designata, and there is no appeal from his order or direction or judgment, and if the party wishes to take any appeal at all, he will have to wait until there is an arbitration, but if there is no arbitration and one party desires to take any advantage of an appeal, then he is prevented from taking an appeal by reason of the fact that the judge is designated as a person to arbitrate and not as a judge of the court. What I am asking for in subsection 13 is that the judge shall be designated as a judge of the court, and that his decisions, orders and directions shall have the force of a judgment and not simply the force of a direction coming from a person who stands in the position of a person designated.

Mr. NESBITT: That might be better put as an amendment to another clause.

Mr. J. D. REID: In clause 232, there is an appeal from the award. Would not that cover the point?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: If clause 232 contains the amendment I desire to suggest to the Committee, some difficulty might arise about turning back to the definition of the word "judge", because the definition of the word "judge" would rule in clause 232. I am afraid the amendment must be made in clause 2, subclause 13, so as to give the judge the power of the court, and it would have to be repeated in clause 232.

Mr. MOWAT: I would ask my hón. friend (Mr. H. A. Mackie) whether he is quite sure that the laws of his province do not follow those of the older provinces which have Acts called "Judges Orders Enforcement Acts," which put any duty of a judge outside of court statutes in the same position as if he were acting wholly as a judge. We have that in Ontario, and, I imagine, also in the other older provinces.

Mr. WALLACE: Would the minister kindly postpone the consideration of this Bill until every member has a copy of the amendments sent by the special committee to the House of Commons Committee? Some of the members have not had an opportunity of considering them.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member was present on the committee and knows the amendments that were proposed, and I hardly think it is fair that we should postpone proceeding with the Bill. We know what the amendments are when they are mentioned here.

Mr. NESBITT: I would suggest that it might be well to postpone the consideration of any long amendments, but there is no need to do that in the case of small, simple amendments such as changing a word or two.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In answer to the inquiry of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), the following cases have been decided on the point on which I touched regarding the question whether a judge is persona non designata or has the power of the court:—

Marsan vs. G.T.P. (2 Alta. Law Reports): Saunders vs. E. D. & B. (6 Alta. Law Reports): Gauthier vs. C.N.R. (7 Alta. Law Reports). In every one of those cases the question was discussed whether an order given by a judge sitting as an arbitrator had the force and effect of a judgment of a court. If it has not, you may not appeal from it; if it has, you may appeal. A very peculiar situation has arisen, in this way: Where notice has been given of an interim direction by a judge, and notice of appeal has been taken from that direction, subsequently, if an arbitration was held, you could not appeal from the arbitration because, it would be contended, you had appealed from the direction. Then the question would be; should we have appealed from the direction? This question has arisen, and I should like to have the point cleared up.

Mr. McKENZIE: The doctrine which the hon. member expounds is well known to the law. I did not have the opportunity of attending the Committee when this Bill was being considered. The question is, was it the intention of the Committee that the judge should sit as a judge and discharge the ordinary functions of a judge, from whose direction there would be an appeal? If it was the intention of the Committee that the judge's decision should be final, there is no necessity for providing for an appeal. If that was not the intention, we should make it clear what was intended.

Mr. BOYS: I think there is no question that it was the intention of the Committee that there should be an appeal, because the Committee dealt with section 232 in which an appeal is provided for. I do not think the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton applies in so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, unless it be on a question of practice. If his idea is that we should expand the meaning of the word judge so that any action on the part of a judge acting under this Act should be subject to the ordinary appeals and consolidated rules of the province of Ontario, that would necessitate a complete revision of the rules and would revolutionize our practice. Section 232 lays down that an appeal shall lie, and the proceedings that are to be taken. It was the intention of the Committee that that appeal should be open either to the railway company or to the person whose land was being expropriated.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the sections make it clear what the intention of the Committee was, I think we should be satisfied.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think there can be any doubt as to the intention of the Committee, because section 232 in plain English provides for an appeal. All that paragraph (13) of section 2 does is to say that a "judge" means a judge of a superior or county court, and I think that definition is necessary, otherwise it might be held that "judge" meant only a judge of a superior court. When we say that it means a judge of a superior or county court we realize that the appeal provided for under section 232 would lie from either.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Section 232 says: "Within one month after receiving from the arbitrator . . . . a written notice of the making of the award." It is quite clear that the appeal is from the award. My hon. friend from South Simcoe has stated my position correctly. I desire to revolutionize this section so that an arbitration judge shall be constituted a judge of a court from whose judgments there shall be an appeal, just as in the case of a judge of a court.

Mr. MORPHY: I rather agree with my hon. friend from South Simcoe. I would point out to my hon. friend (Mr. H. A. Mackie) that section 232 provides for dealing directly with questions of fact upon the evidence taken before an arbitrator. Further, paragraph (7) of section 2 defines a "court" as follows:

> "Court" means a superior court of the province or district, and when used with respect to any proceedings for the ascertainment or payment, either to the person entitled, or into court, of compensation. . . . . includes the county court of the county where the lands lie; and "county court" and "superior court" are to be interpreted according to the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto.

So we have all the machinery possible under section 232 to cover anything a judge may do as arbitrator.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I quite realize that there is an appeal from every act of a judge of a court as designated here, but if he is sitting as an arbitrator in an arbitration he has not the power of a judge of a court, but of an arbitrator; he is in the position of a person designated. If there is no arbitration there is no appeal of an intermediate character up to the point of arbitration, because one cannot appeal unless there is an award. Section 232 is the only one under which an appeal is provided for. Suppose under section 215 you go to a judge designated as arbitrator and ask him to direct that John Smith or Peter Jones be summoned before a certain board for the settlement of differences and some one desires to take an appeal from that. There can only be an appeal from the award. The judge should be a judge of the court and not an arbitrator purely and simply, and all he does should have the force and effect of a judgment from which we may appeal, whether there is an award or not.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member state his amendment?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: It would take me some time to formulate it. I did not expect that the Bill would be taken up this afternoon, nor that it would be dealt with in this way.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where is the authority in this Act to go before a judge to have an order to compel somebody else to appear before a board?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Section 215 says:

(c) A notification that if within ten days after the service of this notice, or, where the notice is served by publication, within one month after the first publication thereof, the party to whom the notice is addressed does not give notice to the company that he accepts the sum offered by the company, either he or the company will be entitled to apply to have the compensation fixed by arbitration as provided in the Railway Act, 1919.

A notice to this effect must be served upon the opposite party preliminary to proceeding to arbitration to fix compensation or damages. If an application is made under this section, it is not to a judge of the court, but to a judge appointed as arbitrator.

Mr. BUREAU: If the party to whom you serve notice is in default and does not accept within ten days you just set your case for trial. That is the law of Quebec. If the other party does not appear it is an ex parte arbitration. You do not need to have an order from the court to set your case. You set it de jure. After you set your case a man is debarred from pleading further unless he receives permission.

5 p.m.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: My point is that it is before a man acting as an arbitrator and not as a judge.

[Mr. H. A Mackie.]

Mr BUREAU: He has all the powers of an arbitrator, and you proceed the same as if you had three arbitrators under the old system. If a man is in default you do the same as in an ordinary process—we call it "inscription" in our province—for trial, and the other party may appear to cross-examine witnesses. In our province that would be allowed even though he had not disputed or filed an appearance. He may appear in person at the time of the trial, and has a right to cross-examine witnesses if he desires, but he is barred from filing pleadings. When a man declines to accept your amount and says he wants so much for his land, that is a complete answer to your notice—I am not sure what it is designated in Ontario, whether it is "bill of particulars." If he does not answer he is in default and you inscribe the case before the court and proceed.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Suppose a railway company offers a lump sum for a piece of land in which four or five parties are interested. One man may ask a certain sum for his interest, and it may not be accepted, with the result that there is an arbitration. The company or some individual interested in the land appeals, and A or B, who is willing to accept a certain sum and avoid further proceedings, has no remedy. He has no judgment in his favour. Any direction that the court gives is a direction from an arbitrator and not a judge and the man must stand the proportion of costs of all proceedings.

Mr. BUREAU: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a question for the final division of the money. When there are several persons interested in the land the money must be paid into court and there must be some machinery to divide the money according to their interest, and the man who took the appeal would have to take the responsibility of costs.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: If I were permitted I could get the reports, which I have not with me, and could convince the Committee that I am absolutely right in my point.

Mr. BUREAU: If a man does not dispute a case they cannot charge costs against him. It is a case of, "Il s'en rapporte à justice." If a man wants to dispute it let him bear the costs that are incurred against him.

Mr. BOYS: Section 217 refers only to an absent party, or substitutional service. We do not want an appeal from a judge in regard to substitutional service. That would only make the costs of arbitration so much more expensive to the parties interested. When a sum is offered by a company and is refused you proceed to arbitration under section 232, and have the right of appeal and unless we want to give further appeals the section is all right as it is. If what my hon. friend is suggesting should become law it would simply mean that when a county judge makes an award you can appeal from him to the Superior Court in the province and then to the Supreme Court, and from there to the Privy Council. We want to avoid that sort of thing and there is a remedy provided now.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—to what persons, companies and railways applicable:

Mr. J. D. REID: I move that the section be amended so as to read:

This Act shall, subject as herein provided, apply to all persons, railway companies and railways within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, whether heretofore or hereafter and howsoever incorporated or authorized, except Government railways, to which, however, it shall apply to such extent as is specified in any Act referring or relating thereto.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not mention the Canadian National Railway Act? That is the only Act that is going to regulate the railways. There is only one Act now, as I understand it, that will apply to the Canadian National Railways, the Act passed the other day. The Canadian National Railways include the Intercolonial Railway. I understand the intention is to simplify the system and have as far as possible one uniform law applicable to all. There are only two systems the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is the Canadian Railways Provident Fund, and we might have some other railways.

Mr. BUREAU: The provident fund would not have anything to do with the administration of the railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have some railways that have not been transferred to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, others that have not been transferred come under this Act.

Mr. J. D. REID: There are railways owned by the Government, but not transferred to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. BUREAU: Owned by the Government but not transferred?

Mr. J. D. REID: They may not yet have been transferred.

Mr. BUREAU: Are there any railways that have not been transferred yet? I cannot understand how the Government can own anything and have the property of it in strangers.

Mr. BOYS: If in a year or two hence a further Act was passed this provision would be necessary. You want it to apply not only to the present but to the future, five or ten years hence. As it is worded now it would apply, but restricted in the manner suggested by the hon. member it would not.

Mr. MOWAT: I think it would be better to leave it as it is. We have to consider every Act as standing on its own legs, and this could not refer to an Act that has not been assented to by the Governor General or become law.

Mr. BUREAU: This Bill has not been assented to yet but we take it for granted that it will be law as soon as it passes the House. The Government either owns or does not own railways. If it owns railways there is only to be one law regarding their operation. The moment a railway is the property of the Government it comes under the control of the Canadian National Railways; until then it is regulated by the general Act.

Mr. MOWAT: My friend is asking that this well expressed language "except Government railways" be altered to apply only to the Canadian Government Railway Act.

Mr. BUREAU: What I suggest is "except as provided by the Canadian National Railways Act."

Mr. MOWAT: I think we should leave this language "except Government railways." Every one understands what it means. What is the use of imparting doubt or surmise into an Act which every one wants to be clear.

Mr. BUREAU: We would like to know what the other Acts are. I hate to travel all over the statutes from Confederation to find out what they are.

Mr. BOYS: Except where inconsistent with the provisions of the National Railway Act.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not what it says.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend did not understand me. If he looks at the provisions of the National Railway Act he will find a clause which makes the Railway Act applicable except where inconsistent with the provisions of the National Railway Act.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, but there is the general Railway Act of Canada, the Canadian National Railway Act and the Intercolonial Railway Act—three of them.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—application to:

Mr. J. D. REID: There is an additional subsection that it is proposed to insert here. When the Bill was before the House three years ago there was a subsection (c) added reading as follows:

(c) every railway or portion thereof, whether constructed under the authority of the Parliament of Canada or not, now or hereafter owned, controlled, leased or operated by a company wholly or partly within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, or by a company operating a railway wholly or partly within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, whether such ownership, control or first-mentioned operation is acquired or exercised by purchase, lease, agreement or other means whatsoever, and whether acquired or exercised under authority of the Parliament of Canada, or of the legislature of any province, or otherwise howsoever; and every railway or portion thereof, now or hereafter so owned, controlled, leased or operated shall be deemed and is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. 8-9 E. VII, c. 32, s. 11. Am.

That subsection was put into the Bill in this House, but when it went to the Senate they struck it out. The special committee inserted it again. The reason it was put in was to cover a case in the province of Quebec where the Quebec Central railway, incorporated under the Provincial Government and, of course, under the jurisdiction of the Provincial Government, was leased for ninety-nine years by the Canadian Pacific. The result is that a portion of that railway, in so far as operation is concerned, is under the jurisdiction of the Provincial Government while it is really part and parcel of the Canadian Pacific Railway system. This clause is for the purpose of bringing this railway, which is practically owned by the Canadian Pacific, under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. The representatives of the employees in Ottawa were very strong for having this inserted for the protection of the employees. There is also the other question of placing the freight rates under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commissioners.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. BUREAU: I do not know that the amendment has been distributed or seen by the members. The object of the amendment is all right, but it may be necessary to consider the wording. The intent of the law, as we understand it in discussing it in Parliament, may not be carried out when we come to analyze the words used. There must be some objection to this subsection if the Senate refused to insert it a couple of years ago. What reasons were adduced for its rejection I do not know.

Mr. MOWAT: The Senate said that Parliament's right constitutionally to declare in this general way that every railway should be deemed a railway for the general advantage of Canada was questionable. It said, further, that the question of the invasion of provincial rights bore also upon it and that it was always open to a company to apply to Parliament to have its undertaking declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. It seems to me that the clause which passed this House in 1917, and which has been read by the minister, expresses in apt words what is desired chiefly by the employees of the railway. Here is a provincial railway operated by the Canadian Pacific; the men get accustomed to the regulations of the Canadian Pacific right along and suddenly they are switched before they know it to a provincial railway, where the regulations may be different as to hand rails, height of bridges and all those things that serve for the protection of the men. They do not desire that there should be this difference between the two railways. They desire that the provincial railway, which to all intents and purposes is the Canadian Pacific, be left under the direction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I do not think there is any reason why we should not re-enact what this House did in 1917. We should put it up to the Senate that they have not considered it from the aspect I have now given, that the operating rules should be uniform to insure the safety of the men.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to be understood as objecting, but an amendment of that length ought to be submitted to the members instead of being merely shoved under our noses.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member was in the House three years ago when we discussed the clause thoroughly, and I did not think there would be any objection from him.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not referring to this clause alone; I understand certain amendments have been adopted by the special committee and will be submitted to this Committee. I claim that we have not had an opportunity, not being members of the special committee, to study those clauses, I do not object to this clause going through, although I do not believe the safety of the men is any better guarded than under the Quebec Railway Act. Whether this clause is based on the Quebec Act, or the latter is based on this, I do not know, but they are alike.

Mr. J. D. REID: The employees on the Canadian Pacific railway have uniform rules in connection with the operation of the whole system.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that. I do not object to it.

Mr. J. D. REID: The representatives of the employees state that the rules are different on this particular line.

Mr. BUREAU: That may be, but they have a remedy under the local law the same as they have under the Federal law.

Mr. NESBITT: In 1917 we also wanted to put them under the Railway Board as far as rates were concerned.

Mr. BUREAU: I am only saying that we ought to have a copy of these amendments before being asked to pass upon them.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The representatives of all the railway brotherhoods urgently requested that this amendment should be included in the Bill. They called attention to the fact that the Quebec Central Railway is not under the control of the Railway Commission, and they were most anxious that the employees who are operating that road should be placed in the same position as other railway employees in Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not answer my request to have a chance to look at these amendments before they go through. I have absolute confidence in the Special Committee, but my name is Thomas—I would like to see.

Mr. J. D. REID: Does the hon. member want to see the amendment?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, I would like to have time to read it quietly.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will hand the amendment to the hon. member.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does this mean that we are putting an exclusively provincial road under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners? Take, for instance, the railroad between Sydney and Louisburg, which was built by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company under their charter from the local legislature. They are operating the line to some extent as a passenger railway, but largely as a traffic road. Do we put that road under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. J. D. REID: The railway the hon. gentleman has referred to would not come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, unless, say, the Canadian Pacific railway purchased it and had it declared as a work for the general advantage of Canada. This clause would not interfere with it so long as the line was not made part and parcel of a through road. The reason for this clause is that judicial doubts were expressed as to whether the Board of Railway Commissioners had jurisdiction in such a case. If we pass this clause it gives the Board of Railway Commissioners jurisdiction after the road has been purchased or leased—

Mr. MORPHY: Or operated.

Mr. J. D. REID: —or comes under the control or operation of a through line system. Then the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners extends to it in so far as that board has jurisdiction over the main line.

Mr. BUREAU: This amendment provides that if a provincial road is leased, purchased or owned—I have no objection to ownership —by a company which is partly or wholly under Federal jurisdiction, that road comes under such jurisdiction. But at the expiration of the lease it remains under Federal jurisdiction, which is what I object to. Why not add: "Shall be under Federal jurisdiction while such lease or agreement continues?" It seems to me that would be better. Take the St. Maurice railway between Shawinigan Falls and Three Rivers. Suppose it were leased by the Canadian Pacific Railway, although incorporated by the local legislature, that road would remain under Federal jurisdiction after the lease expired and the Canadian Pacific surrendered control.

Mr. J. D. REID: It has to be declared a railway for the general advantage of Canada, and is brought under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners when transferred either by purchase or lease.

Mr. BUREAU: By purchase is all right.

Mr. J. D. REID: Where railways are being operated as part of a through system or in conjunction with each other, it is better anyway that they should be under one jurisdiction. While there might be something said for letting the road go back to provincial jurisdiction at the termination of the working agreement or lease, I do not think it is in the interest of the road or of the employees; therefore I would prefer leaving the amendment as it is.

Mr. BUREAU: I remember trying to obtain incorporation of a railway exclusively within a certain province, but the Government said: "No, we do not want to incorporate a road like this." If a road is incorporated by the legislature, I admit that for the purpose of better operation it is all right to place it under Federal control while it is operated as part and parcel of another system which is under Federal control. But when the lease has expired why should you force the owners of that line to remain in that position? Why should they not return to the original jurisdiction under which they were incorporated?

Mr. J. D. REID: As far as this case is concerned, it would not make any difference, for the reason that it is a nine hundred and ninety-nine year lease. But at the same time, is it not almost certain that when a lease is taken of a road it is taken for a long term? You very seldom hear of a lease of a railway for only a few years.

Mr. BUREAU: But you are legislating for all railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: I admit that.

Mr. BUREAU: If this is going to be legislation for the Quebec Central, let us so state. If it is going to be for all railways, we should not force any railway which may be leased for a term to a larger system to remain under Federal jurisdiction after the lease expires or when the reason for its having been taken under Federal jurisdiction ceases to exist.

Mr. NESBITT: Suppose you lived on a short line which could not get along unless it had connection with a through line; and suppose the short line charged you more for carrying freight ten miles than the through line, under the jurisdiction of the Railway Board, charged for a thousand miles—what would you say then?

Mr. BUREAU: I would go before the Railway Board and have the rates cut down. I do not think we are so wise that we ought to legislate for these people who have organized companies and put up their money, and tell them that they are making a mistake; and that if they connect for a certain length of time with another line that has a Federal charter, they must stay there forever. I do not believe in that. After the expiration of their agreement with the larger line, they should be enabled to revert to the conditions which existed before they entered into the agreement.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member is overlooking something that will rather upset his argument when it occurs to his mind. The men who work on the main line railways are anxious that any subsidiary lines that are taken over shall have the same appliances, equipment and safety devices and the same general regulations for the safety of the operatives that exist on the large trunk lines. I am informed that many accidents have been brought about by lack of uniformity as between the smaller line and the larger one in the matter of the equipment of brakes and other connecting devices. If at the end of, say, a ten-year lease a local road ceases to be subject to the regulations of the Railway Board and may put on such local equipment and devices as it thinks fit, we shall be right up against the trouble that this section is intended to obviate, namely, lack of uniformity of devices, contrivances and apparatus for the safety of the operatives of the road. If for no other reason than that, I should say that once under the Railway Board, a system should always remain there.

Mr. BUREAU: I assume that the Provincial Legislature are just as wise as we are, and that they are able to make laws and regulations for the safety of their citizens just as well as the Federal Government is. If a provincially incorporated company chooses to make an agreement with a larger company which is under Federal jurisdiction, it is right that during the life of the agreement it should be under Federal supervision in such matters as these. But why should we prevent men from following their own inclination and their own wishes in the matter after the agreement has expired? If the only safety exists in the Railway Board or in Federal legislation, then away with the right of the provinces to enact railway legislation—that is what the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy) comes down to.

Mr. MORPHY: There is quite a difference between a local road with limited jurisdiction and a Dominion or Federal road with an overshadowing jurisdiction. The local road cannot compel uniformity as regards the Dominion road; consequently there should be some paramount power to enforce uniformity of appliances. A local Government may be the best Government in the world for the railway operatives, but it has no power over Federal roads. While the local Government might be as advanced in the matter of railway legislation as the Federal Government, still, it might choose different kinds of appliances from those used on the Federal road, and it would be like the tail wagging the dog; the smaller road would attempt to set up its standards of uniformity against the equally good but different standards of the main line. My idea is that uniformity is the crux of the situation and that some paramount power ought to rest in the Dominion through the medium of the Railway Commission.

Mr. McKENZIE: The point made by my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) is very clear to me. I assume that there is no intention on the part of this legislation to interfere in any way with provincial jurisdiction over provincial railways. If a privately-owned road passes over to the Canadian Pacific Railway, for instance, there is no objection to its being under the jurisdiction of the Board while it is held by the Canadian Pacific. But the member for Three Rivers contends that when the lease terminates, we should not prevent the company from going back to its former status if it wishes to do so. We should so construct our legislation that when the instrument which creates the jurisdiction terminates, the locally owned company may go back to its former jurisdiction.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The point raised by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) is of paramount importance to railway employees throughout the country so far as it relates to safety appliances. Notwithstanding anything that may be said as to the efficiency of any measure that a Provincial Legislature may enact with regard to safety appliances, you cannot have uniformity where nine provinces are dealing with the same thing. It is essential that there be uniformity in appliances on freight and passenger cars, and in respect of equipment of all kinds. Let me illustrate by referring to one of the appliances in connection with freight equipment on railways in Canada and the United States that come under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Railway Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission. I refer to the hand-grips on box cars. It becomes second nature to a railway man in the dead of night, without stopping to look, to reach to a certain place to take hold of the hand-grip on a freight car; and if it is not there, he may get under the wheels. I repeat that you cannot get uniformity unless you have uniformity of control. Railway employees as a body have been working long and arduously to get this enactment into the railway law, so that the Railway Board will have jurisdiction and will know that the equipment is uniform. They do not want to interfere with the right of a province in its own railway, but they do want the large body to have jurisdiction over the smaller one.

Mr. BOYS: I endorse absolutely what has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. G. B. Nicholson). The very matter that he has referred to is what gave rise to the amendment. In 1913 complaints were made to the board with regard to the operation of the Quebec Central railway, which was under a 999-year lease to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Application was made for the establisment of uniformity of devices, appliances and so on.

What has been done here is to pass a law so that where any provincial road is owned, controlled, leased, or operated by a company wholly or partly within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, the provincial company shall also be within the provisions of the Railway Act and subject to the jurisdiction of the Dominion Railway Board. In that way uniformity in devices will be obtained. If what is suggested by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) were adopted, and at the end of the lease the company went back to the regulations which obtained in any province they might be quite different, for instance, the devices on box cars, which have been referred to, and accidents would be almost certain to result. It is for that purpose that this clause is inserted. It is really for the protection of railway employees.

Mr. BUREAU: If you take the case of a smaller road which has operated for a number of years with a larger road, for instance if you take the case of the Quebec Central, you will find that its equipment is just the same as that of the Canadian Pacific. It could not couple its cars with those of the Canadian Pacific if it did not have the same coupling device. To have different equipment would restrict the trade of the company and make it an absolute failure. Business interests would compel it to have the same equipment. All these new devices must be used, because it would be suicidal for such a company not to have them.

Mr. BOYS: We need not worry about the Quebec Central, because it is under lease to the Canadian Pacific for 999 years and will continue to be operated by that company.

Mr. BUREAU: I object to the principle that we should bind forever a company which is at present under a certain management. This control ought not to go beyond the time mentioned in the agreement. If a company is subject to provincial legislative powers, let it be so; but if it amalgamates with a federal company, I am willing that, for the time of the amalgamation, it should be subject to Federal jurisdiction, but when that agreement expires, why impose upon that company the necessity of remaining where perhaps, it would not like to be?

Mr. NESBITT: The company can come to the Parliament of the day and get relief.

Mr. BUREAU: Why force it to come to Parliament?

Mr. NESBITT: It might be better for it.

Mr. BUREAU: We are not here to do guess work for the welfare of other people who are supposed to look into the matter of their incorporation when they become incorporated. This is a question that affects future interests of people who are not bound by any agreement. When this agreement has expired by the lapse of time, you force them to remain in a condition to which they did not want to submit before they came to make this agreement and which was imposed upon them by the making of the agreement.

Mr. NESBITT: We did not force it upon them.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it impossible to use other language than the language used here? The objectionable part is the clause "for the general advantage of Canada." No matter how small a property may be, if it is entirely within a province, when you declare it to be for the general advantage of Canada, it will be very awkward to be obliged some day to come back to Parliament for legislation declaring that it is not for the general advantage of Canada, and that is the only way to get back to the former status. It would be a very peculiar piece of legislation to put through this House, to declare that a certain piece of property was not for the general advantage of Canada. If the language was used that this road while so operated shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the board, then when the owner got the property back, he would be no longer subject to the jurisdiction of the board. In that way, you would have the same effect, but the property would not be forever declared to be property within Dominion jurisdiction.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I would ask the permission of the Committee to draw attention to a matter which properly would come under clause 8. Before I really understood the procedure of the Committee, I had allowed this clause to slip by. It has been carried, and I have to ask the permission of the Committee to speak to it.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is satisfactory.

On motion of Mr. H. A. Mackie, the Committee reverted to the consideration of clause 8.

On clause 8.—provincial railways connecting with or crossing Dominion railways:

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Under this clause the question of crossings arises, and a case may very will be imagined, indeed, a case has occurred where some difficulty has been apprehended in the matter of crossings and the meaning and definition of "crossings", where, for instance, a railway company operating or about to operate under a provincial charter has a certain location route and another company operating under a Dominion charter had virtually the same route and they came into conflict. A case has arisen in Alberta between the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Northern had a provincial charter and the Canadian Pacific a Dominion charter. The lines of the two railways as shown by their respective location plans—though at different levels—both cross each other and also join each other so as to run along much the same right-of-way at several places, in what the plaintiff's counsel designates the "confliction area." The case was tried and decided by a single judge, which decision is not by any means binding, and it might be profitable for the Committee to have a better definition of what is meant by the word "crossing," so as to cover a case where roads are not in operation. The learned judge in that case said:

In my opinion, that section has no application to the case in hand. It seems to me that the evidence establishes a case substantially of both companies claiming a right to build upon the same right-of-way and that at different levels; that one railway "joining" another means joining on the same level so as to enable cars to be transferred from the tracks of one road to the tracks of another; and that "crossing" means the passing of the tracks of one railway on, over or under the tracks of another by meeting at any angle, continuing at the same angle to the opposite side of the track crossed and immediately leaving the track crossed.

The question taken before the court was this: "Is there any question of crossing any track or level inasmuch as neither railway company has thought of construction or operation?" The judge comes to the conclusion that it is merely a question of the right of a Dominion Parliament charter having precedence over a charter of the province. He says:

To be concrete, the Dominion Parliament has exclusive legislative authority with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., the defendant company; and the Legislature of the province of Alberta exclusive legislature authority with respect to the Canadian Northern Western Railway Co., the plaintiff company. These legislative bodies, while each exercising its apparently exclusive jurisdiction, have conferred, each upon its own creature, powers apparently equal and a conflict has arisen.

The decision of the court was that where, as in this case, there is a conflict of rights granted by two different authorities, the authority granted by the Dominion Parliament is supreme. I submit that some amendment ought to be made to make it clear that where railways have secured authority from different sources and a conflict arises, the right granted by the Dominion Parliament shall have precedence over the rights granted by any other legislative authority.

Mr. MORPHY: I think the section already provides that.

Mr. NESBITT: That is what we intended to provide.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: It may be that it does, but I cannot see it, and I shall be very glad if one of the members of the Railway Committee will point out where this provision is.

Mr. MORPHY: I think paragraph (a) of section 8 covers the point raised by my hon. friend, and if it is in any way deficient I should like him to point it out.

Progress reported.

PRINCE OF WALES TO VISIT CANADA.

WILL OPEN NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I have the honour to announce the text of a message from His Majesty the King to His Excellency the Governor General, as follows:

I am very glad to tell you that with my entire approval the Prince of Wales will visit Canada this year leaving England in August. He will open the new Parliament Buildings in Ottawa.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The House resumed at eight o'clock and again went into Committee on Bill No. 19, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The hon. member for North Perth says that section 8 covers the point under discussion. The section says:

Every railway, the construction or operation of which is authorized by special Act of the legislature of any province, and which connects with or crosses or may hereafter connect with or cross any railway within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, shall—

—and so on. Under this section it is assumed that the railway is in operation or has been constructed or partly constructed. It does not contemplate railways on which no work has been done. The case I was dealing with is this. A railway company gets a charter from the province under the Provincial Railway Act and does everything necessary preparatory to the construction of its road. Another company is incorporated under the Dominion Railway Act, and it also complies with the requirements preparatory to the construction of its road. One company begins construction, and in doing so encroaches upon some territory or route that the other company, which we may call the plaintiff company, purposes to operate under the provincial charter. There is a conflict between the two. The routes cross and re-cross and at some point the defendant company constructs exactly on the same route that the plaintiff company had in view. The plaintiff company in this case seeks an injunction to restrain the defendant from constructing over a certain portion of its proposed route, because the plaintiff, by provincial charter, claims exclusive jurisdiction. The defendant company claims that it has a perfect right to construct wherever it sees fit because it holds authority from the Dominion Parliament. The defendant says: "You have done nothing; you are not operating and have not even constructed; we have begun first and are entitled to priority, notwithstanding the conflict of rights between us. Take the case brought before the courts of Alberta, in which the Canadian Northern Railway seeks an injunction against the Canadian Pacific. Under Section 227 of the old Act it is provided:—

The railway lines or tracks of any company shall not cross or join, or be crossed or joined by or with any railway lines or tracks other than those of such company whether otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada or not until leave therefore has been obtained from the board as hereinafter provided.

The judgment in the case says:—

In my opinion, that section has no application to the case in hand. It seems to me that the evidence establishes a case substantially of both companies claiming a right to build upon the same right-of-way and that at different levels.

"Joining" means joining on the same level, and "crossing" the passing of tracks of one railway over or under the tracks of another by meeting at any angle, continuing at the same angle to the opposite side of the track crossed, and immediately leaving the track crossed. The judgment proceeds:—

The proper conclusion is, I think, that to this extent at least and speaking generally, Dominion railway legislation prima facie predominates over provincial railway legislation, that Parliament in legislating in relation to Dominion railways may as far as may be reasonably necessary to effect the object of its legislation impose obligations upon a provincial railway, that where Parliament has legislated with relation to a Dominion railway—as it has by the Railway Act and the defendent company's charter—what it has enacted cannot be derogated from by provincial legislature, and consequently had I thought it necessary for the decision of the questions involved in this action to have expressed an opinion upon S. 227 of The (Dominion) Railway Act with regard to crossings and junctions, I should have held both that it was within the power of the Dominion Parliament and also that it purported to and did apply to a provincial railway.

I have said that it seems to me, speaking generally, a Dominion railway will have predominating rights over a provincial railway, prima facie: what I mean to imply is that all other things being equal the predominance is not to be doubted but that the subsequent history of either railway may perhaps give the provincial railway a status which can be interfered with only, if at all, to a restricted extent.

[Mr. H. A. Mackie.]

Idington, J., in one of his judgments, says:—

The Dominion Parliament having by virtue of its exclusive powers over the enumerated subjects in sec. 91 of the B.N.A. Act created a corporate power and thereby conferred on one or more persons the power to construct or cause to be constructed a railway, that railway cannot be crossed by any other railway company which, with its work, is only the product of the somewhat analogous powers given by section 92 to provincial legislatures over "local works and undertakings."

I am with great respect, quite unable to understand how any express and exclusive dominating power such as given by the Act to the Dominion Parliament despite the so-called exclusive authority subject thereto given to the province is ever in any case to be minimized, much less deleted from the Act, because of some apparently inconsistent power given to the provinces. If need be to discard either, it is the subsequent and subordinate power that must be deleted as it were, in order to give the precedent and paramount power its full effective operation.

in conclusion, the judgment says:

I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff company, in its present condition at least of being an unconstructed railway, can in no way interfere with the construction of the defendant company's railway.

There seems to be the same difficulty in the way when both railways are unconstructed. That is the decision of an Alberta judge. This does not make the matter final. Rather than have any repetition of lawsuits on this very point, I ask Parliament to make it clear, under this or any other section, that where there is a conflict between the provincial and Dominion legislatures in the granting of powers to railway companies which have not constructed and not operated, the authority given by the Dominion Parliament shall predominate over the power given by the legislature. That is the whole point at issue and one that has already caused some litigation. It is easy to understand how a company having a Dominion charter, if it is necessary to obtain even the consent of the board to cross a certain route or line to be constructed, receives that consent and the Dominion Government has no knowledge that a provincial legislature has given the same authority to another company over the same ground. Why not do away with conflict in a case of that sort? Section 8, or any other section which may be subordinated to it, only deals with railways when in operation or constructed, or which at least have done something towards construction or operation, I believe that answers the objection of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) and I hope I have made my point clear.

Mr. MORPHY: I am still in the dark, and I hope to convince my hon. friend that this Bill gives a complete answer to his contention. Without re-quoting section 8, I will just read the first two words: "Every railway". The Bill does not say "every constructed railway". To get the meaning of the term "railway" I refer to the interpretation clause of section 2, subsection 21, which defines the meaning of the word "railway".

"Railway" means any railway which the company has authority to construct or operate—

Not "has constructed" or "has operated", as my hon. friend has argued, not that has been partly constructed or operated, but any railway which may thereafter be constructed.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Under this Act?

Mr. MORPHY: Yes, under this Act.

—and includes all branches, extensions, sidings, depots, wharves—etc. Section 8 provides that the Dominion jurisdiction is paramount to the provincial. Section 8 operates generally and applies to all railways under a provincial or federal charter whether they are constructed or unconstructed. It seems to be so clear that I cannot conceive of any court having any difficulty in the reading of the section.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Has the definition of "railway" been altered as compared with the definition in the last Act?

Mr. MORPHY: If any judge on this reading gave the decision which the hon. gentleman says was given, I think he must have given that decision without having looked at the interpretation clause as it is in the Act. No judge could give such a decision if this wording were there.

On section 10—Chief Commissioner and Assistant Chief Commissioner:

Mr. J. D. REID: I move:

That section 10, subsection 2, lines 1 and 2, be amended by striking out the words "or assistant chief commissioner" and inserting a new subsection between sections 2 and 3 as subsection 2 (a):

"(2a) Any person may be appointed Assistant Chief Commissioner who is or has been a judge of a superior court of Canada or of any province of Canada, or who is a barrister of at least ten years' standing at the bar of any such province, or who is a barrister or advocate of any such province and has held office as a Commissioner of the Board for a period of at least ten years."

The object of the change is merely to say that if it is thought advisable a person who has been a commissioner for ten years, although not a barrister for ten years, may be promoted to be assistant chief commissioner. It really means that Mr. McLean may be appointed to fill the position of assistant chief commissioner.

Mr. McMASTER: I note that in the tenth line you say "who is a barrister or advocate" while in the ninth line, you merely use the word "barrister." I think it would be well to say "barrister or advocate" in both cases.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no objection to adding the word "advocate" in the ninth line.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the necessity of putting in "advocate." Is there any difference between a barrister and an advocate? There is not in our province.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not see any great necessity at all.

Mr. McMASTER: You have used the word "advocate" in one case and you say "barrister or advocate" in the other. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). "Barrister" and "advocate" mean the same thing in the province of Quebec. I would suggest that you either strike out the word "advocate" or insert it in both cases?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think it would be better to strike out "or advocate" in the tenth line. I would therefore move:

That the words "or advocate" be stricken out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not quite understand the effect of the last two lines.

"or who is a barrister of any such province and has held office as a commissioner of the Board for a period of at least ten years.

If you stop at "province" is that not all you require?

Mr. J. D. REID: I believe that has been added because Mr. McLean is not a barrister of ten years standing. Therefore, you could not appoint him to be an assistant commissioner, but if you say "who is a barrister" and who has served for ten years as a commissioner that would qualify him in case he might be appointed as assistant commissioner. He has been a barrister for probably four or five years.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know nothing about Mr. McLean, but I am opposed to the Parliament of Canada passing legislation to suit any particular person. I think the intention was that any occupant of that position ought to have the standing of a barrister of ten years or be a judge of the Superior Court.

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. McLean was one of the commissioners reappointed. He has had ten years' experience as a commissioner. But as the Act now stands the very fact of his being a barrister of three or four years' standing would not qualify him; he would have to be a barrister of over ten years' standing before he could be appointed chief commissioner. It strikes me that if he has had ten years' experience on the Commission in addition to being a barrister of four or five years' standing, his qualifications would probably be equal to those of a man of ten years' standing as a barrister without the ten years' experience as a commissioner.

Mr. McKENZIE: You might very soon have cases where men would be claiming the rights which are being created under this section and which it was never intended they should have. If a man has practised law for ten years he has had a fairly good training. We are departing from the requirements that were originally thought necessary for the occupant of this office and saying that a man who was not a barrister until yesterday may get the same position as a judge of the Supreme Court or a barrister of ten years' standing.

Mr. J. D. REID: I must admit that it is to qualify Mr. McLean for the position of assistant chief commissioner. But after all he must be a barrister. He has been a barrister for a number of years and has served ten years on the Commission, and the information I have from the Chief Commissioner and others connected with the Commission is that Mr. McLean is really one of the best commissioners ever appointed. I am in the hands of the Committee, but I would like to see the clause go through for the reasons I have stated. While acting as a commissioner Mr. McLean has been practically discharging the functions of a judge, and the requirements we are specifying here constitute in my opinion qualifications sufficient to justify appointing him to the position of assistant chief commissioner. However, if the Committee think differently I shall drop the clause.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have nothing further to say about it. I object to special legislation to make a position for any person unless justified by the greatest possible necessity.

Mr. MORPHY: I think if the hon. leader of the Opposition knew Mr. McLean his objection would not be put forward. I had occasion while the late Judge Mabee was chief commissioner to have his opinion of Mr. McLean, and, in short, it was that he did not know any one in the whole North American continent who was his equal as an expert on railway rates. Judge Mabee said he was a perfect encyclopedia on the subject and without him the board would have great difficulty in getting along. So that while the general principle advanced by the hon. leader of the Opposition is a sound one, here is a special case of a man whose outstanding abilities are recognized by his superiors and who has had many years' experience upon the board. The legislation that is proposed now to apply to Mr. McLean will probably never be required again; and even if it is, the appointment has to be made by the Government, and it does not necessarily follow that a man gets it just because he is a barrister of ten years' standing. Having some knowledge of Mr. McLean's work I am of opinion he is much more valuable than if he had been a barrister of ten years without any experience as a commissioner.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not saying anything against Mr. McLean. I would not know him if I saw him on the street, and I never heard of him before. I would be very sorry to block his way to promotion or to deprive the country of his services. But it is the principle I object to; we should not specially legislate any man into a position of this kind. No matter how good he is, there are plenty of other men equally as good to take his place.

Mr. CANNON: The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) suggested an amendment to sub-paragraph 2 (a). It seems to me that if his suggestion is accepted it will lead to a misunderstanding as regards our province. According to the diplomas that we receive from our universities we are called "avocats" in French and "advocates" in English; we are not called "barristers."

Mr. J. D. REID: It was at the request of the hon. member for Brome that the clause was amended. It was considered in Committee and for the very reason the hon. member states the word advocate was inserted.

Mr. CANNON: I do not blame the hon. minister at all; I say I do not concur with what the hon. member for Brome suggested. I think the clause ought to remain as drafted, and it might be improved by adding the word "avocat" where missing,

Mr. FIELDING: I am sorry the hon. member for Brome is not in his place. In one place the words "barrister or advocate" occur, and in the other place it is simply "barrister." The argument of the member for Brome was that to be consistent you should put the word "advocate" in both places.

Mr. J. D. REID: I move that the word "advocate" be added in both places.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 26—commissioners:

Mr. J. D. REID: Subsection 2 as it came from the Senate is now subsection 3. It read:

The secretary shall be paid an annual salary to be fixed by the Governor in Council not exceeding four thousand dollars.

That has been changed to read:

Such annual salary as may from time to time be fixed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. Cartwright has been secretary of the commission since the board was organized, but his present salary, $4,000, cannot be increased unless the Act is changed. It was stated to the Committee that the Government would like to increase his salary to $5,000 per annum, and the change has been made for this reason. We could not change the amount in the subsection to $5,000, because if we did we should have to bring in a resolution.

Mr. SHEARD: Are the appointees of the board governed in any way by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. J. D. REID: No. A good many of the officials are experts. A portion of the staff, consisting of clerks and stenographers, are really in the same position as others who come under the Civil Service Commission, but in this Bill we have not specially made them come under that commission.

Mr. SHEARD: When the matter of the appointment of experts in the new Department of Health was discussed, it was contended that such officials must come under the Civil Service Commission. It seems to me that the departments are not all in harmony in the matter of their coming under the Civil Service Commission, and this is one of the cases in point.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 40—approval of certain works after construction:

The CHAIRMAN: This section was amended in the committee by adding at the end thereof the following words:

Provided that where the doing of such work affects the safety of the public or the employees, no such approval shall be given without due notice and hearing.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there anything in the Act to define what "due notice" shall be?

Mr. J. D. REID: The commission may make regulations at any time that are satisfactory to the employees. At present, fifteen days' notice is required in the West and ten days in the East.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 155—insolvent companies:

Mr. J. D. REID: The leader of the Opposition asked how the Bankruptcy Act would affect this section. Section 2, subsection (k), of that Act says:

"Corporation" includes any company incorporated or authorized to carry on business by or under an Act of the Parliament of Canada or of any of the provinces of Canada, and any incorporated company, wheresoever incorporated, which has an office in or carries on business within Canada, but does not include building societies having a capital stock, nor incorporated banks, savings banks, insurance companies, trust companies, loan companies or railway companies;

So that railway companies are not excepted.

Section agreed to.

On section 179—unauthorized changes forbidden:

Mr. J. D. REID: This clause is intended to compel railway companies to pay their employees for any loss that may result from a change in the location of a divisional point. The clause has been made stronger by the amendments that we are now including in it. The Railway Brotherhood thought that the wording as regards the partial removal of a divisional point was not quite sufficient, and I should think the clause as improved would be quite satisfactory.

Section agreed to.

On section 210—prior contracts:

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I move to amend clause 210 by adding after the word "agreement" in the fifth line thereof the words "or notice thereof by way of caveat or otherwise," because in Alberta as in the other western provinces, the only way in which registration may be obtained is by registering a caveat. This is merely to meet the requirements of registration in the western provinces.

Mr. J. D. REID: Would not the words "or caveat duly registered" be sufficient?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The registration is done both ways. A notice may be registered with caveat attached, or it may be registered by itself, so that I would prefer the amendment I have moved.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am not a lawyer and do not know whether this would make any difference in the clause, but as a layman I cannot see why it should make any difference. What does not appear to me to read right is the phrase "or notice thereof." The hon. member, of course, knows what that means in Alberta. What I had in mind was "if such contract or agreement—"

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Or notice thereof by caveat.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not see any objection.

Mr. MORPHY: Is there not a provision in the Railway Act for notice by caveat as stated by the hon. gentleman? If there is, the wording suggested would be unfortunate. The clause seems very plain and comprehensive in itself.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: This is the Alberta law: An agreement for sale, mortgage or any agreement of whatever nature it may be, with the exception of an absolute transfer, cannot be registered except by caveat. That caveat is drawn up and a notice something like this is filed in the Registrar's office:

Take notice that so-and-so declares that he has a claim against a certain property under an agreement for sale, or under a mortgage or under any other documentary evidence. That notice is filed and that is the only means we have of registering the interest that a man may have. Under the clause as it stands we have no way of getting notice to anybody, unless provision is made for notice by way of caveat. I do not know why the matter should be doubted, because this is the Alberta law, the Saskatchewan law and the Manitoba law.

Mr. NESBITT: The clause says: "If such contract or agreement." Would it not follow that the agreement would have to be drawn up in whatever form is required by the province, without that form being specified?

[Mr. H. A. Mackie.]

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: No. No matter what sort of an agreement a man has, it cannot find its way into the hands of the registrar of the province. The man may give it to the registrar if he likes, but the registrar will not record it. The only way in which he will record it is, according to the law of the province, namely, by a notice of caveat, which says: Take notice that I claim an interest in—describe the property—by reason of an agreement of sale dated a certain date made between so-and-so and so-and-so, and govern yourself accordingly. The registrar will accept that notice and he will stamp it upon the record which contains a description of the land in question, and nobody can deal with that land until the registrar removes that notice of caveat. In Alberta that is the only way in which a man who has an interest less than an absolute interest in a piece of land can protect his interest.

Mr. MORPHY: If that is the only way in which an agreement can be registered in the registrar's office, then what is the matter with the clause which merely uses the words "if such contract or agreement is duly registered?" If the notice of caveat being filed in the registrar's office constitutes due registration, then this clause covers the point, because it refers to an agreement duly registered.

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps we might let the clause stand in the meantime.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I have no objection to letting the law clerk consider the amendment, and I have no doubt he will find that the law is as I have stated.

Section stands.

On sections 215 and 217—expropriation proceedings:

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: These sections were allowed to stand at my request. My reason for asking that was merely because I wished to argue from them in relation to subsection (13) of section 2. The committee did not adopt my suggestions in regard to subsection (13) of section 2, so I have no reason now for asking that these sections be allowed to stand.

Sections 215 and 217 agreed to.

On section 232—appeal from award:

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What I was endeavouring to point out under subsection (13) of section 2 was that a judge appointed as arbitrator who granted an order or gave a direction in any proceedings taken under the arbitration was acting as a person designated, and not as a judge of the court, and that if an appeal were taken from this interlocutory measure, if I may so call it, a legal question of very great difficulty would arise. I was unable this afternoon to convince the Committee by my own exposition of the case, and I shall now endeavour to convince it by a judgment of the court. In the case of Marsan vs. the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, reported in the Alberta Law Reports 1909, volume 2, the judge says—(page 43):

Quære—Whether or not the judgment of a judge who is persona designata is appealable in view of the decision in C.P.R. vs. Little Seminary of Ste. Therese, since the enactment of s. 220 of the Railway Act.

Quære—Whether or not a dissatisfied litigant who has the right to appeal must appeal and is not at liberty to bring the same matter before the Court in a different way.

Held, that where the right of appeal was doubtful and the plaintiff had given notice of appeal, and at the same time brought an action for injunction, in which action the validity of the order appealed from would have to be inquired into, the matter was properly before the Court.

Secondly, from the same judgment I read:

Where there is a failure to comply with the Act the jurisdiction of the judge is wanting, and the company may be restrained from acting under a warrant granted. The warrants in question—

These are warrants for possession of land.

—if these appeals were granted by Mr. Justice Beck under and in pursuance of the power given in section 217 and 218 of the Railway Act and the learned judge in granting such warrants acted persona designata and there can be no appeal from his decision: C.P.R. vs. Little Seminary of Ste. Therese, and particularly the language of Mr. Justice Patterson, p. 618.

Mr. Justice Stuart says:

With respect to the appeal from the order of Mr. Justice Beck directing the warrant of possession to issue, the preliminary objection was taken by council for the respondent company, that Mr. Justice Beck was acting as persona designata in making the order, and that, therefore, in accordance with the decision in The Canadian Pacific Railway Company vs. The Little Seminary of Ste. Therese, there is no right of appeal. There may be some doubt as to whether this case is now binding upon us in view of the subsequent insertion of section 220 into the Railway Act, but inasmuch as the plaintiff has in fact appealed from the order granting the warrants, and has brought his actions for injunctions as well, it is clear that the whole matter is now properly before us, either in the one form or the other.

The point I have been endeavouring to make is this: Some company may want possession of land, as in the case I have cited. They go to a judge and say; "Give us a warrant for possession." The respondent company says: "You have no right to the possession of this land because you have not fulfilled all the requirements of the Railway Act." An injunction is sought, and notice of appeal is given from the judgment granting the warrant. Then when action is taken on the basis of the warrant granted you have a double remedy before the courts: First, the notice of appeal that you have given, and, secondly, an action for damages for trespass, whether nominal or actual. One of the litigants will tell you at once: "You cannot seek damages by way of injunction because you have given notice of appeal." The other litigant says: "When the judge gave you this warrant he was acting as persona designata and you cannot appeal from his decision." That was the case I put before the Committee this afternoon, and I ask that subsection 13 of section 2 be amended to make it clear that when a judge gives such an order as giving a warrant for possession or directs notice to be served these orders are orders of the court, and not merely the orders of a man who stands in the position of an arbitrator.

To further convince the Committee of the ambiguity of the law, let me cite another case, Saunders vs. the Edmonton and Dunvegan Railway, and we may see how other judges look at this question. In the case I cited a moment ago I was dealing both with a single judge and the Appellant Division, but in this case you have other judges of the Appellant Division sitting, and observe how they disagree with the judgment given in the Marsan case:—

By virtue of section 220, the Railway Act, ch. 37, R.S.C., a judge in granting a warrant of possession under sec. 217 to a railway company is acting as a judge.

A full court in Marsan vs. the Grand Trunk Pacific held that the judge was acting as an arbitrator, was persona designata. In this case the full court, but not the same personnel, holds that he is acting as a judge.

The report says:

By virtue of sec. 220, the Railway Act, ch. 37, R.S.C., a judge in granting a warrant of possession under sec. 217, to a railway company is acting as a Judge of the Court and not as a persona designata; Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. vs. The Little Seminary of Ste. Therese, 16, S.C.R., 606, distinguished. The grant of such a warrant is, therefore, subject to appeal.

A warrant of possession granted under sec. 217, the Railway Act, ch. 37, R.S.C., by a judge of general jurisdiction is effective for the purposes intended until set aside in the regular way, and the fact that there has been a failure to comply with some of the statutory provisions does not render the warrant void, but merely irregular.

The Chief Justice in delivering his portion of the judgment in the case says:

> The plaintiff by his statement of claim alleges that he was in August, 1912, the owner in possession of certain lands and that at that time the defendants "wrongfully and unlawfully entered upon the said lands" and did certain damage. He claims (1) Damages for the wrongful acts complained of; (2) An injunction; (3) In the alternative if the railway is authorized to be constructed through the lands, damages for the land taken and to the remaining land.
> The defendants deny the plaintiff's allegations and set up that they went upon the land in pursuance of a warrant of possession duly obtained from a judge of the Supreme Court. Plaintiff joins issue . . . . .
> Even if it is open to the plaintiff under the pleadings to test the validity of the warrant of possession, which is doubtful, I am of opinion that he has failed in his attack upon it. He contends that the judge in making it is acting as a persona designata and that any failure to comply with the express provisions of the Act would result in rendering his act a mere nullity.

I do not need to take time to read the contradictory opinions of judges in this matter. Assuming for the sake of argument that the legal talent of this House say that the decisions I have read provide that you may take action and bring before the courts of your province the very subject matter of the order about which you would take an appeal, and that consequently whether you have the right of appeal or not you are still at liberty to take an action for nominal trespass, why should a man on a legal question be obliged to take a double remedy—first to file a notice of appeal from a decision of a single judge arbitrator, who in one case is not a judge and in another case is admitted to be a judge? Why should he be put to all the trouble of taking action to maintain the very point he could maintain if he had a proper case for appeal? I hope that I have made it clear that section 232 deals only with the appeal from an award, and does not provide any machinery by which you can appeal in cases such as I have cited. In conjunction with this matter I may call attention to section 243 which says:

> —and where there are different interests in the same lands all shall as far as possible be dealt with in one proceeding.

These sections should be taken jointly, because often a judge, if acting in that capacity, could settle by an order of the court the claims of any one of the litigants, whereas now, no matter what may be the attitude of the litigants, it must all be decided in the one proceeding as far as possible. It is of the greatest importance, I contend, in view of the contradictory decisions that have been given in our province in this matter, that the law should be made clear whether a judge is acting simply as an arbitrator or as a judge of court. This brings me back to section 2, paragraph (13). Even if you amended section 232, the courts would immediately turn to the interpretation clause, and if they held under it that "judge" meant a judge arbitrator and not a judge of the court, all that you might say in section 232 would be of no use. So that if an amendment is to be made in section 232 there must also be an amendment in paragraph (13) in section 2.

Mr. J. D. REID: We had quite a discussion in connection with section 232, and I think perhaps it is better to leave it as it is. There is an appeal in a case of award for compensation where the amount is over $600. In other cases where it is necessary for a railway company to take possession of lands they apply to the judge for authority to enter, and the judge granting such authority is acting as an arbitrator. In such a case there is no appeal. The judge can issue an order giving the railway company power to enter and take possession of lands, and that order is final. But after possession is taken, if the party from whom the land is taken is not satisfied with the amount of the award he can appeal to a higher court, if the amount exceeds $600. If a railway company wishing to start construction work could not begin until their right to take possession had been considered by various courts they would be greatly disadvantaged. From the decision of the judge who gave authority to take possession there might be an appeal from one court to another and the railway would never get posession of the lands or be able to build its railway. This clause empowers the judge, who may be an arbitrator, to give authority to enter and take possession, and as regards compensation the owner can appeal. The judge decides the question of possession, and the compensation is disposed of afterwards.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The angle from which the minister views the matter is altogether different from my viewpoint. It is true that under the Railway Act which is now before Parliament if a judge grants an order for possession and he is wrong you may move at once that the party who got the warrant of possession shall deposit in the court a certain amount of security. That is provided for in the Railway Act.

There is no harm done in so far as the ultimate result of the case is concerned, but in so far as the man who is to receive the money is concerned there is, because the court can order the issue of a warrant of possession and also issue an order for security, but this entails unnecessary costs. But the point I have made is that if something is irregularly done or without jurisdiction by a judge, I have no appeal under the law as it is interpreted by the court at the present time. That it has been on the Statute Book from time immemorial is no reason why it should remain on the Statute Book. It is only creating trouble in the carrying out of the Act. I am not merely raising a legal point but my object is to avoid litigation. Apparently the policy of the Government is to foster litigation. I am a barrister and I would like to have a lot of work but where difficulties arise, such as have arisen, and when judges hold contradictory opinions, why not settle it at once? It is just a question whether a judge is acting as a judge of a court or is acting as an arbitrator. If he is acting as an arbitrator I have no redress except to take an action at law, and as the basis of my action I must allege trespass which will mean a nominal fifty cents and costs. Why should my client be put to all that trouble? I should simply have to file notice of appeal to the full court and the case is decided on the merits, or on legal questions, before the court, and if there are any costs incurred it would be the costs of appeal and any court is in a position to deal with costs and to decide as to whether a warrant of possession may properly be given or not. I am not dealing at all with the question from the angle of the minister that no harm can ensue from this section, because if a warrant of possession is given a man has his recourse and he can get his money. A man who has got irregularly a warrant of possession may be forced to give security in the courts. Why should a company be permitted to go before any judge in the country and get a warrant of possession on affidavits which are not correct? Why should it be that under such circumstances I should have no relief except to take a straight action at law and put my clients to all sorts of trouble? Why should a company be allowed to take advantage of such irregularity for the purpose of proceeding with the construction of a line? Our purpose is to see that the Railway Act is lived up to. I had a conversation with a minister yesterday and he said that he would see that the laws of the country were obeyed. I told him that I would do the same thing. I am asking that the laws of the country be obeyed and that no railway company be allowed to start the operation or construction of any railway on the strength of a warrant of possession obtained from a judge on affidavits which are not correct. I have no remedy except to tell my client that he must take a straight action and claim trespass, the result of which may secure him $1 and costs. That is a condition of things that I have proven here, not only by my own exposition, which is not very clear, but rather by quoting from the judgments of the courts. Now is the time to make the law right, and there is no reason why this Committee cannot go back to subsection (13) of section 2 and say that when we speak of a judge, we speak of a judge having the power of a court. If we do that, it would settle the whole situation.

Mr. MOWAT: I think the clause should remain as it is. We must take it for granted that the judges are men of common sense—they are as a rule—and that they are not going to issue these warrants without fully considering the case. It is to the advantage of the country that there should be as few appeals as possible. The minister has put the business side of it in a very clear manner, and I do not think that is a different angle from that from which it has been viewed by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Mackie). The section says that a company should not be held up, but that the ultimate result will be to do justice as between the land owner and the company. My hon. friend does not suggest an amendment here, but he wants the law made so clear that there can be no appeal. I venture to say that we cannot so frame the law that there will be no appeal.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What time have I had to prepare an amendment when the motion is made to-night that we go into Committee at once and no notice is given that we are going into Committee?

Mr. MOWAT: If my hon. friend even had time to prepare an amendment I do not think he could prepare one which could resist the ingenuity of the bar of Alberta to get by the statute. My hon. friend has proved to us apparently that even the courts of his own province differ as to whether the word "judge" means qua judge or a judge as persona designata. Apparently the Superior Court of Alberta has held that he is sitting as a judge. It is stated in subsection (13) of section 2 that "judge" is a judge of the Superior or county court.

It would be far better to leave it at that and have the law construed under the ordinary canons of interpretation that he is a judge. If any particular case should arise of that kind, which I doubt now in view of the decision of the appellate division of Alberta, or if a judge should be held not to have power, which is very doubtful, let that case take care of itself. Anybody who has studied the railway law and the cases in Canada knows that it is a case of the most extraordinary rarity that any dispute has been had as to the warrant of a judge ordering possession. We would be going out of our way if we tried to make an amendment to cover the extremely rare case that the hon. gentleman has cited here. It would probably result in an increase in ligitation on the part of ingenious litigants or their counsel and we would be no better off than before. I think the clause should be left as it is.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: May I claim the indulgence of the Committee for another moment? The hon. member (Mr. Mowat) seems to think that we are so isolated in Alberta that our judges are limited in their knowledge of the cases. In connection with the case I have cited to this Committee, it was not my desire to detail all the law on the subject but if you will permit me I will entertain you for the balance of the evening. For the benefit of my hon. friend let me quote some Ontario cases on this point showing that the Ontario people have not had smooth sailing in so far as that point is concerned. We have, amongst the English cases, Law Reports 12, Appeal Cases 602, 56 Law Journals' Privy Council Decisions 66; 57 Law Times, page 602; 26 Ontario Reports, 667; affirmed 27, Ontario Reports 46; 16 Supreme Court Reports 606.

Mr. MORPHY: What did that 26 Ontario Reports decide? Just read from it please.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I am not reading these but I am just referring to the Ontario decisions.

Mr. MORPHY: What does it say?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I will get the report and read it if you wish me to.

Mr. MORPHY: That will be more satisfactory.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What is given here as a tabulation of the cases on which the judges reached the decision which I read. They have not detailed in extenso the decisions which they have referred to. But they have merely given at the bottom of their own judgment a list of the cases to which they have referred. Amongst these cases is 26 Ontario Reports and I am prepared to give that decision if my hon. friend wishes it. But you have the decision of the case that I read to the Committee, you have these references and you can go back and look up these cases for yourselves. I could go on and give more cases to show that this point has been at issue in other provinces.

You have the English decisions, the Ontario decisions, and our Supreme Court decisions, on this matter; and the Alberta courts after having discussed all these cases are divided in their opinion. Surely it is not for the Committee to ignore this thing.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 240—Warrant for immediate possession in certain cases:

Mr. J. D. REID: The reason the words in line five, "to carry on" were struck out and the words "for the construction or maintenance of" substituted, was because of a question raised as to whether it included maintenance.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 243—to be continued in court where commenced. Different interests:

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no change there. That was held over on account of the other clause.

Section agreed to.

On section 250, subsection (3)—space above rail:

Mr. J. D. REID: When this subsection left the House before, it read " rail level," and the Senate changed it to " base of rail." It was to decide where you would measure the height of a bridge from. The railway employees appeared before the Committee and stated that they preferred the subsection in its original form. The term "rail level" they say is better understood by the railway authorities than the term " base of rail." So we are just reinstating the old term.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the top of rail ?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes; whether you measure from the top of rail in determining the height of a bridge or from the base of the rail where it touches the ties. It makes a difference of about five inches in the height.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 255, subsection (1)—Railway on highway. Leave. Compensation. Consent of municipality:

Mr. J. D. REID: The words inserted in line 7 and in line 19 " in so far as such sections are applicable," were to make the meaning plainer as to what sections would be applicable.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the restriction for? Is that to exempt Government railways? There must be a reason for it.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not to exempt the Government railways.

Mr. BUREAU: There must be a remedy for every wrong.

Mr. J. D. REID: It has not anything to do with the Government railways. It is to make it plainer that where we take land for a railway, if the conditions justify, this Act will apply.

Mr. BUREAU: It does apply. If the board orders the taking of land certainly the owner is entitled to compensation, and the compensation must be established by the provisions of this Act.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am informed that when we do not take a man's land, for instance, where the railway is running along a highway, the Act would not be applicable without this provision.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not understand it. Supposing the railway follows the highway, there is no land to be taken; that is public property. Your own railway does that in some parts of the county of Chambly where there is nothing between the roadbed and the main highway. What compensation do you want to give—for the noise or the frightening of horses?

Mr. J. D. REID: A railway may run alongside a highway without taking any land, but it may injuriously affect a man's land in the vicinity, and in the absence of this clause there would be no power to award compensation.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a new principle. You do not award compensation for any nuisance created by a railway without touching any man's land.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not a new principle; I am informed by the solicitor for the Railway Commission that legislation to that effect was passed in 1911. I should think, if a railway were running close to a man's house, it might cause a nuisance which would entitle him to compensation.

Mr. BUREAU: He has his right of action at common law.

Mr. McKENZIE: There would have to be a question of severance in any case.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 262—Crossings.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I should like to have the last two lines of subsection (5) amended to read as follows, in order to meet the case of Alberta:

"Municipality" means an incorporated city, town, village or rural municipality.

Mr. J. D. REID: What are the divisions of land in Alberta?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: There are three—local improvement district, municipality, and rural municipality.

Mr. J. D. REID: Just add the words " or rural municipality " after the word " parish ".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Subsection (5) says:

"Crossing" means any steam railway crossing of a highway, or highway crossing of a steam railway, at rail level, and every manner of construction of the railway or of the highway by the elevation or the depression of the one above or below the other.

The member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) said that the definition of " railway " covered the point that I had raised. Section 262 defines " crossing "—the very thing with regard to which I was arguing and citing cases a few minutes ago. Suppose you have a railway company operating under a provincial charter and a railway company operating or about to operate under Dominion charter, and there is a conflict between the two with regard to the route that they are to cover, which is to have priority?

Mr. J. D. REID: The definition of the word " crossing " relates to this particular section, and so far as provincial roads are concerned, would apply only to those which have not been declared for the general advantage of Canada. Even if two railways are side by side, if they are under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the board may order them to build one or more subways or overhead bridges. Of course, this act would not apply to a railway incorporated under provincial law, over which the board has no jurisdiction.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: This definition makes " crossing " apply to every manner of construction of a railway or a highway by the elevation or depression of the one above or below the other, and deals also with rail levels. Section 8, under which I made my observations a few moments ago, says:

Every railway the construction or operation of which is authorized by special act of the Legislature of any province and which connects with or crosses or may hereafter connect with or cross any railway within the legislation or authority of the Parliament of Canada, shall, although not declared by Parliament to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, be subject to the provisions of this Act relating to,—

(a) the connection or crossing of one railway with or by another, so far as concerns the aforesaid connection or crossing.

Suppose two railway companies are building simultaneously on the same route and one encroaches upon another, which is to have priority?

Mr. NESBITT: According to my memorandum, we did not strike out the whole of subsection (1) of this clause; we simply changed the word " nine " in the third line to " nineteen ". According to the list of amendments, we struck out the whole of subsection (1).

The CHAIRMAN: Subsection 1 is entirely struck out, according to the official copy.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Parliamentary Counsel, in the memorandum he gave me, stated that subsection (1) shoud be stricken out and that the Act that we passed a short time ago would fit in.

Mr. NESBITT: If that Act is inserted here, that will be all right, but that is not the way the Committee passed the clause.

Mr. J. D. REID: I admit that, but I am moving now to strike out subsection (1) in accordance with the advice of Mr. Gisborne, the Parliamentary counsel. The hon. member will remember that we passed an Act which, of course, is now law, and that Act takes the place of subsection (1) in this Bill.

Mr. STEVENS: At the time that we were discussing this clause, that Act was in process of passing through this House.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 282—packing in spaces:

The CHAIRMAN: Section 282 is amended by adding to subsection (4) the following proviso:

Provided that if there is at any time any method of packing which, in the opinion of the Board, is an improvement over the present requirements, the Board, after hearing on notice, may authorise or direct the use of such improved method.

Mr. J. D. REID: This was put in at the request of the Board of Railway Commissioners after they had consulted with the railway brotherhoods.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 285—notice to Board of accidents:

The CHAIRMAN: Section 285 has been amended by striking out from lines 9, 10 and 11, the words "Any conductors or other employees making a report to the company of the occurrence of any such accident," and substituting therefor the words "The conductor or other employee in charge of the train, place or structure in connection with which such accident occurred."

Mr. J. D. REID: This amendment was made at the request of the brotherhoods representing the railway employees.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 323—tariffs of tolls:

The CHAIRMAN: Section 323 has been amended by striking out from lines 3 and 4 the words "in which his name in full and title are stated."

Mr. BUREAU: Why is that struck out?

Mr. J. D. REID: Because, if these words were left in, every time there was a change in the directorate, for instance, if a director or an official of the company resigned, his name and title would have to be taken off the printed time-tables.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 346—Members of Parliament and Board, etc., free:

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Why are not judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, and of the superior courts, county courts and district courts for the several provinces included in this clause?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Railway Act has never provided for judges being given free transportation. There is no particular reason why they should travel free. On the contrary, judges must go on circuit and their travelling expenses while on circuit are paid by the province. If we were to give the judges free passes it would mean that the provinces would be getting the benefit except, of course when judges were travelling for private reasons. I cannot see why the railways should be deprived of this source of revenue.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In Canada, but in no other part of the British Empire, the judges are treated as magnified civil servants, and are underpaid. While they get their travelling expenses on circuit refunded, they are not free to travel to and fro throughout the Dominion as they should be permitted to do, in order that they might have an opportunity of learning how the different provinces conduct their law courts. I think the judges should be given an annual pass over all the railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: I quite agree that the judges are not receiving sufficiently high salaries, but the only way to remedy that is for Parliament to vote them a higher salary. I cannot see why we should expect the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways to help pay the salaries of our judges by giving them free passes. We should be big enough to pay them adequate salaries ourselves. Although the judges are not receiving adequate salaries, I might say that ever since I have been a member of the Government I have never found any difficulty in getting a man to accept a judgeship when one became vacant. We should appoint to the Bench the very best men we can get, and we cannot get the very best men at the salaries we are paying to-day. I believe that in some cases the result is that people probably do not get the judgments they would if we were able to appoint the very best judges. But I do not think we should discuss the salaries of judges on this Bill.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I will give a reason why they should be granted travelling passes. Historically and traditionally the judges should stand between the legislative body and the people. If there are a number of men chasing after judgeships it is because of the way in which the appointments are made. In the province of Alberta to-day there are three judgeships vacant, and twelve politicians looking for judgeships. So long as judgeships are granted principally for political services rendered, rather than upon a man's record at the Bar, just so long you will not be able to get the best men in the country to sit on the Bench.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I understand that the Government is considering the question of increasing the salaries of the judges. I think the reason advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton for granting passes to judges is a fallacious one. If judges should be allowed to travel on the railways free to see how court business is conducted in other portions of the Dominion, you should extend the same privilege to school teachers, for instance. The whole principle is wrong.

Section agreed to.

On section 371—municipal and other systems, connection with stations, etc.:

The CHAIRMAN: This section is amended by inserting in subsection (1), line 1, after "any" the word "province" and on line 7 after "such" the word "province". Subsection (2) is struck out and the following is substituted therefor:

(2) The Board may also upon the application of any interested party authorize any telephone company operated by any province, municipality or incorporated company to install at its own expense telephone connection with any station of the company, the annual charge, if any, to be paid by the company for such service and all other terms or conditions connected therewith to be such as the Board may determine having regard to all local conditions, but in no case is such charge to exceed the customary local rate.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is the telephone clause. All the different parties interested were heard before the Committee, and I think the section as now drafted is satisfactory to all.

Mr. BUREAU: It is a compromise clause?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 373, paragraph (b)—Height of wires:

Mr. J. D. REID: We took this matter up with the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the maximum height mentioned in this clause was agreed upon. Twenty-two feet was considered high enough in cities, towns and incorporated villages; 18 feet in the rural districts, and 17 feet at crossings.

Mr. BUREAU: What is a police village?

Mr. J. D. REID: In Ontario the Government gives power to a small number of people, probably 100 or 150, to form themselves into what is called a police village. They can assess themselves to put down sidewalks and make different local improvements.

Mr. NESBITT: They are separate from the township?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 374—Power companies:

Mr. J. D. REID: This section stands.

Mr. CAHILL: Why?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is the section that relates to Toronto. There will be quite a discussion on it and it will be necessary to take it up another day. Some members who are not here now would like to discuss it.

Mr. SHEARD: Will the minister fix a special day for the discussion of section 374?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. SHEARD: And will he announce the day in time?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the minister any idea when it will be?

Mr. J. D. REID: It will not be taken up again this week, but some day next week, probably on Tuesday, unless the Acting Prime Minister has something special for that day.

Mr. BUREAU: Can it not come up before Tuesday?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, not before Tuesday or Wednesday.

On section 376, subsection (7)—Connections with other systems, power of board to order:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Why were the words "including compensation if any", in subsection (7), in line 29, not struck out?

Mr. J. D. REID: We are now on section 376. We made no changes in it.

Mr. WALLACE: I move to amend subsection (7), of section 376 by striking out the words "including compensation if any" in line 29, and adding thereto the following:

> Provided however that the charge to such first-mentioned company, province, municipality or corporation for any long distance conversation or message transmitted over a line owned, controlled or operated by the company shall not be more than the established long distance rate of the company.

Mr. J. D. REID: We had a considerable discussion in the Committee in regard to this and went into the matter thoroughly, and the Committee decided that the clause as it is now and as it has been in the Bill should remain.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is this amendment made at the request or suggestion of the Bell Telephone Company or any other company?

Mr. J. D. REID: We are not moving the amendment; it is moved by the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace). I do not know at whose instance it is moved.

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps the hon. member might explain the amendment. Those present at the discussion in the Committee will understand it, but to many hon. members the striking out of a few words will not convey any clear meaning.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it for the purpose of restricting the jurisdiction of the Board and determining the terms upon which connections shall be made?

Mr. WALLACE: It is to provide that the Bell or any other telephone company shall not have power over independent telephones.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that when a small company want to connect with a larger system, if they cannot agree upon the terms they shall go before the Board, who shall determine the terms and conditions upon which they shall connect, and determine conmpensation, if any. What is the object of striking out the words "including compensation if any"? Is it to eliminate compensation, even if there is a right to it?

Mr. STEVENS: This was very fully discussed in the Committee. Certain persons desired to eliminate these words, "including compensation if any," because they claimed that no compensation should be allowed. The majority of the Committee decided that it would be better to leave it to the board to decide if compensation should be allowed.

Mr. BUREAU: That is what the clause does now?

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly. It was argued by the majority of the committee that if these words were eliminated the board would not have power to allow any compensation, no matter what the conditions were or how deserving the case. Therefore, the committee decided to leave these words in.

Mr. BUREAU: After discussing the matter?

Mr. STEVENS: After an exhaustive discussion for days.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the object of the amendment? If you strike out the words "including compensation if any" you limit the powers of the board. Supposing there is any damage done we prevent the board from assessing the damages. Is that the object?

Mr. MOWAT: I think I understand what the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) means. There is a strong feeling which he represents here, I understand, that users of the Bell telephone should have the same right to use their long distance lines as if they were subscribers, although they are subscribers to a private line. The way the law is now, and with the words "including compensation if any," there is an addition to the rates of the Bell Telephone company. It amounts to $600 in some cases where there are over 400 subscribers to a local line. It was thought that was too much of a burden to put on the users of the local telephone lines, and that all local telephone users should have the right to connect up with the Bell without paying that extra compensation.

Mr. BUREAU: We decide, without hearing the merits of the case, that whether or not any company is entitled to compensation they shall not have compensation?

An hon. MEMBER: That is what it means.

Mr. BUREAU: I think that is rather arbitrary, and I would not like to vote for anything of that kind. I think it would be better to leave it to the decision of the board after hearing the evidence. Unless there is some further explanation given I cannot see my way clear to support the amendment.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not see why the words "including compensation if any" should be in at all. "Upon such terms, as the board shall direct" ought to be sufficient. The inclusion of the words "such compensation if any" lends colour to the argument that compensation was intended. We had a case before the committee. I think it was the case of the Ingersoll Telephone company. This company had a large number of phones and sent about six times as much business to the Bell company as they got from it. It was a great advantage to the company. Many other companies would also do that. There are many small companies, some of them struggling to get along, sending business to the Bell company which is much more valuable to the Bell than the short distance connection is to themselves and to put in this section, "including compensation" and then after it the words "if any" carries with it the implication that compensation may be asked for. Compensation for what? For handing over revenues that the Bell would not otherwise get if they were not connected with the local company? I think the words "compensation if any" should be left out and that the section should read "upon such terms as the board deems just and expedient." That would be a fair clause. The question of compensation is not directly placed before the board to be dealt with.

Mr. BUREAU: Do you mean that it is a suggestion to the board that might influence them?

Mr. MORPHY: Yes. I think in a way it might possibly be so. It certainly would not suggest anything by way of compensation if the words were not there. Why put them in when you have the words "such terms and conditions as to the board may seem just and expedient?"

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member (Mr. Morphy) was a member of the committee and recalls the discussion we had about the very point he has raised.

Mr. MORPHY: Yes, I took the same ground there.

Mr. J. D. REID: My hon. friend took the same ground there. We went into the question very thoroughly and the majority of the committee decided that we should have these words in the clause. I think the clause should pass as it is here because this matter is left entirely in the hands of the board and they can take up each case and do justice to all parties concerned.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to explain this clause a little bit because I have been very much mixed up with this question the last few years. When the House of Commons passed this clause in 1917 they sent it to the Senate after striking out the words "including compensation." In the old Railway Act the words "including compensation" appeared. The Senate inserted the words "including compensation if any." They added the two little words "if any" to the words "including compensation" which had appeared in the old Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: They continued the language of the old Act?

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, and added the words "if any" so as to make it clear that it was not necessary to give compensation unless it was thought to be justified. Lawyers argued before the Committee that under the old Act containing the words "including compensation" the board necessarily had to give compensation because those words implied that compensation was to be allowed, but, that the addition of the words "if any" removed the obligation to give compensation. The Bell company did not charge compensation to those rural companies who were not competitors in cities, towns and villages but they did charge compensation where rural companies were competitors, for the reason, as they say, that the rural company takes away a certain number of their subscribers. Therefore they claim they should have compensation. I moved in 1917 that the words "including compensation" be struck out. That was carried in the Commons Committee at that time but the Senate put the words in again and added "if any" so as to leave it to the board, which made it better than it was before in my judgment. You have to bear in mind that the Bell company impose on the rural companies a charge over and above the regular rates and that is what the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is trying to get at by his amendment. They make a charge generally of about ten cents over and above the regular rates against the rural company connecting with them. That surcharge is generally divided half and half, but in some cases it is not so. At Ingersoll the Bell company get 7 cents and the Ingersoll company 3 cents, but they charge the Ingersoll company compensation to the extent of $300 because that company competes with them in the town of Ingersoll.

That is why at that time I moved that that be struck out, because, speaking offhand, they derived from the Ingersoll company about $1,100 one year and about $1,300 another year, while the Ingersoll company only got about $189 one year and less than that the next year. For that reason the rural companies—and they were here by the flock before the Committee—claimed that compensation should not be allowed to the Bell company, a good many of them also claimed that they should not be charged a surcharge. That was not listened to very favourably by the Committee, I confess, because they thought the Bell company should have something for the additional expense.

An hon. MEMBER: Some of them.

Mr. NESBITT: But as it passed the Committee I have nothing further to say about the matter. I moved at the time that that be struck out, I was defeated, and I am willing to take my defeat and abide by the decision of the majority. So far as Ingersoll is concerned, in 1917 the total earnings on surcharges were $1,632.09, of which the Bell company got $1,443 and the Ingersoll company $189, the latter company being charged $300 for the compensation.

Mr. MORPHY: For the privilege of giving a big revenue to the Bell company.

Mr. NESBITT: I have explained as nearly as I can the position that was taken throughout on this clause, and I repeat, having been defeated by the Committee I am willing to abide by my defeat.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I think the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is right: There should be no compensation, there should be reciprocity in a matter of this kind. The member speaks of the Bell company feeling aggrieved because some of their business was taken away. That would not have happened had they been reasonable with those who wished to use the telephone. The Bell company virtually made it impossible for the rural population to take their telephone service. Now that company comes along and wants compensation to the extent of thousands of dollars throughout the province. It is one of the greatest monopolies and I think the Committee would be quite justified in striking this clause out. The Bell company ought to be satisfied with what it gets and encourage reciprocity with outside telephone companies.

Mr. SEXSMITH: We had a similar fight when this Bill went through the House before, and after discussing it until two o'clock in the morning, the Committee struck the clause out. Of course, the hon. Senate saw fit to reinstate the words. I think the Bell Company have already a sufficient monopoly without allowing them to extort this compensation. I know municipal systems with hundreds of subscribers in country districts which the Bell Company refused accommodation, and if any subscriber on those systems required to use long distance, the Bell Company insisted on payment of the regular long distance charge and ten cents extra. Why should a man outside the city of Ottawa, if he happens to be on a municipal or privately-owned system, have to pay the Bell Company ten cents more than the Bell subscriber in the city of Ottawa, or a fereigner, if you like, coming in from another country? I think it is a prepostterous position. In the meantime those municipal and privately-owned rural systems are bringing in thousands of dollars to the Bell Company, and yet that company wants to penalize these systems.

Mr. J. D. REID: "Upon such terms, including compensation, if any, as the board deems just and expedient, and may order and direct how, when, where, by whom and upon what terms and conditions such use, connection or communication shall be had, constructed, installed, operated and maintained." If a rural line makes application to the Bell Company for a connection, and they cannot agree on terms, they have a right to appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the board has absolute power to compel the Bell Company to make that connection on this clause as it stands. I do not think that is where the complaint is; it is more as to compensation. I do not think that the question of compensation would arise in very many instances, but in any event a clause such as this protects all concerned, and we all have confidence in the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. SEXSMITH: What have the courts said?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know what the courts may have said in the past. But I understand that this clause gives the Board the final decision, with the reservation, of course, that in all cases there is a right of appeal from the Board to the Governor in Council. The Board can order that connection free of charge if it sees fit to do so, and of course the Act is framed entirely on the understanding that we have confidence in the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister explain why there should be any compensation at all?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not say there should be compensation if, for instance, it is merely a connection with a rural line. But, if I remember rightly, in the discussion before the Committee, cases were brought to our attention where there might be compensation. For instance, the Bell Company have connections all through the city of Ottawa; another company might bring in an independent line at a small cost and take away a lot of the Bell subscribers if they could get connection free of charge. In the opinion of the sub-committee there might be a question of compensation in some cases, and for that reason the words were left in by the Senate. In any case, that is the way the Bill came from the Senate, and the Committee thought it wise to leave it as it was.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was not on the Committee which dealt with this matter, and I am not as familiar with what took place as members of the Committee are. But I have a recollection of the debate that took place on this section a year ago, when the words "without compensation," were struck out of the Bill. These words, which were inserted by the Senate in the Bill this year, are evidently designed to enable the Bell Telephone Company to penalize any company that dares to compete with them. For many years the Bell Telephone Company, to which the people granted a very valuable franchise, neglected to extend its lines into rural districts; consequently, over six hundred telephone companies have been established in various parts of the country. I am familiar with the operation of the Ingersoll Telephone Company, which has been mentioned to-night. I believe it was singled out by the Bell Telephone Company as a company that dared enter into competition with the great Bell Company, in the town of Ingersoll; therefore a clause must be put in this Act to exact compensation from them.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is meant by "compensation" in this case?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Bell Telephone Company levies a tax of $300 a year upon outside companies for the privilege of connecting with the Bell lines. Besides, for every long distance call originating on the Ingersoll or on any other local line, ten cents additional has to be paid, of which the Bell Company takes seven cents and the local company three cents. Ten thousand calls must originate with the Ingersoll Company before they can get a cent of revenue out of this part of the service, because they have to pay $300 for the privilege of connecting with the Bell Telephone Company's line. As a matter of fact, these outside companies are of great service to the Bell Telephone Company; they enable it to reach the people in the rural districts. The number of long-distance calls originating on the Ingersoll line last year was 7,284; and 11,947 calls which originated on the Bell lines went over the Ingersoll lines. It seems to me that this charge of seven cents a call is ample compensation to the Bell Company. In justice to the local companies, an equal division should be made of that ten cents; the local company should get five cents and the Bell company five cents. That would be only fair, because the local company is of as much service to the Bell company as the Bell company is to the local company. For the life of me I cannot see why this provision should be in the Act. In a case which came before the Railway Board some years ago and was submitted to the courts, one of the judges decided that as Parliament had not defined the matter clearly, but had put these words in the Act, they must have intended that compensation should be paid in some instances. Those instances only occur where a company is in competition with the Bell company. If you are going to encourage monopoly, if you are going to strangle initiative and enterprise on the part of weaker or smaller companies, then, I say, leave these words in. But if you are going to see that justice is done to all, regardless of whether they are weak or strong, these words should be struck out of the Bill.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I was a member of the special committee that dealt with this Bill, and listened to most of the discussion. I voted against the section as it now stands in the Bill, so that I feel free to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace). The objection I have to mentioning compensation is that by doing so we imply that there are cases in which compensation ought to be given. I cannot make up my mind that there are any cases in which a tax of three, four or five hundred dollars should be imposed on a local company. The Bell Telephone company is looking for business; the greater the number of long distance messages brought to that company the more money they will make. It is an advantage to them to have the rural connection, and they get the lion's share of the ten cents extra that is paid by the sender of the message. This compensation is really used for the purpose of keeping down competition. The member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) told us that the Bell Telephone company did not insist upon exacting compensation in all cases; they asked for it only where there was competition. If, therefore, you give them the right to a compensation they will always ask for it for the purpose of keeping down competition. Why should Parliament assist the Bell Telephone company to keep down competition? The rates of the local lines, as well as those of the main line, are under the jurisdiction of the board, and if the local lines show a tendency to cut rates unduly the board will see that nothing unfair is done in that regard. There is no reason why compensation should be given when there is competition, but not when there is no competition. The objection is that the right to compensation is used for an ulterior purpose, and is not in the public interest. The matter is not important so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, but I understand that eight or nine hundred lines in Ontario which connect with the Bell Telephone company will be affected by our decision in this case. I intend to vote for my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a general Act controlling railways, telephones, telegraphs, etc., and it is administered very creditably by the Railway Commission. This clause refers not only to any one particular telephone company, but to the telephone companies of Canada generally; it applies just as much to the British Columbia Telephone Company as to the Bell Telephone Company in Ontario. Whenever a company or province, municipality or corporation desires to make a connection and cannot agree with the telephone company with respect to obtaining such use, connection or communication, such first mentioned company or province, municipality or corporation may apply to the Board for relief. What I want to impress upon the Committee is this. This clause is not, as many hon. members have intimated, some protection for the Bell Telephone Company, but really a restriction on such companies as the Bell Telephone Company. It provides that other companies not having the advantage of these larger concerns may apply to the Board for the terms of their connections, and the convenience of the public is undoubtedly considered by the Board as of primary importance. The clause continues:

> And the Board may order the company to provide for such use, connection or communication, upon such terms, including compensation if any.

The argument here is a question of fact. All those who are opposing the words now in the clause do so on the ground that there should be no compensation, but we are not in a position to decide that no case will arise anywhere in Canada where compensation may be desired. This works both ways. It does not affect only the Bell Telephone Company, although that company has been brought up as a sample case, and if we strike out these words, we are preventing the Board of Railway Commissioners from giving compensation where cases are clearly made out. The point I wish to make plain is this. This court has been set up for the purpose of trying these cases on their merits; this Committee and the special committee cannot possibly expect to decide these cases on their merits, and, therefore, we should give the Board the widest possible powers. I consider that those local companies, quoted so frequently here, are safe in the hands of the Board. I think we must all admit that. If the Railway Commission is not competent to administer this Act, then our first duty would be to make that court a competent court, but I submit that that court has, by its record, proved beyond all question that the public interest and the interests of various companies are quite safe in its charge. I feel it would be a serious mistake to restrict the powers of that Board to administer this clause or other clauses of a similar character in the Bill.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I quite agree with the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair). This is not a matter of want of confidence in the Railway Board at all; it is a matter for the Committee to decide. While I am not familiar with the telephone company of British Columbia, I am fairly familiar with the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, and if this Committee does not wish to say that the Bell Telephone Company, which is the great telephone company of this country, has a right to a monopoly and the right to make any other private or municipal company which wishes to use its long distance lines, pay the regular rate and to charge those people an extra ten cents, why should we not strike out those words?

Mr. J. D. REID: As I understand the hon. member, he wants the clause framed so that the Bell Telephone Company cannot charge that ten cent rate for a local connection, but the striking out of the words "including compensation if any" would not do what he wants, because the clause still reads that the Board has power to order the connection on whatever terms it may deem just and fair.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The private companies would be perfectly satisfied if those words were struck out because, apparently, there has been in the past some decision on those very words. But apart from that altogether, I cannot bring myself to the conclusion that the Bell Telephone Company has a right to charge any other company an extra ten cents unless we of this Committee say: Yes, because you have a monopoly now, we shall let you keep it, and we shall permit you to penalize the other private or municipal companies, some two or three hundred in number throughout Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: This is not a question which affects only Ontario. As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has said, it affects any telephone company. Why is the Bell Telephone Company brought into this argument? Simply to becloud the issue and to endeavour to arouse sympathy. We are legislating for the whole of Canada. The Bell Telephone Company are not operating in Manitoba, and I do not know if they are operating in British Columbia. Supposing the British Columbia Telephone Company have some connection to make with any private telephone company, why should they be deprived of getting compensation before the Railway Board because there is a grievance in one or two provinces against one particular telephone company?

Mr. STEVENS: In one province.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think that is fair. As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has stated, we must either accept the Board of Railway Commissioners as a fair tribunal or not trust them. We may trust them to give justice, and what this Parliament seeks to do is to enact legislation that will give justice. If we do not trust them what is the use of having a Board of Railway Commissioners and of submitting to that board all differences which may arise under the Railway Act. If we strike out those words, we curtail the powers of the board; we give notice to that court: We are willing that you should go a certain distance, but we do not trust you to go past that distance. I do not believe in limiting the jurisdiction of any court to serve a specific purpose, when in this Bill we are legislating for the whole of Canada and for every citizen in Canada. The deeds of the board in the past are such as to justify the confidence I have in them, and I am willing to trust them to remedy wrongs which may be done to any individual or company. We do not want to becloud the issue the same as was done as regards another Bill when it was made to appear that because certain members did not agree to a clause in the Bill, they were against public ownership of railways. That was not the question, and that is not the question here. There is a tribunal to settle all these differences, and I think we can safely leave this matter to the board.

Mr. FIELDING: I think the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith), the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), and the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) were excellent arguments to advance before the Board of Railway Commissioners, but they did not seem to me to be reasons why we should not allow the board to inquire into the question. If we were asked to decide now whether there shall or shall not be compensation, we might have some difficulty in determining and I think in the light of the excellent speeches I have just listened to I would vote against it, but all we are asked to determine now is: shall the board be permitted to inquire whether there is at any time a case for compensation? That surely is a question within their proper authority. The words " compensation, if any " which are in dispute may naturally give the company ground for making a claim. To that extent the words are worth something to them, but who will say that they will have any influence on the mind of the Board of Railway Commissioners? Surely they are not going to be influenced by these words. If the words encourage the Bell Telephone or any other company to base a claim upon them, why, it pleases them and does not hurt anybody, because the Board of Railway Commissioners is the tribunal, and surely we can permit them to inquire whether or not in any exceptional case there is a fair claim for compensation.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It is not simply a matter of the Bell Telephone company, but concerns every long-distance telephone company. The question for this committee to decide is whether the privately-owned and the municipally-owned telephone companies shall be compelled to pay the Bell Telephone Company, in addition to the regular rate, ten cents a message for long distance. I have confidence in the Board of Railway Commissioners, but is this committee going to say that every privately-owned and municipally-owned telephone company must apply to the Railway Board if it does not wish to pay that extra ten cents?

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). The people have found it necessary to build rural telephones for themselves because large corporations like the Bell Telephone have refused to do so. They had to invest money in these telephone companies, many of which I know have never paid one cent of interest. Then they have to pay for an expensive connection in order to get a long distance message over the 'phone. I claim that that is an injustice to the public. The telephone may be called a public utility, and its extension into the rural districts is going to be one of the great factors in keeping people on the land. We should encourage these small telephone companies instead of holding a club over them in the shape of a clause like this. I think it will be in the public interest to eliminate this clause altogether. Very few of these small companies pay more than operating expenses, while the Bell Telephone is one of the richest corporations in Canada to-day. The daily papers show that they are paying dividends of about 8 per cent, and now they are increasing their share issue and allotting them in the proportion of one to every four held, and a shareholder of the company will be able to get them for about 12 per cent less than the market value. I do not think this corporation needs any encouragement from this Parliament. I think we should pass legislation to protect the people, and especially the rural people, so that they will stay on the farm and produce, as they must produce if we are to pay off our national debt.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: These particular words with compensation have been in the Act now for a number of years, and we are in a position to judge of their effect. The argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) would be very convincing if this were new legislation, but it is not. We know from actual experience that those words are in there with a view to prevent competition with the Bell Telephone Company. I understand that that question was argued before the Special Committee. It was not a question of lines in Western Canada or British Columbia, but a question of the lines that were competing with the Bell Telephone Company. The Bell Telephone wants these companies penalized for encroaching upon their preserves. It has been mentioned here that the Ingersoll Company is one of the greatest offenders in that respect. It is a rather remarkable thing that the Ingersoll Telephone Company built their lines out into all the country surrounding Ingersoll, the Bell Telephone having refused to extend their lines outside the town. Ingersoll has a population of nearly 6,000 people, and many of the townspeople were anxious to connect up with the people in the rural districts, and in consequence the Ingersoll Telephone Company has about 600 subscribers in Ingersoll, and is therefore in competition with the Bell Telephone in that town. On 10,000 calls sent out over these rural lines the Ingersoll Company does not collect one cent of revenue, because the Bell Telephone takes it as compensation. After 10,000, the Ingersoll Company gets three cents and the Bell seven cents on every call. That is the actual experience of this small company with the great Bell Telephone Company, and it is now looking to this Parliament, not to the Railway Commissioners, but to the men who have been sent here to represent the people, to pass legislation that will protect them against injustice of this kind. In fairness to them, we should not leave this matter in doubt for one moment. Parliament should put itself on record as disapproving of any such conduct on the part of the Bell Telephone Company. I would go much further and say that the small companies should receive fifty per cent of the revenue derived from the long distance calls originating on their lines, instead of the ten cents being divided in the proportion of three and seven.

Mr. NESBITT: There are a good many companies that receive half on every call. I belong to two such companies myself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: By making some private arrangement with the Bell Telephone Company. The hon. gentleman's argument goes to justify the striking out of these words.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: There is a point that seems to have been overlooked in connection with the word "compensation." I believe there is a decision of the court in which it is held that when Parliament inserted the word "compensation" it was a reasonable presumption that the board must grant compensation whether they deemed it to be just or not. We can accept the judgments of the Railway Commission as being just, and our confidence in the commission would be best expressed if we omitted the word "compensation," for we would thereby leave the whole question to them. The clause without the word "compensation" will read:

> the Board may order the company to provide for such use, connection or communication, upon such terms, including compensation—

Mr. FIELDING: If any.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Yes. The word was struck out by this Parliament in 1917 and reinserted by the Senate this year. The Senate reinserted the words "including compensation" and added "if any" afterwards. I am not a lawyer and do not presume to argue this question from the legal standpoint, but I think the majority of lawyers will agree with me that if we put in the words "including compensation if any" there is a reasonable presumption that we anticipate that there will be compensation, and that we are directing the Board of Railway Commissioners to find compensation. Without these words we leave the whole matter to them, the same as we would any question of rates for the carriage of freight or passengers, or any other matter that rests with them.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am in an awkward position in regard to the amendment. I can support the striking out of the words "including compensation if any" but not the rest of the amendment. I think the board should have an entirely free hand as regards rates. I understand that the Supreme Court of Ontario decided that they felt themselves bound by some meaning attaching to the word "compensation." I am in favour of leaving these words out but I would not support the rest of the amendment.

Mr. J. D. REID: That decision of the court, I believe, was in connection with the original Railway Act, which read: "Upon such terms as to compensation as the board deems just and expedient." In that case it was decided that there should be compensation according to that interpretation. The words "if any" have been added so that it is plain the board will have power to decide whether there shall be any compensation or not. If these words were struck out the Board of Railway Commissioners would not have power to allow compensation even if it were considered that compensation should be allowed. The very fact of Parliament having struck out the words would be interpreted as an intention on the part of Parliament that there should be no compensation, and the board would have no jurisdiction as regards compensation. If the rest of the clause is left in, they will, of course, have the right to arrange as regards rates and tolls.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the board will have every power they can possibly require, even after you have omitted these words on line 29. If they cannot give compensation they can increase the rates and even things up in that way. They need not call it compensation. We are giving them absolute power to deal with every phase of argument that can be presented by both sides. I have never had the pleasure of appearing before the board, who, I understand, are a very democratic court and will hear everything properly presented to them, and will make a decision covering the whole ground. It is open to parties who go before them to argue as strongly as they can from both sides, and the board will reach its conclusions on the merits of the full facts. It is unnecessary to suggest to them that they have to consider the question of compensation. If it is decided to leave them a free hand without any encumbrance, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of Ontario, I am in favour of striking these words out and will vote accordingly; but if the hon. member insists upon the rest of his amendment, I cannot vote for it.

Mr. BALL: The words "including compensation" are entirely superfluous. Their elimination would not detract from the powers of the board one iota. The matter would be fully covered if the section read:

The Board may order the company to provide for such use, connection or communication upon such terms as the Board deems just and expedient.

The word "compensation" is unnecessary, misleading and suggestive, and the board would have full power without them. The words "including compensation if any" are objected to by those who have experienced the effect of this clause. I have had communications from rural telephone companies in my riding and it is felt that these words should be eliminated.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I would move that the words "including compensation if any" on line 29 be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN: That is part of the amendment.

Mr. J. D. REID: If there were a connection with the Bell Telephone company in the East or the company in the West they would not get any of the extra charge which would go to the rural line. The clause would read:—

Provided however that the charge to such first-mentioned company, province, municipality or corporation for any long distance conversation or message transmitted over a line owned, controlled or operated by the company shall not be more than the established long distance rate of the company.

Therefore if connection is made with the Bell Telephone Company, or the British Columbia company, it will be made without any extra charge.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: It does seem to me that it is our duty as representatives of the people to protect them. In putting through a clause suggesting that the board may allow compensation if they see fit, we are giving an invitation to the board to make a charge against these companies. We all have confidence in the Board of Railway Commissioners and it is unfair that we should put in the Act a provision of this kind. If we are satisfied that the clause should not be there it is our duty to strike it out. Speaking for myself I am quite satisfied that it should not be there. I think there is no bigger monopoly in Canada than the Bell Telephone Company. They have made loads of money—so much money that they do not know what to do with it, and they had to create an insurance company in order to use it up. You are admitting here that they should have the privilege of charging for something for which they should not be allowed to charge. We have been neglecting our duty in the past in regard to this matter. Our duty to-night is to strike out these words. The ten-cent charge is an outrage and it should not be tolerated for a minute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In view of the explanation that has been made, and the exception that has been taken, I think the difficulty can be overcome by moving as an amendment to the amendment that the section be made to read "upon such terms, excluding compensation, as the board may deem just." In view of the fact that the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for—

The CHAIRMAN: The ruling I gave a moment ago concerning the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) was that the ground covered by the sub-amendment was already dealt with in the amendment. If the amendment is adopted by the Committee there will be no reason for the hon. gentleman to move his proposed amendment but if the amendment is not adopted he will be in order in proposing a new amendment to strike out these words.

Mr. WALLACE: I will be very glad to agree to the cutting out of the words in the 29th line "including compensation if any."

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the hon. member wish to drop the rest of the amendment?

Mr. WALLACE: I just propose to cut out the words "including compensation if any." I therefore beg to move:

That sub-section 7 of section 376 be amended by striking out in line 25, the words "including compensation if any".

The Committee divided on the amendment (Mr. Wallace). Yeas 47, nays 9

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 380—statistics and returns:

Mr. J. D. REID: moved that the section be amended as follows:

Section 380, in the subtitle, strike out the words "To the Minister."

Subsection (1), line 4, strike out the words "and furnished", and on line 5, substitute the word "Board" for the word "Minister".

Subsection (2), line 7, strike out the word "Minister" and substitute therefor the word "Board."

Subsection (3), line 8, substitute the word "Board" for the word "Minister".

Subsection (4), line 3, substitute the words "Dominion Statistician" for the word "Minister," and on line 5, substitute the word "Board" for the word "Minister".

Subsection (5) struck out.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the minister explain why these clauses 380 to 384, were not struck out altogether as they already appear in the Statistics Act? I take it that these amendments are suggested to make these clauses conform more to the Statistics Act. I would also call the minister's attention to the fact that clause 385 seems to cover the same subject. Perhaps there is an explanation. I was not a member of the special committee and I do not know what discussion took place there.

Mr. J. D. REID: Statistics have in the past been collected by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The Board of Railway Commissioners are collecting certain statistics and they perhaps know better what statistics should be collected. It was thought advisable that the statistics should be sent to the Board of Railway Commissioners and the Dominion Statistician.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The Department of Railways and Canals will have nothing to do henceforth with gathering statistics?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, this duty is assumed by the Board of Railway Commissioners and the Dominion Statistician. It is they who print the statistics for the public. The Board of Railway Commissioners keep their copy on their file and use it for their own purposes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does not section 385 cover very much the same ground as the preceding clauses?

Mr. J. D. REID: When we get to section 385 we can deal with that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understood that has already been settled.

Mr. J. D. REID: That has been passed.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 381—traffic returns:

Mr. J. D. REID: moved to amend the section as follows:

Section 381, subsection (1), line 3, substitute "Board" for 'Minister' and on line 3, substitute "monthly" for 'weekly,' and on line 4, substitute "close' for 'seventh,' and strike out all the words after 'inclusive' on line 5 to the end of the subsection.

Subsection (2), line 2, strike out the words 'and furnished,' and substitute "Board" for 'Minister.'

Subsection (3), line 4, substitute "Dominion Statistician" for 'Minister.'

Subsection (4), line 1, substitute "Board" for 'Minister.'

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 382—annual returns of accidents:

Mr. J. D. REID moved that the section be amended as follows:

Section 382, subsection (1), substitute "Board" for 'Minister' on lines 3 and 5.

Subsection (2), line 6, substitute "December" for 'June.'

Subsection (3), line 3, substitute "Dominion Statistician for 'Minister,' and on line 4, substitute "February" for 'August.'

Subsection (4), line 2, substitute "Board" for 'Minister.'

Subsection (5), line 1, substitute "Board" for 'Minister.'

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 383—further returns as to accidents:

Mr. J. D. REID moved that the section be amended as follows:

Section 383, substitute "Board" for 'Minister' on lines 1, 2, and 7, and on line 8, substitute "their" for 'his.'

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 385—board may require returns:

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member (Mr. Campbell) was asking about section 385.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would move that this section be reconsidered. I would like to have the minister's explanation regarding it.

Mr. J. D. REID: Clause 385 has been in the Act for some years, and the Committee thought it wise to leave it in. I understand that on this statistical matter, which includes this clause, the Dominion Statistician, Mr. Coats, and Sir Henry Drayton, the Chief Commissioner, got together and framed clauses 380, 381, 382 and 383, which we have just passed, and this clause 385, and the amendments as I have given them were handed to me by Mr. Coats. I did not go into this particular clause with him, but took it for granted that it must be satisfactory to him and the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The clause seems to be superfluous. I suppose it will not do any particular harm, but I do not see why 385, which covers practically the same matters as 380 to 384, should be left in.

Mr. J. D. REID: It covers more than the others.

Mr. CAMPBELL: We are amending the Act and should amend it properly.

Mr. NESBITT: Clause 385 is the financial clause.

On section 392—limitation:

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The meaning of subsection (1) has for years been the subject of judicial disagreement and doubt, and it should be redrafted to clearly define these three distinctions: The time limit for personal actions, the time limit for actions as to land damages, and the time limit for any actions not otherwise covered.

Section agreed to.

On section 409—Walking on Track. Penalty:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am afraid the language is not right. After amendment the section will read:

Every person not connected with the railway or employed by the company who trespasses upon the yard or track of the company, except where the same is laid across or along a highway, is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding ten dollars.

What does the word "same" refer to? If it refers to the track I can understand it; but if it refers to the yard I do not see how that can be laid along or across a highway.

Mr. BUREAU: There may be a street going through the yard. We have that in Three Rivers.

Mr. J. D. REID: We can pass it, and I will get it redrafted.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 436—Opening package with intent to steal contents:

Mr. J. D. REID: That is amended to make the section clearer.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 444—subsection (c)—fraudulently entering train:

Mr. BUREAU: Has there been any doubt expressed that a man who is under the orders of the section foreman is liable under this section?

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no reason why any person fraudulently entering a train with the intention of not paying his fare should not be punished, whether it be done with or without the knowledge of the company's employees. If with the knowledge and consent of an officer or servant of the company, he is guilty of a conspiracy to defraud, which clearly should be punishable.

Section as amended agreed to.

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Order for the House to again go into Committee on Bill No. 53 (from the Senate) to amend the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue): This Bill was before Committee of the Whole some few days ago when very substantial amendments were proposed. In some respects the Bill is contentious, and requests have been made by many persons in regard to certain of its provisions. It is very desirable, I think, that these persons be heard, and the most convenient way of so doing is to refer the Bill to a special committee. I move, with the unanimous consent of the House:

That Order 21 be struck from the Order Paper and that Bill No. 53 be referred to a special committee consisting of Messrs. Beland, Copp, Cowan, Douglas (Cape Breton South and Richmond), Long, McMaster, Manion, Nesbitt, Pedlow, Sheard, Stevens and Sutherland, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): At this late stage of the session it is very unlikely that the special committee which is now proposed will have time to sit, and hear evidence and report. I do not know what procedure could be suggested in lieu of what is now contemplated, but it is obvious there will not be time now for a special committee to consider this Bill in all its details and report, and then for opportunity to be afforded for a thorough consideration of the measure by the House.

I would suggest that we further consider the Bill in Committee of the Whole. No doubt the hon. minister has had a number of interviews since the Bill was considered in Committee, and he might be in a position to suggest some amendments. I believe that would be the proper course to adopt, otherwise it means that the law will remain as it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: I have had many requests from hon. gentlemen to appoint this Committee. I think if the Committee when properly constituted fixes one day for the hearing, that will be sufficient. There is no reason as far as I can see why the Committee should not report the Bill promptly.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I hope it will be a lesson to the Government to introduce Bills of this importance in the House of Commons instead of in the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent. Do I understand the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) to object?

Mr. BELAND: No, I do not object. I understand that the Committee will have power to summon witnesses before it to give evidence. That in itself will require more than one sitting.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Committee need not exercise that power. Motions of this kind invariably contain those words. The power is there in the event of the Committee desiring to call any one before it, but I do not think there will be any necessity to exercise the power.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): May we have the assurance of the hon. minister that the Bill will reappear this session?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I see no reason why it should not. I have every desire to expedite the Bill.

PROHIBITION.

BILL TO CONFIRM ORDERS IN COUNCIL PROHIBITING IMPORTATION, MANUFACTURE AND TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 107 to confirm the Order in Council of the twenty-fourth day of February, 1919, prohibiting the importation, manufacture and transportation of intoxicating liquors, and the Order in Council of the twelfth day of April, 1919, in amendment thereof:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Will the Acting Prime Minister give us some information on the details of the Bill?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Upon consideration by the Committee of the resolution which preceded this Bill I made a full statement as to its nature and scope and I do not know that there is anything I can usefully add on this occasion. If in Committee further information is required in regard to any of the sections of the Bill, I shall, of course, be pleased to reply in as great detail as may be necessary.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1, subsection (1)—Orders in Council confirmed. Definition of "prohibited area" amended. Importation of permitted wine allowed. Manufacture of liquor that may be sold in any province to be permitted in such province. Transportation of liquor, the use of which is permitted, to be allowed. Sale of liquor which is in prohibited area allowed but not delivery in that area.

Mr. BUREAU: Could we have the regulation read now as amended before we proceed? To hear that a word is stricken off in the third line or added in the sixth line does not help us very much.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon friend will have no difficulty in following it. He will find in the schedule the regulations referred to, and the amendments are of a comparatively simple character. I will send up to the Parliamentary counsel to see if he has a copy of the Bill in its amended form, but in the meantime I think we can make progress. For example, take the first section:

> The Orders in Council marked "A" and "B" in the Schedule to this Act are hereby declared to be valid and are ratified and confirmed, and declared to have the force of law according to their terms, subject to the following amendments to the said Order in Council marked "A."

That is to say, as I explained upon the resolution, the Government is asking the House to ratify and confirm the two Orders in Council, subject to such amendments as are necessary to enable effect to be given to any provincial legislation respecting the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. Then take subsection (a) of section 1.

> Paragraph (c) of regulation one is amended by striking out all the words after the word "wine" in the last line thereof and inserting the following words in lieu thereof: "or other intoxicating liquors of limited alcoholic content are permitted."

Mr. BUREAU: That may be all right, but we had the same thing last night, if I may be permitted to inform the Acting Prime Minister. Somebody is charged with the duty of drafting amendments to a Bill, and the Bill is examined by a sub-committee. We have full confidence in the sub-committee, and we are satisfied that the Parliamentary counsel has seen that the drafting is proper. But we have not the law before us as amended, and I think it unfair to any member of this House to have a clause read to him full steam stating that in the first line all words are struck out after the word "wine," and certain words are added in the second line, and so on. That is not the proper way to pass legislation. I suggest that the regulations as amended should be submitted to the members in order that they may have a chance to make a comparison between the law as it exists and the law as it will be when amended.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand that some members of the Committee desire to speak generally on the question, and while an opportunity is being afforded them, I shall endeavour to see if we can get the regulations in the form suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. CRONYN: Mr. Chairman, if I am now in order, I desire to make a few remarks on this clause and to suggest two amendments thereto. In the first place, when the resolution on which this Bill is founded came up for discussion, I suggested an amendment which was not approved by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), and which was dropped. Upon reading his remarks in Hansard, I take it that the basis upon which the Government is acting in this matter is set out in these words by the Acting Prime Minister on page 2440 of Hansard:

> The principle which should underlie the action of the Dominion with respect to legislation of this kind in recognition of the rights of the provinces to enact such legislation within their jurisdiction as they may deem proper.

And again, on page 2438, the Acting Prime Minister states:

> I should be prepared to consider an amendment to the resolution which would provide for the importation into a province of wine not exceeding the alcoholic standard authorized by the law of that province. Such an amendment might provide for importation from a country outside of Canada, or for transportation from another province in Canada, into any province where such a law as I have mentioned is in effect.

Following the reason of the Acting Prime Minister, I feel it will be necessary to drop my former suggestion. I note that his position, which is also that of the Cabinet, has been approved by a body called, I think, the Dominion Alliance, which is prepared to endorse the Government in accepting the provincial view on matters concerning prohibition. I, therefore, do not purpose making any general remarks on the Bill itself. It would be futile to mention the fact, and I understand it to be a fact, that a petition of 1,500 Trades Unions was presented to the Government last February asking for an increase in the strength of beer. The answer, in view of the attitude of the Government, would be logically this: You must go to your provincial legislature and request it to increase the strength of the beer, if that is your desire. It would be useless to discuss the fact that in various states of the Union and in a number of European countries, beers of a strength of from two to three per cent alcohol by weight are declared to be non-intoxicants and are advocated very strongly by temperance societies and other bodies in those countries. But I do question whether this new Bill follows the provincial law, and I hope to be able to submit to the Committee a statement, which, if the Committee reach the opinion which I have reached, may cause them to favour the amendments which I shall suggest.

I want to take the case of Ontario as an example. I have no familiarity with the laws of the other provinces, but I have before me a copy of the Ontario Temperance Act. It is necessary for the consideration of this subject that the Committee follow as closely as they may be able, the law of Ontario as, in my opinion, it stands to-day. Under section 40 of the Ontario Temperance Act passed in 1916, there is a sweeping clause prohibiting any person from selling any liquor,—which, under the interpretation clause, is defined to be any liquid having an alcoholic strength of more than 2½ per cent proof spirits. Section 41 is another sweeping clause and it provides, that no person by himself, his clerk, servant or agent shall have or keep or give liquor in any place wheresoever, other than in the private dwelling house in which he resides, without having first obtained a license under this Act authorizing him so to do. Then there follow three clauses to which I wish to draw the attention of the Committee, and which may be classed as clauses of exception. I do not desire to read all of each of these clauses as portions do not affect the question at issue, but I hope to read all the words which have any bearing on the subject. Section 43 provides, amongst other things—and this section was enacted first in 1916, and amended in 1917:—

> Nothing in section 41 contained shall prevent common carriers or other persons from carrying or conveying liquor from a place outside of Ontario to a place where the same may be lawfully received and lawfully kept in Ontario, or from a place where such liquor is lawfully kept and lawfully delivered within Ontario to a place outside Ontario, or from a place where such liquor may be lawfully kept and lawfully delivered in Ontario to another place in Ontario where the same may be lawfully kept, or through Ontario from a place outside of it to another place outside of it.

That clause, as will be seen, deals with common carriers or other persons interested in transportation. Then section 45 reads:

> Nothing herein contained shall prevent any brewer, distiller or other person duly licensed by the Government of Canada, for the manufacture of spirituous, fermented or other liquors, from keeping or having liquor manufactured by him in any building wherein such manufacture is carried on, provided such building does not contravene the provisions of section 39 hereof, or for selling liquor therefrom to a person in another province or in a foreign country—

I just want to emphasize that line, which is repeated in the next section.

—or for selling liquor therefrom to a person in another province or in a foreign country or to a licensee under this Act, or to the keeper of a liquor warehouse within the meaning of section 46.

Then this clause was amended at the last session of the legislature by repealing certain words and adding these:—

Nor shall it prevent a distiller selling alcohol to a wholesale druggist.

Then subsection (1) of section 46, which is very much along the same line as the last section I have read, reads:—

Nothing herein contained shall prevent any person from having liquor for export sale in his liquor warehouse, provided such liquor warehouse and the business carried on therein complies with the requirements in subsection 2 hereof mentioned, or from selling such liquor from such warehouse to persons in other provinces or in foreign countries.

Under these sections of the Act—and I do not think there are, in that very voluminous Act, others which materially affect the provisions of those sections—the law of Ontario is clear that while one could not sell liquor having a strength of more than 2½ per cent proof spirits in Ontario, it was possible to manufacture and export to places outside of Ontario liquor of a greater strength. Since that Act was passed, the Orders in Council, of which those now before us are a consolidation, came into effect, and in 1918 the Legislature of Ontario added section 154 to the Ontario Temperance Act, which reads:—

During the time any statute of the Parliament of Canada or any Order in Council passed thereunder is in force, the effect of which is to prohibit the transportation of liquor into or out of this province for any purpose, sections 43, 45, 46 and section 139 of the Ontario Temperance Act shall be deemed to be suspended to the extent necessary to conform to the provisions of such statute or order.

I would call the attention of the Committee particularly to the words "shall be deemed to be suspended." I submit that the real effect of the Bill before the Committee is not to implement the provincial law, but actually to supplant it. The provincial law, as I hope I have made clear, did allow the export of liquor of a greater strength than that mentioned, and the Order in Council actually prevents it. It is quite true it may be argued that the Ontario Legislature suspended the operation of the four sections I have mentioned during the continuance of the Orders in Council, but if we now confirm by this legislation those Orders in Council, are we not virtually legislating for Ontario? That is the effect, and if I cannot make that clear, I must confess to failure.

It may be argued that Ontario recognized the Orders in Council and was only too glad to lay the burden upon the shoulders of the Dominion—words to that effect were used in a former discussion. I rather take it that Ontario desired no clash of jurisdiction between the province and the Dominion and was quite willing to supplement the Dominion Order in Council by saying "While that Order in Council is in force we shall suspend the effect of our Act."

In order that the Committee may understand the effect of the amendment I shall propose, I will read subsection 1 of section 3 of the regulations, appearing on page 4 of the Bill, as amended by section 1 of the Bill:

No person shall make or manufacture intoxicating liquor or cause intoxicating liquor to be made or manufactured within the Dominion of Canada after the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen: Provided that in case the sale of intoxicating liquor of any class for beverage purposes is permitted in any province, this regulation shall not apply to the manufacture of such intoxicating liquor in such province.

Section 1 of the Bill strikes out all the words after "province" in subsection (1) of section 3, so that the subsection as amended will read as above. Now my amendment is that the last three words "in such province" shall be struck out. The proviso will then read as follows:

Provided that in case the sale of intoxicating liquor of any class for beverage purposes is permitted in any province, this regulation shall not apply to the manufacture of such intoxicating liquor.

In other words, as the law of Quebec allows beer of a strength of 2.96 per cent to be manufactured and sold in that province, the other provinces may lawfully manufacture beer of that strength.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It will be a case of Quebec ruling Canada.

Mr. CRONYN: Perhaps so. The amendment, of course, does not make the sale of that beer lawful in any province outside of Quebec. It would be just as unlawful for a brewer to sell beer of that strength in Ontario as to sell to the public the stronger beer which the brewers now manufacture and sell for medicinal purposes to licensed vendors.

Combined with the amendment I have proposed, I also suggest an amendment to subsection (3) of section 3 of the regulations, and in this case my amendment has to be read into the amendment proposed by the Government. I will now read subsection 3 as it will read with the combined amendment:

No person after the first day of April 1918, shall send, take, transport into or deliver in any prohibited area any intoxicating liquor, or cause any intoxicating liquors to be sent, transported or delivered.

I leave out the proviso which then follows, because it has only a temporary effect and does not govern this case at all, and I will read the second proviso with the combined amendment:

Provided that this regulation shall not apply to the sending, taking, transporting or delivering any intoxicating liquor lawfully manufactured in any province to any place where such intoxicating liquor may lawfully be sold.

Hon. members will see that my amendment strikes out the words "in such province" from the amendment appearing in paragraph (d) of section 1 of the Bill. I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. Bureau) that it is most difficult to follow the Bill in its present form. The net effect of the two amendments I have proposed is to allow the manufacture of beer of the strength permitted by the province of Quebec in any province of the Dominion. It does not permit the manufacture of any other liquor; it would, of course, permit the manufacture of wine up to the Quebec strength, but that is already provided for under a special proviso. It would also permit the export of that beer not only to the province of Quebec but to any foreign country where it can lawfully be sold. That is the total net effect of striking out the words "in such province" in the two subsections.

It restores to the breweries throughout Canada—because it affects only the breweries, as I read the Act—their right to export ale of only Quebec strength to any country where it may lawfully be sold.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the present proposition?

Mr. CRONYN: That is the proposition as embodied in the amendment I have suggested. Under the Bill as brought down here, while you can import into Quebec wines of Quebec strength from anywhere in the world including Ontario, you cannot export from Ontario or any province beers of any strength greater than 2½ per cent proof spirit. That is the rule in Ontario, and, I understand, it is the same rule throughout the rest of Canada. The curious fact should be noted that if Ontario is so ill advised as to follow the example set by Quebec—some people may quarrel with my phraseology describing it as ill advised—and allow beer and wine of limited strength to be sold there, while Ontario could manufacture that beer it could not under this Act be sold outside of Ontario; and Quebec could not export her beer into Ontario, nor could any other province. As I said, I did not come prepared to discuss the general question, but I do not want this Committee to be under any misapprehension as to my view thereon. I am delighted to testify to the benefits derived from the abolition of the sale of ardent spirits under the Ontario Temperance Act, and I would be very sorry to see that Act repealed. But I am also of the opinion that the best measure of temperance to-day is that one, or something akin to it, adopted by the province of Quebec. I therefore move:

To amend clause 1 of the Bill by striking from sub-paragraph (d) of subsection one, the words "in such province" where they appear in the thirtieth line of the said bill and by adding as sub-paragraph (f) of subsection one, the following words:

"(f) Subsection one of regulation three is amended by striking out the words 'in such province' in the eighth line thereof."

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I want to understand what the hon. member is doing by his amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Some one is joking—

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Well, I hope my voice is at once circumventing the acoustics of the Chamber and penetrating the somewhat dull faculties of my interrupters. I want to know what my hon. friend exactly desires to accomplish by his amendment. Does he want Ontario to manufacture these liquors, where they are not drunk, and export them into Quebec for sale there?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. CRONYN: To manufacture what may be termed "lager," which is absolutely the Quebec standard and export it not only into Quebec, but into any country where it may lawfully be sold.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does the hon. member not think that that would be a most immoral proceeding—at least from the Ontario point of view?

Mr. CRONYN: Can my hon. friend justify the Ontario point of view which allows the manufacture and sale of native wine having an alcoholic strength up to perhaps 20 per cent proof spirits?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That is not under discussion.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: The question is, do we or do we not want a "dry" Canada? The answer is; we do. Considerable effort has been made to prove that the working men are anxious to return to the old condition of things. Even Gompers has given his view on liquor drinking and is rather encouraging the use of strong drinks among working men. From my experience I will venture to say, notwithstanding the endeavours that are made to draw the workman into this issue, that the liquor interests are involved in the attempt to revert to the old condition of things; and before I conclude my remarks I think I shall be able to convince the Committee that the workingmen generally do not want that condition. It is untrue that the workingmen are asking for it. But there are certain interests that are making capital out of the question for their personal advantage and at the expense of the workingmen. Let us consider the question from some concrete standpoints. Do the railway companies, for instance, want to employ men who indulge in drinking either wine or beer? My experience is that any man who shows any indication of being addicted to the drink habit is turned down, and there is no use whatever for men of his type. Then take the manufacturers—and we have many of them in this Chamber. One such gentleman is sitting very close to me and no doubt he employs hundreds of men. I would like to ask him if he or any other manufacturer would employ to operate machinery men who showed signs of intoxication. I think not. And take the banks. I know of one instance in which a bank was wrecked through over-indulgence on the part of one of its principal men; and in another case of which I am aware, a man who had imbibed too freely lost one of the best positions in connection with the management of a bank. And in connection with the steam ship companies no man who is addicted to the drink habit even in the slightest degree will be employed, for we know that accidents have frequently happened and lives have been lost because men employed in occupations of this kind have given way to drink. I remember a few years ago that to be a school trustee or an alderman or a controller, a mayor or member of Parliament, one could not succeed unless he had been endorsed by the saloon-keeper or the hotel-keeper. This condition was rather embarrassing. If a respectable candidate wanted to offer himself for election, he would have to make terms with this class of people, and it meant that he had to go to every saloon in the riding and saturate the voters with booze so as to satisfy the saloon-keeper.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That was not in Toronto.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: It was in a large city in this province. I have seen this condition time and again, and I have experienced it when offering myself in opposition to that class. I have seen candidates go from saloon to saloon to debauch the voters with a view to getting their support, and I might mention a rather amusing incident. I know of a candidate who catered extensively to people of this type. He would call into the saloon perhaps about twenty or thirty men, and there would be in all some hundred men in the saloon. He would purchase drinks for all the "boys" who, as soon as they had quaffed their fill, made their escape. The candidate could not understand it, but when he got to the next corner the men were all there as dry as ever. He went the rounds for a couple of hours, and the crowd grew larger and larger at each saloon, until after a while there was no saloon large enough to accommodate the men who had been trying without success for hours to slake their thirst. That condition of things has passed away, and we do not want a return to it. We know the debauching effect drink has had on the people generally, even when supplied by candidates who wanted to ensure their elections and to be considered pretty good fellows into the bargain. In satisfying those who were ready to drink, they were only injuring men who would be better off without liquor. I wish to call the attention of the House to two or three statements which I shall quote as bearing upon this important question:

Prohibition Extending in Europe.

The trend of public opinion throughout Europe is all against the Liquor traffic. Legislation prohibiting certain classes of spirits had been adopted prior to the war, and, since the outbreak of hostilities this has been largely extended, both in belligerent and neutral countries, while beer and wine have been prohibited in some countries and greatly restricted in others.

Total prohibition has been enacted in Russia, Roumania, Finland, Iceland, Greenland, the Faroe Island, and among the North Sea Fisheries. Absinthe and similar spirits have been prohibited in France, absinthe in Switzerland, Italy, Holland, and Belgium: branvin in parts of Norway and throughout the rural parts and in some of the cities of Sweden: the use of home grown corn and potatoes for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor is prohibited in Denmark and other countries: the manufacture of spirits for beverage purposes has ceased in Great Britain and its sale in parts of Scotland and on certain days throughout the United Kingdom is also prohibited. The beneficial results are so universal that prohibition is fast being recognized as the true remedy for the world's drink problem.

Mr. Stanley Washburn, the well-known British journalist, has stated in 1916:—"From Serbia to the Baltic there is not a public-house open, and, further, the Order is enforced to the letter: and greater even than that, it is accepted by the entire population."

Denmark:—An overwhelming majority of the people has declared for National Prohibition, and at the General Election in July, 1918, 69 per cent of the elected members of the various Liberal, Socialists, and other parties pledged themselves to enact a measure for taking a National Plebiscite on Prohibition.

In France, Switzerland, and some other European countries, the demand for Prohibition or more drastic restriction on the liquor traffic is growing louder and more persistent.

I heard one hon. member of this House make the remark a few days ago that the drinking of coffee for a certain time caused sickness and that it was necessary, in order to counteract the effect of the coffee, to take something stronger, or to indulge in another way. Well, if coffee has such an effect on the individual that it is necessary to resort to something stronger, I think I can prescribe a remedy that would be more effective than that if my hon. friend would accept my prescription. I would say to him that, instead of taking strong coffee to make him sick, and taking strong liquor to cure him, if he would take pure water all the year around, he would have none of these troubles at all. I read the following citation:

Civil War and Prohibition.

The first State to adopt Prohibition was Maine. From 1851 down to the present time, with the exception of a few months in the years 1856-57, prohibition has been the law of Maine. On March 29th, 1918, the Governor of this State, in an address delivered before the State Convention of the Republican Party, at Portland, Maine, said: "The honest efforts of all officials charged with the enforcement of the Prohibition law in Maine have brought about a condition so satisfactory that all discussion of the wisdom of the law has permanently ended." This is surely an effective answer to those who declare that "Prohibition does not Prohibit."

Clearing the Liquor from Government and Civil Positions.

In spite of the powerful influence of the liquor interest and its influential lobbying in Congress, year after year the Temperance Reformers have made inroads upon the various strongholds of liquordom. To protect the Indians, a Prohibition Zone has been established round every Indian Reservation. To protect the soldiers and sailors the sale of intoxicating liquors has been abolished from all Canteens, Army and Navy Training Camps and Naval Depots. Prohibition is also enforced in all Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes, Army Reservations, National Homes for Disabled Volunteers and Emigrant Stations, &c. To protect the workers a Prohibition zone has been established round shipyards and Government workshops. To protect young people, the evil effect of alcohol upon the human system is taught in all the public schools, colleges, and universities throughout the land. By an Order issued September, 1918, the selling of alcoholic liquors is now prohibited on trains and at Railway Stations. Railway Corporations and many of the great industrial concerns have, with the approval of the Trades Unions connected therewith, prohibited servants employed by them from drinking while on duty, and in some instances this is extended to drinking whilst off duty, or frequenting places where intoxicating liquors are sold. The great fraternal organizations, such as the Masonic, Trade and Thrift Societies, totalling a membership of over 12 millions, exclude liquor-sellers from membership, and many societies call upon their members to vote for Local No-License and State-wide Prohibition.

Surely, if that has been the experience in the past, we cannot be too careful at this moment in changing the present condition as to the restriction of the liquor traffic, especially when societies representing 12,000,000 people will not admit to membership any one engaged in selling liquor or who is associated with the traffic. I read:

Methodist Minister Arrested.

The arrest of the Rev. S. F. Newton, pastor of the East End Methodist Church, for distributing temperance literature on the streets without a permit was one of the incidents of the campaign on Wednesday. Mr. Newton stated that he had permission from the general manager of the Canadian Consolidated Rubber Company to distribute leaflets among his employees.

There is a case where a clergyman trying to do good, and innocently distributing certain kinds of literature, is arrested. We know, notwithstanding it was forbidden by this Government, that certain propagandists were distributing literature, that they were arrested, convicted and sentenced to two or three years' imprisonment, that their sentences were commuted and that they were set at liberty. When men had been convicted of doing things of this description this Government had no right to interfere with the law but the law should have been allowed to have taken its course. Yet, here is a man, a minister, who is doing harmless work and he is arrested and put in prison. It is not very creditable to those who undertook to bring about his arrest. I read:

Mr. Brewer: We are absolutely opposed to the restoration of the drinking bar. They propose to cleanse whisky drinking of its relations with crime and vice by changing its posture and ensconcing it behind tables. So universally are vice, crime, corruption, disease and misery associated with the bar, that both brewers and distillers are willing—nay anxious—that it should be banished—if only they can go on doing the mischief they have been doing by means of it. But no change of fittings or of posture is going to change the nature of the reptile or the fruits of its activities..

There are streets in Montreal whose reputation is so bad that their names have had to be changed over and over again. One which was named after a saint had to be unsanctified and was then called after a national hero, but he, in turn, had to be relieved of it; and it was again reduced to a more fitting godfather. It will be the same with the drink trade; its outward form will not change its unholy results.

Then, as to the saloon, we have the following declarations:

Death on the Saloon.

The Committee of Fifty, in their exhaustive study of the liquor traffic in the United States found that out of the unions investigated one out of every five is, by its constitution, directly opposed to the saloon, one out of every three is at least generally opposed to it, while only about 25 per cent of all unions seem to have no definite policy in relation to the liquor traffic;

Now come the opinions of labour leaders, men occupying responsible positions, and organizations of working men:

To inquiries, answers were received as follows:

Order of Railway Conductors: We are absolutely opposed to the saloon, and it is incorporated in our laws that a man cannot engage in the liquor traffic and remain a member of this organization.

Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen: We oppose the saloon to the extent that the Brotherhood will not tolerate a member being connected with the sale of liquor.

International Seamen's Union: We continually enjoin sobriety upon our members by refusing to publish advertisements of the saloon, etc., in the official organ of the union.

United Garment Workers: Our organization is decidedly opposed to the saloon.

The Journeymen Tailors: The officers of our organization are decidedly opposed to the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage and its general secretary adds: "I have not failed whenever the opportunity has presented itself, to declare myself upon this question."

The United Mine Workers of America: The officers of the United Mine Workers of America discourage in every respect saloon business.

The constitution of the Telegraphers reads: The use of alcoholic liquor as a beverage shall be sufficient cause for rejecting any petition for membership.

And to crown all, and to prove that the fight against the saloon is not of recent origin, in 1894 the International Typographical Union in its convention called for "the State and national destruction of the liquor traffic."

[Mr. Foster.]

The Blacksmith's Journal says the greatest curse to the labour movement has been the saloon, and it is high time that the labour leaders got together and forever divorced the trades union movement and the saloon influence.

It is a readjustment, a changed condition of society. Almost every disturbance in the ranks of organized labour can be traced back to some connection with the saloon.—John Mitchell, Vice-President A. F. L.

I have been criticised for my fight against the saloon, but I give notice here and now that I will fight the traffic as long as the saloon opposes the interests of the people. Too many men and women are going downstream to degradation for me to keep silent. To the trades unionist there is no redeeming feature in the saloon. Go anywhere where its influence is felt and you see the demoralization it brings. We are fighting for social well-being, civil benefits, and moral uplift. Never a foul plot is organized to injure public rights and social well-being but the saloon is used for the job.—John B. Lennon, Treasurer American Federation of Labour.

I know that I am right; I know that in refusing to even touch a drop of strong drink I was, and am, right. In refusing to treat another to that which I do not believe to be good for myself to drink, I know I am right. In refusing to associate with men who get drunk, I know I am right. In not allowing a rumseller to gain admittance into the Order of the Knights of Labour, I know that I was right. In advising our assemblies not to rent halls or meeting rooms over drinking places, I know I was right. I have done this from the day my voice was first heard in the council halls of our order.—Terrance V. Powderly, former General Master Workman of the Knights of Labour.

I will now give quotations showing what the position of President Wilson is:

President Wilson's Glass of Water.

The American press report that when President Wilson responded to the toast of the President of the French Republic in Paris, he raised a glass filled with water, President Wilson drank no wine at the luncheon. Explaining the President's action to the French, Dr. Grayson, his physician, said that Mr. Wilson never drank wine or alcoholic liquor of any kind.

Here is a further statement showing the attitude of labour towards the liquor traffic:

Slandering the Workingman.

Friends of decency and sobriety are getting exceedingly tired of the constant vilification of labour at the hands of the Liquor Traffic. Every time an attempt is made to pass some prohibitory legislation there is a protest in the name of labour. We must not shut down the saloon lest labour be angry and cease work. The curious fact is that every time the vile grogshops have been put out of business in any large numbers, labour, far from quitting or causing trouble, has immediately become more efficient.—Zion's Herald, Boston, Mass.

That goes to show the opinion of the workingman and the effect which prohibition has with respect to his efficiency. Now let me give the opinions of the Canadian provincial premiers in regard to the value of prohibition. The International Record contains the folowing:

Prime Ministers and Prohibition.

During February, 1919, an extraordinary expression of opinion on the value of Prohibition was given by statesmen, professional and business men and others. We have only space for the following:—

Sir G. H. Murray, Prime Minister of Nova Scotia—"I regard Prohibition in Nova Scotia as very beneficial."

