The policies to which I wish to refer include the following: roles and responsibilities for training and development in the public service; conditions governing education, training and development, including subsidization; identification of training and development needs and evaluation of results and annual training and education review. These can be found in subchapter 110-9 of the manual.

The existence and application of these policies on a public service-wide basis demonstrates that a framework of policies and guidelines for training and development has been developed and is in place. The guidelines for training need identification and assessment, and for the recording and reporting on training and its costs, provide specific guidance for departmental managers and personnel specialists.

The first of these policies sets out the relative responsibilities of Treasury Board Canada, the Public Service Commission and departments and agencies in matters of training and development. The policy on "conditions governing education, training and development including subsidization" provides policy direction and administrative instructions for use by departmental managers in assessing the need for training programs as well as guidelines for determining the extent of organizational support warranted in particular cases of employee training and development. The government's policy on the "identification of training and development needs and evaluation of results", is directed toward two major objectives: first, to provide specific guidelines on factors which managers and personnel specialists should consider in assessing and identifying training and development needs, and second, to set out the criteria and processes for assessing and evaluating training and development programs provided to public servants.

The final longstanding policy on training and development to which I would like to draw the hon. members' attention at this time is the policy on the annual training and education review. This policy sets out a process by which departments are required to record and report on training and development activities undertaken for the benefit of departmental employees. In addition to providing information for an over-all review of training which is conducted annually by Treasury Board Canada, this process encourages departments to take a hard look at the amount and the cost effectiveness of the training they provide.

We can see from the existence of these policies that there are a number of mechanisms in place and working, which provide for the conduct and assessment of training and development programs for public service employees.

The comments I have made are not intended to suggest that the management of training and development in the public service has been, and continues to be, a kind of Camelot where the sun always shines. One could expect that, with the changes and challenges which presented themselves within Canada and the Canadian public service during the past decade particularly, there has been a need for periodic reviews of all aspects of management in the public service which have led to modification and adjustments in the approach taken to such matters as training and development.

Specifically, during the past two years the Auditor General has included reviews of training and development in the context of payroll costs management as a component of regular departmental audits. The Auditor General has pointed out that there were certain weaknesses in the management of training and development activities and that certain improvements appeared to be warranted, particularly as regards providing systems for the accurate recording and reporting of training and development costs by departments.

As well, the report of the special committee on the review of personnel management and the merit principle, the D'Avignon committee made a number of useful comments about the orientation which should be given to the management of training and development in the federal public service. The D'Avignon committee emphasized that explicit recognition should be given to the value of training and development as a means of accomplishing organizational objectives, and that training and development should be considered an essential cost of doing business. The committee further suggested that employees moving into management positions be given basic training in personnel administration and human resource management prior to assuming their new duties.

In response to the observation of the Auditor General and the D'Avignon committee, a number of steps have been taken by the government to further improve the management of training and development in the federal public service.

On June 26, 1980, the Treasury Board approved a new staff training policy. This new policy defines training, specifies the types of training to be provided, specifies the conditions under which the training will be provided, deals with the selection of trainees, defines the roles and responsibilities of departments, the Public Service Commission, Treasury Board Canada and individual employees, and provides for the certification of trainers and for the evaluation of training. The new staff training policy is now being implemented by departments.

The policy also provides for the creation of a staff training council to provide over-all direction and co-ordination of training throughout the public service. Its specific responsibilities include determining training needs and setting priorities for meeting these needs. The council will also be responsible for setting standards for training programs and those who provide training.

Membership on the council includes: the secretary of the Treasury Board, who is to act as chairman; the chairman of the Public Service Commission; the clerk of the Privy Council or his nominee; the Comptroller General; four deputy ministers; and a number of other government officials.

The staff training policy states that training is an essential component of good management and an accepted cost of doing business. It is the government's policy that training will be provided where necessary and appropriate. The government will be committed neither to training for its own sake, nor to a specific quantity of training unrelated to need.

Furthermore, the policy states that it is the responsibility of individual employees to plan their careers and to develop their own skills. Government support of training and development will be limited to activities directly related to the operational needs of the public service.

Training will be provided for a variety of purposes including improvement of job performance, preparation for new responsibilities or changes in technology, the maintenance of sufficient quantities of necessary skills, retraining, safety training, and to give effect to government objectives regarding under-represented groups.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I mentioned the fact that in 1972 the fruits of the Carter commission report began to appear in the tax act with the introduction of the concept "a buck is a buck." This really does not take into account the social implications of that measure on Canadians.

If it was not true in 1972 that a buck was a buck, certainly it is not true today with the inflated dollars we use. Just over the weekend I saw a BCTV news report on real estate in the lower mainland of British Columbia. It made the point that in the lower mainland $115,000 to $130,000 is the cost of an average house which in Ottawa might cost $40,000 or $50,000. With those kinds of costs and the inflated dollars involved in the construction industry, the concept of the Carter commission report really does not work because it punishes the people who will buy those homes. Right now in the lower mainland of British Columbia according to that report the cost, of an average house rises $80 per day. That is all right for those persons who happen to own them, but it is not so good for some others, particularly young people who want to buy homes. One cannot have the advantage of selling without paying capital gains as tax as is the case with a farm. I realize at the present time that an owner does not have to pay capital gains tax on a principal home, but the developer does and that cost is added to the price of the home. When it comes to family farms I am particularly thinking of the social costs. All through western Canada many people are looking forward to the day when they can pass their farms on to their children.

They want to keep their families together, they want to contribute to the welfare of their children, but when they retire they must pay capital gains tax on the major part of their properties. They cannot roll it over, for example, into an RRSP as they ought to be able to; then the children must pay the increased cost of that farm. That whole policy or problem is not dealt with in this tax legislation.

The government has not taken into consideration the social implications of some of its taxation policies and what they do to people. I think of the many people who come out to my constituency and those surrounding Surrey-White Rock-North Delta to retire. Between the May election and the February election, the voters' list in my constituency increased by 6,000 names, 6,000 people in a matter of eight months moved into that area. A good many of them are people who retired. They thought that they were looking after their own interests. They wanted to maintain a life of dignity and be independent in their retirement years. They provided for their own retirement income, and now they find that their income is being eaten away by inflation, particularly the kind of inflation being experienced in British Columbia. That is not taken care of in this tax legislation. As is so often the case, they are being punished for their thrift and their planning. This is not right.

On the one hand the government makes money on inflation. It has not taken inflation into account in this taxation measure, yet capital gains continue and people are paying capital gains tax on inflated dollars. If the value of a commercial property increases on paper from $100,000 to $300,000, the person who sells the property must pay capital gains on it. I talked to my mechanic this weekend. He does excellent work. He wants to move into commercial property. He says that he cannot buy commercial property in the lower mainland because he cannot afford to pay $100,000 for a narrow strip of commercial property. But even if that property were for sale, you would have to pay capital gains tax on it—in a matter of 18 months, some $200,000 in capital gains, which would increase the cost. And the government makes money in times of inflation by not indexing the capital gains feature of income tax. It is in the interest of the government to continue with inflation as long as it does not have to accommodate it in capital gains. It pays to keep it going.

The second thing the government does is ensure it slides out of the obligations it took on some years ago. I am thinking particularly of the obligation toward the funding of training for our RCMP officers and the contracts with municipalities. Many of us in the House know that the federal government has the lion's share of taxing capabilities. This is followed by the provinces and, last, the municipalities. The municipalities receive whatever is left over in taxing ability. So the federal government starts off the taxes, then comes the provincial government and, finally, the municipality.

The federal government also has the advantage of entering into a long-term contract with the junior levels of government. Some years ago it entered into an agreement to fund something in the order of 70 per cent or 75 per cent of the cost of RCMP policing in the municipalities. Now it wants to renegotiate that contract to 85 per cent. The municipalities will have to pick up what is, in some cases, a quarter million dollars. I remind hon. members that the municipalities are not in a very good position with respect to negotiating. The gun is at their heads. Too often the central government engages in a long-term contract and then, after the commitment has been made by the provinces and the municipalities, it begins to slide out of it—witness the transfer payments to the provinces on health care and education costs. They were itemized packages at first; now, it is block funding, which is easier to negotiate.

There is so much that this bill does not take care of, Mr. Speaker. I am reminded of a provision for the handicapped. About 14 months ago we debated a motion in this House in my name to rewrite the regulations regarding the $1,000 deduction for the care of handicapped persons, in the income tax provisions. The Clark government accepted a proposal that the Department of Finance should take another look at the wording of that provision. Would you believe, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of the tax department, right now, is that in order to be declared a handicapped person, and thereby qualified for the $1000 deduction, a person must be certified to spend "a substantial part of the day in a bed or a wheelchair". That is absurd! What do you do with someone who is mentally handicapped and in perfect physical condition but who needs 24-hours-a-day care? The government has a choice: it can encourage the parents to take that child and place him in a government institution, which will cost the government $15,000 or $20,000 a year to look after him; or it can increase the tax deduction so that the parents can provide better care for the child.

Looking at it in terms of pure, hard, cold cash it is in the interests of the government to provide better provisions under the Income Tax Act for the parents of handicapped children than to be so stingy, so miserly, in their description of who may qualify. We passed a measure to that effect in the House. The government has never brought that recommendation forward, even though the House of Commons passed that motion. There is no such provision in this bill. It has never been referred to committee.

If the government were really concerned about the handicapped of this country it would take seriously the recommendation passed by this House to study that proposal to provide some relief to the parents of handicapped children. These parents want to look after their children themselves and they are punished by the government for wanting to do so. All we need to do is change the wording in that regulation. I see the minister listening intently. I appreciate that and I hope he will take this under advisement. Something should be done to give the government some heart so that it will provide for those parents who are doing something to help their handicapped children.

I am reminded of the Small Business Development Bonds. The government says it wants to encourage private initiative and risk-taking and therefore it went along with the Crosbie budget and announced the continuation of the Small Business Development Bond policy. That was in April. We continue to hear in this House that the policy is in place, but when small businessmen and women go to the bank to take advantage of it the banks continue to say, "We have had no clear direction from the government." I ask the minister to tell this House when that will be taken care of so that the banks have a clear direction from the government. When that policy is clearly stated the small business people of this country will be able to take full advantage of the low interest rates which will accrue to them under it.

These are just some of the things which concern me with respect to this bill, not only the measures it includes but, more important, the drift of the government as indicated by the measures it does not include. As we have heard over and over again, the budget announced last fall was not really a budget of the finance minister but, rather, a budget of the energy minister. It was an energy policy and not a finance policy. It is time for this government to put definite policies in place so that the business community may have some clear indication of its intent. They must know what this intent is so that they can plan for months and years ahead and so that the risks they are willing to take are minimized. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Francis in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Andre: Just to seek clarification, Mr. Chairman, did I hear you say clause 2? Are we not commencing with clause 1?

● (2020)

The Chairman: I called clause 2. I am standing clause 1 for the moment and we will come back to it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I gather from what you have just said that you have a special reason for starting with clause 2. As far as the Standing Order is concerned we start with clause 2 only if clause 1 is a title, and in this case that is not so.

On Clause 1—

Mr. Andre: Mr. Chairman, I have a few brief remarks as we begin this stage of this legislation. Most of the remarks which I wanted to put on the record with respect to Bill C-54, I made in second reading debate. I would like to give the Minister of Finance some indication of the kinds of information we will be seeking as this bill proceeds, however, in order that he might be prepared with the information with some accommodation. As I and others remarked during second reading, this particular income tax bill flows from three budgets or, really, two and a half budgets. The October 8 budget, which contained very little additional information, was primarily an energy policy. Although it was delivered to the House by the Minister of Finance, it was in fact authored by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Most of the important provisions will come along later in the form of excise tax legislation and other special legislation. The other provisions of this legislation flow from the mini-budget of April, 1980, when the minister bootlegged that particular budget in through a statement on motions in the House. It was based primarily on the budget of December 11, 1979, introduced by his predecessor, the hon. member for St. John's West. In this budget, the Small Business Development Bond was introduced as a policy of this government, but with some significant changes.

The applicability of the Small Business Development Bond was restricted to certain types of expenditures and for many months there was a great deal of uncertainty as to just who was eligible and which financial institutions were participating. A number of hon. members from our side will be interested in obtaining the government's explanation as to why there was this restriction on the Small Business Development Bond. We will be offering suggestions to the government about how the provisions might be extended beyond the current expiration date of March 31 or April 1, in the hope that it might be put to better use and to more use by the small business community and thereby generate the employment which Canada so desperately needs.

A number of speakers on this side will express their interest in why the provision with respect to capital gains and the family farm, which was contained in the budget of the predecessor of the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, was not adopted by this government. This provision was particularly important to the western farmer. We will be interested in knowing the government's reasons for not proceeding with it and will try to convince it to do so.

Also, at the appropriate clause, I will remark on the government's approach to Canadianization. In the budget of the minister's predecessor, the hon. member for St. John's West, there was a very important, very innovative program called the Canadian stock investment plan which would have provided very considerable stimulus and incentive to average Canadians—not people of substantial means or people known for their active involvement in the investment community, but ordinary Canadians—to participate in investment in Canadian stocks.

Had the plan of the minister's predecessor been carried on by this government, it would have had a very significant and important effect, that of causing more and more average Canadians to be involved in investment in Canadian industry. It seems strange that a government, which claims it is interested in Canadianization, would drop that particular provision which was more important to the Canadianization of Canadian industry over all, not just oil and gas, than any facet of the budget of October 28 or the mini-budget of last April.

It is sad that the government would state that its goal is Canadianization, while it cancels or fails to carry on a very innovative and important program which would achieve that aim. One can be forgiven for perhaps suspecting that the goal is less Canadianization than simple nationalization, because that is the thrust of the October 28 budget, to provide a special tax which Petro-Canada could put in place so that it might buy out oil companies. There was nothing in the budget, however, to promote or encourage ordinary Canadian citizens to become involved.

Yet, the budget of the predecessor to the Minister of Finance introduced a program which would not have been costly to the treasury. This program would have resulted in a modest deferment of taxes by a segment of our society which heretofore has not had that opportunity. For the rich and for those who can afford the high-prices lawyers and accountants, there are innumerable tax deferral systems in which one can get involved, whether they be MURBs, films, oil and gas or various real estate investments. The tax deferral opportunities to those who can afford the high-priced lawyers and accountants are considerable. The program we proposed was designed to give ordinary Canadians, Canadians who have modest incomes, the opportunity to participate in the future growth of this country by buying equity positions in Canadian companies and receiving a modest tax deferral. And it would only be a deferral. The government ultimately would collect; there is no question about that. Yet that program was turned down by the government.

I think it is fair to ask why a government, which claims to be interested in Canadianization, would not adopt this policy introduced by the previous government. There is also the matter of the failure of this government to proceed with the energy tax credit provisions introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West in his budget, the lack of which will increasingly be felt this year by more and more Canadians.

It is obvious to everyone in this country, with the possible exception of a few slow learners in Energy, Mines and Resources, that the National Energy Program is not going to fly. It will have to be changed and changed dramatically. Most reasonable people have already acknowledged that. As I say, it is taking a while for Energy, Mines and Resources to come around to that point of view. Presumably they want to find a face-saving way of doing it. They will put the policy in place and then make the changes, or use some other political manoeuvre. The reality is that it is going to change.

The other reality is that this government is going to impose much higher energy costs on Canadians. When it finishes making its changes, Canadians will be faced with much higher heating oil costs and fuel costs than they previously expected. The failure of the government to provide the energy tax credit which this minister's predecessor wanted to provide means that those at the low end of the sale, those who are stuck with the high heating oil bills, will find their income distribution will change very significantly. That will not be very pleasant.

I strongly recommend that the Minister of Finance re-examine his decision not to proceed with the energy tax credit proposed by his predecessor. It may be well and good for him and his colleague, the energy minister, to claim they are doing such a good job in terms of their energy policy. However, I believe he is starting to realize, and I am sure his officials are telling him and others are beginning to recognize, that the government simply cannot stay with that national energy policy. As I said, it will have to be changed dramatically. Therefore, the government should re-examine its decision not to protect the low-income scale along the lines proposed by the minister's predecessor.

There is another point I wish to bring to the minister's attention. Hopefully as this portion of Committee of the Whole proceeds, we can get his views on this subject, determine his thinking and see whether we can convince him to re-examine his decision not to proceed, and possibly even decide to introduce that energy tax credit.

Finally, before I resume my seat and allow my colleagues to proceed, I want to say that we have no particular interest in unduly delaying this legislation. It is our hope to proceed expeditiously. A great deal will depend on the willingness of the minister to be forthcoming with information and opinions as we proceed. If there is that kind of co-operation, there is no reason why we cannot handle this stage of the bill with some expedition.

Mr. Waddell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for recognizing me. I hope you will not mind if I speak while wearing my kilt. I believe it is traditional dress. I am returning from a Burns supper where we celebrated the great immortal poet of Scotland. I thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for acknowledging my kilt.

An hon. Member: It's a skirt.

Mr. Waddell: It is not a skirt, it is a kilt. I was asked what is worn under the kilt, and I propose to answer that question tonight. However, hon. members will have to wait 20 minutes until I have finished my speech. I will then answer the question about what is worn under the kilt.

I now want to talk about the National Energy Program and the bill before this committee. You need to be a wily Scot to analyze this bill and realize where all the money is going. This is indeed a very difficult situation. I say to the Minister of Finance that what we have is a capital strike. The hon. member for Calgary Centre did not mention when he spoke that we have a strike against the government.

Those who lived in British Columbia under a New Democratic government know what it was like. I say to the Minister of Finance that this government did not invest in forestry when we tried to do new things in forestry. We tried to do new things in mining, and it did not; it kept the money back. That is now happening with the National Energy Program. There are a lot of problems with that program.

The public in this country seriously believes that we should control our own energy resources. The public believes we should control them and not the foreign multinational companies. When you try to do that, you find the people suddenly saying they will move their rigs to the United States and not explore here any longer.

The companies give you the same old argument, "Just give us more money and we will find more oil." But that claim is not true. Since 1968, the oil supply in Canada has been going down. That is well known. It is the same situation in the United States. The rigs will come back to Canada because there is more oil here than in the United States. There is a lot of gas in Canada. The companies used the money they got from the government to find that gas, under pressure from the government. The government caved in last year on the prebuild of the pipeline in order to export the gas. This has been the traditional pattern in Canada.

I am now going to get into the bill and I hope the minister will learn something from my remarks. The strange thing is that the Canadian companies which he sought to help Canadianize, are now turning against him and are moving their rigs out of the country. It is rather a shame, but they are acting just like the foreign multinational companies. Those who sit in this corner ask what is the use of replacing David Rockfeller with Conrad Black? They act in the same way. They want to maximize their profits against the long-term energy interests of the Canadian people.

Unfortunately, that is what some Canadian companies are doing. Some have problems with cash flow. Some small Canadian companies find the 8 per cent wellhead tax difficult. I do not sympathize with some of them; they have made a lot of money. They think they have a God-given right to make millions and millions of dollars, but they do not have that right. We need that energy for the ordinary people of this country.

Some companies have justifiable complaints. It would have been better if the government had not proposed this wellhead tax, but had concentrated instead on a fair system of taxation for the country. The government is in the midst of a strike by the industry. I predict the government will back off and give in to the hon. member for Calgary Centre and his Conservative friends in the oil industry and the multinational oil companies. They will give in because Liberals traditionally give in. If you are going to have a socialist program, you have to be prepared to go the other way, and I do not think this government is prepared to do that. I wish to refer from an article by John Twigg in the Regina Leader-Post.

Talking about the government's National Energy Program, he said, "While there are some moderate incentives for activity by Canadian companies and for preferred activities such as heavy oil, tertiary production, tar sands and frontier and gas substitution, the underlying price structure is clearly inadequate. As well, the tax measures are merely grabs of revenue from the provinces and companies with too little reform—" I underline this. That is what is lacking in this bill, "—too little reform of the lucrative deductions in the federal tax system and no new taxes on the refining sector which has emerged as a profit centre for the oil companies."

What the government is doing with its National Energy Program, putting on the wellhead tax of 8 per cent and the gas export tax, is forgetting one of the areas where the large multinational companies make money, what they call the downstream, the wholesaling and retailing of gas. That is where they make their big money.

I predict this government will not only cave in on the National Energy Program, but will cave in soon on the oil and gas bill. It will change that. It will cave in on the tax after the Ontario election. With regard to the price of oil and the great Liberal promise of cheaper oil than the Clark government's promise of $4 for 1980; $4.50 for 1981; $4.50 for 1982 and $4.50 for 1983, the government will cave in and the price will be raised in order that it can make a deal with Alberta. All those people in Ontario and Quebec who voted for this government because they thought they would get lower energy prices will be sold out. I think the government should come clean about that and tell the Canadian people now that it is going to put up prices. I can tell the Minister of Finance that the ordinary working people in my riding are prepared to pay more for oil and gas, but they want a fair deal. They do not want all the profit to go to the oil companies which have been making a lot of money; they do not want the money to go into the Alberta Heritage Fund and they do not want it to go to the federal government because they do not believe the federal government knows how to use it.

In western Canada, that is a generally accepted feeling. The western Canadian people do not want the Minister of Employment and Immigration to deal with the western development fund because they know where that will go. That is the problem. Canadians know if they pay more for oil and gas that it will come out of their own pockets. Nothing will go back to the ordinary people. There will be no financial benefit for the low-income people and that is the problem with the proposal to increase energy prices.

Before I sit down I want to talk about two programs which are the real "people programs", namely, the program to insulate houses and the program to help people to convert from oil to gas, both of which are in the National Energy Program. They are good ideas in principle but the government is not going about them in the right way.

You cannot have a program for people to convert from expensive oil to cheaper gas when you are going to sell out all the gas to the Americans. There is a new book out by Bruce Wilson called "The Energy Squeeze". The Walter Gordon committee which studies economic policy said that we do not really have that big surplus of cheap gas that we think we have, and that we are going to sell it out like our oil. I finally found Joe Greene's speech, the former minister of energy. In 1971 he said this: "Canada's total oil reserves were 469 billion barrels at the end of 1970 while natural gas reserves were 726 trillion cubic feet. At the 1970 rate of production these reserves represent 923 years supply for oil and 392 years for gas."

Mr. Chairman: Order, please. The Chair hesitates to interrupt the hon. member, but according to Standing Order 55(2) speeches in Committees of the Whole House must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thought he was doing fine.

Mr. Chairman: I just draw that to the hon. member's attention.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I hope you have not forgotten the tradition, though, that on clause 1 of a bill a general discussion, provided it is on the bill, is still in order. Certainly, when we had discussions about getting into Committee of the Whole, that was the understanding among House leaders.

Mr. Chairman: It is a question of judgment. The hon. member is talking about a statement of a former minister of finance as to the oil reserves of the country. In terms of the taxation measure before us, the Chair would simply call to the hon. member's attention that a good deal of tolerance has been exercised so far. But we do have rules and we should try to observe them.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Chairman, let me tell you how it is relevant. I will put it to you and I will put it to the Canadian people. In 1971 the then minister of energy was saying that we had lots of oil. He based that on industry estimates. But two years later he said that we only had 18 years' supply of oil. By that time, we had sold out most of our oil. This time the government is telling us we have lots of gas, and we are selling out all our gas. The government is bringing in a program in this bill to pay people up to $800—which is not a bad idea—to convert from oil to gas.

Mr. Blenkarn: Where in the bill?

Mr. Waddell: It is in part of this bill. It is part of the clauses dealing with conversion.

Mr. Blenkarn: What clauses?

Mr. Waddell: If the hon. member would look at the different clauses in the bill—

Mr. Blenkarn: I have looked very carefully.

Mr. Waddell: What the government is saying is that it wants to pay people to convert to gas. What I am saying is that we had better have some cheap gas there so that when people convert, they can use it. It seems to me that makes a lot of sense. What the government is also saying is that we should aid people in insulating their homes.

The government is telling us that it is continuing with CHIP and so on. If the government really wanted to deal with this aspect, it would not say to people, "We will give you a grant up to $800". The government would go to the provinces and tell companies such as Quebec Hydro to go to people's houses to tell them how to convert their furnaces. These people would not have to pay anything right now. They would pay a little bit over a period of time. That is what Mr. Berube, the Quebec minister of energy told them. That is what he wants to do and it seems to me to be very rational. He wants to have the program so that low or middle-income people do not have to pay out money. They could have a professional person from hydro look at their houses. There would be no rip-offs. People could be advised about what to do with their furnace. They could convert and pay so much on their hydro bill. But the government on the other side, and the Quebec members especially, want to give the money directly to the people because the government thinks it is a better political pay-off. This means we will not have the best system of converting.

If the government really wants a conversion program, why not take chunks of a city, even take the whole of Toronto, for instance, and convert it? Let us get serious about energy conservation. Let us take a whole area and insulate every house. I talked to a carpenter this weekend. He told me that this government's program is a joke. He said the new houses that are being built would be blown down if a big wind came because they are so poorly built. What we have to do is to make really tough changes in building codes. We must make sure that every house in Canada now is built properly in order to be completely energy efficient. This program only goes a little way toward that goal. Really, it is nothing.

Drilling expenses are difficult to explain when one looks at this bill. There are clauses and clauses of income tax deductions. You would need a Philadelphia lawyer to explain them to people. But the Canadian people should keep the following in mind: for drilling in the north this government has given, out of a dollar invested, 93 cents. The government is going to give grants to Canadian companies. I have demonstrated through speeches in the House how Imperial Oil can practically call itself a Canadian company even though it is 70 per cent foreign-owned, provided that it becomes a member of a consortium with Petro-Canada. If a company has 70 per cent control of the consortium, it is classed as Canadian owned. It is a sham like much of the National Energy Program. It is rhetoric and it is a sham.

When the Canadian people consider that 93 cents in every dollar is paid by the Canadian government and only 7 cents is paid by investors, one wonders. Why do we not pay the extra 7 per cent and take control of the drilling? I do not know how the government will deal with this. I pose the following question to the minister: how will the minister propose to help northern drilling when the industry is on strike? I have quotes from a number of sources which say, "We are not going to drill in the north unless you change the National Energy Program." Under the provisions of this bill companies will receive traditional depletion allowances.

How do I explain to my constituents that a company like Dome Petroleum, that great Canadian company, is actually only 37 per cent Canadian-owned because it has sold most of its stock to the Americans, and that in spite of those hundreds of millions of dollars Dome received from that government over there, it does not pay any income tax? Go to your constituents outside and say that we pay an average of $1,500 in income tax but Dome does not pay anything, yet makes millions and millions and under the new government program, has depreciation allowances amounting to 93 cents out of every dollar! This government is going to face that situation. It is giving these people everything in order to drill and to encourage the private sector. Robbie Burns said:

Oh wad some power the giftie gie us to see oursels as others see us!

I wish others could see Canada in the sense of giving away so much money. In spite of giving 93 cents on every dollar to the industry, the industry is on strike and refuses to build.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance before I sit down what he proposes to do if, in spite of these generous tax allowances in this bill, in spite of the fantastic allowances he gives them, the companies, as they have said, will not drill in the north because they are not satisfied with the National Energy Program? Who is going to drill to find that oil, given that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said that for 60 per cent we will rely on the tar sands, which is tied up in a dispute with Alberta—who is going to drill in the north and off the east coast at Hibernia? Mobil said today and Chevron said yesterday that they would not drill. Who is going to drill and who is going to find that oil so that Canadians down here will have supply? I wonder if the minister would answer that question for me. Mr. Chairman, I do not think my time is up.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has one minute left in the time allotted him.

Mr. Waddell: I would ask the minister to reply to that question when he gets the chance. Who is going to do the drilling if these companies will not do it? If he is prepared to give them this generous tax allowance of 93 cents on every dollar, why does the government not add the extra seven cents and set up Petro-Canada to do it? What does the government propose to do, other than back down? Does it propose to stand up to these companies and say we are not going to accept these strikes?

The Chairman: Order, the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering as I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway if we were referring to the same bill. I have looked through Bill C-54 and I do not see any part which discusses the National Energy Program or anything about the 8 per cent tax or the pricing of oil. He seemed to make an urgent call for the government to go all the way. In fact, in my opinion the NDP has gone all the way with the government for a long time. As a result, it has gone so far I can see why the NDP, as a matter of party policy, is in favour of abortion on demand!

There is no doubt that Bill C-54, being 224 pages long is just grotesquely complicated as a matter of income tax law. I recall when tax reform went through. The matter was debated and finally passed. Then the horrendous nature of tax reform came home to people who had to live with it, the solicitors and tax accountants. The joke went around that not one member of Parliament understood what had been passed.

I can now say having been here and having tried to work my way through Bill C-54 that I very much doubt whether anybody understood what happened. To emphasize the point, sir, I would like to read clause 66.2(6) as follows:

> Where a non-resident person is a member of a partnership that is deemed under paragraph 115(4)(b) to have disposed of a property described in subsection 59(1.1), his share of any amount that would be an amount referred to in clause (5)(b)(v)(A) or subparagraph (5)(b)(vi) or (xi) in respect of the partnership for a taxation year of the partnership if section 96 were read without reference to paragraph (1)(d) thereof shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be an amount referred to in clause (5)(b)(v)(A) or subparagraph (5)(b)(iv) or (xi), as the case may be, in respect of the non-resident person for the taxation year of the non-resident person that is deemed under paragraph 115(4)(a) to have ended.

An hon. Member: That's clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Thacker: That is crystal clear. It is so obvious.

An hon. Member: If the Minister of Finance can't explain it we will get Jean-Luc to do it.

Mr. Pepin: It is very simple.

Mr. Thacker: We need without any shadow of a doubt a total review of the tax law. It is simply too complicated.

There is no doubt, for the minister's benefit, that in 1971 a number of general charging sections were brought in, but as a result of pressure groups, of which most of us were members at one time or another, these have been chipped away so that in several cases in this act the exceptions have actually overtaken the general rules, and there are so many exceptions that the general rule might as well be changed.

A disturbing aspect which I have certainly shared first-hand in my capacity as a solicitor is that the present complication is causing people to fiddle, to cheat, to go well beyond avoidance, into the area of evasion. They really do not have the respect for our tax system in the nation that they should because most people take a simplistic view. They feel the government comes up with a program, sells it to the people in a promise during an election campaign and that there should then follow a taxing bill which matches the selling job. We learn as politicians, of course, that you can cheat the people. You can promise them a program for which they do not have to pay immediately. We do that by going out and borrowing through Canada Savings Bonds. We borrow from our own people to give them a program they do not have to pay for! We then go out and issue treasury bills. We know in terms of Canada Savings Bonds there is about $17 billion outstanding which we borrowed from our own people. In treasury bills it is $20 billion, plus or minus a few. We have even been able to take the ultimate step. As a nation and as a government we have gone to the international marketplace and borrowed $9 billion or $10 billion. We have done this so that we do not have to increase taxes to our own people. Clearly that has misled the people and is causing trouble right now.

It is clear from tax statistics that the Income Tax Act is not progressive. The bulk of people come within the high tax ranges of individual taxation. For example, the new tax statistics for 1978 point out that of some 14 million returns, if you as a citizen earn $10,000 only 43 per cent of the population makes more than you. If you earn $20,000 only 13 per cent make more; in short, if you make $20,000 in our society you make more than 80 per cent of the taxpayers of Canada. If you make $25,000 only 6 per cent earn more than you, and if you earn $30,000 only 2 per cent of the taxpayers are in a higher bracket than you. If you happen to make $40,000 you would be above the top 99 per cent of taxpayers in this country and only 1 per cent would make more. If you hit that magical $50,000 bracket that we as members want to be in, at that point only .2 per cent of taxpayers will earn more money than you and you will then be above 99.8 per cent of the taxpayers of the nation.

Another fact I would like to put on the record is that tax expenditures have become quite enormous. Even dealing with tax expenditures we should not have to get into these very complicated tax amendments which try to raise money in all sorts of ways which, to the ordinary person with common sense, should be unnecessary. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out the massive tax expenditures under the old Dome Petroleum program, which the Liberal government in a previous incarnation introduced and which really meant that there was a tax expenditure of over 100 per cent for every dollar invested. Even under the existing program it is some 93 per cent.

However, let us look at the accumulated tax expenditures relating to RRSPs and registered pension plans. Over $20.5 billion have accumulated since 1979. Under the Canada Pension Plan $4.8 billion have accumulated. Incidentally, we do not have that $4.8 billion. That has been spent on ordinary operating budgets, so it is really just a bookkeeping entry. With respect to preferred tax treatment of income debentures and term preferred shares with which we deal in our tax law, $400 million have been lost as a result of that tax expenditure.

Marital exemptions have cost us $1.355 billion. Non-taxation of capital gains on principal residences has cost us $2.5 billion. I want to make that point in some later comments with respect to farmers and the capital gains tax. Transfer of income tax room to the provinces in respect of shared cost programs has cost us $3 billion at the federal level, and that is money we presumably could have had we not gone into it.

A major point which deals with this bill but also income tax in general, relates to the reverse onus clauses which we find in the Income Tax Act. There is now a feeling that the taxpayer is guilty until he takes steps to prove himself innocent. The general population out there in Canada has some real fear of tax administrators, tax assessors and tax collectors, who are able to get away with all sorts of statements and mistreatment of ordinary taxpayers. This leads to a great deal of lack of respect on the part of taxpayers, and there clearly is a feeling of guilt among people who come into accountants' offices or solicitors' offices and a feeling that the obligation is on them to prove themselves innocent. I believe the Minister of Finance should give some very serious attention to that, as should his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

A development which has affected us in the west a great deal is that income tax files have been moved to Winnipeg. In the past all files were held in Calgary. If a solicitor dealing with a tax problem wanted to deal with an assessor, he would simply get on the telephone, arrange an appointment and discuss the matter. It could be negotiated and solved right there. Now he puts in a call to Calgary and is told that the department is sorry but that a certain file has been moved off to Winnipeg. So the assessor in Calgary has to put in a requisition form to get the file out of Winnipeg and back to Calgary. Ordinary citizens who go to see chartered accountants learn that those accountants have filed their returns for them. Months go by. All of this causes agitation and concern. In addition, interest is charged if the taxpayer happens to owe a few dollars to the government. That should surely be examined and rectified.

Estates cause a very serious problem and, as my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, so aptly pointed out, time delays in obtaining income tax clearance certificates on estates are enormous. I want to associate myself with the comments of the hon. member for Moose Jaw because this clearly is a problem, at least in Alberta.

Some of the clauses in this bill are good clauses which I am sure everyone can support. While the spousal deduction amounts to another tax expenditure, in terms of equity and fairness most people would have to support it. Given the unfairness of the system we have and given the much too complicated tax system, until we have an over-all view—and I am hoping the minister or his parliamentary secretary will take a serious look at forming a new task force of some sort to take a genuine look at the Income Tax Act—clearly the spousal deduction is good. Citizens have to be careful with that, however, because if a small businessman is making less than about $17,000 and if he transfers much of that income to his spouse, then one or the other will be in trouble in terms of getting the maximum deduction under the Canada Pension Plan. I think the department should feel an obligation to put out some information to the taxpayer taking advantage of this to make sure either he or his spouse retains enough income in one to get the maximum Canada Pension Plan deduction. If people do not get that, they will find they will be in trouble when they retire.

The energy substitution grants of up to $800 are good in principle, but the minister should answer specifically the question as to whether the grants will be payable in the event of a partial conversion. For example, in many homes people have oil heaters, but they either do not want to get rid of the ones they have now because they were just recently purchased or they want to wait until the technology with respect to heat exchangers has improved. Meantime, they would like to put in a couple of electrical wall units. Will those qualify for a grant under this legislation? I would appreciate an answer to that.

Another advantage is brought about by the extension of the "cash" method to farmers. I think the government should be commended for that.

As far as it goes, the Small Business Development Bond is quite satisfactory, but we need to know whether it will be extended beyond the three-month period. I think most members on this side of the House would take the position that it should be and in fact must be extended.

The major defect in this bill is not what the bill contains but what it does not contain with respect to capital gains taxes. We all know that the Liberal government made a campaign promise, in the light of the Crosbie budget, of some specific tax relief for roll-overs on farm capital gain. The Liberals promised to move the valuation date from 1971 to 1974. The budget did not have that provision, and I want the minister to tell us specifically why it did not.

I would like to argue to the minister that capital gains tax is really a misnomer in the farm industry at this point. In fact, it has become a tax on capital per se. The reason is that there was no indexing with respect to the value of farmland, so since 1971 the value of farm land has gone up, but the bulk of that increase has been the result of inflation. When we work the calculations out and apply even a modest inflation factor, the capital gains tax takes more than that and is actually biting into the capital per se. The reason is simply inflation. As a result of its policies and its borrowing internationally and through Canada Savings Bonds—in effect, turning on the printing press—the government has created more money than there are material goods, and the value of those goods has therefore gone up. Unfortunately, the bulk of that money, at least in the area with which I am familiar, has settled on land. It has not settled out on boats, cars or trucks necessarily. It has settled on land. Land which normally would sell for $100 an acre in 1971 now sells at about $600. This is just for ordinary dry land. Often it will cost $1,000 an acre for irrigation land. The 1971 valuation date is too early. In 1971 land values in the west were at a low point. The 1974 value would actually be a much closer valuation to what the agricultural productivity of the land is because the other factor the minister needs to understand is that the price of land in the west is in no way related to its agricultural productivity.

If we applied the inflation factor to that, we would have it covered completely. So there are only two simple little moves which need to be made. While naturally I would like to have the capital gains tax taken off completely, the government could go a long way by advancing the VD value to 1974 and indexing the inflation factor from that date. What is happening is this: if I were a farmer who wanted to will my land to my son at the 1971 value, I could do that because we can get a tax roll-over. But the 1971 value would no longer produce enough money to permit me to retire in Lethbridge and buy a home there, because the inflated value in Lethbridge has gone up, and to have a nest-egg for my retirement. Second, if I want to transfer that farm to my son for, say, $300 an acre when the VD value is $100 an acre, that causes a problem because I could get from my son $300 an acre which would give me enough money to buy my retirement house, and then we could elect, for tax purposes, to roll it over to his name at the 1971 value. That would mean, however, that he would ultimately have to pay the capital gains tax. But he is not going to buy that deal and he will say to me, "Dad, I've paid you $300 an acre, how can you give me that land for $100 an acre?" If I died the day after or if I had to sell it, my son would have to pay the capital gains tax. So we are locked into a dilemma.

The third situation which could arise is that I as a farmer might want to leave my farm to my son as an economical unit, but I had two other sons who had moved away to become politicians and I had a daughter who had married and was living somewhere else. How could I transfer the farm to my son at the 1971 value and still give my other children a fair share of my estate? It has become quite impossible. As a result, people have been listing the land and selling it to the highest bidder. Often those are people with cash from the cities and industrial areas who wish to protect themselves from inflation. They are prepared to put their money into land with no thought of productivity. They just want to put their money into a safe place. As a solicitor in Lethbridge I did innumerable deals through my firm—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I have to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, one of our major concerns with respect to this bill is its excessive complications. The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills has alluded to them. We have a bill here which adds enormous complications to an already very complicated Income Tax Act. It is the view of many of us that the tax reform measures proposed by the Carter commission which are now in our Income Tax Act of 1971 need complete reform. We would expect the minister to speak on this clause with respect to tax reform.

The bill before us is exceedingly complicated. Clause 12 amends section 12 of the Income Tax Act. Let me remind hon. members that section 12 reads:

There shall be included in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year as income from a business or property such of the following amounts as are applicable:

And then it goes on with paragraph (a) right through to paragraph (o). This particular bill extends to paragraph (v) with one change after another. When an ordinary individual, or indeed a chartered accountant or a lawyer, is looking at this act, he must try to understand it. The act is now virtually incomprehensible to almost all except the most experienced. When looking at the problems of the ordinary taxpayer, the ordinary small businessman, we must realize that in this Income Tax Act we have created a horrendous problem. It is small wonder that a great number of people—some studies say nearly as many as 50 per cent of the population—who file income tax returns must receive some assistance in filling them out. But when you look at the complications contained in this act, you realize that a person whose source of income is in any way complicated may be required to hire not only one firm of chartered accountants but many. Indeed, they are faced with the problem that no matter how many experts they hire, they cannot in any way be assured that the experts understand the act.

I am only a country lawyer from Mississauga who has been involved for a considerable period of time in dealing with the corporate problems of many people and I want to say with absolute certainty that I have a very difficult time understanding this statute and understanding some of the complications that the minister has brought to us in Bill C-54.

Before I go into some of the problems in the few minutes allowed me, I will repeat what I said at second reading of this bill, namely, that the bill is an effort to bring into force in law some of the suggestions made in the November budget of 1978; to reinforce some of the defeated measures in the December 11 budget of 1979; to make as part of the law some parts of the "Minnie Mouse" budget of April 21, 1980, and to try to incorporate, if at all possible, and make sense out of, some of the suggestions of October 28, 1980.

The delay has made things impossibly difficult for most taxpayers, even for chartered accountants, for people in the lending industry and for people in business in general. The delay has been such that measures which might have helped to spur on the economy, have not done so. In that respect, it is important that the minister pay attention to our concern about the provisions covering the Small Business Development Bonds. The minister will know that this feature in our tax bill is really a reincarnation of the income bond which was allowed prior to the change in the act contemplated in 1978. What happens with an income bond is that the lender is able to lend money to a corporation. The corporation pays the interest in terms of a dividend rather than in terms of interest. The dividend is, of course, not deductible as an expense in business but is received by the lender as a tax-free remittance. That is how Petro-Canada was able to finance the purchase of Pacific Petroleum. It was immediatly after the purchase of Pacific Petroleum that the minister made the changes in the November, 1978 budget which prevented the use of income bonds, or term preferred bonds as they are sometimes called, as a method of financing. The concept was reincarnated in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West on December 11 which was defeated by these fellows who now occupy the treasury benches. It was defeated, of course, because it was not appropriate, but it was reinstituted in the statement of April 21 and reinforced in the statement of October to give some benefit to business.

During 1980 a number of small businessmen approached lending institutions with the objective of trying to finance some improvement or addition to their capital assets through the use of Small Business Development Bonds. I know of no small business which has been able to negotiate a Small Business Development Bond. I know of some which have been able to negotiate options on Small Business Development Bonds, but I do not know of any small business which has been able to use this provision which allegedly benefits small business.

In fact, if a small businessman approached the Bank of Nova Scotia or another lending institution, he was told, "If the statute goes through, then your interest rate will be reduced and you will be able to use the interest as a dividend. We will get it "taxfree" and you will not be able to deduct it. You can take advantage of the provision only if it goes through, but we do not know what will happen. In the meantime if you want the loan, sign at 13, 14, 15 or 16 per cent, and if it goes through, maybe we will give you a reduction." Until now I know of no small business which has been able to negotiate a Small Business Development Bond.

When this clause comes up, I will specifically ask the minister whether he can give the details of any small business anywhere which in fact negotiated an absolute Small Business Development Bond without regard to whether or not the statute went through. I suggest that he cannot and that everyone who managed to get something got an option deal. Because it was only an option deal and because they could not be firmly in place on the deal, most people were unable to use the provision which was boasted about as being useful to help small business.

We have had a charade. The Minister of Finance stood in the House and said that he is helping small business. He gave people the hope that they could do something about high interest policy of the government. Let me stop here for a moment. When the last government was defeated, the interest rate charged the chartered banks by the Bank of Canada, or the Bank of Canada rate, was 14 per cent. That was the rate when we were fighting an election a year ago. The person who now occupies a treasury bench as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said on a television show that if interest rates went that high, he would resign. Now the Bank of Canada rate is 17 per cent! While he had an unfortunate accident and came into the House with a cane, he has not resigned. Perhaps he has tendered his resignation and it has been refused.

Perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance will be able to explain whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has offered his resignation. If he has not offered it, why not? If he has offered it and it has been refused, why is the Minister of Finance prepared to accept and indicate that the Bank of Canada rate should be 17 per cent? A year ago he was traipsing around the country promising low rates of interest. At that time the Bank of Canada interest rate was only 14 per cent. How can he now say that it has to be 17 per cent and that it is low?

Let me leave that subject for now because it is somewhat off the topic. The real issue is whether small business should be able to borrow money or obtain funds to create new productive assets at a rate of interest which makes some sense. With all the programs of the Minister of Employment and Immigration—LIPs, grant programs, give-away programs, make-work programs or get a new community group to study the programs—the government refuses to recognize that small business creates most of the employment in the country and that small business is being totally tarred and feathered by the high interest rate policy of the government.

What does this bill do except provide that the Small Business Development Bond will expire on April 1, 1981? Perhaps that will be less than two months after the bill passes this House and the other place. What does the bill say? It says that unless one has done the work and unless all the improvements the loan is for are in fact in place, then one cannot write off the interest. One cannot write off the Small Business Development Bond payment scheme out of the surplus account of one's company on the basis of the dividend to the lender. The Small Business Development Bond is not that big a deal. With interest rates running from 19 per cent to 24 per cent for small businesses today, the Small Business Development Bond would perhaps allow small businesses to borrow, in after tax dollars, at a rate somewhere around 13 per cent. Even that is a dickens of a lot better than asking small businesses to pay 20 per cent; even that will create a great deal of employment.

In the bill before us we have misrepresentation and deceit. The government said that it will do something for small business. It said that it will allow businesses to use the Small Business Development Bond scheme, the same kind of scheme it allowed Petro-Canada to use when Petro-Canada bought Pacific Pete. The government will allow small businessmen to use that scheme and they will be well off, but they will be cut off on April 1, 1981, and will not be able to use it from then on.

The government offered a possible solution to the excruciatingly, exorbitantly and deceitfully high interest rates imposed on businesses; then it said that it cannot be used. In other words the government tries to get political marbles out of the deal and winds up teasing or pretending to do something but does nothing for small business. The deal is not all that great. Instead of paying 20 per cent, the small businessman might get away with paying only 13 per cent on the market. But that in itself would be something; it would give him some hope and would offer some employment. It would help to get the country rolling again.

Sir, before we got onto this portion of the bill I had an opportunity to speak to members on the treasury benches. I suggested to them that if they really wanted to accomplish something in this bill, what they might do is extend the provisions of the Small Business Development Bond to December 31, 1981. We brought in that provision. We suggested it to them in this House on motions under Standing Order 43 on a number of occasions. We expressed our concern over the Liberal high interest policy. They talked about the Tory high interest policy which was 14 per cent. They said it was terrible and impossible. But 17 per cent does not bother them. They do not mind 17 per cent. But if they wanted to do something in this bill at all they would immediately stand up and make an amendment to this statute, now, and extend that particular provision to December 31, 1981. I want to say this to you, as chairman of this committee, that if they really wanted this bill to go through and if they really wanted to demonstrate that this provision in the Income Tax Act will make some sense, then they would stand in their places immediately. I am finished and propose an amendment to this legislation to extend the date of the Small Business Development Bond to December 31, 1981.

The extension to that date would give small business the opportunity to go out into the marketplace, buy the production machinery it needs and make the new investment it needs to make. How can a man start a business, buy his equipment or get organized when he must pay 20 per cent to the bankers? Can we not give him a little break? Can we not reduce the interest rates he must pay? Can we not do something in this bill to get Canada going again?

Everything in the budget of October 28 was to turn off progress. There was not a thing in that budget which would expedite the development of Canada, make Canada grow again. Can we not do something in this bill? Can we not do one thing in this bill to make Canada grow again? Can we not be a little more reasonable with respect to the Small Business Development Bond?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but, as I have indicated his time has expired.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, speaking on income tax amendments is probably the most important function of a practical nature we have as members of this House. Our primary duty here is the watching of the expenditures of money to make sure that the tax system which collects that money to pay for government expenditures, is done wisely and prudently.

The previous two Conservative speakers, or maybe three, have mentioned the Small Business Development Bond. I can take that as an example of what I mean by being prudent. This should be the aim of the tax collectors of the federal government, and this particularly applies to the Department of Finance which lays down these amendments to the Income Tax Act in consultation with the Department of National Revenue. As has been made abundantly clear by the hon. member for Mississauga South, using this Small Business Development Bond as an example, it was a fiscal device to try to reduce the interest rates which were suicidally high in Canada because of a theory held by the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. So the government which preceded this government—the Clark government—tried in a small way to get at this problem on the fiscal side by reducing interest rates for at least somebody in the country. It picked on the small businessman, whether a farmer or a small businessman. It said, "We will give to you, the small businessman, the same kind of loophole in the tax law which exists for big companies like PetroCan, or any other company which is busy taking over someone else, if you call your interest a dividend."

Under our definitions in the tax law, the lender of that money is not charged tax. Therefore, he can reduce the rate by about half, plus a little bit for his own profit. This was a reasonably major effort to get interest rates down for the small businessman. Where it failed, of course, was not having included the farmer, whether incorporated or not. It should also have included all those in the export business, incorporated or not and it should have been applied to the ownership of homes, to be consistent and fair.

But what happened to this bill which we have before us? This bill simply says that the Small Business Development Bond will only be available to March 31. For the last two months the banks have been saying to small businessmen who tried to negotiate loans under this type of provision, "We will not lend money for a program which will end March 31." Small businessmen trying to negotiate loans under this type of provision have been made equal to big business in the borrowing of money at lower interest rates. In effect, the government wipes that situation out. So, the chaps who went ahead and took up options on the basis of the Small Business Development Bond are stuck now with this 15 per cent or 20 per cent interest rate.

I would suggest to the minister, Mr. Chairman, and to his officials that this is a perfect example of where the present government zigged when they should have zagged. He knows this country needs lower interest rates, whether they be in B.C., the Northwest Territories or in the Atlantic provinces, whether they be in Quebec, Manitoba or Ontario. Big business, small business, the little people are all being wiped out in tens of thousands by this high interest rate policy in the United States and Canada. Quantitatively it is wrong. I made that pitch on a previous occasion when I gave the figures on the rough comparative cost of using the interest rate technique to fight inflation versus the value of the dollar. I am simply repeating what previous speakers on this side have said, "For heaven's sake, stand up as a representative of the people and say this measure will be extended." Under the rules, of course, we cannot make a motion to add to the possible financial obligations of the government.

I would like to return to my main argument, Mr. Chairman. One of the things I said in my earlier speech, which the minister remembers well—it got him mad enough to get up and answer anyway—was that the main purpose of the Minister of Finance should be to get the maximum amount of taxes that he can. Comparing the present level of taxation in Canada with that in the United States, ours is counterproductive.

I will give you a classic example of this, Mr. Chairman. If you want to get more money out of the tax system today, reduce the taxes. Then people will go ahead and do some business. They will take out these development bonds and develop something. With that development comes jobs and with those jobs comes wealth. On that wealth the tax collector will collect.

Some people call this the theory of potential, but in its simplest terms, it is merely a way to get more money out of the tax system at a certain level, by reducing the rate, than can be obtained by increasing the rate. This theory does not apply to all things and all subjects, but it does apply in certain instances. About ten or 12 years ago the government, in its wisdom, increased taxation on cigarettes which were being used by roughly 30 per cent or 40 per cent of the population. The tax was increased to such a high rate that the people who lived along the American border smuggled in truckloads of cigarettes from the American side and distributed them without paying any tax to anybody. As a result, the government very wisely backed up and reduced the tax which stopped the smuggling and, as a result, it received more money.

The same situation exists today with regard to jewelry, which is the newest wrinkle in smuggling. With the rising prices on jewelry and an ad valorem luxury tax of 10 per cent, it makes such a difference that an article of jewelry which can be smuggled easily has increased tremendously in value over this last year or so. According to the police the amount of this smuggling has increased to between $100 million and $400 million per year.

Jewelry is of interest to many people, and that interest goes beyond the very rich right down into the middle class. All one need do is ask the secretaries around here what they would like for Christmas, and they certainly let it be known. I would suggest, as in the situation with the cigarettes, that if the government wishes to get more money through jewelry, it should search for the right level of taxation so that we may be competitive with our main opposition in this field, the Americans. The smuggling will then stop and the government will make more money. All the ladies, and their husbands or boyfriends will be happy, and the government will make more money. That is the simple logic of the ordinary layman.

On the question of the development bonds, such logic is much more important because the government will lose millions of dollars by letting small businesses take advantage of this loophole in the tax law, whereby one can borrow money and pay interest as though it were a dividend. The number of jobs and the amount of wealth which the government will probably produce over the next five years or ten years by this move will be far beyond anything it will lose by reducing the tax. Nearly all the tax economists in the English-speaking world accept that principle. That is why the minister looked so stupid in the House when he took away this one little thing in the Crosbie budget which helped small business move toward fiscal equality with big business and which moved toward developing and stimulating the economy while at the same time giving more money to the taxpayers. This is not new economics. It is the oldest economics of the world.

When I heard the parliamentary secretary to the minister reading his speech the other night with the passé comments that he receives from the department, I was struck not just by the embarrassment in which he found himself when he learned that his whole speech was out of order, but by his repetition of this passé doctrine we are so sick and tired of hearing from the Department of Finance. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary should check with his officials, who are right in front of him, and they will tell him that what I am saying is true. But those officials should not make ministers look stupid by encouraging them to make such comments in the House. That is why I have always defended ministers of finance.

I have made my point very clear with regard to the Small Business Development Bond, but I could also add comments about the Farm Credit Corporation, the export operations of this country which we should be trying to increase in order to take advantage of our dollar and the building of homes which is almost at a standstill in some of our larger cities where prices are too high and rent controls exist. These things are the real needs of the people. If the government wants more money for the tax collector from these segments of the economy, it will get more money from those particular items which are marketable products by reducing the tax rate. How much the tax rate should be reduced, no one knows, but the government should feel for the point where it stops receiving more money, and when it stops receiving more money, then it should level the tax off.

I am putting this forward, as I have done in the House many times before, as a classic example of the utilization of quantitative analysis through which the government may find out what is happening, rather than relying on this theory which we learned in school 40 years ago.

This bill has a number of clauses which should be praised. I am glad that at long last the remuneration for spouses has been included in the Income Tax Act. This has been requested by small business people and farmers all the years that I have been in public life. Credit should go to the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West of one and a half years ago who first introduced that provision which has been retained by this government. Even though I can accuse the minister, I believe wisely and correctly, of being forced to look stupid as the result of some of the statements he made in that budget speech when he should have been zigging rather than zagging on taxation, on that provision, I want to make it very clear that every husband is damned grateful.

The next item is small but crucial, and that is that the SIN number, the social insurance number, has now been mentioned in the Income Tax Act. No longer will instructions be given to banks, credit unions or trust companies to take out 25 per cent of the interest which holders of small denomination bonds with cash coupons must pay to the income tax department and which can only be refunded to them if they file an income tax form.

Most of the holders of $100 or $200 bonds are children, housewives or older people with a little bit of pin money who like to go down to their financial institution once or twice a year to obtain their $2 or $3 in interest. Yet, the people in National Revenue and the Department of Finance who would skin a louse for its tallow stuck in the provision that 25 per cent of their bond dividends must be paid by these old people and these children, knowing very well that they would never have to pay income tax. The government stole this money from these people, but at long last it has corrected the situation, and it should receive credit.

I might say, in all fairness, that there was no such provision in the Crosbie budget. I am appreciative of the fact that it is in this budget. I cannot find in this Income Tax Act a provision which applies to common-law spouses and which was in the Crosbie budget. Does the minister not know that there are a large number of common-law relationships in Canada? The number of these relationships cannot be measured at 1 per cent or 2 per cent. I do not know the correct percentage, but I do know that when I walk through any part of Canada, I am told of the unfairness which a man, who is probably paying alimony to his previous wife and who now has a common-law wife, must face because he cannot claim her as a tax deduction, even though she is carrying out all the functions of a wife. That provision was in the Crosbie budget. I have been through this bill twice. Maybe I have poor eyesight, but I have looked through this 200-page bill, and I cannot find it. Why discriminate against a person who is not divorced from his wife by not allowing him to use this common-law wife as a deduction? Is this part of the reluctance on the part of the government to treat women as equals, or is it something more realistic, namely, that the income tax people in the Department of National Revenue do not give a hoot about justice or equity? They are looking for every last penny they can find. They think they have a good, valid and moral reason because the couple living common-law are living in sin. I question whether the income tax people should concern themselves with this type of delicate question. I use that as an example of the other side of the story.

I have a list of 13 subjects I would like to raise with the minister. In some cases I hope that even in this last minute he will do something. Some of these are very important, but I will have to let them go.

Finally, there is something I have been raising in this House for seven years. Under the definition in the Income Tax Act and the Family Allowances Act, an orphan is not defined as being a child if that orphan is under 16 years of age. The minister in charge of social welfare agreed that is a discrimination against orphans. In 1978 the minister promised in the House to do everything possible to change it.

Who is holding it up? It must be the Department of Finance, Treasury Board or National Revenue. This bill does include a definition of a child, if they are eligible for family allowance from January to December. Why not include the word "orphan" in the definition of the word child. If a person is an orphan, he has lost both his father and mother. Why should he be discriminated against under the family allowances legislation and the child credit legislation just because he has no parents? The minister has admitted this discrimination. The previous minister of social welfare knew about it. Everyone knows about it, but nothing happens.

If this government has any principles of fairness and ethics, it will look at this question of orphans and consider including them in the definition of a child. It will get rid of these definitions and regulations which do an injustice to the orphans of this country.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes remaining in tonight's session, I wish to deal with my concerns regarding Bill C-54 as they pertain to the business community in Canada. During this session of Parliament, members of the opposition have probably spent more time on what appears to be a disregard for the stresses and strains placed on the business community in Canada through measures like Bill C-54 than on any other subject. Members of the opposition like to feel that members of the government have had some business experience. We would also like to feel that their business experience would be reflected in the legislation they bring before this House.

We went through an election campaign in 1979 and another in 1980 in which members opposite pledged themselves to bringing legislation into this House which would address the problems of the small businessman in Canada today.

During those election campaigns they made a commitment to the people of Canada to bring in legislation that would prohibit the growth of government, would increase the revenue of government for purposes of social welfare and social planning by spending less on government bureaucracy. What they have done with the introduction of Bill C-54 is bring in legislation to raise more revenue for government to cover increases in the bureaucracy, increases in government overhead expense. This government continues to spend, through increased taxes and bills like C-54, 25 per cent more than it takes in each year.

Surely members opposite believe in the free enterprise system. They believe as we on this side believe that the marketplace can function best with the government out of it, yet by creating an atmosphere which allows them to function without continually being interfered with. They have allowed the growth of government to exceed any increased percentage in the gross national product. They promised the people of Canada they would not do that. Since they have broken their promise and have increased the size and cost of government, they have no alternative but to bring in a bill like C-54, which in turn will increase revenues through increased taxation in order to cover the cost of government.

My experience in this House of Commons is not as long as my colleague who just spoke. He has 13 points he wishes to raise while this bill is in Committee of the Whole. I only have 11. I will try to deal with half of one in the remaining couple of minutes.

Let us take the example of a small businessman who looks at page 28 of this bill which deals with a 3 per cent inventory allowance at year-end, when he determines his business tax. When the 3 per cent inventory allowance was first conceived, interest rates in this country were 6 per cent or 7 per cent and inflation was not much higher than that.

What has happened since that was first conceived? Inflation in this country is now running in excess of 11 per cent and interest rates to the small businessman are running in excess of 20 per cent, even from the government lending institutions. Therefore, the 3 per cent inventory allowance on page 28 of this legislation is totally inadequate. When a businessman carries over that inventory at year-end, there is no way a 3 per cent inventory allowance will cover the cost of that inventory as a hedge against inflation, which is the reason it was introduced in the first place.

I ask the Minister of Finance if in the process of reviewing this bill he will consider increasing the inventory allowance to cover increased inflationary pressures in excess of the present insignificant 3 per cent allowance, bearing in mind that in the last 60 days, since this budget was brought in by the Liberal government on October 28, interest rates in Canada have gone up 39 per cent and the dollar is the lowest it has been in 47 years.

We still have the same Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in this House who promised that he would resign if interest rates went above 14 per cent. They have now done that and he has not kept his promise. We have an uncaring finance minister and a promise broken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I would like to move on if time will permit. If time does not permit, I will make my remarks at the next opportunity.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under S.O. 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—PROPOSED SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND NEW YORK CITY

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on January 20, 1981, I asked a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). The thrust of that question dealt with the importance of establishing as soon as possible a daily direct air service for passengers travelling between Ottawa International Airport and New York City for the benefit of commercial and other users. The question arose for two reasons. First, there seems to be a long delay in the process of resolving the question before the Canadian Transport Commission and the federal communications commission in the United States. An official from the Department of Transport indicated that the delay in the U.S. would be for a period of a year and a half which, quite frankly, seems to be quite a long time. Second, Air Canada, for some reason or another which is not apparent in terms of providing service to the travelling public, has filed an objection to the applications made by two competing Canadian carriers, First Air and Air Atonabee.

You might ask why there is a requirement for this kind of direct service, Mr. Speaker. For many years there has been growing concern in the national capital area about the necessity to provide a diversified employment base for the people who live here, particularly for our young people coming out of the school system, to provide an economic base for assessment for municipalities and local government generally. There has been concern that the area was becoming historically dependent upon the presence of the federal government, a tendency we cannot deny, and that because of restraint policies which have been applied generally it is not likely to provide uninhibited growth of employment opportunities.

Something else has happened in the meantime. Into this economic milieu in Ottawa-Carleton have come the high technology industries in abundance. The cities of Kanata and Nepean are gradually, inextricably but surely becoming the high technology centres of Canada. There is a feeling that we should do everything possible at the local government, provincial government and federal government levels to encourage other industries to settle here as well. There have been meetings with representatives from the cities of Kanata and Nepean, representatives from the townships of Osgoode, Rideau, Gloucester, and representatives from the local chambers of commerce. Out of all of these meetings has come the importance of quickly establishing an air service of the kind I have described, at least as a first step toward completing this industrial component. We regard this just as important as having our educational systems respond.

Two carriers have applied. Air Canada—which does not intend to provide the service itself—has for a legal reason decided that it would intervene to oppose the application. This is not the first time. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) is here. He knows. It was pointed out by the member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) that the situation had occurred in Winnipeg. It was done simply to preserve something Air Canada had, and is not using.

An editorial in the Ottawa Citizen for Tuesday, January 13, 1981, summed it up as follows:

> Air Canada is supposed to be in the business of flying people, not grounding them. Yet that is exactly what it is ready to do in its opposition to applications by two regional carriers to provide an Ottawa-New York air link. Air Canada's attitude is curious—while it has no legal rights to the route itself, it doesn't want anyone else to use it.

I think it is curious, indeed, and we are entitled to an answer. We are entitled to know as well what the stance of the government is. The Minister of Transport wrote a letter which I received today in which he said that under the Air Canada Act of 1977 the governor in council may give the company directions of a general nature. The point I want to make to the minister is this: please have the government give directions of a general nature. Have the company stand aside from its objection, because as sure as God made little apples, the presence of Air Canada in this matter before our Canadian Transport Commission is going to slow the process. The whole regulatory process takes on the dimension of not being a contest between two air carriers, First Air and Air Atonabee, but of involving a third right. It becomes complicated and it interferes with the minister's other responsibilities, to indicate to that commission that the government itself has an interest in diversifying the economy in this area.

I would ask the minister whether he will intervene in this matter in accordance with the powers of the act of 1977. Have Air Canada withdraw its application for a service which it does not intend to use. Allow the two contending parties to come before the CTC quickly so that a service, which is generally recognized in the national capital community can proceed; so that what businessmen have told us can come to pass; so that what municipal officials have told us is essential can come to pass, and so that we may have a direct air link between a commercial centre like New York which is important and which has been demonstrated as important in all the submissions which have been made.

I know the Minister of Transport has a personal interest in this because he represents a seat within the national capital. All of us who represent seats within the national capital have that interest. I ask the minister through his parliamentary secretary, who is kind enough to be here tonight, to answer my question. Will the minister intervene and, if so, to what extent? Can the time be shortened in which an application can be dealt with? Will he ask the minister or inform us whether he is prepared to reconsider the advice he gave me by letter today, and give the company "directions of a general nature" in respect of its attitude toward this application by two Canadian carriers to provide a service which Air Canada does not seem to want to provide? I think the service would be of benefit to this area, to the whole region of Ottawa-Carleton. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the minister has asked me first of all to convey his regrets that he is not able to be present for this debate. The question of a direct Ottawa-New York air service is, of course, of utmost interest to him as it is to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

The central point in considering such a service is the fact both Canada and the U.S. must work within the terms of the existing bilateral air agreement. Under the agreement the New York-Ottawa route has been allocated to a U.S. carrier. If Canada wanted a Canadian carrier to operate the route, approval of the U.S. authorities would be required.

Naturally the minister was pleased to see two Canadian carriers, First Air and Air Atonabee, take the initiative and apply to the Canadian Transport Commission for the route.

It is his hope that the regulatory process in both Canada and the United States can be dealt with as quickly as possible.

With respect to Air Canada's intervention and the applications before the CTC, I understand the minister has had the opportunity to explain his position more fully to the hon. member since his question last week. Since Air Canada is fully entitled to take this action under the existing regulatory framework and since the intervention is not likely of itself to delay the CTC's final decision, the minister does not feel it would be appropriate for him to tell Air Canada to withdraw its intervention.

In conclusion, the minister has asked me to stress his close personal interest in such a service and to assure the hon. member that he is exploring all available options to achieve it as soon as possible.

BANKRUPTCIES—CALL FOR INCREASE IN GUARANTEED INSURANCE COVERAGE

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I wish tonight to bring to the attention of the House and focus in a very direct manner on the absolute necessity of increasing deposit insurance. On January 15, in reply to a direct question, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) stated, and I quote:

—I have asked the Superintendent of the Department of Insurance to weigh the possibility of having the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation review the current $20,000 ceiling. That study is under way—

The words "review" and "study" have become watchwords for inaction. The Minister of State for Finance told the House that he has asked the Superintendent of Insurance to weigh the merits of an increase in this $20,000 ceiling. I submit that the evidence as to the need for an increase has long been available. Inflation alone has reduced the value of the dollar, from the time that $20,000 figure was first introduced, to half its value. Since the time that figure was fixed, such programs as the Registered Retirement Savings Plan and the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan have been introduced, and these have added to the level of deposits by Canadians.

Just as an example, the average Registered Retirement Savings Plan at maturity is worth $27,000, $7,000 over the limit. Last year the United States government increased its deposit coverage from $40,000 to $100,000 in response to needs comparable to those in Canada. The minister has in his files requests—and I have seen some of that exchange of correspondence—for an increase in the amount of deposit insurance from as far back as 1974. Many of those requests came from the industry itself.

What was the response? The response was that the premium costs for the relatively small number of depositors involved are not justified. That means it has taken an event like the collapse of the Astra Trust Company and the resultant tragic losses to hundreds of Canadians of their life savings before the government would begin to think about such an increase. The question now is how many more bankruptcies must take place and how many more Canadians must suffer financial loss before the government will take action.

It is the responsibility of the government to protect investments and deposits by Canadians in trust companies and institutions which have been given approval. The individual depositor should not have to feel, as many say they must, that they must be accompanied by their lawyers, who can translate the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, so that they will know whether they are insured or not insured.

Seals on doors declaring membership in the CDIC have been used to give depositors a sense of security, when in fact little security exists. People have invested $50,000, $60,000 or even more, only to find out that under today's circumstances, $20,000 is the limit of their protection, and whatever is in excess is lost, as was the case with respect to Astra Trust. This raises a related issue concerning funds being transferred and shifted into totally uninsured mortgages, or whatever, without the circumstances being fully explained to the depositor.

The government must more closely monitor institutions upon whom it bestows its charter of trust, not only for the sake of the thousands who have deposits and investments within them but also because of the vast majority of companies whose reputations have been tainted as a result of the Astra Trust fiasco.

It is time to do something which will, first, prevent these events from occurring in the future and, second, ensure that those who use federally approved and insured institutions are adequately protected.

I return to the issue of public confidence. You cannot encourage or expect a positive response from people who feel that even if the government says it monitors and will insure their savings, those assurances appear to be without real value.

I therefore put it once again to the minister that the evidence has long been available supporting the demand for increasing the basic insurance coverage. Astra Trust has only served to magnify that need. I therefore ask that the minister provide us with an answer with as little equivocation as possible. First, in the minister's response of January 15, he stated that actuarial studies were required to ascertain whether the increase should occur according to specific criteria which would establish the amount. My question is: Have those studies been carried out and, if not, when will they be carried out and when will the results be known? If, by any criteria, the figure of $20,000 was valid in 1967, a substantial increase is warranted today.

Can the minister provide in his response some assurance to the financial institutions to allay the worries of depositors and to restore once again the confidence of Canadian financial institutions?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The winding up of Astra Trust Company has been cited as a reason why the $20,000 limit on insurance on deposits in one institution should be increased. In this regard, I should like to point out that the Astra Trust situation is not typical in Canada. Astra is the only federal trust company to fail in more than 50 years, and it appears that its problems were not related to insured deposits but rather to other activities carried on by the principal shareholders of the company. Nearly all the certificate holders and depositors of Astra have been paid in entirety by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation because very few persons had amounts in excess of $20,000 due to them. Persons who did have deposits of an insurable type over $20,000 due to them stand to recover a substantial portion of the amount in excess of $20,000 when the remaining assets of the company are distributed on completion of its winding up.

Apart from the Astra Trust situation, a number of representations have been received by the government to the effect that the limit on deposit insurance should be increased. The level of coverage provided under the deposit insurance plan has been kept under regular review by the board of directors of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, and up to date it has been thought the existing limit is adequate to provide for the savings needs in the form of deposits of the vast majority of people.

The hon. member has cited the growth in the funds accumulated under Registered Retirement Savings Plans and RHOPs as a reason for an increase in the $20,000 limit. I should mention in this connection that, to the extent that contributions under such plans are put into insurable deposits, such deposits are treated separately from other deposits with the same institution, for purposes of the $20,000 limit.

Any change in the limit would require an amendment to the legislation governing the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. The government plans to introduce proposals for revisions to the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act in the near future, and this will provide an opportunity to consider the question of increased limits for deposit insurance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.20 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

REVIEW OF INTEREST RATE POLICY BY STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I move a motion under Standing Order 43. The Bank of Canada interest rate has floated at 17 per cent now for nearly two months. Forward positions indicate that interest rates will not significantly decline in the foreseeable future. A year ago, those now on the treasury benches campaigned on the promise that they would reduce interest rates. The rate was then 14 per cent; it is now 17 per cent. They have abandoned their promises. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That this House immediately order its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to undertake an immediate review of the high interest rate policy of this government and of the Bank of Canada, and for this purpose the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance appear before it to explain their actions and what they will be doing to solve the problem.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AWARDS AND DECORATIONS

SUPPORT FOR AWARD OF ORDER OF CANADA TO CANADIANS INVOLVED IN ESCAPE OF AMERICAN HOSTAGES FROM IRAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a motion under Standing Order 43, the intent of which I have discussed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). One year ago six Americans escaped from Iran with the help of Canadian diplomatic and military personnel. Most of the Canadians involved in the successful return of the American house guests were subsequently awarded their country's highest honour, the Order of Canada. Two persons, however, Mrs. Zena Sheardown and Mrs. Pat Taylor, whose role in sheltering the six Americans was critical, were not awarded the Order of Canada. To redress this injustice I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House go on record as strongly supporting the nomination by the Department of External Affairs that Mrs. Zena Sheardown and Mrs. Pat Taylor receive the Order of Canada for the courageous and indispensable role which they played in the rescue of six Americans from Tehran.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I gather there is unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

CALL FOR REINSTATEMENT OF HOME REPAIR AGENCY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of great emergency. Recently CMHC officials informed the national anti-poverty organization that their contract as a RRAP home repair agency on the northern peninsula of Newfoundland was cancelled without notice. Since this program has successfully upgraded some 400 homes on the west coast, and over 140 east coast applicants desperately await home repairs and can provide labour while unemployed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That the minister responsible for CMHC immediately reinstate the NAPO-RRAP for at least six months in order to complete home repairs and solve administrative problems; and further, that CMHC extend RRAP in a more flexible, decentralized way, offering training for local workers in order to assist economic recovery in depressed rural areas and Indian reserves across Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to draw to the attention of this House an injustice arising from the federal excise tax on natural gas and which is being underlined by the presence in Ottawa today of the 18 directors of the Alberta Gas Co-ops Federation. Under present regulations the excise tax must be paid within 30 days from the end of the month in which the gas is used. Most gas utilities do not collect revenue or make calculations of gas sales until approximately 75 days from the end of the month in which the gas is used, and cannot comply with existing payment regulations. In fact, at present many gas utilities must borrow money at excessively high interest rates to pay the tax. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

● (1410)

That the government accede to the request of the Alberta Gas Co-ops that all gas utilities be allowed 90 days following the end of the month in which the gas is used to calculate, collect and remit the excise tax to Revenue Canada until the tax can be eliminated completely.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CAFETERIA AND LAUNDRY WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As the Supreme Court of Canada on December 18 recognized the equal contribution of a woman to the success of her partner, awarding Rosa Becker half the assets accumulated by her common law partner of 19 years, and as the Treasury Board has finally decided to honour recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission giving the female-dominated library science group of federal librarians salary equalization adjustments so that their pay indicates their work has equal value with that of the male-dominated historical research librarians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House urge the government to act on the directions of the Canadian Human Rights Commission and immediately implement a long outstanding "equal pay for work of equal value" settlement with its federal cafeteria and laundry workers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

SPEECH OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), in his speech to dairy farmers at Moncton, New Brunswick, on January 20, 1981, stated:

—so it seems sad to me to hear some citizens of this country talking about not wanting to share their regional resources or their tax revenues with the other parts of the country.

It is clear that the minister was referring to the people of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, even though they have in fact shared their oil and gas wealth and tax revenues to a greater extent than any province at any time in confederation and have always paid the extra tariff charges to support manufacturing in central Canada. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Prime Minister direct the Minister of Agriculture to stop sowing the seeds of dissension in other parts of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATURAL RESOURCES

REAFFIRMATION OF PROVINCIAL OWNERSHIP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The National Energy Program has fostered and is continuing to foster apprehension in Canada. Much of this apprehension is caused by the repeated suggestion that loss of provincial ownership of resources is at stake. To reduce such apprehension I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet):

That Parliament, through appropriate action of this House, reaffirm that natural resources within the boundaries of each and every province shall remain the property of the provinces; and furthermore, that the final address to Her Majesty on constitutional patriation shall contain within the proposed amending formula a section affirming that no existing natural resource ownership rights shall be taken from any province without the express consent of the affected province.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

CALL FOR STUDY BY STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In a poll conducted recently in the riding of Peterborough, Ontario, 5,927 respondents answered the following question: "Do you support capital punishment for premeditated first degree murder?" Of these respondents, 5,168 or 87.2 per cent answered in the affirmative. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

● (1415)

That this House urge the government to respond to Canadians and refer this subject of capital punishment to the all-party Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for its recommendations to be made to Parliament, or follow the example of the Conservatives and pledge support for a free vote in this House on the subject of capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent to this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ALLEGED REPUDIATION OF STATEMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It goes to the heart of the parliamentary system and concerns the Solicitor General who on Friday, as a minister of the Crown and appearing as the Acting Minister of Justice, a position he holds by virtue of an order in council, gave an undertaking on behalf of the government which later, according to the Minister of Justice, "we decided, the Prime Minister and I, that we were not to accept".

Since the Prime Minister has repudiated the minister, has he asked for the resignation of that minister, or has that resignation been offered to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, this House can not function if the word of hon. members can not be accepted. Particularly it can not function if we cannot accept the word of ministers with respect to bills which they are piloting through the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: By his answer the Prime Minister has indicated that the word of the Acting Minister of Justice in committee, on a bill he is piloting, is absolutely worthless. He has thrown aside the ability of this House and the public of Canada to trust the word of a minister.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Since we have an energy bill before the House of Commons and in a committee, does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is piloting that bill through the committee, speak for the government, or will his word be repudiated by the Prime Minister? There are finance bills which are coming through. When they are in committee does the Minister of Finance speak for the government on those questions or will he be repudiated by the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has abandoned the traditional standards of this House.

Madam Speaker: I must ask the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to put his question.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, my question is: since the Prime Minister has abandoned the traditional standards on which this House has customarily relied, what new standards has he put in place in order to tell us which word of which minister in this House can be trusted and accepted?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, there are no new standards; the same standards continue to apply.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if the same standards apply then the Solicitor General of Canada, as Acting Minister of Justice, should resign and have his resignation placed before the Prime Minister and this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: During the time in which the Acting Minister of Justice made the statement which has been repudiated by the Prime Minister, he was serving in that position by order in council, by the direct instruction of the Government of Canada, and he was flanked by the advisers of the Minister of Justice. I wonder whether the Prime Minister can tell us if everything else the Solicitor General said on that occasion was a mistake too. Was everything else he said to be distrusted and thrown aside? Has the Prime Minister repudiated everything the minister said? How does the House of Commons know what is repudiated and what is not?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is making an emotional argument about something which happens frequently.

An hon. Member: It only happens to you!

Mr. Trudeau: The member opposite says it only happens when we are on this side. Well, Madam Speaker, they changed their minds with respect to Petro-Canada and we did not make a great fuss.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Was the former prime minister talking about his government's policy when he took the position on moving the embassy to Jerusalem? Was he taking an official position and was he repudiating himself and forcing himself to resign?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Dictator.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members should allow the Right Hon. Prime Minister to answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it was not the Solicitor General who was at fault here. I believe, quite frankly, that when this government presented the amendments to the provinces last summer, including a provision for the protection of property, this was our position. This was the position of the Minister of Justice as he negotiated with the provinces throughout the summer.

Mr. Nielsen: It was his position four days ago, too.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, there is nothing untoward or surprising about this turn of events. The point is that the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General at different times were trying to obtain increased consensus for the bill.

Mr. Dick: When is Broadbent going to join the cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: The difference is that when we talk of increased consensus, we are trying to obtain the support of more provinces or to bring the opposition party onside. When the Leader of the Opposition changes his mind, all he is attempting to do is get his own party onside.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister continues his dances of evasion at which he is a renowned expert. Will the Prime Minister answer this simple question: When does a minister speak for the Government of Canada on a bill which that minister is piloting through a committee of Parliament, and when will that minister be repudiated, as the Solicitor General was repudiated by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Leader of the New Democratic Party the other day? When can we trust the word of a minister of this government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it would seem to me that rather than talk of dancing, the Leader of the Opposition should have listened to my previous answer. The minister was speaking for the government when he made that offer on Friday.

Mr. Clark: Commitment.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, and, I repeat, that was our position last summer. But it did not bring the Tories onside. They seem to want this amendment, but they do not want the whole charter.

Mr. Clark: When can you be trusted, Pierre?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition asks when I can be trusted. I did not ask him that question when he took his position on Jerusalem or on Petro-Canada; I said that it was wrong.

Mr. Lawrence: If I remember rightly, you would not take a position on that issue.

Mr. Trudeau: If the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition believes that the position taken by the Solicitor General was wrong, he may make his arguments. But we changed our mind on the matter, and it is as simple as that, as the Leader of the Opposition has changed his mind on several matters.

ALLEGED BREACH OF COMMITMENTS BY MINISTER

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has said that these flip-flops happen frequently; I imagine he was referring to his government. But the situation which we have now is that an undertaking was given by the Solicitor General who was acting as the Minister of Justice, and a clause was passed on that undertaking. That clause was then changed when we moved to another clause because of the undertaking. So there was a very definite—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot refer to the proceedings of the committee in question and, therefore, he cannot refer to the fact that a clause was passed. If the hon. member has a question concerning policy or matters which do not refer to the proceedings, he may proceed with that question.

Mr. Nielsen: This concerns Parliament.

Mr. Epp: In view of the fact that certain decisions and actions were taken because of commitments made by a minister under oath, on what basis does the Prime Minister feel he is justified to breach or flip-flop on those commitments? The Prime Minister has said it is because of objections by the provinces, but at the same time he overrides those objections and is willing to impose a referendum, is not willing to impose an amending formula, and there are many other parts of the charter which are opposed as well. How does the Prime Minister square that double standard?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the first part of the question, Madam Speaker, I think the wisdom of the rules of the House is justified in that I do not know about the clause and what was given in exchange, as he says—

An hon. Member: You will find out.

Mr. Trudeau: I will find out when the committee reports, but I think the substance of the question is more serious and I will attempt to answer that seriously. Our position has been, Madam Speaker, that when we brought the resolution before the House we had at least the New Democratic Party onside and we had—

An hon. Member: They sold out early.