Hon. T. C. Norris, Prime Minister of Manitoba—"Results of Prohibition are certainly beneficial."

Hon. W. M. Martin, Prime Minister of Saskatchewan—"Money formerly spent on liquor now finds its way into more legitimate channels. Crime has greatly decreased, and one of our jails has been closed."

Hon. N. E. Foster, Prime Minister of New Brunswick—"Prohibition in New Brunswick since it became effective in May, 1913, has undoubtedly given satisfaction."

Sir W. H. Hearst, Prime Minister of Ontario—"All parts of the province indicate the success of Prohibition."

It is apparent, from the statements I have read containing expressions of opinion by labour leaders, that it is a libel upon workingmen generally to say that they are not sympathetic towards prohibition. I have also given you the opinions of the various provincial premiers throughout the Dominion, and I think it can be taken for granted that a similar opinion is held by the Premier and the Acting Premier of Canada. Such being the case, and the House having now to deal with a prohibition measure, every clause of the Bill should receive the greatest consideration, and should be put in such a form as to demonstrate that Parliament proposes to discourage rather than encourage the liquor traffic and the consumption of liquors of any description. Surely it will not be long until the day comes when throughout this Dominion there will be total prohibition. I think you will find that every province will eventually vote in favour of it.

I do not suppose there is an hon. member but has had more or less experience of the degradation, the suffering and the wasting of energy of men and women through overindulgence in the use of intoxicating liquors. The world knows by this time that liquor sold under high license, low license, or no license, in saloon, export warehouse, or government grog shop, by hotel keeper, dealer, or "factor," whether across a bar, on a table, or in a sealed package is the same liquor, and it is the liquor that does the damage. Let us not be confused or deceived in this matter. The foe we are fighting is alcohol.

Then I saw the mother shudder and tremble as if with dread,
As she heard on the rotten staircase the sound of a heavy tread,
And the children run to their mother, and cry in their deep despair,
Oh, hide us from our father, for we hear him coming there.
Then I see the door flung open and a form come staggering in,
The form of one God made as man, now a brute through the curse of gin.
Those hungry babes are his children, that fainting woman his wife,
And he was their proud protector till the liquor ruined his life.
Now the stone is rolled away,
Hail the glorious Temperance Day.

Mr. M. CLARK: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not interrupt my hon. friend; indeed, I admired the care with which he had prepared his speech, and it has always been considered an invidious action to interfere with a young member. But I submit to you, Sir, that we are embarking on a second reading debate after the House has gone into Committee; that is the point of order I desire to raise. If we are to have a second reading debate we ought to have it at the proper stage, and it is a bad precedent at a time when law and order ought to be supported everywhere that a coach-and-four should be driven through the rules of the House of Commons itself. I hope my hon. friend will not take any offence at my remarks.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Certain latitude was given by the Acting Prime Minister to cover any general views on this question.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Red Deer is well taken. The debate which is now being carried on is a second reading debate, discussing, not the Orders in Council at all, not the schedule to this Bill, not the clause under consideration, but the general principle of prohibition, which principle was adopted by this House when the Bill was read the second time. As long as the matter had not been brought to my attention by any hon. member I took it for granted that the debate was being carried on by the unanimous consent of the Committee; but now that it has been drawn to my attention I will have to ask hon. members to observe the rules and confine their remarks to the clause under consideration. Section 5 of rule 13 is well known to all hon. members. It is very short and has been read many times, but I will read it again:

Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: Of course, the point is not open to discussion, but I might just remind the Chair that there is an amendment before the House which I think would let in the speech of the hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think it would.

Mr. HENDERS: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) with regard to the turn taken by this discussion and I shall endeavour to confine my remarks to the matter in hand. As I understand it, this is an amendment that will continue the provinces in the right that they now have to deal with the use of intoxicants. I believe that when the Government dealt with the liquor question as a war measure and passed the Order in Council, they did one of the very wisest things possible under the circumstances, and there is no doubt that very great profit accrued to us as a people because of the advantages that followed that measure. The part that Canada played in the war would indicate that the action taken by the Government was along the right lines and brought splendid results. Now that the war is over and we are coming back to normal conditions, naturally the question comes up as to what should be the attitude of Canada on the temperance question. That brings us back to the point as to where the provinces stood on this question previous to the war, and there can be no doubt that their pronouncement was emphatic and conclusive along the line of prohibitory legislation, with the exception of one province, and that province through local option measures had in large measure in effect pronounced against the evils that flow from the effects of intoxicants used for beverage purposes.

I am glad that the Government has brought this matter up for consideration. In the main I agree with the Bill as now presented, which will leave the matter in the hands of the provinces to be dealt with as they see fit. I have always been a believer in provincial rights, and this regulation is placing the matter where the law previously enacted by the provinces placed it. In view of the fact, however, that the Order in Council gave practically Federal prohibition, and that we are enjoying that condition of affairs at the present time, it seemed to me that we might perhaps have left the Order in Council as it is, with the right reserved to each province, if it saw fit, to bring up the issue and vote on it, as to whether it would continue a prohibition province or not.

This would have practically removed the question of prohibition as a contentious matter out of the realm of Federal politics and would have left it entirely with the provinces, and the Federal powers would have concurred in the attitude taken by each of the provinces. As the Bill now stands, however, no serious loss can accrue and no serious damage can be done to any one. I am prepared to support the Bill because of the position taken by the constituency which I represent. I have received from my constituency a large number of petitions asking that the strongest possible support be given to the retention of the prohibitory legislation that has been secured. I have further the endorsation of one of the largest organizations in my province, an organization that has placed itself on record year after year for seven years as being in favour of prohibition. I think that organization represents very largely the sentiment of the province from which I come, and I believe I would be acting contrary to the pronounced view of that organization as well as of the constituency which I represent, did I not make my voice heard to-day in endorsation of this Bill.

Mr. EULER: It is not my purpose to discuss the merits or demerits of prohibition, although I would say in a general way that restrictive legislation of too drastic a nature, particularly at this time, is not in the interest of the country under the present unsettled conditions. The extremist in any movement is usually a greater hindrance to that movement than a help. I rise only for one purpose, and that is to point out what I consider was an inconsistency on the part of the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) in the statement he made the other day when discussing the resolution that preceded this Bill. He laid down the principle that legislation on prohibition should primarily be the function of the provinces, such legislation to be enacted after the will of the people of the provinces had been ascertained. With that, I entirely agree. If the people of any province say that they desire prohibition in whatever degree they please, then this Parliament of Canada can consistently enact legislation that will ensure, so far as lies within the power of this Parliament, that the will of the people of that province shall be made effective. When the Acting Prime Minister made that statement, he also stated that when the Government of Ontario enacted prohibitory legislation, he took it that they represented in that legislation the will of the great majority of the people of that province. I do not know upon what he based that assumption. It may be, and perhaps it is, the wish of the people of Ontario that they should have prohibition in that province. but, so far as this Parliament knows, there is no indication that the people of Ontario desire prohibition. Indeed, the election of 1914 would show that prohibition was not favoured. For that reason my opinion is that this legislation is premature and anticipates what this Parliament believes to be the will of the people of Ontario. The proper method to follow would be this: First, obtain your mandate from the people of Ontario—and I refer now particularly to Ontario, because I know very little about the conditions in the other provinces—then, after that mandate has been obtained, this Parliament would be justified in making effective whatever wish is expressed by the people of that province. The Acting Prime Minister, when he stated that he took it that the people of Ontario endorsed the action of the Government of that province, could not have been in close communion with the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), because, as far as I know, the only recent expression of opinion that we have from the people of Ontario was that given in the provincial election of 1914. The President of the Council knows all about that, because he was the leader of the Opposition in the Ontario House at that time, and that election was fought on a question of much less stringent legislation. The question was the abolition of the bar, and, as every one knows, the people of Ontario voted overwhelmingly against the Opposition, led by the present President of the Council. From that, we must gather, if we can gather anything at all, that the people of Ontario were opposed to prohibition, and if later on it seemed that opinion had changed, perhaps because of the war, the proper method to follow, before this Parliament interferes with provincial rights, would surely be to obtain a new mandate from the Ontario people. It may be the case that the people of that province will vote in favour of prohibition, but my argument is entirely on this point, that, so far as we know, the people of that province are, from their view as expressed in the election of 1914, opposed to prohibitory legislation. This was war legislation in the first place, and now that the war is over, the logical thing to do would be to revert to the position as before the war so far as Dominion legislation is concerned. Then, when each province declares itself by referendum in favour of or against prohibition, as the case may be, it will become the duty of this Parliament to enact legislation to ensure the carrying out of that expressed view. The thought has just entered my mind whether the reason for this legislation is not that possibly some undertaking or promise was given to the effect that legislation of this character would be enacted. If any such promise was given at a certain time, perhaps a year or two ago at election time, we should be told to whom that promise was given and what the consideration was.

Mr. CHARTERS: I desire to say a word or two in support of this measure, because in the first place I believe the passage and enforcement of a prohibitory law would result in greater good to the people of Canada than any measure we have put upon the statute book in recent years, with the possible exception of that in regard to the conduct and the winning of the war.

The Government is to be congratulated upon the courage it displayed in passing the Order in Council, and I believe that the House will be commended by the people of this country for the readiness with which it is accepting the legislation validating the Order in Council. As we have recognized the right of self-determination by the provinces in this matter, we cannot have total prohibition at the present time, but this legislation approaches more nearly than any heretofore enacted to the objective at which the temperance people have been aiming for upwards of fifty years, and I believe that it will meet with the general approval of the temperance forces throughout the country. Many years ago Sir John A. Macdonald told a temperance deputation that they would get prohibition just as soon as they elected men to Parliament who would vote for prohibition. I think the action of Parliament to-day indicates that the advice of Sir John A. Macdonald is being followed by the people of this country.

Are we wise in passing this legislation? In the first place, it has been asked whether the people of the province of Ontario are behind this proposed legislation. Let me remind the House that the people of Ontario have voted three times directly on this question, when no other issue was before them. In 1894, in the first Ontario plebiscite, there was a majority of 82,000 in favour of prohibition. The second vote was taken in 1898, when the Dominion plebiscite was held. At that time, although there was very great fear on the part of certain temperance workers that a vote in favour of prohibition would put the then Government in the hole, Ontario gave a majority of 39,000 in favour of prohibition. In 1902, when the third vote was taken, prohibition was carried by the province by a majority of 96,000. In 1916, a petition equal to upwards of eighty per cent of the total vote cast at the election two years before was presented to the legislature asking that prohibition be enacted, and following that, the present Ontario Temperance Act was passed. Surely that is sufficient evidence of the feeling of the people of the province of Ontario on this question, and because of that evidence I believe the Government is justified in introducing the legislation now before us.

Further evidence is found in the western provinces. In 1915, for instance, Alberta voted for the widest measure of prohibition within the jurisdiction of the province by a majority of upwards of 25,000; Saskatchewan, in 1916, by a majority of 71,000, and Manitoba in the same year, by a majority of more than 25,000. The same sentiment prevails in the eastern provinces. In view of this evidence of a strong sentiment in favour of the destruction, as far as possible, of the evils of the drink traffic, I think the Government is justified in seeking to validate this Order in Council, and I am convinced that the only serious complaint that will be made is that the legislation is to be enacted for one year only, instead of being made permanent. I am sure that if this Government or the local Government in Manitoba opened the saloons in Winnipeg at the present moment they would be regarded as fit only for the asylum, and the same is true with regard to Toronto or any other city, where similar conditions might prevail. For the reasons I given this legislation has my heartiest support.

Mr. M. CLARK: I am a victim of unfortunate circumstances. I am compelled to break the law against my own will—that is, so far as breaking the rules of this House is breaking the law. I would not have done so, and I shall do so very briefly, but that there are one or two circumstances I am bound to point out in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Charters). I have put to myself as carefully as I could the question "Do you think that you can honestly vote for giving greater facilities during the twelve months immediately ahead of us than exists at the present time for the drinking of intoxicating liquor, considering all the circumstances of the country and the serious time through which we are passing?" And I have concluded that my duty to the country compels me to answer that question in the negative. I do not think that I could honestly vote for giving any extra facilities for the use of intoxicating liquors during the first period of reconstruction; but when my hon. friend goes on to say that regret will be expressed that the Government have not gone further I take issue with him, and on very clear and distinct ground. He mentioned the province of Alberta. Now, in the province of Alberta the prohibition vote was as large as it was, very largely because of the constant use by prohibitionists of this kind of appeal—it was said to the people most distinctly: "You are voting on what is practically a measure for the abolition of the bar; you are voting to abolish the free sale of these liquors in public houses over the bar; there is no disposition to interfere with any one's right to use liquor within his own home." I know I am right about that, because that argument was used upon the platform and in private canvass, and it had a very large influence upon the vote that was given in the province of Alberta. I do not know about other provinces, and therefore I do not mention them. Now, Mr. Chairman, what position does that put the question in from the prohibitionist's point of view? Good faith would have required that we should again have taken the opinion of that province on the question of importation. The Government in my judgment were perfectly justified in doing what they did as a war measure, and it was put up to them as a war measure by those who held what I venture to call, without any desire to offend, extreme views on this question. So that under the law complete prohibition was arrived at in Alberta by influences brought to bear upon the Dominion Government—I won't say against the wishes of the province of Alberta, because the question has never been submitted by referendum to the people—but against what they voted for at the time they voted on this question for their own particular province.

For that reason I do not agree with my hon. friend that this question can remain as it is. I understood that what the extreme prohibitionists were advocating at this time was an extension by legislative enactment of the conditions established by the Order in Council, with the added view that the opinions of the entire Canadian people should be taken at the end of that time; and that would be the only fair thing to my province, having regard to the way the vote was taken.

And, I have a shrewd suspicion that the same thing applies to other provinces. However, as I said at the outset of my remarks, which I am sorry are somewhat out of order, I am in favour of the Government's measure. I am quite sure they have approached this question with a great sense of responsibility, and I am glad to support them in speech, and if there were a vote on the question I would support them in that respect also. Having looked as carefully as I can into the question I for one should hesitate to take the responsibility of giving greater facilities, for the first twelve months after peace has been declared, for the sale of intoxicating liquors than there are at present.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I understand that the particular subject before the committee is the amendment of the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) by which he purposes to allow the manufacture in Ontario of liquor of such strength as is permitted in other provinces. Perhaps on a cursory consideration the proposal might seem reasonable, but a careful study of the question will not support such a view. If the province of Ontario says it is in favour of complete prohibition, that would imply that it is also in favour of abolishing the manufacture of liquor in that province, because it would be most inconsistent to say that you are not in favour of the sale of liquor, the consumption of which you think is not in the interests of the people, and at the same time that you are willing to have it manufactured to any strength permitted by other provinces. If the amendment of my hon. friend from London were accepted you would have breweries all over Ontario manufacturing beer to seven or eight different strengths. Perhaps British Columbia would permit 3 per cent, Alberta 5 per cent, Manitoba 6 per cent, and so on throughout the different provinces; and under the amendment beers of these varying strengths would be permitted to be manufactured in Ontario while the province itself had said that they did not think that the sale of liquor was in the public interest. I do not think that is consistent. If we in Ontario say that we want prohibition because we believe it is good for the people, how can we consistently be willing to manufacture it for sale in Quebec? On the other hand, if we pass a law permitting the sale of light wines of a certain strength—we may do that, I do not know—can we conscientiously manufacture light wines of a greater percentage of alcohol to ship elsewhere?

Sir SAM HUGHES: In temperance legislation why should we depart from the principle of equal rights and the same law for all, and special privileges for none? Why should there be a different law in Ontario in this matter from that in Quebec, and why should this Parliament legislate special laws for each province?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: This Parliament is not legislating special laws for any province. Each province may pass whatever law it chooses, and by the legislation proposed by the Government we ratify and enable such law to be put effectively into force.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not do the same with any other concern?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: We do not want to force laws upon any province which it does not wish, and as regards the liquor traffic I think the only just and equitable solution of the difficulty is to allow each province to say what it wants, and so soon as it had the courage to declare its conviction this Act would enable that province to carry its legislation effectively into force. I think the Bill as it is is the best solution of the difficulty. It is fair to the provinces and to the Dominion.

Mr. BLAKE: I said before that I was in favour of the law permitting each province to manufacture liquor for export to any other province. The Order in Council, taken on the whole, has been quite unnecessary. But as the Government gave a promise a year ago that it would be effective for a year after the war, we must endorse it under those circumstances. When we voted on prohibition in Manitoba the vote was two to one in favour of prohibition, but at that time we had the option, as every one knew, of sending to Ontario or Saskatchewan for liquor. That privilege has been cancelled by this Order in Council and has interfered greatly with the comfort of the people of Manitoba. I have heard it said dozens of times—in fact I do not recall having heard anything to the contrary in Manitoba—that if the vote were taken again under existing conditions, liquor not being allowed to be imported into Manitoba, the result would be vastly different and possibly prohibition would be defeated. We are not going to eradicate the liquor traffic suddenly by such legislation or by enforcing total prohibition. Apparently, nothing has so many public enemies and at the time so many private friends as liquor, but very few of the old private friends are ready to say a word in its defence. Total prohibition can not be rapidly advanced successfully. The only member who has thoroughly understood this matter of temperance—and the question resolves itself into one of temperance versus prohibition—is the hon. President of the Privy Council. If he had had his way and were elected in Ontario he would have proceeded, as he said, to abolish the bar. That accomplished, the liquor stores would undoubtedly have been regulated and the business would have been put under Government control. This would have solved the whole difficulty slowly and gradually perhaps but effectively. The pendulum at present is swinging with terrific force and will come back again to probably the same condition that existed before the war. I remember an old Scotchman years ago having said that it was well to make haste slowly, and the same remark applies when dealing with an old established custom like this. Liquor has been drunk since the time of the flood, because we read that Noah was drunk after that great event. It is evident therefore that liquor must have been obtainable before that period. And we also read in the Scriptures that Christ converted water into wine. The Bible teaches temperance in all great things. And in any great reform such as free trade, it has not been achieved with one fell stroke and in the course of one short year. Total abstinence from liquor will not be effected with any great suddenness. What we want is a reasonable compromise. We might consider France and Italy, which have not yet tried prohibition, and benefit by the experience of other nations. England tried prohibition on a modified plan, providing shorter hours and weaker beer. But so much industrial unrest ensued that they had to resume the longer hours open and the selling of stronger beers. Would Russia not be better off to-day with Vodka galore as before the war than she is to-day tattered and torn and bleeding? I am satisfied that all this industrial unrest is the result of restraint that has been put upon the people by the war. Many men were compelled to serve, and many volunteered, and the war meant a great deal to some 55,000 homes. We had the race track abolished and that meant a great deal of pleasure to many people.

We have had fuel control, we have had food control and we have had, last but not least, prohibition, which was the straw that broke the camel's back and precipitated to a great extent the industrial unrest that we have to-day. No member of this House has had a better chance to see the workmen's homes than I have had in my experience as a practising physician in North Winnipeg. We cannot say that we have any slums but we have some homes which are by no means superb. I have watched these people at their meals in the days before prohibition came into effect. Many people who have come from European countries are fond of their beer and, as they have so little comfort in their homes, they receive a great deal of stimulus from a glass of beer at their meals and they are not so restless after their day's work. I am satisfied that the elimination of the soothing effect of alcohol suddenly has had a great deal to do with the unrest. If any member of this House, who has been an habitual smoker, has stopped it suddenly, for a week he does not feel as serene and happy as he formerly did about his home or amongst his friends. It has a soothing effect. In every country there seems to be something needed to soothe the nervous system. The soothing effect of liquor and of beer is something that will be missed if suddenly stopped. A friend of mine said: When you stop smoking, do it gradually. You have to stop it gradually just as we have to stop a morphine fiend gradually.

There has been too much fuss about this prohibition business. We all know that the liquor traffic will die a natural death. The older members of the House can remember the logging bees in Ontario to which nobody came unless there was a gallon or more of whisky guaranteed depending on the size of the bee. Thirty years ago at a medical banquet the best fellow was the one who was on top of the table when all the rest were under. That was only thirty years ago; the other instance, that of the logging bee, was probably forty years ago. We do not find anything of that kind at the threshing and logging bees amongst the farmers of Ontario at the present time. Twenty years ago we had the first dry banquet at Trinity Medical College. This is the result of the process of evolution, of gradual education, of the gradual discussion of this traffic. Yet, temperance people take to themselves all the credit for this process of evolution. Follow Darwin's theory of evolution if you wish. That is the process which has been going on.

I think it is unfortunate that the conditions as they existed in Alberta, Manitoba, and some of the other provinces, have been disturbed by this Order in Council which we backed up on the promise of the Government that at the end of the year it should be dropped. I think it would be well to drop it and let the provinces make the best they can of the Doherty Act, which meets all the requirements.

We have heard a lot about the harm done by alcohol. I am satisfied that tea and tobacco are doing more harm in the land to-day with regard to the mentality, the physique, and the working capacity of the people than liquor, because they are more generally used. Fifty million dollars annually is the estimate placed on the tea bill of this country at the present time. I have known people to drink as many as one hundred cups of tea in a day. In the Old Country an Englishman would never think of taking a cup of tea after a meat meal. In this country, prepare tea as carefully as you can—and in many homes it is prepared very badly—take a meat meal and pour that tea down with its tannic acid, and the food that you have taken must be tanned as brown as the hide is tanned for the leather that goes into your shoes. Why is it that in the Old Country you find that most of the people are full blooded, while in this country a great many are sallow and yellow? Because they drink beer at their meat meals and avoid tea. The greatest trouble that the doctor has in treating patients in this country is to keep up the standard of the blood. Because of the quantity of tea that is drunk, it is very hard to do that.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union and various organizations are talking loud and long against liquor, but I am sorry to say that a great many of the members of these organizations never had a drink of liquor and know nothing about it. Would I be justified in giving a lecture on digitalis, strychnine or morphine if I did not know anything about these things? Yet members of these organizations are lecturing people all over the country on the question of liquor. I am sure that I have had petitions from every Women's Christian Temperance Union in Manitoba, all drafted in the same way, from the same copy sent out from headquarters.

That brings me to a story that I heard about the master of the Rotunda hospital in Dublin. There was to be a temperance meeting in the early days of the temperance movement, and one of the gentlemen interested in it said to the master of the hospital: We want you to come on the platform. The master said: I cannot make a speech." "We do not want you to make a speech, but we want you to be there to show by your presence that you are favourable to the movement." Several of the speakers failed to respond and the chairman was forced to call on the master to make a speech. He said: "Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I quite agree that bad whisky is a very bad thing, but I am quite convinced that a little good whisky never did anybody any harm."

Prohibition, in so far as it applies to Manitoba, has brought forward an awful crop of bootleggers and stills and the people are getting bad whiskey, which, as I have said, is a very bad thing. We will admit that during the first year in which we had prohibition crime fell off eighty per cent. The police stations had to hire people to clean out the halls and so on; they were almost deserted. But to-day that condition of things is changed. Crime has increased all over the country. The excise department has stated that there are probably 500 illicit stills in Winnipeg. I think they have underestimated the number. In every large city in Canada we find the same state of things. They tried to stamp out potheen in Western Ireland for a century, but they have not accomplished very much yet. This illicit traffic, making criminals of people, is going on. I do not know what the outcome will be, but I am satisfied that if the people had liquor before the Order in Council came in they are going to have it still. There were few bootleggers until the Order in Council was brought into effect and since then there has been no end to them. The people need liquor and they are going to have it. During the influenza epidemic there was a lot of controversy as to whether whisky was beneficial in influenza or whether it was not. Those who had tasted it and knew of it were the ones who backed it up, while those who had never tasted it are most emphatic in their declarations that it was no good at all. They did not know anything about it. I might just explain how alcohol operates by saying that for many years in the treatment of tuberculosis we had given creosote in the hope of killing the germs by this means. Take a child with diphtheria, take two swabs from that child's throat, drop them into two tubes and in one of these tubes put in three or four drops of alcohol; in the tube containing the alcohol there will be no diphtheria germs in twenty-four hours, while in the other tube you will have the diphtheria germs develop.

During the influenza epidemic alcohol was the only poison with which we could flood the lungs in sufficient quantities to have any inhibitory effect upon the growth and development of these germs. That ought to be sufficient proof that there is need for this remedy; and, although I am a temperance man, I would not want to practise medicine during such an epidemic as we had last winter without using whisky profusely upon any of my patients who were suffering from influenza. I am satisfied that the results of my treatment will compare with those of any other practitioner on this continent, and I used heaps of toxine and whisky. The people need alcohol for medicine. Last winter they had to go to a doctor for a prescription when they wanted whisky, and had to buy say Burke's Irish whisky from a drug store and pay as high as $7 a bottle. Talk about the high cost of living. Look at the hardship occasioned to the poor in Winnipeg by reason of the high charges made when they happened to need whisky for influenza. I do not want to be held responsible to say who of my patients shall have a bottle of whisky. It is unfair to the medical profession to expect them to do so, and it is unfair to the public that they should have to go to a medical man and pay one, two or three dollars, as some medical men charged, and then pay the prices charged for a bottle of whisky as was done in some drug stores. That is not the fault of the retail druggists; I know the wholesale druggists are responsible as well. In the drug business, as in all other occupations there are middlemen, and the effort was made to get more money for their work than the manufacturer received for the finished product.

We have already had a referendum in this Dominion on the question of prohibition, and as a boy I worked hard for that referendum. The vote was a very close one, but it did not do any good, and I am satisfied that no federal referendum will achieve any great benefit. I believe the situation in regard to prohibition should be left to each province to deal with. We have not had success with the law as it applied to Manitoba. I repeat that in the last influenza epidemic the wholesale druggist charged all sorts of prices, and the people were either held up by medical men for prescriptions, or else the doctors did not make any charge; it is distasteful to any conscientious member of the medical profession to be placed in such a situation as arose at that time. My suggestion, and my advice to Manitoba in a case like this, and I suppose the remedy might apply equally to other provinces, is to establish provincial liquor stores under Government control and sell the best liquor that can be procured at a reasonable price. License the head of each home, charge a nominal fee of one dollar per year for the license, and then permit the purchase of a bottle of whisky, or a case of beer per fortnight, or per month, as the provincial government may deem proper. In that way the traffic can be regulated, real temperance brought about, and the tendency to crime removed. Control of the traffic, to my mind, is the important thing. We cannot hope to bring about total prohibition because stills will go on, just as the production of wine has always taken place on this globe. My hope is that people will deal with this question sanely; that they will try and carefully control the liquor traffic and not endeavour to enforce total prohibition immediately.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I desire to ask the promoter of this measure—I do not know whether the Acting Prime Minister or the President of the Privy Council has it in charge—if native wine can be made in the province of Quebec up to the same percentage of strength as is made in Ontario under this Bill, and if the same thing can be done in British Columbia or any other province? The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) said this was not special legislation, but as I read the Bill it is special legislation with respect to province after province. What I want to know is whether wine can be manufactured in Quebec up to twelve per cent strength as in Ontario, and whether the same thing can be done in British Columbia, or vice versa?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, if the law of the province of British Columbia permits the sale of native wine for beverage purposes up to that strength. Ontario places its whole limitation upon the strength of the native wine which may be sold in the province for beverage purposes subject to the regulations that are in force.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The point I want to make is that we are legislating for one province on one line and for another province on another line, according to the whim of a particular province for the time being. My view is that we should have the same law for one province as for another; that there should be a universal statute applicable throughout the whole of Canada. This Parliament has no right to legislate according to the whim of any particular province. If you do that in the case of one province why not do it in the case of another?

Mr. WHIDDEN (Brandon): I want to say a few words in favour of the amendments to the Order in Council embodied in this Bill as presented by the Government. In the first place I think the measure recognizes fully the rights of the respective provinces to deal with this matter. It recognizes the legislation of the provinces and also the implied sentiment and attitude of a province where full and final legislation has not been put into effect. I think that the argument raised in regard to the position of the province of Ontario is taken care of in that connection. If the people of that province change their view and express it in their ballots, the provisions contained in this Bill meets that supposed new situation. While the Bill, does not in the matter of the length of time it is to be in operation, go as far as I personally would like to see it go, I believe that in view of the strength of the position taken by the Government in relation to the situation likely to exist in the year that is before us, (as the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has already stated) we can safely allow this legislation to take care of the needs of our developing country, and then permit the people of the Dominion, either through their representatives directly, or through a provincial or Dominion referendum, to express their sentiments when the twelve months have expired. Further I think this Bill meets a situation which my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) argued for in the first part of his address, and then argued against in the last part, viz: the evolving sentiment and attitude of an intelligent people of our country with regard to a system which—I say it without any passion or prejudice but speaking historically—has grown out of barbaric instincts. Scientific authorities, not old-fashioned grandmotherly temperance agitators, or the narrow-gauge old time temperance agitator from Missouri, are responsible for that statement. I do not think it necessary for us to spend time in discussing the general principles of prohibition at the present moment. I believe that there has been placed before us a fair proposition designed to meet the situation which will exist in our country during the next year.

I would like, however, to notice one or two statements that have been made in this debate before I resume my seat. In the first place it has been asserted that the opinion of the majority of the people of Manitoba, expressed in various ways, is that prohibtion has proved to be a failure in that province.

I do not wish to deny any of the statements that my hon. friend the member for North Winnipeg makes, but I will simply cite a quotation with regard to an official claiming that there were at least five hundred stills in operation in the city of Winnipeg alone. He was asked how many stills there were, and he replied: "How many stills; how do I know; there may be two, there may be ten, there may be five hundred." That was the statement that official made. However, a false interpretation of his statement was given publicity, and it was afterwards denied by a reliable and broad-minded citizen of Winnipeg. The same line of argument, Mr. Chairman, would have disproved the validity of Great Britain's position in doing away with slavery; there was many a slave bought and many a slave sold after slavery was abolished. But we do not propose to turn back this evolutionary process in the onward movement of an increasingly intelligent humanity, because there are evidences that we all have instincts which at times claim satisfaction in ways that are not good for the majority.

I think that we do well to enact such legislation as is proposed in this Bill, bearing in mind the outspoken demand and request of a great many thoughtful people in all classes of society throughout our Dominion and in many other countries, that we march steadily forward, not interfering with personal rights, where those rights do not interfere with the development of the national life. In regard to the claim made for the use of alcohol in a medicinal way—although that is not the point before us—I think we would do well to remember that so far as the public consciousness at the present time is concerned, it is capable of changing this way or that. When we refer to other countries, let us not refer to those countries that have not yet developed such a consciousness as is capable of being developed; and when we refer to the dear Motherland, let us not forget that the Prime Minister of Great Britain—whom we delight to honour when the circumstances suit us individually—is responsible for that very, very strong, if not extreme statement of two or three years ago: That Great Britain had three enemies—Germany, Austria, and drink; and the greatest of these was drink.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, I look upon this measure as the most important that has been brought before this House, notwithstanding the vital importance of so many measures that we have dealt with since it has been my privilege to be a member. In saying that, as a prohibitionist I feel that it is not necessary for prohibitionists to justify, or to attempt to justify, prohibition as a means of wiping out the evils of the liquor traffic. The time has come when it is difficult to find any man who would undertake even for a moment to justify the liquor traffic as we have understood it. There are, however, those who will make an effort, that can only be looked upon as the last dying kick of those who, to retain a portion of their privileges, have from time immemorial fastened their tentacles on humanity through the liquor traffic.

This measure deals purely with the matter of giving to each province that which each province by its expressed will desires. Ontario has been referred to as being, one would imagine, the only province that was effected, and that Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island have been overlooked entirely. The argument centered around the question in many respects would seem to lead to the conclusion that Quebec and Ontario were the whole Dominion of Canada. They are important parts of the Dominion beyond question, but there are also other parts of the Dominion. This legislation is for all the provinces and has no relation to one province as against the others, but is simply giving to each the right by its expressed will to have what it wishes.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I would feel that it was unnecessary to go any further, because I rose chiefly to commend the Government for what they have done as a distinct step forward in bringing about what prohibitionists look to as the ultimate goal —the complete wiping out of the liquor traffic. But prohibitionists, who are at the same time sane men, do not wish this or any other Government to go faster than the people want them to, and if the people in any province desire a certain standard of liquor as a beverage I do not feel that I, living in another province, have a right to say to those people, "You must accept something that I feel I should have because I am not living in your province."

But in order that we may not be misunderstood I would like to refer to one or two things that have been said on this question, sometimes in this House and sometimes outside. I as a man who, I think, can presume to represent working men to some extent, having lived amongst them all my life, want to place the position of the working man in a proper light before this House and country. A consistent, determined effort has been made to represent the working men of Canada as being in favour of the liquor traffic. I have been, as I believe has every other member of this House, flooded with petitions, all designed to lead us to the conclusion that the working men were not satisfied with what the Government was doing along the lines of prohibition and the curtailment of the liquor traffic. I am not going to question for one moment the bona fides of those who were circulating these petitions nor am I going to question the bona fides of the statement made in so far as they were representing the views of the individuals who were making them. But I am going to question the right of these men to represent the working men of Canada. I repeat, I have lived my whole life among working men, and I think I know something of their sentiments. I am going to give the House an idea of the efforts made to line up our working men and put them in a false position before the country in relation to the liquor traffic.

In doing that, I will read to the House some of the things that were said to organized bodies of workingmen from one end of the country to the other in an effort to have them pass resolutions in their organizations in support of the attempt to induce the Government to continue the liquor traffic. Some organization—I am not going to give my opinion as to what organization it was—undertook a propaganda from one end of the country to the other amongst organized labour, and that propaganda must have cost at least more than $100,000. I do not think the workingmen provided the money, but that is aside from the question. This is the first letter that was sent out to every body of organized labour in Canada. I will read just one or two extracts because the correspondence is too long to weary the Committee with:

> So that you will have a complete record of the actual proceedings, we are enclosing a copy of the resolution referred to.
> Experience has taught that resolutions do not meet their full value unless active propaganda is systematically employed to enforce them.
> We are also enclosing a resolution and appeal, together with a stamped envelope, which we urgently request your Local to adopt at the very earliest possible moment. Kindly return to us at your earliest convenience after your next regular meeting this resolution with the signature of your secretary and the seal of the Local attached.

I want the Committee to notice particularly the next paragraph:

The purpose of this campaign is self-preservation. We desire above all things to keep our organization intact, and at the same time to lend our aid and assistance in fulfilling the expressed will of the workers as declared at the convention, who have asked for the privilege of enjoying a palatable and nutritious beverage which is non-intoxicating.

This statement was sent out by the organization behind this movement and it is the organization responsible for the resolutions which have been misused to represent the position of organized labour, that all that was being asked for was a non-intoxicating beverage. These resolutions were sent to every lodge or division of every one of the bodies of organized labour in the railway service in the Dominion of Canada. The first circular and first resolution sent out did not secure a single reply from any one of those organizations. That was followed up by another letter marked "confidential" and stating:

You have received communications in regard to our campaign for permitting the manufacture of a palatable, temperance beverage—

Take note of the word "temperance."

—to contain less alcohol than is permitted in the manufacture of beer in the prohibition state of Maine.

We fully realize that your constitution may not permit you to sign the resolution as such, and it is far from our purpose, therefore, to ask you to violate any of your rules and regulations. If your sympathies are with us, if you feel that we are working along conservative, safe and sane lines, we should be very glad indeed, and we would highly appreciate if you would return the resolution to us, merely writing on its face that your constitution will not permit you to sign it, but that you give us your moral support and good will.

And so on and so on. Again that letter was sent to every one of those bodies from one end of the country to the other and with identically the same result—not a single answer from any one of the organized bodies of railway workers in Canada. Not satisfied with the progress they were making, after the lapse of a month, they sent out another letter marked "private and confidential" and beginning "Dear Sir and Brother." This time they were getting affectionate in their appeals to the workingmen of Canada in order to get their support for the liquor traffic. This letter reads:

We have been hourly expecting the resolution which we forwarded to you for adoption by your local.

We realize that only very unlooked-for circumstances of some kind would interfere with your co-operation. We have been so successful in our campaign that our ambition now is to make this appeal practically unanimous. With a little assistance and energy from you, this can be accomplished.

Please do not entrust this important matter to the mails.

Just as soon as your Local has adopted this resolution, please wire it direct to us at our expense.

We are again enclosing you copy of the resolution which we desire you to use.

Again thanking you for any assistance that you might give us, we beg to remain, etc.

This third appeal, couched in the language that I have just read, met with the same result as the other two—not one response. I have stated in this House before to-day that there is nothing in my life that I am more proud of than my association with the railwaymen of this country. I never was so proud of them as I was when I learned the result of these insidious appeals to organized bodies of labour men in the railway service of this country, that result being that not a single "local" as these bodies are termed approved the effort that was being made to line up organized labour with the liquor traffic.

While dealing with that, I should like to refer to another matter in connection with it just in order that hon. members in contemplating the possibilities of future legislation regarding the liquor traffic in Canada may take it into their consideration. The statutory law of Canada makes it a criminal offence for a man in the train service of this country anywhere, not only to drink intoxicating liquor, but to be found spending his time in one of the places where this stuff is sold. These so-called beer and wine saloons, that are a possibility under some of the conditions that are contemplated in this House, are of such a nature that if a man in the train service of this country is found frequenting any one of them, he can be haled before the court and prosecuted criminally. That may be too drastic legislation, and perhaps it is, but I am going to give the Committee one or two things to think about before hon. members make up their minds that it is. The men in the train service of this country are not going to be discriminated against very much longer. They have been discriminated against in the enactment of these laws; they have been set apart as a special class. It has been said to them: You are not going to be permitted to enjoy the conditions that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Blake) looks upon as so very necessary for the well-being of the workingman; we will separate you as a special class. When this question is finally put before the Canadian people to determine, the railwaymen are going to demand that they stand on the same ground as every other man in this country. I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North or any other hon. member in this Committee how he would like to go to bed in a pullman car going out of the city of Ottawa to-night with the knowledge that the man standing on the right hand side of that locomotive peering out into the night as he handled the train across the continent, had sitting beside him a jar of this stuff that the hon. member seems to think is so very necessary in order that the workingmen may be in a position to do their work, that, as he says, they may be full-blooded, that they may have the energy necessary to do these things. Or, I would like to ask any hon. member how he would feel if he knew that the train despatcher, in the still hours of the morning between one and five o'clock, had sitting beside him, instead of a pail of tea (which the hon. member (Mr. Blake) condemns so vigorously) a pail of lager beer. Would he feel that that man's intellect was so very much clearer, as the result of the imbibing of that kind of a beverage to maintain his vitality as he performed the most arduous kind of work any man could be called upon to perform?

The very reason why we have these drastic laws in the train service of this country is because there is not a man in this House or out of it with an ounce of common sense who does not recognize that the lives of the travelling public would be at stake but for these very laws. The common sense of the men themselves, recognizing that truth, has made them say, in the constitution of every single organization of railway employees in this country, that a man cannot be a member of any one of those organizations if he indulges in the use of intoxicating liquors to any extent whatever. If the Canadian people, when this question is directly before them for the first time, should decide against prohibition, railroad men are going to insist upon standing on their present ground, because if one of their members happens to come under the influence of drink they do not want to be brought before the criminal courts of this country, as I have known railway men to be brought, on the charge of being under the influence.

Let me say one word—and this brings me to the amendment moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Cronyn)—with reference to the manufacturing within a province of something that the province itself says should not be sold within its borders. I can scarcely conceive of a more immoral proposition being put before a body of intelligent men and the people of this country than to suggest that the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, which say, "We do not believe there should be imported into or manufactured in our province a liquor above a certain strength, because we do not believe our people should drink it," should, for the sake of financial gain, declare, "We are going to manufacture the stuff that we say is not fit for our own people to drink, and sell it outside of the province, where it will be accepted." I can hardly conceive of a more immoral proposition from any source whatever, than that there should be manufactured within a province something that the province emphatically states is not fit for its own people to use, whether it is liquor or anything else.

Let me add a word or two with regard to the workingman, because after all it is the workingman who is used as the argument in the effort to continue the liquor traffic in this country. I know workingmen's homes, not one, but by the score, into which the light of heaven itself has come as the result of the measure of restriction we have had in this country already. I can count workingmen by the thousand who were kept down by liquor when the liquor traffic held sway who so long as their money lasted were good fellows, but as soon as their money was gone were kicked out on the street like so many dogs. That is how the liquor traffic treats the workingman.

I should like to give the House just one instance. In 1912 I had in my employ a man from a town many miles from Ottawa, and the only reason he was back in the lumber woods of Northern Ontario was because he could not trust himself in places where liquor was sold. On a certain morning I received a telegram that this man's wife was dangerously ill. I immediately despatched a man to the camp in which he was working, to get him out as quickly as possible. He got out to the town in which I lived, and in which there were two open bar-rooms, about two hours before the train left for his home town. He had sufficient money to take him home and look after his anticipated needs there, and left my office one hour and forty minutes before his train left. The following morning I got a wire asking that the man come quickly as his wife was dying. I wired that he had gone the day before and should be at home by that time. The next morning I got another wire, "Where is so and so? His wife has only a few hours to live." I put the case in the hands of the provincial police to locate the man. They traced up and down the line, but could find no sign of him. The very next morning I got a wire that his wife was dead, and on the following day a policeman found the man in the snakeroom of one of the hotels in the little town of Chapleau where I live. The climax came in June 1916, when that man staggered out of a bar-room in the city of Hull at ten o'clock at night, and the next morning his body was found against a boom of logs near Booth's mills. That is what the liquor traffic has done for the workingman, and that is why the workingman turns a deaf ear to the appeals of the liquor traffic, that he should get behind it and give it his support. Never was I so proud of my association with the railway men of this country when I learned that notwithstanding these three appeals not one single "local," as they are called, in Canada gave them their support.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: I should not like to remain silent while this Bill is passing through the Committee. If the case which the hon. member for East Algoma has just recited were the only one, I believe it would be a sufficient justification for the wiping out of the liquor traffic the world over; but the history of Canada, the history of the continent, nay, the history of the whole world affords hundreds of thousands of if not millions of such instances. History is weighted down with tragic stories of that kind. However, I do not wish to deal with the question from that standpoint.

The province of Manitoba passed its present Temperance Act about three years ago and it came into effect on the first of June, 1916. As a newspaperman of forty years 'experience, and as a public man, I want to bear testimony on this great issue, and as a Winnipeg editor, I want to tell of the success of the temperance legislation in that province. The almost complete extinction of the liquor traffic in Manitoba has, in my judgment, been perhaps the most profound blessing that has ever been conferred upon the people of that province. I want to dissent from the position and the views enunciated by my hon. friends from North and Centre Winnipeg. As they are both my personal friends, I differ from them in all kindness and with all moderation. I have talked this matter over with all classes of people. I have often discussed it with many old topers in the city of Winnipeg who were tottering to the grave as a result of drink. These unfortunates voted against prohibition when it was submitted to the people of the province of Manitoba, and invariably they have borne testimony to the view that while they voted against prohibition they believed it was a godsend to the country and that so far as they were personally concerned prohibition was the best thing that had ever happened. I never found one dissentient voice on this question. Could I bring stronger evidence to bear of the value of prohibition in Manitoba than to tell the Committee that crime in that province was reduced to the extent of 80 per cent by virtue of the adoption of prohibition? We had six jails in Manitoba, and after prohibition there was a time when it looked as if the entire six would have to be closed. Three of them have been closed altogether, and the other three have scarcely sufficient inmates to warrant their being kept open. Is that not as strong testimony as could be submitted in favour of prohibition? I believe the people of Manitoba are overwhelmingly in favour of prohibition, and I think that their view generally is that they would like to see total prohibition for the Dominion of Canada. And when the speech from the Throne announced, as I think it did, that a plebiscite would be taken for the entire Dominion — the Acting Prime Minister shakes his head, and I accept the correction. The impression I had was that a plebiscite would be taken, but it appears to be erroneous. However, it is my opinion that it would be a good thing if we could have Dominion-wide prohibition. I suppose the federal authority is limited by the constitution, and the Dominion Parliament can only go as far as the British North America Act constitutionally enables it to go. That being the position, I am satisfied that the Order in Council was a good thing. After our Prohibition Act was passed in 1916, as we could not prohibit the manufacture and import of liquor, the result was that a string of liquor houses at such places as Kenora, Keewatin and Fort Frances, were established. On the other hand there were fifty-nine liquor houses established in Manitoba for the purpose of supplying liquor to Saskatchewan and Alberta. While they could not sell it in Manitoba they could export it to these provinces. Of these houses about thirty-nine were run by men of alien origin. I think that is creditable, at least to the Anglo-Saxon. In my judgment the bar should never again be allowed to get a footing in this country. As a newspaper man, and as one who has seen a great deal of life in the city of Winnipeg, almost since its incorporation as a city, I have watched the growth of these numerous and well patronized bars and have seen their extending influence as the years went by. Little bars ten feet long extended to fifteen, twenty, and thirty and forty feet, until finally, before this Act was passed, we had a large number of circular bars taking up all available space possible in the saloons. I have taken many a visitor from the East to witness the spectacle in these bars at five or six o'clock in the afternoon as workers were on their way from work. We saw hundreds, sometimes many hundreds, at one bar alone, almost five deep, clamouring for liquor and pouring their coins over the counter. As a result of the passing of the prohibition measure in Manitoba the money that went over the counters of the bars by incalculable sums every year immediately began to filter over the counters of the retail merchants' stores, and the sale of boots and shoes and women's and children's clothing enormously increased. I am perfectly sure that if any independent man went into Winnipeg to find out for himself what the benefits of prohibition have been he could not find one independent man or woman—and the women have a great interest in this matter, because they are deeply interested in the liquor traffic—who would not bear eloquent and fervent testimony to the substantial advantage of prohibition. It always seemed to me that when the vote was extended to women the question of prohibition was solved. In Manitoba the men carried the plebiscite by a vast majority of two or three to one, and when we had the accession, as we have had since, of women to the ranks of those who exercise the franchise, those of us who believe in prohibition as a godsend to the people, felt that the question was permanently settled so far as Manitoba at least was concerned. The franchise is being extended to women in all the provinces, and we now have this great army of women, who, I think, are almost unanimously in favour of prohibition. And well might the women be in favour of it, for after all they are among the chief sufferers. It is they and their children who are subjected to the brutalities of drunken husbands, and who are deprived of the necessaries of life, because the money which should go to support and make them happy has been thrown over the bars. We know how rich and affluent the saloon keepers and hotel keepers as a class generally became in past years as a result of the liquor traffic. It is generally the saloon keeper who has been able to drive about with a span of fast horses, wearing diamonds and fur coats, and living on the fat of the land. It is no wonder that they desire to get the thin end of the wedge in again.

I want to say a word in regard to the administration of the law in Manitoba. It is true my good friend the hon. member for North Winnipeg criticised it, and said that since its enactment we have had boot-legging and illicit stills and all that sort of thing. Would the hon. member suggest that if we abolished the law against murder we would have fewer murders, because that is the logical sequence of his argument? Certainly not. The fact that crime has been reduced by eighty per cent in Manitoba absolutely proves the value of prohibition. The Liquor Act in Manitoba has been and is being well enforced. At the head of the License Department is a gentleman of splendid character, of known and tried integrity, and the staff of officials who second his efforts have done thir level best to stamp out the evil. Here and there an illicit still may be found, but that will always exist. In Ireland, although it is contrary to law, they have had illicit stills for centuries. I suppose the same is true of Scotland, and I have no doubt that similar conditions exist all over the country. You cannot absolutely wipe that out, but if the law is as well enforced as it can be—and I can bear testimony to the fact that it is in Manitoba—we have reached an almost ideal condition of affairs with regard to the enforcement of prohibitory liquor law. Speaking, as I believe, for the vast majority of the people of Manitoba, we commend every movement that this Federal Government may take to enable us to continue, and if possible strengthen, prohibition in that province. Under this proposed Act I take it that the importation and manufacture of liquor can be prohibited in Manitoba. Is that correct? Yes; the Acting Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council nod their heads. That being the fact, so far as Manitoba is concerned, we may assume so long as the populace itself is sound on the issue that we are safe in that regard. I have no desire to refer to the amendment of the hon. member for London. It has been criticised and it will be unnecessary for me to say anything on that point. But as the representative of a Manitoba constituency, I want to reiterate the statement that the people of that province look to this Government to assist in every way to make prohibition effective, and would be profoundly disappointed if every available measure were not taken by the Government to secure that enforcement. If I could be assured that any legislation that might be passed here, or any additional position which the Government could take would make prohibition more effective in Manitoba than it will be under this proposed law, then I am prepared to advocate it. I am one of those who, from long experience and close observation of this traffic, firmly believes that alcohol has been the greatest curse that has ever fallen upon humanity.

Mr. EULER: Was the Manitoba legislation enacted after a plebiscite had been taken or was there a plebiscite taken at all?

Mr. RICHARDSON: It was after a plebiscite. Perhaps the President of the Privy Council could answer that.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) has answered it. It was enacted after a vote of the people.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, after a plebiscite had been taken. It was carried by two or three to one.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL: I think the Committee will pardon me for saying that I listened with a good deal of satisfaction this afternoon to the expressions of appreciation and approval of the policy of the abolition of the bar uttered on both sides of the House. I mention this because it indicates the rapid growth of sentiment in all sections of Canada on the important question now under consideration. Not only have there been expressions in the House and elsewhere, but I notice that in a statement issued by the distillers of Canada and circulated among members of the House they set out:

> It was felt that the public bar with its ever-ready invitation to enter, its customs of "treating," its pernicious record of political activity, and in too many cases its dubious management, could only be dealt with by extinction.

The distillers go further and put themselves on record as being absolutely opposed to any legislation which has for its object, directly or indirectly, the restoration of the public drinking bar. When I recall the attitude, so recently as 1914, of the gentlemen who are responsible for the publication and distribution of that pamphlet, and their very active and energetic hostility to the proposal to abolish the bar, I feel justified in accepting this change of attitude as an indication of the growth of public sentiment on this question. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) has intimated that he thinks that the closing of the public bar is the right policy, and that in this proposed legislation we should not go further. I judge that the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) shares the same view, and that he thinks that in the Order in Council which we are seeking to ratify we are going beyond what should be considered in the public interest.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think the hon. member for North Waterloo expressed his opinion one way or the other on the prohibition question from my recollection of what he said.

Mr. ROWELL: He very carefully avoided committing himself, but I think the statement I have made is a fair inference from what he did say. But while that policy may have been a sound and wise policy in 1914, I venture to think that the war radically changed the situation in all the provinces of Canada, and public sentiment throughout Canada demanded more advanced action than the abolition of the bar. That has been shown by the action which the various provinces have taken in legislating on this question. Wherever it has been submitted to a vote of the people, the vote has been overwhelmingly in support of a proposal which went much further than simply the abolition of the bar. As I recall the matter, the province of Saskatchewan passed legislation for abolishing the bar and putting the sale of intoxicating liquor in shops under government control. That continued for one year. Then the Government submitted to the electors of the province the question of whether the sale in shops should continue, or whether it should be abolished. The result was a decisive vote of the people in favour of abolishing the sale in shops also. The question was submitted in Alberta, as my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has stated, and the vote included the prohibition of the sale both over the bar and in shops, as the terms of the Alberta Act indicates. That was also the case in the province of British Columbia, in the province of Manitoba, in the province of New Brunswick, and in the province of Quebec in the legislation passed there a year ago. Nova Scotia was dry before the war, except the city of Halifax, and legislation was introduced to make the city of Halifax dry also. Prince Edward Island was likewise dry before the war. That was the general situation. Now the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has suggested that there is really no evidence that the province of Ontario is in favour of legislation as advanced as that now in force in Ontario and that we should not proceed with this legislation at the present time, but should defer action until an expression of the people is taken in Ontario this fall. May I say that I entirely dissent from the hon. gentleman's conclusion that the people of Ontario have not evidenced a desire in favour of the legislation in force in that province at the present time. The hon. member from Peel (Mr. Charters) has already pointed out the attitude of Ontario on this question as expressed in the votes which have been given in the province from time to time when the matter was submitted to a vote of the whole people. When the legislation was introduced by the Government of Ontario in 1916 I was a member of the legislature and have an intimate knowledge of all the discussions that took place upon it. But while I concede there was some differences of opinion in the House on the question, some members not being wholly in favour of the legislation, yet the Bill passed the House without one dissenting vote. I do not think there could be legislation as important and radical as that introduced into Ontario in 1916, and no vote against it unless public sentiment strongly supported the legislation.

Mr. EULER: How would the minister interpret the vote given by the people in the province of Ontario on the issue that was raised by the hon. gentleman himself in the election of 1914?

Mr. ROWELL: I think the best interpretation to put upon it is the one I put upon it at the time.

Mr. EULER: What was that?

Mr. ROWELL: That was that I would continue to advocate the policy until the cause triumphed.

Mr. EULER: That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. ROWELL: The interpretation I put upon the vote at the time was this: The total vote given in the province of Ontario—I am speaking now from recollection—was fifty-two and a half per cent in favour of the Government or the Government candidates. The vote in favour of the Opposition or in opposition to Government candidates was forty-seven and a half per cent. The popular vote was not fully reflected in the membership in the House, as the popular vote seldom is on any occasion, and there were other factors entering into the contest, as there is in every political contest. You cannot in an election between political parties have any issue decided wholly on its merits. In the vote referred to other questions entered in; all I can say is that to me it was not discouraging. The night after the election I announced that the policy would be continued; and I may be pardoned for saying I am gratified to-day that the policy has been accepted in all the provinces of Canada by men of both political parties. In reference to the situation in Ontario I have one further remark to make, and I make this upon the basis of a statement by the Prime Minister of the province. Speaking at the last session of the Legislature on the matter—Sir William Hearst stated that if the men opposed to the legislation, the men engaged in the trade, had desired a vote in the year 1916, he would have given it. I know that to be the case: If the men opposed to the legislation which was introduced by Sir William Hearst in the Legislature of Ontario in 1916 had desired that it should be submitted to a vote of the electors before it came into force on the 1st of September of that year, he would have been quite prepared to have had the question submitted. But those who were opposed to the legislation recognized that it would simply be absolutely hopeless for them to successfully oppose it before the people. The sentiment of Ontario was so unanimously in favour of the proposal of Sir William Hearst, that those opposed to the legislation would not challenge a vote upon it; and one of the grounds of complaint, and I think quite just complaint, on the part of Sir William Hearst, was that after he had refrained from giving a vote because these people did not want it, he should have been criticised for putting the legislation into force without a vote. Now since that time a vote has been given to the women of the province. There is not an hon. member coming from Ontario, if he considers the question of the women's vote in that province, who will not frankly admit that if you take a vote of the men, plus the vote of the women, there would be a most overwhelming preponderance of opinion in favour of this legislation. Others may not think the vote will be so overwhelming, but there will be an opportunity of ascertaining that when the vote takes place next fall. There is no use hazarding a prediction on the point; but I am persuaded myself that the vote in Ontario on all the questions submitted will be decisively in the one direction; the people of Ontario will answer all the questions submitted to them in the negative. The position therefore when the Dominion Order in Council prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquor and interprovincial trade in it was passed, was this: All the provinces of Canada had enacted legislation prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor within their own boundaries, and the law had gone into force in all the provinces save Quebec, where it was to become effective on the 1st of May of the present year. When the Order in Council was passed the Government believed that it had the power to pass the necessary legislation to continue during the war and for the period of one year thereafter. Orders in Council passed by the Imperial Government, under somewhat similar legislation, were made to continue during the war and for certain periods after the war. The great majority of the Orders in Council passed by the Government of this country under the War Measures Act were made to continue during the war and for a certain period thereafter. But more recently the advice of the law officers of the Crown in Great Britain, and of the committee of lawyers of the British House of Commons appointed to look into the matter, has been to the effect that the legislation would end when the war came to an end—that is when peace was officially proclaimed. The Department of Justice concurs in this opinion and this legislation has therefore become necessary.

The object of the present legislation is simply to give effect to the intention and policy of the Government, as embodied in the Order in Council, to implement what they thought at the time they had the power to do, but which appears now to be doubtful; that is, to continue this legislation for the period of one year after the war.

The Order in Council as it stands prohibits the importation, manufacture and interprovincial transportation of intoxicating liquors throughout the whole Dominion for the remainder of the period of the war and for one year thereafter. Intoxicating liquor is defined in the Order in Council as any liquor or beverage containing more than two and one-half per cent proof spirits. It is quite true, as was stated by the hon. member for London, that deputations waited upon the Government urging that a change should be made in the definition of the alcoholic content, and that instead of two and one-half per cent proof spirits it should be two and one-half per cent alcohol. The Government was not able to see its way clear to grant that request. The Government did not itself fix two and one-half per cent proof spirits as the definition of what constituted intoxicating liquor; it found that definition already embodied in the legislation of almost all the provinces. It was the definition of intoxicating liquor in Quebec, in Ontario, and, I think, in nearly all the western provinces. Two provinces had a definition covering even a lower alcoholic content, one, I think, being two per cent proof spirits and the other something less; but no province had higher than two and one-half per cent proof spirits as the definition of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. McMASTER: As the minister is an authority on these matters, will he explain the exact difference between proof spirits and alcoholic weight?

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend had been in the House the other afternoon when this was very carefully and fully explained he would have had the information, and I must refer him to the Hansard statement on the difference, which is fully set forth there. Practically proof spirit is about one-half the alcoholic content.

Mr. McMASTER: The alcoholic content by weight?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. In other words, 2½ per cent alcoholic content would be approximately 5 per cent proof spirits. If the Government had undertaken to change the definition of the alcoholic content as was requested at one time, and had undertaken to say that liquor containing that alcoholic content might be sold in any part of Canada, it would have been over-riding provincial legislation. For while the Federal Parliament has power to deal with the sale of intoxicating liquors, if we undertook to do so the Federal legislation would supersede the provincial legislation. Therefore the Government in its legislation has carefully guarded against interfering in any way with the provincial legislation on the question of sale; we have dealt with importation, manufacture and interprovincial trade and transportation.

Before passing to a discussion of the amendment of my hon. friend, may I say a word or two more with reference to the action of the Federal Government in the matter? My hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and one or two other members of the House have intimated that they believe the action of the Government taken as a war measure was in the public interest and met with public approval. I want to assure hon. members, and I say this after consulting with the Prime Minister's office, that on no piece of legislation introduced by the Prime Minister has he received so many expressions of public approval, from all sections of the country, as he received in connection with this Order in Council.

As to the attitude of the provinces in connection with this question, my hon. friend from London—and he presented the view very clearly, very concisely, and very effectively from his standpoint—intimated that our legislation was not supplementary to, but was superseding the provincial legislation. He quoted various sections of the Ontario Act, under which he pointed out that import and export and manufacture, under certain conditions, and interprovincial shipment were expressly permitted, and therefore he argued the Order in Council supersedes rather than supplements the provincial legislation. I should like to draw the attention of the members of the Committee and of my hon. friend from London to this important consideration. The various provincial statutes dealing with the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquor within the province are almost all founded upon the Macdonald Act of Manitoba; there may be a few exceptions, but that is the basis of the provincial legislation dealing with the suppression of the sale of intoxicating liquor in most of the provinces. When that Act was passed many years ago the question of the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament and the jurisdiction of the provincial parliaments on this important matter was not clearly defined. There was grave doubt as to just how far the jurisdiction of the provinces went. When the Macdonald Act was passed special provisions were inserted in it to guard against its being held that the Act was unconstitutional in that it entrenched on the power of the Federal Parliament. So that provision was expressly made in the Macdonald Act that it should not interfere with the export, import, interprovincial trade and similar matters to which my hon. friend referred. That Act ran the gauntlet of all the courts and was declared by the Privy Council to be constitutional. Because it had been so declared to be constitutional, and because thereafter no question could be raised in the courts as to its validity, the majority of the provinces, when they came to frame legislation dealing with the matter, followed the Macdonald Act. I recall the discussion in the Ontario Legislature when this Bill was up in 1916 and these very clauses were under consideration. It was urged by some hon. members that Ontario, in view of more recent decisions of the Privy Council, had power to go further; that they could further limit the traffic in intoxicating liquors than they had done under the provisions of the Macdonald Act. I also well remember the answer made by the Hon. Mr. Hanna, who was in charge of the Bill, that it was much better to be on safe ground than on doubtful ground, and the Government considered it wiser in the public interest to keep within the limits of an Act which had already been declared by the Privy Council to be constitutional, even although it did not go so far as some might like to see it, than to run the risk of the Act being declared invalid by going beyond those limits. That is the reason why those provisions appear in the Ontario Act and in nearly all the other Acts passed by the other provincial governments. The reason is the desire of the province to make sure of the validity of its legislation by expressly providing that its legislation shall not interfere with matters which were considered to be within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, namely, matters relating to export, import, interprovincial trade, interprovincial transportation.

What conditions developed under the operation of the provincial Acts? Exactly the condition described by the hon. member for Springfield. Liquor stores could not be established in Winnipeg to sell liquor to the people of Manitoba, but a large number of liquor stores were established at Kenora to sell liquor to the people of Manitoba. Liquor stores were established at Montreal to sell liquor to the people of Ontario, and liquor stores were established in Winnipeg to sell liquor to the people of Saskatchewan.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Fifty-one stores.

Mr. ROWELL: Representations were made to the Government that this was not in the public interest; that it was militating against the efficiency of existing legislation and preventing it from having the full effect which was desired. I am quite prepared to concede that many arguments were made by many people in favour of provincial enactments along the line of what the hon. member for Red Deer stated, and I thought his statement of the general position was very reasonable. The Government, having decided that this legislation was in the public interest and was needed to supplement the legislation of the provincial governments, passed this Order in Council, and among the expressions of public opinion on the matter, I think none is more worthy of the serious attention of hon. members and of the country than the statements of the premiers of many of the provinces who expressed themselves on the subject, either in communications to the Prime Minister or in the form of interviews given to the press at the time. The Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), when he moved the resolution, read to the House a copy of a telegram from Sir William Hearst, Premier of Ontario, to Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, in reference to the matter. Let me give the Committee a statement made by the Premier of Manitoba in reference to the question:

In reference to the recent order passed by the Dominion Government concerning the control of the liquor traffic, it is regarded as very satisfactory to the Provincial Government rendering more effective the Manitoba Temperance Act. It applies the missing link, and will, I believe, be acceptable to the great majority of the people of the province.

I point that out as indicating that the provincial government recognized that our legislation was not supplanting theirs, but supplementing theirs, was providing the missing link, which they themselves had not the power, as they understood the situation, to provide. What was the view of the Premier of Saskatchewan on this matter, as stated at that time?

The announcement that the Dominion Government, by Order in Council under the War Measures Act, has determined that Canada on April first next will be under a complete prohibitory law has been received with general approval by the people of Saskatchewan. Almost all the provinces of Canada have now in force prohibitory laws which go as far as their constitutions will permit, but it was necessary for the Dominion to supplement the legislation by prohibiting the importation into Canada and by stopping trade in liquor between the provinces. The beneficial effects of our local prohibition law have been of such a character as to lead to the conclusion that Dominion wide prohibition will better economic conditions, and will also decrease waste, and will so increase the efficiency of the nation that we will be assured of still greater efforts being put forth to see that Canada performs her full duty in the world's great crisis.

I desire to call the attention of the committee particularly to this sentence:

It was necessary for the Dominion to supplement the legislation by prohibiting the importation into Canada and by stopping trade in liquor between the provinces.

Then the Premier of Alberta made this statement:

Aside from the national approval of any measure tending towards the conservation of all food products for strictly war purposes, the Dominion Order in Council prohibiting the transportation of liquor into any part of Canada wherein the sale is now illegal is the legal complement to the enforcing of the will of the people of this province as exemplified by the overwhelming majority given on the Alberta referendum.

Mr. M. CLARK: What is the date of that?

Mr. ROWELL: Shortly after the Order in Council was passed. I have not the exact date, and I am not sure whether that was an interview given to the press, or a telegram sent to the Prime Minister of Canada, but it was published, I think, in January, 1918, or the last week of December, 1917. I am not sure which.

Mr. M. CLARK: I am sure the minister does not want to mislead the Committee and is not doing so as to the opinion in Alberta, but is he aware that the Attorney General of Alberta stated in the Legislative Assembly quite recently that at this time eighty per cent of the people of the province are law-breakers? They are not breaking the law of the province as they are not drinking over the bar because they cannot do that, but, according to the statement of the Attorney General, they are law-breakers as far as the Order in Council is concerned. Does the minister know the opinion of the Alberta Government as to the matter now?

Mr. ROWELL: I have had no conversation with the Premier of Alberta on this matter since July or August of 1918, when I understood him to be wholly favourable to it. The situation may be quite as my hon. friend has stated, although I was not aware that the Attorney General of Alberta had made such a statement in the legislature.

Mr. M. CLARK: I do not want to misrepresent my province; indeed, I have no means of doing so. I think there is a very strong sentiment in the province still, but the minister will admit that that was a strong statement also by the Attorney General of the province who has in charge the liquor business within the province.

Mr. ROWELL: It certainly is a strong statement upon which I am not in a position to express an opinion as I have no personal knowledge of the matter. The then Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Brewster, made this statement:

Apart from sentimental temperance considerations, I regard the prohibition order as wisest possible enactment for war period and entirely in conformity with pledges of Union

Government to introduce all possible measures affecting the economic situation. The direct and indirect saving will enable the Dominion to better bear war burdens and, at the same time, materially conserve the country's manpower.

I might go on showing the general trend of public sentiment throughout Canada at the time by reading similar expressions of opinions from other influential persons and religious bodies. I shall not do so. I have quoted these particularly to show that the legislation we are proposing does not supplant, but, in the language of the premiers themselves, supplements their legislation of the provinces and gives effect to it in a way that at the time at least, they thought very desirable.

My hon. friend from London also referred to the large petition which had been sent to members of the House from various labour organizations in reference to changing the alcoholic content which should be deemed intoxicating. My hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has already dealt with one aspect of that matter, and it is not my intention to go into it. I would say, however, that one of these deputations, representing the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, indicated that they would be satisfied if the Government left it to the provinces to settle the question of the alcoholic content, just as is being done by the amendment to the Order in Council. So that, even if there are sections of labour that do not agree with the Order in Council as originally framed, I believe that the Order in Council as now framed, meets their views. Even as the Order in Council was originally framed, it met with the approval of that very large and influential body of labour, the organizations of railway employees, who waited upon the Government to present their recommendations against any change and in support of the Order in Council as it then stood. My recollection is that the Winnipeg Trades and Labour Council, the Alberta Federation of Labour, and I think the British Columbia Federation of Labour, voted against the proposal to change the alcoholic content. A very serious strike took place in Winnipeg last year, and the strike committee made a public statement in reference to prohibition which was cabled to New Zealand for use in labour organizations there, in view of the vote which was being taken in New Zealand on prohibition. I refer to this statement because it has a very direct bearing on the present situation. They stated that one of the most important and satisfactory features in connection with the strike was the maintenance of law and order in the city of Winnipeg during the whole period of the strike. And that this would not have been possible if the bars had been open.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What would have been the situation in Winnipeg to-day if the bars had been open?

Mr. ROWELL: I ask hon. members to stop and think what would be the situation in Winnipeg to-day, with 30,000 men on strike, and feeling running high as it naturally does when the situation is so critical, if the open sale of liquor were permitted in that city? I ask further, what would be the situation in Winnipeg to-day if large quantities of liquor were stored there and could be broken into? I venture to think that if this measure was important during the period of the war, it is vastly more important during the year that lies immediately ahead of us. We must recognize that we are passing through a very critical time, that there is a widespread feeling of unrest, that men must keep their heads level and their minds clear. We must recognize that the use of intoxicating liquor under existing conditions, or the granting of facilities for the securing of it, might have very disastrous results where large companies of men are on strike and feeling is running high in consequence.

The present Bill validates the existing Order in Council subject to certain exceptions which I shall mention. The existing Order in Council is to continue in force for the duration of the war and for one year thereafter. It has been modified, and modified only—as the Acting Prime Minister has pointed out,—to give effect to the change in the situation that has developed since the Order in Council was passed, and indeed, since the speech from the Throne was delivered. In the speech from the Throne the Government promised to introduce legislation to validate the Order in Council. At that time all the provinces had legislation prohibiting the sale of liquor. Since then the province of Quebec, by a vote of the people, has decided to permit the sale of beer containing 2·51 alcoholic content, and light wines. The province of Ontario has also passed legislation to take a vote on the same question, and it has been suggested—I do not know whether the suggestion has been carried out or not—that some other provinces are preparing to take a similar vote.

The effect of the amendment is simply this: That if any province decided by a vote of its people to permit the sale within that province of any class of alcoholic liquors, then automatically the manufacture and transportation of such liquor is permitted in that province. Quebec has already decided to permit the sale under certain conditions. Automatically, under this legislation, those liquors may be manufactured within that province. If Ontario, when the time comes, should vote to permit the sale of beers of a limited alcoholic content, then the manufacture of those beers in Ontario may commence the moment the sale commences. Automatically, the Order in Council applies. It is not a question of discriminating between the provinces, because exactly the same principle applies with reference to every province of the Dominion.

The amendment of my hon. friend from London is to this effect: That although the province of Ontario does not permit the sale of beer of a higher alcoholic content that two and a half per cent proof spirits, if we should permit the manufacture in Ontario of beer containing a higher alcoholic content, namely, whatever alcoholic content might be sold in any other province it would mean, if his amendment prevailed, the manufacture of such beer might immediately commence in Ontario for shipment to the province of Quebec or for export.

Mr. MORPHY: How does the minister explain what appears to me to be an inconsistency of permitting Ontario to ship to Quebec or any other province native wines that may be fifty per cent proof spirits, but not beer that may be only five per cent proof spirits?

Mr. ROWELL: Ontario cannot ship to Quebec any wine of an alcoholic content in excess of that which may be sold in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MORPHY: Ontario could, if Quebec voted that way. The question is à propos just the same.

Mr. ROWELL: The Order in Council permits the manufacture in any province of any liquor of which the province permits the sale.

Mr. MORPHY: Ontario permits the manufacture of wine to any percentage.

Mr. ROWELL: Native wine.

Mr. MORPHY: That may be shipped out.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: Beer of 6 per cent can neither be made nor shipped out?

Mr. ROWELL: It cannot be made because Ontario does not permit the sale.

Mr. MORPHY: But this Order in Council permits the export to any other province.

Mr. ROWELL: It permits the shipment from Ontario of anything that may be lawfully manufactured and sold in Ontario. The only intoxicating liquor that may be manufactured and sold in Ontario for beverage purposes is native wine, which may be manufactured and sold under the conditions provided in the Ontario Temperance Act.

Mr. MORPHY: But your Order in Council, as I understand it, does not refer to the export of beer of any strength. You absolutely prohibit the export of beer abroad by this Order in Council.

Mr. ROWELL: No, the manufacture is prohibited.

Mr. MORPHY: You allow the manufacture and export of wine to the extent of 50 per cent proof spirits?

Mr. ROWELL: We permit the manufacture of wine because the province permits the sale. I do not think I can make myself clearer. The whole basis of the legislation is the recognition of the right of a province to govern the question of sale. We permit the manufacture of anything that the province decides may be sold.

Mr. CROTHERS: Does the Order in Council provide for the absolute prohibition of transportation from one province to another, or is the prohibition applicable only to a "dry" province? Does it absolutely prevent the transportation whether the province is "dry" or "wet?"

Mr. ROWELL: It prohibits the transportation of intoxicating liquors into any place that is "dry." It may be transported into any place where it may be lawfully sold.

Mr. CROTHERS: Is that native wine, or does that provision apply to beer? I understand that Quebec is not what is generally called "dry" since the vote taken recently, and under the proposed Bill would Ontario be in a position to send to that province not only wine but beer?

Mr. ROWELL: No. The provision is this:

> Provided that this regulation shall not apply to the sending, taking, transporting or delivering of native wines in the province of Ontario, or to sending, taking, transporting or delivering any intoxicating liquor lawfully manufactured in any province to any place in such province where such intoxicating liquor may lawfully be sold, or to sending, taking, transporting, or delivering any wine lawfully manufactured in any province to any place where such liquor may lawfully be sold.

It does not permit a brewery in Ontario to manufacture liquor containing a higher percentage of alcohol than the province of Ontario authorizes to be sold. What cannot be sold cannot be manufactured.

Mr. MICHAUD: What is the percentage of alcohol in the native wine manufactured?

Mr. ROWELL: There is no fixed percentage.

Mr. MICHAUD: What is the minimum?

Mr. ROWELL: There is no minimum named.

Mr. McMASTER: What is the usual percentage of alcohol in the native wine in Ontario?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know. My recollection is that it is a higher percentage than that authorized for sale in Quebec. Therefore I think that the question of shipping it into Quebec is largely an academic one. At the suggestion of my hon. friend from Beauce the other day the Acting Prime Minister said he was prepared to amend the Act so as to provide for its shipment if it may be sold.

Mr. EDWARDS: Suppose the province of Ontario permitted the sale of 15 per cent wine and the province of Quebec limited the strength of wine sold in that province to ten per cent. Am I right in supposing that Ontario could not export into Quebec any wines stronger than 10 per cent?

Mr. ROWELL: That is correct.

Mr. MICHAUD: What amount of wine has the province of Ontario on hand at present?

Mr. ROWELL: The Ontario Government has not any wine.

Mr. MICHAUD: The province of Ontario?

Mr. ROWELL: The Government of Ontario has no wines on hand at all.

Mr. MICHAUD: But the province?

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot give that information because I do not know; but my recollection is that it is not a very large quantity. On one occasion when representations were being made to the Government by the grape growers of Ontario we asked for the information and I was surprised to find how limited the quantity was, and how small was the volume of business in native wines in Ontario. Relatively, it was an insignificant trade; there were only a very limited number of gallons. My hon. friend from North Winnipeg seemed to think that there was an objection to this Order in Council because of the necessity for liquor in the case of influenza. I am not going to discuss the medicinal or scientific aspect of that question, but I would point out that no legislation in any province interferes with the use of intoxicating liquor for medicinal purposes. My hon. friend also mentioned that the price was excessive and it was urged that there should be some control. I quite agree with that. Quebec and Ontario have both taken steps to curtail excessive prices in the future. Quebec in its recent legislation provides for withdrawing the license from the vendor if he charges an excessive price. In Ontario the Government is taking over the sale, and will carry the business through the License Board. Two or three hon. members have urged that the legislation be made permanent. The hon. member for Springfield regretted that we did not make it permanent and Dominion-wide, subject to a vote of the people, and other hon. gentlemen spoke of the legislation being province-wide, that is being continued subject to repeal at the request of any province so far as it relates to that province. While these views do represent the opinion of very many people in this country, the Government is carrying out the promise it made in the speech from the Throne by validating this war-time measure for the period during which according to its terms it should continue in force. In the meantime a vote is to be taken in Ontario where there will be an expression of public opinion on the question. Votes may also be taken in other parts of the country. The soldiers will have returned before another session of the House and the whole matter can be reviewed at the next session in the light of all the relevant facts with a view to taking such action as the public interests may demand. The Government felt in introducing this legislation, modified only to the extent I have mentioned, that it was carrying out its pledge in the speech from the Throne and giving, as I believe, expression to the real public opinion of this country.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I do not wish to take up much time in dealing with the subject in any general way. I do not think that I would have risen had it not been for some remarks that we have heard from some hon. members who appear to think that any legislation that is brought forward now by people who are generally termed temperance organizations, such as the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which has been so much complained of, and kindred bodies, is liable to increase the consumption of intoxicating liquors. They are opposed to such institutions, and to the friends of temperance, although if their desires were carried out there would be less liquor consumed. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) has given the Committee some medical views in regard to the question. The hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has replied to a portion of the hon. member's address and has shown that this legislation is not intended to interfere with the use of intoxicating liquors for medical purposes. In regard to any other views that he may have expressed, as to the good effects of intoxicating liquors, or as to the absence of any bad effects, let me remind the hon. gentleman that there are others who are quite as capable of expressing opinions on this question as he is and who have expressed exactly the opposite opinion. In the issue of the Ottawa Journal for to-day, I find that one of the reporters of that paper has had an interview with Dr. Saleeby, whom the paper describes as the leading recognized expert on the effect of alcoholism on the future of the race. I will read an extract or two from what he says:

> We and you want to see the Dominions populated with British people. But if those people do not exist where are you going to get them? This is one of the factors of imperial importance that must be faced.
> The decreasing birth rate in Britain means ultimately that there will be no surplus for the Dominions, and then what? The future of this great Canada is bound up in this question of the birth rate of Britain. To go back to the factors in the reduction of the British birth rate, I said that the war was the chief factor, but the war did not cause the steady decline that had been going on for years before.
> Belongs to Racial Poisons.
> Alcohol, which I hold belongs to a group of racial poisons, is one of the chief factors in this condition, whether a war is being fought or not. Alcohol, it has been proved, has had the most deleterious effect, not only on the consumer in excess, but on his ability to be the father of healthy children; to be the father of children at all. Babies dead and babies incapable of living we have in immense numbers, due solely to alcoholism. Think of the effect on the future of the race. I am not so much concerned with the drunken man. I am, of course, deeply sensible of the fact that he is ruining himself and abusing his wife. But with the children of that drunken man I am vitally concerned. The racial effect of his indulgence is a matter that concerns not himself alone, but the nation to which he belongs.
> In my opinion there is no better stock in existence than the Scottish. For centuries the Scottish race has been the fruitful source of the best of our Dominion's population. My friend Professor Arthur Keith, curator of the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons in London, reckoned that in the war one Dominion soldier in every three was either Scottish or of Scottish descent.
> Scotch whisky in Scotland to-day is arresting the continuance of that splendid breed. The time has come for the Empire to choose which is the more valuable: Scotch whisky or Scotch men.
> Empty of Population.
> Our Dominions are practically empty of population and with this war we have made ourselves responsible for immense further tracts of the earth surface. We must have men for them. If we are going on with social practices that ruin the race whence will we get the men? It was not worth going on with the war if it is not worth going on with the race. This war has of course had its terrible effect on the fathers of the future but we must not lose sight of the other war against them that is continually going on. Incidentally this need of saving the future fathers of the race led me to devise the helmet which the British Government honoured me by accepting as the standard for its troops and the American Government added to that honour by adopting it for the United States troops. That, however, is beside the point of the evil of alcoholism. Research, data, statistics of every description, conditions as you may see them each day prove the evil effects of alcoholism on the human race.

I put that up in opposition to my hon. friend from North Winnipeg.

Mr. FRASER: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if what he has just read about the Scotch race represents his own views?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I think I will pass it over to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) to answer.

Mr. FRASER: If the view expressed in that statement represents the views of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Levi Thomson) I protest against it. The Scotch race proved themselves to be a race of heroes in this war, and to say that alcohol has depleted that people is a libel against which I protest. It is well known that in the State of Maine, which has had prohibition for the last forty years, the birth rate is the lowest in the United States.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I do not know that what my hon. friend has said has any bearing whatever on the authority that I have quoted and I quote the statement of this gentleman as being as good an authority as my hon. friend (Mr. Blake). I have listened to the objections to the work of so-called temperance people and the assertion that their work has had the effect of increasing the consumption of intoxicants rather than decreasing it, and that their opponents are the true temperance people.

We have been told that very often. Those who oppose these organizations pose as the real friends of temperance. I have been watching temperance work for half a century and I have become rather accustomed to the statement. In this connection I am reminded of the saying that there is nothing new under the sun. When I was a boy I sometimes had occasion to travail over the Guelph-Erin gravel road for a distance of twelve miles. Along that road, according to the best of my recollection, there were twelve licensed hotels. A great many people in those times thought there was no necessity for so many. They earnestly preached the doctrine that some of these licenses should be cut off, the way temperance cranks do. A strong campaign was made along that line but the liquor interests and their friends held that if the suggestion of the temperance workers was carried out it would cause an increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquor. That was the main argument used against the cutting down of the licenses. It was suggested that the congregating of people in fewer houses would result in more drinking. That was one of the first effective reforms that was undertaken along temperance lines in that part of the country. Another early reform was the cutting down of the hours in which intoxicating liquors could be sold. The same argument was used against that—it would increase the consumption of intoxicating liquors. Not a single thing endeavoured to be done for the last fifty years in the hope of decreasing the consumption of intoxicating liquors but the organized liquor traffic and their friends insisted determinedly would have the opposite effect. We were told the same thing in regard to the Dunkin Act, that its adoption would cause an increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquor. The same thing was said in regard to the Scott Act and local option. People who opposed local option said: "Anything in the world but local option; we are prepared to support you in anything at all that will do away with the use of intoxicating liquor, even total prohibition, but don't say local option whatever you do. It will ruin the communities in which it is passed, and will cause an increased consumption of intoxicating liquors." Every man who has been through those campaigns knows that these were the arguments always advanced. The same arguments were put forward when a campaign was started in favour of banishing the bar. We were told that if we banished the bar it would cause intoxicating liquor to be taken into the people's homes, that more of it would be consumed, and the young people in those homes would be taught to use it. Doubtless that doctrine was preached in Ontario and all over the country. I know it was preached in Saskatchewan, because before we actually did banish the bar in that province there had been considerable agitation going on on the part of the so-called temperance cranks and marked advance had been made everywhere along temperance lines by reason of that agitation. The same thing is true with regard to every single piece of legislation that has ever been passed with a view to decreasing the consumption of intoxicating liquors; and I think we may say such objections will always be raised. I think the present legislation is along sensible lines. The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) has dealt so very fully with the subject that little has been left for me to say, except this: The duty devolves upon us under the British North America Act, in view of the decisions which have been given with respect to temperance legislation, to pass such laws as will make provincial enactments effective. The provinces, as we all know, have no power to prohibit the importation, the manufacture or interprovincial trade in intoxicating liquors. Therefore, the only authority that can make the provincial legislation as effective as it should be is this Parliament. The only complaint I have to make with regard to the Bill now before us is perhaps that it is merely temporary and not permanent. However, it is legislation along the right line; we will take what we can get and look for more.

Mr. EDWARDS: The debate has taken a somewhat wide range, and while I do not propose to speak at any great length I may be obliged to follow the course taken by others instead of confining myself directly to the Bill.

I suppose we can all accept the principle that the aim of legislation should be to make it as easy as possible for men to live right, and as difficult as possible for them to live wrong. We will find considerable more difficulty when we undertake to define what is right and what is wrong. No doubt it is a serious matter to interfere with the personal liberty of the individual citizen; but it is also a serious matter that the physical, intellectual and moral status of the next generation may depend upon the quantity of intoxicating liquor consumed by the head of the house. That is also a serious matter and something that we have a right to take into consideration. The State, I take it, is justified in introducing legislation of this kind interfering with the liberty of the subject, when the subject in the exercise of that liberty interferes with the general welfare of the State and with the undoubted right of other individuals to enjoy a measure of happiness in this world.

The amendment which is before the Committee is in the right direction because its general object is to make effective whatever legislation the provinces see fit to pass. I do not blieve the House should go beyond such legislation as the provinces are prepared to adopt, but, in my opinion, it is perfectly logical and right for us to go as far as each of the provinces wishes to go and to pass legislation here which will make effective the expressed will of the people of those provinces. Such, I understand, is the general intention of the present legislation. I am not one of those who feel very enthusiastic about the Dominion Alliance, nor am I disposed to throw many bouquets at that organization. I think the Dominion Alliance has on a great many occasions taken a course which could not be regarded as a straight course. From 1878 down to 1896, the Dominion Alliance hounded the life fairly out of the Conservative Government at Ottawa by its demands for prohibitory legislation, and from 1896 down to 1911 was practically silent in regard to prohibitory legislation so far as it could be enacted by the Dominion Parliament. The Alliance became active again, especially active, immediately after 1911. I do not agree with some gentlemen who seem to think that the argument in regard to prohibition is all on one side. I think I could produce figures here to show that that is not true in the prohibition States on the other side of the line, bearing in mind what is disclosed by the years 1888 and 1893. It may be said that that is ancient history, but those are the years for which I have figures concerning the prohibition States of Maine, Kansas and Iowa. Comparing those States with the non-prohibition States of Michigan, Nebraska and Minnesota, there were more arrests per thousand of the population for all offences against the law in the prohibition States referred to than there were in the non-prohibition States. There were also more arrests for drunkenness in the prohibition States than in the non-prohibition States, and a greater degree of pauperism in the former States than in the latter. I do not think we would be justified in taking that data as an argument against prohibition. The figures cannot be regarded as an argument against prohibition because they did not really have prohibition in the so-called prohibition States. Prohibition has never had a fair trial in any of those States. The Royal Commission appointed by the Canadian Government in 1893 to inquire into the liquor traffic examined one hundred and eighty-four witnesses from the states of Maine, Kansas and Iowa. Twenty-four of them stated that the prohibition law was enforced; one hundred and fifty-four that it was not enforced; and six of them expressed no opinion on that point. The report of the Canadian Commission contains this sentence:

> The whole trend of the evidence only proves this much, that prohibition prohibits where no one wants intoxicating liquors, but nowhere else.

That was the summing up of that commission in regard to the way in which prohibition was working out on the other side of the line. But notwithstanding that summing up there is undoubted evidence that not only in the United States but in the countries of Europe wherever prohibition has been tried it has been an unquestioned success in the rural districts.

I was very much interested in reading a work compiled by two English gentlemen appointed by the Imperial Government for the express purpose of inquiring into this whole business, Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell, who have probably written the most comprehensive and logical book that was ever attempted on the temperance question. They spent several years on the work and visited the different countries of Europe, the United States and Canada, and their facts and deductions are well worthy of consideration. Referring to the Gothenburg system in Sweden, they state that in 1900 the consumption of spirits per head of the population was not over one-third as much as fifty years before. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the Swedish government enacted a law which gave the right of distillation to any person who owned or cultivated land. The result was the establishment of 173,000 distilleries, or one for every seventeen of the population, and the drunken degeneracy of the people. Drunkenness was carried to such an excess that, I presume, it disgusted public opinion and led to the adoption of the Gothenburg system. An attempt was made through that system to lessen drunkenness, and by 1895 the number of distilleries had decreased to only 132. The Gothenburg system has been a very great success if viewed from the standpoint of the amount of liquor consumed per head of the population, but its weakness lies in the fact that while the sale of liquor is under the control of the State, the money received by the State from the sale is used as a means of increasing the local revenue, and consequently the people have an interest in retaining the liquor traffic because the revenue derived from it lessens their burden of taxation.

Now, Sir, I want to name what I consider to be the three principal causes of intemperance, and then to suggest what I think, if not a complete remedy, is something which commends itself to me as more likely to be effective than anything I have heard suggested. First, in regard to the cause of intemperance. What are they? The first is the element of private gain. General Neil Dow, who took such an active part in the prohibition movement in the state of Maine, made use of these words:

> The liquor traffic can never be put down so long as there is any profit remaining in it.

That is to say, his idea of the first requisite was to eliminate private profit from the sale of liquor. I believe that that is logical and sound. So long as any persons are making money out of the sale of liquor, there will always be some who will actively work for the continuance of the traffic. Another cause of intemperance is the monotony and dullness and, too often, the actual misery of many lives. I know there are some who are of opinion that drink is the cause of poverty. No doubt drink is responsible for a measure of poverty, but I think I am right in saying that if it were possible to eliminate all liquor from the Dominion, so that no person could procure any drink for beverage purposes, you would not thereby eliminate all poverty. Drink is not the only cause of poverty. I grant that drink may be taken to be one of the causes of poverty, but perhaps it is not the main cause. Poverty, I think, may be characterized as a sort of industrial disease, and you will have it in this or any other country until industrial conditions have very much improved over what they are at the present time. Another cause of intemperance is the absence of adequate provision for social intercourse and healthful recreation. That brings me to the suggestion which I desire to make, and which, perhaps it may be said, has not any direct bearing on this legislation now before us. Reforms, it seems to me, must be constructive as well as restrictive. If we are going to have liquor sold in any province, I think the State should handle the sale—that it should be a State monopoly. There should be a system of local restriction and control, and if we are to be consistent we must cut out the State profit in liquor just as we would eliminate individual profits in the business. Therefore I say that any profits which arise from the sale of liquor by the State should be used to provide counteracting influences to provide some forms of healthful recreation, some attractions to draw the people away from the place where liquor is sold.

That principle has been recognized in many places in England, Scotland and Wales; it has been recognized in many places in Norway and Sweden, and it has worked with splendid success. Rooms have been provided where the men can meet, have social intercourse, enjoy games and recreations, and the money required for providing those places was the money obtained from the sale of liquor. I commend that suggestion to this committee, and in order to give point to that suggestion, may I be permitted to place on Hansard a few words from the pen of Mr. Robert Blatchford, who, writing in regard to conditions in certain parts of London, stated:—

> Imagine for a moment the common lot of our London poor. Ignorant and untrained minds, weary and unhealthy bodies, gloomy and demoralising environment, monotony and weariness of life, out of these evils spring the seeds of vice. Drudging in their vile stews day after day, night after night—always with the black future like an ominous cloud, casting its chill shadow on their anxious hearts; always with the mean walls hemming them in, and the mean tasks wearing them down, and the mean life paralysing their sick souls; with no pleasure but drink, with no club but the public house, with work precarious and wages low, in hateful and cheerless surroundings, and with faint hopes ever narrowing, the toiling millions bring their worn bodies and bewildered souls to fight against the devil and all his works—and the devil, amongst other weapons, uses gin. Out in the horrible East the women drink. What wonder! if you go amongst these poor women you will feel suddenly stricken old. What culture have these poor creatures ever known? What teaching have they had? What graces of life have come to them? What dowry of love, of joy, of sweet and fair imagination? Think what their lives are, think what their homes are, think of the darkness and confusion of their minds and then say, is it a marvel if they take to gin?

I place that quotation before the Committee because I think it has a very direct bearing upon two things to which I have previously alluded, one being the fact that poverty is not entirely due to drink, but is largely a result of wrong industrial conditions. But we find, it seems to me, in those words, ample justification for the adoption of any means which will lessen the evil of intemperance. Notwithstanding what I must regard, from my reading of statistics, as the failure of the attempt at prohibition in the United States, at least in so far as applies to urban centres, I find in the success which attended their efforts in the rural communities very great encouragement for Canada, because this Dominion is largely rural as yet, although there is a tendency towards the cities. I do not mean to say that any law on prohibitory lines which was successful in the rural parts but a failure in the urban centres is a complete success; it must succeed in both the urban centres and the country districts to be a complete success. But because our population is largely rural, I believe that there is a good opportunity for a greater success of any temperance measure in this country than has attended similar measures in any other country in the world.

I do not believe that legislation in Ontario or in this House is due entirely to temperance sentiment in Ontario or in this House. I believe it is largely due to the fact that it is supposed to be and is, unquestionably, a popular measure at this time. As has been stated by some hon. gentlemen, the position taken in Ontario at the present time is a most inconsistent one. Ontario prohibitionists hold up their hands in holy horror at the thought of any man drinking beer of a greater strength than 2½ per cent, but our friends are quite ready to allow a man to drink wine of a strength of 10, 15 or 20 per cent, so long as it is made from Ontario grapes. Ontario says in effect: It is a crime and a shame for a man to get drunk on beer, but it is quite permissible for him to get drunk on wine so long as the wine is made in Ontario and of Ontario grapes. That is an inconsistent position and shows that some temperance agitators in Ontario are not prepared to go as far as they would like members of this House to go in matters of prohibitory legislation. Again, I say the only safe and proper way for us to take here is to go no further than each province is prepared to go. We have no right to force upon Quebec, for instance, the views which may obtain in Ontario or Manitoba, and we have no right to force on Manitoba the views of the majority of the people of Saskatchewan. But we are quite safe in passing legislation here which will make effective any attempts of the various provinces along temperance lines.

Mr. McISAAC: I desire to say a few words in favour of the Bill before the House, in the first place, because I come from a province which has taken the lead and is the foremost province in Canada to-day as regards prohibition legislation, and second, because I myself am a temperance man, that is, I have been a total abstainer all my life. I am, therefore, pleased to give my feeble word in support of any temperance legislation. I think the Government are to be congratulated on having brought in a Bill to give legislative sanction and statutory enactment to the Orders in Council, and also because they have made this legislation adaptable to the conditions of the different provinces. Whatever prohibtion legislation the different provinces may have will not be interfered with; on the contrary, this Bill will so adapt itself as to meet their wishes and enactments in that respect. It is, therefore, most commendable legislation. Within the last few years there has unquestionably been a great advance in temperance sentiment throughout the Dominion, and it is pleasing to know that such is the case. After all, we cannot make men altogether temperate by legislation, because true temperance is a moral virtue; but all legislation that tends to bring about temperance and that will lessen temptations and remove dangerous occasions from those who may have a weakness for intemperance, is good for the uplifting of the people.

Any legislation that will promote temperance will improve the moral welfare of the community. A good many stories have been told by hon. gentlemen of the evils of intemperance; we have all encountered cases of this kind. The hon. member for East Algoma told of a man in his employ who was called home to the death-bed of his wife, but who instead of going home went to the tavern and got drunk, and finally met his death through drink. It occurred to me, while my good friend was telling his story, that he would have performed a good and meritorious act if, knowing the man's weakness, he had kept him in his office for the two hours the man was waiting the train, and my hon. friend might even have accompanied him to the station and seen him on board the train. He was not obliged to do that, of course, he is not his brother's keeper; but I could not help thinking that if he had done so, it would have redounded to his everlasting credit.

I shall not deal at greater length with the Bill because the matter has been pretty well discussed. I most highly commend the Government for the action they have taken, and the way in which they have framed this legislation to meet the requirements of the different provinces. The legislation will have no effect so far as my own province is concerned, because at the recent session of the legislature the provincial prohibition Act was amended so as to place the sale of liquor in the hands of the Government. We have gone further in the matter of prohibition than any other province in Canada, I believe.

Mr. CRONYN: Before you put the motion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in reply to those two members, excluding the President of the Privy Council, who alone touched on the question of the amendment. So far as I was able to follow the speeches this afternoon, I heard only two criticisms directed against the amendment I proposed.

In the first place, the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) called it an immoral proposition. Well, it is always easy to call a thing names, and even outside of the legal fraternity it is not an unknown exercise of wit by pinning a bad name to a man or an argument, to endeavour to put him or it out of court. But I would ask you for a moment to analyze just what this "immoral" proposition is. The whole proposition is founded on the rights of the province of Ontario or any other province to legislate on this matter of prohibition, and my contention is that the Order in Council and the Bill as drawn do not recognize the Ontario law. If I am right in that contention, my amendment simply seeks to implement or follow the Ontario law, and if there is any immorality in the proposition, that immorality rests upon the Government of the province of Ontario. I understand that my hon. friend from East Algoma was, and perhaps is, an ardent supporter of that Government, and I call his attention to the fact that not merely the export of three per cent beer, but the export of any kind of intoxicating liquor, was permitted under the Ontario Act. That is made abundantly clear by the sections which I read this afternoon. I suppose my hon. friend from East Algoma, if my "doxy" did not agree with his, might call me heterodox; and so he may call a proposal to export three per cent beer "immoral." But let us look a little further. The state of Maine has been mentioned during the debate. It has had prohibition for something like sixty years, and the statement is made, and I think has not been contradicted, that for many years the state of Maine has accounted beer containing three per cent alcohol by weight a non-intoxicant. Would Maine then think that the drinking of beer containing two and-a-half per cent alcohol by weight was "immoral?" Would the province of Quebec consider it an "immoral" transaction to drink beer containing two and-a-half per cent alcohol by weight if the same were made in Ontario and exported to Quebec?

Something has been said about the progress of temperance in Denmark and Sweden. Now, in Denmark, as in Maine, the Government declared beer containing three per cent alcohol by weight a non-intoxicant, and removed all duties thereon. The temperance societies in that country, large and powerful, established cafes and restaurants throughout the country and placed this excise-free three-per-cent beer on sale. They believed that to be a good move; they believed it to be in the interests of temperance, and the result is shown by the figures. You will remember that there is no general prohibition law in Denmark. The figures show that in consequence of this move the sale of three-per-cent beer went up in a most tremendous fashion, and the sale of ardent liquors decreased in a similar way. So, I think it cannot fairly be argued that this particular amendment—and no other result is possible in the time in which this law will last—is immoral.

The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) suggested this case: Suppose, he said, Ontario voted to go completely dry, to allow no sales of beer of any kind; how strange and illogical it would be to allow the export of three-per-cent beer into Quebec. That is a striking supposition, but quite an impossible one. This legislation will last, at the outside, for fifteen or sixteen months—until peace is declared and one year thereafter. The people of the province of Ontario are to vote next autumn on the question of the continuation or otherwise of the Ontario Temperance Act, and under no possible combination of circumstances, on no vote that can be given on that Act, can the province of Ontario go absolutely "dry." So that the danger conjured up by the member for North Grey does not apply in this case. At the present moment under these very Orders in Council the breweries can export to licensed vendors anywhere, so that whether Ontario went "dry" or not that export business could continue. The President of the Privy Council pointed out the genesis of the Ontario Temperance Act, and I am not at all in a position to argue or contradict him in that respect. He said that this Act followed generally the Macdonald Act of Manitoba and that the clauses permitting export and transportation were put in to avoid any question of jurisdiction or any attack in the courts as to the constitutionality of the Act. I would like, however, to call the attention of the Committee to one clause of the Ontario Temperance Act which I did not read, as I did not think it dealt with the matter before the Committee, but which is in striking contrast to the clauses I did read. I would suggest that this clause is the type of clause which the Government would insert in an Act so as to prevent any possible question as to constitutionality, whereas the other clauses are of a wholly different type, and are framed, I submit, for quite another purpose. Clause 139 reads:

> While this Act is intended to prohibit and shall prohibit transactions in liquor which take place wholly within the province of Ontario, except under license or as otherwise specially provided by this Act, and to restrict the consumption of liquor within the limits of the province of Ontario, it shall not affect and is not intended to affect bona fide transactions in liquor between a person in the province of Ontario and a person in another province or in a foreign country, and the provisions of this Act shall be construed accordingly.

This is a clause such as one could well imagine the Government inserting, out of an abundance of caution, to protect the constitutionality of its Act. But clauses 43, 45 and 46 are on an entirely different basis. They deal with the right of common carriers to carry liquor for export, and the right of the manufacturer to sell for export. The President of the Privy Council said, in answer to a question by an hon. member, that the test of the right to export is the right of sale within the province. That is the test as matters stand today. Under the Bill which the Government has introduced you can export wine of Quebec strength into Quebec because Ontario allows the sale of that wine. But as I pointed out in moving the amendment, if Ontario next September allows the sale of beer of 3 per cent or 2½ per cent alcohol by weight—if it follows the Quebec lead in that respect—even then, when the sale of that beer is allowed in Ontario, under this Act as brought in, that beer could not be exported into Quebec nor could beer be imported from Quebec. So that the sale test is only partly applied and unless the amendment which I suggest is adopted there will be that defect, that illogical position. I desire to repeat briefly what the general effect of my amendment is: It allows the manufacture in Ontario of beer of a strength which is permitted to be sold in Quebec, and the export of that beer to Quebec or any other place where it may lawfully be sold.

Amendment (Mr. Cronyn) negatived.

Mr. FIELDING: Subsection 3 of this section says:

> The Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue shall have power to make such regulations as he may deem necessary to prevent intoxicating liquor from being illegally manufactured in or from being imported into Canada——and so on. This language certainly is very unusual. The Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue is to have power to make any regulations that he personally may deem necessary. They are not to be approved by the Governor in Council nor published in the Canada Gazette. The minister has an absolute and unqualified power; I would call the attention of the minister to this subsection because it seems to me to be a very usual proceeding.

Mr. ROWELL: This is in the form drafted by the Parliamentary Counsel, but there is not the least objection to substituting "Governor in Council" for "minister." I presume the regulations will be important and it would be wiser to have them passed upon by the Governor in Council.

Mr. FIELDING: The words as drawn give the Minister of Inland Revenue absolute and unqualified power in the matter. No broader words could be used. I have never to my recollection seen such broad language in any previous Act.

Mr. ROWELL: I understand from the Parliamentary Counsel that these are the usual words in many Acts, and that in drafting this clause he has followed precedent. But I see no objection to an amendment to provide that the regulations shall be made with the approval of the Governor in Council and published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. FIELDING: That would be better.

Mr. ROWELL: That is what the intention is. I move that subsection 3 be amended by striking out the words " Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue " and substituting therefor the words " Governor in Council," and inserting at the end of the clause the following words:—

> All regulations made hereunder shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the title:

Mr. ROWELL: It has been said that the title is rather long and cumbersome. I would suggest that the following be inserted in section 1:—

This Act may be cited as the Intoxicating Liquor Act, 1919.

That is for convenience of reference.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CANNON: By referring to section 1 paragraph (a), it will be seen that paragraph (a) provides for the amendment of subsection (c) of regulation 1. If we amend subsection (c) of regulation 1 as provided in paragraph (a) of section 1, I do not see that there will be any meaning to it at all. It says that you shall strike out the word "wine" in the last line and there is no word "wine" in the last line.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "wine" is found in the last line of paragraph (c) regulation 1 page 3.

Mr. CANNON: Paragraph (c), as I read it, says "native wine is permitted." The word "wine" is not in the last line. If the paragraph is amended I do not think it will have any meaning at all.

Mr. CRONYN: I do not know whether the hon. member (Mr. Cannon) is aware that the Order in Council as printed and first distributed differs from the Order in Council as printed in the Bill. The original Order in Council read "wherein the sale of native wine is prohibited" and the Bill reads "wherein the sale of native wine is permitted"—absolutely and entirely changing the Order in Council.

Mr. CANNON: I am reading from the Bill.

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend will turn to the schedule he will find that paragraph (c) regulation 1, says:

"Prohibited area" means any province, territory, municipality, district, county or other area wherein the sale of intoxicating liquor is under or by any law, federal or provincial, prohibited, and shall include any such area wherein the sale of native wine is permitted.

The words after the word "wine" are stricken out and the following substituted: "or other intoxicating liquors of limited alcoholic content are permitted."

Mr. CANNON: I understand that but it says the word "wine" in the last line, when it is not in the last line. It may be in the Order in Council but it is not in the Bill and the Bill is going to be the law.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is correct. There is a line in which half of the word "permitted" appears. It should be changed to read "the fifth line thereof." I therefore beg to move:

That Regulation 1 paragraph (c) be amended by substituting for the words "the last line thereof," the words "the fifth line thereof."

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT.

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS AND MEN.

On the motion of Major-General Mewburn (Minister of Militia and Defence), the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Militia Pension Act, chapter forty-two of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to provide:—

1. That an officer who is retired compulsorily, for any cause other than misconduct or inefficiency, after ten years' service, shall be entitled to a pension for life, not exceeding one-fiftieth of the pay and allowances of his rank or permanent appointment at the time of his retirement for each completed year of service.

2. That in the case of an officer who has been seconded or given leave of absence for service in a position in the public service of Canada or in the Canadian Expeditionary Force or in any other military force raised in Canada for service outside Canada, and paid and maintained by the Government of Canada, or who has been permitted to serve in any such force, deductions at the rate of five per cent per annum shall be made from the salary or pay, as the case may be, which such officer is receiving in the said public service, or as an officer in any such force, and those deductions shall form part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, and shall be treated in all respects as deductions under section eight of the Militia Pension Act; and, notwithstanding anything in that Act mentioned, the pension granted to an officer thus seconded, or thus serving in any such force, shall be based on his salary and allowances, or his pay and allowances, as the case may be, which at the date of his retirement the said officer is receiving from the said Government in the public service or in such force.

3. That the time served as an officer, non-commissioned officer or man on active service during the war between Great Britain and Germany, which commenced on the fourth day of August, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, shall be counted for pension purposes under the said Militia Pension Act.

4. That every militiaman shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life who has completed not less than ten years' service, subject to the provisions of the Militia Pension Act.

5. That the pension to a militiaman on retirement shall be:—

(a) if he has completed ten but less than twenty years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowances for every completed year of service;

(b) if he has completed twenty but less than twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances, with an addition of two-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances for every completed year of service above twenty years;

(c) if he has completed twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances, with an addition of one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowances for every completed year of service above twenty-five years: Provided that tht pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay and allowances at his retirement.

6. That the time served as a militiaman on active service during the war between Great Britain and Germany, which commenced on the fourth day of August, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, shall be counted for pension purposes under the said Militia Pension Act.

7. That the Governor in Council may as to him seems fit grant a pension to the widow and a compassionate allowance to each of the children of any officer who, having completed twenty years' service, was at the time of his death on full pay, or who, having completed ten years' service, was at the time of his death in receipt of a pension.

8. That the pension of a widow shall, if her husband was at the time of his death on full pay, be an amount equal to one-half of the pension to which he would have been entitled if he had been retired compulsorily immediately before his death, or, if at the time of his death he had been pensioned, an amount equal to one-half of such pension.

9. That pensions to widows heretofore granted under the provisions of the Militia Pension Act may be re-adjusted in accordance with the provisions of these resolutions; but no such re-adjustment shall authorize the increase of any payments for pension that accrued before the passing of the Act based upon these resolutions.

Major-General MEWBURN: The object of this resolution is to carry into effect one or two amendments in the old Militia Pension Act, which now provides for compulsory retirement after twenty years' service. Under the old Militia Pension Act an officer or a man could only be pensioned compulsorily after twenty years' service. This amendment permits the pensioning of officers after ten years' service instead of twenty. It will enable us to pension certain officers instead of keeping them on the strength for twenty years; especially the large number of officers promoted from the ranks who have served overseas during the present war, and who cannot be absorbed in the establishment. The second resolution makes provision in connection with officers of the permanent force who have been seconded, or given leave of absence in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or other military forces. The Pension Act only provides for officers seconded in the public service in Canada and, by adding the words "Canadian Expeditionary Force," it will enable us to pension officers of the Permanent Force who have been promoted from the ranks, or officers of the Permanent Force who have been promoted to a higher rank in the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The present Act, of course, was passed without any thought of this war. This does not provide for voluntary but compulsory retirement. It provides for the recognition of war service and makes it unnecessary for officers and men of the Permanent Corps who distinguished themselves in the war to return to their lower ranks. It would be manifestly unfair to require non-commissioned officers and men who have distinguished themselves to revert to their rank as non-commissioned officers and men. In connection with section 3 of the resolution, I might also refer to section 6 which provides that the service of men in the recent war will be considered towards pension. Under the old Militia Pension Act provision was made for men who had served in the South African war or the Yukon. In accordance with the precedent created after the South African war this section enables us to count towards pension the time that officers, non-commissioned officers and men have served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Section 4 provides that the men are to be pensioned on the same ratio as the officers. It also gives the right to a man, which the officer does not possess, to retire voluntarily at the end of ten years service. Section (5) subsection (a) provides that militamen can be pensioned after ten years' service. Subsections (b) and (c) of section 5, are the same as now provided in the Act, except in the addition of the word " allowances."

Mr. MORPHY: What is the difference between "militiaman" and "man"?

Major-General MEWBURN: In the interpretation clause "militiaman" means a non-commissioned officer or private of the force. All ranks below the commissioned rank of lieutenant would be included in the word "militiaman" under that interpretation.

Sections 7, 8 and 9 are identical with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Pensions Bill which went through the House last week. Section 7 simply provides for the reduction of time from twenty years to ten years, in which time a pension can be granted to a widow, provided her late husband was in receipt of full pay or pension.

Section 8 is identically the same as the Mounted Police pension. It provides that the widow of a husband if he were, at the time of his death, drawing full pay, should receive equal to one-half of the pension to which he would have been entitled. Section 9 makes provision identically the same as under the Mounted Police pension, that is, the pension of widows already granted under the provisions of the old Act, can, by Order in Council, be readjusted from the date of the passing of this Act.

Mr. NESBITT: What would a militiaman receive after ten years' service?

Major-General MEWBURN: A warrant officer of the Permanent Force, after twenty-five years' service, comes under a pension of $739.25. He gets one-fiftieth of his pay for every year of service.

Mr. BELAND: How much would a militiaman receive who had been nineteen years in the service?

Major-General MEWBURN: He would get nineteen-fiftieths of the pay and allowance he was drawing.

Mr. BELAND: It says here one-fiftieth of his annaul pay.

Major-General MEWBURN: For every year of service.

Mr. BELAND: It does not say so. It does say that, however, in the case of a man of over twenty-five years' service. I refer to subsection (a) of section 5. It reads that if a militiaman has completed ten, or less than twenty years' service he shall receive an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowance for every completed year of service.

Major-General MEWBURN: The amount is equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowance for every completed year of service.

Mr. BELAND: The provision reads differently in the one case from the other. It is a little confusing.

Mr. CANNON: The resolution provides for the case of officers and men who have taken part in the war against Germany?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: Take the case of men who fought in the advance from Saloniki.

Major-General MEWBURN: The resolution applies to any man belonging to the Canadian Expeditionary Force who took part in the great war.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Mr. CANNON: I do not know about that. There are men who participated in the engagements in the Balkans and never fought against the Germans?

Major-General MEWBURN: Canadians who fought there would be members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. If a man served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, no matter where it was, he would come under the terms of the resolution.

Mr. CANNON: Would that apply also to men who served in Siberia?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes, if they were in the Permanent Force.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times and concurred in.

Major-General MEWBURN thereupon moved to introduce Bill No. 118 to amend the Militia Pension Act, founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HALIFAX HARBOUR MASTER.

On motion of Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Acts respecting the appointment of a Harbour Master at the Port of Halifax, chapter forty-nine of the Statutes of 1882, and chapter seventy-eight of the Statutes of 1885, by providing:—

1. That the Harbour Master of the Port of Halifax shall be remunerated for his services solely by the fees, or the portion of the fees, which he may be authorized, by the rules and regulations, to collect in respect of all ships over twenty tons register, entering the Port of Halifax, but which shall not at any time exceed the following rates:—

(a) For every ship over twenty tons and not over fifty tons register, fifty cents;

(b) For every ship over fifty tons and not over one hundred tons register, one dollar;

(c) For every ship over one hundred tons and not over two hundred tons register, one dollar and fifty cents;

(d) For every ship over two hundred tons and not over three hundred tons register, two dollars;

(e) For every ship over three hundred tons and not over four hundred tons register, two dollars and fifty cents;

(f) For every ship over four hundred tons and not over five hundred tons register, three dollars;

(g) For every ship over five hundred tons and not over seven hundred tons register, four dollars;

(h) For every ship over seven hundred tons and not over one thousand tons register, five dollars;

(i) For every ship over one thousand tons register, seven dollars.

Ships of twenty tons register and under not to be subject to any duty under this resolution, nor ships engaged in trading or plying between ports and places in the Dominion of Canada.

2. That the Harbour Master of the Port of Halifax may, out of the moneys received by him for fees, retain for his own remuneration such sum, not exceeding three thousand dollars per annum, as the Governor in Council may authorize; and if the moneys received by him for fees in any calendar year amount to a less sum than that allowed him by the Governor in Council, then such sum shall be his remuneration for that year.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The object of this resolution is to enable the Government to pay a reasonable salary to the harbour master at Halifax, having regard to present-day conditions. In 1885 the salary was fixed at $1,800 a year, but out of this he was obliged to pay boat hire and the expenses of his office. It can scarcely be said that such remuneration for an officer looking after a harbour of the importance of Halifax is sufficient. If this salary was considered reasonable thirty-four years ago it is manifestly inadequate to-day. The resolution is to provide the means of putting the matter right. The resolution also deals with the fee collectable on vessels of over one thousand tons registered tonnage entering the harbour, the amount being increased from $5 to $7 per ton. This will add greatly to the revenue, which in ordinary times is scarcely sufficient to make ends meet. The resolution, which involves the expenditure of money, has been duly recommended by His Excellency the Governor General. The total fees collected in Halifax from 1914 to 1918 were as follows: 1914, $1,822.50; 1915, $1,714; 1916, $1,783.50; 1917, $1,832; 1918, $3,351.

The large sum collected in 1918 was due almost entirely to the war, and to so many vessels entering the port of Halifax. The object of this Bill is to enable the harbour master to get a larger remuneration than $1,800, but in no event can his salary be more than the total amount of the fees he collects. As a comparison I might take some of the other ports where the harbour masters are not paid by fees. The harbour master of the port of Montreal receives $5,000; of Quebec, $3,500; of Vancouver, $1,800, and fees as shipping master; of Three Rivers—the amount is not inserted, but I know from memory that it is $900 a year. Two important matters are embodied in this Bill. One is to enable the harbour master to draw more than $1,800 a year, provided the fees exceed that amount; and the other is to increase the fees of vessels over 1,000 tons register from $5 to $7.

Mr. FIELDING: Has the hon. minister any special reason for changing the system? On general principles the payment of any important official by fees is objectionable; it is better that the fees be turned into the public treasury and an established salary be paid. That seems to be the rule in the harbour of Montreal, as my hon. friend has said, and unless there be some special reason to the contrary, it seems to me that that would be the wise policy in the case of Halifax or any other port.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The reason the harbour master is not paid by fees at Montreal is because the port is under a harbour commission. The port of Halifax is not under a harbour commission, and since 1885 the harbour master's salary has been fixed at the maximum of $1,800. He cannot get one cent above $1,800 unless this Act is passed.

Mr. FIELDING: But he has been paid a salary in recent years as I understand the hon. minister?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. FIELDING: By fees?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, entirely.

Mr. FIELDING: The object of the Bill is to give him a larger salary?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The object of the Bill is to enable him to draw more than $1,800.

Mr. FIELDING: Up to $3,000?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes. But if the fees were only $1,700 a year, that is all he would draw as remuneration. On the other hand, if the fees reach the maximum of $3,000, that is what he would draw. But according to the amount of fees during the period of years that I have given to the Committee, it is not at all likely that he will draw much over $1,800. I would like to put the harbour master of the port of Halifax in such a position that if the fees collected amounted to $2,800 he would be able to draw that amount of remuneration. It is manifestly unfair to have the harbour master of such an important port drawing the meagre remuneration of $1,800 a year, and that has been in vogue during the past thirty-four years. It is time we changed it, I think.

Mr. BELAND: Is there a harbour commission at Three Rivers?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: And the harbour master receives, if I understood the hon. minister aright, only $900 a year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have not a memorandum of the exact amount, but I believe that is correct.

Mr. BELAND: I think the hon. minister gave it as $900?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I did. But with all due deference to the port of Three Rivers, it cannot be considered to be as important a port as Halifax, neither does it have as many ships coming in and going out.

Mr. BELAND: I am sure if my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) were here he would resent very much such a declaration.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No doubt.

Mr. BELAND: Because the harbour master of the metropolitan city represented by my deskmate should receive more than $900.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is a matter that can be remedied by the harbour commission of the port of Three Rivers. But the harbour master of Halifax cannot draw any more than $1,800 even if he collects fees to the amount of $2,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister say how much the pilotage rate is being increased?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We are raising the fee for all vessels over 1,000 tons registered tonnage entering the harbour from $5 to $7 per ton. These fees are payable once a year for small ships under 100 tons and twice a year for those over that tonnage.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: No more than twice a year in any case?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No more.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: For example, the liners that come in from Boston or any other port will only have to pay on two occasions each year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is the meaning of it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the reason for the change? Is it because the present dues are insufficient to pay the harbour master?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is one reason; and the other reason is to enable the harbour master to draw more than $1,800 from the fees collected. For instance, in the year 1915 he was only able to collect in fees $1,714, which really is too small an amount for a man who has the responsibilities of harbour master for a port like Halifax.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How much did he collect last year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That was a very large year, $3,351. But the harbour master stands no show whatever of getting an income beyond $3,000, because the war is over and the amount of shipping going in and out of the port of Halifax will not be so large that he will be able to draw such a salary, but he certainly will draw more than $1,800—I hope he will, anyway.

Mr. DUFF: Has the Board of Trade or any other body at Halifax asked to have these changes made?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No one has asked it as far as I know. It is just a matter of what the minister would consider fair and just in the way of remuneration, and I think that a harbour master who has been in the service for thirty-four years, considering the high cost of living, would not be treated fairly if the Government only gave him $1,800 a year. I am sure hon. members will agree that if he can collect more fees than $1,800 he certainly ought to be entitled to them.

Mr. DUFF: I agree with the hon. minister that $1,800 for the harbour master of Halifax is not sufficient remuneration, and I think the vessels can afford to pay the fees laid down in the resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE: How are those fees collected ?

Mr. DUFF: At the custom house, are they not?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I presume so.

Mr. McKENZIE: This will be an amending Act, I understand ?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I should like to have it clear that those fees are collected at the custom house. I do not like the idea of an officer going aboard a ship and collecting fees for himself.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This is what the resolution states:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Acts respecting the appointment of a Harbour Master at the Port of Halifax, chapter forty-nine of the Statutes of 1882, and chapter seventy-eight of the Statutes of 1885, by providing:—

1. That the Harbour Master of the Port of Halifax shall be remunerated for his services solely by the fees or the portion of the fees—

It does not say how he collects them, but I am quite certain that must be done through the custom house.

Mr. DUFF: That is the way it is done.

Mr. CANNON: Does that official fall within the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. CANNON: He is under the minister?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. BALLANTYNE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 119, to amend the Acts respecting the appointment of a harbour master at the port of Halifax.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Newton W. Rowell (President of the Council), Bill No. 116, to amend the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 9—those who left Force to serve in war on rejoining Force, service in war to be included in computing pension:

Mr. BELAND: Are there many who joined the forces?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, several hundreds went to the war.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—rates of pay:

Mr. ROBB: How will this rate of pay compare with the previous rate?

Mr. ROWELL: This rate of pay was the rate established by Order in Council last autumn when we decided to recruit the Force up to the authorized number of 1,200 men. The rate is 50 cents per day for constables and non-commissioned officers above the rate of pay that prevailed before the war. It is only right here to mention to hon. members that, as was suggested when we were discussing the resolution, the rate of pay during the next two or three years will have to be increased above this amount, and provision for that is made in the latter part of the section by giving the Governor in Council power to do so. I think the rate of pay of constables will have to be 50 cents per day above the amount fixed in the Bill which will make the constables start at $2 a day. It is not possible, we think, to get the most desirable men and to recruit up to strength unless we make the pay for the next three years start at $2 per day. We should also increase the pay of non-commissioned officers by 75 cents per day and the officers by $1.25 per day.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—creation of a reserve of officers and men who have served in Force.

Mr. ROWELL: I desire to make a slight amendment in this clause. Members of the Committee will see that subsection 3 reads:

When such officer or man of the said Reserve shall have been called up for duty he shall hold the rank and draw the pay which he received on the date of his retirement or discharge from the Force.

We should make that read "current rates of pay when he is called up." I therefore move to amend the clause by striking out all the words after the word "rank" in the second line and substituting therefor the following:

Which he held on the date of his retirement or discharge from the Force and shall receive the current rates of pay for such rank.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CANNON: Subsection (7) of this section reads:

Any member of the Reserve may retire therefrom on giving one month's notice in writing to the commissioner.

Does this extend to the man who is called for service, because that would be most acceptable?

Mr. ROWELL: No, this reserve applies only to men who have served their full period in the Force and have retired or been discharged. It provides for creating a reserve of retired men who have served in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. They cannot be brought in unless they voluntarily consent to do so, and if once they are brought into the reserve and called for service, they may retire on a month's notice.

Mr. CANNON: Subsection 2 says:

Such reserve, or any portion or member thereof, may be called up for duty by the Commissioner when he deems it necessary.

Mr. ROWELL: They must be enrolled in the Reserve, then they may be called up for duty. After a man has been called up for duty and is serving, he may give notice that he wishes to withdraw at the end of the month.

Mr. FIELDING: In that case would he receive both pay and pension? These men forming the reserve are presumably pensioners, and in emergency they may be called out. They would receive the pay of their rank at the time of retirement. Would they receive both pay and pension? That is allowable only under certain conditions which I do not care to mention here.

Mr. ROWELL: I admit there is a good deal in what my hon. friend has suggested. The situation is simply this: We want to enroll this reserve at once, as it appears desirable in certain sections of the country that they should be enrolled, and we want to make the inducements as generous as possible. The time the men would serve would not count for any additional pension. And the amount of pension the members of the force receive is very small. I beg to move that subsection (7) of section 11 be amended by substituting the word "two" for the word "one" in line 10.

Major-General MEWBURN: After an active officer in the Militia retires he goes on the reserve of officers, so that he can be called upon in case of emergency. During peace time he is permitted to resign after three months' notice, I think. Our object in the Militia is to create a reserve so that the men will be available in case of emergency.

Mr. CANNON: According to the Bill he could resign while on service.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 16:

Mr. ROWELL: I beg to move that there be inserted in the Bill as section 16 the following:

Subsection (c) of section 60 of the Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor: (c) to every officer in the force on the first day of July, 1902.

Section 60 created this pension system for the officers of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. Prior to that, they had certain rights to a pension under the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act. When the Mounted Police Act was amended by creating a pension fund to which the officers of the force must contribute, every officer was given a certain period in which to elect whether he would come in under the Mounted Police Act or retain his rights under the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act. There were two officers of the force out in the North country, either in the Yukon on the Mackenzie River district, I am not sure which, who were not able to take advantage of the Act in time, and they have been unable to come in under its provisions in consequence. They have wanted to do so, but as the Act was not being amended, it has not been possible to permit them to come in. The amendment I have proposed is simply to enable them to take advantage of the opportunity enabling all the officers to come in under the Act, and of which the great majority have taken advantage.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Thursday, May 22, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

CONFERRING OF TITLES ON CANADIANS.

MOTION BY MR. NICKLE TO ADOPT REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

On motions being called:

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston) moved:

That the report of the Special Committee appointed to consider the question of conferring honours, etc., upon subjects of His Majesty resident in Canada be concurred in.

He said: You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that on April 14, as an amendment to a motion proposed by me, the acting leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) concurred in a special committee being appointed which should, without partisanship, consider the questions involved in the motion and certain other questions raised by him on his amendment. At the time concurrence was reached with reference to that committee the hon. the leader of the Government impressed on me that his wishes would be best met if at the earliest possible moment the committee's report was presented to this House for consideration and decision.

As a result of his injunction and of the desire of the Committee, consideration was first given on the 24th of April, to the subjects that were to be taken under review and the committee's report was, as you will remember, presented to the House on the 14th of this month. In justice to the committee I should say that during its deliberations full consideration was given to the questions passed in review, and that while the debates were at times vigorous they were never characterized by anything that could be otherwise considered than in the very best of friendly spirit. I can assure you, Sir, and the House that careful consideration was given to the subject matter viewed from every possible angle. The report of the committee in the main reflects what I might call its unanimous opinion, although some findings did not secure unanimity.

Those who took an interest in this matter last year will remember that among the recommendations adopted by this House was one to the effect, that hereafter no hereditary titles of honour should be conferred on a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada. The Acting Prime Minister in his address to this House directed the attention of hon. members to the fact that the reply of the British Government was couched in the following language:

> His Majesty will not hereafter be advised to confer any hereditary honour upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada save on the formal recommendation of the Prime Minister of Canada.

The British Government in its reply seems to have overlooked the fundamental principle enunciated by this House, that this House, expressing the collective wish of this country, desired that no hereditary title be hereafter conferred on any Canadian, and the British Government went no further than to say that no such title should be granted except on a formal recommendation of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. SHEARD: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that that was carried by this House?

Mr. NICKLE: The hon. member for South Toronto quite correctly understood me. The recommendations of the Prime Minister last year, embodied in the Order in Council passed prior to the debate taking place, were summarized by the Prime Minister, and the third recommendation was:

> No hereditary title of honour shall hereafter be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.

The amendment of the Prime Minister was passed by this House on a vote that I do not think can have escaped the memory of the hon. member for South Toronto.

Now, I wish to direct the attention of the House for a moment to the principle which I was discussing. This House laid down the principle that we, as Canadians, did not want hereditary titles to be hereafter conferred. The British Government did not appear to be willing to recognize that principle in its full operation, and simply went the length of saying that they would not grant hereditary titles provided the Prime Minister of the country from time to time did not want such titles granted. The result was that in its report this year the committee enunciated the principle—in so far as that principle is now being passed under review by me—that the Canadian Parliament did not want any further hereditary titles granted in Canada.

The fourth recommendation contained in the amendment adopted last session by the House, was as follows:

> That appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period—

I direct the attention of the House to this language.

> —to provide that after a prescribed period no title or honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada shall be recognized as having hereditary effect.

The resolution adopted by the House last year did not define what was meant by the phrase "after a prescribed period." This year the committee goes further than the resolution of last year by deciding beyond the possibility of doubt that the expression "after a prescribed period" should be taken to mean "at the death of the present incumbent of the honour" or "at the death of the person at the present time enjoying the honour." In other words, it is recommended that when a person enjoying an hereditary title should pass away, the hereditary character of the title should cease with him, and that those who follow him should not be enabled to have the recognition or to enjoy the title.

The reply of the British Government to the resolution of last session, which I have just read, and which asked that after a prescribed period no title or honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada should be recognized as having hereditary effect, is in this language:

> This presents many difficulties that would require very careful consideration. Action for the present remains in abeyance.

Translated into the language of the street, this reply means that the British Government say: "We see very great difficulties in the way, and, appreciating those difficulties, we are not at the present moment prepared to meet them." Speaking with all deference from my place as a member of this House, I think that I would not be going beyond the limits of propriety if I said—in reference to the suggestion in the reply that I have just read, that many difficulties would require careful consideration—that careful consideration ought to be given in the spirit that prompts action and that assures results by finding a way or making it. We do think that the deliberate expression of the opinion of this House in respect of a matter that is particularly within its jurisdiction and that affects in a peculiar way the people of this country is entitled to be very carefully considered, and considered in such a way that we may obtain results. It cannot be that the British Constitution, concerning the flexibility of which we hear so much, is rigid on this particular point; that when something that Canada particularly wants is concerned, the flexibility becomes rigidity and it is impossible to secure the realization of that desire because constitutional difficulties stand in the way.

The resolution adopted by this House last year confines itself to a very great extent to what I might call ministerial responsibility and to the question of hereditary titles and titular distinction. The committee of this year, which passed in review the questions now under discussion, goes further in the report than the resolution last year went, and, in paragraph (a) of their report, recommend that an address be presented to His Majesty praying that His Majesty might be graciously pleased to refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of his subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character, or which appertain to an office. The effect of that recommendation, if adopted by the House, would be to do away with what are commonly known as titular distinctions, and also—if they are not included in that expression, which I think they are —with what are known as the lesser classes of the various orders.

I shall not re-argue this question. It was debated fully in 1918; it has been debated fully in the House this year, and certainly it was debated fully before the committee. Anything that I might say would simply be a re-statement of what has already been better stated, perhaps, than I could state it now. It would, if I may speak figuratively, be threshing straw that has already been threshed, and I therefore would not be justified in taking up the time of the House. I shall say nothing further than this: The effect of the recommendation to which I have just directed attention, if acceded to by those who have authority in England, would be to take away entirely titular distinctions in this country.

A further finding of the committee was in reference to foreign titles. The question was mooted before the Committee that if the committee were to go the length—as it did go—of reaching the conclusion that titular distinctions should be not granted by the British Crown, it was only consistent and proper that titular distinctions and honours should not hereafter be received by Canadian from foreign rulers or governments. A recommendation to that effect was carried, which reads as follows:

> Your committee further recommends that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to provide that hereafter no person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada shall accept, enjoy or use any title of honour or titular distinction hereafter conferred by a foreign ruler or government.

Having made that recommendation, the committee were confronted by the suggestion that hereafter the titles of "Right Honourable" and "Honourable" should be not further recognized in this country. The committee reached a conclusion, which reads as follows:

> A suggestion was made that the titles of "Right Honourable" and "Honourable" be discontinued, but the suggestion did not meet with the approval of the committee.

The question of such decorations as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Long Service Medal, and so on, was also considered, but there was unanimity of opinion that nothing should be said in the committee's report that would lead the House to the conclusion that the committee disapproved of the granting of these decorations. The language of the committee's report in this regard is as follows:

> Your committee, however, do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations, such as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty.

Generally speaking, so far as I have been able to appreciate public sentiment as gathered from the press and from communications that have reached me, the mass of the Canadian people seem to approve the findings of the committee. Possibly, however, I would not be doing my entire duty if I did not say that there are a few who do not seem to go quite as far as the committee's recommendations go. There are those who say that the principle of titular distinction is not wrong, is not objectionable; that what is objectionable is the method that has been followed in this country and elsewhere for some time past in awarding these distinctions and dignities.

There are those who say that it is not desirable to abolish titles of distinction entirely, and that the matter should be left to His Majesty the King and to his constitutional advisers, but that greater discretion should be displayed in the selection of recipients, and the number to be decorated. Needless to say I am not one of those. In my judgment, the granting of these titular distinctions, these titles of honour, is out of tune entirely with the spirit that should, and that, I believe, does prevail in this country. The attitude to which I have just directed the attention of the House and which they seem to lay down as a principle to be followed in Canada, namely, that these recognitions are right in principle, but that greater discretion should be shown in the selection of recipients, and that a lesser number should be decorated, carries with it the conclusion, as the night follows the day, that those gentlemen would advocate the establishment, if I may use the expression, of a super-selected class; that to this class only the few should be admitted, and that in place of a generous recognition, if I may use that word, as we have had heretofore, there should be a very restricted recognition, in fact, the engendering of an aristocracy, in the true sense of the word, in this country of ours. There is a fine irony in that idea that greater discretion should be displayed in the selection of recipients. We have heard much that these honours come from His Majesty the King, and yet those who advocate that greater discretion should be displayed in the selection of recipients, have the audacity to suggest that His Majesty's attention should be directed to the fact that he has not been exercising his constitutional prerogative with the care, judgment, and discernment that certain people think he should. The whole thing is stamped with inconsistency, and the inconsistency lies in this; that those who are advocating the continuance of these dignities and honours, seem afraid that the thing should be seen in its true light. They are afraid to strip the veil of mystery from what might be called the Imperialistic prerogative.

There is not in this House a man who has listened to these debates during the past few years but knows that these titular distinctions and honours do not emanate from His Majesty, but are granted on the recommendation of ministers from time to time. And last year, in reply to my resolution urging ministerial responsibility, the leader of the House, Sir Robert Borden, by the Order in Council that had been passed prior to the debate being precipitated in this House, recognized the principle of ministerial responsibility, and stripped forever, if I may use the expression, the camouflage from the idea that these honours, titles, and dignities originated from His Majesty. Because the House, by the adoption of the resolution and the principle enunciated in the Order in Council made it abundantly clear that, in so far as Canada was concerned, once and for all we recognized that honours, titles, and distinctions did not come from His Majesty of his own motion, but should come from His Majesty on the recommendation of the man who, from time to time, happened to be the leader of the Government in this country.

Mr. EDWARDS: Did the committee give any consideration to titles of honour conferred on judges. For instance, a judge is referred to as "His Lordship."

Mr. NICKLE: I think the title of "His Lordship" was not, so far as my memory goes, discussed by the committee. Certainly no formal resolution was passed regarding the matter. I doubt very much if the title of "His Lordship," as used in the courts, comes from His Majesty at all. My opinion would be—and I am giving only the opinion of the moment—that that is simply a title of courtesy, just the same as a man is called "Mr.". I have no knowledge of such a title emanating in any way from His Majesty or being conferred by any formal document.

Let me just for a moment direct the attention of the House to the position of those who advocate that the granting of these titular distinctions is not wrong in principle, but that it is the method of distribution only that is wrong. Might I say that it seems to me that those gentlemen fail to appreciate the significance of what has prevailed and is prevailing in the old country to-day? So far as we are concerned, Britain is the parent State, and if it has been found impossible there to devise a method that will permit these honours and distinctions being granted without corruption becoming rampant, how can we hope to do better in this country? Last year, I read to this House at great length from the debates that took place in the House of Lords in 1914, and again in 1917, and if I ever proved anything by documentary evidence, I proved that in the granting of these titular distinctions in Great Britain corruption prevails. I was criticised severely in certain parts of this country for daring to rise in my place in this House and direct attention to what was taking place in Great Britain; I was told that it was none of my business, was not the business of the House to consider how Britain administered her domestic affairs. Again to-day, as last year, I want to take issue with those who take that position, and so long as we occupy the position that we now do, and so long as we are a part of the British Empire—and may we long continue to be a part of that Empire—so long do I say that we are concerned with the methods that are evolved, with the principles that are allowed to prevail, that have anything to do with the selection or election of those who compose the British House of Commons or the British House of Lords, and it is not beyond the purview of this House to direct attention to irregularities in the selection of those who may, from time to time, obtain a seat in the House of Lords.

And I think that those who argue that titular distinctions, honours, and decorations should be granted at the present time fail to appreciate the magnitude of the national effort as measured in this war. How are you going to determine to whom recognition shall be given? How are you going to say what man shall receive and what man shall not receive, or what woman shall get and what woman shall not get? How are you going to determine sacrifice and service? How are you going to determine or measure the proportion of the sacrifice of the individual? Are these recognitions to be given only to him or to her who does great things in relation to the national effort? Are we to leave out of account entirely the great individual service of the person who occupies a humble position in life? Is the man who gives $5,000, $10,000, $15,000, or $100,000 to a great cause to receive recognition, while the widow who gives her all, who gives her years of labour, is to be overlooked? Have those who advocate the principle to which I have just directed attention forgotten the parable of the widow's mite? If that parable was good in the time of Christ it is equally good in the year 1919, when Canadians were rallied to the flag to fight for liberty, for freedom, and for the rights of the humble people. The philosophy of those who so advocate is bad in this, that it endeavours to establish the principle that the hope of recognition is the incentive to service.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: Recognition should not be the incentive to service to a man who has a true appreciation of duty. The consciousness of duty well done should be reward enough for any man, and I say that the true philosophy that underlies the granting of these titles should not be that recognition is that which prompts to action, but should be a keen appreciation that what rankles in a man is neglect and oversight; that recognitions are soon forgotten, and that men who have done their utmost and women who have given their all will smart and chafe under the neglect that leaves them without anything while others who apparently have done much more from the national point of view but infinitely less as viewed from the personal standpoint, receive recognition.

As I have said, Sir, this trouble is not altogether confined to Canada; it is not purely a local issue. The subject matter of the discussion I have brought before this House this afternoon is shaking social England. I do not ask you, Mr. Speaker, nor do I ask the House, to take my words alone. Being a lawyer, I realize that if you want to sustain an argument it is an excellent thing to have a precedent, and if you want to win a point it is well to cite a statute; and when I say that the principles I am enunciating this afternoon are stirring social England, I do not state it on my own authority alone. I can support it by a letter I am now about to read from the London Times of the 29th of August, 1918. The letter reads:

> Sir,—Even in the midst of the anxiety arising from the war we think it necessary to point out in public the serious danger which may arise from a continued bestowal of honours without any real safeguard against abuse. Habits contracted in time of trouble and pressure, if unchecked now, will be difficult to counteract hereafter. This subject has been debated in the House of Lords. Before those debates some of us endeavoured in vain to procure from the Government such public assurances as might avert the necessity of a Parliamentary discussion. When the discussion came on, the scandal was neither denied nor defended, but the securities embodied in resolutions have proved inadequate. There has been some improvement in the form of the Gazette notices, but the root of the evil remains. Nominally the Prime Minister is responsible for the advice given to the Crown. In reality, it has become obvious that a minister overwhelmed b public duties of the most arduous kind cannot possibly supervise the distribution of honours or prevent the monetary corruption and debasement of standards which will assuredly ensue. He would be obliged to neglect other vital duties.

The same mischief shows itself in another direction. A new Order, that of the British Empire, has been instituted, and in a recent Gazette the names cover no less than 60 quarto pages. We make no suggestion of corruption in connection with this Order, but the wholesale scale upon which it is granted makes it obvious that no responsible minister can control the selection of recipients, much less that it is a real mark of His Majesty's favour.

Our feeling is that, unless the bestowal of honours and titles is protected from this sort of cheapening and is unmistakably cleared from the danger of a peculiarly mean kind of pecuniary corruption and reserved for real merit, honours may come to be regarded as dishonours, leaving no way out except their entire abolition.

It is an additional and very grave evil that the money obtained by the disgraceful traffic in honours has gone to swell and, if rumour is true, has mainly constituted, the large party funds which are at the service of party leaders and are used for party purposes.

We have no sort of desire to embarrass the Government. It is quite impossible for Mr. Lloyd George to spare the time necessary for supervising these lists, and yet it is due to the Crown that the constitutional advice to which it is entitled shall not emanate, almost without being filtered in its passage, from underlings accessible to all kinds of influence. I therefore think I may take it as proven that the conditions which I allege may prevail in Canada are undoubtedly prevailing in Britain to-day. Then, I desire to read to the House a few words from the London Globe of Friday evening, May 2, commenting on the discussion that took place in this House on May 14, 1918.

So it has come to this: Honours and titles have been distributed in such a haphazard and undiscriminating manner that Canada, at any rate, wishes to have no more of them. South Africa, too, has already shown that it is more or less of the same opinion, almost the whole press of the Union having criticised and ridiculed the honours conferred last year on South Africans. One Cape newspaper in referring to the question remarked that when South Africa had ceased laughing over the honours it would assuredly resent having been made a laughing stock in front of the rest of the Empire.

In view of recent Honours lists, and especially in view of the one issued this week, we are inclined to share the opinions of our colonial brethren; indeed, conservative though we be, and always will be, it seems to us that a motion regarding the conferring of honours on residents in the United Kingdom, similar to that introduced by Mr. Nickle regarding Canadians, might with advantage be put forward at Westminster.

To the attention of hon. gentlemen who say it is not wrong in principle to grant titular distinction if the methods adopted are proper, I would direct the last words of the article I am reading:

If we saw any hope of titles being given in a thoroughly equitable manner or of honours being conferred on those to whom honours are due, whether the latter be soldiers or sailors or civilians, we should think otherwise. But we see no such hope.

And if the editor of a British paper sees no such hope, then I think it is not beside the mark to suggest that we in Canada are at least purblind where they are blind. I may now read an extract from the London Daily News of May 5, 1919. It reads:

It has always been the hope of those who realize the pernicious influence of titles that the evil would be kept out of the overseas dominions. Canada yielded in some measure to it, and there have been symptoms of late that Australia and New Zealand were in danger of succumbing; but the hostility which has taken such vigorous shape in Canada may be expected to fall like a killing frost on the very objectionable weed everywhere.

The self-denying ordinance of Canada extends to the O.B.E., the latest distribution of which is now imminent. In that connection it is useful to recall the Olympian defence of the Order which the Earl of Crawford, Lord Privy Seal, made in the House of Lords on Nov. 13 last:—

I suppose, without being in a position to speak with great positiveness, that that defence was made in answer to the article I have just read from the Times. This is what Lord Crawford said:

The people who have been receiving the Order of the British Empire are humble people who have been, and are, doing great work for the country. It has been my duty on more than one occasion to make recommendations to that Order, and I cannot say how bitterly I resent the comments of persons of high standing and full of honours about the humble people who are receiving well-earned recognition for work of incalculable value.

Those who are doing great work for the country, those people who are doing services of incalculable value, can only receive the Order of the British Empire, while those who are full of honours and high distinctions are to be awarded with peerages and hereditary titles. Let us ponder on what the editorial writer says:

It is possible that the "humble people" in question will find the frankly hostile comments of "the persons of high standing" rather less insufferable than the high-born patronage of their defender. But one never knows. Perhaps "humility is the badge of all their tribe." Perhaps it is as members of the Order of the Humble that they accept these crumbs from the high table where Earl Crawford sits. In any case, it is gratifying to know that the new list is to be the last and that henceforth people may serve their country without any suggestion of being engaged in a vulgar scramble for meaningless distinctions.

That is all I am going to offer from the popular press of England, but I want to quote a short extract from the London Spectator of May 3, 1919:—

The Honours List was issued on Monday evening, during an outburst on the part of our wonderful climate, which did its best to make us forget that the list had been postponed from the New Year. The list contains four new Barons, twenty-three Baronets, and forty-nine Knights. Lord Burnham and Lord Rothermere both go up a step in the Peerage and become Viscounts. The new Barons are Sir J. H. Roberts, Sir R. T. Hermon-Hodge, Sir T. R. Dewar, and Mr. T. H. A. E. Cochrane. Among the Knights we notice with interest the name of Mr. Harry Lauder.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

But the feature of the list is the steady stream of honours which flows through Fleet Street.

Fleet street, as hon. gentlemen know, is the newspaper centre of Great Britain.

The Navy and Army are still unhonoured.

* * * * *

Lord Burnham, of the Daily Telegraph, and Lord Rothermere, of the Daily Mirror, as we have already said, both go up a step. Lord Burnham has been a most faithful liaison officer between the daily newspaper press and the Government, and Lord Rothermere worked hard at the Royal Army Clothing Department and figured less successfully at the Air Ministry. A baronetcy goes to Mr. Sutton, who is connected with the Daily Mail and its kindred papers; another baronetcy to Mr. Davison Dalziel, formerly proprietor of the Evening Standard, another to Mr. Edward Hulton, who is proprietor of the Daily Sketch, the Daily Dispatch, the Sunday Chronicle, and other newspapers, and who is the only colourable rival to Lord Northcliffe; and yet another to Mr. W. T. Madge, managing director of the People, and formerly manager of the Globe.

What is the insinuation contained in that article? The insinuation is that these men gained their dignities, titles and promotions, not by virtue of any great national service that they had rendered, but by virtue of the fact that they had been instrumental in maintaining a certain Government in power.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Let me read a word or two further from the Saturday Review (London) of May 3, 1919:—

Lord Rothermere's promotion to a viscounty will be gall and wormwood to the irate Polypapist on the Riviera, as the brothers are not on very good terms and there has always been a certain amount of jealousy between them.

That is Lord Northcliffe.

Unless Lord Northcliffe is quickly made an earl, the war of Carmelite House on the Premier will grow hotter. We fail to see why the miracle of turning water into whisky, and selling it at exorbitant prices, should be rewarded with a coronet. If political services go for anything, the peerage of Sir Robert Hermon-Hodge, a hero of many campaigns without an enemy, has been well earned. It would be interesting to learn a little more specifically what are the services to Parliament and the public which entitle the company promoter, Mr. Davison Dalziel to a baronetcy. As for the knights, with the exception of a couple of music-hall mimes (Sir Harry Lauder is a genius), they may be dismissed, as the Morning Post dismisses minor arrivists, by the words "and many others." We are astonished, and grateful, that no Canadian financiers have been ennobled.

We at least have this satisfaction, that the debates that have taken place in this House have apparently had the effect of holding up the list of honours in Canada. I have spoken longer than I intended when I rose to address the House. I have endeavoured to put before the House the argument and principles as enunciated in the resolution of last year; I have endeavoured to place before the honourable members the principles that moved the Special Committee which was appointed to consider this matter this year, and I have endeavoured to show you that the position that I take to-day is exactly the same position that I took over a year ago.

I tell you, Sir, and I tell this House, that when I introduced this matter over a year ago I was moved by a sincere desire that there should be a reform. I thought that the grappling with this problem had been too long delayed. I do not stand for any halfway measures with regard to it. Some men on your right or on your left may call me an extremist, but my experience in public life has led me to the conclusion that if you want to get anywhere, or if you want to advance toward the achievement of that which is right according to your conviction and judgment you have to be prepared to sacrifice something for the attainment of that principle.

I believe that the spirit of the Canadian people is against the continuance of the practice of granting honours, dignities and titular distinctions to Canadians. The press, the conversations that you have with people, and the platforms enunciated by various political and social organizations all show that the people are against it.

This is not a quarrel with merit; it is a quarrel with the principle that seeks to give recognition to some, not because they are more successful or more entitled to it than others, but simply because they are more successful in obtaining recognition. If I might express my sentiments in a word, in language more apt than I could use, I would say: " Let us be done with the business. Let us build up a public opinion which repudiates these things as an insult to democracy, which holds honest and disinterested service to the Commonwealth as its own reward, which regards the offer of a title as an indignity and its acceptance as a personal degradation."

I have much pleasure in moving the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with a great deal of interest and attention to the very eloquent speech of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I suppose we have a right to assume that the attention of this honourable body of legislators would not have been got so promptly or kept for so long a time on various occasions by the hon. gentleman unless he felt he had a subject of paramount importance to present to the House. I cannot work myself into a fury over this question, because I do not think it is worthy of the great attention that has been bestowed upon it. I do not think it is such a crisis in this country as to warrant it taking up the time of the House to the very great extent that it has taken up our time for the last two years. I would submit to my hon. friend (Mr. Nickle), who has talent and ability to burn, that there are a great many things in this country which require his attention much more than titles. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that he would have won the plaudits of the people if he had dilated to-day to the same extent on the situation of some poor boy who could not go to school because he had no shoes, or some little girl who did not have a proper dress, or of some poor children who had to go to bed hungry.

This subject will have to be disposed of, and I do not wish to belittle the ideas put forward by my hon. friend. I would like to tell him that the discussion should not be prolonged too much, for fear that he may change his mind and vote against his own resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope, to recall the old saying, that we may strike the iron when it is hot and catch his vote on this occasion. The hon. gentleman seemed to be very much disturbed about the way in which the British people govern themselves. He seemed to think that there was a serious danger to the world if the British people should be permitted to deal with their own affairs, and that we must step in and tell them how to apply democratic principles in that country.

I do not share in that fear; I believe that the British people are quite capable of looking after their own affairs. I submit, Sir, that the granting of titles is entirely a matter for the people; and if we can educate our own people to say that titles are unnecessary, that they should not be recommended and that Canadians should not receive them, then they will not be granted. If the granting of titles is coming to be a matter of disgrace, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nickle) said, and a matter of corruption in the Old Land, the British people will deal with that, and they will see to it that a Government will be put in power who will not make those recommendations which should not be made. That I think is the way in which this question must be effectively dealt with.

It has been acknowledged by the hon. gentleman, and I think quite truly and properly, that His Majesty the King is not responsible for the creating or making of these titles; that he is simply carrying out, or allowing his name to be used in connection with recommendations made by the Government of the day in every country in which those titles are being conferred. It is one of the basic principles of our constitution, under responsible government, that the King can do no wrong. We have to stand by that principle, and to realize that the King acts upon the recommendation of his advisers, and that his advisers are responsible to the people; and if there is any abuse of His Majesty's prerogatives or power, the abuse must be visited upon the Government and rectified by the people and not make any direct representations to the King himself. I am in favour, Sir, if I have anything to say about it, of the language of this resolution. I am not in favour of bringing this matter directly to the notice of His Majesty, but I do believe in this House declaring itself, as a principle of democracy, against titles. When that happens we are declaring, as far as this House can declare, to the Canadian people whom we represent here, that henceforth we are in favour of an enlarged democracy in this country, and to a continuation of the democracy which we possess by telling the Government—whichever Government it may be—that the nation is not in favour of such recommendations for titles being made to the King.

The creating of titles, as is well known, is one of the prerogatives of His Majesty. In these days when the liberty of the British subject is of a broad and deep character, and based upon such a solid foundation, we can recall that those who had to do with the circumventing of the power of the King, or the cutting off of whatever they regarded as dangerous, left this prerogative of conferring titles to His Majesty. We must, therefore believe that this prerogative having stood the test of many ages, was not regarded in the early stages as dangerous, and is not so regarded now, in view of the fact that that prerogative is not exercised by the King except upon the will, wish, and recommendation of a responsible government. Therefore, Sir, if there is anything to be reformed in connection with it, it is a domestic reform so far as Canada is concerned, and should be, and can be carried out, without referring the matter to His Majesty the King, or to any authorities beyond the seas, except in so far as cutting down the titles that are already conferred; I presume it would be necessary to have some legislation enacted in the Motherland in regard to that.

It is unnecessary for me to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not in favour of hereditary titles, for the reason that while I am not opposed to a man who earns a distinction getting it—I believe there are occasions when worth or ability, noteworthy discoveries, or inventions, and matters of that kind, should be recognized by honours—I do not think the honour should be handed down by way of heredity to somebody who had nothing whatever to do with it, and did nothing to win it except that he had the good fortune to be the child of the person who had earned that distinction. My idea of democracy, to use a commonplace expression, is that every tub should stand on its own bottom; that every man and every woman in this country upon whom a title is conferred should have the distinction of having earned such title himself or herself. That, Sir, is the position which I take, and for that reason I am opposed to hereditary distinctions.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I was not in favour of taking up too much of the time of the House in discussing this subject, and therefore I should not transgress beyond reasonable bounds. I think we have occasion to be grateful to the hon. member (Mr. Nickle) for having brought this matter before the House because it affords the opportunity of thrashing out these matters and showing what real democracy is. I have met a great many knights in this country—gentlemen upon whom titles had been conferred. They are not any more to me to-day than they were before they enjoyed those titles; in fact, perhaps I thought more of them before than I do now. We have "Sirs," sitting in this House; they are estimable gentlemen now, and they were estimable gentlemen before they were knighted; I do not see any difference in them in that regard. I am almost in the position of the old Scotchman—a great big burly fellow, who was being beaten by a small handful of a wife. He was asked, "Why do you permit that little midget of a woman to beat you?" "Why," he said, "it pleases she and doesn't hurt me." If it is a gratification and satisfaction for any person to be called "Sir," very good; it does not hurt me in the slightest degree and I lose no sleep over it. But, as I have already said, there are a great many other things in this country which call more for the attention of the pure democracy of this House than the question of titles, although I am not finding fault with my good friend for bringing the matter forward.

Now as far as the prerogatives of the King and the exercise of them are concerned, I think we might well say about them what a very excellent Governor General of Canada told me on one occasion. He said, "I understand that a Governor General is permitted to have opinions in Canada provided he does not express them." That is very much the same as in the case of the prerogatives the King has, providing he does not exercise them except upon the advice of his ministry for the time being. Therefore I think that we can be just as democratic as we please in respect of any prerogatives that the King or the Governor General may be exercising here or in the Homeland. However, I think we are apt to go too far with our democracy, like everything else. We must not forget the magnificent stability given to the institutions of this country by reason of the fact that we have a King, and the prerogatives of His Majesty and the prerogatives of the Governor General and the continuity of power and excellence in connection with our institutions and our Government do not suffer by reason of that stability. It would be well not to try and strike too close to the foundation in case we might find ourselves doing discredit to the fountain head of constitutional justice, power, and right unintentionally and not meaning to do any such thing. No doubt power and wealth, and what you might be pleased to call aristocracy, jar upon the poor man, and some people for the sake of getting relief and satisfaction think they should strike down those institutions. That is a great mistake. There is only one true liberty—the exercise of the right of citizenship within the law. And that law is only stable as we recognize the fountain head, the prerogatives of the King and of those who are in office by virtue of the powers that flow from him.

I am prepared, Sir, to vote for this resolution, as I have nothing to the contrary to offer, but I am not doing so because I feel I am accomplishing anything very great. However, it seems to be the desire that an expression of opinion should be obtained from this House as to the cutting down of the multiplicity of titles. I want to say to the Acting Prime Minister for the benefit of this Government and of any future Government, that great care should be taken that no person is recommended for the honour except one who is highly worthy of it, and to whom the granting of a title would be recognized by the Canadian people as something that was eminently deserved. These titles are becoming so common that before very long some men will be ashamed to acknowledge that they have them; they are no distinction at all. If they are to be an incentive to or a recognition of honourable conduct and better service, they must be kept within the bounds of respectability.

I have reason to know that there are sitting in this House men from my own province who deserve distinctions and who could have easily have had them, but who turned them down. I have no doubt, Sir, that on more than one occasion the hon. gentleman who represents Shelburne and Queen's (Hon. Mr. Fielding) could have been knighted; but his own name, a name that has been a household word in this Dominion for the last twenty years, is greater to him and to his friends than any knighthood. I had the pleasure of sitting with the now distinguished premier of the province of Nova Scotia when word came offering him a knighthood, and he replied, "I want no knighthood. I will not accept it." That is no reflection on the gentlemen who accept knighthoods; it is simply a matter of temperament. But the men who enjoy the respect and confidence of the people of this country are honoured just as much without titles.

If, however, occasions should arise in the future when men should be honoured by titles, I would not care to say that the door is absolutely closed against His Majesty conferring titles upon them. I like freedom in these things as well as freedom in everything else, and if it be proper that the time honoured custom of conferring a title here and there on worthy citizens should be continued, I am not entirely opposed to it.

Let me say in closing, Mr. Speaker, that if the motion of the hon. member for Kingston is a step towards broader democracy, if it is a step by which the common people of this country will be more consulted and have more to say and feel themselves more a factor in the Government of this country he has done much and has my thanks for the discussion which he has brought on in this House.

Mr. CHARLES SHEARD (Toronto South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the adoption of the report, for the reason that I consider it unwise in its expression, unconstitutional in its tendency and unreasonable in its application. If I may quote from the report of the committee, I find that we approach His Majesty with what is practically a rebuke. We, the people of Canada, as represented in this assembly, ask His Majesty in paragraph (a) "to refrain." As one of His Majesty's Commoners in this Parliament, I entertain too high a respect for His Majesty to approach and address him in that particular form. I venture to say that if we had set forth the facts; if this committee is prepared to vouch for the facts and to submit evidence to His Majesty in a proper form to illustrate and to substantiate the view that the people of this country are greatly perturbed about the granting of titles, it is right and proper that that evidence should accompany so peremptory a demand as the report of this committee appears, to my mind, at least, to make.

The hon. member for Kingston has said that the heather is on fire in the Dominion regarding the distribution and application of these titles; that there is a tremendous stir, not only throughout Canada, but throughout the British Isles, and that in England some newspaper writers, notably among others, the owner and director of the Times, have shaken the Empire to its very base. I must confess that in my goings to and fro amongst the people of this country I have yet to find a single individual in any walk of life who is a hundredth part as agitated about this matter as the hon. member for Kingston appears to be.

I have listened last session and this, and at times somewhat wearily, to the prolonged debates upon this subject, and I must confess that the thought often entered my mind, that it would have been better if we could have turned our attention to something far more inspiring and far more important. I am not going to be a transgressor against the principles which I am now voicing and I do not intend to speak very long upon this subject; but I do think that it is right and proper for those who hold contrary views to demonstrate that something can be said for the other side.

At the outset I am free to say that the whole discussion upon this question has been caused, in my judgment, not by the principle of bestowing titles, but the unfortunate fact that many men have been distinguished by the conferring of titles,—particularly in the city a part of which I represent,—who have done nothing whatever that the ordinary man on the street could discover to deserve their being so honoured. It has appeared that this special distinction is claimed and enjoyed by the banker, the broker, and the money maker, and that the only qualification is ability and power to amass wealth. Well, if that be so, all I have to say is that those who make the recommendations to His Majesty should receive the rebuke, not the head of the Empire, who acts upon the recommendations and advice of his advisors.

Secondly, I consider that in its tendency the recommendation in the report of the Committee is unconstitutional. In its effect it aims at the destruction of the House of Lords. If we carry it to its logical completion, we would necessarily, in the next step, ask His Majesty to abolish the House of Lords. We all know that in order to occupy a seat in that body a man must have a peerage; a peerage must be created before a man is advanced from the House of Commons to take a seat in the House of Lords. In Canada, following the constitutional practice observed in Britain, we too have an Upper House, composed of the honourable members of the Senate. If we are going to be practical and radical in this matter, we will start to carry out the principles which we are enunciating by abolishing the Senate. I might get considerable support for this suggestion among the rank and file of the people of Canada. I venture to say that if the question was put before the people to-day: "Which is more important, the abolition of titles, or the abolition of the Senate,"? my recommendation, if I made such would carry. If we are to be consistent and constitutional, before this resolution is adopted, the member for Kingston and those who second and support it, must, in my judgment, bring forward for the consideration of this Parliament a recommendation to abolish the Senate.

Let us consider the effect and application of this resolution. I am one of those who believe that titular distinction is a very strong incentive, and has been all through history, to earnest, honest, devoted work in certain lines, professions, and callings. I propose to address myself more particularly to this phase of the question.

From the cradle to the grave the greatest incentive and the strongest inspiration to extra effort and extra endeavour on the part of the human being is appreciation. Even the nursing child in its mother's arms performs its little tricks more earnestly under her smile and when surrounded by the approval of its friends. I have often wondered as I listened to the member for Kingston expounding on this question whether he was among the dull laggards at the bottom of his class in school, college, or university, or whether he was among those who strove to achieve distinction there. From what I know of him, I venture to think he was in the latter class. We see boys at school working for certificates of honour; we see young men at colleges and universities burning midnight oil and making every effort, putting forth every energy, to improve and strengthen their mentality—for what? Simply in order that they may be distinguished among their fellows as being the recipients of honour certificates, of prize books of award, or of medals. These distinctions are regarded by their recipients not, as of so much intrinsic value in themselves, but as valuable to those who win them—valuable not only during their university and college careers, but throughout their whole lives, because such certificates or awards bear the imprimatur of the institution whence they graduated and indicate their high standing and progress among the classes. In the great school of life this principle still prevails, and I sincerely trust that Parliament will not put any stumbling-blocks in the way of the application or bestowment of such evidences of appreciation.

It has been argued that titles are of no value. We have been told that they make a class; that they engender class hatred in the smoking rooms of the cars and among those who travel up and down as does the hon. member who submits this report. Well, let us go back and see. I have in mind those of my own profession who have been so distinguished, and worthily distinguished, and if I do not weary the House I should like to submit one or two names in this connection. Would any one claim that the bestowment of a peerage upon the great surgeon and discover of antiseptics, Sir Joseph Lister, did not inspire and benefit the whole of the surgeons of the British Empire, from himself down to the humblest worker and striver in the same field? I say that it did.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman is surely aware of the fact that Lister ascribed all his achievements to Pasteur, and that Pasteur had no honour or distinction of any kind.

Mr. SHEARD: I am well aware of Sir Joseph Lister's achievements; I know what they were long before he was raised to the peerage. I am also aware of how much he owed to the distinguished Frenchman, Pasteur, the very apostle and centre of all germ theory and germ progress. But I fear that the hon. member has failed to grasp my point, which is this: the distinction which Sir Joseph Lister secured did not affect him so much as it affected students, workers, and votaries in the same class, at a time when men were defaming him and decrying his efforts and his claims because, it was contended, they had no value.

I will give another illustration. Sir James Y. Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform, struggled alone in his back office for twenty years trying to demonstrate the feasibility of anaesthetics as a benefit to patients who were undergoing surgical operations. He was actually expelled from the surgical society of the city of Edinburgh because of his theories and experiments in this regard. His critics said: "He has gone crazy upon an impossible condition." It was not until Queen Victoria permitted him to administer to her an anaesthetic, and afterwards knighted him, that it was clearly demonstrated to every one that anaesthetics were of value, that their application was feasible, and that their use enabled the surgeon to gain access to parts of the human frame which previously he had been unable to reach.

I go further and give to my hon. friend another illustration—one nearer home. I was fortunate enough to be intimately associated with and a personal friend of one of the most distinguished physicians Canada ever produced. That gentleman worked in the same scientific field with me, occupying a professional chair in the University and Medical Faculty of McGill College, Montreal. He devoted his energies to what? Not to the making of money, but to increasing and improving the status and condition of the medical profession throughout the length and breadth of this country. He put in hours and hours, aye, often day after day, week in, week out, and year in, year out—he devoted as many as four, five, and six days' service in the week amongst the paupers and poor in the public hospital of the city of Montreal. His efficiency being recognized, he was invited to become the assistant of Pepper, of Philadelphia, and I well remember his being with me when he was about to remove to that great centre, and while driving him over to the General Hospital in Toronto, I asked him: "What are the emoluments in connection with your new appointment?" "Oh," he said, "the emoluments are nothing; they are not enough to live on, but the field is large, and the possibilities for scientific achievement on behalf of medicine in this country are very great, and it is that which attracts me and makes me anxious to get into the work that I want to serve." Then when he was transferred from there to Johns Hopkins University, one of the most famous institutions upon the North American continent, he revolutionized the clinic in the medical department, establishing a clinic that was world famous. And when from there he was invited by the University Authorities to take the Chair of Medicine in Oxford University and created a baronet, there was not in the Dominion of Canada a man but was proud to see him so honoured, and there was not in the rank and file of the medical profession a man but who felt stimulated to greater service and endeavour, because one so worthy had been so greatly honoured. I need hardly say that I refer to our great and distinguished Canadian citizen, Sir William Osler.

I do not want to say that all the advantages are to the doctors. I might quote almost every branch of science and art to show where titular distinctions have been of advantage. Indeed, no man who knows the history of or anything about art will deny how much the National Art Gallery of Great Britain has owed to the work and teachings of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Yet, Sir Joshua Reynolds did not receive much attention until he accepted the distinction of knighthood, because, even in the early part of his career, artists in England were classed with sign painters and interior decorators of buildings and houses. There was no real admiration for art for art's sake. There was, amongst the rank and file, a general impression that such effort was only wasting time and trifling and frittering away greater and more glorious opportunities, but by the conferring of titular distinctions amongst its votaries and leaders who, because of their work, genius and calling, received a separate and official distinction, the whole art of painting was benefited and blessed.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is the hon. gentleman aware that Zeuxis, Praxiteles, and Leonardo da Vinci bore no titles?

Mr. SHEARD: I am not saying that for a second. The hon. gentleman entirely misunderstood me. I am not saying that titles and distinctions are the only things in life. But titles have their use, and the abuse of them is no argument to put up that they are an injury to a progressive and democratic people. I was about to refer when interrupted, to that great astronomer who under the greatest difficulties and objections from the populace, developed under the patronage of George III, and discovered the planet Uranus, and history records of him that as regards all the facts in connection with the demonstrations of astronomy, no man has done so much for astronomical science as Sir William Herschell. Some one may say: Did the title make him do that? Certainly not, but it altogether separated him from the common remark—"star-gazer and trifler and fool that wants to find out something where there is nothing." It showed that there was an expression of national spirit, a national feeling, a national judgment, that that science in its greatest votary was a thing to be recognized, restored, and esteemed amongst the people.

When I come to the arts, painting, literature and the like, hon. members will remember what was said of Englishmen during the last of the Georges and on the accession of Queen Victoria. It was said on the continent of Europe that the English were nothing but a nation of shopkeepers, and why? Because, nothing had been said or done to distinguish the man of art, of science, of letters, in the nation. I say that these very distinctions counteract that tendency amongst the people of a new country and a new land, and they have value.

I take the resolution and I see a weakness in it at the start. This resolution proposes to leave untouched distinctions and honours acquired by military men. That was very wise on the part of the committee at this present time. Those distinctions may be trifling in intrinsic value, but they are the dearest possessions of many a soldier whose breast they adorn. Will any man in this House dare to say that above all the treasures a true British soldier possesses, the Bronze Cross that adorns his breast, the Victoria Cross for valour, is not amongst the highest of his achievements? It is but a recognition in military life what knighthood, forsooth, may be in civil life. It has stimulated to greater effort and sacrifice; it has developed and produced throughout all the officers and all the rank and file a determination that they will sustain the men who have been so decorated by His Majesty the King. If such be true of men who have borne so much sacrifice, sacrifices so great in the military ranks of this Empire, does it not illustrate the fact that decorations, although different in kind—acknowledgments conferred with honour and formality—have also the same and equally useful purpose in the great work of civil life? These are the decorations which keep life, hope, and courage in the hearts of desperate men, and without them there would be, in my humble judgment, a lack of effort and a lack of energy. Go to the great republic to the south, the great home of democracy. The exemplars of democracy live in that nation, and what do we see? We see that there the great measure of success is not a peerage, it is not a titular distinction, it is the bank account of the individual and the size of the cheque he can subscribe. I do not for a moment wish to say anything derogatory of that great, energetic, progressive people. I do not for a moment wish to say that there have not been noble patriotic men there who have come forward with liberal donations to every scientific enterprise and every philanthropic work. But I contend, and I say it cannot be denied, that underlying it all is a keen and earnest desire for some distinction or other which may designate them as separate and apart from the money value of the man. And to so great an extent has this been carried that it has become a matter of common remark throughout the length and breadth of this country, that the efforts of Americans, backed up by their gold, to ally themselves with the peers of the realm of Britain and the aristocracy of England, have amounted almost to a disgrace. So that for all your democracy, there is still what I describe as an innate physiological trait in the human species, a longing for something still more distinctive. And, I could cite instances in justification of that assertion. This is a time of unrest after the war. This is a time when, in my judgment, we have to consider carefully every motion and every movement which tends to set class against class. History repeats itself. Some one in this House, I have forgotten who, just now cited an illustration of the Louis's of France and what happened to them in the French revolution. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that no man will adduce that period in support of this resolution and recommendation, unless he carefully analyzes the period and its history. What happened there? They dethroned Louis of France, but what did that carry with it? Every art, every culture, every moral surrounding. Yes, more than that. They obliterated all advice and opinion, and those who held contrary ideas hesitated to speak until it was too late. Men of genius and culture came forward. The whole family of genius gave forth their treasures and nobly did they yield them upon the altar of their country's exigency, but too late. The rabble blasphemer would have none of it then, and they called their polluted deities from the brothel and the fall of the idol extinguished the very flame of the altar. We need not, however, go so far back. We can go back to the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. Any man who visited Paris after that war and saw the devastation wrought and the injury done to works of art and decorations historic in their character, and saw the rabble incensed against all government, crowd the streets with cannon and grapeshot, must realize what comes to those who inspire revolutionary conditions, heedless of results, heedless of the lesson of history, but willing to go any lengths to abolish class and to bring about an equality which does not exist. I well remember, too, after that time the great French painter, Gustave Doré had to flee from Paris with his precious treasures and instal them in Regent street in his gallery. And many a quiet hour have I spent watching him at work with his brush and palette, doing his pictures so dear to his heart, when he had not even the wherewithal to buy his meals and to pay his rent. But at that time he could have no home in Paris because the Communists had got control, and had no regard for science, nor art, nor culture, nor for men of such pursuits. And I remember on one occasion, if I may tell it, while I sat in his gallery, a rich and proud American came to see his pictures and implored him to sell one. He offered Gustave Doré $20,000 for the painting, but Doré, with the true ideal of the Frenchman, refused to consider the offer. The American came back and importuned him, and finally offered him, for what was probably his greatest work of art—Christ leaving the Pretorium—$100,000. I well remember when he was pressing that offer; it was in Doré's open gallery in Regent street. I was then a student and I was watching this ideal of the great painter. Doré dropped his brush, gazed upon the painting, and saw there what he had produced upon that canvas, the great central figure of the Christ, with its lights and shades surrounding. And as he looked upon it he turned upon his would-be seducer and said: "No; money can never buy that painting, for it represents the life and work of Gustave Doré." I will not say positively, but I believe that France afterwards adopted these works as national treasures, and bestowed upon Gustave Doré the cherished distinction of the Legion of Honour.

I have another point to which I wish to draw attention. The report of the committee says:—

> Your committee further recommends that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to provide that hereafter no person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada shall accept, enjoy or use any title of honour or titular distinction hereafter conferred by a foreign ruler or government.

Well, if I were fortunate enough to be distinguished by the Government of France and had had conferred on me the Legion of Honour I should wear it, and if I had the button and had the right to wear it in the lapel of my coat I should wear it. I do not care what resolutions were passed by this Parliament I should wear it, because I presume I would have some idea of what it meant. And then what would you do? Either you would fall down in your resolution and your law, or you would have to pass an amendment to the Criminal Code to cause my arrest and imprisonment because a foreign nation had deservedly decorated me and I was proud of the distinction and desired to acknowledge it publicly on all occasions. And you want to argue upon the floor of Parliament that after two years' careful deliberation of the question, and after debate and a most earnest consideration of what is wisest and best to do, the maturity of your deliberations and the expression of the opinion of the people of Canada is such a recommendation!

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if Canada ever hopes to attain a place, or maintain a position, amongst the civilized nations of the world. I do not know if this Parliament of Canada is ever hopeful to realize and recognize the proud stand of our soldiers who fought for liberty, and for their King. But if Canada is to be relieved from the stigma of a transaction of this kind which can only be characterized as a farce, she must eradicate from her records that ridiculous resolution and recommendation of the report which I feel convinced will only be regarded as a laughing stock by the country.

I said that I did not wish to speak very long upon the subject and I have probably exhausted my allotted time. I hope this House will not be hasty. I hope it will delay the acceptance of this report. I do not know that I can be altogether carried away with admiration of the ability, the statesmanship, or the mind which at this particular time would introduce here debates and resolutions which, I think, every man must realise, have for their object and effect the setting up of class against class. We are the common people; we are a united people, we are a peace loving body of citizens in Canada, and I hope that amity, unity, and admiration for all that is good and great and noble will yet be the characteristic of the true Canadian without distinction or difference.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in whatever blame or praise is due to him for bringing this matter before the House. There has been a reproach urged against him to the effect that this is not a matter of first rate importance and that it has taken up too much of the time of this House. I ask, Mr. Speaker: Is that the fault of the hon. member for Kingston? I should say it is not. One evening last spring the House of Commons was prepared, in my humble opinion, by an overwhelming majority, to adopt and carry the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), along the same lines as the resolution before the House to-day. It was not the fault of the hon. member for Kingston, and not the fault of the hon. member for Brome, who had seconded the resolution, that it was not carried on that occasion. It was the fault, if fault there be, of the Government of the day which made the matter a non-confidence motion and whipped their followers into line. If the House of Commons had been allowed on that evening to express freely and frankly its opinion, the amendment of the hon. member for Springfield would have passed by an overwhelming majority and, in so far as this House is concerned, the matter would have been disposed of.

This session, when the hon. member for Kingston brought this matter up, urging again the same position as was assumed by the hon. member for Springfield last year, the motion would have been carried by a substantial majority had not the Government of the day thought it wise to refer the question to a committee. I believe firmly that the hon. member for Kingston has been absolutely sincere and courageous in this matter and I am proud to associate myself with him. I would say to him not to mind the sneers and jeers of those who state that he would employ his talents to greater advantage if he used them to forward some other reform. Every reformer has had to meet that. If people do not like a reform they say to the reformer: Why do you urge this reform; why do you not urge the other reform? You remember what was said to the woman with the alabaster box: Why was this ointment not sold for much and the money given to the poor?

The speech of the hon. member for one of the Torontos (Mr. Sheard) started off by saying that this resolution was a rebuke to His Majesty. His Majesty has no more to do with this than he has to do with a writ issued by a court in Canada which reads: George the Fifth, King of Great Britain and Ireland, Emperor of India, and King of the Dominions Beyond the Seas, to so and so, a bailiff of the superior court. It is merely a matter of form and every one knows it. His Majesty has nothing to do with the granting of titles and everybody knows that. The people in England who have to do with the granting of titles are the whips of the political parties and the people in Canada who have to do with the granting of titles are the Government of the day. If the title factory is continued in operation in Canada and the practice grows, the member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and if we on this side of the House get into power and this pernicious system still exists, my hon. friend from Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) will say who is to be called a knight or a squire.

The members from Toronto are so numerous that I cannot remember all their geographical descriptions, but the distinguished medical gentleman who sits for one of the Torontos need not go very far to find evidence of popular disapproval of knighthoods. He has merely to turn to the distinguished gentleman who sits beside him and whom I congratulate on his support of democracy in voting against knighthoods last session.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman's reference to a distinguished gentleman sitting beside my hon. friend from Toronto I can take to mean only one person and that is myself. I rise to a point of order. I want the hon. gentleman to correct himself.

Mr. McMASTER: Had I been referring to the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) I would have call him the "most distinguished." However, the next statement—I cannot characterize it by the appellation of argument—made by the hon. member for South Toronto was that in colleges and schools we have great incentives in the medals that are granted, and he asks why we should not have titles to take the place of medals after the college life is over. May I point out to this House that medals are open to all, not only the rich students, but the poor students, and that medals are granted on a democratic basis on examination open to all and in which the poor boy, often by the fact that temptations to waste time are removed from him, has a better chance, or certainly as good a chance, as the son of the rich man.

My hon. friend went on to detail a list of worthy recipients of the honour. Of course there have been worthy recipients of the honour. There is Sir William Osler, a most worthy man, but I would like to ask my hon. friend before he leaves the Chamber if his admiration for Sir William Osler is due to the fact that he said that all men over sixty should be chloroformed, or is it due to the fact that he said that no man after forty had ever done anything worthy of commendation.

Now as regards military decorations. In our report we distinctly did not touch the question of medals or military decorations. The committee was glad to learn from a gallant and distinguished member of this House that at the front those who originated the giving of medals and decorations were the rank and file of the army, who transmitted instances of particular bravery to their superior officers, who in turn transmitted them to their superiors. That has nothing to do with the question of titles.

My friend also spoke in eloquent terms and worked himself up to almost a fury of eloquence in denouncing the worship of money in the United States. Let me tell my hon. friend that since the children of Israel worshipped the golden calf in the wilderness, all nations have suffered from the same disease and have worshipped the same false god. But when the argument is attempted to be made in this House that the American people are greater sinners than others in this respect, I beg to give that statement a most emphatic negative. I think of Thomas Jefferson, who died a poor man, and who was a typical American democrat. He was so fond of an entire absence of titles that he preferred to call a man by the plain name of John Smith, and not even John Smith Esquire. I think also of William Howard Taft, who left the greatest position in one of the greatest nations in the world, a comparatively poor man, to go back to be a college professor. I think of Thomas Woodrow Wilson, who was forced out of the presidency of Princeton University because he was against rich men's clubs in the university as being undemocratic; they forced him out of the presidency of Princeton University and into the presidency of the United States. Then we had a tirade against the French Revolution.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But there was an English Revolution before that, and there was a Charles who was beheaded.

Mr. McMASTER: There was an English revolution, and there was a Charles beheaded; but I would not hurt the Royalist sentiments, or the tender Stuart proclivities of any hon. gentlemen who sit opposite by referring to those events. But I might speak with pride of the revolution of 1688, when William of Orange came over the North sea and landed in England to found a new dynasty there when the former king disappeared. I believe such a reference as that will not be ungrateful or ungracious to the ears of some hon. gentlemen opposite; they, like me, are warm admirers of that great Dutchman, William of Orange. But we have heard a tirade against the French Revolution. If you will pardon a personal reference, Mr. Speaker, some years ago I had the pleasure of being a student at Edinburgh University. I belong to a literary and debating society there called the Dialectic Society, which had been in existence a little more than a hundred years. Those Scotch students of the Dialectic Society discussed the French revolution when it was in progress and spread upon their minute book—(I saw the resolution)—that the French revolution would result in greater benefit than harm to mankind. And they were right, because whatever were the extreme measures which characterized that revolution, whatever were the extravagances of those connected with the movement, it was a great liberating movement, a great forward advance in the march of liberty.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does the hon. gentleman pretend to confuse the French revolution proper with the period of anarchy and Bolshevism?

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I hope not.

Mr. McMASTER: But I say that these great changes in the history of mankind are often accompanied by turmoil, disorder, anarchy and crime.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Every one has endorsed the revolution.

Mr. McMASTER: Every one has got to endorse the French revolution. My friend from Toronto—I am not sure from which geographical division—has read history, if I may dare to say, through Torontonian eyes if he does not appreciate the French revolution.

Now we come to the last argument that in this House attempting to do away with knighthoods and distinctions of this sort we are trying to set class against class. That is what they said of John Bright when he was trying to free from taxes the bread of the poor in Great Britain.

Mr. BURNHAM: And voted against the Factory Acts.

Mr. McMASTER: He voted against the Factory Acts only as regards men.

Mr. BURNHAM: And women and children.

Mr. McMASTER: He did not in the case of women and children, that is where my hon. friend is wrong. Let him read Trevelyan's life of John Bright, he will find that John Bright supported the Factory Acts for the protection of women and chidren, but he believed that as far as men were concerned—I think he was wrong as a matter of fact—they could get better economic justice for themselves through their unions than through legislation. It is an old, old story that John Bright opposed protecting women, and especially children, against the rapacity and the selfishness of their employers. Setting class against class! Why what we are trying to do by this resolution is to endeavour to have true democracy in this country. No one will tell me that knighthoods can be distributed except to those who have got the wealth to support them. Perhaps one of the least harmful features would be the granting of knighthoods to soldiers in the field; but you cannot knight generals unless you are prepared to knight colonels; you cannot knight colonels unless you are prepared to knight captains; you cannot knight captains unless you are prepared to knight lieutenants; you cannot knight lieutenants unless you are prepared to knight sergeants; and you cannot knight sergeants unless you are prepared to knight the rank and file. I say that as far as heroism and unselfish devotion to duty are concerned, that the rank and file will compare with those of any other branch of the Canadian or any other army. No, we are not attempting to set class against class, but we are attempting to do away with a system which we believe has no place in the free air of North America. Therefore, I give my most hearty, sympathetic, and warm support to the report which has been submitted by my gallant, brave and unselfish friend from Kingston.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise with any purpose of dealing with this question on what one might call its merits; I think that is unnecessary after the very eloquent and able speech, from my point of view, of the hon. member from South Toronto (Mr. Sheard). I rise with a double purpose, Sir, in my mind: The first purpose I have is to give a slightly different view of what happened before the Committee than is given either in the report, or in the speech which we we have had to-day from my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I was a member of that Committee and I did not get the notice calling the final meeting for the adoption of the report until the meeting itself was breaking up. The reason for that was: The notices calling that meeting were not posted in the post office until nine o'clock the night before, and sometimes business is of such a nature that it does not detain members after that hour. I understand there was only a bare quorum when the report was adopted. If I had been present I should have made it quite clear that I could not concur in the report as adopted because, to my mind, it is illogical, it leaves certain anomalies, and if we analyzed the report carefully, the House, by its adoption, would be going very far towards lending its countenance to the absurdity.

Now with regard to the question of hereditary titles. I do not think there is much difference of opinion in this House or in the country. The question of heredity is totally opposed to the question of the distinction conferred upon a man in his own lifetime—opposed in principle. A man who gets a distinction in his own lifetime, from a monarch or any one else, presumably has earned it.

But the man who only gets it from his father has inherited it, and has had nothing to do with the earning of it. I take it that this whole House would be opposed to any continuation of the hereditary principle.

But with regard to the other findings of the Committee, I can scarcely think that a majority of the House will support them when they understand exactly what the report recommends. It is said, for example, that we are to recommend His Majesty to insure the extinction of titular distinctions. The paragraph immediately succeeding that which makes this recommendation says that "a suggestion was made that the titles of 'Right Honourable' and 'Honourable' be discontinued, but the suggestion did not meet with the approval of the Committee." I submit to this House that the titles "Honourable" and "Right Honourable" are titular distinctions. As a matter of fact, what happened was that I had the duty of moving that those titles, if Parliament abolished all titles, must go likewise, because I wanted to be logical. That was voted down on the Committee by only six to three. There were only nine members at the moment taking sufficient interest in the proceedings of the Committee to give a vote on what I conceived to be a very important point.

We are asked by this report—in which I should have been very sorry to concur, because I cannot, the way my mind is trained, concur in anything which is the embodiment at once of democratic cant and illogical nonsense—in one paragraph to recommend His Majesty to abolish all titular distinctions in Canada, and we are asked in another paragraph—by a six to three vote of the same Committee—to retain the titles "Honourable" and "Right Honourable," which I contend, on any fair interpretation of the English language, are themselves titular distinctions. What is the difference between the "Sir" which goes with a knighthood and the "Right Honourable" which goes with a Privy Counsellorship? The one comes to a man because he is made a member of the Privy Council; the other is conferred directly by the Sovereign. The same applies to the term "Honourable" to this extent, that while the "Sir" is conferred directly by the Sovereign, the title "Honourable" comes under the provisions of the British North America Act, if I am not mistaken, to members of the Senate and to the members of provincial or Dominion Administrations. Well, with regard to the present occupants of portfolios, whether in the provincial governments or in the Dominion Government, I suppose we are all prepared to say, "Brutus is an honourable man; so are they all, all honourable men." But I am perfectly sure in regard to the history of some of the men who have held that title of honourable in the past, the title was very much needed, because a good many people would not have suspected the existence of what the title suggests.

Mr. NICKLE: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to show me where the word "abolish" appears in the report?

Mr. M. CLARK: "Extinction" is the word I used.

Mr. NICKLE: The hon. member used the word "abolish." I do not see it anywhere in the report.

Mr. M. CLARK: Mr. Speaker, it is only a mind like that of the hon. member for Kingston that could see a difference between abolition and extinction. When I am extinguished I shall be pretty badly abolished. I do not want to dispute this point. I quoted the word "extinction," and if my hon. friend is out for literary accuracy in dealing with the report, why, Sir, he can have the word "extinction." Extinction is coming to us all, and when we are extinguished we shall be abolished.

Mr. NICKLE: May I have the privilege of asking a question?

Mr. M. CLARK: Mr. Speaker, I shall really have to ask the hon. member for Kingston not to interrupt.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Red Deer has the floor.

Mr. NICKLE: Yes, unless he gives me the privilege of putting a question, and I think he should do so. May I have the privilege of putting this question? Then I will not interrupt again. Does my hon. friend not see " to insure the extinction " applies only to hereditary titles?

Mr. M. CLARK: The point has the merit of a very slight distinction. What my hon. friend will admit is that the paragraph which asks for the extinction of hereditary titles asks for the discontinuance of the conferring of knighthoods.

Mr. NICKLE: It does nothing of the sort.

Mr. M. CLARK: Then I do not understand the report.

Mr. NICKLE: That is the difficulty.

Mr. M. CLARK: Then, Mr. Speaker, if a member of the Committee does not understand the report, I can only say that that would be a very good reason for the next Committee over which my hon. friend presides sending out notices for the final meeting rather more than twelve hours before the final meeting is called; and it would also be a very good reason for this House taking some considerable time to study the report before endorsing or amending it. I understood that we were to recommend His Majesty to confer no more titles of the knighthood order in Canada.

Mr. NICKLE: That is correct.

Mr. M. CLARK: That is what I said a minute ago. Then my hon. friend interjected that the report did nothing of the kind.

Mr. NICKLE: No.

Mr. M. CLARK: That is exactly what I said a minute ago, and I must say that my hon. friend has wrought himself up to such a pitch of excitement on this question that he forgets one moment afterwards what has been said one minute before.

Mr. NICKLE: Look at to-morrow's Hansard.

Mr. M. CLARK: I must return to my argument in spite of these interruptions, which are of a somewhat persistent and disorderly nature, Mr. Speaker. At the time when my hon. friend intervened to make a distinction without a difference I was pointing out that this report asked the House of Commons to recommend His Majesty to extinguish the custom of giving knighthoods, and in the next paragraph it says that it does not recommend His Majesty to interfere with the titles of "Honourable" or "Right Honourable." And I had arrived at the point in my remarks when comparing the title "Honourable"—which is a title that goes to hon. members of the Senate—with the title "Sir"—which is the prefix of knighthood,—

I was pointing out that what we would actually do if we adopted this report in its entirety would not be to abolish titular distinctions at all, but to abolish titular distinctions conferred by His Majesty, while we ourselves would continue those which come to our fellow citizens under the British North America Act. So that the report of the Committee brings us to this position: We have more respect for what was done in the British North America Act by the titled gentlemen who occupied the House of Lords fifty or sixty years ago and their comrades in the House of Commons, than we have for His Most Gracious Majesty at present occupying the throne of the British Empire. I contend that that is an absurd recommendation for any committee to make to this House, and that we should be illogical in the extreme if we adopted it.

Another reason why I would not have concurred in this report if I had been at the last meeting of the Committee is because of the recommendation in regard to foreign titles. Mr. Speaker, just think of what is actually recommended in that part of the report. It reads:

> Your committee further recommends that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to provide that hereafter no person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada shall accept, enjoy or use any title of honour or titular distinction hereafter conferred by a foreign ruler or government.

The House will observe that we cannot interfere with a foreign monarch. But the Committee recognized that it would be a great anomaly to recommend our own Sovereign to confer no titles upon people resident in Canada and yet to allow people in Canada to accept similar decorations from a foreign monarch. But the difficulty of the whole subject as it is dealt with in this report will at once be brought home to the mind of the House when we reflect that there had to be a recommendation that legislation be passed by this House to prevent our citizens from receiving titular distinctions from a foreign monarch. Now, legislation, to be effective, must carry with it a penal clause. Therefore, what is recommended by this report is that we should pass legislation with a penal clause, sentencing to fine or imprisonment men who have been so distinguished among their fellows that they have been picked out by monarchs of foreign countries to be the recipients of distinction. It is the thought of that condition that led me to say in the opening of my remarks that if we adopted this report in its entirety we should be passing very nearly into the realm of the absurd. That is a brief history of the arguments that came before the Committee as they appealed to at least a minority of the Committee, of which this report is not the unanimous finding.

The second purpose, Sir, for which I rose was to say that I thought the feelings and sentiments of the Canadian people would be met on this subject at the present time if they accepted the guidance which was to be had in the very sane, constitutional speech of my hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie). I think he indicated, without doing so specifically, the lines which would meet the average thought of a majority of the thinking people of this country. For the principle of heredity I do not think any one has any use. But I feel that what was in the mind of my hon. friend who leads the Opposition was that to go much further than a recommendation to governments that greater care should be taken in the conferring of distinctions would be going further than would be wise, having regard to all the circumstances.

I was very much impressed by the argument of my hon. friend by which he made it clear to the House, or clear to my mind anyhow, that in practice the King confers only those distinctions that are recommeded by governments. What I think my hon. friend wanted us to infer from that was that it would be a wise thing, it would be a temperate thing, to keep the King out of this thing altogether. If it is governments that do this, then let us, as a House of Commons, be reasonable and address ourselves to governments and tell them what we think is the average opinion of the people of Canada upon this subject. I am confident that the prevailing sentiment of this country is that the principle of hereditary titles is utterly bad and that there has been an abuse of the giving of titles; that titles have been conferred upon people that the majority of the Canadian people would not have honoured in that way. If these two points were brought clearly out in a recommendation to this Government, in conjunction with the Imperial Government, we should keep the monarch out of the matter; we should take a step in advance along the line of what those who feel keenly about it feel is the line of reform; and we should leave a large number of people with the satisfaction that they derive from the thought that constitutional proceedings which have come down through centuries should not be too lightly or too rudely interfered with at this particular period of our history.

The leader of the Opposition laid down an excellent principle when he said that he was for freedom in these matters—he added, I think, " in all matters." Well, I was particularly glad to hear him say that, because I at once added mentally that he is not only for free titles, but for free trade as well. I hope I did not misunderstand his generalization. If that is the state of his mind, it has come about suddenly; but after all, there have been sudden conversions in history that have been very beneficial to mankind and I should rejoice with unspeakable joy and without any reserve if the case of Saul of Damascus was repeated in the case of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I think that freedom might well be allowed to rule in this matter, for a time at any rate. I repeat that so far as I can interpret the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) he has, on this question anyhow, interpreted the mind of the country. The country would be very well satisfied at this time if the House could see its way to pass some resolution or to amend this recommendation so that we express ourselves strongly against hereditary titles and strongly in favour of more care being exercised in the conferring of any other titles.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough, West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this subject, because I believe it is of vast importance. Many things which appear to be trifling because they are splashy nevertheless hide a great deal of rottenness, and that is the case with the whole scheme of titular distinctions, without exception. The day has passed for the triumph of aristocracy.

We have reached the age of democracy, and it would be well for the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and the hon. member for Toronto South (Mr. Sheard) to remember that fact. If hon. gentlemen fancy that they are not interpreting the wishes of their constituents by voting for the resolution and if they are in favour of the continuance of titles, let them go on and vote for titles they will find out what their constituents think about the matter the next time they go home or the next time they stand for election. I do not intend to debate this question at great length, as we have heard about it for years. I brought up the subject in 1913-14, and I was knocked out by two heavy weights, the great and much lamented late leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). This seemed too much for me to go up against at the time, so I retired for a sponge-off and a glass of water. But there intervened a war, and it seemed to me that it was inadvisable, under all the circumstances, to interpose a row about titles in the much greater row that was going on in Europe. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), however, after consulting me about the matter, took up the question and has dealt with it with the object of stemming the tide of decorations which was about to flow in consequence of the war. He is no doubt well advised, and he had more courage than I, or perhaps more wisdom. I thought the day was coming when, undoubtedly, people in Canada as elsewhere in the world would insist that titular and class distinctions must disappear. We could well afford to wait. We have waited for hundreds of years for this consummation to be brought about, and surely, when we view the world over, we may well and confidently say that those who are in favour of class distinctions will disappear with the junkers of Germany and the aristocrats of Russia.

We find in the world to-day very little in support of the arguments of these hon. gentlemen. We find that the last desperate stand of aristocracy made in Europe as it has been, has been a signal failure, and the only reason that it has stands apparently solidly in Great Britain is that in that country it has been less abused than, perhaps, anywhere else in the world, and therefore, it has more apologists. But to argue, as has been argued here this afternoon, that because certain men like Joshua Reynolds were knighted, therefore, that knighthood, is a distinction conferred upon art, is to give the whole case away.

All I need to do is to refer, as I did in my interruption of the hon. member for Toronto South (Mr. Sheard), to the fact that all the greatest men with the exception of Sir Isaac Newton remained without titular distinctions. You have to begin if necessary with Homer, Buddha, Confucius, Thucydides, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, the Seven Wise Men of Greece, with all the historical characters of Europe, unless you appeal to the great rascals such as Nero, Commodus and the like. Surely hon. members do not think that Scipio Africanus required a title. Surely they do not think that our friend Julius Caesar was smaller for not having a title. And these hon. gentlemen show their ignorance of history when they say that these distinctions confer honour on the arts. What about Titian, Michael Angelo, Velasquez, Correggio, Rubens, Rembrandt, Raphael, Corot, and God knows what other great names. Do not entangle these great men with these little trappings of titles that hang like spit curls at the side of a woman's head, and that amount to nothing. These great men tower majestically over all these little things which arose from what? They arose from property owners, and not from the people. They were not recommendations of the people. They were what the aristocracy gave to themselves before the people had the right of franchise or had any liberty at all; but when the time came that the people rose strongly in their own might and shook off these things, they shook off class distinctions, and these hon. gentlemen here to-day who have spoken so strongly in favour of titles, so insidiously and in many ways, so cunningly, are compelled to acknowledge that the rottenest branch of the whole tree is hereditary titles, the greatest and highest of all. If it be the case that the topmost branch, the great culmination, the apotheosis of the whole titular business is absurd, it follows that the lesser is only less absurd, unless logically you choose to argue that it is more. I am not going to condescend to argue the question against titles. If hon. members are so ill-read in the history of class and class distinctions in the struggle of the people as to continue to wish that titles and class distinctions and all those abominations should be perpetuated, let them go on, but they will reckon with their people at home some day, and I am content to leave the matter to the great mass of the people of this country, if the members of the House do not wish to exterminate these titular distinctions to-day. We have been told—and I believe it is true—that the Government wants this to be a fight to a finish. We have been beaten several times; we have been more or less jockeyed—and I do not say that in any nasty sense. I brought a good deal of opprobrium last year upon my humble self by having endeavoured to find out from the late lamented leader of the Opposition if he intended to let the Opposition have a free-for-all. I found out that the Prime Minister regarded that as a constitutional mistake, and I retired under my bed, and I did so promptly, but I do not purpose getting under the bed any more. I do not mind being moderate nor endeavouring to be discreet; but this question is one of great importance to the people, and if some of these gentlemen will go to Winnipeg or Toronto or to some other place where there are great gatherings of the masses of the people and deliver the speeches which they have delivered to-day, they will have a reception which will astonish them, or I am mistaken.

Brigadier-General GRIESBACH (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) that as regards Scipio Africanus, Scipio was the gentleman's name and "Africanus" was the title conferred upon him. The point to which I particularly desire to direct attention is the paragraph of the report which says:

> Your committee, however, do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations, such as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty.

This paragraph must be construed, I take it, somewhat as a legal document, and inasmuch as certain decorations have been mentioned, it may be assumed that those which are not mentioned are thereby excepted. As I understand this paragraph and as it has been explained to me by the Chairman of the Committee, it would, if adopted, prevent recognition by the granting of an honour or an award to any officer in the Canadian service above the rank of captain.

That is what this proposal means. It excepts the D.S.O., the C.M.G., and the C.B. and the Distinguished Conduct Medal, for some reason unknown to me, although some 1,204 have been granted to Canadian soldiers in the war. The Victoria Cross, of which fifty-three only, although that is a large number, have been granted to Canadian soldiers, is a decoration which can really only be won by non-commissioned officers and junior officers. Only in very exceptional cases can it be won by officers above the rank of captain, because when officers are in their proper places and in the proper discharge of their duties, a major or lieutenant-colonel will be too far away from the scene of fierce activity to win this distinction. The Military Medal can only be won by non-commissioned officers and men and the Military Cross by warrant officers, lieutenants and captains. The Conspicuous Service Cross is unknown to me.

An hon. MEMBER: That is naval.

Brigadier-General GRIESBACH: I do not know what it is awarded for. Therefore, if this report means what it purports on the face of it, this House, by implication, is asked to say that decorations which have been won in the last four years, and which are being proudly worn by distinguished soldiers of the rank of major and upwards, and n.c.o's and men shall be barred in the future. For although these distinguished officers and men may wear these decorations, they will do so in face of the implied opinion of this House that they are unnecessary and do not stand for anything, and that the wearing of them is dangerous and pernicious. That is what this report virtually asks the House to declare in reference to the decorations worn by Canadian officers of the rank of major and upwards. I shall vote against the adoption of this report because of that aspect of it.

With regard to foreign decorations, Canadian soldiers are to-day wearing a considerable number of French orders and Belgian orders which have been awarded to them by the governments of those countries for services rendered by them in France and Belgium during the war, and the same observations apply to these decorations as to the British decorations. Those who have them at present may keep them, but they will not be permitted in the future, and I would direct attention to the situation that frequently arises, and will arise, in connection with rescues at sea by British ships. At the time of the earthquake in Italy British ships went into the harbour, and British sailors, displaying admirable courage, and at a serious risk to life and limb, rescued people who were buried beneath the ruins. What position would the Canadian sailor be placed in if, having performed such a splendid act and having been graciously offered some recognition of his service, he had perforce to decline the honour which a foreign government desired to bestow upon him? The question as to whether this country can legally make it impossible for citizens to receive these decorations is a matter for the legal gentlemen to consider; but I can conceive of no legislation short of a penal law that could prevent a man from accepting such a decoration if it were conferred upon him. The argument which may be urged against the decorations that are of the nature of orders is that such orders lead to knighthood. The report of the Committee declares that there is an objection to the C.M.G. because it is the third class of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and the C.B., because it carries membership in the Order of the Bath, and because in these orders there is promotion to knighthood. The Committee are objecting to the C.B. and the C.M.G., although in themselves they are not knighthoods. In themselves they are not titular distinctions or titles of honour, for you can hardly go around appending the phrase "Companion of the Bath" or "Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George" to a man's name when speaking of him, no matter how respectable his companions may be. The situation that would arise, then, assuming that this report is accepted, would be that in the future Canadians serving in co-operation with Australians, South Africans, New Zealanders or British troops, would be unable to accept such honours and awards as might be bestowed on officers of equal rank in the other forces. It may occur to some one, Mr. Speaker, as being a matter of very small moment; but I assure you, as a soldier, that it is, on the contrary, of considerable importance. A soldier does not ask very much; he does not get very much. But he does wear with proper pride the ribbons and the distinctions of the orders which he has gained. These distinctions cost the soldier a great deal, and are earned with a labour that is inconceivable to those who are not of his calling. It is almost futile to attempt to convey to the civilian mind all that they do mean to him. But let me assure the House, even if I repeat, that they mean a great deal. They round off his military career, and inform others exactly where he has been and what he has done; and if, without any endeavour to safeguard the well-earned and dearly-bought distinctions of these men, you indiscriminately abolish all these decorations, you are introducing, in my judgment, a very serious innovation. We find in the Army that these distinctions are necessary. Not only has this, during the past four years of fighting, been true in the British Army, where the full value of these rewards is recognized, but the Americans, who came into the war practically without any medals of any sort, found it necessary during the struggle to evolve a complete system of decorations. Before this Committee's report is adopted, I earnestly desire that every hon. member will seriously consider the position of our Army in the future when called upon to co-operate with other armies in the Empire; and I ask that the House will weigh well the feelings and sentiments of many gallant soldiers who are not able to speak for themselves here to-day, but who will, without doubt, feel keenly the effrontery and insult which this report, if adopted as it stands, will reflect upon them.

Mr. ROBERT JAMES MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the honour of being put upon this committee when it was appointed, but I had hoped that when this committee brought in its report the report would be in such a form that it would be accepted by the House practically without discussion and that probably, as soon as it had been accepted we would be able to get back to the discussion of some of the really practical things of life, such as the cost of living, and so perhaps the cutting down of some of the Bolshevism and revolutionary feeling in this country. However, as the report has come in and as I had nothing to do with framing it, I must say that it is not entirely satisfactory to my mind, therefore I should like to offer an amendment, if it is permitted, on the report of the committee. I do not know whether it will be in order or not. I did not intend to speak at this moment, but perhaps I might proceed with the discussion and leave the point of order to be considered afterwards. The part of the report that I do not wish to agree with was that which was taken up by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Griesbach) that refers to the cutting out such distinctions as C.B. or C.M.G., which do not carry any title. Therefore, I believe these distinctions need not have been cut out by the committee. I believe it was the feeling of this House last year, and that it was the feeling this year when the question was up for discussion, that hereditary titles and knighthoods, which give the titles of Sir and Lady, should be discontinued. I do not think that anybody in this country who has been bothering about this question really cares how many letters you place after a man's name, if you leave off the aristocratic touch of knighthood.

The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) made a very eloquent speech this afternoon, one of the most beautiful that I have ever heard him deliver, and I have heard him many times in the old days in Toronto. But, I believe that many of his points were beside the question. For example, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), and those who are supporting the report, are not making any attack upon those who have been given knighthood. Nobody in this House has greater respect from me than the hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) who has a knighthood. Such distinguished people as Sir William Osler, Sir Joshua Reynolds and Sir James Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform, and the other distinguished men whom the hon. member for South Toronto mentioned, are not being attacked by those who are supporting this resolution. I should like to get the view of the House upon making a motion to do away with hereditary titles of all kinds, and knighthoods, in this country.

I understood the hon. member who has just taken his seat to desire that titles should be given to certain officers who have performed good service overseas. I understood from his remarks that he believes that knighthoods should be retained at least for certain officers, those in charge of divisions or brigades who have not been discriminated against, but who have more or less been forgotten up to date and who might be given knighthoods by the Crown. Am I right in that?

Brigadier-General GRIESBACH: I did not say anything about that at all. I hope the hon. gentleman will confine his remarks to what he himself thinks. I have said what I have said; I did not say anything about what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. MANION: That is quite possible. I do not wish to put any words into my hon. friend's mouth that he did not use, but I understood him to say that certain men who had served at the front if they were forgotten would feel that they had been insulted by this country. That is my understanding of what he referred to, but I do not know whether I am right in that or not. If I am not right I will be glad to be corrected.

Brigadier-General GRIESBACH: What I said—or what I meant to say—was that by accepting this report barring out C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., D.C.M., this House would be reflecting upon a number of gallant men who have gained these distinctions in the past I concluded by stating that it would appear that the framers of this report considered the granting of such distinctions to Canadians as unsound, dangerous, and pernicious.

Mr. MANION: I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. I, perhaps, have been carried away to a certain extent by the fact that I understood that he had made that statement to the committee, but I accept my hon. friend's statement absolutely. I agree with the hon. gentleman that such distinctions as C.M.G. and D.S.O. should be continued. But I certainly do not gather from the report of the committee that they should be discontinued. The report says:—

> Your committee however do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations, such as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty.

I distinctly take that into account.

Brigadier-General GRIESBACH: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman ask the Chairman of the Committee to state what the Committee does say.

Mr. MANION: We will leave that question out for the present. I have just heard there is an amendment to be made by the hon. member for East Algoma which will cover the point that I wish to make in my amendment.

There is an objection to making a distinction between military men and others in regard to the conferring of knighthoods. In the first place, the war has been carried on for four years against the German military caste or aristocracy. I do not think that we wish in this country to establish any such military caste to take the place of the military caste that was destroyed in Germany. The second point I wish to make in regard to the conferring of distinctions upon military men is this: The real heroes of this war have not been Sir Arthur Currie, gallant soldier as he is, or the staff officers, or the commanders of divisions, brigades, battalions or the medical officers but they have been the ordinary private soldiers who went over the top. The private soldiers are the men who have endured the greatest hardships, who have faced the greatest dangers and who have displayed the greatest courage in this war and yet, not by any stretch of the imagination, would any of these private soldiers be given a knighthood. The greatest soldier of all, Ferdinand Foch, has no title except his military title of Marshal. I might go further to exemplify the point that a title is not necessary in order to enable any man to be great. On the contrary, three of the greatest men at the Peace Conference are plain Misters, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Georges Clemenceau and Mr. Woodrow Wilson, and they would not have been any greater if they had had titles.

I am not belittling the officers of the Canadian army, of whom my friend from Edmonton (Brigadier General Griesbach) is one of the most gallant, but I think there should be no distinction in the giving of titles, titles should be allowed to be given to all or none. The hon. member for South Toronto mentioned the discoverer of chloroform and a number of other discoveries in medicine. I think that if the day should come that some Canadian would discover a cure for tuberculosis he will have performed a greater service to humanity than any general or hero who has served at the front in this war and he would deserve a title. I do not like to see any distinction made by giving titles to one class and not to some other class. In other words, we should teach our youth to aspire to proficiency in the constructive arts of peace rather than in the destructive arts of war.

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) as I understand it, is going to move an amendment along the lines that I suggest—that is that we do away with hereditary titles of all kinds, and do away with knighthoods in this country. That is the only point I wish to make; I think the rest of the report might easily be omitted.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I have two reasons for saying a word on the subject of the resolution: first, after the varied discussions that we have had last session and this on the subject of titles I do not care to take the responsibility of casting a silent vote; and, second, I wish to take issue squarely with some statements hon. members have made.

I would first reply to what has been said with regard to the feeling throughout the country on the subject of titles. I have not travelled all over the country—I have something else to do—but I have mingled with the people to a fair extent, and have had some experience with the working men. I represent a constituency in which 95 per cent of the adult manhood work with their hands and the remaining 5 p.c. work in some other way perhaps equally as hard. Yet it was not until I came into this House and listened to the cold, insistent logic of the hon. member for Kingston and to the burning eloquence of my hon. friend from Springfield that I had any notion whatsoever that the country was in the least disturbed on this subject. But, after listening for about six and a half hours during last session to those two hon. members I came to the conclusion that perhaps after all I was not in touch with the people among whom I mingle, and I made it my business to make some definite inquiries; and again after listening to the discusion this session and hearing what took place in the committee appointed to deal with this matter, I made it my business to get around among some of the bodies of organized labour to find out what they thought about it. I came to the conclusion that they are beginning to take an interest in this subject. I found that they were more or less agitated on what Parliament was doing, but not in the manner in which the hon. members who have spoken on this subject would indicate. They are not agitated because titles have been or may be granted, but they are agitated because Parliament instead of applying itself to a solution of the many problems that confront the country, is wasting its time discussing a subject in which the common people have no interest whatever. Last week-end I went up to the constituency of East Algoma, and I again made an effort to find out how the working men were feeling. Mr. Speaker, if I were to tell you in their own words what some of them said to me, I am confident you would rule that I was out of order in using unparliamentary language. The working men whom I met put it this way: that if ever there was an example of the old adage about Nero fiddling while Rome was burning, it has been given by Parliament spending its time in discussing this subject at this time. For that reason I am going to endeavour to be exceedingly brief.

Notwithstanding all that, if the report of the committee had been in any degree consistent, I perhaps might have constrained myself to support it. But if you analyze paragraph (a) I think you will find that it is the embodiment of inconsistency. It says that His Gracious Majesty shall be asked to refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of his subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character. In other words, they say to His Majesty: "We do not want you to continue to exercise the only prerogative that you have and confer upon your subjects titles of honour; but we are willing to leave in your hands that which you have not the right to confer—titles of a professional or vocational character." I do not think that the hon. member for Kingston would suggest that it is in the province of His Majesty to confer university degrees on a man after he has taken his professional course. Why do the advocates of this resolution go the length of abolishing distinctions of all descriptions whatsoever? Why do they say that professional and vocational distinctions shall remain? Why do they leave in the hands of the universities the right to confer titular distinctions?

We have heard a great deal with regard to the great democrats who have refused to accept titular distinctions. But would any hon. gentleman suggest, for instance, that the late Theodore Roosevelt was not a democrat because he accepted a titular distinction at the hands of the authorities of the University of Oxford? Would the hon. member for Kingston suggest that William Howard Taft is not a democrat because he accepted a title of honour at the hands of the authorities of the University of Toronto? Will any one suggest that the hon. member for Maisonneuve is not a democrat because he accepted the Legion of Honour at the hands of the President of France? Or that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada is not a democrat because, on the recommendation of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, he accepted a knighthood? Or that Chief Justice Mulock, of the Supreme Court of Ontario, is not a democrat because, for the same reason, he accepted a knighthood? I say again, if hon. members supporting this resolution want to be consistent and to wipe out distinctions entirely, all right—some of us might be willing to follow them; but when they are willing only to cut off the prerogative of His Majesty the King, I, as a loyal British subject, am not prepared to follow them.

It has been intimated during this debate that members who are not willing to vote for this resolution may find when they go back to their constituents that they would have been doing good business politically if they had supported it. That may be so. But so far as I am concerned I am willing to abide by the traditions and institutions of the British Empire, and I believe that the constituents who sent me here are of the same opinion.

The point made by the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) in connection with hereditary titles is perfectly logical to all those who desire to leave in the hands of His Majesty the prerogative that we believe is his, but to provide that any distinctions should die with those upon whom they have been conferred. That is really the only question in connection with the matter of titles that can be said to be agitating the people of this country at the present time. That side of the question was fully covered in the Order in Council laid on the Table of the House by the Prime Minister last session. But in case there may be some doubt in regard to that, and in order that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity of expressing their opinion on that phase of the subject and, possibly, going a little further in the whole matter of titles, I shall accept the implied suggestion thrown out by the leader of the Opposition this afternoon—that there should be freedom with regard to this whole question, but that care should be exercised; and that that is the will and the wish of the Parliament of Canada. Before I sit down I will move an amendment along the line suggested.

No man who is imbued with democratic principles and who, at the same time, wishes to abide by the constitution of the British Empire, can take exception to the position taken by the leader of the Opposition in this matter. I am not going to say anything in addition to what has been so well said by many with regard to the desirability of leaving something in our institutions that will make possible the recognition by the country of deeds of valour and acts of exceptional service to the State. I fully concur in what was said so eloquently and earnestly by the member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) this afternoon with regard to all that. If you canvass the subject in all its aspects I think you will find that no one disagrees with the conclusions which the hon. member reached. I believe that the amendment which I am about to submit will meet the situation and will give the House an opportunity to put itself on record with regard to the question of hereditary titles, as well as with regard to the manner in which the House thinks that titles of all classes should be conferred. With your permission, Sir, I will read the amendment:

That all the words after "that" of said motion be struck out and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

That only paragraph (b) respecting hereditary titles of the report of the sub-committee appointed to consider the question of conferring honours, etc., upon subjects of His Majesty resident in Canada be concurred in; but that this House is of the opinion that in making recommendations to His Majesty for the conferring of knighthoods or other titular distinctions upon persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, the greatest care should be exercised in the selection, and that special regard should be paid to the personal merit and distinguished services of the recipient thereof.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the limited opportunity I have had of looking into the wording of this motion, I am inclined to the opinion that it is not in order. When a motion is made for the adoption of the report of a committee, it is competent for the House to adopt it, to reject it, or to refer it back to the committee with or without instructions. Or, a motion may be made for the six month's hoist. I do not think it competent to move to amend the report of a committee.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Would I be in order, Sir, if I should ask to amend the motion so as to conform to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the circumstances, the hon. member should ask for leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: With the consent of the House I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I will move an amendment in these words.

Mr. PROULX: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member still has the floor.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I move:

That the report of the committee be referred back to the committee, with instructions to amend the same in the following manner:

That all the words after "that" of the said motion be struck out and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

That only paragraph (b) respecting hereditary titles of the report of the sub-committee appointed to consider the question of conferring honours, etc., upon subjects of His Majesty resident in Canada be concurred in; and that this House is of the opinion that in making recommendations to His Majesty for the conferring of knighthoods or other titular distinctions upon persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, the greatest care should be exercised in the selection thereof, and special regard should be paid to the personal merit and distinguished services of the recipient thereof.

Mr. NICKLE: I rise to a point of order. There is no word "that" in the report following which everything else can be struck out. If hon. gentlemen are going to submit an amendment, may I suggest that they take time and draw it properly.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion, the motion as put by the member for Algoma East (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) is in order. The main motion is that the report of the special committee be concurred in. Mr. Nicholson moves, seconded by Mr. Sheard, that the report be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend the same "in the following manner." The question is on the amendment.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, as one of those who were charged with the duty of taking under consideration the matter of titles, I feel called upon to make just a few remarks on this occasion. The report, I may say, was satisfactory to scarcely any man on the committee, and I do not think I am giving away any secret when I make that statement. But that some of us pursued a logical course I think I shall be able to show the House, if hon. members will have the patience to follow what took place in the Committee. I have always endeavoured to be consistent in any matter that I have undertaken to do in the House or the country, and if I fail in that regard it is because my judgment is at fault and not because I wish to err. I have endeavoured in every respect to be absolutely consistent in dealing with the matter that was submitted to the Committee for report.

In the first place, the question of hereditary titles came up. It was assented to practically unanimously by the Committee—and I believe it is almost the unanimous opinion of this House, that the Committee was right in its decision—that all hereditary titles in Canada should be discontinued and that such as now exist should die out when the then present owner of any title dies, that is, that his title should not descend to his posterity, the belief being that posterity has done nothing to deserve it. I think that in that respect the Committee was a unit.

The next matter, and perhaps the most crucial, was with regard to knighthood or the title of "Sir," and the lesser titles that are said to be stepping stones to the title of knighthood. I am one of those who have always endeavoured to support the throne and dignity that surrounds it, and while there may be cosmopolitan members, such as the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who do not see any use in "frills" and titles and so on, the average citizen is built on different lines, and he recognizes that in order that the best may be made of this life there must be divisions as there always have been and as there always will continue to be in this world. They cannot be done without, as was shown very conclusively by the hon. member for Toronto South (Mr. Sheard) this afternoon. The matter of competition begins in the very earliest days of childhood. The child appeals to the approval of its parents or to the applause of the older or younger members of the family. That is recognized in human nature, and in spite of all the insistence of the hon. member for Brome and other extreme radicals, that can never be thoroughly eradicated from the human breast. I believe with others that His Majesty the King and the pillars of the Throne that surround him, be they who they may for the time being, are the best authorities in the British Empire to say whether or not a man should be distinguished amongst his fellows. If His Majesty who occupies the Throne of the Empire at the present moment, believes that during this war certain persons, be they soldiers or sailors or civilians, have done acts of valour and distinction and national service, in my opinion, it rests with him to say whether or not those gentlemen should be recognized on his part as those whom the King delights to honour. We have examples, from away back in ancient history right down to the present time, that these distinctions have always existed, and they always will exist in this world in spite of all the drastic proposals that have been made by some members of the committee, that we should do away forever with all titles, that we should throw them into the waste paper basket or the garbage can and get rid of them. That is not a wise conclusion, and when we undertake to address His Majesty as we do in this resolution, the least we can do is to talk with sense and dignity——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Hon. members should not say "hear, hear" too soon. I may have something to say a little later on to which they will not feel like saying "hear, hear." The least we can do is to talk with sense and dignity, and not to endeavour to approach His Majesty in any way that, at the present time, which is a very critical period in the history of this country, may lessen the hold that he has upon his faithful subjects. Whether I am alone in this or not, I do not know, but I see something beneath the surface in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I have said so in the committee and I am not afraid to say so here, that I see something beneath the surface, and that I purpose letting the House know what I see in it. If hon. members do not think there is anything in it, that will be all right, but I shall feel that I have tried to do my duty according to my light and knowledge. There are but very few ties between the Dominion of Canada and the Empire at the present time, and they have been described on more than one occasion as being lighter than air, but strong as iron. The conferring of titles by His Majesty is one slender thread that has been recognized ever since we became a Dominion up to the present time as one of the prerogatives of the Throne and that we have allowed to go unchallenged until last year. Another is the appeal to the Privy Council, and it is rather strange to say that many of the same men who are at the present time bent upon destroying titles are also of opinion that in matters of litigation there should be no appeal beyond the high courts of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: This demonstration only goes to prove the truth of my words. Gentlemen sit upon the Opposition benches who would destroy appeals to the Privy Council. Let them wait until I cite the other two. There are many who have told me privately—I have not found one man who has got up on his feet on the floor of this House and stated that, but probably some one will do so before we are through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, legs, if you please, then. I say that those two—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Am I in order, Mr. Speaker, or not in the words I used?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If hon. members have any point of order to raise, they should raise it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Probably I was not as dignified as a man who supports titles should be, and I will take it back to that extent, and I will endeavour to be more circumspect, because I believe we are all walking uprightly or trying to do so, and we are not using four legs to do it. I was only speaking figuratively. These same gentlemen who want to abolish titles want also to banish appeals to the Privy Council, and if one talks privately with many of them, one will find they will state that the Governor General of Canada is a figurehead and costs a great deal of money to the country and ought to go. Time and again I have heard that stated, and it cannot be disputed, although some of them have not the courage to get up and say so. What other ties remain? We have simply the Crown and King left to bind us to the Motherland, and three legs having gone it will not be hard to knock out the fourth, and then we shall have the whole Empire tottering and coming down. In my judgment, every one of those ties, light as they are, is a silver thread that holds us to the Crown and to the Empire.

Believing that, I said in the committee, and I say here, that if any one is qualified to bestow distinctions and titles on soldier, sailor or civilian, it is His Majesty the King and his faithful advisers that surround the Throne. Having laid down that principle and having been defeated in the committee, I say I was perfectly consistent when I said, "If you do not take titles from His Majesty you shall not take them, with my consent, from any one else." We therefore moved—an extreme radical and myself working hand in hand—that "Honourable" and "Right Honourable," not having come from the Throne, should also be banished. Strange to say, the gentlemen that said "We are out to pull up all titles by the roots and to banish every distinction," voted in retention of the appellations "Honourable" and "Right Honourable," while we Imperialists voted for their abolition. Fine consistency, Mr. Speaker. Beautiful consistency. Surely the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) can see that even he was getting somewhat out of hand with himself when he had to support the retention of "Honourable" and "Right Honourable" and at the same time do away with all titles emanating from the King. Now, Mr. Speaker, seriously—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, if my hon. friends do not think I am speaking seriously they may say "hear, hear." I have the commendation of my own conscience in the matter and have better proof of the correctness of my position than the applause of hon. gentlemen opposite, because when they applaud me I always think I am going wrong. I say that "Honourable" and "Right Honourable" are the most disagreeable and most uncalled for of all the titles we have. Suppose you call me "Honourable" and I am not entitled to the term; I have to come back and say I am not honourable. Then you say: "You are in the dishonourable class," and rightly so. Therefore, I say that the man who presumes to be called "Honourable" arrogates to himself certain characteristics of mind which require that he shall deal truly with his neighbour, that he shall not oppress the poor, that he shall not wrong his neighbour to the extent of a single dollar, and that he shall live an absolutely circumspect life. If he does not fulfil these obligations, he does not deserve the title "Honourable," for it carries within itself elements of character which none of the others have. A man might be a blackguard for all his title of "Honourable;" but the man who deserves the title must live up to all the attributes it implies. Therefore I believe we were absolutely consistent when we moved that the titles "Honourable" and "Right Honourable" should be abolished. But that was not all. We have heard some criticism of the last clause, which is about the only one I may be said to have fathered, and I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. I think I was the mover of that in the Committee, and strange to say though I have been in a great minority most of the way through, even the Democrats swung round finally, when they were shamed into it, and voted for this. Would you believe, Mr. Speaker, that we had gentlemen upon that committee who, having held that His Majesty the King and his advisers should not bestow titles upon Canadians, had the wonderful audacity to get up there and tell us that though we would not accept titles from our own King whose advisers had no right to send them to Canada, yet we would take them from every other nation in Europe. What do you think of that, Mr. Speaker? Can hon. members cheer at that, or at the action of those gentlemen on the committee who, having said that no titles should come from the King at the head of the British Empire, were prepared nevertheless to take them from every European country? What does that indicate?

An hon. MEMBER: Disloyalty.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Yes, disloyalty and worse than that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, my friends may think that I have nothing to support my arguments in this respect, but I have taken the precaution to fortify my position as to the consistency of the course that I have followed, and I have a document here that will prove to this House that I was absolutely consistent in what I did in this matter. This is an order that I got this afternoon from the Department of External Affairs, from the hands of the titled gentleman whose honour is above reproach,—Sir Joseph Pope. It reads:

Regulations respecting Foreign Orders and Medals applicable to Persons in the Service of the Crown.

Orders.

1. It is the King's wish that no subject of His Majesty in the Service of the Crown shall accept and wear the Insignia of any Foreign Order without having previously obtained His Majesty's permission to do so, signified either:

(a) By Warrant under the Royal Sign-Manual, or

(b) By private permission conveyed through His Majesty's Private Secretary.

2. Permission given by Warrant under the Royal Sign-Manual will enable the Insignia of the Foreign Order to be worn at all times and without any restriction.

Private permission will only enable the Insignia to be worn on occasions specified in the terms of the letter from the King's Private Secretary conveying the Royal sanction.

3. Full and unrestricted permission by Warrant under the Royal Sign-Manual is contemplated in the following cases:—

For a Decoration conferred—

On an Officer in His Majesty's Naval or Military Forces lent to a Foreign Government; on an Officer in His Majesty's Naval or Military Forces attached by his Government to a Foreign Navy or Army during hostilities; or on any British Official lent to a Foreign Government and not in receipt of any emoluments from British public funds during the period of such loan.

In the case of decorations awarded in recognition of services under the Red Cross, permission will only be granted where such services have been rendered in a war in which the Empire has itself been engaged, and by persons serving under one of the officially recognised British voluntary aid societies or under similar societies of Allied States duly recognised by the Government of those States.

4. Private or restricted permission is contemplated for Decorations which have been conferred in recognition of personal attention to the Head of a Foreign State, and which are therefore of a more or less complimentary character, and will, as a rule, only be given on exceptional occasions when in the public interest and for political reasons it is deemed expedient that the acceptance of a Foreign Decoration should not be declined. Private permission will generally be given in the following cases:—

For a Decoration conferred—

(1) On British Ambassadors or Ministers abroad when the King pays a State visit to the country to which they are accredited;

(Note.—A State visit is defined as one on which the King is accompanied by a Minister or High Official in attendance.)

(2) On Members of Deputations of British Regiments to Foreign Heads of States;

(3) On Members of Special Missions when the King is represented at a Foreign Coronation, Wedding, or Funeral; or on any Diplomatic Representative when specially accredited to represent His Majesty on such occasions; and such Members of his Staff who actually attend the ceremonies in their official capacity;

(4) On Naval and Military Attachés only after completion of five years' service at the post to which they are appointed in that capacity.

(5) Private or restricted permission will not be given to—

(1) British Ambassadors or Ministers abroad when leaving;

(2) Members of British Missions announcing the Accession of a Sovereign;

(3 British Officers attending Foreign Manœuvres;

(4) Naval Officers of British Squadrons visiting Foreign Waters.

There is considerably more, but I think I have read enough to show that foreign titles are not to be recognized in this country without the permission of His Majesty, by special request. I see my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) smiles at this. He probably is wearing his decoration without that permission because it may have been bestowed before this order was made. But this document which I have just received from the Department of External Affairs absolutely defines the procedure, and I believe that the Privy Council has the right to decide, when a foreign title is bestowed upon any citizen of Canada, whether or not he shall wear it. If there were no such provision what would be the situation? We have been having a war, though, judging from the amount of attention we are devoting to such trivial matters as the question now under discussion, one would hardly credit the fact. These foreign titles are coming into Canada, and I as a Britisher was amazed to find that on that committee there were men who would support the practice of accepting foreign titles after having denied their own King the right to bestow British titles on Canadians. I was astounded at a proposition of that kind. The hon. member shakes his head, but what I say is quite true.

Mr. PELLETIER: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is making remarks in reference to members who were appointed on the committee. That has absolutely nothing to do with the amendment, which is to refer the subject back to the committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have just taken the Chair this moment, and have been unable to follow the hon. gentleman's remarks. But I understand the hon. gentleman has the right not only to discuss the amendment but to discuss the main motion at the same time.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: When that interruption took place I was about to show the position that we are going to get into if we allow these foreign titles to come in and be scattered broadcast through this country. Where would they come from? They would come from France, Belgium, Italy, Russia and, last and most serious, they would come from Germany itself. Does any hon. gentleman in this House tell me that we are going to allow Iron Crosses to come in from Germany because a man, during the war, has blown up a bridge of the Canadian Pacific or has despoiled His Majesty's possessions in this country? Will any man tell me we are going to allow titles to come in from foreign countries while we deny to His Majesty the right to send them in? That is what will happen if these foreign titles are not shut out. I say that the rein that is placed upon the bringing in of these foreign titles is a very wise provision, and I would be very much surprised if every hon. member does not say that I was absolutely consistent when we were discussing the abolition of titles to say that if any titles are going to be abolished the foreign titles should be the first to get out. I tried to give them a good hard kick in that direction and I think I was right. We would have these foreign titles streaming in here and I think this is a good reason why this committee and this House should take very careful note of what is going on in the country now.

The adoption of such a report as we have before us now would be a very dangerous and serious matter. If we take time, as we have had to take time, for the discussion of this question, I think the time will not be wasted if we come to a wise decision on the matter. I have my opinion of the intelligence and loyalty of any one who is not ashamed to send over such a pronouncement as appears in the Votes and Proceedings of the 14th May although I do not wonder so much at it. It was hard for one to hold himself in restraint while such democrats as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) were overshooting the mark in their attack upon titles.

Mr. McMASTER: Did not the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) say that some of the recent appointments had enraged him?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Not in this debate, and I think the hon. gentleman is out of order in referring to that matter. I want to point out that these democrats who have overshot themselves in this case are absolutely up a tree to-night; there is not a bit of doubt about that. These democrats want to uproot and destroy everything that has been established throughout the ages, and they have put a proposition in that book that I do not believe ten members of this House would like to send to His Majesty, even although my hon. friends say that they approve of it.

In this case why not take the sensible method? The hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie)—and I am surprised at the loss of control of his followers that he exhibited this afternoon—spoke right on the lines that I am endeavouring to speak upon now. I dare say he did it a great deal better than I am doing it, but he spoke right along the same lines. He condemned the report practically from start to finish, but, strange to say, he wound up by saying that although it was a bad report he presumed that he would have to vote for it. I do not think there is any necessity for the leader of the Opposition stultifying himself in that regard. Let him bring before the House a resolution along the lines on which he spoke this afternoon and I will back him up. He made as strong a speech in that direction as I am making, and he was talking sense. He was talking by the book. Let the hon. gentlemen who have treated this subject with so much levity to-night read in to-morrow's Hansard what their own leader said to-day and they will not feel any very great satisfaction that they have succeeded in carrying such a report which, I say, is unworthy.

Let me point out to these democrats that there are other divisions in society than simply those of titles. Let me direct these hon. gentlemen's attention to the dress habit. I have heard parsons say that the terrible finery that goes into the church on a Sabbath Day is the cause of the absence of the workingman from the communion and from the service. Only yesterday I met a man in such a brilliant array that I had to remark upon it. He is a personal friend of mine, and I said to him: "What does all this gaiety mean?" In reply, this democrat of the democrats said that he had been at a wedding. The titled gentlemen are not squeezing workingmen out of the church. I believe they attend fairly regularly; and at least one or two of the members of this House do. If there is any member of this House more democratic, more good-natured, more gentle, than the two or three distinguished gentlemen that we have here, I would like to know where they are. I would rather serve under an autocrat, so-called, with a title, such as we have in this House, than under some of these democrats. I would rather serve under the autocracy of a titled gentleman than I would under the democracy of a so-called democrat who rubs it in on every occasion, and who always insists on getting his own way. That is the kind of democrat we have in this country. Democracy is not advanced by shouting from the platform. It is living the life. Let me commend to these gentlemen who are now engaged in pulling up by the roots all that stands for sound democracy in this country that they should begin, not by the destruction of the things that work for edification and uplift, but that they should begin at the bottom and live the life. That is where the foundation should rest. I am tired of that democracy that is shouted from the platform—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Wait till I get through the sentence—that is shouted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I will take my time. I say I am tired of that democracy which is shouted from the platform but is not ingrained in the life. That is the kind of democracy I do not like. They talk about titles and aristocracy as if they were something to be shunned, despised and kept out. Some of the gentlemen who hold the same opinion as I do are not ashamed of work. They know work, they were brought up to work, and although I am an older man than the hon. member for Kingston or the hon. member for Brome, let me tell them that I will meet them at the woodpile.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I was brought up to work and I am not ashamed of it. It has been one of my best assets all through life; and I have had to struggle for what I have saved. I have made my way like a man, and I am ready to do it both in peace and war.

I have tried to bring up my family in the same direction. I take no credit to myself, it was due to the soundness of my bringing up; I was fed on oatmeal porridge and the Bible, and in my early days I was brought up to work, and I worked as hard, I believe, as any man of my age in this House can say he worked at that time. Therefore, I knew the dignity of labour and I do not despise the workingman. I am a democrat of the democrats when it comes to meeting the workingman, and I am not ashamed to say it. If I can do anything, Mr. Speaker, to lighten the task of the workingman at the present time I am prepared to do it. I have tried to do it during my life. I have tried to carry out that principle when living among my fellowmen and among my workmen, a number of whom I am glad to say I represent here, although they may not all agree with me. I say that I have endeavoured to live that sort of life among them, and I challenge any man to impugn my honesty or my integrity when I say that I think this report should be thrown out—that it is unworthy of this House and unworthy of the committee that prepared it. I tell you, gentlemen, and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that your duty to-night is to see to it that His Majesty the King is not insulted by any such rubbish as is contained in this report; and I hope you will send it back to the committee with instructions to amend it and to intimate to some of the democrats who sit in that committee that you expect, whether the report they bring in goes to the King or not, that such report shall be worthy of the dignity of a committee of this House and worthy of the subject they undertake to legislate upon, and not make—I was going to say foolish men of hon. members here who, I believe, have in them some wisdom as well. I hope that the course I am now advocating will be followed and that the men responsible for this report will be taught that this is not the kind of thing that will make for the dignity of this House or for the uplifting of the democracy of this country. I have much pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in supporting the amendment of the hon. member for East Algoma.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, in August, 1789, when the Three Estates met in Paris it was proposed by one of the members that the titles given to the French nobility and borne by them at that time should be abolished. One speaker got up and made a speech in support of titles, and the privileges of the French nobility, and was as eloquent and as vigorous as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I refer to L'Abbe Maury. He was then the man who sang in the French constituent assembly the swan song of the titles given to the nobility of France; and I think Mr. Speaker, that I can say to-night, without being mistaken, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockshutt) has sung the same song for titles in Canada. I admire the hon. gentleman; I admire the vigour with which he expresses himself, and I admire the robustness of his Toryism; but unfortunately he represents a period which is passing. I was astonished to hear the hon. gentleman talk as he did about the hon. member for Kingston, and to hear him declare that the latter's motives may have been tainted with disloyalty. In making that statement I think the hon. gentleman was carried away by the warmth of his sentiments. He, surely, does not believe that any man in this House could be moved by feelings or sentiments of disloyalty.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I think the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) has mistaken my observations. If I applied any such words as he attributes to me to the member for Kingston, I beg to apologize to that hon. gentleman; I certainly had no such intention. I was making a general remark, and I applied it to nobody as far as I know.

Mr. CANNON: I was sure it was only necessary to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the expressions he used to elicit from him the apology that any gentleman would give to the House and to the hon. member referred to.

I was also surprised to notice that the hon. gentleman omitted from his speech a very important feature of this question, and failed to give us his views on it. What will become of the titles actually borne by the bishops of the Anglican church? According to this report, if I understand it correctly, the archbishops and the bishops of the Anglican church will be deprived of their titles if the report passes. Is that the intention of the gentlemen who composed the committee which sat on this question and made this report to the House? Before casting my vote I would like an answer on that point. I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that the Anglican bishop of Toronto would be very much surprised if this report is adopted, to find himself debarred from using a title which gives him a distinction over a Methodist minister. I think this is a very important feature of the question and one which should be considered very seriously by the members of the House before they record their votes.

Both the hon. members for East Algoma and Brantford declared they were very much surprised to see that upon the conclusion of the war, when the people of Canada have serious problems to face, this Government has not brought forward enough legislation to keep members busy, and that the House has already discussed upon three occasions during the present session the very useless question of titles. Not very long ago, Mr. Speaker, a question of great moment to the people of Canada was introduced here, namely, the question of dealing with our Canadian railways. I can state without any fear of contradiction that the discussion on that question lasted not half as long as the discussion on the present subject, nevertheless, the Government, through the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) invoked the closure against the Opposition. Why should we be allowed to discuss matters of this kind and waste the time of the country while the Government sits there merely listening? I will tell you the reason: it is that the Government is not ready to undertake the problems that await a solution; the Government is not ready to bring down a solution of the reconstruction problems that is demanded; and it would rather have the House discuss questions of this kind than tell us what it intends doing to see that Canada is made a great and united country as it should be. I may be told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the discussion has been long because this question is a very difficult one to solve, and has many aspects and many sides. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that is true, judging by the many sides that several members opposite have taken on this question; and before I cast my vote I would like to be sure that the gentleman who moved the adoption of this report will not vote against it.

I wish to call the attention of the Government to another matter, Mr. Speaker. I think that the moment is ill chosen to ask the representatives of the people to discuss a question of this kind. To-day we know the situation all over Canada. We hear the cry of discontent coming from the Prairie Provinces; we know the situation that exists in Winnipeg; we know that Canada is on the brink of revolution—and the Government does nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CANNON: And the Government asks us to discuss a question of this kind. Mr. Speaker, I think the sooner this Parliament gets down to real business the better, for discussions of the character we have had to-day tend to aggravate the people rather than to content them.

On the merits of this question: Am I in favour or against titles?—my answer is very simple. I am a plain, simple, ordinary Liberal, and I am against titles. I will tell you why.

I think that titles and distinctions in many cases have been nothing but a bait to the cupidity of people, a screen to their infamy at times, and a reward for their servility. The hon. member for Brantford has mentioned the situation which exists in England. I admire the British nobility. It has given throughout the centuries examples of devotion and of self-sacrifice that no other class of people have ever equalled. But, Mr. Speaker, I say that these English people have so borne themselves not because they are dukes, or earls or viscounts, but because they are British people and nothing else.

But if we study the history of the nobility all over Europe what do we find? Take, for example, the noble families of France. If you go back to the origin of many of those families you will find that their titles were obtained very often because the founder was nothing more than the illegitimate son of a king. Turning to England, take the great family of Churchill—a family of which every Britisher is proud. The founder of that family obtained his title on account of the infamy of his sister. Mr. Speaker, those are historical facts. Titles have been used in that way throughout the history of the world, and should we keep them here in Canada?

How and why are titles given here in Canada? The last Emperor of Brazil, Dom Pedro, was a very clever man. In his memoirs he tells us that he had to build a hospital in his capital of Rio, but the Government did not have the necessary funds, so he decided to try the following plan. He sent out a statement to the effect that people who subscribed a certain amount would have their names inscribed in letters of gold on the front wall of the hospital; that the people who subscribed a lesser amount would have their names inscribed in letters of silver; and that the people who subscribed a still lesser amount would have their names inscribed in letters of bronze. When the hospital was built through the money thus obtained, Dom Pedro had the names inscribed, and above he added this sentence: "This monument has been erected to charity through human vanity."

Well, we have before us to-night a monument erected by the Premier of this country, not through the charity of our country, but through the vanity of man. This monument, which we call the Borden Government, is a government that has been bought—that has been built through the vanity of its members. The builders who have contributed the bigger amounts of money will see on the front wall in letters of gold their names, such as those of Sir Joseph Flavelle and Sir Clifford Sifton; the names of people who have done less, but also have done quite a lot, will appear in letters of silver, such as those of Hon. Mr. Calder and Hon. Mr. Rowell; and in letters of brass will be seen the names of Hon. Mr. Blondin and Hon. Mr. Sevigny; and, Mr. Speaker, in letters of chalk, so that they may not remain very long, will be seen the names of Hon. Mr. Crerar and Hon. Mr. Carvell.

I do not wish to detain the House any longer. I admire the convictions of people like the hon. member for Brantford. They stand for the old institutions, for what was very noble. They stand, like the noble people in the French Constituent Assembly, who fought for their king although he was to die. But although we admire these people we have got to combat them, because their ideas are away behind the times. I am in favour of progress, I am in favour of Liberalism, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that the abolition of titles will bring a better state of things in our Canada that we all love.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss this subject upon its merits. Having accepted the honour of a title, I feel debarred, as I stated when the matter was before the House on the last occasion, from taking any active part in the discussion. I desire, however, to state the position of the Government on the motion now before the House.

For two sessions this subject has engaged the attention of this Parliament. Prior to the assembling of this session the Prime Minister requested that the matter be referred to a special committee of the House so that a deliberate and reasoned judgment of the committee and of the House might be had. When the House met the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) placed his motion upon the Order Paper. I saw him about it, informed him of the request which the Prime Minister had made, and I asked if he would be willing that his motion should be referred to a special committee of the House in order that it might have full consideration, with a view later to discussion in the House, and such action as it might be thought desirable for the House to take. He stated that he would consult with some of those who were especially interested in the matter and inform me whether or not he would agree. Later, after giving the matter consideration the hon. member consented to my suggestion, with the result that when his motion, which was that of a private member, was before the House I moved that it be referred to a special committee. I say that in explanation because some reflections have been without warrant cast upon the hon. member for Kingston by reason, as has been alleged, of his changing his vote. He did not change his vote, Mr. Speaker, he carried out honourably his undertaking with me. The disposition of the motion was entirely in accord with parliamentary practice, and it was perfectly open to my hon. friend to agree to it. I make that statement in justice to the hon. member for Kingston.

I desire to say this with regard to the position of the Government: This motion does not involve a question upon which the Government has any pronounced policy, as I stated when the matter was last before the House. The Government, therefore—I desire to make this perfectly clear—makes no request to any members supporting it with respect to the matter; it is perfectly open to each member here, so far as the Government is concerned, to vote as he may see fit. The same remark applies to members of the Government. This is a matter upon which members of the House, and members of the Government themselves, may hold different views, and as it is not a question of policy it is the desire of the Government that the House should express its view freely upon this question—which, notwithstanding what has been suggested by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day, is one of considerable importance. The member for Kingston has brought the question forward for two sessions. His speeches leave no room for doubt as to his earnestness in the matter. It is fairly before the House, and what the Government desires is a frank expression of opinion upon it.

The hon. member for Kingston stated this afternoon that I had requested him to have the report of the Committee submitted to the House at as early a date as possible. That is true, and the Government is willing to assume the responsibility of this matter now being before the House. It was my belief that it could best be dealt with in the first instance by a committee which would consider it in all its aspects. The Committee chosen was one which commanded the entire confidence of the House, and I feel that I should express to all the members of that Committee my thanks for the attention which they gave to the subject and for their promptness in bringing it down for final action.

I have stated that I feel rather debarred from discussing this matter upon its merits by reason of the fact that I have had the honour of having a title bestowed upon me. I feel very much disposed to agree with much of what the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) said this afternoon; there was a great deal of sound common sense in what he said. My own view is that this matter has assumed a disproportionate importance. It is an important question, but I do not believe it is so important, either intrinsically or in the eyes of the public, as the debates in this Parliament would indicate. However, each hon. member is to judge for himself as to that. The chances are that if the academic or abstract question was put to any body of citizens in Canada, or elsewhere for that matter: "Are you in favour of titular distinctions?" the answer would be "No." But I submit that is not a fair test. The question is, what would the answer be if the matter could be fully discussed and considered with and by those people? It seems to me that the real test that should be applied by the House of Commons is this: What is in the public interest? So far as individuals are concerned, they need not be considered. Whether this or that or the other citizen receives a title is of minor consequence; the true principle upon which this House should proceed is: What is in the national interest? Is it wise that titular distinctions and all that they imply should be abolished? My own view is that there is not and should not be objection to the principle of titular distinctions; but I do believe that the circumstances surrounding their bestowal are of utmost importance. I think that in all the British-speaking countries the bestowal has been on altogether too generous a scale and has not proceeded upon the principle that it should have proceeded. I believe that if the question of bestowal had received more careful consideration in the past by all Governments in Canada, this question would not be before us to-night.

I am not going over the ground which has been so ably traversed this afternoon with respect to the propriety and advantage of distinctions. But I submit this: There are men in this country, and in other countries of the Empire—in fact, in all the countries of the world—who give very distinguished and very valuable public service without reward, in the money sense, such as comes to those who attain success in other callings.

I do not say that to those men a knighthood would be an incentive. To the best of them, I do not believe it would; to some of them it might. I do not believe that men who serve the State put forth their effort with any idea that they are to be rewarded by a title. On the other hand, I do believe that men who have put forth effort of the greatest advantage to the public, who have served the State for long years—the Prime Ministers of this country, for example—should receive some distinction as a mark of the State's appreciation of their advices. Take the Prime Ministers of this country. Take Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and a Provincial Premier, such as Sir Oliver Mowat. If the question had been submitted to the people whether these men should be deprived of their titles, there would have been an overwhelming vote in favour of their being allowed to retain them; the people would say: These men are entitled to have their public services marked by the conferring of titular distinction upon them. Appreciation encourages men. I do not believe that men who serve the State—men such as those I have mentioned—are at all inspired to effort by any hope of titular distinction.

But I do believe they are encouraged to go on in their work by the conferring upon them of a distinction which marks the appreciation of their services to the State. After all, men are only boys grown up. As has been pointed out to-day, at school, and in college, and on the battlefield, and in campaigns, there is no doubt that prizes are looked upon as rewards and do stimulate to effort. More than that, they encourage further effort. Personally I fail to see the distinction which is made between the awarding of prizes, military medals or other decorations to soldiers and distinctions to men in public life or in some other walks to which I shall refer a little later on.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would ask the Acting Prime Minister if this does not involve the question of precedence and, therefore, become a class distinction and not a decoration.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that just in a moment. Who will say that the Cross of the Legion of Honour has not always powerfully appealed to the French soldier, to inspire and to stimulate him to effort? Who will say that the Victoria Cross has not powerfully appealed to British and Canadian soldiers? The principle of conferring distinctions for action that is unselfish, that is altruistic, that is for the benefit of the people, is a sound one. I am the first to admit the very great difficulty in the matter of bestowal of titles and, as I stated before, I think it has been the unwise, too wide bestowal of titles and particularly the conferring of hereditary titles that has caused this question to be more or less of an issue in this House. But in public life, and also in the world of science, of literature, and of philanthropy, it is very much in the national interest that some means should be open to the Government—because the responsibility belongs to the Government—to mark the nation's sense of appreciation of distinguished service rendered in those fields, and if the bestowal of titles could be confined to that class, I do not believe the people would raise any objection. It has been put forward here that many distinguished citizens of Canada have been offered and have refused titles, but that does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that titles should not be granted. It is open to any citizen in this country to refuse any title offered to him. As the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) suggested this afternoon, it is a matter of the point of view, and I am sure many gentlemen who have refused titles would not necessarily take the view that the principle of the bestowal of titles is unsound.

With regard to hereditary titles, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I concur in the report of the committee, but I have grave doubt whether, from the standpoint of national interest, this report as it stands to-day should be adopted by this House. I am speaking, not as leader of the House in the absence of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), but simply as a member of Parliament expressing my individual view, and I do not desire to be taken as speaking in any other capacity. My view is that the report of the committee as it stands is too sweeping, I think the Prime Minister of Canada advanced the matter as far as it should be advanced when he caused the Order in Council to be passed, which was brought down last session and which has been referred to in this debate. That is my individual view, and that is all I desire to say at the present time to the House

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this question before the vote is taken. Before, however, referring to the question under consideration, I want to enter an emphatic protest against an expression used by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) who spoke before the acting Prime Minister. In referring to the troubles in Winnipeg and other parts of the country, he said that this Dominion was on the brink of revolution. That is going entirely too far, and I do not think the actual circumstances in any respect warrant such a statement as that. It is perfectly true that a very large body of men are on strike in the city of Winnipeg from which I come, and it is also true that some very unreliable, untruthful and improper reports have been sent from that city by way, I think, of the United States. Emphatic denials have come with regard to the reports, and we learn, from Government sources, that the situation is thoroughly in hand; that the constituted authorities are in command, and that the situation is steadily solving itself, so that I do not think the country need be unduly excited over the situation as it exists either in Winnipeg or in any other portions of the Dominion.

With regard to the subject under consideration, I think that too much emphasis has been laid upon the point that a great deal of the time of this Parliament has been consumed in the discussion of this question. It is perfectly true that last session we occupied considerable time in discussing the matter in Parliament, and during the present session we have also spent some time, but I dissent from the view that it was entirely misspent time. If the Prime Minister of this country had taken the position that the Acting Prime Minister has taken this session, the question would have been disposed of in perhaps two or three hours, and I believe it would have been satisfactorily disposed of, because the House was almost unanimously opposed to the granting of titles. But the Prime Minister who had the question under consideration with the home authorities staked the existence of the Government on the issue, and many of us on this side of the House, although we were very much in earnest in regard to the abolition of titles, felt it would be undesirable that the country should be plunged into a parliamentary crisis on a question of perhaps subordinate importance, at least, a question that could wait for solution until a later time. That was the reason why the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), myself and some others declined to take the responsibility of overthrowing the Government on the question of titles.

Then the question came up at the present session, and the resolution was again introduced by the hon. member for Kingston as it was introduced by the same hon. member last session. Last session I moved as an amendment to his resolution, which dealt only with hereditary titles, that all titles should be extinguished. At this session, when the hon. member for Kingston introduced his resolution, he adopted my amendment of last session which provided for the abolition of all titles, inclusive of hereditary titles. I had given some study to the question, and I came to the conclusion that there might be a constitutional difficulty so far as the British authorities were concerned if the few hereditary titles that exist in the Dominion at the present time were extinguished or if an attempt were made to extinguish them immediately.

So I conceived the idea of moving an amendment at the present session that these titles should expire with the death of the holders. That amendment has been implemented or embodied in the resolution of the committee that is before the House to-night, and that is the method that is being adopted. The Acting Prime Minister when he referred to the hon. member for Kingston as having agreed to allow his motion this session to stand until the matter might be inquired into by a committee, might also have stated, had he thought of it, that he discussed the matter with myself before the vote was taken and indicated to me the course that he, as Acting Prime Minister, purposed to take. The hon. Acting Prime Minister nods his head, in acknowledgment of the accuracy of my statement. I decided to follow the lead of the hon. member for Kingston, and naturally came in for a considerable amount of criticism from a few of my "friends"—if I may be permitted to put the word in quotation marks—and when I rose to vote in the House I was jeered at by certain members of the Opposition. However, on the principle that he laughs best who laughs last, I felt I could afford to endure the contemptable sneers from a few insignificant characters, if in the end the object that we who are opposed to titles had in view, was attained. I could not help feeling that although the matter could have been summarily disposed of, the fact that it should be referred to a special committee which would make a thorough inquiry, might, after all, furnish a stronger reason in the minds of the masses for the adoption of such a report as is embodied in that before the House to-night. I have no particular reason to change my view in regard to that.

I want for a moment to call attention to the report itself, because there are some members of this House who some days or weeks ago were in favour of abolishing all titles, and in two or three cases they have now expressed some doubt because they were persuaded by the eloquence of our good friend the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard?. En passant I must say how greatly I enjoyed the oration which he delivered this afternoon. It was wonderfully dramatic and in some respects moving, but it had, in my judgment, very little bearing upon the real issue. He tells of certain worthy people who received distinction at the hand of the King—if you call it a distinction—by being knighted. But the point that we who are opposing titles in this House have in mind is that while it might, as the hon. leader of the Government said, be excused in certain cases, it has been so scandalously misused in Canada as to become an offence in the nostrils of the people. And I want to say to any of my good friends who may think of voting against this report of the committee, that they had better pause and consider the effect of their vote, not necessarily on their political position, but on the country at large. The country on the whole is deeply disturbed, and perhaps that is quite natural following so great a war as we have just passed through. But times have changed, in my judgment; and however much the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) or other hon. members may deplore the fact, a change has come over the spirit of the dreams of the people of this Dominion, and the democracy is not only being ushered in, but it is in fact ushered in. And in my opinion such a step as we propose to-night could not fail to be effective in appeasing this uneasy public opinion. The abolition of these social distinctions could not fail to have a beneficial effect. Now, let me for a moment, for the purpose of putting the question fairly before any weak brethren—if I may be allowed to use that expression—read what the report actually says, because I think there may be a misapprehension on the part of some members, who, as I said, were probably over-persuaded by the eloquence of the hon. member for South Toronto. Paragraph (a) reads:

(a) To refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of your subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

That paragraph means the extinction of knighthoods, C.M.G.'s, and C.B.'s. C.M.G.'s and C.B.'s are merely steps in the ladder to knighthood, and in coming to the decision which it reached, the committee only aimed at extinguishing such titles as placed a prefix to the name of the recipient, and we felt that if we voted against the conferring of knighthoods we ought also to abolish C.M.G.'s and C.B.'s, and made a clean job of it. That is the object of that paragraph. I need not discuss the paragraph with regard to the abolition of hereditary titles, because the House seems to be unanimously agreed that they must go. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) waxed, I think, unduly eloquent, or perhaps unduly warm would be a more accurate description. They indulged in statements of much more warmth than one would expect from either of them with regard to the alleged titles of "Right Honourable" and "Honourable," and the statement was made that the members of the committee were to be censured for not recommending the abolition of those two distinctions.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON: My hon. friend from Brantford says, "Hear, hear," so he agrees with my statement of the case. According to my recollection of the situation—and I would like hon. gentlemen to particularly note the point—the reason we did not touch the distinctions "Honourable" and "Right Honourable" was that these are authorized by the British North America Act, and are conferred by virtue of a provision in that Act. So that the committee, and indeed this Parliament, would have no power to deal with them, and the House will agree with me that it was particularly desirable that we should refrain from recommending the abolition of these two particular appellations. Paragraph (4) says:

Your committee, however, do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations, such as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty.

I want the House to be particularly clear with regard to the position of the committee in this connection. We refrained absolutely from interfering in shape, form or manner with military distinctions and decorations which might be conferred for valour upon the field. We had before us the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) who gave the committee very valuable information. He addressed the House this afternoon and it is possible that he left the impression that the committee had not been as fair with the military profession as it should have been. However, I want to assure the House that the committee was scrupulously careful not to interfere in the slightest degree with the conferring of distinctions upon naval and military men. That will relieve the committee from any blame or censure in this respect. I want to deal with the question of foreign titles, to which my friend the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) referred to a few moments ago, I shall not say with eloquence, but rather with undue heat, and I believe that even he will agree with me, as I am sure the members of the House will, that he did not present the case with perfect accuracy, when I state the facts as they are. Let me first read the clause of the report dealing with that matter.

Your committee further recommends that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to provide that hereafter no person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada shall accept, enjoy or use any title of honour or titular distinction hereafter conferred by a foreign ruler or government.

I may explain how that came about. The committee had no warrant to deal with the matter of foreign titles. It had come before the Cabinet in a certain manner and they referred the question to our committee for a decision. There were a number of members of the committee who, like myself, felt that inasmuch as the reference of the particular questions to the committee did not embody that point the committee should not deal with it. I was one that took that ground, and after some discussion the matter was ruled upon by the chairman of the committee. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) thought it came within the jurisdiction of a committee appointed to make a general finding and be so ruled.

The hon. member for Brantford indicated with great warmth that the members of the Committee were actually in favour of foreign titles being received by Canadians. I want to absolutely dissent from that statement, and I think in doing so I shall be borne out by all the members of the Committee. Excepting himself, there was not, according to my recollection, one single member—I see the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) agrees with me—of that Committee who took the view that foreign titles should be received into this country. It was merely a question as to whether or not we should deal with the matter. The position taken by the hon. member for Brantford entirely falls in that regard.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: There was an amendment moved by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and afterwards we were asked to get together, which we did, and we framed the resolution which was passed.

Mr. LEVI THOMPSON: I want to say that the statement made by the hon. member for Springfield is absolutely correct—that there was no member of the Committee expressed himself as in favour of continuing foreign titles.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: You moved an amendment.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I did.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I do not wish to suggest that the hon. member for Brantford desired to deliberately misrepresent the case, but he got carried away with the sound of his own voice and the enthusiasm of the moment, and I think he consequently misrepresented the position of the committee. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) will make a statement later and I am sure he will endorse my description of what happened at the committee. The hon. member for Brantford told us here with great enthusiasm that he had got from the Under Secretary of State this afternoon a statement that Parliament had nothing to do with foreign titles, anyway, and that no one in Canada could receive or wear a foreign title without the permission of the King. If that be so there can be no possible objection to that particular clause in the report being adopted. Anyway, it leaves the matter to the Government to deal with in some proper manner later on. If the permission of the King must be received to accept or wear a foreign title, we need not worry very much about the existence of that clause in the report.

What I want to impress upon hon. members is that the report embodies nothing but what has been generally accepted at one time or another by the majority of the members of this House since the question was brought before it last session, and during the present session. Under the report hereditary titles are to be extinguished on the death of the holders and knighthoods are to cease from the present time.

The hon. member for Brantford spoke of the insult that was offered to the King by addressing him in the manner proposed in the report. As a matter of fact, the King has really no responsibility, although he finally "does the trick," in connection with these titles. The recommendations for titles are made by the Prime Minister of the day. No doubt the whips and the corporations may have considerable influence on the Government of the day in reference to the conferring of titles. But the King should not be charged with the responsibility. This is the only way that this House has of putting an end to what we regard as an improper practice, as a practice which has led to very much heartburning throughout the country and which, I believe, is not in the general interest of the public, a belief which I am convinced is shared by the great mass of the people of the country. The members of the House should have clearly in their minds the point upon which they are voting when they come to record their votes in a few minutes. Members need not worry at all about foreign titles when the King is the supreme authority in that regard. The committee only made a finding in regard to it because the matter was referred to it by the Government. We have absolutely guarded the military ranks in this country. The two things we have done are, first, to recommend the ending of hereditary titles and, second, to recommend the ending of knighthoods. That is practically all that the members are asked to vote upon.

I think that this country owes a considerable debt to the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) for his courage and pluck in bringing this question before Parliament and for the ability and care which he has displayed in presenting the case on the different occasions that it has been brought up in this House. I resent the reflection of the hon. member for Brantford, although he has explained it, in saying that there was something disloyal behind this attempt to wipe out titles in this country. Doubtless there are many little cross-currents in evidence, but I do not think there is anything sinister behind this movement against titles; I am quite sure that the hon. member for Kingston, who sent two of as brave boys as this country has produced overseas to fight the battles of Canada in the great war, is not influenced by any sinister or improper motives. On the contrary, I think the hon. gentleman interprets the feeling of the country very clearly with regard to this question. It may be that many members think that we have devoted too much time to its consideration, to the exclusion of other matters which they regard as of greater importance. I repeat, however, that it is a question that means a great deal to the people of this country, and in the long run I believe that if titles are abolished, as this report proposes, we shall have done a good day's work for Canada, and the time which has been devoted to it will not have been spent in vain.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the position of the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), who said that members who regard this question lightly will probably discover that they have made a great mistake when they come to discuss it with their constituents, and when they find what the real feeling actually is throughout the country with regard to it. I believe that is a fair statement of the situation. While the people are not perhaps especially excited, still I believe that if this issue could be referred by a plebiscite, uninfluenced by other considerations, to the entire population of Canada, it would be carried by the enormous majority of twenty, thirty, or fifty to one, because people generally, I reiterate, are sick of the institution of titles and the manner in which they have been misused by the governments of the day since Confederation.

There is one other point to which I wish to refer before resuming my seat. I read a letter in the press the other day, and I want to give a brief extract from it to the House. The writer says:

> What chance is there outside of an aristocracy for the development of the following virtues: Modesty, truthfulness, sincerity, regard for the feelings of other people, genuineness—what chance has any one of them in the fierce competitive struggle of democracy? Not the smallest. They get choked out—stifled in the crowd, killed.
> Proof—take our Toronto or Montreal crowds—a necessity. We Canadians-born believe that a nation—not a mob, but a nation—should have one part of its population in which such things can be preserved.

I shall not enumerate the list, but I invite the House to recall and scrutinize the galaxy which holds the doubtful honour. I would not like to be understood as saying an offensive word against the gentlemen as a class who enjoy the doubtful distinction, as there are undoubtedly some excellent and deserving men upon the list. Hon. gentlemen, however, no doubt recall the reasons for which many of the decorations were conferred by the governments of the day.

If the virtues of modesty, truth, sincerity and tenderness are to be found only in the ranks of our belted knights, and especially if these virtues which should be universal are mostly confined to that limited and interesting collection of citizens, then I think, with all earnestness, we should invite you, Mr. Speaker, when at the opening of each session, you invoke the Almighty to save the King, to also implore the Deity to include the country as well.

In Canada titles have not been generally distributed because of the possession of the qualities of genius, or because of any distinguished service to the country but largely because of political services rendered to this or that party or corporation, whose conduct may have been glaringly inimical to the best interests of the people.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I shall not occupy more than one or two minutes in discussing this matter, and I would not take that much time were it not for the fact that it so happened I was not present when the debate occurred last year on this matter, nor was I in attendance when the debate took place on a former occasion during the present session. The hon. members for Springfield and Brome paid very high tributes to the hon. member for Kingston for his courage in bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I would not for one moment wish to be understood as reflecting in any way on the courage of that hon. gentleman; but if the statements made by the three hon. gentlemen referred to are correct, that eighty or ninety per cent of public sentiment is in favour of the motion moved by the hon. member for Kingston, the thought occurs to me that it requires little courage to move such a motion, but it does require some courage to express opposition to it. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) in the course of his remarks intimated that it would be a grave mistake for this House not to pass this report because of the effect it might have on the prevailing situation as indicated, for instance, in the city of Winnipeg, and that it would add if anything to the unrest which is exhibited in that city at the present time. I happen to have in my hand a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press. That clipping gives an account of a meeting held by the Great War Veterans in Winnipeg, and I quote in answer to the statement made by the hon. member for Springfield, an expression of opinion by one of the Veterans, named Captain Wheeler, who said in reference to titles:

> "What do we care about titles," declared the speaker, "what we want is a chance to live properly and to know that we can be able to buy food for our wives and children at the lowest possible price."

Apparently, if we are to take the words of that gentleman as any guide, the people of Winnipeg are not very much concerned about the question of titles. Furthermore, I express my own opinion, which, of course, may be wrong, when I say that I think there is very little concern in the country with regard to this whole matter; I think the people generally are very little concerned about the question of titles.

I do believe that opinion throughout the country as in this House is practically unanimous in regard to hereditary titles; but I do think there is a difference of opinion in regard to the granting of other titles. Personally, I do not believe in the granting of these titles at all, and in so far as Canada is concerned, I think we can get along very well without them. But they have been conferred upon men in this country,—some of whom have been mentioned by previous speakers, and I rather incline to the view that the public generally were pleased rather than otherwise, not that the title of "Sir" was conferred upon John A. Macdonald or Wilfrid Laurier, but that the head of the British Empire took a means of signifying his appreciation of the services of men of that type. But titles have been conferred rather promiscuously, and I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the wealth of the individual apparently has had a good deal to do with the matter, although there are notable instances in this country of titles having been conferred on men who are not by any means wealthy.

I think the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) expressed the situation very well indeed; at least, my view coincides with his. It has been stated, and this is one of the things that appeals to me, that the King does not confer these Canadian titles except on the recommendation of the Prime Minister of Canada. If that is true, why not address the opinion of this House to the Government of this country? Why address it in the form of a demand to be placed before the King? Is it that the House believes that an expression of opinion addressed to the Prime Minister would be ignored by him? I do not believe for one moment that the Prime Minister would ignore the opinion of this House addressed to him in the words of the motion asking for the adoption of this report; and if he did not ignore such expression of opinion, there would be no recommendations made to the King asking for titles to be conferred on Canadians resident in Canada, and consequently no titles would be conferred.

After all, there are two parties to this question; there is the party here in Canada, and the party over in the Old Country. There are different sentiments in the two countries. I feel inclined to respect the sentiments of the people in the Old Country, although I do not agree with their views in regard to titles. But, while I am willing to vote for any resolution expressing the opinion of this House as against the granting of hereditary titles or titles of knighthood, I do not think we should go beyond that and place our opinions in the form of a demand that the King should take this or that action. I have the greatest respect for those who hold a different view in regard to the matter. If it comes to a vote I am going to vote against the adoption of the report for the reason I have stated. My opinion may be misrepresented, and there may be some who will say that I am in favour of the continuance of titles in this country. Very well; I am willing to take my chances in regard to that, notwithstanding the remarks of some hon. members that it was as much as one's political life was worth to take that course.

I repeat, Sir, that in my view we should be perfectly within our rights in expressing the opinion of this House that it was in conformity with the sentiments of the people of Canada that hereditary titles should not continue to be conferred on Canadians resident in Canada. I believe that such an expression of opinion would get us just as much as we would obtain by placing a demand before the King and saying: "We want you to do thus and so." That seems to me to be a rather harsh way of treating the matter.

Distinctions have been made even in the resolution. I know, of course, that many object that it is undemocratic to have certain men in this country who are known as "Sir This" or "Sir That." I do not approve of it myself. But if they want to play with that sort of a trinket, why, all right; I do not think the public cares very much about it one way or the other. But if it is improper and undemocratic that I should address a gentleman in this country—who has had a knighthood conferred upon him—as Sir,—and really I cannot treat him courteously unless I so address him—then is it democratic for my friends, the hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Brome—both lawyers—when they go into the court room bowing and scraping to the gentleman on the bench to say, "May it please you lordship" or "Your worship this" or "Your worship that," or "Your honour this" or "Your honour that?" Of course, to suggest that that is undemocratic, or that it is undemocratic to refer to the dignitaries of some churches as "My Lord Bishop," I suppose, would be carrying democracy a little bit too far. But to be perfectly consistent, I cannot see why one should object to my speaking to John Jones—if he has been knighted—as "Sir John," if it is proper to refer to a judge on the bench as "Your lordship."

Nor do I think that it is altogether consistent that we should make no effort to do away with the titles of "Honourable" and "Right Honourable." Of course, it is true that those are titles which may come to some honourable gentlemen in this House, if they reach the height of their ambitions, —and no doubt they are worthy of holding those titles—and we would be lacking in courtesy if we did not address them as "Honourable" or "Right Honourable."

I repeat, Sir, that I believe the sentiment of Canada is opposed to the granting of titles; but I think we will be going as far as we should go in taking action on this matter in this House if we give expression to that opinion and carry our request to the Prime Minister or to the Government.

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not much sympathy with the contention, which has been made a number of times this evening, that time has been wasted in the discussion of this matter in the House. I have always had the idea that the people elect representatives to come to Parliament and to take whatever time may be necessary for the discussion of matters that come before them. If the Government was criticised during the last session of Parliament for one thing more than another, it was on the ground that sufficient time was not given for the discussion of matters which many members wanted to discuss. I took the ground this year that Parliament should be called as early as possible and should sit as long as members wanted to sit and should discuss matters of public interest affecting the people.

I am rather inclined to agree with the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that there is not the demand for the abolition of titles in Canada that some people think there is; still, I do believe that if the proposal were put to a vote it would carry by a large majority. I believe that the sentiment of Canada is against the conferring or retention of these titles. I am opposed to them—not, perhaps, from the standpoint taken by some hon. members, but as a matter of principle. I do not believe that the aristocracy of Great Britain during the last thousand years has been the advantage to the country that some people have tried to make it out to have been. One had only to go to Great Britain before the war—and the condition would be much exaggerated since the war—to see the great gulf that existed between the classes and the masses. What has been the origin of all the social revolutions that have taken place in Great Britain since the repeal of the Corn Laws if it has not been the fight between the classes and the masses; if it has not been the fact that the aristocracy were arrogating to themselves rights and powers and privileges which were considered by the common people as inimical to their best interests, and taking to themselves rights which the common people believed they were being deprived of? The principle upon which I shall vote on this question is this: I do not want to see that condition of affairs built up in Canada. It has been admitted here by all sides—I am not blaming one political party more than another—it has been admitted by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), that there has been an abuse in connection with the granting of these titles during recent years. Many men have received them who, perhaps, are not entitled to them; and were it not for that abuse, I assume that this matter would not be under discussion to-night. Personally, I have no objection to a man receiving a distinction from his sovereign who had become a great inventor or a great scientist, had contributed something to the uplifting of the world, had been honoured by being made Prime Minister of his country, or something of that kind, because in nearly all these cases the distinction would be actually conferred by the sovereign or by the ruling power as a reward for what the recipients of the honours had done. But we might as well get down to the ordinary condition of affairs and realize that where there was one of that class there would be a dozen whom the King did not know at all and about whom he cared nothing. The King has nothing to say about it, except in these few outstanding cases. People are made knights because they want to be made knights; because they have sufficient influence with their political friends, or in some other way. After all, Mr. Speaker, the recommendation for the creation of a knighthood in Canada comes from the Prime Minister, from the Government.

Mr. MARCIL: In all cases?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I think in all cases, although there may be some outstanding exceptions. I have no doubt that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the present Prime Minister, after being elevated to the Premiership, received their titles direct from the King. But in the great majority of cases it is the building up of an aristocracy because people want to become the aristocracy; and that is the principle I am opposed to.