Mr. Trudeau: —and we had the Premier of Ontario and the Premier of New Brunswick onside. In other words, we all thought that this action was necessary and important at this time. Since then we have heard many witnesses in committee, and the position taken by the government and expressed when the Minister of Justice brought in his amendments was that any amendment we could bring in which would increase the support and augment the consensus behind this resolution would be accepted by the government. But we would not accept an amendment, no matter how desirable it would be, if it were going to diminish the support we have now.

Our position on that was that these amendments would be discussed at the second stage.

An hon. Member: That is leadership?

Mr. Trudeau: The important thing is to get the resolution through. That is leadership, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sixty-four per cent.

Mr. Trudeau: I think the hon. member opposite is really off base when he talks about waffling. We hear that the Conservative party—

An hon. Member: Are you going to waffle?

Mr. Trudeau: —is in favour of a charter—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid I have to interrupt the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I would ask him to answer the question that is asked in the House—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is doing his best.

Madam Speaker: —rather than answering the interjections that come from other members. The hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I want to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. He said that many witnesses appeared before the committee and that is true. Invariably, they wanted property rights. Many Canadians want the guarantee of property rights—

An hon. Member: Most of them.

Mr. Epp: —included in the charter of rights. I want to ask the Prime Minister why it was in view of the testimony of the Minister of Justice when he said, "We decided, the Prime Minister and I, that we would not accept"—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: When did he say it, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: I was not there, but I believe that the hon. member is now quoting proceedings from the committee and that is not allowed in this House at this time.

Mr. Lawrence: It is a policy question and an important question.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the statements made at various times and by his minister that they needed the support of the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) and the NDP and the support of Premier Blakeney and the NDP—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Epp: —could the Prime Minister answer this: Why was that pressure so extreme that he was, in fact, willing to override—

Mr. Lalonde: His name is not Peter.

Mr. Epp: —the wishes of the majority of Canadians who wanted to see property rights included?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, in so far as the federal government and jurisdiction is concerned, property rights are now contained in the Bill of Rights passed when the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker was Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: So is the preamble.

Mr. Trudeau: In that sense, Madam Speaker, property rights are protected now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: They are in so far as federal jurisdiction is concerned. I understand that the position of the Tory party—

Mr. Clark: That is not what Bob Kaplan said.

Mr. Trudeau: —is that they do not want to impose the charter on the provinces.

An hon. Member: What is the position of the Grit party?

Mr. Trudeau: That is the position of the Tory party.

An hon. Member: What is the Grit position?

Mr. Trudeau: But we have those rights federally now. They do not want to impose that on the provinces. It is hard to see what they are complaining about. They were proposing an amendment which, if passed by us, would go against the will of several provinces.

An hon. Member: It was accepted by your minister.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member mentioned the Premier of Saskatchewan. He might mention the Premier and government of Prince Edward Island. As he knows, the attorney general of Prince Edward Island was in this city lobbying against the clause on property rights.

Mr. Lawrence: You are getting senile.

Mr. Epp: All you wanted was—

Mr. Trudeau: I will make an offer—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher is allowed one supplementary question, not a second one from his seat.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

TESTING OF CHEMICAL SPRAYS—POTENTIAL HEALTH HAZARDS

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Over the past few months this House and the people of Canada have been patently misled about the amount and degree of chemical warfare testing in this country. First we had the 1953 tests in Winnipeg, then the tests off Vancouver Island in the mid-sixties, and now we have the Gagetown tests. Will the minister now come clean and tell us how many more tests like Gagetown occurred, when they occurred and how they occurred? Will he also tell us if there are any more tests like this going on today?

● (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think I already answered the question of the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake yesterday when I told him that on the basis of our information, no further tests have been made to spray chemical products in the air, over bases or over public areas, and that I have given very strict instructions so that in future no project may be carried out without the minister's formal authorization.

[English]

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, if the minister had answered that question yesterday, I would not have asked it again today.

Yesterday the minister did admit to this House that he had known since last September of the existence of the Gagetown report and tests. Given the seriousness of the potential health hazards, why did the minister cover this up at the time? Did he inform the Prime Minister and the minister of health so that the proper precautionary steps might be taken, and if not, why not?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, you have to put this incident in a proper and realistic perspective. These tests were done in 1966 and 1967. They were performed over a small area of a large base, namely, Gagetown, which comprises 250,000 acres. The tests were done on 400 acres. According to Mr. Hellyer, the minister at the time, they were strictly routine tests. I do not think the minister or even the Prime Minister should be advised of everything taking place on all of the bases across Canada. The product was commercially used. It is still commercially used, and we had no reason to think there would be any harm to the health of the people.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, the minister has just admitted to this House that the tests were routine at the time. That would indicate to me that there is a possibility of considerably more tests and more hazards to the health of the Canadian military personnel involved. The minister also says there is no evidence as to the seriousness of the effects. How does the minister respond to the 2,000 Americans who are now suing Dow Chemical and the other manufacturers of Agent Orange? How does he respond to charges of proof that dioxin is one of the most deadly chemicals known to man? Has the minister sought any information from other sources, particularly the American government, as to how to deal with these potential health hazards caused by Agent Orange and other chemicals containing dioxin?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is making presumptions. I do not want to get involved in a legal argument with the United States government or the veterans' association of the United States. As I said before, I am ready, along with the minister of health for New Brunswick—the product is still being used in New Brunswick—and our own health minister, to collaborate fully in any kind of investigation into that product and how it could harm people.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—INQUIRY RESPECTING SUPPORT FOR PROPERTY RIGHTS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday Canadian Press reported the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice as saying that the government was considering breaking its commitment to support the inclusion of property rights in the constitution because the continued support of the NDP was very important to the government. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government has received the assurance from the NDP that as a result of breaking that commitment it will have the continued support of the NDP for the government's constitutional package?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member has the sequence wrong.

An hon. Member: The parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Trudeau: My understanding is that the Minister of Justice said Friday that he would not support that amendment. I understand the Leader of the NDP made his "threat" on Sunday. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, what our position was; I said it a moment ago. Any amendment which will bring us greater support, I will accept. Any amendment which will erode the support, including that of the NDP, I will not accept.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister, of course, is wrong. It was the Acting Minister of Justice who, on Friday, said the government would support the amendment. It was not until yesterday evening at eight o'clock that the Minister of Justice indicated that he was betraying the commitment that was made.

In view of the statement just made by the Prime Minister that any amendment which would win increased support from Canadians he would support, and in view of the fact that the government is prepared to change its position for the support of 32 New Democrats, will the government listen to the voice of 64 per cent of the Canadian people who are asking the Prime Minister to bring the Canadian constitution back to Canada unamended, and to make substantive changes here in Canada and not in the parliament of Westminster?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the first part of the hon. member's question I would have to defer to the Minister of Justice, who has left the House temporarily.

An hon. Member: He is over there.

Miss MacDonald: He said yesterday he would answer last night.

Mr. Trudeau: I understood him to say that it was on Friday that he indicated that he could not support the property rights amendment.

As to the other part of the question, Madam Speaker, it seems to me its very phrasing indicates that if we went this course we would not get greater support for the resolution. On the contrary, we would be destroying the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I see an hon. member waving at somebody in the gallery. I do not know what his point is, but I am telling him that if he is suggesting that we withdraw the resolution in order to get his support, I say no, we will not do that.

Mr. Beatty: Listen to Canadians for a change.

Mr. Trudeau: We would amend the resolution to get his support, as we did with the NDP and as we did with some of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTED CHANGE OF POSITION BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, perhaps I can help the Prime Minister by directing a question to the Minister of Justice, because he does not seem to fully appreciate what is going on here or the import of this question. The minister has indicated, and it is now a matter of public record, that he and the Prime Minister on Friday decided that they could not accept the Conservative property rights amendment. That was the same day that the Solicitor General, as Acting Minister of Justice, gave the exact opposite commitment in committee when he indicated that he would accept it.

Mr. Nielsen: On behalf of the government.

Mr. McGrath: We moved to another clause when that commitment was made and we agreed to withdraw.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think it would be wise just to proceed to the question; the preamble is too long and the hon. member is getting into proceedings of the committee.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I certainly do not want to transgress the rules of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: But I say to you with great respect that this goes beyond the committee; this goes right to the heart and soul of Parliament. That is what we are talking about—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: —as well as the accountability of this government to Parliament and whether or not we can accept the government's word. That is what we are talking about, Madam Speaker.

Did the minister meet with the Prime Minister on Friday within minutes after the solemn undertaking was made to the committee by his colleague acting on his behalf?

An hon. Member: It was Thursday.

Mr. McGrath: Can he tell us from where the opposition came, because there was no opposition coming forward until the weekend? The Leader of the NDP himself did not speak until Sunday. Where did the opposition come from? What caused him to change his mind on Friday?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, on Friday night, probably nine or ten hours after the meeting, I was talking by telephone to the Prime Minister in light of the developing opposition. We recognized that I could not have communicated with the Solicitor General. The conditions which were approved by cabinet were, as the Prime Minister said, that if it would enlarge our support we would go along with it. By Friday afternoon that was not so. It was indicated to the committee and we received some information to that effect. This was confirmed on Sunday, 48 hours later, by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. On Monday night the attorney general for Prince Edward Island was before the committee. On Monday afternoon the Premier of Prince Edward Island was objecting to it.

Mr. Clark: This was Friday.

Mr. Chrétien: As we were not, according to our directive, improving the consensus, we concluded that if we did not get unanimous support in the committee we would not go along with it. It was quite evident there was no unanimity. Therefore, on Monday we decided that, unfortunately the consensus was not developing. We could agree because we agreed in July—and I conceded to the provinces in the summer—that I would not impose this on them.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to help the House try and get through that bafflegab. If he and the Prime Minister changed their minds because of opposition from the provinces—and he cited the attorney general of Prince Edward Island—can he tell us why the double standard? I recall the Premier of Saskatchewan coming before the committee and objecting in the strongest terms to the unilateral provisions of section 42, yet nothing has changed there. Why deny Canadians property rights while imposing upon them an amending formula which will deny their provincial rights in their legislatures?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, the committee has yet to reach section 42. We will get to it soon if the opposition is prepared to get down to business and pass the amendments. The committee has now been sitting for four or five months and we are still on section 7. I think many sections have to be adopted between 7 and 42, and I have already indicated that we will be moving amendments to that section when we get to that stage of the resolution. We will settle that problem then. All I am saying, as I clearly explained in committee this morning, is that had the committee been unanimous—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister is now repeating what he said in committee this morning, and that is out of order because obviously we cannot entertain that question in both places. Therefore, I would urge the hon. minister to abide by the rules of the House.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I am quite prepared to abide by the rules, but I am answering the question put to me and if my reply is out of order, I suggest the question was out of order as well and I am prepared to discuss it again at 3.30 this afternoon.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

TESTING OF CHEMICAL SPRAYS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO POTENTIAL HEALTH HAZARDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Changing the subject.

Mr. Dick: Here's the culprit.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: Self-defence.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Conservatives are obviously upset because we managed to get a lot of amendments accepted by the government and they are losing out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: My question to the Minister of National Defence concerns a very important health matter. American authorities have recognized the harmful effects of Agent Orange, contrary to what the minister of defence is implying. We have been misled in this House a number of times about the frequency of use of other chemicals of a military nature being tested in Canada. Finally, considering the erroneous information of different kinds related to the subject matter that has been presented to this House, will the minister now consider establishing an independent commission under the Inquiries Act which will have the full authority to investigate all the health implications of these tests, so that we can finally get to the bottom of this very serious health problem?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): I would first say, Madam Speaker, that I have never misled this House on the issue mentioned by the hon. member for Oshawa. I have always tried to state the truth regarding spraying, whatever kind it may be, certainly with regard to the two incidents since I have been minister. With regard to the one in Winnipeg, the truth came out in a report that was published. Everything was made clear and there was no question of a health hazard in connection with that spraying.

With regard to the second one in Oromocto or at the Gagetown base, this is another matter which the hon. member does not understand. The first was a harmless spraying over a portion of Winnipeg. The second was over a very small area of a large military base in places where there were no humans.

They did not spray humans, they sprayed vegetation. This is still being done in forestry areas for other purposes in the province of New Brunswick.

With regard to the hon. member's comment that U.S. authorities have said this chemical is dangerous and condemn it, I would like him to tell me why the issue is not being settled between veterans in the United States and the U.S. government, which did not admit to any damage being done by such products.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister has sat on a report he has had on this subject since last September. The report indicated very clearly that experts in the United States have clearly argued that these substances are profoundly dangerous to human health. He has admitted in the last couple of days that this is apparently a routine procedure.

Mr. Lamontagne: Was.

Mr. Broadbent: He says was, in the past. Apparently they have changed it. Perhaps there is some consciousness that there are dangerous implications. Considering that the matter in the United States has not been settled and is now before the courts, with a considerable amount of medical information on the side of those who are fighting the case, why does the minister not establish an independent inquiry in Canada which will make available to the Canadian public, particularly those who might have been affected, all the health implications of these tests?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I stated very clearly yesterday, and I repeat it for the hon. member for Oshawa, that if he is concerned about a health hazard as a result of these incidents, I am ready to co-operate fully with the New Brunswick health department and our federal health department and to investigate the whole issue as much as the hon. member wants.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—COMMITMENT RESPECTING PROPERTY RIGHTS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister and the government knew there were some objections to an amendment on property rights well before the commitment was made in committee. The Prime Minister and the government knew full well that the Conservative party was not supporting many aspects of this resolution. The Prime Minister said today that the commitment was made in order to broaden consensus. Knowing that it would not broaden consensus, why did the Solicitor General, the acting justice minister, make that commitment? Is the Prime Minister really trying to make us believe that it was put forward to broaden consensus which the Prime Minister knew perfectly well did not exist?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the federal Conservative party seems to attach such importance to this matter—

An hon. Member: You're damned right we do.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says, "You're damned right we do". I say that if they want that amendment so badly in the constitution, and they want it so badly that it should bind all the provinces as well as the federal government, then let them come and support us and maybe I will give up the support of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, I remind the Prime Minister that the Conservative proposal is to put these provisions that we have been suggesting and working on to the provinces. I come back to what my question to the Prime Minister really was; he has not answered it. He now says he was trying to broaden the approach. Knowing there was no consensus, why did the Prime Minister permit the Solicitor General to go ahead and make a commitment which was not made on the basis of getting support from us for anything, broadening consensus or anything else, but was clearly made as a consequence of some decision in government? The Prime Minister cannot have it both ways. He cannot be saying it was to broaden consensus when he knew it would not broaden consensus.

Mr. Trudeau: Let me make it clear, Madam Speaker. I thought I said earlier that this government supported the property rights clause. We presented it to the provinces last summer. I personally would have liked to see it in the constitution. It was opposed by many of the provinces.

An hon. Member: By Ed.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Oshawa was not a party to the negotiations last summer. The negotiations last summer were with the provinces, not with the NDP. We still hoped at that time to get support for the people's package. In the people's package was a clause concerning the protection of property rights. There was a last attempt on Thursday and Friday by the Solicitor General, since it was the federal Conservative party that willed so strongly against the will of some Conservative premiers of the provinces to have this in the package.

● (1450)

Mr. Clark: A commitment given under oath.

Mr. Trudeau: There was a disposition to get the Tory party onside. It did not have this effect so we changed our mind. I put it again today; if putting property rights into the constitution will obtain us the support of several of the Tory premiers and of the leader of the Conservative party for the resolution, then I will go back to cabinet and see if we will not change our mind again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRADE

REPORT OF TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Seven months ago the Textile and Clothing Board presented to the government an exhaustive study on the textile industry problems in which it recommended that the quotas negotiated with several countries be extended for nine years. Considering that in the same report the board was asking and urging the minister to take immediate steps concerning the shirt industry in Canada, that no decision has been taken after seven months and that over 700 workers are without jobs, I would ask the minister whether he intends to intervene at the earliest opportunity and make public the government position about the report of the Textile and Clothing Board?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, when I tabled the report of the Textile and Clothing Board I stated that the intention of the government was to make an attempt to reply to the recommendations of the report in March. I am endeavouring to achieve that objective within the time limit specified when I tabled the report. I am fully aware of the difficulties experienced by the shirt industry and I am still looking into this problem to find out whether it is necessary to take emergency action even before announcing our general policy.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

INQUIRY RESPECTING REFERENCE OF PROGRAM TO SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is further to the exchange yesterday between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Calgary Centre on the question of referring the National Energy Program to a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons. My question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the National Energy Program acknowledges almost a total revolution in energy development in this country, I am sure the minister is encountering a great degree of uncertainty among consumers, industry and provinces as to the impact of this program.

Since the National Energy Program is the subject of at least five separate pieces of legislation, will the minister add his support to the fairly positive response of the Minister of Finance in allowing this program to be considered by a special committee of the Senate and House of Commons?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the way I read it in Hansard, it seems to me that the Minister of Finance rejected that suggestion yesterday.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I read Hansard too and I felt there was a generally positive response to the proposal put forward by my hon. friend. The minister has acknowledged that the National Energy Program will totally change energy development in this country. Changes of this magnitude usually result in a great degree of disruption for different elements of the economy and society. The risks to our security of supply, our balance of payments, the economic development of the country and the total fibre of the country are stretched to very great limits. Surely the people of Canada must be able to assess this risk. There are major disagreements as to the impact, so would the minister explain why it is not in the general interest of a clearer understanding of the National Energy Program to have a discussion and consideration of this total program in one place, in one forum, not spread among five different forums as a result of the different pieces of legislation?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, there is one forum where this matter is considered, and that is called Parliament. The matter has been debated extensively in this House. The National Energy Program has been debated extensively in this House during the budget debate, six consecutive days when the pricing issue was debated, as well as during the consideration of the oil and gas act, the Income Tax Act amendments which are before the House at the present time, and before the parliamentary committee where Bill C-48 is being considered. There has been no shortage of places or avenues for debate and discussion of this subject and the hearing of witnesses. In addition, the National Energy Program has been the subject of discussion and debate in the media and before provincial and federal boards. So there has been ample opportunity for the expression of views on this particular subject. I fail to see what the suggestion of my hon. friend would achieve in advancing the debate any further.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—NOTIFICATION OF POTENTIAL HEALTH HAZARD

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the minister responsible for CMHC and it pertains to some remarks made last week in the House by the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning people who have experienced difficulties as a result of the installation of UF foam. She said at that time they could contact their physicians, her office or the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources if they were experiencing difficulties. A constituent at that time telephoned me to indicate she had been suffering from these symptoms for two years after her home was filled with foam, and her physician was completely unaware of this problem and the symptoms that result.

In light of that I would ask the minister whether he would undertake to notify every physician in Canada of the potential hazards of this substance? Will he also provide testing equipment in every region in Canada so people experiencing difficulty can have access to this equipment? In addition, would he contact every contractor who has installed this material in order to obtain the names of individuals whose homes have been affected, so those people can be circularized by the government and if they are experiencing problems be told where they may obtain information. Finally, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. We have had about three questions in one and the hon. member is going on to a fourth one. I will allow the minister to answer those questions which have been asked.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to bring the member's representations to the attention of the minister, who is not here today. I might repeat, though, an answer I gave earlier in the House. I think his questions are somewhat premature as we are awaiting the final report on the status of the UF material.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, there was only one other point in that regard. I doubt the representations are premature since people are experiencing very serious difficulties with this material already. The previous speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs are fairly competent at putting off this matter. I am just wondering if the minister responsible for housing would take the bull by the horns and do something. The fourth point is, will the minister ensure that there is a financial program in place to help people whose homes have to be rehabilitated because of the government's encouragement of the use of this very serious and damaging insulation through the RRAP and CHIP programs, affecting approximately 100,000 homes in Canada?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, with respect, I believe the question is really a repetition of the same question which has been asked on three occasions. I do believe the question in substance is premature and I would have to wait for the report of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO BIRTHPLACE IN PASSPORTS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Canadian passport, presumably by international convention, has a heading indicating the birthplace of the citizen. This information can and has led to some discriminatory treatment at some foreign borders. Would the minister consider taking some steps to have this information deleted from this document?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I recognize that the fact that such information is required does occasionally cause difficulties for Canadian citizens, but for the vast majority it greatly facilitates their admission to various countries of the world because, under international standards for passports, that information is required. Therefore, while I will re-examine the question in the light of my hon. friend's comment, I would not want to encourage him to think that a change in the policy is likely.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have had consultations with the House leaders of the opposition parties and I am pleased to report that we have come to an agreement concerning the second reading stage of the access to information bill. I therefore ask for unanimous consent to the following House order:

That on Thursday, January 29, 1981, the business first taken up under government orders shall be the second reading stage of Bill C-43, an act to enact the access to information act and the privacy act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof;

That, during debate on the said stage of the said bill, no member shall speak for more than 20 minutes;

That private members' business shall not be taken up on the said day; and

That no later than 10 p.m., on the said day the Speaker shall interrupt proceedings and put forthwith and successively every question necessary for the completion of the said stage of the said bill without further debate or amendment.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposed House order. Does the House agree to that order?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there have been consultations with respect to that matter which we did discuss and agree upon. The question which I have in my mind is whether there will be any change in that now as a result of what occurred in the question period. Is it indeed the government's intention to carry that out and not change the business in the middle of the day?

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, on behalf of my House leader and of my party, I should like to confirm that I have been informed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that that is in fact the agreement. We will be pleased to participate in the debate on the grounds outlined.

Madam Speaker: Does the House accept the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. KAPLAN

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I rise on a question of privilege, Madam Speaker. I wanted to have the freedom of information matter in place before rising on a question of privilege, but since I did not take part in the question period I cannot rise on a question of privilege which applies to me as a participant in the question period. However, I can do so as a member of the House, and it is on that basis that I do so. We have found ourselves in a different position here with respect to what might be called the grease or lubrication which makes this place function appropriately, that is the matter of trust, integrity, honesty and forthrightness which should exist when ministers of the Crown take a position as part of the parliamentary process and that process is reported here in the House of Commons.

Last Friday, a minister, acting under the provisions of PC 18-824, an order which was tabled in the House of Commons and which gives him the authority, made a statement on behalf of the government, acting as minister in a committee. Therefore that matter is here now before us in the House of Commons. The minister gave an unequivocal undertaking on amendments with respect to property rights which were proposed by one party and which were accepted by the minister because they were put by this party, amendments which were repudiated the next day on some other ground, a ground that is now characterized by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is not part of those proceedings, as the wish to expand the level of acceptance. On sheer numbers alone, Madam Speaker, that is a shocking statement when the comparison is made between the 32 members of the rump—

An hon. Member: The red rump.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —of the red rump, whose support they were seeking, and this party, and more than that, the large group of Canadians.

Ministers do not speak idly anywhere, and I suggest that ministers do not remain silent in the House of Commons when, in effect, they have been repudiated by the Prime Minister and by the government. It is the minister's duty to this House to rise in his place to explain precisely what happened, and because he is a law officer of the Crown, one of the ministers who has responsibility with respect to the law, certainly in this matter under that order perhaps he has the duty to consider his own place within the administration and whether or not he can be or should be accepted now as Solicitor General.

An hon. Member: Tell him, Pierre.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The only way in which this government can recover itself with respect to this breach is for the Prime Minister to ask for the resignation or, failing that, for the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to tender his resignation immediately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): As Acting Minister of Justice and acting in the capacity of Attorney General of Canada, he is not an ordinary line minister. He carries responsibilities on his shoulders which are far beyond those of an ordinary line minister. It is now apparent that either he was acting under instruction or he was not. If he was acting under instructions, they have been repudiated. If he was not acting under instructions, then he should not hold the portfolio, even of Solicitor General, let alone that of Acting Minister of Justice.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The veil of silence is something we cannot take—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I just want to remind the hon. member that he should not be commenting on what took place in the committee and referring to instructions which the minister might or might not have had. I can accept the argument which the hon. member is making about what took place in the House and what he thinks should follow as a consequence of what happened this afternoon, but the hon. member knows that he must limit his argumentation solely to what took place in the House and not refer to the committee.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am trying to do that within the purview of the case because the matter was raised by members of Parliament on this side of the House in questions to the Leader of the Government, the Prime Minister. We are at this point now that on one of the most crucial matters that we could ever discuss in this House of Commons, we have had a flip-flop of monumental proportions. The House, and perhaps the country, have been deceived, and I think that if the Solicitor General sits silent and makes no explanation, he should not occupy that position. He would do us all and himself a favour by resigning, or he should stand in his place and tell us exactly what happened. But this place cannot operate if a position taken by the government in the House or elsewhere is taken on one day and denied on the next. We cannot operate that way.

I leave the matter now and reserve whatever rights I may have following a statement which I hope will be made by someone with respect to what did occur.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief because the answers which were given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) were totally responsive to the questions which were asked, and set out all the facts. With respect to my silence, under the rules this is the first opportunity I have had to rise since the matter was raised at two o'clock. None of the questions was directed to me, and this is the first order of business following the question period. So the hon. member is greatly exaggerating the implications of a member remaining in his place and obeying the rules.

I was authorized by the government and under the order in council to represent the Minister of Justice in his regrettable absence last week. I did so. The spirit in which we are approaching the preparation of the joint address, and in particular the charter of rights, is one in which we want to seek the broadest possible support. We are willing to accept sensible resolutions from both parties, provided the resolutions improve the charter, but Conservative members are playing games with us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: They are putting forward an amendment designed to give Canadian people the impression that they stand for the right of enjoyment of property.

Some hon. Members: We do.

Mr. Kaplan: Yet, they have made it very clear that that charter of rights is not to apply. It is not to be binding and available for the citizens of Canada. It must be submitted to the provincial governments. We view that as an unsatisfactory state of affairs in this country.

It has been referred to as a checkerboard in which the arsenal of rights and freedoms provided for all Canadians, or prepared by the government for all Canadians, should only be binding from province to province.

An hon. Member: What did you say last week?

Mr. Kaplan: Our approach, and I believe the continued approach of the Minister of Justice, will be to try to encourage the participation of all members, to take any amendments which will strengthen the charter and will add support to it. As was indicated, following the meeting it appeared that the amendment, however well-meaning we were in the position we took, would not increase the support for it; in fact it would reduce the support for it.

Mr. Beatty: By 32.

Mr. Kaplan: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) characterized my position as a statement under oath. It was far from it. It was a negotiation which was taking place in the committee. It was a give and take effort, which is the spirit in which I approached that responsibility to improve the bill of rights and to increase support for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to the remarks just made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). I gather there is some—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on the question of privilege introduced by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), or is he rising on a new one?

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege flowing from the remarks made by the Solicitor General.

Madam Speaker: I would say that probably the hon. member wants to intervene on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, and I recognize him now.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief. I have some difficulty trying to raise the question which bothers me without transgressing into the area which Your Honour has already admonished us not to, that is, the proceedings of the committee.

The Solicitor General indicated that hon. members opposite to him were playing games in the committee. That is somewhat the basis of my question of privilege. Throughout all the discussions since Thursday and Friday, and today the questions in the House, the undertaking about which people have remarked that the Solicitor General gave, was an undertaking to me. It is a matter of public record for anyone to read.

After I made an intervention at a particular meeting, the Solicitor General—

Madam Speaker: I gather that particular meeting is the committee; I was not there either.

Mr. Nielsen: Wait until you hear it.

An hon. Member: This is absurd.

Madam Speaker: Even if the hon. member does not mention the committee, he cannot refer to the proceedings. Now that is exactly what he was doing, although I have not read the proceedings. So, I ask him to speak about what happened in the House this afternoon.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I apologize for that. It is a serious matter to me and I simply want to get out the entire story as I understand it because I was not here on Friday and Monday.

Mr. Epp: Here is a press report; here is another one.

Mr. Crombie: Let me go by press reports then. The facts of the matter are that the Solicitor General gave an undertaking—it is a matter of public record—with respect to a motion that we include property rights in a charter of rights. It was a solemn undertaking to me as a member of that committee and as a member of this House.

When the Solicitor General speaks in this House on matters outside the House and when he uses the words "playing games", not only am I personally offended by that, because it was an undertaking I felt was given to me, but I have refrained from making any comment publicly until I heard from the Solicitor General. The first thing I hear from the Solicitor General is that I am accused of playing games.

Mr. Collenette: That is not what he said.

Mr. Crombie: I would like him to withdraw it.

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I will defer to the Acting Minister of Justice if he wants to withdraw it.

Mr. Kaplan: Well, I do not.

Mr. Clark: He does not want to withdraw the accusation against a member of the House.

Mr. Collenette: Because he did not make one.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I just want to be clear about—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Has the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to withdraw his remarks?

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I am speaking to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. Will he repeat what he said? I did not hear it.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I indicated that I would be prepared to defer to the Acting Minister of Justice, if such he still is, if he would withdraw the accusation he made against the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie). The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has indicated from his seat that he does not intend to withdraw the accusation, so I will not defer to him and I will continue.

The only point I rise on is really a point of clarification. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) indicated that he was raising a matter of privilege that we may want to pursue at a later time.

[Translation]

And in my opinion, it is a really important matter for the parliamentary institution. I should like to be sure that we will be in a position tomorrow or later to pursue the question raised today about the possibility for Parliament to take the word of the Liberal government, because it is fundamental to our parliamentary system. We cannot take the word of a minister in that capacity one week, if it is no longer valid the following week. Parliament would be unable to enact or implement legislation. It is a basic issue.

[English]

The reason we have raised the question now is that I asked in my questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether or not there was to be some new set of standards by which we would know when we can accept the word of a minister of the Crown. The Prime Minister responded in a political way, which is fair in this House, and made reference to campaign promises which might be departed from, such as the opposition he once articulated to the imposition of wage and price controls. It is one thing when a party leader and a party abandon or reverse themselves, as they did on the question of wage and price controls. It is quite another thing when a minister of the Crown—sworn to oath as a minister to tell the truth and to speak for the government and sent before a parliamentary committee to steer a bill through that committee on behalf of the government—serving as an acting minister of the Crown and authorized by order in council, gives representations on which members of Parliament act. Without getting into the specific deliberations of the committee, that is what happened.

A representation was given by the minister on behalf of the government, after he had been introduced as the spokesman of the government and the Acting Minister of Justice. There was a response to that; it changed the behaviour of members of the House of Commons serving in the committee. We accepted his word and we were misled. Madam Speaker, that is precisely what happened. It raises the question now as to when the word of any minister of the Crown is word that the House of Commons can accept.

When will we be faced again with a situation where something is said on Thursday or Friday and then repudiated on Monday night as a result of deliberations, pressures, we know not what, having to do with perhaps other parties, the New Democratic Party and its alliance with the Liberals? Perhaps there were other pressures which were brought to bear. This House cannot function, Madam Speaker, unless we can accept that ministers of the Crown speak the truth, speak for the government when they are guiding matters of government business through a committee of the House of Commons. We cannot function now in a situation such as has been created by the repudiation by the Prime Minister of the Solicitor General in his capacity as Acting Minister of Justice.

The question does not stop here, Madam Speaker. My colleague from Nepean-Carleton raised a very good point when responding to the House business announcement and the request by the government House leader for the agreement of this whole chamber to designate Thursday as a day when we can proceed with the access to information legislation. We voted on that quickly. But will there be a repudiation of what the government House leader said? We have before the House of Commons now, and again in committee—I will only deal with the dispatch of business to that committee by this Parliament—bills and very important legislation dealing with oil and gas matters in this country. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) appears, speaking for the government, before that committee. He gives testimony. Can we believe him? Can we believe what he says? When we vote on a particular bill and go through it clause by clause, can we be sure that the statements made by the minister, which cause members of Parliament to vote one way, will not be repudiated the day after? That is the question which is before us.

We now have had a shadow passed over the capacity of this House to believe the word of a minister of the Crown. And it is not simply a question of one man's reputation, although that is always at stake here. It is a question of the ability of this Parliament to work and to function. We cannot function if one minister speaking for the government one day says one thing, and another minister, speaking on the same question for the same government the next day, says the opposite thing. We cannot function as a Parliament that way. There will be no progress here, no trust, and no legislation. There will be no respect here. This Parliament cannot function that way.

It is a matter which arose today. It is a matter which we will want to pursue later. I rise now simply to underline the basis of the privilege which, in my judgment, goes to the very root of this Parliament, to our ability to trust ministers, to our ability to transact business, and to our ability to function effectively as the House of Commons. It is a fundamental question and one which I would want the assurance of the Chair we will be able to pursue after we have had the opportunity to consult precedents and the laws of Parliament which apply to this situation.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I should say that the issue involves first a question of fact and then a procedural question. About the facts, I have nothing to add to the reply given by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the oral question period or to what the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has just said in replying to the point of order or the so-called question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I believe that the facts have been well outlined by members on this side of the House. While the official opposition may not agree with these facts, as everyone knows such disagreement cannot justify a question of privilege.

As for the procedural question, I respectfully submit that it was very difficult for the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) to abstain from referring to the committee proceedings as it is quite obvious, Madam Speaker, that their intervention in the House today is based on a definite situation which occurred in committee, which led the committee to vote on a question of privilege and reject it. On the other hand, Madam Speaker, by allowing a debate on this question of privilege, we are obviously—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister himself is now referring to the committee proceedings. I would ask him to refrain from doing so.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I simply wished to refer to the rule which prevents us from referring to committee proceedings. That is why I used the word "committee". What the members opposite did was to base a question of privilege on what occurred in a committee. This is quite irregular as we are not supposed to refer in the House in any way to committee proceedings in the absence of a report, and I am simply stating that there is absolutely no other fact resulting from the oral question period today which would justify the Speaker ruling that there has been a breach of privilege affecting all members of this House. I have noted that the Leader of the Official Opposition often says that it is essential to ensure the orderly operation of this House, and I quite agree with him. However, the best way to do so is to start by not raising unfounded questions of privilege.

Madam Speaker, both the experts and our own procedure make it very clear that questions of privilege should be used very rarely. Beauchesne says specifically a question of privilege ought rarely to come up in Parliament. In this case, there has been an attempt to raise an unfounded question of privilege based on what occurred in committee, which is a waste of the time of this House. The Leader of the Official Opposition has given us notice that he might obstruct further the proceedings of the House by saying that he wants to reserve the right to raise the same question of privilege later on.

I respectfully submit, Madam Speaker, that if you rule today that there is no basis for a question of privilege, this question should not be raised again unless new facts warrant it and justify the request made by the Leader of the Official Opposition, who wants to reserve the right to raise unfounded questions of privilege at any time and delay unduly the proceedings of the House. I submit that this is an abuse of our parliamentary rules and will truly prevent Parliament from operating in an orderly manner. If he is sincere when he says he will make every effort to ensure the orderly operation of Parliament, he should first of all refrain from imputing motives to ministers on this side of the House, and in this case to myself, as he did when he tried to question the agreement reached yesterday among House leaders. For his information, even if we changed our mind, the arrangement could not be changed because an order of the House was made today and such an order cannot be changed in parliamentary procedure. That is quite elementary.

Second, the best way to ensure the orderly operation of Parliament is to refrain from imputing motives to hon. members opposite when in good faith we have concluded an agreement which benefits both sides of the House. Third, it is also to refrain from raising unfounded questions of privilege, wasting the time of the House and thus preventing Parliament from discharging its responsibilities.

Given all these considerations, Madam Speaker, I suggest that there is no question of privilege because the point is based on what happened in a committee and that the Leader of the Official Opposition has no reason whatsoever to doubt the agreement which was reached by the parliamentary leaders and which, in any event, has since been made an order of the House that must be respected.

Madam Speaker: I will take the question under advisement and I want to say to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that although the Chair may take a question under advisement he is not allowed to do so.

If the question of privilege has not been explained to the satisfaction of the Chair this afternoon, I do not believe we can raise it again tomorrow unless the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition finds an issue to raise a new question of privilege. If after reading the Votes and Proceedings tomorrow I feel I need additional information then perhaps I will ask one hon. member or another, or even the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition, to provide me with further details. But I can take the question under advisement. Anyone raising a question of privilege on a given day may not continue on the same subject the following day.

In my opinion, therefore, the arguments have been made to the Chair. I will study them, take them under advisement and make a ruling later.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, simply to make myself clear, I was seeking the right to consult the Standing Orders and parliamentary precedents relevant to the situation described here today during the question period. In fact the Chair seemed to suggest that we think there is indeed a question of privilege and that we have not had an opportunity here in the House to produce all the evidence, to refer to all precedents which may be available. I took the floor simply to indicate that in all likelihood, after a review tomorrow, we will want to continue debating the question. You have stated that if you have reason to believe that there is in fact a question of privilege, we will be allowed to continue tomorrow. If we were able to establish precedents in support of the rules we want to quote, perhaps we might do so tomorrow before the question period and raise the question of privilege if need be.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition are utterly unbelievable. According to him, he has been trying for half an hour to give you notice of his intention to rise on a question of privilege on some other day. That is unacceptable. The question of privilege has been thoroughly debated and you have stated yourself that you might need additional information after reading Hansard. Fair enough, we accept your ruling. But I think it is pretentious on his part to claim that all the time we have wasted this afternoon was nothing more than notice from the Leader of the Opposition of his intention to seek information and consult the Standing Orders of the House before rising to speak.

In my opinion, Madam Speaker, we have had a full debate and the issue cannot be reopened unless it is on your own initiative.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, as you will recall in my remarks at the outset, I reserved on the matter as well. So there will be no doubt as to why I reserve, this is a question of privilege, and I wanted to prepare for your consideration an appropriate motion which usually follows such matters. I think it is only appropriate as well that all members of the House read the "blues" which you, Madam Speaker, have allowed us to do, and quite properly so. That is my understanding of what you have suggested. It is a common parliamentary courtesy for which we thank you.

I just want to make sure, Madam Speaker, that you understood that I had a reservation as well.

Madam Speaker: I can tell the hon. member that I noticed that there was no motion attached to the intervention made by the hon. member or by any other hon. member. This often happens. It is a technicality, and I am sure that I would not reject a question of privilege solely on that technicality. Arguments have been presented this afternoon. A question of privilege may not be deferred. If the hon. member would now like to make a motion, I will receive it, and then I will defer my decision on the question of privilege which has been raised.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I could build a motion of privilege on my feet, but I have been involved now as House leader, on one side of this House or the other, since 1976. I want to say, with respect to the Chair, that it is not unusual for there to be even consultation among various members in the House from both sides as to what might be an appropriate approach. I would be the first to argue that without a motion before you, Madam Speaker, you could not make a judgment. But since you have indicated that you are prepared to reserve anyway, then I suggest, if it is not inappropriate for you to reserve on the basis which has been set out, that we look into the appropriate form of the motion to be put, in order that you will have before you tomorrow what you regard today as being necessary to complete the proceedings, given the fact that you, Madam Speaker, have reserved on the matter.

Madam Speaker: I have reserved so that I may consult the precedent and reflect on the arguments which have been presented to me this afternoon. That is my intention. I really believe that the question of privilege has now been exposed to the Chair. The Chair will now look at the precedents.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has said that he wishes to look at the precedents. I would suggest to him that this is the role of the Chair. I will look at the precedents and determine whether there is a basis for a prima facie case of privilege. I will rule on the matter later. If hon. members have another question of privilege arising from the deliberations of this House at some other date, relating to the subject today, then they may raise it at a later date. But I cannot allow discussion on the basis that this is merely a notice of a question of privilege and that tomorrow we will discuss the question of privilege. That question of privilege was exposed this afternoon. It is on the basis of the discussion which we have had today, looking into the precedents and referring to the rules, that I will rule later on this question of privilege.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I want to be absolutely clear that your statement is not precluding me or any member of this House from making available to you, before you rule tomorrow, any arguments or precedent that we think might well be drawn to the attention of Chair. Am I correct or incorrect?

Madam Speaker: No. What I am saying now is that I have heard the arguments and that I will rule on the basis of the arguments that I have heard. If, as has happened sometimes in this House, someone has a document which the Chair has not seen and it cannot judge on the basis of what was quoted from that document, then the document is sent to the Chair. I guess that would constitute a supplementary or an additional argument, which takes the form of the document given to the Chair so the Chair may review it.

What I am saying is that there will be no more discussion on this question of privilege tomorrow. The arguments are being heard today.

MR. TAYLOR—BEHAVIOUR OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a new question of privilege. When a number of members of this House reach a decision in a committee and that decision is changed by one man, I feel that it affects the privileges of every member of this House.

Madam Speaker: Order. It is clear to me that the hon. member is speaking about the same question of privilege. Is he raising a new question of privilege?

Mr. Taylor: Yes.

Madam Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to be more explicit. The hon. member has referred to "a committee" and "a man"; I must have specifics.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, it is a new question of privilege, and I start by saying that when a number of members in a committee reach a decision which is then changed by one man, my privileges as a member are affected.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is referring to proceedings which took place in committee.

Mr. Taylor: No, I am not.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is saying "a committee".

Mr. Taylor: Any committee.

Madam Speaker: I do not understand, and I gather that other people do not understand. Would the hon. member be very precise if he is referring to a committee as to whether it is a general matter with regard to a committee or a specific occurrence in a committee?

Mr. Taylor: I want to refer to the committee, and I will be very precise. I feel that my privileges have been affected. The people of Canada and, I believe, the hon. members of this House, are sick and tired of having a dictator such as the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). I want him to resign. That is what the people want because he is affecting the privileges of every member of this House.

Mr. Nielsen: Let's have a referendum on that.

Mr. MacEachen: Not another one.

Mr. Taylor: The Prime Minister is making our work ineffective if he can change a decision reached by a majority of the members of this House. That is completely unparliamentary. It is the type of thing which goes on in Russia, and it should not go on in Canada.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has not convinced me that he has a question of privilege. He has made some remarks on behaviour of which he does not approve, and it is perfectly within his right not to approve of the behaviour of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or of any other member of this House. But if the hon. member is raising a question of privilege, he must be very clear as to what way his privileges have been breached, and he has not exposed that to me. So I feel that he did not have a question of privilege.

SECURITY—SERGEANT ROBERT HUTCHISON

1. Is Sergeant Robert Hutchison a member of the Canadian Armed Forces and, if so (a) on what date did he first enlist and what are the various branches in which he has served (b) has he been a member of the security section and, if so (i) did he assume such a position in 1973 (ii) was he trained in security at Camp Borden among other places?

2. Was he posted to the Canadian Embassy in Prague in July, 1979, and, if so (a) on what date did he arrive in Prague (b) what was a full description of his duties during his stay in Prague (c) was his immediate superior Colonel Spencer?

Order Paper Questions

3. Did he request that he be returned to Canada in November, 1979, due to a health problem of his daughter and, if so, did he decide to reconsider such a request as a result of being asked to remain in Prague by the Canadian Armed Forces?

4. Was he advised in January, 1980, by Colonel Spencer that the Canadian Ambassador to Prague had decided to have him return to Canada and, if so, what were the reasons given for such action?

5. On what date did he, his wife and daughter leave Prague for Canada and was it on or about May 10, 1980?

6. On return to Canada was he interrogated on or about May 22, 1980, by the security and intelligence unit of the Department of National Defence and, if so (a) was he questioned on the subject of whether or not he had in any way been in liaison with Russian agents while in Prague (b) did he volunteer to submit to a lie detector test and was this test followed by further interrogation (c) on or about May 23, 1980, was he given a further lie detector test and additional interrogation and was he requested to return on May 27, 1980?

7. (a) On or about May 27, 1980, did he tell Commander Vallevand that he had given SIU all possible information and specifically, did he state that he and his family were being harassed and request that it cease (b) on the same date was he given a further lie detector test on orders of Captain Roberts of SIU (c) on the afternoon of the same date was he forced to sit in a small room for over an hour and, if so, for what purpose (d) on the same date did his wife contact legal services of the Canadian Armed Forces asking for assistance and was she refused legal aid and, if so, for what reason?

8. (a) Since the return to Canada of Sergeant Hutchison and his family, has their telephone been bugged or tapped in any way and, if so, what are all the details (b) has a military police vehicle been parked in front of their house on a number of occasions since they moved in on May 15, 1980, and were the most recent occasions the evenings of July 11 and July 12, 1980, and, if so, what was the purpose (c) was he informed on July 10, 1980, by Captain Richardson that the investigation would be carried on until November, 1980?

9. During all of the above incidents, was he frequently asked during interrogation whether he was a Russian agent, whether he had connections with the Russian or Czechoslovakian intelligence and, if so, what are all the details on which the Canadian Armed Forces have based such questions?

10. If there is no evidence that Sergeant Hutchison did collaborate with Russian Intelligence, for what reason is he being frequently interrogated, etc. and will the Minister of National Defence order a full investigation into all aspects of this situation?

11. Was Sergeant Hutchison at one time visited by an RCMP officer named McLean since he returned to Canada and did an approximate two-hour discussion take place and what was the purpose of the discussion?

12. Is there in existence a written memo signed by Anne Scott, a Canada Customs inspector, concerning Sergeant Hutchison and, if so, is it dated June 11, 1980, and does it state in part: "Superintendent Hatherall called the office to inform us that the Military Police had a lookout on Sergeant Hutchison, he was involved in some dealings with the (blank)" and, if so, on what basis did Superintendent Hatherall make such a call?

13. (a) Is there in existence a report headed "Rough Report" by J. Smith in regard to Sergeant Hutchison and compiled by a Canada Customs official and does it state in part, "... suspected that he might have been in liaison with the Russians" and that he was a "cagey, conniving type of person and that he might be up to something" (b) subsequently was he charged $479.68 (Canadian) duty by Canada Customs for alleged items brought back from Europe (c) was he charged for two stereo speakers purchased for 489 German marks on the basis of $489 rather than actually converting to Canadian dollars (d) was he charged duty on other items without conversion of currency taking place and, if so, what were they (e) was he given the impression or told by Canadian diplomatic officials that any items purchased abroad prior to six months before his return to Canada would be duty free?

14. Does the Department of National Defence follow the policy that a person is not guilty until proven otherwise?

15. During his stay in Prague, was Sergeant Hutchison of considerable service to Canada or any member of the Western Alliance by the duties he performed there?

16. Is it the intention of the government or the Canadian Armed Forces to charge Sergeant Hutchison as an agent for a foreign power and allow him a court martial before which he could defend himself and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, will any alleged harassment, character assassination, etc. against him and his family cease forthwith?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of External Affairs, National Defence, National Revenue and the Solicitor General as follows:

1. Yes.
   (a) April 13, 1964,
   Supply and Security Branches.
   (b) Yes.
   (i) Yes.
   (ii) Yes.

2. Yes.
   (a) July 20, 1979,
   (b) Administrative duties in the Canadian Forces Attachés office.
   (c) Yes.

3. No. In November, 1979, he told the Canadian Forces Attaché that he was considering asking for permission to send his family home but intended to remain in Prague himself. After discussions with the Attaché regarding this matter he reconsidered his situation and after a short interval advised the Attaché that he would like to remain in Prague with his family. His personal decision was accepted by the Attaché and the Ambassador.

4. Yes. Medical reasons.

5. Yes.

6. He was interviewed on return to Canada as part of a routine security debriefing.
   (a) No. He was questioned in regard to his dealings with Czechoslovakian authorities.
   (b) Yes to both parts of the question.
   (c) Yes to which he readily agreed.

7. (a) Yes.
   (b) No. He underwent voluntary polygraph examination.
   (c) No. He sat in a large comfortable furnished room awaiting the arrival of the case officer who was 32 minutes late returning from a meeting with his supervisors. While he waited, the room door was open, he was advised there would be a delay and was provided with reading material.
   (d) On or about May 27, 1980, Mrs. Hutchison contacted a legal officer in the office of the Judge Advocate General by telephone at which time she requested advice concerning a legal matter involving her husband. The legal officer explained that she was not entitled to be given legal aid by him because she was not a member of the Canadian Forces. However, the legal officer did state that her husband, as a member of the Canadian Forces, might be entitled to receive legal aid but that it would be necessary for the member to contact the legal officer directly. The legal officer also explained that if she urgently required legal advice, she should contact a civilian lawyer, at which time she indicated she already had done so.

8. (a) No.

(b) No.

(c) No. He was informed that the investigation could continue until November, 1980.

9. No references were made to Russian agents.

10. Regarding instituting an investigation this has already begun. Sergeant Hutchison has instituted "redress of grievance" procedure within this department, and this automatically causes an investigation to be carried out.

11. The policy of the RCMP is to maintain the confidentiality of names of people they contact during the course of their inquiries. This policy extends to identifying members of the RCMP, the purpose and length of any ensuing discussion.

12. Yes, such a memo exists and Superintendent Hatherall made the call as a result of a telephone call from his immediate superior.

13. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) Yes. As an explanation, the Inspector concerned asked Mrs. Hutchison if the two speakers were paid in Canadian or German funds, and the answer received was "Canadian". On this basis, the 489.99 was utilized as a value for duty. We now realize that perhaps the 489.99 D.M. could have been converted to Canadian dollar value and the bill paid in Canadian currency on the converted amount. A refund claim would be in order.

(d) Yes. As follows—one pair of headphones and $33.98 in lieu of D.M. 33.98 (same explanation as in (c) above).

(e) No members of staff of the Canadian Embassy in Prague recall a conversation with Sergeant Hutchison on Canadian Customs regulations. However, a copy of Revenue Canada's booklet "Moving Back to Canada" received by the Embassy from the Department of External Affairs on January 7, 1980, was circulated to all Canada-based staff including Sergeant Hutchison, who initialled the covering form as having seen this document. The booklet states in part "if you have been residing outside Canada for anything from the one-year minimum to just under five years, your personal and household effects must have been in your ownership, possession and use for at least six months before you re-enter Canada".

14. Yes.

15. His performance of his duties at the Canadian Embassy in Prague was considered fully satisfactory.

16. Only if investigation establishes that a charge is warranted. (a) (b) In view of the above—not applicable.

FUNDING OF CANCER RESEARCH

Question No. 1,572—Mr. Howie:

What amount of government funds has been allocated for research into the causes and treatments of cancer?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: funds allocated for research into causes and treatment of cancer during the fiscal year 1980-81 amount to $2,630,140. This sum excludes salaries of professionals conducting intramural research.

In so far as the Medical Research Council is concerned: to date, for the fiscal year 1980-81, $5,100,000 has been committed to research and research training to causes and treatment of cancer.

CANADA COUNCIL TOURING OFFICE

Question No. 1,676—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Jean-Claude L'Espérance appointed general manager of the Canada Council touring office and, if so (a) on what date (b) what were his qualifications (c) did he resign on or about October 22, 1980, and, if so, for what reasons?

2. Did Mr. John Cripton and Mr. Michael Tabbitt leave the employ of the Canada Council touring office and, if so (a) on what dates (b) to the knowledge of the government, did they go into a private tour management business with Mr. Sam Gesser (c) have they sought any business from the council since leaving and, if so, what are all the details?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canada Council that the reply to the above question is as follows:

(a) August 15, 1980.

(b) Mr. L'Espérance has extensive experience in the world of theatre and in the organization of tours. He had worked as stage manager for the Théâtre du Rideau Vert and le Théâtre du Nouveau Monde. He was assistant technical director at Man and His World in 1969 and in 1970. In 1976, he became General Manager of Kébec Spec where he was actively involved in establishing a touring network.

(c) Yes, the reason for resignation is personal.

2. Yes.

(a) April 25, 1980.

(b) It is general knowledge that Messrs. Cripton and Tabbitt, together with Mr. Sam Gesser, formed a private tour management business.

(c) This firm has neither sought nor received any business from the Canada Council. However, since leaving the Canada Council, Mr. Cripton has received honoraria and expenses in the total amount of $725.50 as a consultant, to assist in the completion of certain projects (unrelated to his firm) with which he had been familiar as general manager of the touring office.

OLD AGE SECURITY BENEFITS

Question No. 1,702—Mr. Herbert:

Has consideration been given to making optional the receipt of old age pension benefits for persons between the age of 65 and 70 and, if so, what are the financial implications?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Provision exists now for delaying the date of receipt of Old Age Security as qualified persons can apply to receive the pension at anytime after the age of 65. Payments can be retroactive for a period of 12 months only. Persons who are eligible for a partial OAS pension may actually increase their potential OAS benefits by delaying application. This is already being done on an optional basis.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, January 26, consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Francis in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening Clause 1 of the bill was under consideration and the hon. member for Peterborough had the floor.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Chairman, I shall be addressing my remarks on the bill before us in regard to income tax, to the Minister of Finance. In the three or four minutes before adjournment last night I prefaced my remarks with an expression of the concern the people of Canada have about the direction the government is taking, through the implementation of legislation in this House, that is adversely affecting the business community in Peterborough and other areas of the country.

The Income Tax Act shows a lack of concern on the part of the government for some of the promises and commitments it made in the last election campaign. In this bill we had looked forward to changes that would bring about a positive direction in addressing the needs of the small business community, those entrepreneurs of Canada who contribute 28 per cent of the gross national product of this country. What I am suspicious about is that the government's policies on energy and finance as reflected in the income tax legislation are searching for the means to derive income to offset its excessive expenditures.

In the last election campaign the Liberal government committed itself to holding down growth in the public sector, in the civil service to a point that would not exceed the growth in the gross national product. It has betrayed that election commitment. It has sat idly and watched the cost of government soar above 12½ per cent in its short time in office, while the gross national product has only increased to something in excess of 11 per cent. That leaves the government with no alternative but to look to income taxes, corporation taxes and other means of levying these charges against the areas of our country that are moving gradually from a free enterprise system into a more socialistic form of government, with the emphasis on public ownership. This can only lead to disaster.

This government is so inconsiderate, as I pointed out last night, with its 3 per cent inventory allowance to the small business community that it has not taken into consideration that when this provision which appears on page 28 of the bill, was first conceived by the government the inflation rate was 6 or 7 per cent and interest rates were perhaps 11, 12 or 13 per cent. Since then, and since the budget three short months ago, interest rates have increased 39 per cent, and the dollar today is at its lowest level in 47 years. We all optimistically looked to the government to introduce measures in income tax legislation that would offer some relief to the business community to cover the high cost of inventory.

Another area of concern affecting the business community appears on page 33 of the bill in the clause which relates to cash accounting. Farmers have always been able to show as income in any given year only the amount of dollars that they received. That has now been extended to the fishing communities as well. I say to hon. members opposite that if they were sincere in the commitment made in the last election campaign to the small business people of Canada, that cash accounting clause would be extended to cover all entrepreneurs in Canada so that they would not be required to pay corporation or business taxes on sales in December at the end of their calendar year, on money that might not be received until well into the new year. In other words, businesses would not be required, as fishermen and farmers are not, to pay income tax until the cash was received. The government could have shown some compassion or concern about the lack of cash flow in the business community today and could have extended the cash accounting clause on page 33 of the bill, to the small business community.

I should like now to discuss the Income Tax Act as it pertains to capital gains tax. It will never cease to amaze me that a government, which says it has credibility with the agricultural community of this country, can tell farmers of the second, third or fourth generation that when a farm is sold, the capital gains on the acquisition of a farm from the father—who in many cases received it from his grandfather—must be declared as a liability. This shows a lack of compassion and concern for the agricultural community—a lack of concern for the business community as well.

The Conservative government at least said that it would allow the transfer to a registered retirement savings plan of the capital gains derived from the transfer of a farm to a member of the family.

The Minister of Finance comes from an agricultural community. I would ask him what is to happen to a lot of young farmers today who are being driven from the farm by such measures? They lose the farm because of the necessity of paying capital gains tax. Often this is not paid at the time of the sale but some years ahead when they have to liquidate. In other words, they find themselves deeper in the hole because if they could keep the farm they might find they would eventually have to sell it in order to pay the tax. Sometimes they have to move off the farm because it is not profitable.

Another area which shows a lack of compassion in Bill C-54 relates to the volunteer firemen in small communities across Canada. The Conservative budget would have allowed them a tax deduction of $1,000 but this bill only allows $500 to volunteer firemen in communities where they offset a cost of municipal and provincial governments by offering their services to fight fires. The $500 is totally inadequate and shows a lack of compassion and concern for the local level.

Members of the government often talk about the Small Business Development Bond. What did they do about it when they took office? The people of Canada should know that this bond will expire at the end of March, but the government does not care enough about making that money available to the business community to allow it at least to flow for one calendar or fiscal year. I challenge the Minister of Finance to stand in this House and give us one example of a business that has borrowed on the development bond principle without conditions being imposed by the trust company, bank or lending institution—conditions providing that should the government not implement the policy, the small businessman will borrow at the going rate, will continue to pay the going rate and will not benefit from the bond issue. How much confidence can the banking institutions of Canada have in a government that offers a 90-day government bond issue as is done in Bill C-54?

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance now why this bill discriminates between men and women. Why should separated men not be allowed to claim child care expenses without first obtaining a legal separation, while women can? I thought the Liberal government considered all persons equal. Why does this government discriminate between separated men and women? I asked this government, and I asked the Minister of Finance what do they have against single parents by not allowing them to claim child care expenses?

I asked the Minister of Finance why this government fails to recognize common-law couples on income tax returns. What does the Minister of Finance have against common law arrangements? Does the Minister of Finance not realize that common-law marriages exist in Canada today? Does the Minister of Finance not realize there is a moral obligation on the part of both partners to such an agreement? Is there not a moral obligation on the part of government to recognize that these people exist? Are these people not citizens? Are these people not Canadians, and are they not entitled to equal treatment? What does the Minister of Finance have to say about that?

In addition, what does this government have against allowing a dependent spouse allowance? Why does the government discriminate on the basis of marriage? Is the Minister of Finance creating two classes of couples? Is he creating different classes of citizens just as he is doing with the metric system by allowing the citizens of Peterborough to opt out? But to the other 33 cities of Canada he tells their citizens that they must operate under the metric system. So he is creating different classes of citizens, just as we have different classes of provinces in the constitution. Even if the Minister of Finance stands up in this House and defends these positions, I do not know whether I can believe him. He has broken his election commitments. The commitments of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce were broken. He said that if interest rates rose when he took office and he was in the cabinet, he would resign. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce still sits in this House. He has never resigned.

Bill C-54 is totally irresponsible. It is not a credit to the government. It is a sham to this Parliament. If the government does not address some of its commitments made in the last election campaign, dealing with small business and the citizens of Canada, the day will come a lot sooner than it expects when the citizens of Canada might say that they know best and it is not the Prime Minister of Canada who knows what is best for Canadians.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I have a few points to make on Bill C-54. I am a practising small businessman, aside from being a member of Parliament. I thought that if I brought the practical view to the Minister of Finance he might find it useful.

I think there are some serious structural problems in the small business sector in particular. The small businessman is in a real financial bind. The manufacturer in marketing his product is saddled with unbelievable costs. For instance, the cost of travel in Canada is one of the highest in the world. He is pressed to pay wage levels equal to or higher than large industry, and he must deal with competition from outside

Canada. The small businessman is quite prepared to do this providing he has a quid pro quo, or providing certain structural changes are made. The large and growing service industry has similar problems, but they are cast in a slightly different way.

Competition tends to bracket the gross profit of the service industries within certain upper and lower limits. When costs beyond the control of the small businessman squeeze profit to the extent that the bottom line, or the net profit, shrinks below acceptable levels, then the businessman is in very serious trouble.

Most of these companies are either owner-operated or are private companies with a small number of investors. They cannot go to the market, so to speak, for venture capital. If there is a sustained downturn in the economy, in many cases they just cannot survive without some extraordinary financial assistance. Many go into bankruptcy, as current statistics prove. If you examine the expense items of the average small business, you will see a dramatic upward change in items such as municipal taxes, business tax, Bell telephone rates, bank interest charges, insurance rates, unemployment insurance rates, workmen's compensation, extended health care rates, and so on. These are charges which the businessman cannot control in any realistic way. Add to that the cost of heating a plant, transportation, and the unbelievable cost of travel, as I have mentioned, and you begin to get an idea of the dimension of the problem.

Observers on the outside could easily say that they should increase their investment. However, to that kind of a question the businessman answers, "Where do I get the money?" Most small businesses have very little leverage in the money market. With the ever-increasing push of inflation, the original investment in constant dollars is dramatically reduced in current value. The cost of borrowing money is at an all time high. The question is: where does the small businessman go for additional capital?

In fact the small businessman asks, "What did I do wrong? In good faith I have invested money in a business venture, I have employed people, I have paid my taxes and I have complied with the many regulations which have cost me untold hours of unnecessary work." Yet many small businessmen now face the possibility of becoming casualties through no fault of their own. The fault is both through poorly-thought-out government policy, and the bureaucracy which taxes and taxes beyond the ability of many small businessmen to pay.

As a remedy the ministry has suggested doing another study. There have been so many studies done that this is absolutely ludicrous. If anyone wants studies on small business, they need only talk to the Canadian Federation of Independent Business or other such organizations which will give them the results they have. The problems are known, the solutions are known, but nothing happens. We hear only that more studies will be done, more press releases issued, and more pious speeches will be made about how great the small business sector is and how important it is.

As I see it, there are some solutions. I am not one to stand up and lambaste the government without offering some solutions. Many times members opposite ask what we would do. I will give the minister some suggestions. Maybe he will like them and maybe he won't. As I see it, the solution to much of the paper work which comes through the average business is just to separate it. If it pertains to taxes, you have to pay your taxes. There is no way out of that. If it is other unnecessary things, I say buy a rubber stamp which says "non-applicable" and send whatever it is back to the appropriate department. Just tell them that you do not have the time.

If the Metric Commission comes to your retail store or plant and orders you to buy a new metric scale when you feel you do not need it, tell them where to go, and challenge them to take you to court and make their case before a judge, as they did in Peterborough. I understand there they padlocked scales and doors and so forth. I think it is time that the small business sector said, "No more. Do what you will, but we are not going to have any more".

I come now to the area of research and development. Does anyone in the ministry really know what closes down an R and D project in a small business? It is not the lack of ideas. It is not the lack of market sense. It is not the lack of ingenuity or inventiveness. It is simply the lack of money, Mr. Chairman. I know this is the situation because I have heard it from numerous businessmen with whom I have associated. They get a bright idea, they get it going, and then it is just closed down. The fellow who closes down the R and D project in a small business is usually the guy who handles the money, namely, the comptroller, the bookkeeper, the treasurer, or whoever he is. He just says, "Look, fellows, the way things are we just haven't got the money to complete this project".

Most of the products that will be sold in 1990 have not yet been put down on paper. They are ideas running around in someone's head. If the businessman finds the money that will allow him to produce, you may have a new product that will employ people and contribute to the economy. If he does not, that product or one similar to it will be imported from some other country which has a business sector less fettered by government than this one is.

I want to make another comment about nationalization and to read a quotation sent to me by one of my constituents. The quotation is from The Metal Bulletin of December 16, 1980. It is a speech given by Sir Richard Marsh, minister of power at the time of the second state takeover of the steel industry in Britain. He said this:

> Looking back, I regret the nationalization of steel as one of the most disastrous things I have done in my life. If I had not fought for the nationalization of steel, the British economy would not be in the mess it is in today.

I offer that as some advice to those who feel we must go on with Canadianization, nationalization, or whatever you want to call it. It is a dangerous route to follow.

Let me get back to some solutions I want to suggest to the minister. Small businessmen should be allowed to create a reserve for research and development from taxes payable to the federal government. It could be handled somewhat like an RRSP investment that they could draw down to start a research and development project. The Small Businesses Loans Act should be amended to allow loans required to complete a research and development project. When these things start off, you never know where they are going to end. The Small Businesses Loans Act should be used to register a patent or purchase technology. It would be advantageous in the Canadian market. Small Business Development Bonds should be extended to cover a ten-year period rather than the five years now proposed. The regulation should be amended to allow it to be used as a form of refinancing for businessmen who are being bled dry by high interest rates.

The members of the New Democratic Party talk about the position of the banks in connection with the Small Business Development Bond. I do not care if it gives the bank a special tax position. I want to see more people survive in the troubled times we are facing. I want to see the small business sector have a measure of hope that it can continue to contribute to the economy of this country, to the labour market and the revenue required to operate this very diverse nation. We will in the course of this debate propose amendments which will try to achieve some of these objectives.

I want to say a few more words about regulations. I have heard the comments of the chairman of the parliamentary committee which looked into the regulatory system of this government. I am distressed at the continuous thrust of regulations and the desire of the bureaucracy to control everything. Can you think of anything more depressing than going to someone in Finance or Industry to get their approval for your project? It does not happen that way. You get an idea, you want to pursue it, you know the market, and you are looking for money. I hope the minister will take this thought of an RRSP idea for research and development and run it around in his mind because it has a great deal of merit. I can assure him of that.

I do not know whether anyone here has ever been confronted by a bureaucrat with a book of regulations, laying on you an error you have made. He tells you how big brother can fine you, and the sanctions he can impose against you. If you tell him you are not aware of the regulations, he says that does not matter. He will tell you that the governor in council passed a regulation on such and such a day and it was published in The Canada Gazette. You would think that all Canadians on Sunday morning, instead of going to church, get the latest issue of The Canada Gazette to see whether they are complying with all these regulations.

I hope, in looking at the report of the committee, that some consideration will be given to a method of appeal, a review board, or something of that nature. When these regulations come in, they would not then impact immediately upon the business community. There would be a time-frame which would give the businessman an opportunity to adjust, whether it be his inventory or whatever it might be. It does not need to be imposed on him right away. There should be an appeal route he can follow in order to redress what he may think is wrong.

I will give a recent example in my constituency. A small businessman had a $10,000 inventory of California bark brought in from the United States. It had passed through customs. He had paid the duty, sales tax and so forth. He had been selling this merchandise in the normal way until someone walked in from the consumer and corporate affairs fraud division.

This small businessman was told he could no longer sell the California bark because the Imperial measure is illegal and fraudulent. Can you imagine that? The official impounded the $10,000 inventory. It is ludicrous.

The small businessman said he would call his member of Parliament. The official laughed in his face, saying, "Those guys can't do anything. You are wasting your time. Your inventory is impounded." The businessman told the official that his supplier was just using up old inventory and the next shipment would be metric measure. The official said that did not matter, the $10,000 inventory was being impounded. When the businessman asked what he should do with it, the official told him that was his problem, not the department's, and walked away.

Immediately after the official left, a customer came in and asked to buy 15 cubic feet of California red bark. The businessman called me on the telephone to see what he should do. I told him to sell the whole works and, if the official came back, to tell him to take the case to court. I do not think a judge in a court in this land would convict someone of fraud for selling Imperial measure. That is bordering on stupidity.

That is only one of the problems that small businessmen face in the regulatory process. I commend the committee for the work it has done. I have not read the report yet. I look forward to being involved in it because I think I can make a contribution.

The small business community has much to offer. There is much it can do to alleviate unemployment and help the growth in our economy. Some mechanism must be found to relieve the problem of the high cost of money. Lowering the interest rate 1 or 2 per cent will not be of much help. We must look at their original investment in terms of constant dollars to see what that investment is today.

Where is the small businessman to get the money to continue to operate his business? He cannot afford to pay 17, 18 or 19 per cent interest. I know of many businessmen who do not lay off their employees when the market turns down. It is hard to believe the stability they impart to our economy. When the market turns down, they find something for these people to do. They know the value of good employees and how hard it is to find them.

Small business offers constant employment. It offers employees all the fringe benefits offered by large industry. Small businessmen need some relief in the form of low-cost capital, and I do not mean government loans. As I said, the Small Business Development Bond should be extended from five years to ten. The whole damned thing should be amended. It is not worth anything the way it is now written.

If the minister will accept the suggestion for research and development of an RRSP concept, allowing business to accumulate an amount of money to draw on in order to complete research and development programs, and allow the Small Businesses Loans Act to supplement that, he will be taking a dramatic step forward in assisting the small business sector of our economy.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to take a few minutes to make some remarks about some of the relationships between Indian communities and taxation legislation. I can certainly identify with the remarks of the preceding speaker concerning the impediments of the bureaucracy, red tape and regulations, and his example of a community which suffers to the nth degree because of this problem.

First, in relation to income tax I would like to raise some points. It is the understanding that the purpose of this legislation is to raise funds for the provision of government services, and the basic principle upon which the legislation is based is that it should ensure that the burden falls fairly, and through the progressive system the philosophy is expressed in that direction. But equally, the benefits should be distributed in an equitable manner.

In order to make my case today I would like to select one example of a community in my riding with which I am familiar. It is the Bella Bella Indian community and I want to explore some of the implications of the legislation. The reason I have chosen Bella Bella is that it is a unique case, but the circumstances would clearly apply to at least most other Indian communities in the areas I am familiar with, and most of the proposals I will put forward certainly would apply to many low-income Canadians in this country.

Just as a bit of background for a moment, the community of Bella Bella has a population of 1,200 people, living at a place called Campbell Island, 250 miles northwest of Vancouver. Historically the income of that community has been based on the fishing industry. Many Indians were fishermen in former times. Two very large canneries that consumed a very large amount of labour were based at Klemtu and Namu and there was a very large number of people involved in this seasonal activity.

I would just like to read some of the facts and figures relating to Indian communities very similar to Bella Bella, specifically in terms of employment data in those communities. Alkali Lake is rated to have between 80 per cent and 95 per cent unemployment; Babine Lake 50 per cent to 85 per cent unemployment, and so it goes on and on down the page. Soda Creek, for example, which is very near the Bella Bella area, has 65 per cent to 100 per cent unemployment.

When talking about the equitable distribution of services I will just take a moment to make a comment on education. About 60 per cent of Indian people have an education of grade nine or less. In terms of violent deaths, Indian communities lead Canada and any population group within Canada in the number of violent deaths. On and on the story goes, no matter what problem we may be discussing.

This community of Bella Bella of which I speak has a number of difficulties, but one of the problems I speak of today is that there are very few opportunities to earn income. The economy is based on the salmon fishing industry. Native Indians have had their boats removed, and major canneries which provided a major source of employment have been closed.

By and large the management of the fisheries in this area on the west coast is chaotic. There are very short periods of openings, and the mismanagement of habitat and what not has ensured that there are very few fish, and those fish available are not available for commercial income activities, but available only for spawning. For two years there has been no herring fishery in the area.

What is required is some initiative on the part of the government to become involved in helping these people balance the economy. The first suggestion which has been put forward is that those Indian communities should be allowed access to tree farm licences. In the off season when fishing is not the main activity, employment could be created by logging. For years they have been denied access, except on an experimental basis, to the timber in order to undertake logging and increase employment.

The next suggestion on how to improve the income-earning potential of many of these communities is that the government should increase its spending on salmon enhancement projects. At this time on the central coast where reduction in stocks is very severe, the government could do a great service to the people of this and other communities by increasing spending on salmon enhancement programs. Not only would this increase a very valuable resource in that area where it is badly depleted, it would provide substantial employment for Indian people in that region. This would be a very valuable activity in expanding employment opportunities as well as increasing a valuable resource.

Another area in which government spending could be improved, and in the long-term increase the income-earning potential of Indian people within this community, is in expanding educational facilities. It is very interesting that this particular Indian community has been battling with the federal government for years trying to get it to approve a school project. They operate a school district, but the Indian affairs department says Indian people are not entitled to the same kinds of benefits that other children in British Columbia enjoy because the guidelines are substantially lower. When that department takes our number of students and compares it to the number of students in a public school, it allocates 13,000 square feet less of usable space on a given population. Over a period of time all educational facilities are reduced in this sense. What there has to be before you can find the people to manage businesses and look after enterprises in these communities is an educational system so the managers can develop.

Again government spending on educational programs, particularly the one in Bella Bella at this time, is imperative if the next generation is to improve in these communities. It is vital that this occur.

I do not want to elaborate on the condition of housing. We have noted for a number of weeks the Prime Minister making very worth-while tours examining the problems of disparity throughout the world in terms of the North-South dialogue they are attempting to develop. But I would suggest one of the most eloquent visual things that could happen would be for the Prime Minister to take a trip to a number of Indian communities. The thing that jumps right out at you is the degree of housing. There has to be a massive infusion of money in order to bring Indian community housing up to an acceptable level. We have heard horror stories in this House about the lack of running water, homes that need rehabilitation, and on and on. Spending on housing is vitally important. Housing is at a level that would not be acceptable in other communities in Canada or to other groups. There would be people lined up for miles outside this door screaming if other people had to live in the kind of housing that Indian communities are asked to accept.

Let me refer to postal service. This community of 1,200 people operates a school district, seven businesses, including a store, a shipbuilding enterprise, and a bulk fuel plant, but has mail service only three days a week, and sometimes less because of weather conditions. The Post Office will never tell the air carrier when and how much mail is to be flown in, and quite often the mail is bumped. This band handles millions of dollars in administration. The school district handles large amounts of money and records, as do the other businesses, and the situation is absolutely chaotic. There is no bank in that community, consequently every transaction has to be moved back and forward. We have to ensure that the money we are spending on government service is spent in such a way that they obtain equitable services, especially in the area of postal service.

I was disappointed to hear the Postmaster General say that for 17 cents he was doing a great job delivering mail to such a remote community. By air service it is not that far away. I hope at a future meeting with officials of his department we can resolve this situation.

The most important area where government spending is vital, if it is going to build an income base or a good economy in the community and provide the people who live there with a decent standard of living, is transportation. No economy can be developed without reasonable transportation. There are two methods of transportation to that community, one is by water and the other is by air, and both are in a chaotic state right now.

At the present time the British Columbia Ferry System operate a ferry to and from Bella Bella on its way to Prince Rupert. In the summer, they curtail their activities because it is more important to carry tourists. The rest of the year, if there are less than 20 passengers, they will not stop and they will not allow freight to be carried to and from that community because it would compete with other forms of transportation. By and large, the government clearly discriminates against this community because other communities are entitled to carry freight on trailers.

I believe that a roll-on roll-off ferry should be built there so that those people can reduce the cost of freight, the cost of living and the cost of doing business in that community so as to create more viable businesses and to create business opportunities. For a number of years the provincial government of British Columbia has led these people to believe the ferry will be built, but it has never kept its promise. The federal government provides a subsidy to that province for an adequate ferry service, and yet we never see it delivered. I understand the Minister of Transport has currently under way a study evaluating transportation on the west coast, and this input is vital.

No money should be paid on that coast unless it is for specific guaranteed programs under which communities, such as Bella Bella, will have the same access as other communities of a similar size, such as Ocean Falls, to a roll-on roll-off ramp, the ability to carry freight, and regular stops. That is imperative. It is clear discrimination against an Indian community, and this government is a party to it. The federal government must supply funds and must ensure that adequate service is available to these people. It is the only logical way of guaranteeing the federal investment which is already being put in there. Without a transportation base, that investment is lost.

Government red tape, bureaucracy and regulations are best epitomized in the air transportation service to that community. There are two small islands there. One is Campbell Island, with a population of 1,200 Indian people, and the other, half a mile away, is Denny Island, with 50 people who essentially live off the Indian community. The Department of Transport was asked to do a site evaluation for an airport in the central coast region. The two sites were, of course, Denny Island with 50 people, and Campbell Island with 1,200 Indian people. What happened was that the government said that both sites are technically acceptable, but it will not make the decision; the responsibility is that of the province of British Columbia. The province of British Columbia said it was the federal government's responsibility—

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have been listening carefully to the hon. member for Comox-Powell River and I find that he has yet to mention the Income Tax Act. He has spoken about the Post Office, about the ferry boat service, about bureaucracy in general—all points on which I agree with him—he has spoken about the herring fishery, but he has yet to talk about the Income Tax Act. If we are ever to get through this bill, we cannot continue to go on with member after member talking about everything under the sun but the income tax.

The Chairman: The hon. member's point is very well taken. The Chair has attempted to enforce the rule of relevance with, I might add, a singular lack of success on both sides of the House. I invite the hon. member who has the floor to take note of the remarks of the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that my preamble is somewhat lengthy, but I would remind the hon. member that I did mention the income tax at the beginning of my remarks. However, in all seriousness I am coming to the point quickly. I would just like to mention some of the services which are required by people in order to earn their income. We are talking about legislation which removes taxation in an area, and our purpose is to provide services. I will come to the point in just a moment, but I beg your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, to allow me to continue.

I was speaking about the economy of this area and the problem which the government has in assisting people to build up the local economy. In this case the government has the responsibility to designate that airport. The hon. member for Burlington spoke at great length about small businesses. Let me point out that this community is attempting to establish small businesses and to employ people locally. Without an airport this will not happen, and the seven businesses which are in place will disappear.

The basic problem is that on the other island where there are 50 people an airport is already in progress and government funding may be allocated there. There is a great danger that in the future the 50 people in that community might find that bankruptcies will drive everyone away from that area. What we have is a government funded airport, and 1,200 people on another island being forced to depend on that. The hospital is located on Campbell Island and so is the RCMP, and the total population is being made to suffer because of the totally inadequate transportation system.

At the beginning of my remarks I intended to speak briefly on this subject. I listened to hon. members preceding me make speeches about small business. Having laid the groundwork, I will reserve my remarks relating to the Income Tax Act to other clauses. Thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Chairman, I certainly noted your tolerance with respect to the previous speaker. I will try to be somewhat more relevant in addressing my remarks to some of the injustices and difficulties which my constituents have experienced with the income tax system. I wish to put forward in particular a few ideas which might emerge in the form of amendments as the committee proceeds to the clause by clause debate on Bill C-54.

However, I cannot help but observe, in reacting to the previous speaker, that here we have a party which is apparently intent on enhancing opportunities on behalf of small businesses and its members pretend to advocate increased government attention to small business, yet at the same time they are saying that ownership, and the enjoyment of ownership of property should be denied—

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I should like to call attention to the hon. member who has the floor that we do not pretend to support small business. In my area, the government of which he was a member—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta has the floor. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River had his opportunity to make a speech and he can do so again, if he wishes, later.

Mr. Siddon: I do appreciate the latitude which you, Mr. Chairman, granted the previous speaker. It is of interest to note that that party, which pretends to advocate support for small business, is intent on denying Canadians, along with their pet sheep across the way, the enjoyment and the ownership of property. They know full well, on a matter that is currently before the House and high in the minds of all of us, that the concerns of the provinces, including the province of Prince Edward Island, could have been accommodated by the same kinds of "notwithstanding" clauses or limitations which are inserted in the constitutional resolution in relation to a number of other special rights and privileges that have been granted.

I am also impressed by the implications of this tendency to nationalization on the whole of our country and its economy. That includes the income tax system. If the NDP and their pet sheep have their way, we will not need to have an income tax system. We will be able to dispense with this very tedious Bill C-54 as well as with the Income Tax Act because there will be no income being earned, the resources of the country will be allotted by the central government, no one will get any pay, and favours will be dispensed in the form of patronage to friends of the party in office. That is how it works in Russia. I have been there and seen it. Those who are good workers for the Communist party get all the breaks, and the rest live like serfs. There is no need to pay income tax or to concern oneself with an income tax act.

Before I leave this subject I would just like to quote a statement which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is reported to have made in Alberta on the weekend. Apparently the minister said this:

> "Provinces don't own resources like your own home", Lalonde explained to one group at Bonnyville. "And provinces don't own the resources the way Libya and Saudi Arabia own theirs."

● (1630)

That can be coupled with the courtship between the party on my left and the party opposite in relation to the question of private ownership of property. I might go beyond including ownership of title to land by also including ownership of businesses, homes, automobiles and everything in our society. I submit that these members of Parliament are directing the country toward a new system of government in which we will not need an Income Tax Act and we will not have to spend long hours, as we are today, trying to achieve equity and fairness for the free citizens of this country, at least those who considered themselves to be free until the advent of the current constitutional debate.

Merely by reading clause 1 of this bill, one is struck by its complexities. I do not intend to go into all the complexities of the bill, as my colleague from southern Alberta did last night when he referred to and read from Bill C-54 some of its complicated jargon which puts innocent taxpayers at a tremendous disadvantage in dealing with the government. But in turning to clause 1, I should like to point out that there is an ambiguity in the wording which I hope will be amended. The form in clause 1 is changed from the form in the Income Tax Act where the exceptions were placed in brackets.

If one reads clause 1(1)(a), one learns that income includes "the value of board, lodging and other benefits of any kind whatever, except any benefit", and if one excludes subclauses (i) and (ii), "that was received or enjoyed by him in the year in respect of, in the course of, or by virtue of an office or employment". One could get the impression by reading it in that manner that all income was exempt from tax. We know that is not the case. But, if I read this clause as an innocent taxpayer, I would be led to believe, as a citizen of Canada, that I would be required to pay income tax on any other benefits of any kind whatever. Then I would presume that it would include, for example, my expense allowance as a member of Parliament, my honorarium for taxis, the clothing allowances which many employees receive, and the other allowances which are subsequently exempted somewhere in the act.

The point I am making is that innocent taxpayers cannot wrestle with all of the complexities of the act. Therefore the act is written to the advantage of the government in collecting revenue on the widest possible basis from innocent, ordinary Canadians who perhaps cannot afford accountants, who perhaps hire bad accountants, or who struggle to complete their income tax returns on their own with the short form return and perhaps some help from the department.

In the final analysis taxpayers often get stung due to their own inability to digest this complicated and legalistic language. Therefore the Minister of Finance, who is here this afternoon, can impose very significant powers. He has liberties at his disposal which border on the undemocratic and on being immoral. I am speaking of the concept of reverse onus of proof. The taxpayer is made to feel, perhaps without intent, that he is being accused of doing a wrong, that he is found guilty and that he must prove himself innocent. It is wrong, it establishes an adversarial relationship between ordinary Canadian taxpayers and their servants who happen to be employed in the federal Department of Finance as tax assessors.

Sometimes these tax assessors couple this with an attitude of arrogance. Their marriage to their position is measured by the number of dollars they can bring each year to government by way of additional tax revenues. They will not admit mistakes. I have seen cases very close to my own experience where individuals have been accused of earning money they never made. They have been accused and, subject to the outcome of a series of complicated and costly appeals, they have been found responsible for earning income they never actually received. The onus is placed upon the taxpaper to prove otherwise.

Then there are the tremendous confiscatory powers which the Minister of Finance enjoys in being able to withhold tax which should be returned to a taxpayer in a subsequent year when there is no fault found with his tax return. Those funds are confiscated and held by government to pay off the so-called taxes laid out through the process of assessment before it has been proven that the taxpayer has made an error in his return and should be responsible for remitting those taxes.

The Minister of Finance has the power to garnishee salaries, to take titles of homes, and to demand notes of credit from bankers before innocent taxpayers have been proven guilty of a violation or a transgression under the Income Tax Act. I think that is wrong, wrong, wrong.

This is Canada. It is a free country where we treat one another with dignity. Our citizens should not be put in a position where they are judged and made to feel like criminals until they have had a fair opportunity to prove that they did not receive certain moneys upon which the government is attempting to tax them, without the need of resorting to great legal cost or high-priced accountants.

I have a series of claims by constituents against the Surrey Taxation and Data Centre in the lower mainland of British Columbia. Most of these complaints can be summarized by reading a couple of quotations in a letter which I received from a constituent who has tried since the middle of June, 1980, to obtain information about his assessment because he did not receive his tax rebate after filing his 1979 tax return. He made over a dozen calls since last summer, and he received the following answers: the delay could be caused by the change in government; it could be a million reasons; it is now being assessed; it has now been carded. He received a different excuse each time. Having been told at one point that his return was being assessed, a week later he was informed that it was not being assessed. He was most infuriated, and when he asked to speak to someone in charge, he was told that there was no one, that all the information was in the computer. These are the kinds of problems with which constituents are faced.

I received another letter from an American citizen who was employed and lived in my riding in British Columbia for a year. Some $6,000 of his income was withheld by the Government of Canada. Last June he wrote a letter, of which I have a copy. It was addressed very carefully to the Surrey Taxation and Data Centre and asked what procedure he had to follow in order to have that withheld tax rebated, in view of the nature of our reciprocal tax treaty with the United States. He received no response to that letter. He wrote again in October, and still received no reply. It was the computer that was responsible; one cannot find a person at the other end of the telephone.

Finally he telephoned the Vancouver tax office in late November and he was told by a clerk that they had received his request of the previous June and that it would be processed in two or three months, that is, some time in February, 1981.

This was income on which he was taxed by the Canadian government for his 1979 tax year, and in the meantime he had to pay a tax on that same income to the United States government. This is most improper and most irresponsible of those government officials who do not feel any obligation to our own citizens, let alone those of another country who are our guests here in Canada.

After having had someone special look into that case, we have learned this individual has to apply using certain forms. No one thought to send him the application forms last June, or in October when he wrote again, or in November or December. Now he must remit application forms. I feel that is a tremendous imposition upon an individual.

I would like to speak for a moment about RRSPs and the registered retirement income fund option. The minister has received many representations from senior citizens who have put aside earnings in Registered Retirement Savings Plans over a considerable period of time. They want to have a more flexible pay-out provision. The minister well knows that the Consumers Association of Canada has been lobbying for some time in order to have a greater degree of flexibility granted to these senior citizens. They are entitled to draw those earnings out, accept whatever penalties are imposed, but should be able to draw them out at a rate which is consistent with their own needs.

You may know, Mr. Chairman, that under the present scheme the pensioner at age 71 must opt either to take an annuity payable at age 90 or take a stream of cash which is indexed so that, for example, if the pensioner had $100,000 accumulated in his RRSP, at age 71 he would receive something in the order of $9,000 a year, and at age 90 he would receive $22,000 a year. Many people come to me asking what good $22,000 a year is to a man hobbling on a cane at age 91, if he is still alive. He would prefer to have the option of using some of those funds earlier in his retirement so that he might enjoy them and be willing to pay whatever tax penalties are incurred at the point.

Others have suggested they would like to keep the money in the RRSP. They do not want to take it out at age 71. They may not want to take it out until age 75, when some other source of income has been exhausted. It seems absolutely unreasonable that the Minister of Finance to this date has not given a positive undertaking to all these appeals and to the Consumers Association of Canada, granting more flexibility with respect to the disposition of the RRSPs and the proceeds of those plans to the benefit of our senior citizens.

I do not have much time left, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to add a few words with respect to the Small Business Development Bonds. There are many people, entrepreneurial individuals, trying to build businesses in my riding, and elsewhere across the country, who have predicated their loans and their business plans on the expectation that the special rate of low interest under the Small Business Development Bond would be available to them in order to offset the high cost of interest.

There are cases where individuals have been carrying a line of credit for almost a year based upon the minister's initial mini-budget statements of last April. They have been amassing large amounts of deficit accumulated from high interest rates for bridge financing. They are now being told, as we approach March 31, that if they do not have the project completed by that date any subsequent commitments they have made, in terms of spending to complete the project, will have to be financed by some other means. I think this is heartless and cruel, Mr. Chairman. We have people who have sacrificed their livelihoods. They have bought property. They have gone to great lengths to have it rezoned. They have hired architects, contractors, and they have had estimates done. They have signed contracts and borrowed for bridge financing. But they are told that if they do not have the project more than a quarter or half complete by the end of March they will not be able to complete the project.

The whole basis for those types of entrepreneurial ventures, the whole financial viability, is predicated on a certain cash flow from the business and a certain outlook as to the expenses. The prospective business person is faced with a doubling of his interest charges, because he will not get a Small Business Development Bond, even though the banker has been willing to extend him credit, when he has no assurance as to whether expenses incurred in 1980 will receive the benefits of this bond.

To this day we do not have any assurance that expenses incurred prior to March 31 will receive benefit under this scheme. In fact, if this deadline date of March 31 is not extended and the enabling legislation has not been passed by that date, then I must say that the whole talk, the whole promise of a Small Business Development Bond program by the government opposite is a fraud—a plain fraud—F-R-A-U-D. To create the impression among the people of this country that they were to receive something when, in fact, the government had no intention in the first place of extending that benefit to them, is fraud.

There is no provision in the measure before us for any special consideration to farmers and fishermen—the latter being particularly important in my riding. Under the Crosbie budget there was a 10-cent, or a 10 per cent rebate on the cost of fuel. There is now talk by the federal fisheries officials in British Columbia that they will, in fact, impose a landings charge or a so-called resource rent. This will be an additional supplementary income tax upon fishermen. And this government has not chosen to help them with the cost of fuel. The fishermen do not buy that when it is placed in contrast to the benefits appreciated by the dairy industry, the milk producers, the butter industry and many other industries, through regional equalization grants and other types of financial assistance.

Here is a government which will tax the fishermen and it has chosen not to give them any special assistance in the area of fuel. By imposing a wellhead tax, a Canadian ownership charge and a self-sufficiency tax, the Minister of Finance has imposed a tremendous burden upon all people who consume energy, whether they be manufacturers, small business persons, farmers, fishermen, home owners who must heat their homes, and those who operate transportation systems. The Crosbie budget would have imposed the same burden, only it would have been upon that discretionary use of fuel, the burning of gasoline by automobiles, through the purchase of gasoline at the pump. That, Mr. Chairman, is another defect in the budget and it is something which the minister ought to be addressing when he considers amendments to this bill.

I have had many requests from parents of handicapped children as to whether or not the government can provide some type of tax break for parents who must buy special aids for the deaf and the blind. I see you getting to your feet, Mr. Chairman, so I shall end at this point.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on capital gains, especially since the minister published a document on that topic last November. I would like to draw the attention of all members of the House to that publication because you will see what it means in terms of capital gains, what it implies in general.

[English]

Actually, Mr. Chairman, in my book capital gains is one of the biggest swindles that the government has ever perpetrated on the Canadian people. It is the built-in incentive for continuing inflation since there is no provision against artificial gain. The gain in the price of a commodity, such as personal property or real estate, is in itself a reflection of the loss of control of the economy by the government. Frankly, wherever there is percentage taxation there is a built-in incentive to allow inflation to continue.

In 1973 the former minister of finance acceded to the demand for the indexation of personal income as a hedge against the government benefiting from inflation of wages and salaries. He did this, of course, after he had said during the election campaign of 1972 that such a move would bankrupt the country. Then John Turner proceeded with a similar formula to introduce the indexation of personal income so that there was a constant dollar on which income taxes would be based. And that is what we should have as Robert Stanfield had advocated.

Mr. Chairman, I am speaking generally, as we usually do on clause 1, although why we do it I do not know. There are many references to capital gains in Bill C-54. Therefore I would like to put on record some views with regard to capital gains. In the course of my speech on second reading I spoke in extenso on the inequities of capital gains with regard to the sale of farm land for agricultural purposes. I believe that capital gains is a form of sheer robbery and a deterrent to continuing farm operation in this country, when that sector of the Canadian economy, according to comments made during the highly touted trips of the Prime Minister, will have to meet increased demand upon Canadian agriculture to provide food and other basic raw materials for the Third World. The paradox is startling.

What is the effect of this capital gains? A retiring farmer sold a parcel of land on the outskirts of the city of Edmonton within the past few weeks for $6 million, on which he will pay something like $2 million in capital gains tax. Obviously, this land is not for agricultural purposes and I agree that capital gains tax should be paid, but taxes were paid before 1972 on land which was being subdivided for other than agricultural purposes. As a matter of fact the tax rate was higher than it is now. But this was a business venture. The land was coming out of agricultural production and going into subdivision. If the land is to be subdivided, then it is fair game and should be taxed.

However, the capital gains tax has the effect of guaranteeing that that $2 million will ultimately be paid by the purchasers of the homes which will be built on that parcel of land. The government says that it worries about this situation. In Vancouver today a three-bedroom home is being sold for $175,000. Of course speculation in Vancouver is grist for the government's mill. These homes are not bought for residences. They are being bought for speculative purposes, and the tax on these homes is being loaded on every time there is a transaction. This tax is ultimately paid by the purchaser, just as the purchaser in effect always pays the real estate commission, which is loaded on top of the price. It is all a nitwit's game played for the benefit of the government.

If one looks at pages 8 and 9 of the minister's monograph, one will find Table I which shows that individuals in 1978, which is the last year for which there are complete statistics, paid on net taxable gains of $1,193,000,000 and that the corporations paid only on $795 million, making a total of $3,977,000,000 of net capital gains to which income tax is applicable at whatever level. It does not mean that that much has been paid in income tax. It is impossible to determine, as I have tried on numerous occasions, how much income tax is attributable to the capital gains tax, unless one were to take every individual return on which capital gains were acknowledged. The capital gains is usually translated into the taxable income and put at the marginal rate of the individual person or the rate that is paid by that corporation, whether it be a small business or a major corporation earning at the top rate. Therefore it is impossible to say how much tax was paid.

I judge that, if there were close to $4 billion acknowledged in capital gains in 1978, 50 per cent of that, because the losses have already been wiped out, which would be $2 billion, and at least $1 billion was paid on income in that year. We do not have the figures for 1979 and 1980 which had inflation factors of 10 per cent which will naturally affect the figure when added thereto. The 1980 statistics will likely show a downturn in capital gains because of the reduced economic activity and the lowering of certain markets.

I feel that the minister's documentation here is welcomed by the Department of Finance. I certainly hope that the tax accountants and hon. members in this House will examine it very carefully and that we will get a chance to ask questions of the minister to see what effects this matter will have on risk taking.

I would now like to talk about a plan which I advanced years ago. The government talks about forced Canadianization and taxation on oil at the wellhead to provide capital for that government octopus called Petro-Canada, which has only shown its ability through its desire to build a huge skyscraper in Calgary and to load staff, à la-Crown corporation style, by hiring every Tom, Dick and Harry. How about an incentive for the ordinary taxpayer? I can see some hon. members here who would welcome such a provision. If we determine within a ball park what are the relevant research resources and development propositions and what are Canadian companies, one can then indicate that any Canadian citizen or bona fide Canadian company can purchase the shares of Canadian companies or in fact any company engaged in resource search development—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It is five o'clock.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook)—Regulatory reform—Task force report—Status of recommendations; the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby)—Canadian National Railways—Investment in foreign shipping group; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—World Health Organization—Canadian position on infant formula for Third World countries.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the parties and it is a little bit awkward for me to propose this motion but I shall. I am sorry the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is not in the House at the moment but we had agreed to this and I am sure he has just been delayed. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has also agreed to the following request.

The problem is that Bill C-227 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) is a bill that I introduced five years ago. As a result of the bill coming forward in the next little while, and as a result of a misconception that I was under when the bill was introduced on my behalf by the hon. member for Mississauga North, we have agreed to revert the sponsorship of the bill back to me as the member for York East. The hon. member for Mississauga North will concur with that in a moment. The bill is not to be debated today but will be debated some time next week.

I would point out that according to citation 401 of Beauchesne no notice is required for change of sponsorship of a private member's motion. I can assure hon. members that this matter has been discussed by the House leaders on the other side. If there is agreement of the House, then I would propose a motion so to change this sponsorship.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): This can be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I only want to concur in the statement made by the parliamentary secretary. It was a pleasure for me to introduce the bill originally. It sprang from his ideas, his experience and his concern, and I am happy to let him have the credit for that.

Mr. Collenette: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you could advise whether unanimous consent is sufficient or whether you want to make a House order so that the order paper can be changed when it is printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

Items Nos. 17, 18, 22, 25, 27 and 29 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE HULL IN NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull) moved that Bill C-230, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (national capital of Canada), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to debate this bill which has been on the order paper for quite some time. I realize that it may be one of the most challenging pieces of legislation ever debated in the House since its purpose is to change the national capital of Canada. Mr. Speaker, may I make it clear that I am not advocating dissociation between the name Ottawa and Canada's capital city. I think that the historical background of the capital of Canada is properly reflected by the objective of Bill C-230. A cursory glance at the bill—of course I have no intention of reading the full text—reveals that essentially it has to do with section 16 of the constitution. If it were repealed, the amendment would read as follows:

It is hereby declared that the national capital of Canada and the seat of the federal government of Canada shall consist of the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, and of the city of Hull, in the province of Quebec, and also of such surrounding area as prescribed from time to time by the Parliament of Canada.

To make everything crystal clear, Mr. Speaker, I would want this new capital to become what is designated as the National Capital Region in an act of Parliament of 1958, which contains a geographical description of the municipalities that are part of the national capital. I believe Parliament enacted that legislation in 1958, thereby creating a Federal District Commission known as the National Capital Commission. The region itself is mostly urban. It includes the city of Ottawa and its suburbs as well as adjacent territories and, on the Hull side, as far as Gatineau and part of the federal ridings of Pontiac and Hull.

Mr. Speaker, let us retrace the history of our national capital. In 1858, Queen Victoria asked that Ottawa be known not as the capital—if memory serves me right, I have not seen the word "capital" in the constitution—but as the seat of government. A linguist I am not, so I would not want to come up with unenlightened definitions of the expressions "capital" and "seat of government", but I am sure the subject lends itself to debate and especially reflection.

Mr. Speaker, if I refer to Hull, and that is the object of my bill, it is because the various governments we have had since 1899 have always been anxious to have a capital which would reflect the aspirations of Canadians, the unity of our country, its cultures and the duality represented by both peoples of Canada. To my mind, the National Capital Region is the striking example of what Canada is and of what the Canada of tomorrow will be, because I think that no other regions in Canada can generally get along as well as Hull and Ottawa do, although there may be the odd conflict here and there. Indeed they have opted for identical administrative structures, and here I refer to the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Community and the Outaouais Regional Community.

Mr. Speaker, if we examine the past and read history books, we find out that in 1899 the governments realized that the authorities of the city of Ottawa were unable to maintain and improve what was then known as the capital of Canada. That is why they created the Ottawa Improvement Commission which continued in existence until the advent of the Federal District Commission in 1926-27.

We had the Federal District Commission and then the National Capital Commission which, basically, have always aimed at embellishing and protecting the environment of the national capital. This is so true, Mr. Speaker, that a man who thought big and who had a vision of the future such as perhaps no politician has had since Sir Wilfrid Laurier, decided because of all this inertia, through his minister, the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, to hold a kind of plebiscite in the federal capital in order to ask the residents whether they would agree to a federal district which would become the Washington of the North. This was the dream of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. A plebiscite was held in 1906, but it was unfortunately defeated by no more than 600 or 800 votes, which means that 45 per cent of the people were in favour of this concept, and I would add that the people in Hull did not vote on this issue for the simple reason that they had not been invited to do so.

Since then, Mr. Speaker, the situation has evolved greatly. We have had the Holt commission, which published its report in 1915, I believe, and which had been created by the Conservative government of Mr. Borden. This commission was made up of six members including the mayors of Ottawa and Hull, who themselves advocated a federal district to administer the Canadian capital. All the successive mayors and elected representatives of Hull have always urged and implored the federal government to extend in some way the national capital on the Hull side.

Even King, in 1927, Mr. Speaker, was in favour of a federal district—and I say this for those who are not aware of it—and Mr. Pearson also advocated a federal district for the Ottawa-Hull region on television in 1964. In 1927, King also had a great vision of the future, and it can be said that the national capital region was always a priority for him. Indeed, one only has to look at what he left in the magnificent Gatineau park to see that the national capital was one of his priorities. He also decided to urge the improvement commission to do something for Hull. The Federal District Commission was created in 1927, and that is when things started to change for the Hull region. However, it took many representations, many pleas and many prayers until finally, around 1968-69, after many studies carried out by joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons, a consensus was reached at the constitutional conference and the premiers agreed that the Ottawa-Hull region would from then on be known as the National Capital region. Since then, massive investments have been made on the side of Hull, not only to meet the wishes of the population, but also to accomplish what Canadian prime ministers have wanted for the Ottawa-Hull region since 1895.

If it had not been for the First World War, the fire that destroyed the Parliament buildings, the depression and the Second World War, Mr. Speaker, we would now be living in a federal district. Even the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons advocated some type of federal district for the Ottawa-Hull region in its recommendation 47 in 1972, which is not so long ago.

Mr. Speaker, we have to face the facts, and this is why I have introduced this bill to create a legal framework for what is now a reality. In fact, in 1972 or 1973, I believe, when the government introduced its reorganization project for departments and government administration, it replaced the word "Ottawa" in the acts governing the departments whose headquarters were in Ottawa, the Canadian capital, by the term "the region of the National Capital". This was in recognition of the fact that the National Capital Region was to all intents and purposes the capital of the country. If you go to Ottawa international airport and look at the airlines' advertising you will see that Air Canada, CP and other companies list their arrival and departure time under Ottawa-Hull. When I returned from Miami a short while ago on flight 172 to Baltimore and Ottawa I noticed on the sign "Ottawa-Hull". So it is only a normal occurrence that airlines, both national and foreign, should recognize an actual situation. That is why we must consider the capital of Canada as the National Capital Region, and I am not talking about making it a federal district, although I have mentioned it. Also, you will note that the 1981 telephone book, for those who have received it, reads in big letters Ottawa-Hull. And there are a host of similar things. The Auberge de la Chaudière—I do not want to give it any publicity but it is a magnificent hotel—gives its location in its ads in Time magazine as Ottawa-Hull.

There are many such cases. Since 1969 we have had a new Hull, an urban Hull which is spreading out to Gatineau, and I see the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) might prefer to say that Gatineau is spreading out to Hull, but in any case, one thing is sure and that is that we now have an urban population within a five to six-mile radius which is part of the National Capital.

There have been many surveys, Mr. Speaker. The people of Hull have been asked many times by CROP and other opinion polls if they wanted to belong to the National Capital and the response has always been about 85 per cent in favour. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the law should reflect the actual facts. Now changing the Constitution certainly poses problems in some regards but as far as section 16 is concerned, we do not need a committee, we do not need anything. Just listen to the witnesses! I think that was done by the joint committee on the Constitution in 1972.

There was another committee on the National Capital of course which, for reasons that escape me, did not pursue its work. Still, things must change, otherwise someone later on in history will certainly bring up what has been an inconsistency dating back many years. I am not talking about the mayors of Hull who have always held the same view and who are quite contented. But ask the people on the street and the majority will tell you that they are very happy to live in the National Capital Region.

I still have many things to say, Mr. Speaker, but time is running short, and I know that my colleagues would like to speak on this subject. I hope they will not rise merely to hear themselves speak but have a genuine contribution to make to this debate. Unfortunately there are many members in this House who rise and have nothing to say. But I would like to hear their views if they really have some to express. I am sure that I have friends on both sides who, if they have been living here for some years, will understand what I am talking about. I do not want to take anything away from Ottawa, quite the opposite, I think it is a marvellous city. A million visitors come to the National Capital every year. These people do not come only to visit the Parliament buildings. They come to see the capital of their country. I think Ottawa is a beautiful city, an extraordinarily clean city. That is why it should share all its amenities with the other side, as it does with its suburbs. I am just as eager to see the area which is not Ottawa but within the national capital region, as shown on an official map of the national capital region included as part of the national capital, as I am to see the townships adjacent to Hull also become part of the national capital of Canada.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that those who really want their capital to reflect truly its status as the seat of the federal government would want it to symbolize the power and the unity of the country, to be the home and the soul of our nation as well as the image it casts to the world. In my opinion Ottawa-Hull is a microcosm of what tomorrow's Canada should be.

I hope that those who take the floor after me will have something to say on that subject at another sitting; I might find that they were completely mistaken.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the opposite corner of the House and actually the physical distance between us would force my friend from Hull to use binoculars, because we almost need them in the House to see each other.

However, as a Canadian from the city of Edmonton, I am just as interested in the national capital of my country as the hon. member who lives in the neighbouring city of Hull. In my opinion, that is all he is, a neighbour who represents the citizens of Hull, Quebec.

From a geographic point of view, I entirely agree with the hon. member and those who find it would be more attractive for Ottawa to extend on both sides of the Ottawa river at the foot of the Gatineau hills, because it is an exceptionally beautiful area not easily matched elsewhere in Canada. Having lived here for 16 years, I will admit that I am sympathetic to the idea. However, the hon. member is a physician and I am a lawyer. Therefore I would like to consider the bill. Unfortunately, to start, the hon. member has fallen into a trap. He argues from the premise that the end justifies the means. Actually, although it might perhaps be advisable to have the entire area which consists of the city of Ottawa, the city of Hull and the neighbouring townships, included in the national capital region, legally it is impossible.

Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that a legal argument which the hon. member could have used has been allowed to appear in the bill. Unfortunately, I do not agree with Judge Cartright who used to feel that the Queen and Parliament have the right to determine the location of the federal Parliament. The provinces are clearly involved in the matter and their consent would be required.

We could actually legislate that the national capital would from now on be called Ottawa-Hull. Since such is not the view of the province of Quebec because that would seem to lessen its influence over its territories, the Quebec government could immediately introduce a bill rather longer than this one, as the result of which the name of Hull would be totally eliminated because the Quebec government is responsible for setting the limits of the city of Hull. That does not take time. It is only a matter of dividing the whole into two, three or four parts and to assign them to neighbouring communities. This way Hull would become part of history. I suggest therefore that the bill introduced by the federal government would be altogether worthless. No!

[English]

I now want to turn to the desires expressed by many of the people I represent in Edmonton. Many if not all of my colleagues from other parts of the country, whether the east, centre or west, will say that the determination of what shall be the capital of their country belongs as much to them as to the people of Ontario or Quebec where the actual site is located.

If a plan were submitted with the consent of Ontario and Quebec, and with the general approbation of the country, that the capital be expanded to include the new area, I am sure most people would agree. I think there is a certain attraction to it. The proposer of this bill took us through the history of this matter. I am sure that when the matter was first considered 100 years ago, as indicated by the hon. member, there were certain arguments in favour of it. Some are still in existence today. I do not disagree with them. However, legally this House does not have the power to change the name and the location of the capital of Canada by passage of a bill in this House and the other place and then have it sent on for royal assent. That would be the greatest nullity ever perpetrated in this House.

In the province of Ontario there is the city of Ottawa, the city of Vanier, the village of Rockliffe, the city of Nepean, the city of Kanata, the township of Gloucester—

Mr. Simmons: The city of Gloucester.

Mr. Lambert: All of these are on the Ontario side. If the impatient young member from Newfoundland will listen—

Mr. Simmons: I was trying to help. It is the city of Gloucester.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member is correct. I apologize. As of the first of January, it became the city of Gloucester.

Mr. Simmons: He learns after a while.

Mr. Lambert: That's right. And I am willing to admit it, unlike some other people. There are other municipalities on the Ontario side which are included in the area the proposer of this bill asks to be included in the area of the national capital. Those represent the boundaries; that is only as to name. Everything else that is south of the Ottawa River is under the control of the province of Ontario.

I need not go into all the municipalities, whether of a regional nature or otherwise, which exist on the Quebec side of the river. They are entirely under the dependence of the government of the province of Quebec. The people within those regions may be moved to amalgamate, something that has happened before. They may be moved to upgrade their status, as we have seen on the Ontario side with the growth of population in the cities of Nepean, Kanata and Gloucester. However, the boundaries are fixed by provincial legislation.

In his amendment the hon. member says it is hereby declared that the national capital of Canada and the seat of the federal government of Canada shall consist of the city of Ottawa and the city of Hull. If we adopt that, we will then be saying by act of Parliament that part of the national capital of this country shall be under the jurisdiction of yet another government within Canada so far as its location is concerned, and that to me is a nullity.

I think there is a very logical reason for suggesting that in this national capital region we have unity of assessment, the same type of health services, police protection, fire protection and transportation for the residents here and those citizens living on the other side of the river whose jobs are on this side. I suggest there are scores of thousands—perhaps hundreds of thousands—of people on both sides of the river who consider their lives totally interchangeable on either side. They will go to a supermarket in Ottawa one day, and the next they will go to a similar supermarket in Hull or in one of the other municipalities on that side of the river. They live in this region, and they are part of the region. There are intermarriages and all sorts of interrelationships between people on both sides.

I would not accept the example of Air Canada in this regard, which shows Ottawa-Hull in its timetable. That should not be a justification. After all, one used to be able to look at Air Canada's timetable and see Toronto and Hamilton joined together, and there is certainly a great deal of difference between Toronto and Hamilton, just as there is between Ottawa and Hull.

An hon. Member: Vive la différence.

Mr. Lambert: That is not a reason for advancing this idea in the House. The hon. member might, by way of resolution, suggest that the government set up another study, perhaps the ultimate study this time. Perhaps people have progressed far enough that they have influence with the government in Quebec City.

And that is another story altogether. How can one think for just a moment that at this point the Quebec government would agree to part with one single square centimetre of Quebec territory along the Ottawa River, so that it would become part and parcel of the national capital? In my opinion, it would never agree to that. Even if people really wanted it, they would elect somebody else. After all, the people in Hull elected a PQ candidate the last time around. Perhaps they would elect two now. Then, would these people reflect the opinion of the public as expressed by the Liberal member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle), would they want a national capital, an integrated city, for we would require an integrated city, not a city or a region or a capital divided in two? Unless the Ontario and Quebec governments agreed on the need to provide comparable joint services, a great deal more still has to be done. As to the natural site of the capital, I share the feelings of the hon. member, just as many others would, but for the time being, I am afraid that, however attractive this proposal may seem, it seems that the Canadian people elsewhere in Canada would have also to agree to this change.

You cannot imagine, Mr. Speaker, how many letters I have received from people protesting against the transfer of federal buildings from this side to the Hull side, in order to establish unilaterally the fact that Ottawa-Hull had become the capital of Canada. And I might say that most protesters supported the political party of the hon. member. Those people said, "Definitely not, not that way, give us another plan". But it is the same thing today with the constitution. People are quite willing to patriate the constitution: We would like to have the constitution. But no group has the right to say: "You are going to act this way and that way and not otherwise." The decision belongs to the people of Canada.

The national capital belongs to the people of Canada just as the chief of state, the Queen belongs to the people, and the people will not be ordered around by a prime minister or an administration passing legislation or resolutions here in Parliament or obtaining the consent of the country at large. The constitution is the people's consent to a legislative program. It does not amount to voting a body of legislation, to imposing something on the people. That is the difference and that is what the people of Canada would require in such a situation: Do not impose change, seek to obtain it and you will probably get it. But at the present time, I am afraid the hon. member went astray by trying to amend the British North America Act to change the description of the capital of this country. And I regret it very much, since I know the hon. member very well, and I see his objective is worth while, but he did not make his case. I could not support such a bill.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, let me say I support the principle of this bill, which is what we are debating at second reading, presented by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle). I have long felt that we should have a national capital district or region in Canada similar to those which exist in other countries, such as the United States or Australia, whereby the national capital region includes all the territory on which the capital exists as well as the surrounding area.

• (1740)

On my first trip to Ottawa some 21 years ago I could see Parliament from almost any part of the city. It was a beautiful sight. Today it is obliterated by high rise office buildings and complexes. It has become nothing more than part of the usual North American downtown concentration. When I returned for our one hundredth birthday in 1967, the obliteration had commenced. When I came here as a member of Parliament in 1968, there were certain regulations and bylaws concerning the height of buildings and their location in relation to Parliament Hill, as it is known. Year after year, various loopholes were found by developers and people whose taste was all in their mouths and who were more interested in making bucks than they were in the beauty and value of a real national capital city.

I am sure the hon. member realizes that the chances of this bill being accepted by the government, or of succeeding in this way only, are almost nil, but at least he has made an effort. At this time of the year I wish he had put forward as well another private member's bill similar to the one brought forward by the former member for Waterloo-Cambridge to allow the Turks and Caicos Islands to become part of Canada so we could have Parliament sit there in the wintertime. The weather there is somewhat better than it is here.

I believe that if we were to negotiate with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and if there were concurrent resolutions put forward in other legislatures in Canada, we could succeed in acquiring the area which encompasses the lands of the National Capital Commission for the creation of a real national capital district similar to the District of Columbia in the United States and similar to districts in a number of other countries and for the construction of a completely new national capital.

The hon. member for Hull, the good doctor, is not trying to dismember the country or to cause any separatism in this small area of Canada. I do not know whether he is a surgeon, but he is trying to build something which would add to national unity and national identity, and we support that. I hope he will continue to try to convince one or more members of the national assembly of Quebec to sponsor a bill or a resolution in that legislative body, one or more members of the Ontario legislature to do the same, as well as a member of the federal Parliament so that this bill or resolution could deal with many of the problems which have been raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and so that an agreement could be arrived at for the establishment of a national capital region or district.

One wonders whether there would be a willingness on the part of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario to give up their territory. One could be unkind enough to say that if Quebec would give up Hull and part of the Gatineau hills, we could give Toronto to Quebec in exchange. One could also offer Ontario an Arctic island in exchange for the Ottawa area.

Mr. Rose: One with some oil on it.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, it would be preferable if it had some oil on it.

I think this is a concept which is universally recognized, and the idea is supported in principle by people in all walks of life and in all political parties. Even if we did no more than just agree to this bill in principle and nothing else happened to it, that in itself would be a beginning. I am realistic enough to know that it would take a number of years to accomplish the objectives which the hon. member for Hull wishes to attain and which I think many members on all sides would like to see reached, but this would require discussion and agreement between the federal government and the two provinces directly concerned as well as resolutions of support from the other eight provinces and two territories.

This could become a district belonging to all the people of Canada, reflecting all the provinces and regions of the country and reflecting the two official languages and the multiculturalism of the people. In the way we would run the place, in the names of the buildings and streets and in the languages used recognition could be given to all parts of the country. In effect, it would be a place which would belong to all Canadians. People could still have their local government, they could elect their local education authorities and they would be governed by the laws of the respective provinces when it came to municipal and educational endeavours. These areas could be autonomous but, on the other hand, that would be subject to negotiation and agreement with Hull, Ottawa and the other municipalities in both areas as well as the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

I congratulate the hon. member for starting this concept. He was lucky enough in the draw that his bill came up early and we had a chance for debate. I hope that subsequent to this debate the House will adopt the bill in principle. Even if it dies on the order paper, it will still be a beginning. I hope the hon. member will continue to expand on it and to seek the support of the national assembly in Quebec and the legislature in Ontario. He will then find much quicker results because of agreement being reached prior to any amendments to our constitution, to our federal legislation or to the legislation of the two provinces concerned.

I hope the government and all members will accept the bill in principle and that the hon. gentleman will continue to work at this worth-while endeavour.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in entering this debate it had been my intention to suggest to you that Bill C-230, introduced by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle), is defective in that it deals with a matter which is already before the House in another forum. However, I have consulted the Table officers, and I now find it to be acceptable. The constitutional amendments which are now before the committee in the form of a resolution do not make this particular bill, which also proposes amendment of the constitution, unacceptable under the procedures of this House. So on those grounds I have had to shift my stance.

There is, however, one matter which might be of some small concern to the hon. member introducing this bill. It is recognizable because the bill was introduced and given first reading on May 2, 1980. Clause 2 indicates that "this act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1980". I am sure the hon. member would like that changed to 1981, since we are now into the new year.

● (1750)

The explanatory notes refer to the remarks of Mr. Justice Cartwright of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Munro v. the National Capital Commission of 1966. I should should point out that the Munro in question is a person with whom I am in no way connected. In part Mr. Justice Cartwright said:

> —the change could doubtless, be made by an act of Parliament in which Her Majesty acts with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada.

Any resolution which would change our constitution must perforce go through the House either as a bill or, in very special circumstances, it could proceed as a constitutional amendment by order in council. But on a matter of this importance, it is quite correct that Parliament should make the decision.

As has been said by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), the matter of how the Senate and the House of Commons should give their advice and consent is at issue. It cannot be done in the House without the advice and consent of other levels or orders of government. I prefer to use the words "orders of government". As was said by the hon. member for Edmonton West, and I concur, the capital of my country is not by any means a matter which can be decided upon by one order of government. If I did not know the hon. member for Hull better, I would say he is demonstrating lack of awareness of the rest of the country by bringing forward a measure of this type without the approval of the other orders of government in this country and with a total lack of regard for the feeling of the hinterland or outlying parts of the country.

I am sure the hon. member does not wish to offend, but this is exactly what such an action would do; it presumes that this order of government could change the capital of the country without consultation with the other orders of government, even the one which is very close by and immediately affected, namely, the government of the province of Quebec. Without giving it too heavy an overtone, it is offensive in the sense that it would offend jurisdictions which are beyond the jurisdiction of this House, but which need to be consulted about any action by this House in such a matter. To a considerable extent the hon. member is leaning in his preamble on section 16 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

Until the Queen otherwise directs, the seat of Government of Canada shall be Ottawa.

As the hon. member quite correctly said, it is not the "capital"; it is the "seat of government". When Ottawa was originally chosen, it was chosen as the seat of government in Canada. In fact, the address to Her Majesty Queen Victoria on March 24, 1857, indicated "the permanent seat of government in Canada". At that time Canada consisted of the united provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

When the BNA Act was being drafted, representatives of Upper and Lower Canada were attending meetings in Quebec City and Charlottetown to draw up the measures which would constitute the formation of an enlarged Canada, and the "seat of government for Canada" was being decided.

The hon. member also leans on head I of section 91, which outlines the power of Parliament to amend from time to time the Constitution of Canada, but he overlooks section 92.13, to which the hon. member for Edmonton West referred. It deals with the question of property, which was at issue during oral questions and the subject of questions of privilege today, as well as in committee. Property and civil rights are matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. For this Parliament to presume to impose its will on property beyond its jurisdiction would be—and I use the word tenderly—offensive to the province of Quebec without its consent. I hope the hon. member will accept the intent with which I am making these comments. I do not use "offensive" in an offensive manner; it just offends the niceties and the areas of jurisdiction within our country if this chamber presumes that it can impose its will upon another jurisdiction.

If the member was desirous of this measure being accepted, I am surprised he was unable to persuade members of his party that perhaps this particular aspect might be included in the constitutional measures before the committee. It could very well have been article X, Y or Z of the resolution which purports to make changes to the Constitution of Canada. His bill received first reading on May 2, and the resolution was not presented to the House until October 6. That gave him ample time to persuade the cabinet that his measure might well have been included in the ones which were brought forward. Of course, I recognize that it would be an imposition—as are many of the other measures—on other jurisdictions without the consent of the provinces.

Mr. Benjamin: Like property.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I hear a member saying "quite properly". I think it is quite improperly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

[English]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, before we adjourned for dinner I was going through a proposition which I had put before the House. I would like to repeat just a little bit of it. It seems to me that rather than bulldozing Canadianization of resource industries, as is proposed in the national energy policy put forward by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I would like to encourage Canadian citizens to do it on a voluntary basis. I know hon. members from all parties would much prefer to see it done this way. I would take those natural resource search and development companies in Canada, whether foreign or Canadian owned, and work out the following proposition: their shares, available to Canadian citizens and bona fide Canadian companies on the market, would have the added benefit, when related to the capital gains section of the Income Tax Act, of providing an investment opportunity to those persons qualified, and by "persons" I include corporations. If the shares were to be held for five years, with, if necessary roll-overs within the ballpark of approved resources or approved companies, then they would attract a forgiveness of tax for capital gains purposes.

I have in mind a five-year plan so that an investment within the ballpark, maintained by the taxpayer or the investor for five years, would earn a total remission of any capital gains tax. If it were kept for four years, it would be 80 per cent, and this would go down through 20 per cent per annum. It seems to me that under those circumstances we could attract a great deal more Canadian participation. I am being, shall we say, discriminatory in favour of Canadian citizens and bona fide Canadian companies in the area of investment in the resource search and development industry. It has not been tried before in Canada, so I cannot say I could guarantee that we would see such and such a shift in ownership. I do not personally know whether such a proposition would bring about the nirvana and cause a very significant shift, but I am satisfied there would be a considerable shift.

As the plan progressed, Canadian money or even foreign money for the purpose of resource development in this country would soon Canadianize itself and come into the hands of Canadians, who would have the rights of owners of shares, whether they be in partnerships or corporations in the search for and development of Canadian resources. At one time my party approved, in a hesitating way, a plan for putting a ceiling on such investment. There cannot be a ceiling on the amount of money invested because it is an incentive. Something must be done, and it does not cost the state anything because, unless the incentive were there, the action would not be taken.

That is why I say there is so much poppycock and deluding of the public when the Government of Canada says it has assisted the oil industry through incentives and made financial contributions, perhaps in the billions of dollars, for the development of resources in this country. That is an utter falsehood because, unless that incentive existed in the first place, no action would have been taken and, if no action is taken nothing falls to the government, and nothing is done. People merely sit on their hands or invest their money elsewhere.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood may shake his head all he wants, but no investment takes place. No one in the early years of Canada's oil industry made the trip to Toronto to obtain financing for western oil companies, because it was not even worth the trip. As a former minister of the Alberta government, the hon. member for Bow River can certainly attest to that. As a lawyer in the business, I can say so as well.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer this evening to Section 69 of the Income Tax Act and its interpretation in terms of small businessmen and farmers. I will pose some questions to the minister in the hope that he will be able to respond. Section 69 of the Income Tax Act is designed to ensure that fair value is applied to transactions which involve gifting, or dealings with people "within arm's length".

In the area of Manitoba which I represent, many families have incorporated their farms for purposes of taxation, estate planning and for dividing up land and farming operations among family members. Many people in my riding have been conducting their businesses on the basis of verbal agreements with the Winnipeg tax office—although I understand that in the cases involving the Regina tax office there was a written interpretation—that for the purposes of taxation rent would not be deemed to be paid by a corporation to an individual when there was no rent money available to be paid. In other words, many farms were incorporated on the basis that the individual would transfer everything he owns to his family corporation except the land, which was kept in his or her name.

These individuals took this course under the impression that for planning purposes it was the proper thing to do and with the knowledge that the transfer of land could have taken place at the time of incorporation without being taxed. However, the tax people have gone back and said that in a case where there has been a poor crop or a poor market, and as a result no rent paid by the corporation to the individual farmer or owner of the land, for tax purposes the rent must be deemed to have been paid to the individual. This is only one side of the situation.

On the other side of the situation there has been no indication that the tax department will allow that deemed rent, which becomes income to the individual, to be claimed as an expense of the individual's corporation. This has the effect of creating a large income for the individual, but that individual has no means of offsetting that large income with expenses. Also, in a case where there is a low income because of the variability of the farming situation, the farm can suffer a large loss which, in some cases, could more than equal the total real income of the farm.

The tax department must spell out this section in very explicit and straightforward terms. We are dealing with the principle, as it is called by the tax department, of "within arm's length" with regard to family corporations. The tax department must spell out how it intends to handle such corporations.

While I am referring to rent in this case, I could also refer to salaries, interest on shareholders' loans or the situation where one neighbour volunteers his services to another neighbour. In the latter case, the tax department could ask the individual to show this volunteer service as income.

Some notices of reassessment have been sent out, but I understand that, for the time being, the tax department has decided not to proceed. However, it has not decided that it is wrong in principle. It has merely held in abeyance tax collections in these situations. There are two things which should happen. The tax department should clarify the situation so people will know how to govern themselves when they incorporate and, if there is to be any change in policy, people should be given a chance, and the department should not proceed on a retroactive basis. While we do not need five years, we do need more than five days to adjust to new rules.

I would like the minister to clarify any concern he may have with regard to the problem and give his thoughts on this situation in terms of further proceedings by the tax department.

Mr. Chairman, if I cannot get a response from either the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary now, I would like to proceed with other topics, but I would like to have a response now, if possible.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, a number of questions have been asked, and at the appropriate time I intend to answer the hon. gentleman and other hon. members, so he can be assured that he will get the information he requests.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I will amplify the case which I have made tonight by pointing out some of the problems which can be caused by this situation. It should be clear to the government that there are many farms which incorporate for reasons other than to avoid taxes. As I have said, farmers incorporate for purposes of planning family operations and for estate planning. Thus, this problem can arise on many small farms. I am not talking about large corporations. This is also a concern to many small businessmen in the farming sector.

What concerns many farmers in this country—and I represent a farming area—is that when the tax department proceeds with changes, it should do so on a basis that does not create havoc in the system.

I know of a case in which a reassessment was to cover a period of four years. If that had been proceeded with, it could have caused very severe hardship for the individual involved, his family corporation and the family members who are part of it. The financial hardship could have driven the family out of business.

What I found particularly disturbing about this case was that the tax department proceeded with it as a test case. That meant that the individual concerned would bear the full cost of testing the case in court and that the tax department could then use it as a precedent for other cases on the prairies because it originated in the Winnipeg office.

It disturbed me that the individual involved could be put to considerable expense to defend himself, yet he was really acting on behalf of a group of people who had incorporated under the same guidelines as he had. In that sense it was a test case, so the individual was not really being treated fairly. Fortunately, the tax department did not proceed. If the case had gone to court and he had won, however, his expenses could have amounted to as much as the tax it was proposed to levy in the first place.

I think it is unfortunate that the tax department has enough leeway to cause problems like this for the individual farmer. I urge the minister to ensure that if the department decides to proceed on this basis it makes sure that an individual does not put himself into financial jeopardy for what could be considered a class action or test case on behalf of other producers in western Canada. I should not take the narrow view and refer only to western Canada because it is my understanding that if there had been a test case and a ruling obtained, it would have applied across the country.

Many small farmers would be affected by such a decision. This involves not only a decision on whether rent is deemed to be an expense whether or not money changes hands, but the same principle also involves salaries. In the case of an individual who works for his family corporation—and this certainly falls within an arm's length transaction as the Income Tax Act defines it—whether there is money to pay him a salary or not in lean times, the tax department could assess and tax him as the individual owning the operation even though he had received income from his family corporation.

The situation I have outlined could cause the same kind of hardship as the deemed rent could have caused in the individual cases with which I am familiar.

We all know that many small business people incorporate and make shareholders' loans to their own corporations. In most cases the shareholders' loans are not interest-bearing. In fact, many banks stipulate that a shareholders' loan cannot bear interest unless the bank the corporation deals with agrees that interest can be paid.

If the provision regarding deemed rent is upheld, it could also apply to a person lending money to his own company. He would have to show as income the deemed interest accruing to him from his own company. That is a matter of concern to me, Mr. Chairman.

If the tax department decides to proceed and a ruling is made that income is deemed whether it is realized or not, it could be applied to salaries, to interest on shareholders' loans, to rent on land and to other things that an individual could rent to his own small corporation.

When changes are made, it would be sensible for the tax department to proceed on the basis of allowing people six months or a year to adjust to them. They should not be made retroactively. People should have time to adjust to them and not be put to the expense of defending themselves in court.

This concludes my remarks, Mr. Chairman. I look forward to receiving a reply from the minister on this very important matter.

Mrs. Côté: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance for his budget and the bills which are being introduced to amend the Income Tax Act, and particularly for the investment tax credit offered to manufacturers and processors in areas where there are wide disparities.

When the federal budget was tabled on October 28 the rate of the tax credit available in areas characterized by acute disparities or difficult growth was raised from 20 to 50 per cent in the case of the businesses I have just mentioned. It is true to say that the government wanted to offer as much assistance as possible to promote commercial undertakings in underdeveloped regions and I do not think I am saying anything new to anyone, particularly to you, Mr. Chairman, when I depict the economic situation which prevails in the Rimouski-Témiscouata region.

We are part and parcel of a territory, the Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé area, which is extremely underprivileged and which accounts for barely 4 per cent of the population of Quebec and slightly more than 1 per cent of Canada's total population. The riding of Rimouski-Témiscouata is home to nearly 75,000 people and we depend entirely on very small businesses, small and medium-size businesses, in fact—except for the city of Rimouski which has 30,000-odd residents and which is essentially a service community where municipal authorities are making superhuman efforts to spur industrial growth.

I must point out the problem I have with this investment tax credit. In a territory as wide as Rimouski-Témiscouata, I would say it stretches from Rivière-du-Loup to the Magdalen Islands and extends to both sides of the river, including part of the North Shore, this special program does not apply to two cities, Rimouski and Sept-Îles, allegedly because their per capita income is a little bit over the regional average and their unemployment rate somewhat lower than the regional average.

If we examine the economic standing of the city of Rimouski in the whole territory I must admit that we wonder about Rimouski being excluded from a program which is extremely important and extremely interesting for a region such as ours. True, Rimouski is a service community, but it must be said that 83 per cent of the labour force in Rimouski are people who earn a living in the public, quasi-public and educational sectors. We have a regional hospital which provides jobs for many people and we also benefit from the decentralization of provincial and federal government services. People will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that we have reached the saturation level when it comes to the decentralization of services, and we have even recorded a decrease in the number of jobs in provincial public and quasi-public services, particularly in the field of education.

This is what we find if we compare Rimouski to the rest of Canada, Quebec and other neighbouring cities. I would like to point out to hon. members that, according to the figures published in the Survey of Market in 1980 of the Financial Post, the per capita income in Canada was $7,225. For the province of Quebec, the per capita income was $6,563, for the Rimouski constituency, $5,160, for the city of Rimouski, $6,675, for the city of Rivière-du-Loup, $6,401, and for the city of Matane, $5,566. I must admit that I do not find these figures too depressing, but I am certainly upset about the figures for the per capita added value for the manufacturing sector in the city of Rimouski.

The per capita added value is $1,860 for Canada, $1,857 for Quebec, $483 for the county of Rimouski, but the city of Rimouski has only a $166 per capita added value for the manufacturing sector. For the city of Rivière-du-Loup, the figure is $1,563, and for Matane, $1,130. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I am somewhat envious of the per capita added value for the manufacturing sector of Rivière-du-Loup and Matane, which are not excluded from this investment tax credit or rebate. I would also like the Minister of Finance to note the important role that the city of Rimouski can and does play in a region like the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula. Rimouski is the most centrally located city in the region. It is true that we have government services. It is also true that we have a university, a community college and major teaching institutions, but it must also be said that Rimouski is seriously underprivileged as concerns manufacturing investments.

In this regard, these last few years, the city of Rimouski, and therefore all its residents, have benefited from assistance under certain federal programs to help create industrial complexes and establish infrastructures so that businesses can settle in the area in the best conditions possible and as quickly as possible. This has been done especially thanks to financial assistance from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion totalling nearly $1,250,000 for the creation of industrial complexes. Tax credits are now being granted to an underprivileged area, but the city of Rimouski has been excluded.

I would also like to note the economic conditions which now prevail on the North Shore, that is at Sept-Îles, Wabush, Schefferville and Fermont, where The Iron Ore Company has already announced the temporary or permanent lay-off of thousands of workers. This has a tremendous influence on the economic situation of the South Shore. For those of my colleagues who are not familiar with the area, I should point out that the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula are located on the south shore of the St. Lawrence River and that the whole North Shore area is on the opposite side, as the name indicates.

However, traditionally, since this great territory has been opened, manpower has been recruited on the South Shore. This means that those who lose their jobs on the North Shore come back to our region because they come from there. The regions which will now have to face a major demand for new jobs will be the regions of the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula in particular, as well as the city of Rimouski.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the Department of Finance were now facing a completely different situation as concerns this investment tax credit, from which Sept-Îles and Rimouski were excluded on October 28. The announcements made by employers in the Sept-Îles area concerning the lay-off of thousands of workers were not expected on October 28, but this has caused major economic setbacks in the Sept-Îles area, so much so that the Departments of Employment and Immigration, Labour, and Industry, Trade and Commerce have found it necessary to create a fund or to implement a special assistance program amounting to $350 million to help workers in areas such as the North Shore, which we are now discussing, to find other jobs.

This program will help business create jobs and ensure workers' mobility, if they so desire. We must remember that an economic happening in one area can affect another area. The economic situation prevailing in my area and on the North Shore on October 28 was certainly not the same as it is now.

Things have changed. Rimouski is at the heart of an area which is well equipped to satisfy the requirements of potential investors and should be considered with regard to this 50 per cent investment tax credit. I think that has become a question of social justice. People who will be coming back to the South Shore, the Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé areas will need jobs, so I wonder what our priority should be. Should we increase unemployment insurance funds or should we give entrepreneurs the opportunity to set up businesses in areas such as ours through reasonable tax credits that answer real needs and help support the work undertaken by municipal authorities to turn the city into the important centre it is today and which naturally has economic repercussions on the whole area? The industrial and economic development of Rimouski could benefit all surrounding townships. When we speak of developing the Montreal area, we mean that very area and not as far down as Drummondville in the hope that it will affect the Montreal region. I think all this should be taken into consideration, given the fact that in this area there are three towns, Rivière-du-Loup, Rimouski and Matane, which need assistance because they have set up an infrastructure and opened industrial parks to meet investors' requirements. This was done with the help of government programs. It seems logical to me, considering that this area represents barely 1 per cent of the Canadian population, costs millions of dollars in unemployment insurance, and contains roughly 4 per cent of the Quebec population, and considering also that the local people have shown that they are able and willing to do good work, that the government, in view of the new economic situation, should re-open this case. It should also consider Rimouski on an equal footing with other cities, no more no less, with the same advantages, because municipal authorities have made considerable efforts to achieve a just and reasonable industrial development in an area which has suffered quite badly from socioeconomic hardships. I think the people of the entire area expect a great deal from a decision which, in their view, would be equitable and would answer their needs.

[English]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, in the 20 minutes allotted to me on clause 1 of Bill C-54 I intend to put forward what I hope will be a reasoned and constructively designed proposal for the minister in the hope that he accepts the premise on which it is made, namely, how with this bill we can get more tax money into the hands of the minister by reducing taxes. With that objective in mind, I will discuss the question of renewable resources, how they are affected by several sections of this bill, and how I think this bill could be improved.

There is no question that every person knowing the problem of energy in Canada knows that no matter how you twist and turn, there has to be a concerted move toward the utilization of renewable energy to replace non-renewable energy.

● (2040)

At this time we have a number of low-grade technologies which are either in the economic ball park or are marginal. Therefore, we can achieve this objective. In the budget of the previous government, which we will call the Crosbie budget, an effort was made to free up this creative force among individual Canadians in order to get at the districts which have tremendous potential in renewable energy resources. I refer to the districts of the Gaspé, the Atlantic provinces, the great majority of Quebec and Ontario as well as British Columbia.

What have we done, tax-wise, to give incentives in order to move forward on the very necessary social and economic purpose of reducing the cost of energy to our people and at the same time making more money for the tax collector? Surely those are two laudable objectives.

There is no use trying to pretend to the Canadian people that at the present time there should be an over-emphasis on attempting to encourage them to go into active solar heat, for example. The capital costs are so high in relation to the benefits that it is uneconomic, even with all sorts of incentives, grants and inducements. However, with other forms of indirect solar energy, particularly on the passive side, there are many examples of low-grade technologies which, as I said in my opening sentence, are either economic or close to it.

Solar water heaters were mentioned in the Crosbie budget. They are economically viable. It only costs $200 or $300 to heat water for a year, $500 in some cases, but you can show that $100 spent on this type of low-grade technology will give you $100 a year in savings at present prices. An incentive was therefore put in the Crosbie budget, namely, the removal of the sales tax. That did not make me too happy because I did not think it was a sufficient incentive. However, it was at least a start.

The Crosbie budget also talked about renewable energy equipment. Under the credit system, it gave a two-year write-off of 100 per cent. If the equipment cost $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000, over a period of two years you could write it off at absolutely no cost to the government because we are not now collecting a penny on that type of equipment. There may be a few examples I do not know about, but generally speaking this type of renewable resource equipment is not being used in the way it should.

That deduction of 100 per cent would make a marginal operation attractive under the tax law proposed in the Crosbie budget. If you had to spend $4,000 and were allowed a write-off of 100 per cent over two years, the average person would save $2,000. Therefore, the capital equipment would cost only $2,000. If you saved $400 a year on that investment, you could pay that off in five years. I would think that of those who pay income tax today, to be able to save $400 or $500 a year indefinitely, and more than that in times of higher oil prices, a great majority would be willing to invest the $4,000 and recover $2,000 from their taxes over two years. they know they would get the $2,000 investment back in four or five years. From then on they would be away ahead of the game and be using a renewable energy source.

In the present budget and the bill we are discussing we have an equally well-inspired system. The government has replaced this tax reduction incentive. In return for taking a risk and investing your money in this type of thing, the government offers a grant of $800. That grant will cost money, but it is not enough to induce people to use that product. Therefore, the government will not have to spend a great deal as a result of this $800 grant. Some people will say it is even taxable, but that is not the real issue.

Which type of proposal would provide more revenue at the end of each year for the next three or four years? I suggest that the tax incentive route would do that. We do not collect any money on this renewable resource equipment now. If just one million homes over a period of five years went into this type of investment, it is easy to multiply one million by $4,000. It amounts to $4 billion.

All that money being spent on something which has not been built before creates tremendous job opportunity. Who will collect the tax on all this money? We know that by the time the $4 billion original expenditure goes through the system, it yields about $8 billion to $10 billion. Of this $8 billion to $10 billion over this four or five-year period, governments will collect approximately 40 per cent.

Governments will collect 40 per cent of $10 billion over a five-year period. They are not collecting anything now. Over the next four or five years they will collect $4 billion or $5 billion, not a small amount. When you think of reducing the cost of heating homes and buildings by as much as 75 per cent a year for those who take the risk and the incentive, it will be very clear to those in the Department of Finance who can add and subtract what a tremendous amount of money this will represent.

If you take the other route, the one in this current legislation, which gives a grant of $800, you may have to pay out a few thousand dollars a year. If something costs you $4,000, that $800 will reduce it to $3,200. After you pay $400 in tax, you have a net cost of $3,600. With a $400-a-year saving, it will take nine years to pay off that amount. That is very marginal. Only a few thousand will take that approach.

I think I have made my point as clear as it has to be made for any person willing to listen. The best thing the minister can do is go home tonight and think this over. If he checks it out with his officials, he will find that what I have said is more than true. If he comes back prepared to move an amendment, and he can do that as government leader, even though it involves an expenditure of money, he will be serving his country well. Not only would there be more money for the tax collector to meet the deficit, but there would also be savings for many people.

There are 4.4 million homes in Canada today and many other buildings to be heated. Between 35 per cent and 40 per cent of our total energy requirements today in our cold climate go to heating buildings and homes. That is a large segment of our energy requirements.

Examples of these low grade technologies are well known. One is the windmill. We have had them for thousands of years. We are now moving forward so fast that in a year or two many of them will be money-making operations for those who buy them. They are not at the present time because you can get power cheaper now, for example, at one cent per kilowatt. With new technology coming on stream in the next year or so, the government would be well advised to realize how much power we can get from windy areas such as Algoma, along rivers and shorelines and particularly on the prairies.

We could be producing 3 per cent, 4 per cent or 5 per cent of the total energy needs of the country from these winds, and maybe more, but I think that is a safe guess.

The most obvious one is the one I have referred to many times, and that is the heat pump. We have had heat pumps in North America for 60 years. Women call them refrigerators. They take the heat out of food and dump it out onto the floor. A heat pump takes the heat out of the air, the ground, the water or any source you like, brings it up to the proper heat level and dumps it into the House.

The research for North America on this type of cold climate heat pump is being done in Canada. I think one American company will be making Canada its main production centre, but there must be a market in order to get people to do this. This type of investment I think will be around $4,000. I know the head research man in this one American company was hired on January 1 of this year by the National Research Council because the council wants his knowledge.

All the expertise is here in the civil service, and I know all the manufacturing capacity is here in Canada. There are not many heat pumps going out. I know they are scattered throughout Ottawa with maybe 30 or 40 sold this winter so far. I am talking about 300,000 or 400,000 of these things being sold every winter. The amount of employment, the amount of tax money rolled into the government and the number of extra people put to work on that one item alone means that for 15 years we will have growth and expansion in this type of production. Above all, if we can get this kind of saving, 50 per cent to 75 per cent per building each year by using the indirect heat of the sun, just think of the savings of our non-renewable resources.

In the Crosbie budget there was an item mentioned in two or three parts of that measure—alcohol stills. Alcohol stills are old devices for making energy. If we look at it from the typical economist's point of view, we will find that it does not pay commercial people to go into it because it costs too much to make. But, when we give the incentive to individuals to have stills, it will work because they do not count the time they spend watching as labour, particularly if they pay their wives for doing it and, get their wives tax deductions.

All I know is that 36 of the United States have legislation and incentives for this type of thing, but we do not have them in Canada now because we lost them when we defeated the Crosbie budget. This will only produce 3 per cent, 4 per cent or 5 per cent of energy needs, but this is such a promising idea we have people warning us that if we go too fast and too far with it, we will begin to take up good grain land to produce what is needed to put into stills. That is not going to bother most of us because we know enough in the agricultural field to know that we have not begun to reach the potential productivity of our farms. We can produce all the energy we need to run these devices without cutting into our present productivity at all.

Stills are all but gone, but the police would be glad to be relieved of the task of searching all the bluffs and trees looking for stills. Half the population of the prairies brought that knowledge from Europe and could still use it. One per cent of housewives still use stills in their houses. They call it by a different name, but it is still a still.

I am simply pointing out that all these ideas, whether they be stills, windmills, heat pumps, transfer of heat from waste water going out of houses or anything else, will produce energy and reduce consumption of our non-renewable resources.

Let me talk about that latter point. We know now as a result of research at the University of Saskatchewan that with the expenditure of just $100 on a device for a water heater in the individual home you can save $100 to $150 a year. This device has been shown in a diagram by the research council in Saskatchewan, but there is not a single province in Canada outside Saskatchewan that allows it.

Every time you take a shower or a bath and dump all that heat into the sewer you are wasting money and energy. With a simple device—just running it by the water tank, taking out the heat and then sending the water out to the sewer—you can save yourself $100 to $150 a year. You can save yourself $150 with just a little pipe connection. Every province should be cracked on the head and have it pointed out that there is a saving. They should be asked why they have regulations saying you cannot take the heat out of that waste water, which is called "grey" water.

I think I have made enough points to prove, at least to my satisfaction, that there is a tremendously large number of examples of low-grade technology that are either economically sound now or are marginal, and that the government would not lose a dollar, but would make hundreds of millions, and billions, of dollars over a period of years, by providing incentives rather than adopting this kind of procedure, which is not enough.

I think I have five minutes more, but I want to close with a final appeal. What I have said is not new to many people in Canada. Canada leads the world today in its knowledge of the use of biomass. In any area where you can grow trees you can make all the energy this world needs seven times over without even trying. Canada led the world in that regard, but what are we doing about it? Are we giving grants? When you give grants to scientific people, they want to spend four, ten or twenty years proving every little detail before moving to the next step.

I remember in 1972—or in 1973, I think it was; I have forgotten which—I asked the Minister of Agriculture if he had heard of biomass. He had not heard of biomass, so I asked the then minister of energy. The University of Manitoba had been trying for years to get a $4,000 grant to prove that you could get a tremendous amount of food and energy from a little green thing that grows in the water when it is warm—algae. Manitoba finally got its grant after two or three years of bugging. What are the scientists doing? They are busy breeding this algae; they will be breeding them from now until kingdom come, trying to find out which algae is most prolific. All that is good. I am simply saying that government has to move a little faster than it is under the present situation. If we could provide an incentive for translating that idea into producing protein or energy, we should do so.

Second, the Government of Canada and the Ontario Research Foundation got together years ago to prove up the technique of taking the waste product from a high-rise in Canada, cooling that whole high-rise building and heating it almost entirely with those waste products. This has been in operation for nearly ten years in Ontario.

When I asked the minister seven years ago whether he would tell the people about it and let the world know about this new development he said, "Oh, no, you tell them, I won't." He would not because he was frightened that Canadians would be upset to learn that we were taking heat out of water and heating the whole house. That broke the hearts of many scientists and practical people in Ontario and in the National Research Council. The government would not tell the people what had been done. No patents were taken out on that.

Therefore, I ask the minister, please, to take a look at these proposals. I do not mean any political harm to the government. I think it would help the government tremendously if it looked at these things to see if I am not right. It could make much more money for itself as a tax collector, and at the same time help the individuals of this country and the nation economically. Thank you.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Chairman, I am addressing my remarks primarily to the Minister of Finance, who I see is taking his seat opposite. After speaking on this subject earlier today, referring to page 33 of the bill, which deals with cash accounting, page 28, which deals with the minimal 3 per cent inventory allowance, touching upon capital gains tax and moving on from there to areas affecting farmers and other segments of society, I came to the conclusion over the dinner hour that perhaps behind this particular piece of legislation there might be some ulterior motive on the part of the government. When we entered the last election campaign, this government made certain commitments we expected to see first in the budget, then in the energy policy and then in proposed tax measures that affect individuals in Canada.

Let us take that into consideration and give credit where it is due. I am sure many Canadians suspected that some of those promises would become reality, but we did not see them in any policies. We saw the government shift away from the free enterprise system in Canada to a system which aligned itself with the principles of our friends to the left, the socialists. When we on this side of the House saw all this, we started to wonder whether we were dealing with the Liberal Party of Canada, the New Democratic Party of Canada, or the Liberal-democratic party.

Hon. members opposite have said that this bill is responsive to the business community and to the citizens of Canada. Let me draw to the attention of the House a statement made by hon. members opposite which defines their economic policies as they would affect Canada. Backbenchers have used it in their remarks across Canada, and I have excerpts from the newspapers. The Minister of Finance, and his increasingly embarrassed backbenchers, have referred to his economic policy as being one of gradualism. I took it upon myself during the dinner hour to look up what "gradualism" means, and I refer everyone in the House to Roget's new edition of the vocabulary of economic theory. This is what the Minister of Finance is proposing by adopting a policy of gradualism. According to the definition in the dictionary of economic theory the following are similes for gradualism: sluggard, slow-march, mincing steps, dog-trot, slackening, retardation, creeping and slowness. What we have in the bill before the House today is a creeping, slow dog-trot. It is sluggish, and the minister is mincing steps with the people of Canada.

What the minister is saying is that even though he committed himself to fighting to keep the expenses of the government as low as the gross national product—those are his words and those are the words of the Prime Minister—what has happened in reality is that the gross national product in Canada is up only 11.1 per cent. But what has been the growth of the government following the budget and during the short term when the finance minister has been in office? I will remind the minister that the growth of government is up 12.8 per cent.

If the government continues to spend 25 per cent more than it takes in each year, there is only one place from which the government can get the shortfall, that is through taxation. The government uses every means at its disposal to expropriate multinational investments from the free enterprise system in Canada. What happens is that it discourages Canadian investment in Canada and drives oil rigs out of this country. Oil rigs are lining up at the border. Canadian investors are prepared to spend up to $200,000 to move one oil rig across the border. Oil rigs are crossing the border at the rate of 70, 80 and 90, and the forecasts are that they will exceed 100 in the imminent future. That is costing Canada jobs. Every time we lose a job in Canada and every time a man does not have a paycheque to take home, I say to the finance minister that he is not living up to his responsibility as finance minister, and has failed to force his colleagues in the cabinet, through the budget he introduced, to bring in measures to create employment.

What did the Prime Minister say when he was leader of the opposition? He promised Canadian citizens that he would negotiate a fair price with the western provinces and, through negotiations, keep the price of gas at less than 14 cents. I purchased gas this week and found that it is up 50 cents in one year.

What did the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce promise the Canadian people when he was campaigning to be elected? He said that if he was in the cabinet, he would resign if interest rates rose higher than they were at the time the Conservatives were in power. What has happened? Interest rates have gone up 39 per cent. The Minister of Finance introduced his budget on October 28, two and half short months ago, and what did the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce do about it? Has he resigned? Did he live up to his commitment to the Canadian people that if interest rates rose higher than they were when the Conservatives were in office—it was 14 per cent then—he would resign.

What is the small businessman paying today in interest rates because the finance minister has refused to bring in a tax measure which would encourage businessmen to stay in business and farmers to stay on their farms? He is driving them out of business at the rate of some 2,000. That was the figure for last year in Ontario alone. In the small business sector, there were over 5,000 bankruptcies in Canada. What does the small business sector mean to Canada? What does it mean to this government as it endeavours to raise taxes to meet its excessive spending?

The government absolutely refuses to cut the size of the bureaucracy. When the Conservatives were in government, we took major steps to reduce the size of the civil service. What has happened since this government took over? The Liberals, together with the socialists to my left—these Liberal-democrats—have allowed the civil service to expand through expropriation in the private sector. In reality what they are doing is discouraging free enterprise. They are moving its strength into the public sector, driving entrepreneurs and free enterprise people out of Canada and sending them to other parts of the world where they can make a living unencumbered by government and where the free enterprise system can function.

There is nothing more serious than the erosion of the system we have grown to respect and enjoy in Canada. It disheartened me to see the Liberal backbenchers return to their ridings this past Christmas, look their constituents in the face and say, "You do not need an energy tax credit, you do not need a mortgage interest deduction program, you do not need a property tax deduction, and you do not need any concessions in the energy policy which we introduced so successfully through closure in the House of Commons."

I predict that many members on the benches opposite will not be sitting there after the next federal election. Through their leader they introduced very carefully only four promises during the last federal election campaign, and they broke every promise to the provinces and to the people of Canada. They did not create an industrial strategy, which the Prime Minister said they would do, a strategy which would increase the number of jobs, spur growth and increase Canadian ownership. They are driving Canadian ownership out of existence. They joke about it. They are led by a man who pulls the strings, and the puppets and marionettes to my left stand up and vote in unison "Aye". The Liberal-democratic party of Canada is driving ownership out of this country through the Constitution, through their energy policy, through the budget and now through this income tax measure, which utterly fails to acknowledge the desires of the farming community with regard to the capital gains tax. What about the three generations from grandfather to son to grandson? If the minister does not respond to the needs of the farming community, farmers will lose their farms because they will not be able to afford them. Under this bill they will be forced to sell them to pay accumulated capital gains, which could amount to sums greater than the selling prices of the farms.

At least the Conservative budget recognized the need for farms to remain in the hands of third and fourth generation farmers. There are many of them in the minister's riding and in his province, yet he refused to look at Canfarm and say that it was there for the benefit of the farm community. Approximately 30 per cent of the minister's farming constituents were involved in Canfarm. The government found $40 million for the big multinational oil company, Imperial Oil, when it threatened to stop its oil projects out west. The government found $40 million at the snap of a finger in a budget which spends 25 per cent more than it takes in, but it could not find $3 million to keep Canfarm alive for the farmers in his province, as well as those in the province of Ontario.

The government could not formulate an industrial strategy to create jobs. The last promise of the Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition was that he would fight to increase jobs; he said he would ensure an industrial strategy was developed to increase employment. But what has happened in reality? The number of people unemployed in Canada has risen to more than one million. It is a remarkable increase; it is even greater than the growth in government spending. The government should control its spending and reduce the bureaucracy, which forces on the people of Canada a metric system and a constitution they do not want. It is not always cabinet; it is the bureaucracy which controls cabinet in many cases.

When cabinet ministers make commitments which the Prime Minister nullifies, how can Parliament have credibility with the people of Canada? How can we be expected to go home and say, "The Government of Canada agrees because the minister said so", when the next day the minister says that that is not the way it will happen? That is exactly what happened with respect to the four election promises of the present government. That is what is happening in this measure, which places undue pressure upon the small business community of Canada.

Apparently small business can borrow money on the government bond issue. I challenge the Minister of Finance to provide a list of all people who have borrowed on that bond issue without conditions being placed upon them by the banks. Is the Minister of Finance aware of the fact that there are 400,000 small businessmen in the province of Ontario? Does he know how many loans have been made to small businesses because of the restrictions put on them and which the government refuses to lessen? Does the minister know how many loans have been made to the 400,000 small businessmen in Ontario? There were 788 loans made in 1978 through the Small Businesses Loans Act to small businessmen. Is the minister able to respond by indicating the number of loans which have been made under that bond issue? Why will the availability of this bond issue to small business expire on March 31, 1981? Does the minister not have enough faith in the business people of Canada to give them at least a year to take advantage of some interest relief? The government does not want to give any interest relief to home owners or small businessmen. Before this bill is passed, would the minister allow an amendment to come forward which would extend the bond issue to at least the end of this calendar year? Then the small business community and the banking institutions would know that the Minister of Finance cares, and a bank would not have to lend money to a small businessman with the condition that should this bill not go through before the expiry date of the loan the interest rate will be 21 per cent.

We need a little compassion and concern. We should show Canadians that we are not moving completely to the left and that to be successful everything does not have to be under public ownership. The government should create a climate which allows business to function free of government pressure and without the government in its pocket. The government should realize that the country would run better if government got out of the marketplace and let business function as it was intended when the settlers first came here, as Canada and its business community grew and before the Liberal government joined ranks with the NDP to form the first socialist government of Canada.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with only two cases to follow up on one or two of the statements made by other members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: When the conversation across the floor stops, I will be able to continue with the debate. I have nothing against the other side, so I will not speak against them. Many people in the country are very concerned about income taxes and the Income Tax Act. I thought tonight I would bring to the attention of the hon. minister and his departmental officials two cases which illustrate how frustrating it can be for Canadians when certain officials of the income tax branch of the Department of National Revenue start acting in a very officious manner.

But first I should like to give credit to the people in the Department of National Revenue who try to help people. There are others who will not turn a hand unless they are trying to work against the taxpayer. I think the Minister of Finance should know about these two cases because they are bad ones. The Minister of National Revenue knows about them, and I appreciate his effort in trying to correct them. The reason I am bringing these matters to the attention of the minister is that I feel there must be some changes to the act.

The first case is that of a widow whose husband died in Saskatchewan. She moved to Alberta. Before leaving Saskatchewan she filled in two income tax forms, one for the federal government and one for the provincial government. She received advice from someone that that was what she had to do, so that is what she did. When she arrived in Alberta, she received word from the department that she should have filled in only one form. So she immediately went to a highly qualified insurance agent in the city in which she lived. He filled in the one form and sent it in on her behalf. Of course, she paid to have that done. Her 1978 assessment was dated June 26, 1979. The provincial tax was assessed at some $258 and the federal tax at $370. Tax deductions were applied, which gave her a credit of $1,618. The payment made on filing left her $781, and the refund interest assessed was $24. The department sent her a cheque for $1,795. She was delighted. She not only received all the money she had sent, but some more, which apparently should not have been paid. Any widow who has no husband to earn for her and who is living on a fixed income would be happy to receive a refund of $1,700 from the Department of National Revenue. That took place on June 26.

On December 7, 1979, she received another letter from the Department of Revenue stating that the provincial tax had been reassessed. The amount had increased from $258 to $982. The letter informed her the federal tax had been reassessed; the amount had increased from $370 to $2,550. The interest arrears were adjusted to $167, and the refund interest recaptured was $24. She now owed the department $3,725. I ask hon. members to bear in mind that these are the same forms which were assessed on June 26. No additional forms had been sent in. The widow was very worried. Instead of having $1,795 to her credit she suddenly found she had a debt. Before receiving that information she received a letter from the department telling her that the computer had made a mistake and had sent her the $1,795 in error. Almost immediately she returned the $1,795 to the department.

On December 7, 1979, she received a reassessment. The department was now charging her $3,725. She was overwhelmed. Then 1980 arrived, and she received another letter stating that the arrears on interest had been adjusted to $92. This raised her total debt to $3,818. Then she received another letter. The department reassessed her situation. The provincial tax was reassessed, which gave her a credit of $218 instead of a debit of $982. The federal tax had been reassessed allowing her a credit of $566 instead of a debit of $2,550, and the interest on arrears was adjusted to $67. A tax deduction of $51 was credited. The department then sent her a bill for $2,915 in place of the bill for $3,800 which she had received a few months before. That, at least, was a saving to her. She did not know how on earth she would obtain all this money, but she was in receipt of the bill, and there was a reduction. But not for very long; she soon received another letter on March 9, 1980. The reassessment was March 7. The letter informed her she was entitled to a credit of $1,665. The interest arrears were readjusted; the department found $5.44 more. The arrears were adjusted again to $12, and then to $7. She now owes $1,275. Does anybody wonder about a woman receiving this kind of bookkeeping?

That was not the end of it. On May 23 she received another reassessment. The provincial tax was reassessed to $159. The federal tax was reassessed to $414. The interest on arrears was adjusted to $59. Then the interest arrears were adjusted again to $8.82, then again to $6.86, and then to $14. This is contained in a statement she received from the department. I am not making these figures up. Imagine a widow receiving a statement like this!

She then made a payment of $1,630, which left her owing $1,938. The payment of $1,630 was all she could scrape up at the time. Of course, the figures were then readjusted and there was added interest on arrears. They are now charging her interest because the computer made a mistake and sent her $1,700 which she had for a month. They are now charging her interest on the $1,700 which were sent to her in error.

Those are the figures to date. We are expecting another reassessment at any time. The interest on arrears adjustment gave her a credit of $208. She now owes the department $121.74. I might add that these last three adjustments, which were in her favour, were carried out with the co-operation of the Minister of National Revenue. I believe he is as disgusted with this situation as I. The bookkeeping is so bad in this case that I have asked the Minister of National Revenue to close it out. Surely we cannot antagonize our citizens with readjustment after readjustment and reassessment after reassessment. It would drive anybody crazy. And all of this is being done to a widow who is trying to be honest. She would not think of cheating anyone out of five cents, let alone the amounts I have been talking about. Now she owes $121.74. I think the men who have been doing this should pay that $121.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: This woman should be told by the government that we will not put up with this kind of bookkeeping.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Then they should be fired.

Mr. Taylor: Yes, then they should be fired. People who do that kind of work do the government no good. The case I have been talking about is an actual one. Hon. members can obtain a copy of the statement from the minister of revenue if they wish.

The other case I would like to deal with has even more far-reaching ramifications. It is something which frightens me. I refer to the "deemed income" contained in the act. The hon. member for Portage-Marquette spoke about this a few minutes ago. I wish to deal with it because I do not think deemed income has any place in our legislation. It is a totalitarian concept which can ruin any farmer in this country, if it is applied in the way this legislation permits. It has been applied in one or two cases and, again, they were settled only through the intervention of the minister of revenue. I am sure he is not prepared to put up with this kind of nonsense. I raise this matter tonight because I think the Minister of Finance should give some serious consideration to taking this deemed income out of the act.

I would like to show hon. members what happened in this particular case. It is one case, but I am fearful that if the circumstances were to occur in many places our farmers could be ruined. There is no defence for it. Blood ran up and down my spine when I heard about this case. I am sure the minister will feel the same way; I certainly hope so.

Here is the story, as briefly as possible. It involves a farmer who had five sons. They were all of mature age, and all of them wanted to be farmers. The father did not have enough money to set his sons up with separate machinery, nor did he have enough money to turn the land over to them. This is because he did not have the money to pay the capital gains tax. This case, if followed through, illustrates what the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills was saying in the House the other day. It has to do with the ill effects of capital gains.

The farmer went to a law firm for advice. They advised him to set up a family corporation. These events took place in 1974 and have been related to quite a few people in this country. They were advised to set up a family corporation and then to custom farm the land in order that the sons could utilize the father's machinery. The father could not afford to put his land into the corporation, since he had to have something to live on. So he did not put his land into the corporation.

They began to custom farm with the father's machinery. The five sons intended gradually to build up an estate and become farmers in their own right. All this occurred in 1974. The farm went in the hole for three years. In one year it lost $50,000, which is not unusual. The best farm in the country can have a bad year. I have seen it happen many times. Of course, they can also have good breaks and earn a lot of money. But in this instance the family suffered bad weather and so on and, as a result, lost $50,000.

Hon. members can imagine how the members of this family felt when suddenly they received a notice from the Department of National Revenue with regard to their 1975, 1976 and 1977 income tax returns. The department said that the family was deemed to have disposed of an intangible property, that being the right to use the farm land. Consequently, the family was deemed to have received proceeds equal to fair market value from the corporation. The fact of the matter was that the corporation had not made any money. However, it was deemed to have used this intangible asset, the land.

As a result, the family was assessed for each of the three sections of land $32,800 for each year, although it had made no money. They had gone into the hole because they had used their machinery in the corporation on what is called intangible property and were deemed to have made so much money that they must pay more than $95,000 in taxes. I can understand why the minister would shake his head, because it is absolutely astounding.

I decided to look at the act in an effort to understand the situation. Section 69 of the act, which is not amended in this legislation, says that except as otherwise provided in the act, where a taxpayer has acquired anything from a person with whom he was not dealing at arm's length at an amount in excess of fair market value thereof at the time he so acquired it, he shall be deemed to have acquired it at that fair market value. One would think that if the farmer was deemed to have earned this income, then surely it would be deemed that there were certain expenses but, oh no, he cannot deem that.

The family appealed the decision. The inspector general said that it could not be deemed that there were any expenses, merely that there was income from a farm which went in the hole.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You're deemed if you do and you're deemed if you don't.

Mr. Taylor: The matter was taken to the appeal board, and it took the position that, because of the way in which the act was written, it had no power to change the situation. One wonders why one would take the time to go before an appeal board, when it cannot change anything. One official of the department said that the tax laws have been gradually changing—and the minister would know about that better than I, because I have not been here for very long—since 1970 with a view to so-called deemed income assessment and that eventually everyone would be assessed accordingly one way or another. I am sure that no government would want to put farmers out of business, but this department official suggested that this was the plan.

The total deemed income for this farm for 1977 was $161,000, without a dollar of offsetting expenses. If income is to be deemed, then anyone who has ever stood on an acre of land, let alone farmed it, would know that there must be expenses in order to earn that much money. The situation was even more aggravating because the farm had lost money in those years.