In a sense, I am sorry to see the matter before the House in the shape it is. It has created a good deal of feeling; there has been a good deal of discussion about it. I was afraid, on coming into the Chamber just before six o'clock—I had not been able to listen to all the debate—that in some way the report of the special committee, if adopted, would ask the King to refrain from granting military distinctions. I listened to the member for Edmonton, and immediately got a copy of the report and read it over; but I saw nothing in it to bear out that contention. Evidently the committee deliberately avoided expressing any opinion derogatory to the granting of military decorations; and that is as it should be. They have asked the King—and that is only the manner of asking, because really the request goes to the Government of Canada; they have asked the powers that have the right to recommend these distinctions to refrain from granting hereditary titles. That everybody agrees with. Secondly, they have asked them to refrain from granting ordinary knighthoods—about that there seems to be some difference of opinion. I have no feeling against any gentlemen who have accepted titles in the past, or who might accept them in the future, because that is largely a matter of individual opinion. But holding the views that I do, believing that the creation of a privileged class is not in the best interests of a country like Canada, and having regard to the fact that the question is before Parliament for the expression of its opinion, I intend to vote against the amendment and for the adoption of the report of the Special Committee.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken up any of the time of the House had it not been for the rather serious reflections and insinuations made by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) against the other members of the Special Committee. I felt, as the hon. member was speaking, that he was rather telling tales out of school that might better have been kept quiet. However, I would not have minded had the statements been correct. In referring to other members of the Committee and to those who were opposed to him, the hon. gentleman used the term " disloyalty " over and over again. He apologized so far as the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) was concerned, but he evidently still considers the rest of us as disloyal—and every other person who opposes him on the question.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not think the hon. gentleman is justified in making that statement. I pointed out that there were four threads that held us to the Empire and that the cutting of those was an element of disloyalty. If the hon. gentleman did not cut any of the threads he certainly does not come in that class.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: The hon. gentleman has no right whatever to impute disloyalty to me, even if I did believe in all the things he says—which I do not. He has no more right to impute disloyalty to me than I have to impute disloyalty to him because he holds an opposite opinion. This talk about disloyalty is getting threadbare; it is a shame that that cry should be used in this House in connection with the discussion of any question that comes before it. Any cause which has to be supported by talk about disloyalty is a pretty weak cause; it is only because of the weakness of the cause my hon. friend supports to-night that he uses that cry.

The hon. gentleman tried to leave the impression with the House that the members of the Committee who were opposed to him on most questions that came before the Committee were in favour of those foreign titles being received. Not a word was said in the Committee that would justify that statement. In support of his statement, he says that I moved an amendment. I did move an amendment, which the hon. gentleman himself accepted and put into his motion. If you saw his motion here you would consider it unworkable—a rather strange looking motion. I do not think he would care very much to quote it himself.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Has the hon. member got it?

Mr. L. THOMSON: My hon. friend was very willing to accept it. We were told that this resolution which we proposed to submit was an insult to His Majesty. It was a resolution addressed to His Majesty asking him to refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction and so on, but my hon. friend says he supports the amendment which provides that we ask His Majesty or demand of His Majesty:

> To provide that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to ensure the extinction of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, dignity or title, as a peer of the realm, on the death of a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada at present in enjoyment of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, and that thereafter no such title of honour, titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, shall be accepted, enjoyed or used by any person—and so on. It is a tremendous insult to His Majesty to say: We do not want you to confer knighthoods, but it is all right to say: You must not confer peerages on Canadian citizens. It just shows how hopeless a case my hon. friend has when he brings forward such absurd arguments. One thing is undignified and insulting, while another thing, absolutely the same, if not a little worse, is all right. I do not propose discussing this question, because it has been pretty fully discussed. Like the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) I do not know that there is a tremendous agitation in regard to this matter, but notwithstanding that, I believe the general public think that we should act. I am not saying that I believe a lot of time has been wasted in this House, and I do not purpose wasting any time myself, although I have noticed that the members who spoke most about wasting time took up a good deal more of the time of the House than they needed to do, and I do not intend following their example. I am following rather along the line of what the Minister of Public Works said, and the reasons given by him are my reasons, and for those reasons, I purpose voting against the amendment and for the resolution.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make just one or two observations before the vote is taken. The question of hereditary titles is not open for discussion at the present time; that question was settled more than a year ago. The Order in Council which was passed by the Government and submitted to the House expressly set forth that no hereditary title of honour shall hereafter be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, and further provides that:

> Appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period no title of honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada shall be recognised as having hereditary effect.

That Order in Council sets forth the most advanced position which any Government in this country had, up to that time, taken on the question of titles in Canada. Those provisions were approved by the House, and that decision has been communicated to the Imperial Government, so that both Government and Parliament are committed to that policy in relation to hereditary titles, and I am sure that appeals to the judgment of the people of Canada.

Referring to the question of knighthoods, while there may not be the same unanimity as there is on the question of hereditary titles, I believe the overwhelming mass of the people of Canada have reached the conclusion that it is not in the interest of the country as a whole that further titles of knighthood should be conferred. I think they have reached that conclusion on very sound grounds. The Minister of Public Works and other hon. members have already spoken on the subject, and I shall not repeat their arguments. I do not believe it is consistent with the democratic conditions prevailing in a country like Canada that we should continue to mark in this way certain men, no matter how honourable, no matter what distinguished service they render; for experience has shown us that we cannot limit it to the few men whom every one would recognize as properly entitled to be so marked. From our experience, I believe we must reach the conclusion that it would be wise to discontinue that policy in the future. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Edmonton West, and if I understood him aright he pointed out that under the report as printed it would interfere with the conferring of military distinction. If that is true, I should like to see the report amended so that it would not interfere with conferring any distinctions, decorations or titles upon men who had served in the present war, my reason being that large numbers have already been so recognized, and further, I know of some who have been recommended for recognition. The matter came before the Government some time ago, before this House met, and the Government wisely and properly declined to take action until this question had been considered by a Committee of the Whole House. Personally, I cannot see why military men who have already received recognition should stand in a better position than those who have earned but have not yet received such recognition. Some may say: No military men should receive recognition. All I am suggesting is that they should all receive the same consideration. I must vote against the amendment because it says that we should continue to confer knighthoods on citizens of this country. I should be glad to vote for an amendment that would refer the report back to the committee to amend it so as to make it clear that it would not interfere with recognizing men who have served in this war and would put those men in the same position as those who have already received recognition, but if no such amendment is proposed I shall vote for the report.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few words, not of argument, but rather of explanation. I was a member of the committee appointed to consider this question, and as I was not able to concur in the report, perhaps it is not objectionable that I should offer a few words of explanation why I was not able to agree with my colleagues. On the question of hereditary titles there is practically no difference between us, and I take it to be the view of this country and of this House that, neither on the recommendation of the Government or without it, and neither on the recommendation of the Prime Minister or without it, so far as this House has any influence, shall any hereditary title be given in Canada hereafter. I take that to be the meaning of the report, and on that I presume there is no difference of opinion.

Coming now to the question of titles generally, I have assented to the views of the majority on that question, but not without some hesitation and reluctance. I do not concur in the views of my hon. friends who claim that as a matter of principle the granting of these titles is wrong. In the earlier years of Confederation, in the years before Confederation, when honours of this character were granted but seldom, and always granted to men of undoubted distinction, there was no public opinion against them. Nobody found fault with the conferring of honour, say for example, on Sir John A. Macdonald or Sir George Etienne Cartier, although I believe in the beginning there was a little cause for jealousy and trouble. It is historically known that when Mr. John A. Macdonald received his knighthood Mr. George Etienne Cartier was offered a minor honour, and that this caused trouble and jealousy and an uncomfortable situation. Mr. Cartier resented it and Mr. Cartier's friends resented it more freely. In the end Mr. Cartier received a consolation of a higher prize, in the form of a baronetcy, than that received by Mr. Macdonald. The authorities had ascertained that Mr. Cartier was not blessed with a son and that, therefore, the title would not last long. Beyond a little jealousy of that character I do not think there was any manifestation of public opinion against the granting of these honours so long as they were granted rarely and for services of undoubted merit.

It is only when in later years—and I am not speaking now of one party or the other—these honours were offered in greater abundance that any question began to arise concerning them. I think if we look over the list from A to Z, of the men who have been honoured with knighthood there will be found the names of a great many gentlemen of eminence and of long public service, men of distinction, with the recognition of whose merits no one can find fault. Indeed, nearly all on the list will be found to be honourable and estimable men. But when you ask yourself the question, why was this or the other particular man honoured, you find yourself in a quandary. True, some one who is honoured may be an honourable man; but there are thousands of honourable men all around him in the community. True, he is estimable, but there are estimable men in his neighbourhood in the same line of business, and of equal distinction, who receive no honour. As time went on and these conditions continued, there began to develop an opinion against knighthoods. It will be said with some force that the abuse of anything is no valid reason why you should abolish it; but the opponents of knighthood have argued with equally great force that if the system should continue the evils will coexist with it; because if the appointments are made by the Government or on the recommendations of the government of the day it is inevitable that they will be characterized by favouritism of some kind, political or personal. These considerations, I think, have led to a considerable volume of public opinion against these honours. I do not think the country is at all excited about the matter, as some hon. gentlemen seem to think, but there is considerable public opinion against it, and for that reason, with some reluctance, and not as a matter of principle, I have concurred in the view that, as respects knighthoods,—an adverse recommendation should be made. If I could have an opportunity of voting on these matters separately, if there were submitted a question concerning hereditary titles, I should undoubtedly vote against such titles, but I shall not have that opportunity. And if I could have the opportunity of voting distinctly on the question as it relates to ordinary knighthoods, I should with some reluctance vote against those titles. But I shall not have that opportunity either. Now, why did I differ from the committee? I thought that whatever public opinion there was in the country—and I am not magnifying it—had relation to hereditary honour and what is called ordinary knighthood. Public opinion did not concern itself with anything beyond that; why then should we do so? Why should we worry over C.M.G.'s, C.B.'s, and I.S.O.'s, which no one in the world except very few knows the meaning of? I doubt whether very many ordinary men know the significance of "C.M.G." It is a badge of honour and distinction, but five out of six men in the street, generally speaking, could not tell you what C.M.G. and C.B. meant. And if it pleased His Majesty in the ordinary course to make somebody a C.M.G. or a C.B. I see no reason why we should break our hearts over the fact. It may be that these two honours, C.M.G. and C.B. are steps in the order of knighthood, one in the Order of the Bath, and the other in the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and I suppose that if these orders generally were marked with disapproval, these minor honours would also be regarded with disfavour. But I do not see why we should worry about it. Then there is the I.S.O.—The Imperial Service Order—given sometimes to old public servants. I could not tell you all who have it in Ottawa, but it never hurt any one. I do not see why minor honours should have entered into consideration at all.

Now we come to foreign titles and decorations. I was not present in the committee during all the proceedings, and during my absence some resolutions were reached which I did not concur in. But very naturally and properly they were carried into the report of the committee. If it suits any foreign authority to grant a mark of distinction to any citizen of Canada, which distinction does not carry with it the title of knighthood, I do not see why in the world we need object. These honours come seldom, being most frequent in the case of the French Republic, and a number of our fellow-citizens have had conferred upon them the Legion of Honour. I do not think we should seek to prevent any one from receiving such an honour if it pleases the French authorities to offer it and the recipient to accept it. Whatever public opinion there was on the subject was confined to hereditary titles and knighthoods, which involved the prefix, "Sir." Beyond that I do not see that there was any demand, and I do not think there was any need for the committee to present to the House a report concerning these things. The committee reported according to their judgment, and I am not finding fault with them. I am merely stating my own views. And inasmuch as I believe that there was no need for a consideration of these minor honours, I cannot agree in that, and I dissent from their report.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of that committee and voted in support of the various resolutions which form the report now before the House. I have not changed my mind and shall vote in favour of the adoption of the report. It is not the time or the place to split hairs, Mr. Speaker. The committee by a very large majority adopted the report. I think there were only three members opposed to the broad principle embodied in it, and the last speaker was not one of them. The committee adopted the report after a full discussion on the matter, and the principle which was at stake was whether or not in Canada we should put an end for the future to any class distinctions. The committee almost unanimously decided that we should do away with all attempts at maintaining in this country any class distinction whatever. Sir, we are not living in Great Britain. If we were, I would understand that perhaps members of the House might have some diffidence in the matter. There they have a different civilization and a different tradition as regards these distinctions. For my part, I wish to pay my respects to the British nobility. I know what has been the role of that nobility in history and how well it has behaved during the recent war. But, as I say, we are not in Britain; we live in Canada, in a democracy, and at the present hour, in view of what is taking place in the country, I do not know that Parliament could do better than abolish all class distinction. Some hon. gentlemen have spoken about military decorations.

I am not opposed, Mr. Speaker, to military distinctions, such as the V.C., D.S.O., or the Military Cross, but I am of the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) that if you are going to give decorations to the higher officer you are creating again an invidious distinction between that officer and the modest, unassuming private who went over the top. The private is as much entitled in this war to any decorations, any distinctions as the higher officer.

Mr. MANION: I never said a word about decorations; I said knighthoods.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Sir, in this war the private was a knight, in my judgment, as much as a colonel, the major, or the general. They were all knights and if you make a distinction, I say that the greatest knights of all are the dead. Where are the decorations for the dead? Wooden crosses! Reference has been made by the hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and he made it with that chivalrous spirit which generally inspires his thoughts and actions in this House and outside of it. As a matter of history, it is well that we should know how it came that my late leader became Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is of record that in the campaign which preceded the election of 1896, at a meeting held in Ontario, Sir Wilfrid Laurier made the famous declaration; "I am a democrat to the hilt." After he became Prime Minister, the Queen's Jubilee took place in England and he was deputed as the representative of Canada on that occasion. He had not altered his views; he had not changed; he was, as ever, a democrat to the hilt. But how could he refuse the honour, the distinction, when, without being consulted, on taking his seat at Windsor Castle, as one of His Majesty's Privy Councillors he found his title in front of him. That is the history of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's knighthood. If he had been consulted he never would have accepted it, but if on the other hand he had refused on that occasion it would have been looked upon as a lack of courtesy on his part. But, as we all know, he was a grand gentleman. The manner in which the honour was conferred upon him on that occasion reflected his modesty, his true chivalry, and at the same time his devotion to the interests of Canada. But let me give here another instance from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's career. It may throw light on what took place on the occasion to which I have just referred. It will show, Mr. Speaker, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier always was a democrat to the hilt in the sense he meant when he made that declaration prior to 1896. It is not known to the members of this House, it is not known to the public, but in the history of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which is being written at the present time, it will be made public. On one occasion, perhaps on two, but certainly on one, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was offered a peerage and he declined it. That was the spirit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The true democrats of this country can well look up to him as a guide.

I do not intend to say anything more on the subject. The problems that confront us are very serious indeed. I do not know that it is wise policy on the part of this or any Government to make a last-ditch fight for the maintenance of those titles which in the past have been so lavishly distributed. I have in my mind some titles which were given not very long ago and which shocked the public conscience, titles given to men who had no right and no claim to them. I am positive they were given without His Majesty knowing anything about them. They were the gift of the whips of the parties; that is all. They were given to these men because of some consideration. It has been stated publicly in England over the signature of responsible parties that titles were offered before general elections for a consideration. Why should we perpetuate that system in this young country of ours? Public opinion is absolutely opposed to any class distinctions in Canada, and the people will hail the result of the vote that we take on this question to-night.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I submitted was drafted hurriedly. I have another here the phraseology of which is a little better. I do not know whether I will be permitted to substitute it. It does not change the principle of the amendment in any sense.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is an amendment before the House and it is technically in order. What the hon. member asks is that he may put the same substance in better form. That can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. I will read the altered form of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for East Algoma:

That the report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Special Committee with instructions to amend the same by striking out paragraph (a) of the proposed Address to His Majesty, and by striking out all the paragraphs after the said proposed address, and by adding the following paragraph to the report of the said Special Committee:—

"That in making recommendations to His Majesty for the conferring of knighthoods or other titular distinctions upon persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada the greatest care should be exercised in the selection of the persons recommended, and that special regard should be paid to the personal merit and the distinguished services of the said person."

Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have permission to substitute this for the amendment proposed?

Mr. NICKLE: If no other hon. member desires to speak, I should like to exercise my privilege of closing the debate. I may say that this afternoon I have found myself in the position in which Mr. Storey, later Judge Storey, found himself after he had been appointed to the Supreme Court bench. In his earlier years he had drafted an Act of Congress that was considered by him as a model of perfection. He felt assured that no matter what attacks were made upon it, it was impossible that ambiguity would arise in reference to the legislation of which he had been the author. But in later years when he had risen to the Supreme Court Bench, cunning lawyers, in arguing certain questions before him as being applicable to the Act that he had drafted, so confused him that he said that he hardly understood what his own legislation meant, and he found himself almost unable to interpret it. That is very much the position in which I would find myself to-day if I were to lend myself to the cunning arguments which have been submitted against the report. They have attacked it from every point, from the point of view of logic in this way, from the point of view of logic in another way; they have criticised it on the ground of loyalty and they have criticised it on the ground of inconsistency.

I would not care at this late hour to say very much in reference to the attacks that have been made, but I do not think, in justice to myself, that I can allow a personal remark which was made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) to pass unnoticed. It was a remark that cast the imputation upon me of having been inconsistent in my conduct and vote in this House on the 14th of last month.

The hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) has certainly been most courteous in giving to this House an explanation of what occurred, and I may say that the explanation given by him is correct in every detail. When I introduced the resolution into the House at the first of the session it remained on the Order Paper for a somewhat protracted period until my attention was drawn to it by the Government. A few weeks prior to the discussion, the acting leader of the Government asked me if I would be prepared to take a fair, non-partisan and representative committee which would consider and discuss in a judicial manner the involved and difficult points covered by the resolution. I told him that such a committee would be acceptable to me. I explained the position to those who were supporting my motion and I had their concurrence in the arrangement.

I was amazed the night the debate took place on the 14th of April, when suddenly a political situation developed, and I found myself confronted with this difficulty: I had to take a position that certainly would be construed by the country as being inconsistent, or I had to break my word to the leader of the Government; and there are some things that a man of honour, even when faced with the likelihood of severe criticism, must consider, more particularly when the breaking of his word would mean the breaking of a Government. I had pledged my word, and those who were behind me had pledged their word, that we would accept that committee. Men had left this House and gone to their homes for their vacation—the Easter vacation I think it was—believing that a committee was to be accepted; and it would have been the rankest perfidy, the rankest treachery on my part, if, when I found the Government of this country in a precarious position, I had not kept my word to a man whom I had known for twenty years and who in all that time never in the slightest tittle deviated from that which he had promised me. That is my explanation of the vote I gave that night. I used the wrong word in saying the word "explanation." It is not an explanation; it is a reason for the vote I gave that night. I had told the right hon. leader of the Government that I would accept that committee, and I had told many men who spoke to me in reference to the matter and had asked me if there would be a vote, that the matter would be referred to a committee, and would finally be discussed in this House free from being considered as a party question.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to know why it was, under those circumstances, that the resolution was introduced in the way it was, and why in it the committee was not recommended?

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. NICKLE: The resolution had been on the Order Paper for some seven or eight weeks. That length of time elapsed, if hon. gentlemen will remember, before the resolution was debated. I had simply to take it as it was, before I was permitted to know what the conclusion of the Government was. Then the offer of a committee was extended to me and I accepted it as a fair solution of the difficulty. It may have been badly managed, I am not making any defence in regard to that; I am simply endeavouring to make it clear to the House that the Acting Prime Minister kept his faith with me, and I kept my faith with him.

Mr. CAMPBELL: You did not intimate in any way that there was such an arrangement.

Mr. NICKLE: I am not saying for one moment that certain gentlemen did not find themselves in an awkward position; not for one moment am I arguing that.

An hon. MEMBER: You did not care.

Mr. NICKLE: Yes, I did care. I do not know what riding the hon. gentleman represents who said I did not care. I cared more than most men think, and I would never have spoken if the matter had not been brought up in this House to-day—my lips would have been sealed.

Now, Sir, I want to direct the attention of the House not to a personal matter, but to the issue which is before us. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) spoke this afternoon with marked eloquence—an eloquence which shook the House, and shook the argument that I had advanced in favour of the resolution that I had introduced. It was a remarkable effort. But was the hon. gentleman consistent? He waxed most eloquent in criticising the language in which the report was drafted. He said the language was an insult to His Majesty. He shook with vigour, and with feeling, as he denounced the arrogance, if I might use the word, that prompted the Committee to say that His Majesty should be approached to provide that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise, to ensure the extinction of titles. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) shook with similar indignation this afternoon when he approached the subject in the same way; and the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) trembled with indignation as he approached the matter from the same point of view. In imagination I could see His Majesty shrinking back as this terrific and terrifying resolution was presented to him for consideration, and I said to myself as these gentlemen spoke; "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel." Because I remembered that in 1918, on May 21st, the right hon. leader of the Government moved his amendment to my then resolution and the very gentlemen, who shook with indignation this afternoon and evening, voted for exactly the same language that the Prime Minister put in his motion as the language that I put in the resolution which I submitted this afternoon. The resolution of the Prime Minister which carried in this House in 1918 read thus :

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly petition Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon your subjects domiciled or living in Canada.

And so on, and so on. The division took place on that resolution, and is recorded at page 2448 of Hansard, and among the names recorded in favour of that resolution I see the names of Edwards, Cockshutt, and Sheard. When I drafted this report—because my hand was known in the drafting of it—I used the very language that the Prime Minister used so that an imputation could not be cast upon me in this House that I had acted in a disloyal manner. Because I have heard, not only in this House but outside, that there was an element of disloyalty in approaching His Majesty and asking that a certain concession be made that the Canadian people wanted. Where is the disloyalty in making any such approach? Is the monarchial institution so weak that it cannot stand by virtue of its worth? Do the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this House want the House and the country to understand that the attachment between Canada and the Empire is so weak that it cannot be preserved except by the maintenance of titles of distinction? I do not believe it. I do not think this country believes it, and I do not think the members of this House believe it. Five hundred thousand men did not go to the Front and sixty thousand of them do not lie in Flanders fields because they hoped to win distinction; they went to the war because they were moved by patriotism; they went to the war called by a sense of duty. And I say it is an insult to the memory of those men to say that titular distinctions is the tie that binds the Dominion to Great Britain. Titular distinctions probably have no effect in binding the Dominions to the Motherland; but it is that warm bond of sympathy, the sentimental tie, that unites the Empire that covers all the seas and has made it so strong in the face of a mighty foe.

I want to say a word or two more. I want to say a word or two in reference to something the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said this afternoon. He is a magnificent debater. The flow of his language, the vigour of his intellect, the rhythm of his sentences, carries you along in a majestic flow. But what did he say this afternoon in the House? Not content with his marked abilities, not content with being the premier debater of this House, he used this afternoon in reference to me these words, and I did not rise to my feet at that time because I could hardly believe my senses when I heard the member for Red Deer speak as he did.

He said:

> I cannot, the way my mind is framed, concur in anything which is the embodiment at once of democratic cant and illogical nonsense. We are asked to concur in this report and recommend in one paragraph His Majesty to abolish all titular distinctions in Canada and retain the titles Honourable and Right Honourable, which I contend by any fair interpretation of the English language are themselves titular distinctions.

"Democratic cant"! Am I not to be regarded as being as sincere in advocating the abolition of titles as the hon. member for Red Deer is to be thought sincere in maintaining the position that free trade would be a sound economic principle for this country to adopt? If I cannot get all I want in one bite, am I to be thought any more insincere than he because the Government may give him something, but possibly not all he wants? Does he not realize that no well-matured policy, no great advance in public affairs is made by jumps? Progress is made little by little in any great reform; and I say to the members of the House to-night who are asked to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for East Algoma that a subterfuge is being cast about the issue. It is not a question of whether this thing or that thing, in reference to logic, shall be the determining factor. The question is, shall this House or shall it not stand for what the people of this country want? The people of this country do not want titles continued. The hon. member for Frontenac has said that they do not want them continued, yet he shrinks back in horror from the vote. Why?

Because he thinks His Majesty may be insulted. And yet last year he voted for a resolution couched in exactly the same terms. The member for Red Deer says that it is illogical nonsense. There never was a more logical committee than the committee that sat to deal with titles, honours and distinctions. Let us draw the veil aside and see what happened. The committee met and there was no question as to hereditary titles and their extinction; on that we were agreed. The next point was in reference to knighthood; on that the vote was 17 to 3, if I remember correctly. The next vote was on the minor classes of orders, and there the difference in the vote was not quite so marked—I do not know exactly what the vote was. The committee adjourned, and at the next meeting the hon. member for Red Deer raised the question that the titles "Honourable" and "Right Honourable" should go if we were to be consistent. I said to him, "If you believe that, put it in the form of a resolution, and submit it to the committee, and let the committee vote upon it." The hon. member for Red Deer did put it in writing, and this is his resolution:

Mr. Clark moved: That this committee is of opinion that in case Parliament finds it expedient to abolish titles in Canada, steps must necessarily be taken to see that no citizen of Canada resident in Canada wears henceforth the prefix 'Honourable" or "Right Honourable."

What happened? If the committee had accepted that they might have gone outside the reference, for the reason that the prefixes "Honourable" and "Right Honourable" did not form part of the subject matters that had been particularly discussed in the House. But if the committee had accepted that amendment I have no doubt whatever that the members who were opposed to the action the committee had taken on knighthood and the orders would have steadily pressed, and pressed, and pressed, one resolution after the other until they had reduced the whole thing to an absurdity. It would not have made any difference where you drew the line. No matter where it was drawn, imputations of being illogical and absurd would have been cast upon the committee. The committee were extremely logical. They said: "The subject matters that were before the House and the country were hereditary titles, knighthoods and the various classes of the Orders, and that is as far as we are going to go in the matter. And there they stopped. Therefore I submit, Sir, to you and to this House that there was nothing illogical in the action of the Committee in voting on the question of the titles of "Honourable" and "Right Honourable."

Mr. M. CLARK: Will my hon. friend permit me to ask a simple question? Is the term "Right Honourable" before a man's name a title?

Mr. NICKLE: I should certainly consider it a title. Now, another question has been raised, and by the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), who was also a member of the Committee. I must admit that I am a little lost in following his argument. He starts out with a burst of eloquence, stating that the King confers titles, and yet last year, at the instance of the Prime Minister, he voted for a resolution ratifying an Order in Council that distinctly and emphatically declared that the King no longer should confer honours except on the advice of his ministers. In other words—

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Might I correct my hon. friend? I said "the King surrounded by his constitutional advisers," and I do not want those words left out.

Mr. NICKLE: It makes very little difference which way the hon. gentleman puts it. I am quite willing to take it as he now expresses it. If he puts it that way the loyalty cry is exploded and gone.

Now I come to the question of foreign titles, which came before the Committee in this way. I, as Chairman of the Committee, received from the President of the Privy Council this letter:—

Dear Mr. Nickle,—

By direction of Council I enclose herewith a copy of a communication from the Secretary of State with certain enclosures relating to titles. It raises the question of residents in Canada accepting titles from other sovereigns.

There was also enclosed another letter from the Under Secretary of State to the President of the Privy Council, directing the attention of the President of the Privy Council to the fact that a foreign dignitary had offered a title to a Canadian citizen, and the opinion of the committee was requested in reference to the matter. Now, what happened was this. One of the members raised a point of order, that consideration of that question was out of order. But the fact that the matter had been referred to the committee by the President of the Privy Council, and that the reference read this way, made the chairman reach the conclusion that the matter was not out of order. Here was the reference:

It referred to the committee various things, together with the question of conferring honours, titular distinctions and decorations upon subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, including those who had performed overseas, in Canada or elsewhere naval, military and civilian services in connection with the war.

In the resolution there was no limitation as to the conferring of titles being restricted to British titles, and it was therefore ruled that the matter could be discussed by the committee. What was the result?

On motion of Mr. Cockshutt it was resolved that inasmuch as this committee has decided to recommend that no further titles or orders be conferred by His Majesty the King on Canadians, the committee is opposed to the acceptance by Canadians of titles or orders from foreign rulers or governments.

And yet the member for Brantford stands in his place to-night and says that he is prepared to vote for an amendment that negatives the very resolution that he prepared in the committee. O! consistency, thou art a jewel.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go for it.

Mr. NICKLE: And the member for Brantford jocularly spoke of the wedding guest clothed in luxuriant wedding attire. But I wish to draw attention to the fact that the gentleman who was clothed in wedding attire always wears his attire on State occasions while the member for Brantford appears similarly attired on all occasions.

Now, Sir, I want to go further—and I must speak quickly because it is getting late.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go for it.

Mr. NICKLE: The member for Algoma directed my attention to a few things, particularly to the irregularity, as he saw it, of the words, "professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office," being used in subclause (a) of the first paragraph of the report. Let us see what is meant and decide if this report is or is not regular. Does the member for Algoma know that when a lieutenancy is given to a man and he gets his commission, it is issued in His Majesty's name? Does he know that when a man is appointed a notary public for the purpose of taking oaths his commission is issued under the name of His Majesty? Does he know that when a man is appointed to any judicial position his commission is issued under His Majesty's name? In the name of common sense how are you going to make an exception unless you use language to express your idea? The committee was perfectly consistent in the report. Let me read it to the House. I leave out the preamble:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty—

And in passing may I suggest to you, Sir, that I do not see anything in the nature of a demand when you say that you humbly approach His Majesty.

—praying that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased:—

(a) To refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of your subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

What does that mean in plain language? It simply means that the committee recommended to this House to pass an Address asking His Majesty to refrain from conferring titular distinctions on his subjects domiciled or living in Canada, but that that should not stop His Majesty from issuing commissions appertaining to such appointments as a lieutenancy, a notary public, or a judgeship. There is nothing out of the way in the reference; it is a sound and proper expression of an idea, and I am rather surprised that the member for East Algoma took the position that he did to-night.

I wish to revert for a moment to the member for Brantford; I cannot leave him altogether without a few remarks. He professes to speak for his constituency, and, if I understood him aright, he endeavoured to lead the House to the conclusion that his people were not interested. I hold in my hand a telegram addressed to the Chairman of the Titles Committee, Ottawa; as follows:

Resolved that this Brantford trades and labour council strongly resent the attitude of W. F. Cockshutt in the granting of Imperial titles to Canadian citizens and repudiate the insinuation that Brantford workingmen were not opposed to the same. The above council represents 1,487 Unionists.

A. G. Brown,
President.

I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House to decide just who speaks for the riding of Brantford.

When my attention was first directed to what I considered a wrong in this country, I determined, if my weak efforts would bring about a reformation, to do what I could to secure a reform. I brought the question into the House last year in reference to hereditary titles. I stated at that time that if an amendment were moved and if I thought the sentiment of the people warranted it, I would support a resolution to do away with all titular distinctions. The Prime Minister took the position last year that as the Government had stated its policy in an Order in Council, he was not prepared to go further than the Order in Council went; and the inevitable happened—the House sustained the Prime Minister. This year I again introduced the subject; and I told you at the beginning of my few remarks just what happened when the matter was discussed in this House on the 14th of April. I said that evening that I had approached this matter with sincerity; that I wanted results, not notoriety. I am just as sincere in the advocacy of the principles that I am enunciating here as other men are in their advocacy of principles on the floor of this House, and I expect from them exactly what I am prepared to accord to them—recognition of my good faith, and of my desire at least to carry out a reform as I see it. As I have said, a gulf lies between the position taken by myself and those who support me and the position taken by the member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard). I believe that the granting of these titular distinctions is pernicious, and that it has a bad national effect. The member for South Toronto says: You are wrong; the principle is all right; it is the method employed in granting these distinctions that has brought about the grievance you decry. This House to-night has to decide which way it is going. It has to make a decision that will probably regulate and influence our national life for the next fifty years, because if the House decides in accordance with the amendment moved by the member for East Algoma, the probabilities are that there will be such a flood of titles that the flood-gates, once opened, cannot be closed for years. There is no use in trying to camouflage the issue; it is clear-cut and well defined. The issue before the House and the country to-night is this: Is the Parliament of Canada in favour of titles and titular distinctions being granted to Canadians? You cannot hide this thing any longer under a veil of mystery. The question that has to be decided is this: Are you in favour of giving to any Government the right to denominate who shall have titular distinction? If you are, vote for the amendment submitted by the member for East Algoma. If, on the other hand, the members of this House are consistent in standing by the principles that they have enunciated in times past, then I ask them to stand by the report of the Committee. In my judgment, that report honestly expresses the intention of the Committee, honestly expresses the wishes of the people; and its adoption will be not only a step forward, but also the attainment of a goal in doing away once and for all with a pernicious principle in this country. If this report is adopted Canada will take the position she should take—that, being a true democracy, she is opposed to priorities and personal recognitions and declare that all men are equal and that what is good enough for one man is good enough for all.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nickle) sits down, I wish to ask him a question.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the consent of the member for Kingston.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Does the member for Kingston permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Why did the member for Kingston, as chairman of that committee, carry that telegram in his pocket for two weeks, and not produce it before the committee instead of before this House? He informed me that it was going to be filed with the documents; I want to know why he did not produce it before the committee.

Mr. NICKLE: That is a very fair question, and deserves a straight answer. I showed the telegram to the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) within half an hour of receiving it. At a meeting of the committee I directed the attention of the committee to the fact that I had received the telegram; but my practice in life has been never to go gunning except when the game is in sight.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Nicholson (Algoma East), which was negatived on the following division:

Motion (Mr. Nickle) that the report be concurred in carried on division.

Mr. NICKLE: I move:

That the said Address be engrossed.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is not worth while engrossing it and we should not spend the money on it. I suggest that it be not engrossed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. NICKLE: I move:

That an Address be forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General, praying him to transmit the foregoing address of this House to His Majesty the King, in such manner as to His Excellency may seem fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the Throne.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. NICKLE: I move:

That the said Address be engrossed, and presented to His Excellency the Governor in Council by such members of the House as are of the Honourable the Privy Council.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not altogether sure as to whether the motion previously passed that the address be engrossed is not sufficient——

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will permit me to conclude my remarks. I submit the motion because I believe the hon. member is following the usual form.

Sir SAM HUGHES: As I am a member of the Privy Council I must respectfully decline to have the House or any other body dictate to me what I shall do with any address.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Does the hon. member want to be a pallbearer?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I respectfully refuse to have my name put on any such address.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisk).

EMPIRE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What Senators and Members of Commons went overseas in 1917 as representatives of the Canadian Branch of the Empire Parliamentary Association?

2. Were the Senators and Members of the Commons who made the trip selected by a vote of the members of the association? If not, how was selection made?

3. Were any of the expenses of these gentlemen paid by the Canadian Government? If so, what was the amount paid in each case?

4. What was the total cost to Canada of the trip?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government has not this information, but I understand the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), who is chairman of executive of the Empire Parliamentary Association, will be able to supply it.

Sir HERBERT AMES: As chairman of the executive of the Empire Parliamentary Association, I may perhaps give the House the information that is called for by this question. The Empire Parliamentary Association is a voluntary body composed of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada. Every member of both Houses is eligible for membership, the main idea being the entertaining of visiting members of Parliament and other governing bodies from other parts of the British Dominions. The delegation that went over in 1917 was composed of ten members, of whom four were senators and six were members of the House of Commons. The four senators were Hon. Mr. Landry, Hon. Mr. Dennis, Hon. Mr. Belcourt, and Hon. Mr. Ross. The six members of the House of Commons were Sir George Foster, Mr. J. E. Armstrong (East Lambton), Mr. W. F. Nickle, Mr. E. N. Rhodes, Mr. W. E. Knowles, and Mr. F. H. Shepard. These members were selected at two meetings of the Empire Parliamentary Association at which it was first decided that there should be four members from the Senate and six from the House of Commons.

The four senators then chose their members and the members of the House of Commons chose theirs. They were chosen with geographical representation in view, three from Ontario, three from Quebec, and three from the Central and Western Provinces. One minister was invited to go as chairman. Sir George Foster was supposed to represent the Dominion as a whole. That constituted the ten. The three from the Western Provinces were Mr. Shepard, K.C., British Columbia; Mr. W. E. Knowles, Saskatchewan, and Senator Ross. The members were the guests of the British Empire Parliamentary Association of Great Britain and their expenses, from the time they left Canada until they returned, were paid through the courtesy of the British Empire Parliamentary Association. No expenditure whatever was made by the Canadian Government in respect of this trip.

PROHIBITION.

BILL TO CONFIRM ORDERS IN COUNCIL PROHIBITING IMPORTATION, MANUFACTURE AND TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister), Bill No. 107, to confirm the Order in Council of the 24th day of February, 1919, prohibiting the importation, manufacture and transportation of intoxicating liquors, and the Order in Council of 12th day of April, 1919, in amendment thereof, was read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Burrell.]

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Newton W. Rowell (President of the Privy Council), Bill No. 116, to amend the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 12 midnight.

Friday, May 23, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

THE DEBATE ON TITLES.

PRIVILEGE—MR. EDWARDS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, during my temporary absence from the Chamber last evening the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) stated as a fact something which was not a fact, which seriously reflects on me, and which I desire to correct. During the course of the few remarks I made last night I stated that I would not have taken any of the time of the House had it not been for the fact that I was absent last year when this question came up for discussion and that I was not here this session when the debate took place. In his speech the member for Kingston said—I shall quote, of course, only those remarks which refer to myself:

> The member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) trembled with indignation when he approached the matter from the same point of view.

I pass from the matter of trembling "with indignation;" that is not worth paying attention to. He said further:

> "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel." Because I remembered that in 1918, on May 21st, the right hon. leader of the Government moved his amendment to my then resolution and the very gentlemen, who shook with indignation this afternoon and evening, voted for exactly the same language that the Prime Minister put in his motion as the language that I put in the resolution which I submitted this afternoon.

The hon. gentleman, to make assurance doubly sure, referred to the page of Hansard on which the division is reported. He said:

> The division took place on that resolution, and is recorded at page 2448 of Hansard, and among the names recorded in favour of that resolution I see the names of Edwards, Cockshutt, and Sheard.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I was not in Ottawa on May 21, 1918; that my vote is not recorded in any division that occurred in the House on that date, and that my name is not in the division list to which the hon. member refers. I may add that at the foot of the list is this statement with regard to pairs:

> The Chief Whips announce that there are no pairs on the foregoing division.

So that the statement made by the member for Kingston with regard to my voting on this subject is absolutely incorrect. I regret that under the rules concerning privilege I am not permitted to go further and say what I would like to say.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the Acting Prime Minister any news from Winnipeg?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Minister of Labour and the Minister of the Interior arrived at Winnipeg the night before last, and yesterday were in conference with the authorities and the several parties concerned. I have no report from them to-day with respect to which I could make an announcement to the House. I understand that the situation is as it was so far as order is concerned; and we have gathered that there is reason to be hopeful of an early settlement.

Mr. CAHILL: There was an item in yesterday morning's Citizen concerning the Winnipeg strike, dated at Fort William, May 21, which said:

> Last night it was announced that General Ketchen has decided that when the moment had come for a show-down, he would send out the street cars through the city under armed guards with instructions that any attempt at interference was to be met with rifle and machine-gun fire.

Has the Government any knowledge of such instructions being issued to General Ketchen? Is this cold-blooded murder being planned——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHILL: ——with the knowledge of the Government?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): I can say quite sincerely that no such instructions have been issued to General Ketchen, and that no such information has been given out by him. General Ketchen is in command of the Winnipeg Military District, of which Fort William forms a part. His instructions are very minute and very definite; I have been in daily communication with him. I am glad to say that the militia units in Winnipeg—— the 90th Regiment, the 79th Regiment, the 100th Grenadiers, the 106th Regiment, the Fort Garry Horse, and the 13th Battery are completely filled up with volunteers, with plenty of reserves available in case of trouble. In addition to that, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are on duty in Winnipeg. The troops in Winnipeg have not been called out, but they are available, and if they are used in case of riot they will act entirely in conformity with the Militia Act, in aid of the civil power. General Ketchen is on the job and ready for any emergency. Specific instructions have been given to him, and he is perfectly well aware that troops will not be, as they never have been, used as strike-breakers.

IMPERIAL GUARDS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: I have noticed that in the press a rumour is gaining ground of late that a new military force is to be created under the name of the Imperial Guards, in which units from the various Dominions will be included. Is the Canadian Government in accord with that policy? Is the Department of Militia taking part in the movement?

Major-General MEWBURN: The Government have no official knowledge of the matter referred to; all I am aware of is what I have seen in the press. A Commission has been sitting in the War Office regarding the post bellum reorganization of the British army, to which I referred when the Main Estimates were under consideration. There has been a suggestion, though it has never come to us officially, that in the reorganization of the Imperial army a Guards division might be formed, to include battalions representing some of the overseas dominions. If such a military force were organized the men would be voluntarily enlisted in the Imperial service. I have asked for some information regarding the article I saw in the public press.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If there is to be any such organization I suppose the Canadian Parliament will hear of it, and it will be the subject of legislation?

Major-General MEWBURN: The moment I have any information I shall be very glad to give it to the House.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Major-General Mewburn (Minister of Militia), Bill No. 118, to amend the Militia Pension Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—"rank" made to include temporary brigadiers and honorary rank in case of non-combatant.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister give a general outline of the purport of the Bill?

Major-General MEWBURN: I referred to this matter on the resolution the other night. This Bill is really in conformity with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Pension Act. We found it necessary to make one or two amendments to the Militia Pension Act in order to take care of conditions that have arisen on account of the war. Under the present Militia Pension Act, officers and non-commissioned officers could be pensioned compulsorily only after twenty years service. During the war we have obtained through promotion from the ranks from 117 to 120 commissioned officers, and in the reorganization of the permanent force, there are more officers than there is room for in the establishment. A large number of officers have served over twenty years and some over thirty-five years, and the object is to permit the pensioning of officers and non-commissioned officers after ten years' service. This also brings the rank and file into conformity with the officers, permitting the rank and file to retire voluntarily, but officers can only be retired compulsorily. That is, an officer cannot retire voluntarily if his services are required. This is to enable us to pension a number of senior officers so as to make room for a number of men who have obtained their commissions overseas.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—period of service during war to be counted for pension purposes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not have this clause read so that every year served in the war shall count the same as two years in time of peace?

Major-General MEWBURN: I would certainly have no objection to that. As I explained the other night, the present Pension Act provides only for officers seconded in the public service of Canada, and it was doubtful whether officers of the permanent force who had been given leave of absence in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, as that force was simply a temporary extension of the active militia, could come under this. In the former Act provision was made for men who had served in the South African War, or the Yukon, that the time they had served there would count for pension. This is simply to say that men who have served in this war shall receive the benefits of the Pension Act. It has been suggested that men who have served in the present war should be allowed to count double time for their service. It is for the Committee to say whether the service given by these men in the present war should count double time for pension or not. If that were done, it would mean that section 4, which refers to the officers, and section 7, which refers to non-commissioned officers and men, would have to be amended by inserting the word "double" in each section.

Mr. REDMAN: I think the point just discussed by the minister is very well taken. It may be doubtful whether recruits will be immediately obtained for the permanent force in the numbers required unless some inducement is provided, and the very best class of recruits that can be secured for that force will be those who have had some years of active service overseas. With that in view, as well as the idea of doing justice to those particular members of the permanent force who have done service overseas, I move to insert the word "double" before the words "the time" in the first line of paragraph (f) of clause 4 and also in the first line in paragraph (f) of clause 7.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment in regard to clause 7 will have to stand until we reach that clause.

Mr. FIELDING: I would suggest that if the substance of the hon. gentleman's amendment is approved, the drafting be committed to the law officers of the Crown, because I do not think the form in which he has put it will effectively serve his purpose. There is, in connection with that, this thought: Have we not already passed legislation of this character in regard to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and I also think some other branches of the Military Service? We had before us one or two Bills of this character. I am merely suggesting that what is done in the one case, it is probably desired to do in the others.

Mr. ROWELL: The Bill which has already passed relating to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police provided that time served overseas should count as time in computing the pension.

Mr. COOPER: Do I understand that this clause will refer only to active service in this war and not to future wars of the Empire, and also that it applies only to doubling the time officers, non-commissioned officers and men actually served in the field?

Major-General MEWBURN: The section referred to in the original Act stated the period of time for the purposes of the Act, and then it went on to describe what the service was, including the South African war, the South African Constabulary, the time served in taking over the fortifications in Halifax and the Yukon Field Force.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the object and what was the effect of this? Is the idea to increase service so as to enable these men of the permanent force to be sooner retired?

Major-General MEWBURN: The object of the general amendment is, as I have already explained, that under the present Pension Act officers, non-commissioned officers and men could retire only after twenty years' service. Owing to the war, from 117 to 120 non-commissioned officers and men have been given commissions in the field, and in the re-organization of the force, it is an utter impossibility to take care of all these officers. The result was that we considered it advisable, in the interest of the country and the public at large, that we should be enabled to retire some of the officers after ten years' service.

They are all paying into the pension fund and can receive pension only on the ratio of the number of years of service. This will enable us to carry that proposal into effect; otherwise those non-commissioned officers and men who got commissions on the field on returning would have to revert to the non-commissioned rank, which would be unfair. The question is whether a man who has served in the war for two years or four years as the case may be, should count double time, and if a man who had never been in the permanent force but has now joined it should have the benefit of the time he had served in the war in the computation of his pension. It is now suggested by the amendment that service in the war should count double time.

Mr. CROTHERS: What are the officers, who are now part of the permanent force, entitled to by way of pension under the Pensions Act? I understand that these are officers that are employed in the city of Ottawa.

Major-General MEWBURN: No.

Mr. CROTHERS: It does not include them?

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not think there are more than five. They get one-fiftieth for the actual number of years served. All these officers pay into the pension fund 5 per cent of their pay and are now entitled, under the present terms of the Act, to 1-50th per annum for each year's service, but can only be retired after twenty years. The point is, shall those who retire after ten or twelve years' service do so on the ratio of the number of years they have served?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The statement was made some time ago that this concerned only the permanent force. As I understand it, time will be doubled for the man who is not of the permanent force as well as the man of the permanent force.

Major-General MEWBURN: If he joins the permanent force.

Mr. NICKLE: I think the Committee should approach this matter with considerable deliberation and not be stampeded.

Mr. CARVELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: I may be wrong, but if I understand the principle of the Pension Act, 5 per cent is supposed to be paid in by the officer towards a certain fund and when he has served in the permanent force for twenty years he is entitled to 20-50ths of the pay he was receiving on his retirement. If he continues for twenty-five years and is promoted he gets 25-50ths of the amount, and so on, up to but not exceeding 35-50ths of the salary to which he was entitled at the time he should be retired. Let us see for a moment what the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary signifies. In the first place, I submit that it is out of order, because I have a distinct recollection of a similar motion having been ruled out of order when moved to a Bill as it would increase the public expenditure. If I remember correctly, there is a provision in the British North America Act or in the Rules that all Bills for the expenditure of public money must emanate from the Government and that it is not competent for any private member to move an amendment to such a Bill, if the result of the amendment will be an increase and not a decrease of expenditure. Certainly the effect of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary would be to increase the expenditure. If double time is to be given to each man for the time he served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the pensions would be increased. That would involve an increased expenditure and therefore the motion is out of order.

But let us look more carefully at the matter. I think that under Order in Council No. 1595—it may be No. 1596, I am not just sure of the exact number—all members of the permanent force were to be incorporated, so to speak, in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, with the result that every member of the Canadian Permanent Force affected by that Order in Council became, ipso facto, a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The net result of the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary will be that every single member of the permanent force, whether he went overseas or not, will count double the number of years he actually was in the force overseas in the computation of his pension. Let us view it from another standpoint. I, on another occasion, already drew attention to the fact that a great many men in the permanent force had received rapid promotion during the war and that this country did not begrudge them such promotion nor the remuneration they were receiving. But since the war began there has not only been rapid promotion but, unless my memory fails me, there has been a very radical increase in the remuneration paid members of the permanent force. The principle on which these pensions were to be paid was based on the argument that 5 per cent should be taken from the man's pay from year to year and that at the expiration of 20 years he should receive 20-50th of the amount of his salary at that time. Add to that the second principle that you are going to add one, two, three or four years, as the case may be, and then double it for every man who was a member of the permanent force; and then add further that you are going to determine this matter not on the salaries that were paid at the time war broke out but on the remuneration now paid and on the further consideration that promotions will be taken into account in giving these pensions, and the result will be a vast outlay of money. I do not think there is any member who objects to the principle of the Bill as enunciated by the minister, that is, that unnecessary officers should be given a pension and allowed to retire after having been in the service ten years. But I do not believe that the country will view with favour a large pension list being created on the principles and in accordance with the arguments I have just advanced. We want to be fair and generous, but there is such a thing as acting reasonably, and I do not think the Government would be acting reasonably in adopting the suggestions of the hon. member for Calgary.

Major-General MEWBURN: The hon. member for Kingston is perfectly right. The question of double time did come up when this Bill was drafted. I did not personally think it wise to include that at the time, but certainly I do not want to oppose it, because I think these men are entitled to consideration. These men cannot retire voluntarily; their retirement is compulsory. The services of many of them are required and they may have to remain in the force for twenty years. But the question is whether the time served during the war should count as double time. I did not deem it wise to include it in the Bill. The amendment is not mine, but if the committee feel that double time should count I do not wish to oppose it.

Mr. CARVELL: I feel, notwithstanding the fact that my colleague expresses an agreement with this, that I should say something about it. I am heartily in accord with the attitude taken by the hon. member for Kingston. I have no hesitation in saying that this matter was discussed a great many times and the Bill was brought down after mature consideration by the Government. If there is a class of men in the Canadian army who are not entitled to such special privilege as this I think they are the men of the permanent force. They voluntarily joined the Canadian army and became professional soldiers. They were paid for their service and were maintained for years doing nothing, this, of course, being through no fault of their own. When the war broke out they were the first men in Canada who logically should go to the war. They did go, but in doing so they were only performing their duty. They did not do more than, and, indeed, not half as much as, hundreds of thousands who volunteered and went to the war. Now the war is over and they are coming back. This proposal means that you are going to give to the men who belonged to the permanent force the right to retire, and you will add to their period of service double the time which they served at the front. If a man was transferred to the Canadian Expeditionary Force and stayed in Ottawa, as many did who never got out of the city—

An hon. MEMBER: Active service?

Mr. CARVELL: Many men in Ottawa never got out of the city. They belonged to the Canadian Expeditionary Force and their wives had the separation allowance. I know what I am talking about. You are simply handing to these men double pay in the form of pensions. The principle is not only wrong but it is vicious and I hope this Committee will not back it up.

Mr. FIELDING: In order that we may prevent any further disagreement among our friends of the Cabinet, I would ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on the point raised by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), that this involves an increase of the public expenditure and can only originate on a motion from the Crown.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no doubt that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kingston is well taken and that the amendment is not in order.

Section agreed to.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Reference has been made by the Minister of Public Works to the fact that a number of officers and men remained in Ottawa. A great many officers remained in Ottawa very much against their own will, but they rendered just as good service in Ottawa as any man who stood in the trenches at the front. Take Colonel Emmett Clark, Colonel Charlie Winter, Colonel Deroche, Brigadier General Helmer, Brigadier General Jos. Langton, Colonel Burritt, and the deputy minister himself, General Fiset. I could name a score of officers here who begged and pleaded to go to the front, but who could not be spared and were not allowed to go. They did necessary, faithful and efficient work here and they are entitled to just as much consideration as the boys who went and did their duty so fearlessly in the trenches.

Mr. CARVELL: Are they entitled to greater consideration than the men who went to the front?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Officers, non-commissioned officers and men who remained here and did good service are more entitled to consideration than those officers who did not go to the front but remained in England holding down soft jobs.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—service for pension reduced from fifteen to ten years and to be based on allowance as well as pay:

Mr. NICKLE: What does that mean?

Major-General MEWBURN: This makes the pension of the men calculable by reference to the allowance as well as the pay. That has always been the case with officers. This is to make the calculation with reference to the men the same as it is with reference to the officers.

Mr. NICKLE: What is involved in the term "allowances"?

Major-General MEWBURN: Officers and non-commissioned officers get a field allowance; a married man gets a lodging and fuel allowance if these are not found for him.

Mr. NICKLE: Does it include separation allowance?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, that goes to the wife.

Mr. COOPER: Have pensions been paid on lodging, fuel and light allowance?

Major-General MEWBURN: There is, in the Permanent Force, a lodging and fuel allowance for married men. The difficulty we are under to-day in reference to the Permanent Force is that we have not sufficient barrack accommodation for them.

Mr. NESBITT: Are these allowances over and above the pension proposed in the former clauses; or is this the total, including housing, fuel, light and all that sort of thing?

Major-General MEWBURN: Officers have always got their pensions on pay and allowances and it is proposed to make the man the same as the officer in that respect.

Mr. NICKLE: I have still not got the information I want. How much does this allowance amount to? In the case of a private, what would this allowance come to per month?

Major-General MEWBURN: About $1.80 per diem including subsistence allowance.

Mr. NICKLE: Do I understand that a man who has served twenty-five years is going to have added to his pension ninety cents per day?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, he gets a proportionate fiftieth for every year of his service.

Mr. NICKLE: Suppose he has been in the service for twenty-five years?

Major-General MEWBURN: A non-commissioned officer on his pay and allowances would get a pension, based on twenty-five years' service of about $739.

Mr. NICKLE: For life?

Major-General MEWBURN: For life—after twenty-five years' service.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to suggest to the minister that when bringing in Bills of this kind, instead of substituting "ten" for "fifteen" and making changes of that kind in the old Act, if he would print the sections as they will read with these changes made and show what the provisions of the old Act are we could discuss these things much more intelligently.

Motion agreed to.

On section 7—period of service during war to be counted for pension purposes:

Mr. McKENZIE: Could the minister give us any fair idea of what amount is involved in putting this Bill into operation and how much it will increase the yearly outlay?

Major-General MEWBURN: It will be impossible to give the actual amount involved, but I think there will be a tremendous saving to the country because we will not have to give them their full pay for twenty years, after which time they would get the benefit of the pension system anyway. This makes provision whereby these men can be pensioned after ten years' service. They will only get ten-fiftieths of their pay and allowance, whereas if they had served twenty years they would get twenty-fiftieths. It will be a net saving to the country rather than an increase.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is taking for granted that we are obliged to keep these officers on at full pay?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes. In the British army they have a different arrangement. Some of these officers come back from the front and they cannot find employment. Until they have employment they are given half pay. We have no such arrangement in Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—pension to widows, compassionate allowance to children:

Mr. POWER: Is there anything in the law in reference to pensions for the widows of non-commissioned officers and men under similar circumstances?

Major-General MEWBURN: This provision conforms identically with that of the Northwest Mounted Police Pension Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—widow's pension increased to one-half of what husband's pension was or might have been at death:

Mr. NICKLE: What was it before?

Major-General MEWBURN: The pensions of widows were as follows:

Widow of a	Colonel	$500
"	" Lieut.-Colonel	450
"	" Major	350
"	" Captain	250
"	" Lieutenant or 2nd Lieutenant	200
"	" Warrant Officer	100

Mr. NICKLE: Under the new scheme what will it be?

Major-General MEWBURN: This gives them one-half of the actual pension the officer was drawing at the time of his death.

Mr. NICKLE: What would the figure be for a colonel.?

Major-General MEWBURN: After thirty-five years' service, the maximum pension for his widow would be about $1,400.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think this is a very humane provision. In one case that I know of the widow of a general was receiving as pension the small pittance of $500 a year until her son, her only support, was killed in action on the battlefield. On account of the death of her son, who was a lieutenant, she was entitled to a further pension of $800, but instead of her pension having been increased by reason of the death of her son it has been reduced. I think Canada is in honour bound to do the right thing for the general's widow who has lost her son, her sole support.

Mr. EDWARDS: Suppose it could be shown that this widow was in receipt of an income from other sources to an amount greater than the military pension; say the military pension is $1,400, and the income from other sources $1,450 or $1,500; would this income in any way affect her pension? The reason I ask is this: A case came under my notice where a bank clerk in Ottawa, who was the main, if not the sole, support of his mother, enlisted, and was killed overseas. His mother had two other sons and three daughters, I believe, but they were all married and living in different places, and did not contribute to the mother's support. While her son was overseas she received the usual separation allowance, and on his death she received a pension. I think it amounted to $40 a month, and she undertook to supplement that by keeping a boarding house. Later it was ascertained that her income from the boarding house exceeded the amount of the pension, and the pension was discontinued. The reason given was that her income from the boarding house exceeded the amount of the pension.

Major-General MEWBURN: The Pension Act provides:—

Such pension or compassionate allowance shall not be granted if the applicant is in the opinion of the minister unworthy, or if the applicant is already in the opinion of the minister wealthy.

My hon. friend has cited the case of a disability pension. I do not know just what the new Bill provides in such a case.

Mr. NICKLE: "Wealthy" is a very elastic word. May I ask if section 25 as drafted will give the widow of an officer the right to a pension and the right also to a disability pension under the Pensions Act?

Major-General MEWBURN: No.

Mr. NICKLE: Why not?

Major-General MEWBURN: It was a case of that sort that my hon. friend from Maisonneuve cited just now. In that case, after the husband had served thirty-five years in the permanent corps, the widow was granted only the small pittance of $500. This unfortunate lady had no other means, and because she was drawing this pension she was not entitled to a further amount when her son was killed.

Mr. NICKLE: I am sorry to correct the minister, but his facts are wrong. In the case he refers to, the widow of a deceased officer made a claim in respect of her son who was killed in this war. She as the widow of a deceased officer of the permanent corps was drawing a pension of $500 under section 25. She was entitled on the death of her son to a pension, to be exact, of $720, but the Canadian Expeditionary Force Pension Commissioners gave a ruling, which is in accordance with the regulations, that the $720 should have deducted from it the $500 paid under section 25. But that is the case of a woman drawing a pension first under the Military Pensions Act in respect of her husband, and secondly in respect of her son killed in this war. The case I am putting to the minister is this: If the widow was entitled to a pension under section 25 on account of the length of service of her husband, and entitled also to a pension under the Canadian Expeditionary Forces pension scheme, could she draw the two pensions? The Canadian Expeditionary Forces pension scheme establishes as a principle that a wife is entitled to a pension regardless of any other sources of revenue, beyond the Canadian Expeditionary Forces pension. This section 25 says clearly "The pension of a widow shall be as follows." It certainly should be made clear that in the event of a woman's husband having gone overseas and been killed, he having been a member of the permanent corps, the widow should not be entitled to draw let us say $1,400 under the Military Pensions Act, and $1,500 or $1,600 under the Canadian Expeditionary Forces pension scheme. Both pension schemes are based upon a reasonable allowance being given, and if there is any possibility of a duplication of pension, it seems to me the minister should make it abundantly clear that no such thing will take place.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I fear that the practice of searching for other sources of income may sometimes be carried too far. A case was drawn to my attention recently of an old gentleman living in a poor settlement in the province of Nova Scotia who lost his two sons in the war. He himself was almost blind, and was utterly unable to carry on the work of his farm. His wife was living on the farm, but he had no other help whatever. He was getting a pension of $480, and an agent of the departmeent was sent to investigate into his other sources of income. This agent reported that he found this poor man on his farm with a horse, two cows, twelve hens, and twelve apple trees, and he estimated the revenue from these sources to be half the amount of the pension. He recommended that the department therefore cut the pension in two, giving the man $240 instead of $480. This recommendation was carried out by the department. It strikes me that that is going altogether too far. Any one who knows anything about a farm knows that unless the man was able to work the farm he would get very little profit indeed from twelve hens, twelve apple trees, two cows and a horse. I just want to mention these to the minister so that in administering the pension fund the rules be not allowed to bear too strictly on poor people, because it strikes me that at the present time they are a little too stringent.

Major-General MEWBURN: I think the hon. gentleman is confusing this particular Bill with the Pension Bill on which a Special Committee of the House is sitting at the present time. Those are matters that will be covered by pensions for disability or death. What we are now considering is the old Pension Act dealing with the permanent service.

Mr. NICKLE: Have I the assurance of the minister that there is not to be this duality of pensions?

Major-General MEWBURN: I certainly agree with the hon. member. I think the Disability Pensions Act should provide for that. If an officer of the permanent corps was killed in action, his widow would probably get the disability pension; she certainly should not get both.

Mr. MANION: I have a case which I should like to bring to the notice of the minister, somewhat similar to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Antigonish.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not leave it until the other Bill comes before the House?

Mr. MANION: Is it out of order?

The CHAIRMAN: It would be out of order to discuss pensions not covered by this Bill.

Mr. MANION: I have taken this case up for six months, and have not been able to get justice for this man—John Taylor by name—and I thought perhaps it would be a good time to have the Government stir up the Pension Commissioners to act a little more rapidly. I will discuss the case when the report of the board comes up, but that will mean a delay of two months in securing justice for this man.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member should not say that the rules of the House preclude him from discussing the matter and securing justice. He can bring it up and discuss it on any Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday, when the House is moved into Committee of Supply. He would be in order in doing that, but he is not in order on the consideration of this Bill in Committee.

Mr. NICKLE: I would suggest that the section might be amended in this way:

Provided, however, that where a widow is entitled to a pension as the widow of a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and under this Act, she shall elect which pension she will accept.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have no objection to that. She must elect between the two. That is, if her husband in the permanent force was killed at the front she must elect which pension she will take, whether the disability pension or the pension under this Bill.

Mr. NICKLE: I am very glad that the minister appreciates the point. The Order in Council I referred to is No. 1569, and as the minister will remember, by that Order in Council:—

All officers and men from time to time in pay in Canada during the present war or during demobilization thereafter who belong to the permanent active militia or who are attached to the headquarters staff or to the staff of a military district, shall be officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and shall be continuously subject to military law. They shall, while their services continue to be required in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, hold therein temporarily as from the date of last appointment or promotion the ranks which they now have or may from time to time be granted therein, and except as hereinafter provided, the regulations for the pay, allowances and pensions for the Canadian Expeditionary Force shall be applicable and shall govern any claims for pension not heretofore disposed of.

Major-General MEWBURN: If an officer were killed at the front his widow would get a disability pension under the C.E.F. rates.

Mr. NICKLE: If during service a member of the permanent militia, who was made a member of the C.E.F., remained in Canada and died of influenza, his widow would be entitled also to the C.E.F. pension, and the question of election might come up.

Major-General MEWBURN: Do you think it wise to provide for that?

Mr. NICKLE: I think it should be provided for.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member repeat his amendment?

Mr. NICKLE: It is:—

Provided, however, that where a widow is entitled to a pension as the widow of a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and under this Act, she shall elect which pension she will accept.

Mr. COOPER: The hon. member for Kingston cites a Canadian officer as having a choice between two pensions. What would happen in the case of a Canadian officer in the British service, and the British service paying better rates of pension than we do here? Would he have the choice of taking the British pension?

Major-General MEWBURN: We have many officers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who have been loaned to the Imperial Forces but are still under Canadian rates of pay. If a Canadian officer was a member of the Imperial Forces he would only get the pension provided by the Imperial Government, he would have nothing to do with our pension.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Widow's pensions may be revised but not payments made before this Act:

An hon. MEMBER: What is the effect of that?

Major-General MEWBURN: That is just the case we have been speaking of.

Mr. HERBERT J. MACKIE: If I am in order, I would like to refer to a grave injustice that a number of permanent officers feel have been done to their brother officer; I refer to the case of Colonel G. Hunter Ogilvie, of Kingston. Colonel 4 p.m. Ogilvie, like all other permanent officers, was very desirous of completing his thirty-five years' service. It has been the practice in most other departments that the last six months of a man's service is given on leave, but for some reason Colonel Ogilvie was chopped off the last three months that would entitle him to his thirty-five years' service. He served thirty-four years and three months, and was then granted six months' leave of absence, making his service thirty-four years and nine months, thereby missing three months of completing his thirty-five years' service. I submit that if Colonel Ogilvie was worthy of being retained in the service for thirty-four years and three months, he should have been retained for thirty-four years and six months. Colonel Ogilvie towards the end of his term was not as effective an officer as the department would like to have had, and they replaced him by a younger and more active man. But even so, I contend it would have been only just to Colonel Ogilvie, and to other officers similarly situated, that he should have been retained the extra three months, which would have enabled him to retire with thirty-five years' service to his credit.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a thought that may find expression in connection with this Bill. It is not a new matter, it is one that has existed for quite a long time. We are not only providing for war pensions, as to which there is no question, but we are providing for peace pensions to two branches of our public service: the Perman-Force and the Northwest Mounted Police. I need not say that I am not objecting to that at all. But we are doing nothing for the great body of the Civil Servants of Canada.

I want to keep in the public mind and in the mind of hon. members that what we are doing for the permanent force, for the militia force and for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police is creating a distinction. Something was said in a recent debate about class distinctions; we are having class distinctions here. We are providing that a man who serves in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police or in the permanent force in ordinary times of peace is eligible for a pension; but the man who has the misfortune to serve in any of the other branches of the public service, which comprise probably ninety per cent of the whole, will have no pension.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment salaries, including Deputy Minister at $6,000, Assistant Deputy Minister and Secretary at $4,000, Solicitor at $4,000, Superintendent of Expenditure at $3,500, Assistant Secretary at $2,525 and Accountant at $2,500, $71,200; contingencies $25,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister give an outline of the work of this department?

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL: The work of the department, broadly speaking, is divided into three branches: the medical treatment of returned men who are so injured or physically unfit that there is no hope of their early permanent recovery; the re-training of injured or disabled returned men to fit them for useful occupations, and the re-establishment in civil life of those who return from overseas and are desirous of securing employment or occupation here. The department also provides for the free medical treatment for a year after their discharge of all who have served overseas and are suffering from any kind of disability. It has established an artificial limb factory where artificial limbs are provided for those who have lost limbs in the war; and these are kept in a proper condition of repair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many hospitals are there under this department and where are they located?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that question is in order. Under item 331 this same discussion may be revived this evening by other members who are not present now. It is absolutely unfair that the discussion should be repeated.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I beg to take exception, Mr. Chairman, to your statement that it is unfair. It may be out of order; and if you say so, I will resume my seat. But to say that it is unfair that I should seek information is rather hard on an old member like me. I understand that the hospitals which were formerly under the Militia Department are now administered by this new department?

Mr. ROWELL: All hospitals except those for soldiers whose recovery is hoped for at an early date. Soldiers whose early recovery is hoped for are not discharged from the army; their treatment is continued in the hospitals which are under the direction of the Army Medical Service Branch of the Militia Department. But if cases are likely to be incurable or to require very lengthy treatment, the men are discharged from the army and placed under the care of this department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to prolong the discussion if it is out of order, but as we are discussing a vote on a new department, I thought the minister could give an outline of its work. But if you, Sir, insist that I am out of order, I will abide by your decision. Is this going to be a permanent department?

Mr. ROWELL: It is desirable that the bulk of the work of this department should be done in the next two years; it has hardly yet reached the maximum of its work, which will be reached when all our soldiers return from overseas. Perhaps it would be better if on this particular item questions were asked which I might answer, and then when we come to the other Estimate, which deals with each branch of the work, I shall be glad to give all information about each branch as we take up the various items.

Mr. MORPHY: The item says: "Including deputy minister at $6,000, solicitor at $4,000." Who is the deputy minister, and what are his qualifications? Who is the solicitor, and where does he come from?

Mr. ROWELL: No solicitor has been appointed, and the minister hopes it will not prove necessary to appoint one. The department has got along so far without one, and it hopes to continue to do so. But many questions come up and the minister thought it was desirable to have provision for the appointment of a solicitor in case it became necessary to appoint one.

The deputy minister has been in the department since its organization and was with the Military Hospitals Commission before that. He was executive officer of the Military Hospitals Commission, in which capacity he was brought into contact with all phases of the work of the department. Previous to that he was engaged in executive direction of a commercial enterprise. He has had large practical experience in organization work, and, as my hon. friend will recognize, when we get into the details of the department, the number of hospitals and educational institutions under its charge, how important it is to have an efficient officer with good organizing power and executive ability in charge of this large administrative work.

Mr. MORPHY: What was his salary before when he was engaged in the Governmental service, and why is the salary now $6,000? I thought $5,000 was a sort of standard salary for deputy ministers.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is quite correct that $5,000 was the general standard for deputy ministers, and that was the salary of the deputy in this department; but in the Estimates of this year, salaries of all deputy ministers have been raised to $6,000.

Mr. MORPHY: I want to reiterate what I have said in this House many times before, namely, that a wrong principle is applied all through, and I wish to make another statement in favour of the underdog. The lower branches of all Government departments are absolutely underpaid, and this seems like a free opportunity for the big fellows to get the high jump without a by-your-leave or a word of protest. I protest against the ease with which the high salaried men can secure an increase, when it is so difficult for the lower paid men, such as messengers, packers and so on, to get one.

Mr. ROWELL: I would sympathize with that view very largely if legislation were not to be brought down this session to deal with the matter. I understand the acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. A. K. Maclean) will, on Monday, introduce a Bill relating to the reclassification of the service, and that will indicate the scale of salaries in all branches of the service. There will then be full opportunity for discussing the point raised by my hon. friend, and I hope he will consider that what the Government proposes in the matter is reasonable and satisfactory.

Mr. MORPHY: The minister has not given me quite a definite answer as to what deputy minister, whose name I do not know, was getting before in the Government service.

Mr. ROWELL: The deputy was drawing $4,500 in the Military Hospitals Commission as assistant to the director. When he became director he got the salary which the former director was drawing, namely, $5,000.

Mr. MORPHY: Then this is an increase in salary of $1,000 in a new department of Government?

Mr. ROWELL: It is an increase of $1,000, just as in every other department of Government. I am free to admit there may be a difference of opinion whether all deputy ministers should draw the same salary, and I think we shall find when the reclassification comes down, there will be some recommendations on that point, but for many years it has been a settled policy that all deputies should receive the same salaries, and this department is simply carrying out that policy.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: Will that same principle be carried into effect as regards ministers?

Mr. MORPHY: If some of the really executive departments of the Government have their deputy ministers' salaries raised to $6,000, will not that necessarily carry with it the principle of giving a similar increase to $6,000 to heads of more or less non-executive departments of Government, although the work may not be half as great?

Mr. ROWELL: I should say not, unless, as is the case in certain positions, they have the rank of deputy minister. A certain number of positions have been created in the service where in the Statute it is provided that the official holds the rank of deputy minister. I know there are several, and in those cases, I assume the principle would apply. In fact, I think the Estimates this year contain the same amount for those who are so declared in the Statute.

Mr. NESBITT: The work of deputy ministers varies greatly, and some should have higher salaries than others. I am not quarrelling with the salary of this deputy. Why is a solicitor required in this department? If any little legal question comes up, surely advice can be secured from some law officer in Ottawa. It is absurd to have a solicitor for this department.

Mr. ROWELL: As already stated, I understand from the minister that he did not expect to require a solicitor, but he thought it expedient to provide for the appointment of one. As I understand, a solicitor will not likely be required, I have no objection to the item with regard to the solicitor being stricken out.

Mr. NESBITT: I know one or two men in the department who are quite capable of giving advice on any ordinary point. They are sitting here now, and I do not see why the item should not be stricken out.

Mr. ROWELL: I will drop it.

Mr. MORPHY: It is a temptation to have it in the Estimates, and it should be stricken out.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: In connection with the item $3,500 for a superintendent of expenditure, I would like to know if such an officer has been appointed, and if so, what his duties are? Is there any necessity for a superintendent of expenditure when you have a minister, a deputy minister and a secretary?

Mr. MORPHY: And an assistant secretary, and accountant?

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: I need not mention any more officers, but I think we might have some explanation as to the necessity for this office.

Mr. ROWELL: The superintendent of expenditure might be known by some other name, perhaps chief accountant. He is the executive head of the Accounting Branch and supervises the policy and staff necessary to control all expenditures. I think it is very desirable that there should be such an office, because it is a new department, which is spending very large sums of money, amounting to millions of dollars. The Committee will see that already the estimate is over $20,000,000, and there will have to be supplementaries. It requires the most careful supervision of all expenditures in administering this department in order to conserve the public interest, and I think that any money wisely spent in supervising expenditures will bring a large return in the way of curtailing what otherwise might be a great increase in public expenditure.

Mr. NESBITT: I absolutely agree with the minister, but I think that as titles were voted out last night we should call this official chief accountant.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member for North Oxford has raised a point which is worth considering. There is a provision for a superintendent at $3,500, one accountant at $2,500, and four at $2,100, practically six accountants for this department. You might, as the hon. member for North Oxford says, call the official chief accountant, and in addition to this accountant you have five others. Surely with six accountants in the branch there is going to be very little for each to do. I appreciate in a sense the enormity of the work, but I begin to be staggered when I see so many accountants on a new board. I would like to have some explanation of this, as there seems to be something funny about it.

Mr. ROWELL: All soldiers who are either receiving treatment in the hospitals or are being trained in the vocational institutions are drawing pay and allowances. At present there are as many as 15,284 ex-members of the Forces drawing pay and allowance, either in connection with medical treatment or taking vocational training. The accounting is a very important phase of the work of this department and it is essential that they should have an efficient first-class man, the best they can get, to supervise this very large expenditure. I do not know of any department where expenses may run up more rapidly unless carefully supervised than in a new department which is expanding to meet the increasing demands being made for the benefits it administers to returned soldiers. The suggestion of the hon. member for North Oxford is perfectly acceptable. I do not see why the official should not be called "Chief Accountant."

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: I think that "Superintendent of Expenditure" is a misnomer. I happen to know the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister of the department and I can testify to the ability of each. I quite agree with the minister that it is necessary to have some one charged with the oversight of these expenditures, but I do not think that "Superintendent of Expenditure" is quite appropriate, and the minister might accept the suggestion of the hon. member for North Oxford.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: There are companies divided into several units and a great deal of expenditure is being incurred in the different units. It will be necessary for the Superintendent of Expenditure to visit these units and supervise the expenditure at each headquarters. I therefore think the term "Superintendent of Expenditure" is better than "Chief Accountant."

Mr. HUGH CLARK: The Superintendent of Expenditure will be charged with the supervision of the expenditure of considerable sums of money and probably "Chief Accountant" may not be a dignified enough title for him to maintain the authority necessary to discharge his important duties.

Mr. ROWELL: I move that item No. 29 be amended by striking out the words "Solicitor at $4,000" and by reducing the total amount from $71,200 to $67,200.

Motion agreed to.

Buildings, Hospitals, Sanatoria, Soldiers' Homes, Vocational Training Centres, etc., $1,300,000.

Mr. ROWELL: The expenditure under this head for 1918 amounted to $1,700,000 and this Estimate is $400,000 less. The expenditure covers hospitals for general purposes, sanatoria for the treating of tuberculosis, homes for incurables, and buildings for vocational training. The department is now erecting new buildings in almost all the provinces. There is one at Tranquille, British Columbia, where the department, in co-operation with the British Columbia Anti-tuberculosis Society is erecting an extension for the housing of 130 patients, together with dining room and kitchen accommodation. In Alberta the department with the co-operation of the provincial government is erecting a building to accommodate 175 beds for the treatment of tuberculosis.

Mr. PARENT: What is the expenditure?

Mr. ROWELL: I can only give an estimate. It is probably very near $300,000. In Manitoba the department is contributing towards the accommodation for the treatment of tuberculosis in the provincial sanatorium at Ninette. The Manitoba Anti-tuberculosis Society is setting aside sufficient accommodation for the exclusive use of this department. In most cases the department has made arrangements with the provincial governments or some recognized institution whereby the department provides for the extension of the existing institutions in order to care for the patients. As a result of experience, the department has reached the conclusion that that means in the long run a substantial saving to the Federal Government.

In Quebec, with the co-operation of the provincial government the department is erecting 200 beds for the treatment of tubercular patients at the Laurentian Sanatorium.

In New Brunswick, the department has recently assumed the administration of Jordan Memorial Sanatorium at River Glade, N.B., and is making provision for extra accommodation at this institution.

In Nova Scotia, through the co-operation of the Nova Scotia government, the department is completing certain buildings at the Nova Scotia Sanatorium.

In Halifax, in order to provide for active treatment cases, the department, through the Public Works Department, is erecting a 50-bed active treatment hospital.

In Prince Edward Island, the accommodation is being completed at Dalton Sanatorium, for the treatment of tuberculous patients.

Over and above the foregoing, the department, in operating the large number of institutions coming under its control, must of necessity provide funds for the maintenance and upkeep of various buildings. The members of the committee will see that we must meet the demands made upon this department to care for all returned soldiers suffering from tuberculosis. The cases that come under its charge are not those in which an immediate recovery is expected. They are discharged from the military forces as soon as this disease is diagnosed and are passed into the hands of this department. I am sure all will agree that the country should do everything in its power to provide the best possible treatment for ex-members of the forces who are suffering from tuberculosis. These expenditures are necessary in order to provide sanatoria where they can be treated. This is usually accomplished by an extension to an existing institution thus saving the cost of erecting a new building.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the dental corps been transferred from the Militia department to this new department?

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that a decision had been arrived at some time ago.

Mr. ROWELL: The Militia department has not transferred the Dental Corps to the Soldiers Civil Re-Establishment department. The Militia department is treating the returned soldiers who require dental treatment immediately upon discharge, but the Soldiers Civil Re-Establishment department must necessarily provide dental treatment for those who come under its charge and establish its own branch for this particular work.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: In connection with the programme outlined by the minister, I think the department is taking the right line in co-operating with the provincial authorities, in using sanatoria and other hospital accommodation in the different provinces and assisting in putting up buildings that will be of some value to the country after the work of reconstruction is completed. In my experience of the working of the Militia Department and the Military Hospitals Commission, prior to the Soldiers Civil Re-establishment Department being established, there never has been a more wasteful expenditure of public money than that which took place as between these two departments. Buildings have been erected for hospital purposes of a semi-permanent character which, now that the war is over, appear to be absolutely useless and the money is thrown away. I do not know whether the minister of this new department intends to use these hospitals which have been built in almost every province in Canada. If nothing can be done to utilize these buildings on which millions of dollars have been expended, it will be a great loss to the taxpayers of this country. I am pleased to learn that the department proposes to take over and assist existing institutions which, in any event, will be of some value to the people after the war. I would suggest to the minister in charge of the department in this House that he bring to the attention of the responsible minister the fact that thousands of dollars have been wasted between the Militia Department and the old Military Hospitals Commission; whether through jealousy or lack of co-operation, I do not know. The fact remains that in every town in Canada almost the same condition has prevailed, money being wasted by one department or another that might have been used to better advantage had there been proper co-operation between these two departments.

Mr. ARGUE: Is there any provision for hospital accommodation for invalided soldiers who never left Canada?

Mr. ROWELL: They stand on the same basis as those invalided from overseas.

Mr. ARGUE: I am glad to hear that because I have been fighting a case now for pretty nearly a year and a half. In 1916 we had a man in Swift Current, Mr. McIntosh by name, who enlisted in the 209th Battalion. He is a married man, 39 years of age, has a wife and five children and is a machinist by trade. He was examined by the battalion medical officer and taken on the strength as medically fit. He went to Camp Hughes and put in the summer there. He broke down under the training and when the battalion left he remained in Camp Hughes, was discharged as medically unfit and went home. Since that day the city of Swift Current has kept him and his wife and family. The returned soldiers pay the rent of the house for the family, which amounts to $15 a month; the town of Swift Current pays $80 per month to keep the family, and it sent him to the Mayo hospital for treatment. The hospital sent him back and said he had broken down under army training and probably would never be much better. I brought the matter to the attention of one department after another, and let me tell you they are past masters at passing the buck. They sent me from one department to another. They sent me to the Pension Department, and the Pension Department told me that there was no provision at all for a case of that kind, that it was a recurrence of a former disability. There ought to be responsibility somewhere, and somebody has to assume it. The Militia Department took that man on the strength as medically fit on their own doctor's certificate, and I am going to stay with the job until the thing is straightened out. Up to date the town of Swift Current has paid $1,500 to maintain that family ever since the man was discharged, and I want to know who is going to reimburse the town.

Mr. ROWELL: I can understand the action of the Pension Board in saying that it was a recurrence of a disability. What is the other department to which my hon. friend presented the case?

Mr. ARGUE: The Invalided Soldiers Commission, and then the Pension Board. The Pension Board said that they had no jurisdiction over the case at all, and that there was no provision to meet it. I do not know how it will end, but I am going to keep on pressing the case.

Mr. ROWELL: I should think it would be a case for consideration by the Soldiers Civil Re-Establishment Department. The deputy minister will look into the matter and take it up if my hon. friend will give him the facts. I think the Pension Board is correct in saying that it did not come properly before it.

Mr. ARGUE: I want to assure the minister that I have given them the facts more than once.

Major-General MEWBURN: Has he been discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

Mr. ARGUE: Yes, as medically unfit for military service. He was given his ticket, sent home, and that was the last of it.

Mr. ROWELL: The deputy minister will take the matter up and look into it. If the facts are as stated by my hon. friend, I should think that it was a case for treatment in one of the institutions of the department.

Mr. ARGUE: We have tried several times to get them to take him back and give him treatment, or put him under observation. I have done my best to see if something could not be done, but up to date I have not been able to get any action.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: Will the hon. gentleman give the name?

Mr. ARGUE: I will give you the name and all the particulars.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: How many tubercular soldiers are at present in sanatoria throughout Canada, and how many beds are there for tubercular soldiers?

The CHAIRMAN: I think that question would be more in order under item 334.

Mr. COWAN: Do I understand that the cost of dental services is provided for under this vote?

Mr. ROWELL: No, this relates only to buildings. I just want to make one observation to prevent a misunderstanding, with respect to the remarks of my hon. friend from Strathcona, and I do so because I think the Minister of Militia was not in the House when my hon. friend spoke. If either of the two departments had known that the war would come to an end when it did, much less accommodation might have served, and much less building would have been gone on with; but as the situation looked last summer almost right up to October, until September, anyway—and I recall this matter having been repeatedly presented to Council—owing to the severe casualties sustained in the August drive and the casualties which it was expected would be sustained during the year, it became necessary to evacuate as many hospital cases to Canada as possible. Men were coming back to Canada, and the complaint constantly made to the Department of Militia and Defence was that there was not sufficient hospital accommodation for them in the principal military centres of Canada, and it was urged that additional accommodation be provided. The department, therefore, in their view of the case, were unable to turn over these institutions to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment because they were being used for men who came under the Department of Militia and Defence. Now that peace has come, just as soon as the Department of Militia and Defence is prepared to surrender one of these institutions it is being surrendered, if suitable, to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment for their work. I happen to have personal knowledge of quite a number of hospitals which have been turned over in that way recently. I think that, in a measure, will explain what my hon. friend has referred to.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: I give a clear case of lack of co-operation between the two departments in my own constituency. The Military Hospitals Commission rented from the Alberta College a building for, I think, $11,000 a year, on the understanding that the building was to be returned in the same condition in which it was received. Last year the Military Hospitals Commission expended something like $50,000 on this building for new plumbing, baths, and work of that kind. The equipment had all been put in, with the exception of the boilers required to make the baths available, when the armistice was signed. The result is that the entire expenditure is wasted; the equipment has never been used, and if the Commission turns the building over in the condition in which it was received it will have to take out every part of that equipment. Again, the city of Edmonton offered to the Militia Department the use of one of the best hospitals in Western Canada free of charge; it had all the necessary facilities and accommodation for 180 patients, but through lack of co-operation between Military District No. 13 and possibly the Military Hospitals Commission, this hospital was caring for only twenty or twenty-five patients instead of one hundred and eighty. What I am complaining of is the lack of co-operation between the two departments, which has resulted in an expenditure of money which can never be justified.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: What is the policy of the department with regard to epileptics and tubercular cases? Is it still the policy to unload them on the civilian institutions, as was done a year ago?

Mr. ROWELL: I am not aware that that was the policy, and so I am advised by officers of the department. The policy is to take care of these men until they have recovered, and that is the object of these various institutions for which I am asking this vote.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: My point is this: Instead of the Government taking care of these cases in their own institutions and with their own doctors, they were turned over to civilian institutions at a cost of so much per day or per month. Is that still the policy?

Mr. ROWELL: No. The policy is for the department itself to care for these patients in these institutions for which we are asking this money.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I am very pleased to hear that statement. I raised this question a year ago, but I did not get much consideration. I trust that more accommodation will be provided in the future than in the past. I have visited many of the civilian institutions from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and I did not find one where I thought the men were getting sufficient care and treatment. I am very glad to know there has been a change.

Mr. ROWELL: I am glad to say that the results of the treatment have been very satisfactory. About seventy-five per cent of the men treated have been able to resume work in gainful occupations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At what centres is vocational training being given in connection with the hospitals, and is there any arrangement with the provinces to assist in providing buildings for this purpose? About what proportion of this vote of $1,300,000 will be devoted to vocational training?

Mr. ROWELL: There are some twelve centres in which vocational training is being given at the present time—Montreal, Ottawa, Halifax, Kingston, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, Calgary, Guelph, Regina, Victoria and Fredericton. Besides the departmental training centres there are outside schools to which the pupils are sent. A number of men are also under training in industrial establishments under actual working conditions. In the Quebec district, last year there were 3 schools carried on by the department directly, and 4 this year; Nova Scotia, 2 last year, and 3 this year; Central Ontario, 3 last year, and 2 this year. Central Ontario, 8 last year, 8 this year; Western Ontario, 3 last year, 2 this year; Manitoba, 1 last year, 2 this year; Saskatchewan, 3 last year, 3 this year; Alberta, 3 last year, 2 this year; British Columbia, 3 last year, 5 this year; New Brunswick, 1 last year and 1 this year. The total number last year was 30, this year 32. The principal increase has not been in the schools under the direct charge of the department, but in other schools with which the department has made arrangements—institutions of the provinces, universities, and other schools. The total number of those last year was thirty-seven; this year one hundred and twenty-seven. So that the department has, during the year, been carrying out the policy of co-operating as far as practicable with the various provincial governments and the educational organizations of the provinces in order to utilize those schools for vocational work as indicated by the increase and so reduce capital expenditure.

One of the most important features of the retraining is in connection with the men working with independent firms. In fact, the war veterans have impressed very strongly upon the department that the men should have their practical training by working under ordinary business conditions. The number of firms in which soldiers are engaged in that way has increased from fifty-seven in March, 1918, to nine hundred and ninety-three in 1919.

Mr. ARTHURS: I notice you stated that Calgary had three schools last year and it now has two. Is one of those schools located in Edmonton?

Mr. ROWELL: There is one in each place.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Is any provision made for getting this vocational training at night, or is it all during the day?

Mr. ROWELL: The department has not made any provision for training at night. Soldiers who are taking this retraining are disabled, and night classes would impair their physical well-being. As they receive pay and allowances when receiving retraining there is no hardship entailed.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: The reason I ask the question is that I have been approached by a number of men who are in employment part of the day, and who would like to have the privilege of attending some classes at night in order to make themselves more proficient.

Mr. ROWELL: As I understand my hon. friend's question, he is referring, not to disabled men, but to soldiers who are physically fit and who would like to qualify themselves more effectively for their particular work.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Not exactly what you might call totally disabled. They are able to carry on, and they have employment which they are not exactly satisfied with, and they would like to qualify themselves for something better.

Mr. ROWELL: The question my hon. friend raises is one deserving careful consideration, and I will commend it to the officers of the department. So far the department only deals with disabled men, that is, men who are so disabled that they cannot carry on their pre-war occupations. The department grants them pay and allowances while undergoing re-training.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is the department doing anything towards the education of a number of these men in agriculture; and, if so, what buildings are being used for the purpose in connection with some of the agricultural colleges and experimental farms?

Mr. ROWELL: Generally speaking, so far as training in agriculture is concerned for men who wish to engage in farming, that is under the Soldiers' Settlement Board. The Department of Soldiers Re-Establishment do a certain amount of retraining of disabled men who were formerly general farmers. These men are trained in specific branches of farming pursuits such as market gardening, poultry raising, operation of tractors, gas engines and farm machinery. It is only to that extent that they provide training in agricultural matters.

5 p.m.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I understand that in addition to those men who are partially or totally disabled, there is a class now being educated composed of young men who went overseas when under eighteen years of age. Has the minister ever considered extending that class to include young students over eighteen who on their return at the age of twenty-two or twenty-three are unable to carry on without some help? They are very desirous of continuing their educational studies. While over eighteen and not suffering from any disability, yet they are unable to go on with their studies for various reasons. I think those men should have consideration.

Mr. ROWELL: With reference to those men who enlisted under military age, the Government has decided that some provision should be made for their re-training regardless of whether they have suffered disability or not. That was discussed in the House earlier in the session. I am sure that decision will be sustained by the judgment of the House and of the country: that the boys who were under eighteen years of age at the time of their enlistment, and who were under no compulsion to go overseas, but voluntarily left to serve their country, should be afforded an opportunity of completing their studies.

Mr. NESBITT: Why should a boy of twenty not get the same accommodation when he comes back as the boy under eighteen? The boy under eighteen at the time of enlistment has a better chance than the boy of twenty-one, because when the latter comes back it will take him longer to finish his course. The boy under eighteen is discommoded less than the boy under twenty-one who left his studies and voluntarily enlisted.

Mr. ROWELL: The man who enlisted when seventeen years of age in the early days of the war is now going on to twenty-two. He has been away from Canada during the period when, if he were here, he would have proceeded with his education or would have learned a trade. He comes back to Canada at the age of twenty-one or twenty-two without a trade and with his education unfinished, and it has been represented to the Government, and strongly urged in the House, that if some provision be not made for those boys they would drift into the class of common labourers. Those boys were not under obligation to render military service, but they volunteered and went overseas. Therefore the Government decided to deal with those under eighteen years of age. So far the Government has not seen its way clear to help those over eighteen years of age.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Exactly the same argument would apply, so far as I can see, to students over eighteen and under nineteen. They were under no obligation to go overseas, and, as the member for Oxford North well said, they are suffering greater disability than boys of sixteen or seventeen. They now come back men, and many of them are desirous of going on with their studies if they can get help. I understand that the Government was considering the education of men who were two years in the university, leaving out matriculants, for whom no provision is made in any way.

Mr. NESBITT: The only argument the minister advances in favour of the idea that boys under eighteen should be considered is that they did not have to go. Well, others who were over eighteen—nineteen and twenty—did not have to go; they enlisted before the Conscription Bill was passed. But the soldier who comes back twenty-five or twenty-six years of age is at a greater disadvantage than the one who comes back under twenty-two.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think a distinction should be made between the boy under eighteen who volunteered, say, a year before the war ended, and gave only one year's service, and the boy who enlisted in the early days of the war and gave four or five years' service.

Mr. ROWELL: All that has been decided so far is that some provision should be made for all those who enlisted under eighteen years of age; the extent of that provision or the manner of its administration have not yet been settled. The point that my hon. friend makes, however, can be considered when the regulations are being worked out.

Mr. WIGMORE: I suggest that the age in respect of which this provision is to be made be extended from eighteen to twenty. I know the case of a young man nineteen years of age who had been preparing for the matriculation examination. He enlisted and recently returned after having been overseas three and a half years. When the matter is being dealt with I hope that this suggestion will be considered.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The moment you endeavour to divide men up into classes you get on dangerous ground. The case of six young men who enlisted has come under my personal observation. Two of them, under eighteen years of age, enlisted practically as school boys. One was nineteen just starting at the university, and the other three who were from twenty-one to twenty-four years of age, had completed their education and established themselves in business. Those who had finished their education and had put everything they had in the world into their business felt the call, gave up everything and went to the war; they come back twenty-six, twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age and have to make an entirely new start. The boy who was sixteen or seventeen when he enlisted has the advantage of years over these men, and if you compensate the soldier only if he was a certain age when he enlisted, you will get into endless difficulties. It is not practicable to make a dividing line; if you do, there will be overlapping and consequent dissatisfaction. If the department will confine its energies in this regard to the education of men who come back disabled or are unable to provide for themselves, they will be on much safer ground.

Mr. PARENT: Some time ago the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) inquired of the Government whether it was true that the late Gustave Stuart, K.C., of Quebec, had bequeathed his beautiful estate to the country for the purpose of establishing thereon a soldiers' home or a sanatorium. To that question the Secretary of State answered "No" and the Department of Militia "Yes." We have been trying to find out whether the department, or whatever department the matter may come under, has taken any steps to do something with that property, which is very valuable and surely ought to be taken advantage of.

Mr. ROWELL: It is correct that that beautiful property was presented to the Government. It is now being put into shape by this department for the re-training of ex-members of the forces in certain phases of agriculture.

Mr. POWER: I asked a question early in the session with regard to this matter, and the answer of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment was to the effect that plans were being prepared for the utilization of the property. We have been spending thousands of dollars all over the country in the purchase of properties for the establishment of sanitaria, agricultural farms, and so on. But here is a property, the best located in that part of Quebec, which has been in the possession of the Government for a considerable time; and we are now told that preparations are being made for its use in the re-training of soldiers in some "phases" of agriculture. May I ask in what phases of agriculture? In what way is the department going to use it, and why was it not used before?

Mr. ROWELL: At the time it was given the only use the department had for it was to turn it into a hospital, but it was not considered desirable or in the public interest that that should be done at that time, not only because of the character of the place, but because of its situation. There were not the necessary transportation facilities to reach it conveniently, and the necessary water supply for hospital purposes was not available. A considerable expenditure of money would have been necessary to provide an adequate water supply. But the property is well suited for the purpose to which it is now being devoted. I understand that some thirty-five soldiers will shortly be there receiving training in poultry farming, truck gardening, dairying, and activities of that kind in which the soldier who is more or less disabled can engage with advantage to himself and country.

Mr. POWER: Is it the intention of the Government only to train soldiers in poultry raising or truck gardening on that or any other farm, or will financial arrangements be made to enable returned soldiers to purchase small lots of land in the vicinity of cities for the purpose of carrying on such work?

[Mr. Parent.]

Mr. ROWELL: That is a matter which comes under the Soldier Settlement Board. A Bill is now before the House to deal with that and other aspects of the matter. I do not know its express terms, but, generally speaking, the Government is making provision under that Bill to assist returned soldiers to acquire property for the carrying on of agricultural pursuits. When the Bill comes up, the whole matter of its scope and the character of the property to be purchased may be discussed.

Mr. PARENT: I should not like the minister to be under the impression that water cannot be obtained on the St. Louis road property. It is next the yards occupied by the Transcontinental railway and Government locomotives go there for water many times a year. In the same parish in which this is situated, a tuberculosis hospital has just been erected by private subscription, and water has also been obtained there. If private citizens have been able to secure water for a private hospital, surely the Government can afford to go to the expense of obtaining water on property which has been granted to them gratuitously.

Maintenance of patients, $3,000,000.

Mr. ROWELL: At present 7,800 patients are in the hospitals of the department, 1,800 are being treated in specially designed and equipped sanatoria for the treatment of tuberculosis, 600 suffering from mental disabilities are under the care of specialists in the treatment of mental diseases, 5,400 are receiving intermittent general treatment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The purchases for this equipment, medicine, food, and all that is required for maintenance are, of course, made in large quantities. Are tenders called for?

Mr. ROWELL: The purchases are made through the War Purchasing Commission.

Mr. PARENT: Are any patients being treated at the Kent House, near Quebec city, or will there be any in the near future?

Mr. ROWELL: The Kent House does not come under the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and I cannot give my hon. friend any information in regard to it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: With reference to the minister's statement that the War Purchasing Commission does the purchasing, is there not a purchasing agent in the Department of Militia, and has he nothing to do with the purchases of these supplies?

Mr. ROWELL: The Department of Militia has nothing whatever to do with the purchase of supplies for the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment makes its requisition for the supplies it requires, and the purchases are made under direction of the War Purchasing Commission which supervises everything that is purchased.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is the minister using existing technical schools in Canada for vocational training, or is he establishing new ones in the different centres? What, for example, is he doing at Halifax?

Mr. ROWELL: For the Military District of which Halifax is the centre, the department has three schools of its own for vocational training, but under arrangements it has with fifteen other schools in Nova Scotia, returned soldiers are being trained in those schools. The bulk of the department's work, so far as it relates to vocational training, is being carried out under an arrangement between the department and the various institutions existent in Nova Scotia.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Who is in charge?

Mr. ROWELL: Professor F. H. Sexton, an officer of the department is in charge of vocational training, is in charge at Halifax.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister said that there were in the province other places where technical education was given to soldiers. What are the names?

Mr. ROWELL: I have not the names of the different localities in Nova Scotia, but I shall be glad to get the information, and I will write my hon. friend giving him all the different places where these are in the province.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Supposing a soldier at Ste. Anne de Bellevue hospital near Montreal wants to get some technical training. If he does not find at the hospital the necessary equipment, is the department doing anything toward sending him, say to the technical schools we have in Montreal?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. A certain phase of this re-training is carried on in the hospital, if the soldier is able to do this work, and it aids in the cure of the patient to have him encouraged to undertake certain work in the hospital. As soon as he is able to be transported from the hospital and to undertake work in an institution or commercial enterprise outside of the hospital, arrangements for that are made.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: How many tubercular patients are being treated in sanatoria at the present time, and how many beds has the department ready for returning tubercular soldiers?

Mr. ROWELL: There are at present approximately 1,800 tubercular patients undergoing treatment, and approximately 150 vacant beds, so that the hospital accommodation for tubercular patients is at the present time in round figures 1,950 beds. Then, in those various units which I have mentioned, which are now in course of construction, provision will be made for about 859 additional beds, making a total of about 2,800 beds available for treatment of tubercular patients when the present accommodation is completed.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: I am not quite clear as to the scheme under which this department is operating; that is to say, I understood from the minister that a returned soldier, discharged to civilian life, was, if requiring treatment, entitled to free treatment for one year. Is that correct?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. There are two classes of cases. A man who is discharged without disability, and who suffers from any disease or injury during a year after discharge gets free treatment if the disability is not due to vice or misconduct. That is a provision made by the Government for the returned soldier, and it is effective for one year after discharge.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: That is if he breaks down within a year.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, if he suffers from any disability or disease not due to vice or misconduct. That provision was made a few months ago. If a man breaks down and his collapse is due to or aggravated by service he receives not only free treatment, but pay and allowances for himself and his actual dependents so long as he is thus disabled.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand there is a soldiers' home in Ottawa; what does it cost per day per patient?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know to what home my hon. friend refers.

Mr. MICHAUD: The Soldiers' Home in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. ROWELL: There is no Soldiers' Home in Ottawa operated by this department. There may be an hospital under the Department of Militia and Defence. I believe there is the Sir Sanford Fleming Home, but I have no knowledge of that.

Vocational Expense, Administration and Training, $750,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What does that include?

Mr. ROWELL: This includes the administration and training in the vocational branch. It covers such matters as maintenance, repairs, light, heat, and power, stationery and office supplies, car fares of soldiers attending classes, telephones, telegrams, laundry and clothing expenses, subsistence of staff, subsistence of students attending vocational school. That would be the meals they might have there while the school was in session.

Mr. PARENT: Has any part of this amount been expended?

Mr. ROWELL: No; this is a vote for the present year. The actual expenditure last year on this head was $645,452. The amount is larger this year because there will be a larger number of students attending these vocational classes.

Salaries, Administrative, Clerical, Training, Industrial, $5,178,420.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This is a very large item for salaries, and it does not include all salaries, because doctors and nurses are under a separate item. Cooks, orderlies and general staff are also separate. It seems that a very large proportion of the whole expenditure is salaries, and it would be well to have some explanation of this item.

Mr. ROWELL: Previous to the transfer to the Department of Militia and Defence of a number of hospitals operated by the Military Hospitals Commission, men who broke down as a result of their war service were given treatment in hospitals by the Military Hospitals Commission, and their pay and allowances were issued by the Department of Militia and Defence. Under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment the number of men for treatment on April 1, 1918, was 1,776, and this number has increased in the present year to 7,381.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Do I understand the minister to say that we have 7,381 employees in this branch?

Mr. ROWELL: No. I was speaking of the maintenance. The numbers taking treatment or being retrained necessarily largely determines the number of employees. These salaries are for all branches of work of the department including the new Information and Service Branch co-operating with the Department of Labour. The personnel served by the department has increased three-fold during the past year and probably the peak of the load has not yet been reached.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I interrupt the minister to ask what connection this has with the Department of Labour?

Mr. ROWELL: Before I answer the hon. member there are two or three facts I would like to give the Committee. This salary item varies, as may be supposed, with the general variation in the number of men cared for. The occupational work carried on in hospitals by this branch has been developed considerably during the past year. On April 1, 1918, the number of men undergoing curative training, together with those in attendance in certain work shops, was 3,817, while on April 1, 1919, the number was 9,059, thus entailing increased instructional facilities together with increased cost of administration. It is expected that the rate of growth will be materially accelerated in the near future. For the last three months the increase has been at the rate of about 2,000 per month. My hon. friend has asked what is the relation of this work to the Department of Labour? Under the Act passed last session whereby provision is made for co-operation between the Federal Department of Labour and various Provincial Governments, a number of employment offices have been established throughout Canada. In each of these offices there is a representative of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. That representative is paid out of this vote. The object of having a representative of the department in each of these employment offices is to ensure that the returned soldier when he comes seeking employment not only gets a fair show, but is given the preference as far as is possible. It is proving to be of great advantage to have representatives of the department in all these employment offices throughout Canada. The representative is there to meet the soldier when he comes in, and to keep track of all opportunities of employment that may be available and to acquaint the men of them. I am glad to say that the results are proving very gratifying.

Up to the 17th of May, just a week ago, the number of applications from demobilized soldiers for employment was 30,146. The total number placed in positions was 22,838, being 75.7 per cent of the number of applications received. In addition to the placing of demobilized soldiers in employment, the representatives of this branch have interviewed on their return to Canada 150,297 members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force with a view to giving them information or assistance, and particularly for the purpose of properly informing each man as to the benefits which are provided by the Government of Canada for him.

The number of men seeking information from the representatives of the department on matters other than placement in employment averages about 40,000 per month.

Under this branch information was gathered from every soldier on the field as to the particular occupation or pursuit in which he would like to engage on his return.

The department has information collected from all the soldiers who were overseas which gives a full record in the case of every soldier and the occupation in which he desires to engage on his return to Canada. This involved the collection and tabulation of over 6,000,000 items of information. We were able to ascertain what percentage of men desired to engage in any particular occupation. All that information was collected and tabulated by the Information and Service Branch of the Department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does that include university training on the other side?

Mr. ROWELL: No; the Khaki University is under the Department of Militia and Defence.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like more details from the minister about this large item of $5,178,420. What is it for?

Mr. ROWELL:

Salaries—Administrative, clerical and industrial re-training.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister tell me how large a staff he has in these different branches?

Mr. ROWELL: The total number of employees to be paid out of this vote, on the 31st March, 1919, was 3,891. Of these 37.8 per cent are females in clerical positions not sought by returned soldiers. Of the total remaining 34.8 per cent had seen service in France; 4.7 per cent had seen service in England; 4.2 per cent had seen service in Canada; 2.2 per cent had been rejected or exempted; 6.6 per cent were over age or under age, and only 6.4 per cent were male employees who had not seen service in the C.E.F.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: You are classifying them altogether?

Mr. ROWELL: That is classifying them altogether.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What number are returned soldiers?

Mr. ROWELL: 1,698 actually served with the forces or 43.7 per cent of the total number of staff. If females are excluded the percentage of those who served with the forces is 81.5 per cent.

Mr. POWER: I have here Sessional Paper No. 263 being a return from the Department of the Secretary of State to a large number of questions. Amongst others there is the question whether it is true that only returned officers are offered the higher positions in this department. The answer is:

No. In selecting ex-members of the force for vacancies in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, the suitability of the applicant and his particular qualifications for the position are the determining factors.

That is very good. I quite agree with the minister but in selecting suitable persons to fill the higher positions, I think pains should be taken to inquire into the qualifications of not only returned officers but non-commissioned officers and men. The minister states that he has 6,000,000 odd records of these soldiers who were overseas. Surely, with these 6,000,000 odd records, and with 400,000 men, if the department would take the pains to look them over, they would find some men who had these qualifications and who possessed the peculiar knowledge of the needs of the returned soldier to fit them for the position of deputy minister or other higher positions.

Mr. ROWELL: I will convey my hon. friend's representations to the minister in charge of the department. I now have the information that the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) asked for as to the institutions in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island where training is being given. They are the Nova Scotia Agricultural College; Acadian Business College; Acadian University; General School, Glace Bay; Charlottetown Business College; County academy, Halifax; Dalhousie University; Dominion Navigation School, Halifax; King's College, Windsor; Maritime Business College, Halifax; Maritime Business College New Glasgow; Maritime College, Halifax; St. Dunstan's University, Charlottetown; Business College, Truro; Union Commercial College, Charlottetown; Nova Scotia Technical College, Halifax; Camp Hill Hospital, Halifax; Nova Scotia Sanatorium, Kentville.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I would like to express the wish that the minister who is piloting these Estimates through the House would impress upon the minister in charge of this department the necessity of giving greater consideration to the claims of returned soldiers. As one of the returned soldiers in this country I think it is an insult to this army that amongst these 400,000 men they should not have found a man capable of taking the deputy ministership of a department such as this one which is dealing entirely with the problems of this war and of the men who have been disabled through service to the country. It is all right enough to give men at the bottom the little jobs as clerks and errand boys but when you have men quite capable of filling many of the higher positions I think they ought to have them.

Mr. POWER: With regard to these many items of information which have been furnished, could the minister tell me how many times the overseas soldiers were examined in order to secure these 6,000,000 items? If my information is correct the soldiers were bothered to death with whole series of questions submitted to them by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. Under these circumstances I have no doubt that it was a comparatively easy matter to get these 6,000,000 items. I want to pass to another subject—the labour bureaus. I understand that 30,000 men have been given employment but no information has been given to the Committee to show how long these men remained at the employment which was provided for them or how many found suitable positions. My experience of sending men to the labour bureau in Quebec is that they are shipped to positions that they cannot hold either through being injured or through not having the requisite training. They remain for two or three hours, or perhaps a day, when they have to return to the department to seek more suitable positions. When a man with an injured hand is sent down to the railway station to be a mechanic or something of that kind, or to do work that he cannot possibly do, I do not see that there is any reason for congratulating the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment on what it has done in connection with finding employment for men. The experience of every member is to the effect that very few men placed by the department have remained in the positions which have been found for them.

Mr. ROWELL: The department has a system of follow-up in all cases where employment is secured with a view to seeing if the employment is satisfactory and assisting the soldiers in finding permanent positions. It may be quite true that some soldiers find position which are not suitable but every effort is made to secure such suitable employment as is available. Of course, the department cannot create employment. It can only offer the soldiers the best positions available. If he should find the position unsatisfactory and leave it, the department will endeavour to secure him another. The department follows him up to see that he gets satisfactory employment. 65.2 per cent of those who have been re-trained are still in the positions found for them when they graduated.

Mr. POWER: I know a farmer, a returned soldier, who went to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment looking for a position. It was in winter, and he could not farm then. He was offered a position as chauffeur for a doctor. "That is the only position we have," they said, "take it or leave it." The man had hardly seen an automobile before he went overseas, but he said he was willing to take the position, and do the best he could. The doctor gave him a week to learn, but he was not of a mechanical turn of mind and he could not learn in that time; so he lost this position. He went back to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment and they said: "We gave you a position, but you could not hold it." You could not blame the man for not holding it.

Hospitals and Sanatoria—salaries—doctors and nurses, $2,000,000—cooks, orderlies and general staff, $500,000.

Mr. COWAN: I think this is the proper item on which to discuss the dental service of this department. The minister announced very briefly this afternoon that he had decided to establish a dental service as distinct from the Canadian Army Dental Corps. The minister probably will not thank me for trying to make an announcement on his behalf, but as I happened to be, and have been for the last thirty-five years a dental surgeon, also assistant director of the Canadian Army Dental Service in military district No. 12 since that district was first formed, he will probably pardon me for making a few observations. In the first place, I approve most heartily of the course he is pursuing in establishing this separate dental service for the department. It may be asked why a separate service is necessary when the Canadian Army Dental Corps is in existence. As I see it, the Canadian Army Dental Corps has given to Canada a very satisfactory service. We have set a pace for the world. We have established a service that was unknown to us heretofore, and I think we have to thank probably the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence for the advance made in that regard. The Canadian Army Dental Corps has given to Canada a distinct and a new place in dentistry. Heretofore Canadian dentistry has been submerged, so to speak, under American dentistry; we had no distinct place of our own. It is due to the fact that we established this corps, and the further fact that it has given such magnificent service overseas, that Canada is recognized as occupying a distinct place in the dental world to-day. Wherever the corps has gone, they have always caused a good deal of jealousy among the dentists serving in the corps of other armies.

I suppose it will be asked why it was necessary to create a separate service. I approve most heartily of the step, because just as it would be inadvisable to put a dentist in control of the Army Medical Corps, it is equally inadvisable to put a medical man in control of the Dental Service. The two are distinct professions. We dentists have always felt that we had the business ability to handle satisfactorily our own affairs, and the record of the Canadian Army Dental Corps in this war has proved that ability conclusively. The corps has not caused any trouble at all, I am satisfied, to the Militia Department; it has served, and served well, and at salaries much lower than could have been earned in civilian practice.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The transfer has not been made yet?

Mr. COWAN: The minister this afternoon announced that he was going to establish that service. I have every reason to believe that the Canadian Army Dental Corps is to be continued for service to the Militia Department, and that this new branch is to be used in the service of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment.

Mr. ROWELL: I think my hon. friend understood me, but perhaps some other hon. members did not. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is not taking over the Dental Corps, but is establishing a branch for treating the ex-members of the forces coming under its care.

Major-General MEWBURN: We felt that during demobilization we could not disband the dental service. A very large number of men are coming back from overseas or are here already, some thirty thousand, who will require further dental treatment. Many of them are suffering from trench mouth and other mouth diseases, and it would be manifestly unfair not to give them treatment. At first we thought it could be done in connection with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, but that was not considered feasible. So after consultation, we decided to continue the Dental Service during the period of demobilization, so that the men requiring treatment could get it.

Mr. COWAN: I approve most thoroughly of the course which is being followed by both departments in connection with the dental service. In the position I occupied in Military District No. 12, it was my duty and opportunity to observe conditions, and I know something of them. Many of the men are coming back from overseas in a most deplorable condition, dentally speaking. The conditions under which they have been living for the last two or three years have brought about a dental condition which is very very difficult to deal with to-day, and the minister is absolutely right when he says that they should receive the necessary dental treatment until they are at least in the condition in which they were when they enlisted. It will take a considerable time, some months, for the Dental Corps as now established to finish up their work in connection with the Militia Department. It cannot be done in the time which was first specified, namely, sixty days after discharge; that is absolutely impossible. It would nave been equally impossible, if the corps had been demobilized as at first proposed, to attend to these men in our hospitals because they are already occupied by patients who require quietness more or less. Further, it would be utterly impossible for as satisfactory a service to be given in the hospitals, because the treatment is entirely different from that of the Dental Corps. For these reasons it was found advisable not to demobilize the corps, and I approve as strongly as I can of the course which is being pursued. I am satisfied that in about a year—I hope less— it will be possible to demobilize the corps, but I believe it will be necessary to continue for a very much longer period of time a Dental Service in connection with the hospitals.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Who appoints the doctors and the dentists?

Mr. ROWELL: The doctors would be selected by the Director of the Medical Service, and the dentists by the Director of the Dental Service.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: What percentage of the medical men appointed to this Soldiers' Re-Establishment Commission have seen service in France? I have been informed that practically all those employed are civilians who have never been out of the country.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is misinformed. My information is that in round figures 90 per cent of the men in the Medical Service have seen service overseas.

Pay and allowance for ex-soldiers and sailors undergoing medical treatment, $5,000,000; Vocational training, $3,500,000.

Mr. ROWELL: While the men are undergoing treatment they are entitled to pay and allowance, and that is the estimate of the amount required, having regard to the number who have been receiving treatment during the past year and the number that we anticipate will require treatment during the current year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are sailors on the same basis as soldiers?

Mr. ROWELL: On the same basis.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is, sailors in the Canadian Naval Service?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, those who suffered disability due to service are entitled to retraining or treatment.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many ex-soldiers and how many ex-sailors are now in the different hospitals?

Mr. ROWELL: 7,800 patients are now in the hospitals undergoing treatment for disability incurred on active service, 5,400 are receiving general treatment under the direction of medical and surgical experts, 1,800 are being treated in tuberculosis sanatoria, 600 mental cases are being treated.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does that include sailors?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes; I have not the division as between soldiers and sailors.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to know what is being done in my own province in regard to vocational training. Are many classes being taught, and in what lines?

Mr. ROWELL: In the province of Nova Scotia the department is conducting three schools itself, and it has arrangements with twelve other schools, and with forty-nine independent firms with whom certain soldiers are getting their industrial training, supplemented by a branch of this department. The particular institutions in the province of Nova Scotia, as of March 31, 1919, with which arrangements have been made for industrial retraining are as follows:

Mr. McKENZIE: In my own town I know a young man who lost his sight, and after coming back from France he entered some school of vocational training in England—I forget its name.

Mr. ROWELL: Would it be St. Dunstan's?

Mr. McKENZIE: I think so. First he learned stenography and became an efficient stenographer—and I mention it as an extraordinary thing that a man totally blind could learn stenography—but he was a strong, active fellow and preferred manual work, so in the same college he took up a carpentry course, which he completed. On returning home the college authorities gave him two suits of clothes and $250 cash. I do not know what the arrangement is, but I thought it was a very excellent institution, and if we have more of such institutions we will be doing some good.

Mr. ROWELL: An arrangement was worked out between the department and St. Dunstan's Hostel in England for the training of blinded ex-members of the Canadian Forces. Further arrangements have now been made for the continuation of their training if necessary in Canadian institutions. The St. Dunstan's scheme of aftercare for the blind is being fostered in Canada from Pearson Hall at Toronto, called after Sir Arthur Pearson, the head of St. Dunstan's Hostel. What they have done for the blind is almost a miracle, and too great credit cannot be given to Sir Arthur Pearson. We are trying to follow his example here.

ATHABASCA AND GRANDE PRAIRIE RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 72, to incorporate the Athabasca and Grande Prairie Railway Company, and recommending that the title thereof be changed to "An Act to incorporate the Athabasca Grande Prairie and Fort Vermilion Railway Company."—Mr. Tweedie—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 9—line of railway authorized:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has a plan of this line been deposited with the Department of Railways?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: A very complete map was placed before the Committee and the fullest information submitted in regard to the whole subject. Senator Pope was present and gave a detailed explanation of the reasons why this charter was asked for. The matter was thoroughly investigated by the Committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—issue of securities for purposes other than railway.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are the other purposes which this company have in mind?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I understand that the company have some 18,000 acres of coal lands in Alberta, not far from the Peace River district, and their intention is to build the line beyond the coal mines into the Peace River district for the purpose of distributing the coal. They have already paid into the Dominion Treasury about $125,000 in annual dues on these lands. The extent of the coal fields is reported to be very great and the quality of the coal the very best. They have already expended about $250,000 and cannot proceed any further until this line of railway is constructed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is an interior line; it does not reach any seaport?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It is an interior line. It does not parallel any other line; it is being built merely for distribution purposes. They connect with the National Transcontinental and the Canadian Pacific and distribute over a section of the Peace River district that at present has no railway facilities.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JURISDICTION OF PROVINCIAL COURTS IN DIVORCE CASES.

In Committee on Private Bills:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some time ago I asked the Acting Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Meighen) if he was aware that a case was pending before the Privy Council in connection with the claim made by the provinces in the West that Provincial Courts had jurisdiction in matters of divorce.

I asked the Acting Minister of Justice if the Federal Department of Justice was represented. I notice that the case is being or has been argued before the Privy Council, and that the Dominion Government is not represented. This is a very important matter affecting a question of the highest importance and one in which the Dominion Government ought to have been represented.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not familiar with the circumstances connected with the case to which my hon. friend has drawn attention, and I am therefore, not able to state whether it is a case in which it is proper that the Dominion should be represented. I would suggest that the hon. member ask the question of the Acting Minister of Justice when he returns from Winnipeg.

DEPOSITS IN DIVORCE CASES.

In Committee on Private Bills:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wonder if all the deposits have been made in these cases. I noticed in the press the other day that a senator stated that the deposits were not always made. It is simply appalling to think of the number of divorces that have come before Parliament this year. I think there are more cases of divorce this year than there have been since Confederation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry I have not the information respecting the matter.

Mr. CARVELL: These Bills have passed the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like to know from the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee if he has ascertained that all the deposits required by law in these cases have been made.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Probably when the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee (Mr. Steele) is in the House, my hon. friend will ask him.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 114 (from the Senate) for the relief of Vernon Balm Bailey—Mr. McCurdy.

Bill No. 102 (from the Senate) for the relief of Simon John Fraser.—Mr. Morphy.

Bill No. 111 (from the Senate) for the relief of Mary Ann Scheib.—Mr. Fripp.

DIVORCE.

On the motion of Mr. J. M. Douglas for the return to the Senate of the evidence taken in divorce cases:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am informed that the fees in these divorce cases are remitted. Of course in doing this we are facilitating the granting of divorces by the Parliament of Canada. I do not sit in the Committee when these cases come up because I do not recognize divorce, but as a public man and as a Canadian, I am appalled at the number of divorces Parliament is granting. There are more divorces during this session than since Confederation and that is a period of half a century. I had always thought that Canada was a British country, but we are being fast Americanized. In the United States there is one divorce for every twelve marriages. Ottawa is becoming the Reno of Canada as a result of the granting of innumerable divorces. I take the number of divorce Bills that we have passed this evening. Ten have received their third reading and five or six their second reading. Going on at this rate, it is evident that we are passing through a social revolution. The institution of the family on which society rests is passing through a crucial test indeed. I would certainly object to the remission of the fees in these cases.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply —Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Works—chargeable to income—harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia, $201,330.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Does that mean that all these items go through in bulk?

The CHAIRMAN: Unless there is a special motion that we take the resolution up item by item. They are all included in one resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE moved:

That the resolution be considered item by item.

Motion agreed to.

Arisaig—repairs to wharf, $3,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When will that work be done?

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): We will proceed with it just as soon as the money is available. Wherever it is possible, to prepare the plans and specifications they are being prepared and there will be some cases in connection with this list in which we have actually called for tenders before the money is voted, taking the ground that a vote of one-sixth of the Estimates is a justification for proceeding. We have found in the past, and I believe it has been the experience of all ministers and of the department generally that a great deal of time is lost by reason of waiting until the Estimates are all passed by the House. It takes some time to get these works under way and our intention is to have the work started at the earliest possible moment and to have it finished before cold weather comes on.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This work is very much needed. The wharf at Arisaig is in very bad condition. But if the Department of Public Works comes along in its usual leisurely way, I am afraid the work will be of very little use to the people during the present season. I would urge upon the minister the importance of having this matter attended to with as little delay as possible.

Mr. CARVELL: I appreciate that.

Boisdale—wharf, $1,800.

Mr. McKENIE: That is to replace a wharf that was there before?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, for repairs.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister intend calling for tenders?

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

East Bay Beach—wharf extension, $650.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that the wharf at the head of the bay?

Mr. CARVELL: Beach Bay is off the Bras d'Or lake somewhere. My hon. friend ought to know the geography of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know the place very well. It used to be called the Head of the Bay.

Ecum Secum—completion of wharf, $1,700.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is meant by "completion?" That wharf was built not more than eight or ten years ago. I understand it is not in very good repair, and that this money is being voted for the purpose of putting the wharf in repair. Am I right in that?

Mr. CARVELL: This is for the building up of a crib 40 by 40 feet and 4 feet high, and also the building up of a crib 26 by 20 feet and 10 feet high, in order to complete the wharf which was constructed in 1914.

Gabarus—extension of beach protection, $1,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that for a new work or is it to extend a section of Gabarus harbour?

Mr. CARVELL: This is to continue the pile protection work to the already existing wharf and for the protection of the harbour.

Mr. McKENZIE: Last fall, or a year ago last fall, there was a terrific gale that did a great deal of damage to public works in that district. Many claims or demands came to the department for repairs after the storm. I understand that there was considerable damage done to the wharf at Gabarus. This is probably for replacing or extending the work that was done before?

Mr. CARVELL: It is.

Livingstone's Cove—to repair and strengthen wharf, $4,600.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is to be done there?

Mr. CARVELL: This is to repair the damage caused by the severe storm of November, 1918. A cribwork block 65 feet long, 16 feet wide, and of an average depth of 16 feet, is to be constructed. The block will have a creosoted substructure.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What I said about Arisaig applies to these other places.

Mr. CARVELL: I can assure my hon. friend it applies to every public work for which I am asking an appropriation. I appreciate as much as anybody the necessity of getting to work early. I admit that we did not make as early a start last year as we should have done, and I am afraid that in many cases this year we shall not accomplish all we wish to do. Every week I demand from the engineering office a statement of the entire progress on all important works under the department; a statement also of the works for which tenders are being called; a statement of the works in respect of which we shall be able to call for tenders next week; and another statement showing the preparations. I find that demanding this information hurries things along. We must have about three or four dozen works now actually contracted for in different parts of the country for which the money has not yet actually been voted.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the material been ordered for the work at Livingstone's Cove, and have any steps been taken in the construction of the wharf?

Mr. CARVELL: No. The difficulty is this: We are taking the ground that on any public work for which we can call for tenders we are justified in calling for tenders even before the Main Estimates are voted, but in respect of works which must be done by day labour, such as small repairs like this, we have to have the money voted before we can pay the bills.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We voted one-sixth part of the Estimates some two months ago. That would surely enable the minister to take some action in preparing for the work this summer. At least, he could have contracted for the material. I presume that in nearly all these cases the work will have to be done by day labour because you cannot very well contract for these repairs. Consequently, it is of the greatest importance that material should be ordered as early in the season as possible. This is one of the worst seasons of the year in which to obtain material in that locality, because the farmers are all busy and no one can be got to do that kind of work, whereas a month or two ago they would have been very glad of the opportunity of taking out some timber and getting ready for the season's work. But that time has passed, and there is no help for it. All I will say is that it is not the way we would like the business to be done. There is very urgent need of the repairs to Malignant Cove, which is the next item, and the deputy minister was kind enough to tell me that he would do something towards having those repairs made. The top of the wharf has been carried off and landed in a field some distance away, where some farmer rescued it. The planks are there and it is very important that the repairs should be made because a ship discharges there and the wharf is required for the goods. Has the minister had any word from the locality about what is being done there?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I do not think any word has come back. But positive instructions were given to the engineer to proceed with the work at once. As to the other wharf my hon. friend referred to, I cannot say that instructions have been given to procure materials for this particular work, but we have already made arrangements for a large amount of material in all parts of Canada in order to be ready to start work as soon as the money is available.

Neil's Harbour—repairs to breakwater wharf, $1,100.

Mr. McKENZIE: This wharf is also a breakwater. Neil's Harbour is a fishing village of considerable importance, and before the breakwater was constructed the fishermen did not have very much shelter for their boats, and consequently had to haul their boats up every night and launch them next morning. Since the breakwater was constructed they have been able to anchor inside, and this convenience has brought quite a number of new settlers to Neil's Harbour. In the terrific storm last year the breakwater was pretty badly battered, and I presume the minister has received a report on the damage done.

Mr. CARVELL: The damage was caused in the terrific gale of November 4, 1918. The estimated cost of the repairs is $1,100, covering round timber, guard rails, facetimbers, sheathing, covering, fenders, ballast, etc.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope that $1,100 will be enough to restore the breakwater to its former condition. But as soon as possible the minister should have the breakwater extended for about its present length. The shelter afforded by the present breakwater is not very great, and on account of the number of boats—and larger boats are coming there for shelter—there is not sufficient space for all behind the breakwater, and the request of the fishermen for some years back has been that the breakwater should be extended so as to give them more room. I can assure the minister that it is not throwing money away to increase the fishing facilities along the coast of Nova Scotia. It is quite unnecessary to point out what a splendid food is the fish these fishermen catch, and how important it is they should have the opportunity of taking this harvest of the sea where there is an abundance of it; but it is impossible to reap the harvest unless facilities of this kind are put at the disposal of the fishermen. I keenly realize that money is scarce and hard to get—I must say, however, that large votes are being taken which I think could have been postponed for the present—and in view of the financial condition of the country I have not the appetite, shall I say, to press very hard for an expenditure at the present moment, but I trust that when our finances are in a little better shape this breakwater will be extended.

I would like the minister to bear in mind that we had in the Estimates of 1911-12 large votes for works in various parts of the Dominion—considerable of which was in the county that I represent. The Minister of Public Works of that time, Hon. Mr. Rogers, always told us that as soon as the war was over and conditions got better the works so provided for would be the first to receive the attention of the Government. Carrying out that idea, if the minister will look back to what was in the Estimates in 1911-12 after the change of Government, he will see that a great many of the works have been dropped. I cannot put my finger on the page of Hansard where that promise was made, but it was made repeatedly, that before the Government undertook anything new in the line of public works the old programme would be carried out. If the old programme were carried out in regard to my own county I would be very well satisfied, for facilities would be afforded to the fishermen along the eastern coast of the counties of Victoria and Cape Breton that would be of very great benefit indeed. And those facilities would not be altogether for the benefit of the local fishermen. Boats come from all parts of Nova Scotia to the fishing grounds off the coast, and safe anchorage is just as necessary for them as for the local boats. I have said on several occasions, and I repeat it now, that no other industry in Canada to-day holds out such prospect of profitable development as the fisheries both of the Atlantic and the Pacific coast, and I would impress upon the minister and the Government the opportunity which presents itself to them to make a record in connection with the development and proper handling of that great industry.

Port Hood—wharf repairs and extension, $7,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What repairs were done at Port Hood?

Mr. CARVELL: This is to repair the present work and to construct a new block 20 by 100 feet on the southern end of the block constructed during 1914-15. It is estimated that the cost will be $7,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: This wharf has an exposed location which renders it essential that the work should be done as soon as possible. As to the importance of the wharf I need say nothing, for it is the only wharf along that shore, and quite a trade is carried on there. Unless the work is done early in the summer it cannot be undertaken at all.

Mr. CARVELL: This work will be pushed forward just as rapidly as possible.

Saw Pit—wharf improvements, $1,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is something new. We have heard about a mere sawdust wharf; this is Saw Pit wharf?

Mr. CARVELL: It is in Lunenburg county, but it is not a sawdust wharf.

Mr. DUFF: There are two Saw Pit wharves in Nova Scotia. I am not sure if this is in Lunenburg county or not—I hope it is.

Mr. CARVELL: This is in Lunenburg county. It is only worth $1,000. It might be built partly of sawdust—I am not sure.

Scotch Cove (White Point)—breakwater extension, $8,400.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a White Point in my county, but I do not think this is my White Point.

Mr. FIELDING: It is in Queens county, I hope.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is in North Cape Breton. It is for the purpose of extending the present breakwater. The contract is for an extension, 50 feet long by 30 feet wide, to the present breakwater which was originally built at a cost of $28,934.

9 p.m.

Mr. McKENZIE: This extension is just exactly the improvement that I was praying for at Neil's Harbour, but we have reason to be thankful that we are getting this extension. White Point would be a better name for the place than Scotch Cove. It may be called Scotch Cove, but not to my knowledge. I think when the wharf was built it was called White Point wharf.

Yarmouth Bar—repairs and improvements, $4,500.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have directed the attention of the department to the need of repairs to the wharf at Baddeck. There are breaks in the sides and at the ends; the ballast is running out, and the condition of the wharf is getting bad very rapidly. There is much tourist travel at that point in the summer season, and we take pride in the good appearance of our wharves and landing-places. The repairs required are not very extensive, and I hope the minister will do what is necessary to put this wharf in good shape.

Mr. CARVELL: That is under consideration.

Mr. FIELDING: These Estimates were prepared, I assume, some months ago, and since their preparation the minister has no doubt received from his officials information which will be very useful in the preparation of the Supplementary Estimates. I take it for granted that in urgent cases brought to the minister's attention by his own engineers, provision will be made for such works as may be necessary. At all events, we may be permitted to hope so.

Mr. CARVELL: If I provided in the Supplementary Estimates for all works that have been suggested by engineers and interested parties the amount would stagger my hon. friend, who for many years was the watch-dog of the Treasury. These small works, which are constructed chiefly of wood, are naturally subject to the wear and tear of the elements, and during the war they have probably not been taken care of as they should have been. A series of storms last autumn caused damage along the Atlantic coast which will probably run into half a million dollars. In many cases we were unable to have accurate surveys made at the time these Estimates were prepared, and my hon. friend is right in saying that we have much information to-day which we did not have then. I am afraid, therefore, that additional amounts will have to be voted in the Supplementary Estimates in respect of many of the items in the Main Estimates.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: A work in my constituency that is in very much need of attention is the breakwater at New Harbour. This breakwater was built ten or twelve years ago—perhaps more than that—but it was never finished and it is not sufficiently long to protect all the fishing boats. Before the breakwater was built, the fishermen there had to pull their boats upon the beach and sometimes sit up all night to look after them in case of a storm. After the construction of the breakwater a certain number of boats were able to find shelter behind it, and a flourishing village has grown up at that place, where a large fishing business is carried on. But the breakwater is not long enough to protect all the boats that operate in that harbour; when a storm comes some of them are unable to crowd in behind the breakwater. In 1911 the Government of that day voted $10,000 to complete this breakwater by extending it some 300 feet or more out into the harbour. The vote was carried along for one or two years after the change of Government and then it was dropped, with the promise that it would be restored. But time has passed and nothing has been done. I have not been asking for anything in my constituency during the war, because I wanted to assist the Government in saving as much money as possible. As a matter of fact, there is only one small item in these estimates for the county of Guysborough. That is for $1,700 for repairs to one wharf. There are 150 miles of coast line in Guysborough county. That county is also one of the greatest fishing counties in Nova Scotia. I wish to say that the case of New Harbour is a very urgent one. I see that $60,000 is appropriated for harbours and rivers generally in Nova Scotia. I do not know whether the minister could find the money in that vote for this work at New Harbour, but I do know that nowhere along the coast of that province is a work more needed than it is at that place. I would urge the minister and his staff to do something in the matter and provide shelter for the fishing boats and greatly assist production in that locality. No expenditure anywhere in Canada has produced better results than have come about through the construction of the breakwater in that harbour, but unless we complete it, sufficient protection for the fishermen who do business there will not be afforded. I leave the matter in the hands of the minister, and would urge him to give it special attention.

Another matter has been drawn to my attention, a very important one, about which nothing has been done. At Wine Harbour, further west on the Atlantic coast, a storm filled up the channel. The boats could not get in or out of the harbour, and the cellars in the village were flooded with water. When the people asked the Public Works Department to do something about it, they got the reply that the department had nothing to do with it; that it was purely a muncipal affair. But it was the closing of the mouth of the harbour by the storm that caused the trouble in the village. While the department is not responsible for keeping water out of cellars it is part of its duty to keep the harbour open. A very small amount of hand dredging would have done the work. There was no municipal authority to attend to it and it has not been done. I submit, with all seriousness, that it is really the duty of the Public Works Department to open up that harbour with as little delay as possible. Will the minister do it?