To make matters worse, the sons had borrowed money to buy machinery. As it was insisted that the loans be private, National Revenue attacked each boy and each boy began to get it in the neck. I have here a letter which one of the boys received.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He was deemed, too.

Mr. Taylor: Yes, he was deemed too. According to this letter, the boy would be charged almost $5,000, even though he was not making any money.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Taylor: I thank hon. members. The matter was appealed, and corrective action had begun when the PC government came into office. However, the matter was not completed, and the case was brought to me after the last election. I referred it to the Minister of National Revenue, and I appreciate the understanding which he showed. Although the minister did not say so, I am sure that he had the same feelings as I, that this situation should not occur.

To make a sad story happy, the department was ordered, I believe, by the minister, to repay all the money which it had taken. This man had almost been ruined. His credit rating at the bank was gone. The money which was deemed as having to be paid almost put him into bankruptcy. He almost became a broken man wondering how he would help his sons to set up their farms. And, all those agonizing years are still to be remembered.

I ask the minister: Is there any place for such legislation in our country? I would like to see deemed income taken out of the act so such situations will never occur in Canada again.

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak about Bill C-54 as it applies to the tax policies which affect, in a rather negative way, housing prices in Canada today. In particular, I hope the minister and his government will explain how MURB tax write-offs, which are a part of this legislation, will help solve the housing prices faced by Canadians who are tenants, many of whom have no choice but to remain as tenants.

I would like to ask what steps the government plans to take in its taxation policy to slow down the spiralling costs of homes and to cool the excessive speculation which is taking place in cities like Vancouver and the other six cities in Canada which have zero vacancy. These speculators are exploiting the current housing situation. Finally, I hope to convince the Minister of Finance and his colleagues that, in view of high housing prices in Canada, which have been created largely by drastically high interest rates, action must be taken very soon to implement a national economic recovery program in the housing sector, a program which we in the NDP believe should be a top priority in economic and social planning in Canada.

Before I proceed with specific questions on Bill C-54 I should like to repeat what we believe must be the basic housing philosophy for Canadians. Instead of leasing from the private sector and being faced with the impossible housing crisis which we have today, we believe that decent, affordable shelter, whether rental or home ownership, is a basic need and right of all Canadians.

This means we must have government planning, and we must have it now. We hope most Canadians will be able to raise families in homes they own.

Contrary to the myth the Conservatives put out today, the NDP does not believe there are no property rights for Canadians. We believe very much that it would be highly desirable for most Canadians to own their own homes, not necessarily large luxurious homes on very large lots but at least homes with three bedrooms and outdoor space costing no more than 25 per cent of an individual's income. Unfortunately, we all know that under the present policies of the Liberal government and those of the former Conservative government, home ownership is only a dream for young people in Canada today.

Who can afford a downpayment, much less the exorbitant monthly payments caused by very high interest rates, which are now up to 15 per cent or 16 per cent on what have to be short-term mortgages these days? In the city I come from it takes not just two wage earners but three wage earners to begin to get enough money together to make the monthly payments. It also means, of course, that those who are making payments on homes will not own them in their lifetimes.

Many people who were trapped into short-term mortgages and AHOP-type mortgage plans have been faced with foreclosures or, in AHOP cases, people sometimes just walked away because they could not afford to keep up payments on renewed mortgages at the increased rates.

The only people in Canada who have any housing security are those lucky enough to own their homes outright. I should like to say that this is not the situation with high income families alone. I spoke about this in the House already today, and I also spent a good deal of time with people from Newfoundland, most of whom own their homes in the little fishing villages of the northern peninsula. It is a shocking indictment of the Liberal government, and in particular the minister responsible for CMHC, that the RRAP home repair program in those communities has been terminated without notice. Many of these people own their small cottages outright, and had repaired them as a hedge against inflation.

What has the government done for home owners, Mr. Chairman? Nothing very much since the last budget, certainly. Will the government intervene in the desperate economic situation that exists in many cities in an effort to de-escalate speculation in housing? Many times in this House I have given examples of what happens in the greater Vancouver region, which I represent. We also know that because of the housing shortage in cities like St. John's, Calgary and Vancouver, prices are escalating far beyond the real value of the homes. Every day I hear about a house bought in the morning and sold in the afternoon with a commission of sometimes as much as $15,000 going to a real estate agent, if the sale is in my city. We have asked the Minister of Finance to do something about this. We hope he will consider it as part of taxation policy. We think it is absolutely essential that steps be taken to de-escalate and control this form of speculation. It seems to us that the sensible course would be to increase the capital gains tax on homes other than primary residences from 50 to 100 per cent. People speculating in housing prices and who are exploiting the situation by reaping huge profits are putting the price of housing up every time there is a resale.

Just this week in the House I asked the minister to do something about this situation. He said that his answer, in the interest of brevity, was "no". He did not give any reason, so I hope he will give one tonight. As far as I can make out, he has not given consideration to some of the views of CMHC officials or those of the minister responsible for CMHC. It is absolutely essential that alternatives be offered so that there can be some control over this immoral speculation in housing.

I also asked the minister responsible for CMHC to assist with land-banking programs in municipalities. He could start today by granting some requests such as those made recently by the mayor of Vancouver and by using some of the funds left in the community service grants program. He has refused to accede to the request of the mayor of Vancouver for $15 million to establish a land-bank fund, saying he had to wait until a real estate conference was held in March before he could make any plans or a decision. Why do we have to wait for advice from real estate interests before getting on with the business of doing what is obviously essential, establishing a land bank or, preferably, a system of leasing public lands in order to provide affordable housing for Canadians?

I should like to present the NDP position on the taxation on capital gains, which we believe must be part of a housing strategy and part of a national economic program in the housing sector. In a research paper put out for our party, the section dealing with taxation of capital gains states that at present capital gains are taxed at only half the rate of other income, which is counter to the principle of tax equity—particularly since only the upper income groups are able to reduce their taxes payable in this way. The paper further states that Canada ranks lowest among OECD countries in its effective rate of tax on wealth.

In addition, of the capital gains reported to government in 1978, 52.8 per cent of the $2.3 billion capital gains reported by individuals was derived from profitable deals in real estate; 67.6 per cent of the $1.6 billion in capital gains reported by corporations was also derived from real estate.

We can see what a vastly important area the capital gains tax covers when it is related to the housing sector. The research paper continues by saying that since principal residences are exempt in any case, and since this system has made the few who can afford to be real estate speculators rich, while beggaring the rest of the citizens, who have increasingly had the doors to home ownership slammed in their faces, the government should change the capital gains tax to include all income derived from the sale of real estate. Of course, we believe very strongly that principal residences must be exempt from this kind of tax.

Mr. Chairman, "no" is not good enough for the people of Canada. It is certainly not good enough for this party. We want an explanation as to why the minister refuses to increase the capital gains tax. We want to know what alternatives, if any, he proposes in order to do something about this immoral speculation, which is putting the cost of housing beyond the reach of all young people today.

There is another taxation policy about which I have spoken many times in the House and which we strongly oppose as part of Bill C-54. I am referring to clause 20(13) of the regulations concerning MURBs and capital cost allowance. We all recognize there is a great need in most Canadian cities for more rental accommodation. No one would deny this. Affordable rental accommodation is especially needed for families, pensioners and other average and low-income people who cannot get into home ownership. They will never be able to be home owners. Statistics show that well over 50 per cent of Canadians will have no choice but to remain tenants for all of their lives. We have to have a realistic solution to the whole problem of affordable housing for tenants. People need housing at 25 per cent of their incomes, not at the 60 per cent level of their incomes, which is what many senior citizens and those on fixed incomes are paying today.

People need decent rental accommodation, not the kind of accommodation which many single people have, not the kind of accommodation people on low incomes in inner cities have, nor the dumpy hotels or rooming houses which are fire traps and infested with cockroaches. This kind of accommodation is a disgrace in a country like Canada. We should not put funds into tax write-offs, as proposed under the MURB system included in the minister's budget this year. We want the building of affordable rental accommodation. This can only be done through the kinds of non-profit programs which are essential and which should be supported by the federal government, by municipalities and provinces as well.

Instead, the federal government introduced MURBs, a direct response to real estate interests, developers and investors who want to make a quick buck out of the housing crisis. I want to quote from an article by Michael Valpy on this question. I know his research is very good because we helped him out ourselves. He said:

> At any rate, we got MURBs. MURBs are multiple-unit residential buildings (apartment buildings, in short) which wealthy people put up money to build.
> Here is a simple definition of how they work: Wealthy people put up money to build MURBs because of a tax provision that allows them to write off a percentage of the total costs of the building—not just the amount of money they invest in it—against their income.

That is the total cost of the building. The article continues:

> Thus a wealthy doctor or lawyer making $100,000 a year decides to build a $500,000 MURB. He invests a bit of his own and borrows the rest. Under the MURB provisions, he can write off four per cent of the total cost—or $25,000—each year against his income. Meaning he will only pay income tax on 75 per cent of what he earns.
> At the same time, the building appreciates in value, particularly if it is a high-rent, or luxury, building (which most MURBs are).

They are not affordable housing for the average or low-income people. Mr. Valpy's article continues:

> Then after a few years, the wealthy doctor or lawyer sells the MURB at a substantial profit (which a lot of them do), having made a good deal on both their investments and their tax shelters.
> In his budget speech, Mr. MacEachen called MURBs 'an important new initiative' as an 'incentive for the construction' of rental housing.

I wonder how he feels about it today.

Mr. Knowles: His face is red.

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Valpy goes on to say:

> In fact, it is hard to find evidence that MURBs have done anything more than benefit the well-to-do—those who build them and those who live in them. Few MURBs have been built for family housing or low-income housing. Family housing was demolished in Vancouver's Grandview district to make way for single and couple-occupancy apartments, many of them MURB-financed.
> Canada's foremost housing economist, Frank Clayton of Toronto, believes that the budget's MURB provision will do little to alleviate the shortage. The disincentives of high interest rates and rent controls will probably counteract the MURB dangled carrot.

In fact, they have. I understand very few investors are taking advantage of this program because the interest rates are so high. Mr. Valpy goes on to say:

In the face of those construction disincentives, co-operative and non-profit housing ventures appear a better vehicle but there was no help in the budget for them.

We find this is one of the main complaints we have about this bill being discussed in committee tonight.

In conclusion, we believe that to counteract the present problems a plan for an economic recovery in the housing field must include a lowering of interest rates so that construction of rental accommodation is stimulated and the cost of financing individual home ownership comes down into the real world. We want to revitalize CMHC, with direct lending powers to the public. We also want a greater emphasis by CMHC on non-profit and co-operative housing projects. I have asked the minister, who is sitting here tonight, why he cannot approach the banks to require them to invest the enormous profits they have made from high interest rates in a lending portfolio. This would bring down mortgage rates, and it could provide mortgage assistance to those Canadians earning under $35,000.

We also want restoration of the community services contribution program. This is very important if municipalities are to service land and buy up and preserve land for affordable housing. We think the government should allocate $250 million to this program. Of course, we believe there must be a direct leasing of serviced lots for housing on Crown lands. We believe that mortgage finance assistance is needed for low-income and average-income families. A much tougher capital gains tax is needed to end speculation in land, which causes even further housing price increases.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Chairman, it is a privilege for me to speak about Bill C-54. The basic problems which exist because of the Income Tax Act are such that they are having an effect on the economy, an effect on the small businessman and an effect on farmers, all of which are counterproductive. This is the same type of effect government policy has on the oil industry today. In Saskatchewan, the oil industry is flat on its back, and I mean it is flat on its back. There are hundreds of people out of work. Yet, the Minister of Employment and Immigration comes to Saskatchewan and announces $4 million of taxpayers' money is to be allocated to give people jobs to provide service which is not needed.

As I have only one minute, I will deal with the topic of capital gains taxes as they apply to farms. The minister and the government told farmers the valuation day would be changed from December 31, 1971, to 1974. To date this has not been done. Many farmers are having very serious problems transferring their farms from one generation to another because of the capital gains provision.

This government, it seems, is saying that that is not its concern.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

REGULATORY REFORM—TASK FORCE REPORT—STATUS OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, on January 19 I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) for a statement with regard to what had been done about the special task force report on regulatory reform. For six months a small group of members of Parliament, on a non-partisan basis, together with an excellent staff, worked extremely hard to prepare a report that would aid the government in attempting to get a handle on those who make regulations, the process of making regulations and other possibilities to simplify the process and eliminate some of the difficulties of the private sector in dealing with bureaucrats.

What kind of answer did I get? I got an answer that answered nothing. The President of the Treasury Board said, among other things, that the report was not gathering dust, that the government was looking it over and that in the area of reform of regulatory process things were being considered. I must say it was a very equivocal answer. He said, in effect, that it is being considered.

I rise to speak tonight because the guts of the report, the important recommendations, were not even referred to in the minister's answer. I might add that I looked very diligently at his speech in Toronto last Thursday to the advisory committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and again there was a vast wasteland of silence on the most important recommendation of the report. That is why I rise to expand on the question and hopefully to get specific information, not baffle-gab or platitudes signifying promises but no commitment from the government.

I must say that in the field of regulations and reform, the enemy is not the government nor those with ministerial responsibilities, not the Liberals, Progressive Conservatives or the NDP, but the bureaucratic system itself, the mandarins with the power to delay, the bureaucrats with the ability to mislead and persuade otherwise and a cobwebbed, built-in inertia that frustrates all members of Parliament.

My question is in relation to the recommendations in the report dealing with a special parliamentary committee to oversee the work of reform in the regulatory process. Recommendations Nos. 18 and 19 read as follows:

We recommend that a special committee on government regulation be established to function until required parliamentary reforms are implemented. We recommend that the special committee on government regulation monitor the government's process in implementing regulatory reform and oversee the regulatory activities and processes of federal departments and agencies.

That is the guts of the report, a committee on a non-partisan basis to call before it bureaucrats to explain their actions, not two years down the road as is the case with public accounts, but now, immediately, a committee not only to watchdog the bureaucrats but also to serve as a burr under a minister's saddle to ensure that things get done, not delayed, waylaid or forgotten. Such a committee also serves the very useful purpose of giving the private sector a place to complain about arrogant decisions by bureaucrats. As it now stands, those who make judgments judge themselves. Is it not about time Parliament had just a little bit of its power to control government returned and asked in a proper forum for detailed answers to questions involving the control of the civil service in its regulatory functions?

The minister's answer did not deal with this vital recommendation of the report. I can only say that if the government intends to keep the whole process of regulatory reform within the secret cocoon of the minister's office and if it is this government's intention to hide the facts from Parliament and to attempt the clean-up in privacy without parliamentary authority and responsibility being considered, then it surely is another black mark on an already tarnished government that prefers to do in secret that which should be done publicly in the parliamentary tradition.

May I have a response to the specific question as to the government's intention with respect to an open policy and allowing parliamentary sunlight into the process, or, as implied by the silence of the President of the Treasury Board, is the process to be carried on secretly and subject to the inertia of the bureaucrats?

Parliament needs answers. Will the government immediately set up such a parliamentary committee, as the report suggests? Will the government allow Parliament to act as a watchdog, as it should? Those are the questions; may I have answers?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I just outline at the beginning the hon. member's concerns because I understand he was a member of the task force on regulatory reform. The minister wants to point out that on January 9, which was only two and a half weeks after the report of the committee was tabled, he wrote to his cabinet colleagues identifying a number of specific initiatives in the regulatory field which he suggested be the government's focus for reform during the next 18 months. His role is going to be co-ordinator for the government in order to encourage ministers and their officials to consider regulatory change and to support them in their efforts.

The first aspect of his work program, housecleaning of existing legislation and regulations, is an area in which the minister hopes rapid progress can be made. The first intent is to eliminate unused and ineffective legislation. A bill is now being prepared to repeal obsolete federal legislation, a bill the minister expects to be able to introduce in the near future. He further urges his colleagues to review and to put forward proposals for legislative rationalization.

The second and very important aspect of our work program, improving the process of regulation, is developed in our work program by a number of specific projects, including looking at the feasibility of an advance notice system, such as a regulatory agenda, applying the principles underlying the SEIA program whenever new regulations are being proposed, finding ways in which federal departments and agencies can improve their evaluation of regulatory programs within the present program evaluation procedures, etc. The consensus process and self-regulation as alternatives to regulation, placing greater emphasis on service to the public and on the relationships between government and its clientele, and implementing proposals already approved by cabinet and designed to reduce the paper burden imposed by federal requirements for records retention are also included.

The special committee placed considerable emphasis on the role of Parliament in the regulatory process. As my colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), indicated in the House earlier this month, parliamentary reform is viewed by the government as a very important matter, and work on proposals that might be placed before members is now under way. The advice and suggestions of the special committee are being examined very closely, and I expect as well that every member of Parliament will want at some time to review the ideas presented.

With respect to the third aspect of our work program, selective deregulation, the government will be aided by the final recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada's report, now expected in late spring. Pending receipt of the council's recommendations, I believe there is much that can be done to improve the regulatory process.

In conclusion, I believe the government has moved with great rapidity to follow up on the special advice of the committee on regulatory reform. I hope I can look forward to continuing support from both sides of this House in the implementation of these initiatives. Thank you.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INVESTMENT IN FOREIGN SHIPPING GROUP

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on January 15, 1981, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to explain the involvement of the Canadian National Railways with the CAST shipping group. In 1980 the minister revealed that the CNR, with the approval and concurrence of the Government of Canada, invested $50 million in the CAST group.

CAST operates a north Atlantic container fleet and a container terminal at the port of Montreal. These Canadian public funds will be used by CAST to assist in financing the construction of six new container ships, to expand the Canadian container terminal in Montreal and to acquire equipment and services related to the transporting of containerized cargo. According to the Montreal Gazette the CAST group, with the assistance of the CNR, will double its vessel capacity and its terminal facilities at the port of Montreal.

My general concern is that CNR's involvement with the CAST shipping group may well have an adverse effect on Atlantic ports, particularly the ports of Halifax and Saint John, and yet contribute very little to the Canadian economy or to marine transportation in Canada.

Let me point out some special concerns which may arise from CNR's direct involvement in CAST operations in the port of Montreal. First of all, let us consider the ownership of CAST. CAST is operated by Euro-Canadian Shipholdings Limited of Bermuda. Sixty-one per cent of the shares of that company are held by Dolphin Investments Limited, and that company is under the effective control of Frank Narby, a Canadian residing in Europe. Only 18 per cent of the shares of Euro-Canadian Shipholdings Limited are owned by CNR, leaving the operation of CAST in the hands of foreign persons.

The construction of the six container ships involved in the expansion program will take place in Yugoslavia and South Korea at an expenditure of approximately $180 million, so that this expenditure will not result in any jobs for Canadians or any real advantage to the Canadian economy.

An additional point is that the doubling of the container traffic on the North American routes is not anticipated over the next three or four years of CAST's expansion, so that in order to live up to its new capacity, CAST will have to rob traffic from other container carriers, in particular the container carriers which serve the ports of Halifax and Saint John and go on to serve other ports on the Atlantic coast.

My major concern is the welfare of the port of Halifax. Marine transportation is a viable and important industry in the province of Nova Scotia, providing millions of dollars in supplies and services and providing employment for a large number of persons. It is said that in the Halifax area one out of seven jobs can be attributed to marine transportation and to the operation of the port of Halifax. The port of Halifax, in terms of its magnitude of operation, handled in 1979, 2.1 million tonnes of cargo, and this would involve, in terms of container traffic, approximately 200,000 containers. Container traffic was down 7 per cent in 1980, although the port manager hopes it will increase in 1981.

In addition to container cargo, the port of Halifax handles a large amount of general cargo. The auto port operates a very effective and efficient system for transporting automobiles. In 1980 it handled approximately 79,000 vehicles. The port of Montreal in the last completed year, 1980, experienced an 11 per cent increase in container traffic. That would lead one to conclude that perhaps the port of Montreal is getting some special advantages in the container field.

What we want on the east coast and what we want for the port of Halifax is fair treatment from the government departments and agencies involved in marine transportation. We have in Halifax a new container facility coming on stream in 1982. That is the Fairview Cove container pier, and we look forward to a substantial increase in the container traffic in order to utilize the facilities which will be available at that pier. That kind of expansion cannot take place if we do not get fair treatment from the Canadian National Railways, which is the major source and recourse for land traffic from the container pier facility now in place in the port of Halifax and which will be the land transportation source for the new Fairview Cove container pier.

We believe the CNR has taken a dangerous step in its direct involvement with the CAST operation, and we believe that such a step should not be taken without a full and public inquiry and review being carried out on the relationship of CNR and international marine transportation corporations. There is a great danger that conflict of interest will occur and that CNR might be inclined to favour operators such as CAST over operators who have served ports like Halifax and Saint John.

In addition, there is the danger that difficulties will develop with the good relations which now exist between the east coast Canadian ports and the ports on the east coast of the United States.

Other factors could be mentioned, particularly the benefits received by the port of Montreal through the Government of Canada in relation to ice-breaking activities, which amount to millions and millions of dollars annually. So, we must be very careful in dealing and tampering with the subtle fabric of our marine transportation system.

It is my concern and interest to bring to the attention of the House the particular involvement of the CNR with the CAST shipping group and to inquire of the minister how he explains this involvement. I ask for his assurance that it will not have an adverse effect upon the port of Halifax and other east coast ports.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for his interest in and commitment to the port of Halifax, but the question he posed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) really deals with the rationale behind CAST's plans for expansion and CN's involvement in this venture. It does not concern the development of the harbour of Montreal or the harbour of Halifax.

According to Mr. Frank Narby, the head of the CAST group, CAST expects the competition for container traffic on the north Atlantic to be greatly intensified in the coming years. By using bigger ships burning low-grade bunker oil and offering door-to-door service at attractive prices, CAST expects to meet the competition and increase its share of the market. CAST's unique service, combined with its experienced mangagement, puts it in a very strong competitive position.

Mr. Speaker, CAST intends to expand its container transport operations by increasing exports of U.S. coal, and as was mentioned by the hon. member, not six but eight freighters for bulk products transportation have been bought for that purpose, and the Quebec City harbour will become a transfer port for this coal.

[English]

CN's participation in the CAST group in the past has provided a healthy return on its investment. It has also given CN a considerable share of Canada's container traffic—I suppose Halifax has benefited from it—and is helping CN to develop into a dynamic and fully integrated transportation company. Its recent investments are fully expected to reinforce this position.

[Translation]

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the CAST expansion project will also mean direct and indirect benefits for the port of Montreal. The hon. member seems to be complaining, but when it suits the port of Halifax, of course it does not suit the port of Montreal and vice versa. In this instance this can help the port of Montreal harbour, and a study by the National Harbours Commission has estimated the impact to be some $56.6 million. The first tangible result, of course, will be the lease of 22 acres of land in the eastern part of the port of Montreal.

[English]

So, if CN through its investment in CAST is contributing to shipbuilding employment in some other countries, it is also clearly creating job opportunities in Canada.

The government is concerned about this problem. It has requested CN to report back every six months on the status of its involvement so as to keep the matter under continuous review.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION—CANADIAN POSITION ON INFANT FORMULA FOR THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, recently I asked a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) concerning Canada's preference for mere recommendations as opposed to regulations in its work at the World Health Organization on an international code of marketing of breast milk substitutes.

● (2220)

My concern was, and is, that Canada is abandoning whatever pretence it has to friendship with the peoples of developing countries and is becoming a mouthpiece for the interests and the ethos of multinational food corporations. The minister's assurances in the House that she is as concerned about Third World children as she is about Canadian children and that the government is as committed to fighting poverty overseas as it is here in Canada would be humorous, if they were not also frightening. I say this considering the lethargy which the minister has displayed in doing anything other than posturing about the recommendations of the Commission on the Year of the Child here in Canada.

Her answer subsequently to me in a letter takes the tack of claiming that the federal government must argue for recommendations only because to argue for regulations would impinge on provincial jurisdiction. This is a complete abdication of Canada's international responsibilities as a nation. It is a shameful cop-out.

Babies the world over are dying; this is the reality of the matter. They are dying because of the misplaced trust which our civilization puts in technological means over and above the natural way which is available to mothers, regardless of their economic status and regardless of their water supply, and is also because of the further corruption of this over-emphasis on professional care by the global profit-seeking of multinational corporations.

Other industrialized countries such as Sweden and Switzerland have been willing to support a strong code. Why not Canada? Is it because we, too, have Third World conditions in our own backyard which give rise to exploitation? If so, we would therefore have to stand up to the multinationals here, as well as in Burma or Nigeria, were we to adopt a strict code. No doubt this is part of it. That leads me to the unhappy conclusion that contrary to the minister's usual self-righteous effusions, we do not have just a case of callousness here but also a case of cowardice.

When I first asked this question, I did so because at the time the World Health Assembly executive was meeting in Geneva to formulate policy recommendations to be made to the meeting of the 34th assembly of the World Health Organization in May of 1981. In the House, and in a subsequent letter, the minister claimed, and rightly so—at least in terms of chronology—that she could not tell me exactly what the latest developments were with regard to Canada's position. She could not tell me whether or not it was, in fact, to be changed from supporting recommendations to supporting regulations.

Given that the meeting in Geneva ends tomorrow and that therefore, presumably, this matter has been discussed in Geneva, I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Frith) in addition to the prepared statement he no doubt has ready to read to us might also be able to comment on whether or not the lamentable position of Canada in this regard has been changed and whether or not, as a result of representations made to the government, the health department took a different stand in Geneva and Canadians might now have cause to feel that once again they are on the side of mothers and children in the Third World and not on the side of corporations like Nestlé.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should begin my response to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) by pointing out to him that the government is far from being a defender of large multinationals. Contrary to the way he feels that the minister has answered his question previously in the House, in my view the minister has consistently stated that her viewpoint and that of the department is that breast feeding is the superior method, if you will, of feeding children. Her position has never been one of defending the widespread use of infant formulation in the Third World.

Notwithstanding that, it is a fact of life that infant formulas have become a way of life in too many Third World countries. Indeed, as the hon. member points out, it has created some problems. From the standpoint of the children's health particularly, largely because of the need for a source of potable water to mix with the infant formula, a number of children become quite sick. I expect there could probably be a good case made that many babies have died as a result of the use of infant formulas in the Third World.

The World Health Organization executive board is meeting this week in Geneva, and it hopes to make a recommendation or a regulation with respect to a code which will be applied to the use of different formulations in the Third World. If a decision is reached, then the matter should be ratified by the World Health Assembly some time in 1981.

The way in which United Nations organizations such as the World Health Organization establish their groups and go about their discussions, one might argue that it should be a registered art form. It is quite clear to me that the Canadian delegation has been consistent in its attempts to come up with a recommendation which will be adopted by the widest number of countries in the world. This is the position taken by the government, that it take the form of a recommendation which carries significant moral and political weight and which constitutes the judgment of the collective membership of the organization.

What is being contemplated is a draft recommendation in very precise terms so as to avoid controversy at the time of implementation, thereby allowing it to be put into effect immediately in the greatest number of countries possible. I believe that this is a goal which is shared by both sides of this House. This recommendation will be consistent with the promotion of the health of all children and will be acceptable to the governments of the provinces, the people of Canada and the Government of Canada.

That in a nutshell is the position taken by the Canadian government at Geneva this week. I thope it will lead to the implementation of a code which will decrease the number of deaths which occur as the result of the use of infant formulations in the Third World.

NATURAL RESOURCES

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON RESOURCE OWNERSHIP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing importance. Last weekend in Bonnyville, Alberta, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) said, "Provinces don't own resources like you own your home . . . and provinces don't own the resources the way Libya and Saudi Arabia own theirs."

In view of this statement I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be required to make a statement on motions immediately, clarifying his new definition of resource ownership, which is clearly contrary to the constitutional pledge recognizing that natural resources belong to the provinces as set out in sections 92 and 109 of the British North America Act.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXCISE TAX ON NATURAL GAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The excise tax on natural gas will increase the cost of heat and fertilizer to farmers, thereby increasing the cost of food to all consumers. This price increase will find its way into almost every segment of Canadian industry, increasing unemployment and inflation. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House urges the government to eliminate the excise tax on natural gas from its national energy policy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES AID TO EL SALVADOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering the increasing number of violent deaths in El Salvador caused by the current policies of the governing junta, and considering recent increases in United States military aid to El Salvador, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That when the Secretary of State for External Affairs meets with General Haig in Washington this week he seeks a commitment from the American government to live up to its previously-established commitment to stop shipping lethal arms to El Salvador or involving itself in the internal affairs of any other nation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EDUCATION

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION FINANCING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The cabinet social development committee apparently has before it a proposal to cut some $1.5 billion from the $3 billion the federal government transfers to the provinces under the established programs financing arrangement to help pay the operating costs of post-secondary education institutions across Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That the government launch, in concert with the provinces, the universities and colleges, a full-fledged review of post-secondary education financing in Canada before it introduces drastic changes in the education component of the established programs financing arrangement.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

S.O. 43

IRAN—RESUMPTION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that many Canadian firms and many Canadian citizens have lost considerable amounts of money and assets as a result of political unrest in Iran, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That if and when the Canadian government decides to resume diplomatic and economic ties with Iran, the settlement of these accounts be one prerequisite to the resumption of our relations with this country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RIGHT OF EMPLOYEES TO STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Treasury Board has been rapped on the knuckles by the Public Service Staff Relations Board for attempting unilaterally to designate 1,800 of the 2,100 air traffic controllers as essential to the safety and security of the public, thereby in effect depriving them of the right to strike, despite the fact that under section 79 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act it is not Treasury Board but the Public Service Staff Relations Board which is empowered to make decisions regarding the designation of employees. Since this is only one of the many actions taken against public servants by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), I move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That this House condemns this dangerous trend of the government to encroach upon the authority of its own agencies; that this House condemns the federal government for attempting to remove the right to strike from public servants; that this House condemns the President of the Treasury Board for his continuous harassment of public servants at chambers of commerce meetings and through the media; and that this House recommends that the President of the Treasury Board seek to promote good will with government employees by initiating open and frank discussions with union leaders and by negotiating in good faith.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Having received protests from all over Simcoe county, I wish to prevail upon the government to reinstate the beneficial community services contribution program which permits municipalities to undertake necessary public works projects, alleviating the tax burden on local taxpayers. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the government reconsider its decision to terminate the community services contribution program and take the necessary steps to implement a lengthy continuation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is costing Canadian taxpayers $12 million daily to import foreign oil, an increase of $6 million daily since January, 1980, which is creating jobs and great wealth in OPEC countries. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House instruct the government to withdraw its energy policy, which is counterproductive to Canada's becoming energy self-sufficient, and that it revert to the energy policy outlined in the PC budget, which would make Canada self-sufficient, encourage investment in Canada, keep Canadian oil companies from moving to the United States and put a halt to the exodus of millions of dollars leaving the country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

PROTECTION FOR RAILWAY PENSIONERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, particularly for retired railway workers. In view of the fact that any increase under the pension plan administered by the Canadian National Railways to its pensioners is administered on an ad hoc basis and in an irregular fashion, offering the least protection to pensioners who retired before 1973; in view of the fact that pensioners under the plan administered by the Canadian Pacific Railway received even less assistance than those under the CNR plan; and in view of the fact that few of the worth-while recommendations first enunciated four years ago in the Hall report have been implemented, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House urge the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour to contact officials of the CNR and CPR, and also urge those unions which represent retired railway workers to lobby aggressively on their behalf, with the over-all purpose of ensuring more adequate protection for those pensioners who have little protection from the ravages imposed by an ever-increasing cost of living.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POLICING SERVICES IN PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the senior assistant deputy minister in the Solicitor General's department last week threatened the eight provincial governments with RCMP contracts that unless the provinces agreed to a contract with the federal government the government would go ahead and charge the new rates anyway; and in view of the fact that these rates represent an increase of over 100 per cent in some cases and are an intolerable raid on provincial and municipal treasuries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar):

That this House urge the Solicitor General to end his policy of confrontation tactics with the provinces on RCMP contract negotiations, make a far more equitable proposal to the provinces and municipalities on costs, and particularly on accountability of the RCMP to the provincial attorneys general, and stop taking actions which may very well threaten the break-up of the RCMP in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TRANSFERS AND EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which might find agreement on all sides of the House. The present agreement between the federal government and the provinces with regard to equalization expires on March 31, 1982. The agreement must be written and it is essential that Parliament be involved in this process. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House does direct the President of the Privy Council to create a task force of seven members of Parliament to investigate on behalf of this House all transfers and equalization arrangements between the federal government, the provinces and the territories, so that an equitable arrangement for sharing revenue can be determined without confrontation prior to the expiry date of the existing agreement.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ALLEGED ADVERSE EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Mr. Len. Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The economic situation in Canada is a very serious one at this time, as the minister knows. Will the minister take the necessary steps to give oil production first priority so that the economic picture in Canada may be strengthened? The minister's policies are driving out the industry—oil rigs, expertise and capital—to the United States. Is the minister aware that his policy is having an adverse effect on the whole economy of Canada, turning us into a nation which is begging for oil rather than a leading nation in the industry?

● (1415)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as of January 20 there were in Canada 532 active rigs compared to 496 on January 22, 1980, one year ago. In effect, drilling activity has been maintained at an appreciably higher level than during the same period in 1980. The petroleum industry is a very fundamental industry. The position of the government is stated in the Speech from the Throne and in "The National Energy Program", and is that the energy sector should be the motor or main engine of the Canadian economy in the 1980s. This is the position of the government, and that is why we have put forward an energy program which will ensure that this industry remains a leader in progress in Canada.

Mr. Gustafson: Madam Speaker, the minister continues to deny that oil rigs are leaving and that the industry in western Canada is being seriously affected by government policy. Yet it was stated in the news today that Saskoil is preparing to explore in Williston, North Dakota. Oil rigs are lining up at the border, yet the minister continues to deny the fact in the House. Will the minister take the necessary steps to redirect Canada's energy policy and see that the economic development of the nation does not become a foreign aid program of the United States?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the hon. member contends that oil rigs are leaving the country. As of the last count by Oilweek magazine, 36 more rigs are in operation in Canada at this time than at this time last year. Thirty-six is the difference between 532 and 496. So the gloom and doom picture which the hon. member is trying to paint does not seem to be supported by the facts.

Mr. Gustafson: Madam Speaker, the minister is aware of the fact that Canada has one of the finest oil fleets in the world, that many rigs have been built in the last year and that seven rigs have left the Estevan area alone. The picture is the same all across western Canada. Does the minister want to turn towns in Saskatchewan, such as Estevan, Weyburn and Lloydminster, into ghost towns through the economic direction he is imposing on this country?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the executive director of the oilwell drilling association stated last October, well before the budget and well before the National Energy Program, that it expected a 30 per cent reduction in wells being drilled in 1981.

Mr. Clark: He saw you coming.

Mr. Lalonde: That projection was completely independent of the influence of the budget, and based on an expected surplus in natural gas in the country at this time. The National Energy Program foresees a very substantial increase in revenue going to the industry and to the government of Saskatchewan over the next four years. If the hon. member cares to check the figures, he will find that the amount of money going to the government of Saskatchewan and to the industry under the energy program over the next four years is substantially higher than the last four years. There will be plenty of money for the industry to do the job it must do.

● (1420)

Finally, I should like to say that I had a very worth-while, fruitful and constructive meeting with my colleague, the Saskatchewan minister of energy two days ago.

An hon. Member: He told you to leave the province.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—FINANCING OF PROJECT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, if it is true that figures do not lie, there must be some liars around who can figure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: What the minister has just said certainly does not correspond with the true situation in western Canada. My question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Madam Speaker, and it is in reference to some comments attributed to him yesterday by the press which he apparently made outside the House with respect to the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline. The minister is quoted as saying that the United States administration is completely committed to the $22 billion project. The minister draws his conclusion from a telephone call he received from the new energy secretary in Washington, who said there is strong support for the pipeline in the new administration. Naturally, we on this side of the House would have liked—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Oberle: My question to the minister, therefore, is whether it is the intention of the new administration in Washington to issue something that comes closer to the ironclad guarantees that the minister was so anxious about earlier, or was it that the energy secretary called with respect to the new administration's intention to renegotiate and review the pipeline treaty that we have with the United States?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is misinformed. Secretary Edwards did not call; I called Secretary Edwards to congratulate him on his appointment and to assure him of the co-operation of the Government of Canada with the government of the United States in the energy field. I must say we had a very worth-while and fruitful discussion over the phone.

Mr. Clark: Did he thank you for the rigs?

Mr. Lalonde: We agreed that we should meet eventually, either in Ottawa or in Washington, to pursue further a number of files that are currently active between Canada and the United States in the energy field.

I raised with the energy secretary the question of the Alaska gas pipeline as one to which this government attaches a very high priority. He confirmed that, as far as the Reagan administration is concerned, this pipeline is also of the highest priority and that he will make sure that all the commitments given by Congress under the previous administration and by the previous administration will be fully implemented.

Mr. Nielsen: Have you got that in writing?

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. We know that the previous commitments were of a more minimum standard rather than the ironclad guarantees that the minister had previously insisted upon.

I apologize to the minister. I do not know; I am only taking my information from the press and I did not know who initiated the phone call.

Is it the intention of the minister now to insist on having from the administration certain guarantees in writing commensurate with the pipeline agreement or pipeline treaty that we have with the United States? Is he going to insist that these guarantees be issued in writing?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the hon. member arrives very late in the game indeed. There have been very, very significant developments in the last six months between the parties concerned. The Northern Pipeline Agency, which is responsible for the construction of the pipeline, has been in regular contact and discussion with the parties concerned in the United States, the private sector as well as the energy department. Those discussions indicate that a great deal of progress has been accomplished in the full implementation of this project. There is no need for additional guarantees; the project is proceeding extremely well.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSION ENTITLEMENT OF RCAF VETERAN

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. I would appreciate it if the Minister of National Health and Welfare would listen as well, but I see she has left the chamber for a moment.

Mr. Bjarnie Paulson, an RCAF veteran of the Korean war, suffered tragically for 15 years from cancer all over his body which he attributes to his participation in the clean-up operation at Chalk River in 1958. Mr. Paulson has previously been denied a veteran's pension. Further, he was sworn to secrecy upon his retirement from the forces, and records, even to admitting his presence at Chalk River at that time, apparently have disappeared or have been expunged. As if multiple cancer were not enough, Mr. Paulson as well has had a long and bitter fight with the pension board.

Since his application for pension entitlement is now currently before the board, will the minister assure the House that this time his application will be treated promptly, thoroughly and compassionately?

● (1425)

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, we always try to show compassion and fairness on questions of veterans' pensions. However, I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that the pension commission is an independent body. It is very seldom that we get involved, politically or otherwise. Nevertheless, I will take this subject to the president of the pension commission to make sure that everything is being done to treat this veteran with all the fairness and compassion he deserves.

HEALTH AND SAFETY

PROTECTION OF WORKERS EXPOSED TO RADIATION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. There were an estimated 600 military and non-military personnel involved in the 1952 and 1958 Chalk River accident clean-up operations. The Department of Veterans Affairs has released the names of 50 RCAF members involved. Of eight known civil defence workers who were participating in the clean-up, four have cancer, yet so far Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has refused to release any records of the personnel working at Chalk River at the time of the accident.

Since medical science is only now beginning to learn about the serious effects of long-term, low-level alpha radiation, will the minister of health insist that AECL turn over all pertinent records to the Department of National Health and Welfare? Will the minister instruct her department to begin a long-term medical study of all those people who were involved in Chalk River at that time, not only to protect them but to protect today's uranium miners and reactor station workers?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am not sure that the procedure proposed by the hon. member with regard to the Chalk River workers and the confidentiality of their medical records is quite appropriate. But I will discuss the matter with my officials and make sure that, if an epidemiological study is required on the workers, it will be done either by the institutions making the request or by contract.

[English]

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, I understand the minister's concerns about the confidentiality of the medical records. I think permission could be given by those affected if we knew their names. I am not asking for the records to be released to the public but only to the minister's own department.

NUCLEAR DEVELOPMENT

CALL FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, yesterday in the province of Ontario there was a major announcement concerning the expansion of nuclear energy in Canada. Since at the moment there is no safe way known to dispose of nuclear waste, and since it is estimated that Ontario has an overcapacity of some 4,000 megawatts expected to last until the year 2000, will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—who is busily engaged now—reconsider his internal departmental review of the whole nuclear question and instead recommend a full public inquiry, so that if Canadians are going to be committed to a radioactive future, at least they will have the opportunity to understand why?

Miss MacDonald: You should have stuck with a good government.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member that there are many studies and royal commissions under way in the various provinces. Saskatchewan had one, Ontario also conducted studies as well as British Columbia, and the Canadian government also published a number of documents on this matter. We are in fact doing an internal review of this question and I intend to make public as soon as possible the studies and the documents available to allow the public to react and to give us feedback on the various questions studied within my department. So I can assure the hon. member that the public in general and those concerned will have the opportunity to make their views known to the government and to the public if they so wish, and it is not my intention to keep secret, hidden or confidential the studies prepared in my department.

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AFFIDAVIT

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women. On Monday the minister told the House that he was prepared to ask the members of the executive committee of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women for a copy of an affidavit to which he had referred and upon which he placed very considerable reliance in the position he has taken in the conflict between him and Doris Anderson. Has he now obtained that affidavit and is he prepared to table it? If not, is it because the affidavit will not bear out the charges he has made?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have written to the members of the executive committee asking their permission to submit that affidavit. I have not yet received a reply.

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, the minister was certain that the executive committee minutes misrepresented the facts, even though he admitted he had not read those minutes. In light of the ongoing discussions, is he now willing to offer an apology to Miss Shelley-Ann Clark, the secretary, for slurring her professional competence, or is he going to hide under the immunity offered by this House?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I am not hiding behind any immunity. I simply go on the statement I made, which is that the five members who were party to that meeting have signed an affidavit suggesting that the minutes are not accurate. That is all I reported to this House; I made no further comment. I have not read the minutes. I still stand by that statement. If the members of the executive committee are prepared to release that affidavit and make it public, that is entirely their choice and decision to make. I abide by my statement, which is that I have requested them to do so.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

TESTING OF CHEMICAL DEFOLIANT AT CFB GAGETOWN

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The minister has indicated that 11 military and two civilian personnel were involved in the use of Agent Orange in the 1966 defoliation operation at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown and that he is prepared to co-operate with the New Brunswick minister of health in dealing with the matter. For further clarity, I would like to ask the minister this. Has the minister initiated measures to identify all persons, military and civilian, who may have been exposed to a health hazard as a result of the use of Agent Orange or any other toxic substance at CFB Gagetown in 1966 or since then? Is he prepared to offer remedial assistance to anyone who establishes that he or she has been injured as a result of such testing?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I can well understand the concern of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, considering that Gagetown is in his riding. He may not be concerned about the spraying action which took place, but rather about the way the question was raised by two NDP members, which needlessly and without reason alarmed the population in that area. I can assure the hon. member for York-Sunbury that at the moment there is no reason to believe there is any health hazard as a result of that spraying. I can further assure the hon. member of full collaboration of myself, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the New Brunswick health minister. As far as identifying those who may have actually been exposed to this spraying is concerned, we are prepared to contact them to see what happened and have a full inquiry.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

CARRIAGE BY RAIL—POSSIBLE LEGISLATION TO LIMIT LIABILITY

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): I thank the minister for his answer. I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport on a related matter, the transportation of dangerous substances. I apologize for having been unable to give him notice. Has the minister received a request from Canadian National Railways or CP Rail seeking legislation to limit the liability of these multimillion dollar corporations for any damage suffered by Canadians as third parties resulting from the transportation of dangerous goods? What is the limit being sought, and what is the minister's response to this inquiry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any formal request to that effect. I remember speaking with the president of CN about the fact that they now carry a very high level of insurance for material such as the hon. member has in mind. The railways are insured. As to whether they have asked for a limitation of liability, I will look into that and give the hon. member an answer at the earliest opportunity.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PROTECTION OF URANIUM MINERS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Early last week three of my NDP colleagues and myself met with officials of the United Steelworkers and some 50 uranium miners at Elliot Lake, Ontario. These workers are angry. They told us, and we agree, that the government's referencing last May of Ontario bill 70 into part IV of the Canada Labour Code has been a total bungle, a botch-up. Uranium miners in Elliot Lake and throughout Canada are now left surrounded and jeopardized by a jurisdictional no man's land which leaves them entirely without protection from the very real and hazardous dangers of that industry.

What action is now being taken to protect the safety and health of these miners, as promised by the Minister of Justice in reply to the hon. member for Brant on December 16 of last year?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I assure him that the reports he has received are not accurate. The uranium mines are well protected by the regulations and the incorporation through reference of the Ontario regulations. I want to say to the hon. member that the jurisdictional question is one that would be more appropriately directed to the Minister of Justice, but it is my information that the process that has been undertaken is legal and the miners are as well protected by the regulations as they would be if they were under provincial regulations.

I might say that submissions were made by the steelworkers requesting that joint safety and health committees be established at the two largest uranium mines, Denison and Rio Algom at Elliot Lake. They were accordingly ordered to be established at these two locations in an order dated April 14. As of this date they are not yet in operation, due to the refusal of the steelworkers to nominate labour members to these committees.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, the minister and his government with their majority may be protected, but the people on the ground floor of the industry in Elliot Lake do not think that they are, and they are the ones who ought to know. Because of what these workers see as the government's bungling and their consequent lack of protection, I want to ask the minister this question, which does not have anything to do with jurisdiction.

Will the minister, along with the rest of the government's Punch and Judy show—the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who have the punch, along with the member for Nickel Belt who apparently does not have any—go to Elliot Lake and meet with the miners there, as the miners demanded? They asked us last week to forward that request to the government. Will they go there soon to learn from these people, whose health and lives are at stake, what they think are the realities in that industry?

Mr. Regan: I thank the hon. member for his supplementary. I appreciate his concern, but I feel sorry about his lack of accurate knowledge on the subject. I want to assure him that the minister of mines has been there on a regular basis and has had a number of meetings. I want to further assure the hon. member that I met with the officials of the union here in Ottawa on the subject. We had a thorough discussion of the matter. We explained in great detail the legalities of the situation. I want to say to the hon. member that he would do a great service if he would pass back to any friends he has the fact that these miners are as well protected by safety regulations as those in any mine in Canada.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER POTATO GROWERS BENEFIT FROM STABILIZATION INSURANCE

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Potato growers in every province of Canada have qualified 1980 as a disastrous year because their income from sales was much lower than production costs. I would like to know whether the government will support them through agricultural stabilization as it did in recent years and, if so, when and how much assistance can Canadian growers expect to receive, since they are eagerly waiting for that answer to plan their seeding operations for 1981.

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, farmers in eastern Canada, both in Quebec and in the maritime provinces, have filed applications with the Agricultural Stabilization Board and those applications are now being reviewed by the board and the Canadian Horticultural Council. Studies are not quite complete but I dare hope that in the very near future we will be able to announce in the House a stabilization program for potato growers in eastern Canada.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

DISTRIBUTION OF QUOTAS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport who answers for the Wheat Board. I am sure the minister is aware of the ridiculously low wheat quota on CPR shipping blocs, particularly in the province of Alberta, some 2.9 bushels, while quotas on neighbouring CN blocs are some nine bushels to the acre, which violates the spirit and principle of equity. I wonder whether the Minister of Transport would consider prevailing upon his colleague in the other place to take immediate action to alleviate this very inequitable situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will certainly bring that to the attention of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Transport if he would consider asking the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to recommend an immediate quota adjustment; and if that is not available perhaps he might consider the movement of grain to CN lines if CP lines are going to continue to be congested.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am absolutely sure that the Minister of State for the Wheat Board, if he has proof that there is an injustice in the distribution of quotas in this particular area, will move very, very rapidly to correct it.

WAR MEASURES ACT

INVOCATION IN 1970—REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF DOCUMENTATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The FLQ crisis occurred well over ten years ago. Other governments and other agencies of other governments are now releasing detailed information respecting the FLQ crisis. The French press and now the English press are almost daily making accusations and allegations about certain people relating to that affair. The then minister of justice, one John Turner, whom I am sure the Prime Minister will remember, said ten years ago that when the full facts of the FLQ crisis are known in this House, the government's use of the War Measures Act will be fully justified. In view of all this, does the Prime Minister not now think it is about time, ten years after the event, for the mass of documentation under his control to be released to the public at large?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member has asked that question before and has had my answer. I stated at the time and I have stated since that the decisions of the government, on which this House voted, including the hon. member's party, were based on facts which were published and which were known. I still stand by that statement. If he believes he can get more information from my friend John Turner, I would be happy to give him Mr. Turner's phone number and to have Mr. Turner state all the facts within his knowledge.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, because I suspect that the Prime Minister knows there are now other people in this chamber who know of documentation and files in the control of the Privy Council Office, in the control of the Solicitor General and under the control of the RCMP, which by not being released provide a cover-up of monumental bungling of the right hon. member in this House—and I do not make that charge lightly—I wonder if it really is not time for the Prime Minister to review some of this mass of documentation and this mass of files to let the Canadian public know really what some of those decisions were based upon.

An hon. Member: Come clean.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member that this government has been seeking passage of the freedom of information legislation since the Speech from the Throne, and I understand there is an agreement among House leaders to expedite at least second reading tomorrow, thanks to the co-operation of all parties. Very soon we hope that legislation will become law, and if the hon. member thinks there are documents available which sustain his suspicions, he will be perfectly entitled to ask for them.

As to the monumental bungling accusation, I wish the hon. member could substantiate that. I repeat—and I think the facts are well known to Canadians—that in the period of years preceding 1970 there had been some 100 incidents of train derailments, robberies of arsenals, attacks on gun shops, kidnappings, murders and assassinations. I would point out to the hon. member that there was at that time a government in power which was not prepared to hand power over to a parallel government of unelected people, and that has meant there has been no violence in Canada since then. I think the hon. member should want to share in the credit for that because his party was responsible for our bringing in the War Measures Act.

THE BUDGET

TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—PROJECTED SAVINGS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister's budget of October 28 stated that the government plans to realize net savings in transfer payments to the provinces in areas coming under their jurisdiction. Will the minister inform the House whether the net savings will be achieved by cuts in hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education funding, or will the savings be borne entirely by the education portion of the government's established programs financing?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is true that in the budget statement I indicated that we wanted to achieve significant savings in the large transfers from the federal treasury to the provinces. We have not yet commenced negotiations with the provinces and it is not possible at this stage to say in what area these savings might be achieved. That is the state of play at the present time.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He has indicated there will be negotiations with the provinces on the established programs financing scheme. Given that answer, may I ask the Minister of Finance, if the federal government does decide to reduce substantially support for post-secondary education across the country, would the government consider itself bound, either legally or morally, to give notice to the provinces and, if so, how much notice would the government consider appropriate to give?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, quite apart from this particular question relating to one aspect of the transfers, I think the hon. member is aware that there is an expiry date for these agreements, and that if not renewed they terminate. It is because, as I understand it, the expiry date is in 1982 that we are now beginning to prepare within the government to undertake discussions soon with the provinces with a view to concluding a new agreement. I have not speculated upon the outcome of the situation in which we would find ourselves if agreements were terminated and no new agreement was put in place or no new understanding reached with the provinces. I have not examined that.

COMMUNICATIONS

AM RADIO TRANSMISSION—PROPOSED CHANGE IN DIAL POSITIONS

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. The possibility now exists that Canadian AM radio stations may be soon forced to change their dial positions, a move which would benefit the United States and perhaps some Latin and South American countries, but would only hurt Canadians as it will decrease the quality of AM radio reception. Most of the new frequencies will be gobbled up by new northern U.S. stations, and at the same time would cost us millions of dollars. Could the minister inform this House whether the cabinet has decided on a position with regard to a change in the AM dial positions?

• (1450)

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, we are addressing this question very closely at the moment. The traditional position of the Government of Canada has been that we were quite favourable to maintaining the spacing of ten kilohertz, and the U.S. position of asking us to move to nine kilohertz is one we would resist. I have received a number of representations from members of Parliament and from broadcasters across the country and we are aware of their concerns. Up to this time there has been no change in the basic position of the federal government that we support the ten kilohertz spacing.

RENEGOTIATION OF INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING AGREEMENT

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or, in his absence, to the acting minister. The present international broadcasting agreement will be renegotiated in November, 1981 in Rio de Janeiro. The consensus of the nations at that particular conference with regard to the frequency changes will carry the day. Would the minister inform the House if his department has any plans for assuming leadership among the nations in opposing this change in AM radio frequencies for the benefit of Canadian broadcasters and listeners?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will take that question as notice and get back to my hon. friend.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. On January 16 the minister announced that Quebec City will be receiving a new federal contribution granted under the community services contribution program for Quebec's professional hockey team arena. That grant was for $4.5 million. My question on behalf of the municipalities of Canada is this: Is the community services contribution program cancelled or is it not?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member would not recall the statement made when I announced that the 1980 program will not be continued and that some $400 million will be transferred out of the federal treasury to the provinces for the assistance of municipalities before March of 1982, when those payments will cease. The money to which the hon. member referred is part of that allocation to the province of Quebec, which has decided that that was how that money was to be used. The other allocations go to other provinces under the same formula in the present agreement. The hon. member should not be surprised that out of $400 million there will be allocations from time to time, some receiving more publicity than others.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, my surprise is at the use of the word "new". I would ask the minister this question. When the province took over Loto Canada, the province of Quebec agreed to assume the cost of the Quebec coliseum using the new Loto Canada funds. Why is the minister paying out funds from this cancelled program which could be used by other municipalities when the province of Quebec has already agreed to fund the coliseum?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member indicates a part of the problem which the government had to confront when it reviewed that program, that is that the federal government permitted the provinces to designate where the funds under the community services contribution program would be spent. We said to the provinces, as did the government in the early design of that program, that they have the choice where the funds are to be spent. In retrospect we wonder whether that was a wise move, because the question raised by the hon. member indicates that, in a fast changing world where perhaps we cannot afford at any government level to spend money, for example, on soft services, perhaps it is not desirable to lock ourselves into that kind of arrangement.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION ON ASBESTOS USE

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Asbestos ranks high in our national economy and it is even essential to the well-being of my riding. Can the minister tell the House whether his department intends to set up some kind of mechanism to dispel the cloud of uncertainty over asbestos? As a result of very negative publicity about asbestos we have been witnessing lay-offs which will soon affect over 1,000 workers.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we know that our asbestos exports represent $600 million for our balance of payments, but at the same time, we need regulations to protect mines and plant workers. My department has therefore set up a federal-provincial task force to develop a reasoned and scientific policy that will give due consideration to asbestos-related security and health problems, while recognizing the importance of this industry for the province of Quebec and Canada as a whole.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—INQUIRY RESPECTING FINANCING GUARANTEES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who, I think, will be familiar with reports that President Reagan's transition team recommended support for the northern pipeline on the condition that there would be no government guarantees. The minister would also be familiar with the view in financial circles that that project cannot proceed without financial guarantees.

In his conversation with the U.S. Secretary of Energy, did the Canadian Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources receive an assurance that the Reagan administration would be prepared to contemplate the kind of government guarantees that would allow the financing of the whole project?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this matter was not specifically raised during my discussions with the American Secretary for Energy for the very simple reason that the information I have received from the Northern Pipeline Agency and our contacts within the American private sector responsible for the project seem to indicate that it might not be essential to have a financial guarantee from the government. Discussions are still going on with the private interests involved and it seems that a firm conclusion cannot be reached as yet as to the need for a guarantee from the American government.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, that answer indicates that, for whatever reason, the Government of Canada at the moment has no undertaking from the government of the United States that there will be the kinds of guarantees which the financial community believes are essential for the completion of the pipeline. Would the minister give the House an undertaking to seek and report such guarantees immediately, and would he give us an undertaking to put in writing either his record of the conversation with the U.S. Secretary of Energy or the commitments which the Government of Canada believes are necessary from the government of the United States for the completion of the whole pipeline project.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I certainly do not intend to request at this time the kinds of guarantees that the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned from the U.S. administration. We have the word of the former president of the United States and we have a joint resolution of the U.S. Congress that they will take every step necessary to ensure the completion of that pipeline. That assurance was given to me again yesterday by Secretary Edwards. I submit to the Leader of the Opposition that the U.S. authorities have stated quite clearly that they are fully committed to the construction of this pipeline. We have no reason at present to doubt that all the necessary steps will be taken to ensure that this pipeline is built according to the schedule that has been mentioned before.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. KAPLAN

Madam Speaker: I am ready to rule on the question of privilege which was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), but as he is not in the House at present, and as I usually extend the courtesy of deferring a ruling when an hon. member who had brought forward a question of privilege is not present in the House, I considered taking that course today. However, in view of the fact that I have a notice of another question of privilege which seems to be close enough to the one which was brought forward yesterday, perhaps it would be easier if I dealt with the first question of privilege before hearing the new one. I would ask other hon. members who intervened in that question of privilege whether they feel they want me to rule today or whether I should delay.

● (1500)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): On that question, Madam Speaker, you will recall in the notice I sent to you, within the time limited by the rules, that I explained I wished to raise a very complex question of privilege involving, as I see it, the privileges of all members of the House.

In the second paragraph of my notice I set out that the privilege I wish to raise is complex and slightly overlaps the question which was spoken to yesterday. I mean just that—it bears a relationship. The submissions I intend to make today go far beyond that but indeed include a facet of the matter raised yesterday. It is my suggestion that, Madam Speaker, you might well be advised to withhold your ruling, if indeed one was necessary on yesterday's question which was not followed by a substantive motion, until I and other members who may wish to participate in what I consider to be a very serious and complex question have been heard. You should have all the facts, all the evidence and all the arguments before you, prior to making a judgment.

Madam Speaker: Yesterday it was quite clear that I could not extend the time to today for arguing the question of privilege of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. The one raised yesterday by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has been argued to my satisfaction, and I am prepared to rule on it today.

If the hon. member, as he is suggesting, feels that I should defer—and I usually do that as a courtesy to the member who has raised the question of privilege—I am prepared to do it.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has sent me notice of a new question of privilege. The fact that he has stated it slightly overlaps the one raised yesterday does not mean he may discuss the question of privilege raised yesterday. I will be very strict on that. The question of privilege which the hon. member will raise, the subject of which is suggested in his notice, should not overlap or should not discuss the one raised yesterday.

I can accept the hon. member's notice, but I must warn him before hearing him that it seems from his notice he might be asking the Chair to rule on an hypothetical situation. I just want to remind him that the Chair cannot rule on hypothetical situations. I appeal to him to be very specific about his question of privilege and, of course, not to refer to proceedings which took place in a committee.

MR. NIELSEN—CONSEQUENCES OF MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS AND UNDERTAKINGS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, notwithstanding your relatively short time in the chair, I am sure you have already observed that I am always specific in the matters which I raise, that I am never hypothetical, and that, unlike the government benches, I never deal in the abstract.

The questions which I want to put before the Chair and before members today are quite serious. They affect the privileges of all members of the House. When my submissions are through, in my submission and with respect, you will be compelled to look at yesterday's proceedings. I believe you will be compelled, in anticipation of what your ruling would have been today, to have another look at it, because it has a bearing and it is one of four elements which are involved in the questions I wish to raise.

I want to emphasize at the outset that we are not speaking of actions, or statements which may have been made before public meetings, in a political campaign, or statements to the media. We are dealing with statements made in the course of the parliamentary process, and we are dealing with statements which have been made in a parliamentary institution.

Before launching into the substance of what I have to say, let me say a word about the existing situation with respect to the recourse that members do not have in connection with questions of privilege which may arise in committee. As the government House leader is aware and as you are aware, Madam Speaker, such questions raised in any committee cannot be dealt with by the committee chairman unless that committee reports to the House, and then Madam Speaker is the only officer of the House or its institutions who has the jurisdiction to make a ruling on a question of privilege which arises in the House.

One might consider whether or not it is an abuse of privilege for the government majority on a committee, regardless of the political stripe of the government majority, to refuse the desire of the minority on a committee to have a question of privilege brought before you, Madam Speaker, because the chairman of the committee cannot rule. One might consider it a Catch 22 situation where members, other than government members, have no way of bringing a question of privilege to a head if a government majority chooses to exercise its majority in a committee.

If that is the position, Madam Speaker, which I anticipate you might be taking in agreement with the government House leader and in accordance with my understanding of our existing rules, it may well command the immediate attention of the Chair and of all members of the House, since it is only those members on the government side of the House, who form the majority in any of our standing committees, who seem to enjoy the right to have a question of privilege reported to the Chair in this chamber and have it ruled upon. All other members are denied that right. In my submission that is very wrong and should be rectified.

The substance of the matter which was spoken about yesterday, as you will recall, Madam Speaker, was the right of members of this place to be able to rely on statements made by ministers of the Crown in the parliamentary process and on behalf of the government. That is not a hypothetical situation, in view of the events of last week and in view of the fact that the matter was on the floor of this House yesterday.

Just to touch very briefly upon what was dealt with yesterday, what your ruling was intended to deal with, and I am sure will be dealing with when it is given with respect to the proceedings yesterday, the question yesterday was narrowly confined. If there is any doubt about that, I suggest it should be resolved in favour of the privileges of members rather than the privileges of the government.

It was narrowly defined as to whether or not it is an abuse of the privileges of all hon. members for one minister to give an undertaking on behalf of the government and for a second minister to withdraw that undertaking. I do not intend to address myself to that point, in compliance with Your Honour's stricture. I intend to develop my submissions to you on three other very important points with respect to this question of privilege.

The first submission I wish to make to you, Madam Speaker, is with respect to the resolution of the question as to whether or not a breach of the privileges of the members of this House occurred by the fact that action was taken by some hon. members as a result of reliance upon an undertaking given by a minister of the Crown on behalf of the government in a parliamentary process, as in the case which arose and which was discussed yesterday, wherein amendments were withdrawn and discussion advanced to a later clause of the constitutional resolution, as a direct result of undertakings made by a minister of the Crown, and later revoked. Madam Speaker, in other forums that would fall within the definition of false pretences, under the provisions of the Criminal Code.

I would like to read from section 319(1) of the Criminal Code to see how that situation is regarded. It reads:

> A false pretence is a representation of a matter of fact either present or past, made by words or otherwise, that is known by the person who makes it to be false and that is made with a fraudulent intent to induce the person to whom it is made to act upon it.

That it was acted upon, there can be no doubt. With respect to the intent, I intend at a later stage in the development of my submission to refer you to citations from May's which strongly suggest that a breach of privilege has occurred on that count. There is no doubt in my mind, and I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that in a civil forum such representations would be regarded as a civil wrong, commonly called a tort.

The key point in procedural terms in my submission is whether or not the minister deliberately misled a parliamentary proceeding. It can be argued that when the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) accepted the Conservative amendment he knew very well what arguments had been made against it during the summer, and by whom. It seems to me the record will disclose that was the case. In accepting the amendment he was either saying that the government had decided to set those arguments aside as being less crucial than the arguments in favour of the subject matter of the amendment which was being put forward, or he was only giving the appearance of accepting an amendment which he knew at the time would have to be repudiated at a later date. The position was changed after repetition of the original—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I sympathize with the difficulties the hon. member might have in arguing his case. He is constantly getting very close to discussing what has happened in a parliamentary committee. It is not because he calls it a parliamentary proceeding, that he chooses to give it a very general term, that the Chair must not see that he is obviously discussing what took place in the committee. I will hear the hon. member's question of privilege, but I must ask him not to refer to the proceedings of that committee because, as he knows, these questions should be discussed and dealt with in the committee. He knows the rules as well as anyone in this chamber. The way to deal with it in the House is to bring it into the House through a report. These rules are wise.

The Chair does not know what is going on in the committees and therefore it is difficult for the Chair to rule on matters which happen in a committee, unless the Chair receives a report. That is the reason for which that rule exists. It is sensible and wise. I would ask the hon. member not to put the Chair into too difficult a position, and I would ask him to try to argue very closely to his point. His question, as stated, would have to be very specific. He would have to argue it in terms of that specific statement and not refer to events or proceedings which took place in the committee.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I appreciate that advice. Allow me to reflect for a moment, however, on the reasons for the existence of that rule. With great respect, I believe the reason for the rule which prohibits a discussion of committee proceedings in the House before those proceedings have been reported is a very narrowly technical reason, namely, that the House is not technically seized of the evidence, the record of the committee proceedings, until such time as that report does come into the House. In this modern age, where Hansard is printed overnight, that archaic and narrowly technical reason, in my submission, falls to the ground. In any event, it should be examined.

I might also point out, Madam Speaker, that I need not rely on the official reports of the committee to raise a question like this. This matter has received on-the-spot, blow-by-blow, verbatim television coverage throughout the length and breadth of this nation. So none of us can stick our heads in the sand, with respect, Madam Speaker—and my intention is not to reflect on the Chair—and claim that we do not know what happened. Any one of us who watches television knows. We can see it every night.

I will leave this matter, Madam Speaker, by saying simply that there was a position which was changed after repetition of the original arguments by the original proponents. It is not far-fetched, in my submission, to draw from that that there was a deliberate intent to make a commitment to the committee in question, which he knew was a commitment which could not be kept.

I wish to deal with my second point now. But perhaps the last point is the most important. The second point, but third in the elements of what I conceive to be a total question of privilege, is whether or not the question of a breach of privilege occurs by the fact that the committee is working to a strict deadline imposed by this House and has wasted limited time as a result of the undertaking given and withdrawn. I submit the answer to that question must be a resounding yes. If it is not clear already it will certainly become clear in the next day or two.

The fourth and last point, before I go to the citations, is whether the actions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and of the two ministers involved who, I regret to observe, are not in the House, I am sure as a result of other more pressing business, and of officials advising them, are subject to the citation at page 141 of the nineteenth edition of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, which reads, "Conspiracy to Deceive either House or Committees of either House" will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

Under the heading "Presenting Forged, Falsified or Fabricated Documents to either House or Committees of either House" the citation reads:

> It is a breach of privilege to present or cause to be presented to either House or to committees of either House, forged, falsified or fabricated documents with intent to deceive such House or committees or to subscribe the names of other persons or fictitious names to documents intended to be presented to either House or committees of either House, or to be privy to, or cognizant of, such forgery or fraud.

The authorities listed below that heading include, among others, "Fabrication of documentary evidence (Martin's case, (1889))."

● (1520)

That precedent will support my submission, Madam Speaker, that the presentation to a committee, which is an extension to the House, of a false statement is, in essence, the presentation of a false document.

Under the second heading on page 141, "Conspiracy to Deceive either House or Committees of either House" it reads:

> It has already been seen that the giving of false evidence, prevarication or suppression of the truth by witnesses while under examination before either House or before committees of either House is punished as a contempt; and that persons who present false, forged or fabricated documents to either House or to committees of either House are guilty of a breach of privilege. Conspiracy to deceive either House or any committees of either House will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

I submit that that quotation supports the fourth element of this global question of privilege. I would also like to cite page 142 of the nineteenth edition of Erskine May under the heading, "Misconduct of Members or Officers of either House as Such—Deliberately Misleading the House". It reads:

> The House may treat the making of a deliberately misleading statement as a contempt.

The first paragraph under the heading "Corruption in the Execution of Their Office as Members" on page 142 has this to say:

> The acceptance by any member of either House of a bribe to influence him in his conduct as such member or of any fee, compensation or reward in connection with the promotion of, or opposition to any bill, resolution, matter or thing submitted or intended to be submitted to the House or any committee thereof is a breach of privilege.

I am glad to see that the Solicitor General has returned to the House. That passage might be viewed in the light of the very special relationship which existed in this instance between those cosy bedmates, the NDP and the Liberal members, not only in this House but elsewhere in their work together. I think sometimes it is the case of the little red rump wagging the pink dog. With regard to the last passage, I would also cite for the Chair's attention, the authorities listed thereunder.

Having briefly, but hopefully concisely and tersely, described what I submit is a very complex and serious question of privilege—on which other hon. members wish to address themselves—which goes far beyond yesterday's proceedings, at the end of hearing all these submissions and the arguments of hon. members who wish to participate, I will move:

> That the matter of the statements made to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada by the Solicitor General of Canada, as acting Minister of Justice, on Friday, January 24, 1981, and widely reported in the public media and the direct repudiation of these statements by the Minister of Justice on Monday, January 26, 1981, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and that the committee consider in particular
> (a) whether it is an abuse of the privileges of all honourable members for one minister to give an understanding on behalf of the government, and for a second minister to withdraw that undertaking;
> (b) whether the question of a breach of privilege occurs by the fact that action was taken by some honourable members as a result of and relying on that undertaking, as in the case in question, wherein amendments were withdrawn and discussion advanced to a later clause of the constitutional resolution as a direct result of undertakings made by a minister of the Crown and later revoked;
> (c) whether the question of a breach of privilege occurs by the fact that a committee is working to a strict deadline imposed by the House and has wasted limited time as a result of the undertaking given and withdrawn; and

If you find that there exists a prima facie case of privilege, Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) will second the motion. Before you take this very serious matter under consideration, I urge that you invite intervention by other members who may be interested in this very complex and serious question.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I was absent from the House during the intervention by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I understand that he made statements referring to me. I am rising to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege based thereon when I have had a chance to review the "blues". If I consider it advisable, I will be prepared to take action tomorrow following question period.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, while I am not obliged to do so, the time constraints placed upon me in preparing this question of privilege prevented me from extending the courtesy of giving notice to the Solicitor General and other ministers of the Crown.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to address the very important question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I hope you will allow me some latitude because the question of privilege presented by my hon. friend arises out of a question of privilege I raised in the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution last Monday.

Perhaps it would be helpful if I were to set out, without going into detail on the proceedings of the committee, the position in which I found myself when I originally raised this question of privilege in the committee last Monday.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I heard the hon. member's plea for latitude in placing his question of privilege, but I cannot allow that latitude. The hon. member must refrain from referring to what happened to him or to other members in that committee. I must assume that the hon. member had a chance to discuss that matter in committee with members of the committee and the chairman, and that in some way the matter was dealt with. I cannot allow the hon. member that latitude. He will have to speak closely to the question as it has been exposed by the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the ruling of the committee chairman is germane to the question of privilege and the arguments which have been advanced by my colleague, and which I myself would like to advance, because the chairman ruled that he could not rule on a question of privilege raised in committee. The chairman's ruling was that only Madam Speaker could rule and that the committee could only vote as to whether or not the matter should be reported to the House so that Madam Speaker may rule. The chairman made that very clear. There was no ruling in the committee on the question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I am not sure that I should be arguing with the hon. member on this point, but I would remind him that the rule does exist. If a matter arises in committee, it is dealt with in the committee by vote and after discussion which, I suppose, has taken place according to the rules. The hon. member cannot argue that he does not accept those rules. They are the rules established by this House. The hon. member has had his input and must accept those rules when coming into the House. So I do not believe that that argument can be invoked. If the hon. member wishes to discuss the question of privilege, he may, but he cannot tell me that those rules are not adequate. He may tell that to his colleagues in the House. I only apply the rules, and that is what I am doing now.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, you just said that you only apply the rules. As you well know, you also have a fundamental responsibility as the ultimate arbiter of justice as it extends to all members of this House of Commons.

You are the guardian of the rights and privileges of every member of this House of Commons as the occupant of the chair. That is your responsibility.

The dilemma that faces members of the opposition in particular is that we have a situation where it is quite clear to us that the privileges of members sitting in opposition have been abused. We are prevented by party vote from raising that abuse in committee, and we are prevented by the interpretation of the rules of this Parliament from raising an abuse which occurred in committee, in this House of Commons. In other words, we have no recourse against an abuse of the privileges of members of the opposition. You say that you are here to interpret the rules and apply them. That is the case, but you are also here as the guardian of the rights and the privileges of the members of the House of Commons.

I rise simply to ask you, Madam Speaker, what are we to do? To whom are we to turn in a case where members of the government party, enjoying a majority, are able to have their privileges respected, and members of an opposition party who are not able to control a majority in committee are in a position where their rights can be abused—the same members, the same privileges, a double standard?

It is within your responsibilities as ultimate guardian of the rights and privileges of Parliament, Madam Speaker, to find or direct some way out of this dilemma, perhaps by making, or recommending, a reference to a committee, or perhaps by some other means.

I rise simply to make the point that it is unacceptable in logic and, I am sure, unacceptable to you, Madam Speaker, that there should be a situation where rights can be abused, where privileges can be abused and will not be upheld in the case of an abuse of privilege of members because of where they sit in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: In answer to the hon. member I agree that it is true I am the guardian of those rules, and if a situation such as the right hon. member is suggesting has risen in committee, I cannot correct that situation by not following the rules, or changing them on my own. I am sure there are means of bringing this matter to light. If members feel that the rules do not allow them to act freely in a way that gives justice to them I am sure they can find means of bringing this matter to light and discussing it. We are doing just that today, I suspect.

I will listen to this discussion so that I may rule on it later, but I will listen to it while applying the rules that exist now. If rules should be changed at some other time I will apply those rules. That is the sense in which I am the guardian. Sometimes I have to make judgment calls and I do so following as closely as possible the rules and precedents. Therefore, I have to apply the rules; I have no other choice, and that is what I come to do.

I will listen to the hon. member, but I think if he has a case he will be able to argue it within the framework of our rules.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, at this point in your observations may I perhaps assist you in this regard, since I once occupied the position that you fill with honour at this time.

The Speaker has no choice of the sectors in which the Speaker will act as guardian of the privileges of hon. members on both sides of this House. When I was Speaker there was a minority administration. I have recognized, and Madam Speaker will recognize, that other Speakers have dealt with minority situations in which the decision of a chairman which could be arbitrary might affect the rights of members on the government side as well as members of the opposition.

I go beyond the case of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I think it applies to both sides of the House, because the rules have to apply evenly to all members of this House, in all situations. There are no technicalities which will prohibit or inhibit the protection of rights in this House.

If we are in Committee of the Whole and the Deputy Chairman is in the chair and a question arises, and there is a ruling; there is a right of appeal to Madam Speaker immediately on the report of the Deputy Chairman. That is provided for in the rules. Today we have a situation where there was a denial—and a wrong denial, if I may say so—by a chairman disclaiming to the authority to deal with a question of privilege. There is no chairman, no Speaker, who can duck a question of privilege.

Either the chairman was wrong in deciding that he had no authority to hear the question of privilege, and that would be my submission, or if there were a decision with an appeal within the committee, then an hon. member has the right to come to the Chair because the committee is merely an extension of this House.

The Speaker has the right, not only the right but the obligation, to protect the rights of all members. With the greatest respect, Madam Speaker, I for one cannot say that there is any situation where one may take refuge behind an anticipated lacuna in the rules or say that the matter took place in committee. After all, if the matter took place in the Committee of the Whole, not in the Speaker's presence but when someone else was the chairman, what is the difference? The overriding principle is that of protecting the rights of individual members in this House, and there is no other rule that will override that one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I agree, and I disagree, with the hon. member. Obviously that is the responsibility of the Speaker, to protect the freedom of expression of all members, but the rules have been devised precisely to ensure that all of the members' rights are protected. The only way the Speaker can do this effectively and fairly is to base his or her decisions on the rules and on the precedents. That is what I intend to do.

I will hear the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I shall try to compress my remarks within the parameters of your ruling with regard to not being able to deal with what happens in committee, but I have to make this point, and I think it is very important. It is you, Madam Speaker, as the custodian of our rights and privileges, who has the responsibility of ruling whether or not a member's privileges have been violated; not the majority. That is the point.

We do not dispose of these matters in the House by a majority vote; we dispose of these matters because we have conferred upon Your Honour the responsibility and confidence of making that judgment. If I cannot ask this House for redress, where do I go, Madam Speaker? To whom do I turn?

I and other members of that committee have been shamefully deceived. It is a very serious matter; it is not the simple flip-flop that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or his colleagues like to call it. It is not a simple change in policy; it is not a simple change in attitude; it is a gross violation of a solemn undertaking that was given to hon. members in exchange for withdrawing an amendment.

I do not address myself to the time that was lost in that process, but I say to you, Madam Speaker, and I say this with respect, that it could very well have happened in this House because we could have been in Committee of the Whole. I wonder where Your Honour would sit then in terms of dealing with it because a standing committee or a special joint committee is merely an extension of this place in terms of Committee of the Whole.

I say to you, Madam Speaker, that a solemn commitment, a solemn undertaking was made in the parliamentary process in examining a resolution, a joint address, that was referred to the committee by this House. That solemn undertaking was to the effect that if we withdrew an amendment that we were proposing under a particular section then the government would receive and accept that amendment if we agreed to withdraw it and move it on another section.

Mr. Nielsen: It was a false inducement.

Mr. McGrath: It was a false inducement, as my colleague says. We agreed, and my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), asked for the necessary unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Unanimous consent was granted, and we withdrew it. When we came to the relevant section and the government indicated on behalf of the Liberal party—and that is a matter of public record; they did not say "On behalf of the government"; they said "On behalf of the Liberal members of the committee"—when we arrived at the relevant section we were told, "The deal is off; there is no deal."

That is a serious matter, Madam Speaker. This place cannot function if we cannot accept the word of a minister speaking on behalf of the government. The most serious breach of parliamentary privilege that an hon. member can be guilty of in this House is to accuse another hon. member of deliberately lying. And rightly so, because that speaks to the fact that the system, the institution, has to get by on the honour and integrity of the members. Without that there would be chaos. I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that my privileges as a member of this House have been grossly and deliberately violated.

I have no quarrel or criticism to make of the hon. gentleman who presides, on behalf of this House, over that committee. Indeed, he has done so with distinction, and with honour, and with impartiality. I hope I will have a chance to refer to that at some other point. He indicated what the rules were according to the advice he received from his table officers. He indicated that he was not permitted to rule on my question of privilege, that he could only entertain a motion that the matter be referred to Your Honour, who is the only person who could so rule. The Liberal majority on the committee voted against having the matter referred to the House so that Your Honour could rule.

Mr. Nielsen: That is the biggest wrong.

Mr. McGrath: Where do I turn? How do I get redress?

There has been gross deception, and there is no question about that. If you say that your hands are tied because of the rules of this place then, Madam Speaker, I submit to you with the greatest respect that, as the custodian of our rights, individually and collectively, and as the custodian of our minority rights, it is incumbent upon you to address this anomaly in the rules and to suggest that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization where it can be dealt with immediately. Otherwise I am not capable, under the rules, of doing that, because I am subject to the whims and fancies of the majority in this House, and the majority in this House would never entertain such a motion from me even if it were procedurally acceptable. Only Your Honour, with the weight of the position that you carry in this place, can make such a recommendation where it would have any weight. I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that this is a very, very, serious matter.

We have to deal with the government in this place and in the committees of this place on a day-to-day basis. We have to accept the word of the government with respect to legislation. If the government gives its word, in exchange for certain commitments we make with regard to a certain provision of a bill, and if the government does not keep that word, then, Madam Speaker, where do we turn? With respect we can only turn to you. We can only turn to you as the one to whom we have entrusted the custodianship of our rights and privileges. I believe that you, in your wisdom and in your experience as a member of this House, indeed as a minister of the Crown, realize the gravity of the matter that has been brought to your attention formally by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I believe in your own mind that you appreciate the fact that I am entitled to redress. I humbly submit to you, Madam Speaker, that I can only obtain that redress from you.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, as a member I realize the almost absurd position one is in, in having to talk in abstract terms about what is unmentionable according to the rules.

I would like to suggest, with great deference, that the proposition put forward by my hon. colleague that you use the weight of your office to approach the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or someone on behalf of the government opposite, to refer the matter back to the committee, be followed so that this impasse can be resolved here in the chamber.

Without drawing too long a bow I can recall that there was considerable discussion about whether a committee was in fact the master of its own house, so to speak, with respect to allowing television coverage of the committee. In that case there was real controversy whether this committee could determine that matter or whether the House had to do it. Eventually, as I recall, the House of Commons, through the Prime Minister, had to give direction to the committee to make it possible to have its proceedings televised according to the wishes of certain members of this House.

Therefore, with respect to this very important procedural matter, would it not be possible for you, Your Honour, to go to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, or to whomever you please, to have this matter reconsidered in the committee? By doing this, at least Your Honour could have, without any possible confusion, the complete jurisdiction to deal with this proposition, to rule on it, and therefore exercise your prerogative as the custodian of our rights.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I have a few words to say about this particular question. At the outset I should say that I think your patience and good will have been somewhat stretched this afternoon by the kind of debate we have heard from the other side. In essence what we are hearing is a debate on the same question that took place yesterday, a question on which you have reserved judgment.