Mr. CARVELL: I have heard of the latter case; it was brought to my attention some time ago. I cannot agree with my hon. friend that the Public Works Department was responsible for the storm. My hon. friend might have a logical reason for asking the department to dredge out the sand and gravel that have been deposited by the storm, but I do not think that we can be held responsible for the flooding of cellars. As to the other matter, this is the first I have heard of it. Although this work is well known in the department, the particular matter mentioned by my hon. friend has not been brought to my personal attention. I shall be happy to give it the best consideration that I can. I would not like to say that it will be provided for out of the general vote of $60,000; it has been the experience of the department that these general votes are always required to take care of ordinary matters that come up during the year. A storm arises and a wharf or a breakwater is damaged to some extent, and it has to be repaired immediately. But if it be at all possible, I will endeavour to see if we cannot build the extension asked for by my hon. friend.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $14,000.

Mr. McISAAC: Under this item I should like to ask the minister regarding a couple of public works which are very necessary and to which I have already directed his attention. One is the projected boat harbour at North lake, in King's county. The minister has before him all the data concerning this work and is also advised of the reasons why it is so necessary. What a haven it would be for fishing boats along the coast, because there is no other place within twenty-five miles where they can enter for shelter. These are excellent fishing grounds. This public work was projected before the war, and tenders were called for, but in consequence of the outbreak of the war the matter was dropped. Since then nature has done something to our advantage; it has changed the outlet of the lake, and under present conditions it will not require more than about one-third of what it would have originally cost to construct this work. In addition to this, if the harbour is built and solid side walls constructed, it would afford the provincial government an opportunity of building a bridge across the outlet, which would be of great convenience to the people, shortening their travel in that section. I sincerely trust the minister will be able to bring down in his Supplementary Estimates an amount sufficient for this public work so extremely necessary, and which I have been endeavouring to get for the last two or three years.

I have also called the minister's attention to the necessity for a small wharf at a point on a little island called Boughton island, on which there are some eighteen or twenty farmers who are great producers, but who have no means of getting the products of their farms—and they are good farmers—to Prince Edward Island, which for them is the mainland, across a small strait, except in dories. The provincial government have projected a highway right across the centre of the island down to tide-water, and if such a wharf as desired could be built, at which large gasoline boats could be loaded, it would be of the greatest possible convenience to these people who are so isolated, and would enable them to carry their products to the mainland. If the minister would be able to bring down in his Supplementary Estimates amounts to cover these two items of necessary public expenditure it would be deemed a great favour and would be of the greatest possible convenience to the people to be served thereby.

Mr. CARVELL: I want to assure the constituents of my hon. friend that if they do not get these works it will not be because their representative has not done his duty.

Quebec—Gross Isle quarantine station, extension of wharves, $50,000.

Mr. PARENT: Has a contract been given for this work?

Mr. CARVELL: No. The plans are practically completed now and we are about to call for tenders.

Isle Verte—repairs to wharf.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Isle Verte is on the south side, but opposite Isle Verte there is Green Island, and I regret to see that there is not a sum sufficient to finish or extend even one work there. The residents of this place are not wealthy. It is very difficult for them to send their products to Quebec, and the river is their only means of transport. A few years ago they started two wharves, one at the upper and the other at the lower end of the island. The one at the upper end is not completed, and the lower one, opposite Isle Verte, should be extended so as to enable the biggest schooner to reach the wharf. These people exported last year over 24,000 bushels of potatoes to Quebec, and apart from the fish they catch, this is all they have to live on. I should like the minister to take a note of this matter with a view to seeing if there is a possibility of having an extension built on the lower wharf, the cost of which will only be a few hundred dollars.

Mr. CARVELL: This is the first time this matter has been brought to my attention as far as I can remember. I shall certainly take a note of the matter and have an investigation made.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I was sorry to see that sufficient work had not been done at Isle Verte, but I must say that I was pleased that nothing had been done at Cacouna East. I would like to know if the report is true that some money is to be expended on the wharf at Cacouna East. I do not want to take up the time of the committee in speaking about that small wharf, but I think it is a useless wharf and an expenditure of money on it will be unnecessary. I understand that $100 is to be spent on it this summer.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no personal knowledge of the matter but will be glad to make an investigation. Only yesterday the hon. gentleman spoke to me about it and I have not had time to consider the subject. The amount is very small, but if as he says it is unnecessary to spend the money the expenditure ought not to be made.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Only two years ago an expenditure was made merely for the purpose of erecting a fence on each side of the approach to the wharf, and if the minister were acquainted with the locality he would know that the money was uselessly spent. The municipal road skirts the shore and the farmers reside south of the road. The road is free and there is no necessity whatever for a fence because there are no cattle to trespass. It is a very easy matter to have petitions signed. I know that the resident engineer is anxious to convince the minister that the wharf was a necessity, but unfortunately the member wants to impress on the minister that it is not, and that in fact that the wharf is useless. It is a contest between the member and the resident engineer, who, however, by some means or other succeeded in having a petition signed by about a hundred persons. I am told that even merchants six or seven miles down in Isle Verte signed the petition insisting on the necessity of a wharf at Cacouna East. It is all very well to have a hundred signatures to a petition, and I am not opposed to the expenditure of money in my riding when I am convinced that there is a real necessity for it, but when I see $100 spent for nothing, just to please an individual I must enter a protest, and accordingly I call the minister's attention to the matter.

Mr. CARVELL: If the facts are as stated by the member the money will not be expended. I will see that an investigation is made immediately.

St. Laurent, Island of Orleans—Repairs to wharf, $15,000.

Mr. PARENT: With regard to the wharf on the Island of Orleans this item is rather large but I suppose it is due to the storm that occurred last fall destroying the wharf. I understand that the policy generally followed by the department is that when an amount is voted exceeding $5,000 the work must be given by contract and tenders called for. But I would urge upon the minister, owing to the wharf having been practically destroyed, the necessity of having the works started at once and not waiting until tenders are called for. The same remark applies to the wharf at St. Jean, which has suffered from the same storm and is in about the same condition.

St. Anne de Beaupré—Wharf repairs and reconstruction, $39,000.

Mr. CARVELL: As regards the item under discussion—Ste. Anne de Beaupré—over a week ago special orders were given for the construction of a temporary landing place with a plank walk leading to the shore and it is our hope that the work will be all completed inside of two weeks from to-day or to-morrow at the outside. We realized that if this work was to be of use this year it must be done immediately because of the immense traffic that takes place there in the month of June. A temporary landing will therefore be ready inside of two weeks and that will enable us to properly prepare plans and we expect to call for tenders and have the work completed during the summer.

Ste. Famille—wharf repairs and reconstruction, $17,000.

Mr. FOURNIER: Is there anything provided in the Estimates for a wharf at St. Valerie in Bellechasse county? The wharf there was destroyed last fall.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot state to my hon. friend what may appear in the Supplementary Estimates. I can only say that it has been put up to me in the most forcible manner possible by my hon. friend. And, as I told my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. McIsaac) it will not be the fault of the hon. member (Mr. Fournier) if his constituency does not receive the improvement he asks.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I want to say a word about the titles to land taken for wharves. Perhaps the minister is aware that application has been made for a petition of right by the Seigneur, Mr. Fraser, of Rivière du Loup, against the Government on the pretext that the land and everything else in his seigneury belongs to him, even the fish in the river; the farmers are not allowed to fish. The seigneur does not allow the farmers to take the sand but charges them ten cents for every load they take to put upon the road. Those representing the seigneury have petitioned the Government under the pretext that the Government must pay them either a yearly rental or a certain purchase price for the whole property. I see that the minister has an able lawyer in his department. I have to congratulate him upon that, because we do not want the case to be in the hands of lawyers named by the Department of Justice; I have not much confidence in that quarter. A lawyer has already been named by the Minister of Justice to attend to that very case, but what has the Department of Justice to do with a case which properly belongs to the Department of Public Works? I want the minister to take note of that. If a petition of right is granted and the case goes to court let him have a lawyer to study the case, let him come to Rivière du Loup, look over the matter and see that justice is done to whom justice is due. If the minister wants to come and see for himself he will be welcome.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do not go on Sunday.

Mr. CARVELL: I will not go on Sunday to Rivière du Loup.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. GAUVREAU: No minister will denounce you from the pulpit. I am quite satisfied that the minister is right when he tells me that nothing will be spent at Cacouna East. I think his intentions are good but I would like to know if, in his absence—I will not say behind his back—there is any means by which the deputy minister or the chief engineer, or some other official, where only a small amount is involved, can write to the resident engineer and say: "Spend such and such a sum of money on such and such a work," this money being taken out of the vote for harbours and rivers.

Harbours and rivers, generally, repairs and improvements, $75,000.

Can this be done without the knowledge of the minister?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, some little matters of that kind can be done without the knowledge of the minister, although there has not been very much money expended in the last year and a half by the Public Works Department that the minister has not had personal knowledge of. I assure my hon. friend that if I live until Monday morning I will see that a pretty rigid investigation is made into the matter he has referred to. If the facts are as he has stated, there will not be any money expended there this year. As to the other matter, I am quite familiar with these points involved in connection with one big seigneury down on the lower St. Lawrence. The point is one of such importance that it should be decided by the court according to the law and facts of the case. I think my hon. friend is perhaps a little severe on the Department of Justice. It has been rather an unbusinesslike arrangement that has been carried on ever since Confederation by which matters are handed over to the Justice Department by the different departments requiring legal advice. That is all right if you want simply a decision upon an abstract principle of law, but unfortunately the custom has been for many years that where there was litigation the matter was handed over to a local solicitor who might be subject to all sorts of local influences, and he was the Department of Justice, representing the Dominion of Canada. I have tried to adopt a different course. I have secured the services of a man in whom I have absolute confidence, a lawyer who has had very great experience in arbitration and expropriation cases. The Department of Justice was consulted before the appointment was made and gave its hearty assent and is loyally working in conjunction with the solicitor of the Department of Public Works in all these matters, the one referred to by the hon. gentleman included. It is being looked after by the solicitor of the Department of Public Works in connection with the Department of Justice, because, while we have no legal right to go into court and take charge of this case, we do have the right to take a very active part in the preparation of the case, and we will be there and see that it is properly put before the court.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is this very interesting law point? Is it about land?

Mr. CARVELL: The point is whether the seigneurs have the ownership in the sites of all the wharves down the river St. Lawrence which are located upon the seigneuries. A sort of test case is being raised at Riviere du Loup.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The pretext of the seigneurs is that they are the owners of the land down to low tide, and they claim that you have no right to place the wharf there unless you pay a certain amount to them.

Mr. CARVELL: That we are practically trespassers in very many cases.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am surprised that that point has not been settled. When I was Solicitor General the case came before the department. The Seigneur of Riviere du Loup claimed that he was the sole proprietor of the seaweed. People from time immemorial had gathered the seaweed in summer time but he claimed that, under his title, the people could not take the seaweed. I had a commission appointed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries and, if I remember correctly, the commission decided that it was not a weed, but an animal; it even had claws, and therefore the seigneur, Mr. Fraser, could not claim to be entitled to the seaweed. That was the decision given by Professor Prince after consultation with another authority on fish. It would be a very easy thing for the department to determine whether the seigneur can claim the shore as his property; his rights must be well defined in the title. We had a similar case in Gaspé around Grande River. We had the case tested, and the preposterous claims of the seignieur were set aside by the Privy Council, and the people were given the right to use the shore.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The case is not the same in all the seigneuries. In the case at Rivière du Loup the title given by the King of France was to certain land along the river St. Lawrence with the shore and shelter in front of that land. In other seigneuries, title is given only as far as the river, and does not include the shore. I do not think the seigneurs have any right to claim compensation for the land on which a wharf is built, because in all the titles navigation rights are excepted. Of course, wharves are built for navigation purposes, and surely the rights of the public are paramount to those of the seigneurs. I do not think the Government would have any difficulty in winning these cases.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the point at issue. I have not studied it closely, but I know generally what the situation is. The case is under preparation by the department to be tested out in the courts, and when the case is decided we shall know what the court says, at all events. I am afraid the decision of Professor Prince is not of very much assistance to us when a wharf is in question, because while a wharf may have claws to fasten it to the ground, it could hardly be construed as an animal.

Harbours and rivers—Ontario—Pembroke—repairs to wharf, $1,500.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: I would draw the minister's attention to the exceptionally dangerous condition of this wharf. Six large boats use it, and I would not take the price of any one of them to go on that wharf at night, it is so exceedingly dangerous. I trust that within a very few days after the passing of this item something will be done to improve the condition of the wharf.

Mr. CARVELL: We are now preparing plans and specifications for every work which can be done by tender and contract, and we have already called for tenders in a great many cases. I presume the work at Pembroke will have to be done by day labour and in the case of all small repairs of this kind we intend to start work just as soon as the item is passed and finish up the work before August or September. I can assure my hon. friend that we will be at work on this wharf within a few days.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: The work required is patching the surface.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I presume the minister's remarks apply also in the case of the wharf at Cornwall.

Mr. CARVELL: My remarks apply to every public work for which we are asking an appropriation.

Dredging—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $45,000.

Mr. PARENT: With regard to this item, perhaps the minister may think that we are quite persistent in our request for certain works on the River St. Charles, in the province of Quebec. It just occurs to me that if the works cannot be proceeded with in connection with the building of the dam, perhaps we could find some means of dredging the river so as to accomplish what the people are so anxious to have done. In looking over Hansard recently I read the statement made by the minister on the 13th of May to the effect that if the works on the St. Charles river had not been proceeded with it was due to the fact that that part of the contract under which the city of Quebec was to take care of the sewage was never performed. Here is what my hon. friend said:

> The sewage of at least three-quarters of the city of Quebec enters into the St. Charles river above the location of this dam and before the work was started an agreement was made with the city of Quebec by which they were to provide for the sewage.

My information is that the contract did not contain any such agreement. What it did contain was an agreement on the part of the city not to ask the Government to pay any of the expenses that might be incurred by reason of any change in the sewerage of the city. It was not a condition that completion of the works was to be dependent upon the sewage being taken care of by the city. All the department has to do is to go ahead with the works, and it will be then for the city of Quebec to attend to their sewage, if it is found necessary to do so.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has correctly interpreted my words, and if I put his version of the contract along side of mine, I do not think there will be very much difference between us. He may be using the exact words of the agreement, and I may be paraphrasing them. There is no doubt there was an agreement or understanding with the city of Quebec that they should provide for the sewage. It is quite true we might go on and spend another $2,000,000—it will take that much to finish the works—and then when we had expended that much and waited for three months and found we had a cesspool there causing typhoid fever and other diseases, we would have to say: "We have got to take out these works in order that the city may put in its sewerage." That is not good business. I would very much like to go on with this work. In July last I had some correspondence with the mayor of Quebec. I called his attention to the fact that the city had not carried out their part of the agreement, and intimated that I did not see how we could go along until some provision was made to take care of the sewage. I think my hon. friend, with his intimate knowledge of the location, is sufficient of an engineer to know exactly what could happen in three or four months' time with the small amount of water coming down the St. Charles river, if we built that dam and made a pond behind it. Much as I would like to proceed with the work, I do not see how we could go on with it until something is done by the city. If they would make arrangements to do the work we might start simultaneously. But until something is done by which we 10 p.m. are assured that the city will carry out their part of the agreement, I do not think we would be justified in doing anything further.

As to the dredging, I do not think my hon. friend is serious. Unfortunaetly no money can be expended by the Public Works Department which gives so little labour, considering the amount of money expended, as on dredging. Dredging is practically a machine proposition, and very few men are needed to operate a very extensive dredge. Then, on the other hand, if you are going on with the dam proposition and raise the water fifteen feet, you do not need very much dredging, because then you create an artificial lake with fifteen feet more water in it than there is at the present time. So I think my hon. friend, when he thinks it over, will see that it would not be a good business proposition to proceed with these works until some arrangement is come to with the city of Quebec.

Mr. PARENT: It will take a certain time before the works are finished. In the meantime, if the Government does proceed with the work it could get into communication with the city.

Mr. CARVELL: I would rather make an arrangement first.

Mr. PARENT: The contract says plainly that the Government will first start the work, and when it is finished the city will attend to its part of the contract. That is the way I understand the terms of the contract. But I understand that my hon. friend is afraid of typhoid and other diseases resulting from the completion of the dam. I would remind him that there is not only a dam to be erected, but locks also, and when the works are finished it would be very easy to prevent typhoid by opening the locks and letting the river flow through as before. I call my hon. friend's attention specially to this, that an enormous amount of money has been spent on these works, and they are deteriorating while in an incomplete state, so that a lot of money is being lost in that way. If proceeded with I think the country should win out in the end.

Mr. McKENZIE: Some years ago certain dredging was done at the mouth of the Little Bras d'Or harbour. I think I brought it to the notice of the minister last year. I do not know whether anything was done to complete the work after we discussed the matter in the House?

Mr. CARVELL: I think nothing was done.

Mr. McKENZIE: A good deal of money was spent there some years ago with very excellent results, making a splendid harbour and a good channel to the mouth of the Bras d'Or—creating a new harbour practically. The harbour was there, but there was a bar across the mouth of it. That bar was partly removed and a depth of about twenty-two feet of water obtained. But there are patches here and there that were not cleaned out, and in that way of course the channel is dangerous. The amount of work left undone is comparatively small.

In connection with that I would like to call the attention of the minister to the following. A delegation from North Sydney, consisting of the mayor of that town and Dr. McLean, waited on the minister some six weeks ago in connection with a relatively small amount of dredging at Sydney. I have not heard whether or not anything was done; the only difficulty was the obtaining of a proper dredge to do the work.

Mr. CARVELL: Last year our whole plan was disorganized by the loss of the dredge Cape Breton. Moreover, we had a dredge that was to do some of this work along the coast and then proceed to Yarmouth, but the demand came for the construction of the hydroplane station at North Sydney and the dredge was taken there and remained there during the latter part of the season. There is a dredge now in New Brunswick; it is fitted up and ready to start on Monday morning to do some of this work. It is to go to Sydney and Bras d'Or and also to North Sydney. It is our intention, unless something happens that we cannot foresee, to carry out during the present summer all the work to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where is the dredge that was working at North Sydney in connection with the hydroplane station? Is it still there?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but that is a suction dredge; the work referred to by my hon. friend must be done by a dipper dredge. There is no dipper dredge in that locality, but one will go down there some time in the early summer.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Is anything in contemplation with regard to dredging at Little Current? It is anticipated that 150,000 tons of coal will go into Little Current during this season, but because of the condition of the channel only small boats can go to the wharf. Light-draft boats going into the upper lakes with coal cannot carry back large cargoes, and if such boats must be used the difficulty with regard to getting tonnage will be increased.

Mr. CARVELL: We have no dredge on the lakes that would be available for the work at Little Current. This matter was brought to my attention a number of times last year. But there is another work at Little Current which I think we must go on with. A very serious fire occurred there some months ago and the wharves were burned down. While I cannot make any positive announcement, I feel that something must be done at once, and quite a large expenditure will be involved. Whether it will be possible to carry on both works at that important point this summer I am not sure, but one or the other will be proceeded with. The matter that my hon. friend has directed attention to will certainly be discussed when the Supplementary Estimates are being prepared.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I would not like the minister to feel that I suggest for a moment that the dredging should have precedence over the re-construction of the wharf, because the wharf is a vital necessity; they cannot get along without it.

Roads and bridges, $309,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Speaking generally, bridges are supposed to be controlled by local governments, but there seem to be exceptions. Perhaps the minister could give in each case, very briefly, an explanation of how these expenditures on bridges come to be chargeable to the Dominion.

Mr. CARVELL: The first item is the Banff bridge. Banff, as my hon. friend is aware, is in a Dominion reservation known as the National Park, all public buildings in which are under the purview of the Dominion Parliament. I personally inspected the Banff bridge; it really must be attended to. It is an ordinary light steel bridge which was probably quite sufficient for the traffic when it was constructed twenty-five years ago, but which is entirely inadequate now. There is a tremendous tourist traffic over this bridge in summer. We are asking for $100,000, but that will not be sufficient to build the new bridge. There has been a good deal of discussion about the character of the proposed bridge. The people are very anxious that it shall be built along certain artistic lines. They want an arch bridge instead of a steel bridge, and they are desirous that it shall be in keeping with the rest of the works around that important centre—the Canadian Pacific hotel at Banff, and other public buildings. After investigating their request carefully we found that the granting of it would involve a very large expenditure. We had designed an ordinary steel bridge. The engineers are now working on a sort of combination steel and concrete arch bridge which will meet the traffic requirements and at the same time comply with the wishes of the people of that vicinity. The Canmore bridge is also in the National Park.

The next item is a contribution by the Dominion of $7,000 for repairs to the Capilano river bridge. The Capilano river flows into Burrard Inlet and is west of the Indian reserve. I am just a little doubtful whether we have overstepped the mark or not in this vote, but I did not make the grant without personally inspecting the bridge. It seems that some dredging was done by the department two or three years ago at the head of Capilano river, and the contention is that this dredging so changed the channel of the river that it undermined the piers of a fine bridge that had been erected by the municipality on the route of a very important highway. One marvels sometimes, when he sees the splendid public works that have been built out in the country in these western districts, at the faith which the people there possess. I feel that I would hesitate before I would spend the large amount of money which has been spent in that part of the country on such works. They, however, did it, and one of the piers of this bridge was washed away. It was contended by the engineers—and from what little knowledge and experience I had in looking it over I agreed with them—that the damage resulted to a certain extent from our works. The proposition was then made that we divide the cost between the Dominion and the province and the municipality, and an agreement was entered into; in fact, I think the bridge has been constructed, and this item appears in the Estimates to cover it.

Mr. CROWE: I understood that the repairs of the Capilano bridge would cost something around $30,000; that the municipality and the provincial government offered to contribute some $10,000 or $11,000 each, and that the Federal Government was going to contribute $10,000 or $11,000. The amount of $7,000 will not be enough to contribute one-third of the cost of the repairs.

Mr. CARVELL: The next item is "Edmonton—repairs to bridge." This is a small amount of $1,200. It seems that many years ago the Dominion Government built the low-level bridge across the Saskatchewan river at Edmonton, and this is to take care of certain repairs.

The next item is $2,500 for the interprovincial bridge at Matapedia, for the purpose of putting a new plank roadway over the bridge. It was under contract; the contract was not let until the last year, and as the contractors contended that owing to great difficulty in getting labour, they could not do the work within the prescribed period, we gave them the right to extend the contract to the first of June. I am not sure that the work is not finished by this time.

The next item is for a new bridge between Ottawa and Hull to replace the present Union bridge over the Ottawa river below the Chaudière, $120,000. There happen around Ottawa many things which demand the expenditure of public money, but which would not, of course, be tolerated for a moment in any other part of Canada, and this is one of them. I do not know how this came about, but many years ago the Dominion Government built a bridge across the Ottawa river below the falls. It was perfectly good for all the traffic existing at the time, but the people of Ottawa and Hull wanted an electric railway, and they promptly put an electric railway across the bridge and then they came back and said: This bridge is not sufficient to carry the railway; you build a new bridge for us. This seemed a peculiar proposition. I know if I had asked for anything of that kind in New Brunswick, I would have been told

I was absolutely crazy, and I think I would have been. I refused to pay the total expense of building this bridge, and the result was that we entered into negotiations with the provinces of Quebec and Ontario and they agreed to pay $40,000 each, and the Dominion is to pay the balance. I believe our proportion will amount to just about $40,000. I think this bridge is under contract now for $110,000, and there will, of course, be some extras, which will bring the cost up practically to $40,000 each, and in that way a bridge which will be sufficiently strong to carry the traffic will be built.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it necessary for us to vote the whole amount?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, it will take the whole amount. We make the contract with the Dominion Bridge company, and then we receive the reimbursement of $80,000, or $40,000 each from Quebec and Ontario, so that we have to vote the whole amount in order to carry out our contract with the bridge company.

The next item is for a bridge at North Timiskaming. This is a bridge not over an interprovincial river, but over a river within less than half a mile of the boundary line, so that it is practically across an interprovincial river. I am sure that it was so nearly an interprovincial river that it was felt proper that the Dominion Government should share the expense. This item is to provide for the superstructure and some small repairs to the substructure. In this case the province of Quebec pays $15,000. Tenders were called for, and a contract was let some time ago at somewhere around $75,000 or $80,000, and the bridge will be finished in a very short time.

The next item of $7,000 is to take care of the approaches to bridges in the city of Ottawa. It is wonderful what people do around here, but the custom has become so long established that it has practically become law, and I suppose we must carry it out.

The next item is for repairs to bridges at Portage du Fort, also up the Ottawa river, and then there is a small amount for improvement to the river road at St. Andrews, Manitoba.

Mr. PROULX: I am sorry I do not see in these Estimates any amount for the construction of a bridge between Hawkesbury and Grenville. The construction of that bridge had been decided upon before the war; in fact, tenders had been called for and an Order in Council passed awarding a contract to the lowest tenderer, but war was declared almost immediately and so the work was suspended. I had hoped that the work would be resumed after the war, but I do not see any amount in the Estimates. I hope it will be provided for in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is quite right that tenders were called for and an Order in Council was passed, but I do not think the contract was signed. It was just a week or two before or practically at the time that war was declared, and the matter was allowed to drop. When I came into the department, of course, the matter had practically ceased to exist. I have not included this in the Estimates for this year for the very good reason that I thought we should wait until the highway policy of the Dominion and the provinces was settled, because I do not think we would be justified in erecting a bridge costing, I suppose, $500,000 or more, across the Ottawa river until we know exactly whether it will form part of the general highway from Montreal to Ottawa. Personally, I feel very strongly on this question, and I should like to see a beautiful highway extending from Montreal to Ottawa. To my mind it is incomprehensible that the capital of Canada is absolutely cut off as regards automobile traffic, from the rest of the world. A man would require tremendous courage who endeavoured to get out of Ottawa in an automobile.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: It cannot be done.

Mr. CARVELL: I agree with my hon. friend. If the railway employees strike, we should have to use aeroplanes because we cannot get out of Ottawa by automobile. I should like to see a highway built from Ottawa to Montreal, and a highway from Ottawa to the St. Lawrence river, so that we could get over to the United States and west. Until, however, the question is settled, we should hesitate to decide whether a bridge should be built at Hawkesbury or Vaudreuil. I do not want the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) to think I am endeavouring to take the bridge away from Hawkesbury, but we should wait to see where the highway is going to be constructed, and when that matter is decided the Dominion of Canada would be justified in contributing towards the construction of a bridge across the Ottawa river.

Mr. FIELDING: Is there a well-defined principle now regarding interprovincial bridges as to what relation the provinces and the municipalities have to them?

Mr. CARVELL: There is a well-defined principle. The only thing is that there is a provision in the British North America Act—

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think so.

Mr. CARVELL: I have held that opinion, but I may be in error.

Mr. FIELDING: I must not contradict my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: And I will not contradict my hon. friend either but it is easy to settle the question.

Mr. FIELDING: This is the reason why I imagine there is no such provision. A good many years ago, when I had something to do with the affairs of Nova Scotia, the Dominion Government would not contribute a penny towards an interprovincial bridge, but let us pay a duty on the bridge when we got the material. However, things have changed a bit since then, and I suppose there is a better understanding.

Mr. PROULX: Ontario and Quebec contribute a portion of the cost of this bridge which is interprovincial, while the bridge at Ste. Anne and Vaudreuil could not be provincial. It is midway between Ottawa and Montreal. Nature has provided its location, and it is on a solid rock foundation.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot say that there is any policy in these matters. I simply take things as I find them, and I have not yet asked for any appropriations for either interprovincial or international bridges. Of course, international bridges are provided for by the British North America Act, and I was under the impression that interprovincial bridges were also.

Mr. FIELDING: It may be so.

Mr. CARVELL: Even if it were, I entirely agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend that it is a pretty risky business to go into it. I think I ought to take this occasion to remark that it is astounding the demands that have been made upon the Federal Government, since the armistice was signed, for the expenditure of public money on all sorts of schemes. I sometimes admire the ingenuity of the men who conceive these projects. I believe I have been asked during the last four or five months to spend one hundred million dollars in all sorts of undertakings. Every day sees its quota. I think to-day is one of the small days, but the amount is pretty nearly a million. We are being asked to-day to spend money for works that would not have been thought of five or six years ago. The only explanation I can offer is that in the last four and-a-half years the Government has been spending tremendous sums and has been practically the paymaster for the country. People have been selling goods to the Government and receiving cheques and have not had to look after anything, and they have got the idea that the Government ought to act as paymaster. I do think that the people must have a notion that in some way we turn a crank at Ottawa and grind out notes, or that we have an inexhaustible vault filled with gold and all we have to do is to dig down with a dipper dredge and scoop it up. There must be some such conception on the part of the people or they would not make the demands they make on the Government. I am getting away from the subject of interprovincial bridges, however. I do not know where we are going to land if some one does not apply the brakes and if we do not get down to sound business principles and declare that we will not expend money except on certain really necessary public works.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I quite agree with the statement of the minister as to the isolation of Ottawa from the rest of the country, and I think it is extraordinary that the capital of the Dominion should be so isolated. We are not isolated from a railway point of view, for Ottawa is a good railway centre. But if you leave Ottawa by automobile, when you have reached a certain radius you cannot go further. It seems to me that the good-roads policy has made such steady progress in all parts of the world, and especially in America, that the Provincial Governments of both Ontario and Quebec should see that transportation by way of good roads should be available from Ottawa eastward and westward. I am informed that it is the policy of the Quebec Government to have a new road betwen Montreal and Ottawa. I am not at liberty to say whether it will be on the north or south bank of the Ottawa river, but the Prime Minister stated not very long ago in my presence that he did not understand why there should not be as good communication by highway, between Ottawa and Montreal, for instance, as there is between Montreal and Quebec. The good-roads policy adopted by the Quebec Government eight or nine years ago has undoubtedly produced excellent results in our province. It has attracted a large number of tourists and has improved our country hotels. It has proved for the farmer as well as the resident of the city a source of comfort, and for the farmer a source of wealth. Coming back to Ottawa, it is incredible that this city should be isolated as it is. I am not speaking for myself. Sitting on this side of the House, I can not claim to have the privileges enjoyed on the other side. I have no automobile, but I say that the capital of the Dominion should have all-round excellent communication, and in view of the improved highway system that is being advocated in every progressive province, it is not fair that our capital should be isolated.

Telegraph and Telephone Lines—Nova Scotia —Pictou Island—Telephone cable, $5,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I wish to congratulate the minister on the fact that he is doing something to put Pictou Island in touch with the rest of the Dominion. Pictou Island is situate in Northumberland Straits between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. It is of considerable size and is inhabited by a hardy race of Scotchmen and if my hon. friend will go there at any time I am sure he will be accorded a right Highland welcome. These people have never had the advantage of communication with the mainland and I am very much pleased that the minister is taking this step which is urgently needed. A friend of mine, the Rev. Allan Simpson, D.D., a retired Presbyterian minister, living in New Glasgow, was engaged in preaching the gospel to the people of this island last season when he observed the isolated condition of the place. He noticed that they had no telephone communication with the mainland and that they were at a serious disadvantage in case of sickness, or when there was any urgent necessity for communicating with points outside. I think he had a good deal to do with creating an interest in this matter and starting the agitation to obtain this telephone connection, and I am quite sure it will cheer his heart very much to know that the minister is taking the necessary steps to bring it about. The cable, when completed, will be a great boon to the people of the island not only in connection with the fishing industry but also in their social and business relations with the rest of the country. I have been informed that the department has some wire on hand that could be utilized without incurring any great expense. I trust that the work of laying the cable will be commenced at once and that the people will have the advantage of it during the present season.

Mr. CARVELL: I can assure the hon. member that there are no votes in these Estimates that are not serious. When I asked Parliament to vote $5,000 to lay that cable I expect to lay it, that is, if the steamship Tyrian ever gets into the water; it has been in dry dock now for a year. When we get it out the crew will want more pay. They have been kept there without doing anything and I do not know whether we will get the boat going again or not. We intend anyway to lay the cable. I accept all my hon. friend says about the good qualities of these people. I think they must be good people. I was just wondering whether this was the island that my hon. friend was telling me about last summer where one of those good thrifty Scotch people parted with some $3,000 or $4,000 for white paper. Some sharp chap came down there. If so, I think they need a telephone to wake them up.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Some care will require to be exercised in order to avoid the ice in the winter season. I do not know much about laying cables but I have heard it said that some investigation should take place to see that the best spot is selected so that the cable will not be swept away in the winter time.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was sorry to hear the minister give such a bad reputation to the Tyrian. She must have got into bad company. We had her in Sydney.

Mr. CARVELL: That is where she became demoralized.

Mr. McKENZIE: No, she was a respectable boat and she was always on time whenever there was anything to be done. But some evil genius thought that Halifax was the centre of the earth and that everything had to gravitate there. Immediately after the change of Government they took the boat away from North Sydney to Halifax, and they have of course manipulated the Tyrian ever since for their own purposes.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it a fact that my hon. friend stole her away from Halifax some few years ago?

Mr. McKENZIE: She was in the market for a proper dwelling place, and, having the best harbour in the world, the Tyrian being a stranger, we took her in. But she was led astray by those bad influences at Halifax. I think the trouble is not with the Tyrian, but with the people who are trying to make too much money out of her.

She has a good captain and good men, and I cannot understand why there should be any trouble over the Tyrian. I believe there are some people around Halifax so fond of easy money that they try to find something wrong with her and to keep her wrong as long as they can.

Mr. CARVELL: When the Tyrian goes out of commission I am going to see that she stays out because I am not going to be a party to squandering $60,000 a year on a boat that does not do anything. Of all the useless things that I ever heard of the Tyrian is the most useless. It is a little boat that never was any good. It only cost $20,000 when it was bought. I am told that she has cost the Government $1,000,000 up to date. The moment I think of the telephones and telegraphs owned by the Dominion of Canada I get hot under the collar. This is an illustration of what we are spending.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If you maintain a cable system such as we have in the gulf of St. Lawrence, how can you do it without a cable boat?

Mr. CARVELL: I would get rid of the cable boat and establish wireless stations. Here we are spending $60,000 a year on a boat that does not get into the water for more than about two months in the year. The fault may be in the department officials at North Sydney or at Halifax, but it is something I will not stand as long as I have anything to say about it, and I do not think that any Minister of Public Works ought to stand it. Something must be done to limit it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you not wireless stations all over the gulf?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, there are a good many of such stations.

Mr. FIELDING: In the meantime there are several cable lines which are broken, and the people interested are clamouring to have them repaired. If the Tyrian cannot do it what provision has the department made to meet that situation?

Mr. CARVELL: We have managed to repair them during the past year by fitting up scows for small works. I think the Lady Laurier is a ship that is capable of being fitted with cable-laying apparatus, and the apparatus is stored at Halifax. Whether we can do that or not we are not going to keep the Tyrian going under present conditions. If we have to get rid of the cables we will do so and we will adopt the wireless.

In connection with the Magdalen Islands I think the cable might be entirely abolished and that we might rely on the wireless. The same thing applies to Anticosti. They have the wireless to Anticosti during the summer season and it is closed down during the winter. There is no reason why it should not be kept going continuously. There is Pictou island, Scatari, Deer island and Grand Manan off the coast of New Brunswick, and some others, were cable connection must be maintained; but we can dispense with the cable if it is necessary, in order to maintain this ship, to spend $60,000 a year.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does not the great advantage of cables over wireless lie in the fact that you can utilize the cables for telephone purposes?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is all very well to talk about getting rid of the Tyrian. I do not care whether the minister takes advantage of the Tyrian or the Lady Laurier or of any other steamer, but the cables are there and unless you have a perfect system of wireless stations you cannot do away with them as easily as my hon. friend thinks, because in the interest of navigation these cables must be maintained. My hon. friend spoke of the Magdalen Islands. They are isolated from the mainland for four or five months in the year. You have Bird Rock, which forms part of the Magdalen islands group. It is the first station in the river St. Lawrence seen by the mariners as they come up the river. It is connected with the group of islands and with Cape Breton by cable. You have your station on the rock. You have Bryan island, which was the first island sighted by Jacques Cartier when he discovered the river St. Lawrence. For navigation purposes you must maintain these cables unless you get a perfect system of wireless stations. If you can substitute that I have no objection. I do not know anything about the Tyrian, but I do know that, on account of the very rough weather in the gulf of St. Lawrence, it happens very often that the cable is broken. I have experienced some very serious troubles myself by reason of being out of touch with my electors for weeks and weeks during the winter because the cable had broken and they were awaiting the return of the Tyrian early in the spring to repair it. I do not know what my hon. friend will do but he must not forget that ocean navigation is interested in maintaining these cables.

Mr. FIELDING: I am, like my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux), not concerned in the Tyrian, but I am interested in the cables. There are a couple of cables that have come within my observation and knowledge which have been broken and for some months they have been waiting for something to be done to repair them. They have been brought to the attention of the minister, and the Tyrian cannot do the work some other means should be devised for doing it. It may be that the dropping of the cables and the substitution of wireless is the proper policy, and I have no objection to it; but in the meantime I hope my hon. friend will do whatever he can to help out the situation to which I have called his attention.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I might make a statement about these wireless stations. These are largely isolated positions and there are a great many posts, so that you would have to have a day and night operator at each place and it would be a bill of expense. I remember this was all gone into before the House some years ago. The great advantage of cables is that anybody can use them for telephone purposes. If the telegrapher is absent one could use the cable as wireless. I have no special interest in the matter other than the general welfare. I think it would be short-sighted to deprive these people of their cable stations.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite agree with all that has been said. I do not propose to take service away from anybody. In most of these cases there is no telephonic communication. They rely entirely upon the telegraph.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It could be put in easily.

Mr. CARVELL: You would have to lay a new cable, because they do not put telephone circuits in when they are laying these cables. The telegraph is a single wire, while the telephone requires a circuit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They are exactly the same.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend will investigate he will find he cannot get very far on a single wire. It is true the Government telephone system is practically all single wire, but it is an antiquated system. If you are going to put in a telephone system you would have to have two wires. I quite realize that navigation must be looked after, and I believe that many of these cables must be maintained.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Ships must be reported long in advance of their arrival.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. That can be done by wireless in a great many cases. But I shall have more to say about this matter when we come to another part of the Estimates. I am not willing to lose $400,000 or $500,000 a year in maintaining a telephone and telegraph system when we can get along without losing that amount. I want to treat it as a business proposition.

Saskatchewan and Alberta—Peace River Line —office and dwelling at Grande Prairie, $4,000.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: Would it not be possible to do without these telegraph lines in the north country now that the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway has been built to Grande Prairie?

Mr. CARVELL: So far as the telegraph lines are concerned, in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta there is no necessity for the Government ever spending another dollar; but perhaps I am going a little too far. There are one or two places where the line must be maintained, from Spirit River and Grand Prairie, for instance, to west of Hudson Hope, because there is no railroad there yet. Then, about fifteen or twenty miles of line has to be maintained around the western end of Lesser Slave lake. There are also ten or twelve miles to be maintained in Saskatchewan. Outside of that, the whole thing could be handed over to a company, and I would suggest handing it over to the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company, as that is now owned by the Government, and let them run the line where it is necessary, as a business proposition, or it could be handed over to the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway, as their line practically parallels ours.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why is it necessary to clear the woods when you can use the railway right-of-way?

Mr. CARVELL: While the line practically parallels the railway, it deviates from it in many places and trees have to be felled.

British Columbia—Mainland telegraph and telephone lines—general repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What mileage have we on the mainland of British Columbia?

Mr. CARVELL: We have many telegraph lines in northern British Columbia that must be maintained as that is the only means of communication the people have with the outside world. The Yukon line runs from Ashcroft practically up to Dawson. After leaving the Fraser river it strikes the Grand Trunk Pacific at Fort Fraser, some short distance west of Prince George. From there it practically parallels the Grand Trunk Pacific to Hazelton. Some arrangement should be arrived at about this line. There is no reason why both the Government and the Grand Trunk Pacific should maintain telegraph lines paralleling each other for two hundred miles. There is also a line from Hazelton to Prince Rupert paralleling the Grand Trunk Pacific. That should be handed over to the railway. When the Vancouver and Great Eastern is constructed to Prince George, a very large part of the line from Hazelton to Fort Fraser could be handed over, but at present we must maintain it. The line from Hazelton to Dawson must be maintained by the country. There have been a good many suggestions that communication might be had by wireless between these places. That might be done from Atlin to Fort Fraser, but from there to Dawson you would have to have a land line. When we come to the southern part of British Columbia, it is an entirely different proposition; there it is a telephone proposition pure and simple. But I do not wish to discuss that on this item, it is a question that should be considered very carefully by the House. We could not settle it in one night or one week, or even in a year perhaps. It should be approached purely from a business standpoint.

Miscellaneous—Architectural Branch—salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draughtsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $60,000.

Mr. CARVELL: These are services that are maintained annually, the architectural branch, salaries of architects, draughtsmen, clerks, messengers, etc. These are men that we utilize in the Outside Service to go round the country for inspection purposes and things of that kind.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: Does this department derive any revenue from the building of the tremendously large reservoirs on the upper Ottawa river?

Mr. CARVELL: No, we do not.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: These large dams control the supply of water in the Ottawa. From the Timiskaming down to Ottawa city many miles might be benefited, but it seems that the dams are maintained and operated expressly for the benefit of certain mills in and around the Chaudiere and the Deschenes, while the mills on the upper Ottawa, that is, the boom area, can go practically dry. Protests are probably considered, but it is the large mills in and around Ottawa that derive 98 per cent of the benefit. Personally I think it would be well within reason that the mills in and around Ottawa should contribute somewhat to the upkeep of these improvements.

Mr. CARVELL: This is the first time I have heard this question raised. One would naturally suppose that a storage proposition benefiting a mill on one part of the river would benefit mills on other parts of the same river. However, there may be some conditions that I am not acquainted with.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: There are.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no doubt that these works were built expressly for the purpose of controlling the water in the Ottawa river, and there is no doubt also that they have been a wonderful boon to the water-power development in Ottawa and other places along the river. I have been told by gentlemen interested in the water-power development of the Chaudiere that these works have practically doubled the capacity of electrical plants around this city. While we receive no revenue from these works—and I am not sure that the Government should engage in them—yet there is no doubt that they constitute the proper scheme for all parts of the country, and I only wish it were possible that the proper authority, whichever it might be, could carry on such works in every part of Canada. I am a great believer in water-power development, and the only way we can increase the capacity of our water-power is by storage dams.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Dominion Government has jurisdiction?

Mr. CAHILL: Yes, we have the right.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the riding which I have the honour to represent there happens to be a large number of these storage dams, and although there they come under the Department of Railways and Canals, I would direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the practice of keeping the water six inches higher than the law reserves. I wonder whether the Government would furnish us with a little dynamite to keep the water down to the proper level?

Mr. CARVELL: That is a complaint that seems to follow the building of all these dams. I have received complaints from Timiskaming and North Bay.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Everywhere.

Mr. CARVELL: I think the attendants have to work too hard and have not sufficient time to take the stoplogs out and look after them.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Signals are sent up from Ottawa and from Peterborough when they want the water controlled. I purpose taking this matter up in another way with the Department of Railways and Canals, so far as my riding is connected, to see if some proper method cannot be devised to meet the complaints. The control is always in the interests of large manufacturers here in Ottawa, Peterborough and in other places.

Mr. CARVELL: I received a complaint only two or three days ago in connection with the North Bay works. But it only shows that people do get unreasonable, because for some weeks every stoplog has been taken out of the North Bay dam, and I am told there is greater facility for the water escaping to-day than before the works were placed there.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the French river?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. But we have had very heavy rains and the lakes are very high, and my hon. friend will remember that we also had very heavy rains during the latter part of last year.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They did not let the water off when it was high, and consequently when the rains continued they were flooded.

Monument to His late Majesty King Edward VII, $5,000.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is this, please?

Mr. CARVELL: This has been carried forward for some years. The contract was awarded, but was not proceeded with.

Monument to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, $25,000.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How does that compare with Sir John's monument?

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry I cannot answer the question. I will get the information.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It does not matter.

Mr. CARVELL: Nothing has been done; it is just simply voted.

National Gallery of Canada, $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose the National Gallery is this building?

Mr. CARVELL: No, this vote is not for the purpose of being applied on this building. It is practically for the staff of the National Gallery.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Carvell the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Labour for fiscal year ended March 31, 1918.—Sir Thomas White.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

STEAMER PRINCESS.

Mr. FAFARD:

1. What steamer has replaced the Princess?
2. Who has been appointed captain of the said steamer, on what date was he appointed, and by whom recommended?
3. How many years' experience has the person appointed had as captain?
4. What are the names of the applicants for this position and how many years' experience has each of said applicants had as captain?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. C.G.S. Loos.
2. Wm. Tremblay, May 5, 1919, appointed by Civil Service Commission.
3. His captain's certificate is dated April 8, 1915.
4. No information in Naval Service Department. The advertising for this position was carried out by the Civil Service Commission.

Dr. O. B. KEDDY.

Mr. d'ANJOU:

1. Was O. B. Keddy of Windsor, county of Hants, physician, in any way in the employ of the Militia Department of Canada, or in connection with the British Expeditionary Forces stationed at Windsor, Hants county, during the war?
2. If so, in what capacity was he so engaged, what work was required of him, how much time was he required to devote to it and what was the rate per day and the total amount of money received by him?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1 and 2. Yes; he was employed as medical officer examining recruits for the Imperial army and railway construction troops. He was paid as follows: Under 50 men, $1 per head; 50 to 100 men, $2 per day; 100 to 150 men, $3 a day; 150 and over, $4 a day. Dr. Keddy was paid a total amount of $1,436.44; $607 of this was incurred in examining recruits for the Imperial army, and is being recovered from the Imperial Government.

RUMANIAN RELIEF—MARINE INSURANCE.

Sir SAM HUGHES:

1. What firm is doing the Marine Insurance on cargoes from Canada under the relief arrangements for Rumania, Greece, Belgium, etc.?
2. Are other firms asked, or allowed to complete?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. In connection with the credit to the Kingdom of Rumania for the purchase of goods in Canada, the Canadian Trade Commission, acting as agents for the Rumanian Government, have placed marine insurance through the firm of Messrs. Jones & Proctor Bros. Ltd., Toronto.

2. The commission is of opinion that the Rumanian Government would be better served by handling the insurance through a single firm than by calling for tenders. They state that the method adopted is the best way from a competitive standpoint of handling marine insurance. It is stated that the firm selected was instructed by the commission to place the business with companies registered in Canada, provided rates were satisfactory.

OVERSEAS MILITARY EXPENDITURES.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. Were the Overseas Military expenditures audited?
2. If so, who was in charge of the audit and by whom was he appointed?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to submit these expenditures to a further examination by the Auditor General's Department?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Yes.
2. Colonel L. A. Dowie is general auditor, Overseas Military Forces of Canada; appointed by the Canadian Government.
3. Yes.

VICTORY LOAN ADVERTISING, 1918.

Mr. DUFF:

1. What amount was paid for advertising in 1918 for the Victory Loan?
2. What amount was paid the same year for printing, in connection with the said loan?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

Assuming that question means what was paid for advertising and printing for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1918, for the Victory Loan floated in November last, the answer is as follows:

1. $275,596.88.
2. $219,257.23.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

1. Is Hadley B. Tremaine, M.P. for Hants, in the employ of the Government of Canada or in any way connected with the Military Forces of Canada?
2. If so, when was he first appointed?
3. In what capacity is he so engaged and what salary does he receive?
4. How much pay has he received from the outbreak of the war up to and including the 12th day of May, 1919?
5. Is the wife of the said Hadley B. Tremaine in receipt of separation allowance? If so, how much has she received to date?
6. If the said Hadley B. Tremaine was and is in receipt of pay from the Military Forces of Canada, was he and is he in receipt of his indemnity as a member of the Parliament of Canada?

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many soldiers enlisted in the 117th Eastern Townships Battalion went overseas during the war?
2. How many of the said soldiers saw active service?
3. How many were killed in action?
4. How many were wounded in action?
5. How many died as a result of said wounds?
6. How many were rendered unfit for further service?
7. How many recovered from said wounds and returned to duty?
8. How many died from sickness or other causes?
9. How many officers and men of all ranks received decorations, medals or other rewards for bravery?
10. What are the names of the said officers and men?

INCOME TAX OFFICE, EMPLOYEES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I ask the Minister of Finance if the men employed at the income tax office in Montreal and elsewhere are appointed by the Civil Service Commission. If not, under whose authority are their appointments made?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): The appointments are made by the Government upon the recommendation, in the first instance, of the Commissioner of Taxation, who is responsible for the administration of the office.

LABOUR SITUATION IN THE WEST.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): In view of the serious situation which the papers indicate prevails throughout Western Canada, has the Government any information to give the House regarding the strike in Winnipeg, and the threatened strike which the press to-day predicts in Calgary, Edmonton, and other western cities?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Labour): There is nothing substantially new to report in connection with the Winnipeg strike, but I may say that the telephone service is almost normal and business activities are being gradually re-established. There is no official information as to the probability of a strike at Calgary and other places in the West.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton East): I would like to know what steps the Government intends to take in regard to the situation in Edmonton and Calgary, particularly in Edmonton. I am in receipt of a communication to the effect that a sympathetic strike is declared there, and that there is likely to be danger to property and person.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No official information has been received by the Government or the Department of Labour in respect of the matter to which the hon. member refers, and until there is the Government cannot very well express an opinion on the subject.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Did the postal employees in Winnipeg return to work this morning? It was stated that they would be obliged to go back to work at 11 o'clock this morning or their places would be filled.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Department has had no information from Winnipeg to-day respecting the return of the postal employees. Last evening, however, we received a message to the effect that a great number would likely return this forenoon, but there has been no confirmation of that.

Mr. CHARLES MURPHY: May I ask my hon. friend whether he or any other member of the Government has received communications from North Vancouver regarding the conditions that prevail there? I have received two letters written on paper headed, "Second Narrows Bridge and Terminal Railways Special Joint Committee", signed "Ewart Adamson, Campaign Manager". In the second letter, which I received to-day, attention is drawn to the industrial and labour conditions at North Vancouver, and the concluding sentence reads: "Even now our form of representative Government is being weighed as against the Dictatorship of Labour". Can my hon. friend give the House any information as to the conditions existing in Vancouver?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have no knowledge of this matter, but I shall make inquiries and endeavour to give the hon. member information to-morrow.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.

On motion of Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways) Bill No. 117 to authorize an extension of time for the completion of the St. John and Quebec Railway between Centreville, in the county of Carleton, and Andover, in the county of Victoria, N.B., was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—time for completion extended to December 31, 1919:

Mr. CAHILL: What is the nature of this agreement?

Mr. J. D. REID: The agreement made between the Government of the province of New Brunswick and the Dominion Government was that the Provincial Government should pay for and build a road from Centreville to St. John, which the Dominion Government was to take over and operate on a percentage basis, this Government taking 60 per cent and the Provincial Government 40 per cent of the gross earnings. This 40 per cent which the Provincial Government was to receive was to help pay the interest on the bonds. The road has been partly constructed, and is now in operation from Gagetown to Westfield, where it strikes the Canadian Pacific near St. John. When the agreement was revised a couple of years ago, it was decided to run over the Canadian Pacific from Westfield to St. John, instead of duplicating that last fifteen or twenty miles.

Mr. CAHILL: Will this road be merged with the Canadian National Railway system?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. You can take the Canadian National now from McGivney Junction and connect with this road. That would be the short line over the Transcontinental into St. John. That part of the road between Centreville and Andover has not yet been completed by the Provincial Government, owing to the increased cost of labour and materials. When at the beginning of the session I asked for an extension of time in which to complete the road between Gagetown and Westfield. I overlooked the fact that the road was to be built from Andover to Centreville, thence to Westfield, and into St. John.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the distance from Andover to Centreville?

Mr. CARVELL: Twenty-five miles. The road has been completed for about 160 miles and is in operation to Gagetown. The last 40 miles from Gagetown to Westfield will be completed and in operation within three or four weeks at the very outside. When completed it will be operated by the Canadian National Railway system under the agreement ratified by Parliament in 1911.

Mr. J. D. REID: The road is being operated now from Centreville to Gagetown, about 160 miles, on the 60-40 per cent basis.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it the intention of the Government to take over this line when completed?

Mr. J. D. REID: If the New Brunswick Government construct the road between Centreville and Andover, the Dominion Government will take it over on the 60-40 basis.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is there not a line running from Andover to Centreville now?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What amount has been paid by the Dominion Government towards the construction of this road?

Mr. J. D. REID: The usual subsidy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No guarantee of bonds?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, the bonds were guaranted by the New Brunswick Government.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Have there been any net earnings since the road was in operation?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not think the 60 per cent would pay the operating expenses, nor the 40 per cent the interest on the bonds.

Mr. CAHILL: About how much of a loss will this mean to the Dominion treasury?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think I gave a statement some time ago of the earnings of each part of the Canadian National Railway system, but if not, I can give the figures for this particular line when my Estimates are up. The loss is not very great to the Dominion Government. The 40 per cent does not come near paying the interest on the bonds, but, of course, the provincial Government must stand that loss.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the agreement of 1911 include the extension that is asked for now?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Act that we have already passed covered all this, and in addition 25 miles from Grand Falls.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported the third time and passed.

At this point the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister, and Hon. Arthur L. Sifton, Minister of the Interior, entered the Chamber for the first time since their arrival home from the Peace Conference. The hon. members of the House rose in their places and cheered.

HALIFAX HARBOUR MASTER.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine) Bill No. 119, to amend the Act respecting the appointment of a harbour master at the port of Halifax, was read a second time and the House went into Committee on the Bill—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—maximum remuneration of harbour master increased from $1,800 to $3,000; to be retained out of fees collected.

On section 2—harbour master's fees increased: rates of fees:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister explain on what basis this schedule is prepared?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The object of this Bill is to enable the harbour master for the port of Halifax to receive a greater remuneration than he is receiving at the present time, namely $1,800 per year. His salary is paid him according to the fees that he can collect from vessels entering the harbour. This Bill provides that he may receive a larger remuneration than $1,800 a year but not more than a maximum of $3,000. The old Act was passed in 1885. When we consider the high cost of living to-day and the fact that the harbour master has to pay boat hire, I am sure hon. members will agree that $1,800 is not a sufficient remuneration for him especially in view of the fact that at other large ports the harbour masters are receiving as high as $5,000 a year. The object of this Bill is to enable the harbour master to increase the salary he is now drawing and also to increase the fees levied against ships.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has there been a proportionate increase in these fees? Wages have only gone up a little more than one-third and there should not be more than a corresponding increase in the fees exacted from ships.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The increase that the Bill provides for is a very small one. We propose to increase the fee for every ship over 1,000 tons register from $5 to $7. As I explained when this matter was before the Committee on Wednesday evening I do not think the harbour master will get more than $2,000 or $2,500 a year. If we do not increase the fee from $5 to $7 the harbour master will continue to receive the same meagre salary of $1,800 that he received in 1885. It is only a reasonable proposition that this small change in the fees should be allowed and that the harbour master, if he collects $2,000, or $2,500, or even the maximum of $3,000, should be allowed to keep this himself.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I cannot understand why you are limiting the salary of this officer to the meagre pittance that he is being given here. I imagine some of his clerks will be receiving more than $1,800 a year and if he is worth anything why not give him a straight salary or give him a sufficient proportion of the fees to ensure him a proper income. No apology is required for giving this officer a larger remuneration.

Mr. McKENZIE: The ships that enter the harbour complain very bitterly about there being any fees at all. They believe that they should be exempt from any fees of this kind. I think that if you pay the harbour master $3,000 he will be satisfied. He only used to get $1,800 and, while that was small, he was evidently satisfied to stand by. I am not complaining about the fees being raised sufficiently high to secure $3,000 but immediately anything of this kind is done the ship masters complain that you are reducing their meagre earnings. I do not think the harbour master of the port of Halifax is required to devote all his time to the duties of his office. We have a very capable harbour master in my town and we have a very good harbour. I do not know of anything particular that this harbour master does except to see that ships arrange themselves in proper shape and that they do not unnecessarily get in each other's way. I think that is all he does. He has not to decide anything excepting that, if there is any complaint about a ship being unseaworthy, he may have something to say about it.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I cannot agree with my hon. friend about the duties of the harbour master not being most important at a very large port like Halifax. The tonnage entering and leaving that port each year is so considerable in amount that the harbour master has to give all his time to his duties there. The duties of the harbour master are to see that berths are allocated to vessels entering the port.

He also has to see that the vessels are properly moored. The harbour master has full charge of the port, and I consider that his duties in the case of such a port as Halifax are most important. When one compares the port of Halifax with the port of Montreal, where the harbour master receives $5,000 a year, and with the port of Quebec, where the harbour master gets $3,500 a year, I do not think that we are overpaying the harbour master of the first-named port when we place him in a position whereby he may possibly make five or six hundred dollars a year more than he is now drawing. For instance, in the year 1917 the total amount of fees collected in the port of Halifax only amounted to $1,832. Now, if the total amount of fees collected in 1920 do not exceed $1,800, that is all the harbour master of Halifax will be allowed to get in the way of salary; but if the fees, as I have already stated, amount to $2,500 or $3,000, he will draw a more substantial remuneration. Considering the fact that Halifax is a very large and important seaport, I hope that hon. members will agree with the reasonableness of the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not complaining about the harbour master getting a salary of $3,000; I think it is little enough for him, but I know how vigorously shipping masters in the past have complained regarding the exaction from them of any unnecessary fees. I simply wished to be sure that there were no greater fees to be collected than were necessary to meet the salary proposed to be given to the harbour master.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In regard to the fees to be collected, we are only proposing a very slight increase. From my experience as a commissioner for the port of Montreal, I know that the shipping agents are always on the alert and do not want to pay anything more than they are obliged to pay, which is only natural. I am quite sure that the small increase in fees which is proposed here is not going to be a burden on any of the ship-owners, nor will it have any detrimental effect on shipping, but it will yield the harbour master a larger remuneration.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Under whose control is the port of Halifax at the present time? I understood when the Halifax disaster occurred that the port had been placed under the control of a naval officer. Does that control still continue, or has it again been placed under the department?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: During the war authority over the port of Halifax was exercised by the Naval Service, but since the signing of the armistice control of the harbour has once more reverted to the department.

Mr. PEDLOW: Why is the harbour master of Halifax paid by fees, whereas the harbour master of Montreal receives a salary of $5,000, and the harbour master of Quebec a salary of $3,500? If it is deemed desirable to increase the remuneration paid to the harbour master at Halifax, why not adopt the course which has been followed in the case of the other two harbour masters mentioned?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The system of administering the port of Halifax is entirely different from the system which obtains in the ports of Montreal and Quebec. The two latter ports are administered by a harbour commission, and power is vested in them to pay to the harbour master whatever salary they may deem fit. On the other hand the port of Halifax is not under the control of a commission, but is administered by the Department of Marine, and we are not allowed by the Pilotage Act to pay the harbour master a fixed salary; his salary can only be obtained by the collection of fees.

Section agreed to, Bill reported, and read the third time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine) the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the provisions of sections 432, 862, and 865 of the Canada Shipping Act, chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to provide:—

1. That notwithstanding anything in Part VI of the said Act, the Governor in Council may, when it appears to him to be in the interest of navigation, appoint the Minister to be the pilotage authority for any pilotage district, or for any part thereof; and the said Minister shall thereupon supersede the then existing pilotage authority for that district or part of a district: Provided that nothing in said Part shall authorize the Minister to sit as a tribunal for the trial of offences of which pilots may be accused before the pilotage authority; but such Minister may, in any case not provided for by Part X of the said Act designate a tribunal or officer to try any such offence.

2. That for and in respect of all ships entering a port to which Part XII of the said Act applies, and at which a Harbour Master is appointed, and discharging or taking a cargo, ballast, wood or water, there shall be paid as fees the amount prescribed by paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) of section 862 of the said Act; that paragraph (h) be repealed; and that the following paragraphs be added to the said section:—

"(h) for every ship over seven hundred tons and not over one thousand tons register, five dollars;

"(i) for every ship over one thousand tons register seven dollars."

3. That the salary or remuneration of each Harbour Master shall from time to time be fixed by the Governor in Council, but shall not exceed the rate of one thousand two hundred dollars per annum, and shall be subject to the provisions prescribed by the said Act, providing for the payment into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of all moneys received by him for fees, after deducting therefrom the salary or remuneration fixed as aforesaid, and if the moneys received by him for fees in any year amount to a less sum than is so fixed, then such less sum shall be his salary or remuneration for that year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain the object of the resolution?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The object is to enable me to introduce a Bill permitting the Department of Marine to take over the control of all the pilotage systems of Canada and to vest authority in the Governor General in Council. At present, and for some twelve years past, the pilotage systems of the two districts of Quebec and Montreal have been under the Department of Marine. In order to determine what steps should be taken in the interest of the greater efficiency of the pilotage system in Canada, the Government appointed a Royal Commission in the early part of 1918, consisting of Mr. Thomas Robb, of the Shipping Federation, Montreal; Captain Bayles, Deputy Warden for the port of Montreal; and Captain Harrison of Halifax, to inquire into the matter. The commission visited all the important seaports on the coasts of Canada, such as Halifax, Sydney, Louisburg, St. John, N.B., Vancouver, Victoria, and Nanaimo, and their report, which has been already tabled, recommends very strongly that these pilotage districts, outside those of Montreal and Quebec, be taken under the supervision and direct control of the Department of Marine. I am sure hon. gentlemen will recognize that the only object the Government has in recommending that this course be followed is to place the pilotage systems in the ports referred to on a much more efficient basis than they have been in the past, and to provide for much more rigid pilotage examination. It is the intention of the Government, if the resolution should pass, to appoint a local superintendent of each one of these leading ports who shall be a seafaring man holding a master mariner's certificate. In addition the Government intends to appoint a general superintendent of pilots, to be stationed at the head office of the department in Ottawa, who will have general charge of all the local officers and of the various pilotage systems. It is further provided that the harbour dues on ships of over one thousand tons registered tonnage shall be increased to $7.

A great many of the harbour masters who are looking after our ports now are only allowed to draw a maximum salary of $600 per year. The object of this Bill is to allow them, if they collect sufficient fees, to draw a maximum salary of $1,200 per year. For instance, the harbour master for the port of Victoria, can at present, only draw a salary of $600 per year, whereas if this Bill passes, he will be allowed, providing he collects sufficient fees, to draw a maximum salary of $1,200.

There are, therefore, two important matters in the resolution before the Committee: First, that the pilotage systems of Canada from Halifax to Victoria be vested in the authority of the Governor-in-Council under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and, second, to provide harbour masters who are now drawing $600 a year a maximum salary of $1,200.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Have the Boards of Trade or the shipping authorities of any of the ports asked for this legislation?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The efficient management of the pilotage systems of Montreal and Quebec under the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the past twelve years was considered sufficient evidence to warrant the Government in appointing a Royal Commission to investigate the pilotage systems of these other ports. All the shipping interests and also the various Boards of Trade appeared before the commission when it visited those ports, and this Bill is receiving the unanimous approval of those interests.

The pilotage systems of the ports that I have referred to were looked after by local pilotage commissions, and as those commissioners did not receive any remuneration for their services, naturally they did not give the attention that they should to their duties. There is great scope to increase the efficiency of the pilotage systems. which systems it is now proposed shall be vested in the Governor in Council, and eventually shall come under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, more particularly as we are going to have a local superintendent, who will be an ex-master mariner holding a master's certificate. All the interests concerned agree that this should be done.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This is a revolutionary proposal in a way, because it is removing the control of pilotage altogether to Ottawa. There must be a large number of pilotage commissions along the coasts of this country, and under the law they have jurisdiction to determine the age, the qualifications and the skill of the pilots who are acting in their particular vicinity; to grant or withhold licenses to those pilots; to make regulations for their control, and other powers. The minister is proposing to sweep them all away and vest the control in an officer at Ottawa. I hesitate about approving the change, because I do not think it is wise to centralize this control. The local authorities know these pilots, they have been trained in the vicinity, and the commissioners are the best judges. Ottawa is too far away from the sea coast for an officer stationed there to possess the necessary local knowledge. A thousand miles makes a great difference in efficiency in matters of this kind. With all due respect to the minister and his department, I would hesitate to take this authority out of the hands of the local commissioners and transfer it to some one in the department.

From what I have heard in this House and have gathered from the press, I do not think that the management of the pilots in the St. Lawrence river has been such a great success as the minister describes. I think it is open to a great deal of criticism. We are aware of the patronage that has existed in connection with the appointment of those pilots, and it is only a few days ago that we were called upon to vote a considerable sum of money to pay pensions to pilots on the St. Lawrence river who should never have been appointed. I do not know whether that system of appointment is still continuing or not, but I am aware of the fact that owners of ships coming up the St. Lawrence river will not employ some of the pilots appointed; they prefer pilots that they know are competent and they do not care as a rule to take any pilot that comes along. As a matter of fact, I do not think that the management of the pilotage business in the St. Lawrence river commends itself so much to the people of Canada that they want to place all the pilotage systems under the authority of the same officer. I am not speaking for the different Boards of Trade in the country or the ship owners, but I would be surprised if they have all agreed to this proposal.

We are told that a Royal Commission investigated conditions. I do not know who these Royal Commissioners are, but I understand it was a Royal Commission consisting of two or three captains, officers of the Government. The trades people were not represented on the commission. It would be a very easy matter for two or three officers to travel around the country and get opinions favourable to their own theories. I would not place so much reliance on the report of those Royal Commissioners as I would on the report of the representative men selected from the business interests of the country. I would advise the minister to hesitate before he takes this revolutionary step of wiping out all the pilotage authorities and centralizing the control at Ottawa.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The only criticism that is likely to fall upon the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries is that successive governments did not take any step several years ago that I purpose taking now. As to the hon. member's remarks in reference to the Montreal and Quebec pilots, the best answer I can give is the almost total absence of any accidents during quite a term of years. It is true that several of the large steamship companies prefer to engage certain pilots to take charge of their vessels. But from any knowledge that I am possessed of—and I do not claim to be an authority on pilotage, although I have been connected with it for a good number of years—I do not know of a more efficient lot of pilots than those who have charge of vessels in the Montreal and Quebec districts.

In regard to the personnel of the Royal Commission, none of those gentlemen are connected with the Government. Mr. Thomas Robb is president of the Shipping Federation and occupies an important position; Captain Burns is deputy Port Warden of Montreal, and Captain James Harrison is superintendent of one of the large steamship companies at the port of Halifax.

Here is what the commission states about the Montreal Pilotage district:

> From the evidence adduced before your commission, it appears that the administration of the Montreal Pilotage district has been carried out in an efficient manner, and in this respect considerable credit must be given to the civil servant who has been handling the records, etc.

The commission also pay the same tribute to the Quebec Pilotage district. Their recommendation to the minister is this:

> That the commissions at present administering the pilotage service in the districts of Miramichi, Sydney, Louisburg and St. John have been found by your commissioners to have outrun their usefulness, and we recommend the immediate enactment of legislation appointing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the pilotage authority for these districts.

They make the same recommendation as regards the pilotage districts of Vancouver, Victoria, and Nanaimo.

The hon. member has made reference to the local pilotage commissions. The authority that those commissions have at present is subject to the approval of the Governor in Council and to the approval of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. So that we are not taking away any powers from them; we are simply saying that their work must receive the approval of the minister. But hon. members will readily see that a pilotage commission that receives no remuneration at all is not entirely satisfactory. It is not particularly interested in the rigid examination of pilots, nor in seeing that their efficiency is kept up to the standard that the importance of the calling demands. The pilotage systems of Montreal and Quebec have certainly worked admirably.

I am only asking for authority to take these pilotage systems over providing that we think it necessary to do so. But I would not care to assume the responsibility of the pilotage systems in Vancouver, Victoria, Nanaimo, Halifax, St. John and Sydney being what they should be if they are left in the hands of local pilotage commissions. There is a great deal of opportunity to increase the efficiency of the pilots and to see that the examination is a great deal more rigid. Therefore it is in the interests of navigation that this resolution should pass.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I do not wish the minister to misunderstand me. I did not condemn the pilots of the St. Lawrence; there are no better pilots than they. But I have been informed that they are not all efficient, that there are some who should not have been appointed, which is proved by the very fact that the minister has asked us to retire them and provide for them otherwise.

In reference to the other pilotage commissions, if it is not the intention of the minister to interfere with them, I would not have the same objection. But I do not think they should be interfered with unless there is some request from the locality that is interested. The fact that the pilotage commissions have been giving their services free of remuneration is not any reason why they should be dismissed. In the county I represent we have had a pilotage commission for many years, and the commissioners have not received any remuneration, but they are very proud of their position and they have done good work in the appointments they have made.

They accept these responsibilities and discharge them very well without remuneration; but there is no reason why their services should be dispensed with if everything is satisfactory to the locality concerned. If it is the intention of the minister to take over the pilotage only in cases where the people of the harbours concerned wish it, then I would not have so much objection to the measure.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension as regards Montreal and Quebec pilotage. I do not say anything about other ports, but the transfer to Ottawa some years ago of the control vested in the pilotage commissions of Montreal and Quebec was a change for the better. Before that time there had been many accidents in the St. Lawrence river, but since then the river has been practically free from accidents. At first the pilots were very much averse to the move and opposed it strongly, but they have become reconciled to it because they find that under the supervision of the Department of Marine and Fisheries the pilots have become more versed in their profession and more alert in their service. The superannuation plan was adopted when Mr. Brodeur was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in order to provide for old pilots who had become blind and who were unable to give further efficient service. The list of superannuation is decreasing yearly, and after a while there will be no more. May I ask the minister whether pilots, especially those of Montreal or Quebec, who are nearly all French Canadian, may pass their test examinations in the French language? I read something in the press about this some time ago. I know that the minister is as broadminded as a man can be, but I would like him to give the assurance that the pilots may pass the examination in whichever language they choose.

4 p.m.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am happy to inform my hon. friend that, in line with their general ability, the French Canadian pilots speak one language as well as the other, and the examination is such that they have to be familiar with the English language as well as the French. The examination may be carried on in French if the pilot so desires. But having regard to the fluency with which they speak English it is of little importance to the French Canadian pilots whether the examination is in English or is in French.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who are the members of the Pilotage Board in Ottawa?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is no Pilotage Board here now, but if this Bill goes through I hope to have a General Superintendent of Pilots at Ottawa who will be in charge of all the pilots at the various ports. At any port where the French language is the dominant one, we shall provide a superintendent who can speak that language.

Mr. LOGGIE: I wish to congratulate the Government upon bringing down this measure. The matter was not looked into in a near-sighted manner, as the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) would seem to indicate. The shipping interests as well as the manufacturing interests were fully heard, and I am sure that better service will be given under a management that is in direct touch with Ottawa than could be given through a local commission. I would like the minister to provide that in any event there shall be a minimum salary of $300. I have heard from harbour masters in small ports that there is a very great grievance because the fees were so small that they did not provide a reasonable remuneration for the work done, and it would be nothing but fair to include a provision that if the fees were only say, $200, the harbour master in any case would get $300. The work is considerable and the responsibility a grave one, and it would be in the interests of all concerned if the minister could fix a minimum for the harbour master in accordance with my suggestion.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not think it is necessary to consider that. I have a memorandum showing the remuneration that harbour masters receive at various ports, and in most cases it amounts to between $500 and $600 a year. We think that that is too low, and that it ought to be increased, provided they receive sufficient fees, to a maximum of $1,200.

Mr. DUFF: How are the pilots on the St. Lawrence route appointed ?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Whenever there is a vacancy it is advertised through the press, and any one may apply. I presume the hon. member refers to apprentice pilots, who have to pass the examination required every year until they become full-fledged pilots, when they take their turn as vacancies occur.

Mr. DUFF: Is the examination taken before the Pilot Commission or the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Department of Marine and Fisheries set the examination and have everything to do with it.

Mr. FOURNIER: It is true that practically all the pilots speak both languages, but probably some are not as fluent or as well versed in one or the other language as might be desirable, and I think it might very well be provided that in the case of inquiries or accidents, testimony could be taken in French. I do not quite agree with part of the remarks of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). I have the honour to represent the constituency of Bellechasse, in which there are many pilots, and I do not think my hon. friend has a precise knowledge of the St. Lawrence route. If he travelled with some of the pilots over that route on two or three occasions I am sure he would be convinced that these men are expert navigators. Indeed, I do not think that better or more prudent men could be found. The channel is narrow, and they are obliged to travel at night, and notwithstanding the difficulties they encounter, there are very few, if any, accidents. I suggest that it should be provided that testimony should be accepted in both languages.

Mr. DUFF: In places like Halifax, Vancouver, and St. John, are the local superintendents to be appointed directly by the Minister of Marine or by the Civil Service Commission? The appointment of superintendents in these places is a very important matter, and these men should be appointed by the minister himself, after consultation with the shipping men, who are best informed on the subject. These appointments should not rest in the hands of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I agree with the views of the hon. member, and while the Civil Service Commission will have the appointment of local superintendents, I, as minister, will necessarily be called on to pass upon their qualifications. The efficiency of the pilotage system very largely depends on the knowledge and qualifications of the local superintendents.

Mr. PARENT: Does the practice of " tour de rôle " still obtain, and, if so, does the present Bill seek to abolish it?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: " Tour de rôle " still applies.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are in the county I represent a very large body of pilots, and I should like to know somewhat more about this Bill. I must say, in justice to the pilotage system in the harbour of Sydney—a system that has been in existence for at least a hundred years—that the work has been excellent, and while there may have been some complaints, as there necessarily are against every human institution, considering the number of pilots at work in Sydney harbour and the very large number of ships with which they have had to cope, I think the number of accidents or complaints of any kind must be a very small percentage indeed. In view of this fact, I would like to be assured that full justice will be done to these men, and that they will not be placed in any worse position than they are under the present management. Is the minister making any provision for members of the pilotage system at Sydney who will be called upon to retire, or who he thinks should retire? And I may ask also if he is making any provision for the officers who are now employed in connection with that work. I do not know how many officers there are, but I think there are two or three men who are paid salaries in connection with the work of the commission and who are doing the work very well. I suppose it would be regarded as just as great a hardship to the men in Sydney to deprive them of their living as it is to those in Quebec and Montreal, where provision has been made by way of pension for those pilots who were retired. I am not finding fault because such provision has been made by reason of a change in the system, but I do say that the same justice should be meted out to men in other parts of the country who will be deprived of their living as a result of this change. In Sydney harbour under the present plan, which has been in force for some time, apprentices are appointed by the board and it depends to a great extent upon the ability of the apprentice as to when he shall be admitted to the full status of a licensed pilot. Once he gets a license I do not think there is any difference between him and others. Can the minister say how old a pilot must be before he gets a license, or is there an age limit; and to what age is he permitted to serve under the provisions of the statute? I think the maximum age now in Sydney is sixty-five years. I do not know that there is any fixed minimum, but I suppose a man could not become a pilot under twenty-five or thirty years of age at all events. How apprentices can be appointed from Ottawa rather puzzles me. The pilotage commission is on the ground there, they know the men, and I have never had very much reason to complain about the appointments they have made. Of course, it has been a political institution. When we were in power, Grits were appointed, but since the change of Governa Grit has not had much chance of becoming a pilot or an apprentice. But we did not find very much fault with that, because it was regarded as a part of the party system and as legitimate patronage. Now that a change is proposed I should like some explanation of the system the minister is going to adopt. If it is still going to be the party system, he must be advised by some person in the constituency who has knowledge of party affiliations. If it is not going to be the party system, there must be some agency through which the apprentices and pilots will be appointed regardless of party affiliations. We have already the supposed non-party system in connection with the post office and custom house and other departments, but as I have already pointed out in this House there is a marvellous instinct exercised in making these appointments, and a Grit is never by any possibility appointed where the vacancy should go to a Tory. I am only mentioning these things so that the minister will devise a system that will be satisfactory to all concerned and that justice shall be done. I suppose that once a man has been appointed as an apprentice, the position he gets as pilot depends upon the place he takes in the examination. The discrimination, as I regard it, can be more effectively exercised in selecting the apprentices. I think in Sydney harbour we have 32 pilots; 34 would be the limit. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the minister to reduce that number and whether any other radical changes are proposed in the pilotage system at Sydney.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend need have no fear of appointments being made on political grounds. Ever since I have been minister I have paid absolutely no attention to party politics in administering this department, and that will be my attitude so long as I hold office. Hon. members on the other side of the House who call upon me well know that I am as ready at all times to serve them as I am to serve members on this side of the House, and no one will strive harder than I to keep the pilotage system free from political patronage.

With regard to apprentice pilots, the local superintendent at Sydney would report to the general superintendent of pilots at Ottawa, and that report would come before me, so my hon. friend need have no apprehension as to the qualifications of the apprentices or that appointments will be made on party lines.

At Sydney there are 33 pilots and 7 apprentices. It is not my intention to interfere with that organization in any way, except that I have had a request from the port of Sydney to take the pilotage system under the Department of Marine and Fisheries in the same way that Quebec and Montreal have been taken over. The only change will be that instead of the local pilotage commission having charge of the pilots, the local superintendent will have charge of them.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister did not answer my question as to what he is going to do with the officials there.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Government has no pension system for pilots except for those of the Quebec district, and that has to be approved by Parliament each year. The various pilotage systems throughout Canada, however, have pension funds of their own and provide for their pilots when they reach the age of 65, which is the age limit. It is not the intention of the Government at the present time to propose a pension fund for pilots. The pilots have annually to pass an eye test and show that they possess the other necessary qualifications, and then when they reach the age of 65 they are generally retired, although a pilot may continue to the age of 70 subject to the approval of the minister. If the pilot on retiring has no means of his own the Pilotage Fund generally takes care of him.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will there be a local examiner at each port?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understand that this legislation is for the purpose of putting the different pilotage systems under the control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. When the Bill comes up we shall have an opportunity of studying all the details. There are several important questions to be considered—the question of pensions, for instance. Conditions vary at the different ports. In Halifax, for instance, the pilots may have to get on the bridge of a ship and stay there for only two or three hours, whereas between Quebec and Father Point they will be on duty from twenty-four to twenty-eight hours. I have no objection to the passing of this resolution because we shall have ample time to consider all the important questions involved when the Bill comes up. I approve of the systems being placed under the control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I am somewhat interested in this question because I live down there and understand the conditions. I think it would be of great advantage if the examiners and those in charge of the pilots were required to speak both languages.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it true that the department purchased at a cost of $70,000 or $80,000 a steamer to take the place of the pilot boats at Halifax, but that she was found cumbersome and the pilots had to take to the pilot boats again?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Department of Marine and Fisheries simply borrowed from the Department of the Naval Service the boat now used by the pilots.

Mr. MARTIN: Am I correct in understanding that the department equipped her at a cost of $60,000 or $70,000, and had to abandon her afterwards?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am not aware of any such expenditure as the hon. gentleman speaks of. I shall be very glad to look into it.

Mr. LOGGIE: I want to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman will be out of order.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. BALLANTYNE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 122, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—CASE OF EUGENIE ALIAS "VENUS" COTE.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Calder for the House to go into Committee of Supply:

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I desire to bring to the notice of the House a question which I could not follow up the other day, as I had a motion which I had at a previous period in the session placed on the Order Paper. That motion having since been dropped, I now desire to direct the attention of the House to the case of the King versus Eugenie alias "Venus" Coté. I bring this question before the House because an inquiry was urgently asked by the Toronto Globe into the case. The facts are very simple. On June 8, 1918, the Toronto Globe published under flaring headlines the following:

> Young Girl posed as man. Outrageous sentence upon her rouses a storm of indignation. Two years in Prison! Trying to help country. She contravenes some old statute.

The despatch is suposed to be sent from Kingston, and is dated June 7:

> Kingston, June 7.—Because she posed as a man, had her hair cut in military style, and went so far as donning a man's attire in order to do her bit in a log-driving bee for the Chaleur Bay Pulp Co., at Restigouche, "Venus" Cote, Rimouski, Quebec, aged twenty-three is now a prisoner in the Women's ward at the penitentiary here having been sentenced to two years for this awful crime. The girl was brought here in male attire, and the authorities at the big prison did not know whom they were dealing with till they read the commitment presented by the officers who had her in charge.
> As a result of the bringing of the girl to the penitentiary, there has been a storm of indignation over the treatment given her. There is an old law which states that it is an offence for a woman to wear male garments, but the opinion is that the penitentiary is no place for this sturdy young girl who showed such enterprise in endeavouring to help her country.

There is a further despatch supposed to be sent to the Globe and dated Kingston, June 7:—

> An effort will likely be made by Women's organizations to have "Venus" Coté, of Rimouski, Quebec, released from Portsmouth penitentiary. Miss Coté arrived here yesterday to serve two years for posing as a man and wearing male attire while she worked at log driving.

The facts are thus very clear: A young girl, who, according to the Toronto Globe, in the month of June last was doing her bit in a camp on the Baie des Chaleurs, was arrested because she was posing in male attire. For the terrible offence of thus appearing in public, and at a lumber camp, she was cruelly sentenced by a Quebec judge to Kingston penitentiary for two years. Then the Globe said that an effort was being made by the women's organizations to have "Venus" Coté released from the penitentiary. The Globe was not satisfied, and the editor, apparently to serve the end of justice, on June 10, published as a leading editorial the following:—

Coté Case Calls for Action.

If the facts are as represented in Press despatches, from Kingston, the case of Miss Coté demands immediate action from the Minister of Justice. This young woman, whose home is in Rimouski, Quebec, is twenty-three years of age, According to public reports, she responded to patriotic appeals for workers to take the places of men called to the colours by donning male attire in order to do her bit at a logging bee for the Chaleur Bay Pulp Company at Restigouche. In so doing, she apparently contravened some old statute which makes it an offence for a woman to wear male garments. Some busybody took action, and some court sentenced her to two years' imprisonment in Kingston Penitentiary for her heinous offence! Her arrival at Kingston to serve this term is said to have occasoned amazement at the big prison, and the despatch states "the opinion is that the penitentiary is no place for this sturdy young girl who showed such enterprise in endeavouring to help her country."

This is no case in which the slow methodical process of judicial procedure should be permitted to crawl its course. It is a case for prompt investigation and immediate action. If the facts are as published 24 hours should not elapse before this girl is honourably freed, recompensed for the injury done, and publicly commended for the spirit which found expression in her action. If a cruel injustice has been done, the Minister of Justice should deem it his peremptory duty to do everything in his power to right the wrong and deal with those responsible for its perpetration. An effort is already being made by earnest and enterprising women's organizations in Kingston to secure the girl's release. But the minister should not wait until the humanity and patriotism of womanhood have forced his hand. In this case, called to his attention by publicity, he should act at once on his own initiative.

An outraged public sentiment wants to hear from Hon. C. J. Doherty.

As you will see, Mr. Speaker, this is a very strong indictment. First against the "busybody" who caused this unfortunate young lady to be arrested because posing in male attire she was nevertheless doing her bit and taking the place of slackers; second, it is also a very strong arraignment of that judge in Rimouski who dared sentence a girl to two years in the penitentiary; and third, this article contains a very broad hint of disapproval of the Minister of Justice because forsooth he might not act promptly enough in dealing with the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Was it a judge of the county court, or a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec who imposed the sentence in this case?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was a magistrate, but I am not myself passing judgment on the magistrate. I am drawing an inference from the article in the Globe. Not only is there an implied charge against the busybody who brought this young lady to justice, not only is there an implied charge against the judiciary, but there is an implied charge against the whole population of the district of Rimouski.

As I read the despatches published in the Globe, and the editorial comment on them, I became somewhat nervous, because you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that during the month of June last, war conditions seemed to call for unity in this country. We had reached a very serious period of the great conflict, and I did not think it was a proper thing that a young girl should be sent to the penitentiary for two years, because, forsooth, she was "doing her bit", when according to the Globe there were so many slackers in the district of Rimouski. So I followed up this case. I thought the request for an investigation should not be delayed at all and so I waited, waited and waited until finally, nothing having been heard from the Department of Justice, and no investigation having taken place, I said to myself, "It is my duty as a loyal citizen of the province of Quebec to inquire into this matter." So I wrote to the Assistant Attorney General of the province. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must confess my surprise when I found that instead of this young lady "doing her bit" and being cruelly sent to the penitentiary for contravening an old statute, information which had been laid before the magistrate at Rimouski, showed that the circumstances were altogether different. First of all, the editor of the Globe should have understood at once that any girl named Eugénie alias "Venus" Coté must have something dubious in her record, and should have made a little inquiry before at once launching an attack upon the district of Rimouski and its young men, and before publishing all these innuendoes against the judiciary and the people of Quebec. As I stated a moment ago, I wrote to the Assistant Attorney General of the province of Quebec, who sent me by the next mail the record of the case, and here is what I read in that record:

Canada,
Province of Quebec,
District of Rimouski Justice of the Peace Office, Rimouski.

Frederic Joseph Astle, Hotelkeeper in the village of Little Metis, district of Rimouski, Plaintiff.

Vs.

Eugénie Côté, spinster, from the parish of Ste. Angèle de Merici, Accused.

Be it publicly known that on the eighteenth day of May, 1918, at Rimouski, in the district of Rimouski, the said Eugénie Côté (and having consented that I would proceed with a summary examination and without a jury), has been found guilty by the undersigned for having malignantly, illegally and criminally, in the village of Little Metis, in the district of Rimouski, on or about the 14th of May, 1918—

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the very accurate special press despatch published in the Globe in June had reference to a case which had been made in the month of May previous. It shows how diligent and well informed the press of Canada is, and how honestly it always presents the facts to its readers.

—stolen, taken and removed the following articles from the dwelling, a summer residence, of Mrs. John Thomas Molson, viz: 25 silver forks, 22 silver spoons, a butter knife with a bone handle, opera glasses and case, 50 pieces of household lingerie, marked "J. T. Molson;" a package of playing cards, a small case containing a pair of scissors and a tooth brush, two playing balls, two linen table-cloths, all being the property and in possession of the said J. T. Molson, and estimated to at least fifty dollars.

Eugénie Côté was sentenced on the 18th of Mach, for the said offence, for internment during five years in the authorized penitentiary in the province of Quebec.

Given under my signature and seal on the day, month and year hereabove first mentioned, at Rimouski, in the above-mentioned district.

Clerk of the Crown and Peace.

Therefore, Venus Coté was not sent to the penitentiary because she had donned male attire and had "done her bit." She had "done her bit," but at the expense of the summer residents of Little Metis. She was a burglar and was condemned for burglary; she was "doing her bit". Now, perhaps there are persons who may be surprised that Venus Coté should get such a long sentence, but she had been "doing her bit" before. According to a report received by the Attorney General from the judge, the following may be gathered:

Rimouski, June 13, 1918.

The Hon. the Attorney General,
Quebec,

Dear Sir:—

I beg to convey you the information asked for re the prisoner Eugénie Côté, presently detained in Kingston Penitentiary.

Eugenie Coté was sentenced on the 18th of March, 1918, for having stolen goods from Mrs. J. T. Molson's residence, at Little Metis.

The list of goods mentioned in the accusation contains only a portion of the valuable articles taken by the prisoner in that case.

The accused is a repeater: she having been sentenced by me on the 21st November, 1916, to serve five months in jail for house-breaking in the residence of a Mrs. Moise Habib, at Mont Joli.

The question of she being dressed in male attire, when arrested and convicted, has nothing to do with the penalty imposed upon her.

Two days after her incarceration in the common jail, at Rimouski, she escaped and would be subject for that offence to a further punishment.

So the dear little lady, the protegée of the Globe, was rather konwn to the police authorities, and evidently she knew all the tricks of the trade, for on being interned she managed to escape, and then donned male attire.

That girl is completely out of any moral sense. She smokes, chews, curses, blasphemes and runs about the streets and highways like a real vagrant and her case is still aggravated by the fact that for some months, she had dressed herself with male attire, because under such a disguise she could go round anywhere without being noticed and thus become a real cause of disorder.

Should you request more information about her whereabouts and moral condition, you might communicate with the parish priest of Mont Joli and St. Joseph de Lepage, and they will be able to furnish you with surprising facts.

When arrested, she was wearing masculine garments. She gave her name as being Xavier Coté, 19 years old. She had her hair cut and was so unclean in everyway that I could not recognize her at first; and it was only when we arrived at Mont Joli I found out that we had again to deal with Eugenie Coté.

Besides all her other vices, she is an inveterate burglar, for whom no correction would seem possible.

(Signed): H. R Fiset.

So, Mr. Speaker, the Toronto Globe was well informed indeed by its correspondent. But in the month of June last year it paid that paper better to preach Unionism than Unity and to be particular about the facts of this case. I imagine the Globe will at least make an apology to the magistrate and to the people in that district and also to its readers. And it should not omit to make an apology to the Minister of Justice, because unhappily he was a pretty bitter pill, and from the language used by the Globe we know, of course, that he was persona non grata with a section of the Cabinet. That is the case I wish to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker. It shows how the press of Canada, subsidized for its news, informed the public as to the real facts in this partisular instance.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

NAVAL SERVICE ESTIMATES—STATEMENT BY Mr. BALLANTYNE.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Naval Service—Salaries, $238,900.

Contingencies, $50,000.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Naval Service): Mr. Chairman, before asking the Committee to deal with the Naval Service Estimates, it will be in order that I should reply to the charges made some time ago by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) against the Naval Service. I regret that my hon. friend did not do me the courtesy to let me know that he was going to launch those charges on the floor of the House at that time, so that I might have been in my seat to reply to the inaccurate statements he then made. If the hon. member had said that the ships comprising the Royal Canadian Navy were not as efficient as they should be, I would not feel so much disposed to take issue with him; but he saw fit to detail a long list of inaccurate charges against the loyal and capable officers and men who have been defending the coasts of Canada to the best of their ability, and, as Minister of Naval Service, I am happy to say, in the most efficient manner during the period of the war. It is not my intention to reply to every charge that the hon. member made, because if I did I would take up too much time and probably I might weary the committee. I feel sure that he did not prepare these charges himself; no doubt they were collected together for him. When I was in Halifax last fall I quite accidentally came across a well-known man, not a member of this House, who was very busy trying to gather what information he could so as to supply the hon. member with the defective ammunition that he used in making these charges. I am sorry that the hon. member did not himself look into these matters more carefully; I am satisfied that he would never have made the charges had he known that they could not be substantiated.

I may mention in the first place that the establishment of the Royal Canadian Navy when war broke out on August 4, 1914, was only 300 men. Suddenly the Naval Service was called upon to furnish escorts for the convoys that were going out of Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and Sydney, and also to provide the necessary patrols, and hon. members will appreciate what it meant to increase suddenly the establishment of the Royal Canadian Naval Service from 300 to over 5,000 men. During the period of the war over 10,000 men passed through the Royal Canadian Naval Service. I resent, and I am sure that the people of Canada will resent, the very unfair and unfounded charges that the hon. member (Mr. Duff) has seen fit to launch

5 p.m. against the loyal Canadian officers and men, as also the officers and men of the Imperial service, who gave their time and best efforts to Canada when her very existence as a nation was threatened. I am glad to take advantage of this opportunity, as Minister of the Naval Service, to pay my whole-hearted tribute to the splendid work done by the Imperial officers and men in the Canadian Naval service and by the loyal and efficient Canadian officers and men, who during the four and a half years of war, have been exposed to all kinds of hardship and of peril. I am surprised and disappointed that any member of this Parliament should make such unwarranted and unfounded charges as the member for Lunenburg has seen fit to make against these patriotic men who rendered to Canada and to the Empire such devoted self-acrificing service during the war.

Mr. DUFF: I said no such thing. If the minister will read my speech he will see that I took the part of the men and of some of the officers.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member made charges against the men and he cast slurs at the efficiency of the Naval Service of Canada. Having charged the Naval Service with inefficiency and blundering, and having cast ridicule upon it, he cannot now rise in his place and say that he did not make any charges against the personnel of the Canadian Naval Service. It will be interesting, no doubt, to the hon. member to hear what a stoker had to say with regard to one of his charges as published in the Montreal Star:

What the Navy Did.

Sir,—In a recent Star I saw that a Mr. William Duff, of Lunenburg, ran down the Naval Service on the Nova Scotian coast. Now, if it had not been for the Naval service there would not have been one of the Lunenburg fishing fleet on top to-day. I was on one of the naval boats, the Stadacona. We were sent out in very bad weather to find the Lunenburg fishing fleet on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland and send them home because there were submarines around, and we did not stop till we had rounded every boat up. There was over 60 I was told. I did not count them myself—about 5 miles apart. In the meantime the men stood at the guns day and night, watching for subs. I happen to know that the Lady Evelyn is not the best equipped vessel in the service, and when she went to Magdalen Islands, she took something of a great deal more value than lead pencils. Mr. William Duff of Lunenburg may know a lot, but he doesn't know everything.

George Goodman, Stoker.

And now the hon. member says that he made no charges against the officers and men of the Canadian Naval Service. If he did not, what did he mean when he said that at the time the oil-tanker Lux Blanca was sunk by a submarine several miles from the gas buoy off Halifax, the naval officials at Halifax were holding a pink tea and playing bridge whist? To-day, when I charge the hon. member with making unfair and inaccurate statements with regard to the officers and men of the Naval Service, he tries to make out that he did not reflect upon the personnel; that he was referring only to the ships. Such an explanation at this late date will certainly not go very far.

It is strange that the hon. member should go for his information to a junior officer, Lieutenant Julian—a man who did not know the bow from the stern of a ship when war broke out and who knows very little more to-day. In winding up his long list of supposed charges he says that he asked this young politician, Lieutenant Julien, to what he ascribed the inefficiency of the Naval Service of Canada; and that Lieutenant Julian said it was due to Sir Robert Borden and the late Conservative party. That clearly shows that the charges were made for the purpose of trying to gain some political party advantage. The late lamented and gifted leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, did his best to inaugurate a Canadian naval service, and he placed a Naval Service Act upon the statute book. The ships that we have to-day are the ships that were brought out to this country by the Liberal party. And yet a full-fledged Liberal like the hon. member for Lunenburg gets up and slams the navy that was created by his late revered leader.

It is not my intention to enter into any political controversy on the subject of a Canadian naval policy. It has always been a matter of great regret to me that the naval defences of the coast of Canada ever became a question of controversy between the two parties; I should have preferred to see it treated as a national matter and kept entirely out of the political arena. I shall not, therefore, this afternoon go over the history of former Liberal and Conservative Governments so far as it relates to a naval policy for Canada. The matter of a Canadian naval policy will be taken up in due time. When Parliament meets in the next session I am satisfied that the Government will place before Parliament and before the people a naval policy that will receive the unanimous approval of members of Parliament and of the people generally.

The first charge that the hon. member (Mr. Duff) makes is this:

> I am going to show, Mr. Chairman, that this $31,000,000 was practically all wasted, that it was not spent in the interest of the taxpayers of Canada; that it was entirely unnecessary, and did not in any particular, or in any way help to defend Canada or to protect the property of her citizens.

That is a nice charge to make against the Liberal party who created the Naval Service of Canada. It is strange that the hon. member throughout his speech did not return to the financial side of the question, except to say that the Government proceeded to waste money on the purchase of a lot of small boats that were utterly useless.

Then, the hon. member had something to say in regard to the Niobe and the Rainbow. He said:

> Shortly after Hon. J. D. Hazen assumed the position of Minister of Naval Affairs the crews of these ships were disbanded, the boys sent home and only a few men kept on board to act as caretakers.

I shall give the actual facts. On the 28th of July, 1914, when events in Europe first began to look alarming, the Rainbow was in commission with a full crew. On that day she was directed to prepare for war, and on the 2nd of August she was despatched to sea to cruise off Vancouver Island to be in readiness for any sudden attack by German submarines, known to be on the west coast of America. Immediately upon the declaration of war on the fourth of August, the Rainbow was ordered south to convoy His Majesty's gunboats Algerian and Shearwater to Esquimalt, a task which she successfully accomplished. She was continuously at sea until paid off in the spring of 1917, covering something over 50,000 miles during her period of service and her activities extended from Panama to the northern coast of British Columbia. By the battle off the Falkland Islands the great menace of the German Pacific fleet was removed; but there was considerable scope for useful work on the Pacific until the entry of the United States into the war. It was then decided that the Rainbow's trained and experienced crew could be used to better advantage on the Atlantic. So much with regard to the Rainbow.

The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) had also to say something about the Niobe. He said that upon war being declared "it was found that her boilers were in such condition that it would take several months to put her in a seaworthy condition." Here are the actual facts, which are very much at variance with the statement of the hon. member for Lunenburg. The Niobe was ordered to prepare for war on the 28th July. Steps were once taken to bring her forward for service, and to raise a crew for her. She was ready for sea on the 31st August, 1914. She at once joined the N.A. & W.I. Squadron, her first duty being to escort SS. Canada with the Royal Canadian Regiment to Bermuda and return with an Imperial regiment. She then patrolled the gulf of St. Lawrence and coast of Newfoundland, whilst the First Canadian Contingent was preparing to leave and during their passage through Canadian waters. She subsequently formed part of the so-called New York Patrol until she was paid off in September, 1915, after a full year's efficient service, during which she steamed over 30,000 miles. Hon. members will see that there is a wide difference between the charge that the hon. member made, that her boilers were in such condition that she was not seaworthy, and the actual facts, which were as I have just stated. Furthermore, at the request of the Admiralty all the big guns on the Niobe were removed and used on the merchant marine ships, but only after the active service at sea to which I have referred had been performed.

The hon. member was good enough to say that he had no charge to make against my administration, but that he had as to the administration of my predecessor, Sir Douglas Hazen. I want to say, in fairness to my predecessor in office, that he is not to blame in any way for the Naval Service of Canada not having done more than that which it did render so effectively during the war.

In the early months of the war the Canadian Government inquired whether, in the judgment of the Admiralty, it was necessary or desirable to undertake preparation for naval defence. A reply was received stating that naval preparations were not necessary and that Canada's effort should be concentrated upon military forces. A further inquiry was made in the spring of 1915, with the same result. In the autumn of 1916 the Canadian Government was suddenly called upon by the Admiralty to undertake certain preparations for naval defence. The Department of Naval Service took up the matter immediately and vigorously, with the result that all the proposals of the Admiralty were carried out practically in their entirety and to the greatest extent that was possible in the circumstances. The result is seen in the large number of patrol boats of various types and sizes which were engaged in anti-submarine defence.

It will be seen, therefore, that the Government on two different occasions inquired of the Admiralty if there was anything that Canada could do more than was being undertaken at the time, and the reply was that the British Government did not desire that Canada should do anything more than concentrate her full effort upon necessary military forces to send overseas. The hon. member (Mr. Duff) makes this further interesting statement:

> I make the statement here that if the Niobe had been ready to proceed to sea the morning that war was declared she would have succeeded in capturing prizes which would have paid the Canadian expenditure for war purposes during the first year of the war.

I am sure that the hon. member finds himself in rather an awkward position this afternoon after having given expression to views that had been gathered for him by some persons who had very strong partisan political leanings, and who were not careful about the accuracy of the statements that they placed in his hands. The hon. member no doubt referred to German vessels sailing to or from United States ports, but I may say that the German Government took the precaution to warn all masters of ships in advance that war was likely to be declared, and on receipt of this intelligence these vessels were careful to remain in the shelter of neutral ports. It will be interesting to learn that an Imperial cruiser of very similar type to the Niobe put into Halifax the day after the outbreak of war and that Imperial vessels continually shadowed the Atlantic coast from that time on. Neither this ship nor any others of the fleet made any captures off the Canadian or the northern United States coasts, which, I think, effectively disposes of the supposition that had the Niobe been at sea she would have made many valuable captures. The committee may rest assured that the Imperial Government were quite awake to the possibilities of the situation and took measures to deal with it.

The further the hon. member proceeded with his speech, the farther he got away from the facts. He wanted to know why the Niobe did not capture the German steamer Willehad. If he had taken the trouble to ascertain the actual facts he would have learned for himself that this German steamer Willehad sailed from Montreal on the first day of August, and war was not declared between Great Britain and Germany until August 4. Notwithstanding, the hon. member expected the Niobe to open up her guns, and if not to sink this German steamer, at least to capture her, before a state of war existed. I am surprised that the hon. member should have made such an inaccurate statement before the intelligent members of this House.

Mr. COPP: When did she sail from Quebec?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: She sailed from Montreal on the first day of August.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When did she pass Quebec?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: She passed Quebec on the 2nd, and her movements were watched and telegraphed to the Naval Department all down the St. Lawrence. Furthermore, the vessel Canada was held in readiness to intercept her in the event of war being declared while she was in Canadian waters.

Mr. DUFF: Where was this ship on the 4th of August?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: On the 4th of August she was outside of Canadian waters on her way to Boston, where she arrived on the 5th of August. But, said the hon. member, while she was going down the St. Lawrence, the Naval Service did not watch her, nor make any attempt to capture her. It must be obvious that the reason we did not do so was that war had not been declared at that time. The hon. member said, in regard to the Princess Cecelia:—

> It was humiliating for Nova Scotians to know that the North-German-Lloyd SS. Princess Cecilia left Boston a day or two after the war was commenced, with the most valuable cargo ever shipped from that port. . . . . and that no effort could be made by the Niobe or any Canadian cruiser to go out and capture that ship.

The facts are these: The Princess Cecelia left New York on the 28th July, 1914, one week before the declaration of war, bound for an European port. When matters assumed a threatening aspect she was half way across the Atlantic. She was ordered to return to a United States port by wireless and reached Bar Harbour on August 4th before the declaration of war. She left Bar Harbour on the 6th November, 1914, under an agreement between the Imperial and United States Governments, for Boston, in order that better supervision might be exercised over her. She did not leave Boston until after the entry of the United States into the war in 1917, and then flew the United States flag. The value of sea power was never more startlingly demonstrated. No prizes were made on the North Atlantic coasts, as the German ships simply stayed in neutral ports or fled to them for shelter, making a rich harvest for those neutrals at a later date, when they in turn entered the war and took over hundreds of thousands of tons of the finest shipping in the world without an effort.

The hon. member's next charge is that relating to what he calls the waste of money on small patrol vessels. I do not suppose the hon. member knew that the Canadian Naval Service had to provide an extensive system of patrols. Not only did we have to have patrols outside our principal Atlantic seaports such as Halifax and Sydney, but we had to furnish escorts for the numerous convoys conveying Canadian and American troops across the Atlantic from Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and Sydney. These men of our patrol service who have served on small trawlers and drifters in all kinds of weather, performed as good service, and deserve as much commendation for that service, as our gallant soldiers who fought in the trenches in France for all that we hold dear. I cannot help feeling annoyed that the hon. member for Lunenburg should make such slighting and sneering references to the naval men who have performed such signal service for Canada. It might interest the members of the Committee to know what we have done in the way of Atlantic coast patrol. The patrol squadron consisted of:

10 Auxiliary Patrol vessels.
12 Canadian Trawlers (named).
7 Trawlers Sweepers Type known as P.V's and numbered).
36 Trawlers (known as T.R's and numbered).
36 Drifters (known as C.D's and numbered).
15 Drifters (Imperial and temporarily lent, known as I.D's and numbered)
6 United States Submarine Chasers.
1 United States Torpedo Boat (allocated to Air Service, Halifax).

The whole of the above were manned by Canadian Naval Service ranks and ratings (with the exception of the United vessels), the total number of ranks and ratings employed being approximately two thousand.

The area to be patrolled, and over which practical operations were continually carried out, extended from Belle Isle to Shelburne, and from Point Des Monts (St. Lawrence) to the Virgin Rocks, including the Nova Scotia Banks and Grand Banks. This area gave some 1,800 miles of coast line besides open sea areas and routes which had to be patrolled.

The operations on which the vessels of the Patrol Squadron Area were employed are:

Coast patrolling and investigation at all points of the coast line of reports of suspicious crafts sighted, suspicious lights, possible mines, etc.

Constant patrol of certain positions of strategic importance.

Frequent patrols of the Grand Banks and Nova Scotia Banks and giving warning to fishing vessels of enemy submarine activities.

Port patrols off Halifax and Sydney.

Daily mine sweeping of the approaches to Halifax, Sydney and St. John's, Nfld.

Frequent exploratory sweeps over mineable waters along the coast routes of shipping.

Convoy escorts to the slow convoys transporting stores overseas for some 150 to 200 miles out to sea. (These convoys number 25 to 43 vessels in a convoy) .

Convoy escorts to the troops convoys leaving Canada.

Convoy escorts continually along Canadian and Newfoundland coastal routes.

Organized searches over areas where any enemy submarines were known or believed to be operating. In addition to which a very considerable amount of salvage work has been done by the Canadian patrol vessels.

The force was divided between the bases of Halifax and Sydney in proportion to the measure of activities required in the neighbourhood of these ports and the force based on each of these ports were further divided into separate flotillas utilized respectively for patrols, convoy escorts, minesweeping, etc. The main principle guiding the amount of sea time for patrol, convoy escort and other flotillas engaged in work beyond the minesweeping of harbour approaches was that two-thirds of the force were actually in active employment, one-third being in harbour undergoing necessary overhaul, coaling, storing, etc., and their personnel receiving instruction in gunnery, minesweeping, signal, hydrophones, depth charges, etc.

By this it is seen that force was maintained actually at sea for two-thirds of its time, which, when the weather conditions of the coast, the class of vessels employed, the small number of their crews, and consequent strain are considered, together with the amount of work which has to be carried out even when in harbour, is considered as much as can be expected of the crews and at the same time maintain a good and efficient lookout.

When the war was on, a strict censorship prevented both my predecessor and myself from giving the public any information as to the splendid work the Canadian Naval Service was performing, and in one sense the country should be thankful to the hon. member for Lunenburg for making these charges, because it gives an opportunity not only to refute them in toto, but to place on Hansard the record of the splendid work of the Canadian Naval Service during the four and a half years of war.

I might also say that our Canadian patrols discovered several German mines, and no one can tell how many ships and how many lives have been saved by their vigilance in that respect. There is another thing. The people of Halifax and of Sydney, not familiar with the work of the patrol service, and observing these trawlers and drifters, which look very much alike, as they strolled along the port of Halifax or Sydney, were under the impression that the trawlers and drifters never went out to sea, and that has led sometimes to the unfair charge that the men of the patrol service doing nothing but attending pink teas and wasting the country's money and their own time. As a matter of fact, these trawlers and drifters proceeded to sea as divisions, and when they had stayed out the requisite number of days, they came back to port to refit. Surely no one will begrudge these men the short leave they were granted when they returned to their base.

I shall not refer to what the hon. gentleman had to say about chartered vessels and motor launches, but here is a statement that I cannot allow to go unchallenged. He said:

> When it was found that Halifax was full of these boats a base was established at Sydney. I have no hesitation in saying that the large expenditure of money for naval purposes at Sydney harbour was absolutely wasted, and there was no good result from having these boats in that harbour.

That is a very strong statement for an hon. member who was not conversant with the facts to make. In view of the brief outline I have given of the work of the patrols at Halifax and Sydney, I cannot understand how the hon. member could get up and state they had performed no service whatever for Canada, and that the expenditure in maintaining the base at Sydney was a waste of money. The hon. member for Lunenburg shakes his head. What I read were his actual words. I will read them again. He said:

I have no hesitation in saying that the large expenditure of money for naval purposes at Sydney harbour was absolutely wasted.

There I take sharp issue with him. I say there was no money wasted at the base at Sydney or at the base at Halifax. Words fail me to do justice to the splendid gallantry and efficiency of the men of our patrol service. Here again is another evidence that the hon. member could not have gathered this information from any trustworthy source.

The naval base at Sydney was first established in the spring of 1915. It was made a permanent base in 1916. During the summer practically the whole export trade of Canada passed through Cabot Straits. During the war Sydney became more important and in 1917 the Admiralty used it as a port for collecting the convoys proceeding from the North American ports to Europe. Convoys consisting of thirty, forty, or more merchant ships would leave Sydney regularly every week throughout the summer. Sydney was certainly a most important base and was used not only on the judgment of the technical officers of the Canadian naval service but also on the advice of the Admiralty. I think the advice I had, as Minister of the Naval Service, was more to be relied upon than the inaccurate information that the hon. member has received. The hon. member for Lunenburg follows along with this other statement:

Captains and mates were taken from the merchant marine service and held around Halifax for months doing nothing.

That might sound all right if there was a general election on but I do not see why the hon. member should make such an absurd statement as that these men were taken from the merchant marine service and held around Halifax for months doing nothing. What are the facts? When it was decided by the Admiralty to build 60 trawlers and 100 drifters, the department agreed to assist by providing crews for those in Canadian waters. This meant the addition of at least 1,600 officers and men. It is obvious these men could not be recruited, and instructed in their special work in a day, and, therefore, they were recruited and held in readiness, so that as each vessel was ready at the builders the whole crew could be despatched to bring the vessel out to sea without loss of time. That is what these men were doing at the port of Halifax when the hon. member says they were lying around doing nothing.

Mr. COPP: Could the minister tell me what year it was and at what time of the year these men were waiting for these trawlers?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If you get down to such details as the name of the month or the day of the month they were there, all I can say is that I have not that information before me; nor can I tell you whether it was full moon or half moon, but I can find that out if you want to know.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the minister say that these men were not kept at Halifax at all waiting for ships to be ready for use?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No, I do not say that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will he say they were not kept there for a whole winter by the hundred?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I say that they were not kept there for a whole winter and they were not kept there by the hundred, but there was of course a certain number of men held there waiting to man these ships. Then the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) makes another statement about the craft. He says:

Owing to their condition they were constantly undergoing repairs, most of them were unseaworthy and were not fit to go outside the headlands.

I do not know where the hon. gentleman got such information as that but I want to say that in view of the importance of their duties, these vessels were always kept as far as possible at the top notch of efficiency. There was room for a possible failure when these vessels were ordered out for duty. They were, therefore, always immediately overhauled on their arrival in harbour and any small defects made good, and as much time as possible was given in harbour for this purpose. Of course owing to the rapidity with which they were built, on account of the emergency, many of the vessels developed more minor defects than would be normally the case.

Then the hon. gentleman speaks of the crew of trawler No. 30 and he makes certain charges about that vessel. In July 1918, trawler No. 30 was engaged in escorting convoys and merchant ships to sea. The hon. member referred to the court martialling of certain members of her crew. Her crew had complained of leaks in the forecastle deck. All available caulkers were engaged in more urgent work and repairs could not be taken in hand at once. On the morning of the 18th, the men refused to take the ship to sea, and consequently she was unable to take her part as escort to the outgoing convoy.

The ship was inspected by the shipwright officer, who reported that there was a slight leak over the starboard after bunk, also over the mess table; a leak in the captain's cabin, the worst on the ship. There were three or four leaks in the engineer's quarters. He further reported that the leaks were no more than might be occasioned in the case of a ship sweating and in no way impaired the ship's seagoing efficiency. In view of the fact that the country was at war, and these men put their comfort before the safety of valuable lives and ships in the convoy, the crew were tried by courtmartial for refusing duty and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. This sentence was considered not excessive.

The captain of the Hochelaga I wish to inform the hon. member, was not a member of the court which tried these men and the statement of the hon. member that he was a typical example of the distortion and misrepresentation employed by him throughout his speech to work up a case against the naval service. Then the hon. member had gathered certain shreds of information regarding the Hochelaga. He stated:

> There was a steamer on naval duty called the Hochelaga, which was commanded by a certain gentleman and which was sent to sea on patrol duty. The lookout on this naval patrol boat one morning sighted a submarine; he reported the matter to the captain, and the captain, who was in charge of eight or ten small boats in addition to his own, at once put up signals to return to port, and instead of stopping and endeavouring to get that submarine or be sunk in the attempt, the captain of the Hochelaga deliberately turned tail and proceeded back to port.

And yet, the hon. gentleman says that he has not made any charge against the officers and men who comprise the Canadian naval service.

Mr. DUFF: I did not say that at all.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hansard makes the hon. gentleman state that the captain—

> At once put up signals to return to port.

That is a direct charge against the officers and men of the naval service.

Mr. DUFF: Against some of the officers and men but not against all.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend need not try to draw the line too fine because his statements were general and sweeping. The particular charge that he makes in this connection is against the officers and men who were on board the Hochelaga. The facts are: On the 25th August the patrol ships Cartier, Hochelaga and trawlers Nos. 32 and 22 were patrolling, ships three to four miles apart. About 1.45 p.m. the Hochelaga sighted two schooners which being reported to the captain, he altered course to intercept them. When about four miles from the schooners a submarine was sighted close to them, and at the same time one of the schooners sank. The captain then ordered his crew to stations for "action," altered course towards Cartier, his senior officer's ship and away from the submarine, and reported the presence of the submarine by wireless. Cartier immediately steered for the position of the submarine, accompanied by Hochelaga, but the submarine had by that time disappeared. Then the hon. member for Lunenburg asks:

> Why in the name of common sense was he allowed to go with an honourable discharge?

There again the hon. gentleman's information is totally inaccurate. Here are the facts in that case: When the circumstances were reported, the captain of the Hochelaga was tried by court-martial on the following charge:

> That he did not, from negligence or other default, on sight of a ship of the enemy, which it was his duty to engage, use his utmost exertions to bring his ship into action.

He was found guilty and sentenced to be dismissed from His Majesty's service. By no stretch of imagination can this sentence be called an honourable discharge. There can be scarcely any greater disgrace than such a sentence in time of war, which carries with it not only the forfeiture of his commission as an officer, but also of all claim to pension, war service gratuity, medals, or other benefits. Surely that was enough punishment for a man who showed some neglect in the performance of his duty. This officer was not on the court which tried the crew of Trawler 30, for refusal of duty, although the hon. member says that he was.

Then my hon. friend unearthed another mare's nest and he referred to the oil tanker Luz Blanca, which was either sunk by a shell, or torpedoed by a German submarine, seventeen miles off the gas buoy at the port of Halifax. The hon. member made a number of charges of culpable negligence against the officers of the department in connection with the sinking of that ship. Here is further evidence that the hon. member made charge after charge against the officers and men of the Naval Service of Canada. At the opening of my remarks the hon. member disclaimed having done so; but as we consider his speech we find that as he proceeded he time and time again makes absolutely unfair and inaccurate references to these gallant men. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to say:

> While this vessel was being sunk a number of the officers at Halifax were at pink teas and playing bridge whist. This is the way we were protected on the Nova Scotia coast.

I am glad of this opportunity to absolutely refute the accusation—the unfair accusation—that the hon. member has brought against British officers with a splendid record in the Imperial navy, and against the excellent officers and men who comprised the Canadian Naval Service of Canada. For the hon. gentleman to allege that in time of war these men who had donned the King's naval uniform would be guilty of attending pink teas and playing bridge while an oil tanker was being shelled and sunk outside of the port of Halifax, is absurd and nonsensical, and I hurl the charge back at him as unfair and totally inaccurate. Now, here are the facts in regard to the Luz Blanca, which may afford some information to the hon. gentleman: She left Halifax about 7 a.m. on the 5th of August, 1918. She was struck by a torpedo on her starboard side when about 35 miles southwest of the Outer Gas Buoy of Halifax harbour. There was a considerable amount of haze on this day. Her report of the attack was received by the senior officer of patrols at 1.45 p.m., and action was taken immediately. At this time there were at sea—one division of patrol vessels (i.e., four vessels) and two United States submarine chasers. The former had just left the convoy, and the latter were still in company with the convoy. The W/T. message was sent to both divisions, which was coded, sent, decoded and acted upon by 2.30 p.m.

That is very prompt action. This is how the officers were employed instead of attending a pink tea and playing bridge whist. The patrol vessels were uncertain of their position, as they had been at sea for some time in fog. Unfortunately, the senior officer made a wrong decision as to his position on the advice of a fisherman whom he happened to pass, and in consequence did not get into touch with the Luz Blanca. He was absolved from blame by the court of inquiry and the department concurred in this. Any man who knows anything at all about navigation—and I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) knows much about it—is aware that when a ship is in a dense fog it is nothing unusual for a navigator not to be able to determine what his right course is.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister say there was a fog on that day?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do. I suppose my hon. friend later on will assert that there was no fog on the day in question.

Mr. DUFF: I absolutely assert that there was no fog on that day, and I will put up $1,000 to prove the assertion.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hon. gentlemen will appreciate, from what I have said already, whether the accuracy of the statement of the Minister for the Naval Service, or the accuracy of the statement of the hon. member for Lunenburg, is the more to be depended upon. The submarine chasers arrived on the scene too late to save the ship, but picked up survivors. Those are the facts in regard to the sinking of the Luz Blanca.

It now becomes my duty to deal with another statement by the hon. gentleman; and it appears that the further he proceeded with his speech the more intoxicated he became with his inaccurate statements.

An hon. MEMBER: He had been taking pink tea.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Probably he had been taking tea, and I hope it was not anything stronger.

Mr. DUFF: I must ask the hon. member to take back his suggestion that I was indulging in something stronger than pink tea.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will withdraw the observation, because I am satisfied the hon. gentleman would be perfectly satisfied with tea, and more especially "pink tea."

Now here is another statement by the hon. gentleman:

> That whilst a German submarine was off the coast, the Lady Evelyn was sent to Magdalen islands with six lead pencils.

It is a shame that the hon. member should occupy the time of the House with such frivolity as that, and to take up my time and the time of my technical officers in looking up accurate information to reply to any such nonsensical charge as that the Lady Evelyn was sent to the Magdalen islands with six lead pencils. The facts are that the Lady Evelyn left Sydney at five a.m. on the 3rd August on patrol duty in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Whilst on this duty she visited, in the ordinary course, the various war signal stations in her area, at the same time landing any supplies required by them. She continued patrolling until seven a.m. on the 7th August, when she returned to Sydney. The submarine on the 5th August was operating off Halifax, and not in the area of the Sydney patrol to which the Lady Evelyn belonged.

Then the hon. gentleman dealt with the assistance rendered by naval vessels from the country to the south of us, and here is what he said:

> An American destroyer was off Cape Canso, she received a call to return to Halifax. When the commander of the destroyer received the call, he wired back that he had information a submarine was in his zone. Nevertheless he was ordered back to Halifax on some paltry excuse, and when he got there he was sent out on convoy with the ship that was to take Prince Arthur of Connaught to England.

The facts of the case are as follows: The Halifax subdivision of United States chasers were ordered to leave Halifax and to search Banquereau bank and return to Halifax, in order to escort H. M. S. Shannon, which ship was to convey Prince Arthur of Connaught to England. No submarine was sighted or reported by any of these vessels, and their programme of search was not curtailed in the least degree for the purpose of returning to Halifax. The normal routine was maintained, which would have been used in the case of any ship of the size of the Shannon proceeding to sea.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the minister the log of the Lady Evelyn?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is available.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the minister tell us where she was on the 5th August?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry I cannot off-hand tell the hon. gentleman the longitude and the latitude of the ship's position on that date—it is not to be supposed that I should know—but I will try and get that information for him. There is no necessity for me to refer to where the submarine went.

I pass over several of the hon. member's remarks and come to his statement that the Americans established seaplane bases at Halifax and North Sydney, and that this was a humiliating position for Canada. Well, let us see how humiliating it was for our beloved country. The seaplane bases at Halifax and Sydney were established, constructed and paid for by the Naval Service Department. As all naval operations on the Canadian coast were carried out in consultation with the Imperial and the United States authorities—that is to say, after our neighbour came into the war, it was agreed that when the stations were erected, the United States would lend such personnel as was desired to assist in operating them, for the following excellent reasons: I need not go into details, but there were large numbers of American soldiers going out of the ports of Sydney and Halifax, and it was necessary to establish a naval seaplane base not only at Sydney, but also at Halifax. The agreement was that the Americans were to provide the machines free of cost, which they very generously did—not only seaplanes, but kite balloons, and they were also prepared to supply airships. They also agreed to supply the personnel until we had a sufficient number of Canadian officers trained to take the places of the American officers. When one considers the number of men that we sent overseas and the number of men engaged in the naval service, it was not at all humiliating for Canada—when it came to filling the technical posts of pilots and crews of seaplanes, kite balloons and airships—to apply to the United States for the necessary skilled officers and men until Canada could provide the personnel. Canada had her share in this. We had to provide the buildings and the landing base, which we were proceeding to do as rapidly as possible, and some of the buildings were partially constructed when the armistice was signed.

As to the patrol of our waters by the United States war ships, the United States was one of the Allies. The tremendous British fleet was performing, as we all know, the herculean task of providing the necessary escorts for the vast number of ships that were carrying soldiers, munitions and foodstuffs, as well as holding the enemy at bay in the Kiel canal during the whole term of the war. Therefore, an arrangement was made with the United States for their navy to patrol a certain portion of Canadian waters. The United States established their outer base at Shelburne with a view to protecting the approaches to the northern United States ports. The patrol from Lockeport, east and north, was carried on by Canada. So the United States was only taking a fair share in looking after the safety of her own ports as well as the safety of her own soldiers.

Then the hon. member comes to an offer than he heard was made by Mr. J. K. L. Ross "to pay for a British cruiser if the Government would build the other four, but his offer was turned down." There is no record in the Naval Service to show that any such offer was ever made by Commander Ross. Furthermore, at the outset of my remarks I clearly showed that the Canadian Government on two different occasions asked the Admiralty if we could do anything in the way of building ships or providing further naval service, and the reply was, "No; concentrate Canada's effort on the military forces."

Then the hon. member deals with the Halifax explosion, and here is what he states:

> There was absolutely no necessity for the Mont Blanc to come up harbour, and the Naval Authorities had no right to allow her to come up, there being plenty of space in the Eastern passage to lay, etc.

I would state that there was absolutely no reason why this vessel should not come up Halifax harbour. The channel is wide and straight, the largest ships in the world have navigated it throughout the war with ease and safety in all weathers. The people of the city of Halifax would, I think, be the last to claim that the entrance to Bedford Basin cannot be navigated, in all weathers and at all hours, with ordinary every day precautions on the part of pilots and masters for their ships. So there was no necessity whatever that the Mont Blanc should be held out for there was any amount of sea room and the day was perfectly clear. The hon. member further states that the collision was caused by violation of the rules of navigation. In answer to that, I may say that a court of inquiry was immediately ordered by me, as Minister of Naval Service. That court was presided over by Mr. Justice Drysdale of Halifax. The court found Pilot MacKey to be at fault, and his license was cancelled. Not even the slightest insinuation was made by the court that the Canadian naval authorities at Halifax were to blame.

It will require only a moment to deal with the statement of the young lad, Julian, who is the hon. member's authority for charging that the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt were in a deplorable condition. I can assure the hon. member that they were not; on the contrary, they were in constant use at the time and they have been in use ever since. I will not take up any more of the time of the House by referring to the commissioning of the Niobe and Rainbow; the fishery protection vessels; or the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve.

If my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) does not hold the officers and men of the Royal Canadian Naval Service in very high estimation, our beloved Sovereign does, and he has been pleased to approve of the following posthumous awards:

Mr. Albert Mattison, late acting boatswain, R.C.N., Albert Medal.

Late Stoker Petty Officer Edward S. Beard, V.R. 1731, R.N.C.V.R., Albert Medal.

Chief E. R. A. 2nd Class, Hay, R.C.N., Meritorious Service Medal.

The British Admiralty have requested that an expression of their Lordships' appreciation may be conveyed to the following officer:—Mr. Walter O'Reilly, Gunner, R.C.N.

The Admiralty have sent letters of appreciation to the next of kin of the following ratings:

Carl C. Wilson, Able Seaman, V.R. 1561.

Albert Sanders, Able Seaman, V.R. 4066.

Freeman P. Nickerson, Able Seaman, V.R. 1891.

Geo. H. Yates, Stoker, 2nd Class, V.R. 5480.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have covered the ground sufficiently to satisfy every hon. member of this House that there is no truth whatever in the charges that were made by the hon. member for Lunenburg either against the materiel or the personnel of the Naval Service.

I have shown what splendid service they have rendered, and as Minister of the Naval Service I have paid my tribute to them. I am sure that the House and the people of Canada will feel proud of the splendid work done by the Naval Service, its officers and men, of whose activities they have to-day been informed for the first time, in a meagre way.

In closing his remarks the hon. member (Mr. Duff) suggested that a committee of the House be appointed to investigate the affairs of the Canadian Naval Service. There is no ground for the appointment of such a committee; there is no necessity for it. I think I have made it plain that not one of the charges made by the member for Lunenburg is substantiated by the facts.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, some nineteen days ago the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), then Acting Prime Minister, introduced a resolution which was discussed before this House. The resolution had for its object the providing of $350,000,000 for different services of this country, a part of which money, the minister told us, was to be expended this year for naval purposes. I took occasion that time to rise in my place and object strenuously to any portion of this $350,000,000 being spent for naval purposes, and this afternoon, nineteen days after the consideration of that resolution and after I had made certain charges against the Naval Department of this country, the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne) comes into the House and accuses me of discourtesy. Possibly, Sir, I may not be as extremely courteous as my hon. friend the admiral of the navy, nor do I hold any high rank in the fleet; but I do resent the imputation of discourtesy whether that imputation be made by the hon. Minister of Naval Affairs, or anybody else. If any one was discourteous to him, undoubtedly it was not I. We all regret the fact that the hon. minister has for the past six months been seriously ill, and from the time the House convened on February 20, as far as I know, the hon. gentleman was never in his seat until recently. But the work of his department was being conducted by the minister acting in his stead, and if I am not right in this statement I stand corrected. I understood that while the minister was not in the House he was in his home in Montreal recuperating from a serious illness. If it was necessary for the Minister of Naval Affairs to be present when this resolution was being discussed and when the whole subject matter involved in it was under consideration, any discourtesy that was shown him must be attributed to the then Acting Prime Minister, who introduced the resolution. I did not know that the resolution was to be introduced, for I had no notice of its impending introduction; nor did I know at what time I should have an opportunity of discussing the subject. I was in the House when the resolution was introduced and on the spur of the moment I rose in my place and made certain charges against the Naval Department—charges which I affirm that the Minister of Naval Affairs did not in any particular rebut this afternoon. It is quite true, he endeavoured to draw a red herring across the trail. He flapped the flag and eulogized the men, at the same time trying to make out that I, in my remarks, reflected on the men by alleging that they were no good and did nothing during the war. That is entirely incorrect, and is not borne out by my remarks as they appear in Hansard. In this speech the minister did not insinuate but deliberately stated that I had said in my remarks that the men had done nothing. Now, Sir, I will quote my exact words from Hansard, and I presume the minister will accept what I read as being correct. This is what I said :

> I do not wish to imply that all the naval officers were incompetent. There were a number of bright, young Canadian officers scattered through the fleet, and a large number of marines and bluejackets, who, if they had been given a chance, would have distinguished themselves and brought honour to Canada, but these men were not given an opportunity so to do.

In face of this, will the minister dare say that I deliberately attempted to besmirch the character of Canadian naval ratings and others connected with the Navy?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Did the hon. member not say, when he was referring to the Lux Blanca being torpedoed seventeen miles from the coast off the entrance to the port of Halifax, that admiralty officers at that time were trifling at pink teas and playing bridge whist? Will the hon. member say whether or not he made that statement.

Mr. DUFF: That is not an answer to the statement I have just made, but for the benefit of the hon. minister I will quote further from my speech later on; and as to the naval officers in Halifax in their relationship to the Lux Blanca, I have absolute proof that they did nothing to relieve the situation that existed on the occasion to which I referred. While, perhaps, they might not at that precise moment have been attending pink teas or playing bridge, I can substantiate the statement that this condition of affairs generally prevailed in Halifax at that time; and if the minister would grant the investigating committee which he refused this afternoon I could prove my charges to the hilt. I am quite aware that there are good men in the so-called Canadian Navy. For instance, there is young Silver of Halifax, who was lost on the H.M.S. Good Hope off the coast of Chili. No brighter boy ever donned the uniform than this young man, who went to his death as a hero in battle against German ships in the Pacific Ocean. Or take my good friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), would anybody say for a moment that his son is not a credit to Canada—a young man who has been for four or five years in the Naval Service in command of a submarine chaser? No man, certainly not myself, would ever think of saying anything derogatory of young men such as these. Again, there is the son of Mr. Justice Brodeur. Would any one suggest that he does not deserve the utmost credit? What I do say, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think it can be controverted, is that there were certain men in the so-called Canadian Navy who were not fit to be in it, and this fact I shall prove in a few moments.

The hon. minister was disposed to sneer at my knowledge of marine affairs, and he said I did not know much about the sea. Well, I do not profess to, but I think I know more about naval affairs than a gentleman who was born in the city of Montreal and had the odour of paint in his nostrils for the last ten or fifteen years. I was born with the smell of salt spray in my nostrils and have been familiar with the sea ever since I could toddle, and I should be the last to say anything disrespectful of men in whom I have taken an interest all my life. For this reason it did not become the Minister of Naval Affairs to sneer at me and to suggest that I was unfriendly to the fishermen or those whose calling is to follow the sea. I presume the minister likely derived his knowledge of the sea on a gumphead in Montreal, while I, on the other hand, got my knowledge of the sea on the sea itself, however little that knowledge may be. The entire speech of the minister consisted in sneering inuendoes and insinuations, and it was painfully evident to all present, as he read his essay, that he had not learned his lesson as perfectly as he might have done, for he did not even lay the emphasis on the proper portions of his address; he just recited his statement with the aid of the two officials at his side who coached him from time to time. He also suggested that the charges which I made in my speech some time ago were not prepared by me. Well, what about the answer of the minister himself? Did he prepare the statement he made this afternoon? Was there very much of a suggestion that the work was his own, or did it not rather appear that he was repeating what the officials of his department had prepared for him? I do not think that any one sitting beside me when I made my charges could question the originality of them, and I can prove and substantiate them in their entirety.

But I do not wish the admiral of the fleet to take my words alone for what I have said; I am quite prepared to give him some more evidence on this matter, and for this purpose I will first quote a gentleman well known in this country, Mr. J. W. Wilkinson, R.N.A.V., of Toronto. Let us see what he says—and I am willing to admit that this gentleman knows more about naval affairs than I do myself. This is what Mr. Wilkinson says:

> It has always been to me a source of disappointment and regret that Canada has ever failed to realize her duty with regard to assuming her full share of responsibility in connection with Naval Defence. . . . . .
> When considering Canada's weakness with regard to her naval obligations, I would ask, could anything be more grotesque than the ceremony which took place opposite the City Hall during "Sailors' Week," when under the auspices of the Navy League of Canada a dummy ship was christened the Victory, and at which the Premier of Ontario, the Lord Bishop of Toronto, and His Worship the Mayor, were present, while simultaneously the Captain of the steam trawler Triumph at the Toronto Exhibition, tells his pitiable story or how he was captured by a German submarine, of how guns and a wireless were placed on his steamer, and how he and his crew of twenty were crowded into a small boat, and after being insulted, had the humiliating experience of seeing his own boat steam away manned by a German crew, with the object of sinking the rest of our fishing fleet, and of which they were successful in destroying some twelve vessels. No effort was available from the Marine Department in the way of defending our fishing fleet against a cruel and relentless foe, who simply destroyed at his own free will. To use a well-worn quotation, "Nero fiddled while Rome was burning."

I may vary the quotation and say that "Mr. Desbarats fiddled while our fishing fleet was being sunk on the banks of Newfoundland and off the coast of Nova Scotia." Mr. Wilkinson proceeds:

> After four years of war, to appear to get busy over the British navy about the glorious work it has and is doing, would practically be an admission of ignorance, and to do so at the present time would have a tendency to place Canada in a false light by advocating the necessity of the British navy, when Canada, as a matter of fact, has no navy of her own to talk about.

Further on he says:—

> Notwithstanding that we thus have the enemy in our own waters, performing deeds of piracy and destruction at his own free will, without let or hindrance, as far as Canada's ability to defend herself is concerned, we read in the newspapers that the Naval Department at Ottawa calmly makes the statement that "all steps possible are being taken to meet the situation," and that a fleet of submarine chasers from the United States and British navies had put off after the enemy submarines. Are we to understand from this that Canada still refuses to assume any responsibility whatsoever as regards naval defence, but merely assumes the right when attacked by German U-boats to call for help to the United States and British navies? What greater proof is our present Union Government waiting for to make them realize that the great need of Canada to-day is a navy of her own?
> When we remember the indifference displayed by Canada in the past with regard to her naval responsibility, any thoughtful person must surely look on with amazement that even after four years of war, and the enemy sinking our ships at his own free will in our own waters, that no action appears to be considered necessary for our Government to take in the way of providing a navy for our own protection.

He says further:—

There never has been a time when the want of a Canadian navy has been more keenly felt than at the present. We are at war and we want a navy to drive the enemy from our shores, and protect our ships sailing in Canadian waters. Is it not a fact that the very type of vessel is at present being built in Montreal for the British navy, which we require for our own coast defence, viz, the submarine chaser? Would it not, therefore, be advisable to get some of these or similar craft included in our Canadian navy, in order that they might be placed in commission with as little delay as possible? It would also be advisable in my opinion to have guns placed on all fishing vessels of sufficient size, which would at least give each boat a fighting chance. These are, however, all matters which I trust will be taken into consideration at an early date by the Marine Department.

Unless something of a definite nature be done while we have an enemy to fight, there will be a strong tendency with a very large section of the Canadian people to come to the conclusion when the war is over, that a navy as far as Canada is concerned, will not be necessary.

Those are the words of Mr. Wilkinson; they are not mine. Yet the minister this afternoon said, in effect, that I was the only person in Canada with the audacity to get up and say one word in this House against the Naval Department of which he is the head. He also quoted from a letter which he cut out of the Montreal Star. I wonder if the admiral of the naval forces also cut out an editorial which appeared in the Star on Saturday morning, to show to his leader on his return to-day? The letter which the minister read was no doubt written in good faith; I have not one word to say against the writer, but I noted this sentence which the minister read: "The patrol fleet had notified sixty Lunenburg vessels to go to port." Now, if there is one thing I know it is about the Lunenburg fleet, and particularly what happened last summer on the Atlantic coast, and I happen to know what happened to the fishing fleet. So if that is the only evidence the minister can adduce his defence of the Canadian navy is very badly supported.

I have also received some letters, and one of them happens to be from Montreal. I want to be fair to the Canadian navy. Any criticism I made was made in good faith. I made it as a business man who did not want to see the money of this country wasted. When I can say a good word for the Canadian navy I shall be only too glad to say it, and to be absolutely fair I shall read this letter in full:—

Dear Mr. Duff,

I read with interest the comments in the papers on your speech in the House regarding the Canadian naval situation, also your criticisms.

As a demobilized member of the R.N.C.V.R., I do not wish to make any remarks one way or the other, but I think that, while the question is up, it is only fair for me to draw your attention to what I consider the brightest spot in the whole service, namely, the Naval Hospital in Halifax. During the influenza epidemic last fall I was unfortunate enough to be one of the victims and was sent to this hospital for treatment, and I cannot speak highly enough of Dr. Rousseau, Dr. Irwin and the two nursing sisters, and, in fact, every one connected with the institution. I was in the hospital itself for about two weeks, and during that time every patient with whom I came in contact, had the same feeling of appreciation.

With regard to your remarks on the Naval College, while never having met Commander Nixon, I can only repeat to you what appeared to be the general opinion among the men I met while in the service, namely, that the Naval College was efficient, that it did splendid work and turned out efficient officers, and that those officers who had graduated from the Naval College and who were serving with the Imperial Fleet were highly thought of and efficient.

With regard to Lieutenant Julian's views on the general administration, I had the privilege of serving on the same ship with this officer and know him very well personally, and am sorry to say that both myself, and, I think fully ninety-nine per cent of the officers and men in the service are forced to agree with him.

Now, what has the minister to say about Lieut. Julian? He insinuated this afternoon that Lieut. Julian was no good, that he was not a good officer. I say that he was a good officer. He served four and a half years in the naval service and had a splendid record, with not one black mark against him. I say it was most unfair for the minister to insinuate that this man was not a good officer and a good Canadian. The writer continues:

I trust that in all fairness you will, while drawing attention to the dark spots, also draw attention to the bright ones. In October, 1917, I with a number of other officers, was sent from Halifax to Esquimalt, and we one and all were greatly impressed with the difference in the atmosphere prevailing at the latter station. In Halfax there was nothing but discontent and what seemed to us practically chaos, whereas at Esquimalt everything was efficiency itself and every one seemed well content.

On my return to Halifax in the spring of 1918, after having put in six months at Esquimalt, the difference in the atmosphere was doubly impressed on me. I think it was sufficient to say that every officer who was trained at the Esquimalt base feels the same towards it, and it was a heartbreaking experience to find that all the "esprit de corps" that had been created at Esquimalt was absolutely crushed out after the men had been a very short time at Halifax.

Will the minister deny that this is true? This afternoon he flapped the flag and tried to make out that I was simply insinuating —that there was nothing in my charges. I have another letter which might interest the Minister of the Naval Service and the Admiral of "the Bum Boat Fleet." This writer says:

> It is all true, and further, the half has not been told. I think . . . . . .would give you some information along that line as he is pretty sore at them for the way he says they used him. He appears to be ready to squeal on them as he is awfully sore.

These are not my words. I could talk all night about the way naval affairs were conducted at Halifax. You must have noted, Mr. Chairman, that the minister this afternoon, trying to get some applause from his own side, endeavoured to make it appear that I had introduced politics into this question. Nothing was farther from my thoughts, and although Lieut. Julian in making his charges blamed the Borden Government, I was not responsible for that. After saying that I had introduced politics into this question, the minister in his next breath went on to say that I was making charges against ships built by the Laurier Government. If I was introducing politics, why should I introduce charges against ships built by the Laurier Government? I think that is a complete answer to the minister's insinuation. The truth is he was simply floundering around like a seal on ice and did not know where he was half the time.

He also objected to my remarks about the Niobe. He tried to make out that there was nothing wrong with this steamer's boilers. I tell you that the Niobe was compelled to come back from her cruise because her boilers were no good, the result of having been allowed to rust. It is quite true that for four or six weeks after the war was declared they did manage to patch the boilers up, but I would ask the minister how much money was spent for repairs on the Niobe from September 1, 1914, until she finally played out in 1915. The only reason she played out was that her boilers were out of condition. Will the minister, or anybody connected with the naval base at Halifax, deny that?

He tried to make out that I was getting my information from outside sources, and that it was second hand. I want to tell the minister that this is not the fact, and further that I watched operations proceeding and that any information I got was from the officers themselves and the men of the so called Canadian navy.

The minister also tried to make out that I had said that the men on the Hochelaga had run away from the submarine. I did not say any such thing. If the minister knew anything about marine matters he would know that the cook, steward, cabin boy and marines have nothing whatever to do with navigating the ship but that that is a duty which is left entirely to the captain. To make such an assertion shows very little knowledge of naval and marine matters on the part of the minister. He tried to make out that I had said the men were guilty of cowardice. I said no such thing. The men were all right. If I could only repeat some of the conversations that the men had with me on their return I would tell you how, with tears in their eyes, they told me that they wanted to fight the submarine but that they were not allowed to do so by the captain. The men are not to blame; they are all right. The men are all young Canadian boys, they thought they were going to do something for their country, they went into the Naval Service prepared to do it but they were prevented by the naval officials.

The minister also tried to make out that this captain of the Hochelaga was a great man. I hate to say anything unkind about anybody but if the minister knew where the captain of the Hochelaga came from and what service he had had, the information would make him hang his head in shame. I know all about the captain of the Hochelaga. I know how long he has been in the Naval Service, I know where he came from; and I say he never should have been put in command of that boat and I can prove it.

Then the minister talked about the Lady Evelyn and he practically said I was not telling the truth about that steamer when I said that she had gone to the Magdalen Islands to deliver six pencils. I beg the hon. minister's pardon. She not only delivered the pencils, but she also delivered some pads for the wireless operators. I have the facts from the officers who were on board the Lady Evelyn. I intend to repeat what these officers said and if the minister does not want to take my word I will give him that of somebody else. On August 20, 1918, the day that the Triumph was captured, the Lady Evelyn was in a Nova Scotia port. A wireless message came stating that the Triumph, a steam trawler owned by the National Fish Company of Halifax, had been captured by a German submarine on the Middle Ground, a fishing bank off the Nova Scotia coast. Word also came that the German submarine commander had equipped the Triumph with guns and manned her so that she could be used as what is known as a raider. This word came to the Lady Evelyn. The captain immediately sent a wireless to the man in charge of the naval dockyard at Halifax asking permission to go and try to capture the Triumph. The men on the Lady Evelyn did not sleep all night, they kept steam up and they waited minute after minute and hour after hour for the expected word from the Halifax authorities to go and recapture the raider which had been previously a fishing boat. No word came from Halifax but the Lady Evelyn with Commander Shenton in command was sent to the Magdalen Islands to deliver six pencils and a few pads for the wireless operator.

Let me give a little more information about the Lady Evelyn. In a few days the Lady Evelyn returned from the Magdalen Islands and reported to the base at Sydney. The flash came over the wires that on a certain night a German submarine was coming up the strait of Canso. The Minister of Naval Affairs, of course, with his knowledge of marine matters and geography, knows where the strait of Canso is, but for the benefit of hon. gentlemen who may not have that information I will explain its location. The strait of Canso divides the island of Cape Breton from Nova Scotia and connection between either side of the strait is maintained by the operation of a steam ferry between Mulgrave and Point Tupper. That is practically the only means of communication between the great coal mining and steel districts of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia and the rest of the world. The situation was considered so serious that the Government ferry was laid up at Point Tupper. It was not allowed to cross the straits for fear the submarine might come up and attack it. The Lady Evelyn was lying at Whitney pier at Sydney with steam up waiting until word came from Halifax. The men were all on tenter hooks. They wanted to engage the submarine. They were anxious to go, and suggestions were made that they should not wait for orders but that they should take the Lady Evelyn and go to the strait of Canso. You can understand the state of mind in which these young men were when they were deliberately talking of mutiny, of taking charge of the ship, taking her up to the straits of Canso and fighting the submarine. This is what an officer said about it:

> We were in Canso a few weeks ago and all our old friends were there to welcome us and renew old acquaintances. While there one evening a party of young ladies from Canso came on board and entertained us with music and singing. We left next morning. We now hear they are being shelled, while we are lying comfortable at Sydney. Perhaps these same young ladies that entertained us are being murdered by the German beasts, while we, lying at anchor, steam up, ship ready with a lot of damn, stupid Englishmen preventing us from slaying the murderers of our friends and sweethearts less than a 100 miles away.

Would the minister be kind enough to tell this Committee why the Lady Evelyn was left at Sydney and why she was not dispatched to Canso to try and catch that submarine if submarine there was?

The Minister of Naval Affairs also endeavoured to contradict my statement in reference to the steamer Lux Blanca. I wish to tell the minister that if the officials gave him the information that he gave here this afternoon there is only one thing to be done with these officials and that is to get rid of them. The minister said that there was a fog that day. I was on the Nova Scotia coast and I never saw a more beautiful summer day than that on which the Lux Blanca was sunk. There may have been a fog in Ottawa and if so it was around the Naval Department.

But, Mr. Chairman, he went on to say that there were patrol boats that had gone out in answer to the Lux Blanca's S.O.S. call. I said they did not, and I think I can prove it in a few minutes. The minister this afternoon deliberately contradicted my statement, and said that patrol boats went out to help the Lux Blanca. But he had to admit that those patrol boats lost their way, and they tried to get their course from a fisherman, but the fisherman could not give them their course. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know very much about marine matters, but I will say this—and I am looking at my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) while I say it, because he had something to do with putting buoys and lights at the entrance to the mouth of Halifax harbour—that from my little experience of marine matters I can leave Halifax in a boat on a dark night or a foggy morning, feel my way out to the Fairway buoy, and can shape my course to where the Lux Blanca was sunk. If that is the kind of men the Minister of Naval Affairs had on his boats—if with their lead lines, their compasses, their horns, and everything else, they could not find their way out in the fog,—my charge in that connection is proved out of the lips of the minister himself. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not want the minister to listen to anything I say; I am going to give him the evidence of somebody else. I would not expect him to accept the correctness of my statements, after what he said this afternoon I am almost afraid myself to believe that I know what I am talking about; but I will give him the testimony of other men. When the Lux Blanca was sunk, what happened in Halifax? I am going to recite a conversation which took place between a master mariner, who is the agent of a very large insurance company in Halifax, and who knows all about marine matters, and certain other parties. I will give what he said about the sinking of the Lux Blanca. This gentleman—he is a reliable man and I will give his name if necessary—said:

I was informed of the sinking of the Dornfontien off the Bay of Fundy and shortly after of the sinking of another vessel up the coast towards Cape Sable. I saw at once that the U Boat was headed towards this part of the coast and of course expected that the Dockyard was watching the course of events and would be preparing to look after her. Great was my surprise next morning when going to my office on finding Long Distance frantically trying to locate me. I at once took up the phone and found Captain..... of a fishing vessel speaking from down the shore, he said, I have just been sunk by a large German submarine a few miles of Cape LaHave. We are all out this morning, he is going towards the eastward and will probably get all of us who are out, for God's sake get in touch with the Dockyard and send help.

This marine insurance man continued:

I asked him the particulars and then rang off, calling up the Dockyard and giving them the information. I do not know who answered the phone but it was some stupid idiot who wanted to know how he could be sure the information was authentic and he also replied that everything that was possible was being done.

That day (I am not sure whether he said that day or the next day) a prominent merchant of Halifax called me up on the phone and told me a German submarine was shelling an oil tanker a few miles off Sambro, he said, I am going to call for you in my car and we will rush to the Dockyard and interview the "powers that be" and see if we can do any good, I replied, "I will be waiting for you."

A few minutes later the Halifax gentleman arrived in his car and we drove to the Dockyard and went at once to see Admiral Storey. He appeared a very sociable chap but I was not there on social calls that day.

I do not know whether this Admiral Storey gave the two gentlemen pink tea or not, but you will notice, Mr. Chairman, that this insurance man says "he appeared to be a very social gentleman." He went on:

We went over the situation with him as quickly as possible and then asked him what he was doing. He replied very calmly that he was sorry but that he had nothing he could send out to engage a modern submarine. I replied, "Great God! do you mean to tell us that with all those patrol boats" (pointing to a mass of boats I could see from his office) "you will calmly let a steamer be shelled to pieces by a German submarine and never lift your hand to stop them, and this almost before your eyes?" He replied, "Gentlemen, as I said before, I have nothing which can engage a modern submarine." We had a few more words and we left, and what we thought of the Dockyard I had better not say.

Now let us see what the captain of the Lux Blanca himself said:

When the Captain of the Lux Blanca arrived in port with his survivors he at once came to see me and I can tell you he was a very hot boy. He gave me the full particulars of the fight and he ended with. "Had I thought that the Dockyard of naval people would not send me help I would never have tried to do what I did. I was expecting help to come every moment from around the point but never a sign of assistance came. My ship was sunk underneath my very feet and two of my gunners killed almost in sight of the forts of Halifax and with all the patrol boats and everything else, not a sign of anything came to help me. What in Heaven's name can they be thinking of there? I put up an unequal fight for hours, but I might better have tried to save our skins for all the assistance I got from the Canadian navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go on a little further.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman assert that there was anything in the Canadian Navy in the shape of a war vessel fit to go out and cope with a modern submarine at that time?

Mr. DUFF: I am very pleased indeed that the hon. gentleman has asked me that question. It is quite true that there was no vessel in Halifax, or in the Canadian Navy, which could have coped successfully with this German submarine, but let me tell the hon. gentleman that what the naval authorities at Halifax should have done was this: They had, as this marine underwriter says, scores of boats lying in the dockyards doing nothing, but if Admiral Storey had gone down and said to the crews of those boats, "I know you cannot cope with this submarine but get steam up and start for Lux Blanca and the minute the German submarine sees the black smoke coming round the head it will submerge and go away," it would have been effective. The authorities might at least have done that. I do not say they could have sunk the submarine, but I do say there were boys in the Canadian navy who could have gone out and driven that submarine away.

Mr. COOPER: Did the hon. gentleman give Admiral Storey the benefit of his excellent advice?

Mr. DUFF: No, Mr. Chairman, he had so many Englishmen around him there was no necessity for me to give advice. I will read about some of them before I am through. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I do not want the minister to take my word as to what happened.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does the hon. gentleman think it was a misfortune for Admiral Storey to have Englishmen around him while the war was on?

Mr. DUFF: Well, we had a certain class of Englishmen in Halifax, some of whom were not much good. For instance the captain of the Hochelaga was an Englishman. Here is what was said by the Halifax Herald in its issue of August 7, 1918:

> The outstanding feature in connection with the three hour battle outside the harbour that rivets attention with compelling force is the absence of any protecting ships while torpedoes sped on their deadly mission, shells fell thick and fast and the air reverberated with the crack of guns for a space of 3 hours.
> Where was the patrol fleet? The brave wireless operator of the oil tanker heriocally obeyed duty's call, but the patrol answered not. Had it been a ship in distress even in peace times succor would have arrived in less than that time.
>
> But at war, with the fiendish Hun pirates at our very door and known to be lurking in the waters off the coast, the brave crew of the allied ship fought single handed a monster pirate of the deep—and there was no response to the piteous calls for help from the patrols—which at least it would be thought would be busy scouring the waters that lap the shores of Halifax and all the other towns and villages from here east and west.

The Halifax Herald goes on to say:

> Where the patrol was, what they were doing, may be in the ken of the authorities—

And I presume it was, Mr. Chairman, and I want the minister to pay particular attention here:

> Where the patrol was, and what they were doing may be in the ken of the authorities—may be confidential, but the citizens of this city—who have already suffered from the greatest calamity ever visited upon any city on this continent by gross and criminal carelessness, and neglect of proper control by the constituted authorities, are vitally interested to know that the patrol is such that it may with all human probability save Halifax from another calamity.

If the patrol boats did such good work, why does not the minister produce their logs and tell us where they were on the coast of Nova Scotia during this time? That would be the proper evidence to lay before this Committee. But he gives us only sneering remarks about my knowledge of these matters, he tries to gloss them over—to put a coat of Sherwin-Williams shellac on the whole business.

The minister says that some of these boys were decorated by the King. Certainly they were. They were good Canadian boys lost in the Halifax explosion. They were on the Niobe at the time and volunteered to go out to the Mont Blanc, and they deserved to be decorated by the King or by anybody else.

I would like to call the minister's attention to what he said about the conduct of the captain of the Hochelaga in comparison with the conduct of the six boys who were sentenced as criminals to eighteen months' imprisonment in Rockhead jail. The captain of that steamer, as I said before, was discharged for gross negligence and cowardice in the face of the enemy. The hon. minister tried to make out that I said the captain was honourably discharged. Perhaps I did so express myself. But if the Naval Department discharged the captain of the Hochelaga, is there any man in Canada to-night who will say that the department is treating those six young boys as they should be treated, some of them lads from the city of Victoria—no doubt from the county represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Cooper) who interrupted me a few minutes ago? These boys are at present languishing in a criminal prison at Rockhead, forced to associate with vicious, degraded criminals. I assert that no man should dare get up and say that those boys got a correct sentence. Immediately the minister read my speech he should have taken steps to interview the Minister of Justice and have these young men discharged from custody. I say it is a disgrace that these six young men should be to-night undergoing the association of criminals while we are here sitting on our cushioned chairs; and I say emphatically that to-morrow morning the first thing the minister should do is to see that those young men are immediately released.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for a few moments I wish to make some further statements, as the minister did not quite believe what I said in my last speech. I noticed this afternoon that he spoke about the good work the Royal Canadian navy did on the British Columbia coast. That is quite true; but no credit is to be given to the naval authorities at Ottawa for that good work.

At Victoria, British Columbia, a few public spirited men got together in 1912 and put their hands in their pockets for the purpose of forming what is known as a Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve. They applied to Ottawa for permission to form this reserve and for help. The officials of the Naval Department turned those men down, and declined to give them any assistance. A petition accompanied the request. Shortly after a cold formal acknowledgement was received from the department saying "the matter would be given consideration," but nothing further was done by the department. Influential citizens of British Columbia were interested in this matter, and, as I said a moment ago, out of their own pockets they subscribed liberally, and as a result 400 boys joined what is known as the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve. Nothing was done until July, 1914. You will remember that the minister this afternoon took credit to his department for what was done in relation to these boys. The department was compelled to give them recognition, because in July, 1914, the Kamagata Maru arrived in Victoria with a large number of Hindus, and the city authorities, realizing the seriousness of the matter, telegraphed the Ottawa authorities and asked that those boys be given power to look after that ship and see that nobody landed from it. That was when the Naval Reserve was first recognized. No. 1 Company, Victoria, of the R.N.C.V.R. were the first to offer and to perform volunteer service in Canada when the war started in August, 1914.

Those boys at that time were sent to Esquimalt, and to show you the state things were in, for a few days they were given orders to dig trenches in the solid rock around the dock yards. Ammunition pits were dug and shelters erected, and general chaos reigned throughout. To show that nothing was contemplated, these boys were not fitted out with any equipment, clothes, rifles or anything else.

What happened on the Pacific coast? On or about August 10 the German cruiser Leipsig was known to be in the Pacific. The citizens of Vancouver, of Victoria and other coast towns were very much afraid that this cruiser might reach the British Columbia coast and shell them. In fact, the banks in the coast cities removed their gold to their inland branches. Our fighting strength at the outbreak of the war on that coast was represented by the cruiser Rainbow and the other two ships mentioned by the minister this afternoon. In addition, there were two fishery protection boats, the Galaino and the Malaspina and the two submarines which were purchased in Seattle about this time from an American shipbuilding firm. There was also a fleet of auxiliary yachts given to the Naval Reserve by wealthy men of Victoria and Vancouver. The Naval Department agreed with the Marine Department here to transfer those fishery protection boats to the Naval Service. These two boats were armed, but on being taken over by the Naval Service the guns were taken off and they were sent to sea without guns or ammunition. It is well known that the Galaino proceeded to sea without guns or ammunition of any kind.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Naval Department determined to do something, and they thought they had better help out one of their friends, I presume, so they arranged to charter the Grand Trunk Pacific steamer, the palatial Prince George. She was chartered on August 8, 1914, at $500 per day. Then the department proceeded to spend a lot of money on her for repairs and alterations to fit her as a hospital ship. Equipment was purchased, cots and sick bays and operating areas were installed, and a staff of female nurses and a medical officer were placed on board. These are a few of the things that were purchased:

Drugs and medical supplies	$505.40
Surgical instruments	287.16
Flags	115.65
Medical stores	127.27
Bowls, jugs, soup tureen, etc., etc.	109.78
Arrowroot biscuits, 500 lbs., etc.	135.00
Blue jackets, overalls dressings; gowns, 72 at $2.00 each; tooth brushes, towels, etc.	862.35
Bed spreads, 74 at $2.10 each; Blankets, 111 pr. at $5.25 per pair; Felt mattresses, hammocks, etc.; silver forks, etc.	2,214.89

—and hundreds of other items. This steamer, Mr. Chairman, was sent on the broad waters of the Pacific with lights out. Now, anybody knows that Red Cross boats or hospital ships should not be sent out in that way. It is well known that the Hague Tribunal provides that hospital ships shall be painted white with a green stripe and with the red cross displayed in four or five prominent places, and in no way try to conceal her identity. The Prince George proceeded on her journey, and had she been unlucky enough to have met with one of the German cruisers then at large, a terrible calamity would have occurred.

It is not the custom nor the procedure of the Admiralty of any country to send hospital ships sculling about, endangering the lives of people on board; these ships are to follow after an engagement, not to precede it. During an engagement they remain at their base or in the safety zone. After a short but somewhat expensive career this hospital ship was recalled and dismantled, and on September 23, forty-five days after being chartered, was turned back to the Grand Trunk Pacific. This little farcical episode cost the country $49,805.05, plus some other items of expenditure appearing in the expenses of H. M. C. dockyard, Esquimalt. As I said before, the Government paid the Grand Trunk Pacific $500 per day for the use of the Prince George.

While this was going on on the Pacific coast a number of German trading vessels were proceeding from Japan to Pacific ports in America. It was known to every pilot on the Vancouver coast that these ships had sailed from the other side and were on their way to this side of the Pacific. Two of the lieutenants who were at Esquimalt—one of them was Lieut. Julian and the other, Lieut. B. L. Johnston, a Vancouver pilot—presented to the naval office at Esquimalt a list of the German vessels which were then on their way across the Pacific, and requested permission to take the Galiano or the Malaspina, place her guns back on board and use the boat in an effort to capture these German ships. The senior naval officer promised at once to communicate with the naval authorities at Ottawa, but a few days later the lieutenants were informed that permission was not granted. One of the trading vessels was the German barque Kurt, which arrived at the port of Astoria, United States, on September 11, 1914. If these young Canadians had been allowed to take these fishery protection boats out they would have captured the German barque Kurt, which was worth $600,000 in gold, had a full cargo of products from South America, and was without guns or ammunition of any kind.

There were other vessels which the commander at Esquimalt was told about, and concerning which, I assume, he sent word to Ottawa. One was the ss. Alexandria, which arrived in San Francisco from Samoa about this time with the entire personnel of the German staff of the South Pacific German possessions, and over a million dollars of gold in her strong-box. Other German boats which arrived safely at their destination on this side of the Pacific were the Arnoldus Vinnen, which arrived at Astoria on October 11, 1914, and the German ship Ottawa, of 2,542 tons register, which arrived at San Francisco August 21, 1914. If these young lieutenants had been allowed to use the fishery protection vessels to which I have referred they would in all probability have captured these three valuable prizes.

What was done to help these boys keep up this naval reserve? The climax was reached and the death knell sounded for the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserves on the arrival of the Director of Naval Service in Esquimalt, Vice-Admiral Chas. E. Kingsmill. Strong representation was made to him by the heads of the respective branches at Esquimalt to obtain the bare necessities for carrying on the R.N.C.V.R., and it was hoped that his arrival would in no small way herald the righting of things. It is to be remembered that Admiral Kingsmill called the entire corps of the naval volunteers to assemble in the drill hall and there addressed them somewhat along the following lines: He said he had been informed by the department at Ottawa that the Government had received instructions from England to devote all their energies to manning an army, not a navy. This is in contrast to the recruiting that was going on in Great Britain and in the Dominions overseas. Admiral Kingsmill stated: That the naval volunteers had been very badly advised; that the naval volunteers had been to a much greater extent poorly led; that there appeared to be great discontent throughout the 9 p.m. rank and file, and that it was not the intention of the department to go on with the volunteers as a fighting force, and, therefore, that as many as wanted could leave the yard forthwith. This was small recompense and very little thanks for the work done up to this time under the most adverse conditions by these men. They had been in the stokehold of the Rainbow when at sea; they had coaled ships in their civilian suits and had generally borne the brunt of things in the yard. Great consternation reigned after this speech. However, suffice it to say that over one hundred availed themselves of the admiral's advice and departed.

Needless to say, naval recruiting was at a standstill. The blow had been dealt, and the naval spirit that existed up to this time in Western Canada was practically dead. Many of the naval ratings joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force. However, it is to be noted that about sixty days later the Naval Department, evidently being in need of naval ratings, sent an urgent telegram to Esquimalt, using the words "Recruit! Recruit! Recruit!"

As showing the kind of stuff our Canadian boys are made of, I may point out that a large number of them, some 1,188, went across to the Old Country and joined the British navy. But let us see what The Sailor, a magazine published in Toronto, says about affairs in the Canadian Naval Service. It is headed "The Price of Inaction," and says:

Mention has been made editorially of the fact that Canadian officers serving in the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve strongly desire to be identified with a Canadian Naval unit. This desire has been expressed not once, but many times, and recently was voiced in a constructive manner by a young officer, who, in writing home, suggested that some plan be worked out whereby Canadians who are now serving under the White Ensign be formed into a Canadian Naval unit and loaned to Great Britain for the duration of the war. It may be parenthetically remarked here that the young officer in question has already been recommended for a foreign decoration and has been since appointed to a responsible post in the British navy. Therefore, his suggestion was actuated by the purest motives of patriotism, and shows plainly the spirit which animates our sea warriors; for no matter how high they may climb; no matter what their environment, they are Canadians first, last and all time; and they are proud of their Mother Country. It is a curious fact, however, that the suggestion was identical with the one made by Capt. the Hon. Rupert Guinness, R.N.V.R., to the Department of Naval Service in 1916. At that time he was in Canada armed with diplomatic credentials, and instructed to urge Canada to recruit 2,000 men for the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, and to lend them to Great Britain, where they could be trained in various ratings. While he was pleading with the late minister, and his deputy minister, to take action in the matter, Commander Armstrong, R.N.V.R., was also in Canada and was energetically recruiting for his unit. The result was obvious, the apathy of the one side and the energy of the other, brought its own reward, and when Commander Armstrong left Canada he had secured about 400 of Canada's finest sons for the British branch of the service. Meanwhile the late minister and his deputy sat idly by, and watched the young men go. In fact, it took them from early spring until late autumn to break the monotony of their inaction, and then they decided to start recruiting for the R.N.C.V.R., in the depth of winter. This decision was indicative of only two things, of either the utter incompetency of the late minister and his deputy as departmental heads, or of their absolute indifference to the branch of the service which they were bringing into being.

These are not my words, Mr. Chairman, but the words of the editor of The Sailor. I think his name is Mr. Amelius Jarvis, of Toronto. At the time the German cruiser was on the Pacific coast and we had only the poor old Rainbow and the other little boat to do our work, what was the position that Canada was placed in? We had to accept help from the Japanese Government. Three Japanese cruisers—I forget their names—came to the Pacific coast, established a base at Esquimalt and did patrol work for the Canadian Government and the Canadian people during a great many months while there was danger on the Pacific coast.

The minister this afternoon endeavoured to convince the Committee that it was impossible for the Niobe to capture the German steamer Willehad, which sailed from Montreal.

Some one asked that question, and it was shown that she was going along the Nova Scotia coast the very day war was declared. My information is, and reliable information too, Mr. Chairman, is that the steamer Canada was at that time on the Atlantic coast. She carried two twelve-pound guns, and if she had been given instructions from the dockyard or from the authorities at Ottawa she could have captured the Willehad. There was no necessity to have the Niobe to capture the ship. Now, it was considered necessary to purchase an aggregation of boats for patrol, and in connection with this matter I do not think I need say very much. There were a number of boats connected with the Marine Department for the purpose of laying buoys, and looking after the bells on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. One of these boats was the Lansdowne. She was one of the largest steamers in the Marine Department, being equipped with derricks for the purpose of placing and hoisting buoys. This ship was taken off Marine work and put in the Naval Service, the cost involved being some $47,043. Instead of being put to useful work she was kept at the base in Sydney for the purpose of lifting and lowering the signals at the defence boom to allow vessels to come into Sydney—work which a small tug boat could have done rather than this large ship belonging to the Marine Department. Let us see what happened as a result of the boat being taken off the Marine work. As I said a moment ago, the work of these boats was to lay buoys along the Nova Scotia coast every spring. In winter some of these buoys have to be taken up owing to the ice, and during the spring and summer of 1918 a number of buoys were not placed because the Marine Department had no boat to lay them. The following are the buoys not placed in position:

Liscomb Fairway, gas and whistle.
Thrum Cap, gas and bell buoy.
Three Fathom, gas and bell.
Egg Island buoy, no whistle or light.
Thorn Shoal, bell.
Owl's Head, bell.
Ship Harbour, automatic whistling buoy.
Spry Bay, bell.

Sheet Harbour Passage, bell.
Basson Reefs, bell.
Lockwood Rock, automatic whistle.
Nixonmate, bell.
Bull Rock, bell.
Isaac Harbour, gas and whistling buoy.
New Harbour, whistling buoy.
Tor Bay, whistling buoy.
Flying Point, bell.
Whitehead, gas and whistling.
Cerebus, gas and whistling.
Grimes, gas and whistling.
Argus Shoal, whistling buoy.
Petitdegrat, gas and bell.
Beak Point, whistle buoy.
Haddock Rock, bell.
L'Archeveque, bell.
Fourchu, whistling buoy.
Guion Island, gas and whistling buoy.
Barr Reef, whistling.

Now, I suppose the Minister of Naval Affairs will say the reason these buoys were not placed is that the German submarines, if the buoys were in position, would find their way into the harbours. That argument will not hold water, because the German submarines had no need of the buoys or bells to enable them to get into the harbour. All the coast lights were burning, and if a German submarine wanted to go into a harbour from Cape Sable to Cape North it could have done so at any time, day or night. To show what kind of naval service we had, we were obliged to have a Japanese guard on the Pacific coast, while a similar condition existed on the Atlantic. It will no doubt be remembered that two Australian ships came to our coast to help protect our coastal waters. If I remember correctly, these ships were the Sydney and the Melbourne. One I am sure was the Sydney, which sank the German ship Emden in the Pacific and afterwards came to help us. So that it is obvious the minister could not rely on the service of his navy when we had to have Japanese and Australian ships assisting us. Then the hon. gentleman told us about the work of the mine sweepers. The joke about them is that they only swept the sea after the convoys had passed, and for this statement I have the most reliable authority. The duty of the mine sweepers is to clear the water before the ships carrying soldiers and other passengers go forward; but this patrol calmly swept the ocean after the convoys had passed and were out of sight. We did have some protection on the Atlantic coast in 1917, on the suggestion of Mr. Amelius Jarvis of Toronto. The Canadian Government, with money which I believe belonged to the Imperial Government, purchased seven or eight fishing schooners which were changed to represent camouflaged vessels. They were supplied with motors, and had guns. They also had on deck dories which were let down and disappeared in the waist of the ship. These vessels were bought in May or June, 1917, and as an illustration of the expedition with which the naval authorities in Halifax did their work, these seven or eight vessels were not made ready until October of the same year. Of course, as every one knows, in October the fishing fleet were home so that those ships did not do any work that season. However, they should have been kept for the next year and could have rendered excellent service. One of these little vessels fixed up to look like a fishing craft could be anchored or laying amongst the fishing fleet, and on a German submarine coming up, this "mystery ship," as it is known, would lower her dories and train her guns on the submarine, and before the latter had time to get her own guns ready, the camouflaged boat could damage, if not sink her. In the winter of 1918, I presume at the suggestion of the department, these vessels were sold at about half their price to any one who cared to purchase. I contend that they should have been kept, for they could have performed very valuable services in 1918. But, as I said, they were sold in February or March of that year. We have been told of what was done to protect the fishing fleet on the Atlantic coast. I do not profess to take any credit for what was done, but I may say that I did telegraph the Acting Minister of Naval Affairs last year acquainting him with the condition of affairs in Nova Scotia and asking him if something could not be done to protect about 150 fishing vessels at that time on the broad Atlantic. I received word from Ottawa—a very nice telegram, I must say—that they were doing all that they could in the matter. Of course, I knew what that meant, and I telegraphed back and requested that an endeavour be made to get either British or American cruisers to come and patrol the Nova Scotia coast. We have heard about the Stadacona and the advice to fishermen to leave their grounds and go into port. Now, I took the matter up myself when I could not get satisfaction from the minister, and on my responsibility I telegraphed every port in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland where vessels were in the habit of going and advised them to remain in, and by the time that either American destroyers or any boats which the Naval Department might have sent from Halifax got to the grounds, there were only two or three vessels on the Grand Banks. So that when the gentleman who wrote the letter to the Montreal Star, as quoted by the minister this afternoon, said that there were 60 vessels notified, I will say that it must have been in the stokehold of the boat shovelling coal instead of being on the lookout. These vessels could not continue their fishing voyage owing to lack of protection by the Canadian authorities, and the advice I gave at the time was that they should endeavour to get home at the earliest possible moment and in so doing hug the shore.

The instructions which I gave them at that time were to try and get home at the earliest possible moment and hug the shore; that is, they were to leave the Newfoundland ports and come up around Cape North, down through the straits of Canso, and hug the shore from there to Lunenburg. This was done, but I regret to say that one of the vessels which was hugging the shore—this would not have happened if we had had the proper naval protection—on the sixth of September was blown on the rocks by an easterly gale, and eighteen men were lost owing to the culpable negligence and lack of protection afforded by the Canadian naval authorities. When these vessels arrived at their home ports I telegraphed to the Minister of Naval Service that some 150 valuable ships had arrived home with valuable cargoes ranging in value from $30,000 to $40,000. I asked if it would not be possible for him to send some patrol vessels from Halifax to patrol the coast off the mouth of Lunenburg and Lahave, but the minister has not yet done me the courtesy to reply to that telegram. Two days after the armistice was signed, on the 13th of November, into the harbour of Lunenburg steamed about a dozen patrol boats, the first we had seen since the beginning of the war. That is the kind of patrol service which the minister tried to defend this afternoon.

Early in the war a despatch came from Ottawa to the naval authorities at Halifax that the German cruiser Karlsruhe was shelling the town of Glace Bay. Of course, no such thing ever happened, but word came to that effect. The naval authorities hustled around. At that time the good ship Canada, a boat not much longer than this Chamber, was lying at Halifax. She had two twelve-pound guns, and that was the boat that was sent down to Glace Bay to engage the German man-of-war. At the same time, in order to give further protection to the citizens of Glace Bay, a crew with a couple of guns was sent by train. This crew was made up of sick-bay attendants and watchmen on the Niobe; there was hardly a naval rating among them. The joke was that the gunners went without any ammunition and without a breach lock. One of the guns sent by the naval authorities at Halifax was about twenty years old, and had been used as a hearse at sailors' funerals. The whole thing was a joke, and after setting up some wire at the town of Glace Bay, the sailors came back.

The minister did not think I was correct when I said that a certain gentleman had offered to give one destroyer to the Government if they built four others. That offer was made by Commander J. K. L. Ross. He gave his own boat, the Tuna, and also took charge of a vessel called the Grilse. The Grilse was the only vessel in the patrol service that could be said to be equipped with guns and ammunition, and would you believe it, after the Grilse had been bought in New York and brought to Halifax she was sent up to Gaspe Basin, in the St. Lawrence, to help convoy ships carrying Canadian soldiers. Her guns and ammunition on her first trip consisted of a half-barrel with a stick of wood painted gray lashed on top of it.

The minister also talked about the ships the Government bought. I notice that six of these small patrol boats cost something like $208,000 each, or $1,250,000 altogether. They could have been bought in England for at most half the price, and I say without fear of contradiction that somebody made $75,000 or $100,000 on each of these six boats. If the minister would grant me the investigation I ask I have no doubt this fact would come out. It is true that other boats were purchased, but all kinds of prices were paid for them and no attempt was made by the department to get value for the people's money. I have no hesitation in saying that our naval affairs were conducted by the department in such a way that every Canadian should hang his head in shame.

The minister said that my remarks with regard to the Mont Blanc were not correct, and he spoke of the beautiful harbour of Halifax. Now, if anybody should know about the beauties of Halifax harbour I should. It is one of the finest harbours in the world; I might say the finest, but the hon. members for St. John might not agree with me. The minister said that it was all right to allow this ship carrying high explosives to come into Halifax harbour. I do not know whether the minister knows this or not, but it is a fact that the Mont Blanc had her decks on fire before she reached Halifax harbour. Some oil had got out of the casks on deck and started a fire. That ship was deliberately allowed to come up to Halifax harbour with her decks on fire. Is that the way to protect the citizens of this country? I do not want the minister to take my word alone; I am going to put somebody else on record. On December 20, 1917, the Morning Chronicle said:—

The public have the right to know under what authority the Mont Blanc was allowed to approach the Narrows, proceeding inward towards Bedford Basin at the very moment when the Imo was outward bound. The naval authorities, as we understand, control the movements of all ships inward and outward. It is imperative that the public should know by whose authority the Imo was ordered to leave her anchorage in Bedford Basin at a time when it must have been plain to the competent naval authority that the two ships would meet in or near the narrow channel which leads from the inner harbour to the basin. It is also imperative not only for the purposes of this investigation, but for the city's security in future, to ascertain why a proper patrol was not maintained by naval craft to keep the course clear for the munition boat. The naval authorities have a large number of boats of various sorts at their command in this harbour, but so far as we have learned none of them were employed in escorting the Mont Blanc on her way to Bedford Basin. Why? The public have a right to know why these and other precautions which we might mention were not taken and, above all, why the risk of allowing these two steamers to meet on this narrow waterway was taken.

The Morning Chronicle at that time was a supporter of the present Government and of the Minister of Naval Affairs. On December 22, 1917, the Chronicle says:—

Halifax has suffered a calamitous loss on account of the explosion on a ship which carried exceedingly high explosives. What we want to know is what precautions were taken to avert this disaster; why the Imo was allowed to go through the Narrows, where the waterway is comparatively narrow and a considerable current runs, at the same time as the Mont Blanc laden with munitions; why the course was not kept clear for the latter ship? And why warning was not given to all craft to give the munition-laden ship a wide berth?

The public want this whole matter thoroughly and searchingly probed, not alone to establish the responsibility for what has occurred, but to ensure that there shall be the most absolute safeguards possible for the future. They want to know if the regulations governing the movement of traffic in this harbour shall govern in the future, and they want to have it made absolutely certain, so far as human effort can make it, that no such risk of disaster will ever be taken again.

Now Sir, I will go a little farther to establish my case. I do not want the minister to think that I am the only person in Nova Scotia who complains about his bumboat navy. The Chronicle of December 26 (?) says:

Halifax harbour is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canadian Government. It is officered and staffed by Federal appointees who act under Federal orders. Neither the province of Nova Scotia nor the city of Halifax exercises or can exercise any control over its navigable waters. It is evident, therefore, that neither of them bears any responsibility for anything which may be amiss in the management of those waters. They receive neither fees nor direct emolument from the shipping which enters the port. They have no power to regulate, much less to prevent, the movement to, from or within the harbour of undesirable or dangerous shipping. . . . . .

It seems to us that the Dominion is not only legally and equitably liable for the injuries occasioned by the explosion of the Mont Blanc in Halifax harbour, its entrance having been sanctioned, if not invited, by responsible federal officials, but that it is morally and conscientiously bound to indemnify, in so far as it can, the people of Halifax for the grievous loss and injury which has been inflicted upon them through the direct acts of its regularly appointed and duly authorized agents.

Would not any individual citizen of Halifax have a good cause of action against the Dominion Government for his personal loss? If so, should not the damage done to the city be borne without contest or murmurs by the whole people of Canada every one of whom has as much personal interest in the cargo of the Mont Blanc as had any citizen of Halifax, although all the loss caused by the explosion fell immediately upon the people of this city?

The Government and the minister admitted their responsibility when they paid the citizens of Halifax millions and millions of dollars. The Halifax Chronicle of December 28 said:

The inquiry which is demanded is an inquiry to establish the responsibility for the movement of the ships, the one from her anchorage in the lower harbour, the other from her anchorage in Bedford basin—why a death-carrying vessel was allowed to proceed up the harbour and into a narrow channel and there to come in collision with an outgoing steamer, with, so far as it is known, no precautions or safeguards whatsoever having been taken or provided. That is the crux of the whole question.

The minister said this afternoon that this ship was perfectly justified in coming up the harbour and that the naval authorities had done nothing wrong, and yet we have this Government organ, the Chronicle, condemning in unscathing terms not only the minister but his officials at both Ottawa and Halifax. But I am not going to rest my case upon what the Chronicle says. The Morning Chronicle once upon a time was a Grit paper and of course some of my friends might say Grit papers are not always reliable. So I am going to give a few quotations from another paper. This paper is known as the Halifax Herald, a newspaper edited by no less a gentleman than the Hon. Senator William Dennis, of the city of Halifax, province of Nova Scotia. What do we find the Herald saying on December 24?—

There is no need to try and disguise the fact that the citizens will not rest content until the blame is rightly fixed and it would be useless to deny that there is considerable unrest in the minds of the people, that the citizens require to have their faith re-established in the ability of those having the safety of the port under their care.

It is alleged that there is no effective harbour patrol, though the naval authorities have a number of craft at their disposal, many of them tied up when they might be keeping the roadway clear for ammunition-laden ships. That there is a scarcity of men to man those patrol boats does not seem apparent from the number of uniformed men which were seen day by day in the vicinity of the Acadian hotel, which by the way was a sort of hotel for naval men on the "waiting list."

Yet when the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) asked the minister a question about the number of men lying around Halifax he tried to make out that they were not there for any length of time. We will go a little farther and see what the Halifax Herald says on December 31:

The persistent demand made by the Halifax Herald is for a thorough investigation into all the causes that led to the explosion and the placing of official and personal responsibility therefor.

(a) Who permitted the Mont Blanc to pass up the harbour without being preceded by a patrol boat?

(b) Who permitted this foreign ship, heavily laden with a cargo of inflammables and the most deadly explosives and with a captain, officers and crew who couldn't speak a word of English and a pilot who couldn't speak a word of French? What naval, or other Canadian Government official permitted this ship to steam up to the Narrows not only without a patrol escort, but without even the ordinary and usual "red flag" danger signal?

(c) Who permitted the Norwegian steamer Imo, chartered as a Belgian Relief Ship, but now in ballast, to proceed down the harbour at an hour and minute that made it possible for the empty Imo—also without patrol escort—to collide with the Mont Blanc and her cargo of death-dealing explosives, through "error of judgment," "accident," "crass stupidity," "gross carelessness," "damnable cussedness" or from any other cause—to collide in the very narrowest part of the harbour—this wonderful harbour in which the greatest ocean leviathans can swing around at full speed and the navies of the Empire could ride in safety.

We will go a little farther with this investigation and see whether the naval authorities were doing their duty at the time this boat came through the Narrows and blew up with the result that some 1,800 people lost their lives and some 20,000 or 30,000 were injured and wounded. This was the greatest disaster that any city had suffered for a number of years and it was all due, as proved by the Chronicle and the Herald, to the carelessness of the naval authorities. On January 31, the Herald said:

There are rumours that there may be a complete reorganization of the naval department at Ottawa, but it is hardly likely that anything will be done until the findings of the Drysdale Commission are received. The feeling here is that there is "too much pomposity and too little efficiency among certain naval officers in Ottawa."

I address this in particular to the minister himself.

Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs Desbarats is admitted to be a competent official though, of course, he is a civilian and consequently lacking in naval experience.

The shake-up in Canadian naval affairs at Halifax is without doubt only preliminary to a more extensive carrying out of a much needed reform in the Department of Naval Affairs at Ottawa.

Let me go a little farther to prove my case: The Halifax Herald of February 5, 1918, says:

Notwithstanding the cruel manner in which—

And this is a reference to the minister:

—he was deceived by his officials when he made his deplorable utterance at Halifax some weeks ago in defence of men who have been shown to be utterly incompetent, and of a system thoroughly rotten, congratulations are due Hon. Mr. Ballantyne on the initial reforms he has made. No one to-day regrets that utterance more than he and the changes he has already made can be looked upon as an instalment towards a complete reorganization of the staff at this port—and which should carry with it as complete and as thorough a change in the department at Ottawa. An investigation of the conduct of naval affairs in Canada, apart altogether from the question of harbour control, will reveal changes that should have been made long ago; and if they had been made not only might the great catastrophe have been prevented, but much money would have been saved which has been expended for unseaworthy craft and their incompetent management.

I would like the minister to give careful attention to that.

Of that there will be more to reveal in the future.

Let us see what the Halifax Herald says further of the Department of Naval Affairs. On February 9 it says:

Yet upon this simple policeman's job the Canadian naval service, with all its frills and feathers—

Now who is talking about pink teas and furbelows?

The result 1,500 innocent men, women and children killed, thousands injured, and several hundreds blinded for life. The punishment, the preventive methods for the future must not stop with the prosecution of a pilot, a ship's master, and a subordinate examining officer. The horror is too appalling, the measure of official neglect too ghastly.

We will go a little further in the matter. In its issue of February 12, 1918, the Halifax Herald says:

So accustomed has Halifax become to startling developments in connection with the recent disaster and the matter of harbour control, there would seem to be nothing added which could further appal the people of this city, and further convince the country of the necessity of revolutionary changes. But once again comes a terrific shock. It is an actual fact that the great ocean greyhound, the Olympic, had, because of harbour mismanagement, a narrow escape, when freighted with thousands of human lives, from going on the deadly Sambro Ledges. The Commission appointed by the Federal Government to inquire into pilotage affairs was astounded yesterday afternoon near the close of the second session of the day at an announcement by Captain Latter of the pilot board. Captain Latter declared that "the naval people shifted buoys without warning, and vessels coming up in the fog narrowly escaped going on Sambro Ledges."

Then this appeared in the same paper on the same day:

Another development of the inquiry was the further proof of the "death sleep" and lethargy of the Marine Department at Ottawa given the evidence of J. E. De Wolf, one of the Halifax Pilot Commissioners. Mr. De Wolf said that some six or seven years ago the Marine and Fisheries Department asked the Pilot Commission to draft new by-laws. The Commission, assisted by Hector McInnes, K.C., did this and the new by-laws were sent to Ottawa. It is evident that they are still reposing in a dusty pigeonhole. No notice was taken by the department. "They treated us with contempt" said Mr. De Wolf. "We never heard a word and I urged upon the commission to resign in a body as a protest."

Now, the point I am making in connection with what I am reading now has reference to do with what happened after the explosion. The explosion occurred in December, and although the naval authorities knew all that happened in that regard, the officers of the Naval Department at Halifax made no attempt to better the conditions of that city. Therefore we read as follows in the Halifax Herald of March 12, 1918:

Further investigation by the Halifax Herald in shipping and pilotage circles yesterday has brought additional and conclusive evidence that there must be a shake-up of no meagre dimensions at Ottawa. The pilot's story that a steamer laden with high explosives was allowed to lay in the fair way of the harbour one day last week for seven hours, was fully confirmed, and in getting the confirmation other details of a most startling nature were disclosed.

The Halifax Herald is scrupulously careful to abide by the rules of the censorship and anything calculated to furnish information to the enemy is gladly withheld from publication. There is not a man familiar with marine affairs at this port, not a Nova Scotia captain, who has gladly given his services to the work of naval patrol, not a master mariner who regularly brings in and takes out a steamer, but what has a story to tell of stupidity, of pig-headedness, of bungling in connection with the affairs of the port, and, following up these stories, the trail leads directly to Ottawa and reveals a heterogeneous bunch of incompetents who may know the ways of society, who may be able to judge aright the merits of various blends of wines, but who certainly do not know the ways of ships and are not able to judge the competence of those whom they place in charge.

The coming in, the anchoring and the going out of ships is at all times a matter which should demand the attention of men familiar with the sea. Nova Scotia has produced some of the best seamen of all time—they are not at Ottawa, they are not in control of marine affairs, such control is left to men whose hands never gripped hemp, men to whom the use of a sextant is an absolute mystery, and their management of floating things limited to a slight knowledge, possibly of a varnished canoe on a still lake.

In times of peace we should not have such men at the head of affairs of a maritime nature. To have them in such position in these awful days of war is evidence of a laxity on the part of our people, a laxity which has already led to fatal consequences, and which should, perchance, a break be made through the British fleet, lead to awful disaster. God forbid that a change at Ottawa be withheld until such a time comes.

It took one of the greatest disasters the world has ever known to partially arouse those in auhority, but those who were in supreme authority then are still in authority. Britain, France, Italy, the United States, all have had a shake-up, and a betterment of their management of marine affairs. Canada, after appalling evidence of incompetence is without a shake-up. A Jellicoe was shifted, a Kingsmill reigns supreme.

I think I hear the minister whispering something to the Chairman. Perhaps he does not want me to read these extracts; but I would like to finish the task which I have undertaken, even if I am getting under the skin of the minister. In its issue of March 13, the Halifax Herald says further:

that so long as men who have notoriously outlived their usefulness as public officials, and some of whom are regarded as having become fossilized incompetents are retained in positions of great responsibility at Ottawa in marine and naval affairs there will be no harmony, co-operation or practical co-ordination among those upon whom the safety of this port depends and while this condition remains the people of Halifax cannot feel that "all that is possible for their protection is being done."

Then the Halifax Herald says on the same day:

The Halifax Herald has been informed by responsible citizens, in a position to know, that while the vessel was at anchor in the fair way, explosive matter was removed from her, that it was taken up the harbour, that not only tugs or barges, but a motor boat, with gasoline on board, was used in the transportation of certain cases from the vessel before she was taken up into the basin.

Yet the Minister of Naval Affairs this afternoon without endeavouring to criticise the charges I brought against the department, pronounced those charges inaccurate

Now I have established to the satisfaction of other members of the Committee that what I said in my previous remarks on May 7th was correct. I have also gone at great length into these matters to-night. I have more to say; and if the minister will grant me the investigation for which I have asked I will prove who is speaking truly and who is not. We are going ahead to-night with the Naval Estimates. On May 7th after making my charges, I made the assertion that under all the circumstances, after what had happened in the case of the Canadian Navy officials, we should not vote one dollar for naval expenditure this year. I repeat that statement to-night. After all has been said and done, after all that was heard on May 7th, and what has been said to-night, and after all that is current talk in the city of Halifax, and in every port of Nova Scotia, I say that this Committee should not vote one dollar to the present Administration for Naval Affairs in Canada. We are asked to vote a sum of $288,000 for the salaries of men whose incompetence has been proven not only by myself, but by the Halifax Chronicle and the Halifax Herald. Therefore, I urge this Commitee not to vote one dollar for the Department of Naval Service. It is quite unnecessary. It can do no good. There is no necessity for any vote of public moneys for men in Halifax connected with the Naval Department. They should be discharged as incompetent, and the vessels either sold for old junk, or else handed over the Minister of Public Works, filled with cement and ballast and then sunk for the purpose of making breakwaters at the mouths of harbours. We are not only asked to vote $288,000 for salaries for these gentlemen in the Naval Department, but the immense sum of $1,805,000 is asked for the maintenance and upkeep of the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt and the Royal Naval Reserve. I say, Sir, that no good can come from this expenditure especially in view of the present financial situation of Canada, and every representative of the people should decide against one dollar being voted for this purpose.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is the minister not going to make any reply to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Duff) has said here to-night? He asked for an investigation. A number of very serious charges have been made. Surely there should be some investigation into those charges. The minister, I submit, did not this afternoon satisfy the Committee; there are too many complaints against the administration of naval affairs to expect that the country could be satisfied with his mere denial. I do not want to offer any obstruction to the minister's Estimates, but I would like to get from him an answer to some of these charges that have been made by my hon. friend from Lunenburg. I think we are all indebted to that hon. gentleman for the research he has made into these matters, for he has brought to the attention of the Committee a great deal of information. Of course, we all want to be posted on these questions, and we are all grateful to any member who will take the trouble of giving us the facts.

The hon. minister spent a long time in answering the charges made by the hon. member for Lunenburg on a former occasion. But the minister did not tell us very much about the Naval Department. He did not tell us anything about what he was going to do for the ensuing year. We have no information at all as to what are the plans of the Naval Department. He spent all the time practically in referring to the speech made by my hon. friend from Lunenburg on a previous occasion, and we should have from the minister considerably more information than he has furnished so far.

We cannot settle this question by bandying words across the floor of the House and saying that so and so is not correct. The proper way to deal with it is by a competent tribunal to find out whether the administration of the Naval Department is or is not satisfactory.

The blue-book published by the department during the past year shows that the purchasing department spent over $10,000,000. Have we got value for that enormous expenditure? That is a matter the Committee would like to know something about before we vote another large sum of money to keep this department going.

I listened to the speech of my hon. friend from Lunenburg on the former occasion, and I listened this afternoon very attentively to the minister's reply, and I submit that some of the charges made have not been properly answered. Over and over again my hon. friend, the minister, said that the member for Lunenburg had stated that those seamen were incompetent, and he denounced the member for making that statement. But the member for Lunenburg never made any such statement. As far as I could gather he was defending the seamen against the administration. His criticisms were directed, not against the men in the Naval Service, but against the department. He criticised some of the naval officers, but he certainly said nothing that was derogatory to the ordinary seamen; he had nothing for them but the highest praise.

But the question is: Is the administration of the Naval Department efficient or is it not? That is the question the House wants answered. The member for Lunenburg said in his former speech that at the time war broke out the Naval Department was unprepared for the event, and I suppose no one will doubt that. In endeavouring to answer that statement the minister made the admission that the only ship in the service that could be called a warship was the Niobe, and that the Niobe was not ready for sea until the 31st day of August. Everybody knows that war was declared on the 4th day of August; yet up to the 31st day of August our main war vessel on the Atlantic coast was not ready to go to sea. If the administration and the officers had been doing their duty the Niobe would have been ready for sea and could have taken some very rich prizes along the coast. There is no doubt at all that she would have captured the German ship that left the city of Quebec bound for Boston, on the 2nd day of August, and which must have been on the coast of Nova Scotia on the 4th day of August. Everybody was expecting that Britain would declare war. But no motion was made on the part of the Naval Department at Halifax, and the main ship of the service was unfit for sea when she should have been ready for active service.

Another charge made by my hon. friend the member for Lunenburg has not been answered, and that is the difference between the punishment that was meted out to the sailors and to the officers. It will not be disputed by hon. gentlemen that a sailor has as good right to fair play in this country as has an officer. What are the facts? As we get them from the statements the facts are that seven sailors belonging to a certain ship refused to go to sea because the ship was leaking so badly that they thought she was unseaworthy, and they refused to embark until she was repaired. That was the offence committed by those sailors, if I am rightly informed, and I think I am.

Mr. DUFF: That is right.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: They were court martialled and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. I suppose they are serving their sentence; at least we have not been told anything to the contrary. That may be all right—I do not know. It looks to me like very severe punishment. But admitting that it was all right, what was done to the commanding officer of the Hochelaga, Lieut. Robert D. Legate? He was in charge, and his orders were to destroy submarines. He saw a submarine at sea, but instead of attempting to destroy it, he turned tail and made for harbour. He was court-martialled. And what was his sentence? He was dismissed from the service. Now, those seven boys would have been very easily punished if they had been simply dismissed from the service. Perhaps that would have suited them very well. At any rate, this officer was simply dismissed from the service and not punished at all.

The minister said that if these seven sailors had been in the British navy and had got their just deserts under the laws of war they would have been court-martialled and shot. Under the naval laws of Great Britain would Commander Legate not have been court-martialled and shot too? If so, why was he not punished? I am informed that this is the first time in the history of naval warfare that the white ensign ran away from an enemy; I do not think such another case is recorded in British history. Why does this man go scot-free? Why were these sailors sentenced to eighteen months in prison while the commander of the Hochelaga was simply dismissed from the service, although his offence was much more serious than that committed by the seven sailors? That is the point which was made by the member for Lunenburg in his first speech, and it has not yet been answered. It ought to be answered by the minister before we go any further in voting salaries for his officers. The question was asked some days ago in the House whether the Canadian Naval Department had 10 p.m. the power to punish this man, and the answer was in the affirmative, though no indication was given as to why they did not do it. Will the minister give us that information? If not we shall have to come to the conclusion that in the Canadian Naval Service there is one law for sailors and another for officers.

The character of the ships employed in the service has been referred to several times in this discussion. The minister has not told us very much about the character of the ships. In the naval discussion we had a few years ago the late Liberal Government was reproached for what was described as a proposal to build a "tin-pot navy." The present political associates of the minister objected at that time to fast cruisers of the Bristol type. Ships like the Sydney, which did such splendid work in the war. This was the class of ships that was proposed to be built by the Government then in power, but the minister's friends objected to that class of vessel. Nothing short of dreadnoughts would suit them; Bristol cruisers they christened "tin pot." But if ever a navy deserved to be called a "tin-pot navy," it was the navy constructed by the department of my hon. friend. The only ships that were any good in this navy were the ones that were there prior to 1911.

No one can deny that there was a great deal of discontent in Halifax. Discontent prevailed in many places along the coast, but chiefly at Halifax. If, as the minister says, everything was rosy, where did all this trouble come from? Why were there so many complaints at Halifax? The fact that the Halifax Herald, though a strong supporter of the present Government, attacked the Government on this question, ought to be proof to the minister that there was something wrong. I suppose the Government was never so severely attacked as it was in connection with naval affairs by the Halifax Herald during the war. The Herald does not blame the officers at Halifax; it traces the trouble to the Naval Department at Ottawa; it blames the heads of the department here and it must be admitted that the contention of the Herald with regard to the inefficiency of the department was well founded. I do not expect the minister to give orders in regard to warfare or to naval affairs, and I do not throw the blame upon him. But the minister is responsible if he fails to surround himself with competent men. If he finds that his staff is incompetent and fails to take prompt measures, then we have to throw the responsibility on him.

The member for Lunenburg has been reading from the Halifax Herald; let me read a few extracts from the Halifax Mail. The Mail is the evening edition of the Herald; both papers are owned by a prominent gentleman in the other Chamber, Senator Dennis. In dealing with this matter the Mail opened its columns to complaints, and they came in so fast that the Mail did not know what to do with them. They had a special editor whose duty it was to answer complaints of all kinds, but these complaints poured in at such a rate that the editor was overwhelmed with them and admits that he could not answer them. But he makes a list of them in the paper day by day, and here are some of them:

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Question No. 1662—Why were the ratings on T. R. 30 court martialled in the Canadian navy last summer for refusing duty and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment, when several so-called skippers and mates positively refused to take boats overseas last winter and were not court martialled or punished in any way? (2) How can discipline be maintained in the service, when such work is allowed to go unpunished? (3) Is there one law for officers and another for ratings under the present management of the Canadian navy? (4) Can you give the names of the officers comprising the court martial before whom the ratings on T. R. 30 were tried, and are they still in the service? (5) Had the officer in command of T. R. 30, at the time these ratings refused duty, sufficient experience to command men and was he a Canadian? (6) Is there any truth in the report of the wholesale discrimination against Canadians in the Canadian naval service? (7) Will there be a fair, impartial investigation by a committee of the House of Commons at the next session of Parliament into the naval affairs of Canada during the war, with full power to go into all matters of expenditure, promotions, granting of commissions, etc.? (8) Who, on behalf of the Government, looked after the building of boats known as C. D's? (9) Who accepted these boats from the builders as being fit for service?

Then the paper goes on to say:

Answer—Here are nine questions on a matter of which we have no particular information. The only place where you can be effective in eliciting replies is in the House of Commons. The navy make a rule not to answer questions, as attempts on our part have fully demonstrated. Hundreds of questions are received every week concerning the navy, the majority of them asking the questions put by our correspondent as above. It is evidently not a very happy or united family.

The above is an extract from a leading paper in Halifax, a supporter of the Government, published during the time these transactions were going on. I submit that the minister should answer them.

The only way in which they can adequately be answered is by granting the request of the hon. member for Lunenburg and giving an investigation. Let us take another extract from the same paper:

Note.—Questions continue to pour in concerning naval affairs. Many concern the men of T. R. 30, who are in prison for, it is alleged, refusing to go to sea in a craft unseaworthy. Others relate to P. V. 5 which it is alleged is in an unseaworthy condition. They say she is leaking aft around the rudder and also in her starboard bunker and the statement is further made that they were pumping from three to four tons of water per hour from her, that the conditions on board are unbearable. There is no getting away from the fact that there is seething discontent in the service. One correspondent says it is caused by "racial" distinction. He says he is a Canadian, wants to be a Canadian man-of-war sailor, but objects to be designated as a "native." The complaints may not all be founded on fact, but where there is so much smoke, there must surely be some fire. The imprisoning of the boys on T. R.

30, seems to be causing considerable indignation. The complainants all lay stress on the statement that the boys should not have been sent to prison for refusing to go to sea on an unseaworthy craft, when captains of other boats, who refused to go to sea on the same plea were passed over without a reprimand. It is impossible to find room for all the letters. We would advise the complainants to take the matter up with the secretary of the Navy League. The league has a paper of its own with a big circulation and is quite sympathetic to the men who have grievances. It is stated that out of 4,000 men in the service during the war, only a baker's dozen, when asked the question, if they desired to go on the reserve, answered "yes." If the service has become so unpopular, that men will not enter it unless by force, something drastic must be done at once.

That is the opinion of the chief organ supporting the Government in Nova Scotia, and I submit to the minister that it does raise a question for an investigation. If the officers at the head of the Canadian Navy are incompetent and inefficient, something ought to be done by the minister to see that this state of affairs is remedied. We are all anxious that the navy shall be properly managed and shall be such as all citizens of Canada may be justly proud of, and it is the duty of the minister to make this possible. I am sure he would be carrying out the will of the members of this Parliament and of the people of this country if he took decided steps in that direction, and I am quite sure he would have the support of every hon. member on this side of the House in such action. I am not here for the purpose of unduly criticising the minister, but it is my duty to ask him to take this question up seriously and make an investigation into the conditions of his department. And if he finds that there is truth in the allegations and that the officers responsible for the management of affairs in the Naval Department are inefficient, then it is his duty to see that they are dismissed and efficient men are appointed in their stead; if we are to spend millions of dollars in an endeavour to build up a Canadian Navy, let us have a navy in which the people of Canada can take a pride.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I took the pains this afternoon very carefully and categorically to answer every charge that the hon. member for Lunenburg made in his speech, delivered as I understood him to say, on May 7. I occupied the time of the committee for a period of about an hour and a quarter, and I really do not think it would be fair to hon. members to ask me to cover the same ground again. I made a full and complete answer in regard to the court martial of men on trawler 30 who refused to carry out the orders of their superior officers. I did not say that if these men had belonged to the Imperial service they would have been court-martialled and shot. What I did say was that if on the field of Flanders Canadian soldiers had refused to carry out the orders of their superior officers they would have been court-martialled and undoubtedly the sentence of death would have been passed upon them, and they would in all probability have been shot the following morning. I also very carefully explained to hon. members the full particulars about the captain of the steamer Hochelaga. I can traverse that ground again if hon. members think it necessary, but I must say that I endeavoured to the best of my ability to give a full, frank and complete answer—which was not difficult—to the hon. member for Lunenburg. The hon. gentleman has wearied this House to-night for some two hours, continuously reading extracts and comments of the press of Halifax. Now, I am not interested in what the press of Halifax may have to say regarding the Naval Service of Canada, neither does it interest me to know whether the owners of those papers belong to either the Liberal or the Conservative party. We are dealing with serious matters. The hon. member for Lunenburg, has treated the Naval Service of Canada in a light and frivolous manner, and I made ample reference to that phase of that attitude this afternoon. He rose in his place some weeks ago and made the statement that the steamer Hochelaga went to the Magdalen Islands to carry six lead pencils to that port.

Mr. DUFF: The Lady Evelyn.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Lady Evelyn then. Does the hon. member think for a moment that sane members in this House will take that statement seriously? Who on earth would send the Lady Evelyn or any other steamer on such a voyage as that—to carry six lead pencils to any port? All through the hon. member's two hours' talk this evening, everything he did say confirmed what I stated this afternoon in regard to his slighting references not only to the officers of the Canadian navy but also to all the men connected therewith. The hon. member was not content to do that alone, but he deemed it fit to cast slurring remarks upon officers of the British navy. If we are holding——

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say——

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Allow me to finish, please. If we are holding this session now, it is due to the fact that the Imperial fleet and those brave and gallant officers have defended Canada and the British Empire for hundreds of years, and it ill becomes the member for Lunenburg to make the slighting and slurring remarks which he made during his last speech in his reference to English officers that were employed——

Mr. DUFF: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Chairman, I must protest against this interruption. I desire to complete my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has risen to a point of order. He must be given an opportunity to state his point of order.

Mr. DUFF: My point of order is that the minister is accusing me of reflecting on the British navy.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That is not a point of order, but a question of privilege, and the hon. member can correct any misstatement when the minister has concluded.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I think I followed the hon. member very closely. He referred in very unparliamentary terms to the officers of the British navy that had been loaned to the Canadian Government, and his wearisome two hours' speech very largely consisted of long extracts and quotations from certain Halifax papers. Now, I am only too glad to give the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), or any other hon. member in the House all the information in my possession regarding the naval affairs of Canada. I was only attempting this afternoon to refute the charges of the hon. member for Lunenburg, and made no attempt then to go into details of the Naval Service. But as the items come up in the Estimates before the Committee now, I shall cheerfully and gladly give hon. members any information they desire; and if the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough wishes me to go over again the facts regarding court martials, I shall be only too pleased to do so. In the army and navy there are rules and regulations covering offences and courts martial that were held in regard to the men of Trawler 30, and also the officer in charge of the Hochelaga, and I am quite sure they were followed out. Hon. gentlemen surely would not for one moment suggest that under the rules and regulations of the Canadian navy, which are similar to those of the British navy, full justice is not meted out to the officers and men tried before a court-martial for disobedience or any other offence. I can assure my hon. friend that there is not one code for the seamen and a different code for the officers. Everything has been done according to the rules and regulations. It is to be regretted, of course, that these young men on Trawler 30 refused to obey orders. The craft was proven to be in a seaworthy condition; Canada and the Empire was at war; these men had been ordered by a superior officer to carry out certain duties; and surely, when these sailors disobeyed that order, hon. gentlemen could not possibly expect that we would let them go scot-free. Discipline could not possibly be maintained under those circumstances. The sentence was not a heavy one in view of the seriousness of the crime.

With regard to the captain of the Hochelaga, the charge of cowardice was not proven against him. The only charge proved against him was that he did not do all that he might have done. He was tried by a very competent board of British and Canadian senior officers, and when an officer is dismissed from the service and loses all that I stated this afternoon, that punishment cannot be looked upon as a light sentence. I do not want the House to think I am trying to hide anything in connection with the naval affairs of Canada. I do not suggest that the service is so efficient that no criticism can possibly be levelled against it, because it is certainly open to legitimate criticism. I took the trouble this afternoon to answer fully and completely every one of the charges made by the hon. member for Lunenburg, and I did not hear anything new to-night in his long two-hour speech. There is no necessity to my mind for a commission to be appointed to inquire into his charges, because I have clearly proved that every one of his charges was inaccurate. When we come to the Estimates I shall be very glad to give full and complete information.

Mr. DUFF: The minister in his reply a moment ago endeavoured to make the Committee believe that I had said something against the British navy. I want to deny that absolutely. In any remarks I made I did not refer to the British navy. Like every British subject I realize that the British navy was the only thing that stood between us and the German hosts. We know what the British navy has done in this and every other war, and I say it is not fair for the minister to insinuate that I, who am as good a British subject as ever he dared to be, would say one word against the British navy. The minister gets up and says that this afternoon he answered all my arguments. Let hon. gentlemen read Hansard and see what paltry excuses he made this afternoon. His chief stock-in-trade was an endeavour to brand me with saying that the men on the Canadian ships were not good sailors and were not doing good work. Hansard will show that those insinuations are absolutely groundless. Now he tries to make the Committee believe that I am against the British navy. I say he should be ashamed to insinuate anything of that sort in regard to any British subject in this House.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Would the hon. gentleman deny that he made some slurring remarks on the English naval officers in the Canadian navy?

Mr. DUFF: No, I will not say that I did not make some remarks about English officers in the Canadian navy. I do not know any body of men in any line of business which is one hundred per cent efficient, and consequently, good as the English navy is, and better as the British navy is, composed as it is of English, Irish and Scotch, and Canadian, I do say that there were men in the British navy who were not one hundred per cent efficient, and that some of those who came to Canada were cast-offs from the British navy. They were put over men like Captain Manning, a native of my own county, and a better seaman than they in every respect. If the minister desires it, I can show him where English officers were put over good Canadian officers. Let him investigate the case of the captain of the Hochelaga. The minister talks of the captain's naval record. He had none, and I know it. It is not right for the minister to insinuate that I said anything derogatory of the British navy.

Mr. COPP: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is the first minister I have heard who, on going into his Estimates, takes occasion to stand up and lecture hon. gentlemen opposite on how to conduct themselves, and to suggest what criticism it is proper for them to make. A few days ago my hon. friend from Lunenburg made some statements in the House that seemed to me, and I believe to other hon. gentlemen, to be of a very serious nature. The minister tells us that he has answered those charges fully and completely, and then he deplores the audacity of my hon. friend from Lunenburg in standing up again and wearying the House with a two-hour speech. What has the minister to say of himself for standing up for an hour and a half this afternoon reading extracts and reports prepared for him by officials of his department? We might as well have a show-down here and now as to whether the minister can stand up and lecture hon. gentlemen on this side of the House for venturing the criticise the Estimates of his department. Has the minister such a high and sensitive nature, and are his qualities so statesmanlike and of such a high order, that his department must be above criticism by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House? The minister expects his Estimates to pass. I have no desire to block Estimates in this House, but hon. gentlemen have a perfect right to criticise without being insulted by the minister.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is rather difficult for me to understand the remarks of my hon. friend. I have never ventured to question any hon. member's right to criticise the Naval Estimates. We have not as yet taken up the Naval Estimates. I have already said that I will cheerfully give all the information I have when we come to discuss the items. The discussion this afternoon and evening has related almost altogether to the charges made by the hon. member for Lunenburg. I certainly have no desire to lecture any hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am not aware that I have done so. I would be the last man to do it, because, of course, every hon. member has a right to ask what questions he pleases, and it is the plain duty of a minister to give the House all the information that is asked for. Last year when my Estimates were up and again this year I gave all the information I had, and I intend to follow that rule.

Mr. COPP: Then why complain that an hon. member on this side of the House is wearying the House?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I made no reference to hon. gentlemen opposite wearying the House. I just referred to the long speech of the hon. member for Lunenburg, but I want to make it perfectly clear that I find no fault with hon. members criticising to the fullest extent and asking any questions they like regarding the Estimates before the Committee. I had no such intention as the hon. gentleman has recently imputed to me.

Mr. COPP: Does the minister say that he will dole out to us how we shall criticise and how we shall ask questions and that he will answer them? While my hon. friend from Lunenburg was discussing this matter this afternoon the minister did not pay much attention to what he said, but when he read extracts from the Halifax Herald, which supports this Government, he began to be weary of my hon. friend's argument. Hon. members on this side of the House have just as much right to take part in discussions, whether their remarks be long or short, as has my hon. friend the minister.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I need not say that the tone and manner of the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne) in his criticism of the speech offered by my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) surprised me very much. I had been in this House for many years before we had the honour of the presence of the distinguished minister, and I have also been here since he came. It seems to me that he has always been rather a high-minded gentleman and we always have treated him as such. But to-day he came into this House with a speech prepared for him by some piqued officer of his department, by some party who ought to know better and who is responsible to some extent for what has been going on in his department. That gentleman was piqued and hurt because there was criticism and he transferred his pique to the minister. It was so apparent to everybody who heard the remarks of the minister that the language and emphasis were not his own, but were absolutely foreign to his style. Hereafter, if he finds it necessary to criticise anybody on this side, let him prepare his speech himself and not be responsible for the pique, spleen and bad manners of somebody in his department.

I listened with the closest possible attention to the speech delivered on the 6th of May by my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I listened with all the attention of which I was capable to the speech of the minister this afternoon. I was looking for a calm and deliberate refutation of these charges if they could be refuted. I have heard no such argument. I have heard a tirade of scolding from the minister. That is all we have received—assertions on one side and denials on the other. We had assertions by the hon. member for Lunenburg about matters with which he is perfectly familiar and flat denials by the minister upon facts furnished to him by his department.

Let us take the one statement as to the failure to go to the assistance of the American tanker that was being sunk off the port of Halifax. It has been stated by the Halifax Herald and other papers, and by business men in Halifax, that when called upon the commander told them that he could not go out, that he had nothing to go out with. That is a statement of fact published in the newspapers. We have members sitting in this House representing the city of Halifax. I would like to hear from them what defence they have for the conduct of the department. The statement is made in the newspapers, and by the hon. member for Lunenburg, that there was no assistance sent out to this vessel. The minister makes a statement that this is all false, that a ship did go out, and that she was lost in the fog. It is most extraordinary that such a thing could happen. There is a square issue of fact. Surely the controversy might be settled by some person who was present in Halifax as to whether the truth lies in the statements which have been made in regard to this incident or in the reports which the department has got. If the people are paying millions of money for the upkeep of the Naval Service, surely there can be no dispute about an important question of fact such as this which should be settled beyond all controversy.

We have always understood that nothing will be stated as a fact by a naval or military officer in the service of this count unless it is absolutely a fact. Here we have a dispute on a bare, bald question of fact; and I think, although it does not make very much difference now when the matter is over whether it is true or false, we should know what the fact actually is. A seaman knows the place to which he has to go before he leaves port; he knows the latitude and longitude of that spot; he has his compass, his log, and he knows how fast his vessel is steaming. He ought to be able to get to that point along the coast of Nova Scotia without stopping in the fog to consult some poor fisherman whom he encounters a few miles from the shore. A more absurd statement was never made in this House—that a warship should stop on her course in order to allow the officers to consult a poor fisherman as to her latitude and longitude and where and how she should sail. That is the most absurd proposition and the most damning evidence as to the incompetency of the men who say that they did go out when other people say that they did not go out at all. These are the answers we have to these charges. Reputable newspapers and men in the city of Halifax say that they did not go out at all; now they say that they did go out in the fog and that this fisherman gave them some directions as to how they should go, but that he did not give them the proper direction. I do not think the minister should waste one minute in defending an officer of that kind.

Then, leaving that, evidence is produced to show that bungling of the worst kind took place in Halifax harbour in connection with the vessel's explosion there which resulted in the destruction of millions of dollars worth of property and in the loss of hundreds, if not thousands, of lives. There is not a word in the nature of a satisfactory explanation. We are not told the name of the officer in charge, we are not told who he is, or what he did or whether he did anything. But we have the newspapers and citizens of Halifax condemning the actions of the naval officials. The minister simply stands up and abuses my hon. friend from Lunenburg for daring to bring this matter before the House. There are these two things, the failure to rescue that vessel and the bungling in Halifax resulting in this accident. Does the minister explain how that accident took place? The people of Halifax and the newspapers say that it was simply due to the bungling of his officials and we have no answer to that.

The minister becomes very wrathy because we say that a certain steamer went to the Magdalen Islands with a small cargo of pencils. If that is not so why does not the minister tell us what the vessel went with? He is absolutely reticent and non-communicative about what the cargo was. Surely the position of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Duff) could be made more untenable and perhaps ridiculous if it could be shown that this vessel went for a good cause and was carrying a good cargo, and refused to do other duties in order to discharge her mission to the Magdalen Islands? There are scores of other reasons why an investigation of some sort should be granted into the matters which have been brought forward.

I regret exceedingly that the minister found it necessary to resort to a contemptible practice that has prevailed in this House and in this country for the last five or six years, viz.: directing charges of disloyalty at hon. gentlemen on this side. I am surprised that a gentleman of the standing of the minister should stoop to such a course. He knows very well there is not a single man on this side who would indulge in any fling at the British navy or at any British officer; he ought to know that if anything that could be construed into an accusation of that sort slipped from the lips of any body on this side it would be merely a mistake, and something that was uttered unintentionally. Nobody in this House who is in the possession of his sound senses would do such a thing, and nobody knew better than the minister that no such thing was intended. Let me say that any hon. member—no matter on which side of the House he sits—who interrupts a speaker may very well expect to get a retort he was not looking for. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) was interrupted by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Cooper) who asked him in a sneering way whether he gave orders to a certain Admiral Storey in Halifax. All that the hon. member for Lunenburg said was, "No, I did not advise him, he had plenty of Englishmen about him to do that." On that very meagre statement, which did not amount to anything at all, a minister of the Crown thinks it proper for him to start a cry in the country that an Opposition member insulted the British navy. The minister is welcome to all the glory he can get out of it; he has laid himself open to being stigmatized in this House, as a man who is capable of descending to low, contemptible tactics. That is my judgment of any man, I care not whether he is a minister or an ordinary member, who would stoop to such miserable, contemptible proceedings.

Let me tell the minister that I hold in my hand a letter dated at Esquimalt on the 11th day of the present month, and which is therefore of recent date. It was written to me by some men out there who say that they are anxious to get clear of the Naval Service. The letter states:

> We have come to the conclusion that they are holding us so as to hold their positions as long as possible. If we were doing some useful work which necessitated our being kept on, it would not be so bad. But we are just stalling round, painting the cars of the officers at the Government expense. Could you give the matter your immediate attention, and oblige?

That is an extract from a letter from men who were engaged in the Government service around Esquimalt and on the warship Rainbow. Like requests came to me from Halifax. I brought the latter requests as speedily as I could to the minister, and I am very glad to say that two days afterwards he moved in the matter, and those very men were allowed their liberty. I suppose the men in Esquimalt found that their friends in Halifax were allowed to go, and now they complain that they are being kept there for the purpose of making positions for superior officers. They say they are not doing anything that is useful for anybody except painting cars for their officers.

I must also draw the attention of the minister to the case of those men who are suffering imprisonment in the Rockhead jail at Halifax. They are not Nova Scotia men, every one of them is from British Columbia, and their names are: Frederick L. Jones, Robert G. Bissett, David A. Curry, Oscar T. Metras, George Gibson, Archibald M. Green, and John C. Hewson. I would expect some of their friends from British Columbia who sit in this House to take an interest in them. I know something about marine law, and a great deal about sailors and their difficulties and their lawsuits; I have lived for thirty years as a lawyer in a seaport, and have had much to do with a great many such cases. It is true that I have no knowledge of naval rules. We never had any occasion to deal with the Navy, or with naval men who were in difficulties, we would not have an opportunity of so doing; but I do know that our young men of the sea are brought up under the rules of the Merchant Shipping Act. They are not educated to know very much about naval rules, but they do know that in the case of those men in question, who were possibly sailors, and who had gone to sea from Canada, that if there was anything wrong with the vessel it was the duty of the captain to send them ashore, and for them to make complaint before a magistrate and a harbour master. It would then be the duty of these officials to hold a survey on the vessel, and the finding of that survey would be conclusive as to whether the men complaining should go to sea or not on the vessel. But there was nothing of the kind in this case. The absurd practice was followed in the case of certain miserable craft that had been moving along the shores, vessels that are no good to anybody, and run to land when anything like danger threatens, of applying to them the austere rules of the British navy. When these boys complained that the deck was leaking, that their beds were full of water, and that any food they would take into their quarters was soaked with salt water, they were not allowed to leave. The moment they did that, there was no word of calling in the proper authority to inquire as to whether the ship was seaworthy or not; they were brought before men who turned up the authorities in order to ascertain what constituted insubordination in the British navy. I suppose that if a ship were just going into action and one of the gunners refused to take charge of his gun, it would amount to insubordination. A charge of that kind was applied to these poor boys who were accustomed to the right of making complaint and going before the harbour master and magistrate, and having the actual conditions determined. The naval rules were rigidly applied to them and they were sent to jail for eighteen months; whereas a man who had for the first time in the history of Great Britain, or in the history of our navy, disgraced the white ensign, as has already been stated, got off scot-free. Probably he was able to attend those pink teas in Halifax with the rest of the officers who were there doing nothing, and eventually perhaps his passage home was provided for. But let me in all seriousness say to the minister that he cannot put his finger on one single thing that his miserable navy did for the defence of the Atlantic coast that was worth tuppence ha'penny. Where is it? Not a single thing, except shovelling out hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money. Is it not most marvellous, Mr. Chairman, that year after year we were spending large sums of money, and yet we had nothing that could do anything to defend us? Could there be a more deplorable confession than that when this American vessel was within a short distance of the port of Halifax and appealed to the headquarters of our naval and military forces, in the province of Nova Scotia, in the Dominion of Canada, the officer in charge had to say: "I am absolutely helpless; there is nothing I can do"? And that was after three years of war. Surely if there was any efficiency in the department something could have been done, even if we had to borrow an American craft or get one from overseas to defend our own shipping. There was nothing done.

Now, if in humility and honesty the hon. minister had come here to-night and said: "I regret exceedingly that there was nothing we could do. We had nothing when the war began, we had nothing when the war was half way through, and we had nothing at the time of the armistice," we would sympathize with him and say: "Possibly in view of the circumstances that is the best thing you could do." But instead of that he allows some zealous official in his department to create a howling speech full of abuse for everybody in sight who dares find fault with the efficiency and standing of the navy and what it did for this country. I repeat again that the only time when a submarine appeared off Sydney harbour the vessel that went out to deal with her fled cowardly, and the master was discharged because he did so. Off the coast of Nova Scotia an American vessel was being smashed and sent to the bottom, and we had to acknowledge that we could do nothing. Where is the efficiency, where was anything done in connection with the war of which we can be proud, and from which we have any return for the money spent? I would be glad, indeed, to be informed what naval service was rendered and by whom, and I would be delighted to give credit to the minister and to his department for anything accomplished for our protection during the war.

I am not going to say very much about the little craft on both coasts that he hired, because he has steered absolutely clear of them. Those craft were hired to no purpose whatever. Every man of a certain line of politics from Cape Sable to Cape North simply ran to headquarters with his little boats and hired them at the highest possible prices that they could ask. Those boats were engaged all the time, but what they were doing nobody knows. It would be quite in order for the minister to give a list of the craft of every kind and description that he engaged for service on the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coasts, together with the names of their masters and the amount of money that was paid out in connection with the "secret" services performed. What they were doing, as I have already stated, nobody knows.

Now, in view of the fact that there was inefficiency from start to finish, the minister should not get on his high horse and hurl epithets at hon. members on this side of the House when they dare to question the services rendered by our Naval Department. I would ask the hon. minister and his department to give us the best possible account of what was done for the lavish expenditure of the people's money.

For myself and my friends on this side of the House I am not at all satisfied with the tone of the minister in replying to the criticisms of the hon. member for Lunenburg, nor am I satisfied that any defence worthy of being called such was made to the charges put forward by the hon. member. However, a great many of these things cannot be helped, I suppose. But the minister can help those boys who are pining in jail at Halifax, and he can let them go home to their friends, where I am sure they will be more useful to the country than they can possibly be kept in confinement at Rockhead. Rockhead is the site of the old penitentiary in the province of Nova Scotia before Confederation, but I am glad to say that so law-abiding and excellent are our people that we have no penitentiary there to-day. But Rockhead is still there, and it still carries the same disagreeable odour that was associated with it while used as a penitentiary. To that old penitentiary those boys were sent. I hope that the minister will be perfectly satisfied that they have sufficiently condoned for any little shortcomings they may have been guilty of. I am sure, Sir, that now the war is over nothing is to be gained by afflicting the sore hearts of this country, and this is one little thing we can do, or rather the minister can do to allay irritation, having amply punished any insubordination on the part of those young men. I trust, therefore, that before many more days have passed over our heads the minister will be able to tell us that he has done one good thing—allowed those boys to depart to their homes in British Columbia.

I have not had an opportunity, Sir, of looking through the Estimates to any extent but I presume they are somewhat along the lines of the other Estimates, and we shall be very glad to give fair and honest consideration to every item in them. I am sorry that this is the first time that a minister of the Crown, this year at all events, has started out with a storm, which has been visited back upon his own head, and which has kept him for over three weeks before getting a single item through the Committee.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I might be allowed to say a word or two in answer to the hon. leader of the Opposition, for whom I have the greatest regard. With regard to the young men referred to, it was my intention when the peace treaty was signed to give orders for their release. The hon. leader of the Opposition has stated that when orders are disobeyed in the navy it would be proper to call in the harbourmaster and refer the matter to the Marine Department. That of course could not be done in naval affairs, because the Marine Department has nothing to do with the navy, and in this case we necessarily had to follow the regulations. But I will be very glad to look into the matter again and see if these young sailors may not be let out even before the signing of the peace treaty.

The hon. member has stated that I made no explanation to the Committee in regard to the Lux Blanca. I will very briefly repeat what I stated this afternoon. There were off the coast at that time one division of patrol vessels, comprising sixty-four vessels, and two United States submarine chasers. The former had just left their convoy; the latter were still in company with a convoy. A wireless message was immediately sent to both divisions, and this message was coded, despatched, decoded and acted upon by 2.30 p.m., which shows considerable promptitude. The patrol vessels were uncertain of their position in the fog. I do not claim to have any great knowledge of navigation, but I have crossed the ocean several times and have talked with mariners, and I know that it is not unusual for a man to be uncertain about the position of his vessel, especially during a thick fog. These trawlers went as quickly as they could to the assistance of the Lux Blanca.

With regard to the service generally, the hon. member says that it has not done anything. As I said this afternoon, having regard to the fact that aside from the Rainbow and the Niobe the Canadian naval service is made up of trawlers and drifters, it rendered good and efficient service for Canada. The trawlers acted as escorts to the convoys, and also as scouts and mine-sweepers. So that considering the craft that were at our disposal, the service was as efficient as could be expected.

11 p.m.

I made reference this afternoon to the services of the Niobe and the Rainbow. If there is any further information that I can furnish to hon. members, I shall be only too glad to give it.

With regard to the men out on the Pacific coast who, the hon. member says, have nothing to do but certain painting, I have no knowledge of that, but I will immediately send a wire out there to ascertain the facts and shall be glad subsequently to give my hon. friend more information than I am able to give him now.

I thought that I covered the ground pretty well this afternoon. I did not say during the course of my remarks that we had modern ships in the Canadian navy. When I became Minister of the Naval Service I had to do the best I could with the ships that the Canadian navy had. Hon. members know all about the Rainbow and all about the Niobe. These trawlers and drifters were new ships. I understood the hon. member to say a moment ago that Trawler 30 was an old ship. I wish to correct him on that point; this was a new trawler and, according to expert officers, was perfectly seaworthy, although she was leaking a little, as all new vessels do. As we proceed with the Estimates I shall be glad to give any additional information that I can.

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister has kindly invited us to bring to his attention anything we heard of that was not satisfactory in the Service. I wish to direct his attention to a matter relating to the claim of a sailor in Halifax by the name of James C. Lavandier. I received the following letter from him on February 17 last:

> I beg to acknowledge to you that I am out of the naval service, and what about I cannot tell, as I was steward of the ship Hopper Barge No. 1 and was getting my food from H.M.C.S. Niobe, and was getting food for 18 of the crew, and as it happened that the Captain, John Barr, had on board his wife and daughter, and the mate also had his wife, I was short of food. This was on Friday, January 24th. I thought that there was nothing else for me to do but to tell the Captain, and I did so, and he said if I should speak to him again he would report me to the Niobe, and I told him to do so, and he did, and on Friday night at 8.30 he told me to get my clothes and go ashore. I did so, and on Monday the 27th of January I went down to the Niobe, and they said I had run away from the ship, and they gave me 17 days' leave and 17 days' pay cut off, and although I had two witnesses they did not take my word. Of course, if I had been a Captain I would have been all right, but as a slave I was cast down, and on February 10 I was let off and I did not get my discharge yet.
> That is what I got after being in service from August 20th, 1914 till February 10th, 1919, and we were under fourteen days' notice. I was discharged without a cent, and all those that did nothing and have joined the service from this last year are going away with three months' pay or six months and I have nothing to show for my services.
>
> I hope you will take charge of this case and see what you can do for me. I have four years' service and five months.
>
> Yours truly,
> James C. Lavandier

When I received that letter I wrote to Mr. Desbarats, the Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs, as follows:

> I am enclosing herewith a letter just received from one of your employees in Halifax, James C. Lavandier.
>
> Be kind enough to look into this matter and let me know if this man has a reasonable complaint, and if anything can be done to adjust it, and oblige.

I received the following reply from the deputy minister:

> I am in receipt of your letter of the 24th enclosing copy of a letter from James C. Lavandier complaining of certain treatment in the Naval Service. He does not give much information in his letter, but I am having his record looked up and should be able to inform you of the facts of the case.

That was on the 28th of February. I waited for some time for an answer, but there did not seem to be anything doing, so I decided to write to Colonel Thompson, the Commanding Officer of Military District No. 6, Halifax, to see whether I could make any progress in dealing with this sailor's case. I received the following polite reply from Colonel Thompson, dated March 15:

I am in receipt of your letter in reference to a sailor's grievance, which I handed over immediately to Commander D. Tatton-Brown of H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax. He advises me that he has instructed the Commanding Officer of the Niobe to look into the case and take the necessary action. I asked him to communicate with you direct.

If you hear nothing in the course of a day or so you might please write the Commanding Officer of the Niobe yourself.

I trust you will be able to get a full explanation of this matter. Should there be any delay and should you consider I could help you further I shall be pleased to hear from you.

Colonel Thompson referred the matter to the commanding officer of the Niobe. Colonel Thompson wrote me a further letter on March 17, as follows:

With further reference to my letter of the 15th instant, I attach herewith copy of communication this day received from the Assistant Superintendent H.M.C. Dockyard regarding the complaint made by Mr. J. C. Lavandier.

This is the letter that he enclosed. It is addressed to Colonel Thompson and reads:

The Admiral Superintendent has directed me to inform you that if Mr. J. C. Lavandier has any complaint he should have made it to the Commanding Officer Niobe or to the Admiral Superintendent.

If Mr. Sinclair requires any information with regard to men in the Naval Service he should apply to the Department of Naval Service.

Yours faithfully,

D. Tatton-Brown,
Commander, R.N.

This gentleman is evidently more anxious about the due observance of rules or red tape than he is to see that justice is done to the sailor. He gives no explanation of the sailor's charge that he was dismissed from the service because he ventured to tell the captain that the food had run short. As will have been observed in his letter, the man was a steward on this vessel and was getting food from the Niobe to feed eighteen persons. The captain took his wife and daughter on the ship, and the mate also took his wife; and the number of those on board multiplied so that the man could not feed them on the supply he was receiving from the Niobe and when he brought this fact to the attention of the captain he was reprimanded and dismissed from the service and he has been at No. 2 Hurds Lane ever since that time waiting to get a settlement of his case. In the meantime, I have been writing letters and waiting for replies from the commander of the Niobe or from the deputy minister in regard to the matter. This dismissal occurred in January and it is now the 26th of May; and while I have had a number of polite letters from different officers in the department there has been no settlement or explanation. The sailor has not received his wages. I have done my best to obtain a settlement from the minister's officers and have failed, and I submit that this is only another illustration of the inefficiency of the Department of Naval Affairs. The question is what next? After the impudent letter I received from commander D. Tatton-Brown, R.N., I do not feel like going back to Halifax for any solution of this matter, and I trust that the minister himself will see that the necessary steps are taken to have a satisfactory adjustment made.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I shall be glad to look into the matter to-morrow and let the hon. member have a prompt answer. I understand that the man to whom he refers was not a member of the Naval Service, but was a civilian on board a ship called the Speedy, all the crew of which had been demobilized. This is the first time the matter has been brought to my attention, and I shall see that the hon. member receives a satisfactory and prompt reply.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister an experience I had similar to that of the hon. member for Guysborough. Last fall I also received a rebuke from a gentleman who was, I think, the master of the N.R. 30. I do not happen to remember his name. One of his sailors came ashore in my town and found illness in his family. He came to me as the member for the county to see if I could intervene with the officers of the ship with a view to getting him leave to stay at home with his sick wife. His wife was a nervous wreck on the verge of confinement, without any help, and she simply clung to her husband and refused to let him go. In an endeavour to help the man I wrote as politely as I could to the commanding officer. He wrote back to me informing me that I should mind my own business, and suggesting that I should know better than to write a letter like that to a man in his position. He said that if anything was required I ought to know where to look for the information. He signed his name and never mentioned the sailor at all. Now, Sir, we are a simple Canadian people, unaccustomed to such conduct as that. In future years we may know how to deal with such high and lofty officers, but I desire, on the floor of Parliament, to bring to the notice of the minister the fact that such conduct engenders in the hearts and minds of the best people of Canada nothing but the most extreme contempt for such officials or any one who may stand behind them; and the sooner they learn that this is a democratic country and that we are a democratic people, the better. We are willing to stand behind efficient service and give our hearts and souls, and our blood, in support of such service, but we will not tolerate snobbery or contemptible behaviour of such a character.

Fisheries Protection Service—To provide for the repairs and maintenance of Fisheries Protection Steamers, $400,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How does the minister intend to spend this money?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This item shows an increase of $120,000 over the Estimates of 1918-19 and an increase of $45,000 over those of 1913-14. The increase is due wholly to the fact that most of the vessels engaged in fisheries protection work were also engaged in patrol duties under the Royal Canadian navy. As such their expenses were defrayed from the war vote and not out of this item. This condition will now cease, and vessels will return to peace basis. The increase of $45,000 as compared with the pre-war estimate is due to the fact that three of the smaller vessels, those employed in fisheries protection duty, have outlived their usefulness and have been disposed of. To fill their places the department has transferred from the Naval Service, the Hochelaga, and two new trawlers, and also the patrol vessel Stadacona.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many ships have we now in the fisheries protection service, and where are they?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We have the Canada, the Hochelaga, the Petrel, the Gulnare, the Arras, the Arleux, the Vigilant, the Malaspina, Stadacona, the Armentieres, and the Givenchy. They are distributed as follows: On the east coast the vessels are: Canada, Hochelaga, Petrel, Gulnare, Arras and Arleux; on the west coast, Stadacona, Malaspina, Armentieres, and Givenchy, and on the Great Lakes the steamer Vigilant.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I wonder whether we are not spending too much money at the present time in fisheries protection service. There is really nothing special to protect. We are allowing American fishermen to come into our harbours freely to purchase supplies, etc., and are not in the same need of protection we were in a few years ago when we had to watch the American fleet and when the regulations called for more care than at present. It strikes me the minister might make some reduction in the cost of this service if he looked into the matter carefully. I think he could find we could do with fewer boats thereby reducing expenditure.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have been looking into the matter carefully and we have been increasing the revenue especially in British Columbia which will make up for any deficit shown in previous years. The fishermen call constantly for the protection we are now giving them, and while I have gone carefully into the matter I do not see how we can very well cut it down any further. We have not got a very large fleet. These vessels are protecting our fisheries and seeing that American vessels do not fish within our limits.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There was a proposal made recently by people engaged in the fishing industry that a special deputy be appointed to give special attention to the fishing interests on our coasts. Does the minister approve that idea, and is it likely to be carried out?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I was going to go into that when the fishery Estimates are before the Committee. I have been favoured with a delegation from the Fisheries Association. I realize that great opportunities exist for increasing the fisheries of Canada, and I hope before very long to be able to separate entirely the Department of Naval Service from the fisheries. In the meantime I am taking active steps to develop to the utmost the fisheries of Canada, and to make that branch as efficient as possible. I shall be glad to go more fully into the matter when the fishery Estimates are up.

Radiotelegraph service—to provide for the building and maintenance of wireless stations, $285,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this for new stations, or repairs to old ones?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is mostly for the maintenance of our present stations, but also for the construction of some new ones. We intend to construct one on the east coast at a cost of $7,500, one on the west coast at a cost of $48,700, and another on the Great Lakes at a cost of $1,000. The balance of the item is for the maintenance of our present stations.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where is the one on the east coast going to be built?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: At Grosse Isle.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there not a wireless station there now?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, but we have to rebuild the present station.

Mr. McKENZIE: How many Government-owned wireless stations are there on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Government owns all the wireless stations on the east coast except the one at Pictou.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the minister in his Estimates any item dealing with the wireless equipment on Government boats? If he has not, I am going to ask permission of the Committee to raise a matter concerning wireless equipment on Government boats, information concerning which I have been unsuccessfully endeavouring to get from the Government since the opening of the session. If there is an item in the Estimates dealing with the matter I shall not interrupt the work of the Committee to deal with it now.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My Estimates do not contain any item for wireless equipment on any boat of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I must apologize for the delay in giving my hon. friend the information he has asked for. I have personally inquired about it several times, and the information is now in preparation, but in these busy days it seems difficult to get information as speedily as we would like. I hope in a few days, however, to give my hon. friend the information he has asked for.

Mr. McMASTER: I thank the minister very sincerely for his kind promise. It is now several days since I received from the gentleman who occupied the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries during the regretted sickness of the present minister a letter which led me to suppose the information would be forthcoming about the 20th of May. I am glad to know that I shall have it in the course of a few days.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not know that the large wireless station at Glace Bay was owned by the Government, but I understand from the minister that it is. There is a small wireless station at North Sydney and a large one at Glace Bay, which I thought was private property. Will the minister tell us how many stations there are altogether, and where the others are located?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The following stations are owned by the Government but operated under contract by the Marconi people: Belle Isle, Nfld., Pt. Amour, Nfld., Pt. Riche, Nfld., Harrington, P.Q., Heath Pt., P.Q., Cape Ray, Nfld., Cape Race, Nfld., Grindstone Island, P.Q., Fame Pt., P.Q., Clarke City, P.Q., Father Pt., P.Q., Grosse Isle, P.Q., Quebec, P.Q., Three Rivers, P.Q., Montreal, P.Q., Cape Sable, N.S., Partridge Island, St. John, N.B., Cape Bear, P.E.I., Camperdown, N.S., Sable Island, N.S., Halifax, N.S., Pictou, N.S., North Sydney, C.B.

Mr. McKENZIE: Glace Bay is not included in that list.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is a private station, owned by the Marconi people.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister told us that Pictou was the only private-owned one, but I understand now that both Pictou and Glace Bay are private-owned.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is correct.

Mr. COPP: Has the Government any interest in the wireless station at Newcastle?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is a private-owned one.

Mr. COPP: But the Government have controlled it for the past two years?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: During the war only.

Mr. COPP: Is it in operation now?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It has been handed back to the company, the Marconi Company, I believe.

Patrol of the northern waters of Canada, $40,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is being done in these northern waters. Is this in connection with the Stefansson expedition?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This is to pay the balance incurred in connection with the Stefansson expedition that was sent north some years ago.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the word "patrol" the proper word? Patrol has a certain significance, and I did not know there was any "patrol" of these waters.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I think the hon. member's point is well taken. The word "patrol" should really not be there. This amount is required in connection with the northern expedition that was fitted out at the expense of the Government in 1913. Mr. Stefansson's report is now under way, and I understand from conversation I have had with him that it is going to be of considerable scientific and practical value to Canada.

Life saving stations, including of rewards for life saving, $100,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Who is the superintendent of the life saving stations on the coast of the Maritime Provinces? Some two or three years ago Mr. Nickerson occupied the position of superintendent, and I would like to know who succeeded him.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No one was appointed to succeed Mr. Nickerson, and we have no officer performing his duties.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think it is very unsatisfactory that nobody should visit these stations.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not want to convey the impression that no one visits the stations. The officers of the Fishery Protection patrol, as they are in the vicinity, visit these life saving stations.

Royal Naval College of Canada, $100,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This appears to be a new item.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am very glad to see it. I think it is a move in the right direction that the Royal Naval College should be supported. If we are going to have a Canadian navy, we must support the institution that teaches the boys the very important lessons necessary to give them a start. The accusation has been made against the department that they have not acknowledged young Canadians who have devoted their lives to the naval service. A considerable number of young men have been trained in the Naval College at Halifax. I am not familiar enough with the matter to say whether the charge is substantiated by the facts or not, but it is that Canadian cadets who were trained in the Naval College were not given positions in the Canadian naval service during the war. I would like the minister to give me a list of the young men who were trained in the naval service and who were put in charge of Canadian vessels during the war.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am very glad to hear the commendation of the hon. member regarding the Naval College cadets, a very large number of whom have joined the Imperial service, and their record has been a most admirable one. The object of the present vote is to buy a site. It will not be sufficient to put up a good, modern, well equipped naval college, but it is sufficient for the time being, and next year we will probably come back for an additional amount.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it true that none of these young men were employed by the minister in the Naval Service?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, a few. I will be glad to send the hon. member a list that he has asked for. A large majority joined the Imperial Service in preference to the Canadian because they would see more active service and also get a better idea of the duties of a naval officer.

Mr. COPP: Where is the college to be built?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: At Halifax.

Mr. McKENZIE: What opportunities for training will the naval cadets or students have in connection with the college at Halifax? Will there be a ship in which they can learn something of naval seamanship generally and put into practice the theory which they are receiving at lectures?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I quite agree with my hon. friend that they ought to have practical training as well as instruction in theory through lectures. While our cadets have done well and made creditable records for themselves I am in hopes that they will get a still better training than they have had in the past and that they will also get the training on board ship such as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. COPP: Has the site been purchased?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not yet.

LABOUR UNREST IN CANADA.

THE SITUATION IN THE WEST—STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Centre Winnipeg): In view of the serious situation in my constituency, would the Prime Minister be good enough to state the Government's attitude with regard to "collective bargaining," which I am informed is the basic cause of the sympathetic strikes now on in Winnipeg?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I should like to give an answer to his question which will be more comprehensive than the strict scope of the question might demand. The Government are thoroughly conscious that there is throughout the world a condition of industrial unrest which in some countries has reached a very acute stage, and I am very sincerely hopeful that the condition in this country will not go so far. I might remind the hon. gentleman and the House generally that the Government some months ago had under consideration what might arise in this country in the change from war conditions to peace conditions, and by reason of the demobilization of some hundreds of thousands of men who putting aside in a time of great need their civilian activities, had taken up military duties and served with great distinction for years in the world theatre of war. It was thought at one time that the return and demobilization of the Canadian forces would occupy at least a year, and, perhaps, longer. It was even suggested that it might take eighteen months or two years, but owing to very active and energetic measures the task of demobilization will be accomplished in a much shorter time. Having regard to all these conditions, the Government, during my absence, passed on the 4th day of April last an Order in Council by which authority was taken for the appointment of a Royal Commission to report to the Government on the following matters:—

First, to consider and make suggestions for securing a permanent improvement in the relations between employers and employees.

Second, to recommend means for ensuring that industrial conditions affecting relations between employers and employees shall be reviewed from time to time by those concerned, with a view to improving conditions in the future.

It was further provided in the Order in Council that the commission should first make a survey and classification of existing Canadian industries; secondly, that it should obtain information as to the character and extent of the organization already existing among bodies of employers and employees respectively; and, thirdly, that it should investigate available data as to the progress made by established joint industrial councils in Canada, Great Britain, and the United States.

Following that, on the 9th day of April last, these gentlemen were appointed to be members of the commission: Chief Justice Mathers, of Manitoba (Chairman); Senator White, of Montreal; Mr. Charles Harrison, M.P., a member of this House; Mr. Carl Riordon, president of the Riordon Pulp & Paper Company, Montreal; Mr. F. Pauze, lumberman, of Montreal; Mr. T. Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; and Mr. J. W. Bruce, of Toronto, member of the Labour Appeal Board.

These Orders were adopted upon a report to Council by Senator Robertson, Minister of Labour. This commission is still actively at work, and no doubt it will have to consider (if it has not already done so), and in the end report to the Government upon the particular question which my hon. friend (Mr. Andrews) has raised. He will therefore realize that any observations I may make in direct reply to his question must be in very guarded terms, although I shall have something to say about it in a few moments. The terms of the Order in Council did not necessitate, and on the other hand they did not preclude, legislation for the purpose of carrying out the report.

I have no doubt that in this country as well as in other countries the stress and strain of the war have made the adjustment of difficulties between employers and employed more difficult than it would perhaps be under ordinary conditions. I do not think there is one among us who has given any consideration at all to the subject, who will not agree that taking any nation as a whole which has participated in the war—including not only those men who have fought at the front but those who have remained at home and sought to do their duty there—the people are not quite the same, so far as mental poise and balance are concerned, as they were before the war.

I hope that both employers and employed will bear fully in mind the conditions I have alluded to, and especially the employers not overlook the principles which were adopted by all the nations represented in the Peace Conference at Paris, and which are included in the peace treaty as presented to the Germans. I regard these principles as of sufficient importance to justify me in reading them, with the indulgence of the House:

The High Contracting Parties, recognizing that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, have framed in order to further this great end the permanent machinery provided for in section 1 and associated with that of the League of Nations.

They recognize that differences of climate, habits and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding, as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the High Contracting Parties to be of special and urgent importance:—

First. The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second. The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third. The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth. The adoption of an eight hours day or a forty-eight hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth. The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hourse which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth. The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh. The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth. The standards set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth. Each State should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the High Contracting Parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations; and that, if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the League, and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage earners of the world.

Now, it has been alleged in some quarters that as regards the strike at Winnipeg the Government has taken sides. The Government has taken no sides in that dispute, except in so far as necessary executive action, to which I shall allude in a moment, may be looked upon in that light. I believe it will be obvious to all the members of the House, and, I hope, it will be equally obvious to all the people of Canada, that if the needs of the people as a whole are to be regarded we cannot have in this country a complete dislocation of public services founded upon such reasons as have been put forward by the postal employees of Winnipeg.

The Government of this country is in an entirely different situation from a private employer. The Government employs persons who are servants of all the people of the country. It differs from a private employer in many respects, but especially so in two important respects. In the first place, the duties for which public servants are employed have a direct relation to the maintenance of law and order and, as well, a direct relation to the operation of public services which are necessary for the convenience of the people. But in addition to that, it does not employ these people for any purpose of private gain or private interest; it is acting merely as the representative of the people as a whole, under the mandate, and only so long as it has the mandate of the majority of the people's representatives in Parliament. Therefore, certain considerations which must obviously be taken into account in dealing with the relations between a private employer and those whom he employs are utterly wanting when we come to consider the situation of persons who are employed in the public service. As the Government of the country has and can have no private interests to serve, inasmuch as it represents the people as a whole and acts under the authority of a mandate from Parliament, by whom its acts can be corrected at any time, if they seem to be improper or unjust, one would naturally suppose that in these circumstances the Government might be trusted to act fairly in respect of the remuneration of public servants and in respect of the conditions of their employment. But I should be prepared to go further than that and say that in appropriate cases the public servants of the country—persons usually known as members of the Civil Service—might ask for and obtain a sort of appeal against the Government of the country by arbitration or some such method; but always subject to final approval by Parliament, which is the ultimate authority so far as the Government is concerned.

In dealing with the situation at Winnipeg, there are certain fundamental considerations to which this Government is committed and which, I hope, will commend themselves to the people and to their representatives in this Parliament. In the first place, we are absolutely determined that law and order should be maintained; and, in the second place, we are of the opinion that members of the Civil Service cannot be permitted to disregard their public duties and to dislocate the public service under the conditions which have arisen in the city of Winnipeg.

On the one hand the Government directs them to discharge a public duty, a duty to the whole of the people of this country; on the other hand another authority directs them to disregard that duty. They must make their choice as to whether they will serve the public as a whole, or whether, by disregarding that duty, they will abandon once for all the public service.

So far as "collective bargaining" is concerned, since my hon. friend who has asked this question spoke to me on the subject yesterday, I have made a good many inquiries as to precisely what that term conveys, and I am thoroughly satisfied that it has not any definite and final meaning which is recognized in all parts of this country. I am further satisfied that in some parts of Canada, in some cities in this country, it may be understood by some persons in one sense, and by other persons in another sense. I want to make it perfectly plain that so far as my opinion goes, and I think it is the opinion of all the members of the Government, every possible facility should be given for discussion between employers and employed, and for the making of arrangements which will bring about industrial peace and maintain and stabilize industrial conditions to the end that wasteful unemployment, used as a coercive measure, may be put to one side, and other methods—methods which must be so established as to do complete justice and remove any inequality—may be substituted in its place.

I should like to read, in this connection, the statement which has been made public by a minister of the Crown, Senator Robertson, and which is to be found in the morning press of this city. I knew Senator Robertson for some time before he came into this Government, and I have known him very intimately since he has been a member of the Government. No one can entertain the slightest doubt as to his absolute and complete sympathy with all the reasonable ideals of labour—there can be absolutely no doubt on that subject. No one who knows the man, or has been associated with him, can entertain the smallest atom of doubt as to his complete sincerity or as to his full sympathy with all the reasonable aspirations of labour. The statement which he has made public is this:

> "Conditions for the right of collective bargaining which are stated to be the cause of the Winnipeg strike seem to be generally misunderstood.
>
> The employers, parties to the original dispute; the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and the Citizens' Committee as constituted since the strike occurred, all agree to the principle of collective bargaining as it is interpreted, namely, the right of any individual to belong to a labour union if he so desires and the right of employees to bargain with their employers concerning matters affecting any individual plant or industry.
> The central strike committee interprets the right of collective bargaining to mean that the central body shall have the power to approve or reject any agreement that may be satisfactory to the employer or classes of employers and their employees, which, if granted, would have the result of enabling any central committee entirely outside the industry or craft affected to dictate the acceptance or rejection of any agreement. Instead of giving to the workmen in any individual plant or industry the right of collective bargaining with their employers, the present plan deprives them of the right and places them entirely in the hands of a central body, which principle, the Citizens' Committee of Winnipeg, Provincial and Federal Governments, agree cannot be accepted."

Now one can easily see that what is called the right of collective bargaining, if interpreted in a certain way and carried to an extreme length, might have an unfortunate effect so far as the public interest is concerned. More than that, as is suggested in this public statement, it might have the effect of placing labour men and labour unions themselves in such a situation that they could not make their own bargains except with the approval of some body that might be situated thousands of miles away. Before the phrase "collective bargaining" is insisted upon, we ought to have, and we must have, an exact definition as to precisely what is intended by it and as to precisely what the results might be if that principle, so defined, should be adopted. On that point the Government will probably have suggestions or recommendations in the report of the Industrial Commission, which we hope to receive not later than the fifteenth day of next month. My hon. friend who has asked this question will realize that it would be out of place and, indeed, invidious for the Government to attempt, by way of anticipation, to pronounce upon questions which are properly within the scope of the duty imposed upon that commission.

I repeat once more that I hope in this country we may be able to arrange between employers and employed some understanding and such relations as will prevent the awful waste, the dislocation of public service, and what is worst of all, the intensely bitter feeling which is engendered by such incidents as are now occurring in some parts of the country.

The nations of the world have at Paris set about the task of establishing such a society as will prevent war in the future. Would it not be rather a mockery if the nations engaged in that greatest purpose of all, should, in respect of their domestic affairs, permit a condition to continue, and to be perpetuated which, if it reaches the stage of a general strike, must obviously involve the employment of some of the methods which are in use in modern warfare?

I most earnestly hope that the report of this commission, and appropriate action of the Government, may eventually bring about between employers and employed in Canada such better understanding, such more perfect realization of the viewpoint of one and the other, as will prevent incidents such as are now transpiring. If we cannot accomplish that all-important purpose in respect of our domestic affairs, there cannot be very much hope for that wider purpose which has been attempted in the constitution of the Society of Nations. In this country we have a common citizenship; we live under the same form of government; we have the like ideals; we have practically the same aspirations; although sometimes different interests and sometimes prejudices may appear, but there ought to be a much more favourable condition for assuring industrial co-operation and peace in this country through the effort and co-operation of employers and employed fully realizing their responsibilities than is to be discovered in the foundations of the Society of Nations from which we confidently anticipate a great service to the world.

I do indeed hope that the strike at Winnipeg may be terminated amicably. I should also allude to what has taken place at Calgary and at Edmonton, and read the communications which have been addressed to the postal authorities in those cities. On the 24th instant the Postmaster General sent this telegram to the postmaster at Calgary:

> Regret to learn everything points to sympathetic strike with Winnipeg on part of postal workers. Government considers such action wholly unwarranted and in violation of the plain duty of postal employees. The prompt handling of His Majesty's mails and the maintenance of the public postal service at this time is the first obligation of every employee under the Post Office Department. For such employees to seek to embarrass or prevent the prompt handling of His Majesty's mails by a sympathetic strike is entirely incompatible with loyal service to the country and all postal employees joining in a sympathetic strike will be deemed to have resigned their positions in His Majesty's service and their places will be promptly filled. All loyal employees will be supported and protected by the Government. Make known to employees and keep Department promptly informed.

As far as Winnipeg is concerned, I should add that a report reached me, before coming to the House, that seventy of the postal employees have returned to work, and that no difficulty has been experienced in filling the places of those who have not returned.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Labour a question that does not conflict at all with what has already been said. Is the Government taking steps to restore the balance between the cost of production and the cost of consumption in Canada; or does it intend to leave that matter to be fought out by the people?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is rather difficult to answer so comprehensive a question. I can only repeat what I said a few days ago, that the cost-of-living officers of the Labour Department are daily engaged in watching the particular matter to which my hon. friend refers. In the course of a few days the Labour Estimates will be taken up and there will be opportunity then for discussing the matter at greater length than I can now go into it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that why eggs are 70 cents a dozen?

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the explanation the Right Hon. the Prime Minister gave to the House, may I ask the Right Hon. gentleman if he is in a position to state what proportion the postal employees on strike at Winnipeg bear to the total number of persons on strike there?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am speaking from memory when I say that those on strike in the postal service number between 500 and 600.

Mr. MURPHY: Does my hon. friend know what proportion they bear to the total number on strike?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As five or six hundred is to twenty-five thousand.

Mr. MURPHY: It is a mere fraction.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: So the explanation of my right hon. friend relates to a mere fraction, and not to the vast majority of the people on strike.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I endeavoured to cover the whole situation. My explanation as to the number of people who have returned to work obviously referred to the postal employees.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): The right hon. the leader of the Government has given us the result so far as between the postal authorities and their employees and that 70 of the latter had gone back to work. Would the Prime Minister be able to give us any idea as to what progress is being made in regard to a settlement of the general strike? What negotiations are going on in that behalf?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can only tell my hon. friend that possibly later in the day we may have some more detailed information to lay upon the table of the House. For the present, I must confine myself to saying that the news we have received this afternoon is of a distinctly reassuring character.

Mr. MURPHY: Before asking any further questions, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that, as my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, would say, certain members of the Government are not synchronizing. Yesterday afternoon I inquired what information the Government had with reference to the strikes that were said to be pending at Calgary, Edmonton, and other places in the West. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), speaking on behalf of the Government, said: "There is no official information as to the probability of a strike in Calgary and other places in the West." That statement was made, although the Ottawa Evening Journal published that afternoon the following item of news on its front page:

> It is understood that the Ottawa Ministers have received formal notification of the threatened action in the western cities.

That afternoon my right hon. friend read certain telegrams that passed on Saturday last, the 24th inst., from the Postmaster General, a member of the Cabinet, regarding these strikes. Now I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) whether the Postmaster General is likely to have any other information on these matters that he has not communicated to my hon. friend or to the other members of the Government?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My answer was perfectly correct. My hon. friend asked me if a strike had actually occurred in certain cities of the West. In reply, I stated that there was no official information up to that time that there actually was a strike. Of course, I knew that a strike was probable, as indeed the papers actually stated threats had been made to that end.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend said the Government had no information as to the probability of a strike.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not remember the word "probability."

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): I would call the attention of the Government to an important resolution introduced in the United States Senate by Senator King, of Utah, regarding the Georgian Bay canal. I read from the Associated Press despatch.

> The resolution proposes that the waterway be constructed by way of Lake Nipissing and the Ottawa river, and that costs be paid by Canada and the United States jointly. It also would authorize the United States to acquire a port on the southern bank of the St. Lawrence, opposite Montreal.

I would like to know if the Government is aware of such a resolution, and if it is their intention to co-operate with the United States Government regarding the construction of such an important canal that would benefit the whole country?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Government has no official information on the subject. As far as co-operation is concerned, from what my hon. friend has read, I do not think there is any intimation that the United States Government would be prepared to co-operate. I can only say at the moment that we shall ascertain just what the proposal is and give it our consideration.

EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Mr. Wm. D. EULER (Waterloo North): I noticed a report in the press a few days ago that as one means of abating the unrest in the country it is the intention of the Government to bring down legislation to enact an eight-hour day. I would like to ask whether such is the case?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not within the legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada to enact such legislation.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT.

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS AND MEN.

On motion of Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence), Bill No. 118, to amend the Militia Pension Act, was read the third time and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE OVERSEAS FORCES.

STATEMENT BY SIR EDWARD KEMP, MINISTER OF THE OVERSEAS MILITARY FORCES.

On motion of Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) to go into Committee of Supply:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of the Overseas Military Forces): Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a short time in order that I may have an opportunity to make a statement with reference to the administration of the overseas military forces of Canada. I was obliged to go across the water before the elections took place in 1917; and in making a few observations on the subject to which I have referred I ask the indulgence of the House the more readily because of the fact that I was unable to take my place in the House last session, and also because I have not taken up very much of the time of the House this session.

When in 1914 we decided to participate in the war to the last man and the last dollar, I fancy that none of us, none of the people of this country, fully realized what the obligation we then assumed really meant. We did not hesitate; we did not stop to bargain; the one point which was uppermost in the minds of all was: What would happen to the world; what would happen to the Empire; what would happen to Canada, if Germany could force her will upon the world, as she intended to do? But Germany was unable to carry out her scheme to change the map of the world. It is the intention, I understand, of the Peace Conference so to change the boundaries of European countries as to make it impossible for all time to come for any European nation to undertake, with any hope of success, such an enterprise as Germany entered upon.

I venture to say that few of Canada's soldiers, who enlisted so readily and with so much enthusiasm, particularly in the earlier days of the war, anticipated that they would be away from their homes so long or that they would be subjected to such privations, such hardships, and such sacrifices as overtook them. Neither did we expect that we would require to send such a large force overseas. If any one had predicted in the early days of the war that we should send 50,000 or 100,000 men overseas, the estimate would have been considered a large one. Yet we have sent overseas in all 420,913 of the best blood and sinew of Canada.

This, however, does not by any means represent the whole effort of this country. Many things were done by the people—the House is familiar with them—to help win the war. I shall not attempt this afternoon to enumerate them; in fact, I would be unable to do so, because these efforts were so varied and branched out into so many different directions and had such a far-reaching effect in bringing about a successful conclusion of the war, that it would be an impossibility to state them in detail.

It is desirable, Mr Speaker, that the people of Canada should familiarize themselves as much as possible with the activities of Canada's army while it was overseas. I realized some time ago that it would be an almost hopeless task for me, as a minister of the Crown representing the Canadian Government overseas, to convey to the people a picture which would accurately represent the activities of our army across the water. After the armistice came about on the 11th of November, we commenced to get out a report on the subject, and we succeeded in having that report completed. We could not do very much work on the report before the armistice, because the officers and men who were in a position to assist in the work were fully occupied. I had the honour of laying this report on the table of the House a couple of weeks ago. While it is a large volume, comprising over 500 pages, I think it is fair to say that the volume could have been much larger—indeed, that there might have been two or three volumes just as large—and yet contain, without padding, matters of very great interest in connection with the overseas forces. My task to-day is to touch upon, as briefly as I can, a few of the most important points in which I think the public may be interested; of course, I cannot do more than touch upon the fringe of the subject.

At the request of the Prime Minister, I went to England in November, 1917, to accept the position of Minister of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada. I accepted the position, with some misgivings, knowing to some extent what the responsibilities were. I realized the difficulty involved in being so far from the seat of Government and from the people of Canada, and of explaining to the people and to my colleagues the necessity for such action as was required from time to time in connection with the carrying on of the war. In fact, from first to last it has been difficult to convey to the people an explanation of the many necessary things that had to be done.

The war was conducted on a tremendous scale. It was difficult for the people of Great Britain to understand the many things that had to be done. The war was, you might say, one surprise after another to the people of Great Britain, and perhaps more so to the people of Canada, who were so far removed from the scene of hostilities. I do not know that any one has prophesied what the effect would be upon Canada of sending such a large part of our population on this mission overseas, of holding these men in restraint, of subjecting them to military discipline for such long periods.

No one, it seems to me, has carefully studied the effect which this phase of our participation in the war will ultimately have upon Canada—in fact, the effect which it is having upon Canada to-day—or the political effect, using the word "political" in its broadest sense—which it will have upon this country. It would be well for us to stop, to consider, to reflect upon the difficulties which we shall have to face in the future in relation to the great task which we undertook under the obligation which we entered into in connection with the war.

The soil of Belgium and of France will always be sacred to Canadians, particularly to those whose loved ones lie there. But out of 420,913 men whom we sent overseas, 364,599 are alive; and for that we should be duly thankful. We rendered great service in the war; our achievements were great. Surely we may hope that this magnificent country will reap some benefit from these sacrifices, aside from the benefit which comes from our having helped to win the war. Surely we may hope that the result will be to make Canada a better country to live in; to make our people a better people, if that be possible.

It is not my intention this afternoon to attempt to deal with the operations of the Canadian corps at the front, because in the time at my disposal it would be impossible for me on the floor of this House to do justice to the magnificent way in which our soldiers conducted themselves in active service. From time to time in the press a record has been given of the operations that were carried out, and in the report which I placed on the table of the House there is a lengthy record of the operations of the Canadian corps during the last one hundred days of the war, which period constituted its crowning effort. The report to which I refer is a preliminary one in the view of General Currie, who was chiefly responsible for it, and who had it written. I understand from General Currie that he has some one now engaged on writing a complete history of the operations of the Canadian corps in the war, including the last one hundred days, and that history will be available at a later date.

The tasks of the Canadian corps were most difficult; the Canadian Corps was always to be found where the fighting was most fierce; and by its valour, patience and skill it brought renown to Canada; its record will endure for all time in the history not only of Canada, but of the world. Its commander, General Currie, has made a high place for himself in history; he measures up to a proud standard as compared with other great generals of the war; he was ever considerate of the men under him, and always exercised patience and foresight in dealing with problems which came before him.

Demobilization is the question which is particularly before the people of this country at the moment in connection with the overseas forces, and I intend to take this question up a little later on, but before doing so, I should like to mention certain matters connected with the administration of the Canadian overseas forces before the armistice.

The question as to what control is exercised over Canadian troops at the front, and in fact over all our overseas forces abroad, has always been one of interest to hon. members, and it has been frequently referred to on the floor of this House. The inquiry has often been made: Were they under British or Canadian control; or, what was the control? As regards Canadian soldiers in training in the British camps, the control, so far as Canada was concerned, was perfectly satisfactory; we controlled them completely. As regards the Canadian corps, and Canadian troops in France outside of the corps, the situation was somewhat different, and when I went overseas I found that that particular part of our relations with the British authorities had not been so well defined as I should have liked. I, therefore, took the question up with the Secretary of State for War and with Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig at the front, and I had several conferences on that particular subject. We found that recommendations for promotion and advancement, recommendations for new establishments and organizations and many other things which had no particular reference to immediate military operations, were sometimes delayed by going in a roundabout way from general headquarters in France to the War Office, and from there to Canadian headquarters in London. We accordingly devised a scheme of having, at general headquarters in France, a Canadian section, through the establishment of which the Government of Canada got as closely as possible in touch with the commander-in-chief of the British armies in France, and it was arranged that all matters in connection with Canadian soldiers, except those having for their end military operations, would be referred to this section, and that this section would com-

4 p.m. municate direct with Canadian headquarters in London for final approval. At first the British authorities demurred in respect to this organization, but after it was formed and began working, it proved to be a success, and they were grateful that it was established, because it enabled the Canadian representative at general headquarters in France, namely, General Embury, to have conferences with different officers under Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig and to get together a staff which was desirable and necessary.

Mr. MURPHY: Who composed that section?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: General Embury was the head of the section. He organized the section, and his work proved very successful. General Embury has been appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan.

Mr. MURPHY: Were there any other members?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, there was a regular staff including a representative of the Adjutant-General, a representative of the Quartermaster-General, a representative of the Director of Medical Services and representatives of the other branches.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister has not the names at the moment?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not the names of the members of the section in France, but they are available. It may not be generally known and understood that outside of the Canadian corps in France, we always had from 40,000 to 50,000 troops in various formations and units. At the time of the armistice the numbers were not quite as large as they had been, we having altogether 1,608 officers, and 37,174 other ranks not under the control of the corps commander. The following are the details:

	Officers.	Other Ranks.
Corps of Canadian Railway Troops	491	14,390
Canadian Forestry Corps	376	11,375
Canadian Cavalry Brigade	141	2,719
Canadian Army Medical Corps	360	2,467
Canadian Army Service Corps	57	1,675
Canadian Engineers Reinforcement Pool	49	1,214
Canadian Labour Pool	—	1,881
Canadian Base Signal Pool	8	432
Canadian Army Veterinary Corps	9	438
Canadian Army Dental Corps	52	104
Miscellaneous Details	65	479
Totals	1,608	37,174

These were troops that were operating partially under the British commander and partially under us, but they were not under the Canadian Corps Commander, and the Canadian section was, in my judgment, extremely necessary, not only to assist the corps commander, in carrying on operations, but to control these troops more efficiently.

As regards the necessity of taking action with reference to new organizations within the corps, it was the desire of the Imperial authorities that our army organizations should, as far as possible, be similar to theirs, but it was found by our commanders that in certain formations reinforcements which did not exist in the Imperial forces were desirable.

In the last hundred days of the war our Army was stronger than at anytime previously, because we had largely reinforced existing Establishment and organized new establishments, and I shall put this on record for the information of the House. Between January 1, 1918 and November 11, 1918, the following organizations and increases were carried out:

	Officers.	Other Ranks.
1. Organization of two Corps Tramway Companies	6	528
2. Organization of three Forestry Hospitals	19	62
3. Reorganization of Canadian Engineers, involving in addition to absorption, of four Pioneer Battalions, and three Field Companies of 5th Division, an increase of	163	3,822
4. Reorganization of Machine Gun Companies into Machine Gun Battalions, involving increase of	8	1,100
5. Formation of one additional Company for each of the four Machine Gun Battalions and necessary increase of Battalion Headquarters	80	1,953

7. Organization two Sections Divisional M.T. Company for 5th Canadian Divisional Artillery	2	78
8. Reorganization 1st Motor Machine Gun Brigade, and creation of 2nd Motor Machine Gun Brigade, involving, in addition to absorption of three Machine Gun Companies of 5th Division, an increase of	7	263
9. Organization No. 9 Employment Company	1	425
10. Organization H.Q. Corps M.T. Column	4	13
11. Increase of 100 O.R.'s, per Infantry Battalion	—	4,300
12. Organization Canadian Corps Veterinary Evacuation Station	1	30
13. Organization Nos. 1 and 2 Forestry Companies	12	370
14. Organization Anti-Aircraft Searchlight Company	5	130
15. Organization Marne Group H.Q., C.F.C.	3	19
	315	13,759

In addition to general reinforcements it has been necessary from time to time to organize new units, and the following schedule gives in detail the strength of complete units despatched to France between January 1, 1918, and November 11,1918:

Complete Units Despatched to France.	Off.	O.R.	Date of Despatch.