I find it rather odd to hear the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) talk about the Speaker making a reference to the Standing Committee on Organization and Procedure, knowing as he should, as a parliamentarian of long standing, that the Speaker does not have that right and privilege. Indeed, it is the members of this House collectively who determine our rules and not you, if I may say so, as servant of the House, as first among equals in this House.

I find it difficult to entertain the arguments of my friend from Yukon who criticizes the rules of the House with respect to questions of privilege in committee only being dealt with by members of the House when the report is given to the House; yet, on the other hand, to make his case he has cited rather archaic references from Erskine May, which perhaps have no application to today's modern Parliament. There seems to be a dichotomy there in his thinking.

The rules are very clear. Beauchesne's citation 608 clearly states as follows:

Procedural difficulties which arise in committees ought to be settled in the committee and not in the House.

This is further augmented by citation 76 at page 24 of Beauchesne, which reads as follows:

Breaches of privilege in committee may be dealt with only by the House itself on report from the committee.

Mr. Nielsen: And the majority controls that.

Mr. Collenette: And citation 76 goes on to talk about witnesses.

Those are the rules, Madam Speaker. I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in that he feels legitimately that this rule should be analysed by members of the House, that it should be reviewed and perhaps even changed. I am not going to pronounce upon that. He may have a good point. But that is not what is at issue here this afternoon.

We have the rules clearly before us. With respect, you, I may say, must give rulings in the House based on the rules as they are written.

The hypothetical nature of the debate which the hon. member for Yukon tried to use in making his question of privilege—

Mr. Nielsen: Never hypothetical.

Mr. Collenette: —because I maintain he is dealing with the same question as yesterday and as I said, I think he stretched your patience by dressing it up in hypothetical terms, but this point is also dealt with by Beauchesne in the fifth edition. In citation 117 (5) it reads:

Hypothetical queries on procedure cannot be addressed to the Speaker from the floor of the House.

Even in trying to make the case so as not to reflect on yesterday's deliberations, he is in a sense breaking one of our rules in trying to skirt another rule.

Mr. Nielsen: There was nothing hypothetical about the undertaking.

Mr. Collenette: Citation 117(7) of Beauchesne goes on to reinforce this, as follows:

The opinion of the Speaker cannot be sought in the House about any matter arising or likely to arise in a committee.

It is my contention that the debate we have heard this afternoon is completely out of order. Really we are dealing with the same case that was made yesterday, the judgment of which you have reserved perhaps until tomorrow.

However, there is a very serious matter arising out of the remarks made by the hon. member for Yukon. Perhaps this is what the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) had in mind a few moments ago when he reserved his right to raise a question of privilege. The hon. member for Yukon having once been given the latitude to make his case—which I argue he should not have had—talks in terms of the intent of the minister. He questions the intent, the honesty, and the integrity of the minister. I, for one, would like to see the "blues". We were all present a few moments ago when those words were used. I wrote down the words "forged, falsified in terms of a statement, in terms of a document." This goes to the heart of our parliamentary democracy when one member is imputing a motive against another.

In effect the hon. member for Yukon is accusing the Solicitor General of making a false statement either in this House or in committee. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) explained the government's position on this quite clearly yesterday.

I should say to the hon. member for Yukon, who has been in this House some 23 years, he should not be so naive as to think that representations cannot be made by members or parties in this House and decisions of the government reversed. That is what this game is all about. You try to impress your views on each other. This is a debating forum. We try to convince each other of the certainty of our own opinion.

In that particular instance, the government reversed itself, changed its mind after hearing representations from members and parties on the other side. This is done every day, no matter whether it is with regard to the constitution, energy, or unemployment insurance. It is an essential element of the work in this chamber. I think the hon. member for Yukon is being somewhat naive in this matter.

Just to finish my point about imputing motives, the hon. member for Yukon referred to citations at page 142 of Erskine May, the nineteenth edition I believe it was. He talked about bribery. By extension is the hon. member accusing the Solicitor General of this nefarious kind of deed?

In my time here, and I have not been here as long as the hon. member for Yukon, I had never heard that word used in this chamber. It is an extremely serious word.

Mr. Nielsen: I used it in 1963.

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member says he used it in 1963. Perhaps he is used to throwing around the word bribery if he has done it before. However, as somewhat of a novice in this chamber, I find it extremely serious when a member uses such terms as forge, falsify and bribery. I submit those words should not be allowed to stay on the record one instant. I hope the hon. member will withdraw them.

The Solicitor General was not in the chamber when those words were said, but I wrote them down. He said forge, falsify and bribery in connection with the statement the Solicitor General made not only in committee, but by extension in this House. I submit the most serious charge is not the one trying to be drummed up by the other side because it is dissatisfied with the rules, but the imputing of motives by the hon. member for Yukon against the Solicitor General.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I want to put a few words on record on this matter of privilege. The motion was seconded by me. In his comments the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) made the point that it was not within your power, Madam Speaker, to refer this matter to the appropriate committee. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) never made that recommendation. The recommendation to the Chair was that a referral be made, not that a direct referral be made by the Chair. There is a very marked difference between that and what the parliamentary secretary was saying.

There are two obvious questions that need answering in terms of redress. One was raised by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the hon. member for St. John's East, namely, that undertakings were given and undertakings were removed. I will not address that any further. I believe that has been fully discussed.

There is another undertaking that I feel is directly part of this issue. In other matters we have a bill or a resolution and an opportunity for members to find redress, at least in the legislative sense, if not in the moral sense, through the avenue of report stage whereby amendments that have been defeated can again be brought forward at report stage. The House can at least address those amendments and take a decision apart from what might have happened in any committee of the House. That is normal procedure in terms of bills or resolutions.

That is not what is facing us here. We have no redress to bring an amendment forward to have that matter discussed now by all members of the House in the legislative sense, because we have not received from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) any word as to what form the debate will take once the matter is before this House.

Not only do I feel there is a responsibility on your part, Madam Speaker, to protect the rights of members who now have no recourse to redress in the committee because of the weight of majority, and that majority is being exercised in the committee, but on this issue there is no redress in a legislative sense that the matter can again be brought before the House. We do not have those guarantees. Both of those issues should be dealt with.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, there is one other matter I might draw to your attention that will perhaps help you resolve the dilemma between your responsibilities as guardian of the privileges of the House and the difficult technical problem you have raised with regard to a question of privilege which arose originally in committee.

It is an unusual kind of committee, not simply in that it will not be reporting back as is normally done with a bill, but unusual more particularly in that its proceedings are televised live. There is no question that members of this House of Commons, including the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) and others received, through the medium of television, a representation delivered directly by a minister of the Crown having to do with government policy. It was received directly through the medium of television by those members of Parliament and taken as a representation by a minister in a parliamentary context to members of Parliament.

Many of those members of Parliament acted on that undertaking. They acted in terms of representations they gave to their constituents, telling them that property rights would in fact be honoured and protected in the legislation now before the House of Commons. They perhaps acted in other ways as well.

I know Your Honour wants to find a way out of the dilemma in which the rules have placed you, the dilemma between your responsibilities as guardian of the privileges of this House and the technical problem created, as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) pointed out, at other times when it was not possible for the Speaker or other members of the House to be seized of information that arose specifically in committee.

In this case, because television was there, and because this House decided to extend that committee beyond the committee to affect the decisions and the information, not only of all Canadians, but all those Canadians who happened to be members of this House of Commons, there was direct communication by a minister of the Crown to individual members of Parliament emanating from, but not confined to, that committee, which affected decisions taken by members of Parliament.

I believe Your Honour may well want to consider whether that fact would reduce the force of the technical obstacle, which I believe is the only real obstacle that is of concern to you in passing judgment upon what we consider to be a very serious breach of privilege.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to rise because the usual rule is that individuals are only allowed to participate once in a debate on a question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member can rise on a point of order, as did the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who spoke previously on this question of privilege. I can hear the hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Collenette: I made those remarks in order to preface what I believe is a point or order. It is in reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). So that the record is absolutely clear, the hon. member for St. John's East was clearly asking the Chair to initiate a reference to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to look into the rules. I was saying that the Speaker did not have that power under the rules. I want that to be absolutely clear. That is what I said earlier. I dispute the interpretation given by the hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. McGrath: That is not what I said, Madam Speaker. What I said to you, with respect, was if you find that the rules do not cover this situation, then you should ask the House to refer it. You can recommend to the House, not that you refer it, but suggest to the House that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. That is not quite what the hon. member is trying to say. I leave the rest to the record.

● (1600)

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have listened with interest to the discussions over the last two days in respect of this question of privilege and I am moved to say a couple of things about this matter.

The first thing is the question as to whether we are able to discuss matters in committee, whether we are allowed to comment on them, or whether you are able to rule on them. That is not something which I think can be very much in dispute. The rules, it would seem to me, are pretty clear on that.

The point being made by members of the Conservative party perhaps deserve further study by the whole House. The question as to whether we can continue this does admittedly put us into a difficult situation. If we are told by the chairman of the committee that he is not able to deal with the question of privilege, and we are then told by you that you are not able to deal with the question of privilege because you cannot deal with a matter before a committee, this puts us into a very difficult Catch 22 situation. If that is the case, this is something which I think has to be studied. That is the first point, and I think it is a legitimate and real concern.

I do want to say something about the comments by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It seems to me rather extraordinary that, once one has had an explanation, whether or not it entirely satisfies the member, as this House has had an explanation from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of the country and from members of the cabinet, as to what transpired over the last five days, and the explanation has been that there was a change of mind or a change of heart on the part of the government, a member of this House can quite casually, as if talking about the weather, clearly leave on the record the implication that the very fact that there has been a change of mind brings to his mind two possible interpretations which lead him to say there is a prima facie case. He says either there was some kind of conspiracy involved here in which the cabinet was deliberately misleading and placing a forged document before the committee—that is the first implication raised by the hon. member for Yukon, casually dropped as if this were the ordinary allegation one makes every day of the week about other members of the House of Commons. The second implication is that somebody has offered a bribe or somebody has taken a bribe.

I think it must be said that if a member of this House is going to make that kind of an allegation, let him say who made the bribe, when was it made, and when was it accepted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, you have said earlier in another context that the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) perhaps went beyond his thoughts. In many cases one would really think it is not an unusual occurrence for that to take place. But I would say it is very strange to me that the very fact of a change of mind, and how many instances are there in question period when that is exactly what we are trying to do, get the government to change its mind, and God would that they would change their mind in terms of policy on the economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: If the Conservative party had understood the necessity of changing one's mind from time to time it would still be the government today, and everybody here knows it.

It is because of the very fact that the mere changing of a mind is seen to raise suddenly a prima facie case, either of conspiracy or of a bribe, that I must say, when that is the immediate thing brought to the mind of a member of this House I feel very sorry for that member.

It seems to me very strange indeed that one can casually make those kinds of allegations, saying that a bribe was offered, presumably by members of this party, that it was accepted, presumably by a member of cabinet, without saying who made the bribe, when it was made, and what was involved.

I know the hon. member for Yukon prides himself on being a member of the Bar of many jurisdictions. As a member of the Bar he knows perfectly well that to make that allegation about some other individual, were it not for the protection of the House—he knows perfectly well that is a blanket smear on the integrity not only of members of the government but members of the whole House, which I must say is pretty unacceptable and pretty strange.

I quite agree there is a problem which has been raised, and an embarrassment that has been caused. There has been a problem raised by the fact that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has been told that he cannot raise this in committee, and now when he comes before the House he is told he cannot raise it in the House. That is a genuine problem and a matter that has to be discussed. But, for the member for Yukon to say, just because there has been a change of mind on the part of the government, that raises a prima facie case of conspiracy or a prima facie case of fraud, is the most pathetic, unfair and unreasonable kind of reasoning on a matter of privilege I have heard since I came here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): If I may, Madam Speaker, I would like to intervene briefly in this debate. I have to go back to the substance of the problem. First, the chairman of that committee stated that, under the rules, he has no authority to give satisfaction to a member who is complaining that his privileges have been breached. That is my first point. Here is the second point: the only recourse available to him, according to the chairman, would be to report to the House. Here is the third point: that report is voted down in committee by the Liberal majority. Under the circumstances, Madam Speaker, how can the member complain and seek redress when he claims that his privileges were breached?

It is difficult to accept the notion that a majority vote in a committee will decide whether or not privileges have been breached.

[English]

I should like to underline one other matter raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), namely, that in this House it is forbidden to us to call fellow members, on our side or any other side, liars, or to say they are speaking an untruth. As the hon. member said, the reason for that is simple. We have to take their word for it. When we can no longer take that word, this House is in serious trouble. This House is in trouble now because of this stupid dilemma in which we find ourselves.

I say, Madam Speaker, that the matter is over to you as the guardian and custodian of the rules of this House and, if it is not over to you, then it is game over for the House and for Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I might make a few remarks before I allow another hon. member to speak.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) spoke in impeccable French, and I congratulate him for that, but I must tell him that he did not bring new arguments which had not already been made in this debate by previous speakers. When participants in a debate reach the point where they repeat what has already been said I think the time has come for the Chair to indicate that just about enough information has been collected on the question under debate. That is why, before I recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), I urge him to be very precise and to come up with new arguments; otherwise I will have to ask him to limit himself and be extremely brief in his intervention because I have already allowed a rather lengthy debate on this question. I must now have new arguments, otherwise I will not hear more interventions.

• (1610)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, indeed allow me to say very simply that nothing is lost by underscoring some specific arguments made in the debate.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order, but I did hear what the hon. member said.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I noted with interest that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) used, and I quote him accurately, the term "mere changing of a mind". I would remind him and the government House leader that government members are entitled to change their minds as often as they want until they make a solemn commitment. After they make a commitment under the oath of the Privy Council, they are bound. That is the crucial point of this debate.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Friesen: They can change their mind as often as they want to, until they make a solemn commitment.

Second, I want to point out that this commitment was made not on the basis of a surprise amendment thrust upon them on the spur of the moment which would take them off guard so that they made an inadvertent error in judgment, but rather on an amendment which had been tabled by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) a week prior to the time, and the government had that entire week from Tuesday to Friday to study the amendment, which they did. They came back with plenty of foreknowledge and, as a deliberate action, made a commitment to the Conservative members of that committee, and then withdrew it. It was a deliberate act on their part.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, of course, is not referring to the proceedings of the committee. He will have to restrain his arguments to other aspects of this question.

Mr. Nielsen: Ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, the point is that members of the House must be able to count on the ministerial sense of responsibility and accountability. Once that commitment has been given, they must be able to depend on that commitment and not have the word broken by other kinds of negotiations which have been going on in order, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said yesterday, to maintain the consensus for which they were looking.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I will take this question under advisement, but I will likely rule at the same time on both questions of privilege.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,619, 1,753, 1,769, 1,772, 1,812 and 1,845.

RAILWAY IMPROVEMENT—SMITHS FALLS TO BROCKVILLE

Question No. 1,619—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Are steps being taken to change the railway tracks in the area of Smiths Falls, Ontario used by passenger trains to avoid the considerable delay spent in track switching operations and (a) if so, what are all the details (b) if not, for what reason?

2. (a) Are steps being taken to improve the railway roadbed between Smiths Falls and Brockville in order to bring it up to modern standards (b) in what year was the roadbed originally constructed?

3. (a) What is the scheduled travelling time for passenger trains between Smiths Falls and Brockville (b) what is the distance involved (c) what would be the estimated travel time for Toronto-bound trains between Smiths Falls and Brockville if the roadbed was brought up to the standard of the roadbed between Brockville and Toronto?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No steps are being taken or are planned to change the railway tracks between Brockville and Smiths Falls, Ontario. The switching of trains from the CN to the CP track and the attendant delay cannot be avoided.

2. (a) No steps are being taken to improve the railway roadbed between Smiths Falls and Brockville as the existing track is adequate for present train operations. As part of a long-term plan to improve rail passenger service in the Quebec-Windsor Corridor, there are plans to upgrade the service and facilities on the Smiths Falls-Napanee route. The Smiths Falls-Brockville route, however, would not be affected.

3. (a) Approximately 55 minutes on average.

(b) Approximately 45 kilometres or 28 miles.

(c) The average travelling time of a passenger train could be reduced by approximately ten minutes per train. The number of stops, curves, etc. precludes greater time savings.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,753—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses)): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Canadian Government Office of Tourism, (a) $10,467,300; (b) 940,700; (c) 1,450,000.

Public Information Directorate, (a) $1,300,000; (b) 950,000; (c) 200,000.

Metric Commission Canada (a) Nil; (b) Nil; (c) Nil.

Question No. 1,769—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Export Development Corporation for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Export Development Corporation advises that: For the financial year ending December 31, 1980, its estimated expenditures for, (a) newspaper advertising: $714,500; (b) free publications: $156,150; (c) other information: $190,625.

Question No. 1,772—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Canadian National Railways for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: (a) $8.6 million; (b) $10,000; (c) Nil.

Motions for Papers

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED

Question No. 1,812—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past ten years, by province, what is the value of land procured by Defence Construction (1951) Limited?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): During the past ten years Defence Construction (1951) Limited did not acquire any land.

RIVIÈRE BEAUDETTE, QUEBEC—TOURIST INFORMATION CENTRE

Question No. 1,845—Mr. Herbert:

Did the government contribute to the construction or maintenance of a tourist or information centre off highway 40 near Rivière Beaudette, Quebec and, if so, what was the amount and were any conditions attached to the payment?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses)): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Under the terms of the government's Federal Labour Intensive Winter Works Project for the winter of 1971-72, the Canadian Government Office of Tourism contributed $80,000 toward the construction of a permanent tourist information centre at Rivière Beaudette, Autoroute 20, County of Soulanges, Quebec. The following is the proforma for the project:

Objective: To give quick stimulus to job creation in the winter across Canada.

Method: By carrying out the clean-up, refurbishing, re-design or augmenting with special new facilities, features or equipment, of one or more travel/tourism attractions or facilities per province.

Provincial Contribution: The aim was for the provincial contribution to match the federal contribution as closely as possible (a minimum for provincial contribution would be 25 per cent of the costs of the projects selected).

Costs: Costs were to be predominantly labour-intensive, although a minor share of equipment or capital cost could be included, provided this could be related to job creating activities. Approximately 75 per cent of the federal share of the contributions was to be made for the FY 1971-72 ending March 31, 1972 and 25 per cent in the two months of April and May and ending May 31, 1972.

WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—PACIFIC WESTERN AIRLINES PROPOSAL FOR MAINTENANCE HANGAR SPACE

Motion No. 20—Mr. Keeper:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications relating to Pacific Western Airlines proposal for maintenance hangar space at the Winnipeg International Airport.

Motion agreed to.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LTD.—PUBLICATION OF TENDER CALLS

Motion No. 39—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all regulations and instructions in Defence Construction (1951) Ltd., concerning the publication of tender calls for construction work, including all references to the amount and form of deposits that may accompany such tenders.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Tuesday, January 27, consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

On Clause 1—

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Chairman, last evening at ten o'clock I was saying that I was somewhat concerned about Bill C-54 and the direction it seems to take and about the Income Tax Act in general, as well as the procedure which the government is following and the policy it is setting down for the people of Canada in the tax measures before us. I drew a comparison between what is happening in the oil industry in western Canada today and the type of measure which we find before us here which is having a negative effect on the economy of Canada.

I should like to say at this point that I think it is very important for us to take a positive look at the direction in which the Canadian economy should go, and I would like to make some positive suggestions today, particularly from the agricultural perspective in view of my background, relating to the measures in the bill before us.

I am sorry that the Minister of Finance is not here today to hear these recommendations, but I hope they will be passed on. I was referring earlier to the Income Tax Act which had a devastating effect on the economic expansion of the country and on the oil industry in western Canada. In my own town of Assiniboia and within my riding the oil industry has been so curtailed that many of the supply companies, many people working on the oil rigs and in the service companies, have been laid off. Approximately 50 per cent to 75 per cent of those people have been laid off, and those numbers are not unusual in oil production areas. For example, PanCanadian in western Saskatchewan is suggesting it may have to close 77 per cent of its oil production. If you are familiar with oil production in southern Saskatchewan in particular, Mr. Chairman, you will know that 50 per cent of the oil wells in southern Saskatchewan produce less than ten barrels of oil. So it is most important that some type of positive direction be given to this industry.

The measures contained in the Income Tax Act and in the bill before us will have the same type of restrictive effect on the whole economy of Canada. This has been going on in Canada for a number of years, and if we do not change this direction we will have more serious economic problems in Canada. I want to relate in particular what is happening with respect to the capital gains tax on farms, a problem to which this bill has not addressed itself.

In the last election the Liberal Government of Canada promised some provisions for the benefit of farmers, particularly relating to valuation day of December 31, 1971. Those measures have not come about. The farmers of my area have been seriously asking about this because what simply happens today is that they take the 1971 valuation day and multiply it by 4.5 times the assessment of the land, and that is the value of the land which the income tax department uses. What will happen to farms and small businesses if the government continues in its present direction? It will force many farms, particularly family farms, into serious economic situations. I suggest to the minister that we must look into the future in regard to this type of legislation.

I see a very serious situation coming about in the province of Saskatchewan. It relates to the ownership of farms, the entire subject of capital gains, and exactly the direction in which the agricultural business is going. Under the land bank scheme the government of Saskatchewan bought over one million acres of land, that is, over 62,000 quarter sections of land. It is owned by the government; it is state-owned land. If the present direction of the government continues, there will be state ownership of land in Canada.

The present direction seems to be evident in what the Liberal government and the NDP have been doing in the constitutional talks as they look at the amendments to the constitution, clause by clause. When it came to the right of ownership of property, it is interesting to note that the Liberal party and the NDP seemingly agreed that that right should not be within the constitution.

The ownership of farms and land is very, very important to farmers. I would suggest that we should be addressing more positively the situation of capital gains tax on farms. If we do not address ourselves to that problem, the state, the government or whoever, will one day own the farms of Canada. It will be a sad day for production; it will be a sad day for Canadian farmers when they no longer own the land on which they produce grain, raise beef or whatever; it will be a sad day for Canada.

It is important for the minister and his department to start looking at the direction of agricultural production. Some of the restraining measures in the Income Tax Act have a counter-productive effect upon the ability of farmers to produce. I should like to speak very generally about something I have experienced, having had a history in agriculture, and the importance of it.

A farmer who may have anywhere from $500,000 to $900,-000 invested in his farm is allowed the same depreciation and the same personal deductions as a wage earner. But, we must remember his investment in his farm, particularly with the present inflation, the high cost of machinery, the inflated cost of land to which we addressed ourselves a little earlier when we discussed capital gains, the inflated cost of repairs, and the high costs of production. Certainly a farmer who has been established for many years does not find himself faced with a major problem; but the young farmer who is trying to buy a farm, to pay high rates of interest and to make capital payments on his principal, finds that out of the small amount of money he is allowed to make after paying his high rate of income tax, he is not able to meet his obligations and to make principal payments on his farm. The government should take a positive look at changing this direction in the interests of agriculture. At this time I should like to ask the minister, through his officials, whether they will take a look at this direction.

In the agricultural industry today there are many farmers who are not delivering grain because they find themselves in situations with which they cannot cope because of the income tax department. This is very restrictive to production in this country. I am not saying that farmers should not pay a fair level of income tax. They realize that they can average their income over five years, which is a benefit, but I believe that we are operating under 1949 methods. The department has never implemented an up-to-date method of operation in regard to agriculture which takes into account the inflation factor of the 1980s. If we do not meet this present challenge which is causing serious problems, particularly in the agricultural industry and also in the area of small business, the economy of Canada will face an even greater challenge.

I have been receiving letters daily from my constituents concerning this matter. Just the other day I received a letter from a businessman in Assiniboia, Saskatchewan. He pointed out that the Income Tax Act has not kept pace with the importance of development in this country and is restraining production to the point where our production capacity is not being utilized.

Last evening I pointed out—and it bears repeating—that the policies of the government have laid the oil industry of Saskatchewan flat on its back. Seemingly the minister laughed about that today, but it is no laughing matter in the towns in my constituency and in all of western Canada. Yet the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced some $4 million aid programs for the province of Saskatchewan which will come out of the pockets of taxpayers. This simply does not make sense. On the one hand they restrict the industry to the point where unemployment is increasing, service rigs are leaving the country, and oil wells are being shut down because it does not pay to bring them into production as production is so low. On the other hand they ask the taxpayers of Canada to pay x millions of dollars to subsidize people who find themselves unemployed. You cannot blame the Canadian people for that, you must blame the Government of Canada for it.

A very good example within the tax structure of Canada today concerns rebates to farmers on gasoline. This is an example of circulating paper and creating jobs. I know the department says that the tax or rebate—10 cents or seven cents a gallon—cannot be taken off at source at the bulk station. I do not know why they cannot find a way to do that. There is a very simple method, but they would rather circulate paper. You see offices full of people sending out circulars to the farmer telling him how to apply. The farmer finds himself unproductive because, instead of being able to feed another pen of steers, he is filling out the papers for the rebate, which get him all confused. Then he needs an accountant and a lawyer to help him fill out the forms. So, what do you have? You have big government circulating paper, and no production. There is not one more hoof of beef, one more roast, or one more bushel of wheat. There is no production whatsoever. This is the type of program suggested by too many government big idea men.

I want to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the people of Canada, farmers and small businessmen in particular, are fed up with this kind of administration. I say to the department and to the minister that it is most important we take a look at this area in Canada today. Do you know that Canada should be having the biggest boom in its history today? Mr. Jarvis, who is responsible to the Wheat Board, made a statement the other day to the effect that this could well be the golden age of western Canada in agriculture. We know what could happen in western Canada with respect to oil and production. Make no mistake about it, so does all of Canada. We should not be beggars in the boardrooms of the world. We should be leaders of production, both in oil and agriculture. And we will be. We mean to put into place some legislation with regard to the Income Tax Act which will allow Canada to produce in the way that only Canada can.

I suggest to you that we must take another look at some of these areas. I would like to deal again briefly with valuation day and its importance to farmers. I have had a number of calls to my office, and a number of farmers have stopped me on the street to ask me about this. They ask: when will the government keep its promise to the people of Canada? I think what is important, is that it keeps a promise.

More important than that is the very serious situation which exists for farmers because of the Income Tax Act. I again ask the government and the minister's department to take a look at this valuation day and the capital gains situation. It is altogether out of tune with the time in which we live. It is archaic, in terms of being up to date with what must happen with respect to agriculture and capital gains.

I wish to speak of another matter about which I have some knowledge. I filled out a payroll for some 25 years. The Income Tax Act—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He will be allowed to intervene again on the second round. Right now I must recognize the hon. member for Pembina.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, I, too, appreciate this opportunity to participate in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-54. Prior to making my comments I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Assiniboia. I would like to align myself with his statements with respect to capital gains. He indicated the approach that both the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party are taking in regard to state ownership of our farm land, or of any land in Canada. It is interesting to note that the Liberals and the NDP voted against our property rights amendment in the constitutional debate. It is also interesting to note that in 1976 at the Habitat Conference the same Liberal administration supported a resolution which was put forward in support of public ownership of all lands.

In reviewing Bill C-54 and examining some of the economic problems we are facing in Canada we find that, in effect, this budget is counterproductive to many sectors of our society. It will be counterproductive as far as it affects the small business sector, our farming population and our senior citizens. We introduced a budget about which I will speak in more detail later. We introduced a very socially progressive budget, when we had the opportunity as the Government of Canada. At the time the New Democratic Party, the supposed party of social compassion, voted against those progressive policies which we had advocated. At the time that illustrated to me the way that they speak out of both sides of their mouths. They indicate they do have a concern for the underprivileged in Canada, yet they do not show it when they have the right to exercise a vote in the House of Commons.

Bill C-54 covers the amendments and the various propositions brought forward by the finance minister in his mini-budget of April, 1980, and in his budget of October, 1980. If it is to be faulted it can be faulted in a good many areas with respect to the deletion of various proposals. There were many important proposals which we included in our budget and which the Liberal party has not seen fit to adopt. A good many of the recommendations which we supported in our budget have been brought forward in this minister's budget, and I commend the government for that.

With respect to what the member for Assiniboia mentioned, there is no relief from capital gains for the farming sector of our country. On several occasions in the previous election campaign the Minister of Agriculture promised that valuation day would be changed from 1971 to 1974. This commitment was not fulfilled by the party opposite. Under the Crosbie budget we offered an opportunity to the farming sector whereby they could roll over their capital gains into a registered retirement savings plan. This went a long way in alleviating the farmer's burden, whose only retirement plan is realized when he sells the property he owns.

We are glad to see that the present government has again accepted our proposal with respect to the Small Business Development Bond. We advocated this measure in order to alleviate high interest rates which so many sectors of our society were facing. We are disappointed that this measure will expire on March 31, 1981. It is my understanding we will be introducing amendments to extend the expiry date of the Small Business Development Bond program beyond that time period. We are hopeful that the Liberal party will accept this suggestion.

Let me congratulate the government for including the provisions with regard to volunteer firemen. We advocated the proposal whereby the allowance would be increased from $300 to $500. However, I am disappointed that the government did not include a provision for an energy tax credit. What the government has done in imposing higher energy costs on Canadians is totally different from what we advocated. The Conservative party advocated an 18 cents excise tax on gasoline to be imposed on those individuals who drive a vehicle. The government impose a refinery tax, which means that even individuals on low incomes will now be burdened with the additional costs. Nor has the government brought in an energy tax credit for those individuals who earn less than $22,000 per year.

Because of the energy policies of this government, exploration activity will be 40 per cent less this year, which amounts to approximately $2 billion in investments. As the result of the government budget, interest rates will be higher. Let us review some of the positive measures which were introduced in the Crosbie budget. We intended to reduce government spending. In spite of that, the Social Policy Board of Canada indicated that the budget was the most progressive budget it had seen in the past ten years. We intended to eliminate mismanagement while at the same time helping those who were most in need of help. As I indicated earlier, the Crosbie budget offered capital relief to farmers, and the working spouse deduction which the government has accepted.

I hope that the government will give some consideration to offering aid to those individuals who face high mortgage costs. The Conservative government committed itself to offering such aid. In light of high interest rates, I hope the government will come forward with positive measures to alleviate the situation. The Conservative policies reflected a belief in the individual Canadian, that he or she could develop without the government becoming too involved in their private lives. We felt that we could contribute to the development of the individual rather than inhibit that development.

It is worth while to review the five commitments made by the Prime Minister during the 1980 election campaign. His first commitment was that the Liberals would manage the nation's finances more vigorously in order to make more effective use of taxpayers' money. He made the specific pledge that his party would hold the line on government expenditure growth under the rate of the GNP. Upon examining this budget we find that for the coming fiscal year there will be an increase of some 12.8 per cent in total federal expenditures and it forecasts an increase in the GNP of 11.1 per cent, which includes inflation. In reality government spending has not been held in line. That is the first promise broken by the Prime Minister.

The second promise of the Prime Minister's five-point plan was that he would achieve energy security at a fair price for all Canadians. He indicated that he would negotiate an increase of less that 14 cents on the price of a gallon of gasoline. In reality we see that the price of gasoline per gallon has increased by anywhere from 20 cents to 30 cents. Now we find that the negotiations between the federal government and the producing provinces are at a stalemate and a settlement cannot be reached. Consequently, our energy security is becoming a fading dream.

The Prime Minister's third promise was that his party would develop an industrial strategy which would provide jobs, spur growth and increase Canadian ownership and control. The Prime Minister indicated:

> This party will not simply stand by and let the recession come . . . We will fight it and overcome it. . . . A Liberal government would use every economic tool at its disposal to save Canadian jobs and to maintain Canadian growth.

In the year since that speech, the Prime Minister and his government have made no effort to use any economic tool at all to stave off recession. In fact the government did not bring down a budget until seven months after it had resumed office.

The Prime Minister's fourth commitment in the five-point plan was that he would head a national government which used its strength to realize the aspirations and economic potential of each of our provinces. He said that it would be a national government which builds up rather than tears down and that it would make the 1980s a decade of opportunity rather than a decade of doubt. In the one year since that promise, one resource sector in one part of our country is to be taxed to the detriment of that portion of the country. And we have a constitutional proposal before this Parliament which makes second-class citizens of all those individuals outside the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The Prime Minister gave the specific commitment that he would give each individual area and province the opportunity to develop and grow.

The fifth promise made by the Prime Minister was that his party would enhance the security of every individual by helping those who most needed assistance, and they endorsed the right of every Canadian to have a job. One year later we find that these pledges have not been kept and that the government has not even begun to put them into effect.

I wish to refer to our excise tax proposal of 18 cents per gallon of gas, as compared to what the government is doing. As hon. members will recall, we proposed that price increases would affect only those individuals actually using gasoline. This administration has imposed a refinery tax as well as a tax which applies not only to gasoline but also to home heating fuel. This means that individuals on low incomes will have to pay that tax without the benefit of an energy tax credit.

My party has done some research into the specific levels of gasoline costs. My colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville, put a question to the minister of energy on January 12 in which he indicated that gasoline costs had gone up by some 30 cents in a period of one year, after receiving a commitment from the Prime Minister during the 1980 election campaign that prices would not rise by any more than 14 cents a gallon. I have a number of quotes from retail and wholesale outlets in my constituency which indicate that the price has gone up by between 20 cents and 38.9 cents.

Canada is blessed with a great deal of natural resources and human potential. One cannot help but be saddened by the fact that the government is stifling that human potential and the development of our natural resources. It is my hope that the government will reflect on what it is doing and come forward with policies which will help the individual develop and which will allow us to develop the natural resources of the western provinces to the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly on Bill C-54 with regard to the energy section, the effects of the budget, and the disastrous effect of the Liberal energy policy on the industry and the country as a whole. What is most disturbing is the attitude of the government, which has made it perfectly clear that it will keep us on this disastrous course. We are going to have to keep hammering away until we can get ministers to budge on the position they have taken.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Pembina on his remarks. He certainly made one point very clear—never trust a Liberal.

I should like to comment on some correspondence we have received from the oil industry and the drilling industry in Canada about the very serious and damaging effects the Liberal energy policy has on them. I want to quote from a letter dated January 26 this year from the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada to the Prime Minister. The letter points out:

> After three months of careful study we the members of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada have concluded that the National Energy Program (NEP) will have disastrous consequences not only for our industry but for Canada's national goal of energy self-sufficiency and, indeed, the over-all economy.
> We represent the Canadian owned and controlled independent segment of the oil and gas industry in our country.

I want to emphasize that I am talking about Canadian companies, Mr. Chairman, not multinationals or oil barons. We are talking about small Canadian companies that are being harassed and chased out of the country by Liberal policies.

The letter goes on:

> We have no quarrel with the stated objectives of the NEP. We simply do not believe the program will achieve them; moreover, it will prove to be counter-productive to those objectives.

Every document, letter, magazine or newspaper I picked up has this same phrase, "counterproductive to those objectives". So we are going backwards under their ridiculous policy.

The letter continues:

> In view of the far-reaching national and international implications of the NEP, we respectfully request that your government establish a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to undertake a full examination of the impact and ramifications of the National Energy Program.

Again referring to the National Energy Program, the letter goes on to point out:

> These implications include the health of the national economy, jobs in every part of Canada, the secure supply of oil over the immediate and longer term, our international trade and balance of payments, and the unity of the country. Indeed, as stated in the NEP itself, the program "will impinge . . . in almost every sphere of Canadian activity,—"

The activity seems to be taking place at the borders where trucks are lined up loaded with drilling equipment moving out of the country.

It was reported the other day that at Coutts, Alberta, there was a line-up of trucks of one mile long last week. The energy minister disputed this today, but we are getting pictures of these trucks lined up and leaving. I am sure the minister would say that the picture in the Red Deer Advocate is false and that they are telling lies and that this is not happening. I doubt very much if the Advocate is publishing false pictures and giving false information about drilling equipment and trucks leaving Canada. A report in last Thursday's Advocate states as follows:

Rigs Leave—A convoy of trucks carrying a disassembled oil drilling rig clears through United States customs at Coutts on the Alberta-Montana border Thursday. This rig, owned by Hi-Tower Drilling Ltd. of Edmonton, needed 30 trucks to transport it, although some require up to 60 trucks. About 50 rigs have moved south through Coutts since last October when the federal energy policy was announced.

Today the hon. member for Assiniboia gave more figures about the devastating effect this is having on the province of Saskatchewan. The Saskoil Company is applying to do drilling in Montana. How are we to become self-sufficient when this sort of thing happens? I think the reason the Liberals are continuing with this disastrous policy is because they are trying to squirm out of the ridiculous statement they made in the last election campaign that they were going to get cheap gas for Canadians. I think they had better get off that "cheap gas" idea and tell the truth to the Canadian people. They should tell the people how much of their money is being spent daily to bring imported oil from the OPEC countries. I brought this up in a motion today, Mr. Chairman. It costs $12 million per day for oil from the OPEC countries. They will become wealthy and have all their people working. But not this country, Mr. Chairman.

I should now like to read part of a letter from the chairman of the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited—not some company over in Africa or Asia. The letter states:

Since the passing of the October budget, and the introduction of the National Energy Program, parliamentary and media debate on Canadian energy policy has been intense. As chairman of one of Canada's principal petroleum companies, I am acutely aware of the importance, not only to the industry but also to the economic and social well-being of Canadians, of an energy policy of optimum benefit to the nation.

He enclosed a brochure. I shall not read all of it but just some of the more important parts. On page 5 it states:

The over-all impact of the measures proposed in the National Energy Program will be a very sharp decline in the industry's cash flows and earnings.

With double-digit inflation, Mr. Chairman, you need a large cash flow. You cannot work on a little bit of cash flow.

It continues:

All of the industry forecasts, as well as those made by other knowledgeable observers, indicate that the industry's cash flow will be reduced by approximately 30 per cent and its net earnings by about 50 per cent. This inevitably will result in a substantial reduction in exploration and development activity in western Canada. It also will seriously impair the industry's ability to undertake the risks and finance the massive investment required for development of the oil sands and the frontiers.

So much for energy self-sufficiency under this National Energy Program and these clauses of Bill C-54.

On page 6 the brochure states:

In short, we are firmly convinced that an arbitrarily defined requirement for Canadian control to qualify for the proposed Canadian ownership incentives is not only unnecessary but would unfairly penalize many Canadians who already own shares in the industry. It also could discourage foreign-controlled companies from making shares available for purchase by Canadian investors and thus prove counterproductive to the achievement of greater Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry.

Everything that this government has come out with since it got back into office is counterproductive. It has made absolutely no headway at all in any area.

I have a letter here from a small Canadian company which is struggling to survive, called Riley's Datashare International Ltd., based in Calgary. The letter which was sent to all members on our side of the House states:

Enclosed is an interim financial report which outlines our position on the National Energy Program.

Riley's Datashare International is a data service company providing products to the petroleum industry around the world from offices in Calgary and Houston. We are a public company with over 1,300 shareholders, more than 90% of whom are Canadian residents. While a small company of just 200 employees, 140 of which are in Canada, we believe we are representative of the many petroleum service companies who will be hurt by the NEP.

It is all the little companies, the medium-sized companies and indeed even the multinationals that are being hurt—are getting walloped by these policies. Of course in the end we suffer too.

The letter concludes with the following:

In our view, the program is in need of drastic revision. It threatens economic activity, is furthering the sense of regionalism in western Canada, and jeopardizes our chances of energy security. We urgently suggest reassessment.

I hope that in the near future the finance minister or the energy minister will come up with some way of reassessing or withdrawing this program. They cannot continue with this ridiculous procedure in light of all the evidence that is coming from these firms. We cannot assume they are all lying to us or giving us false information. If they are, then someone had better get up and discount it.

Riley's also enclosed a brochure. In part, under the heading of "National Energy Program" we read:

The major event of the second quarter without doubt was the federal government's National Energy Program and the continued inability of the two senior levels of government in Canada to reach an agreement on petroleum pricing and revenue sharing. Much coherent and sincere opposition to the NEP is being made by the petroleum industry in terms of the impact on the industry and the nation as a whole. In our view the inappropriateness of the program traces to several inconsistent objectives:

They go into great detail about how the program is affecting them. They comment on "Self-sufficiency-Activity" as follows:

The federal government remains committed to energy security and yet the net effect of the NEP is to reduce the industry's ability and willingness to achieve this. Industry cash flow under the program will be reduced.

They go on to explain how this program is affecting their firm and its expansion.

Neither the Minister of Finance nor the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is here, but the Minister of State for Finance is. I would like to refer to Oilweek magazine for January 12, 1981. There is a lengthy article quoting statements and comments made by various provincial cabinet ministers, as well as statements by people in the industry. The only favourable comments I can find in this magazine are some statements made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but the other 15 or 20 statements are extremely critical of the National Energy Program. I think the minister would learn a lot about his government's programs and the effect they are having on the nation if he would read this magazine. If he has not, I would suggest that it would make great reading for him tonight.

The statement by Mr. Robert H. McClelland, minister of energy, mines and petroleum resources for the province of British Columbia, is headed "Significant Slump Expected". I will not read his statement in full, but in part it reads:

—unless the federal government seriously reconsiders its positions, the outlook is very discouraging.

Then there is considerable detail, similar to what was in the two letters I received this week.

The next article to which I will refer is by Mr. Selby W. Porter, president, Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors. This is not a multinational firm nor does it have anything to do with OPEC. He states:

The combination of the recent federal budget, the national energy program, the lack of a pricing agreement for crude oil between the federal government and the producing provinces, and the declining gas sales and exports to the United States, combine to ensure a downturn of exploratory and development activity in 1981.

How on earth can we become self-sufficient when every oil company and drilling company is winding down?

Mr. Porter goes on to say:

The outlook for 1981 in the present circumstances is dismal for the contracting industry; with a forecast of only 5,800 wells to be drilled in 1981, and as a consequence we are faced with the prospect of a large surplus of equipment, service facilities and personnel.

This doom and gloom story goes on. Here is a statement by Mr. Jack M. MacLeod, chairman of the board of governors, Canadian Petroleum Association. The heading of his article is "Self sufficiency goal slips away". Here is another statement: "Canada's potential continues to be frustrated by the failures of our national policies."

I cannot find any statement anywhere which gives this government any credit at all for any of its energy or budget policies. I do not know whether this minister wants to make a statement today as to whether the government is looking at changes, is concerned, or whether this is all false information which these people are handing out.

If the minister would like to take a few minutes to make a statement as a start, we would certainly appreciate hearing from him. The explanation to date from the energy minister was meaningless. Perhaps this minister might have a better explanation as to what corrective measures the government is going to take.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Chairman, I have a few opening comments and then I would like to ask the minister some questions. I assume he is in the House this afternoon to answer some questions.

Mr. McKenzie: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, I wish to rise on a point of order. I do not like to interrupt my colleague, but if the minister is not going to answer any questions, could he inform the House that he is refusing to do so? That way we will know whether we are wasting our time here, and we will just have to make 20-minute speeches. I allowed time for the minister to answer, and he seemed to be rising. Then you recognized the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River. Let us hear from the minister if he wants to answer any questions.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: My apologies to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine. I did not realize the minister was rising. We will ask the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River if we may continue—as I ought to have done earlier—and hear the minister in reply to questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I believe that if we start replying to all the questions asked after each speech, we shall never be able to conclude the clause by clause consideration of this bill. However, as concerns the specific question asked by the hon. member at the end of his speech having regard to the energy policy of this government, I would like to repeat that the position of the government as expressed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is quite clear and very well-known. Not only have the views of the government concerning our energy program been expressed today during the oral question period, but they have also been discussed many times in the last few weeks during the oral question period and outlined during the debate on certain bills. I do not believe that our position in this regard is ambiguous. What we want is to develop the energy sector in Canada and to Canadianize the industry while meeting the objective of self-sufficiency.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. President of the Privy Council on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member from North Carolina—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: I am sorry. I am referring to the hon. member who just rose on a point of order and I apologize to him. I just want to bring to his attention that there is an understanding that we deliver general speeches on clause 1 of the bill. I understand that questions will be posed when we are at clause by clause study of the bill. I hope that we can come to the clause by clause study of the bill as soon as possible so the minister will be in a position to answer all of the questions that will be put to him.

May I add that when the hon. member was asking questions, the minister could not clearly understand what was being asked because he was politely answering one of his Tory colleagues to whom he was speaking.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. I would like to amend slightly what the House leader has just said. The minister was in the House yesterday. He was asked the same question, whether he was going to answer questions at the end of each speech. He said, "no", that he was going to make a list of them, and when the general debate on item one was over he would answer those points that he could. That was the undertaking he gave last night. I do not think that it is harmful to the House to know he made that pledge to us.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the Chair might intervene for a moment. My understanding was as indicated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, that hon. members would not be seeking answers to questions while debate is on clause one, but rather that those questions would be pursued under the relevant clauses. There is no Standing Order of the House at this moment that necessitates that. It is simply, as I understand it, the way members have indicated they wish to proceed.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Chairman, I am not that enthused with the arrangement. However, if it was an understanding arrived at through discussion by all members of the House, certainly I will respect that. I have a few questions for the minister and I hope he will take note of them this afternoon although, I do not know why he would have his officials here if he is not answering questions. My questions are not so much to do with what is in the bill but rather about matters which were left out of the bill. I would have hoped that those questions could have been answered, but I am prepared, if everyone else is, to wait until the minister sums up the discussions with respect to clause 1 of the bill.

At the outset, I want to make a few comments following on those of my colleagues who spoke earlier. The government should not be too surprised if, when dealing with a tax bill, we talk about such matters as energy, and the economic policy in general, and matters which strike even deeper to the very foundation of the institution as it will be affected in the future by the arrangements we are presently discussing with regard to constitutional reform.

I have here a document. It is a copy of a book in our library which the hon. member for Victoria dug up. It lays out the procedure one would follow to establish an extreme radical alternative to the type of western democracy on which our system is built. The book is called "Birth of the Communist Manifesto". The early advocates of communism talked about some of the things one would have to do in order to achieve a redistribution of wealth and the transfer of productive mechanisms away from the bourgeoisie to the workers. According to this book, the following would be required, and I quote:

1. Abolition of property in land and application of all rents of land to public purposes.

2. A heavy progressive or graduated income tax.

3. Abolition of all right of inheritance.

4. Confiscation of the property of all emigrants and rebels.

5. Centralization of credit in the hands of the State, by means of a national bank with State capital and an exclusive monopoly.

6. Centralization of the means of communication and transport in the hands of the State.

7. Extension of factories and instruments of production owned by the State; the bringing into cultivation of wastelands, and the improvement of the soil generally in accordance with a common plan.

8. Equal liability of all to labour. Establishment of industrial armies, especially for agriculture.

It goes on and on. What struck me when reading this is that when you go over it you see that many of these things have already been achieved in our society. This document is the foundation for a very progressive and graduated income tax act. The imposition of those kinds of taxes on property would demean them in a way to affect their value when inherited by one's children.

We already have the centralization of banks. Of late, in our constitutional debate, we have been talking about the nationalization of property. It is being said that the right to own property will no longer be looked at as a right in the future, but rather as a privilege. The right to own property, which in my opinion is the most fundamental basis of western civilization, would no longer be respected in our constitution. I wish to quote another sentence from this very interesting document:

In this sense, the theory of the Communists may be summed up in the single sentence: Abolition of private property.

I do not suggest this government is about to go out and confiscate property. However, we do have that in our energy program. There is a clear confiscation of private assets in the sense that, if they are located on federal lands, the Crown corporation will be directed to move in and assume 25 per cent ownership in the lands and the improvements that have been made under the lease without compensation. If that is not confiscation, I would like someone more knowledgeable to explain what it is.

These people, together with their friends to my left, have done more than that. They are abolishing God. I was tempted to stand up before question period today and move a motion under Standing Order 43 suggesting that we rename this place Babylon, and rename our Prime Minister "the king of Babylon". Obviously he has anointed himself as God. He is wiser than the Almighty. We no longer need any reference to God in our constitution. I do not want to be unkind to the right hon. gentleman, but I sincerely hope that he will not be destined to suffer the same fate as the king of Babylon. As you know, when the king of Babylon denounced Jehovah, a mysterious fiery hand came out and wrote on the wall, "weighed, counted and divided". Of course he was assassinated the same night he made the pronouncement. I do not wish that our Prime Minister be assassinated, but I wish he would reassess in more realistic terms the effects of his type of a new society which he is perpetrating upon us.

After that rather gloomy opening, I want to address some remarks to the minister who previously showed some interest in a proposal I made with regard to northern benefits. This is more directly related to the bill. I wish the minister would make some notes and respond to my questions, either now or at an agreed time.

There is a reference in the bill regarding northern benefits. There is a remission order which allows certain northern benefits which employers in northern and remote areas of the country pay to their employees on which no income tax is payable. These benefits are now identified. They basically have to do with travel, housing subsidies, and other direct costs for which the employer wishes to compensate the employee. There is no remission at the moment for actual northern benefits paid out in cash.

I spoke yesterday in the House with respect to my proposals. I laid out to hon. members, and specifically to the minister, the rather serious inequity which exists in northern Canada where living costs are much higher than in other parts of the country. I pointed out the effects of this kind of insensitive income tax policy on lower-income people in the north, particularly those on fixed incomes, old age pensions, unemployment insurance and other forms of social assistance. The payments are the same everywhere in this country. An unemployment cheque is the same amount for a person north of 60 as in the rest of the province. The amount of the old age pension is the same. However, living costs are three times higher in some areas than in the cities.

With the evidence produced through my report, we had every right to expect some reflection of the proposals, which are being actively studied by the department, in this bill. There is no doubt that the report is based on logic. The government compensates employees in the north with cash payments to mitigate the cost differences, the financial hardships associated with northern living. The federal government pays between $1,000 and $12,000 a year to employees of the public service who are posted in isolated areas. I would ask the minister whether it would not be reasonable to expect, if it is costly and difficult for federal employees or employees of large corporations, both of which have chosen to compensate their employees, to cope with these special circumstances, that it is equally costly and difficult for every other Canadian living in the north?

I have enumerated some of the problems that add to the cost of northern living, including the high cost of gasoline. I have pointed out some areas where a gallon of gasoline costs $5 or $6, and that perishable foods have to be flown in by aircraft and therefore are three or four times the cost in cities.

I have pointed out that other countries with similar geographic difficulties are dealing with this problem by establishing different tax zones and allowing taxpayers in those zones greater personal exemptions in order to equalize opportunities and to achieve a greater degree of equality and fairness in the sense of income tax. After all, equity and fairness are supposed to be the basis of the act. With a graduating and progressive tax scheme one is supposed to be charged taxes in accordance with his ability to pay, and there is no doubt that one's ability to pay in this country varies very dramatically in accordance with where one lives.

I was able to table my report before the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I know the minister of the department has a serious commitment to give earnest study to that document. I am also told that the committee on northern affairs, on finance, and national revenue, and the officials of the three departments are seriously looking at the whole question of northern benefits and will be making recommendations to the cabinet, the Treasury Board, and the Minister of National Revenue in relation to the handling of the tax act as it applies to northern residents.

I notice that the Minister of National Revenue has just entered the chamber. I know as well of his interest. He has written to me and has said they are earnest and serious in their assessment of this rather serious situation. What I would ask him to do is nothing else but to use the same criteria the federal government uses to compensate its northern employees in terms of housing subsidies, cash payments or northern living allowances, applying that same criteria on a more universal basis, namely, to use the Income Tax Act to allow all northern residents, whether they work for the government, some other business or even northern businessmen, to make the same kind of deductions. After all, that must only be fair.

I would ask him to study seriously, for instance, what Australia is doing in that regard, and what Denmark is doing in its treatment of taxpayers in Greenland. These people undoubtedly have come to the same conlusion that I reached. I want to tell the minister how serious this matter is for the 5 per cent of Canadians who live in the two tax zones I have identified in my study. This percentage of people would have paid $470 million too much in personal income tax if nothing else were done except the application of these criteria. That has to be very dramatic. In many cases the tax dollar is taking food out of the mouths of children. Their parents cannot afford the kind of nutritious food other Canadians could not possibly do without.

I would ask the minister to look seriously at that. I can assure him there is a wide community and constituency of support for this proposal. Certainly the federation of independent business people has embraced the proposal as a policy and many of the unions operating in the north, the steelworkers, for instance, have made that their national policy. Every municipality in the north has written me letters of support, and I am sure the minister has received letters as well. Strangely enough, as I speak on open line programs throughout the country I get nothing but a positive response, even from people in the larger cities who just simply do not understand how difficult and costly it is to cope with the harsh realities of northern winters, the isolation, and having to send children two or three thousand miles away to learning institutions, or to hospitals for special medical treatment, and so on.

All I am saying is that in order to achieve any degree of equity and fairness in the north, the Income Tax Act would be the tool to use. The establishment of different tax zones would be a method that is acceptable. It has been proven in many other countries and deserves the consideration of this government. I am very disappointed that some of these proposals were not reflected in this particular bill, but I am hopeful the minister, in response to my comments, will be able to enlighten us as to how the multidepartmental study is going and what the government's views are in respect of these proposals.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for just a moment about the special 50 per cent investment tax credit proposed in this bill.

In my view the designation of areas to receive the special 50 per cent investment tax credit should involve regions of the country which suffer the effects of regional disparity, instead of census divisions within regions and, indeed, within provinces. Last Wednesday I spoke at length on this matter and made my argument in that regard. Today I should like to detail a few points in support of my argument.

According to the data base on which the program is based, 13 of the 42 areas selected do not qualify for designation with regard to the per capita income and family unemployment rate criteria used in the selection process. An additional factor, that of isolation, has to be included in order to effect the qualification.

Eleven areas that do not qualify under the per capita income and family unemployment rate criteria are not included. I would like to illustrate this point by referring to the census divisions identified in the province of Quebec.

L'Islet, census division 13, has a per capita income of $2,760 and a family unemployment rate of 3.3 per cent. This area is not included, while Rivière du Loup, census division 8, with a per capita income of $3,577 and a lower family unemployment rate of 3 per cent, is included.

L'Islet is part of Bellechasse, which for a long time was represented by a distinguished Social Credit member of Parliament, and is now represented by an able member of the government caucus, who may wish to pursue this matter. If he does so, the research material I have gathered will be available to him.

Labelle, census division 16, has a per capita income of $3,227 and a family unemployment rate of 3 per cent. Again, Labelle is worse off than Rivière du Loup, but it too is excluded, and I have to ask why.

Charlevoix, which is represented in the House by my friend, the Minister of State for Small Businesses, has a per capita income of $4,000 and a family unemployment rate of 3.2 per cent, but is not included as an area designated to receive the benefit. Apparently the Minister of State for Small Businesses does not enjoy the same good fortune as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Finance whose constituencies are included. That is quite understandable, but perhaps the Minister of State for Small Businesses will have some difficulty explaining to his constituents how the Minister of National Revenue was so fortunate as to have part of his constituency included, with a per capita average income of $5,531 and a family unemployment rate of only 1.5 per cent, in census district number 10, which is Labrador.

I want to be the first one to suggest that the answer is to be found in the weight that is given to an isolation factor, but looking at the per capita income of $5,531 which is higher than most included areas of Quebec, and a family unemployment rate of 1.5 per cent—a lower unemployment rate than all the other areas in Quebec which are included—I have to suggest to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and the Minister of National Revenue that that is some isolation factor!

If my colleagues from Quebec who are left out of the designation marvel at the way that the identification has been done, they will probably find great sympathy from my colleague from Haliburton in Ontario, census district 46, which has an average income of $3,879 and a family unemployment rate of 3.1 per cent. It is the only census division in Ontario to meet the criteria of the program. Yet it is not included in the program.

Part of Thunder Bay district, in census district 58 which is included, has an average income of $6,827 and a family unemployment rate of 2 per cent. Again, it must be some heavy weight that is given to the isolation factor!

If the isolation factor is great in Ontario, some other mysterious and powerful force is at work in Nova Scotia. The Minister of Finance must be delighted that Inverness, census district 15 in his riding, with an average per capita income of $3,674 and a family unemployment rate of 3.1 per cent, is included, while the member for South West Nova is hung out to dry in respect of Digby, census district number 3 in her riding, which has a per capita income of $2,826 and a family unemployment rate of 3.3 per cent. Inverness is in, and Digby is out. In fact they both should be in, but for some strange reason the area represented by the distinguished member for South West Nova has been excluded.

She is in pretty good company because Cumberland, census district number 11 in Nova Scotia, with an average income of $3,524 and an unemployment rate of 3.3 per cent, has also been excluded. The member for South West Nova is in good company with the very able member for Cumberland-Colchester.

For a real shocker we go to Queen's County, New Brunswick, census district number 4, which has the lowest per capita income in all of New Brunswick at $2,484, and is excluded. Its 3.3 per cent family unemployment rate is higher than one, and the same as two areas included from that province.

By removing Rimouski, the urban area, from the county, by removing Sept-Îles from Saguenay in Quebec, by removing Thompson from census district 22 in Manitoba, and Grande Prairie from census district 15 in Alberta, the rest of the census division in each case was able to qualify.

I want to suggest to the minister, who is quite prepared to ignore the city of Moncton in New Brunswick and the city of St. John's in Newfoundland, that he at least consider using this same technique to recognize the balance of the counties in which these areas are located. This is, of course, predicated on the stubborn determination of the government not to do the right thing and to recognize all of the Atlantic provinces as a region that suffers from disparity and should be identified for the benefits of this otherwise excellent program.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Chairman, like my colleagues, I have a terrible temptation to use clause 1 of this bill for a global assault on a government which richly deserves it, but in the interest of time I will zero right in on a point which I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister of State for Finance and also of the Minister of National Revenue who is here, because what I am going to talk about, Mr. Chairman, is the question of voluntary agencies in Canada and the income tax amendment which is very sorely needed on their behalf which will, at one and the same time, be a social advance in this country and save the government $93 million. A proposal to improve the social conditions in our country and make a substantial saving to the public taxpayer, to the government, is a proposal which, if you do not want to build a monument to the one who makes it, at least should be taken seriously by a government concerned about the public purse today.

It is not a new proposal, Mr. Chairman. I am bringing it up again in this debate because the government has not moved on the proposal which has been put forward in the form of various motions over the years by about half a dozen members, and most recently by myself on June 9, 1980. I draw to the minister's attention pages 1898 to 1905 of Hansard of that day. In that debate is to be found the detail of a proposal which is not terribly complicated but which contains many figures to sustain the point I made a moment ago, which is that my proposal would actually result in saving the government $93 million in the initial year.

In essence, the proposal is that the standard $100 deduction for charitable donations be done away with and that taxpayers be given an option of either claiming their gifts to charitable and voluntary organizations as deductions from taxable income, or be allowed to claim 50 per cent of the value of the gift or donation as a tax credit.

Doing away with the $100 standard deduction immediately saves the government, on the figures of 1977 which are the most recent ones available, $245 million. It also becomes much more fair to people who are actually giving donations to voluntary organizations, and it becomes more fair to the organizations because there is a greater incentive for people to make donations to voluntary organizations when they can be given the choice of a deduction, if their tax credit is such that it is more advantageous for them to do that, which it would be for high income earners, or the choice of claiming a tax credit for 50 per cent of the gift, which would apply to a great majority of income taxpayers in the middle to lower ends of the scale.

This is not a fly-by-night proposal. The origin of it goes back to the National Voluntary Organization, an umbrella group of 108 national voluntary and charitable organizations representing some 45,000 registered charities in Canada. These are organizations for the disadvantaged, the poor, the sick and the needy. They are organizations for children and the aged, health organizations, organizations for research into heart and lung disease, cancer, diabetes, muscular dystrophy, health services for the mentally and physically handicapped. They are religious organizations sustaining and preserving our spiritual values, international development organizations, educational organizations, environmental organizations, native, ethnic and cultural organizations. There is a wide group within our society which this organization represents. Indeed it would be hard to think of a Canadian who is not touched one way or another by the social benefits provided to our society by voluntary organizations.

What is happening to voluntary organizations today? They are being hit by the inflation factor in such a way that patterns are now established of a decline in giving because of the squeeze in which so many people find themselves and the transferring of that financial squeeze to those groups that have hitherto been the beneficiaries of a charity based upon a reasonable financial position which is now being eroded as a result of inflation.

I am not advancing an argument against controlling inflation. I am only recognizing the inevitability of continuing inflation and what it is doing to voluntary and charitable organizations which perform such a tremendous service to our country. Briefly, they are in a tax squeeze.

If a change were made to the Income Tax Act along the lines that I have mentioned, the situation would be improved. I must say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave support to my proposal. Of course he entered certain caveats. There were certain measures in my motion about which the hon. member had some reservations. I accept those reservations because I am not wedded to the precise detail of how the Income Tax Act should be amended in such a way as to give incentive to people to increase their donations to voluntary and charitable organizations. I am only speaking to the principle of it, that the time has come to make a change to the Income Tax Act which will be of benefit to voluntary organizations and will be an enrichment to the social fabric of the country. I can say that there is widespread support in the House for such a move.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance responded to my motion, but he did not even bother to listen to the arguments or to figure out the actual computations of the figures which I advanced on behalf of national voluntary organizations. He made a canned speech which was written beforehand. The figures included in my motion to my knowledge have not yet been disputed by the Department of Finance.

I will not argue about a few dollars one way or another. I am only advancing the position that the introduction of such an amendment would be not only socially beneficial, but it would be a saving to taxpayers. I advanced the argument that the cost to government for such a proposal would be $391 million, whereas at the present time it costs $484 million in tax revenues because of the way in which the present law is written. The parliamentary secretary said that we cannot afford it. I say that we can. I say there is a widespread public support in Canada for such a move and that the time has come for us to advance it.

I have received mail from various voluntary organizations and national associations all over the country. I will refer to only a few to show the wide range of support for this proposal—the Canadian Mental Health Association, the National Council of YMCAs of Canada, the Canadian Heart Foundation, the National Indian Brotherhood, Grant MacEwan Community College in Edmonton, and the Canadian Jesuit Missions. That is only a handful of the organizations in Canada which support the proposal and would be among the beneficiaries.

Finally I come to an argument which I think has an overriding appeal. When we consider what needs to be done to help voluntary organizations which are of tremendous benefit to the country, when we consider the widespread support for an income tax amendment which would increase the incentive for Canadians to give to those organizations, and when we consider that it would be a fair tax return to the Canadian government and to Canadian taxpayers, all of that should carry the case. But, there is one final argument.

On behalf of the political parties of this country we put in place a few years ago an income tax amendment which allowed people to give to political parties and to receive a tax write-off of 75 per cent at the bottom line. I think there is an argument to be advanced for political parties because they also make a very important contribution to the total fabric of our society. As a result of that income tax amendment, the political parties are now able to raise money despite inflation. They are able to raise plenty of money for their needs.

I am particularly directing my remarks to the Minister of National Revenue. If we can make such an amendment on behalf of political parties, I submit the time has come for us to apply the same principle of a tax credit of 50 per cent at the bottom line—I am only asking for 50 per cent of what is given to registered charities and national voluntary organizations. If we can do it for political organizations, I submit the time has come in the spirit of social justice for us to do it for voluntary organizations which are providing such a tremendous benefit to everyone in the country.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, I enter this debate with some apprehension. Because the officials of the minister are available in the House and we are meeting in Committee of the Whole, I understood that questions would be answered. But now I am not sure whether I understood that properly. Can I ask questions and expect answers now, or can I ask questions and expect answers later?

Mr. Bussières: Later.

Mr. McKnight: Well, just to start off, we have heard some discussion about the problems in the tax laws of Canada. I am not sure whether it is because they are written by lawyers, economists, or computer experts in a computer language with which not too many of us are familiar.

From watching television and from reading my daily and weekly newspapers, I know that the government spends hundreds—and I would presume hundreds of thousands—of dollars of taxpayers' money telling Canadian taxpayers how simple and easy it is to understand the tax system.

I should like to refer to one clause in Bill C-54. If the minister's officials feel able, when I come close to the end of my time, I would gladly give them an opportunity to explain it. Clause 66.2(6) reads as follows:

> Where a non-resident person is a member of a partnership that is deemed under Paragraph 115(4)(b) to have disposed of a property described in Subsection 59(1.1), his share of any amount that would be an amount referred to in Clause (5)(b)(v)(A) or Subparagraph (5)(b)(vi) or (xi) in respect of the partnership for a taxation year of the partnership if section 96 were read without reference to Paragraph (1)(d) thereof shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to be an amount referred to in Clause (5)(b)(v)(A) or Subparagraph (5)(b)(iv) or (xi), as the case may be, in respect of the non-resident person for the taxation year of the non-resident person that is deemed under Paragraph 115(4)(a) to have ended.

I know that sounds like a speech made by the Minister of Transport, or maybe the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board in the other place. To be fair, I think it is maybe a bit extreme. But I think it is an example of the problems that we, as members of Parliament, have in trying to understand the tax laws. It is an example of additional costs accruing to individuals in Canada in trying to meet the requirements of good Canadian citizenship, that is, of fulfilling their tax obligations.

In Bill C-54, and in the budget, a considerable amount of time was spent with respect to the National Energy Program and also with respect to something called COR, Canadian Ownership Rate. I question the ability of this document to say what oil company in Canada, what company, could be called Canadian. There have been discussions with respect to that question during question period. I have been trying to read up on the subject to the best of my ability. There are two companies which come to mind when considering this matter, Dome Petroleum, which is considered by everyone to be Canadian, and Home Oil. The ownership rate which applies to Dome Petroleum, according to the rules as Jack Gallagher and I interpret them, is a tremendously difficult matter. The company's 15,287 registered shareholders, under the COR rules, only bring the Canadian ownership rate up to 52 per cent. Dome requested that it be able to purchase an interest in a company, of which it owns 49 per cent, in order to bring up its Canadian content. That company is TransCanada Pipe Lines. Is Dome Petroleum a Canadian company or is it not? Bill C-54 is mute on that.

The other company I mentioned, Home Oil, is owned 100 per cent by Hiram-Walker Consumers Home Ltd. If the same rules are applied to Home Oil it is 75 per cent to 80 per cent Canadian-owned. These circumstances illustrate some of the problems which industry in Canada sees.

I would like to ask the Department of Finance if it is aware of the computer modules which the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has established, according to Edmund Clark, for the cash flow of every oil company in Canada? If the department is aware, does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources accept the figures that the cash flow of the oil companies will be 28 per cent higher this year than last year, as stated by the Minister of Finance in answer to a question from the hon. member for Calgary Centre? This is cash flow which is needed by the oil companies for reinvestment. Or does the minister accept the figures of Mr. Bell, the Vice-President of Petro-Canada, which show that the cash flow of the oil companies will be 25 per cent less this year than they were last year?

If these computer modules are in place I do not see why there should be a discrepancy of over 50 per cent in these figures. Why is there this discrepancy between the figures of the Minister of Finance and the statement made yesterday in the Toronto Star by Mr. Bell?

I would also like to know if the department is aware that the figures for drilling for oil in Canada in the second quarter of 1981 will be 54 per cent to 58 per cent less than last year. If so, do the officials agree with those figures? Do they also agree that more than 50 per cent of the drilling rigs presently working will have their contracts expire before the second quarter of 1981? We hear the gobbledygook from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to there being more rigs drilling this year that at the same time last year. If the minister were to take the time to visit western Canada and go into the oil-producing areas, he would hear some statistics which would bother him considerably.

Most of the drilling rigs are now under contract. The reason they are under contract is because until this present program was put in place under the National Energy Program the use of rigs was at a premium in Canada. So oil companies had to contract on a long-term basis in order to have rigs available. The rigs which are presently drilling are also drilling for another reason. We have heard figures about the increase in drilling in Saskatchewan. The reason there was an increase in November and December is because of the credit system which was set up by the government of Saskatchewan. The system was such that if you drilled so many wells you would get an increase in your royalty. That system was removed as of January 1. So companies looked at their credit pool and decided that they must drill more wells in order to use up their credits. That is what they did. That is one of the reasons why there was more activity in the fourth quarter of 1979.

The problem we have in my constituency is with respect to capital gains. Several of my colleagues have spoken about this matter. In my opinion the capital gains tax is a tax after a tax. In view of statements made here I am sure everyone is aware of the promise made during the election campaign by the government. Ministers promised to change V-Day for capital gains from 1971 to 1974 values. I wonder if the minister could explain why this has not been done. Perhaps I have misread something because of my inability to read computereeze. I do not think I have. I think it is something which this government promised and which it has not given. It is like so many other things. What bothers me with respect to capital gains is that we in this party seem to be the only ones in this House who think it is a double tax.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood accused the government of abandoning a field of wealth taxation when it removed the taxation on capital gains and estate taxes in 1972. We in this party do not stand for a death tax. Apparently the NDP does. I find it strange that the hon. member for Vancouver East suggested in this House that there should be a 100 per cent capital gains tax. The farmers in Saskatchewan, even the ones in NDP constituencies, do not believe there should be a 100 per cent capital gains tax on their sweat, blood and toil, on that which has taken them sometimes three or four generations to build up. This government made a commitment to remove some of the onerous aspects of the capital gains tax in its election promises in the February campaign. We look forward to seeing those promises kept when Bill C-54 is translated into English or French.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock tomorrow.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FISHERIES

CONSERVATION OF CHINOOK SALMON STOCKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) is planning to close the Fraser River to commercial fishing for the entire 1981 season, and whereas this decision will threaten the livelihood of some 1,000 gill-net fishermen on the Lower Fraser, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House instruct the Minister of Fisheries to make a full disclosure of all the management options which have been put forward by his consultants and officials to conserve the depleting chinook salmon stocks; and, furthermore, that the minister be required to amend his management plan for 1981 so that the burden of conservation is shared equitably by all those who fish, instead of imposing closure upon the Fraser River gill-net fishermen.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PROPERTY RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the very real and serious concern expressed by Canadians that the right to own property will not be contained in the constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House call on the NDP to reconsider their position, change their minds, and give their consent to allow the Liberal government to reintroduce the PC amendment on the right to own property, and that they accept the position of the Saskatchewan NDP government who recognize the importance of entrenching property rights and have provided for this in their provincial bill of rights.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRADE

EXPORT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL TO JAPAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas a coal deal for sending northeastern British Columbia coal to Japan has been announced—the largest export contract ever negotiated by Canada, I believe—and whereas not only do we continue to sell off non-renewable resources in an unmanufactured state, but in this deal the taxpayer actually subsidizes the Japanese to the extent of some $578 million, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That the federal government release immediately all of its cost analysis studies on this incredible deal, and postpone any federal expenditures or subsidies until the matter can be examined by a special committee of the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RADIO-CANADA LABOUR DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR NOMINATION OF MEDIATOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the unexpected length of the strike by reporters of the CBC French network, which has been going on for 93 days, and the formal commitment made by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) last November when he promised that he would not let that conflict deteriorate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the minister be called on to appoint an independent mediator from the Department of Labour who would be entrusted with starting negotiations between the parties involved.

Madam Speaker: Order. The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF ALBERTA REGIONAL DIRECTOR GENERAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the concern and discontent being expressed by the Alberta Indian community over the appointment of the Director General for the province, and since many urgent and critical problems cannot be solved quickly unless the Director General has the complete confidence of the Indian community, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the minister follow the advice of the IAA and have the position of the Alberta regional Director General filled by open competition, and that the Chiefs Committee conduct the screening of applicants and recommend final selection.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent necessity. Farm bankruptcies in 1980 increased 75 per cent over 1979, which did not incude those who gave up farming to enter other occupations. We all appreciate the importance of agriculture to our national economy. However, with interest rates rapidly increasing and with farm operating costs dramatically high, the only option farmers have is to borrow from the Farm Credit Corporation. Therefore, in view of the fact that CIDA has loaned $6.5 million to Barbados for a water system at a rate of 3½ per cent for 30 years, with seven years grace, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the Minister of Agriculture meet with the minister responsible for CIDA in order to discover the method by which CIDA can loan money at 3.5 per cent and then employ that knowledge to lower Farm Credit Corporation's rate to 3.5 per cent and thus give agriculture in Canada that necessary boost we give so readily to others.

PROPOSED VISIT TO BRANDON, MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that since last February the Prime Minister has travelled to Italy, Britain, Sweden, Norway, Saudi Arabia, North Yemen, Egypt, West Germany, France, Austria, Algeria, Nigeria, Senegal, Brazil and Mexico, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House welcomes yesterday's announcement by the Prime Minister's office that the Prime Minister will be visiting Brandon, Manitoba, on February 4.

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that many thousands of farmers have been advised that they failed to qualify under the Herd Maintenance Program and have launched appeals against the decision, and in view of the fact that the criteria for qualifying under the plan are based solely on the average yield for cereal grains for the past three years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Minister of Agriculture review the criteria and instruct the board to change its regulations to take into consideration the average yields of hay and forage crops.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

GASOLINE—SUBSIDIZATION OF PURCHASES MADE BY U.S. MOTORISTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to draw attention to an anomaly in Canadian gas prices which is resulting in Canadian taxpayers subsidizing United States vehicle operators. The incidence of one-day United States visitors to Canada is up over 50 per cent, the reason being obvious, that they are crossing the border to fill up their tanks with far cheaper Canadian gasoline. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That to emphasize the tangible benefits of our good-neighbour policy, Petro-Canada issue give-away cards indicating to United States motorists the extent to which each gallon of gas they purchase is subsidized by Canadian taxpayers. We have all heard of "Pay as You Go"; in this case "We Pay and They Go". In other words, "Tanks for the Memories".

PENSION ACT

CALL FOR INCREASE IN WAR DISABILITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), I move:

That this House urges the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce, at an early date, an amendment to the Pension Act to provide for the basic rate of the war disability pension to be set each year at the average take-home pay of the five categories in the public service that were designated for this purpose in 1972, it being the view of this House that veterans should not have to wait several years at a time for adjustments to be made but that the increases agreed to in principle should be made automatically, each year, without fail.

RISING INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Again this week interest rates have risen to unbelievable heights. The new interest rate set by the Bank of Canada is 17.11 per cent.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House does condemn the government for refusing to keep interest rates at reasonable levels and does direct the Prime Minister to accept the resignation of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce so that he can retire from the government with some honour.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INQUIRY WHETHER CHANGES CONTEMPLATED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question was for the Prime Minister as I thought he was going to be in the House today, but I will direct it either to the acting prime minister or the acting minister of energy, mines and resources. In fact I will direct it to anyone rather than the acting minister of justice.

Before Christmas we were told and we knew, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made some changes in the National Energy Program proposals that concerned exploratory wells. Last week in Alberta the minister of energy announced that as far as he was concerned in energy policy, everything was open to negotiation and that he was flexible. I wonder if the acting prime minister or the acting minister of energy could tell the House, in light of those statements and developments, whether the government is contemplating any further changes in the National Energy Program and, if so, when those changes will be announced to the House of Commons?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the right hon. member opposite is correct in drawing attention to modifications in the details of the program which have come forward as the elaboration of the program has proceeded. He has referred specifically to two areas announced prior to the Christmas recess. As we proceed further with the detailed elaboration of the program there may also be occasion for further modification.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we are dealing here with a program that is already driving oil rigs, Canadian investment and Canadian jobs out of the country. It is a program that is shrouded in uncertainty. The answer by the parliamentary secretary has just added to that uncertainty because he said that there may be more changes at a time unspecified, and of a kind unspecified. We need to know, the industry needs to know, and people looking for job security in Canada need to know when these changes will be introduced.

The Prime Minister is now in the House, Madam Speaker, so I shall direct my question again, and with your permission I shall try to bring him up to date.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just indicated that there were indeed some changes announced by the minister of energy in the National Energy Program and that—I believe I am paraphrasing correctly—as events develop there may be—there will be further changes in the program.

I have made the point that this is a source of great uncertainty in the country. I should like to have from the Prime Minister an indication of when we will have a detailed announcement of the changes to come in the National Energy Program so that we can put some end, some limit to the uncertainty that is undermining investor confidence and is undermining our capacity to become self-sufficient in energy. When will we have a detailed list of those changes that the parliamentary secretary indicated are being contemplated in the National Energy Program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not hear the parliamentary secretary, and I apologize as I was a couple of minutes late coming into the House.

I am sure that the position of the government is well known. It has been expressed by the minister before. It is that the national energy policy is government policy; that the essence, the thrust, the objectives of it are absolutely unchangeable and that, as we do with legislation and other policy statements, we do what I think the opposition parties have asked us to do, to see if in the application of it certain adjustments could not be made.

The minister has said, and his parliamentary secretary has said, that we are meeting with the industry. I also said that in the House a few weeks ago, that we are meeting with the industry to hear their views on how the policy would affect them in detail, much as we do after a budget when we have tax legislation and we hear representations from concerned citizens on how it would affect them. If there are any minor changes which can be made to make the policy better applicable and fairer for Canadians, we will consider them and we will announce them.

This is not a new procedure. It is done after every budget when we bring in tax measures. We sit down once they are known and see how they could be improved, not in their essence but in their wording or in their application.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. This is certainly now a new procedure. We saw it in the committee on the constitution the other day. We now have three different statements of the policy of the Government of Canada. The parliamentary secretary says there are going to be some changes; the Prime Minister says that the program is policy, it is the policy of the Government of Canada, and the minister of energy says that everything is open to negotiation. That is what he said. That is exactly what he said in a television interview in Alberta. He also said, which stretches credulity, that he is flexible, and he went on to say that everything is open to negotiation.

The House of Commons has a right to know, and the people have a right to know, just exactly what the state of the National Energy Program is. Is it going to be changed? When is it going to be changed? When will we know exactly what that program is. Let me ask a specific question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: I really thought that was the question. I will let the Prime Minister answer that one.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the policy is policy, and everything in it is not subject to negotiation.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, this is a new record. We have two ministers repudiated by the Prime Minister in the course of one week, because that repudiates the minister of energy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me ask the Prime Minister whether the government is conducting any polls—des sondages—today, or has the government commissioned any polls recently regarding any aspects of the National Energy Program? If it has, will those questions be tabled in the House of Commons immediately?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I take exception to the preface of the question about repudiating ministers. I indicated the other day our position on the constitution. Today we have only the word of the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Andre: I heard it on television.

Mr. Trudeau: —based on some press report that everything was negotiable.

Mr. Andre: I saw it.

Mr. Trudeau: I am absolutely certain that that is not the position of the minister.

Mr. Andre: I saw him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR CONFIRMATION RESPECTING EXODUS OF CANADIAN CAPITAL

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. The dollar is once more under pressure with interest rates again higher, recorded at 17.11 per cent by the Bank of Canada earlier this afternoon. Is the Prime Minister aware, with Canadian oil prices now at $17.75 a barrel, compared with unregulated oil prices in the United States of something between $40 to $50 a barrel there, that there has been a mass exodus of Canadian capital—including capital from Canadian companies—to the United States, which in turn is putting our dollar under pressure and causing unnecessarily high interest rates in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker, I am afraid I cannot confirm that.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, we can only despair for this nation when the Prime Minister said he is not aware of a fact—

Mr. Trudeau: I did not say that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I said I could not confirm the silly statement you made.

Mr. Stevens: It is a silly statement now, Madam Speaker.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Speaking at least about silly actions, would the Prime Minister indicate why he feels that the government is justified in negotiating with Saudi Arabia and with Mexico for oil at world prices while at the same time he is insisting that a fairer price for Canadian oil producers will not be forthcoming?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I hesitate to qualify that question because I thought the hon. member and his party knew that Canada is not self-sufficient in petroleum. We have to import petroleum.

An hon. Member: We will never be self-sufficient.

Mr. Trudeau: Because we have to import petroleum, we cannot pay other than the world price, for the prices asked of us by those who want to export to Canada. It is as simple as that. When we are self-sufficient in petroleum, the price of oil that belongs to Canadians should be set by Canadians in Canada, and that is our position.

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES ON INFLATION

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Cape Breton Svengali, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. It concerns interest rates which were announced today showing again that the Bank of Canada has intervened in the market in order to raise Canadian interest rates.

As a preface to the question I would like to point out to the minister that on December 17 at a press conference governor Bouey said:

> I think that interest rates that high would have an impact on inflation and inflationary expectations if they are kept there for a while.

Does the minister agree that the impact of interest rates, which have been maintained at a high level by the government for a persistently long period of time, will have the inevitable effect of giving all Canadians the expectation that that is what inflation is going to be like, and lead to an increase in inflationary expectations and an increase in the problem of inflation, rather than have the effect of decreasing inflation, which is supposed to be the government's policy?