These latter were entirely new organizations for which there was generally no corresponding organization or unit in the Imperial Forces. They amounted to sixteen different units, and were composed of 172 officers and 4,746 other ranks. In other words, from January 1 to November 11, 1918, the strength of the Canadian corps was increased by reorganization and new units, for most of which there was no counterpart in the Imperial Forces, by 487 officers and 18,501 other ranks.

After I had been in England a very short time, I found that it would be of advantage to the minister in carrying on his work to have an Overseas Military Council formed on the same principle and having the same functions as the Militia Council at Ottawa. This Overseas Council, which acts in an advisory capacity to the minister, was organized in the spring of 1918, and was composed as follows:

The Minister; the Deputy Minister (who at present is Col. G. S. Harrington); the Chief of the General Staff, Sir Richard Turner, V.C., K.C.B., etc.; the Adjutant General, Major-General P. E. Thacker; the Quartermaster-General, Brigadier-General D. M. Hogarth; the Accountant General, Col. W. R. Ward; the Director-General of Medical Services, Major-General G. L. Foster; the Paymaster-General, Brig.-General J. G. Ross.

Meetings of the Council have been regularly held, and much benefit has resulted from the exchange of opinions and views, and from the adoption of a uniform policy. When General Currie moved his headquarters from France about five weeks ago, to make his headquarters in London I asked him to take a seat on the Council in order that we might have the benefit of his ripe experience in all matters which still had to be dealt with. He consented. The name of Lieut.-Col. T. Gibson, Assistant Deputy Minister, was also added to the Council.

Mr. DEVLIN: Were these men acting on the Council purely from patriotic motives or were they paid a salary?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The men whose names I have mentioned are the members of the staff and are the heads of different branches of the service at headquarters. They receive the regular pay of officers, but most of them were engaged in professional or business life in Canada before the war, and they sacrificed the earnings from their professions or business from patriotic motives.

The Chief of the General Staff, Sir Richard Turner, and his immediate staff was responsible for the training in Great Britain. It might interest the House if I refer briefly to certain loans of officers to the Imperial authorities for special duties in connection with what was known as the Mesopotamia party, the North Russia party, including the Archangel and Murmansk Forces, the Palestine party, and as instructors for the American Army. In January, 1918, the British Government asked us to loan them certain officers and non-commissioned officers to proceed to Mesopotamia. Fifteen officers and twenty-seven non-commissioned officers were selected from the Canadian forces and left England during the same month. These men were sent out for the purpose of training and organizing an army of the natives to the north and northeast of the area where the British forces were operating at that time, to help the British meet the Turkish forces. Only 14 of this party remained to be returned to England at the end of March, 1919, and I think by this time all have been returned.

Mr. POWER: Can the minister give us any information as to the instructions that were given to the men that went to Mesopotamia? I understand they went on a very, very secret mission.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It was a very secret mission. The British authorities sent out a considerable number of men, and we sent the force I have mentioned, which formed only a small proportion of the total force, for the purpose of training the Armenians and other nationalities occupying the territory to the east and northeast of where the British forces were operating, in the direction of the Caspian Sea. A very mixed race occupies that territory, and it was for the purpose of organizing them if possible into an auxiliary force that these men were sent out.

Mr. POWER: Is it true that the officers were obliged to pledge themselves not to communicate with their relatives for a period of one year or more?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I could not say as to that; I do not think any special instructions of that kind were given. All telegrams and mail were subject to the censorship, and the officers and soldiers become pretty familiar with the rules and regulations, and as a general rule do not try to break them. The men in Mesopotamia were volunteers, as were also those in North Russia, at Archangel and Murmansk. The Archangel force was composed of specially selected personnel of five officers and eleven other ranks; the Sixteenth Brigade Canadian Field Artillery consisted of eighteen officers and 478 other ranks, and in the special mobile force on the Murmansk coast there were eighteen officers and seventy-four other ranks, making a total of forty-one officers and 563 other ranks. Archangel harbour I believe is still frozen, and on the Murmansk coast, which lies to the west the men are engaged in holding the Murman peninsula and railway which reaches to the all-year open port on the Arctic ocean. We intend to get these men back to England and to Canada as soon as possible.

Our men have been the backbone of that expedition, because they were physically fit and understood their work, and I have no hesitation in saying that they were the best of the troops sent there. There were a great many thousands sent there, including British, French, and American troops. Then in the summer of 1918 volunteers were called for a bridging party to Palestine, and six officers and 250 other ranks proceeded, all of whom have been returned.

There has been an impression abroad, and I have heard some echoes of it, that officers whose duties called them to carry on work in England tried to remain there as much as possible in areas where training was going on and where other necessary work preparatory to going to the front was being done. It is alleged that these men preferred to remain in England rather than to go to the front. This impression is entirely erroneous. Out of 1,000 officers I do not think you will find one who did not prefer service at the front, rather than in England, particularly in London. Soon after I took office I instituted a policy with respect to the exchange of officers between England and France, which resulted in a continuous circulation of officers between the two countries, no matter what positions the men occupied, unless under special circumstances where one or two might be found to be of greater service in England.

During the period we have been at war it is gratifying to record that our soldiers have been awarded 17,000 medals, honours, and awards, including 53 Victoria Crosses, 1,885 Military Crosses, 19 Distinguished Flying Crosses, 1,204 Distinguished Conduct Medals, and 6,610 Military Medals.

Mr. GRIESBACH: You say that there were 17,000 decorations. Do those which you have enumerated comprise that number?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Looking at the figures here, I do not think they make that total. However, the official record is that the forces of Canada, since the time they first went into action, were awarded upwards of 17,000 medals and honours, in the proportion I have mentioned. The figures as they are here do not lend themselves to addition, but I do not think they total 17,000. I see that the Distinguished Service Order is omitted from this, also C.B.'s and C. M. G.'s so I presume that may account for the difference. However, I can get that information for my hon. friend.

After it was decided by the Government to grant a liberal gratuity to soldiers, particularly those who had served overseas, it became apparent to us that it would be necessary to have some regulation with respect to discharges in England. The matter had always been more or less under restraint, but it was felt that there would be an anxiety on the part of soldiers—and indeed it was soon manifested after the armistice—to get home and be demobilized. So that in order that we might deal justly with all soldiers who wished to be demobilized in England, we embarked on a policy, and the conditions on which a Canadian soldier may be demobilized in England under that policy are that:

(a) He was born in the British Isles.

(b) He has no dependents in Canada.

(c) He has dependents or relatives in the British Isles in such circumstances as warrant his retention there for financial or domestic reasons.

(d) He has a bona fide offer of employment or has independent means of support irrespective of any pay or gratuity payable by the Government.

In that way, we were able to discharge those soldiers in England who justly could not be asked to come back to Canada, but it did not lead to a wholesale discharge of Canadian soldiers in England, nor could soldiers be demobilized out of their turn.

Mr. POWER: Do those soldiers lose their war service gratuity?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, they do not. A matter of great importance to the Canadian people at the moment is the desire of relatives and others to see the graves of men who have been buried in France and Belgium, and I have received a great many applications for passes to visit these graves. Shortly before I left England I paid a visit to France and Belgium to see for myself what was the condition of the graves of our soldiers there, and I think it might be well to explain to the House what the situation is.

Those who have lost relatives in the war derive a great deal of comfort and consolation in being able to visit the graves of their dead, and as time grows on such a pilgrimage will become increasingly the custom. On the 13th of April, 1917, an organization known as the Imperial War Graves Commission was constituted by resolution passed by the Imperial War Conference, which consists of a large number of representative men. Canada's representative in that organization is the High Commissioner for Canada, Sir George Perley. There are 160,000 isolated graves on the battlefields of France and Belgium, and the total number of graves of British soldiers in those areas is comprised as follows: United Kingdom, 452,730; Canada, 43,631; Australia, 35,131; New Zealand, 11,393; South Africa 4,450; South African Native Labour Corps, 535; Newfoundland, 888; India natives, 5,665; and British West indies, 956. This represents a total of British graves in France and Belgium of 555,379.

There are, as I have said, a hundred and sixty thousand isolated graves on the battlefields of France and Belgium, and for some time before the armistice was signed, and ever since that date, soldiers from the Dominions of Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and Imperial soldiers, have been exhuming the bodies of the soldiers in those graves, and placing them in cemeteries. I am glad to say that Canada has done her full duty in this respect, and I believe Australia has also. I fancy that the British authorities have had more difficulty in carrying out their duty in this regard, owing to the fact that there were a far larger number of bodies of British soldiers than of overseas soldiers buried in these isolated graves. I would like to say that we have a corps of approximately six or seven hundred soldiers who since the armistice have devoted themselves to the work of exhuming bodies and placing them in regularized cemeteries. That duty fell largely to the soldiers who came over to Great Britain under the Military Service Act. It is greatly to their credit that they were willing to do this work and that they have done it faithfully and well. About the time I visited France the intention was to relieve these men of the work, and call for volunteers to take their places from the soldiers who were in England and had come over under the Military Service Act, promising them that they would not be detained any longer on account of this work, and that they would be demobilized when their turn came and their time would be occupied while they were awaiting demobilization. I have since been told that the thousand men that were asked for readily came forward and have since been sent over to France and are carrying out this duty. A great many of the cemeteries which I have visited were in excellent condition; others were not in such a good state. I fancy that after the soldiers have all returned from France it will be necessary, in some way or other, to employ civilian labour to assist in carrying on this work.

As any one who has studied the question at all will realize, the disposition of the property and equipment belonging to the Canadian Government was one of considerable concern to myself and to the members of the staff in England. In time of war, and when the fighting has ceased, especially in the case of this particular war, considerable quantities of stores are piled up, and when hostilities are at an end they are of very little value indeed. They are in such tremendous quantities that they constitute a burden; there is no place in which to store them and if they are left out in the open they rust and decay. We had to take this question up and see what was the best thing to do under all the circumstances.

In the first place we had a considerable surplus of ordnance stores—clothing, equipment, and all the articles that the soldier uses and wears, and that are necessary to the carrying on of war—which run into thousands of different things. About the month of July last, or at any rate several months before the signing of the armistice, I felt that the time must come when we would have to face this question, and the Government would be under considerable loss unless some system for the disposition of these stores was organized. Therefore, I communicated with the Secretary of State for War with respect to it. We had, for instance in connection with ordnance stores, in England a corps of about six hundred men to attend to these stores. I asked the Secretary of State for War if the Imperial authorities would take these stores over and allow us the value. Then we would draw our supplies from the Imperial ordnance stores, and release the six hundred men referred to for other duties, or release them altogether. After considerable negotiations the proposition was assented to, valuators were put on the work, and stock was taken. When the armistice was signed on November 11th last, the transaction had been practically completed and a good deal of work had been done upon it. It was not, however, altogether closed, and it looked to me at one time as though the situation would take on a different aspect. However, as we were dealing with the Imperial Government, and as negotiations had so far advanced and so much work had been done, they took over our ordnance stores in England amounting in value to several million dollars, and allowed us one hundred cents on the dollar for them, with the exception of a few things which had deteriorated, and which we valued at from fifty to eighty-eight or ninety cents on the dollar. Accordingly that amount of money will be on credit with the Imperial Government to us against any indebtedness, or we will get the cash for the articles, in accordance with whatever adjustment may be made.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the minister speaks of being allowed one hundred cents on the dollar, does he mean the valuation that the appraisers made of the stores, or the cost of them to the Dominion Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I mean the value if we bought the stores from the Imperial ordnance stores of Great Britain; the figure they would charge us when we needed such stores; the price which they had fixed by valuation.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am afraid the minister did not understand my question. In stating that he obtained a valuation of one hundred cents on the dollar, does he mean the value of the stores he had on hand, based upon what those stores cost the Dominion Government, or the appraisement put upon them by the officials of the Imperial Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am under the impression that the appraisement was based upon the cost to the Imperial Government of similar stores which might have been in some cases more, and in other cases less, than the stores had cost us.

Another problem which confronted us was the disposition of twenty-four thousand horses and mules which were in France and Belgium on service with the different units. As there were a great many such animals in the British army, and in all the other armies, there was a surplus of horses and mules which were not needed, and to have brought them back to Canada would have cost double what the animals were worth. We were therefore asked to pool all our horses and mules in France and Belgium with the British authorities and take our chance as to what we could get from the disposal of them. The cost of keeping a horse at the time, owing to the scarcity of fodder, was about a dollar and a quarter a day, so that hon. gentlemen will see that it was not a matter which could be allowed to drag along for any very great length. In addition, there were seventy-two officers and seven hundred and fifty-six other ranks looking after these horses and mules. In addition there were twelve hundred and fifty sick horses in hospital, needing the services of four hundred and sixty-seven men of other ranks. Accordingly we entered into negotiations with the Government of Belgium for the sale of these horses and mules, and after considerable negotiation we closed with the Belgian Government for the sale of the animals at £40, or roughly speaking, $200 per head. There were a few very excellent animals among the horses, and a great many of the others were not in first class condition; and certainly the mules were not quite as valuable as the best, or even as valuable as some of the remaining horses. Although we had some difficulty in getting the matter finally settled up, I am glad to say we received receipts for all the horses before I left, which receipts are now in the safety deposit vaults of the Bank of Montreal in London.

Mr. POWER: How is the purchase money being paid?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We are taking the debentures of the Belgian Government at five per cent interest. The debentures are due in ten years, but the Belgian Government has the right to liquidate at any time within that period if it so desires.

There is another question in connection with the matter of equipment, and it relates to property in France. We had accumulated a tremendous amount of property in France in the way of transport, transport vehicles, field guns, and everything that goes to equip an army.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Rails?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Rails are not included in these stores. They were supplied by the British field authorities.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood that rails were also supplied by the Canadian Government.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I remember the debates in this House on that question. I should imagine that those rails were sold to the Imperial Government. But that is not a matter that came to my attention at all. How to deal with the enormous equipment was a very difficult problem, because, as I have said, we had no place to store it. Therefore we entered into an arrangement with the Imperial authorities whereby they took over all this material from us, and we delivered it to them in France and Belgium at specified points. Some of this material we require in Canada. We have the privilege of drawing from Imperial stores in England material of a similar quality to that delivered in France as soon as we asertain what we require here and can find transportation for it from Great Britain.

Mr. MURPHY: When such sales or purchases are made as the hon. gentleman has indicated, where are the accounts kept; in England or in Canada? And if any money passes, who is the custodian of it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: General Ross, the Paymaster General in England, takes charge of the finances. The money passes direct from Government to Government.

Mr. POWER: In connection with the taking over of these stores by the Imperial authorities, is any rental being paid to the Canadian Government for the use of rails or for any other equipment that is now in the possession of the Imperial Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: As I explained a moment ago, the question of rails is one that did not come under my notice at all. These transactions are direct between the British Government and the Canadian Government.

Mr. POWER: Is any rental paid for any other equipment which is now in the possession of the Imperial Government awaiting decision of this Government as to its disposal?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is stored in British Government buildings. We are not paying any rental.

Mr. POWER: Are the Imperial authorities making any use of it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No. The equipment comprises guns and equipment for the most part—not material that is useful in peace times.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What share have we of the war trophies?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will come to that in a moment. It will be interesting to the members of this House—although a great many of them already are aware of it—to know that all the mail for our soldiers both in England and France was handled by the Canadian postal corps. That mail was handled by them first in London, and then sent to the Canadian forces in France and in England and distributed by other branches of the corps there. In 1918 it is estimated that the number of letters handled by the corps was 68,174,000; newspapers, 10,226,100; parcels, 5,332,670; registered letters and parcels, 433,600—making the stupendous total of 85,166,370 pieces of mail.

I will take up now the question of war trophies about which my hon. friend asked me. That is a matter of considerable importance, and the document which I have in my hand contains a little later information than that in the report which I laid upon the table of the House. I will take the liberty of reading this memorandum which is signed by Colonel Folger, who has the responsibility in connection with securing war trophies for Canada:

Memorandum on War Trophies

(1) On the 5th July, 1917, the Colonial Secretary informed the Governor General of Canada that it had been decided to allocate Trophies captured by the Dominion Troops to the Dominion concerned.

(2) It was also laid down that the Trophies would become the property of the Dominion Government and allocation of these Trophies would rest with them and not with the Military Authorities.

(3) The Imperial War Trophies Committee was formed to control all War Trophies, and, on the 11th July, 1917, Sir George Perley, Acting Minister, appointed Colonel Folger as the Canadian representative on this Imperial Committee.

(4) Canadian War Trophies may be classified under three heads:—

(a) Guns, Machine Guns, Tanks, etc., which are actually captured and labelled by individual Units.

(b) Smaller articles of interest to War Museums such as German equipment, armour, shells, shell cases, munitions, etc.

(c) War aeroplanes and aeronautical equipment.

(5) Trophies captured by individual Units are labelled by these Units and turned in to the Imperial Ordnance Department in the field. These are eventually transferred to the Imperial Ordnance Depot at Croydon, where the claims of Units are investigated and, on such claims being substantiated, the Trophies become available for shipment to Canada.

(6) Trophies classified under sub-head (b) are those which are collected by the Salvage Corps and troops generally and by the Canadian Inspector of War Trophies in the Field.

(7) Trophies under sub-head (c) are those which have been obtained by application from the Air Ministry.

(8) Trophies under sub-head (a), claims for which have been substantiated are shipped to Canada as shipping becomes available, and, up to the present, the following have been forwarded:—

	Field Guns.	Trench Mortars.	Machine Guns.	Misc.
August, 1917. ..	7	6	6	67
Oct., 1917	3	6	6	63
Feb., 1918.. ..	—	—	—	6
June, 1918.. ..	6	7	20	124
Sept., 1918.. ..	—	—	141	270
Jan., 1919.. ..	5	—	75	99
March, 1919.. ..	21	—	—	—
April, 1919.. ..	65	—	—	—
	107	19	248	629

(9) Trophies under sub-head (b) are being sorted in this country—meaning England of course—at the present time and have yet to be packed and shipped.

(10) Trophies under sub-head (c) are being prepared for shipment and will consist of approximately 40 German aeroplanes with a considerable quantity of component parts. In addition, the Italian and French Governments have been asked for donations of aeronautical equipment.

(11) The Canadian Inspector of War Trophies has collected a large number of smaller articles of interest to a Canadian War Museum, which have been taken from the battle fields where the Canadians have fought. These consist of trench signs, buried machine guns, field telephones, searchlights, rifles, etc.

(12) A special allotment of 5,000 German rifles and bayonets has also been made to Canada as well as 5,000 empty brass shell cases of various sizes.

(13) A large assortment has also been obtained from the Ministry of Munitions of Shells, Fuses, Grenades, etc., which will show the progress made in munitions, inventions, etc., during the war. These are also useful for instructional purposes.

(14) A varied collection of German proclamations, posters, propaganda literature, flags, German uniforms, decorations, etc., has also been collected.

(15) The total of the above results in a very large collection which will require a large building to accommodate them satisfactorily. Arrangements should be made in Canada for the housing of these articles before shipment from this side and some definite organization appointed for the handling of these articles. When all these trophy collections are gathered together, Canada will have a display which will be second to none in the British Empire.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend any suggestion to offer as to the location of those trophies?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: An organization, headed by Dr. Doughty of the Archives, has been formed here for the purpose.

Mr. GRIESBACH: Will all war trophies captured by our forces become the property of the Canadian Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is the intention.

Mr. GRIESBACH: What will the trophies amount to in round numbers, that is, field guns, trench mortars and machine guns?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have here only a statement of those trophies which have already been shipped to Canada; others are in process of being removed from France to England, and they have not all been received in England yet; but in a very short time we will know exactly what we have got.

Early in 1918 the British authorities requested that the organization of the Canadian corps be somewhat changed. Owing to casualties, the British army had been so reduced in numbers that they had either to cut down the number of men in a division or reduce the number of infantry brigades in a division. They decided to reduce the number of infantry brigades in a division. That was done I believe in the German army as well as in the British. We were asked to do likewise, but after giving the matter very careful consideration it was thought desirable not to agree to the proposal, but to maintain our organization of four divisions, three brigades to a division, and four battalions to a brigade. The idea was to break the Canadian corps up into six small divisions instead of four large, strong divisions. It was thought that the Canadian corps had rendered such splendid service under its existing organization that it would be a great mistake to accede to the request of the Imperial authorities. It was thought better to try to strengthen the corps, if possible, in other ways. The adding of 100 infantrymen to each of the 48 battalions was one method we adopted for strengthening the Canadian corps. We strengthened it also by the introduction of many other units for which there was no corresponding unit in the British army. Besides the disadvantage of the effect upon the morale of the Canadian corps which would be brought about by such a change as was suggested, the expense would have been tremendous.

Mr. POWER: Were our four divisions equivalent in rifle power to six British divisions?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think so, quite, at that time. The change would have necessitated six new brigade staffs, two new divisional staffs, one additional corps staff and possibly something in the nature of an army staff to direct the two corps, all of which would have involved great expense and a heavy drain upon the available supply of trained staff officers. So that we decided to keep the corps as it was and strengthen it as I have explained. We have since had no reason to regret having adopted that course.

Another thing we always aimed at was to keep the Canadian corps together. It required a good deal of negotiating at times to prevent one or more divisions from being taken out of the corps and placed in some other part of the line. I frequently approached the War Office and the Secretary of State for War on this subject; on more than one occasion I spoke to Sir Douglas Haig about it. I had the pleasure and the honour of speaking to Marshal Foch with regard to it, at a time when he was anxious for reinforcements. I told him that if he wanted reinforcements from Canada he should not break up the Canadian corps and in a case of emergency place a division twenty, forty, fifty or a hundred miles away from the corps. I assured him that the best results would be obtained if the Canadian corps was kept intact. Through the representations of General Currie and his officers to general headquarters, supplemented by anything we could do in England, we managed to keep the corps pretty well together, except on that occasion when the Second Division had to go down the line and was kept away longer than we desired.

Mr. GRIESBACH: The action of the British authorities in moving a division about arose out of their policy of regarding the division as the unit of manoeuvre; it was not through any desire to move the Canadians about improperly. In the Canadian corps, however, it was dsired to keep the four divisions together under the corps.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Whatever the reasons may have been; whatever the conditions were from their standpoint, we always took the ground that it was desirable to keep the Canadian corps intact, not to move one division after the other away from time to time.

The Canadian Cavalry Brigade, which brought such credit to Canada, did not come under General Currie or the corps; it was a separate organization and operated with the British cavalry in France. General J. E. B. Seely, a very distinguished officer, a member of the British Parliament, and formerly Secretary of State for War was the first commander of the Canadian Cavalry Brigade. But the time came when we embarked upon the same policy with regard to the Cavalry Brigade as we had adopted with regard to all other establishments and units—that of placing a Canadian officer in charge as soon as a competent one was available. In this case the command was given to Brigadier General R. W. Paterson, D.S.O., of the Fort Garry Horse. The Canadian Cavalry Brigade was composed of the Royal Canadian Dragoons, Lord Strathcona's Horse, Fort Garry Horse, Royal Canadian Horse Artillery, Machine-gun Squadron, Cavalry Field Ambulance and Mobile Veterinary Section.

I would like to say this with regard to General Seely. His services were greatly appreciated; his record was one of great credit to him in connection with the Canadian Cavalry Brigade. The reason why General Paterson was made commander of the brigade was because it was our policy to place Canadian officers in charge of such units in all cases where they were available.

[Sir Edward Kemp.]

I should like to say a word with regard to the air force. More than eight thousand Canadians have held commissions in the Imperial Air Force. As the burden of the fighting and the danger falls almost entirely on officers, this is a record of which Canada may well be proud.

Mr. McMASTER: How many were in the Imperial Air Force altogether, and what proportion were Canadians?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not the figures at hand, but we could secure them. The question of what the proportion was has always interested me. At one time I was under the impression from figures which I received that about thirty per cent of the officers in the Imperial Air Service were Canadians. I am still under the impression that the percentage was at least quite twenty-five per cent; it may have been fully thirty per cent. As soon as it was possible for me to take the question up I discovered that it was desirable that we should have some better control of the record of these Canadians in the Royal Air Force and in the Royal Naval Air Service. I negotiated with Lord Weir, Minister of the Air Service, and we succeeded in obtaining important concessions with regard to records. The Canadian officers in the Royal Air Service are classified as follows:

1. Officers seconded or attached to the R.F.C., R.N.A.S., and R.A.F. up to December 31, 1918..	1,239
2. Other ranks of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada transferred to the above from June 1, 1916 to December 31, 1918..	2,721
3. Cadets enlisted in Canada by the Imperial Authorities and despatched to the above Services..	4,280
Total..	8,240

These were transferred to or enlisted direct by the British authorities in the Royal Air Force.

I might, perhaps, say just a word as to the repatriation of these young men. Those that were seconded from us to the Royal Air Force came back to us and were repatriated with our forces. The young men enlisted in Canada in the Royal Air Force, and also a certain number who were transferred outright to the British authorities, did not come back to our forces, and they are the young men who, it has been stated in the press, have not been able to get steamer accommodation to return to Canada. It is the responsibility of the Imperial Government to repatriate these officers. However, we did all we could to get steamer accommodation for them, but when 50,000 of our own troops are being returned monthly, it is impossible to accommodate everybody and somebody has to wait. We have been able to transport 1,000 of them to Canada recently, but I should not like to say that that does not mean that some of our troops have been held back a little.

Mr. POWER: By whom were these officers paid?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Officers who were enlisted in Canada by the British authorities and officers transferred outright by us were paid by the British, but officers, seconded by us to the British were paid by Canada.

Mr. POWER: Does that include flying pay?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It includes everything.

Mr. POWER: We pay the full pay?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We pay the full pay if they are seconded by us. We finally succeeded in getting the British Minister of Air to furnish us with the following information regarding Canadians in the Royal Air Force:

1. The Royal Air Force agreed to furnish the minister with a nominal roll of Canadians in the Royal Air Force, and to advise him from time to time of all accretions to and deductions from it.

2. All Canadians in the Royal Air Force were to be permitted to wear a Canadian badge either on their shoulder straps or on their sleeve.

3. It was agreed to give Canadians representation on the Royal Air Force Headquarters and Staff.

4. A monthly statement of the exploits of Canadian airmen was to be furnished to the minister, with a view to its dissemination to the Canadian public.

5. It was agreed in principle that Canada should have a Flying Corps of her own, which, while distinct in its organization and administration, would form part of the Royal Air Force for the purpose of operations in the field.

I should now like to take up for a moment the matter of the Canadian Air Force. It was found there was a great desire on the part of the people of this country and of some of the officers themselves in our forces overseas that we should have a distinct air force and it was felt that we should eventually have a nucleus for an air force, more particularly in view of the future development of this branch of the service, not only in a military, but in a commercial sense. We negotiated on this point with the British authorities, and it was very difficult to work out a plan whereby, if we organized a Canadian force, it could operate in connection with the Royal
5 p.m. Air Force at the front. After a good deal of negotiation, however, it was arranged that we were to have an air force of our own, but the men did not have time to become thoroughly trained organized and equipped before the 11th of November. There are, in England two squadrons of the Canadian Air Force, these squadrons being formed in accordance with this memorandum:

1. That the formation of two Canadian Air Squadrons should be proceeded with forthwith.

2. That these squadrons should be organized in England by the Overseas Military Forces of Canada in conjunction with the Royal Air Force.

3. That the type of Unit and equipment should be decided by the Air Council.

The fourth item is quite a long memorandum which I shall not attempt to read, but it deals with the way in which we should get the personnel. I feel very strongly upon the desirability of, at any rate for a time, retaining intact these two flying squadrons in the service of Canada. Canadians have shown themselves adaptable for this particular branch of the service; to use a commonplace expression, they have taken to it as a duck takes to water. They have made a great record in France, and it would be a pity if we did not do what other nations are doing in connection with a Flying Branch of the Military service, not only with respect to military operations which might be considered a secondary matter, but with respect to commercial air flying in the future. In view of all these considerations and also the pride our Canadians have taken in flying, and their splendid deeds, it would be a great pity if, when these men return to Canada, they should be just demobilized and sent to the four corners of the country, without our having a nucleus for a flying corps. I hope this matter will be taken into careful consideration and that something will be done in this regard.

We have quite a nucleus for an air force. Nineteen of the latest and best air machines were presented to us by the British people, sixteen through the Overseas Club and three through the Imperial Air Fleet. In addition to that we expect to get from the British Government ninety-two aircraft, made up as follows:

30 only Avro two-seater biplanes.
12 only single-seater-camels (Scout fighters).
50 only two-seater D.H. 9. Day Bombing Machines.

92

This is a gift from the British Government whenever we wish to accept it, and, in fact, I understand it has already been accepted. There are many other aircraft which are available for Canada. Of captured enemy aircraft there are 21 Fokkers, 39 various other enemy aircraft and 5 Gothas, which, including the nineteen to which I referred to before, make 84. Then we have an expectation of getting 14 machines from the French Government, 16 from the Italian Government and 24 from the British Government and, I believe, there are already in Canada 50 Curtis machines from the British Government. Therefore, I sincerely trust that all this equipment and the training of our airmen will be made use of, not only in a military but in a commercial sense.

Mr. NICKLE: Has the minister given any consideration to the lines along which this air force will be developed, whether it is to be an independent force or is to carry out work in conjunction with the military and naval branches of the service?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I cannot say as to that, as my work has been in England. Perhaps the Minister of Militia might be able to give my hon. friend some information on that point.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I noticed in the Montreal papers last night that a German submarine had reached Montreal on its way to the Great Lakes, having been handed over by Germany to the British authorities and by the British authorities to the United States Government. It has created a great deal of interest amongst the people of Montreal, and no doubt it will be exhibited in the different towns and cities on the Great lakes. Is Canada to be honoured in this way?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My duties did not extend to the naval forces. I would say, however, that as this submarine must pass through Canadian waters, there should be no difficulty in having her visit cities on the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes.

Mr. MARCIL: Does not the minister think Canada should be presented with a gift of this kind?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If my hon. friend would put that question to the Prime Minister, who has been to the Peace Conference, he would no doubt be able to answer more definitely than I can as to what is going to be done with the German warships and submarines which are now in British ports.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Mother Country received so many of these vessels on one day last Fall, that I think she might give some to the colonies.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Would my hon. friend be in favour of receiving them on condition that they become a part of the Canadian navy?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I stand for the Canadian navy still, and I believe one, if not two, of the minister's colleagues do. Can the minister tell us how many Canadians were enlisted in the British navy during the war?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not the figures for the naval forces. The work of the Canadian railway troops should not be overlooked. In 1915 the Canadian Pacific railway organized, at the request of the Department of Militia and Defence, over which my hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) then presided, the Canadian Overseas Railway Construction Corps, composed of 500 picked men of the construction forces of the Canadian Pacific railway. This corps proceeded to France in August, 1915. In May, 1916, the War Office asked the Dominion to furnish another unit, approximately 1,000 strong, for railway construction work. This unit was organized by Lieut.-Col. J. W. Stewart, who afterwards became Major-General J. W. Stewart, C.B., C.M.G.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that Mr. Stewart, of Montreal?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, Mr. Stewart, of Vancouver, who is well known in Canada as a railway contractor.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They say he did excellent work.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Through the methods he introduced in France he rendered very great service, and he doubtless helped to bring the war to an earlier conclusion. In the summer of 1918, after occupying the position of Deputy Director of Light Railways, as well as being in immediate command of Canadian Railway Construction battalions, Major-General Stewart was appointed Director of Construction, his duties embracing all construction of a railway engineering character in the zone of the British armies. The following table shows the comparative strength of the Imperial and Canadian Railway Construction Forces on the western front as at the dates given:

Date.	Nominal Strength Imperial Railway Construction Troops.	Nominal Strength Canadian Railway Construction Troops.
Dec. 31, 1915	2,440	512
Dec. 31, 1916	4,900	1,617
Jan. 30. 1917	7,340	11,562
Dec. 31, 1917	7,340	13,772
Nov. 11, 1918	7,340	14,877

The control of all the railway construction operations in France was largely in the hands of Major General J. W. Stewart. In addition to the railway troops I have mentioned, there were four Canadian Railway Troops Operating Companies, with a strength of 1,087 on November 11, 1918. The total strength of Canadian railway troops in England when the armistice was signed was 3,364. During their career at the front the personnel of the Corps of Canadian Railway Troops were awarded 489 honours and decorations.

Mr. PEDLOW: Did the minister keep a record of the men who returned during the fall of 1917 to engage in the elections in Canada?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I did not happen to be minister at that time.

Mr. PEDLOW: Would not a record be kept of these men?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I could not say offhand.

Mr. PEDLOW: The figures are not embodied in this report?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No. The record of the Canadian Forestry Corps is one we have every reason to be proud of. Their service has been very highly appreciated and favourably commented upon by the Imperial authorities, including the Secretary of State for War.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood the minister to say that he was overseas from 1914 onwards.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) was Minister of Militia at that time. Later Sir George Perley was the Minister of Militia Overseas. I went over late in 1917, just before the election.

Mr. PEDLOW: The reason why—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Hon. members seem to overlook the fact that the House is not in committee. There has been a series of questions and interruptions which were certainly out of order, and I must ask hon. members to refrain from further interruptions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a friendly chat.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Friendly chats across the floor are absolutely out of order.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I endorse your ruling, Sir, most heartily. I was going on to say that the Canadian Forestry Corps under the command of Maj.-General Alex. McDougall, C. B., deserves very great credit, indeed, for the splendid service it has rendered. The time at my disposal does not permit me to make as lengthy remarks on these organizations as I should like, but I wish to give these figures On November 11, 1918, the total strength of the Canadian Forestry Corps in France, including prisoners of war attached to units, was 18,240.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Prisoners of war attached to Canadian units?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We had thirteen companies of prisoners of war, totalling 5,021 men, attached to the Forestry Corps in France when the armistice was signed. In the British Isles at the same date the strength oi the Forestry Corps, including 1,265 prisoners and 1,182 other attached men, was 13,207. The grand total in France and the British Isles of the Canadian Forestry Corps when the armistice was signed was 31,447.

The Forestry Corps saved the situation to a great extent in regard to shipping. Lumber is a very bulky freight and through the efforts of the Canadians, who understood forestry work and knew how to attain the best results, an entirely new situation was brought about. In 1913 Britain imported 11,600,000 tons of timber and lumber. This was reduced in 1916 to 6,000,000 tons, in 1917 to 2,775,000 tons, and in 1918 to 2,000,000 tons. So that the difference between 11,600,000 tons in 1913 and 2,000,000 tons in 1918 is almost entirely due to the work of the Canadian Forestry Corps who supplied the difference from home-grown timber. If they had not been as enthusiastic as they were, besides being capable and efficient, that much more shipping would have had to be engaged in the carrying of timber and lumber instead of being released for the transfer of foodstuffs, etc. As my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) will no doubt tell you, a great amount of timber is necessary in connection with trench work and for many other purposes. The hon. gentleman knows more about this than I do, but I may say that it was through the efforts of the Canadian Forestry Corps that this situation, of which we have reason to be proud, was met.

Mr. POWER: Did the sawmill machinery, etc., belong to the Imperial Government or to the Canadian Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Imperial Government. Now, I shall turn to the Canadian Army Medical Corps, which arose out of a permanent organization in Canada. In June, 1915, it had a bed capacity of 3,000 and in November, 1918, a capacity of 40,000. Our medical service in England and France was of greater capacity than the British medical service at the time of the South African War, and the great efficiency which this service attained was owing to a very considerable extent—and we need have no hesitation in giving full credit to those to whom it is due—to the services of Canadian civilian doctors, the best of whom sacrificed their practices and went overseas to render splendid service for Canada. I suppose we scarcely realize how much the doctors sacrificed. I sometimes argue with other professional men on the question of sacrifices in the war, and while I do not want to draw comparisons here, I think that a doctor of middle age makes a great sacrifice who turns the key in his door and leaves for England and France. He knows that from that time his income stops, and the results are not quite the same as in the case of a man of another calling who may have a partner or any one to assist him. I consider that the medical profession of Canada made great sacrifices for the work they did in the war, and it was through their splendid service that we accomplished such great results overseas. In order to put this matter fairly before the House, I desire to read a short extract from the report I laid on the Table in regard to the work of the doctors. What I shall read epitomizes the situation.

> Just as there is "the man behind the gun," so there is the doctor and the man behind the lancet, and the nursing sister and the true Canadian woman behind the grim paraphernalia of her office. And great have been the souls and stout the hearts and deft the hands, not merely of the doctors and the nursing sisters, but all those "other ranks" who give the great machine of healing its life and its humanity. Unflinching in danger, resolute in duty, unremitting even in the drudgery of their voluntary crusade against disease and death—to these devoted men and women go but the thanks of scores of thousands of Canadian soldiers, and the heartfelt gratitude of hundreds of thousands who loved the men maimed in the defence of Canada upon the fields of Flanders and of France.

So much for the doctors.

Just a word for the nursing sisters of Canada. Those of us who watched the great service they performed cannot fail to appreciate it at its full value, and in connection with the nursing sisters, whenever one talks of or refers to them in any way, one's mind irresistibly goes to the three frightful outrages perpetrated on them—the bombing of the Canadian hospitals at Etaples and Doullens, and the sinking of the Canadian hospital ship Llandovery. Castle The Germans made no mistake in regard to the bombing of the hospital at Doullens and Etaples, the former was isolated from any military camp; they sent their flares down and saw the great red cross; and numbers of the nursing sisters as well as the doctors and patients at the hospitals were wantonly murdered Nothing that I can say would adequately express my outraged feelings on this subject, and I am sure that every hon. member feels the same sense of indignation. In the sinking of the Llandovery Castle fourteen Canadian Nursing Sisters were sent to a watery grave in the depths of the sea 116 miles from land, and in trying to cover up the outrage the Germans endeavoured to sink the remaining life boat in order thereby to obliterate all traces.

I might refer to the splendid assistance rendered our hospitals by the municipal governments throughout Canada and many voluntary organizations, especially the Canadian Red Cross and the St. John's Ambulance Association, besides the universities of Canada which did such magnificent work in sustaining our hospitals. I might read a list of them.

McGill University—No. 3 Canadian General Hospital.
Toronto University—No. 4 Canadian General Hospital.
Laval University—No. 6 Canadian General Hospital.
Queen's University—No. 7 Canadian General Hospital.
Saskatchewan University—No. 8 Canadian General Hospital.
Dalhousie University—No. 7 Canadian Stationary Hospital.
St. Francis Xavier College—No. 9 Canadian Stationary Hospital.
The Western University—No. 10 Canadian Stationary Hospital

These universities have done nobly and have rendered tremendous assistance to the medical service.

Mr. NICKLE: Before the minister leaves the subject of the medical service, may I ask him a question? We have had some disquieting reports and rumours in reference to an alleged insufficiency of hospitalization in England, and it is said that Canadians in hospitals suffered through what I might call a lack of elasticity in the administration—a lack of sympathetic coordination between headquarters and the outside administration. Is there any justification for these reports?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not heard of such reports. May I ask the hon. member where he saw them?

Mr. NICKLE: Certain gentlemen returning to Canada made damaging and disquieting criticisms.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The administration of the Canadian Army Medical Corps has from the first been as good as if not better than any other. Indeed, I think our hospitals on the whole have been better conducted than any others.

Mr. NICKLE: Then, we had an excellent medical service?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is no doubt about it in my mind. In every way it was the very best there was.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I should like to offer a correction in the information regarding Laval hospital. At page 396 of the Report it says:

No. 6 (Laval) Canadian General Hospital, Opened Troyes, January 23, 1917.

The unit of Laval started from Montreal in March 1916.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am very glad the hon. member has made that correction and I shall have attention drawn to it. In further copies the necessary correction will be made.

In dentistry we also took a forward step, and in the two years, 1917 and 1918, the total number of dental operations performed in France and England by the Canadian Army Dental Corps was 2,255,442. As a result of this work a great many men were saved from being placed in lower categories and were made fit for A-1 service.

The chaplain services were of very great importance in the army. The Canadian chaplains rendered splendid service under the director, Colonel J. M. Almond, C.M.G. We had in all 280 chaplains and the following statistics in regard to them may prove of interest:

426 Chaplains have served with the Overseas Military Forces of Canada.
2 have been killed in action.
1 died of wounds.
1 died while serving on Hospital ship.
2 died of sickness.
21 chaplains have been wounded while discharging their duties at the front.
20 chaplains were usually selected to accompany the troops into action.

There are services which the chaplains perform on the battlefield to those that are dying and to the sick and the wounded, which I need not describe, because nearly every one is conversant with them.

I would like also to refer to the work of the Army Pay Corps. Earlier this afternoon some hon. gentlemen asked what duties the Army Pay Corps performed, and I would like now to give that explanation.

Broadly speaking, the Canadian Army Pay Corps performs three cardinal functions:—
(1) The paying of all debts incurred by the Canadian Government with contractors, with Imperial and other Dominion Governments, etc.
(2) The making of all payments to the troops of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada and their dependents.
(3) The adjustment of reciprocal accounts between the Imperial and other Governments, and the maintaining of records and statistics in reference thereto.

Now as to the Record Office. There is a Record Office in England whose duties are as follows:

Soldiers' Documents.—The collection, custody, verification and distribution of soldiers' documents involving:—
(a) Collection and checking of documents of Drafts arriving from Canada.
(b) Collection and forwarding to France of documents of Drafts proceeding to France, and receiving and distributing documents of men evacuated from France.
(c) Checking Casualty Forms of Drafts proceeding to France.
(d) Custody of various documents during the whole period a soldier is on the strength of Overseas Military Forces of Canada, and custody of his documents while he is in France or in Hospital in England.

Casualties.—The reporting of Casualties and tracing movements while in Hospital. Under this head are comprised:—
(a) The compilation, after verification, of Daily Casualty Lists from reports received both from France and from the different centres in England. This includes the reporting of transfers of Casualties from one Hospital to another.
(b) Notification of the next-of-kin when resident in England.
(c) In case of death in England or France registering the location of the grave, and obtaining details of the circumstances of death.
(d) Making enquiries for a period of six months in respect to men reported "Missing."
(e) Compiling and distributing lists of men invalided to Canada and returned to Canada.

Mr. POWER:—Would the minister be kind enough to tell me whether it was at his request that after the armistice Lieutenant Colonel Piché of Montreal was transferred to the Record Office in London?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The officer referred to was sent over to London by the Minister of Militia.

Mr. POWER: Was it impossible to find competent officers in England to do that work?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Minister of Militia informs me that that question has already been answered by him in the House.

The Director of Military Estates is Colonel Robertson, and this office has handled the wills of 300,000 soldiers during the war.

When I reached England I organized an Overseas Purchasing Commission, somewhat upon the lines of the Purchasing Commission in Ottawa. Although not very much purchasing was needed in England I thought it was better to organize a commission for the purpose, and the members of it were officers in connection with our forces who were conversant with business conditions, and purchases were made by tender. Most of such purchases were from the Imperial Government, so the commission over there had not such heavy work to do as the Purchasing Commission in Ottawa.

I would like to refer for a moment to the Canadian War Records. We have a War Record Office, of which Lord Beaverbrook has had charge, which has recorded the history of the war since its outbreak. I think that owing to the efforts of Lord Beaverbrook we have the finest collection of historical documents, war paintings and photographs of any of the Allied nations, and the collection has been made at very little cost to Canada, the only expense incurred having been in connection with the payment of a few officers and O. R's., who assisted in placing these paintings and photographs on exhibition and in assisting in the work at different points. The paintings and photographs have been exhibited in London, and a prominent point in connection therewith is that the proceeds have gone towards defraying the expenses of painting the pictures. We have had the services of the best artists in connection with this work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many paintings are there?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is a catalogue of them, but I could not give the number of paintings offhand. At the Royal Academy a large extent of the wall space was taken up with Canada's war pictures, which formed a considerable part of the total exhibit. Besides that, we have a number of enlarged photographs which have been on exhibition not only in England, but in France and in the United States.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the minister mean to say that the cost of these paintings was defrayed by these exhibitions?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, by the receipts from that and other sources; for instance, we had exhibits of cinematograph films. In addition to the paintings there are also the enlarged photographs and any one who is not a connoisseur of paintings might regard them as even greater works of art, although one would not feel safe in laying down any such canon as that. However, the photographs were very attractive and thousands and tens of thousands of persons viewed them at the recent exhibition in the Grafton Galleries, London. These photographs, as well as other evidences of Canadian activity at the front, have been displayed in France, the United States and England, and have served to advertise Canada to a remarkable degree.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the Canadian War Records Office kept any track of the monies that have been paid out?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The report for last year has already been tabled, as will be the next report as soon as it is ready.

Mr. MURPHY: The money in question was Canadian money, was it not?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, the receipts came from persons who saw the pictures, and were not by any means all Canadians. The cinematograph films, for instance, were viewed by thousands of people in England, France and the United States. They proved a great advertisement for Canada, as showing our efforts in the war, and they have caused the American people to greatly admire us for what we have done. As I say, the proceeds went to defray the cost incurred in making the paintings and taking the photographs.

Mr. MURPHY: If they had not been used those proceeds would have been the money of the Dominion of Canada ?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: As to that, I do not know. I would not want to argue the matter with my hon. friend if he takes a view which differs from mine. Lord Beaverbrook put considerable energy into the matter and has secured a collection of which this country should be very proud. By and by these paintings and photographs will come to Ottawa and we will need a large building in which to store them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister has spoken about Canadian paintings. Would he kindly explain if the collection contains a painting representing a Canadian crucified by the Germans? The statement that there is such a painting has caused a lot of controversy in the press, and I would like the minister to give us the facts in that regard. If the statement is true, well and good, but if not it should not be allowed to remain uncontradicted.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I know to what my hon. friend refers, but it is not a picture. It is a statue cast in bronze about three feet high and two feet wide, which has been enclosed in a frame.

I saw the representation to which my hon. friend refers. The Germans took exception to this picture or statue—I forget the text book name of it—and they sent out a wireless from Germany criticising the position we had taken in exhibiting the representation and denying that such a thing ever happened. This was noted in the press, and I gave instructions that every effort should be made to ascertain if what we had represented could be substantiated. We succeeded in getting affidavits of two soldiers who witnessed the scene, and we got on the track of others who it was thought had seen it. We secured two affidavits at any rate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Were they positive?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They were affidavits by soldiers who saw the actual scene. One wore the Victoria Cross, and the father of one of them was employed in a position of importance in London. So after that denial was made by the Germans we issued a counter statement containing the particulars we had at that time. I do not think there can be any doubt but that the Germans were guilty of this atrocity.

The Canadian War Records have also performed splendid services in issuing a little paper called the Daily Record to the troops. No doubt you have all heard of it. It contained news items from Canada and was circulated daily.

The casualties in the war up to the 31st of March have been as follows:

Killed in action, 38,767; died of wounds, 12,355; died of other causes, 4,755; missing, 415; prisoners of war, 22.

Since the 31st of March I have ascertained that of those 22 prisoners of war all have been accounted for except 10. Those are the only cases we have been unable to trace of the very considerable number of Canadian prisoners of war in Germany.

I had an officer detailed for the purpose of taking down statements of Canadian prisoners of war on their arrival in England after being repatriated from Germany to find out whether the stories told about the cruelties practised by the Germans were correct. That officer and his assistants interviewed most of those repatriated prisoners, and in looking over a memorandum which came into my possession I took this extract of a statement by Captain Thomas:

The verbatim statements of these men show that hundreds of British prisoners—

He refers, it will be noticed, to British prisoners, not particularly to Canadian prisoners.

—were murdered deliberately and in cold blood in working behind the German lines in France —starved till they ate rats, cats, moles, putrid horse flesh, potato parings from garbage heaps —sent to hospital only when they were half dead. In one specific instance a Padre, a Canadian lad, whose statement I took, knows of 117 deaths out of 150 who were sent back to a parent camp by the Germans for their comrades to pull them through if they could.

We had in Germany something like 2,688 other ranks and 130 officers at the time of the armistice, and they have all been repatriated except the ten that we cannot find.

The Khaki University has done splendid service both in France and in England, and has helped many of our soldiers in their studies. I presume my hon. friends have heard all about that excellent work, so I will not attempt to take up the time of the House with a full description of the activities of that university.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many boys have availed themselves of the courses?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: For the month of December, 1918, there were from the 1st Division, 2,000 men; from the 2nd Division, 2,018 men; from the 3rd Division, 2,197; men; from the 4th Division, 2,137 men—making a grand total of 8,352 men who availed themselves of the courses in France. I need not go into the different branches of study. In England the attendance for the same month was 11,755. The total attendance at lectures from July to December, 1918, was 231,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Are those in charge civilians or soldiers?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are largely university professors of Canada who volunteered their services, and to enable them to go into the army we made them honorary officers for the time being.

Mr. MURPHY: Drawing the pay of their rank?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not think so. Most of the money for this work was raised by voluntary subscription in Canada. They have libraries and all sorts of educational equipment.

Mr. EULER: Were there any conditions placed upon the soldiers as to their entrance into this Khaki University?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Do you mean in regard to fees?

Mr. EULER: No, in regard to their educational qualifications.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think they could take any courses they pleased. The rules were not very strict. I am under the impression that it would take that much time off their courses in similar studies when they returned to Canada.

Mr. EULER: Was it necessary that they should have been university students?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not think so. Although called university courses, I fancy some of the subjects were really elementary.

I scarcely feel like closing my observations without referring to the splendid work done by the Canadian Red Cross Society, the Canadian Military Y.M.C.A., and the non-military organizations which provided hospitality overseas. Those organizations were: The Canadian War Contingents Association, the Canadian Field Comforts Association, the Maple Leaf Clubs—these clubs in London furnished beds for our soldiers, who otherwise would have had to sleep on the streets, the accommodation being so scarce—the I.O.D.E. Clubs, the Canadian Officers' Club, the Royal Automobile Club, and the St. Dunstan's Hostel for Blind Soldiers. This last named organization owes its origin to Sir Arthur Pearson, who is himself blind. He has had about eighty Canadian blinded soldiers under his care. I visited the place some weeks ago, and although I often wonder what passes in the minds of the blind, to all appearances those men were quite happy. They were learning various trades. Sir Arthur Pearson himself is a wonderful man and has done splendid work for Canada in connection with St. Dunstan's Hostel.

In connection with demobilization, we have had some difficulties. While the men have been anxious to get back to Canada at the earliest possible moment, yet it has required numerous organizations to prepare and get them back. The staff requirements in all the camps, the cooks and clerks, absorb the activities of an army of men, and we have had very great difficulty naturally in persuading those men to sacrifice themselves for the benefit of others. We have had to appeal to them on patriotic grounds to do this work for their comrades, although they had just as great a right to get back as any one else. To the permanent cadres the thanks of this country are due for the splendid services they have performed in connection with the return of our soldiers to Canada.

When the armistice came we had 268,000 Canadians on our hands overseas. We realized at once that we had a difficult problem to deal with. Every one felt that the war was over, even though peace had not been signed. These men enlisted in Canada, and they had an objective—that of getting at the Hun and fighting him. They were full of enthusiasm, and they were easy to handle. Indeed, they have always been easy to handle, and they are easy to handle even to-day. But when the armistice came their objective was changed; their one desire was to get home as quickly as they could. Men who had been under restraint for long periods ranging up to four years, or even longer, and who had been subjected to conditions of privation, suffering and sacrifice, were tired and homesick, and we found it more difficult to handle these men after the signing of the armistice than up to that time. They were not inclined to inquire very carefully whether or not ships were available, or how many ships had been sunk by submarines, and so on; they wanted to get home, not next year, but next week. We had to get the machine reversed, so to speak. We had the machine working fairly smoothly, carrying troops to the German lines; now we had to see how best we could get them back to Canada. Had there been only 5,000 men to bring back, the problem would not have been difficult. But before I went on board ship on the other side I witnessed the magnificent spectacle of the march past in London of 12,000 Dominion troops, eight deep. It took this body of men an hour and-a-half to pass His Majesty the King; you can imagine what an army of 268,000 is. Well, we tried to do the best we could. Demobilization came upon us in the fall of the year, just before winter. I have heard that you had the mildest winter that Canada ever had, but the people of England, France and Belgium say that last winter was the most disagreeable they have ever known—much cold and wet, and a lack of sunshine. There would be periods of a month when you would not see the sun at all in England. We had these men to house and to take care of under these conditions. Moreover, a fuel famine came upon the country after the winter had set in, and we had to supply the men with extra blankets. However, I am glad to say that the repatriation of our men has proceeded very well.

Some months before the armistice was signed I organized a demobilization committee to consider how to work out this problem when peace came, and the work of that committee was of great service when the armistice actually did come. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that some people thought it would take two years to get the soldiers back, having regard to the number of ships that were sunk by submarines and to the great demand for tonnage. I have heard people say that it would take three years to get our soldiers back, in view of all the circumstances. I am happy to be able to say that if peace is not signed pretty soon, all our soldiers will be back in Canada before peace is signed. There will be in England after the end of this month about 80,000 Canadians. Nearly all our troops are out of France. The troops that went to the Rhine returned to Belgium some time before they went back to England. My latest report, which is dated May 19, says that at that time there were 4,516 Canadian troops in France.

Mr. PEDLOW: Does that include Canadians in the Imperial Service in France?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Only those in our own forces. The 4,516 were made up as follows: Three hospitals, 1,000; details at Etaples and Rouen, 600; Infantry Works Companies, 1,300; burial party, 1,000; patients in hospital, 616. I should think that by this time most of them are in England.

We have moved from France to England since the armistice 140,000 troops. By the end of May we shall have embarked for Canada 185,216 troops. We expect that the 80,000 Canadians who will be in England at the end of May will almost all be returned to Canada by the end of July, though there will be a small remnant still to return after that date.

The matter of steamship accommodation has presented a very difficult problem. I speak with feeling on the subject, because I have had some very warm interviews with the Imperial authorities regarding it. The principle that had to be settled in respect to the transportation from England of Canadian troops was whether the Canadians should have priority over American troops, and if so, to what extent. The relations between Great Britain and the United States are very intimate, and it is desirable that they should be; but I found it necessary to establish the principle that Canadian troops should have priority over American troops, and I succeeded in having it established. We have in the service of Canada all the great Canadian liners as well as those plying on the North Atlantic whose home port on this side of the water is in the United States. Unless something goes wrong, we shall have brought back to Canada during the month of May 52,000 Canadian troops.

The Americans will, no doubt, bring back a good many during this month, but they will not be able to bring back, I am informed, more than 5,000 on British ships. I thought, perhaps, I could finish my remarks before six o'clock, but as I have still a few things to say which I think may interest the House, if the members will bear with me for a few minutes after eight o'clock, I will then conclude my observations.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Overseas Military Forces) (Resuming): When the House rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the question of demobilization so far as it affects the Canadian troops in England. I pointed out that although the weather conditions were unpleasant, the monotony of the troops was broken by diversions in the way of sports and education, and in other ways everything was done to help them pass the time as pleasantly and profitably as possible. The conduct of the Canadian soldiers during this very, very trying period has been excellent—better, I venture to say, than the conduct of any other of the British forces. If there have been slight lapses, as one might expect in such a large force, those lapses have been better advertised than similar occurrences on the part of any other of the British soldiers either in Great Britain or in France. To those of us who are conversant with the situation that has existed in France and England since the signing of the armistice, it has been amusing to read in the press of Great Britain and Canada some of the things which the Canadian soldier has been accused of. I repeat, I believe that the conduct of no other troops of the whole British Empire has been equal to that of the Canadian soldiers. I have no reason whatever to criticise the conduct of the vast majority of them. These men had been away from home for many years and were anxious to get back, and during the waiting time I think we might have expected some slight lapses, and possibly small disorders, occasionally to occur. These lapses, however, have not been any worse, in fact, nor so bad, as those that occurred in other forces. I am not in a position to state all that is in my mind on this matter, because certain information and certain news items with respect to the conduct of other British forces have been withheld from the public, while the occurrences amongst the Canadian soldiers have been very broadly and widely circulated.

Probably hon. members have already been told by the Minister of Militia and Defence of the mode of demobilization. We have two systems, running along side by side, which makes the problem much more difficult than where there is but one system. That, however, has been unavoidable. First of all, the soldiers in Great Britain and France, outside of the Canadian Corps and the Canadian Cavalry Brigade—that is to say, Forestry Corps, Railway Troops and Lines of Communication Units—are being demobilized according to length of service, those with the longest service being demobilized first. They are taken from various camps according to their length of service, and sent to a camp which is divided into wings or areas corresponding to the different military districts in Canada. The men are sorted according to the dispersal areas at which they will be demobilized in Canada, and all their documents and records are prepared before embarkation, so that on arrival at the dispersal station in Canada they are ready for instant demobilization. The result is that when a man reaches the dispersal station in Canada nearest to his home or where he wants to go, he is at once discharged and returns to civil life.

The second system applies to troops included in the Canadian Corps and Canadian Cavalry Brigade whom it was found more advisable to deal with as units and who were accordingly demobilized and returned to Canada as far as possible in the units with which they fought at the front. Special sections of our camps in England were set apart for these Canadian Corps troops and the system of sorting out and documentation for them was, with certain modifications, the same as I have previously described.

I have referred at some length to the shipping situation. The disappointments and the difficulties of the shipping situation were very real and very trying. References have sometimes been made to the bunching of the ships in Halifax, and I have been asked why that has happened. The answer is very simple. We have to take the ships that are available and if, immediately after a ship has just sailed for Canada with four or five thousand troops on board, we are told that another ship is ready to sail which will cross the Atlantic at about the same speed, we cannot refuse that second ship or she would be used by the Americans. So for that reason the bunching of ships on this side of the Atlantic on occasions has been absolutely unavoidable. There is the further reason that the sailing of a ship is often delayed one or two days, and sometimes one or two weeks. I have known ocasions where we were advised that a ship would sail on a certain day, all the papers and records would be prepared for a certain number of men for that ship, and when they were about to embark on the train the day before the ship left, we would get word that the ship could not sail and she might be delayed for a week. Furthermore, ships nowadays are pretty well worn out, and often at the last moment they have to go into dry dock. There have also been a great many strikes at the docks in England. I was told by the captain of the ship I came over on this time that there are about six different organizations, a strike in any one of which would prevent the sailing of a ship.

The House can have some idea of the difficulty with which we had to contend when I say that the nominal roll for a ship carrying from three to five thousand troops involves a tremendous amount of work. I hold in my hand the copy of a nominal roll of a certain sailing,—a small one,—the number of troops being 460. One of my officers came into my office one day with a great pile of documents of this character, which contained the names of all the soldiers comprising that nominal roll. He said: "There are 460 names, and you can see what it would mean in the case of a ship carrying 5,000 troops, particularly when such a ship's sailing is cancelled; in such an event we have to take pen and ink or pencil and run a line through them and prepare the whole thing over again in order to make the roll for the sailing."

I have also referred briefly to the scarcity of ships, and in addition to what I said before recess, I would like to add this further fact: Canada is not the only country to which soldiers must be returned. There are Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, and there is a movement of troops from Egypt to India, and troops returning from Mesopotamia and Palestine and the Mediterranean, while to the United States vast numbers are coming back. In view of this, I think I might reasonably direct the attention of the House again to what has been accomplished in the matter of repatriating the Canadian army, especially when one considers the scarcity of ships as a result of submarine warfare and the tremendous demand which exists for shipping at the present time. The programme outlined by the authorities in Canada in regard to the number of troops that could be repatriated contemplated 20,000 for December and January, 30,000 for February, March and April, 40,000 for the month of May, and 45,000 a month after May. I presume that it was considered that as December and January were winter months, and in view of the uncertainty as to the kind of winter we should have and the fear of a blockade of the railways by reason of snowstorms, it would not be safe to attempt to repatriate more than the number mentioned for these months. It was very easy to obtain ships at that time because other countries and the other dominions had not got as far advanced in the work of demobilization as we had. We carried out the programme for these two months, and in February 30,000 was the number fixed in the programme. We dispatched a considerable number of men in that month, but there was a falling off due chiefly to strikes and, to a limited extent, to the fact that we refused to take some ships to carry men considering they were not adequately equipped for the transportation of troops in winter on the North Atlantic owing to insufficiency of heating and lavatory accommodation and poor ventilation. We had to discard these ships, but the difference was made up. To stop 3,000 men from embarking on a ship interrupts the system, because the men were all moving towards the shipping ports; and sometimes it was necessary to stop the movement of troops as far back as Belgium to meet the situation caused by sudden shortage of shipping. In March, however, we caught up more than we had lost in February. We discovered that the authorities in Canada could take more than 30,000 a month and we sent about 42,000 to Canada in March. In April, there were again bad strikes in England and we fell short. But in the month of May we have more than made up the shortage by sending some 52,000. On the whole, therefore, we have lived up to the programme, and have exceeded it on the average. It was thought that troops could be repatriated rapidly by way of the St. Lawrence route after the opening of navigation, but as a result of careful examination of the matter we found that there were not vessels capable of navigating the St. Lawrence that would carry more than ten to fifteen thousand troops into the St. Lawrence ports. After taking into consideration "military dependents"—the wives and children of soldiers—and a certain proportion of civilian passengers, we could not get into the St. Lawrence more than ten or fifteen thousand troops a month. Repatriation would therefore chiefly take place, even in summer, by way of Halifax, because that port can take in vessels capable of carrying large numbers. In addition to this, these vessels that come to Halifax go on to New York for cargoes and there take passengers back to England. I would call attention to a certain press notice which will throw some light on the careful manner in which we have endeavoured to guard the interests of our soldiers in connection with repatriation, and the fact that we have tried to give them satisfactory sleeping accommodation on board ship, proper meals, etc. The press despatch to which I refer reads:

> One of ten troopships due yesterday with more than 26,000 returning American soldiers, the Leviathan had a total of 14,416 souls aboard when she made her pier at Hoboken. Of these 12,274 were troops.
> The rest were officers and members of the crew.
> In order to accommodate this unprecedented number of passengers, the troops aboard received only two meals a day, but there were no complaints.

Now, we have not deemed it wise to crowd men into ships to the same extent as some of the Allies have done in connection with repatriation. We do not put the same number of troops on ships as others do. I presume the extract I have just read is a correct account of what took place with reference to the Vaterland, now called the Leviathan, one of the largest of the former German ships. It will be seen the men on board this ship had only two meals a day because there were no facilities for providing more; and I can say more than is contained in this article. Some of the soldiers of some of the Allies have slept in eight-hour shifts on board ship because of lack of sleeping accommodation. On the other hand, so far as the Canadian troops are concerned, we have tried to furnish comfortable accommodation for the men so that all of them could sleep at night and not in relays. There are always in some of these vessels a few hammock berths that are more or less uncomfortable, and we try to make conditions in respect to them as comfortable as possible. With regard to the question of meals, this is a matter which has been carefully thought out. Under our regulations, instead of two meals a day as the men received to whom this article refers, our soldiers were given what I might term four meals a day. They received three regular meals and at bedtime were given a substantial bit of food to sustain them through the night. I have already quoted some figures, but I think I may repeat them again. We had, when the armistice was signed, about 140,000 troops in France, practically all of whom have since been moved to Great Britain. Out of 268,000 Canadian troops that were overseas at the signing of the armistice, we will have moved across the Atlantic by the end of the present month no less than 185,216. That will leave in round numbers 80,000 still to be brought home, nearly all of whom, unless something unforeseen happens, will be returned to Canada during the months of June and July. There will be a few odds and ends to clear up after that, but I cannot give the exact figures as to these because there is always a certain number of discharges in England under our policy.

I did not refer, when making my statement this afternoon, to a question as to which I think nearly every member of the House has had some personal experience, I refer to that of compassionate leave. One of the most difficult and trying matters that I, and the members of the staff in Great Britain, as well as the Corps Commander and other officers, have had to deal with has been the question of compassionate leave. As I stated this afternoon, no one thought this war was going to last for such a long time, nor did the parents of our young men anticipate that their sons would be absent for such a lengthy period. All sorts of things can happen in a family in the course of three or four years. The heart rending and heart breaking appeals we had from parents and relatives were many, and it was very necessary that we should decide on some policy and endeavour to carry it out as justly as we could. It was also necessary to try and answer every communication we received in a sympathetic manner and explain, as well as we could the working of the system which was decided on. I have had parents come from distant parts of Canada to my office in England who pointed out and urged reasons why their sons should be repatriated without regard to anybody else. Such a situation is very trying, because the parental affection enters into the case and there are always very affecting circumstances connected with it. I have tried to administer the policy decided upon in that regard in as fair and just a manner to all concerned as was possible under all the difficult circumstances that arose.

I would like to refer for a moment to another important thing which has caused us a good deal of work in England, but which has apparently been necessary, and that is the documentation of the soldiers. When demobilization took place on a large scale it required at the place of demobilization a full and complete record of the soldier as he is returned to civil life, this being needed for the purpose of pensions, for war service gratuity, and for many other purposes. When a soldier went from Canada overseas this documentation, or a very large proportion of it, was not necessary at all; but before he could return to Canada —unless he was to be demobilized in England—as we did demobilize soldiers in England in certain cases—the work to be performed overseas was very considerable, I can assure the House. The only documents the soldier had to take with him when he was leaving Canada were:

1. Attestation Paper or Particulars of Recruit. (Made out on enlistment).
2. Casualty Form. (Giving full particulars of Service in Field).
3. Medical History Sheet. (Kept up to date from enlistment).
4. Field Conduct Sheet. (Giving particulars of any "crimes" or punishments).
5. Pay Book. (Always carried by soldier).

We were not only required to re-sort the men before we could send them back to Canada into units according to the dispersal stations in Canada to which the soldier wished to go, but we had to carry out this documentation to which I have referred. The procedure was laid down in Canada in respect to this additional documentation, and no doubt it was necessary. I am under the impression that if the armistice had not come upon us suddenly as it did, and if demobilization had not been upon us, we could have simplified the matter of documentation; but we were in the midst of demobilization and there was not time to argue the matter out between the Minister of Militia and myself and the officers under us in both cases. So we had to proceed with this rather heavy duty. The procedure which was laid down by Canada involved preparation Overseas of the following ten documents, in addition to those already in existence:

1. Proceedings of Final Medical Board (showing medical condition of man immediately prior to demobilization).
2. Dental Certificate (showing dental condition).

3. Proceedings on Discharge (A cover for all documents bearing endorsement of reasons for discharge and acknowledgment by soldier of receipt of discharge certificate).
4. Discharge Certificate (enclosed in special envelope—to be signed in Canada and handed to soldier).
5. Copy of Discharge Certificate (retained for record purposes).
6. Dispersal Certificate (in triplicate—particulars of address of soldier after demobilization, where he wants War Gratuity sent, etc.).
7. Equipment and Clothing Statement (Receipt by soldier for all items of clothing and equipment taken to Canada).
8. Last Pay Certificate (showing state of soldier's pay account up to end of current month).
9. Duplicate Last Pay Certificate.
10. War Service Gratuity Form (declaration by soldier of essential facts required for purposes of this grant).

These are all in addition to the documents and papers that the man had to have when he came from Canada overseas. Two of these documents to which I have referred had to be prepared in duplicate and two in triplicate. There may also have accumulated overseas sundry documents which may be as many as 20, to cover such items as:

Regimental and Company Conduct Sheets.
Particulars of family.
Particulars of marriage.
Proficiency Certificates.
Statement of Service of Warrant Officers and N.C.O's.
Birth Certificate.
Proceedings of Courts of Inquiry.

Canada, I venture to think, possesses probably the most complete system of documentation of all the Allies; and whilst, as I say, we might have simplified the system if we had had the time, yet there was not an opportunity to do it. In order to give the House some idea of how long it takes to get through with this documentation I had a calculation made and I discovered that if the work for the whole force were to be done by one man who devoted eight hours a day to it, it would take him sixty-eight years to carry it out. This would not include the time required to complete preparation of last pay certificates and to adjust pay accounts, which would double the period. Nor does it include time occupied in getting men on parade, or time spent on parade, for registering name and full regimental particulars. This also would double the time.

Taking into account the 268,000 Canadian soldiers overseas at the armistice there would have to be answered in the duplicate and triplicate forms 100,710,357 questions, and the number of signatures which would be required would be 2,219,512. So that there was the necessity of keeping a regular staff of officers and clerks in England to do this work,—men who were entitled to return to Canada just as much as the soldiers they are working for, and when this is considered hon. gentlemen will understand this was quite a task. In that connection I want to pay a tribute to these men who have stayed in England, and who have carried on this work for the purpose of getting their comrades back to Canada—those who have had no extra pay but who have had to be appealed to on patriotic grounds to continue at work, the army of clerks, cooks, and men of that character who are doing duty in England, and are doing it faithfully, those who have had to keep all the camps going, and perform all the labour in connection therewith,—all have done their work well and have done it very faithfully too.

Now I would like to speak for a few moments in reference to the Headquarters Staff in London. The appointment of an overseas minister was a unique procedure, and I do not venture to express any opinion at the moment as to its advisability. It was the programme that was undertaken by the Prime Minister, and it was thought, no doubt, by him that the responsibility in connection with this tremendous work should be thrown upon the shoulders of some one person who would look after it and see that it went all right. Well, it was a pretty stiff task for the fellow who undertook the work. The powers of the Government, for the purposes of the administration of the Overseas Military Force, were vested in him. He had to stand all the hard knocks and overcome all the difficulties, to consider the aspirations of the officers, and to try if possible to satisfy the ambitions of some.

In many cases I admit that he failed in this regard. Sometimes one would almost feel after the day's work was over, on account of the miscellaneous character of the many things that came up for decision, that after the war was over he would have no friends at all left in Canada. The final court of appeal for the Government in respect to the overseas service was the minister. The task which I had to undertake would at any rate have been impossible so far as I am concerned had I not been fortunate in having men of ability associated with me, Canadians who were broad-minded and painstaking. I refer to the headquarters staff, who on behalf of Canada carried on this work in the city of London. All these men had seen active service in France and Belgium with the exception of a very few, and they were highly trained or technical men whose services could not be spared for service at the front. The members of the headquarters staff in London, both junior and senior, under our policy were, with these few exceptions, required to have served at least six months at the front; and, as I stated this afternoon, I was always being appealed to by headquarters officers to allow them to return to the front. The lot of the headquarters staff in London was unsatisfactory to them. The hours were long, frequently for seven days a week, and the work was performed under the most difficult and trying circumstances. I was assisted by those gentlemen to such a degree that I feel that the manner in which this work was executed will appeal to the people of Canada as being both effective and efficient.

I am going to take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, of running over the names of some of the principal officers who have been on the headquarters staff in London, to whom I am indebted for assistance in carrying on this work.

The first Deputy Minister of Overseas Military Forces of Canada to be appointed was Colonel Walter Gow, of Toronto, who is well known, not only in legal, but in business circles in Canada and in many other parts of the world. Canada may consider herself extremely fortunate in having had the services placed at her disposal of a man of Colonel Gow's attainments.

Through overwork on different occasions, he became incapacitated for duty, and in these periods Colonel G. S. Harrington was acting deputy minister. Colonel Harrington is a barrister of Nova Scotia and the son of a barrister. He familiarized himself with the work in all its details to such an extent that when Colonel Gow retired he was well qualified to take up the work of deputy minister, and I appointed him to that position.

Lieut.-Colonel T. Gibson, D.S.O., who was formerly a partner of my hon. colleague, the President of the Privy Council, and later was connected with the Soo industries, had also a very wide experience in business affairs and possessed good legal attainments as well. He was about to return to Canada, having finished his duties in France, but when he was passing through London I asked him to stay and assist in carrying on the work at our headquarters. He consented, and I appointed him to the position of assistant deputy minister. His services have also been of very great value.

Major L. P. Sherwood is the secretary of our Overseas Military Council. He is the son of Sir Percy Sherwood, of this city, and, of course, well known here.

Colonel W. R. Ward, the accountant general, is a member of the permanent forces of Canada, and has always been considered a very efficient officer.

Lieut.-General Sir Richard Turner, V.C., D.S.O., is a man of the very highest character and integrity. He won the Victoria Cross and the Distinguished Service Order as a young man in South Africa, and those who served with him there are never tired of telling of his bravery. He also showed great gallantry at the front in this war, where he commanded the 2nd Canadian Division, and when the overseas ministry was formed he was brought to London, and is now Chief of the General Staff there. He is beloved by the soldiers, and has always been recognized at the front as a very gallant officer.

Major W. Nickle, M.C., is General Turner's aide de camp. Major Nickle won the Military Cross at the front. He is the son of the hon. member for Kingston.

Lt.-Colonel C. M. Edwards, D.S.O., is a native of Ottawa and is well and favourably known in this city. He is on the General Staff.

Lt.-Colonel H. G. Mayes., M.B.E., was our Director of Physical Training, and his qualifications were considered of such a high order that the British Government asked us to loan him to them, and we acceded to the request.

Brigadier-General D. M. Hogarth, C.M.G., D.S.O., is the Quartermaster-General. If members of the House will take the trouble to examine the report of the Quartermaster-General's Branch they will see what splendid results have been attained through his efforts and those of his officers through the transactions we have had with the Belgian Government and with the Imperial Government in regard to the disposal of horses and stores, and very large sums of money have been saved for Canada because of his keen business insight.

Colonel K. C. Folger, D.S.O., is the Deputy Quartermaster-General. Any one who knows this part of the country would say he came from Kingston—and he does. He was a member of the Permanent Staff before he went overseas, and is a very efficient officer.

Lt.-Colonel E. C. Duffin, O.B.E., is also in the Quartermaster-General's Branch. He has splendid business qualifications and has accomplished excellent results in connection with the shipment of troops to Canada.

Lt.-Colonel S. M. Bosworth assisted the Quartermaster-General in connection with the embarkation of troops and the allotment of shipping space. He is in charge of ocean and rail transport under the Quartermaster-General. He is a son of the president of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services.

Colonel T. A. Simson, C.M.G., D.S.O., is a member of the Permanent Force, and after distinguished service at the front was brought back to take the position of Director of Supplies and Transport.

Lt.-Colonel C. M. Ruttan, D.S.O., belongs to Winnipeg, as his name would indicate, and is a most capable officer in the Supply Branch.

Major-General P. E. Thacker, C.M.G., D.S.O., is the Adjutant-General, and any comments I might make as to his qualifications can be easily understood when one realizes the smoothness with which demobilization has proceeded. It was his duty with the help of the officers under him to work out the scheme of demobilization overseas.

Colonel F. S. Morrison, D.S.O., also of the Permanent Force, is Deputy Adjutant General, and two assistants are Lt.-Colonel E. W. Pope, son of Sir Joseph Pope, of Ottawa, and Lt.-Colonel G. H. Cassels, son of Mr. Justice Cassels, of the Exchequer Court.

Colonel A. L. Hamilton, C.M.G., Director of Records Overseas, is responsible for the system of documentation and records. Having been manager of one of our banks in Canada, he conceived the idea of a clearing house for documents in each of different areas. Through the working out of that system we have brought order out of what at one time might have resulted in chaos had the procedure on demobilization not been systematized and put in better shape.

Major Hume Blake, grandson of the late Hon. Edward Blake, is a Deputy Assistant Adjutant General.

Major-General G. L. Foster, C.B., is the Director-General of Medical Services. He won distinction at the front where he was in charge of the medical service of the Canadian Corps and was brought back for this position at Headquarters. The Deputy Director-General of Medical Services is Brigadier-General H. S. Birkett, C.M.G., Dean of the Medical Faculty of McGill University, Montreal; who is well-known throughout Canada.

The Paymaster-General is Brigadier-General J. G. Ross, C.M.G., a member of a firm of well-known chartered accountants in Montreal.

The General Auditor is Honorary Colonel L. A. Dowie. He is a very excellent chartered accountant who has given his services to the country during the period of the war.

The Judge Advocate General is Colonel R. M. Dennistoun, C.B.E., now judge of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba. He is in London straightening out many matters in connection with the final demobilization of the troops to Canada.

Major-General A. McDougall, C.B., Brigadier-General B. R. Hepburn, C.M.G., and Colonel G. V. White, C.B.E., have been responsible for carrying out the timber operations, to which I referred this afternoon, in France and in England.

Lt.-Colonel G. S. Robertson, a barrister of Nova Scotia, is in charge of the Estates Branch, and has had to do with something like 300,000 wills of soldiers.

I have run over these names hurriedly because I wanted the House to know the personnel of the Headquarters Staff in London. I want to make this observation: if I wanted men in any business with which I was connected, I should consider myself very fortunate indeed if I could select, on the average, men as intelligent, as efficient, and of as high a class as these. These men are chiefly civilian soldiers; their practices in law and in medicine and their businesses for the most part—I speak whereof I know—have entirely gone from them. Some of them are in middle-life and will find it very difficult to take up the threads again when they return. They have asked me repeatedly since the armistice was signed to be allowed to go home. My answer invariably has been: "Do you propose to leave me alone here on this demobilization problem? You are not working for an individual, for a corporation, even for a Government." I appealed to them on the ground that they were working for a country which they loved; for the best country in the world; and the answer has always been: We will stick to this job, no matter what the consequences may be, until the last soldier is back in Canada. The sacrifices made by these men in carrying out this work for their country will, I am sure, be recognized by the people of Canada; they will be thanked for it in some manner at the proper time in the future.

I have simply referred hurriedly to the Headquarters Staff in London. I do not by any means ignore or overlook the splendid officers who have served in France and in the various areas in England. The services rendered by these magnificent men who have served Canada so nobly both in the Canadian Corps and in connection with the other formations outside the Corps have been invaluable. They will not have to stay overseas as long as the Headquarters Staff will, but I repeat that they have rendered splendid service. However, their numbers are so great that I cannot very well take up the time of the House on this occasion in referring to all of them.

We endeavoured, as far as we could, for the sake of economy, to keep the staff down as low as was consistent with efficiency. In the Chief of the General Staff's Branch, the Adjutant-General's Branch, and the Quartermaster-General's Branch, and the Assistant Military Secretary's Branch, the number of officers and other ranks decreased as we systematized the work and improved it, as we always try to do, in the light of past experience. On December 1, 1916, the number of officers in these branches was 134, and of other ranks, 566. On November 11, 1918, the staff had been reduced to 61 officers and 319 other ranks, although the work was somewhat heavier.

I do not think I need say anything more on that point. The matter is one which is very close to my heart. I want to say to this House and to the people of Canada that the men who have served overseas both in France and at Headquarters in England are as faithful and as honest a lot of men as could be found, and I believe they have served their country from the very highest motives of patriotism.

I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who believe that Canada still has a big war problem on her hands, and that in the solution of that problem patience and confidence will be required. On the one side there are the men who have returned and who naturally find it difficult to accustom themselves to peace conditions, to get back into the ordinary occupations of civil life, after having been employed for long periods in something so entirely different. Then, there is the natural anxiety on the part of the men about a livelihood for themselves and their families and the difficulties which they will have to overcome in this regard. As I have said, I have not a word of criticism to make regarding these men. I have been amongst them in their camps; I have been with them on ships on several occasions, and I believe that notwithstanding the hardships they have endured and the things they have gone through while killing the Huns, they are just the same Canadians as they were, and their hearts are in the right place. The whole situation requires to be handled with patience and forbearance. It is our duty, the duty of all the men and women of Canada, to assist in solving the problem which is on our hands with respect to re-establishing our soldiers and finding, as far as we can, suitable employment for every one of them.

On the other side there is the problem of absorption. These men cannot be treated in the same way that men were treated in peace time, when conditions were normal and there was work for all. They took up the great cause for Canada and for those who were unable to go. The Government is doing everything that is possible to help employment, but the Government cannot do everything. It requires the co-operation of every citizen, who must realize that a distinct obligation rests upon his or her shoulders, and employers particularly must deal with the situation in a most sympathetic and practical way. This requires patience, and we must keep the word "patience" constantly in mind; patience is the watchword now for all. In making these observations I have in mind the returned soldier problem, and not another situation which has developed and which is outside of the soldier problem altogether.

Canada has surpassed herself in what she has been able to accomplish thus far, so let us not fail at the end in solving still more difficult problems. If the best results are to be secured and if we are not to be handicapped in our effort at this time, there must be confidence between all classes, confidence also in a commercial sense to enable us to keep the wheels of commerce and industry moving in order that there may be, under such conditions, a maximum of opportunity for employment. A lack of confidence would at this time be irreparable. We want employment for the soldier, indeed for everybody, and one of the worst things that could happen to this country would be the development of a lack of that mutual confidence upon which commerce and industry depend.

We must realize that the war has made a new world. It certainly has made a new Canada, a very different Canada from what it was before the war. It is necessary not only for the soldier to fit himself into new conditions, but for the whole Canadian people to fit themselves into new conditions and to understand what the new conditions mean. Of all the soldiers who crossed the seas from different parts of the world to take part in this war, none of them has a better country in every sense of the word to return to than Canada's soldiers. This is not a mere commonplace statement, for our soldiers have learned what the habits of the people are in other places than Canada, and the more we have seen of conditions as they exist in other places, the more impressed from every point of view have we become of the magnificence of the country which is our heritage. I will not detain the House any longer at this time. I feel very gratified at the attentive and courteous manner with which hon. members on both sides of the House have listened to my somewhat lengthy remarks.

In closing, let me say that I understood to a great extent the responsibilities which I was assuming when after some misgivings I accepted the task of administering the overseas forces of Canada. The task was a difficult one; it taxed all my energies, but I would venture to say this, that I was always desirous of, and always aimed at, administering the overseas forces in such a manner as would meet with the approval of the Canadian people, once they were in a position to understand all the circumstances.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I will not detain the House at very great length after the exhaustive statement which has been made this afternoon and evening by the hon. gentleman (Sir Edward Kemp). I am sure that all the members of the House will join with me when I offer my sincere congratulations to the hon. gentleman for the calm and moderate manner in which he has presented to the House the facts in regard to his two years' administration overseas. I am glad to see him back in his seat restored to health, and ready, I am sure, at all times, to give the House further explanation when such be required from him after his very interesting report has been fully digested by hon. members.

I fully agree with what was stated by my hon. friend as regards the bravery of our soldiers in the field, as regards the officers who, from day to day, since the first contingent crossed the seas, led our soldiers on to victory. Every Canadian is proud of the record of our men overseas, and if at times there were criticisms, they were aimed, not at the men fighting in Flanders, but rather at officials far away behind the lines, and the object of those criticisms was to give the country a better military administration so that the soldiers generally might benefit by it.

My hon. friend, in closing his remarks, had to admit that the returned men were somewhat upset as they came back to Canada. We all agree that after the strain of this long and terrible war, men's minds are naturally upset. But, Sir, the Government must not abdicate even if they are facing a crisis. Amongst the belligerents no Government in the old world has abdicated, and assuredly the United States Government has not abdicated its authority because the war is ended and because an economic crisis is passing over the world.

Returned soldiers, and the working men of this country generally, are not satisfied with the Government, because it has not been able to grapple with the situation. The soldier especially is upset and angry at the Government because on his return to Canada, after having been promised—both before and during the war—a better world in which to live, he finds that a few picked men have been rolling in gold for the four years of the war, while at the same time for the workers the cost of living has become simply unbearable. That is the chief cause of the unrest throughout this country. It is all very well to send a roving commission from Vancouver to Halifax to learn for this Government what is the cause of the unrest. Why, the cause is as clear as the sun is in Heaven. It is first, the high cost of living to the poor, and second, the immense and scandalous fortunes made by the profiteers during the war. That is the cause of the trouble, that is the cause of the clash in Winnipeg, in Regina, in Edmonton, in Vancouver, and possibly to-morrow in Toronto. The Government might just as well send a wire to the commissioners of whom mention was made this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman, to stop stirring up trouble, because so far, they are only ventilating the grievances of the poor people. Let the Government themselves tackle the difficulties which are in the way.

Sir, we are passing through an economic crisis, the worst we have ever seen, and yet the Government, although we have now been in session three months, has not yet given evidence of a desire to afford relief to the suffering community. I say it is a scandal that the Budget has not yet been made public, that the changes in the fiscal policy have not yet been announced. We have been here since the 20th of February and we are still marking time, while the storm has been gathering from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Is the Government going to wait until there are Soviets in every industrial centre? Let the Government assert its authority, but first of all let it table before this House its fiscal policy for meeting the economic wants of the people. That is what I have to say to my hon. friend the Minister of Overseas Military Forces. He uttered a truism a moment ago when he said that this world is not the same old world. The Government will learn that to its cost. The people are tired of listening to rhetoric; they want action and facts. They want a policy which will relieve them from their growing sufferings. The people will never understand why Canadian butter is selling cheaper in Liverpool and London than it is selling in the city of Ottawa. And, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people, during the last four years, have shown that they were able to face any situation with courage and fortitude. The Canadian people have accepted without murmur through those dark days the drastic laws and Orders in Council of the Government; they have accepted an increase of 7½ per cent in the tariff imposed under the flimsy pretext of a war measure. But the Canadian people cannot understand why the levy on the incomes of the rich people was only paltry when it should have been substantial. The taxation is unequal. It bears too heavily on the poor, too lightly on the millionaires, and that is why, Sir, there is passing through this country a wave of unrest which threatens the future of Canada.

Coming back to the administration of the overseas military forces, while I agree with most of what the minister has said regarding the conduct of our soldiers and the patriotism and intelligence of our officers, I am bound to say that in his statement he has overlooked many things; and he cannot plead ignorance. In his absence some of the leading officers of the Canadian army have spoken through the press and in the legislatures of Canada, and the sentiments expressed by those officers have been voiced on the floor of this House by some hon. gentlemen. Surely the hon. gentleman has taken notice of those statements. Yet, in his long but interesting statement this afternoon and evening he made no reference whatever to the very serious charges which were made by those gallant officers against the administration overseas. I hasten to say to my hon. friend that those gallant officers were not members of the Liberal party, but both—one a member of the Ontario Legislature, and the other of the Quebec Legislature—leading lights in the Tory party of Toronto and Montreal respectively. I know the minister is too pious to read modern novels, but surely he reads Hansard during his absence from this House, and he must have read in the debate on the Address a speech by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). A speech of the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) is always as good as a novel. At the opening of this session that hon. gentleman—the ex-colleague and friend of the minister—delivered a long speech, in which he made a most vigorous charge, indeed, a series of charges against the administration of my hon. friend overseas. He even went so far as to attack, shall I say savagely—but at least to attack without gloves the commander of the Canadian troops? I leave the whole responsibility for that savage attack on the shoulders of my hon. friend from Victoria; but I do think that in fairness and in justice to the Canadian commander my hon. friend the Minister of Overseas Military Forces (Sir Edward Kemp) should have taken up the quarrel of General Currie and defended him against the attacks of a gentleman who was his colleague for many years in the Government and his predecessor in the Department of Militia and Defence. The hon. minister is more in a position to know about those charges than your humble servant, Mr. Speaker.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: May I interrupt the hon. member to say that I expressed my unbounded confidence in General Currie and my appreciation of him during the time I was on my feet.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Which means, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has no confidence at all in the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), and that—

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Not at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —far from appreciating, he is depreciating the hon. member.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I only spoke of General Currie. The hon. member can place what interpretation he chooses upon my words.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As we say in law, the inclusion of one means the exclusion of the other.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Well, I am not a lawyer.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I might repeat the adage in Latin. However, it is a well known principle of Roman law that the inclusion of one means the exclusion of the other. I am sorry that the member for Victoria is not in his seat. He ought to be here to hear what my hon. friend has to say about this appreciation of General Currie and depreciation of himself. Coming to the charges made by General Smart, Colonel Pratt and Colonel Price, I must express regret at the fact that my hon. friend has ignored them. I do not assert these charges myself. I do no take the responsibility for them; I have not been overseas. But I happen to know one of those officers. I know Brigadier-General Smart is a highly respected citizen of Westmount. He is a public man and needs no certificate of character from me. He his well known in Montreal and throughout the province of Quebec. He served his King and country on the field most gallantly since the beginning of the war, and yet Mr. Speaker, when he came back—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have not attempted to draw the line at all closely, but I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that it is a well-known rule that an hon. member cannot refer to a previous debate in the same session.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, I am answering the statement made by my hon. friend about his administration of the Department of Militia overseas, and I am giving as an argument against that administration what has been stated by well-known officers of the Canadian militia. I think, Mr. Speaker, I am in order. I am not rehashing an old debate, but am simply refuting a statement—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not prevented the hon. member from referring to the fact that there has been a debate, but that is as far as he can go. He is about to cover the same ground again, which he cannot do. The debate is upon record.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the hon. minister chooses to ignore the very serious charges which have been made against his department, let it be known that no light will be shed by the Government on this important question. However, Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling as usual.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member can make these charges himself on his responsibility as a member of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend will not charge me with cowardice, I suppose. I would make a charge if I had personal knowledge of the thing to which I refer. I said when I brought the matter up before the House that I had no personal knowledge of the facts, but I take the word of those gallant officers. Two of them are well known to my hon. friend. Does he refuse to take the word of Colonel Price and of Colonel Pratt? I do not know them personally, but they wear the King's uniform, and I respect their word. They were not playing politics; they were simply passing judgment on the administration of what is generally known as Argyll House.

Is my hon. friend, then, not surprised to find on the return of the responsible minister, after these charges having been made publicly in the legislatures, in the press, and on the floor of Parliament, that he should completely ignore them? I am sure that the robust faith of my hon. friend in the minister and in the Government generally is very seriously shaken by that very ominous silence of the minister. Suppose these charges had been laid at the door of my hon. friend. Do you think for one moment that he would have remained silent? Oh, no. He is too restless for that; he would at once have risen in his place and would have courted an investigation. He would at least have denied the charges. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the minister has absolutely ignored the charges. He has not courted an investigation. Indeed, it is as though General Smart, Colonel Price and Colonel Pratt did not exist at all. Now, Sir, since I cannot go into these charges again—accepting your ruling in the matter—I must say that I was surprised to find that in the elaborate statement made by my hon. friend, he did not even mention the name of Colonel Bruce. The hon. minister paid a glowing tribute, to which I subscribe, to our Canadian doctors and nurses. But, Sir, Colonel Bruce has laid a terrible indictment, not against the medical administration, but against the fussiness of Argyll House in the medical organization in England.

It is well known to-day that there is in the possession of the minister somewhere, hidden on the shelves of his department, or in the Government's possession, a report from Doctor Bruce in answer to the Babtie report. Yet my hon. friend will not refer to it, or will not make it public, because forsooth if the report were published it would be very damaging to the reputation of Argyll House.

There is another report, if I am well informed, which is even more damaging than the Bruce report. I am told, on good authority, that Lieutenant-Colonel Jenkins, of Toronto, appointed to investigate the financial administration of the Medical Service, found a leakage of at least $10,000,000, and so reported. But he has been eliminated, the report has disappeared, and it is as if there was no Jenkins, no report, and above all no leakage. Well, Sir, this is a public question; it has been aired in the press all over Canada. When the hon. gentleman returned some days ago—and we were all pleased to see him back because, after all, he is not a bad fellow—he was asked if he had that report, and after much hesitation—and it looked as if his conscience was balancing between his extreme partyism and his usual honesty of purpose—he emitted a few words. I read his remarks next day in Hansard, and I could not find out whether Colonel Jenkins existed or not; at all events the answer was typically vacillating and uncertain. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman should once for all make a frank confession. Nobody will accuse him of having pocketed the $10,000,000; but the people of this country are interested in knowing whether or not that report exists; and when its existence is no more in doubt, public opinion will force the Government to grant us an investigation. My hon. friend found some unrest upon his arrival in Canada. He finds that the soldiers are upset after four years of war. It is such facts as those I have mentioned which tend to upset the minds of the soldiers. The soldier fought for a dollar a day during a period of four years.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: One dollar ten.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He left the administration of the country in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. The soldier was asked to vote for the Government that would send him reinforcements, and upon his return he finds that there are very serious leakages in connection with the administration of public funds. That is, Sir, one of the many causes of the existing unrest. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been rolling in millions since the beginning of the war. Now the time has come to render an account of their stewardship, and we, the representatives of the people, are here to see that the will of the returned men is given effect to.

Another question which is of interest to the country is that of the riots which occurred overseas. It is too bad that, under the rules of the House, I cannot refer to what three Canadian officers stated in public letters and speeches, because the officers in question all declared that these riots were not confined to Rhyl, but that they took place in almost every camp where Canadians were congregated. We are also informed that riots even took place in the Canadian camps in France after the signing of the armistice. Have we obtained any satisfactory explanation from the hon. gentleman as regard the trials which have taken place in England as a result of those riots?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Does the hon. gentleman refer to Canadian camps in France?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, camps in England.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think my hon. friend referred to riots that had taken place in France.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In Canadian camps?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, and I made the statement previously in the House. I am informed that in the Third Division the men refused to obey the command that had been given them. When they were told that they would be sent to help in maintaining order in industrial centres in England they refused to obey the command, and that was the cause of a riot in the Third Division in France. That is the information we on this side have received, and yet nothing has been said in regard to it by my hon. friend. Now some of our men have been killed during the riots that have taken place in England, and others have been sent to jail and are still in dungeons. My hon. friend has been silent on this point. The public wants to be reassured about those facts. Many causes have been assigned for the riot at Rhyl, but there were riots in other camps as well, yet my hon. friend did not refer to them. He paid a glowing tribute to the officers surrounding him at Argyll House, but what has he to say about the men in the camps? My hon. friend stated, and I agree with him, that it was rather a difficult to transport so many hundred thousands of soldiers immediately the armistice was signed. I agree with him, but dissatisfaction at not being returned to Canada sooner was not the only cause of riots. There was a motion on the Order Paper in the name of my hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) purporting to mention the causes of all the riots. I cannot refer to that motion because it has been the subject of a previous debate. I am very sorry that my lips are sealed, but I would draw my hon. friend's attention to Hansard. There he will find the motion recorded and he can peruse it during his leisure hours because he has nothing to do now on this side of the Atlantic; his friend sitting behind him (Major-General Mewburn) is doing the whole work in the Department of Militia. Let my hon. friend read the charges made by the ex-Minister of Militia and he will find they call for action. He owes it to our soldiers, he owes it to all our men, to see that justice is done them.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have from my hon. friend a fuller explanation of the Siberian Expedition. The Government acted without thought in this matter. To show its lack of judgment, in a moment of frenzied enthusiasm it decides to send many thousand young Canadians to Siberia. The people are not consulted, the matter is rushed through by Order in Council. Then suddenly we learn after the expedition has reached Siberia that we must bring our boys back. How much has that expedition cost Canada, and who is responsible for that Siberian folly?

Major-General MEWBURN: The Kaiser.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You mean the present Government. No one but the Kaiser or the present Government would have told those young men that they would be sent to Siberia whether or not they were willing to go; and many were sent away against their will. The Kaiser! Yes, the Canadian Kaiser did it.

My hon. friend spoke about our Aviation Corps. There are tales about those young Canadians which are simply heartrending. It is almost past belief that after the armistice hundreds of those heroic young Canadian aviators were passing the hat around in the streets of London because they had not the means to return to Canada. To obtain the privilege of reaching Liverpool to embark for Canada they had to pay with their own blood money some Shylocks who extorted commissions from them when they applied for tickets. Is that a charge emanating from me, Mr. Speaker? No; it emanates from the friends of the Government, from returned officers who made the statement publicly. And yet my hon. friend has made no reference to it.

I would like to put a question to my hon. friend, which I hope he will answer in good faith, as usual. Has he read the charges made by Brigadier-General Smart, by Colonel Price and by Colonel Pratt, and does he intend to answer those charges?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I understand that those charges have been already answered.

Major-General MEWBURN: In full.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: So far as I am concerned I never read those charges.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But you intend to read them now?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, I do not. I have something better to do.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Very well. I will report that to Brigadier-General Smart, to Colonel Price and to Colonel Pratt, and we may hear further from them.

My hon. friend has not given to the House a full explanation in regard to the Jenkins' Report. I would like from him a more apparently sincere explanation than the one he gave when he first appeared in the House on his return from England. Does that Report exist? Did he not receive it? And if he received it, why does he not make it public? It should be public property. Colonel Jenkins acted for Canada and was paid by Canada, and I do not see why, even if his Report is against the administration of my hon. friend overseas, it should not be made public. Let us have responsible Government, Mr. Speaker. It is the first time in the history of this Parliament that public reports, signed by officials, reports such as those made by Dr. Bruce and Colonel Jenkins—if the latter report exists—have not been brought down to the House. Have we abdicated our rights and functions as a Parliament? Are we going to be told that because a report is adverse to the Government it shall not be made public? I hope my hon. friend will seriously consider the matter and speak the truth and the whole truth about these two reports.

SUPPLY.

FISHERIES ESTIMATES—STATEMENT BY HON. MR. BALLANTYNE.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Fisheries—Salaries and Disbursements of Fishery officers and Guardians, Fisheries Patrol Service, and Oyster Culture, $600,000.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, without wishing to detain the members of the Committee, I think it might be interesting to hon. members if I made a very brief reference to the fisheries of Canada and to the reorganization that it is proposed to put into effect. In order that I may be accurate, if hon. members will allow me I will read this brief memorandum that I have here and then they will better understand the Estimates which will be placed before them for consideration.

Reorganization of the Outside Service has not yet been effected, but a method of doing so has been worked out and approved by the Civil Service Commission. As soon as reclassification of salaries has been completed, steps will be taken to put the reorganization into effect. It is anticipated that the reorganized service will be in complete working order by the end of this calendar year. In broad lines, the reorganization will be as follows:

For the purposes of Fisheries administration, Canada will be divided into three sections, the fisheries of each of which are common in their character, viz:—The Atlantic Provinces; The Prairie Provinces; British Columbia.

Ontario and Quebec, so far as their inland waters are concerned, administer their own fisheries.

To assure the greatest possible co-ordination of the administrative service and the closest and most direct supervision, and at the same time to provide that those engaging in the industry may be in the closest possible contact with the Department, each of these sections will be placed under the charge of a Chief Inspector of Fisheries, through whose office all the work of that division will be carried on. District Inspectors will be continued as at present. Local overseers will be employed, but instead of having a large number of them with small districts and insignificant salaries, so that they must engage in other work to make a living, each overseer will have as large a district as he can efficiently handle, and he will be required to devote his whole time and attention to his work. He will be paid a reasonable salary. The amount has not yet been fixed by the Commission.

Special guardians will have to be employed in some instances at certain times of the year, particularly to protect fish on the spawning grounds in the rivers. But no greater number of such guardians will be employed than is absolutely necessary, and then only for such limited period as their services are really needed. In any instances where services are required for more than thirty days, advertisements will be published calling for applications for the position.

The lobster catch for 1918 fell very much below that for 1917. In fact it was little more than half the annual average of the catch of the four preceding years. This sharp decline should not, however, be too readily attributed to a scarcity of lobsters. The falling off was common on all parts of the coast, and a strong contributing cause will be found in the protracted spells of stormy weather and the abnormal ice conditions that prevailed last spring.

The total value of our fisheries for 1917 amounted to $52,312,044. This sum is more than $13,000,000 greater than the value of the fisheries for the previous year.

This brief statement will give hon. members some idea of what we are going to do. As we proceed with the Estimates I shall be very glad to give any further information that may be required.

Mr. CAHILL: Are new inspectors to be appointed to these new positions that are to be created? What will be their salaries. What commission does my hon. friend refer to when he says that the "commission" has not decided on the salary?

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We have a Chief Inspector of Fisheries in British Columbia, Colonel Cunningham, whose headquarters are at Vancouver. It will be necessary to appoint also a Chief Inspector for the Maritime Provinces. All such appointments will, of course, be made by the Civil Service Commission. The salary of Colonel Cunningham, whose responsibilities out there are very heavy and who has been with the department for many years, is $4,000 a year.

Mr. FIELDING: A large deputation waited on the minister recently and suggested some changes in the organization of the department. May I ask whether any progress has been made? Is that matter still under consideration?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member (Mr. Fielding) was present when the delegation from the Canadian Fisheries Association waited upon me. Some of the suggestions that this association made have already been acted upon. In my Supplementary Estimates I intend to ask for an amount for fishing tugs to patrol Lake Erie and to replace the steamer Vigilant, which formerly did that work. That was one of the suggestions that the association made. The most important suggestion that they made was that the fisheries of Canada should be in charge of a deputy minister who would give his whole time to that work, and that the present able deputy, Mr. Desbarats, should not act as deputy minister both for the Fisheries Branch and the Naval Service Branch. I agree with that recommendation, and I hope that before the next session of Parliament we shall have a deputy minister who will devote all his time to the fisheries. We intend also to employ a man who will give most of his time to the commercial side of the question, to the marketing of fish, and so on. The man I am looking for will be a bright young business man who will be able to study the markets of Canada as well as markets abroad, to look into the transportation question, and to advise the deputy minister and myself. While the volume of the fisheries of Canada is very large, a great deal more can be done, and now that the war is over an even more vigorous policy will be pursued than has been followed in past years.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the $100,000 increase chiefly for increased salaries and additional salaries to new appointees?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The appropriation is to provide for the necessary extensions of the service and for the reorganization to which I have referred; also, for salaries and for the appointment of further fishery officers. When my fishery Estimates were before the Committee last year I said that the number of guardians would be very much reduced. I am glad to inform the Committee that this has been done. In 1917 there were 806 guardians throughout Canada; during the past year that number has been reduced to 392, and we have employed them only for the length of time that we wanted them—for one month or two months, as the case might be. Their remuneration has been increased, and we ask that the service rendered be much better—in fact, that it be such as the appointments call for. Therefore, while the number of guardians has been reduced the remuneration to them has been increased, but the cost on the whole has been lessened. The total cost for guardians in 1917 was $94,-290.59, and this year, with an increased remuneration to guardians, it is only $80,-818.78.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that a new inspector is to be appointed for the Maritime Provinces. Is this appointment for the three Maritime Provinces, or is it only for one? What would the specific duties of this new official be?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Only one Superintendent of Fisheries will be appointed for all the Maritime Provinces, and it will be his duty to co-ordinate the work, to have full charge of the overseers and also of the guardians, and in a general way to be responsible to the department at Ottawa for all of the Maritime fisheries. I think such an appointment will prove to be a good one. It has worked so in British Columbia, and since I have had the honour of being Minister of Fisheries, I have done my utmost to run the department free from politics and to put it on a good business basis. I do not claim to have done wonders, but my sincere desire is to get the best men we can, and to place the fisheries of Canada on an even better footing than at present and to expand them.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister has stated that he is looking for salesmen in the interests of the fisheries of the country. Has he in mind that the increased expenditure will in any way reduce the high cost of living, or if it will decrease the price of fish to the Canadian consumer?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have in mind just exactly what the hon. member has, namely, that we shall induce the public to eat more fish, and I hope the cost of fish will also go down. The problem is, however, a very large one.

Mr. CAHILL: What are the minister's hopes based on?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: On this, that we are going to have a publicity department and to do far more advertising than has been done in the past. We intend getting out very attractive booklets about the various kinds of fish, how they may be cooked, how palatable they are and all that sort of thing, just the same as a live business concern would do. We also hope to have more steam trawlers put in use than there are in use at present, and as the volume of the output of the fisheries of Canada is increased, the cost ought to decline. But I will make no promises in that regard, because the problem is too big a one for a minister to state definitely that he can reduce the cost. We will do everything we can to reduce it, and we can only hope we shall be successful.

Mr. CAHILL: I should like to know whether the Government or the minister in charge has in mind the high cost of living in this country. Every minister who has brought up his Estimates so far has had an increase in them. The minister now tells us that he has cut off some 400 inspectors and other employees of one kind or another, and yet in face of that he is asking us for an increased expenditure of $100,000. Every minister seems to be heading in the same direction of increased expenditure and of making positions for his friends. New positions in unlimited numbers are being created from day to day, but so far no minister has told us that he is endeavouring to decrease the cost of living, or that he is thinking at all about the people. It is all very well for us to vote away the people's money, $600,000 in salaries including an increase of $100,000 over last year, which will in all probability increase the cost of living to the Canadian consumer, and the minister tells us frankly that he has in mind no plan that will decrease the cost. It would be very much better for the Government to spend that $100,000 in endeavouring to find some way of furnishing fish to the Canadian consumer at lower prices than those of to-day. But if the Government wishes to consider only the commercial interests of the country, without any regard to the consuming public, we shall continue along in the same direction in which we are now going and get in deeper all the time. All the Government seems to have in mind is to spend money to do business, but that money has to be paid some day, and the ministers should turn their attention to the high cost of living and endeavour to reduce it to the poor people of this country instead of providing what are apparently political jobs for their friends. I take the minister's word when he says he is not letting politics enter into this thing, but apparently, all the ministers say the same thing and they have all found a way of creating new positions at high salaries.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I should not want the hon. member to think that this expenditure is for fishery officers alone; it is for the fishery patrol service and for oyster culture. It might interest the hon. member to know that the price of fish has very materially dropped since the armistice was signed, but I do not take any credit for that. If this new general sales manager, or publicity man, or whatever you like to call him, is the kind of man I hope we shall get, he will be able to look into transportation charges and all that kind of thing in order that fish may be delivered to fish dealers at the lowest possible cost. It is quite probable that the cost of fish will continue to go down, and we want to take advantage of meat unfortunately being as high as it is and fish low to increase the consumption of fish and to educate the people more in the use of it. As regards the consumer, the hon. member will, I am sure, understand that I as well as every other member on this side of the House have the consumer in mind as much as our friends on the other side. No one knows that better than my genial friend the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who knows that the consumer is always the apple of our eye.

Mr. FIELDING: The curious feature of the problem is that while there has been a very perceptible reduction in the cost of fish in the wholesale trade, that reduction does not seem to reach down to the retail trade. Everybody in the wholesale trade will tell us that the cost of fish is so much lower than it was, that many fish merchants have incurred very heavy losses, but the price to the consumer in the retail shop does not vary very much.

Mr. MORPHY: With reference to the transportation of fish to the retailer from the sea, is there a refrigerator service provided for in the minister's estimates?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: Is there any increase for that so as to enlarge the service? That is one of the things that Canada requires more than anything else.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will come to that in a moment, if the hon. member will wait.

Mr. LOGGIE: For the inland trade of the Dominion of Canada it is very important that refrigeration on express cars be provided. I do not think the fresh fish business can be properly undertaken and the inland market supplied unless we have a better system of transportation by express. In the winter season the goods are shipped in a frozen condition, and after being in a heated car for twenty-four hours they arrive at Montreal and Toronto in an almost unsaleable condition, if they have to be kept any time. The moment the frost comes out of frozen fish, the fish should be immediately consumed; otherwise, it deteriorates in value. I do not think the transportation of frozen fish by express can be undertaken in less than carload lots unless some refrigeration is provided. To encourage the transportation of fish from the sea coast to our inland cities there should be express transportation every day in the week. When it comes to delivering fish by freight in carload lots the fish can be landed in good order in Toronto in the summer season, but in the winter season you cannot bring a box of fish from the seaboard to Toronto and deliver it in good condition. In the summer the fish is packed in ice, and even if the ice melts, it is not very material, but even in the summer season there should be some portion of the car which could be cooled by salt and ice, and then the fish would arrive in much better condition than it does at the present time.

Mr. CAHILL: Are these salaries fixed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Under the re-classification they will be.

Mr. CAHILL: But they are not now? What salaries do you expect to pay to these inspectors?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not know what the re-classification will provide. I have in mind myself what would be a fair salary, but the fixing of the salary is outside my jurisdiction. We shall have to wait and see in what class the officers are put.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have been informed by some of the inspectors that when a guardian is to be appointed tenders for the position are invited, through notice being put up in the different districts. These tenders are sent to Ottawa, where the selection is made. I submit that it would be difficult for the minister or any of his officers, unless they had some private information, to select a guardian for the district of Cape North, for instance, in the county of Victoria, if half a dozen or more applications came in from that district from men all of whom were worthy citizens and would discharge the duties of the office equally well. Perhaps the minister will explain how the right person to be appointed is determined when only one man is to be selected out of a dozen applicants.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The commission form their opinion as to the proper man to select, largely, I presume, upon the recommendation of the local overseer or the inspector of fisheries for the district, they are not bound by that recommendation, but it is always passed on to them.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I do not think that is the way in which it is being done, but if the minister says so, I do not like to contradict him. I think it would be a very good arrangement if the local fishery officer had absolute power to appoint his own men without interference from the department in any way. If he is made responsible for the district of which he is overseer and can select his own men, much more efficient service will be rendered than if the appointments are made for political reasons as they have been in the past. Is it a fact that there is no interference on the part of the department in making these appointments, and that the local fishery officer has been informed that he has absolute power to make the appointment, and that the department will stand behind that appointment when it is made?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member is quite right. The Civil Service Commission was so congested with business during the past year that the guardians were appointed by the local officers. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the way he suggests is the proper way and in so far as I have any influence it shall be used in that direction.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are we then to understand that in future the rule will be that the fishery officer for the district will make these appointments independent of the department and of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No, I am sorry to say. If a guardian is wanted for less than thirty days the local officer can make the appointment, but if the appointment is for a longer time the position must be advertised, the local officer makes his recommendation to Ottawa, and it is passed on to the Civil Service Commission, who make the appointment.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How is the Civil Service Commission to decide who is the best man when there are half a dozen applications for the position? I could understand how the local officer could pick the right man, but how the Civil Service Commission can do it is difficult for me to understand, when the applicants live a thousand miles away and the Commission knows nothing about them. Will the minister explain how it is done?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Before the Civil Service Commission took over the making of appointments, I stated on the floor of this House, last year when my Estimates were up, that I intended to leave all local appointments to the chief fishery officer in the various districts. Now, when there are several applicants for the same position, the local officer makes his recommendation to the Fisheries Department here as to the one he thinks most competent for the position, that recommendation is passed on to the Civil Service Commission, and as a rule is acted on by them, although they are not bound to do so.

Mr. McMASTER: When last year the Minister of Marine and Fisheries promised a reduction in the number of fishery inspectors or guardians we on this side of the House gave him a well merited meed of applause. The minister has succeeded in doing what he said he would do. The House and the country should feel grateful to him, and I am sure they both do.

But the minister brings before the Committee to-day an item in his Estimates providing for an increase over last year of $100,000. I have listened very carefully to the discussion which is taking place to-night but have not been able to satisfy myself that the minister has made out a case for this increase. He shows us that in one substantial portion of this item he has effected a diminution in the personnel of the section of his department and an increase in salaries, which I think is perfectly right. I think that the public will be best served by having fewer and better paid officials. That is good business and common sense, and is, I am sure, what we want on both sides of the House. The minister was kind enough to refer to me and my desire to protect the consumer. He said that he as well as myself had an eye to the consumer all the time. It is true he has an eye to the consumer, perhaps in the hope that the consumer's prosperity will enable him to get a little increase in price for what he has to sell to him. On this side of the House I protect the consumer in the hope of seeing that he gets his goods at a little lower price. But we are both thinking of the consumer, and both hope to see him happy and prosperous. Seriously speaking, however, I would like to have the minister establish his case for this increase of $100,000; because it is a truism—it is trite and tiresome but I must emphasize the fact—that we have to cut our financial coat according to our financial cloth in this country, and there has been no attempt on the part of the Government to cut down the Estimates, as far as I have been able yet to perceive. It seems to me that the ordinary expenses of this country are going to be more than they were last year, and I think we are in a very serious position.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I want to assure the hon. member that I have no wares to sell. I formerly was in business, and when I get through with political life I shall devote all my time to my farming interests. Possibly, therefore, I have more interest in the consumer than the hon. member for Brome. But I want to say, with regard to the item, that the hon. member is quite right in asking for a little more information than I have given. The fishery service has been, I would not say deplorably weak, but it has been weak, and we are going to increase salaries of all those engaged in the fisheries of Canada. We shall engage fewer people and pay them better salaries. Then the patrol service has to be increased also, but I have an eye to the expenditure and hope to get a Bill through the House that will allow me to increase the revenue of Canada to the extent of $262,000. So that I trust there will be no deficit in administering the fisheries when the present fiscal year is closed. I am doing my best to reduce the cost as far as possible, and to increase the revenue and the efficiency at the same time. While the amount may seem large, I would like hon. members to realize the fact that the service was allowed to run down a little during the years of the war and we are now strengthening it. For this purpose we have to have more money for increases in salaries for fishery officers and also for patrol service. I can go into details of the patrol service if it is necessary. The money is also required in connection with oyster culture. With regard to the patrol service, in order that hon. members may have some idea of the extent of this work I may say that we have 38 boats that are owned by the department and 18 that are hired. On the Atlantic coast there are 15 owned by the department and 9 hired; on the Pacific, 22 owned by the department and 9 hired; on Lake Winnipeg, 1 owned by the department. These boats are engaged in preventing illegal fishing and are distinct from fisheries protection cruisers. I do not know that I can give more information than this, but if the money is voted we shall see that it is honestly disbursed.

Mr. KNOX: Is it the intention to improve or further develop the fishing industry in the lakes in the Prairie Provinces? In the northern parts of these provinces we have some very large lakes and almost an unlimited supply of fish. And in view of the fact that these lakes are situated so near some of the cities which at present are showing signs of unrest, due no doubt to the high cost of living, it might be well to devote some attention to the possibilities of further developing this industry.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am glad that the hon. member has drawn attention to this matter, for we are certainly going to do everything we can in regard to our Great Lakes.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Will the money that is to be spent on oyster culture be devoted to patrol work, or in what way is it to be expended?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There are three reasons why we want the money. We intend to increase the salaries of all officials, and we want it for the patrol service and also for oyster culture.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: In what way is the money to be spent in connection with oyster culture?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: On the recommendation of Mr. Ernest Kemp, who is a specialist on oysters, it is intended to keep the public beds in proper condition. For this purpose he has to have a boat. It will also afford information and advice to those going into private oyster culture; and, further, the Biological Board will assist very materially in a scientific way.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Can the minister say what proportion of the item will be used for that purpose?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Between $6,000 and $8,000.

Mr. TURGEON: The fisheries officer in the county of Gloucester died two or three months ago. The Civil Service Commission called for applications, and I know that a number of applications have been sent in. Has the appointment been made yet, and if so, who has been appointed?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The appointment has not yet been made but the matter is now before the commission.

Mr. CAHILL: It would be interesting to know how much of this money is to be spent on salaries, patrol service, oyster culture, and so on. The Committee would like to have an idea of what the different phases of this work cost, and what is the cost of the increase of the salaries to officials.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Salaries and disbursements for fishery officers in 1916-17 amounted to $305,000.

Mr. CAHILL: How much is it now?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I cannot say exactly now what the increase will be because we have to go carefully over the list of officers and see what increases in salaries they ought to receive. We have not yet done so. We are asking for the appropriation first and will carefully go over the list of officers afterwards.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will each officer get a share of the general increase?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Civil Service Commission will settle the wages. I hope there will be a general increase, because the fishery officers are very much underpaid at the present time. I hope that when the Civil Service Commission finally settle the matter they will give to these good and efficient officers, and on merit, the increase in salary they are entitled to.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are a great many officers in different parts of the country—I think they are called commissioners—who have a whole county, or more, to look after. They receive a small salary and their travelling disbursements are paid. Would the minister take the four counties of Cape Breton and tell us the salaries of the different officers there and how their travelling expenses compare with their salaries? Perhaps I should not trouble the minister to give the comparison for the whole island of Cape Breton, but let him take one county and give us some idea as to how these accounts stand as between salary and travelling expenses.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I think the hon. gentleman has reference to overseers, and in Inverness county there are eight. In Eastern Harbour the overseer gets a yearly salary of $120, and is allowed ten cents a mile for travelling expenses. In Kingsville, Mr. McLellan gets $50; in Pleasant Bay, Mr. McIntosh gets $75; and in Port Hood, Mr. John A. McDougall gets $150. These are overseers, not guardians.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister has given the salaries. I also wanted the amount paid these officers for travelling expenses, to see how the two amounts compare.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The many hundreds of overseers are allowed ten cents a mile for travelling expenses. I will endeavour to furnish the amount of travelling expenses, but I am sorry I have not the information before me at present.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not very particular about it, because I had occasion to make a private inquiry into the subject a couple of years ago, and I find that while the salaries are very small the accumulation of travelling expenses is getting very high. Some years ago I suggested to the minister that it would be far better for the country, and in the interest of honesty and integrity on the part of the officials, that they should be paid a fixed salary and do away with the pernicious system of inviting them to pad their accounts so as to get moneys to which they are not entitled.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I quite agree with the hon. member that the system is not a good one, and is liable to be abused in just the manner he states. However, we intend to do away with the system, and to give these fishery overseers a fixed amount for travelling expenses each year, a sum that would be fair and reasonable according to the district which they are covering—possibly about $200 per annum. The present system is open to criticism as the hon. gentleman has very well stated, and a dishonest fishery overseer could pad his travelling expenses. I will not say it has been done, but the possibility of doing so exists, and the system will be changed.

Mr. ROSS: I should like to get details if I can in regard to this item, which seems to be divided into three heads: Salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians; fisheries patrol service; and oyster culture. I would like the minister to tell the Committee how much was spent under each head last year, and how much he estimates is going to be spent under each head this year; also how many officers he had under the first head last year, and how many he expects to employ under the same head this year.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Under the heading of Salaries and Disbursements of Fishery Overseers, there was expended last year $305,000, and on the fisheries patrol service $190,000. The number of fishery guardians in 1917-1918 was 806, and this year the number is 392. The overseers in 1917-18 numbered 134, and we hope to greatly reduce them next year. The number of inspectors in 1917 was 24 and in 1918, 21. As to how we are going to divide the expenditure under the increase that we have asked for, that is a matter which will have to be determined in detail later on.

Mr. ROSS: What about oyster culture?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The expenditure for this purpose last year was $6,000.

Mr. ROSS: How much will it be this year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: As far as we can tell it will not be much more during the coming year than it was last year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister is apparently not doing very much to encourage oyster culture, and I regret exceedingly that he has made up his mind to stop the propagation of lobsters on the coast. I note that a few days ago a meeting of those interested in the fisheries of Canada took place in this city. Among the recommendations made at that meeting was one that some money should be spent in the propagation of lobsters and in the development of oyster culture. The minister was present and delivered a speech. In a general way he complimented the meeting for the interest those present were taking in the fisheries, and approved of their proposals, but he did not enter into details as to what the Government's policy would be. The minister will remember that when he took office a few years ago we had some twenty-seven establishments on the coast of the Maritime Provinces engaged in the propagation of lobsters, and many people thought they were doing a very good work. At a meeting of the Fisheries Committee of the House the year before last the action of the department in regard to lobsters was criticised very severely, and most of the members on the Committee from the Maritime Provinces were of the opinion that a mistake had been made in closing the lobster hatcheries without very much consideration. I am aware that in so doing the minister took the advice of a certain expert in Kingston, who professes to know a great deal about the propagation of lobsters. I have no doubt that theoretically the expert referred to is well informed, but like all these learned men, he does not know everything, and he may have been wrong in his conclusions as to lobster propagation. I am aware that there has been a dispute about it for some years. But the amount spent in the propagation of lobsters, if I remember correctly, was somewhere in the vicinity of $30,000 a year. It was not a very large amount, and it was the belief of many people on the coast that the money was well spent.

The minister will recollect that the Fisheries Committee did not approve of the course taken in regard to closing the lobster hatcheries the year before last on the advice of a certain professor from Kingston without consulting the members of the House, and the trade, and the people specially interested. At that meeting the minister said that he would call a general meeting at Halifax of those interested in the fisheries. The meeting was duly held, but the minister was not present. There was no united opinion at that meeting that the minister had taken the proper course, so far as I remember, in deciding to close the lobster hatcheries. The closing of those hatcheries was delayed by the minister until that meeting in order that he might secure some advice as to what ought to be done. I expected to see the minister himself present to get the views of the people of the Maritime Provinces, and I was sorry that he was not able to attend. I do not think that the advice given generally at that meeting would convince him that he had taken the right step in regard to the lobster hatcheries.

Since that date, without submitting the question to the Fisheries Committee or to the members of this House, I understand, the minister and his officers have decided to close the lobster hatcheries altogether, and offer them for sale—in fact a good many of them have been sold, but whether all or not, I do not know. I think it was rather an extraordinary step for the department to take without the consent of the representatives of the Maritime Provinces, many of whom, from my own personal knowledge, were not in accord with the move then made. If our advice is any good, we and the people we represent would like before a decided step like that is taken, to have at least an opportunity of discussing it and giving our views thereon. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction along the coast of the province from which I come in regard to the course the minister has taken.

I am quite well aware that there are two views in regard to hatcheries. No doubt if we could prevent the destruction of the seed lobsters we would not need these hatcheries. But the same is true in regard to the propagation of salmon and of trout and other fish. We are maintaining hatcheries in the other branches, why should we abandon them in the case of lobsters? The natural way of propagating salmon is, of course, the best way if it can be done, and, as I said before, the same is true of all the other varieties of fish. But it is difficult for me to understand why the minister has made a distinction in regard to the propagation of lobsters. Therefore I would like to have an explanation from him, although I expect it will be of very little service now that he has taken such decided steps to abandon the hatcheries.

I would also like to know what the minister has done in the way of preventing the destruction of the seed lobsters. The hatcheries were useful in that way. When the seed lobster was taken, the seed was preserved and placed in the hatcheries, and millions of these young lobsters were put in the water every year, which action, I have no doubt, helped to maintain the industry. But now we are back to the old system, and as far as I can learn on the coast there is no improvement in regard to the care taken of the mother lobster. If the minister does not intend to do something in that direction, I think he has made a decided mistake in abandoning the hatcheries.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I think we would make better headway if we took the items in the order they appear, and when we reach the item of fish breeding establishments I shall be glad to answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There is no item relating to lobsters at all.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hatcheries will come under vote I have referred to.

Mr. ROSS: I do not wish to be too persistent in regard to this item. But the minister told us that last year certain sums were allocated to salaries and to fisheries patrol service. Last year he asked $500,000, and this year he expects to spend $600,000 on oyster culture. That is increasing the vote by $100,000. I would like to know which of the items get the increase. The minister ought to be able to give us some idea of what these increases are going to be in each branch of the service.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: As far as the oyster beds are concerned, as they are controlled by the provincial governments, that will explain why the Federal authorities do not intend to spend any more than $600,000. I have as clearly as possible indicated that the $100,000 is for the salaries of the fishery officers and the patrol service; but to get down to the actual details of how much is for the patrol service and how much for the fishery officers is something I could not do until we had actually gone into the whole matter in detail. The first thing I must do is to try and get the members of the committee to give me $100,000 and then we will distribute it under these three headings. I could not tell to a dollar how much is going to be allocated to the patrol service and how much to the officers.

Mr. ROSS: Tell us to $10,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would expect the Fisheries Department to make a calculation of the amount of money needed. It is extraordinary that they should make up their minds to ask for $100,000 and yet not know what they are going to do with the money. That is not the business way of voting money. In a business concern, for instance, a bank, if salaries of the officers were to be increased, and $100,000 was required for that purpose, the directors would have a statement and would know just why the amount was required and what was going to be done with it. But it appears that in the fisheries office a lump sum of $100,000 is asked for, and afterwards the officials are going to consider what they will do with it.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member is quite right. I have been in business myself and know exactly how a body of shareholders would question a proposed increase of $100,000. They would want to know first of all what the directors were going to do with it. If I told them it was for fisheries patrol and for fishery officers they would naturally inquire further how much we expected to spend on increased patrols and how much on increased salaries. In round figures, as the hon. member has asked, it would be $60,000 for patrols and $40,000 for salaries. That is not absolutely accurate, but it is what we estimate it will be.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the cause of the great increase of $60,000 in patrols?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Because the service has been allowed to run down, due to the war, we have not had a sufficient protective service. Now that the war is over we are increasing the number of patrol vessels and officers to give the protection that we think the fisheries ought to have. We were not able to do that during war time.

Mr. McKENZIE: The coast lines of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia comprise a great many miles, and I do not see how one man can travel that distance during the short season of fishing and carry on this work with any degree of efficiency. If he had the whole year it would be different; but the fishing in the Maritime Provinces begins about the middle of May and ends some time in August, and one man could not inspect all the different fishery points during that period. I assume that the inspector will be supposed to examine the packs of lobsters, to see how the work is carried on in the lobster factories, to ascertain how the guardians are doing their work, and so on. It is absolutely impossible for one man to do that work. If it is necessary at all to have such an official there should be more than one; but I am not in favour of the idea, because if the right men are locally selected to do the work of fishery officers there will be no need of any one to oversee the work. The money that the minister expects to spend on this official would produce better results if given to local officers—not to guardians, but to inspectors and other officials throughout the several provinces. If he increased their salaries and imposed greater burdens upon them he would get more efficiency from his officers and better results generally.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I quite understand that it would be impossible for this officer to visit in a short time all the various fishery points in the Maritime Provinces, but he will do so gradually. We shall try to get a man who is familiar with conditions there and who will co-ordinate the work. According to the experience of the Chief Inspector of Fisheries in British Columbia, the move is a wise one. If one officer is not enough it may be necessary at the next session of Parliament to ask for another; but I am hopeful that one officer will be able to handle all the work. The inspectors in the Maritime Provinces now report to Ottawa; the intention is to have them report to the Chief Inspecting Officer for the Maritime Provinces and thus co-ordinate the work.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I want to mention a request that has been sent to me at various times by farmers living along the St. Mary river in Nova Scotia. Some years ago these farmers had the right to set nets once or twice a week half way across the river for the purpose of catching salmon for their own use. They appreciated this privilege, which had been enjoyed by their forefathers for generations. But the department decided that no more net fishing for salmon should be allowed in that river. Now, the farmer has not time to use a fly to catch salmon, as the sportsmen do. I sympathize with the minister's idea that the fishing in that river should be preserved; but the question is whether we are succeeding in doing it by our present method. The result of the present rigid method is that many of the people in that vicinity are turned into law-breakers. They take the ground that the salmon belongs to them, not to the sportsmen, because the river passes through their farms; that the right to catch these fish as I have described is an ancient right which they had for a long time and which should not have been taken away from them. They satisfy their consciences in this way, and they break the law by going out at night to catch the salmon. I do not believe it would injure the fishing in the river if once or twice a week, they were allowed to set their nets in certain places half way across the river and the law was rigidly enforced against any one who would sweep the river at night or violate the regulations. That is the proposal they have made to me, and their request would seem to be reasonable. I understand that that has been done in some rivers in New Brunswick. If it is true that farmers along certain rivers in New Brunswick are allowed to set nets under certain regulations, and if that practise is not injuring the fishing in those localities, I would like the minister to consider the advisability of extending a similar privilege to the farmers along the banks of the St. Mary river.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member is right so far as the St. John river is concerned; it is a much larger river than the St. Mary river. The regulations in respect to the latter are that there shall not be any net fishing above the ebb and flow of tidal waters. If the use of nets was ever permitted on that river, it must have been quite a number of years ago. I shall refresh my memory and find out how long ago that privilege existed.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The St. John river is a very long one, and in places it is not much larger than the St. Mary river. If this regulation applies to the whole of the St. John river, or to the upper waters of the St. John, it would be on all fours with the St. Mary river. I am aware that fishermen below tidal waters in the St. Mary river are allowed to set their nets. The peculiar thing about the matter is that the river below tidal waters is not very much wider and in some places no wider than it is above tidal water. But when we get to tidal waters, prohibition exists, and people living above are not allowed to set nets. If the St. John river is open all the way up, I would think there would be no distinction made between it and the St. Mary river. What effect has this had in the St. John river? Is it satisfactory or has it been injurious to the fishing? The contention of the people who make these representations to me is that it would be of advantage to the fishing; that there would not be so much violation of the law; that they would not be sweeping the river at night, because they are now prevented from catching any fish at all excepting by fly or by hook, as they are not allowed to use nets. It might be a good thing for the fishing in the river to permit this to be done. I should like to get the experience in New Brunswick.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The regulation covers only a portion of the St. John river from Fredericton to Andover, and that portion of the river, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, is quite large, while the St. Mary river is small. In any event, I will look into the matter and see what can be done.

Mr. COPP: I was not in the House a moment ago when my hon. friend was referring to oyster culture. I understood that only $6,000 is allowed for oyster culture. Does that extend throughout Canada or only in the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In the Maritime Provinces principally.

Mr. COPP: If the cultivation and protection of oysters is of any importance, the amount the minister is devoting to the work is very small. I hold in my hand a report made to the minister by some official of the department, and I notice that on page 17 it states:

> The position of the oyster industry in the Maritime Provinces is an extremely unsatisfactory one. There are in these provinces approximately 10,550 acres of producing natural beds, viz., 5,000 acres in New Brunswick, 4,300 in Prince Edward Island, and 1,250 in Nova Scotia, but there are tens of thousands of acres around the coasts of these provinces that by proper artificial culture and cultivation could be converted into highly producing oyster areas.

If that report means anything, it means that the minister is not taking the proper course in appropriating only $6,000 for oyster culture in the Maritime Provinces, because, as he knows, the beds have been depleted very materially in the past few years. It is almost impossible to get oysters at all, and they have practically tripled or quadrupled in price. If there are around the coast of these provinces tens of thousands of acres that could be converted into highly producing oyster areas, the minister, instead of increasing the vote in other respects, might very well give more to the cultivation of oysters.

11 p.m.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The reason I am not advocating spending more is because the provincial authorities control the oyster beds. The federal authorities are endeavouring to induce the provincial authorities to turn the oyster beds over to us, and if that is done, we shall be very glad to spend more money, but inasmuch as the provincial authorities control the oyster beds, the Federal Government cannot do very much.

Mr. COPP: If it is right and proper for the Government to spend $6,000 on beds belonging to the provincial authorities, it might well be argued that it should spend more, but if the Government has no control of the oyster beds in the Maritime Provinces, why spend anything?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There are a few public beds that are not leased to anybody and that the federal authorities have control of, but, generally speaking, oyster beds are under the control of the provincial governments, and in the general interest and for the few public beds of which the Federal Government has control, we ask the small amount of $6,000. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman's views, and if we had full control the amount would be much larger.

Mr. COPP: I do not know if the minister is aware of the fact that a private corporation in New Brunswick entered into the oyster culture business a few years ago, and I understand they got assistance from the Government. Has there been any report regarding the success of this venture?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have not received any report about the matter.

Mr. COPP: Will the minister find out if there is any report in his office? The matter is important.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The company has not received any financial assistance from the Federal Government.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: A few moments ago the minister, in answer to my question, made reference to a report of Captain Kemp. Is there in that report anything referring to a disease that is attacking oyster areas in the Maritime Provinces and especially in Prince Edward Island ?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes; Mr. Kemp did refer to an epidemic that broke out. I understand it has been overcome now, but it breaks out periodically and the oysters become diseased.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Is it under the jurisdiction of the minister's department to attend to the combatting of the disease that attacks oyster areas, and will any of this money be spent along that line?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The matter of diseases of oysters has been thoroughly gone into by scientific men, and, so far, no means have been devised to overcome the disease.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it open to any private person who has oyster beds in front of his property, or in the near neighbourhood, to cultivate oysters without license?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It would be necessary for such person to get a license from the Provincial Government.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Would it not be wise, when we consider increasing the other two items under this heading, to increase also the item for oyster culture so as to give some assistance towards developing the beds or enabling the fishermen to develop their areas in a manner that would overcome the disease or to conduct scientific investigation so as to find out what the disease really is? Would not that come under the Biological Board ?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That has been done by the Biological Board, as the hon. member states. I will discuss the matter with the board. I cannot discuss it from a scientific standpoint, but I will certainly offer the board a greater expenditure than $6,000 if they ask for it.