● (1425)

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I do not quite agree with the premise of the hon. member's question. I feel that the statement made by the governor of the Bank of Canada, as quoted by the hon. member, is accurate but that it has in a way a somewhat wider scope in that the governor of the Bank of Canada did not specify a limited time period nor did he indicate when interest rates would start having an impact on inflationary expectations. I suggest that the current interest rates reflect the conditions of the marketplace and demonstrate the need to support the monetary policy as a long-term means of fighting inflation.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S INTERVENTION WITH RESPECT TO HIGHER MORTGAGE RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is addressed to the minister responsible for housing. Will the minister explain through this House to the average Canadian how it makes any sense that if you took out a mortgage loan in August, you were taking out a mortgage at 11¾ per cent, but if you took out a mortgage in December, or now, you are taking out a mortgage at 16 per cent or 17 per cent? Is it the minister's position that the Las Vegas morality of a lottery should dictate the level of mortgages of Canadians over time or is there some other principle involved? Is the minister prepared to intervene on behalf of the average Canadian so that there is equity between those Canadians who have to renew in August and those who renew in the winter of our discontent, January and February?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, presumably the greatest number of Canadians looking to renew a mortgage at this time, in the next few weeks or months, have had the mortgage on average for a five-year period. Their five-year renewable mortgages are now maturing. As I explained in an answer before, there is no question about the ability of the average Canadian to meet those increased costs as incomes have increased on average, especially in areas covered by union contracts, by 10 per cent per year during that five-year period.

Mr. Rae: As the minister is well aware, the average income and purchasing power of Canadians has declined over the last three years. My final supplementary is to the Minister of State for Finance. The minister will be aware that the Inspector General of Banks gave an interview to The Financial Post on January 10, 1981, in which he criticized the finance committee for having intervened on behalf of small business and on behalf of competitors with the banks. In referring to future legislation, he sees himself as the spokesman for the banks. He said, "This is a battle we have not lost". I would therefore ask the minister how we can possibly rely on his department and the Inspector General of Banks to do the job necessary to inspect those institutions which have been reaping such profits from the exorbitant interest rate policy, which is a policy of this government, when clearly his own civil servants see themselves not as spokesmen for the Canadian consumer and Canadian small business—but as apologists for the banks.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I would not want hon. members to believe that the duties of the Inspector General of Banks and the rates of interest are connected in any way. First of all, I suggest that these are two separate questions. So much for the first point. Secondly, with regard to the remarks which the Inspector General of Banks is reported to have made, I have been unable to confer with the Inspector General who has not yet returned from his trip to Japan. I will confer with him at the first opportunity and report to the hon. member.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR WRITTEN GUARANTEE RESPECTING FINANCING

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

In answer to a question by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition yesterday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources replied that he had not specifically raised the matter of the continuation of the written guarantees extended by then President Carter last summer, that the Alcan pipeline would be built, in the words of the minister, "whether they do it by financial commitment, legislation, or other means—" which appears at page 3061 of Hansard. Is the Prime Minister now prepared to contact President Reagan, just as he did the former president, to seek in writing at least the same kind of written guarantee that the whole pipeline will be built?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to accept the representation made by the hon. member.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, it certainly is a representation, and it is a request for an answer from the Prime Minister which he has not given. On November 5 last year the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources gave this following guarantee to the House at the time the pre-build legislation was being discussed:

> —as soon as the new administration takes office in January, we will be in touch with it in order to ensure that the commitment will be as firm as it ever was.

It is more than evident from the minister's reply yesterday that this promise has yet to be honoured. Will the Prime Minister take the necessary steps, write President Reagan, so that the government will be keeping the word of the minister, which is on the record of this House, and request the same kind of written guarantee from President Reagan that they thought so important to obtain from President Carter?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, from the outset the government's policy has been known; from the very moment we introduced legislation in the House. It has been made clear several times by the Canadian government, at least ours, to the American administration, to the effect that the pre-build would only proceed on the condition that the whole pipeline will proceed. That position has not changed. I will advise, in the best way of conveying that information, the American administration once again.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AFFIDAVIT—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, the minister responsible for the status of women informed the House yesterday that he had written to the remaining executive members of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women asking for a copy of the secret affidavit. I should like to ask the minister whether he will table his letter of request to the executive?

As the minister will know, the remnant of the council has rescheduled the conference on the constitution for May 29 and 30. Is the government planning to fund this event, and did the minister or any of his staff have any hand in the further delaying of this important event?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I will be glad to table that letter. The advisory council, which is a legitimate and respected advisory council of this government, has made a decision by a majority vote to proceed with the conference and we will, of course, provide it with every assistance necessary.

Mr. McLean: The minister fails to note, Madam Speaker, that the council has lost its representative nature by the resignations and is now representative of only one group and one component only. Let me, if I may in supplementary, ask the minister, since the dates for the women's conference are now May 29 and 30, should this Parliament understand that the government's constitutional package is not going to go to London until June, or is the government determined not to encourage women to speak on the proposals in the constitutional package?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the proposal for a constitutional conference was one I made originally, in the first place, to the advisory council. We will encourage any women's group in Canada which wants to discuss constitutional matters to continue discussing them. The decision by the advisory council is their decision to make, an independent decision. It has nothing to do with the timetable of the government.

RAILWAYS

GRANGE REPORT—INQUIRY RESPECTING PROGRESS OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE DELIBERATIONS

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Last week the minister indicated in the House that his advisory committee on the Mississauga derailment would meet in a week and he would be making decisions very rapidly. In view of the fact that these decisions affect my riding and the riding of Etobicoke Centre represented by my colleague, and in view of the fact there have been persistent reports that the minister is procrastinating in dealing with Mr. Justice Grange's recommendations, can the minister give us any indication of whether the advisory committee has met and whether he intends to move more quickly to protect communities affected by the movement of dangerous commodities?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, indeed the committee, which is a committee to implement and not a committee to study, met yesterday and reported to me this morning. They gave me their recommendation to accept a number of the report's recommendations and I will accept them. They have established an approach to other recommendations, and that approach will be followed. On recommendation No. 3, which has to do with the length of trains and the speed of trains in built-up areas, the Canadian Transport Commission has issued an order to the railways to show cause why this recommendation should not be implemented very rapidly. The railways have a couple of weeks to do so. We will act upon the advice we receive then. All this is to say that this committee is moving.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—ASBESTOS LEVELS IN BAGGAGE HANDLING AREAS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. He was here and I advised him I was going to be asking the question.

As the minister is surely aware, recent tests into asbestos levels in the baggage handling areas of the Winnipeg International Airport have found levels of asbestos fibres as high as twice the government's own maximum limits, and more than 40 times the limit recently recommended by NIOSH, the American agency charged with research into health and safety. I recently visited the airport at Winnipeg and was shocked to find open asbestos in areas where employees have to work 24 hours a day. Is the minister prepared to launch an investigation immediately into this hazardous situation and demand that the asbestos be cleaned up forthwith?

REPORT OF POSSIBLE REJECTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL PACKAGE BY BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I am referring to a press copy of a telephone interview with Anthony Kershaw, chairman of the all-party committee studying the Canadian constitutional package in Britain. I should like to refer that matter to the Prime Minister and the fact that Mr. Kershaw has said, in answer to whether Britain would be obligated to pass the package that the Canadian Parliament might send to Britain, including a charter of rights, that indeed, Britain would be "obliged to reject" the package. In view of the difficulties this matter is causing, will the Prime Minister now take the natural course of action which has been occurring in Canada in the past, that is, end the charade that is going on with the package, call a first ministers' meeting, and come to a conclusion in Canada before the resolution goes to Britain?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not sure if it is within the rules to comment on what is going on in the other place in Britain when it is not even proper to comment on what is going on in the other place in Canada.

I just want to say that the hon. member has obviously had some advance knowledge of a report of an ad hoc committee of the British Parliament, which is not the position of the British Parliament, nor of the British government as stated to me by the Prime Minister. So I can only say that the opinion of one member of the British Parliament will not change the course we have decided to pursue.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I should like to tell the Prime Minister that it is not an ad hoc committee, it is an all-party committee, and the chairman spoke on behalf of the committee when he said that the committee's decision was unanimous. So it was not only one member speaking.

In view of those difficulties, the Conservative party has put forward an approach that can at least get the government out of this impasse, and that is to split the proposal which the government has put before the committee. Will the Prime Minister at least accept that proposal, namely, to split the package and to send to Britain only the patriation package, and keep the charter and those matters which need provincial consent in order to avoid that embarrassment, not only in Britain but internationally? Will he at least take that proposition and follow it up?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, we have taken the position that the British Parliament, according to custom, tradition, and constitutional law, had to act upon a request made jointly by the Parliament of Canada. That is still our position. If one member of the British Parliament spoke to the hon. member on the telephone, it is possible that he had expressed his opinion. I have not seen the report of the committee to which the hon. member refers, and I do not know whether it is ad hoc or select, but I know it is not the position of the British Parliament or the British government.

In so far as the request made by the hon. member is concerned, it seems to me, Madam Speaker, that this again shows that the opposition is more interested in discussing the process than the content, and this has been its attitude all along. It may be a good tactical position—

An hon. Member: An honourable position.

Mr. Trudeau: —but I do not think it is a position which would lead to the results that the hon. party opposite said are desired by the Canadian people, and I quote from the statement made by the hon. member for Provencher on behalf of the Conservative party, that the Canadian people want patriation—

Mr. Clark: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: —that they want an amending formula—

Mr. Clark: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: —and that they want a charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Made in Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: These statements were made on behalf of the party.

Mr. Clark: We are a Canadian party, not colonial.

Mr. Trudeau: They want these three things, but what the opposition members have been discussing since the beginning has not been the substance of these three things; it is the process of how it is attained.

Mr. Clark: Why did you vote against patriation?

Mr. Trudeau: I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition, who is heckling again, that we did not vote against patriation.

An hon. Member: You did.

Mr. Trudeau: When the hon. member from Edmonton moved last May to have patriation without an amending formula, simple patriation, all sides of this House accepted it.

Some hon. Members: Let's do it that way.

Mr. Trudeau: We accepted it. This is the position with which we went to the provinces.

Mr. Clark: You then changed your vote.

Mr. Trudeau: This is the position that not only the provinces changed but that the Leader of the Opposition changed.

An hon. Member: All you are giving us is dictatorship.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Just a short second, Madam Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—ASBESTOS LEVELS IN BAGGAGE HANDLING AREAS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I should like to follow up on my question to the Minister of Labour. The asbestos problem, as he is aware, consists of the fact that the level is twice as high as the level recommended under Canadian standards. The minister must surely realize that the federal government has the worst record in the country in so far as the asbestos problem in federal buildings is concerned. In my riding, asbestos is crumbling from the ceiling in the main post office. Right here in Ottawa there are federal buildings with high levels of asbestos, and the standards are ten times as high as that which has been recommended by the United States. Will the minister commit himself now to a national clean-up program so that the men and women who work for the Government of Canada can be protected from this extremely toxic material?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question, and I regret that when he asked his previous question I had been called to the telephone just a moment before.

I want to say to him, in relation to his initial question, that he should realize that the mining of asbestos and the manufacture of asbestos products are subject to provincial legislation. What we have here is that some of those materials have been put into buildings which had existed for a long time, federal buildings as well as buildings in the private sector. At the Winnipeg airport, which was built a considerable period of time ago, some of the building materials contained a fairly high degree of asbestos fibre—there is no question about that.

The hon. member was one of a group of four members of his party who have been touring across the country examining facilities in relation to health and welfare, so he may have received some misinformation. The situation in relation to the Winnipeg airport is that when alterations are being made which involve any materials which have these asbestos fibres, the immediate area is sealed off and the workers who are working within it use breathing masks to protect themselves.

A procedure in these cases has been developed by both my department and the Department of Transport, as well as by the provincial department of labour. The federal Department of National Health and Welfare is monitoring the situation whenever such work is undertaken. I believe the hon. member can rest assured that every possible safety provision has been taken.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, I should like to inform the minister that this airport was built in 1963—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not here to give information to the minister but to ask information of the minister.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, the fact is that this dangerously toxic material is 40 times the standard recommended by the United States group, and the Canadian airport, which has members of the public going into it and out of it 24 hours a day—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I certainly want to say that I am sympathetic to the concern of the hon. member, who is a very sincere representative of his constituents and of the Canadian people, but I think he is operating under some misapprehensions in relation to this particular situation. Since November of 1975 we have limited worker exposure to a maximum of two fibres per cubic centimetre in the atmosphere. When the hon. member talks about the content of the insulation material within the walls of the airport, he must recognize that it is not exposed any more than in any other building in the country where that has been used.

The only way that I can see in which that content level of 40 units would be reached is if people were to eat the insulation, which seems to me to be an unlikely proposition. I would be happy to discuss the matter further with the hon. member and to reassure him outside the chamber—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

LABOUR DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL INTERVENTION

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the labour dispute between Radio-Canada and its journalists has now been dragging on for three months could the minister tell the House if he is ready to meet personally with the parties involved in order to ensure that both the union and management are ready to negotiate in good faith in order to reach a settlement as soon as possible so as to allow Francophones throughout Canada to enjoy fully their right to information?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for this important question.

[English]

The matter of the dispute between the French language journalists and Radio-Canada is one of great concern to my department and it has recently been the subject of exploratory mediation by perhaps the most able mediator in the country, Mr. Guy DeMerlis. I want to point out that the federal Department of Labour, through its mediation and conciliation branch, not only has a better record than probably any other province in relation to settlements but also has a better record when compared to any other nation in the western world in arriving at settlements without stoppage.

Sometimes intransigent positions are taken by the parties. This has been a very difficult strike in that regard. But I am sure the hon. member will recognize in a free collective bargaining system that all the Department of Labour can do is to provide expert mediation services, and that the parties themselves must make the adjustments from their positions in order to make a settlement possible.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Regan: We will continue to provide those services at the moment when it is judged by the experts that it is appropriate and possible to make progress. We will leave no stone unturned in attempting to achieve a settlement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF INDEPENDENT MEDIATOR

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

In light of the worsening conflict between a Crown corporation and the union of journalists, I wonder if the minister is prepared to appoint an independent mediator; in other words, someone who does not answer to the government, since it is directly involved?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member put a question to which he already knows the answer. He is perfectly aware that it is up to the Minister of Labour to appoint a mediator in labour conflicts between Crown corporations and unionized employees working for those corporations. I must say, however, that it is a labour dispute over which I am deeply concerned, mainly because it is still continuing. It began more than three months ago and I have the impression that such long-lasting disputes can only worsen.

As I said before in the House, I have already met with the president of the union involved, and again late this afternoon I will have discussions with labour spokesmen and Department of Communications officials with a view to seeking grounds for agreement and understanding better the position of the union in this matter.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): At his meeting this afternoon, does the minister intend to suggest the name of an independent government mediator in the discussion, or will it be nothing more than an opportunity for the strikers to air their views before the minister?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, the meeting has yet to take place, so I will see what kind of representations the union president and the CNTU president want to make. Still I can only repeat that the appointment of a mediator is a matter which falls exclusively under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Labour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMBINES

INQUIRY WHETHER DEPARTMENT SANCTIONED VANCOUVER NEWSPAPER CONSOLIDATION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General. It relates to the concentration of ownership in the Canadian newspaper industry, particularly the consolidation of ownership of the The Province and The Sun in the city of Vancouver. For the benefit of the House, will the minister confirm or deny that his department was advised in advance of the consolidation manœuvre and at that time raised no objection and in effect approved the manœuvres by these companies?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, common practice in the House has it that the minister cannot confirm or deny that the combines investigation director is involved in an investigation.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, that was clearly not in response to my question. It related to some suggestions that the minister and his department were advised in advance. I would suggest this statement really advocates a denial of truth by the publisher of The Province and Paddy Sherman, the vice president of Southam, that in fact the consultation took place and that by refusing to comment upon it they in fact gave approval in advance.

Would the minister be prepared to explain the apparent conflict, now that they wish to prosecute those companies after in effect giving them approval to go ahead with these manoeuvres in the beginning, or prior to the event?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I am not prepared to make any comment on that subject today.

[English]

REQUEST FOR FURTHER CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one raised by the hon. member for Provencher. I want to say to the Prime Minister that the report to which we are referring is not one of the ad hoc committee of the British parliament; it is one of the select committee on foreign affairs. I think that may make a difference to the Prime Minister. It may make a difference to the Prime Minister as well that the chairman of the committee indicated that 26 copies of the report of the committee were sent to the Canadian High Commission on Wednesday. Obviously the government is aware of it.

In order to avoid the national shame, and indeed the national disgrace, of the resolution of this Parliament being rejected by the parliament of Westminster, will the Prime Minister now consider going back to the provinces? One of the reasons indicated by the committee for its position was:

—the Statute of Westminster makes Britain a guardian of both federal and provincial interests.

I may say that my party has taken this position throughout.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: In the interest of national pride, is the Prime Minister now prepared to go back to the first ministers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we have the testimony of one of the first ministers, Premier Hatfield—

Mr. Siddon: How about the other nine?

Mr. Trudeau: —that it would be to no avail because the provinces—and I think Canadians were witness to this on television last September—could not agree among themselves on many subjects before them.

Mr. Clark: Except the Vancouver formula.

Mr. Trudeau: Several of the premiers took the position publicly that they would not agree even to simple patriation with an amending formula until one got fisheries, the other offshore, the other cultural sovereignty, and so on. This has been the position of the provinces. If the hon. member's party was so convinced that the provinces could deliver unanimous agreement on patriation with an amending formula, it would be surprising that all ten of them have not made that statement by now. The fact they have not made that statement is a clear indication to me that the provinces cannot agree among themselves—

Mr. Siddon: Just sit down and talk with them.

Mr. Trudeau: —any more than they could agree with the Conservative Party of Canada when it takes its position that they should have the so-called Alberta-Vancouver formula which has not yet been agreed upon among the provinces. There is no unanimity; there is not even a consensus among the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The party of the right hon. gentleman opposite has not been able to adduce that consensus. It is because we have not been able to adduce it over the last 12 years that we say what must be done should be done, and that is what is being done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that six provinces have taken the unilateral action of the government to court, and that 64 per cent of the people of Canada stated in a Gallup poll that they opposed the entrenchment of a bill of rights by the parliament of Westminster—facts which are not unknown to British parliamentarians—is the Prime Minister, again in the interests of national pride and the integrity of this Parliament, prepared to suspend the steamrolling of the constitutional package through this Parliament until he has at least had a chance to consult with the Prime Minister of Great Britain?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have spoken to the Prime Minister of Great Britain. I have spoken to her as early as last June.

Mr. Clark: What did you say?

Mr. Trudeau: I have her word, and I still have her word, that she will make this a government measure—

Mr. Clark: Did you tell her about the charter of rights?

Mr. Trudeau: —and she will put on a three-line whip to pass it through the House of Commons.

● (1500)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, members opposite may laugh at the words solemnly delivered to me by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. This is not consistent with their position.

When the hon. member tells me that it is the select committee on foreign affairs, that is precisely my objection—it is a foreign country which is telling the Canadian Parliament what it can do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST TO EXPLORE POSSIBILITY OF PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, has the Prime Minister considered the incongruity of the position he has just taken? He is asking the British parliament to lay on a three-line whip, to do something about which the people of Canada have expressed some doubt. It is incongruous that he should take that position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): If I may, Madam Speaker, I would like to put this to the Prime Minister. The propositions which the committee are now dealing with are quite different from the propositions put to the first ministers in September. The atmosphere in the country is quite different from what it was in September. The discussions have taken a new tack from those in September. I ask the Prime Minister if he will, as head of the Canadian family, exhibit some faith in that—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Rae: Head of the Canadian family?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is what a Prime Minister is supposed to be. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he has enough faith in Canadian federalism, as the head of the Canadian family—as he would like to call himself—to take the matter back to the provinces to see if there cannot be some reasonable agreement from the result of that process. I think the country is worthy of that move, even if the Prime Minister would disagree with it. I ask him at least to consider it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about the will of the Canadian people. In this House a moment ago I quoted the spokesman for his own party, who said that the Canadian people wanted a charter of rights.

Mr. Beatty: In Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, this Parliament is in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The British parliament is in Britain.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the Prime Minister please continue?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, this Parliament is in Canada. It is studying, in Canada, a measure which the honourable party opposite says the people want. It is studying a measure which several premiers have said they do not want. Therefore, this Parliament is doing what the premiers do not want but what the people want, and what this Parliament expects they want.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): To be sure, this is the Canadian Parliament. But what the Prime Minister seems to have forgotten is that Canada is a federal system. For the sake of the country I say: is the Prime Minister now prepared to consider taking what is a different package to the premiers than what was taken to them in September, after this Parliament has spoken?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the answer to that was given in reply to an earlier question. If the premiers really thought they could agree amongst themselves—indeed, agree with the Leader of the Opposition—they would have met by now and they would have said, "This is what we want." They have not done that.

Mr. Clark: Because you have given no leadership.

Mr. Trudeau: They have told me privately, and they have told the Canadian people publicly, that they would not agree to patriation.

An hon. Member: Bring it back.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, they would not agree to simple patriation until they got the offshore, the fisheries and so on.

Mr. Clark: That has changed and you know it.

Mr. Trudeau: They have said that publicly. If they say the contrary now, then I will take the hon. member's question seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is an undertaking, Prime Minister.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KAPLAN—ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY REMARKS BY MR. NIELSEN

Madam Speaker: I have a notice of a question of privilege in the name of the hon. Solicitor General.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to the remarks made about me yesterday by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). They are set out in Hansard at pages 6652 and 6653. The hon. member himself was raising a question of privilege. In his question he attempted to couch the matters he was referring to in hypothetical terms. However, as he proceeded it became obvious he was attempting to build a case and make unparliamentary allegations based on matters arising out of the meeting of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, at the time I was attending that committee as a witness. He refers to statements which I made. He refers to me as a minister of the Crown making statements "on behalf of the government in a parliamentary process," as if there was any doubt that it was me he was attempting to describe. I was not in the House during most of his intervention, but he noted my return and some other remarks, tying me to the incidents on which he was building his case. I will refer to those in a moment.

With respect to my conduct before that committee, he said:

—in other forums that would fall within the definition of false pretences, under the provisions of the Criminal Code.

I want to draw that remark to your attention, Madam Speaker. He suggested that my conduct in a civil forum "would be regarded as a civil wrong, commonly called a tort". He said, referring to my conduct in the committee:

It is not far-fetched, in my submission, to draw from that that there was a deliberate intent—

—on my part—

—to make a commitment to the committee in question, which he knew was a commitment which could not be kept.

A paragraph later he said that my action—as he put it, it was a question, but I take it he was submitting that for consideration—would be subject to a quotation from Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, "Conspiracy to Deceive Either House or Committees of Either House", which he read. He also read the paragraph under the heading "Corruption in the Execution of Their Office as Members".

At that point I returned to the House. The hon. member said he was glad to see me come back. He said the passage which he had quoted under the heading "Corruption in the Execution of Their Office as Members" might be viewed:

—in the light of the very special relationship which existed in this instance between those cozy bedmates, the NDP and the Liberal members.

Madam Speaker, I consider that unparliamentary language which is designed to blacken my name and impede my work as a member of Parliament and minister of the Crown. The full explanation of the events and my conduct before the committee were described. They were closely questioned by members opposite. They were answered fully by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and by myself when I rose that day on a question of privilege. I therefore ask that the hon. member retract his statement. If he does not, Madam Speaker, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

● (1510)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it is appropriate under the practices of the House when an hon. member submits for consideration a question of privilege which is to be followed by a substantive motion that the motion be read before the reply.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I would like to hear from the hon. member before I move my motion.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, the reason for the practice is that I may either agree with or want to second the motion which the minister has prepared. The minister owes it to the House to read his motion.

Madam Speaker: I believe I can solve the matter now. I listened very carefully yesterday while the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) made his speech and subsequently I read Hansard. I received verbal notice from the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) yesterday and written notice today that he would raise this question of privilege. I reviewed the matter very carefully, and I must say, although the hon. member for Yukon came very close to linking some of the very strong words which he used in his speech to the Solicitor General's conduct or to him personally, I do feel that the linkage was not sufficiently direct to constitute unparliamentary language, though it came extremely close.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. EPP—CORRECTION OF REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. In the exchange between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and myself today, the Prime Minister made the statement that I had had an interview or telephone conversation with Anthony Kershaw. That was not the case. I was using a Canadian Press story, and I would appreciate it if the Prime Minister would take this as notice.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has raised a point of order rather than a question of privilege, and he has made his point.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, could I ask the government House leader his intentions with respect to House business for the balance of this week and into next week. If he is intending to designate an allotted opposition day for next week, would he do so today?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, today the House will deal with the second reading stage of the access to information bill, as agreed upon by members on both sides of the House. Tomorrow we will begin debate on the second reading stage of the borrowing authority bill which will be introduced in a few minutes.

[Translation]

Monday we shall resume debate in Committee of the Whole of the bill to amend the income tax legislation. Hopefully, consideration of the bill at this stage will be completed early in the week so that the bill can be passed on third reading. I also hope that we will be able to continue second reading of the bill to provide supplementary borrowing authority. Finally, Friday will be an opposition day and, if I am not mistaken, the third allotted day in this supply period.

Point of Order—Mr. Fox

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, as the government House leader must realize, Monday, February, 16, just two weeks away, will be recognized by many people in this country as Heritage Day. The government from time to time has had legislation before the House to make that day a holiday. It is not there in this year's Bill C-37, but in view of the wide public interest in Heritage Day, would the government consider bringing some measure before Parliament to establish that day as a holiday, even before February 16 of this year?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, that might be difficult, but I shall nevertheless consider the hon. member's request.

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

MR. FOX—ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING—CORRECTION OF FIGURES USED

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, last Friday in an exchange in the House between myself and the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) concerning the exact participation of the federal government in education programs, the hon. member indicated that the total contribution of the federal government for post-secondary education under the EPF arrangements, totalled some $3 billion. I indicated that it was $4 billion.

As far as the EPF arrangements are concerned, the hon. member for Hillsborough is correct. The total contribution by the federal government is $3 billion of which $1.65 billion is in cash and a further $1.42 billion in the form of tax points. If we add to the EPF fiscal arrangements the funds spent by the federal government in the field of education in this country through programs in the fields of minority language, Canada student loans, grants respecting research councils, northern education, native education and the manpower training programs, the total amount approaches some $5 billion.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, to comment briefly on that, I wish to thank the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) for rising this afternoon, in effect, to set the record straight with regard to the figures the minister quoted on Friday in response to my question. The minister's figures on federal funding for post-secondary education in Canada under the established programs financing now conform to the figures I quoted in my questions.

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the Canadian Association of University Teachers have expressed alarm at the federal government's plan to cut drastically expenditures on post-secondary education. The Progressive Conservative Party shares that alarm.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Obviously, the hon. member is debating.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-59 entitled "An act to provide supplementary borrowing authority".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,754—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Department of Justice for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): The Department of Justice: (a) $2,000, (b) $5,000, (c) $421,000.

GRANTS AWARDED UNDER THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE MINORITY GROUPS PROGRAM

Question No. 1,832—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, by province, what amount was awarded under the Official Language Minority Groups Program?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP WITH SOVIET UNION

Question No. 1,905—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Does Canada have a treaty of friendship and co-operation with the Soviet Union and, if so, on what date was it negotiated?

2. To the knowledge of the government, does (a) Great Britain (b) France (c) West Germany (d) Italy (e) Turkey (f) Greece (g) The Netherlands have such a treaty with the Soviet Union and, if so, in each case, on what date was it negotiated?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canada does not have any treaty with the Soviet Union described as a "treaty of friendship and co-operation". Several Canadian-Soviet treaties accord due recognition to the principle of promoting friendship and co-operation between the two countries, but all deal essentially with practical measures for governing interstate relations in such fields as political consultations, commercial relations, fisheries, civil aviation, and scientific, academic, cultural and sports exchanges. The Canadian-Soviet Protocol on Consultations, signed on May 19, 1971, has occasionally been described inaccurately as a "treaty of friendship and co-operation". It is, in fact, an agreement to "enlarge and deepen consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations".

2. No NATO country has a "treaty of friendship and co-operation" with the Soviet Union, including those countries named in the question. Such treaties have generally been limited to the U.S.S.R.'s Warsaw Pact allies and to selected Third World countries.

RAILWAY CAR NO. 53

Question No. 1,963—Mr. Cossitt:

On or about September 2 or 3, 1980, did the Minister of State for Science and Technology use a government owned private railway car and, if so (a) was the car known as No. 53 (b) what was the purpose of such usage and what were the names of all persons on board at any time (c) what was the point of departure and the point of termination of the car?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No. (a), (b) and (c) Not applicable.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

MEASURE TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-43, to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am, of course, happy that we were able to set aside this day in a very tight and heavy schedule for the second reading debate on Bill C-43, which deals with access to information and privacy. I am particularly gratified because this was made possible through the co-operation of all parties in the House. This unanimity shows that we are all anxious to see progress made toward enacting this important piece of legislation.

This bill has three equally important purposes. First, the bill provides a right of access to information in the hands of the government to all Canadians, subject to a limited number of exemptions set out in the bill. Second, the bill contains provisions strengthening the right of access of individuals to information about them in government files and providing a code restricting the use of such personal information by the government. Third, the bill abolishes the statutory right of ministers to prevent information from being used in court cases without review by the courts.

This legislation will, over time, become one of the cornerstones of Canadian democracy. The access legislation will be an important tool of accountability to Parliament and the electorate, while the Crown privilege provisions will create better conditions for the administration of justice by the courts. The privacy provisions will do much to protect the individual rights of Canadians.

The legislation before us benefits from, and is inspired by, the efforts of many. It owes most, however, to the contributions of many past and present members of this House—to mention only some, Barry Mather, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and, most of all, Ged Baldwin.

The present bill has important innovations. It deals with both access to information and privacy, assuring a consistent treatment of personal information and the protection of individual privacy. It addresses the issue of access to computerized information. It includes a procedure allowing for those who have supplied information to the government to make themselves heard before decisions are made on the release of information. As well, the exemptions are made more precise and the review process has been tailored to circumstances specific to Canada. Finally, it will facilitate access to government records in the official language of the applicant.

The development of this bill has shown Parliament at its best, and, given the nature of the subject, I am sure the contribution of members will continue to be most important when the bill is in committee and even more so once the legislation is in force and a committee of Parliament is monitoring progress of the legislation.

The purpose of the access legislation is stated in clause 2 of schedule I—to provide a right to access, subject to limited and specific exceptions and with an independent review process to ensure that the right can be fully used.

Simply put, the bill reverses the present situation whereby access to information is a matter of government discretion. Under this legislation, access to information becomes a matter of public right, with the burden of proof on the government to establish that information need not be released.

The right of access created by the bill is very broad: information in any form, held by more than 130 government institutions. The right will be exercised simply by making an application to the appropriate government institution.

There are certain narrowly-defined exceptions to the broad right of access, designed to protect information which it is in the public interest to withhold. These exceptions were the most difficult part of the bill to draft. Most knowledgeable observers seem to agree with the need to protect the general areas of international affairs and defence, law enforcement, the privacy of individuals, unions and corporations, and the efficiency of government operations. There is, naturally, some concern about details of wording—which I know will not surprise the hon. members who have attempted to draft this kind of legislation, especially the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

The difficulty facing the drafter is that defining the exceptions requires addressing, in a single statute, the fundamental responsibilities of government. This must be done with enough breadth to capture all the areas where protection is necessary and in the public interest. But it also must be done with sufficient precision to allow general access to the inner workings of government which it is in the public interest to see. One exemption which gave us particular difficulty is that relating to the confidentiality clauses in other statutes. There are roughly 35 such clauses. Examples of these are section 241 of the Income Tax Act and section 17 of the Family Allowances Act. By inserting these clauses in other statutes, Parliament sought to protect certain types of sensitive government information. Therefore, I think that Parliament should have an opportunity to review them carefully and to determine whether they should be maintained. I am confident that this demanding task can be completed within the three years provided for in the bill.

I know that the standing committee which will soon be examining the bill can help refine the exemptions still further. At that stage I hope to deal with many of the specific comments already made about the exemptions.

So that the committee will have a thorough appreciation of how the bill will work in practice, I plan also to outline the kind of guidelines the government will use in implementing the act. These will explain how officials can release certain information which technically, in an exemptable category, the government sees no need to withhold. As U.S. experience has shown, guidelines make it possible to achieve more openness in practice than can be reflected in legislation.

The procedures in the bill range from the very simple rules applicable to requests for access to the review procedures themselves. Procedures for requests for access are straightforward, but it is in the area of review that this bill, borrowing in large part from Bill C-15, represents a major advance on all other freedom of information legislation, existing or proposed. The bill sets up machinery to guarantee independent review of any decision by the government to withhold information under the exemptions. This independence is crucial—not so much because ministers might misuse their prerogatives without it, but because it ensures that justice will be done and seen to be done. This is vital if public confidence in government is to be upheld.

This independent review process is two-tiered. It begins with an information commissioner with sweeping investigative powers, responsible to Parliament, not to the government. The use of the commissioner is a uniquely Canadian approach, giving an independent person access to all government documents and a chance to take a position on the matter vis-à-vis the government before it is heard by the court. The commissioner's appointment must be approved by formal resolutions of this House and the other place. The commissioner would report directly to the Speakers of both Houses, not through a minister. Being fully independent from the executive, the commissioner will be free to lobby, criticize, table his recommendations in Parliament, and even take the government to court to obtain release of information.

The commissioner is the key to making access to information an effective reality for every Canadian, regardless of income, status or knowledge of the law. The procedure for triggering an investigation by the commissioner will be informal, expeditious and free of charge—an entitlement by right of every Canadian. I anticipate that the bulk of complaints will be handled satisfactorily at the commissioner level. I expect the office of the information commissioner to become over time more than an information ombudsman, more than an access advocate. I expect it to be the heart of the system.

[English]

At the second level, a person who was refused access to a document even after examination of his complaint by the commissioner would have the right to apply to the federal court for judicial review. The court would be empowered to review denials and issue binding orders for the release of requested documents.

An interesting aspect of this bill is the way it reconciles judicial review and the principles of ministerial responsibility. In some cases, the government might claim the right to withhold information under an exempted category involving the responsibility of a minister to Parliament. Such a category would be injurious to national defence. Under this bill, the court would order the release of the documents in question if it determines that the minister did not have reasonable grounds for refusing access. In all other cases, the court would be empowered to conduct a full, de novo review and ultimately to substitute its opinion for that of the minister as to whether or not an exemption applies.

I want to make absolutely clear that in all cases the commissioner and the court will have the right to examine any government record. In all cases the burden of proof is squarely on the shoulders of government. In all cases the commissioner and the court will be empowered to refer evidence of illegal activity to the proper authorities. In all cases the court is empowered to overturn a minister's decision and to order release. The effectiveness of this two-tiered and independent review process has been commended by U.S. freedom of information advocates. Moreover, it is my belief that our legislation compares very favourably over all with the United States freedom of information act.

Finally, the legislation provides that a parliamentary committee will have permanent, ongoing oversight of the administration of the legislation to ensure that it is being implemented in accordance with its spirit.

I will now take a few moments to speak about schedule II of Bill C-43, which will enact a new privacy act to replace part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act. This important piece of legislation was introduced in and piloted through the House by a most dedicated parliamentarian and justice minister, the Hon. Ron Basford.

The scope of the access to information scheme now makes it necessary to replace part IV with new privacy legislation. This step will ensure that the rights of access to personal information held by the federal government, and the protection provided to ensure compliance with this right, are as extensive as that to be granted under the general access to information legislation.

In developing the proposed new privacy act we were greatly assisted by the work which had already been done by the previous government. I understand this is reflected in Bill C-535 introduced last May by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty).

Under the new act, the right of access would apply to more personal information than under part IV. The exemptions have been refined and brought in line with those of the access proposals. Finally, a parallel two-tier review mechanism is included involving complaints to a privacy commissioner and review of denials by the Federal Court.

With the experience gained under part IV, the government proposes to strengthen the protection of personal privacy. The new legislation will create a comprehensive code of fair information practices in the federal government's handling of personal information.

Our society is gradually becoming aware that a vital element of the right to privacy is the ability of an individual to control information about himself. This principle is reflected in the code. Further, the code will not supersede limitations imposed by other statutes but will provide additional controls.

The rights of individuals to know how personal information will be used, to ensure that the information used for decision-making purposes is accurate, up to date and complete, and that information collected by government institutions is relevant to their legitimate programs and operations—all these are given further recognition in this bill. The privacy commissioner will provide an independent check on compliance, having the duty to oversee and monitor the way in which personal information is collected, used and disseminated by government institutions.

[Translation]

Now, as a final word about privacy, I would like to emphasize that the government has not ignored the concerns of Canadians about the increasing use of the social insurance number. The provisions in the bill dealing with the use and disclosure of personal information will regulate the use of the social insurance number within the federal government. However, as was recognized by the previous government in setting up the study of the social insurance number by the privacy commissioner, dealing effectively with this problem goes beyond regulating its use within the federal government and, thus, the scope of this bill. It is anticipated, however, that the privacy commissioner's report will be tabled shortly. This will assist in developing an understanding of the problems involved and will form the basis for analysing specific proposals with respect to the social insurance number.

Schedule III contains the third piece of legislation in this package. This schedule would repeal section 41 of the Federal Court Act and enact new rules dealing with Crown privilege in the Canada Evidence Act. The basic effect of this provision will be that ministers will no longer be able to absolutely refuse to produce documents to a court or a commission of inquiry on the basis of Crown privilege. In all cases, such a claim will be reviewable by a superior court.

To conclude, I want to say that the set of proposals in bill C-43 constitute a major thrust in our efforts toward openness of government. The government has already adopted guidelines for dealing openly with the press and is endeavouring to apply the spirit of this legislation before it is passed. Reforms will follow in many important areas, such as the classification system, the Official Secrets Act and the operation of the public archives. In putting the legislation together, we have found that in many areas a general approach to openness and accountability in government is frankly not going to be adequate and that precise answers for specific situations are necessary. This bill should be seen as a dramatic starting point which will lead to even more openness in many areas of government once it becomes law. I would predict that numerous federal statutes passed in coming years will contain specific access codes pertinent to their subject matter. Over time, once the principles behind this bill are established as the basic framework for openness, a great deal of information will flow to the public upon request without the need for all the protections for both parties that are contained in this legislation.

[English]

The access to information and protection of privacy bill is seminal legislation. We anticipate it will have a major influence on all institutions in the country and will constitute a major step forward in making our institutions more open and democratic.

Over the past months I have been fortunate enough to receive the representations of various groups interested in the legislation, such as Access, the National Indian Brotherhood and the Canadian Historical Association. I have also written to all provinces and I am now informed of their views. At committee stage we will have an opportunity to give careful consideration to their suggestions. I am confident that this exchange of ideas will be of considerable assistance to Parliament in producing legislation which is truly reflective of the largest possible consensus in this area.

[Translation]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating the bill to extend the Canadian legislation relating to access to the documents of the federal administration. It establishes the principle that the public has the right to gain access to such documents and provides that the executive branch cannot stand in the way of appeals concerning decisions taken on that subject. In other words, today we are debating the principle of freedom of information, the responsibility of the government to let Canadians have free access to information it holds.

The House will note that the government does not respect the objectives it has set out in the bill. One basic aspect of our system, Mr. Speaker, is that any government is answerable for its actions to the people, through Parliament. That is impossible if Canadians do not know what the government is doing. When the government operates in secrecy and refuses to let the public have certain documents, it creates an atmosphere of public mistrust. It was precisely that type of mistrust we wanted to avoid in our own bill on that subject. It is a question of power and we all know that those who have information are those who wield real power. But in a democracy such as ours, power and information must be widely shared. The bill introduced by my administration was aimed at giving the public the widest access possible to government information.

Freedom of information means that the government endorses the basic principle that any such information belongs to the people of Canada, unless there is very specific and fundamental reason for keeping it secret. The government, not the citizen, must prove that certain documents cannot be released. In our bill we had set very strict criteria under which the onus of the proof fell on the government: it had to demonstrate without a doubt that a document had to remain secret. The exceptions contained in the Liberal measure make it easier for the government to refuse to divulge the information it has.

Mr. Speaker, the issue of freedom of information is not new. It is an objective which my party has been trying to achieve for a number of years.

● (1540)

[English]

I was happy with the recognition by the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) in his opening remarks of the pioneer work done by the former member of Parliament for Peace River, Ged Baldwin, in introducing this principle and pursuing it through the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He began that work some 11 years ago when he introduced a private member's bill. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments recommended the concept as long ago as 1975. The House of Commons approved it in principle in 1976. There it rested until 1979 when my colleague, the member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), as House leader of the government I had the honour to lead, introduced the law known as Bill C-15 in this House, and introduced it as a priority of a new government.

I think the House will recognize, as the country does, that most of the principal strengths and advantages of this legislation are advantages which were incorporated in the bill introduced by my colleague from Nepean-Carleton and by the Progressive Conservative government.

I will make the point that there have been some modest improvements in the bill brought down by the minister today.

For example, information now gathered by computer may be released after request. Two supplementary bulletins are to update the annual list of documents published by the government. Third parties who might be adversely affected by the release of information to an applicant must be told of the application for release and given an opportunity to object. We approve the provision which will allow translation into the language of the applicant as a matter of course. We think it is valuable to have this "Access to Information Act", as this is called, combined with a new "Privacy Act" to replace part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Those are modest improvements. I regret to say that they pale beside some of the major weaknesses and retreats that are evident in this bill, retreats from the standards established by the legislation introduced by the Conservative government in 1979.

Indeed, the difference is evident even in the name of this legislation. The bill we introduced was a freedom of information bill. The bill this government introduces is a bill entitled "access to information". It would be much more properly entitled "access to information that the government wants to release", because there is a very severe limitation, as I intend to indicate later, upon the right of the public to seek information which would have been available to the public under the legislation introduced by the Conservative government.

We have here a much more narrow bill. It gives much more power to the government and much less power to the citizen. I know of the pressures that come from the bureaucracy for secrecy. I know of the pressures which come from elsewhere in society for secrecy. We faced those pressures as well. The difference is that we rejected several arguments for secrecy which the Liberal government in this bill has accepted and acquiesced to. This reflects itself in the difference between what could honestly be called a bureaucratic bill and a citizens' bill, which is the accurate way to describe the freedom of information legislation introduced by my colleague for Nepean-Carleton.

I want the House to look, at this stage in a short debate on an important matter, at some of these specific new limitations that are built into this bill. For example, there is a provision which indicates that the government will not be required to list in a bulletin, material which "the head of a government institution would be entitled to refuse". That clearly is the first line of defence for a department which wants to keep material secret that might otherwise be released under the act.

A very large potential series of loopholes is written into this legislation by the widespread use of that innocent sounding adjective "reasonable". Let me cite one example of a word that appears frequently throughout the bill in a way that I believe is designed to assist the government. Under one clause, material requested must not only be identifiable in such a way that an "experienced employee of the institution" can find it, but it now must be found "with a reasonable effort". There is ample room for abuse, ample room for someone who does not want information to be released to say that it would require more than a reasonable effort, whatever that might be, to have that information released to a public which has a right to that information.

Both bills define certain exemptions to the basic principles of the right to access. The minister indicated that they were narrowly defined. They were much more narrowly defined in the bill that we introduced than they are in the bill now before this House of Commons. These are the four specific categories of exemptions: national defence and international relations, federal-provincial relations, economic matters and cabinet documents. The titles of the exemptions are the same. The contents are significantly different. This bill is much more restrictive than the freedom of information legislation introduced by my colleague.

Let me deal with the question of national defence and international relations. Clause 13 of this bill provides that the head of a government institution shall refuse to disclose a record containing information that was obtained in confidence from the government of a foreign or international organization of states. This exemption, which makes sense, is expanded to include information from the government of a province or "an institution thereof" or from "a municipal or regional government" or "an institution of such a government". Therefore, the scope of secrecy is very much broadened by this change in language and approach to the principle of freedom of limitation—I mean freedom of information. I wish it were freedom of limitation. Unfortunately, there is too much limitation and too little access to information.

Clause 15 stipulates that the head of a government institution may refuse to release a record containing information, the disclosure of which could reasonably be expected to be injurious to the conduct of international relations, the defence of Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada, or the efforts of Canada toward detecting, preventing or suppressing subversive or hostile activities. I have no problem at all with that provision as it applies to a state allied with Canada, but what in the world is meant by the phrase "associated with Canada"?

Mr. Fox: Treaties.

Mr. Clark: Associated with Canada but not allied with Canada. What does that mean? What is the distinction between countries allied with Canada and countries with Canada? Of course, the treaties can explain the word "association", but what kind of countries are contemplated here? Why is this language there? Why was the original language having to do with "allied with Canada" not adequate?

What is the government attempting to incorporate in this legislation which was not incorporated in the language of the previous draft? What kind of information will be withheld as a result of this language which would have been available as a result of the previous language? That is a question of detail, but important detail that we will want to pursue in the committee.

Several of the definitions in this category relating to national defence and international relations have been widened, including that the prohibition of publication shall include "information obtained or prepared for the purpose of intelligence". In this case, the purpose of the gathering becomes the standard, not the content of what is gathered. That means that if there is information which would normally be harmless to release on its basis, merit or content, that information by this law could be withheld because of the purpose for which it was gathered. The content is put aside. The purpose of the gathering is what is at issue here. That casts a very broad net underneath which a great deal can be concealed. We will want to know why the net has been cast so broadly in this case.

Further, it states that intelligence information will be withheld if it is "used by the Government of Canada in the process"—and I underline that—"of deliberation and consultation or in the conduct of international affairs". The bill we introduced stated that non-release was justifiable if "the release . . . would interfere with the formation of policy of the Government of Canada"; but now interference need no longer be demonstrated. The only standard is that the process of deliberation and consultation be affected. Here again there is a significant widening of limitation and of the scope of secrecy available to the government in keeping information from the public. That speaks of international and defence matters.

Let me come to the old bête noire of the government, the question of federal-provincial relations where its paranoia most often expresses itself most vigorously. Bill C-15, the bill we introduced, proposed to retain any record the disclosure of which "could reasonably be expected to affect adversely federal-provincial relations". What we have here now is new language which says that information will be withheld, and will include "information on . . . consultations or deliberations" and then, most interestingly, "information on . . . strategy or tactics adopted . . . by the Government of Canada". That is to say, when the government next dreams up an advertising campaign to have geese flying across the country trying to persuade us to bring our constitution home in an unacceptable way, when it dreams up some new program of manipulation of public opinion trying to achieve in a devious or indirect way what it cannot achieve directly with the provinces, that information will be held secret from the people of Canada. It is not a question of substance that would harm substantively federal-provincial relations; what this government is trying to do, this government which has made such a horrendous failure of its federal-provincial relations, is keep secret from the people of Canada the tactics and strategy used by the Government of Canada in dealing with what it should regard as its partners in the Canadian confederation.

Indeed, that language might even make it possible for the government to refuse to release polls which were the basis upon which it developed its strategy or its tactics for approaching some subject that is the subject of federal-provincial negotiations.

Again, in economic matters, there has been a significant broadening of the language which, in light of the time limitation on this debate, I do not have the opportunity to go into at great length. But the cabinet documents provision is of some interest. It is a very sweeping provision. The result of this provision would seem to be that the public would be denied the right to see any memorandum which may ultimately be destined for cabinet—any memorandum, any piece of paper at all that may ultimately be destined for cabinet.

The proposed law that we brought in specified that secrecy would apply only to "documents submitted or prepared for submission . . . by a minister of the Crown", and other documents that were directly relevant to a cabinet proceeding.

The new clause of this Liberal bill includes discussion papers with "background explanations, analysis of problems or policy options to counsel", and it includes "records used to brief ministers in relation to matters that are before, or are proposed to be brought before", the Privy Council which are the subject of consultations between ministers.

While the previous clause 21 of Bill C-15 clearly restricted that exclusion to genuine cabinet documents, this new version allows for the possibility of labelling literally any document at all a draft for the cabinet or a memorandum to a minister, and by so labelling, by putting on it the words "for the information of the minister", the most innocent piece of paper will be kept secret from the people of Canada. That is a very large loophole, a very large cover under which things can be kept secret, and that is one provision the minister will have to defend very seriously when the matter gets to the committee. We believe it makes a total mockery of any system of freedom of information in this country simply to put a stamp on a piece of paper saying it will ultimately be considered by the cabinet, and in that way keep that information from the people of Canada whose taxes keep the government in business.

The minister spoke about judicial review. I want to make the point, because he glided over it, that in the case of these exempted categories new limits are placed upon judicial review. He used the phrase that "on matters outside the limitations, the Federal Court of Canada would be authorized to undertake to take a de novo review in every case", and that was the proposed Conservative law. In this bill that flexibility of the Federal Court of Canada is limited. It cannot undertake that kind of wide review within the four restricted categories. As I have indicated, those four restricted categories involve language so broad as to cover a great range of information of the Government of Canada. The court can order the release of a record only if it determines that the head of an institution "did not have reasonable grounds" on which to refuse to disclose the record. In other words, what can happen is that the court could look at a matter—and the minister has said it will be able to look at all the documents—and find that it should be released. But it also could find that the government had a reasonable reason to hide it and, therefore, even though it should be released the court would be prevented by this language from ordering its release. That is a very severe restriction placed upon the Federal Court and a very real limitation of the principle of judicial review which is held to be important by very many of us who take seriously the principle of freedom of information in this country.

Again, the previous legislation required that a committee of the House or a joint committee table a comprehensive report within three years. This provision has been dropped from this bill. Clause 72 requires a parliamentary committee to conduct a permanent review of the act. That looks on its face to be quite attractive. The danger is that it will also be looking at a great deal of other legislation, and it may well be that in fact, instead of having greater power to consider the adequacy of the freedom of information legislation, this committee will be so cluttered up with other matters it will not be able to deal with all the things with which it should be dealing.

In summary, this is not a bill that is as strong as the freedom of information legislation introduced by the Conservative government. But I will say this; it is better than what the Liberals had proposed to do before. That is one minor recommendation. We can have a long and detailed discussion in committee as to the improvements that can be made in this bill, and I would expect, certainly from our point of view, we will be seeking extensive changes in the language and in the philosophy of the bill. Because this is restrictive philosophy in this legislation, and we believe that kind of restrictive philosophy has no place in legislation designed honestly to achieve freedom of information in the country. We want a bill which respects the rights of citizens to have information. What we have is a bill that respects and protects the rights of governments to hide information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to join in the debate on Bill C-43, this very important piece of legislation dealing both with access to information and protection of privacy in Canada, both fundamental principles, and long overdue in Canadian society. I am pleased this bill has finally come before the House and that all parties in the House were able to co-operate to see the bill through second reading today.

Let me also point out that we have been dealing in recent weeks with the Constitution of Canada and the proposed Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Members in this House will know that we in the New Democratic Party, and I must also say my friends in the Progressive Conservative Party, proposed that the fundamental principle of the right of Canadians to access to information, and the fundamental right of Canadians to protection from unreasonable interference with privacy, should be recognized in the Constitution of Canada.

That principle we put forward during the course of debate in committee, and I regret that those principles, which we regard as fundamental, were not accepted as part of the constitutional package which we put forward to the people of Canada. As I say, if we truly believe that these principles, the right of access to information and the protection from incursion into privacy, are to be recognized in Canadian society, we must ensure that they can never be eroded or taken away by an ordinary statute of the federal or provincial government. That was one of the reasons we suggested that these provisions should be extended throughout the Constitution.

I would also like to refer in passing to the report of the Canadian Bar Association on this very question. The Canadian Bar Association recommended the entrenchment in the Constitution of the right to freedom of information, and they quoted Ralph Nader who said—and I certainly agree with his remarks:

> A well informed citizenry is the lifeblood of democracy... The democratic process cannot function adequately without timely information about the activities of Parliament. A person should have the right of reasonable access to all public information in the possession of governments—

It is only if Canadians have access to information that they are able fully to exercise the other rights, such as freedom to vote, freedom to be candidates and freedom of the press, which we take for granted in Canadian society. We say that this fundamental principle should be recognized in the Constitution, and we regret that it was not accepted by the government in committee.

In commenting upon similar legislation last year at second reading of Bill C-15 of the Conservative government, I recognized, as have the minister and the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) today, the valuable contribution which was made by a number of individuals and groups on this important question. This includes Barry Mather, former member of this party who in many ways pioneered in this area. He tabled a bill in 1965, some 16 years ago, and on succeeding occasions, and he was joined in that, and was in fact superseded in that, by the outstanding work of the former member for Peace River, Ged Baldwin. As I said, Ged Baldwin can truly be considered the father, mother and uncle of freedom of information legislation in this country because it was his tireless work which resulted in the review of freedom of information legislation by the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments; and it was his prodding, no doubt, that had a good deal of influence on his own government in bringing forward Bill C-15 in 1979.

I cannot leave this area without giving some recognition to the outstanding work which is being done by a number of very effective lobby groups in this area, persons working entirely on a voluntary basis, such as Access, The National Capital Association, The Civil Liberties Association, and a number of other groups which have spent a great deal of time pursuing this very important objective.

We do not need to look very far in Canadian society to see the need for this legislation and to understand why it is long overdue. I was pleased, for example, to note that the government is proposing the repeal of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, a section which has, unfortunately, been abused far too frequently in the past, a sweeping, exclusionary section which permits the minister simply to dictate to the courts that they cannot view particular documents, and at that point the documents are excluded from the court. We saw, for example, the present Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) using that provision with respect to certain documents forwarded to the Laycraft inquiry, and it now appears that there may have been some concern about the use of that section. I am pleased to see that section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act is to be repealed.

My colleagues in the House will be commenting upon some of the difficulties in obtaining information with respect to defence activities which may adversely affect the population of this country. One need only point to the recent shocking revelations in Gagetown, New Brunswick. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues will be speaking further on that subject.

There has been a veil of secrecy cast over the activities of the RCMP. I would suggest that one of the reasons for that secrecy and lack of accountability in the past is that there have been violations of the law, and by opening up the activities of the RCMP security service to greater scrutiny we will ensure, I hope, that never again will the rule of law be eroded in this country and never again will wrongdoing and law-breaking on the part of the RCMP be condoned or accepted.

One need only look at the prison system in this country, which the subcommittee on penitentiaries insisted must become open and accountable; even today it still remains one of the bastions of secrecy in Canadian society. It is still a fact that in order to obtain vital information about what is going on in the penitentiaries, it is necessary to obtain this information, in some cases, through illicit channels. To find out what has happened in the Dorchester Penitentiary, for example, it would have been desirable to receive this information from the minister—and, hopefully, it will be required under the freedom of information legislation. Yet it was necessary to obtain a document through illicit channels which showed that there were serious problems at that institution.

One need only look at the abuse of opinion polls in this country by the present government and, I suspect, by the previous government as well, the right of Canadians to know exactly how this particular information is being collected and what the information is in order that we may all join together in formulating policies based upon the assessment of that information, not just restricting that information to government.

Finally there is the question of the War Measures Act. As was pointed out yesterday by one of my colleagues, we still do not have, over ten years after the event, information on which that decision was based, namely, the decision to sweep away fundamental civil liberties not only of the people of Quebec but of all Canadians. That decision, I suggest history will show, was one of the most shocking abuses of government power which has ever taken place in this country.

There is no question that in Canadian society there is a need to end the pervasive secrecy which exists, and that is the avowed objective of this particular legislation. In addition, there is no question, particularly as we approach that famous year of 1984, that we must ensure that the government does not have sweeping and arbitrary powers to intrude into the private lives of Canadians. That is the avowed objective of the privacy legislation which is being put forward for second reading today. We must recognize the fundamental right of Canadian citizens to prevent the explosion of information, which is at present taking place in this society and which, in many cases is being abused, from being extended far too widely. That is one of the avowed purposes of this bill, as I said. Big Brother must be kept out of the lives of Canadian citizens. We have seen too many incursions.

The door has already been opened with respect, for example, to abuses of wiretapping under the Official Secrets Act. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) eagerly jumped on the bandwagon of the RCMP when they said they wanted to invade the right of privacy of first-class mail of Canadians. We have been waiting in vain for months and months for the evidence which he promised to bring forward justifying that invasion of the privacy of Canadians, and I suggest that that evidence does not exist. These trends are dangerous, and any legislation which can effectively deal with invasion of privacy will, I hope, assist us in checking them.

We also want to look at certain related areas when we talk about freedom of information and the right to privacy. We must look, for example, at the Official Secrets Act, an act which has been recognized by many as being archaic and repressive. I suggest, in looking at the repeal of that document, that we ignore the recommendations of the McDonald commission on this subject, because if they were to be accepted we would not be very much further ahead than we are now. As I said, we need to repeal the Official Secrets Act, which should be replaced only where necessary by much more restrictive provisions. It is important that the right of access to information be extended to the private sector where the activities of the private sector directly affect the interests of the public. For example, I need point only to the importance of extending this to the private sector where the private sector is engaged in the testing of chemicals in abuse of our environment, and also if the private sector has been involved in tests of products which they then attempt to flog on the Canadian market. Surely we have a right to know the results of those tests. Workers who work in the factories, plants and offices of the private sector have a right to know the conditions under which they are working. That principle must be recognized in any freedom of information legislation which is to be truly comprehensive.

We must look at opening up the processes of government. Surely it is not good enough to say that information which has been obtained is to be extended after the fact. The next great battle in this country will be the battle for sunshine laws to open up the processes of government, to open up the meeting places of government to ensure that Canadians are entitled to watch as those decisions are being made and not be provided with the information only after those decisions have been made.

We in this party take that obligation very seriously. We will be pursuing strong and effective sunshine laws to open up the processes of government at the earliest possible opportunity. That would include the obligation to look very seriously at the actions of the lobbyists who have in many cases pervasive and sweeping influence on the process of government. We want to see what they are saying. We want to know what the bankers' association is saying to the government about the Bank Act. We want to be there when these lobbyists are making their representations to the government and to know exactly what is being said. Let us open up the processes of government by introducing tough, effective sunshine legislation.

Last year at this time when a similar bill was introduced, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) symbolized our approach to the Conservative bill, as it was then, by presenting a rose in a dump truck. Well, the rose is slightly wilted and the dump truck we need is perhaps a bit bigger than it was last year; but the principle is the same. The rose symbolizes our acceptance of the fundamental right of Canadians to information and to privacy, and the dump truck recognizes that there are still some very serious loopholes in both parts of this particular bill.

As I say, we welcome the principles which underlie the bill, but we have a number of serious concerns with it. Naturally we will be elaborating on these concerns when we get to committee, but I should like to take this opportunity to elaborate on a number of the more serious concerns. Of course, a number of these concerns were dealt with in the course of the remarks of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

When we talk about the fundamental right of access to information and the right not to have one's privacy unreasonably interfered with, surely it is not a right which should only be extended to Canadian citizens, for it is all residents of Canada who are affected by the actions of government. For example, I need only point to the question of product testing or environmental testing. How can one possibly suggest that it is only citizens of Canada who are affected by possibly hazardous products, or that it is only citizens of Canada who have the right to a decent, clean environment or at least the knowledge of how that environment may have been affected? We will be proposing that this right should be extended to all residents of Canada and not restricted to citizens of Canada, a right which, incidentally, is extended in the United States and Sweden under freedom of information legislation.

We have a number of other concerns; I do not intend to elaborate at any great length on them. I acknowledge the assistance of the lobby group, Access, on this question. I should like to highlight some of its recommendations regarding areas where the bill needs improvement. For example, we believe that the right of access should extend specifically to all government institutions. If an institution is to be exempted, it should be specified by the government. We want to ensure that the indexing system adequately deals with the concerns which have been raised by Access and by other individuals and groups in this area. There must be efficient and prompt access to government records. We have some concerns about the time limits contained in this bill. We want to ensure that the poor as well as the rich have access to information, that it is not restricted to the corporate sector. We want to ensure that the fees involved in obtaining access to information are not excessive.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition raised many concerns which we share about the sweeping scope of the exemption clause. I do not intend to repeat his remarks. We associate ourselves with many of those concerns. I would merely like to highlight one of them today, and that is the exemption with respect to product and environmental testing. I strongly urge the government to consider very seriously substantially tightening the provisions with respect to product and environmental testing because, as they stand now, they are completely unacceptable. Back in 1976, the kind of information which has been kept from Canadians so far and which, if the provision is to be retained in its present form, may continue to be kept from Canadians, was pointed out. I should like to give a couple of examples. Federal inspectors found ground beef padded out with pork and bags of fertilizer which were as much as 12 pounds underweight. They refused to release the names of these products. Surely Canadians have the right to know this. The reports of our health inspectors who check working conditions in mines to ensure they meet occupational safety standards are not made public. Councils have refused to disclose the names of stores which may be selling contaminated goods. The results of tests done on beer, which perhaps can be obtained in Germany or the United States, are denied to Canadian citizens. The provision with respect to product and environmental testing must be substantially strengthened.

I want to repeat our very serious concerns about the judicial review provisions in this bill. There are two standards of judicial review, not one as there should be. We recognize that the government has had to take a major leap forward in its consciousness in accepting the principle of judicial review. We welcome the acceptance of that principle, but to then in turn water it down when dealing with a number of very fundamental exemptions is unacceptable. There must be the right to full de novo review on the part of the Federal Court. This reasonableness test must be eliminated and there must be an objective opportunity for the Federal Court to examine for itself the documents in question to ensure that these important principles are indeed reflected in the decision of the government.

Other concerns have been raised. The minister referred to certain representations by a number of groups. For example, we share the concerns of the Canadian Historical Society with respect to the archives provisions. I hope the minister will be open to amendments which would reflect their concerns, and that we are not in fact restricting access to information which historians already have available to them.

We share some concerns which have been raised by provincial governments with respect to possible abuses in the section on RCMP data flow. We recognize the importance of making this information available, but we want to examine very carefully whether the wording of the bill is the most effective wording in achieving the objectives which I am sure we all share. Also we have concerns with respect to a number of the provisions on privacy. We believe that the third party access which is proposed is too sweeping. We believe there are some concerns about the elements relating to transborder data flow.

We want to ensure that the possible abuse of social insurance numbers can be dealt with adequately. There are a number of other concerns which we will be outlining in committee.

As I said before, we welcome the principle in this important bill. It is long overdue. But we must go beyond the bill because, if we are to be successful in ensuring full and comprehensive access to information and protection of privacy in Canadian society, ultimately it will require the full co-operation of those officials who are charged with the implementation of these provisions. It will be the next great step in this process.

I conclude by urging the government to move quickly on this bill and to bring it speedily to committee where we will propose a number of substantial amendments. I hope we will have a bill of which all Canadians can be proud.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am also very glad to be able to participate in this debate. Because of my time commitments I find that I cannot stay as long as I would like or make as many of the points I would wish. But I cannot resist taking a few moments at the beginning of my remarks to congratulate my colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), for this major piece of legislation. I have no doubt that this legislation will stand as the major achievement of this Parliament, or certainly one of them, apart from the Charter of Rights and Freedoms about which I will speak in a moment.

It has not been easy to bring about this legislation, since one is dealing with a tradition where secrecy tended to be overused. I am glad that from the beginning of this government's term a decision was made that the policy of this legislation would be complied with and that ministers have been expected to operate as if this law was in force. It is acknowledged by the government and those members of the previous Liberal government that there will be less withholding of information from the public than before. For the first time there will be the right, rather than the discretion which existed in the past on the part of the government, to information.

I must say that as Solicitor General I welcome this legislation as much as any other minister, even though in my own ministry there are many matters which will be covered by the confidentiality provisions of the measure which will not be made public. That will continue. In spite of that, there will be, in effect, a second opinion with regard to the decisions the Solicitor General must make to withhold information on the legitimate grounds which are provided in the act. Under the present system, when I stand in my place, write to a citizen or answer a reporter and say that I cannot comment on something or cannot release information, my decision cannot be challenged. But it can be challenged when this legislation is in place.

I think it is great progress that every single piece of paper, every document which belongs to the Government of Canada—to the people of Canada—will be subject to review. All of these documents will not be released; there are exemptions, exceptions and tests provided for in the act. But a minister, such as myself, who must withhold information will see that information go through two stages of review, the commissioner and the courts, to determine by the tests provided for in the legislation whether withholding is justified. I say candidly that I welcome that. I am looking forward to being able to tell a citizen, "I do not think I can give you this information" or "I cannot tell you why this decision was made about you", and then tell them that they do not have to take my word for it. Under this legislation I will be able to say, "You are entitled to go to the Information Commissioner and you are entitled to appeal to the courts and have the decision reviewed." As I say, I take very great comfort from that.

I do not know if hon. members are aware, but as Solicitor General of Canada I receive 65 per cent of all requests made to the government concerning information about an individual. In most cases, the overwhelming majority, information can be provided straight out. But from the time this legislation is enacted, people would not have to take my word for it.

The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) referred to the nature of judicial review. It is that subject about which I particularly wanted to speak. The two of us had an exchange, in which other members participated, before the joint committee. We were dealing with the matter of whether our charter of rights and freedoms ought to contain the absolute right for a court to review a decision made by a minister to withhold information and for the court to substitute its decision for the decision made by a minister.

That is not the test provided for in some of the very fundamental sections dealing with international relations and defence. There is judicial review provided for in those areas but it takes the following form, as I understand it. The court will look at the decision made by the minister. The information which the minister has decided to withhold will be considered. The court will ask, not what it would have done if it had been the minister, but whether the minister's decision is a reasonable one and does the material fit within the class provided for in the statute. I wish to argue that the test which the government has put forward in this area is a very much better one than a completely open review in which a court would have the right to substitute its judgment and decide that the document in question should be made public.

I think the government's test is a better one, which is evident when one considers the consequences of a court substituting, in a particular case, its decision for that of a minister. As I understand it, this is what the opposition will be saying: The judge will say that the minister may have acted reasonably but he does not agree with that decision. Therefore, in spite of the fact that the minister was acting reasonably, that particular piece of information should be made public.

Let us take a hypothetical case. Suppose we are talking about a document which, if disclosed, would seriously damage relations between Canada and a foreign country. For example, say the foreign country confided in us, or sought our advice or support for some matter of great importance to the foreign country. They send us a document and in levelling with us tell us all the political consequences. They tell us how various interest groups in the country feel about the particular issue. They try to convince us to agree with them. Let us say this is the document in question, or a document prepared by our officials relating to that circumstance, commenting on it or analysing it; I think a minister is in a good position to make a decision about whether or not the release of such a document will damage relations between the two countries, perhaps better than a judge. In fact, I would have to say that I think a minister could make that decision better than a judge. I also think the minister should take the responsibility for the decision in the same way the judge would.

Suppose we had the test which some members opposite argue should be in place, and the judge decides in that hypothetical case that he does not think the release of the document would damage relations between Canada and another country and he orders its release. Suppose the release of that document does damage these relations. Who is responsible for that? How can the situation be rectified? This is why I resisted the approach which would allow a judge to substitute his decision for that of a minister when I appeared before the joint committee on behalf of the government.

With respect to the question of reasonableness, there is a provision for judicial review. That review is directed to the question of how reasonable the minister was in making the decision he made. So the special kind of political decisions which ministers are supposed to make will remain with the minister, while the legal question of whether the decision was reasonable or whether the information was within the prescribed category is left with the court. I view this measure as great progress. As I indicated, it will assist me in making decisions which will be perceived to be well founded and more acceptable to those who will be affected by them. I very much welcome this new legislation.

I would like to point out two other excellent features of this legislation which deserve a tremendous amount of recognition and support. One is that an auditing process will continue within the Government of Canada in which officials will have access to all documents within government. Independent officials, on their own initiative, will be able to have access without their requests being triggered by public requests for information, although that may also happen. These officials can come and look through our files which we claim are police files. They can make sure that there are not documents being put in there to receive the benefit of the exception which applies to them. I think that is a very valuable feature of this legislation from the citizen's viewpoint. We will not be able to use special banks for police information and other secure information as a way of hiding things which we want to keep citizens from finding out. This change is a very valuable part of the legislation.

The other change in this legislation which is very valuable is that no matter how protected a document is or how justified the government may be on valid grounds for withholding the document, if it discloses any wrongdoing then it is the responsibility of the courts or the commissioner to bring that wrongdoing to the attention of the proper authorities. So not only does this legislation provide for the giving of information to citizens, but even in instances where it is determined that the withholding of information is justified if wrongdoing is revealed, it cannot be withheld under the security classification which applies to the document as a whole.

Finally, I would like to say a word in support of the passing of section 41 which in the past has permitted a minister, by fiat in effect, to withhold any document or information from a court in any proceeding. This provision is being abandoned by the government. It is perhaps the last vestige of the ancient monarchial tradition where it was not the citizens who gave but the monarch who gave. The removal of this provision is an important step forward.

I am looking forward to living with the requirement of having to defend a decision in response to a request or submission why a particular piece of information or document should be withheld and to leaving the decision with the courts. I do not know how quickly this bill will be enacted, but I know hon. members will have many ideas for improving the legislation. The minister indicated his willingness to hear good ideas and suggestions for improvement, that he is not wedded to all the language or all the ideas in the legislation.

I do hope that, in an attempt to make something perfect, we do not become involved in arguments over relatively trivial matters and thereby postpone the enactment of this legislation. I doubt if any hon. member can stand up and say that as it is written this bill should not be passed, that it does not represent important progress or that it is not worth having. On the contrary, I believe that all of us welcome this legislation. Recognizing the priorities and the business to which this Parliament ought to turn its attention, I hope hon. members will, at a certain point, settle for something which, I submit, is very good and put into effect this legislation which, to end as I began, the Solicitor General of Canada would very much welcome.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by commenting on one remark made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) just a few minutes ago, that no member of this House could say that this bill should not be passed. I agree with the Solicitor General. I do not think that any member of the House would say that this bill should not be passed. However, as some hon. members would say, when the bill is finally dealt with, I hope it is in considerably different form from what it is today in terms of the exemptions, the operation of the committee which is proposed and in other areas.

The fact that House leaders of all three parties have agreed that Bill C-43 is of such importance that the bill should pass in one day and that we would eliminate private members' hour for one day in order that the matter may be considered is an indication of the importance which we attach to this piece of legislation. I merely wanted to make sure that nothing flowed out of the remarks made by the Solicitor General.

It is not the intention of my party to vote against this bill at the end of this day. In fact, it is our intention to send the bill to committee quickly because there are some obvious deficiencies which have been pointed out to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), and which will be pointed out by other speakers in the course of this debate.

This fundamental piece of legislation strikes right at the heart of ministerial responsibility. When the Secretary of State introduced Bill C-43 into the House and held his press conference, I had occasion to comment on the bill, and on first blush I joined with other observers in saying that I was absolutely delighted with the bill. I thank the minister for his kindnesses to me, but I must say that on close reading of that bill those thoughts have become a bit sour. If I were asked to make a comment today, I would have to say that the bill is a giant leap forward for a Liberal government, but not quite the leap that I thought it was when I first looked at the bill, and indeed which other observers thought it was on first examination.

In fact, when I first examined the bill I came to a surprising conclusion because I had thought that the struggles in which I first participated during the period of time when, as the then government House leader, I had the pleasure of piloting the first freedom of information bill through the House at second reading had won acceptance within the bureaucracy and that this work was not in vain. As I say, when I saw that a majority of the clauses were left untouched, I was happy to congratulate the minister. But I was surprised, quite frankly, when I first ventured into this legislation. I do not believe that I am speaking out of school if I say to the minister—because he has probably run into similar situations—that I was surprised at the number of roadblocks put up by right thinking public servants who were used to dealing with things in a particular way to the concept of so dramatically changing the idea of openness which we were discussing. These were the same public servants who had contributed to the Roberts green paper. What I found was that there was a willingness to release more information, but not a willingness to lose control over what might be released.

Among the plaudits which should be extended today, I have to say that as the then president of the privy council responsible for introducing freedom of information legislation, I do not believe our bill would have gone through the various stages known to the minister in cabinet and within the public service, and ultimately to the floor of this House of Commons, if our government had not had the commitment of the then prime minister, now the Leader of the Opposition, to the concept of freedom of information.

At the time we recognized that even our bill, which in modesty I believe, as the discussions go on, will prove to be the bill toward which the Secretary of State should move in terms of some of the exemptions and other clauses, broke new ground. At the outset, what we were talking about then was not intended to be the last word in the freedom of information legislation, but actually the first word. It was a new concept in terms of government operations. It is something to which the public service, ministers, parliamentarians and others would have to become accustomed. Parliament should be given a free rein in terms of its work in the committee to discuss the terms of the bill. The government ought not to tramp hard in its desire to maintain the words or the breadth of the exemptions if a good case can be made for changing them, subject to the best interests of the country. That was the attitude with which the matter was pursued by our government.

I regret to say this to the minister—and I say it in a most positive way—but upon reviewing Bill C-43, it is clear to me that really nothing has been gained. It is true that the bill has some technical improvements, and they were listed by the Leader of the Opposition. In so far as improving on the breadth of the exemptions, for example, the trail that we hacked out has been paved with the same old tar by the same old road gang. The cabinet has added a high profile improvement every few pages, all the while rather gutting the important clauses in the bill.

There is nothing that is really of value that can be released that would not happily have been surrendered under the old regime. Those clauses exempting information from release have been expanded to such a degree that the bill, I must say in kindness at least at this point—and I hope it will not be so when it comes back to the House for third reading—has to be described as an organized giant leap backwards. I should say that openly to the minister because I think he has become subject to the tradition of his party and perhaps the traditions within the Canadian government other than those at the political level. While those improvements that I am prepared to acknowledge are noteworthy, I think we will have to examine some of the others that have been detailed by other speakers.

I want to say something about a couple of other matters now. I think all of us are blinded by the government's seeming conversion, on the face of it, to the concept of judicial review. The idea of putting this in a freedom of information bill is certainly new. I recall that in 1979 when I brough forward Bill C-15, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), who had been the minister for federal-provincial relations in the previous government, spoke as opposition critic. He took great issue with the idea of judicial review, saying that ministers must ultimately be responsible. I think he was putting forth very forcefully what has been the traditional line of a party that has been most conservative on the subject of freedom of information. I hope hon. members opposite will not consider themselves blasphemed if I use that term; I use it with a small "c" to protect their honour and my own.

In Bill C-43 the minister has brought forth a form of judicial review. I do not quarrel now with the details of judicial review as we will deal with that in committee, but it is balanced, indeed counterbalanced, by a broadening of the exemptions to such an extent that I believe, when putting traditional review into operation, the concept will not be as fully utilized as it would have been under Bill C-15. We will want to look at this in committee.

There has been talk about the exemptions. I shall not bother with the specific aspects of some of them because in the 20-minute time limit that we have imposed there is not time to do so. Whatever has been accomplished by inserting the concept of judicial review has been limited, narrowed and diminished as a result of the broadening of the exemptions in the bill. When we examine the bill clause by clause I think we shall have to review that aspect very carefully.

This becomes more worrisome when considered in conjunction with clause 51 of the bill. In Bill C-15 the court was required to rule whether the government was entitled to refuse to disclose a record. That was a straightforward direction and it is retained in Bill C-43 for the less important exemptions. But if the grounds for refusing disclosures are related to federal-provincial affairs, international affairs, defence, special investigative bodies relating to law enforcement or the financial interests of Canada, the judge must be satisfied not only with respect to that test but must be satisfied that the refusal to release was done not on reasonable grounds. In other words, not only have the exemption categories been greatly enlarged; the question before the court is not only whether they apply but whether it is reasonable to think that they might apply. I think this is the best example of the broadening of those exemptions and it is the only example I want to deal with now because of the time limitation. Committee members will find as they go through each of those exemptions that there are words that fudge, make woolly or make vague the specific aspects of exemptions.

Whether we sit to the right of Mr. Speaker or to the left of Mr. Speaker, if we honestly believe in the principle that everything is "releaseable" except that which is specifically exempted, then I think the work of the committee will have to concentrate on those exemptions and attempt to remove the woolliness. This is necessary so that what the Solicitor General wanted to say about the exemptions will come true; that if there is a refusal, the case before the information commissioner and, ultimately, the court will be clear, and there will not be the necessity for the so-called Philadelphia lawyer to advise a suppliant for information from a government or a department as to exactly what those words mean. Some people call them "weasel words". That is a vulgar expression but for the moment I will adopt it. If I may say so, I think in using that kind of word the Secretary of State has perhaps succumbed to the blandishments of certain people in the public service. He knows who they are because he has to deal with them, as I did.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, that is the issue. I do not suggest that those who make such blandishments act in bad faith. Indeed, I believe they act in good faith. But I believe the minister has succumbed, perhaps aided and abetted by the fact that there has not traditionally been within the Liberal party that desire for openness that I found when I took the matter to my cabinet colleagues.

I have just one final matter to raise, Mr. Speaker, because we will be dealing with all of this at length in committee, and that is with respect to the parliamentary committee. The requirement is dropped that within three years of the coming into force of the act a committee of the House must undertake a comprehensive review of the act and produce a report. Oddly enough, section 72 requires the committee to conduct a permanent review of the act and 25(2) requires the committee to review all acts except Bill C-43 within three years. I do not know why that occurred but there may be an explanation for it.

The cumulative effect is that the freedom of information committee will have a continuing reference but instead of a stipulation that the entire scheme be reviewed, only other acts must be reviewed within that short period. At the same time all government institutions will produce yearly reports on the act. I am worried that the effect and intent could be to put the committee in the position of reacting to a yearly barrage of criticism on the operation of the act from inside the public service.

It is in that sense that I want to have the parliamentary committee aspect reviewed. I am happy that the government has taken steps to include it; it was a step in our Bill C-15. I worry about the reason for the change. In the drafting of Bill C-15 I wanted to have that parliamentary committee not only as the place of criticism of the operation of freedom of information, but of the way in which the whole program could be reviewed by its proponents and supporters, not just its detractors. I am concerned that may not happen.

I look forward to working with the Secretary of State, his officials and other members of this House of Commons who will be dealing with this statute. I hope the work will be comprehensive and that the committee will allow the broadest number of witnesses to come.

Tribute has been paid to Access. There have been other organizations as well which deserve credit. When we were involved in the preparation of legislation as a government, I suppose, like everything else, all of us wanted to see our bill improved by the next. That is the attitude with which I approach the work and I look forward to the end of the day when this bill will be referred to the appropriate standing committee of the House.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) mentioned that the bill would be referred to a committee at the end of the day which brings to mind that I discussed the matter with the House leader of the official opposition and with the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) who is representing the New Democratic Party on this issue. There is unanimous agreement to make a request that the bill be referred not to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture but rather to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Therefore, I ask for the unanimous consent of this House that the order of reference be modified and that there be reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby has just left the chamber for a minute. However, I had a discussion with him about this point. He is agreeable, I am agreeable and we are agreeable to the request. Therefore, I think it appropriate to make a House order to that effect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the request of the Secretary of State. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for their applause and I hope I will get a little more when I am finished.

I begin on an agreeable note and I hope my remarks will also be agreeable. However, I must say I was somewhat surprised at the tone of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). While he did approve of the principle of the bill, it seemed to me he was somewhat overly critical of its substance. I found that a little surprising coming from a leader of a party who is opposed to the entrenchment of a charter of human rights and freedoms in the Canadian Constitution. On the other hand, I thought the remarks made by the House leader for the Progressive Conservative Party were much more constructive and much less strident. I will try to put my remarks in that category as well.

I am participating in this debate today not as an expert in law but as an ordinary citizen. I am concerned that big government, big corporations and big unions can withhold information from the average individual which may affect their very livelihood and in some cases their very lives. It is important that we, in a free society, have laws which prevent that kind of insidious use of information which may be a threat to a person's ability to earn a living and in some instances even a threat to his life.

As a member of Parliament I have sometimes wondered whether, in the performance of my duties, I have been given all the necessary information that I have asked for and to which I believe I have a right. There is a tendency in big government for some people to withhold information which they think may not be convenient for them to release. I think that is wrong. We must have protection in law for legislators and representatives of the people to have full access to any information they need in the performance of their duties. With the coming into force of this bill, which I hope will be relatively soon, at least now there will be redress if access is denied.

I am pleased the parties have agreed to have a short debate with time limitation on speeches so we can send this bill to committee. I hope that we will see more of this party co-operation with agreement to limit the amount of verbiage which pass as speeches in this chamber. It seems to me that if someone cannot express themselves in 20 minutes, they should review what it is they want to say and find out if anyone is going to listen. I look forward to the day when all speeches in this chamber, with the exception of major speeches by party leaders, are limited to 20 minutes.

This bill is another step in the desire to enhance and protect personal freedom in our nation. In a world of increasing complexity, both information and the power to withhold it are potent weapons. Because we have agreed that information may be gathered surreptitiously under certain circumstances, it is more and more urgent to have written law to protect precious individual rights, which all too often can be arbitrarily suppressed for the common good by some nameless but powerful individual or group whose anonymity made them immune not only to prosecution but also to appeal.

I have some reservations about the bill, as I have about almost every bill, but one must assess one's reservations or the weaknesses one sees in a bill, with the over-all benefit of the bill itself.

First, I want to deal very briefly with clause 11(4). This clause gives the head of a department the authority to require a monetary deposit before a search is started for the production of a record. I can understand the reason for that. In fact, I agree that there should be some incentive for people not to make frivolous requests or to expect that very costly requests are going to be carried out without any onus on the individual making the request. I would hope that in the regulations to this bill there will be some circumvention of the power of heads of departments to require deposits that are so big as to be impossible for individuals to make. In other words, I hope that heads of departments will not be allowed to use that section of the bill as an excuse not to provide information or to fulfil requests for information.

Second, clause 22 also gives me concern. I can understand the need for exemptions. However, it might well serve governments better to release the kind of information referred to in clause 22 than to keep it secret, or attempt to keep it secret, only to have it leaked in a brown envelope. Unless there is a mechanism for preventing that kind of leak which is designed usually to embarrass a government, I feel that it would be in the best interests of the government to release it. So I wonder about that clause as well.

Third, clause 26 is the clause on severability. My concern with that clause is pretty much the same as with the clause requiring a deposit. I hope that regulations will be devised to prevent officials who wish to withhold certain information, which may not be of the type or kind specified in the exemptions under this bill, from severing the information requested. I know that is not the purpose of this clause. I hope the regulation will make the purpose abundantly clear and circumscribe any attempt to use clause 26 to prevent release of the information.

Clause 28, the transitional provision in the bill, gives me concern as well. I am not sure of the purpose of that clause or what it means; that is why I am concerned about it. I suppose it falls into my general concern about the way in which legislation is written. I hope that one day in this country we will have in our legal drafting department some draftsman who can speak at least one of the official languages of this nation.

I wish to comment on a few more clauses. I want to refer to clause 37(2) which is a very powerful clause promoting exactly what the bill intends to do. I quote that clause:

> Notwithstanding any other act of Parliament or any privilege under the law of evidence, the information commissioner may, during the investigation of any complaint under this act, examine any record under the control of a government institution, and no such record may be withheld from the commissioner on any grounds.

That is a very good clause. It gives the commission the power needed to enforce the act. It is a very positive clause.

I am pleased that the bill provides for the commissioner to make reports to Parliament. Not only must he make annual reports, but he can make special reports if he so chooses. However, I do have one concern. I would like to see it provided that the reports of the commissioner stand as a permanent reference to a committee of this House or a joint committee of both Houses. It could be the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs or the committee referred to in the bill which will be established to review the functioning of the act. I believe it is clause 73 which establishes the special committee or committees to review the act and make recommendations. That, of course, will be done by members of Parliament.

Today we have heard a lot about what this bill does not do. It is important to put on record what it does. I want to talk for a minute or two about the contents of the bill. The bill would provide a right of access to information in government records "in accordance with the principle that government information should be available to the public, that necessary exemptions to the right of access should be limited and specific, and that decisions on the disclosure of government information should be reviewed independently of government".

The second part of the bill dealing with personal information in government files would reaffirm the right of individuals to see and amend personal information and broaden that category to include all personal information, not only personal information used for decision-making purposes.

As promised in the Speech from the Throne, the bill would abolish section 41 of the Federal Court Act so that the government would no longer have the absolute right to withhold information from the courts during any litigation. A minister's objections to disclosure on public interest grounds would be subject to review by a court. The court would have access to the information at issue and the right to decide whether that information should be introduced as evidence. There are a number of exemptions. They are limited, defined and specific.

Another provision in the bill which is absolutely essential to protect individual rights is the third party notice. The bill would establish a third party notice procedure with respect to information provided to the government by unions, businesses and other commercial enterprises. It would require that such persons or organizations be notified when information that could adversely affect their interests is to be released, allow them to make representations as to why the information should not be released, and to appeal a decision to release it. There is a two-layer appeal system provided in the bill, the appeal to the commissioner and, if the individual is not satisfied with that decision, there is a judicial review before the Federal Court.

In closing, I congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) on introducing this bill. I hope it will have the deliberate but not delaying scrutiny in committee that it deserves and will soon be entered into the statute books of Canada as the law of the land.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, for each of us in the House of Commons who has been involved in this issue of privacy and freedom of information over the course of the years, today has to be considered a happy day. Clearly on our side of the House there are concerns about aspects of the bill, both as it relates to privacy and to freedom of information.

We will be supporting this measure. We will be moving to get it before committee as quickly as possible and will be making proposals in committee and in the House designed to make this a better bill for all Canadians. I think I would be doing an injustice to all of those involved in these issues over the years if I did not say that the bill before the House today represents a significant step in the right direction.

Credit has been paid to Gerald Baldwin, our former colleague, who is well known as the father of freedom of information in Canada. Perhaps I would broaden that to refer to the committee of which he was the co-chairman and of which I am co-chairman at the present time, the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. It went on record a number of years ago as being in favour of the concept of freedom of information and pressing the government to take the action it is now taking today. It is important that we recognize the work being done by so many members to promote action in these two areas.

It might be useful at the outset of my remarks to review briefly some of the philosophy behind this legislation and something of the history behind it. During the course of time I have been here, the last eight years, it became apparent to me that the government's attitude toward control of information has been that if it has information related to its activities, as to how decisions are made which affect the day to day lives of Canadians or how Canadians' tax dollars are to be spent, that information is the property of the government. The onus is put upon the average Canadian to justify having access to that information. If governments want information about the private lives of individuals, they maintain the right to compel that information on pain of penalty of law if the individual chooses not to give it.

It was felt necessary by members on this side, who believe that the role of the state should be limited and the state should be the servant of the people and not its master, to turn that onus around. Control over information is not a right of the government. That information is not the property of the state but of the people of Canada.

In those instances where the government feels there is a compelling reason why information should be suppressed, the onus should be upon the government to justify taking that action. In those instances where the government feels it is necessary to compel information from individuals, the onus should be put upon the government to justify compelling release of that information, not put upon the individual to justify his reluctance to give it. This is why we felt it was important to bring in integrated legislation which would deal with both aspects of this matter, freedom of information and privacy.

It has been said in the past that in some ways legislation on privacy and on freedom of information are somehow in contradiction with one another, but that is not so. The two concepts are different sides of the same coin. The real issue here is the control of information. Who owns information, who controls it? Does it belong to the state or does it belong to the people? That is why the first bill of the Clark government, introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), was a bill which would have brought forward the concept of freedom of information.

In conjunction with my colleague, Senator Jacques Flynn, the then minister of justice, I was working on a complimentary bill on the issue of privacy which would be passed separately by this House but which upon passage would interlock and integrate those two principles; it would ensure, for example, that the mechanisms of access to one's own file would be the same as those used for files about how the government was spending your money, or how decisions are made. The exemptions would as much as possible be consistent so we would not run into the situation where public servants were put in the position of having to choose between, on the one hand, penalties for withholding information, and on the other hand penalties for giving out information to which they felt the public should be entitled. We felt it was essential that we should eliminate or at least reduce the possibility of conflict and try to have as coherent a package as possible, recognizing the philosophy that information belongs not to the state but to the people of Canada.

As I have mentioned, my colleagues who have spoken before me have given their evaluations of the government's bill, and particularly of the freedom of information section. They have pointed out at least four areas where Bill C-43 is weaker than the legislation proposed by our government.

First, it is apparent that the government's legislation will make it harder for interested individuals to discover what documents actually exist. Clause 5(3) implies that if information appears to be exempt from release, it does not have to be even listed on information bulletins.

Second, these exemption categories, particularly in the areas of international affairs and defence, law enforcement and investigations and economic interests of Canada, appear to go much further than the Clark government's bill to protect information from release to the people of Canada.

Third, the powers, status and pay of the information commissioner appear to have been considerably eroded.

Fourth, and perhaps most importantly, it does not appear that the additional power given to the courts will come close to promoting the degree of openness that ought to be expected in this bill. This is largely the result of the fact that when a judge decides on the appropriateness of withholding information or documents in certain categories, he cannot determine whether the department head is entitled to withhold it, but merely if he had "reasonable grounds for doing so". For my purposes I would like to shift the focus of the debate from the freedom of information section of Bill C-43 to the privacy section of the bill.

Hon. members will remember that I introduced a similar private member's bill earlier last year which was the final draft of the bill prepared by Senator Flynn and myself for introduction under the Conservative government. I am pleased, obviously, to see that the substance of that bill has been incorporated in the government's legislation which has come forward, and I am delighted by the fact that, while there has been retreat on some of the important areas of the bill, by and large the substance has been incorporated in this legislation.

In fact, the timing of this debate could not have come at a more appropriate moment. Parliament is currently embroiled in an historic conflict over the type of rights that ought to be entrenched in the Constitution of Canada. The current government has endlessly argued that a complete and fundamental bill of rights ought to be included in any constitutional amendments we send over to Britain. Yet, Mr. Speaker, shockingly, one of the most basic of human rights has been left out of the government's charter of rights, and that is the right to privacy.

That right has an ancient history both in the west and in the history of man throughout the world. On this continent the right to privacy, for example, dates back to the first, third, fourth, fifth and ninth amendments of the constitution of the United States. Judge Thomas Cooley, in his influential treatise on torts, described privacy as the inalienable and natural "right to be let alone". Almost 100 years later the Younger committee redefined the concept as the right of "freedom from intrusion upon oneself, one's home, family and relationships". In the western democracies the right to privacy was born out of the Enlightenment's suspicion of the state. To paraphrase Locke, the democratic state became the sum total of the persons comprising society. In this sense the state was established to serve society, a group of individuals who led their own private lives.

In terms of the history of man the need for personal privacy is a universal quest in the human experience. According to I.C. Velecky, evidence of this fact can be found in the social conditions of ancient Greece and was manifested in the customs and communal life of primitive tribes.

The amount of privacy each one of us wants or needs varies from one person to another, but every one of us requires at least a modicum of privacy if we are to protect our very humanity. It is not because we have some evil to hide from detection, but because each one of us needs to keep part of our life private if we are to maintain our dignity and pride. Clearly the historical root of the right to privacy can be said to be inalienable and natural.

In Canada there has been legislation in this field over the last several years. For example, in 1974 there was the legislation which gave control over electronic surveillance, and in March, 1978, part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act was proclaimed. I must stress that part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act was totally inadequate. Indeed, even though it provided for the publishing of an index of federal government data banks which would give Canadians some indication of which government departments held information about them, the government made a conscious decision not to publicize that right because it did not want to be overburdened by people seeking to exercise those rights. What could be a more devastating criticism of the government's commitment to the right of privacy than the fact that it wanted to leave it largely unmentioned?

My party has put forward an amendment to the government's constitutional package to enshrine the right to privacy in the bill of rights. Freedom from unreasonable interference in privacy, family, home and correspondence is the very least people demand that the state provide Canadians. Despite the government's perceived commitment to privacy, members opposite voted down our amendment, striking a blow at the very heart of our Canadian traditions. Government was created by the people to serve the people. It was not created, as members often seem to feel, to give the state the powers to interfere with people's lives.

The reasons it is essential we have legislation on privacy have been obvious to anyone living in modern society. As the needs of society for information about the individual have increased, the threat to privacy has increased commensurately. Indeed, in a survey done by the Department of Communications, 52 per cent of the respondents felt that computers were reducing people to just numbers; 69 per cent felt that computers caused errors because they do not take human factors into account; 37 per cent felt that computers threatened personal privacy; and 52 per cent felt that computers caused violation of confidentiality. This bill goes some distance along the way toward addressing some of the concerns which were left unaddressed by part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

One of the very essential areas which is not covered in this legislation is the public concern, and a very justified public concern, about the development which has been taking place in the use of the social insurance number, moving it toward becoming a universal identification number. The Clark government, as part of the legislation which we drew up, had a proposal to roll back the use of the social insurance number to six purposes for which it was basically designed. One of those instances, which would be the Canada student loans provision, would be a sunset law over the course of three years, and after that time the government would not be able to insist upon it in that area.

We believe it is essential that the federal government act now to show leadership in the whole field of privacy. We do not believe it was adequate for the government and for the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) to take the action of striking that provision from our bill, because the evidence is there today that a real and grave threat to the privacy of Canadians exists in the case of abuse of the social insurance number, and that it is essential that the federal government should show leadership, acting in this area, demonstrating that it is prepared to restrict its use of social insurance numbers. Instead, what it has done is simply broaden the study which we had commissioned into the use of social insurance numbers at the provincial level and among the private sector, and to ask the privacy commissioner to look at the federal government as well. We believe that is totally inadequate.

It is interesting to note that even one of the most compelling arguments in favour of social insurance numbers has been its very credibility; that it is believed there is only one social insurance number per customer. Yet in testimony before the McDonald inquiry it was revealed by one RCMP officer that 50 per cent of all cases of false pretences in one detachment he was policing made use of social insurance number cards.

The lack of security surrounding the social insurance number was illustrated recently by the case of the Calgary man who obtained 109 social insurance numbers to enable him to collect 59 UIC claims and a monthly income of $33,000. Similarly, two chaps from Montreal used 60 social insurance cards over a period of two months to collect $32,867 from the UIC. Then there was the case of the Winnipeg man who secured 25 social insurance cards and proceeded to collect $92,000 over four and a half years.

Members on this side of the House applaud initiative, but this is not the sort of initiative we believe the government should be condoning or should be putting programs in place to foster. Yet the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has cautioned Canadians that it is essential that social insurance numbers be used even more in the future than they have been in the past. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that my time is rapidly running out.

In wrapping up my remarks let me say that we support the government's legislation which is going forward today. We believe that it should be considered in committee and that it should be considered closely. Neither the legislation which we proposed last year nor the legislation which is before the House today should go without improvement. Both of them deserve close scrutiny and the attention of all members of Parliament. We believe that this is an important step forward. We will be calling upon the government to show flexibility before the committee in listening to Canadians and be prepared to make improvements to this legislation so that we will ensure once and for all that the right of Canadians to control information about themselves and about how government is affecting their lives and spending their money belongs to them and should not be under the sole jurisdiction of the state.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this matter will be short. I trust, as a matter of fact I am relatively certain, that I will be able to put those particular points of view across in the 20 minutes allotted to me and thus will be able to demonstrate, as have colleagues on both sides of the House, that the particular agreement which we have been able to reach in this debate to reduce our speeches to 20 minutes as opposed to 40 minutes is an exceptionally good idea, a great step forward, indeed almost a great leap forward, as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) originally described the bill, a description which he later retracted.

At least the method of dealing with this bill is a great leap forward, and I am sure even he agrees with me on that. I hope that we will all be able to agree from time to time, and I hope lots of times, on dealing with other debates in the same manner. It is an enlightened approach which we have taken and this is something on which we should be complimenting all our House leaders and for which we should be pressing our caucuses.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It all depends on the substance of the legislation.

Mr. Daudlin: The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) spoke of onuses of proof and the fact that in his opinion the onus of proof should be on the government with respect to those items which they wanted not to release to the public view. On its face I have to say that I agree with the hon. member. I think that he is putting forward a wise position, but I am a little concerned with respect to some of the presumptions which appear to underlie his concept in the way in which he put it forward.

I have sat in this chamber since 1974 and many of my colleagues have been here even longer than that. Those who have sat on the government benches have come to the realization that when colleagues from the other side of the House speak of what people's rights are, they seem somehow to make the distinction between a government member, whom they judge does not speak for the people, and themselves, whom they judge do speak for the people.

Perhaps I have an old-fashioned idea of what this place should be, but I believe the presumption should be that all members in this place, including hon. members who have been elevated to the ministry, speak for the people, and that the opposition has no particular claim to speak for the people over that which we are able to exercise from this side of the House and on these benches. So long as we can all agree on that presumption, I concur with the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe that the onus be on the party presuming to withhold the documents from public view.

However, I do not share his view that the method to be used in determining whether a document is being fairly or unfairly held is one that should be given over to the courts. I happen to believe that the method which has been struck upon in Bill C-43 is the appropriate and proper method because, in my view, it takes from the courts a job which I am sure any judicial appointee in this country would not want to have. It seems to me, from my practice of law and from what I have heard in the Hosue, that the judges on our benches are jealously protecting the concept of the division and the distinction between the judiciary and the legislative branch. If we are going to put the judges of this land in the position of being asked to make political decisions—because that is exactly what we would be asking them to do—then how can they stand up and claim to be separate from this place?

The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) earlier spoke of the particular problem in which any judge would find himself in terms of having overturned a political decision on some item relating to external affairs and relations between countries and ourselves, a political decision made on behalf of the minister. In my view, the same sort of thing applies to any other minister in the government. Once a political decision is taken, it is reasonable and fair that a commissioner in the first instance, and a court thereafter, make the determination as to whether or not the ministerial discretion or the ministerial decision-making power was exercised in a fair and reasonable manner. If it were not, I challenge any member of the House to find in himself or in any minister of the Crown sufficient political clout to withstand the kind of public pressure, and political pressure from this House itself, which would be brought to bear on a person who challenged the finding of, first, the commissioner and then the court that the decision to withhold a document was unreasonable. I cannot believe that anyone would withstand that kind of pressure, and I think that that is the kind of pressure that is built into this this bill. It puts the political decision-making power squarely where it belongs, namely, on the cabinet, and it withholds it from the judges of our land who, I am satisfied, would be running as fast as they could from that kind of power. I am satisfied they do not want it.

In terms of the indeces of private citizens which currently exist in Canada, I was interested as well in the comments made by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe. I share with him many of the concerns which he expressed in terms of the ability of an individual citizen to have access to those banks of information which are continuously being increased on us all. We all want to have access to information, if for no other reason than to correct the faults which many of us find are there. I cannot say specifically that I heard that hon. member complain about funds being used by the government to publicize a particular act—I would not say that without having first researched it, something which I have not had a chance to do—but it is passing strange to find that at least his party would challenge and chastise the government, for using public funds to publicize its position. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, were I allowed to use stronger language, I would be able to describe more aptly what they have done in terms of commenting on what this government has done with public funds to publicize a particular act of the government, a bill, a position or a point of view that was put forward.

But when it comes to something which they would like to have publicized, the fact that public funds were not used for the purpose, of course, is wrong too. So we find ourselves in the strange position of being dammed if we do and dammed if we don't, and only the party over there can do the damming.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You are getting to them, Bob.

Mr. Daudlin: I do not know whether I am getting to them. I am starting to hear some life on the other side. It is good to know they are listening. There are occasions when one's words fall either on deaf ears or the ears of those who do not want to hear. But today someone is listening, and I express my appreciation to hon. members across the way.

The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe made reference to social insurance numbers. There are many members on both sides of the House who share his comments and thoughts with respect to the ever-increasing use of social insurance numbers. As a matter of fact, some of my colleagues and I have absolutely refused to provide our social insurance numbers when we felt that it was an unreasonable and unfair request. This practice has crept in. Perhaps we should be exercising some leadership in an attempt to stop it.

The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe formed part of a government which started a review on how those numbers were being used. He should know—and indeed he must know—that the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) renewed and continued the mandate which in fact had been given by the former government. More than that, he enlarged the mandate with respect to that review and examination to determine just how widespread the use of social insurance numbers had become, for what they were being used, whether they were being used for the kinds of things which should be allowed and whether there were uses of which we were not even aware that should be stopped. The mandate has not been concluded; the report has not been done. I am glad to say that the government does not act in advance of the reports and recommendations it is seeking. It would be false economy to ask for a report and then prepare legislation in advance of it. It would be wrong to request a report and then attempt to pass legislation through the House without the benefit of the report. It is my understanding that in fact the report will be available shortly. Once we have it, we will be able to examine social insurance numbers much more comprehensively than we would have been able to had we brought that matter in at the same time as this legislation. In short, it would have been premature. I am glad it has not been done without the benefit of the report and that recommendations will come forward once the report is completed.

I had the honour of being parliamentary secretary to the secretary of state in a former government when in fact the green paper on freedom of information was being discussed. I was parliamentary secretary at the time the committee appointed to conduct a study was examining that paper.

I recognize full well the difficulties of the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) in bringing forward this particular piece of legislation. It was not an easy job. It is not the kind of thing one can sit down in a night or even a full month of nights and come forward with, because of the balancing act one must do between the rights of access and privacy. Also there are difficulties with periods, commas and words in terms of drafting. I sincerely congratulate the Secretary of State for bringing forward this piece of legislation. All of us recognize that it is high time, but we are glad it is now before us and we are moving forward to have the matter sent to committee. Ultimately we hope it will be brought into law.

I echo hon. members on both sides of the House who have said it would be folly for us to believe what we have before us in its present state is perfection. It will require work, polishing and amendment before it comes back. The minister indicated that he is prepared to assist in that regard. It would be folly to believe after it has been considered in committee, brought back to the House and debated at third reading, that it will be perfect. Indeed, it will not be, but it is a starting point. It is a credit to the House that we are moving toward that position.

I want to make the point as strongly as I can that the review provision included in this bill is the correct direction in which to go in terms of attempting to retain the division between the judiciary and the legislative branches. Also it gives credence to the concerns expressed not only by those people who want further, more and greater access to information, but also those who have expressed the possible severe interference which could take place if we go too far. I need go no further than the police chiefs associations that have been very concerned, not only the ones in Canada but also the ones in the United States when its particular legislation was passed. It seems to me that associations across the world have been concerned whenever this type of legislation came forward. They are concerned among other things, that if we go too far, we will run into terrible problems in terms of how information such as the names of informants will be kept secret. If in fact informants come forward to assist in combating organized crime, surely we will have to be careful to ensure secrecy. Such information cannot go through many hands. We all know how easily information such as that can slip through fingers, disappear or get into the wrong hands. Surely we would not want one informant disappearing by taking a long walk off a short pier.

It would result in the drying up of that source of information and the inability of our police forces to obtain the assistance they need to combat the crime which we all want stopped. I think the government has achieved this balancing act in this bill.

We should all listen very carefully to the groups which will come forward with their particular points of view. As members of Parliament we have received the usual lobbying documents in this particular case. I have copies of Access documents about which the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) spoke. We will look at these documents very carefully. I am particularly happy to have heard the minister indicate when he introduced the bill this afternoon that we will be receiving amendments with open minds. In fact, I have some particular amendments which I want to bring forward. I will be attending committee meetings diligently in order to see that my points of view are brought forward. I trust that the opposition members who have spoken this afternoon will be doing the same.

I hope we all realize that we are producing something as nearly perfect as we can but not totally perfect and that we are not creating some kind of a panacea. We will create a tool which perhaps will make this House more lively from time to time and will afford the press gallery an opportunity to obtain information which its members now feel is not readily available.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Will it mean more brown envelopes?

Mr. Daudlin: It will probably reduce the number of brown envelopes being used on the hill; perhaps that will be cost-effective. But I have the feeling that all of us on the Hill, being as busy as we are and having a volume of information going across our desks, will find that access to more information, in addition to not being a panacea, may have the effect of glutting our offices as well. I trust that when we have this kind of information available to us and it is not accomplishing the kind of miracle which I know some hope it will, we will not blame the legislation. I hope we will not come up with some kind of perverse decision about the government making certain that this legislation does not work. If it works at all, it will have done so because, by putting forward the bill, by stating the concept and by coming up with these words, the civil servants, whom I think we all recognize are here to serve Canadians, and not somehow not to do their will, will recognize that it is the wish and the will of this Parliament and Canadians, wherever they are, to have access to information being produced by those same civil servants at the request of and on behalf of the government. Knowing that their will has been expressed will, in fact, indicate through their own actions the kind of openness which the government has expressed is its will in this bill.

If that takes place, and I am almost certain it must as a result of what we are doing here, then I think we will have accomplished a step toward what we are seeking. As I say, it will be a panacea for us. But certainly, contrary to the expressed opinion of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, it is a giant leap forward, not a giant leap sideways or backward, as he would rather characterize it.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak briefly on the freedom of information legislation. I think it is a step in the right direction, and I would like to commend the government for bringing it forward. There are many changes which we would like to see made in it. We will be addressing those here today, and we will be moving some amendments in the committee.

I think this legislation goes a long way toward improving the accountability of government. I think Parliament itself is fairly accountable, since we are before the eyes of the public. What we say and do here is written into the verbatim transcript of Hansard. Quite often, when we become involved with government and some of its programs, information which should be accessible to the public at large and to members of Parliament in some cases is hidden away. It is not released at times when it actually should be in order to make government more accountable. I think the disclosure aspect with respect to many pieces of information is necessary so that members of Parliament and the public can be made aware of some of the things which our government—either elected members or public employees—does.

A few instances come to mind in which we can actually obtain more information about our own country in the United States than we can right here at home. The most recent incident is with respect to the events at Gagetown. A few members of Parliament from this caucus had to obtain their information about the spraying of Agent Orange in New Brunswick from the American government. We should be able to find information about our country here at home and not in another country. We should have full disclosure in these cases which affect the public to a large degree.

There are other matters about which information would be very useful to me as a member of Parliament. This is particularly true in cases where I have gone to government departments and asked for internal documents which contain the interpretation of the statutes or supplementary regulations which are used to enforce those statutes. In some cases I find it is impossible to obtain that information from government departments. This puts us in a very awkward position when we are dealing with the public and trying to overcome some of the problems they run into in dealing with certain government programs. As I mentioned before, Mr. Speaker, I think this measure goes a long way toward accountability.

There have been different reports on this subject, recommending government accountability. The D'Avignon report and the Lambert commission report come to mind. The freedom of information legislation is certainly not the be-all and end-all, but it is a step in the right direction. I am a member of the public accounts committee. Quite often cases come before us which would not be there if we had a freedom of information act in place in this country.

I would also like to tell the House that I had an opportunity to serve as a member of the task force on regulatory reform, which was struck by this government. We heard a great deal about people who could not obtain information they needed in order to function properly. I think this hampers our process. People cannot work effectively if they are at the disadvantage of not having all the information which pertains to them or where the government has set a regulation in a unilateral way without a great deal of consultation with the people who will be affected. The government does not allow a great deal of intervention. It does not consult people who will be affected by regulations. Then the regulations are enacted, and we still do not have access to the information. We do not have access to the internal workings of the regulations and the statutes of Canada. This places the general public at a great disadvantage when dealing with government. Companies, labour unions, consumer groups and individuals throughout the country told us of their frustration when they came before the task force on regulatory reform.

Although it does not directly relate to this bill, at this time I would like to say that I enjoyed being a member of the task force on regulatory reform. I hope the government will move to implement some of the recommendations made in our final report, which was tabled in this House on December 19. It was presented to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). I encourage him and his government to take action with respect to some of those recommendations. These recommendations, along with this freedom of information legislation, will do a great deal to bridge some of the gap between the public and the government. I suppose I should say the private sector and the government.

My main concern about freedom of information is with respect to the protection of the rights of individuals about whom the government has information in its files. I want to see very stringent controls applied so that information about individuals or companies will not be released by the government, which would place individuals in an embarrassing position or which would place businesses, large or small, in an uncompetitive position. I hope these rights will be protected and that there will not be any information released with respect to the internal secrets of a company which would place it in a bad position in the free market.

As I said, these many concerns will be addressed in the committee, Mr. Speaker. I have enjoyed the opportunity of speaking briefly on the freedom of information legislation. In closing, I would again like to commend the government for taking a step toward improving government accountability.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I really had no intention of rising on this bill until problems with respect to certain files in my office brought it to mind. I thought I should relate to this House some of my thoughts with respect to the obligation of ministers of the Crown to be more forthcoming with members of Parliament. After all, Mr. Speaker, there are not very many of us. There are only 282 of us in Canada. As members of Parliament we have taken an oath before the Clerk of this House to respect Parliament and our obligations to the Queen.

Often it is necessary for an hon. member in the exercise of his duty to have additional information about the people with whom he may be dealing. Some time ago I had a problem with respect to representations made to me by a constituent. I suspected that somehow this constituent may be a member of an organization which was not operating in the interests of Canada. In that regard I made inquiries of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) because I wanted a private briefing with him in order to obtain information which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police might have on that person and the organizations with which he was involved.

As a member of Parliament, I take my obligations to Canada seriously. I did not want to wind up taking a position on behalf of that person which would in any way jeopardize my obligations to Canada or assist in the promotion of some organization the real purpose of which may not be in the interests of Canada. I was disappointed because I did not get that confidence from the minister. The minister's view was that he should not tell me anything and, therefore, I was on my own.

In a way it is sad that we must have a freedom of information bill. Ministers of the Crown have an obligation to members of Parliament, their colleagues, to be forthcoming, even if it is on a very personal, private or confidential basis. We, as members of Parliament, are entitled to the confidence of ministers, and ministers are entitled to rely on our undertakings not to divulge the sources from which we obtain confidential information. To some extent, this bill is required by members of Parliament because in many cases we have not been able to obtain some of the most elementary information from the Crown.

I would like to outline a matter of elementary information because some suggestion has been made that contracts and things which might affect private corporations and businesses should not necessarily be made public. I understand that line of thought. However, recently, I have been carrying on a running battle with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) concerning some leases on waterfront property in the city of Mississauga. The waterfront property was at one point in the town of Port Credit.

Roughly six years to eight years ago the Government of Canada leased a large harbour facility in Port Credit to a company called Port Credit Harbour Marine. That lease was negotiated in a very interesting fashion for a period of 20 years, and it covers an important marina on a very important commercial facility in my city. Over the past year I have been renegotiating a lease on an abutting property with the Government of Canada for the Port Credit Yacht Club. Strangely enough, the rental arrangements for this very significant facility occupied by Port Credit Harbour Marine are not available.

Members of Parliament sometimes have other methods of learning about matters. I was told that I could go to the assessment department of the Region of Peel and that if they would tell me, then it was fine, but the minister would not tell me. In effect, the minister would supply the information to a municipal department of the government of Ontario, but he would not supply that information to a member of Parliament. So here we have a lease on which a company is paying rent to the Government of Canada for the use of Crown property, the Crown is negotiating a lease on the abutting property to another person, and it is impossible to find out the terms of the lease on the abutting property.

It turns out that the rent being charged to Port Credit Harbour Marine is significantly less on a square footage basis, a building value basis, an anchorage basis or any other basis than the rent which the Port Credit Yacht Club is being asked to pay. The rent which the Port Credit Yacht Club is being asked to pay is higher than the rent paid by any yacht club in the entire greater Toronto area. Indeed, the rent is three times the rent on a mooring basis or a square footage basis than the rent paid by the RCYC, perhaps the richest yacht club in all of Ontario or indeed, Canada.

The facts and figures upon which rent is determined, upon which a fair lease is arranged and upon which the ministry relies are withheld simply because, I presume, the information would not back the government's claim with respect to a negotiable fair rent. That is wrong. I expect that on the passage of this act the government will be obligated to supply the information.

I am bothered by the cost to the bureaucracy involved in scanning requests for information to make sure that those requests are not of the class and kind prohibited under the bill. I say again, if we did not have the situation where governments have refused to come clean and be fair to the citizens of Canada, we would not need this bill. But because governments for some time now have refused to be open and above board, we are required to organize a bureaucracy to judge and arbitrate on whether a piece of information can be released.

If one really believes that our democratic representative system is worth while, one would expect the government at least to have the belief that members of Parliament are trustworthy and that if a constituent has a need which the government can fulfil, the member of Parliament could get the information, if it is possible, and thereby solve the matter. Because of the refusal of the ministries to be above board, open and free with members of Parliament and with people, we must introduce a bill which—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed that at long last there is before the House of Commons Bill C-43 dealing with freedom of information and the right to privacy. This matter has had a rather checkered career going back as far as the days of Barry Mather, the former member for Surrey-White Rock, who brought in a private member's bill. That was followed by a bill brought in by the former member for Peace River, Mr. Ged Baldwin. They were the forerunners of freedom of information in Canada.

Following those two private members' bills in June, 1977, a green paper entitled "Legislation on Public Access to Government Documents" was tabled by the then secretary of state, now the Minister of State for Science and Technology and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts). The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments reported on the green paper.

Senator E. A. Forsey was joint chairman of the drafting committee. He is now retired from the Senate. The other joint chairman was Gerald W. Baldwin, the former member of Parliament for Peace River, now retired. Senator J. M. Godfrey is still in the other place. Mr. Andrew Brewin, formerly the member of Parliament for Greenwood, is now retired. I was the fifth member of the committee.

Next came Bill C-535, a privacy bill presented by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). He spoke on this matter today and expressed considerable concern about the use of social insurance numbers by the federal government and the fact that there is no mention of this practice in Bill C-43. I point out to him that the study of the use of social insurance numbers was commissioned by the privacy commissioner and was extended to May, 1980, and was to include a study of the use of social insurance numbers by the federal government. The hon. member will recall that the matter was initiated by the Conservative minister of justice in the last Parliament.

Obviously, to include specific provisions dealing with social insurance numbers in this legislation would prejudice the findings of the privacy commissioner. However, it is understood that the general provisions in the bill dealing with the collection, use and dissemination of personal information by the federal government will apply to social insurance numbers, and this will accomplish much of what the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe wanted to achieve.

There are some very important points in Bill C-43. The bill represents a significant development in making our institutions more open and more democratic. This is what it is all about. We call ourselves a democratic nation, and we want to be sure it is democratic in every way. Openness is certainly part of what we are looking at. Canadians will have a powerful tool to gain greater insight into the activities and functions of their government when this bill is put in place. Politicians and civil servants will be more accountable to the Canadian public, and I am sure the Canadian public is quite concerned about this.

The people will also become more aware of the operations of their governments. This is openness, and it is the kind of openness we want Canadians to have today.

An independent review process will be established, which will take away a minister's right not to give information at his own whim and fancy. But matters would be determined by courts if necessary.

The burden of proof with respect to withholding information will be put on the government, where it rightfully belongs. After all, at the present time it is the government which has the documents and is able to withhold them if it wants to. Moreover, a judge would be able to overrule a decision of the government to withhold information and order the release of a document. This is in accordance with our present judicial process which, I am sure, is quite adequate to carry out this function.

I am also pleased that section 41 of the Federal Court Act would be abolished so the government would no longer have the absolute right to withhold information from the courts during any litigation.

Access to information is a prerequisite to the exercise of other fundamental rights and freedoms.

In summary, we need openness of government. In effect, we need freedom of information, and we will get that to some extent in this bill.

There are four basic principles in the bill. The first is the right of Canadians to have access to all information held by the government, except where specific exemptions apply. Second, the burden of proof is to be upon government to justify the withholding of information. Third, it is the right of the courts to order the release of information which has been wrongly withheld. Fourth, there is a procedure to ensure that no exemptions, however drafted, could be used by any government to cover up evidence of illegal conduct. In my view, this set of basic principles goes a long way toward addressing the present situation.

When we talk about freedom of information, we must also consider the right to privacy. Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act, entitled "Protection of Personal Information", received royal assent in July, 1977. The legislation became operational on March 1, 1978. The objects of the legislation were to inform individuals of the types of personal information which the government holds about them and the uses to which such information is put. It was also to provide the right of access of individuals to information about them held by the government, to control the way in which personal information held by the government is used and made available to others and to regulate the collection and storage of personal information. This is the important issue in the interrelationship between protection of personal information and access to information legislation. There must be a proper balance between the public's right to access to information held by the government and the protection to which the individual is entitled regarding his personal privacy.

I refer hon. members to the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments for June 27, 1978, and particularly to page 34:6. Under the heading "Personal Privacy" we read:

> —your committee favours the approach taken in the U.S. legislation and in the Australian minority report bill whereby the use of the term "unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" implies a balancing process in which the right of privacy of affected individuals must be balanced against the right of the public to be informed.

I also refer hon. members to the Australian act of parliament of August 25, 1980, where the same concern is indicated with regard to the right to privacy. Included in the bill we find that amongst other things a document is exempt from disclosure if its disclosure would involve the unreasonable disclosure of information relating to the personal affairs of any person.

Some concern was also indicated about the possibility of a conflict between privacy and freedom of information. It was determined by the Australian government that there was in fact no conflict. However, the Australian government put in a precautionary clause that the whole matter would be subject to review three years after the act came into effect.

I hope the government will consider doing exactly the same thing in this jurisdiction. It is to be noted that this bill provides the right to make corrections to personal information in government files. This is a very important aspect of the bill. It will strengthen the protection of privacy by imposing strict controls on the use and disclosure to third parties of all personal information held by government departments and agencies. Under this bill an individual would have to be notified when information that could adversely affect his or her interest is to be released and the individual allowed to make representations as to why the information should not be released, and to appeal a decision to release it.

Let it be understood that personal privacy is the right of access to one's own file and to know and control what information the government holds about us. This freedom of information legislation extends the right of access to all retrievable personal information held by the government.

In the United States the right of access is granted under the U.S. freedom of information act to a third party to obtain personal information, provided the access does not amount to a clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy. In this case, the onus to establish that the invasion is clearly unwarranted, rests with the government and/or the individual whose privacy is being invaded. Our bill, in effect, follows this same tenor, and the same principles will be carried out and adopted. In practice this means the government is put on the defensive, as is the individual and, of course, where either fails to establish a case, the information would be released.

There is much history that goes with freedom of information. Among developed countries, Sweden has the longest history of public access to government information. It goes back as far as 1766 to one of the country's basic constitution laws know as the freedom of the press act. There have been freedom of information laws in the United States since 1966.

Denmark and Norway have had freedom of information laws since 1970, Austria since 1973 and France since 1978. Unfortunately, freedom of information has been far from generally assured in the United States throughout history, particularly during the cold war period when an administrative tendency to protect national security information was intense.

The green paper on public access to government documents which I mentioned earlier was a very important document as far as freedom of information in Canada is concerned. This green paper was referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. The committee insisted on strong freedom of information legislation. It criticized the green paper for its broad and ill-defined exemptions to public access, and it opposed the green paper's preference for ministerial authority or disclosure of information. The committee also reasserted suggestions for a review process.

Fortunately, this bill we have before us today addresses many of the concerns we had at that time. However, there are many more concerns, and it is desirable that some changes take place when the bill is before the committee.

I might mention one thing with regard to fees. There is always a cost involved when this kind of service is provided. At the present time it is suggested that an application fee of up to, but not exceeding, $25 be charged for the processing and releasing of documents. Many witnesses who appeared before the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments suggested that the fees to be charged for information provided should be solely the reproduction costs so that people across Canada would have the same access to information. Charges for supplying information should, if possible, be consistent and low in price throughout government agencies and departments so as to be within the means of the ordinary citizen. I point out to hon. members that in the green paper to which I have already referred under the heading "Fees" we find on page 27 the following:

> Under the American freedom of information act, agencies may charge applicants only for the actual costs incurred in the search for and reproduction of documents requested. The cost of reviewing documents for exemption cannot be charged. The legislation also provides that departmental officials may waive any fees chargeable where it is "in the public interest" to do so. In practice most departments waive all fees under $5 and some departments waive all fees under $25 on the grounds that it would cost more than the amount of the fee to collect it. As a result, when total fees collected are compared to the total volume of requests, the average fee turns out to be less than $1 per request.

I hope we will have the same results in Canada, although there have been occasions where this has not necessarily been the case. I refer to the celebrated Rosenberg case. Someone asked for information regarding that case. In order to get all the information and records requested, it cost the United States government about a quarter of a million dollars. I hope we in Canada will not fall into that same trap.

It should be pointed out that everyone will be entitled to this information. However, we must be realistic. Most ordinary citizens will not ask for information. It will be writers, the media, those writing their theses for Ph.D.s, politicians, legislators and so on. We have to be fair and ensure that they have access, but the cost must be considered. Certainly a reporter doing an in-depth story should not be able to get a free ride at public cost. In his study, "Will the Doors Stay Shut" Professor Rankin said, and I quote:

> Properly understood freedom of information offers no threat to full and frank discussion of policy alternatives within the executive, since only the facts and data are to be available.

Information in the hands of the people, freely available with few exceptions, and clearly defined exemptions are essential to any democracy. This is imperative to the efficient functioning of governments. There is a middle ground on which the public can be best served and government will not be prevented from doing its job.

There is a general trend in the west today for more openness in government. Bill C-43 is not everything to everyone in the area of freedom of information and the right to privacy, but it is a big step in the right direction. I look forward to its going before a committee of the House of Commons to be discussed further and, hopefully, amended.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, my purpose this evening is to make some general remarks respecting the principles and provisions involved in Bill C-43, which would enact the proposed access to information act and the privacy act. Let me begin by pointing out that the process followed in the bill before the House is rather unusual in that the bill contains relatively short provisions which simply refer to schedules of the bill, which in turn contain the proposed access to information act and the privacy act.

My purpose is not to consider the legal technicalities of the bill but rather to deal with the proper principles involved in freedom of information legislation. I will not attempt to review history, but it might be noted that the parliamentary cabinet system of government was not one which easily gave rise to free access to information in the hands of government and government officials. In fact, the tendency of governments under the parliamentary system was to guard very zealously their right to information and only yield it to those who inquired under the strictest of conditions.

That is why in the parliaments of the British Commonwealth it became the practice for members to seek information by the various means open to them in the parliamentary process. We need only look at the order paper to realize that the same system prevails today. The order paper of this House of Commons is crowded with questions by members which have been left unanswered. Therefore, today we have the same attitude which existed many years ago on the part of government, to yield information only under very strenuous urgings by members of the opposition and other members of Parliament.

We hope the present freedom of information tendency will give rise to greater access to information, not just to members of Parliament, but to all citizens of Canada.

The thought in that regard cannot be better expressed than it was by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he spoke in November, 1979, at the time the freedom of information bill of that time was introduced in this House. He said that the starting point for a freedom of information law is a freedom of information attitude. We can all take a lesson from those words, and realize that free information and free access to information is not something that can be written on a piece of paper. It must exist in the spirit of the government of the day. As the Leader of the Opposition said, the government must have a freedom of information attitude.

The history of freedom of information in British Commonwealth nations is relatively recent and evolving. Some provinces of Canada have enacted freedom of information legislation, but it is still in the very beginnings of its development. Members ought to view the bill now before us in that light. We cannot expect it to be a perfect document, but we hope it evidences a proper attitude on the part of the government. We hope that in committee and in future years in this House of Commons and elsewhere the government will move to remedy any defects in this bill which are bound to show up in the future as it is administered and applied.

I should, as others have done, pay tribute to the work done in the past by members of this House with respect to freedom of information. Of course, the person who first comes to mind is the former member for Peace River, Ged Baldwin, who served in this House for many years. His major concern was freedom of information.

Let me quote very briefly one of the remarks he made with respect to the need for freedom of information legislation. He said it was necessary to break the long and encrusted tradition of secrecy which has been the ruling fashion of the bureaucracy since the first day.

I also want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who stood in this House in the fall of 1979 and introduced Bill C-15, which was a true freedom of information bill. I want to note for the record that his efforts and those of his colleagues at that time were lauded by the Canadian Bar Association. I quote from what was said about the efforts with respect to Bill C-15:

> The strength of the legislation lies in its recognition of the principle that government information should be available to the public, that exemptions should be limited and specific, and that the exceptions should be reviewed independently of government.

That is the pith and substance of freedom of information legislation. With that in mind, I want to note the subtle difference between the legislation I have been describing and the legislation now before us, which by its name merely provides for access to information. There is a real difference in the philosophy involved in the two terms.

Freedom of information represents a commitment to the right of members of Parliament and citizens generally to have access to government information. It is in the nature of a right. Access to information, on the other hand, merely provides a mechanism by which citizens, members of Parliament and others can get at the information they seek within the very limited framework of the access to information legislation. We should be careful to note the difference in philosophy. We hope that the government during the course of this debate, in committee or at some subsequent time, will recognize there is a very substantive difference between merely granting access to information as opposed to establishing and enshrining the principle of freedom of information.

What is at stake in this matter for the public? Information is the lifeblood of knowledge. It has been said many times that it is knowledge which sets society free. We ought not to take lightly this type of legislation because it does not have an immediate effect on the economic or other aspects of our national life with which we are perhaps more concerned on a day to day basis.

Another important feature of broad interest to the public is the right to privacy. Under English common law and the common law which prevails in most of the provinces of Canada, the right to privacy has not been as well developed as it is in many national jurisdictions. We look forward to greater recognition of that kind of right and the enshrinement of that kind of right to privacy in legislation which applies across this land. I believe it is the right of every person to keep his or her own personal records and information, and only in very limited circumstances should other persons, government agencies, corporations and the like have that personal information.

Not everyone believes in this concept of freedom of information, nor does everybody believe in this right to privacy. In particular, governments that seek more to enslave than to liberate their populations are opposed to this kind of legislation. This has extended even beyond those government which perhaps do not have the democratic way that has evolved in Canada through our long association with the traditions of Great Britain and the British Commonwealth; this principle has also been neglected by some of our democratic states. They seek to keep in the hands of government and government officials information which ought to be disclosed to the public. I think we need only look at the unfortunate Watergate matter. Fortunately it did not occur in this country. It occured in the United States. Just that kind of thinking was involved. There was a tendency among government officers involved in that case to cover up, smarm over the events that took place and keep information from the public. That is why in some cases governments, even of a democratic kind, are inclined not to allow the right of access to information because that could cause to be disclosed the kinds of improper activities which were prevalent in the Watergate matter. Before we look askance at our great neighbour to the south, let us remind ourselves that this very kind of thing occurs in Canada. It would not be proper to take a superior attitude, but to learn from their experience.

May I just briefly review some of the details of this legislation in order to indicate the kinds of concerns I have and I think the kind all members of this House and all Canadians ought to consider in respect of this measure. First of all, it does provide the right of access to government information, but that information is in the form of records kept by government institutions. While this appears at first blush to be very broad,

I can assure you there is a great deal of information which ought to be publicly disclosed that is not in the form of records and not in the hands, under the control or within the jurisdiction of government institutions as defined in the bill.

I hasten to point out that the long list of government institutions contained in the schedule is another reminder of the extent to which government operations have grown in this country. As I leaf through the bill I see seven or eight pages listing government institutions which are subject to this bill.

It has been pointed out by other speakers that there is a fee involved in exercising one's right under this legislation in connection with attempting to obtain access to the kind of information covered by the act. The fee appears to be very nominal in the sense that it cannot be more than $25. However, any payment can be used as a deterrent under certain circumstances. I hope that provision for the right to impose a fee for access to information will not in any way be a deterrent to the right of access granted by the legislation.

Of course, there are exemptions provided for in the bill. We all recognize there must be exceptions to the right of access to information in areas such as foreign affairs, national defence and intergovernment dealings. However, the bill does not describe all the exemptions with the care and caution I recall Bill C-15 did, as introduced in 1979. However, we can only hope, as I have indicated time and time again, the government has the right attitude toward the provisions of this bill, and as difficulties develop in respect of exemptions as outlined the government will move to remedy the situation.

Attention ought to be drawn to the access which is granted by the bill. This is not simply a matter of walking into a government department or institution listed in the bill obtaining the records one may seek. There is definitely a relatively complex procedure involved. In the case of personal information the provisions of the proposed privacy act apply, and they involve a slightly different procedure. There may be no difference in principle, but a person may find himself deflected from one set of provisions to another set, particularly by a government officer who is seeking to deny access rather than to allow ease of access.

When a person is denied access under the legislation, he can make a complaint to the information commissioner. That may seem like a relatively simple matter, but as a lawyer who practised law I can assure you that when you are dealing with the Government of Canada and its various departments and emanations, nothing is simple. There are forms to be completed, there are time limits to be met, there are office hours to be observed, there are places one must go, there are addresses one must find, and, as I said—and I repeat and underline—nothing is simple. When we see provisions that say there may be complaints to the information commissioner and that the information commissioner may conduct an investigation, we do not know what to expect. That may be something like appearing before the Supreme Court of Canada on a weighty case or it may, if the proper spirit is there, be simplified in order to give real effect to the right of access.

In the end there is a right to review refusals to grant access to information in the Federal Court. I have to repeat what I just said. If you think the procedure involved in dealing with the information commissioner can be complicated, then go down to the Federal Court and see how it operates; look at the myriad of regulations you are put through as you seek access to the Federal Court. I do not want anybody to be lulled into thinking they can walk into government departments, talk to information commissioners, speak to judges and get the information they desire, because they can be put through very difficult and very complex processes, processes which I am afraid may be very expensive.

That is about all I need to say in respect of the mechanics of the legislation. I should add in respect of the privacy section that provisions similar to those provisions in Bill C-43 are to some extent already in force. There is a privacy commissioner operating in Canada. According to the report filed by the privacy commissioner for the year 1979, there were what I consider to be a relatively small number of complaints made to him under existing legislation. As I read the report, in 1978 there were 286 complaints, and in 1979 there were 159 complaints. Those would be complaints in respect of persons who sought information of a personal kind from government departments. We may not be dealing here with a vast thing. I repeat that if the proper spirit prevails in the government, there will be no need to go through these processes.

Let me say very generally in concluding my remarks in respect of Bill C-43 that what we really have to look for in this bill is a determination as to whether we have before us merely a paper tiger, a piece of legislation which will indicate that there is some right of access to information, but the mechanics are there to allow government officials effectively to deny that right of access.

What we want, and what has been effective in other jurisdictions in Canada and elsewhere, is a sunshine law, a law that allows the sun to shine in on government legislation and government activities. It is that kind of legislation which can have a real purpose in a democratic society. It can keep the government within the spirit and the intention of its powers; it can root out evils in government for the benefit not only of all Canadians but, indeed, also for government itself. I hope that is what we have before us in Bill C-43. I hope we have a sunshine law and not a paper tiger. I repeat what I said in the beginning, in the words of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, it is a freedom of information attitude that will resolve these problems, and that is the beginning of a freedom of information law. Thank you.

● (2040)

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in the debate on this very important piece of legislation. As hon. members have pointed out earlier in the debate, the need for a free flow of information is essential in a democratic society. If the democratic process is to work and to function well in a healthy state, citizens must have information. Information is what is required to make decisions. Without full, complete and adequate information, you cannot make proper decisions. That is true, not only for governments having information, but also for citizens of the country having information.

There is no greater need today than the need for adequate, essential information to be available to decision-makers, whether they be people or government. In the type of society in which we are living today we have to make very important decisions, decisions which affect not just a few people, not just a little community, not just a little country, but which affect large masses of people, not just for a week or a year but for generations to come.

Because of rapid technological and social changes, we have within our hands the power to destroy the environment and to affect the genetic pool of the human race, of plants and of all living things for generations to come. These are very important decisions which we as a race now have the power to make.

As the critic for science and technology for my party, I find that it is important that we have in this country not only legislation but, more importantly, practice and custom, as the previous speaker pointed out. We can have legislation in the books, but lawyers and bureaucrats will always be able to find a crack or exemption to prevent the release of any information which they do not want to be released. In the end, it is the practice, the custom and the appreciation of the importance of the process of free information that will determine how effective and how real this legislation is.

In the field of science, as I have indicated, the free flow of information is totally essential. Information is needed to spread understanding and knowledge. In a period of very rapid technological changes, we are making decisions, the ramifications of which we are not certain of a year, a decade or a generation later. It is essential that we have free information so that when it becomes known, observable and shown that these new technologies are having a negative and harmful effect on the environment or on the human being, the public is made aware of it, because if the public does not know about it, then the natural social progress of public pressure to change technology and to set boundaries to these technologies, will not occur. We depend upon the public eventually to make decisions as to what technologies are developed and how they are developed. The public cannot make those decisions unless there is a free flow of information available.

Information is not a privilege but a right. It is an essential right in a democracy. It is essential if a democracy is to work and be healthy. It is essential if we are to live and see new science and new technologies developed and if they are to be developed in a human and responsible way.

So I ask: does Bill C-43 guarantee that this will occur? I am afraid I cannot answer that, in spite of the enthusiastic "yes" which I hear from the benches opposite. There are areas in the bill which suggest that important information will not necessarily become public. I refer, for example, to clause 20 of the bill which reads:

Access to Information

Subject to subsections (2) and (3), the head of a government institution shall refuse to disclose any record requested under this act that contains

(a) trade secrets of a third party;

We have chemical companies which will not reveal publicly what the contents of their products are, and yet their products are being used over a wide area and will affect the environment for years to come. I feel that the public should know exactly what is being put into the environment and what is being put into the food chain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Jong: I suggest that knowledge which will have an effect upon such a wide area of space as our environment for many years to come, something which will have such an effect upon the health of so many people as will these new products being introduced into our food chain and into our diets, should not be considered private property.

Surely all this should be public knowledge so that no mistakes are made. Surely mistakes can happen, and I think we all agree that mistakes will happen, when knowledge is possessed only in a little corner here or in a little patent office there. If the government has the knowledge, then surely it has the responsibility to make certain that that knowledge is made public.

Earlier this month I brought a case to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) concerning a certain fungicide called captan. The Canadian government has been reviewing tests and studies concerning the carcinogenic qualities of this fungicide. We could not get this information in Canada. This information was shared with the U.S. government, and we had to use freedom of information legislation in the United States to get Canadian documents which had been sent to the U.S. government. What do these documents reveal? They reveal that this particular fungicide is not very safe, yet it remains on the shelves. The documents reveal that the company which manufactures this product, namely Chevron Corporation, a big chemical company, asked the testing corporation to change five pages of its data because it showed that this particular product was having a mutational effect on test animals.

Chevron Corporation did not want to see these test results, so it deliberately asked the company to change the results. This information was contained in the secret government documents.

I believe that such information should be made public so that the public knows how responsible these corporations are. I am afraid that there are too many loopholes in the bill in front of us for this law to have had much effect when it came to my attempting to get information about the fungicide captan. Recently my colleague and I have drawn attention to certain aerial spraying of a chemical called Agent Orange in New Brunswick. I wonder if clause 15, governing our relations with other countries, would not have prevented making that information public in this country. Yet, it was important that that information became public information. We know from the experience in the United States with veterans returning from Vietnam that many of them developed various illnesses because they handled Agent Orange. Also we know that Canadian personnel were involved. If any of the Canadian personnel—and I hope none will—develop an illness because of handling Agent Orange, it is important that they know exactly what they were handling. They should be in positions where they can make claims to the Department of Veterans Affairs or the government to receive disability pensions. It is important to the Canadian personnel involved that this information be made public. Then they could make claims to the government for their illnesses, if they can show that they were caused by handling Agent Orange.

I have dealt with many veterans in my constituency who have tried to make claims. It is a very tedious and difficult process. They are required to go through too many loops to make their points. If the government is conducting various secret tests in which personnel are being used as guinea pigs, and if it is not making that information known because it may interfere in its relations with another country, it is not to the benefit of the servicemen. If the information is made public, of course, it is of benefit to them. We will continue to try to make such information as public as possible.

I am concerned about many clauses in the proposed legislation. For example, clause 15 deals with international affairs and refers to "any state allied or associated with Canada". What does "associated" mean? The government could refuse to make public any information that might disturb its relations with an associated state. For example, there is an arms embargo against South Africa. A certain corporation might try to manoeuvre around this embargo and might be interested in obtaining certain information concerning importing and exporting arms permits. They may apply to the government for copies of such permits, and the government may say, "No, you cannot have those because under this section it disturbs our relations with South Africa". I do not think that would be right. If it occurred, surely it would destroy the spirit of freedom of information.

Also I think of other entities such as the Crown corporations which will be exempt. The records of any corporation in the public domain which uses public funds or deals with public lands should be open. For example, under this particular exemption, an environmental impact study by Dome Petroleum of proposed drillings in the north could be considered ineligible for public disclosure. Surely this study would have such an effect upon the public domain, public lands and the future that it should be open to public perusal. The public should be allowed to look at such an environmental impact study because its land and future are at stake.

If we expect our citizens to make wise decisions, this type of information should be made available to them. I could look at some of the regulations concerning the information commissioner, who is supposed to be an ombudsman but is compelled to hold his proceedings in private. Further on in the bill it is indicated that the court can hold its hearings in camera. This leaves the court open to a charge that secret laws are bad laws. It will be difficult to know what is reasonable and what is not, without public precedent.

The bill makes reference to reasonable disclosure, but that is a matter which will have to be defined in the courts. If the court hearings are held in camera, we will be faced with the ultimate irony, that is, that the best kept secret will be how the proposed access to information act works. It will be a double contradiction. No one will be able to figure out how the act works because the proceedings will be conducted in secret. It is ultimate lunacy.

In the end the importance will be the practice and desire of the government, its commitment in terms of philosophy, its commitment to public access and its commitment to the principle that in a free and democratic society and in a society of rapid technological change information is essential.

The spirit in which these commitments are applied is essential. It is the philosophy of those who are applying it which will ultimately determine how well we as a society will survive and function in the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate this evening in the debate on the access to information and privacy legislation proposed by this government. I say that for two reasons, which I suppose are evident to anyone who knows a little bit about my adult working life. First, I spent more than a decade as a journalist and now almost ten years as a member of Parliament and until recently sat on the back benches. If I have learned nothing else over that time and my time as a journalist, it is that nothing is more important to this massive and diverse country than to have Canadians better understand why governments reach decisions and what the base of debate in the House of Commons means to them.

The Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) emphasized that the adoption of this legislation means certain important principles will become part of the legal fabric of Canada. One of these basic principles is that Canadians will have access, as a matter of rights, to all information held by the government, except where specific exemptions apply. When the Secretary of State led off the debate this afternoon, he made it clear that he looks forward in committee to members on all sides of the House reviewing the exemptions in the bill.

Another principle is that the burden of proof will be on the government to justify the withholding of information. It will not be for the politicians but for the courts to adjudicate, with power to order the release of information which has been wrongly withheld.

There is obvious significance in enshrining these principles in law with provisions to ensure that Canadians will be readily able to exercise the legal rights under it. This bill is the culmination of efforts that have been under way for may years. It represents a significant advance in the application of democratic principles to the relationship between citizens and their national government. The spirit of co-operation exhibited here today in allowing consideration of this legislation to proceed is evidence of the basically non-partisan nature of the movement toward more open government in our country.

I should like to add, as others have in the debate, to the tribute which is due a former member of this House from Peace River, my friend, Ged Baldwin, who devoted to this endeavour so much of his wisdom, energy and concern for the public good. Community leaders, including parliamentarians of all political persuasions, have added their voices to the cause. It would also be remiss to neglect the contribution of the media in ensuring that this issue has remained high on the public agenda.

As I indicated briefly a few moments ago, my first involvement in this issue was as a journalist in the 1960s when the proposals we are now considering were usually described as "right to know" laws. The concept was initiated and tested in other jurisdictions, and we have enjoyed the benefit of that experience in designing Bill C-43.

Under the title "access to information" Bill C-43 encompasses both what I prefer to think of as freedom of information and also the protection of personal information, involving the rights of an individual to privacy. Both are vitally important, but I will concentrate my remarks this evening on the question of freedom of information.

It is a fundamental belief that citizens are entitled to information about their government so that they can participate fully in the democratic process. Correspondingly, it is a duty of government to inform the public. This means, of course, that government has an obligation to provide information about its policies and about the legislation and programs approved by Parliament. Clearly, citizens must be aware of the laws which affect them in their daily lives and the programs which have been designed to serve them. More than that, it is also critically important that information be available to them about the policies and issues on which they make judgments, if they are to exercise their rights of citizenship. I do not deny that there is also an obligation upon the people to make some effort to seek the information they require to make those informed judgments. That is a duty of citizenship. Nevertheless, it is a duty which government, in its attitude toward communicating with people, can render either easier or more difficult.

The access to information bill before this House forcefully demonstrates the desire of this government to assist citizens in obtaining information, by conferring upon them the right to have it, with clearly delineated exceptions. The legislation reflects, in its design, the intention to make it easy for citizens to avail themselves of their rights under Canadian law.

I would not be satisfied, however, if we went no further; or worse, if the government and its public servants conducted themselves so as to observe only the letter of the law, narrowly interpreting its intent. The objective is surely not only to give citizens legal rights which they may invoke; the objective must also be to provide to them information freely, as and when they can use it, so that it will be unnecessary for them to invoke those legal rights.

A spirit of openness must prevail. As the minister in this government who is charged with particular responsibilities for communicating with the public, I have given high priority to encouraging that spirit of openness. One of the first steps taken in this regard was approval by the government, in April, of formal guidelines encouraging public servants to communicate fully with the public within the bounds of their responsibilities. Communications with the public, including particularly members of Parliament and the news media, are part of the responsibility of managers in the public service. They are expected to discuss frankly information within their areas of responsibility, information which describes or explains programs and policies which have been announced or implemented by the government.

I would like to add a thought which must go along with our expectation that public service managers will communicate openly with the public. Members of this House will surely agree that public servants should not be asked to speculate about future policy decisions, or to go beyond factual information and into areas of policy deliberations and advice. In fact, these areas are the responsibility of ministers, not their public servants. Nor, of course, would we expect them to disclose information specifically prohibited by law. Public servants acting in good faith under these guidelines will not be considered as having violated their oaths of secrecy. However, we must seek to ensure that they are not subjected to criticism within government or drawn into the political forum for speaking openly, fully in compliance with government policy.

Efforts are under way within the government to advise departments and agencies of the importance the government attaches to its belief in openness. Public servants at all levels have much to learn and do to give effect to the access to information provisions, and steps are under way to communicate the spirit in which they should be administered.

There will be administrative challenges in adjusting to the requirements of the legislation, which are being attended to under the direction of my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). Other measures are in train, under the direction of my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), to facilitate access by Canadians to the services of the government. And that is very important in conjunction with this bill.

In espousing a freely open spirit in the provision of information by government, I am also mindful of the opportunities for the government to assist Canadians in learning, not only of government activities, but also of the nature of the country and of the things which make us proud to be Canadians—our heritage, our diversity and the endowments of nature.

It is a fundamental priority of this government to reinforce the national identity. This is far more than a matter of distinguishing the activities of the federal government and its institutions through identification of the federal presence throughout the country, desirable though that is; it is also important to develop policies and programs to support the Canadian national identity and a sense of participation by citizens throughout the country. Of course, I commend my colleague, the Secretary of State, for his efforts in that area.

The very size of the country, its widely dispersed population, its ethnic diversity, the two official languages and the special character of the regions of our country all underline the importance of seeing the country as a whole and as more, much more, than the sum of its parts. At the same time, those differences and diversities are part of the richness of Canada and reinforce our particular identity as a nation.

In my brief time as the Minister for Multiculturalism, Mr. Speaker, I have learned a great deal about how diverse this country is. I do not think many Canadians realize that the majority of citizens living in the prairie provinces are neither Anglophone nor Francophone. Many people in other parts of the country living in communities with one large majority group of a particular origin, unfortunately, do not have the full sense of how diverse we are, except for the few who have been able to travel widely.

I want to say that it is natural for informed citizens to be skeptical of government, anxious to improve it and yet, I hope, respecting our democratic institutions. It is also an obligation upon good citizens to attempt to understand the issues facing this country, so as to judge the efforts of government, of whatever party, to resolve those issues. In turn, the government has a duty to assist its citizens in this understanding and, as well, to be mindful of its role in furthering other aspects of citizenship, not the least of which we may unashamedly call love of country.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to address myself to several points made this afternoon by other members in the debate on this important bill.

Earlier today a member of the New Democratic Party criticized the government—I believe it was the member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—because in our charter of rights and freedoms we do not have the right of access to information. I simply want to point out that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) made it very clear in that committee—and it is on the record—that he wants the experience of this very important legislation before considering moving forward on that front. Certainly, that is possible.

Many references have been made to the Americans taking a lead in the area of access to information. I point out only that their access to information is not enshrined in their constitution. Yet, Sweden has it enshrined, and it is not as open in providing access to information as is the American government.

I would also like to comment on the remarks made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), who seemed to have his head firmly planted in the past in all his criticisms. Surely this legislation gives recourse to the courts and ombudsmen, and neither Parliament nor government can be supreme over the rights of the citizen in this matter.

If I could, I would like to make a point with respect to comments made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member for Yellowhead seems very critical of the exemption, at the moment, of any matter which might injure relations between the federal, or national, government and the provinces. Again, I simply point out that the government has attempted to release polls and information as requested by the opposition. But, finally, the government is answerable to the ombudsmen and the courts if matters appear to be unsatisfactory in response to demands for information.

Also this afternoon the right hon. member for Yellowhead questioned what the words "associate state" in clause 15 of the bill means. I simply suggest they have the same meaning as they had in clause 15 of his bill.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as a journalist, temporarily retired, as someone who may return to journalism and as someone—as are all members of this House—deeply committed to trying to have Canadians better understand this country and better able to focus on issues which this Parliament debates, I believe this legislation is fundamental to the future of our country.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commence my remarks on a positive note. I believe this is a hopeful beginning and that this is a piece of legislation which is long overdue. I appreciate the tribute which has been paid to members of this chamber—some of whom are no longer here—who are active in this field. I commend hon. members opposite for their objectivity in giving a great deal of credit to our friend and colleague, Ged Baldwin, the former member from Peace River.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: If anyone epitomized the spirit of freedom of information I think it was Ged Baldwin when he was carrying on a long and unremitting campaign for this piece of legislation.

• (2110)

I am sure Ged Baldwin would agree, however, that this particular piece of legislation is merely a hopeful beginning. All of us who have been in this place for very long can remember other pieces of legislation which the government opposite claimed would be very important, some of which were introduced with a lot of fanfare. I can think of the competition act, the Canada Water Act and the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act, all of which were to be landmark pieces of legislation, but which never amounted to very much.

Coming back to the existing situation, I must emphasize the very major step taken in this piece of legislation in the form of repealing section 41 of the Federal Court Act. This particular provision should be put on the record once again to emphasize exactly what an improvement it is that we as parliamentarians no longer must contend with this provision. I had almost memorized this particular provision, simply because I hated it so much. It reads as follows:

(2) When a minister of the Crown certifies to any court by affidavit that the production or discovery of a document or its contents would be injurious to international relations, national defence or security, or to federal-provincial relations, or that it would disclose a confidence of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, discovery and production shall be refused without any examination of the document by the court.

That is the part which really hurts. It was an outright sanctioning of an executive privilege without judicial review, and it was probably unique in the civilized countries of the world. Had the United States of America a piece of legislation like that, none of what happened when the country purged itself during the Watergate crisis would have been possible. In getting rid of that kind of provision, this particular act, if nothing else, advances the cause of freedom of information a great deal.

However, this act in itself is not enough. It is true that it is a hopeful beginning, but as the hon. minister who just spoke commented, there must be more than the letter of the law. There must be a genuine willingness in this place to give information on a reasonable basis within reasonable time limits to hon. members. Although delay is the deadliest form of denial when it comes to economic relief, it can also be deadly when it comes to providing information.

Let us look at the rather incongruous title of Bill C-43, which reads:

—An act to enact the access to information act and the privacy act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof.

Upon reading that description, one must ask oneself whether the government's approach is consistent and whether the government will carry on this kind of openmindedness in other areas. Section 43(9) of the proposed Canada Oil and Gas Act, Bill C-48, which was recently dealt with in this House, seems rather strange and somewhat counterproductive to the spirit of this bill. It reads:

Proceedings in an appeal to the Federal Court of Canada under subsection (5) shall be held in camera on request made to the Court by a party to the appeal.

Subsection (5) refers to infractions of the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. I underline the words "in camera". There may be some reason for such a provision, and I am not prepared to dismiss it out of hand as not being appropriate, but on the face of it, it sounds very strange to me that under a statute which calls for access to the Federal Court of Canada, a party to such an appeal can have it heard in camera.

I would not have been so apprehensive if the word "may" was used, but the words are "shall be held in camera". I do not understand why that particular terminology is used with respect to that act. After all, it would appear as though there is nothing which would involve national security. It would appear prima facie that it would not necessarily involve any of the considerations which would be necessary to have it exempted. Even if that were so, just as this legislation provides for judicial review, so should the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, if the government intends to be consistent.

Why should the government deprive a judge of the option to decide whether or not an important matter such as one emanating from the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act should not be held in open court? It is an incongruity and an example of why some of us are skeptical that the government will not continue to enact legislation in other areas which is inconsistent with this hopeful beginning with respect to access to information.

Another aggravation to all of us in opposition, and perhaps some of us while we were in government, is the apparent obfuscation in providing information on the order paper, which is another inconsistency. I have before me one example, and I only brought it along to emphasize or underscore a small point. In June, 1980, I asked a fairly routine question of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) about a matter in which I had some interest, Judge Rene Marin's commission of inquiry. My question was:

With reference to the commission of inquiry, relating to public complaints, internal discipline and grievance procedures within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, was action taken to implement the commission's (a) 32 recommendations regarding the handling of public complaints (b) 13 recommendations regarding a federal police ombudsman—

And it goes on. I received an answer after six months, but it was no good and was deliberately obscured. For example, it says that of the 13 recommendations regarding a federal police ombudsman, seven will be proposed for legislation and six will be modified and proposed for legislation. That does not tell me very much. Which seven recommendations and which six recommendations? Now I must go back to the order paper again. As a famous author once said, "If you are going to talk the talk, you have got to walk the walk".

This piece of legislation, while a step in the right direction and while I want to be positive about it, should set the tone for the same kind of openness and the same kind of conduct found in other areas.

There has been much injustice as a result of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. The minister who introduced this bill well remembers, for example, an incident while he was solicitor general involving two RCMP staff sergeants which he knew, Gilles Brunet and Don McCleery, and how someone, who was not even a solicitor general but an acting solicitor general, used this provision to invoke executive privilege to the detriment of these two members.

Last spring I wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) congratulating him on his appointment. I mentioned that I was sorry that one of his first acts was to invoke section 41(2) and to withhold information regarding a matter involving the Canadian Dairy Commission. When he wrote me thanking me for my good wishes he was good enough to say that he, too, regretted invoking section 41(2), but nevertheless he did it.

It is good to see that from now on the ministers opposite will not have this option available to them. Like the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) I do not wish to get into a technical dissertation on the bill at this time, but I think it is fair to say that there are many loopholes, as it were, in this legislation. The jurisprudence which will build up in interpreting this bill will be fairly lengthy and probably fairly time-consuming before we get to the kind of expedition whereby we will see ready, quick and efficient access to information.

There will also be a fairly long period of delay before some information will become available under this bill. I hope perhaps some of the drafting can be improved in committee as well.

I want to say to the minister that we do not think our bill was perfect. We do not suffer from that syndrome. We are prepared to admit that occasionally some of the things we do can be improved upon, but we have never seen that kind of humility emanating from the other side of the House. It will be a refreshing change if it ever happens.

Clause 28 of the bill reads as follows:

> The head of a government institution may refuse to disclose any record requested under this act
> (a) during the first two years after the coming into force of this act, in the case of a record that was in existence more than two years before the coming into force of this act; and
> (b) during the first five years after the coming into force of this act, in the case of a record that was in existence more than five years before the coming into force of this act.

Now, let us try to figure that out. As my friend says, it does not mean immediate access, and it is certainly not going to provide very current information about matters we would like to know something about, perhaps during this session of Parliamant. There are certain areas that I think would benefit from close scrutiny and redrafting in committee.

Some of the possibilities that exist for getting around the provisions of this bill ought to be discussed in this House and in the committee—not in any paranoid fashion, but with a clear recognition that there have been abuses. These are not instances brought up by members of Parliament who, heaven forbid, might have any partisan reason for advancing them! I should like to put on the record one abuse that was reported in The Globe and Mail of November 21, 1980:

> Privacy commissioner Inger Hansen says federal 'bank robbers' are laundering sensitive data files before they are opened to individuals.
> Mrs. Hansen said in an interview that information is being taken from files that might be opened to the public and moved to data banks that are closed to the public.
> If a freedom of information bill before the Commons becomes law, Mrs. Hansen would have greater access to closed files than she currently has under human rights legislation. But, she said, information could still be hidden by moving data on individuals to files on protected projects.
> Government departments and agencies also can destroy files, as the RCMP security service did with Operation Checkmate files containing details of disruptive tactics used on individuals and groups across the country.

I remember that my hon. friend opposite expressed great skepticism when I suggested that it was not marijuana that was burned by the Security Service in Quebec some time ago. He assured me that it was, but as he now knows, more than that was burned.

> Last year, Mrs. Hansen won the right to look at data banks that are closed to individuals. However, she can't disclose anything about them, or even confirm they exist.
> After Walter Rudnicki—

That is a name most of us know.

> —was fired in 1973 from his high level planning job with what is now Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp., he was allowed to see his security file. It was bare except for a single handwritten note stating that he had been granted security clearance in 1966.

Without belabouring the point, Mr. Speaker, I hope we see from experience just what kind of jiggery-pokery has existed in areas where federal public servants had the responsibility of providing access to information.

It is sincerely hoped that as a result of this piece of legislation, which I commend my friends opposite for introducing, there will be no more of this kind of manoeuvring that is implicit in some of the fears of Inger Hansen and that we will finally find a way to provide speedy access to information rather than waiting two years or five years. We hope too that such openness will extend beyond this piece of legislation; that there will be a vast improvement in the quality of answers to questions on the order paper; that they will be provided much sooner; that there will be the same kind of openness in committee; and that in general this legislation will be the harbinger of a great new and enlightened change in the House of Commons, where there will be some accountability. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, then it will be one of the most important pieces of legislation ever introduced in the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with my colleagues in recalling the many years of effort put forth by our former colleague, Ged Baldwin from Peace River, who laboured long and hard trying to gain acceptance in this institution for the idea of freedom of information.

I had the honour and pleasure of occupying an office across the corridor from Mr. Baldwin. We spent many hours talking about freedom of information, and he related to me numerous cases in which he had been involved and in which justice would have been done faster and with less heartache for the people concerned had freedom of information legislation been in place.

I cannot help but think it ironic that this bill should be introduced for debate today, Mr. Speaker, because I happen to be dealing with such a matter in my office at present. It is a matter that should be opened up because certain information is being denied.

I am sure hon. members are aware that at the present time a justice committee in the province of Ontario is hearing evidence from various witnesses regarding the bankruptcy of a couple of provincial companies. It has for the last couple of days been considering, and I presume for the balance of this week it will be considering the involvement of those two companies with a federally incorporated trust company.

The Speaker of the Ontario legislature issued a warrant for the Superintendent of Insurance in the department of finance and one of his officials to appear before the committee to give evidence and assist it coming to conclusions about the twisted events that led to the bankruptcy, receivership and winding up of three companies. The committee is also interested in the bilking of hundreds of innocent victims of their life savings, which amounted to millions and millions of dollars.

To the surprise of everyone concerned, I am sure, the federal officials were advised not to appear before the provincial committee. Two levels of government are involved, one going against the other. Some people may ask what the connection is. When a federal company is incorporated and operating in a province, it comes under the jurisdiction of a securities and exchange commission or, in this case, the Ontario Securities Commission. That body is responsible for seeing that companies operate within the laws of Ontario. Federal officials are in possession of certain information that is required by the provincial committee so that it may reach a decision, but that information is denied.

It is strange that on February 5 the committee will appear in the Supreme Court of Ontario to test the validity of the Speaker's warrant and to ask the court to order the Superintendent of Insurance and one of his officials to appear before the committee and co-operate with it.

I asked the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) some questions regarding the appearance of the Superintendent of Insurance and other officials before the justice committee. He told me he had advised them not to appear.

On several occasions I have tried to plumb this matter with the minister in an effort to get some concrete information. Several hundred people have lost millions of dollars as a result of what appears to be a mammoth fraud.

● (2130)

The minister has tried on several occasions to pass off the connection between Astra Trust, Re-Mor and C & M Financial Consultants Ltd. They are the three companies involved in this mammoth bankruptcy. They are interconnected through common ownership of share stock and directors. The minister has said that we should not try to link Astra Trust and Re-Mor unconditionally. He has said the nature of the inquiries is different, that the RCMP is investigating Astra Trust and that the province of Ontario is investigating Re-Mor. No information has been given by the minister, and now he has told his officials not to appear before the committee nor to give information.

These three companies collapsed last spring. As we all know, bankruptcy is a federal matter. Information available indicates an agreement was made by the principals in Astra Trust to make an additional investment of $2 million over an agreed period of time. That money came from Astra Trust investors to Re-Mor and then from Re-Mor, in the form of mortgages, it went out to a group of companies controlled by the principals of Astra. Then it went back into Astra Trust. In other words, it went out of one pocket into another pocket in the same pair of pants. That is the dimension of the fraud we have before us.

I hope this bill in some way will allow information of this sort to be made available. I hope also that when a provincial body with financial responsibilities is trying to investigate a fraud of this nature, where federal officials have been involved—as I will show later—this bill will allow a large measure of mutual co-operation. The matter can then be looked at, and we can get to the bottom of it so it will not happen again. Therefore, we can save innocent people from being taken this way again.

The minister would have us believe that his officials were unaware of the source of the $2 million of so-called additional investment. The evidence is to the contrary, and I will come back to that point in a moment.

I am convinced by what I have read about this and by the information I have been able to gather that they did know and that they knowingly allowed a provincial mortgage company, namely Re-Mor, to be used as a conduit for money going out of and into Astra Trust.

But there are other pressing questions. What magic hold did the principals of Astra Trust have on the president of the Liberal Party of Canada that he would comment in a memo of his law partner? This memo was read into the record of the Ontario committee the other day. It says:

Stanbury pointed out problems, pressures and flak he would receive if this application is turned down.

The application, of course, is the application of Astra Trust for a trust licence. Maybe the freedom of information bill would help us get that out. But seriously, what problems, what pressure and what flak is he referring to? When Astra Trust was in violation of the Trust Companies Act and its regulations, it was the president of the Liberal Party of Canada who informed the president of Astra Trust. It was the president of the Liberal Party of Canada who arranged for his law partner to draft a rescue agreement designed to funnel $2 million of additional investment by three directors into Astra Trust. We have to ask ourselves whether this is the normal function of a president of a political party. Does he, in the normal course of events, mount rescue operations? Did anyone ask where the $2 million originated? What is the hold which the president of Astra Trust has on the president of the Liberal Party of Canada? Was there quid pro quo for such exceptional and diligent assistance? That sort of information being brought before this committee is a reason why we need a freedom of information law.

The connection between Astra Trust, C & M and Re-Mor is solid, and the depth is known. The Ontario justice committee sitting on January 14, 1981, at page 21 of its minutes recorded a means dated December 6, 1978. In part, we find:

RCMP investigating mortgage frauds in the Niagara region.

It goes on to say that the Ontario Securities Commission wants to put a receiver into C & M unless Humphrys, the Superintendent of Insurance, strenuously objects. That is in the record of the committee in Toronto.

Finally we have a letter from Mr. Humphrys to the Ontario Securities Commission. I mention this in particular because when I tried to get information about this matter through questions to the Minister of State for Finance, he tried to tell us there is just no connection at all between Astra Trust and Re-Mor and that they are not connected in any way. I have been saying that if we had a freedom of information act, perhaps this would have come forward and the investigation in the Ontario legislature would not have been necessary. This letter is quite straightforward. it is not at all derogatory, but it does show the connection. It is addressed to the chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission, Mr. J. C. Baillie. It reads:

Dear Mr. Baillie: Re: Astra Trust: I am pleased to be able to inform you that the second instalment under the agreement whereby Messrs. Montemurro, Luciani and Vasko are buying the Spanish property was received by Astra Trust on January 15. The next instalment of $500,000 is due on March 31. We have renewed the company's licence to March 31, the normal expiry day of our licences, and will renew it quarter by quarter as further instalments are paid in the absence of any other problems. I was pleased that the January instalment has been paid since we now have a total of $500,000 put up by these directors, a considerable improvement in the position of the agency funds.

The agency fund is now accumulating a considerable amount of cash and short-term deposits. I think it is important that these funds be invested with a good yield in order to permit the fund to meet the interest payments required under outstanding contracts. Also, a good yield is needed to build up a reserve against possible losses under other investments that are in the portfolio.