Building fishways and clearing rivers, $30,000.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This expenditure is mainly for clearing the rivers of British Columbia. The salmon go up the small streams as well as the large to spawn, and on account of the mountainous nature of the country these streams are liable to be jammed with logs.

Mr. COPP: I had some correspondence with the department with regard to a fishway in the Petitcodiac river. Has any progress been made with that work?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Plans and specifications have been prepared and the work will be carried out.

To provide for the inspection of pickled fish, $15,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there not some legislation pending in connection with this inspection? If it is the intention of the minister to press that legislation through Parliament this session I should like some further explanation about it, although I may not be quite in order in bringing up the matter on this item. The compulsory inspection of the fisheries is rather a disagreeable task to impose upon the fishermen in different parts of the country. This legislation I speak of was before the House in the absence of the minister, and there was considerable opposition to it as far as it advanced, and I should like the minister to consider well before pressing it.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We consulted all the interests, and the majority of them were in favour of making the inspection of pickled fish compulsory. The matter has also been discussed with the various associations that have called upon me, and as far as I know, this legislation is being introduced to meet their wishes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I pointed out to the Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries when this legislation was up earlier in the session that the greatest possible difficulties and legal entanglements might result from this inspection. A man may put up 500 barrels of herring down in northern Victoria county, where there are large fishing interests. He believes it to be No. 1 herring and sells it for No. 1 to some concern in Halifax. There is no provision as to where the fish shall be inspected. The man in Halifax who buys this No. 1 herring without saying a word that he is going to have it inspected may get an inspector to say that it is only No. 2 or No. 3 herring. Then the fat is in the fire, and there will be all kinds of trouble. The fish is sold and beyond the reach of the man who had it in his possession. If there is to be an inspection, it should take place at the place where the fish is packed; otherwise there will be all manner of trouble between the seller and the buyer, and the fishermen as a rule are not sufficiently well off to stand the expense of a lawsuit. There are many other reasons why compulsory inspection should not be pressed upon the people just now. There may be some large sellers of fish who are in favour of compulsory inspection, but it is not the man who buys from the fisherman all along the coast and sells again that I am thinking of, but the small man who put up small quantities of fish and who is now getting along first-rate and has been, and those before him, for the last seventy-five or a hundred years. I am not in favour of imposing fresh duties and further obligations and compulsions by law upon such a man. He has enough to contend with already. He has to fight his way into the Atlantic and battle with the elements in order to catch the fish, and after he has caught it I am not in favour of putting any more embarrassing obligations upon him unless there is real necessity for it. So far we have been putting up very excellent fish in the province of Nova Scotia; I have heard no great complaints. It is to the interest of every fishermen to put up good fish, for he is competing with his neighbours who are putting up good fish. That is the result of local competition, which has been doing very well. Unless the minister finds that the ordinary fisherman is satisfied to have these new obligations imposed upon him, I would not be in favour of imposing them. If he is willing to submit to this inspection, that is his business, but so far I have had no evidence of that kind.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This amount is for the voluntary inspection of fish which has been carried on for many years. It is an annual vote. When the Bill my hon. friend speaks of is before the House full opportunity for discussion will be afforded.

Mr. PEDLOW: Does the department provide for the inspection of oysters? What protection have the public against the sale of diseased oysters?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: They have not any. I was unfortunate enough to contract typhoid fever from eating oysters, I believe. Unfortunately there is no protection that can be offered to those who are fond of oysters.

Mr. PEDLOW: Should not the department provide some means of protecting the public from the distribution of diseased oysters, which may lead to various diseases among the consumers?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is a problem I will put up to the Biological Board. I would like to see it done if it is possible.

Salaries, construction and maintenance of fish breeding establishments, $365,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister deal with the question of the propagation of lobsters?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I carefully considered the subject before those fourteen lobster hatcheries were closed by the Government, and consulted a number of men interested in the business, both business men and scientific men; and from the information I gathered I did not see that they were of any practical use. The fishermen take the lobsters and after brushing off the berries the eggs are taken to the hatchery. We found that the propagation in the hatchery was only about 30 per cent, but when the propagation occurred from the female berried lobster in the natural way it was 100 per cent. The small fry are exposed in the sea, whether they come from the lobster hatchery or whether the eggs are exuded in the natural way. While the lobster hatcheries were costing the Government considerable money we found that instead of being of service to the industry they were the reverse. For that reason I recommended that the hatcheries should be closed. But I was very careful in the matter. As the hon. member said, I waited for a year, and sought advice from every available source that could be of assistance. We have sold three of the lobster hatcheries, one at Shippegan for $610, another at House Harbour for $760, and another at Canso. For the Biological Board for scientific investigation purposes we are retaining the hatcheries at Arichat, Antigonish, Bayview, Charlottetown and Port Daniel. The remaining hatcheries are offered for sale: Inverness Harbour, Little Bras d'Or, Isaac's Harbour, Georgetown, Shemogue and Buctouche. I am not an authority on lobsters and all I could do was to consult those interested in the business in the Maritime Provinces. I was largely guided by the report of Professor Knight, and if it is a fact that there was a propagation of only 30 per cent in the lobster hatcheries as compared with 100 per cent in the natural way, it was conclusive evidence that the hatcheries were not performing any useful service to the country and that the lobster interests would be best served without them.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What proof has the minister that there was 100 per cent propagation in the natural way?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am only quoting Professor Knight's opinion.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Professor Prince was opposed to the step taken by the minister and he is our authority on this matter. I do not know who Professor Knight is, but I am quite sure that no man will say that there was 100 per cent natural propagation because that is impossible of demonstration, and if any professor makes that statement he is "talking through his hat." As regards the 30 per cent propagation, I think that if we succeeded in securing that percentage we were doing very well. The number of eggs on a lobster is something enormous. It runs up into the millions; at all events hundreds of thousands. I cannot remember the number, but I know it is large. According to the reports of the department there were hundreds of millions of young lobsters put into the water every year from these hatcheries, and the propagation of 30 per cent was very good. They were lively looking little lobsters when they were put out, but whether they would live afterwards was a matter of doubt and that was the question that the department never seemed to have the enterprise to investigate. These lobster fry were siphoned out on the water some three miles from the coast and after that they were allowed to shift for themselves. They were very small and I have seen them about the size of a mosquito. The theory of the scientists was that they floated on the surface for some time until they developed, when they sank and crawled on the bottom. As far as I know the department has never made an investigation to discover whether or not they survived and it was a controversy among the fishermen as to whether these young lobsters survived when they were put into the ocean. That was the question which should have been ascertained by the department and it is surely capable of being ascertained. What I complain of chiefly is the fact that the minister undertook this matter without consulting those members interested in the fisheries. In a question of this kind, which is not a political but a business question, and on which there cannot be any difference between the Government and the Opposition as regards the proper administration, is it not curious that although we have a Fisheries Committee sitting, the minister should—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member will surely remember that I appeared before the Fisheries Committee last year and went very fully into this matter. As to whether or not it was a good thing to do that is purely a scientific question. Professor Knight and the Biological Board, which is composed of some of the most eminent university men in Canada, including Professor Prince, strongly recommended the step, and I can only act on the advice of such eminent scientific authorities as I have quoted. But I remember having appeared before the Committee myself and having spent half an hour or more discussing this very subject.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is true. I had not the pleasure of being present when the minister was before the Committee. But there were several meeting of the Committee, and if a vote had been taken the action of my hon. friend would, I think, have been almost unanimously condemned. The Chairman of the Committee asked us not to pass a resolution condemning the action of the department without hearing the minister. The minister appeared before the Committee subsequently and made a statement, but whether he convinced the Committee or not no one knows; he did not give the Committee an opportunity of meeting again and coming to a decision. I understood that the minister stated that he would call a meeting of the fishermen and fish packers, and people interested in the fisheries in the Maritime Provinces and submit the question to them. He did call a meeting last year at Halifax, but he has not told us what the decision was. I was at the meeting, but I do not remember of any decision having been arrived at in regard to this question, and I think that if it had been put to a vote of the meeting there would have been a considerable difference of opinion. But we have a number of men in the House representing the Maritime Provinces and I would like to know what we are here for. Is our advice not to be listened to? Are we not to be consulted on a question like this, but is some professor up in Kingston to decide whether lobster hatcheries in the Maritime Provinces are to be closed or kept open? My complaint is that the minister, without consulting members of Parliament who are interested in the fisheries, decided to close the lobster hatcheries and to sell them. He says he has sold one in my own constituency that was doing splendid work. I do not care what he received for it if he made a bad bargain by selling it. Their advice was ignored, and if the Committee had been consulted in my opinion they would have decided against the action of the department.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. gentleman scarcely does me justice. He criticises me for not being present at the meeting in Halifax, when at that very time I was attending the Imperial Conference in London, England.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am not complaining about that.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: With regard to these matters not being put before members of Parliament, I fully agree with the hon. gentleman. This whole matter was referred to the Fisheries Committee, but, unfortunately, ministers are so driven by the pressure of public business that they cannot attend these committee meetings as often as they would like. For instance, a meeting of the Fisheries Committee was called for this morning at eleven o'clock. How many appointments had I at that hour? There was a very important meeting of the Cabinet taking place at eleven o'clock and I was asked to be there. A very large delegation of labour men representing the shipyards in the East wished to meet me at eleven o'clock. Then there was the meeting of the Fisheries Committee at the same time. Well, I chose to meet the labour men, and, therefore, was unable, much to my regret, to be present at the Fisheries Committee meeting. I would like to attend all the meetings, but if any men have cause for striking it is the ministers of the Crown. Talk about working eight hours a day; we are driven from early morning until the present advanced hour of the night; and it is quite probable that two or three gentlemen will still want to see us after we reach our hotel. I have always referred these matters to the Fisheries Committee, and this subject was thoroughly discussed there. My good friend from Shelburne and Queen's found some fault with me a year ago for not attending a committee meeting. I really could not do so because there were so many other matters pressing for my attention. However, I am always glad to be present whenever I can do so, and that has always been my wish.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Did the minister get the consent, or the approval, of the Fisheries Committee for the course he has taken in this matter?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, as far as I understood it. I did not hear any gentleman there opposing the suggested action, and I certainly understood that I had the unanimous approval of the Committee, after going into the matter very fully. As to the Halifax Convention, I was not there, but the department was represented by the superintendent of fisheries, Mr. Found. He says this matter was not discussed at all; the discussion there was about the regulations with regard to the fishing of lobsters. If my memory serves me right, and I have a fairly good memory in regard to past events, the Fisheries Committee gave me their unanimous approval.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I question very much if any resolution was passed on the subject by the Fisheries Committee.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) was present and I regret very much he is not here to-night.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The attitude of the Fisheries Committee was quite different before the minister did them the honour of conferring with them, and if they had been allowed to pass a resolution on the subject it would certainly have been in opposition to what the minister has done. My point is that after the meeting in Halifax the Fisheries Committee should have been called together and the members from the Maritime Provinces consulted before the minister took the step he did. However, the minister ignored those members altogether and acted on his previous advice. I have no doubt the members of the committee were too polite to say very much to the minister when he was making his statement before them. However, I do not think he obtained any resolution of approval from them. The matter was left in abeyance at the time in the anticipation that a meeting of the fishing interests in the Maritime Provinces would be called to decide it. As no proper decision was arrived at when that meeting took place, it was up to the minister to call the Fisheries Committee together again and give them a chance to have something to say on this important question.

Mr. TURGEON: I concur in what my hon. friend (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) has said with respect to the disappearance of the lobster hatcheries. The lobster hatchery at Shippigan, in my county, has been sold. Now I took great interest in my early years in Parliament, together with Professor Prince, in the operation of lobster hatcheries. I believe to-day that Professor Prince was right in his views as to the value of these hatcheries, and that it was a bad policy to do away with them. I had expected that at the close of the last session of Parliament, according to the understanding of the Fisheries Committee, some official would visit my county in reference to this matter. However, no one came to the county of Gloucester, but nevertheless the lobster hatchery there has been sold, and I presume for a song.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The amount paid for it was $610.

Mr. TURGEON: That is about twenty-five per cent of what it is worth to anybody who wants such an establishment along the shore. May I ask who was the purchaser?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: W. S. Loggie, Limited.

Mr. TURGEON: The firm got a good bargain that time. Now what are we going to do in regard to the propagation of lobster?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am not an authority on lobster propagation. It is purely a scientific question, not a business one, and the biological board is composed of the brightest scientific men we could get throughout Canada, including Professor Prince. That board recommended to the Minister of Fisheries that it was in the interest of the lobster industry to close the hatcheries. I did not take scientific advice merely, but sought information elsewhere, and the matter was thoroughly threshed out before the Fisheries Committee. I did not know that the Committee paid me such deference that they would not express their opinions freely if I happened to be present at their meetings. I appreciate the honour, but I hope that in future when I attend their meetings they will have no hesitancy whatever in expressing their minds frankly. If all the members of that Committee remained silent on this question a year ago when I was present at their meeting, I cannot be blamed for taking that as consenting to what was proposed. As far as I can tell the move is a wise one and in the interests of the lobster industry, but it is purely a scientific question, and I would not attempt to offer any opinion on it myself.

Mr. TURGEON: May I be permitted to proffer advice which I believe to be sound. The lobster hatcheries along our shores have disappeared, and there are now only two measures left for the maintenance of that fishery—maintenance of the close season and limitation of the size of lobsters taken. The close season may have served somewhat in the past, but really the maintenance of the size of the lobsters is the only salvation for the industry in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

Mr. BALLANTYNE: And the protection of the berried lobster as well.

Mr. TURGEON: Last year, or two years ago, the Minister of Fisheries abolished the regulation as to the size of the lobster that could be caught and any lobsters at all were allowed to be brought in. It is pretty difficult to enforce such a regulation, and the only way is to make the packer himself responsible for the size of every lobster he buys—whether he buys from independent fishermen or whether he takes the catch of fishermen who work for him by the day. The packer ought to be made responsible for every lobster that goes into his boiler. It is better to spend a few dollars in that way, and have the guardians look carefully into the character of the lobster pack at each factory, than to adopt regulations which would not be enforced. I do not wish to indulge in any lengthy observations at this late hour of the evening, but I repeat that the only salvation for the lobster industry in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is to maintain the size of the lobsters. For the last twenty-five years they have not been allowed to grow in those waters. In the case of the Bay of Fundy districts the lobsters must be nine and a half or ten inches in size to find a market in the United States, and owing to that requirement their size has been maintained, notwithstanding the immense amount of lobster fishing that is done there.

We were told that our fishermen and packers would not be allowed to take small lobsters so that in a few years big lobsters would be again plentiful. I have always contended that under the conditions prevailing during the last ten years we should have stopped taking lobsters from the gulf of St. Lawrence for two or three years at least, and should have divided the district into two portions so that the fishing would not be too much interrupted. I submit those considerations to the minister, and I believe he will find that they are sound and ought to be put into practice.

Mr. COPP: I do not think my hon. friend from Gloucester has been quite fair to the packers, because he must realize that in the Maritime Provinces at least, if not all over Canada, the lobster packers have been only putting three-quarters of a pound of lobster in a pound can, and in that way have been conserving the lobster.

I do not know which of these items contains the expenses of conducting fishery investigations, but I have in my hand a very valuable report on the lobster fisheries, and I want to draw the attention of the Committee to it. I find one clause in it in regard to the canning of lobsters in the province of New Brunswick. It is stated that there are 660 shippers in various parts of the province, and that their output amounted to 195,993 cases of 48 pounds each. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that there is only 36 pounds in a case of lobsters, and I contend that this report is absolutely wrong and misleading to the public when it states the measure of the amount of lobsters taken in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. McKENZIE: Item 230, development of deep sea fisheries, was allowed to stand. Some hon. gentlemen who are not in the House to-night wish to discuss various fishery matters, and therefore I would not wish the minister to be in any particular hurry about bringing this up for some days. I have in mind that the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) will be away for ten days or so.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is no hon. member that I would like to oblige so much as the hon. member for Lunenburg, but owing to the amount of business that remains to be transacted—and we all hope the House will prorogue by the end of June —I could not promise to leave this item to stand over for ten days. I would like to finish it to-morrow.

1 and 2. Persons, firms and incorporated companies engaged in the slaughtering of live stock or the manufacture of products therefrom liable to taxation under the Order in Council of 9th March, 1918, are assessable for all profits in excess of 15 per cent upon capital and one-half profits in excess of 7 per cent up to 15 per cent upon such capital. Regulations under the said Order in Council were in effect from 1st January, 1918. The Commissioner of Taxation has been engaged in investigating the business and accounts of all persons, firms and incorporated companies who might be liable to assessment under the Order in Council. These investigations are not completed, but so far as they have proceeded they do not disclose profits in excess of the amount exempted by the Order in Council. Many firms and companies engaged in the business concerned, sustained heavy losses during 1918 calendar year, which year was most unfavourable to the packing industry.

HULL INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

*1. Who was the Commissioner appointed to hold an investigation concerning the Hull industrial dispute, during the current month of May?

2. When was the said Commissioner appointed, and what salary is he being paid therefor by the Government?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. There have been two industrial disputes in Hull during the current month of May, as follows:

(a) Hull Electric Railway and its employees, being street and electric railway workers, and the board being constituted as follows: Chairman, Mr. D'Arcy Scott, K.C., Mr. George D. Kelley, and Mr. F. Bancroft.

(b) The Hull corporation and its employees being firemen. In this case the Minister of Labour claims jurisdiction under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, only with the concurrence of the employer concerned, and the employer having granted concurrence, a board was established, Messrs. Archambault, Mayor of Hull, and Pat Green, Ottawa, being appointed as for corporation and employees respectively. Messrs. Archambault and Green being unable to secure a chairman by agreement, the minister, acting under section 8, paragraph 4, appointed the Honourable Mr. Justice F. S. Maclennan, of Montreal, of the Superior Court of Quebec, to the chairmanship. The board was called to meet on Thursday, May 22. Before the board met Mayor Archambault resigned on the ground that the chairman was not French-speaking and belonged to the district of Montreal, rather than the district of Hull. The Registrar requested the City Council to nominate a substitute for Mayor Archambault and the City Council recommended the reappointment of Mayor Archambault. Mayor Archambault was accordingly reappointed. Judge Maclennan notified the Registrar also that court engagements would preclude his continuing to act as chairman. Messrs. Archambault and Green have been instructed, under section 8, paragraph 3, to confer, looking to a recommendation for a third member, who will be chairman. No report has been received.

2. No salary is paid any members of Boards of Conciliation and Investigation, but each member receives the fees payable under the Industrial Disputes Act, section 51, as amended, namely, twenty dollars per day for each day when conducting the inquiry.

HON. MR. JUSTICE MACLENNAN.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Has His Honour Judge McLennan, acting as Chairman of the Board of Industrial Disputes in connection with the dispute between the Canadian Express Company and its employees, been paid his fees and expenses therefor, by the Government?

2. If so, on what date and for what amount?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1 The Honourable Mr. Justice F. S. Maclennan acting as chairman of the Board of Appeal which dealt with a dispute between the Canadian Express Company and its employees has been paid his fees and expenses therefor.

2. April 14, $50.61.

COAL FOR CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS.

Mr. J. H. MACKIE moved:

For a return showing the tenders received for coal for the Canadian Northern Railway and Canadian National Railways, between 1st January, 1918, and 1st April, 1919, also a statement showing the tenders accepted during the same period, along with a statement of all tenders for coal (a) received, and (b) accepted, by the Grand Trunk Pacific since that road passed into the hands of a receiver.

Hon. J. D. REID: I mentioned to the hon. member (Mr. J. C. Mackie) that I could not agree to this motion going through in its present form It includes a return relating to a private company.

Mr. J. H. MACKIE: May I ask the permission of the House to amend that notice of motion so as to drop out the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway? The motion will then be for a return as to all tenders affecting the Canadian National Railways and excepting the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the amendment is to eliminate the Grand Trunk Pacific? The hon. member can put his amendment in proper form by to-morrow.

Motion allowed to stand.

[Sir Thomas White.]

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

For a copy of all correspondence since 1911 between this Government and the Government of Nova Scotia, relating to the licensing of bonded warehouses for the storage of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

For a copy of all correspondence, petitions, resolutions and other documents in the possession of the Government relating to the establishment of abattoir and cold storage facilities at Halifax, N.S.

INQUIRY ABOUT THE FRANCHISE BILL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon and Chateauguay): Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) to the speech from the Throne delivered during his absence in which considerable prominence was given to the question of a new Franchise Bill. We were then promised a Bill to amend the Franchise Act. We have now been in session for three months but the Franchise Bill has not yet been brought down. Might I ask the Prime Minister when we may expect the Franchise Bill and when the five constituencies which are now without representation in this House will have an opportunity of electing members?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In regard to the latter question I believe that the answer has already been given by my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White). In so far as the first question is concerned I cannot give my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) a definite answer to-day. Some papers connected with the Franchise Bill were placed before me last evening, or this morning, but I really have been quite unable even to look at them. I imagine they will require something more than a mere cursory examination. If my hon. friend will let the matter stand for to-day, I shall endeavour to give him his answer at as early a date as may be reasonably possible.

DESTRUCTION OF FOOD—COLD STORAGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I am informed that the following quantities of food were confiscated and destroyed in Montreal during the last four months:

Beef	7,908	pounds.
Veal	10,539	"
Mutton	12,750	"
Pork	7,125	"
Fowl	607	"
Fish	48,216	"
Various meats	5,049	"
Vegetables	2,484	"
Other foods	2,766	"
Ice	203	tons.

In view of that statement is it not the intention of the Government to nationalize the cold storage establishments in the country so as to decrease the very high cost of living?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend will realize that he ought to put a question of that character on the Order Paper.

CONTRACT BETWEEN CANADA AND GREECE FOR SUPPLY OF WHEAT.

Mr. ROBB: The Montreal Gazette of this morning contains a special cable despatch from its London correspondent which reads as follows:

> London, May 25.—A contract has been signed between the Canadian and Grecian Government for the supply of 25,000,000 tons of wheat to Greece to be transported in Greek tonnage by the London shipping firm of M. Embiricos. Ten vessels of five thousand tons are en route, and during the summer months will mostly call at Montreal.

I would like to inquire from the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) or the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), how much of this statement is correct. It is quite apparent that it is not entirely correct inasmuch as it represents more wheat than we would have to export for three or four years. I think it is important that a statement should be made as to how much of this information is correct and whether it is the policy of the Government to give precedence to the sale of wheat rather than the products of wheat.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Negotiations have been proceeding for the disposal of some wheat to the Greek Government but we have no official intimation up to the present time that any contract has been signed. Pending any definite information on that subject, I am unable to give a reply of the character which my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) would desire. I may say, however, that the efforts of the Government have been directed towards the exportation of wheat products in the form which he mentioned. It is not always possible, in negotiations that are being carried on, to accomplish that to the fullest extent desired. I am not quite sure whether any portion of this is to go in the form of flour or whether the whole of it is to go in the form of wheat.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I might add to what the Prime Minister has said that the amount involved is about a million bushels a month which will run to an aggregate of 12,000,000 bushels and cover a period of twelve months.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask how the prices are fixed in these deals?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The price will be the price in Canada at Port Arthur or Fort William, plus carrying charges to the seaboard and upon the ship. The Greek Government have been desirous of furnishing its people with the best possible flour. and they therefore desired to obtain a quantity of Canadian wheat. The matter was most carefully considered by the Government with those interested in the sale of our wheat, especially wheat of this year's crop, and it was thought desirable in the national interest that the wishes of the Greek Government should be met, with the result that some twelve or fifteen million bushels of wheat will be sold. About three million bushels of that will be of this year's exportable surplus; the balance will be of the coming year's crop. I may say that the Government considered it desirable that no effort should be spared to furnish as far as possible a market for the entire exportable surplus of this year's wheat crop, including, of course, " wheat " flour, which is a product of wheat.

Mr. ROBB: If I may trespass again, does this apply to the raw material, or will the Greek Government take flour?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This applies to wheat, because the Greek Government wants wheat. The policy of the Government, as I explained to my hon. friend when the deputation waited upon us not very long ago, has been, to the utmost extent possible, to promote the sale of Canadian wheat in the form of flour. But obviously it cannot all be exported in that form, and the Dominion Government would not feel justified in missing the advantage of a sale such as this, with its ultimate beneficial consequences, by reason of the fact that the Greek Government desires to make this purchase in the form of wheat.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it financed by the Canadian Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No; by the Greek Government from outside funds.

LABOUR UNREST IN CANADA.

THE SITUATION IN THE WEST.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Is the Government in a position to make a statement in regard to the strikes in Western Canada?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Labour): There is nothing further to convey to the House respecting the Winnipeg strike situation. What little news has been received by the Government since yesterday has been of a reassuring nature. The only change which has taken place—which, perhaps, I might mention—is that the railway mail clerks of the Winnipeg Division are out on strike. There is nothing particular to report concerning conditions at Edmonton. A general strike was ordered and is now effective; but it would appear that no very large number of men have responded to the order. At Calgary strike conditions prevail, there being about six or eight different classes of trades out. The postal clerks at Calgary are out in sympathy with the strike, but at Edmonton they are still in the service. At Vancouver a general strike vote has been or is being taken, but we have received no official information as to the result.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What about the threatened strike at Toronto?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): A delegation from the city representing both employers and employees, together with the Mayor and the President of the Board of Trade, are to arrive here to-morrow morning for a conference.

HIGH COST OF LIVING AND MINIMUM WAGE.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. A. K. Maclean) what is the weekly budget for the average Canadian family as found by the latest report of the Department of Labour; and what is the minimum weekly wage to correspond with that weekly minimum budget?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I could not answer my hon. friend's question. I may be able to do so at the close of the session to-day possibly, or Friday.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should properly go upon the Order Paper. From its nature the hon. member could not expect to have it answered off-hand.

GENERAL CONFERENCE SUGGESTED TO SETTLE LABOUR DISPUTES.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Leader of the Opposition): Might I take the liberty of suggesting to the Prime Minister that the Government would be well advised to take into consideration the calling of a general conference of all the parties concerned in connection with the various strikes that are now proceeding throughout the country? Such a conference here in Ottawa might have the effect of allaying the general unrest now prevailing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall, of course, give very attentive consideration to the suggestion which my hon. friend has made. If possible it would be most desirable to have the Minister of Labour (Hon. Gideon Robertson) here if any such conference should be called. He is at present doing his best to bring about an adjustment of the strike at Winnipeg. I shall give the suggestion full consideration and communicate with him.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): In connection with the same matter, in answer to my friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) who yesterday asked what was the attitude of the Government in regard to "collective bargaining," the right hon. the Prime Minister said that there were many definitions of this term, and if given a certain interpretation the result would be rather unfortunate. May I ask the Government whether there is some system of collective bargaining with which the Government is in sympathy; and if so, what is that system?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As I explained yesterday—possibly my hon. friend was not present—we are awaiting the report of the Industrial Commission, which no doubt will take this question into consideration. I should not desire to anticipate that report by making any such announcement as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. CAHILL: Would it not be possible for the Government to get that commission to report at an earlier date than was mentioned yesterday, viz. the 15th of June? In view of the dangerous condition of the country as the result of the many strikes in operation and threatened, I believe an early report by that commission is of the utmost importance.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether it is possible for the commission to report at an earlier date or not. I believe they have been very actively engaged. Indeed, they might reach the conclusion that they are, after all, getting on as fast as the House is.

Mr. CAHILL: As fast as the Government is?

CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

RE-CLASSIFICATION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Macelan (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution. Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend The Civil Service Act, 1918, and therein to provide:—

1. That the Civil Service Commission shall consist of not more than five members appointed by the Governor in Council: Provided, however, that after the expiration of three years from the first day of April, one thousan nine hundred and nineteen, no person shall be appointed a Commissioner until the number of members of the Commission is reduced to less than three, and after such reduction the number of members of the Commission shall not exceed three.

2. That the Chairman of the Commission shall be paid a salary of seven thousand dollars, and each of the other Commissioners six thousand dollars; such salaries to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

3. That the provisions of the said Act relating to temporary employment, dismissals, resignations, hours of attendance, annual reports, regulations, examinations, classification, appointments, promotions, transfers and compensation be amended, and that provision be made for re-classifying the Civil Service and for any additional expense which may result from such re-classification.

Mr. MANION: Last year when the Civil Service Commission was being appointed, the hon. member for Muskoka and myself took up with the Prime Minister the question of appointing a returned soldier as a member of the commission. I believe the Prime Minister gave us to understand that the suggestion would be favourably considered this year. I should like to ask the hon. minister if it is the intention of the Government to give effect to our suggestion?

Mr. LEMIEUX: On the same line as the question put by my hon. friend, I suggested last year when the minister introduced his Bill that a woman should be appointed to the commission; first of all in view of the large number of women who are in the Civil Service; and, second, in view of the fact that we have now given the suffrage to women. Under these circumstances they ought to be represented on that commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should not like to give a definite answer to the questions put by the member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) and the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). We are taking the authority to increase the number of the Commissioners by two, and it naturally follows that there is no reason why one returned man should not be placed on the commission. However, I do not like to anticipate the action of the Government by saying any more than that. I assure my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) that every consideration will be given to the suggestion which he puts forward and which was urged very strongly and repeatedly during the last session of Parliament. Perhaps later, during the course of the passage of the Bill, I shall be in a position to make a more definite announcement.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about my question?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot answer my hon. friend's question; I do not like to anticipate the action of the Government in the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As to the principle, does not my hon. friend see eye to eye with me?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I assent to the principle that women are entitled to the suffrage and to fill any position that they are capable of filling. I cannot say, however, whether I am in favour of the appointment of a woman to the Civil Service Commission and at the moment I do not propose to bind the Government or myself in that matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not even for the time being?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This is a time when the Government ought to practise economy. I do not see any reason why there should be an increase in the number of Commissioners. The minister accepts the principle that it is better to have three Commissioners than five, because he provides that after a couple of years no new appointment shall be made until the number of Commissioners has been reduced to three. Why should we incur the expense involved in the appointment of two new Commissioners when three are sufficient to do the work?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The principle of enlarging the commission may be right or may be wrong; it will be for Parliament to settle that question. At the present time the commission is an exceedingly busy organization and the view is held by many that they cannot possibly do justice to the great volume of work that is before them from day to day. During the reconstruction period it may fairly be held that the commission should be enlarged by the addition of further members. The Bill will provide that the number will automatically revert to three. I will read the section which will appear in the Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know whether the minister has already explained the reasons for the introduction of this resolution and of the Bill which is to be founded upon it. If he has not, would he be good enough to do so, and to state also whether it has anything to do with the reclassification that has been in progress for some months, so that we may understand what we are talking about?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I propose, with the permission of the House, to advance this Order to-day to the extent of having the resolution adopted. I shall not move the first reading of the Bill to-day, because what are known as the classification schedules are not yet fully printed. I hope that some time during the next week they will be available and that when I move the first reading of the Bill I shall be able to place on the Table, and possibly in the hands of hon. members, the printed classification schedules. I do not wish, therefore, to make any extended explanation of the Bill this afternoon, if I can avoid doing so. However, I desire to say just a few words.

Mr. MURPHY: So that the reclassification will be under discussion at the same time as the new Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. Hon. gentlemen will remember that under the Civil Service Act of last year the commissioners were directed to reclassify the service. Since last August, experts employed by the commission have been engaged in that work. As I have already stated in the House during this session, the task was a stupendous one; otherwise the reclassification would have been submitted to the House long before this. I assure hon. gentlemen that it involved a great deal of work, but satisfactory progress has been made and the work is about completed; in fact, the actual classification has been completed—the delay is in the printing. The classification involves the arrangement of the whole Civil Service, outside and inside, into classes. For instance, there is a clerical service, which will be common to a great many of the departments; the clerical force is found in almost every department. To-day the clerical staff of the Department of Public Works, for instance, may be paid on an entirely different rating from that which applies to the clerical services in other departments. The scheme of reclassification will put all the clerical staff into one service; the members of that service will be paid according to their duties and responsibilities and there will be no variation in the salaries throughout Canada. The postal service is a service by itself, because everybody engaged in the postal work belongs to the postal service. There may, however, be a clerical staff in the post office which will become part of the clerical service.

I should like to give to the Committee a definition of some of the new terms which will be imported into the Bill ratifying the classification. The word "position," which will be used frequently, is understood to mean "one specific office or employment occupied normally by one person." For example, a man may have the position of delivering letters, or taking dictation, or driving an automobile; his position is defined.

The word "class" will be used also in the reclassification and in the amending Bill. "Class" is understood to include all those positions, employments, or offices the duties and responsibilities of whose incumbents and the qualifications required and demanded of applicants therefor are sufficiently alike to be given the same denomination or title. In the Department of Railways and Canals, the Department of Public Works and the Department of Marine and Fisheries we have persons engaged in marine work; regardless of the department they are employed in, they will come within the class of marine workers.

Mr. MURPHY: Engineers the same way?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is an engineering division. "Service" is understood to mean an aggregation of classes having similar functions. For instance, all the clerical staff, wherever found, inside or outside, regardless of department, belong to the clerical service. The classification will disclose the following services.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before my hon. friend proceeds, may I inquire what is the name and location of the firm that made the re-classification, what are the names of the classifiers, and are there any Canadians among them?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The work of re-classification was carried on by the Civil Service Commission who employed certain people to do it. The principal assistants were furnished by the firm of Arthur Young and Company who are engaged solely in the work of classifying and organizing civil services.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of Chicago?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Their main office is in Chicago, but they have offices in other large cities, including, I think, an office in Toronto. They furnished the Civil Service Commission with a certain number of experts and some Canadians were engaged in the work.

Mr. DEVLIN: What firm in Chicago would know about the working out of the Civil Service system of Canada?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see why a firm in Chicago would not be able to do the work just as well as a firm in Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then why not give the preference to a firm in Canada?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think there is in Canada any person or firm that has ever given any attention to this class of work.

Mr. DEVLIN: Are these people not accountants solely?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, they are not accountants. Their attention is devoted entirely to work of this character, and they are now being and have been employed by many States and cities of the United States of America.

Mr. DEVLIN: As a matter of fact, is it not true that the heads of the department did the work of re-classification?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, they had nothing to do with it other than to give information when asked for it.

Mr. EDWARDS: Was not Mr. P. D. Ross available for this work?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: His services were not sought by the commission.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is Mr. P. D. Ross?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the remuneration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot inform the hon. member as to the exact remuneration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much per day?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot give the information. The firm of Arthur Young and Company engaged by the Civil Service Commission, was a very able body of men who knew their work well, and it matters little to me what country they are citizens of so long as they are capable of doing this particular work. I think it will be found, when the whole matter is submitted to the House and thoroughly understood, that they were very capable men.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the rate of pay of this American firm; how many are included in their staff, and how much is the staff paid ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend that information to-day. I would hardly be expected to carry that around with me, because there is no particular reason why I should know it. This Parliament authorized the Civil Service Commission to carry on this work, and the commission secured the services of this firm without consulting the Government at all. I shall, however, later on inform the House as to the probable cost of this work.

Mr. HOCKEN: Have certain departmental officials found it necessary to revise the classifications made by this firm?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That question might be answered "yes and no." When the report is fully completed, the Civil Service Commission and the experts who are assisting them, do not expect the report to be without error. There are 60,000 positions in Canada which are being classified, and the classification schedules will occupy between six and seven hundred pages. There will be some 1,600 or 1,700 classes of positions classified in the service, and it would be almost too much to expect that such work would be absolutely free from error; in fact, the commissioners would be well satisfied it they did not find greater error than from five to ten per cent. From time to time the commission have consulted different members of the Civil service, sometimes a deputy minister, sometimes another departmental official. This was necessary, and I have no doubt that, from time to time, they secured from such persons valuable information which would induce them to revise a preconceived idea as to classification of any particular service.

Mr. HOCKEN: All of this leads one to wonder whether a commission of experts composed of our own officials would not have done the work better than this imported commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not of that view, and I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend. We shall be in a better position to judge of that when the schedules are printed and in the hands of hon. members. My opinion is that when the report is studied it will be the judgment of hon. members that the work has been well done and that it will ultimately prove to be in the public interest.

Mr. DEVLIN: Without wishing to be too persistent about the gentlemen who came from Chicago to revise the whole Civil Service system, I should like to know who recommended them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Civil Service Commission obtained the services of these men. They went out looking for men capable of doing this work; they could not obtain such services in Canada, and they took the best means they could of obtaining the names of some concerns outside which might do the work.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then I understand the Civil Service Commission themselves, without the recommendation of anybody, engaged these accountants or others in the city of Chicago?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is true.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Thus trading and trucking with the Yankees.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be unsatisfactory to the Committee and also to myself if I were to endeavour this afternoon to give an explanation of the classification without the schedules before me. I hope, therefore, the Committee will be good enough to permit progress to be made with the resolution, and when I move the first reading of the Bill I purpose giving as full an explanation as possible.

I should like, however, to give an illustration of what classification means. For instance, I have in my hand what will be a page of the classification schedule. This contains three schedules, and to give the Committee an idea of what a schedule actually means, I will read it. The schedules are headed "Junior Forward Sorter," "Box Collectors," and "Postal Labourer." These are three positions in the postal service. It is the position which is classified, and not the individual. The responsibilities and duties of the position are first set forth,

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is nothing new there.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When I move the first reading of the Bill I think I shall be able to point out cases in the Canadian public service where men are receiving at least one hundred per cent more than they should for the class of work they are doing. In other cases civil servants are underpaid for the class of work they are doing. I have read this schedule merely to give hon. gentlemen an idea of what a classification schedule means. The duties of a Junior Forward Sorter are set forth as follows:

> Examples: Facing and sorting letters for the cancelling machine and hand stamper; revising and tying sorted letters; opening, closing, and labelling mail bags; checking amounts of postage on mail matter; sorting letters for forwarding in one or more easy frames; sorting newspapers for forwarding.

From this the incumbent of the office can see what are the duties of his position. Heretofore, the duties pertaining to positions in the public service have not been defined except in a very casual way, and have varied according to the departments.

The schedule also states the qualifications for the position, which in this case are as follows:

> At least public school education; good physical condition and a good memory; quickness of hand and eye.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Public school qualifications?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: For this particular position of Junior Forward Sorter, the intention hereafter, and this will be provided for in the Bill, is that candidates for positions in the Civil Service shall be examined merely in respect of the duties of the office which they are seeking, instead of undergoing a general examination on matters which really do not relate to the duties of the office.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is well enough in its way, but will there have to be another examination in the case of promotion to a position requiring higher educational attainments?

Mr. A. K. McKENZIE: There would be another examination in respect of the work to be done in the new position to which the man seeks to be promoted. The schedule also sets forth the principal lines of promotion, so that a person on entering the service in any position may know what lines of promotion are open to him. Of course, it does not follow that the official will necessarily be promoted, because promotion will depend upon his record and efficiency. It was the judgment of the Civil Service Commission, however, that the lines of promotion should be stated in the schedule so that the incumbent of any office might know what other positions in the public service he might aspire to.

Mr. DEVLIN: Did I understand the minister to say when speaking on the Post Office Department that some officials of that department were receiving one hundred per cent more than they should be receiving?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I did not say that.

Mr. DEVLIN: I think so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am certain I did not say that. I said that if I deemed it necessary or wise to do so, I could indicate some positions in the public service of Canada where the incumbent was receiving one hundred per cent more for the work he performed than the work was worth. The principal lines of promotion for junior forward sorter are as follows:

To perform, under supervision, simple tasks in connection with the forwarding of mail in a large post office and other related work as assigned.

To: Forward Sorter, Directory Clerk, General Registration Clerk, Money Order Clerk, Registration Clerk, Registration and Money Order Clerk.

I think it is an excellent plan to have inserted in the schedules the principal lines of promotion open to anybody in the Civil Service. The schedule finally states the compensation, under monthly and annual heads. The commission have examined fairly well all the civil positions in the public service of this country, and have classified the duties and responsibilities and qualifications of each class of positions. I do not think it is necessary for me to give any more examples.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the report of this new commission differ materially from the report of Sir George Murray?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My recollection is that the report of Sir George Murray was a general report on the conditions in the Civil Service of Canada. This new report has to do entirely with the re-classification of the service.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Murray report was discarded, if I mistake not.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did I understand the minister to say that the classification has been completed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am curious to know what the minister is going to do when the report of the Special Committee inquiring into the manning of the Civil Service is presented. As this new classification is going to be confirmed by an Act of Parliament, does it not seem to the minister, labour in vain for this Special Committee to be toiling every day reconstructing what has already been reconstructed? I would like to know what the minister thinks this Special Committee is doing, and what the result will be when their report is presented.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I really cannot tell my hon. friend what I think the Committee is doing, because I am not a member of it, and I should not like to make a guess. The Committee were directed to inquire into the question of whether or not the service was overloaded, and not to make a classification of the service. The reference to the Special Committee was of a more general character. I do not think there will be any conflict whatever between the two reports.

Mr. CAHILL: What have been the salaries of the commissioners up to this time?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Chairman $6,000, and the Commissioners $5,000.

Mr. CAHILL: In view of the fact that there is now a Special Committee of this House investigating whether the service is overmanned, and the further fact that the service has now practically been reclassified, having regard also to conditions generally throughout the country and the dissatisfaction with a lot of appointments made, on what ground do the commission justify the appointment of two other commissioners to undertake work that has already been done? The Special Committee may report in favour of reducing the number of civil servants. Upon what ground does the minister base his opinion that there is going to be a large increase in the Civil Service of this country in the next two years?

It seems to me that this is entirely uncalled for. Instead of increasing the salaries of these commissioners, if they are not satisfied and are not able to get along with a salary of five or six thousand dollars a year, the Government might be able to get other very estimable gentlemen who would accept the position at the present remuneration. There are doubtless many returned men in Canada that are perfectly competent to fill these positions, and would be glad to accept a stipend of $5,000 a year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The salaries of deputy ministers were recently fixed at $6,000, and it was felt that the members of the Civil Service Commission occupy a position in the service analogous to that of a deputy minister. Let me point out that the duties of the Civil Service Commission will not terminate because the re-classification has been completed. The members of that commission could not have carried out that re-classification because their time is fully occupied with other duties, and on the first reading of the Bill to amend the Civil Service Act I propose indicating to the House in some manner the many duties which they have to perform. During the last twelve months a tremendous amount of work has been placed upon the commission, and the putting under their administration of practically the whole Outside Service has imposed an enormous additional burden on them. Furthermore, after the re-classification is adopted by Parliament the service must be fitted into it, which will be no slight task; also the Civil Service Act of last session directed a reorganization of the departments, involving additional duties. Again the placing of returned men in public positions in this country means additional work for the commission, because a preference is being extended to those men. With the permission of the House I will read a clause which will appear in the Bill covering this extension of the personnel of the commission.

There shall be a commission to be called the Civil Service Commission, consisting of not more than five members appointed by the Governor in Council: provided, however, that after the expiration of three years from the first day of April one thousand nine hundred and nineteen no person shall be appointed a commissioner until the number of members of the commission is reduced to less than three, and after such reduction the number of members of the commission shall not exceed three.

After the lapse of a few years the Civil Service Commission will be better organized than it is to-day; its staff will have more experience, and the public will have become accustomed to the new order of things.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend stated a moment ago that as a result of the re-classification referred to, many civil servants would get an increase in their salaries, whilst others might, perhaps, in future face a decrease. Might I call the minister's attention to what has taken place lately in a large corporation? The Canadian Pacific Railway has of late re-classified the salaries of its officials from coast to coast. Under that re-classification not only has the company considered the salaries of the officials who are in active service, but it has also, according to my information, given a pro rata increase to those who have been superannuated, on the ground that the cost of living and the prevailing conditions apply to the latter class, just as much as those who are serving actively. I understand that there are very few—at least only a relatively small number—public servants who are now on the retired list, and enjoying superannuation. I would therefore ask if it is the intention of the Government in the re-classification which will be presented to the House by my hon. friend to include the former officials who have been superannuated? The additional expenditure which would be involved thereby would not be large in view of the smallness of their number, and there is some justice in the claim for consideration in their case, because with a reduced salary, resulting from their superannuation they also feel the stress of the times we are passing through.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I might say that no person now in the public service holding a permanent position will suffer any diminution in salary during his or her lifetime, even if the position which he or she fills is re-classified.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is, re-classified at a lower salary?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, at a lower salary. The same provision was contained in the Civil Service Acts of 1908 and 1918. The schedules will show a very substantial increase in salaries, though speaking generally the compensation is not based upon the actual conditions to-day—the salaries have been fixed just as if the cost of living was normal and the war had not occurred. During last year a bonus was paid to a very large section of the Civil Service, and that is being continued; in fact, the Committee will be asked to vote a certain amount this afternoon to enable the bonus to be paid for April, May and June of this year. After the amended Civil Service Act becomes law, and the salary schedule which accompanies it is adopted, it is proposed to present to Parliament a scheme for the payment of a bonus to civil servants which will meet the prevailing conditions, but that will probably not take place until very late in the session. My hon. friend has suggested that a bonus should be given to those employees who have passed out of the Service and been pensioned. My hon. friend was good enough to mention this matter to me yesterday, and two other persons in Canada wrote me making the same suggestion, but I have not had an opportunity of placing the matter before my colleagues. The first thing to be done will be to ascertain what additional cost will be involved if the suggestion is carried out. I readily admit there is much force in the suggestion because the purchasing power of the pension which is paid to these former officials has fallen very much, and I shall be very glad to give consideration to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I might give my hon. friend a concrete case. Take, for instance, the inspectors of customs who ten or fifteen years ago received a certain salary, and whose pensions, when they were superannuated, was based on that salary. Their successors in the Service have, since their promotion, had the benefit of one or two increases, and will now get a further increase, so that when they in turn are superannuated they will receive a pension proportionate to their salary. On the other hand, the men whom they succeeded are receiving a smaller pension based on the salary paid years ago. It seems to me that it is only a matter of justice to grant recognition in the way suggested to these former public servants.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think that in dealing with the salaries of civil servants we have commenced at the wrong end, I suppose, on the principle embodied in the old saying, "To him who hath shall be given." Those who stood most in need of salary increases were the men at the bottom of the list, getting from $1,200 to $1,400 a year. On these salaries they have been forced to exist—you cannot call it live—owing to the increased cost of everything they have had to buy and they have found their salaries, with the bonus addition, hardly sufficient to keep their families and themselves in any kind of decency. These, in my judgment, are the members of the Civil Service who should receive the first consideration but those who have received the first consideration have been the deputy ministers and the chief clerks whose salaries were comparatively large. I say "comparatively large" when placed alongside the salaries of others in the service who are getting $900, $1,000 or $1,200 a year.

I fail to see how the hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) can possibly arrive at the conclusion he expressed a moment ago that the members of the Civil Service Commission were quite sufficient to do the work. He was at that time criticising the increase in the number to five members. We have any amount of evidence that the Civil Service Commission were not capable of doing the work which fell to their lot. What did they do? They handed their work over to sub-committees. Applications were received for a position and a sub-committee was appointed to make a choice from amongst the applicants. That did not occur only once; it occurred many times, showing very clearly that the Civil Service Commission composed of three members could not cope with the amount of work that fell to them. If the Government are open to censure at all for increasing the Civil Service Commission that censure should come to them because they did not increase it sooner. I would very much rather have, not three, not five, but a dozen members of the Civil Service Commission who were in some sense responsible to this Parliament than have a commission of three finding themselves unable to do the work devolving upon them and making selections of men who have been milking the Government ever since they were big enough to appreciate the possibility of obtaining assistance from the Government.

A very notable example of that is the editor of the Ottawa Evening Journal, Mr. P. D. Ross, who from 1896 to 1911 succeeded in obtaining for advertising between $9,000 and $10,000 out of the Government of the country, who, in the last six years, has obtained from this Government alone over $24,000 in advertising and who, in addition, has obtained something over $62,000 for the rent of a part of the premises which he built and which he occupies as a newspaper office. Here is a gentleman who has been called upon by the Civil Service Commission, I believe, on more than one occasion, to decide whether this person or that person was the proper one to appoint to a Civil Service position.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the editor of the Ottawa Journal?

Mr. EDWARDS: I understand so; Mr. P. D. Ross.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is he subsidized?

Mr. EDWARDS: I think the figures show how very disinterested this public-spirited citizen is, how he is not looking for anything for himself. We find this gentleman with his hand out from 1896 to 1911, receiving $10,000 for advertising, and we find him with his hand out to every department of the Government for the last six years and receiving payments in the way of advertising. Was it because of his very minute knowledge of every one of these departments that he has been chosen to act on a sub-committee to make appointments which should be made by the Civil Service Commission? Is that the kind of a disinterested man that we should have making these appointments? I am told, and I believe on good authority, that it was an understood thing that when this gentleman put up the building that he at present occupies and holds, and from which he issues his paper, the Government would rent or lease a part of it for Government offices. In that way he was investing his money in such a way as to have a sure thing, that in the course of a few years he would get back, in the form of rental, the money he had expended in putting up the building. This is the type of man who has been selected to do the work, in the way of making appointments, which should be done by a Civil Service Commission responsible to this House. This is the gentleman who takes advantage of the fact that he owns a newspaper, to criticise very severely any member of this House who ventures to express an opinion different from his own in regard to the members of the House having a say in the appointments which are made in their constituencies.

I repeat, in the face of the facts which have been placed before this House again and again, that the Civil Service Commission have been entirely unable to cope with the amount of work which has been thrown on their hands. In view of the fact that they have appointed sub-committees to deal with hundreds of applications for positions in the Civil Service, and in view of the fact that we have had men who are not responsible to Parliament, or to anybody else, making selections of persons for appointment to the Civil Service, it is high time that we had an increase in the personnel of the Civil Service Commission, so that we will have some person who is responsible to Parliament for the appointments which are made.

I do not blame the Civil Service Commission for it but that situation has developed through the assinine policy of this House in placing upon the Civil Service Commission work which could be better performed in the public interest by the men who are responsible to the people, the representatives of the people sitting in this House. It is an absolutely ridiculous and illogical situation that faces this House and the country to-day that we as members of the House are to be held responsible to the people for appointments which are made not by members of the Civil Service Commission but by sub-committees appointed by the Civil Service Commission and responsible to no person in the country not even to the commission itself.

That is an absolutely ridiculous state of affairs against which I want to protest, just as I also want to protest against the way in which salary increases have been made in the Civil Service. Are we to suppose—perhaps we can get some consolation from looking at it from this point of view—that the only officers affected in the city of Ottawa by the high cost of living are the deputy ministers of the various departments, the chairman and members of the Civil Service Commission, and the chief clerks? Is it to be presumed that the high cost of living does not affect those men getting from $1,200 to $1,400 and that therefore it is not necessary to deal with them?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend has referred to the lavish way in which the Government has poured money into the pockets of Mr. Ross and I have no doubt he has told the truth. I think that is likely all true, but he has not referred to the other side of the story. Mr. Ross has earned every dollar that he ever received from the Government. There has not been a shady transaction in which the Government has been concerned since 1911 that Mr. Ross has not defended and if the hon. gentleman had told the whole story there would not have been so much of a reflection to be cast upon Mr. Ross.

My hon. friend criticised my proposal that the commission should be reduced from five to three or that it should remain as it is at present. I think that is a proper proposition. It depends altogether on what work the Civil Service Commission are endeavouring to do. Are they conducting clerical work? Or are they making inquiries throughout the country as to who a man is, what stripe of politics he is, and whether he ought to be appointed over somebody else? Are they engaged in work of that kind? If, on the other hand, they are engaged like judges, in delivering decisions, as they should be engaged., they could do the work all right, and the clerical work these gentlemen are doing could be performed by a clerical staff. I cannot see why five commissioners would be any better than three in doing work of that kind, because we want the combined judgment of the commission in arriving at decisions according to some definite principles. These men have got a great deal of work to do no doubt; but I fear they are doing work that somebody else might be carrying on at a very much lower cost. Therefore, I still want to register my protest against increasing the personnel of the commission. I think a commission of three would be more efficient, and with a sufficient staff such a commission, I submit, would be able to do the work better than five commissioners, with less confusion and with much greater satisfaction to the country .

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not want to be taken as endorsing what the hon. member for Guysborough has said in regard to the editor of the Journal having earned money for backing up shady transactions, although Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to defer to the superior judgment of the hon. member in matters of that kind. I do not know any member of this House better qualified to judge of what is and what is not a shady transaction than the hon. member for Guysborough. I sat with the hon. gentleman in this House for a number of years when the party he supports was in power, and although Liberal newspapers from one end of the country to the other were receiving gifts of money, I do not remember to have ever heard him suggest that any of that money was being earned by the Liberal press in supporting shady transactions; and yet unquestionably from my standpoint many of those newspapers during the fifteen years the Liberal party was in power were backing up transactions which I might, without going very far astray, characterize as shady. I do not think it comes with a good grace now from the hon. member for Guysborough to talk about backing up shady transactions, and making that as a political stroke, because the hon. member has been ready in season and out of season when his party was in power to back up anything and everything that came along, no matter what might be the colour or the shade of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman, I would be sorry indeed that in this discussion any one should introduce party politics. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) in his denunciation of the practice of some gentlemen belonging to the press receiving subsidies directly or indirectly from any Government. The other day I used very severe language regarding a certain portion of the press, and I was taken to task by that press, and yet I find to-day the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) justifies completely the statement I made to the House on that occasion.

Here is a concrete case. Mr. P. D. Ross is a wealthy gentleman with a large and profitable property in Ottawa, who is supposed to enlighten the public with independent information and to guide it with his unbiased judgment. We however find from the blue-books that he is not satisfied with being appointed on special commissions and with receiving fat contracts from the Government, but he also rents his buildings to the Government.

Now, let us take the case of the Free Press—or the Journal Press, because it has changed its name. If the leopard can change his spots—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I must ask him to address his remarks to the resolution before the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will, Mr. Chairman. The Free Press was a Liberal newspaper before 1896. I know that in 1911, when the Reform party, met its Waterloo, that paper supported the naval policy and the reciprocity pact and yet immediately after the Hon. Mr. Rogers became the master of the Borden Administration that paper, having, I suppose, adopted the principle of Dr. Osler, became choloroformed, and one morning, the Liberals found that it had not the same old vigorous style as usual.

At that time the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) denounced in the House the shady transaction which had taken place by which that paper was parading as a Liberal paper although it was the property of well known Tory financiers. Not only was it masquerading as a Liberal newspaper, but it was reading the Riot Act to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and to some other members of the old Liberal party. That concrete case explains, Mr. Chairman, many of the events that have taken place since 1911. The purchasing of the press en masse by the powers that be is one of the deplorable conditions to-day in Canada, and if the people have no direction from an independent press, it is because the press has surrendered its independence into the hands of those powers. There is no respect to-day for the press in Canada. There are indeed respectable newspapers, but those other papers which have been chloroformed have, so to speak, contaminated the whole press family in the eyes of the public. I am not inventing this. My hon. friend knows it just as well as I do.

The statement was positively made in the House of Commons in 1912 that the Ottawa Free Press, although parading as a Liberal paper, was really the property of certain Tory financiers. It is not surprising, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the Free Press should have defended all the shady transactions since, because the price has been mentioned by my hon. friend. Not satisfied with receiving job printing contracts from this Government, not satisfied with accepting positions on important commissions, the proprietor of that paper receives large amounts every year for rentals. How can you expect the public to respect the press of Canada in view of such a condition of affairs.

We are passing through a revolution, Mr. Chairman, and one of the most regrettable features of that revolution is that there is no leadership from the press of Canada to-day on the great questions that are confronting the Dominion. And the revolution which is gaining ground every day——

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —is chiefly caused by that purchase——

The CHAIRMAN: Order, order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —of the press of Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am through, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My hon. friend has said that the press of this country has no respect for the people of Canada. I just want to say that is a melancholy reflection to me that the press say exactly the same thing about members of Parliament, including the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is in a melancholy mood this afternoon.

Mr. BEST: Will civil servants who have been voted increases of from $500 to $1,000 during the present session obtain these increases if the re-classification gives them a lower rating than they had before these additional sums were voted? If so, why were they voted these increases?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think they will.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: It seems to me that the time has come when this House has to do one of two things, either take back into our own hands the responsibility of making all appointments, or make this commission proficient in every way. It is evident to members of Parliament who have had anything to do with appointments during the last year and a half that things have not been working too smoothly. I have been told by deputy ministers that the Civil Service Commission is practically using their staffs for the purpose of ferreting out information that could be got for the asking from any member of Parliament. If you are going to exclude the advice of members of this House in these matters the principle embodied in this Bill is correct: we must enlarge this commission to such an extent that the work can be carried on fairly and well. These commissioners should not act upon, I was going to say, half information; they should not act without being well informed as to the merits and demerits of all appointments. The minister stated that one of the reasons for increasing the number of commissioners was the fact that soldiers had been appointed to different offices throughout the country. I refer him to page 1026 of Hansard, where an answer to a question is quoted which states that out of 1,672 permanent appointments and 14,570 temporary appointments made last year, a total of 16,242, only 1,834 were given to returned men. I might go on and say what everybody knows: the appointments they did get were those at the very bottom of the list. A year ago the Prime Minister, in answer to a question, gave what was practically a promise to the House that if this Commission was enlarged a returned man would be given an appointment on it. Considering the great unrest that prevails in Canada to-day, and having regard to the great service that the returned men are rendering to the country at this present hour, there is no doubt in my mind that the appointment of a returned soldier to the Civil Service Commission would do a great deal to quiet things down and would cause returned men throughout the country to feel that their interests will be properly looked after.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: While the minister does not like to make a definite promise, without consulting his colleagues, that a returned man will be appointed—

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I am not asking that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: —I might recall what I said earlier this afternoon, namely, that there was no reason that I knew of why a returned man should not be appointed to the Commission. I am not in a position to give the Committee this afternoon the number of returned men who have been appointed to public offices, but I think I can say that practically no appointments are at present being made to the Civil Service which are not given to returned men. True, promotions are being made in the Service, in accordance with a provision of the Civil Service Act, which, in my judgment, should be observed. I am glad to say that in my interviews with returned men I found that they did not ask the abandonment of the principle of promotion of men who had been long years in the service and the giving of these appointments to returned soldiers. I think it would be unfortunate if that principle was departed from. When I move the first reading of the Bill I shall endeavour to give to the House some figures which will indicate the number of returned men who have been placed in the public service.

Mr. DEVLIN: Any remarks which I make this afternoon I shall not direct against the minister ad hoc respecting the subject now under discussion; I shall rather direct them, generally speaking, to the Government which is responsible for the legislation we are now called upon to consider. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has perhaps borne greater burdens than the ordinary man could bear; he has occupied several positions with respect to different departments. This is accounted for partly by the fact that the Postmaster-General (Hon. Mr. Blondin) is not in this House. Then, a number of ministers went away and the hon. gentleman took their places while they were travelling. It seems incongruous to have called for the return of these ministers and not to have them here to give a word of explanation when such an important matter as this is before the Committee. I direct my remarks particularly to the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell). There has been, not only throughout the country but within the Civil Service, a great deal of unrest that might have been obviated had a proper course been adopted at the proper time. I speak now as a member representing a rural constituency, and with a very strong feeling that right and justice should prevail in the Civil Service as well as in all other classes of the community. Some years ago, when the bonus was spoken about, I offered a suggestion on the floor of the House that in view of the increased cost of living——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the hon. member purposes discussing the matter of bonus to the Civil Service, I might say that immediately after the committee disposes of this matter, I purpose taking up the vote in connection with the bonus so that my hon. friend will then be enabled to discuss this particular subject.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would be delighted to do so, but the suggestions I mean to offer to the minister are such as he might yet in time embody in his Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Go on.

Mr. DEVLIN: I was saying that when the question of the bonus came up, I suggested to the House that owing to the increased cost of living there should be an all round increase in the wages of the civil servants of this country sufficient to meet that increased cost, and that coupled with that, a bonus should be given to put civil servants in a position to meet some of the back debts which they might have contracted owing to the insufficiency of their salaries and the constantly increasing cost of the articles they are obliged to purchase. The Government in its wisdom at the time gave a bonus to a certain class in the Service, namely, to those earning under $1,800, and nothing at all was received by the poor devil who might have been thirty or thirty-five years in the Service, as I know some of them had been, and who happened to have a salary of $2,000 with a large family to support and under greater obligations in many instances than the man earning $1,800. Had my suggestion been adopted at the time, the minister would have got rid of one of the great reasons of unrest in the Civil Service to-day. The second reason for the present unrest in the Civil Service as well as the unrest throughout the country is the fact that the Government has taken no earnest steps to meet the profiteer. Whenever it was a case of capital, well, capital had its way with the Government; but when it was a question of the ordinary consumer needing redress, then the Government was inactive or indolent or refused entirely to do anything. We have had one Minister of Labour who did his best according to his own light as minister of that department. He followed on exactly the same course as that on which the new Minister of Labour is following, but he was not considered to have had enough initiative or to have succeeded, and he was, therefore, set aside. We have now the same difficulties over again in an aggravated form and the ministry—and I am not blaming my hon. friend, but I am blaming the ministry generally—have been indolent, inactive, and have not taken the proper steps to meet the increased cost of living and to keep down the undue profits that have been made in this country for some years past. It was mentioned to-day that there was a report by Sir George Murray, but the Government does not even know to-day what Sir George Murray's report was. There were reports from other commissioners, but the Government does not know what those reports were. There is a report now from some experts from the city of Chicago, and I want, as a Canadian, here and now to enter my protest against the action of the Civil Service Commission or the Government in going over to the United States to get a few accountants, or experts if you will, to do work in Canada that Canadians are quite competent to do. I do not think it is any arrogance upon my part to say that I have confidence that we have in Canada as good brains as those that are to be found in the country to the south of us. It is true there is a great deal of good and a great deal of money in the United States. It is true that from time to time it becomes necessary to go to the United States to borrow money. It is true that at times it becomes necessary to truck and trade with the Americans. All that is a business arrangement; but when we are told upon the floor of this House that in order to get brains enough to remodel the Civil Service, we have to go to the United States for them, I, as a Canadian, protest and wish to make that protest as formal and as strong as I know how. The money has been paid for these men, and how much has been paid? When the Supplementary Estimates were under consideration, we were told that $46,650 were expended, and that is a pretty good pay for these American experts. Have they gone away yet? There are some cruel enough to say that after they have finished the re-classification of the deputy ministers, chief accountants and other high officials of the different departments, they are going to enter upon the gigantic work of re-classifying the Cabinet. I give that rumour for what it is worth; it may be true or it may not be true. If they are capable of classifying this Cabinet, it is no business nor concern of mine, but I wish them God speed, and I think they will have a difficult task before them. It is unfortunately the case in this country, and it may be so in many other countries, that when it is a question of paying a man a very high salary, that man's case immediately assumes such proportions that it must be considered at once; but when we, the poor men of Canada, who represent the poorer classes, the wage earners, the consumers of Canada, come before the Government, we cannot get from it that information, much less that action that we ask for.

What is the purport of this resolution which the minister pleads with us to pass, telling us not to consider for a moment the lack of information afforded, and that the information will be given at some later date? I accept the minister's word that the information will be given at some later date, but we are told that from time to time. We longed for the return of the ministers in order that unrest might be allayed in Canada, and what were we told yesterday: Wait one month for the report of the commission and then the Government will tell you what it will be able to do. While I do not want to charge the Government with not doing things they cannot do, and while I am with them in the upholding of law and order in this country, there is another way of settling the present unrest, and it is not necessary to wait another month. Action may be taken at once. Get after your profiteers; lower the cost of living, so that the wage-earner can keep his family and himself, and then you will settle all the unrest in this country. This is not a matter that has cropped up since the war ceased, nor did it begin during the war; we have been complaining of it ever since 1912. The Government knows that the cost of living has been increasing ever since that year. The Government was prepared for it, and they got together certain combinations to work out means. The Government threw aside the old Conservative party, and formed a new party, called the Unionist party. True and staunch Conservatives had to take back seats in order that the new blood which had been allied with other parties in the past could take the reins in their hands and meet the situation. What has been the outcome of it all? A dismal failure, disunion in the Cabinet, assassination among the ranks; and that has contributed to the unrest in the Civil Service.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman is not confining his remarks to the resolution before the Committee.

Mr. DEVLIN: If I am not to say anything further about what I consider to be the cause of unrest in the Civil Service of this country I shall resume my seat.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In my constituency, in 1914, a man by the name of Charles Gauvreau, and another by the name of Alfred Trudel, volunteered to go overseas, but were rejected as medically unfit. They were subsequently appointed fire rangers, which position they held up to this year, when they were discharged by the Civil Service Commission on the ground that the position must go to a returned soldier. Now, a returned soldier may mean a man who has only visited Argyll House, or a man like my brother, who has been in France about fifty miles behind the firing line. If Trudel and Gauvreau had been discharged for cause I would have no grievance, but I say that the principle is wrong for the Civil Service to give preference to a returned soldier who may not have gone any farther than England over men who were perfectly willing to sacrifice their lives for the Empire and who actually volunteered. If this point is not covered by the Bill I would ask the minister to give it his consideration.

There is another feature. I understand that under the present Act a civil servant holding a permanent position cannot be removed except for cause. Now a fire ranger is appointed every spring, and unless there is reason for dismissing him he should be re-appointed every spring. The position is of a permanent nature, although a fire ranger cannot be appointed for twelve months in the year. I would ask the minister to see that provision is made in the Bill that men who were willing to serve their country but were rejected as medically unfit shall not be removed from the service except for cause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not acquainted with the facts in the case of these two men other than my hon. friend has stated them, but I shall make inquiries of the commission and later shall make a statement in the House or personally to the hon. member. I quite appreciate his viewpoint that these two men should be regarded as permanent appointees, and not merely casual employees. I do not like to express an opinion one way or the other, however, until I have learned something from the commission as to the reasons for dismissing these men.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (translation): I understand that the object of this resolution is to enable the members of Parliament to make suggestions. Well, I feel in duty bound to offer a few suggestions. First of all, I object to and protest against the idea of increasing the number of commissioners from three to five. I know the present commissioners personally, I believe them to be mindful of their duty, and I do not think the Civil Service or the country has suffered from the fact that the commissioners are but three in number.

It occurred to me that the hon. Prime Minister was perhaps encumbered with the present number of his ministers. Journeys to Europe being now at an end, we have two Ministers of Militia, and the position of commissioner might be deemed suitable for one of them or perhaps for the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), as a reward due to the services he has rendered the Union Government, as all the ministers have now returned and there no longer exists a vacancy.

However, I strenuously object to and protest against this additional expense of $12,000. While not being opposed to the increase of $1,000 a year, which the commissioners are being granted, I think the question of increases to employees in the lower grades should have been dealt with in the same resolution. I understand that the Bill will come up at a later date and we shall know, then be enlightened as to the salaries of those employees. In the meantime we can only guess, though we know that the Government has always been in the habit of favouring the high paid officials and of overlooking the subordinates altogether. The hon. minister who has charge of this Bill will allow me to tell him—

An hon. MEMBER (translation): He does not understand.

Mr. FONTAINE (translation): If he does not understand, let him ask for a translation of my remarks. He will allow me to tell him, once for all, that, this time, he must not overlook the lower grades.

In the city of Hull, we have a large number of public servants and, a startling, nay incredible fact, there are among them some who are earning but $50 a month. I wonder how one can think of adding $1,000 or $2,000 to the salaries of the commissioners and deputy ministers without providing also an increase for those employees who do not even get enough to buy bread for their families.

Mr. Chairman, I would not like to wander from the question, but it seems to me that I may be permitted to digress and say that one of the reasons for all the unrest prevailing to-day among the workers is the failure on the part of the Government to look after the destitute and small wage earners. Had I the honour of being a member of the Government—

Mr. CANNON (translation): You should rather say, the misfortune.

Mr. FONTAINE (translation): My hon. friend from Dorchester thinks "misfortune" would be the better word. I shall follow his advice and say again: had I the misfortune of being a member of the Government, I would consider it my first duty to find a way of lowering the cost of living, of protecting the poor and destitute people, instead of being only concerned about those who got large salaries.

I do not intend saying any more at this moment, as we shall have the opportunity of reverting to this matter when the Bill is laid before us; but it seems to me those are things which the hon. ministers should at once look into. They should show greater concern, because if the Government did nothing to mend the present state of affairs, the strike which is now going on in the West and threatens to spread eastward, may extend to the public servants here.

While I have no desire to advocate strikes, I may say it is quite natural for those who get inadequate salaries to be dissatisfied and to try in every way to better themselves.

Conditions are very serious to-day and I must protest against the inaction of the Government who do nothing at all for the consumers and who, since they are in power, speaking not only of the present Administration but also of the former, since 1911, have exclusively concerned themselves about the millionaires and the manufacturers, without doing anything for the people.

Why should they be so solicitous of commissioners who are earning $5,000 or $6,000 a year? Why should they be so concerned about deputy ministers who are getting $5,000 or $6,000 in salaries, when they do not care at all for the men who only receive $50 or $75 a month?

Mr. Chairman, when we have to pay such high prices as we are now paying for food, when we have to give 75 cents a pound for butter and $10 for a pair of shoes, and when the Government give but $50 a month to some of those employees, it is the Government, I say, who are responsible for all those evils and I cannot blame the men who go on strike under such circumstances.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for his references to myself; I appreciate them very much. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the salary schedules which relate to the lower positions in the Civil Service will show a marked increase over the existing rates, and the bonus which must be given this year will, of course, add to that. I would like to impress upon the hon. gentleman, and upon every member of the House, that all people in the Civil Service cannot receive the same compensation because their responsibilities and duties differ. I know of no other principle upon which any body can be employed and paid than according to the nature of the responsibilities that are assumed and the duties that are discharged. Unfortunately it may happen at times that those in the lower positions in the public service are unable to get a salary which perhaps may be deemed suitable, having regard to adverse or unfavourable conditions which affect the cost of living. That is to be regretted, but it is applicable to all other classes of work as well as Government activities. However, I hope when the hon. gentleman sees that classification schedule he will be pleased with the compensation to be given to those in the lower ranks of the public service.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are one or two things which I deem it my duty to bring to the notice of the minister in connection with this Resolution and the Civil Service. In the first place, I think work is imposed on the Civil Service Commission that they should not be called upon to perform. The resolution seeks to appoint a body of men, not exceeding five in number, of whom four will receive $6,000 and one $7,000 a year. Such a body of men is almost equal in number to the membership of any of our Supreme Courts. Now we all know what important duties are discharged by a judge of the Supreme Court, and what important work the Supreme Court in any province, as a body, is supposed to perform. It would be very absurd if we were to appoint judges, with salaries ranging from $7,000 to $8,000, to do work that could well be performed by a justice of the peace. No Government could justify such a proceeding as that, yet it is exactly what is happening here. The appointment of a tide waiter in the county of Guysborough, the appointment of a fishery guardian in the county of Pictou, the appointment of a postmaster in the county of Victoria, which I have the honour to represent, thousands and thousands of such appointments are being made all over the country, and we have a commission sitting in Ottawa to whom we are to pay $31,000 a year in salaries alone, not to mention incidental expenses, to deal with matters of that nature. I think such a proceeding is highly improper. I am entirely in favour of appointing big men to handle big questions; but I certainly do not approve of having a commission, whose members are paid large salaries, to deal with small matters that can be dealt with by the most ordinary individual in the country. I submit to the minister that he should cut down the volume of work which is imposed upon this commission. Let him remove the manifold appointments of a petty nature that the commission now have to deal with, and let the appointments be made in some other way. It transpired last night, during our questioning of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the hundreds and thousands of fishery guardians that must be appointed in this country within the next few months, are first recommended by the fishery overseer, and then the nominations are sent to Ottawa to be confirmed by the Civil Service Commission. Is that not a work of supererogation? Is not that taking up the time and energy of the Civil Service Commission to no good purpose? In such cases the commission must of necessity accept the recommendation of the overseer, and must trust him to nominate the right man. If he has done so, why not put the appointee in office at once, and thus cut down the enormous amount of petty work which now goes to the commission, and the dealing with which does not require any executive ability at all. I submit that if this is done much unnecessary work on the part of the commission can be dispensed with. It is not fair to ask the Civil Service Commissioners to sit down in solemn form and to pass judgment as to who shall be tide waiter at Big Bras d'Or, or who shall be fishery guardian in British Columbia. All these appointments could be dealt within another way, and in a manner more expeditious and less expensive to the country. I certainly protest against increasing the number of Civil Service Commissioners from three to five in order to deal with matters of this kind. If the real questions that should engage the attention of big, capable, brainy, well paid men were cut down to the class of work that should be done, you will find that three men could do it just as well as five, and with less trouble.

There is another thing about these examinations. I suppose the Government think they are conferring a favour upon any candidate for a position in the Civil Service whom they let in with an easy examination. I do not view it in that way. I do not think that a worse service could be done any young man in this country than to set an examination by which he could get into a lower class at an age between 18 and 25. He gets in after a certain examination. He is there until the next stage of promotion arrives, five or six years afterwards, when the age for learning has passed, when the time for going to school has gone and he finds himself up against a stone wall. He never can pass any more examinations and he has to stay where he is or go back into the world to seek some other work. I submit to the minister that he should always have in view the admission of good men to the service who would be capable of development and promotion from one stage to another and that he would in the different classes pass such an educational examination in the very first instance as to qualify a person educationally for promotion in that class until he reaches the top.

I am not in favour of asking candidates for the Civil Service to pass a high examination in Greek, Latin, geometry, trigonometry, and all those difficult subjects. I am in favour of a good English, or French education. I want a man to be a good writer, a good speller, to have a good knowledge of the English or French language, and such general knowledge as would bring him to a standard perhaps equal to our grade 12 in our curriculum, or qualify him to pass a first class teacher's examination. You have a man of good common sense and fair practical education. Put him at the bottom if you like but qualify him once for all so that if he is ambitious and capable he may look forward to getting to the top. It is no friendship or favour to any person to give him an easy examination whereby he can get into the first grade. He spends some years there, he cannot go to school again, he cannot pass any further examination and he is blocked for the rest of his life. I wish the minister to keep that in view when dealing with the educational test. As I read the examination papers and the curriculum prescribed for Civil Service examinations, it appears to me that it is not a fair test. In some things it goes too high, and you require an examination on subjects that keep many good people out of the service. People get in by reason of their ability to pass these tests who are not as good as those who would get in if the test were along the line that I have suggested.

My whole remarks come down to this: That too much small business is imposed on the commission. Hundreds of thousands of cases which come before the commission might be dealt with by a most ordinary officer at an ordinary salary, and my other point is that I think the educational test should receive more consideration and that it should be conducted in such a way that it would secure for the service the right kind of man and the right kind of woman.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

SUPPLY.

VOTE TO PROVIDE A BONUS FOR CERTAIN CIVIL SERVANTS.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

To provide for the continuance of the payment to those employees of the Civil Service to whom a War Bonus (including provisional allowance under item 419 voted at the last Session of Parliament) was authorized to be paid under the provisions of the Order in Council dated the tenth day of December, 1918, and the Orders in Council incorporated therewith, or in amendment thereof, and who are still in the Service, of amounts equal to one-fourth of the amounts so authorized to be paid to them during the fiscal year 1918-19, by way of a War Bonus for the first quarter of the fiscal year 1919-20, $2,500,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will you kindly explain that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Hon. gentlemen no doubt are acquainted with the fact that last year a war bonus was granted to the Outside Service and also to members of the Inside Service. The bonus was first granted to the employees in the postal service, I think in September last, but it was not made applicable to those who were receiving a salary in excess of $1,800. Later, the bonus was extended to large numbers of the Inside Civil Service, but again it was not made applicable to those who were in receipt of a salary of over $1,800. It was deemed advisable and necessary to continue this bonus during the present year as conditions affecting the cost of living had not changed any since last year. It was not desirable to vote this sum of money by Order in Council—hon. members opposite, I am sure, will approve of that—but it was thought better we should come to Parliament and ask for a special sum to carry on this bonus as it was paid last year for the months of April, May, and June.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will it stop then?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, that is not the idea of the Government. As hon. members are aware there were many qualifications and limitations last year as to payment of the amount and its receipt by members of the Service. It was thought that there were some inequalities and, perhaps injustices, in the method used in this regard. The Government accordingly submitted the whole matter to the Civil Service Commission, and we are hoping for a report from it shortly. In the meantime we wish the bonus to be paid as it was last year. Towards the end of June we hope to make a new submission to Parliament and ask for a larger vote. This now merely carries the bonus on for three months.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there is an experimental farm. I am informed by the labourers on that farm that the men higher up, the superintendent and the foremen, have received a bonus, but that the ordinary working men have not. If that is the policy the Government is going to pursue this year, I wish to register my protest against it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are many persons in the employ of the Government who receive a daily wage, which in most places is at the market rate. For instance, in the city of Ottawa there are many classes of employees, tradesmen of one kind and another, who receive the market rate of wages. The bonus did not apply to that class, because it was thought they were receiving what was the current market rate for their labour. I assume that upon the same principle, possibly, these persons to whom my hon. friend refers did not receive the bonus. It may be that they are not receiving a fair wage. If so, that should be investigated. I shall be very glad to discuss the matter with the Minister of Agriculture and later advise my hon. friend privately or in the House, just exactly what is the position.

Mr. ROWELL: May I supplement what my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce has said? The matter is dealt with by Order in Council of the 10th day of December, 1918, in this form:

All persons known as mechanical or labouring men employed at a yearly or monthly salary or wage shall be entitled to receive the bonus. All those employed at a daily wage at current rates of pay shall not be entitled to receive the bonus. All those employed at a daily wage at less than current rates shall be entitled to receive such bonus within the limits defined by the said Order in Council of November 7, 1918, and this report as the minister in charge of the department in which such person is employed may recommend and the Governor in Council approve.

My hon. friend will see that the object was that where any men were employed by the day at less than the current rate of wages—

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Who is to define what is the current rate?

Mr. ROWELL: I presume the officers of the department. The minister would be the final authority. He is the man who has to recommend what sum, if any, should be added to the man's pay to bring it up to the current rate of wages.

Mr. MORPHY: Are those men on the permanent list or not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are not regarded as permanent employees of the department, although many of them continue in the public service for a long time. This is the principle involved: It was assumed that the classes referred to in the portion of the Order in Council just read by the President of the Council had received increased pay by reason of war conditions, and in that way had received their bonus. Now it might happen in case of the employees of the experimental farm in the eastern part of Quebec that they were overlooked entirely, and perhaps their pay was not increased at all, which of course would be unfair.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to call the attention of the minister to the same thing that I have always complained about in this House, namely, that there is nobody to look after these men. They are not acquainted with the Orders in Council, they do not know whether they are permanent employees or not, and they are standing back too frightened to ask. When the miniter says they get an increase in wages in accordance with the increase caused by the war, he forgets entirely the increased cost of living of these wage-earners, who have to work daily year in and year out as if they were permanent employees, but are not so treated. I repeat again—and I hope the minister will take it into consideration—just what I said the other night that it is the easiest thing in this House for a man who is getting a salary of $4,500 to have it raised suddenly to $6,000—a jump of $1,500—as happened in the Estimates under discussion at the time; while these poor men all over the Dominion, in Ottawa and outside of it, with families to maintain, notwithstanding the increased cost of living are working along at $600 a year. I do not think that any able-bodied employee of the Government with a wife and family to support should be asked to work for this Government or anybody else at $600 a year. It is about time that the Government realized that it is their duty to look into the lower branches of the Service through some specially appointed person, whose duty it will be to ferret out injustices and to remedy them.

Mr. ROBB: At the outbreak of the war certain civil servants joined the forces and were given their regular pay, in addition to which they received their pay as officers in the army, and, if they were married, their families received separation allowances. In many cases those men never went to France; some got safety-first jobs in England and others got safety-first jobs in Canada. Is it the policy of the Government, in addition, to favour those men with a bonus, while employees, as represented by my hon. friend from Kamouraska, are given no bonus whatever?

Mr. ROWELL: Civil servants who receive both civil and military pay are not entitled to the bonus under the Order in Council or under this vote.

Mr. COWAN: Nor do they receive separation allowances at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Civil servants for whom I have a great deal of sympathy are the Dominion Police. They are a highly respectable body of men and have rendered, during the last few years, most important services to Canada. I understand that last year they did not receive the bonus. I do not think it is fair that they should be overlooked; in my opinion they should be treated just the same as other public servants.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend perhaps will correct me if I am in error, but my impression is that the Dominion Police are not civil servants. They are under the Department of Justice. The fact that they are not civil servants would, I assume, be the reason why they do not come under this Order in Council. It would be quite a legitimate matter for discussion whether they should not receive some additional compensation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Dominion Police are as much entitled to a bonus as office employees, day labourers, and others. They are subjected to examinations; they are men of character and ability, and it seems to me that they are entitled to the same treatment as that which is accorded to other members of the public service.

Mr. FRIPP: I wish to support the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) with regard to the Dominion Police. I cannot see any distinction in this matter between a member of the Dominion Police and a Public Works employee in Ottawa. Labourers in the Public Works Department have received this bonus. There is no real distinction between the permanency of a member of the Dominion Police and the permanency of a labourer in the Public Works Department. Moreover, the Dominion Police are not, I understand, paid as well as the City Police Force in Ottawa, and they have not the same advantages. They have not the superannuation, and many other privileges and advantages that the City Police Force have are not enjoyed by the Dominion Police. Therefore I strongly support the contention of the member for Maisonneuve that the Dominion Police should get the benefit of this bonus.

Mr. KEEFER: I concur in what has been said with regard to the Dominion Police. They should be put in the same position as any other members of the public service who receive the bonus. They render efficient service, and are entitled to every consideration.

Mr. ROWELL: I am under the impression that the question of a bonus or of increased compensation to the Dominion Police is under advisement by the Department of Justice. I cannot speak with certainty in the absence of the acting minister, but he will be here in a day or two, and I will bring the matter to his attention.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend attend to that? The minister is away, and the acting minister is away, too.

Mr. ROWELL: The acting minister will be here to-morrow, and I will bring the matter to his attention.

Mr. POWER: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to two other classes of civil employees who have not as yet obtained any bonus. I do not know about the employees of the Dominion arsenal at Lindsay, but I do know about those at Quebec. They are employed by the hour, the rate being fifty or fifty-five cents an hour for mechanics. They have carried on during the war; they have done good work, but they appear to have had very little, if any, wage increase during the war, and they have not been brought under the operation of this bonus. Another class which is, perhaps, even more deserving, comprises certain men employed in the Marine Department. Up to August, 1918, the employees of the Marine Department in Quebec had not received an increase of salary for ten or fifteen years. They were working at a great deal below current rates of pay, so much so that the Marine Department, which is not usually very generous in these matters, were finally obliged to grant them a very small increase. I went into the matter thoroughly with the department at the time and found that mechanics, boiler-makers and so on, in the Marine Department at Quebec were earning about two-thirds of what men doing similar work were earning outside. These employees should be brought under the operation of the Order in Council which deals with the bonus. Furthermore, I cannot understand why a day labourer, as such, should not obtain a bonus while a salaried man does. Of course, I see the viewpoint of the minister: That the wages of day labourers have increased—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Especially where they are organized, and in cities.

Mr. POWER: Whether they are organized or not, their wages certainly have not increased in the city of Quebec. Owing to the benevolent attitude of the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries an attempt at organization on the part of the labourers in the Marine Department in Quebec city was so well squelched that not one of the men has been able to return to his position. I am afraid therefore, that the argument about organization does not go very far. As organization is impossible under a Government department in Quebec—although it seems to be quite possible elsewhere—these men should be given an adequate bonus and be treated the same as other employees in the public service have been treated.

Mr. McCOIG: I have seen Estimates go through providing for increases of $500 and $1,000 respectively to deputy ministers and other officials. As a matter of fact, we are passing Estimates daily increasing the salaries of almost all employees the Government has, from deputy ministers down. Let me put in a plea for the man who is the most deserving of all the employees of the Government so far as increased pay is concerned, and that is the man who delivers the rural mail throughout the different parts of the country. For instance, one rural mail courier whose route is about twenty-five miles long, gets $750 a year. His contract calls for the supplying of a horse and rig and of two horses when the roads are bad, and he has to furnish these horses and maintain them and his rigs, at that handsome wage. When we are giving additional pay to employees of the Government—in some cases where they have not asked for it—we should consider the case of these men. They are held down to their contracts and in many cases they are working for starvation wages. The action of the minister would meet with general approval if he would give some assurance that an additional allowance will be made to the men who have signed contracts to deliver mail in all kinds of weather for the paltry sums which they are receiving.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have been speaking to the President of the Council and to my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) about the matter of giving consideration to a certain class of men who are employed in this building.

I have listened to the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) reading the Order in Council and the regulations under which those increases are made. He speaks of the current rate of wages, but it is hard to determine the current rate of wages. If the pay of any member of this House was to be measured by the current rate of wages out in the street, his pay might be cut down materially, and I suppose the man who is working at a carpenter job or digging a drain or anything like that, would be much better off than any of the members.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A bonus was not withheld from the Parliamentary staff upon the ground set forth in that part of the Order in Council read by my colleague. The Order in Council provided that the bonus should be paid only to those who were employed during the whole year, and I think that pretty nearly every person whom my hon. friend has in mind is merely a sessional employee. It was under another part of the Order in Council that they were denied the bonus.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I would be very brief if the minister would give me some hope that those men would be considered. Their salaries have not been increased; indeed nothing has been done for them. If he would increase their pay in some way, I do not care whether he calls it a bonus or not, it would be of great assistance to them. There are men in this class that I speak of who are bookkeepers; some of them have charge of many men and are doing particular work, and yet they have not received any increase. Some of them come here from long distances and while they used to get a free ticket to come here, they have now to pay their way, and the cost of living has no doubt increased their expenses when they have come here.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Have they had any increases in recent years?

Mr. McKENZIE: No increase whatever. I have had a talk with one of them who has been here for nearly twenty years and who is getting exactly the same pay as he was receiving twenty years ago. I do not care whether you call it a bonus or an increase of pay or an indemnity, the only thing I am after is that those men who come here from year to year, who, by reason of their coming here, have been to some extent disqualified for any other kind of work, who like to come here and who must come here to keep things going, should not be singled out and told that when others are receiving advances they must remain in the same old rut. I have spoken about this matter several times before, and I hope that the case of these men will be considered.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I understood the minister to say that the Government were considering giving a higher bonus, and I should like it to be made clear that they are also considering providing a bonus to Civil Servants who are receiving more than $1,800 a year. I can see no reason why the Government should fix this arbitrary maximum of $1,800 and stop there. A short time ago the Government and the House adopted a principle that shows conclusively that the bonus should not stop at $1,800. When they gave an increase to deputy ministers, they recognized the principle that a man who received more than $1,800 a year might be so affected by the increased cost of living as to require extra remuneration. I know of several cases of men who are receiving more than $1,800 a year and who are not able, upon the salaries they are receiving at present, to keep themselves and their families in the condition in which they are entitled to live. The cost of living to them has increased in proportion to the way in which it has increased to men earning less than $1,800 a year, and I hope the Government will consider the advisability of extending the bonus to men receiving more than $1,800.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the Government given any consideration to placing in the class of Civil Servants those country and village postmasters who have to devote all their time to the duties of office? I do not mean those postmasters where the post office is a side line. In my county I presume there would not be more than two or three of the class to which I refer and they should be classified along with the regular Civil Servants.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They have not been up to date, but the classification will show a division of all postmasters of Canada into ten ranks. In some cases this does not mean an increase in salary, for rural post offices, but it will affect the compensation. I might say in reply to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) that members of the Civil Service receiving an income in excess of $1,800 have placed before the Government what they deem to be their grievance by reason of the withholding of the bonus from them and the matter is now under consideration. Hon. gentlemen will understand that until the re-classification of the Service is settled and the salaries for the current year determined, it is difficult to decide what bonus should be paid, because the re-classification will place some men in a more favourable position than they were in before. Shortly after the re-classification is submitted to Parliament, we should be in a position to announce our policy respecting the whole service.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the case of postal employees in the West. I refer particularly to most of the employees in the Strathcona post office which is a semi-staff office. These men have an initial salary of $600 per annum and with the temporary bonus and some other living allowance which is given to them, their salary is brought up to between $900 and $1,000. The point on which these men have a grievance is that the ordinary mail carrier who does not require the same amount of clerical ability is drawing more money than the postal employees in the office. Under the present strike conditions prevailing throughout Western Canada, these men have remained loyal to the service inasmuch as they have not gone out on strike, and last year when the Winnipeg and Calgary officers went out on strike, these men remained on duty in spite of the fact that they felt they had a distinct grievance and that it was not being looked after by the department. This method of granting an initial salary of $600 a year which must be supplemented by bonuses and living allowances is peculiar, and I hope the minister will assure me that in the re-classification all these anomalies will be wiped out, and that the salary will be fixed, so that a man will know definitely what his salary is, and that if he is getting $600 or $1,100 a year that amount will not be reduced by the stoppage of any bonus, living allowance or any subterfuge of that kind. I gathered, and I hope correctly, from what the minister said, that in the re-classification provision will be made for the adjustment of cases such as I have mentioned.

Mr. ROWELL: The minimum salary of the postal clerks at the present time is $600, and a living allowance of $180 has been paid for many years. There is also a war bonus, which brings the minimum up to $1,080. The maximum is $1,880, which is very much higher than the maximum of the letter carriers. The re-classification will fix the minimum and the maximum salary, and will provide for a bonus due to the high cost of living.

In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. McCoig), provision has been made whereby if a rural mail contractor thinks his contract is at too low a price, he may ask to have it reconsidered and new tenders called for. We passed an Estimate the other evening for $375,000 to meet the increased cost to the country due to new tenders having been called from parties under the old contract.

With respect to the matter to which the leader of the Opposition drew my attention, namely, where contractors are held to their contract if no new tenders are submitted, I am looking into that matter; I think it should be remedied.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Has any provision been made for fixing a minimum rate per mile for the rural mail couriers?

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. PAPINEAU: What was the amount of the bonus paid during the last fiscal year?

Mr. ROWELL: It would approximate $800,000 per month.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do temporary employees come under this?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I wish to protest against the habit we are falling into of granting increases without due consideration of where we are likely to land as a result. First of all, I do not like the term "war bonus" in this item; I do not think there is any justification for it. I believe that where competition prevails you will get much better service, and I think that the feeling of unrest throughout the country to-day is in no small measure attributable to the action of Governments in this country in fixing the hours of work and the wages in the Service. Once people get into the Civil Service they receive so much in, I fear, many instances regardless of the service they render. There is no competition. In the case of the rural mail couriers, however, who tender for contracts, and where competition prevails, the lowest tender is accepted even if the sum is only half what another civil servant is getting who is not rendering anything like as great service. In view of the fact that a commission is now inquiring into the relations between employers and employees in Canada, I think this item should stand until we know the findings of that commission. The Government of this country, not this or the preceding Government, but all governments are responsible for fixing the hours of labour in the service, which I believe are from six to seven hours per day. I believe the fact that men and women in the Service do not have to work more than six or seven hours a day is largely responsible for the unrest that prevails in Canada to-day, and which is in no small measure responsible for the high cost of living. The short day attracts people to the Civil Service. The real creators of wealth in this country, the people who are producing food, are also attracted to the city and the Service by the short day and once they get in the Service they think all they have to do is to hold a gun to the head of the Government to get anything they want. There is no reason why a civil servant should not leave the Service if he or she can better themselves outside, and I think the time has come when we should quit coddling civil servants. We should deal with them as other people are dealt with, as though we expected them to render value for the salaries received. I know the Government is in a very difficult position in dealing with these people, but I think the time has come for plain speaking, and we might just as well face the issue now as at any time in the future.

Progress reported.

At six oclock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 19 (from the Senate), to Consolidate and Amend the Railway Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was under consideration by the Committee we had considered and adopted all of the clauses with the exception of clauses 34, 210, 358, and 374. We will now take up clause 34.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Before taking up clause 34, I would like to revert to clause 325. I understand that an amendment has been made to this clause as it originally stood, a fact of which I only learned yesterday, having, unfortunately, been absent from the House owing to indisposition.

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry but the hon. gentleman is out of order in discussing the clause referred to, which has been adopted in his absence. The hon. gentleman, however, can by unanimous consent take the opinion of the Committee on a motion that the clause be reconsidered.

Mr. McQUARRIE: If you will permit me I would like to do that a little later on. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) is desirous of speaking to the clause which has been called, but I would like if I might be permitted to move later on to reconsider clause 325.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman can do that at any time if there is no objection.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I object to the clause being reconsidered. A deputation from the city of Hamilton was heard in regard to it, and after a full discussion the Committee unanimously passed the clause in its present form. I for one object to the subject being re-opened.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I have no apology to offer for moving an amendment to this clause. It is true that in the early stages of the session I gave notice of a Bill which was worded similarly to this amendment. It is also true that the amendment went before the special committee appointed to consider this Bill and was defeated by a small majority. Nevertheless, I believe that what I propose is in the public interest, and I hope the Committee will insist upon its being placed upon the statute book at the earliest possible moment, in order that the conditions which have existed in past years may not continue in the years to come.

The amendment I propose is not as far-reaching as the one that was submitted to the special committee, and for this reason I laid it before Sir Henry Drayton, Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and asked him to eliminate from it the words "in regard to ocean borne traffic." I also asked him to re-construct clause 358 of the Bill so as to confer upon the Railway Commission control over the maximum rates to be charged; that is to say, that the commission should not have control over any other rates than the maximum rates. Sir Henry Drayton was good enough to re-draft the amendments in accordance with my wishes and I will submit them to the Committee. Sir Henry Drayton's letter to me on the subject is as follows:—

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.
Office of The Chief Commissioner.

Ottawa, May 23, 1919.

Re Water borne traffic.

Dear Mr. Armstrong,—

You ask me to consider the amendments submitted, which read as follows:—

"Privilege and Concession to be under control of Board.

"(A) 1. With respect to any privilege or concession given by any company or express company, or by any person owning or controlling any such steamboat or vessel as is in the next paragraph mentioned, and where any privilege or concession is given by any such person or by any company or express company to any person or class of business, or in any part of Canada, the Board may order that such privilege or concession be discontinued, or modified, or granted to any other person or class of business, or in any other part of Canada, either the same or in a modified form.

"Steamboats to be subject to regulations of Board of Railway Commissioners.

"Tariffs, etc., to be submitted to Board."

"(A) 2. With respect to the traffic accommodation, classification of freight, traffic agreements, tolls, and tariffs to be furnished, made, entered into, and charged in connection with and by steamboats, and other vessels carrying passengers or freight, or both, from one port or place in Canada to another port or place in Canada, and with respect to any place where such steamboats and vessels shall call for traffic, the time of all and duration of stay and all tariffs, tolls, traffic agreements, and classifications of freight charged, entered into, or adopted in connection with any such steamboat or vessel shall be submitted to the Board."

I understand that you are now of the view that the ocean traffic overseas ought not to be mixed up with the same kind of regulation which would apply from one port to another in Canada.

If the policy of water regulation be adopted at all, I would certainly think that you are right in this conclusion, and that the amendment you propose making to the draft above submitted, "or to a port or place outside of Canada," be stricken out.

You ask my view as to whether or not the sections are sufficient. The question as to whether there should be any regulation of water borne traffic, and whether the Board's powers should be extended in this direction, is one entirely of policy for Parliament and a matter on which I do not presume to advise or take any part; but if Parliament does adopt the principle, I would suggest that in addition to the amendment above set out, Section 358 be recast. The present Section 358, which is headed, "Water Traffic," would indicate that the Board's activities in this connection are limited to the traffic on water of any railway company. As I understand it, your proposal is to regulate all water carriers, whether such carriers be or be not railway companies. To give effect to your intention, I would, as stated, recast this section, and provide as follows:—

"Section 358. The provisions of this Act in respect of tolls, tariffs and joint tariffs shall, so far as deemed applicable by the Board, extend and apply to the traffic carried by any carrier (whether such carrier be or be not a railway company) by sea or by inland water, between any ports or places in Canada; and no freight or passenger rate shall be charged by any such water carrier in excess of the maximum rates from time to time approved by the Board; and no such water carrier shall engage in the business of transportation, whether of freight or of passengers, until such carrier shall have submitted to and the Board shall have approved its standard freight or passenger tariffs."

Yours faithfully,

H. L. Drayton,
Chief Commissioner.

J. E. Armstrong, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

That is the proposition which is now before the Committee. I may be asked my reasons for placing this matter under the control of the Railway Commission. As every hon. gentleman knows, that commission is one of the best organized public bodies that we have in Canada. It has given most excellent service, and in spite of the fact that it was constituted some ten years ago, and that tens of thousands of questions of vital interest to the public have been brought before it from time to time, not one of the decisions it has rendered has been questioned on the floor of Parliament. This speaks well for the Railway Commission, and therefore I cannot think of any more reliable body of men to have control of just such matters as we are considering to-night.

The reason for the creation of the Railway Commission was this: It was found advisable to appoint a body altogether separate and apart from the Department of Railways, that would stand between the public and the railways and deal out even-handed justice to the public in the face of the railway monopoly which then existed to a considerable extent. A somewhat similar situation exists to-day in regard to our waterborne traffic. There is on our large inland lakes, and in connection with our coastwise trade, a monopoly which controls the traffic on those waters, and the eight millions of people scattered throughout this country are unable to organize and protect themselves from the combines that exist in connection with water transportation. It must be remembered that in my amendment I have eliminated the ocean-borne traffic, its provisions being confined to lake, river and coastwise trade. That object has been achieved by striking out the words " or to a port or place outside of Canada." If the amendment carries, and the Bill as amended goes back to the Senate and becomes law, then all the vessels operating on our inland waters and in connection with our coastwise trade will come under the control of the Railway Commission as regards the maximum rates which they charge.

In connection with ocean traffic, I hope, at an early date, to submit to Parliament a proposal, which should meet with the general approval of all the members, whereby a Board appointed by the Dominion Government, and a Board appointed by the Imperial Government, shall be able to control rates. In this regard I might call your attention to the fact that this Government, in 1912, appointed Sir Henry Drayton a commissioner to go overseas and investigate conditions in regard to the rates charged on ocean-borne traffic. Sir Henry Drayton made a thorough investigation and submitted a report to Parliament. In 1916 he prepared a still more exhaustive report in which he definitely and distinctly stated that it would be in the public interest to have a joint Board established in order that there might be a joint control between the Imperial and Dominion Governments of tolls and tariff agreements.

In 1912-13 the Imperial Government appointed a Royal Commission to investigate the natural resources, trade, and legislation of certain portions of His Majesty's Dominions. That commission travelled throughout the different Dominions beyond the seas, Canada amongst the rest, and, on its return to England, prepared a number of valuable reports. In 1917 it submitted its final report to the Imperial Parliament. I will just read one clause from page 128 to show the urgent need of taking action to control ocean-borne traffic:

> Clause 538. Our investigations have satisfied us that in normal times the combination of shipowners is strong enough to limit the freedom of shippers, whose varied and detached interests make it difficult, if not impossible, for them to combine in any effective opposition, and that therefore, in principle, it is not desirable that the operations of the steamship companies should remain longer without some measure of Government supervision.

In this report you will find many recommendations, and it is with these recommendations that I intend to deal a little later on.

To-night we have before us the question of controlling the traffic on our inland waters and our coastwise trade, which is entirely separate from the matter to which I have been referring. It will be necessary for us to take into consideration the clauses 34 and 358 in connection with these amendments. They both deal with exactly the same subject, both being for the purpose of bringing our boats under the control of the Railway Commission. The Bill gives added powers to the Board of Railway Commissioners and we are most careful to see that in every detail we grant to the board complete control over traffic agreements and any concessions that may be made. We give them absolute control over almost everything connected with a railway system. Telegraphs, telephones, the wireless, and electrical development are all under Government control. But running alongside these great railway systems is another transportation system that has made wonderful progress within the last fifteen or twenty years. Last year there passed through the Sault canals, American and Canadian, freights to the value of $85,000,000. As that traffic passes on down through lake Huron and the river St. Clair and into lake Erie, it increases in volume. Practically all the traffic is carried by boats that are absolutely free to charge whatever tolls and make whatever arrangements they please, and neither this nor any other Canadian Government can say a word. These boats can call or not at our ports, take goods or not as they wish and are a law unto themselves. Let me call your attention to the increase in some of these rates. I will not have time to take many of them, but here, for instance, is a list of lake rates on wheat from Fort William and Port Arthur to Montreal for the undermentioned seasons of navigation:

Year.	Rate per bushel. Highest.	Lowest.	Average.
1911	6.50	4.25
1912	....	....	5.77
1913	6.34	4.8
1914	5.52	4.2
1915	5.20	3.59
1916	9.11	6.71
1917	11	3.
1918	11	6.

This is a statement prepared by Mr. Coats, Dominion statistician. I also had a statement prepared by Mr. Payne of the Department of Railways and Canals who says that rates went as high as 12½ cents per bushel.

Mr. J. D. REID: For what year?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Last year.

Mr. J. D. REID: He must have been crazy.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: From what ports?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: From Port Arthur to Montreal.

Mr. J. D. REID: Is that by rail?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: By boat.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I have a letter that contradicts that flatly.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The hon. gentleman can read the letter.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I will read it later.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: All right; it will be for the hon. gentleman to show that the statement I have given is not correct. In 1909 the steamboats on our inland waters were able to carry that same kind of grain from Port Arthur to Montreal for two cents a bushel, and it has been stated that they carried it for less than that. In face of the fact that these increases have been going on from year to year there seems to be no limit to them, and there is no reason in the world why they should not charge 15 or 20 cents a bushel. They could possibly reach that limit and I have no doubt that they would be only too glad to have that rate.

I shall show a little later on the enormous profits that some of these companies are making. It would appear they are taking full advantage of the opportunity confronting them. I repeat again, that these organizations are under no control whatsoever, and all that I am asking in this amendment is that the Railway Commission shall have the power to declare what the maximum rates shall be.

In the United States they have complete control over their boats engaged in inland water and coastwise trade. Not only have they that control, but I have under my hand a complete set of the ocean rates from the United States ports. Let me call your attention to their legislation. Under a statute of the most drastic character they absolutely control their boats engaged on inland waters and coastwise trade. For instance under this statute on April 18, 1919, the Shipping Board at Washington issued the following statement:

> Rates for shipment on the Great Lakes this season for ore, grain and coal were formally approved by the Shipping Board to-day as follows:—Ore 80 cents a ton; coal, 42½ cents a ton; grain from Lake Superior to Lake Erie and from Lake Michigan to Lake Erie, April and May loading, 3½ cents and 3 cents per bushel respectively; September, October and November grain loading, 3½ cents and 3 cents respectively; and December grain loading, including winter storage of vessels, 5 cents and 5 cents respectively; grain rates to Georgian Bay and Goderich were fixed at one-half cent per bushel; to Port Huron one-half cent per bushel and to Collingwood one-half cent per bushel under the Lake Erie rate. The rate to Detroit was made the same as to Lake Erie ports.

In Canada we have no such condition of agairs. Our shipowners can continue charging their ten cents or twelve cents a bushel or more if they please, and we are powerless to control them. Just a few words in regard to this Shipping Act which was passed by Congress in 1916. It is chapter 451 of the United States statutes and is intituled "An Act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing and creating a naval auxiliary and a naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its territories and possessions, and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes. This statute deals with the transfer of government-owned vessels to the board and the operation of American merchant vessels; it defines what is a common carrier; specifies the penalty for violation of the provisions of the Act—the authority of the board to approve or disapprove of rates—common carriers not to lower rates by unfair means—tariffs to be filed and displayed—through rates—restrictions on increasing charges—and so on. I might go on reading page after page of this Act, but I have indicated sufficient to show that it is of the most drastic nature and that it covers absolutely all boats owned, operated and controlled in the United States. A number of amendments have been made to that Act since 1916, every one of them in the direction of giving still greater control over their water-borne traffic. But we have made no effort whatever to control our water-borne traffic. It is said that the Railway Commission is given control over the through rates of boats owned controlled and operated by the railways of Canada. That is true, but they have only control over the through rate, and if that rate is charged without any unjust or unfair discrimination there is no cause for action on the part of the commission. As far as the railways are concerned, they have not appeared before any of the committees in opposition to this measure, and as far as I can learn they do not oppose it in any way.

But why should we allow the Railway Commission to have control over a certain portion of our water-borne traffic and not place the whole of it under their control? We have 8,500 vessels under Dominion register, employing 45,000 men. In this Act that we are to pass to-night, the railway men who are assisting in the operations of the railroads in Canada are surrounded with all sorts of safeguards. During the hearings before the Select Committee, those men sat day after day, week after week, and month after month, listening to the arguments to see that their rights were protected; while, on the contrary, the 45,000 employees, as far as I can learn, are absolutely at the mercy of the vessel owners. We assist water transportation in every way; we surround these men with special laws for their benefit. Not only do we do that, but within the last month when a member called attention to the fact that the United States had forbidden Canadian vessels to do any coastwise trade on their coast, the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce said that owing to that fact similar restrictions would be placed upon boats owned in the United States coming to do a coastwise trade on our coasts. So that these men are surrounded by every conceivable protection and are in the position of an absolute monopoly.

We protect our marine interests from foreign shippers; we buoy and light our rivers; we dredge them and we deepen our harbours; we build docks, piers, breakwaters, canals, without end, until we have expended over $400,000,000 of the people's money on these great enterprises. And in the face of that we find members on both sides of the House asking the Minister of Public Works to continue the expenditure of enormous sums of money on such works in different parts of the Dominion. What for? In order to aid navigation. But are we to continue this expenditure? The more money we expend the higher go the rates, and we are in the unfortunate position that we have no control over these vessel owners as to what they may charge or the manner in which they conduct their affairs. The people of Canada do not receive any interest on this money. We have abolished the tolls on our canals. We are spending a million and a half a year in order to operate these public works, all aids to navigation, but there is no apparent return to the people; the rates have been constantly increased rather than reduced. In addition to this, we have built elevators at Port Arthur, Fort William, Montreal and St. John. We have spent immense sums to facilitate the loading and unloading of grain. The capacity of the vessels has increased enormously. Not so many years ago we thought that a vessel which would carry 100,000 bushels of grain had reached about the limit of carrying capacity, but vessels are to-day carrying down our lakes 500,000 bushels in each cargo. When the Welland canal is opened these boats will be in a much more favourable position than they are in to-day. It is generally understood that rates on water-borne traffic should be at least one-third the rates by rail, but we find that the rates for water-borne traffic are kept as close as possible to the rail rates, those interested in the operation of these vessels desiring to make every dollar they can out of the people. We have expended enormous sums of money upon the construction of elevators in our western provinces. We have provided a grain commission. We see that the rates charged in these elevators are fair and reasonable and that the rates on the railways which carry the grain from the elevators to Port Arthur and Fort William are the very lowest that can be charged. From the day the grain is turned over to the vessel men at Port Arthur and Fort William and is loaded into their vessels until it reaches its destination —our own markets or the markets of the world—not one word can any one say with regard to the transportation charges made on that grain. That is surely not a reasonable or a fair position for the people of the West to be placed in. As I shall show you, the people of the East are in the same humiliating position. Why control only part of our transportation system? These undertakings have called for vast expenditures of money. No individual or corporate enterprise would undertake them. Canada has undertaken them; what return has she? An unregulated, irresponsible mercantile marine. Unless you place on the statute-book some such legislation as I am urging, you will continue to be subjected to excessive charges.

Either regulate and control this organization, or open the door to competitors. Expenses of carriage by water are small as compared with the expenses of carriage by rail. The shipowners have no roadbeds or tunnels or bridges to keep in repair, no terminal stations to maintain, no telegraphs or telephones to operate. Before the Committee these men told us of the severe storms that occur on our lakes and on our coasts, and how they materially interfere with the operation of the vessels. But have they taken into consideration the fact that during the winter season the railroads are able to do only about sixty per cent of the business they are capable of doing during the summer months? The amount of money invested in boats compared with that invested in railways is very small. Take, for instance, the 2,200 miles of splendid waterway that reaches on up into the heart of this continent. The first 1,000 miles from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Montreal may be traversed with perfect safety by vessels drawing thirty feet of water, and vessels drawing fourteen feet of water can proceed 1,200 miles further to Port Arthur and Fort William. When the Welland canal is completed a much better condition will be brought about. The investment in Canadian steamships plying on this route would, at a fair estimate, not exceed $50,000,000, while the cost of a railway covering about the same distance, at $100,000 a mile—which was the cost of the railway most recently built by the Dominion—would exceed $200,000,000. I make this comparison merely to show that while these men are carrying on their business as I have indicated, the expense connected with the operation of their vessels is small compared with the cost of our railways.

Our export trade is enormous. The following are the figures, roughly speaking, of the value of the exports of Canadian products for the year ended March 31, 1919, as compared with 1915:

	1914-15.	1918-19.
The Mine..	$ 51,000,000	$ 77,000,000
The Fisheries. ..	19,000,000	37,000,000
The Forest... ..	42,000,000	70,000,000
Animal products.	74,000,000	197,000,000
Agric'l products.	134,000,000	269,000,000
Manufactures. ..	85,000,000	549,000,000
Miscellaneous. ..	663,000	6,000,000

This makes a total of $419,000,000, in round figures, for 1915, and $1,207,000,000, for the year ending March 31, 1919. Our exports will increase year by year, and as they increase the need of controlling these boats will become more apparent.

I have here a great deal of correspondence with regard to this matter, but I shall only glance over some of it hurriedly to direct attention to what is going on in different parts of this country. On April 20 of this year the following statement was made with regard to the conditions at Sarnia:

> There is considerable dissatisfaction here because the Northern Navigation fleet will again stop and take on the passengers at Point Edward this year, as in the past. Sarnia business men and citizens in general feel that all passengers for these boats should be taken on at the Sarnia wharf and discharged there as well.

Instead of stopping at the city and taking on passengers and products, they simply stop where they please. Here is a telegram from Niagara-on-the-Lake:

> Strongly urge adoption of Bill to bring steamboats under Board of Railway Commissioners. This district very much injured by lack of service at end of season and poor service with high rates, damaged freight, and lost goods; rates raised without notice, and boats taken off without warning.
> C. H. Lloyd, President Nigara District Board of Trade.
> L. H. Collard, Reeve of Niagara Township.
> James Macphee, Mayor, Town of Niagara.
> R. G. Dawson, President, Niagara Agricultural Society.
> A. Onslow, Niagara.
> G. W. Bernard, Niagara.

I have here another letter from the President of the Niagara District Board of Trade. Then there is the following telegram from Petrolia:—

> The executive of the Lambton County Farmers' Club, forty in number, 1,000 members, heartily endorse the proposed legislation re bringing boats on our inland waters under control of the Railway Commission. We wish to see the proper legislation embodied in a Bill.
>
> H. A. Gilroy,
> Chairman.

This is a letter from the town of Huntsville, from Arthur Paget, mayor, to me.

> I am strongly of the opinion that all steamboats trading in Canadian waters should be subject to some authoritative body, to whom they should be compelled to submit all rates, tolls, tariffs and traffic agreements, and be subject to the control of such a board as our railway commissioners.

I have here bills of lading and a long letter from Mr. T. E. Godson, of Toronto, mining commissioner, in support of the Bill. This is a letter from the United Fruit Companies of Nova Scotia, Limited:—

> Replying to yours of May 22, we have carefully read over the proposed clause No. 358 for the new Railway Act and we believe that it would be an advantage for the Board of Railway Commissioners to have control of the water shipping in Canadian inland waters.

This is a telegram from Sarnia, Ontario:—

> For years officials Northern Navigation Company have encouraged Lambton producers to expand on production of tender fruits and vegetables, promising us rates and service to protect the industry. Now when our county has over half million trees coming in bearing they cut us off from one of our largest nearby markets by refusing service entirely. In addition rates issued effective 1917 show increases in some cases of 50 per cent advance over last year. On behalf of largest vegetable co-operative association in province Ontario we strongly request legislation regulating steamship lines as laid down in clause.

Lambton Growers' Co-operative Association.

This is a telegram from Dorset:—

Reasons for amendments to your Bill re steamship company from local conditions first unwarranted discrimination in freight and passenger rated between consignees individuals and ports; second, threatened boycott of litigants and their ports of call; third, service discontinued to largest port on lake; fourth, rate raised without notice or publication. Your Bill an urgent necessity.

and James E. Smith, Reeve of McLean.

This is a resolution from the township of Sherbourne, Angus McKay, reeve:—

Moved by John McNamara, seconded by James Russell:

That this council ask our Federal member, Sir Sam Hughes, and also the Minister of Marine to support the Bill to place inland steamship companies under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Railway Board. Carried.

They give a lot of reasons in support of their position, and there are other letters from that district. This is an important letter from a man who is thoroughly conversant with shipping interests on the lakes, a man who operated a number of boats not many years ago. His name is Mr. J. T. Horne, and he is located at Port Arthur:—

Dear Sir:—

My reason for writing you is that as a Canadian I feel that no one class should be allowed to make abnormal profits during this war.

At the instigation of the Canada Steamships Co., section 358 of the proposed amendment to the Railway Act placing Canadian vessels under the control of the Railway Commission was placed before the Council of the Board of Trade of the city of Fort William, and they decided by a vote of 4 to 2, with the shipping interests, voting for the resolution, to oppose placing Canadian shipping under the control of the Railway Commission.

As a matter of fact, all the information the council of the board had, came through the Canada Steamships Co., and it was meagre. A fair freight rate and one that any vessel owner, even at the present high cost of operating vessels would be glad to be assured of would be 2½c a bushel from Fort William to lower lake ports, when this rate of 2½c is advanced to 5c a bushel at the opening of navigation.

It made the ordinary citizen sit up and ask himself if these gentlemen who controlled the shipping interests on the lakes were not taking a war advantage of the rest of the citizens of Canada and more particularly of the overseas Allies, and when the rate advanced to 7½c a bushel it would seem that there should be some control placed on these vessel owners.

Take a 300,000 bushel vessel and giving her a 7½c freight rate, allowing her only 20 trips, one way loaded, she would gross $455,000, placing her expenses for the season at $115,000, and this is ample. She would, say on a capital investment made during normal times of $340,000 net for one season $340,000.

Surely during these strenuous war times these rates should be controlled by some one.

Yours truly,
J. T. Horne.

Mr. J. D. REID: Between what points is the 7½ cent rate?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: From Port Arthur to Montreal, I understand.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman stated that the vessel would carry 300,000 bushels from Port Arthur to Montreal, and the rate as stated by Mr. Horne was 7½ cents. What I wish to say is this, that there is no vessel that can go from Port Arthur to Montreal carrying 300,000 bushels.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This gentleman was a steamboat owner and the minister must surely know him. If he does not the representatives from Port Arthur and Fort William can vouch for his standing in Port Arthur. He says: "The lower lake ports." He might mean Port Colborne, but the rate is 7½ cents. A few minutes ago I showed that the United States had absolute control over their vessels and that their grain is carried from Port Arthur and Fort William down to Buffalo, a greater distance than to Port Colborne, for 3½ cents. The people of Canada must feel humiliated at being compelled to pay such extortionate rates in the face of prevailing conditions.

I do not want to take up much of the time of the Committee in reading these letters, but they are all urging that these clauses be passed. I have here a communication from Mr. J. T. Small, barrister, of Toronto, strongly urging that these boats be placed under the control of the Railway Commission. This is a letter from a prominent citizen in the town of Sarnia:—

From our experience this year as shippers with the Northern Navigation Company, it is more imperatively necessary than it ever has been before, that this legislation should pass. As matters stand now, shippers have no rights that the steamship lines in particular pay any attention to. Rates have gone up to the limit. Service, while fairly satisfactory is nothing as good as it should be. What does this mean to your home county?

George French.

This is a communication to the Department of the Secretary of State from the Government of British Columbia:

Certified copy of a report of a committee of the Honourable the Executive Council, approved by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor on the 26th day of March, 1919.

The committee of Council submit for the approval of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the province of British Columbia, of the 24th instant, as follows:—

That, in the opinion of this House it is desirable that the rates of lake and river transportation systems owned and controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia should be under the control of the Railway Commission of Canada.

Be it further resolved, that an humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, praying that a copy of the foregoing resolution be forwarded to the Honourable the Secretary of State for Canada.

The Committee advise that a copy of this minute be forwarded to the Honourable the Secretary of State of Canada.

J. D. MacLean,
Clerk, Executive Council.

I might go on reading these communications, but I do not care to take up the time of the committee. It is true that Canada's waterways have been the chief factor in building up towns and cities along them. These are the channels through which pass much of our raw materials and manufactured products. We must, therefore, control these great national transportation facilities, and we must not turn over this splendid heritage of the many to be exploited for the benefit of the few. We must consider the interest of the producer at one end and the consumer at the other. Reduced rates will mean cheaper food for our people with commercial development all along our waterways. With boats under control, fair profits to boat owners will be given, and the producer and consumer will be greatly benefited. Vessel men are constantly asking for improvements. Our past expenditures would have been justified had rates been reduced, but the opposite has been the case. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), it is true, voted against this amendment in Committee, but inside of a few hours he was in the House voting away money for the improvements of these great waterways and for the benefit of the vessel men. There has been circulated among the members of the House of Commons and the Senate a pamphlet carefully prepared by one of the solicitors of the Canada Steamship Company.

Mr. BRISTOL: By whom?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Mr. King.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

Mr. BRISTOL: He is not the solicitor.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: He is solicitor for the Dominion Marine Association. Is not that correct?

Mr. BRISTOL: Yes.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: He represents at least ninety per cent of the vessels on our inland waters, and my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) knows it. This pamphlet was not very complimentary to me. It held up to ridicule my efforts in the past in connection with this measure. It is true that at different times during the last six years I have brought forward this measure. It is also true that the Railway Act which is now under consideration has not yet been passed. But I do not see why I should be condemned for the action I have taken in the matter. I should like to give a brief account of what has taken place.

In the year 1912-13 members on both sides of the House called attention to the enormous increase in freight rates on our inland waters and on our ocean-borne commerce. Considerable time of the House was taken up in debating the question, and a Special Committee was formed which had under consideration the consolidation of the Railway Act. While it was under consideration, the Saskatchewan Government appointed a commission to investigate freight rates on our inland waters and ocean-borne commerce. That investigation took place, and I was able to submit to the Railway Committee in 1914, a statement in regard to the work of that commission. I also laid before the Committee a letter from Mr. R. McKenzie, secretary of the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association, reading as follows:

I am in receipt of your favour of the 20th inst., urging me to appear before a Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons who have the consolidation of the Railway Act under consideration. I did not receive the telegram from you which you state you sent under the same date as letter.

I would be very pleased of an opportunity to appear on behalf of the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association before the Committee on the important question of the consolidation of the Railway Act, more especially clause 358 of the Bill to which you drew my attention. It appears to me that the Railway Commission or any other body have not effective control on export rates unless that same body can also control the rates on vessels that are a part of a through transportation system. It is a simple matter of bookkeeping for the railways to apportion a loss made on the railway, and make up on the water portion of the through system.

I also placed before the Committee the following statement from a manufacturer in the city of Sarnia:

As you are possibly aware, there is a most unjust discrimination against manufacturers situated as we are. At the present time, steamship companies will carry freight from Montreal to the head of the Lakes, we are told, at the same rates as we pay from Sarnia to the head of the Lakes. We know for a fact that there is an existing rate of 10½ cents from Cleveland to Fort William, while we pay 16½ cents from Sarnia. This is one case showing the unjust discrimination made under the present method. Where this affects a manufacturer, such as ourselves, it would avail the manufacturers of the same commodities as we make, down in Montreal or Hamilton, to enter into a competition of territory, which, by our natural location, should be ours.

On the other hand, for all freight going east by train, we have to pay a much higher rate over these lines, and we cannot compete with the manufacturer, such as a fence company, in Montreal or Hamilton in its own district, while they themselves can ship their commodity into our territory at the same rates as we ourselves.

I submitted also a communication from the Western Co-operative Fruit Company, resolutions passed by a company of fruit growers in Western Ontario, and a letter to Mr. R. F. Green, M.P., from the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association, all strongly supporting the measure.

I should like to quote the finding of the commission appointed by the Saskatchewan Government:

This Commission reports that the grain of Canada pays more freight to reach Liverpool than does the grain of any other country in the world; also that there has been practically no change since 1909 in the cost of transporting a carload of wheat to Fort William or Port Arthur and selling it on commission. . . . . Were Winnipeg to Fort William the ultimate market for our wheat, it would be unnecessary to pursue the inquiry east of these points. Some of our wheat is finally disposed of at Winnipeg, of course, but the great bulk of it is not. Moreover, the price received for that which goes the farthest is what sets the price for the remainder throughout the season of heaviest marketing. It therefore concerns the farmer even more than it concerns anyone else what the relation is between the Winnipeg market and the importing markets of Europe, for upon the transportation and other connecting links between these markets will the price received by the farmer in one part depend.

Those were some of the statements placed before the Committee in 1914. In 1915-16 the war was on, and as this measure was looked upon as contentious, it was not taken up. In 1917, although the war was still on, the Railway Act was taken up by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Cochrane) and passed this House, but was held up in the Senate. During the discussion that took place I was able to submit many important matters to the Committee, among which was a letter I received from Mr. P. P. Woodbridge, secretary of the United Farmers of Alberta, as follows:

I am in receipt of yours of the 20th instant, together with the copy of Bill No. 2 and notes on same.

After discussing the proposed amendments with our president and several other members of our executive who happened to be available, I beg to advise you that we are entirely in sympathy with the object of clause 358 and unanimously endorse same. We believe, however, that as at present worded, the clause opens the way for a legal action as to the extent of its meaning.

Lines 2 and 3, clause 358, read at present, "extend and apply to traffic carried by any railway company," etc. We believe that to make this clause really effective it must be made to cover all water traffic, whether carried in boats owned by railway or other company or individual, and would respectfully suggest that the word 'railway' be eliminated from this clause, making it read, 'traffic carried by any company or individual,' etc., etc., or whatever amendment your committee might suggest which would affect the purpose hereinbefore outlined.

I merely call attention to this for the purpose of showing that I did make an earnest effort to bring this matter before Parliament from time to time. Then again at the present session instead of proceeding with the Bill which I introduced at an early period, I thought it was not wise to take up time with the various stages that would be necessary, and therefore, for the purpose of securing prompt action, I placed my amendment before the special committee of the House. It was defeated by a small majority, and to-night I believe I am acting in the public interest in bringing forward that amendment in Committee of the Whole and having a vote upon the question.

During the war every other country took measures to control its shipping but we apparently made no effort in that direction. The farmers, manufacturers, and shippers of Canada have been compelled to pay fifty, one hundred and fifty, and two hundred per cent more for the carriage of their goods by water than they formerly were compelled to pay. We are giving credits to Belgium, Italy, Greece, and Rumania to the extent of tens of millions of dollars for the purpose of carrying the products of farm and factory to those markets. But when you take into consideration the enormous tolls that are exacted on the inland vessels, and on the ocean-borne commerce, it is utterly impossible for us to expect, unless this amendment is accepted, that Canadian manufacturers and shippers will receive the benefit which they should receive from the existing facilities. If this amendment is voted down it means keeping open the door for a further exploitation of the country's resources.

Let me call attention to some of the profits that these steamship owners have been making during the last few years. In 1912 the Canada Steamship Company formed a merger of six groups of vessels, the estimated value of which at that time was some $6,000,000. The company was floated for $12,500,000 of preferred stock, $12,000,000 of common stock, and $6,000,000 of bonds. And what happened? The rates increased. In 1914, I asked one of the prominent vessel owners what the increase in rates amounted to in 1913, and he said about twenty per cent. The rates have kept on increasing year after year until these men claim today that they have a capital investment of—or at least that the value of their industry is—$38,000,000, and they are paying the interest on $30,000,000 of that money. They are paying the interest not only on the preferred stock and on the bonds, but on the common stock as well. Let me give you a statement by Mr. Carruthers, president of the company, but who resigned during the present year, as it appears in the Canadian Railway and Marine World of last March. Mr. Carruthers left Montreal for the Pacific coast some time prior to the proposed meeting, and before doing so made the following remarks:

> I cannot admit the propriety of paying such a dividend, for several reasons, and in this attitude have received Mr. Newman's consistent sympathy and support. My principal reason for adopting the attitude described was that I considered the company's best interests were bound up in maintaining the dividend position of its premier capital issue, the preferred stock. In other words, this issue should be strengthened during a period of exceptional earnings, with such a reserve backing that the continuance of the regular rate would be assured for some years to come. My contention is that the disbursement should not be made until there is a strong liquid reserve behind the preferred. It was not the idea of the organizers of the company at its inception that the common should receive anything in the way of dividend until the company had gone through a period of years of experience, which would prove its earning capacity beyond question. In order that my attitude should not prove an embarrassment to the board, and so that the decision to declare the dividend might be considered unanimous, I have decided to resign the presidency and also from the board, and Mr. Newman joins me in my retirement.

That is a pretty strong statement made by the president in regard to the Canada Steamship Company. But when the company are not only paying dividends on all this stock, but have a surplus of $5,000,000, and claim that their assets amount to $38,000,000, hon. gentlemen can readily see whether they have been doing a reasonable or a fair business within the last six years. I know for a fact that many members of this House have been receiving telegrams and letters urging them to oppose this amendment, and it must be expected that practically every port in this country has supporters of this steamship organization. You can depend upon it that they are not going to be content with the sending of a few telegrams or letters voicing their opposition.

Now what else do I find in the report of this company? The capital stock I have already stated, and the depreciation reserve is $3,506,000. They paid in business profits war tax $960,000, and a surplus was left of $5,009,000. These figures show what one company can accomplish within a period of six short years. Is it to be imagined that a company that cleans up $30,000,000 in five or six years wants this legislation adopted? Remember that Canada is going to do a greater business on water than ever before. I expect a great expansion of our foreign trade when we control our trade routes, and our manufacturers and our shipping will develop. If this legislation passes it will help the man who tills the soil, and it will help the man who runs a factory or carries a dinner pail. If it should be defeated the responsibility must rest on the heads of those who vote against it. It is a safe, sane and business like proposition. It will provide control of our waterways in addition to the control of our railways. The shippers scattered throughout Canada cannot organize into a monopoly. We must therefore trust to the Railway Commission to look after their interests. I therefore appeal to every member of this committee to vote for this amendment. By doing so they will protect the interest of the many against the avariciousness and selfishness of the few.

In the early stages of my remarks I drew attention to the fact that the amendment which I propose does not ask for the control of ocean freight rates; it is confined entirely to lake, river, canal and coastwise trade. Therefore, when hon. gentlemen are casting votes for this amendment they must remember they are voting for the control by the Railway Commission of maximum freight rates. By that I mean that the vessel owners will be able to give as low a rate as they choose below the maximum, but that the Railway Commission will have the power to establish maximum freight rates. Surely this is not an unreasonable request to make of this committee. I therefore strongly urge the members of this committee to vote for my amendment in order that we may control the great steamship monopolies that now exist in our country. I beg to move to amend clause 34 by adding after subparagraph (a) in the fourth line of the said clause the following subparagraphs:

(A) 1. With respect to any privilege or concession given by any company or express company or by any person owning or controlling any such steamboat or vessel as is in the next paragraph mentioned, and where any privilege or concession is given by any such person or by any company or express company to any person or class of business or in any part of Canada. the Board may order that such privilege or concession be discontinued or modified or granted to any other person or class of business, or in any other part of Canada, either the same or in a modified form.

(A) 2. With respect to the traffic accommodation, classification of freight, traffic agreements, tolls and tariffs to be furnished, made, entered into and charged in connection with and by steamboats, and other vessels carrying passengers or freight or both from one port or place in Canada to another port or place in Canada and with respect to any place where such steamboats and vessels shall call for traffic, the time of call and duration of stay and all tariffs, tolls, traffic agreements and classifications of freight, charged, entered into or adopted in connection with any such steamboat or vessel shall be submitted to the Board.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House at any great length in reply to the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) on this question. The Railway Bill is a very important one and one that has been before the House for the last two sessions. For a year or so previous to that we had men employed on this Act in order that it might be put in proper form. It is important that it should pass the House during the present session. It is urgent for many reasons. It is urgent on account of the necessity for the protection of the employees in connection with the operation of railways. It is also urgent in connection with the operation of the railways as a whole, and in the interest of the traffic that is carried. For these reasons, I hope that the Bill may go through during the present session. It has passed this House with the exception of the clause that the hon. member has referred to, and clause 374, which has been left over on account of the interest in it of the city of Toronto, the Hydro-Electric Commission and the Toronto and Niagara Power Company.

It is a very important question that the hon. member has brought before the Committee. I am sorry that his Bill, to which he has referred, was not proceeded with during the session, for the reason that we could have given more time to the discussion of the question and probably could have brought forth more facts bearing upon it than we are able to elicit this evening. The hon. member has referred to the letter of Sir Henry Drayton. From the tone of his remarks you would come to the conclusion that he is under the impression that Sir Henry Drayton is in favour of this amendment being passed by this House.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I read the letter and the letter distinctly says that he does not assume any responsibility.

Mr. J. D. REID: I admit that he does not assume any responsibility. But there is a part of the letter from which the hon. gentleman read that I think is very important in connection with this matter. On page 2 Sir Henry Drayton says:

If the policy of water regulation be adopted at all—

That gives me the impression that Sir Henry Drayton is not altogether in favour of the amendment as proposed by the hon. member.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: He does not take a position one way or the other.

Mr. J. D. REID: That part of the letter emphasizes very strongly that he is not altogether in favour of the amendment. The hon. member leads the House to believe that the traffic by water between Port Arthur and Montreal is not now, and never has been, under the Railway Commission, and that the water traffic rates on wheat and other products have never been under any regulation.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: As far as steamboats are concerned.

Mr. J. D. REID: As far as steamboats are concerned. In the Railway Act, which has been in force for many years, we have a clause:

The provisions of this Act in respect of tolls, tariffs and joint tariffs shall, so far as they are applicable, extend to the traffic carried by any company by sea or by inland water, between any ports or places in Canada, if the company owns, charters, uses, maintains or works, or is a party to any arrangement for using, maintaining or working vessels for carrying traffic by sea or by inland water between any such ports or places.

It is a well known fact that the Canadian Northern Railway Company until two or three years ago, when their vessels were taken, or disposed of, for purposes in connection with the war, had a fleet of steamers plying between Port Arthur and Montreal carrying grain, and therefore they came under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. If there were any complaints about the freight rates between Port Arthur and Montreal, they have been for many years past, and are now, under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners in so far as this provision applies to vessels owned or controlled by railway companies.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Why object to this clause, then?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am coming to that a little later. One of the strongest points that the hon. member has urged why this amendment should pass is that it may afford reduced rates on the wheat shipments that come from the West to the East and for transportation overseas. The Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern for years not only had their own vessels, but had the chartering of other vessels. That traffic has been as much under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners as any part of the traffic going to Montreal. I only wish to mention that fact to assure hon. members from the West that there is nothing in the argument that freight rates between Port Arthur and Montreal may be lowered or changed from what they have been in the past.