Now we come to a very interesting part. The letter goes on to say:

I think at some point it would be appropriate for the commission to release the fund from its control—

The commission he is referring to is the Ontario Securities Commission. The letter continues:

—and I am suggesting that this might be considered after the March 31 instalment is paid. In the meantime, I think the company might be given general authority to invest funds received pursuant to the purchase agreement or as the consequence of maturing assets. I think it would be appropriate for the commission to give blanket authority to the company to invest such funds in short-term government securities or corporate papers of good quality.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to limit in any way the hon. member's right to participate in this debate, but I must say that over the past few minutes, although he has been very generous in mentioning the words "freedom of information" once or twice, it seems to me that we are talking about a matter which has been the subject of questions during question period.

Mr. Nielsen: Unanswered.

● (2140)

Mr. Fox: It is beyond me, and I have tried to follow the hon. member very closely, to see how it really fits in with Bill C-43.

Mr. Kempling: It certainly does fit in. We have asked numerous questions on this matter about the connection between Astra Trust and Re-Mor. We have been told by the minister that there is no connection, that one is a provincial company and the other is a federal company.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I may have done the hon. member and the minister a disservice in this case, when he rose to point out the problem of relevancy, by not speaking. In actual fact, the Chair has recognized that the hon. member is pursuing a matter of some particular interest to him. As it happens, I was in the chair the other evening when the hon. member pursued this matter during the adjournment motion. The fact is that simply relating it verbally to the bill under debate now does not necessarily mean it is relevant. The hon. member has a problem with relevancy. If he could bring the matter he wants discussed closer to the principles of the bill under debate, that would fall more within the rules of the House.

Mr. Kempling: I listened very carefully. I do not want to belabour your point, Mr. Speaker. I accept your words. However, I listened very carefully to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), and I did not find too much relevance in his comments. I have nearly completed my remarks. I have only a few minutes left. I will just finish reading this letter and make some concluding remarks. I quote:

I think it would be appropriate for the commission to give blanket authority to the company to invest such funds in short-term government securities or corporate papers of good quality.

After March 31, if the instalment then due is paid, investment authority might be widened somewhat, but with a continuing attention to the maturity dates of the contracts—

I would be happy to discuss this suggestion with you on the telephone or otherwise at your convenience. I expect to be talking with Mr. David Anderson who seems to have been the catalyst in getting this thing moving.

This was only six months before Astra Trust went into bankruptcy. The Superintendent of Insurance was saying they were renewing their licence every 90 days. In the meantime, innocent people were investing thousands, if not millions, of dollars into Astra Trust. They were eventually bilked out of that money. If that is not a clear case for freedom of information, I do not know what is.

We want some importance attached to these matters. We hope this bill will be amended in committe. I am going to watch to see whether it will be amended to allow more free information to pass back and forth between provincial and federal authorities. Looking at the massive evidence that has been gathered in this one instance, had there been more openness and more forthright information passed between the two levels of government, a large number of the people who have been victimized by this unfortunate affair would not have lost their funds. In fact, they probably would have been investing in other areas. The reality today is that 320 people, most of whom are in very dire straits as a result of this mammoth fraud, are in a situation which could have been considerably alleviated by a good passage of information back and forth and less restriction between federal and provincial authorities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the hon. member seek the floor?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am not just standing to pass the time of day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Others do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the bill is entitled a bill to provide access to information. I am reminded of the bill which provided for wiretapping and electronic surveillance, which was called the protection of privacy act. Now we have an access to information act. It does reveal how many hurdles one will have to get over before getting even close to information, if they get it at all. I am very skeptical. I am very cynical that the attitude spoken of by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) is simply not there with the people across the way.

The treasury benches have no interest in providing information to members of Parliament, let alone providing information to other individuals who are entitled to it. My prediction is we will see precious little information released under the provisions of this bill. All one has to do is look at some of the questions on the order paper to examine that attitude. Those members who spoke of attitude were quite right. When the freedom of information bill was introduced for the first time, the prime minister of the day said, and it is quite true, that it is as much a matter of attitude as anything else.

One question has been on the order paper for some three and a half years. It is on page 170 of the latest order paper, question No. 1,705, which reads as follows:

Did the government receive any funds for payment of the swimming pool at the official residence of the Prime Minister at 24 Sussex Drive and, if so, in what manner?

It is a very simple question to answer. The government may want to answer it under the provisions of this bill. The answer may be that because it endangers national security, it will not provide the answer. They may wish for a number of reasons to refuse the information. However, the question is at least deserving of an answer. No answer has been forthcoming, and the question is perennial on the order paper, every single order paper that is printed.

At page 158 of the order paper, there is a question which was asked last October by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie). It is a very simple question. Having performed for a short time responsibilities on the treasury benches, I know the answer is easily obtainable. It simply asks:

What amount of government funds has been allocated for research into the causes and treatments of cancer?

The Ministry of National Health and Welfare together with Treasury Board should be able to provide that information within a week.

Speaking of attitude with regard to providing information, at page 130 of the order paper there is a question which was placed on June 27 last, over six months ago, which simply asks:

Is Mr. Kenneth Backwell employed by the Department of Public Works and, if so (a) in what capacity (b) what is his annual salary (c) is he connected with the property management division?

When I was minister of that department, questions were answered immediately, forthrightly, fully, correctly and honestly. The question simply asks if a certain individual is employed by the Department of Public Works, in what capacity and at what salary. That is the attitude of this government, which is going to administer this bill it is asking us to pass, presumably without amendment. At page 129, there is another question which has been on the order paper since last June:

Did the Minister of Supply and Services order an investigation of Madame Claudette Nadeau, President and General Manager of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if so, is it anticipated that there will be a change in Madame Nadeau's status and, if so, would such a change have any significance in connection with any present investigation?

That question could be answered in the negative if the government wished, but at least it could be answered. If members of Parliament in this place cannot get information to simple questions such as that, what hope has the ordinary citizen of obtaining information under the bill before us? I suggest there is very precious little hope because the attitude is not there. The attitude of this government is an attitude of preservation of secrets.

● (2150)

Another question which my friend, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) put on the order paper on May 14, over eight months ago, requires an equally simple answer. He asked:

What was the expenditure by the Privy Council Office for the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79 (c) 1979-80, for the commission of inquiry concerning certain activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

What more simple a task is there than looking at the books of account of the government to answer that simple question? His second question was:

What was expended for (a) legal counsel (b) non-legal investigative services?

Again a question requiring a very simple answer and one which is quickly and easily compiled by Treasury Board officials, if not in the ministry responsible. Again this is a question of attitude. If the answer to a question is going to be embarrassing to the government, the information is not produced. Believe me, being the cynic I am, if a request for information under this bill is going to provide embarrassing exposure or answers or information that will embarrass the government the information will not be produced, and there are enough barriers, loopholes, nooks and crannies in the provisions of this bill to allow the government to duck the production of information asked for.

An hon. Member: Crooks and nannies.

Mr. Nielsen: Crooks and nannies, yes.

Another example of the attitude and failure of this government to provide information is to be found on the order paper at page 108 as follows:

Did Mr. Michael Pitfield pay back to the Receiver General of Canada any portion of the moneys paid to him at the time he ceased to be Secretary to the Cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council following the general election of May 22, 1979 and, if so (a) on what date (b) what was the amount returned and how was it arrived at?

That is a very simple question requiring a very simple answer, but one which would be embarrassing, so the government is not answering.

The questions I have referred to may be embarrassing, but what about the exposé made by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) a short time ago in respect of directions which have been given in the Privy Council office concerning the withholding of information from members of Parliament in response to questions put on the order paper? If the attitude is to freeze out or prevent members of Parliament from obtaining information as a result of that type of very simple question, what hope is there indeed of any citizen obtaining information under the provisions of this bill?

Another simple question on the order paper which has been there since April 15 is:

> What is the complete employment history with the CBC of Mr. Lionel Martin and is he presently stationed in Cuba (b) what were his qualifications that led to him being considered suitable for employment with the CBC?

That is a question requiring a very simple answer.

Again on the same page a question by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

> What was the cost of operating the Metric Commission during 1979?

Good Lord, sir, how simple must a question be before it is deserving of an answer? That question has been there since April 18. With that kind of record for refusing to provide information to members of Parliament what hope, sir, is there for any member of the public at large to achieve the release of any information under this bill, the provisions of which are fraught with all sorts of refuge for the government to seek if it does not want to provide embarrassing information?

Here is another question on page 102 which has been there since last April:

> Does the government have any plans for the two Cadillacs formerly used by the Prime Minister up until May 22, 1979 and, if so, what are they?

That has reference to the present Prime Minister. That requires a simple answer which could be knocked off in a matter of seconds.

Someone else wanted a list of Canada Council grants, and that question has been on the order paper since last April.

Here is another question which I am sure, if application were made under the provisions of this bill, would receive the same short shrift, and it is to be found on page 97 and has been on the order paper since April. It is a very simple question:

> How many persons named in the Taschereau papers on national security were not prosecuted and who were they and what was the reason?

If the answer to the question would endanger national security, that is all the answer that need be given, but there the question sits, and has since April. I ask why that is so, and I suggest it is because the attitude of this government in respect of providing information is not an attitude which will facilitate the provision of information, but will preclude the release of such information.

Finally, and I just want to mention one more before I give the minister time to sum up, this question appears on page 97 and was put on the order paper on April 14 of last year. It is:

> Were there any individuals mentioned in the Taschereau file on National Security that were then or thereafter or at any time since, cabinet ministers and, if so, what are their names and in what connection were they mentioned?

If it is not in the interest of national security to provide that information, only that need be the simple answer to the question. One wonders why these questions are not answered.

I have very little hope that even with the passage of this bill in an improved form, with these rascals on the government benches now—

Mr. Knowles: Hon. rascals.

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. rascals, I am sorry; I do not want to be unparliamentary. I think there will be very precious little opportunity for any citizen to get information.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Following the very non-partisan debate we have had today I wonder if I might seek the indulgence of the House so the minister could have the normal few minutes to reply beyond ten o'clock. I realize our arrangement did not include this arrangement, but I wonder if we could sit a few minutes beyond ten o'clock in order that the minister could reply?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the proposal by the hon. parliamentary secretary to extend the minister a brief opportunity to respond.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in a signal the minister passed across the floor he indicated that four minutes would be sufficient. I would be prepared to give him five. If the House would so order, I would give him the opportunity he wants.

Mr. Knowles: We will give him the same five.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues on both sides of the House for the co-operation they have extended during the course of the debate today. I want to thank the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in particular for his courtesy in allowing me a few minutes to respond following his highly objective and non-partisan speech, the type of thing he is very well known for in this House.

He spoke a great deal about the question of attitude. I was listening to some of the questions on the order paper read by the hon. member for Yukon.

● (2200)

Sometimes I get the impression that these are questions which they should have asked themselves during some of the time they were in government a few months ago. However, I suppose the hon. member did not have the time either to ask himself those questions or to answer them during that brief period of time.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I simply rise to express my resentment and to question the parliamentary practice of referring to me as being non-partisan in my speeches in this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: Objection sustained.

An hon. Member: A point well taken.

Mr. Fox: For the first time this evening I find myself in complete agreement with the hon. member.

In summarizing this debate I want to say that I think there was indeed a good deal of consensus concerning the principles behind the access to information legislation introduced in the House today. It is indeed legislation which benefited a great deal from the thought and work of many members on both sides of the House. We on this side of the House had the benefit of legislation which had been brought in by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I think we have made a sincere effort to build on that legislation. We do indeed believe, because we had the benefit of that legislation, that we were able to bring forward perhaps a somewhat improved bill.

In looking back at the bill perhaps I could go back to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Yukon when he expressed his skepticism about the fact that there is a bill. If I were sitting in the opposition, I would take great solace from the fact that the government was indeed coming forward with this type of legislation.

If the hon. member wants to speak of latitude and feels that there have been occasions when he did not obtain the information for which he was looking, he will have to admit that with the type of legislation introduced today, the question of latitude is no longer paramount, since a citizen of this country would have the complete right of access and the right to ask the official who is really responsible before the House, the information commissioner, to take on his case and contest any refusal on the part of the government.

So this is indeed a very significant advance which is being proposed to Parliament in this legislation. I think the fact that we have found wide consensus this evening is an indication that members want to see progress made.

In the course of my speech at second reading of the bill I indicated that our approach was not a highly partisan approach to this bill but that what we are looking for is as wide a consensus as possible. We wanted to obtain the best bill possible in this area, as we want to do in other areas. However, this is an area where we welcome particularly the input of members of Parliament. I am not saying we have agreed to every amendment that may have been proposed by the other side, but obviously we have given a great deal of thought to reasonable proposals in the area of ministerial responsibility. The government decided to take the route of judicial review. However, we felt there was a possible conflict between the principle of ministerial responsibility and the principle of judicial review. We opted for judicial review. Perhaps there is a slight conflict with the concept of ministerial responsibility, but we did opt for the system which would bring the most openness possible to Canadian government.

I should like to thank all members who have participated in the debate this afternoon. I hope when we get into the committee stage, we will see the same type of positive reaction on the part of the opposition and that they will help us to get the legislation through the committee stage as quickly as possible because it does indeed represent a significant advance in terms of Canadian legislation.

Once again I want to thank hon. members for their contribution to this debate, and I look forward to hearing their comments during the committee stage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): By order made earlier today, there is no adjournment debate this evening. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HEALTH SERVICES UNDER JAMES BAY AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the serious loss of health services to the Indian people of the James Bay region which were promised under the James Bay agreement, and because of the need for Parliament to know whether the government is upholding that agreement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That the minister immediately state on motions the reasons why the act has not been followed with regard to the yearly submission of a report on the implementation of the provisions of the act to Parliament.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

APPRECIATION OF CONTRIBUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) boycotted the opening session last night of the National Voluntary Organizations' meeting here in Ottawa, after a date had been postponed from last November to suit the government, and since the government was not represented by a minister or even a parliamentary secretary, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House express its appreciation for the contribution of Canada's national voluntary agencies and its regret at the failure of the government to clearly signal its intention to work closely with these organizations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BANKS AND BANKING

CALL FOR INCREASED COMPETITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of information contained in a recent Economic Council of Canada report which demonstrates conclusively that Canadian households and businesses are being overcharged by hundreds of millions of dollars each year by Canada's chartered banks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

• (1110)

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to introduce legislation this year that will allow trust companies and credit unions to compete more effectively with the chartered banks in an effort to eliminate these massive and excessive overcharges.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

ALLEGED SUPPORT OF IMMORAL PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas David Lewis, the former leader of the NDP, has publicly condemned the whole referendum process as proposed in the resolution as "immoral", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That this House join the former leader of the NDP and condemn the NDP for its support of immoral practices.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PAYMENT FOR FIREARMS PERMITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, it has been brought to my attention on several occasions that RCMP detachments throughout the country are not accepting cash money as legal tender for the procurement of firearms permits. Since this is a very serious situation, I move:

That the Solicitor General issue an order to all detachments of the RCMP throughout the country requiring them to accept cash money as legal tender for payment of firearms permits, and in cases where there are officers who cannot be trusted with the handling of such legal tender, that they be commissioned to duties which will not bring them in contact with it.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MARITIME AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the unanimous consent given by the House on January 16 to a motion calling for approval without change of the U.S.-Canada east coast fisheries treaty, and in view of the visit to Washington of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) today, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the House reaffirm its previous support and its total rejection of any change in the fisheries treaty concluded in good faith by both countries.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

WOMEN

PROPOSED CONFERENCE AT STORNOWAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Inasmuch as it was reported yesterday in The Globe and Mail that a women's conference will be held at Stornoway in February and a spokesperson said, "We'll be asking the NDP and the Liberals if they can contribute something in the form of sandwiches, perhaps, so they can have non-partisan participation", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the minister responsible for the status of women interfere again to conduct a national survey of Canadian women to determine what type of non-partisan sandwiches should be served at Stornoway, and in particular, should we serve barefaced Liberal chicken or two-faced Tory baloney.

An hon. Member: Or NDP hash.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS SERVICE ON P.E.I.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The president of Canadian National has promised to pursue with the Minister of Transport a proposal to continue CN Express service on Prince Edward Island. The termination of that service would not only throw many of the 41 CN employees out of work, but also impose severe hardship on the people of P.E.I., especially people in business, farmers and fishermen. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House calls upon the Minister of Transport to make a statement on motions in the Commons early next week in respect of his decision on this urgent matter.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM—INCLUSION IN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. The minister will know that the Department of National Health and Welfare has banned use of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. CMHC authorized its use and gave it credibility by including it in the CHIP program. The government is therefore directly responsible for its use in the homes of thousands and thousands of Canadians. What responsibility is the government prepared to accept for their financial and physical well-being?

• (1115)

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have indicated twice in answer to the very same question that the government, as a result of an interagency or interdepartmental study, temporarily imposed a ban on the use of urea formaldehyde as a material for insulation. We are awaiting the results of an in-depth report from the ministry of health. I understand that report is imminent. Quite frankly, until such time as we know what significance there is in the use of the material, I think that to jump ahead and answer hypothetical questions at this point is premature.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I am somewhat concerned that there are no provisions for testing. My supplementary question is this. In the United States it was agreed that the safety of the material would be proven before it was included in their fuel conservation program, which is similar to CHIP. Why does the Government of Canada do things backwards? Is this the reason that responsibility for CHIP is being taken away from the minister's department?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I understand that the issue of the safety of the material is one which is difficult to determine, even for people who are professional and qualified to entertain an investigation of it. It has been a very difficult problem and is one which still rages. I understand that even in the United States there is opinion on both sides of the issue.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, it may rage but it has not been included in their program.

Suppliers and installers are also suffering from the government's indecision. First, the government initiated the program without final installation standards. Then the government banned the product. As late as January 13, 1981, installers were writing government examinations on a product which they could not instal. Does the government not feel any responsibility for leading installers down the garden path and for throwing thousands of Canadians out of work?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the hon. member by his last question raises the point that the implications of a ban are complicated. The impact upon those people who have used the material is a significant one, and so is the impact upon people who are engaged financially in the introduction of that material. However, I suppose the bottom line is, what is the responsibility of government generally when it is interfaced with the private sector? I would submit that the bottom line is that government cannot be the protector for all people engaged in all kinds of economic activities in this country.

Oral Questions

CONCLUSIONS OF STUDY ON TOXICOLOGY OF THERMAL INSULATION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the minister was the joint author of a statement on December 17 announcing the ban on the use of urea formaldehyde as an insulating material, is the minister aware of the study published in June, 1980 by the department of health entitled "Toxicology of Thermal Insulation"? The conclusions reached in that study on urea formaldehyde are exactly the same, word for word, as those reached six months later by the non-government expert committee on UFI, chaired by professor Campbell of the University of Ottawa, on which the government's decision to ban UFI was based.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): No, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I am surprised at the lack of interest and knowledge of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who felt strongly enough about this in December to be the joint author of a press release banning use of urea formaldehyde. Perhaps he might be a little more concerned when I tell him that his seatmate, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has urea formaldehyde installed in his home. He is one of the 60,000 Canadians so affected.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: You had better check it out, Marc.

• (1120)

Mr. McGrath: Given the fact that the basis for the ban was supposedly the Campbell study, which is identical word for word with the study commissioned by the department six months earlier, why was the ban not implemented in June? Second, is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reaching for the silver bowl to absolve himself of all responsibility, or will he live up to his responsibility to the consumers of this country and institute a testing program in order to put at ease the minds of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians whose health could be affected by this material?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, before I get worked up as the hon. member seems to be doing, I will wait for the conclusions of the inquiry commission established by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

EDUCATION

POSSIBLE CUTBACKS IN UNIVERSITY FUNDING

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance concerning the established programs financing legislation and reports that officials in his department have made recommendations to the cabinet social development committee which is meeting this week and next to discuss these recommendations. Will the minister confirm whether his department has made recommendations to the cabinet committee on social development which would have the effect of cutting funding for our universities by some $1.5 billion and total over-all cuts in established programs financing of some $2 billion? Can he simply confirm whether these discussions are taking place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that discussions are taking place, certainly within my department, with respect to the upcoming negotiations on the fiscal arrangements. We have not yet formulated recommendations to the cabinet. That is something which is in play but has not yet taken place. There have been no proposals agreed upon by the cabinet as of this date. What we said in the budget speech is that we intend to seek significant savings in intergovernmental transfers, but we have not carried the decision-making beyond that point.

Mr. Rae: The question is not fiscal arrangements but established programs financing. That should be clear because we are, in a sense, talking about two different animals. How does the proposal, which the minister has neither confirmed nor denied is actively being discussed, to cut some $1.5 billion from the budget of our universities right across Canada, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, jibe with statements made by his colleague, the Minister of State for Science and Technology, that the government attaches the greatest importance to increasing Canada's research and development capacity? How does it make any sense to cut back so substantially on funding for our universities when we are told there is a shortage of skilled manpower and that the government places the greatest importance on research and development?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, what I said about fiscal arrangements also applies to the established programs financing. The matter obviously has to be under discussion and consideration by the government, but the decision-making stage has not been reached. I think it would add to the speculation for me to begin to comment on rumours that we have reached conclusions about cutting here or there. It is part of the negotiation process. When we have made up our minds as to what we are going to do, we will put our general position before the provinces. That has not yet happened.

Mr. Rae: In light of the dramatic effect which a unilateral change of funding of this magnitude would have, not only on the provinces but on these institutions, will the minister agree that it would be in the best interests of the country and his government to establish a parliamentary task force which would have responsibility for looking not only at the fiscal arrangements between the provinces and the federal government, but at the established programs financing legislation? We would then be in a position as a Parliament to do a review of these things and give the institutions which are going to be cut so drastically by the government an opportunity to put their cases before Parliament.

Mr. Clark: Where did you get that idea, Bob?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the fiscal arrangements expire in March, 1982 and, in accordance with custom, we will be attempting to renegotiate a new set of arrangements with the provinces. The EPF arrangements will not terminate, but if no new agreement is entered into the government can establish its own decisions, and that is the situation in respect of both these arrangements. The suggestion has been made that Parliament be given some opportunity to examine, possibly through a task force, this whole question of intergovernmental transfers, equalization and EPF. Something I want to discuss with the leader of the government and the House is whether it would be possible to put this subject before a parliamentary task force and to receive their conclusions before negotiations with the provinces would be concluded. That is a matter that is under consideration at the present time.

REQUEST FOR MARKETING OF ATMOSPHERE-CONTROLLED APPLES

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence, I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the overproduction of apples in Canada, more specifically in Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, and in view of the brief submitted to the minister on January 5 by the Quebec Federation of Apple Growers, can the parliamentary secretary tell us whether quick action will be taken in this area to enable the producers to market their apples in CA or controlled-air storage?

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, since the department has received several briefs on this matter, as the hon. member has just said, it is therefore well aware of the inventory surpluses of apples in cold storage following a bumper crop in 1980, showing an increase of about 20 per cent. The policy that we are trying to implement is in three parts. First, there will be an advertising campaign to urge Canadians to eat more apples. We would like to reach the figure of six pounds. per capita. This publicity campaign should be launched within a few weeks. Second, a purchasing program by the Farm Products Agency will aim at disposing of the stock of refrigerated apples. Third, the Agricultural Stabilization Board will provide additional assistance to Canadian apple growers.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DENE THA' BAND—STATUS OF FINANCING AGREEMENT

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister is well aware that last October he had signed a $5 million agreement with the Dene Tha' band of northern Alberta which was then cancelled by his department because it had no funds available to fulfil his promise. Is it the policy of this government to make spontaneous promises while in the presence of Indian band leaders, only to cancel such agreements once the minister is safely tucked away in his Ottawa office?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should check his facts. There were problems with finding moneys, there is no question about that, but there was an agreement which was nullified both by the band in question and myself on behalf of the government. It was a mutual agreement—and they had independent legal advice before they agreed—based on the fact that they felt if they had legal recourse they would do better with previous agreements signed at the regional level under my predecessor.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, as a result of the difficulties between the department and the minister, the Dene Tha' band has now reacted by closing off all rights-of-way through their reserve. As a result the Mackenzie highway may well be shut down, which will limit and isolate the city of Yellowknife and other northern communities. What action is the minister planning to rectify this situation and to try to bring it under control before we have a very volatile situation on our hands?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, we are obtaining a legal opinion as to whether the band has that authority at the present time. When I have that legal opinion, naturally I will be in a better position to respond to the hon. member. I hope, through discussions and so on, that this type of confrontation can be avoided.

HEALTH CARE SERVICES TO JAMES BAY CREE

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the lack of health care available to the James Bay Cree. I am sure the minister is aware that since last October 7,000 Cree in the James Bay territory have been virtually without health care and that clinics and hospitals are closed down because medical staffs have been laid off. The minister will remember that last summer at least ten children under the age of two years died of a disease which was probably gastroenteritis. A task force recommended that immediate action be taken. Would the minister tell us what action has been taken by the government to ensure that there will not be a repeat of this situation next summer?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I should like to check on the progress of that matter and get back to the hon. member in the early part of next week.

INQUIRY WHEN BRITISH PRIME MINISTER INFORMED OF INCLUSION OF CHARTER OF RIGHTS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On what date was the Prime Minister of Great Britain informed by the Government of Canada that it was its intention to include a charter of rights binding on the provinces in its patriation proposals?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it was toward the end of June when I was returning from the Summit in Venice that I met with the British Prime Minister and members of her cabinet. I explained to them what was in the package we had put to the premiers at the beginning of June—the people's package, patriation, the amending formula and the charter; that there were many other things we were discussing as well; that the June meeting with the premiers had not been conclusive, except to the point where we had all agreed—

Mr. Clark: The September meeting.

Mr. Trudeau: No, the June meeting with the premiers was not conclusive except to say that we had, among the premiers and myself, agreed to have many meetings over the summer in order to achieve results by September. The hon. member will recall that the premiers wanted a communiqué indicating that the matter would be finalized by September.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Has the government been officially and specifically informed by the British government, after the exact nature of the Canadian government patriation package became known on October 2, that Britain would push the package through Parliament at Westminster?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker. The British contacts which have been made, not by myself but I believe by the Minister of the Environment and the Secretary of State for External Affairs who met in Britain early in the fall, indicated that the inclusion of the charter would make it more difficult, which we know.

INQUIRY RESPECTING BRITISH COMMITMENT ON PEOPLE'S PACKAGE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister, today and in a press conference on January 22, when asked as to the date on which he specifically informed the British government of the intention of Canada to include a charter of rights, spoke about general conversations in June regarding a people's package. In his January 22 press conference he said that Mrs. Thatcher was informed in general terms of the interest in a people's package. It is quite important for the House to know exactly what was known by the government of Great Britain at the time it gave any commitment. When was the government of Great Britain advised for the first time in specific terms of the intention of the Government of Canada to include a charter of rights in the patriation package?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, information was given to the British Prime Minister that we were discussing a people's package—equalization, the question of the offshore and the demand of one province to have self-determination written into the Constitution. I cannot assure the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that I went into details on each of the many, many items which were discussed during the summer. I told her what the agenda was, what we had discussed at the beginning of June, and they came under all these general headings.

The British Prime Minister did not ask for details or put subquestions. She took the position that if the Parliament of Canada put an address to Her Majesty, the British Parliament would have no choice but to take it as a government measure and to assure its passage. This was not done in ignorance; this was done as a result of British governments, including the former government of Mr. Callaghan, having been asked repeatedly what their position would be when they received the resolution from the Canadian Parliament. I did not seek to justify to the British Prime Minister any of the measures in there. I just said that these were the measures with which we were proceeding and that I would attempt to justify them to the Canadian Parliament, not to the British Parliament or British government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what is germane here is that the Prime Minister has been relying for some time upon what he claims was an agreement by Britain to give passage to a measure proposed by the Parliament of Canada. We need to know whether, when the British gave that agreement, they had been fully informed as to the contents of the proposal to which the Prime Minister was making reference. The Prime Minister has indicated that there is now some considerable doubt whether or not Mrs. Thatcher knew in June, when she gave whatever commitment she did give, that a charter of rights would be involved as well as substantial provincial dissent in this country. Could the Prime Minister tell us the specific date on which Britain knew for the first time the specific contents of what the British government was being asked to approve?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I do not know on what date the Prime Minister of Great Britain informed herself in detail of the contents of it. I can tell the hon. member that she was informed of the contents on that day at the end of June when I sat down with her at Downing Street. The Leader of the Opposition should not say that my previous answer left that in considerable doubt. It was made quite clear to her that we were proceeding with this package, hopefully with the consent of the provinces, but the whole point of discussing it together was that perhaps we would not have the consent of the provinces; that was quite clear. The Leader of the Opposition should not try to twist my words and make them sound the contrary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I would not want to twist the Prime Minister's words or his intention. Is it a fair interpretation of what the Prime Minister said that Prime Minister Thatcher knew in June the Government of Canada intended to include a charter of rights in its package?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Madam Speaker, unless she was not listening while I was talking or not informed by her people of what all Canadians and the ten premiers knew—because it had been made public in Canada—then the answer to the question is that she did know.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CANADA—INQUIRY RESPECTING PRODUCTION IN CANADA OF "WORLD CAR"

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance; it concerns the future of Chrysler. I am sure the Minister of Finance is aware of the vote taken by workers in Canada on the aid package initiated in the United States. I think the minister would agree the vote was indicative of the deep-rooted unease the workers in Canada feel about Chrysler's future and the ability of the government to protect their jobs.

I should like to ask the minister whether the government will take steps to require that Chrysler manufacture in Canada, in proportion to Canada's share of the market, the so-called world car on which they are basing their survival in the future, and that the investment necessary for that production be made in Canada concurrently with the investment they propose to make in the United States.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I hope, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member will accept my attempt to answer this question. All I can do at this time is to repeat the words of the minister of a couple of weeks ago when he said that the federal government had a commitment from Chrysler. At that time there were talks with the unions following which the minister met with Chrysler management. I wish to inform the hon. member that at five o'clock this afternoon the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will again meet with Chrysler officials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Today, when the minister is meeting the Chrysler officials, would it be possible for him to impress upon them that if they hope to gain any kind of support in Canada for their package, they must invest in Canada at the same time as they are investing in the United States in product lines which they believe will be the basis for their survival in North America?

Mr. Laniel: The hon. member is aware of the commitment of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the maintenance of jobs in Canada and to Canadian workers getting a fair deal. I am sure that the minister is aware of the preoccupation of the hon. member and of all the points he has made on the whole question. They will be part of the negotiations this afternoon, and the interests of Canada and of Canadian workers will be well defended by the minister.

TRADE

PRODUCTS FROM LESS DEVELOPED NATIONS

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. During his recent visits to certain underdeveloped countries, did he put forward the point of view to those with whom he conferred, as it is reported he did, that the best way the developed countries can help the underdeveloped countries improve their standard of living is by helping them to increase their export trade, and that the most effective way in which this can be done is by the developed countries reducing tariffs and other import restrictions on the products which the underdeveloped countries want to export in greater quantities? If that is the case, would the Prime Minister indicate to the House to what broad categories of products which are also produced in Canada he feels this program of reducing tariffs and import restrictions should apply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as a result of the policy of the Canadian government and of GATT, particularly at the Tokyo Round negotiations, as the hon. member will know having been such a distinguished former trade minister himself, some 80 per cent of the products of the less-developed countries enter Canada duty free. All of the so-called tropical products enter Canada duty free, that is products from the south, and those countries the goods of which are subject to duty have the advantage of the generalized system of preferences. So there is no doubt that the Canadian government and the people of Canada are making a genuine, across the board effort to facilitate the progress of the developing countries by trading with them. Canada in that respect, even in the difficult areas of textiles, clothing and shoes, has a record that is immensely better, for instance, than that of the nation to the south of us in terms of importing for our consumption goods coming from Third World countries as opposed to those made domestically.

Mr. Hees: As the Prime Minister knows, there is a tremendous pressure on Canada and on all developed countries to allow these underdeveloped countries to increase their exports, particularly of textiles, footwear and things of that kind. Does he feel that this country should take the lead, as I believe he was reported to have indicated to those with whom he spoke on his trip, and would Canada undertake such a program and make it possible to import more of those products into this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as to taking the lead, I believe my previous answer indicated that Canada is indeed taking the lead ahead of our major partners in providing access to producers from the Third World, even with respect to these goods. But I must point out to the hon. member, as I did to some of my interlocutors who were asking for increased quotas of these particular goods coming into Canada, that they are essentially produced by three of the Third World countries, namely, Taiwan, South Korea and Singapore, and that if we were to increase the quotas, we would be helping Taiwan, South Korea and Singapore, some of which have higher national per capita revenues than some of the so-called northern countries, members of the OECD.

If the object were to help several of the African countries, it would not be achieved that way unless we continued to discriminate against South Korea, Taiwan and Singapore; or, to put it more accurately, not through discrimination but through bilaterally negotiating quotas with them.

Oral Questions

McDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION

REFERENCES IN REPORT TO POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT IN ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES BY RCMP

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will know that the major report of the McDonald commission was finally submitted to the cabinet earlier this week and is at present being reviewed by his friend, the Clerk of the Privy Council, Michael Pitfield. In view of the fact that this report examines, among other things, the extent of possible Liberal government involvement in illegal activities by the RCMP and of the lack of accountability by previous solicitors general for the activities of the RCMP security service, what action does the government intend to take to ensure that the report is not effectively censored solely by that very Liberal government in an attempt to remove any potentially embarrassing or damaging references to Liberal cabinet ministers, including the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the question seems to me a little tendentious when the hon. member says that the report will be reviewed by one of my friends. I have many friends—not many, but some friends—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Mr. Canada.

An hon. Member: You don't have them in England.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the report of the McDonald commission will not be reviewed by any single individual but rather by a group composed of representatives of the Privy Council Office, of the RCMP and, I believe, of one or two other departments. They will attempt to publish a broad and full report of what Mr. McDonald and his commissioners have said. The hon. member knows that much of the testimony was taken in camera and many meetings were held in camera by the commissioners. On the one hand we wanted them to make a full report without keeping anything secret from the government, and on the other hand we had to make sure we respected the secrecy provisions as the McDonald commission wished, and that is the difficult task which is being undertaken now.

I remind the hon. member that the same thing happened with the report of the Mackenzie committee some 11 or 12 years ago. It was impossible to publish it in its entirety because many of its parts were covered by secret classifications which were accepted by the commissioners themselves, namely, Mackenzie, Coldwell and Pratte. So the same thing will happen this time.

The hon. member will recall that last time, after the abridged version had been released, the commissioners were asked, I believe by the opposition members or by the media people, whether the abridged version was hiding anything which was of partisan interest to the government, and the answer was no. I expect that the same procedure will take place this time.

• (1150)

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows very well that there was no suggestion at the time of the Mackenzie commission of possible substantial wrongdoing on the part of Liberal government cabinet ministers. The Prime Minister seems to be suggesting that somehow, because he has friends in the RCMP who are also reviewing this document, that will assist in the independent review. I suggest that certainly does not restore the confidence of Canadians in that review process.

My supplementary question is this, Madam Speaker. The Canadian people know only too well of the solid Liberal pedigree of the McDonald commissioners themselves. For example, Commissioner Gilbert donated very generously to the Liberal party, while he says—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): My question, Madam Speaker, is this. In view of what some would call this unholy alliance between the McDonald commission and the Liberal government, will the government give serious consideration to permitting at the very least the all-party justice committee of the House of Commons, representatives of all parties on that committee, examination of the full unexpurgated report of the McDonald commission, at an in camera session if necessary?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it seems to me the hon. member is putting himself in something of a Catch-22 situation. First, he does not think the abridgement will be right or fair. He then points out that the report itself probably will not be fair because those who wrote it have, as he says, Liberal pedigrees.

Mr. Nielsen: There is no such thing.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Madam Speaker, we are proud to be a party of the common people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It seems to me the hon. member is questioning the integrity of the commissioners, something which I do not do, and something which I think no one on this side did when we named a prominent NDPer, Mr. Berger, to head a royal commission. We did not discount the results of his inquiry because they were written by a former NDPer. Nor did we discount the Mackenzie report of 1969 because it was written by M. J. Coldwell. I think the hon. member should think a little about what he says before he speaks.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSIONS—DELAY IN HEARING OF APPLICATIONS

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for veterans affairs. At one time or another every member in this House has dealt with veterans' concerns and the latest one, which has been a continuing one for some time, is with respect to the length of time it takes to get a hearing before the Pension Commission or the War Veterans Allowance Board. This is not a knock at Dr. Solomon, Mr. Jutras or Don Thomson, all of whom are working hard and who have a good group working with them. But there must be some obvious bottleneck because of the length of time it takes to be heard. As a member of Parliament one hesitates to recommend to a veteran that he go through the appeal procedure, since it takes so long.

Would the minister give some consideration to having an investigation conducted to ascertain just where the bottlenecks are occurring? Do these delays occur with respect to obtaining the medical reports or are they taking too long in getting out the decision? Frankly, can the minister find out why it is that veterans are discouraged from filing applications for relief?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am sorry that I have a bad voice this morning; I probably need a spray of some kind!

An hon. Member: As long as it isn't Agent Orange!

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, very briefly, I had a meeting yesterday with Dr. Solomon, the president of the Pension Commission. We tried to find out exactly where there were delays. I can assure the hon. member that the backlog will most likely be eliminated within six or eight months.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS OFFICES—LEVEL OF SERVICE IN MARITIME CENTRES

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It is a follow-up to my question of last Friday regarding the meeting which was to take place this week between Dr. Bandeen of CNR and the minister to consider proposals with regard to the retention of CN Express offices in Charlottetown and other maritime centres. I have been informed that the meeting took place yesterday. My question to the minister is: will he now tell this House if the Express offices in Charlottetown and some other maritime centres will remain open and what level of service can be expected?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, at the request, indeed, of many members, and following a vote in the Standing Committee on Transport of the House of Commons, I asked CN to review the situation. They have. I met Mr. Bandeen yesterday for a couple of hours and we went through the entire application of the program with which CN Express is involved. As the hon. member knows, workers who will be laid off will be protected. Some 90 per cent of them will be relocated, retrained or pre-pensioned. Great efforts are being made to protect the interests of the communities affected. Agreements and contracts are being signed with truckers. In Sydney, for example, there are 28 truckers and in Amherst ten. In all these efforts I think CN Express is showing great sensitivity in what they are doing.

Of course, a number of municipalities and communities are hurt, Sydney and Charlottetown being two. After these discussions we decided to do something special for Charlottetown, since the only terminal on the island is located there. We also decided to do something special for Sydney, in view of events which have taken place there in recent months leading to a great unemployment situation. So in these two places the terminals will be maintained, but at a reduced level of employment. We have developed a formula for each community, which will be announced on Monday.

Mr. Gass: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister how many of the 41 employees in Charlottetown will be allowed to retain their jobs.

Mr. Pepin: That is what will be revealed on Monday when we disclose the formula which will be used in the two localities, Charlottetown and Sydney.

NATIONAL VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT REPRESENTED AT OTTAWA CONFERENCE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State, who I understand is attending the National Voluntary Organizations' meeting today in Ottawa. Can the minister confirm whether that is so, how many of his colleagues will be going with him, and who they are?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to respond to the hon. member's question. I thank him for putting it, since I understand there was a motion under Standing Order 43 put earlier this morning which was perhaps misleading. I would like to put the facts before the House.

Basically, the government and the NVO consultation is to take place this afternoon from lunchtime until approximately 4.30. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment will be attending this afternoon. There will also be a number of senior officials from the government participating in this meeting with the NVO. I will be addressing the group myself tomorrow at lunchtime. I would be delighted if the hon. member would attend to listen to the remarks I have to make at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I shall probably have his speech in advance.

I have a further question for the hon. gentleman. When he is lingering over dessert at that luncheon, would he put to the officials of that organization the proposition whether or not it would be acceptable to them to have a parliamentary task force, or a select committee of this House of Commons, conduct an inquiry under the appropriate auspices with respect to the volunteer sector?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I think there were a number of proposals which were initiated by our government a few years ago in connection with the National Voluntary Organizations. I know that when the hon. member's party was in power it also had a number of recommendations. These recommendations were not acted upon, in good part because of the successive elections which occurred in this country. We are looking at a whole series of possible initiatives which we would like to take with the NVO, because of the great importance the National Voluntary Organizations play in this country.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY RESPECTING FEDERAL AID TO AIRCRAFT MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform this House of the terms of the federal assistance for the Dash-8 and the new PT-7 aircraft engine, of the financial implications of this assistance and of the number of jobs to be created?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the manufacture of the Pratt & Whitney PT-7 engine will create 1,000 jobs during the life of the program. Federal assistance will be provided through the government's DIP program for the Dash-8 program in the form of guaranteed loans amounting to $450 million, and this program should create 3,000 jobs. What is most important, subcontractors across the country for both projects will get approximately 40 per cent of the contracts under this program, which is very important for the economy of Canada as a whole.

POST OFFICE

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING MAIL DELIVERY—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE DISCUSSION

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that complaints about mail delivery service to members of Parliament are increasing, and in view of the fact that a great many of these complaints, which come from all parts of the country, result from delays in delivery during the Christmas period—many of which complaints are still coming in—would the Postmaster General be prepared to make public the records showing the percentage of the next day, second day or third day delivery of first-class mail to the different regions of the country, noting the distinction between those delivery rates in the big urban centres and especially the delivery rate between small communities and large urban centres?

Would the Postmaster General be prepared to give an undertaking to this House that he will have prepared for the public a review of the situation and that the review will be conducted on a continuing basis, so that what may be isolated problems of delivery do not create the image of a complete breakdown of delivery? The public is becoming very angry and would like to know the facts.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I shall gladly follow up the suggestion of the hon. member. There is within the Post Office Department a performance rating of postal workers, which shows us just how efficient they are. Of course, there are delays now and then in the daily handling of tremendous volumes of mail. But for each letter which may be delivered late, there are 90 or 92 which reach the addressee on time. I think that once these figures are known, people will understand the extent of the problem and will probably be more tolerant when they hear the bad publicity made in certain quarters against postal workers.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. Would he be prepared, after suitable discussion, to come before the appropriate committee with officials from both management and, possibly, from the labour unions to answer questions directed specifically at this review as to whether or not the delays and bottlenecks of which the public is complaining arise primarily because there is insufficient personnel to do the work, or because certain parts of the system do not work, perhaps because of inadequate design, because of factors which were not considered, or because there are mechanical or other difficulties? Would the minister be prepared, along with his officials, to discuss with representatives of the opposition before the appropriate committee questions directed toward resolving the difficulty?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, each year the estimates of the Post Office Department are referred to a parliamentary committee. Obviously, I would not want to shirk that obligation, and I will be pleased to appear before the committee along with department officials to answer any question from hon. members on both sides of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROHIBITION ON PUBLICATION OF PHOTOGRAPHIC "REACTION SHOTS"

Madam Speaker: I have received inquiries from several hon. members about a photograph taken in the House of Commons which appeared in several newspapers this morning and yesterday. The taking of this photograph is a breach of the agreement which was made between the Canadian Press and the photographers who have been allowed to come into the House. In terms of the electronic journal, the picture constituted what is called in the trade jargon, a reaction shot. Since such shots are not allowed to be taken by the electronic journal, they cannot be allowed to be taken by the photographers who take pictures in the House.

The first thing I did this morning was to contact the director of the Canadian Press. I let him know that I felt such photographs could not be taken in the House, that only the hon. member who is addressing the House may be photographed and that, although we allow shoulder shots, those shoulder shots must be taken from the front, that we want the face of the hon. member who is addressing the House to show, and not the back of the hon. member. To answer the queries I received from hon. members, I have dealt with the matter.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, in regard to my concern over the lines of authority required for the release of those photographs, I am informed by some of the photographers behind the curtain that the photographs are released only upon your authority. Since the entire exercise takes the nature of an experiment, it seems to me that before any hon. member's picture is published in the press the hon. member should be consulted or, at least, give blanket permission. I am concerned about this area because some still photographs may be taken which are not reaction shots but yet are not in keeping with the principles of electronic Hansard, and which an hon. member may not wish to have published.

Perhaps, Madam Speaker, you could consult with the House leaders some time in the near future with regard to guidelines for the release of any of the still photographs which are being taken during the experimental stage.

Madam Speaker: I share the concern of the hon. member. While I suppose it is true that those photographs are published under my authority or with my permission, I do not believe that I could check on a daily basis what photographs will be sent out. This being an experiment, obviously there will be some incidents of this nature, and I hope that they will not recur. We were able to determine with the photographers what we consider to be in conformity with the principles of electronic Hansard.

I was not in the chair at the time television was introduced into the House, but I suppose that from time to time there was some exchange between those responsible for the broadcasting of the proceedings in the House, the Chair, and the House leaders, as to what was acceptable and what was not acceptable. We will have to follow this same procedure with regard to the still photographs. I can assure the hon. member that even before I received inquiries from hon. members with regard to this particular photograph, I was on the phone to the director of Canadian Press. I saw the photograph while reading my paper early this morning, and I immediately came to the conclusion that we could not allow the taking of such photographs. I will accept the suggestion of the hon. member and discuss the matter with the House leaders, and also with the Canadian Press authorities.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. KAPLAN
MR. NIELSEN—CONSEQUENCES OF MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS AND UNDERTAKINGS

Madam Speaker: I am prepared to rule on the two questions of privilege which were raised this week, one by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) concerning an exchange which occurred during question period, and the other by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), which was rather closely related to the first question of privilege, although it was phrased in more general terms, indeed it was of a rather general nature.

I must say that the arguments I heard Wednesday did not sway the ruling I was prepared to make on that day, but I delayed the announcement of my ruling because the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was not in the House at the time. Last Tuesday the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton rose on a question of privilege concerning statements reflecting upon the trustworthiness, the integrity, the honesty and the reliability of certain ministers of the Crown. However, it is quite clear that the hon. member did not make any definite accusation in that sense.

As I am bound to do, I listened very carefully to the remarks of hon. members—several took the floor to enlarge upon this question of privilege—more particularly upon that raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton who, it would seem, rested his arguments on a statement allegedly made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. The hon. member also said that the Solicitor General's statement had later been denied by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Essentially the question raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, which was debated by other hon. members as well, including the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), deals with conflicting statements made before a committee by two government members. It is relevant to point out that the ministers' statements which gave rise to the difficulty mentioned in the House were made before the committee.

That question therefore places the Chair in a rather delicate situation since it would seem that I am being asked to make a ruling on the proceedings of a committee. Obviously I cannot and I do not want to do that. The fact is, however, that during question period on Tuesday, January 27, the problem was brought to the attention of the House and there is no doubt that hon. members did the best they could. They were very careful not to comment on the proceedings of the committee. It is therefore in light of the remarks heard in the House that I must rule on the question of privilege which confronts us today.

Now, nothing was said during last Tuesday's debate which might indicate that the privileges of hon. members have been affected or that there might have been contempt for the House. Hon. members will agree, I think, that the rules or conventions governing relations between ministers of the Crown are not included in that part of parliamentary law relating to privilege. The same thing applies to commitments which are announced by ministers now and then and which are sometimes changed in a later statement. That may give rise to more or less well-founded complaints or grievances, but it does not constitute a breach of privilege.

As hon. members know, parliamentary privilege is very limited and is essentially restricted to freedom of speech, access to Parliament Buildings, immunity against arrest or molestation, and exemption from serving as juror or witness. In my opinion the point raised in the House by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton may be a grievance, but it cannot be considered a question of privilege.

● (1210)

On Wednesday the hon. member for Yukon raised a new question of privilege which he described as probably overlapping the preceding one. He presented his argument and raised four questions, each of which asked the Chair to determine whether or not privileges would be breached under certain circumstances.

On the one hand, the House will understand that if these circumstances related to an incident in a committee, the Chair cannot rule unless there has been a report from the committee to the House, and no such report has been made. On the other hand, if the hon. member is raising these questions in general terms, without reference to a specific case, again the Chair cannot rule, since the Chair cannot be asked to rule on a hypothetical matter. I quote Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 117, as follows:

> Hypothetical queries on procedure cannot be addressed to the Speaker from the floor of the House.

Therefore I cannot find a prima facie breach of privilege in the arguments presented by either the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton or the hon. member for Yukon.

At the same time, however, a number of points were raised in the elaboration of the arguments which claim some attention from the Chair. First, the hon. member for Yukon cited certain passages from Erskine May, for example "Conspiracy to Deceive either House or Committees of either House", as being examples of what we consider contempt; "Presenting Forged, Falsified or Fabricated Documents to either House or Committees of either House"; "Conspiracy to Deceive either House or Committees of either House"; "Misconduct of Members or Officers of either House as Such—Deliberately Misleading the House"; and "Corruption in the Execution of Their Office as Members".

I agree with the hon. member that these passages describe actions which would be contempts, but I have examined his arguments very carefully and cannot find that he adduced any evidence whatsoever to support any charges of this nature. It is one thing to state the law, it is another thing to offer evidence that a transgression has occurred. Obviously a link has to be established between the two.

Again, in elaborating the argument, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition appealed to the Chair as the ultimate guardian of the rights and privileges of Parliament. He is really asking me to disregard the decision of a majority, and this I cannot do, since that decision was arrived at in conformity with the rules of the House. I would point out that it is up to the House itself to determine whether or not a contempt has been committed, and the Speaker's finding of a prima facie case is still subject to the final decision of the House, arrived at through the votes of a majority of members.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) suggested an analogy between procedures in a Committee of the Whole and a standing or special committee. In both cases the Speaker acts only upon a report from the committee, and in both cases matters affecting privilege can be dealt with only by the House itself. I quote again from the fifth edition of Beauchesne, citation 80, as follows:

> A question of privilege, on the other hand, is a question partly of fact and partly of law—the law of contempt of Parliament—and is a matter for the House to determine. The decision of the House on a question of privilege, like every other matter which the House has to decide, can be elicited only by a question put from the chair by the Speaker and resolved either in the affirmative or in the negative, and this question is necessarily founded on a motion made by a member.

Finally, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) appealed to the Chair to protect the rights of the minority, by referring the matter to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. Again I would say that the Speaker protects the rights of all members but protects these rights under the existing rules. I have no choice but to apply the rules. It is not up to me to change them. Any alleged shortcomings in our rules must be dealt with in the normal process by the House itself.

MR. NEIL—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Madam Speaker: I have a question of privilege in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). I have had notice of it but it is not detailed and does not contain the necessary statement to allow me to hear his question of privilege today. I will quote the rule to the hon. member. Standing Order 17(2) reads as follows:

Unless notice of motion has been given under Standing Order 42, any member proposing to raise a question of privilege other than one arising out of proceedings in the chamber during the course of a sitting shall give to the Speaker a written statement of the question at least one hour prior to raising the question in the House.

The notice arrived, but there was no statement of what the question was about. I would be glad to hear from the hon. member at another time, on another day, if he would give me that statement.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I wonder if I could have the opportunity to file a special statement on Monday, so that I can bring the matter to the attention of the House at that time.

Madam Speaker: Exactly. That is what the hon. member should do if he wants me to hear his question of privilege.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—PROCEDURE RESPECTING STANDING ORDER 43 MOTION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order which arises from that portion of the proceedings dealing with motions under Standing Order 43. I proposed a motion relating to the agreements between Canada and the United States to which this House had given unanimous consent on the sixteenth day of this month—its concurrence in the agreements as they now stand and its objection to any changes in those agreements.

What I was seeking today was merely a reaffirmation of that earlier unanimous consent. I did not hear or observe any no from any side of the House and yet the matter was not apparently agreed to. Someone must have heard some noes.

If we accept that there were objections to this particular motion, Madam Speaker, it would suggest that the earlier unanimous consent given to that same motion has been nullified. I am at a loss now to understand how, one day, we can agree unanimously, and another day we can disagree on the same motion. I would just like some explanation as to how the situation is to be reconciled, if not in House records at least in my mind.

• (1220)

Madam Speaker: The hon. member will have to work that out by himself or with other members of this House. The Chair has nothing to do with the substance of these motions. Obviously I heard some noes. The hon. member did not get unanimous consent for his motion. I am not sure whether it was in exactly the same terms as the one which was accepted at a prior date. However, this is a matter for the hon. member to resolve for himself. I am afraid the Chair cannot help him.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,204, 1,526 and 1,896.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

PROFESSOR HUGH GEORGE HAMBLETON

Question No. 1,204—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Solicitor General's answer on May 23, 1980 at page 1350 of Hansard, relating to Professor Hugh George Hambleton of Laval University and which states in part, that Canadians can "cavort with whomsoever they want, etc." is this official government policy and does this include members of KGB and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): The full answer given on May 23, 1980, at page 1350 of Hansard states "Canada is a free country, and anyone can talk to whomsoever they want and cavort with whomsoever they want without necessarily breaking any Canadian laws". This statement is a manner of expressing official government policy and should not be quoted out of context as it implies in certain circumstances that Canadian laws could be broken.

MIRABEL DEFICIT

Question No. 1,526—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What is the estimated loss for each of the next five years on Mirabel Airport?

2. Is action being planned to reduce the losses and, if so, in what way?

3. Does the Minister of Transport agree with the proposals to transfer large portions of Dorval's operations to Mirabel?

4. Is any further expansion planned for Mirabel and, if so, at what cost and over what period of time?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The anticipated deficit for 1980-81 is $21 million including depreciation of $17,675,000. The deficit for the next four years is expected to be approximately the same in constant dollars.

2. The airport management is making a serious effort to control and reduce operations and maintenance expenditures. Fundamental changes in the Montreal area airports system, which could result in reduced losses at Mirabel, are under consideration.

3. The proposal to transfer certain flights from Dorval to Mirabel is now being assessed in order to determine the costs associated with this course of action (as well as several other possible options).

4. No expansion is currently planned at Mirabel. Future plans will take into account the results of the assessment described above.

GREAT LAKES FOREST RESEARCH CENTRE

Question No. 1,896—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. How many persons are employed at the Great Lakes Forestry Research Centre located at Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario?

2. Did the government negotiate with the province of Ontario to turn over the research centre to the province?

3. Does the province contribute to the cost of operating the research centre?

4. Is the government infringing on provincial responsibility by attempting to provide management services through its facilities in Sault Ste. Marie and, if so, for what reason?

5. What is the total cost, including depreciation on land and buildings, involved in managing the research centre?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. The Great Lakes Forest Research Centre currently has 152 full-time person years.

2. There are no negotiations with the province of Ontario to transfer the centre to the province.

3. The province does not contribute to any operational costs.

4. There is no infringement on the province by the centre. The Canadian Forestry Service at the Great Lakes Forest Research Centre does not provide forest management services. The Canadian Forestry Service undertakes a forestry and environmental research and development program, co-ordinates federal forestry activities in Ontario, participates in national programs including the Forest Resource Data Program and the Forest Insect and Disease Survey, and provides technical information to the province of Ontario in support of its forest management responsibility.

5. The total budget for 1980-81 for operating all programs at the Great Lakes Forest Research Centre is $4,583,200.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, Bill C-59 now before the House seeks borrowing authority of $14 billion for the 1981-82 fiscal year. One of its provisions provides that all outstanding and unused borrowing authority provided by the new act, to the extent that it exceeds $3 billion, will expire on March 31, 1982. The bill also seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as in Canadian dollars.

Mr. Speaker, much of what I have to say now was said earlier by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) when he spoke in the House on second reading of Bill C-54. As hon. members will remember, Bill C-54 contained a provision, Clause 1 if I am not mistaken, that requested precisely that borrowing authority. However, following Your Honour's ruling, the government had to introduce a separate bill that has become Bill C-59, the Borrowing Authority Act. Even though the Minister of Finance has already made those comments, I want to reiterate the main points that he made earlier relating to borrowing authority so that there remains no doubt about why we are seeking $14 billion of new borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1981-82.

All unused borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81 provided by the Borrowing Authority Act 1980-81 will expire on March 31, 1981. Without new borrowing powers the government will be unable to implement its debt program for 1981-82. As hon. members are aware, the size of the borrowing authority is related to the size of the government's financial requirements. It will be recalled that the budget which was introduced to Parliament on October 28, 1980, indicated that programmed budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements for 1981-82 were expected to be about $11 billion. The basis for the request for $14 billion of new borrowing authority for the next fiscal year is, therefore, this cash requirement along with a $3 billion margin for such contingencies as the possible need to borrow in foreign currencies.

As hon. members will recall, the budget of last October clearly set out the government's strategy of reducing the deficit through restraint in the rate of growth of expenditures. The budgetary deficit is expected to decline from $14.2 billion this fiscal year to $13.7 billion next year and to $11.8 billion by 1983-84. Throughout this period, there are rising sources of funds from non-budgetary accounts that help to finance the budgetary deficit. The most important of these sources is the superannuation accounts which are expected to provide a source of funds of $2.3 billion in 1980-81 and $2.9 billion in 1981-82, growing to $3.9 billion in 1983-84. As a consequence, financial requirements decline more rapidly than the budgetary deficit. They decline from $12.2 billion this year to $11 billion next year and reach $7.2 billion in 1983-84. As a percentage of GNP, the drop is expected to be from 4.3 per cent in 1980-81 to 3.5 per cent in 1981-82 to 1.8 per cent in 1983-84, the lowest level since 1974-75.

The financial requirements arise from the basic fiscal stance and the over-all budget strategy, a strategy which has been justified by the recent economic developments. During the fourth quarter of 1980 particularly, the main economic indicators have shown moderate strength and the actual outcome for 1980 as a whole is likely to be stronger than expected in the fall of last year. This improved economic performance has sustained employment growth in the fourth quarter with a rise amounting to 1 per cent.

Unfortunately, not all the economic news has been good news. The budget speech warned of the possibility of some deterioration on the price front due to rapid rates of increases in food prices or other factors. There are now indications of somewhat more pressure on food prices than had been anticipated, mainly related to crop yields which were below average and lower marketings of livestock.

It will be recalled that in the budget speech, the Minister of Finance emphasized the need to deal with inflationary pressures, and it seems clearer now than it was at that time that inflation is the most serious and intractable problem facing the Canadian economy. Canada, like other countries, is facing a difficult economic situation and therefore the balanced package of measures contained in the budget, with its gradualist approach aimed at progressively bringing down the rate of inflation and promoting employment and productivity growth, provides the only sensible basis for dealing with the present economic situation. To opt for more economic stimulus at this time would inevitably lead to further aggravation of current inflationary pressures and would require abandoning the policy I mentioned earlier of bringing the size of the government's deficit under control.

The other extreme of excessively restrictive policies would also have major disadvantages. Such policies would have high costs in the form of lost output and unemployment. Moreover, implementing such a policy would require some combination of increased personal and corporate taxes or drastic expenditure cuts which would lead to disruptions to important public programs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain now why the legislation proposes that $3 billion of the borrowing authority provided for 1981-82, or whatever amount remains unused if it is less than $3 billion, be exempt from automatic cancellation at the end of fiscal 1981-82. As the Minister of Finance explained the other day, in recent years most borrowing authority legislation has carried a clause which automatically cancels any unused authority at the end of each fiscal year whether or not new authority has been obtained. In the past when this occurred and new borrowing authority had not yet been passed by Parliament, the government was able to continue with its borrowing program on unused authority obtained in earlier years which was not subject to automatic cancellation.

Since it was not always possible to foresee when Parliament would be sitting or what the parliamentary legislative calendar might be, these old borrowing authorities provided a useful degree of flexibility. During the first four months of the current fiscal year, however, almost all of this non-lapsed borrowing authority was used up as was discussed when we debated earlier the borrowing authority legislation that was adopted by Parliament some months ago. To provide some degree of flexibility in the future, the legislation proposes that all unused borrowing authority provided by the new act, only to the extent that it exceeds $3 billion, will expire on March 31, 1982. So any unused borrowing authority of less than $3 billion will not be cancelled and will be usable after March 31, 1982.

The $3 billion margin for contingencies being requested is in line with the margin that has been provided and deemed necessary in recent years. The financial requirements for 1981-82 referred to earlier exclude requirements for foreign exchange transactions. These transactions can be large and in either direction and can have a substantial impact on the borrowing requirement of the government. A strengthening Canadian dollar gives rise to purchases of foreign exchange and a consequent need to raise Canadian dollars in the domestic market for this purpose. A weakening Canadian dollar, on the other hand, could give rise to the need to borrow foreign currencies to replenish official holdings of foreign exchange which are depleted through foreign exchange operations.

Mr. Speaker, the clause referring to the ability of the government to borrow and repay loans in foreign currencies is a technical one and, as was explained the other day, is similar to a clause that was first included in a borrowing authority bill introduced by the former government in 1979. Over the years, Canada has borrowed and repaid funds in a number of currencies. However, in 1978, Canada made a number of large foreign loans and established standby lines of credit with a number of foreign banks.

The clause was added to confirm Canada's right to borrow in foreign currencies. The Financial Administration Act is currently under review and a clause clarifying the government's ability to borrow and repay in foreign currencies would be included with any amendments to that act. Once such an amendment has been passed, there would no longer be a need for this clause in borrowing authority bills. Recently during the debate on Bill C-54, Clause 1 of which requested borrowing authority, for the information of hon. members, the Minister of Finance set out the government's debt program so far in the current fiscal year and the amount of borrowing authority that has been used. In order to inform hon. members of our current position with respect to borrowing authority, I will take the liberty of repeating what the Minister of Finance said at that time.

Up to January 23, 1981, in domestic markets the government has borrowed a total of $8.8 billion, $5.3 billion through the issue of marketable bonds and $4.6 billion through the issue of Treasury bills, while net Canada Savings Bonds redemptions reduced the amount borrowed by $1.1 billion. In foreign markets, on balance the government has drawn the Canadian dollar equivalent of $10.8 billion in Canadian dollars on its standby lines of credit with Canadian and foreign banks. This amount comprises $1.1 billion drawn in December and currently outstanding and a $0.3 billion repayment on these lines earlier in the fiscal year.

Since borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81 was not obtained until July 17, 1980, borrowing up until that date was charged to $2.9 billion of non-lapsing borrowing authority obtained earlier and carried forward. This was reduced to just over $100 million by July 17 when $12 billion in additional authority became available under the Borrowing Authority Act, 1980-81. As at January 23, the amount still available under this act was $5.1 billion. This is more than enough to complete the planned debt program in the final quarter of this fiscal year and a considerable portion of this amount will likely expire on March 31, 1981.

I believe that the information I have just provided along with the information in the recent budget provides members with the pertinent information with respect to borrowing authority for serious consideration of this bill. It goes without saying that when we discuss the bill in committee, much more information will be provided in answer to hon. members' questions.

In closing, I would like to note that this bill is directly and closely related to the budget brought in by the Minister of Finance. I would like to emphasize that when the committee studied the preceding borrowing authority bill the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) had suggested that such bills ought to be tabled earlier and introduced at the same time as the debate on bills which flow from the budget. I believe that the Minister of Finance did get the message sent by the hon. member and this bill is introduced at the appropriate time along with other budgetary measures.

As such the fiscal policy and general economic policy issues have been debated by this House on a number of occasions in September. There were six days of debate following the budget and a lengthy debate on economic conditions on December 18 before the Christmas recess. In addition there has been some further discussion of these issues as part of the second reading debate on Bill C-54 and in Committee of the Whole we continued to debate the various income tax measures which in a way are all related to the general economic situation.

Some hon. members may recall that on recent occasions the borrowing authority bill has been the occasion for a quite lengthy debate. I might point out, however, that on these occasions the borrowing authority has not been linked to the budget in the way this bill is, as I said earlier.

The borrowing authority bill may also raise issues relating to the government's borrowing program but I will not discuss these matters in any detail now since, as members well know, all of the details of the government's market borrowings are readily available on the public record. I repeat that there will also be ample opportunities for an examination of the government's borrowing activities when this bill goes to committee.

If hon. members grant leave, I would like to table two copies of a document entitled "Background information concerning borrowing authority for fiscal year 1981-82" which hon. members might find useful to prepare the work in committee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the permission of the House to table those documents.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) has requested agreement of the House to the tabling of certain documents. Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, my wish is that the House deal with this bill expeditiously and adopt it as early as possible.

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) for the courtesy of allowing me to speak first in order to keep an appointment in Toronto.

I want to focus my remarks, dealing with the question of the borrowing authority, on the questions I raised earlier during the question period concerning the determination on the part of the federal government to deal with what it regards as the very unique problem associated with a large deficit, a deficit which produces the borrowing requirements the minister has put before us today.

In respect of this unilateral determination on the part of the federal government to change its role in the financing of certain programs which, up until the present time, have been financed by the federal government, I want to urge upon the minister the importance we attach on this side, as he will know from conversations I have had with him over a period of weeks, to the establishment of a parliamentary group with the responsibility for studying fiscal relationships, financial economic relationships, and the question of transfers from one level of government to another.

Word has come to us that the Department of Finance has made certain proposals in respect of the funding of higher education.

An hon. Member: Was that a mole?

Mr. Rae: The hon. member asks whether that is a mole. I can assure him it is not a mole, it is a number of people in the community who are deeply concerned about statements which have been made. In fact, in answer to the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith), it is not a mole, it is the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) himself who, in his budgetary statement at the end of October, told us that the government intends to achieve net savings in this area, referring to social policy, to help finance initiatives in the other envelopes. He went on to say that because of the statutory nature of much of the spending in this envelope, savings are not assumed to begin until 1982-83. Savings are expected to include reductions in federal transfers to provinces relating to areas coming under provincial jurisdiction. Obviously those people working in areas like education, which is clearly under provincial jurisdiction according to the constitution, read the statement by the minister as a clear warning that the federal government was so concerned about simply reducing its over-all economic commitment to the process of transferring from its own jurisdiction to the provinces, that it was university spending which seemed to be the most attractive target.

We now have word that the social development committee of the cabinet is actively considering a proposal which would cut the federal contribution to higher education by $1.5 billion and would lead to a cut over all in the EPF program of some $2 billion.

The accountants in government appear to be in the process of winning out over those people—and I hope there are still some in the government who would include themselves in this group—who look to the substance of the programs being funded and ask the question, not in an abstract way that something must be cut, but what programs need to be funded and how they will be funded. It is not the time for the federal government to suggest that it will unilaterally remove itself from the funding of universities and university research when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is saying that an industrial strategy is one of the top priorities of the government, at a time when the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) is saying that research and development will be beefed up, and at a time when the chairmen of the NRC and other research groups have made it very clear that we face a crisis in funding, planning and strategy in the entire field of scientific research and development.

The federal government should not decide unilaterally to withdraw from this area. We know what is happening in the real world and in the real economies of the universities. The federal government has decided to withdraw because it feels it must cut somewhere so it might as well cut where there are no universal programs to worry about.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) was quoted outside the House. I do not know whether the quotation was accurate or not, but apparently she was quoted as saying that maybe the university program will be cut because, after all, it is an elitist program; she used the word "elitist". I realize that not everyone of university age goes to university, that in fact the numbers indicate that it is very much a minority. There are those who do not see that the world of science, research, universities and higher education goes beyond simply provincial jurisdiction of education and is directly linked to the industrial strategy of a country. They are making a very serious mistake by not seeing the federal government has a responsibility.

If the accountants and the accounting mentality of the Department of Finance win out over the people who look at the substance of the programs, I think it will be a real tragedy for our universities, our young people and our researchers who will inevitably go to the United States and elsewhere if they do not receive the governmental infusion of support which they so desperately need. It will be a tragedy for the whole country.

It appears the government has taken a decision to get out of these programs, according to the minister's own words in the budget. When one looks at hospitalization, medicare, the Canada Assistance Plan and all the transfers which make up approximately 22 cents of the federal government dollar, which is a very substantial amount of money, I suppose university education appears to be the most convenient target. But it would be a mistake to assume that this will happen without a fight. It will be not only a fight on the part of the provinces, because of the assumption that all of the provinces are wealthy and can equally afford it, but I can assure the minister that it will be a fight from this party.

It is our position that the over-all social policy envelope should not be reduced in its role and in its importance because of the importance of maintaining adequate levels of service, indeed more than adequate levels of service. Also we are concerned about the future of higher education in Canada, of research and development, and the role the federal government must play in the financing of higher education. If the department, the ministers responsible for social development, or cabinet are under the illusion that they can make this surgical incision without a very definite political response, I want to assure them they are mistaken.

It is extremely important to understand that the renegotiation of the EPF and the fiscal arrangements involve not only the relationship between the federal government and the provinces, but also the question of the level of service for specific programs which the government must decide as a political decision will be maintained.

Mr. Justice Hall expressed concerns about the integrity of the medicare program because of the fact that there was no way effectively to establish national standards. It is a dilemma; we must all start to appreciate and understand the dilemma of establishing national standards at the same time as having a provincially administered federal program. Of course it is a problem, but also I point out to the government that it will be a very difficult problem in the area of university education. Just as the Pearson government recognized a national concern about medicare and its level of service, there must be a national concern about university education which goes beyond provincial jurisdiction. We should focus on that problem and ask ourselves what are the needs of universities and research institutes from a national perspective.

The government very mistakenly indicated, in the field of urban affairs, that it overstepped the mark and that it would move back. To continue that retreat, faced with some provincial rhetoric, is a very serious mistake. Not only is the relationship between the federal government and the provinces at stake, but also the over-all service and quality of the programs are involved.

Not only is the government cutting back on the activities in the province of Quebec at the University of Laval or the various universities and CEGEPs throughout the province, but it is cutting back on the activities in the province of Ontario at its various universities. For example, it is cutting back $100 million from the University of Toronto. If the federal government thinks it can cut $100 million from the budget of the University of Toronto, or $600 million from the higher education budget for the province of Ontario, without a fight from those of us who are concerned about the quality of education in the province of Ontario, it is sadly mistaken. We think the federal government has a role to play in maintaining the quality of higher education and of research and development.

In closing, I ask the minister to pass on to his colleagues the importance we attach to the establishment of a task force with responsibilities for the fiscal arrangements and various economic transfers between the federal and provincial governments. It would also have the jurisdiction to look into the question of the levels and types of services being provided. In the name of financial responsibility the government may very well be cutting off its own left arm in order to satisfy the concerns of government accountants who look at deficits, and bottom lines, but not at the real nature and importance of the programs being provided.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) I should like to ensure that there is no confusion about the proceedings we are about to follow. After the minister introduced Bill C-59 for second reading and as a result of discussions between some hon. members, I recognized the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) because he needed to catch a plane this afternoon. He was, therefore, speaking out of turn and not under the provisions of Standing Order 31(1) relating to hon. members replying to the minister. That position, with the rule of unlimited time, now belongs to the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, today we commenced the debate on Bill C-59, which is a surprise addition to the government's legislative program as a result of a decision by the Chair with regard to the original version of Bill C-54, the Income Tax Act, to which was attached the borrowing authority. We raised the point that we thought it was out of order, and the Chair concurred. So now we are commencing the debate on second reading on Bill C-59, which is a very simple bill consisting of a single sheet of paper folded over, containing two clauses and four subclauses.

I suppose you have noticed, Mr. Speaker, as I have, that it is always the simple bills which have the most profound impact upon the country. In fact one could almost measure the importance of legislation in inverse ratio to the thickness of the act. The other day we had no trouble in dispensing in about half an hour with a thick bill designated to remove anomalies from existing legislation, but I think it will take a little bit more than half an hour to discuss this question of a $14 billion borrowing authority. This is a colossal sum of money, a sum of money which literally is beyond the comprehension of normal people. It is about 50 per cent more money than was spent by the Government of Canada when the present administration was first elected some 12 years ago. It represents a staggering new edition to the national debt.

Mr. Speaker, I want to address my remarks today to this question of the deficit and the national debt and to what I think needs to be done, and done quickly, if we are not to saddle future generations of Canadians and future governments with obligations and restrictions which will preclude them from making life as comfortable as Canadians and the government of this era is attempting to do.

The total deficit of the Government of Canada, as published in the latest edition of the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1980, shows the liabilities of the government at that point as a colossal $106 billion. The accumulated deficit is $68,600,000,000, with apparently some $37 billion of reported assets. But, Mr. Speaker, when you look at the assets you wonder if, in fact, $37 billion is real or realizable. For example, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has $10 billion worth of assets. As everyone well knows, those assets are sitting idle in many cities right now because of the fact that the owners of CMHC mortgaged homes have simply walked out of them. Indeed, previous auditors general have pointed out that the assets of the Government of Canada, as declared in the Public Accounts, are inaccurate. Mr. Macdonell made quite a point of that in a report of his a few years ago. It has not been rectified yet.

As I said, the accumulated deficit is a colossal $68,600,000,000. If we translate that into the situation of an individual Canadian, it would represent a personal debt equivalent to something in the order of 25 per cent more than his annual income. That is not disposable income I am talking about but annual gross income, given obligations and so on.

Mr. McRae: Not nationally, gross national product though.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member opposite says "Not nationally, gross national product". We have not quite reached the stage in this country where the government has total control over every penny of gross national product. We are talking about the government. That gross national product to which the hon. member was referring is my income, his income, and the income of other citizens. The Government of Canada has not yet reached the point at which it has first call on every single dollar of a citizen's income. At least not yet.

Mr. McRae: It is a smaller percentage than in Diefenbaker's time.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member talks about it being a smaller percentage than in Diefenbaker's time. He is again utilizing the fictitious and phony comparisons which have to do with the fact that when the war ended there was no question that Canada had a larger debt proportionally than we do today, as did all free nations of the world which fought against totalitarianism. The battle cost money, and they had a deficit. Since the war that deficit has been steadily reduced, until about 1975. Until then the Diefenbaker era, to which the hon. member was referring, saw the total national debt on the same downward plane, being reduced year after year. Since 1975 the opposite has been occurring. If the hon. member would like to see for himself I would refer him to the Public Accounts. For March 31, 1980, there appears a chart in the Public Accounts which shows the accumulated deficit as a percentage of gross national product. In 1976 it was 14.1 per cent; in 1977 it was 15.5 per cent; in 1978 it was 18.9 per cent; in 1979 it was 24.3 per cent; and in 1980 it was 26.4 per cent. Based on the deficit of the year we have just finished it will be in excess of 30 per cent at the end of this fiscal year. So the hon. member ought to look at the facts before making those specious comments.

The reality is that the deficit, as a proportion of national debt, is increasing at an alarming rate. The government's deficit this year is $14.5 billion. By comparison, the United States is looking at a deficit of perhaps $40 million. And they consider that astronomical. Both the Democrats and the Republicans consider that an unacceptable deficit. All U.S. politicians during their last election were saying they had to bring that deficit down. And their economy is ten times the size of ours. If they had the same kind of deficit which Canada has, they would be looking at a deficit in excess of $160 billion. They consider $40 billion, which is one-third of ours in relative terms, as astronomically high about which something must be done. Yet the hon. member opposite says, "What the heck. We only have a $14 billion deficit. That is not a serious problem." I hope he was just exchanging partisan debate there.

Mr. McRae: We will get up later on and explain.

Mr. Andre: I hope his comments do not represent the mood of the government and its supporters. Indeed, it will be very tragic if something is not done about this deficit, and done soon. The disturbing thing about this deficit and the accumulating debt is that they are not as a result of apparent policy. Mr. Speaker, you were here in this House, as I was, in 1974-75. I can recall the then minister of finance, John Turner, and subsequently Donald Macdonald, saying that the government was engaged in a program of restraint. They said they were determined to keep spending below the growth in the gross national product. Since that time the deficit has gone from 14.1 per cent of the GNP to over 30 per cent. It has more than doubled, as a percentage of GNP, during a time when every single finance minister emphatically stated in the House that he was dedicated to government restraint and to holding the deficit in line. They were either not telling the truth or they were simply not backed up by the apparatus of government and by their party. No one provided any back-up to these policy statements. In a sense, it was a kind of lie as well.

What is the problem with a deficit? Why is it not a good thing? After all, it does not hurt you or me immediately. The money which is being talked about is meaningless. Once you get past talking about a few thousand dollars most of us cannot comprehend these large amounts. After all, no one is digging into my pockets for it, nor into the pockets of my constituents. Apparently government is able to get it somewhere so why should we worry about it?

Is it really a matter about which Canadians are concerned? It most definitely is, in a democracy. We either need a government which recognizes the problems and concerns itself and then acts in accordance with the best wishes of the nation, or we need a concerned public which forces government to act in the best interests of the nation. Based on the performance of this government we need that informed public. We need a public which is aware of what is happening, aware of the damage that this kind of continuous deficit financing can cause. We need a public which will bring pressure to bear because, if it does not show up at the polls as something the government should do, it will not get done. We know that much from watching the operations of this particular party which is in power.

● (1420)

The Economic Council of Canada in its Seventeenth Annual Review, its most recent review, discusses the question of deficits. In fact I am about to refer to a section entitled "The Question of Deficits". The section holds out some arguments for and some against, without taking a view one way or another. It states:

> The simplest and perhaps for some the most forceful argument against deficits is that future generations must pay for them and that they ought not to. If the deficit is directly or indirectly financed through foreign borrowing that is not used for productive investment but for immediate consumption, then future generations will be burdened.

And the section goes on. There is no question that it is fundamentally immoral for the government to run up deficits which will burden the next generation of Canadians with the obligation of paying off those deficits. It is especially disturbing when we burden those generations not for capital investments or investments in research and development, the results of which would be of benefit, but burden them with the costs of paying for the gasoline which we are using today.

The Liberal party has made a decision that we shall subsidize crude oil which is imported from offshore. By running a deficit we are asking the next generation to pay for the gasoline which we are using in our cars today, and that generation would like to have money left over to buy some gasoline for themselves. Is that moral? Is that the proper behaviour for responsible governments or Parliament to countenance and accept? I submit that it is not.

Another argument against deficit financing is that it pushes out other forms of financing. When the government borrows money from the market, then clearly it makes that money unavailable for other purposes such as investment in new plant or equipment which would generate jobs and so on. By taking this money out, the government drives up interest rates and reduces the savings which are available for investment in capital equipment.

Granted there is the view, which some members of the New Democratic Party support, that deficits are stimulative, that if the government increases its deficit by borrowing it will spend more, thereby increasing demand in the economy and causing growth in the economy which results in more people working, which generates more money and therefore more savings, and the savings provide the money which the government uses to finance that extra deficit. So the net effect of increasing the deficit is to the benefit of the economy, and we are merely using our money over and over again.

The problem with that reasoning can be illustrated through the pyramid schemes which people dream up from time to time. For example, one receives a letter in the mail which says, "Here is the address of the person who sent the letter and if you send that person a dollar and send this letter to ten other people each one will send you a dollar." Of course, those people will extend the letter on to another ten people. It is a marvellous scheme because one only pays a dollar and receives dollars from ten other people, thereby making a very good profit.

The person who starts the scheme makes money, but common sense indicates that at some point in time the pyramid must collapse because an infinite number of people is required to make the system work, and they must have a dollar in their pocket and 17 cents for a stamp. That is what the government is promoting. It is saying that it must increase the deficit which will enable it to spend more, which will put more people to work, which will cause the economy and savings to grow and this will create money to finance the increased deficit, since it is our money anyway. And as a result of the whole ball of wax, we are better off.

This is the theory which we have been following for the last six or seven years. It is a pyramid scheme. And each new finance minister who comes along says that we must cure our current unemployment situation so we must spend more money. And there is a raft of ministers, 33 of them, each with hundreds of civil servants who are dreaming up beautiful schemes to generate employment, schemes such as LIP, LEAP, LAP, community services and so on. There are tons of these schemes which are all marvellous in terms of their impact.

These proposals come from civil servants who say, "If only we would spend another $350 million here and $400 million there, and another $600 million there, we will generate so many jobs and these jobs will generate taxes and save money which brings in more financing. For seven years we have been running this pyramid scheme. Unfortunately, countries are no more immune to the realities of that kind of scheme than are our families, businesses or individuals. It cannot be done. The Canada Gazette is full of individuals who try to work their financing in this manner.

People obtain a Chargex from the Royal Bank and spend to the limit. When the bank asks for the money, these people merely go to the Bank of Nova Scotia and get another card and use the proceeds of that card to pay off the card of the Royal Bank, and then they go over to the Bank of Montreal and obtain a Master Charge and then back to the Bank of Nova Scotia. They keep going and thinking that it is a marvellous deal because they merely have to ask for more money. Eventually these people who are asked for the money say, "Whoops! No more, sorry". Then the collapse comes and they are off to the debtor's court.

This scenario also applies to countries. There is a limit. I am not suggesting that we are at the limit, but I am suggesting that by carrying on in this manner of borrowing more and more each year, and increasing the deficit year after year, we will reach that stage. There are countries in the world which are at that stage right now. On the face of it these countries should be as prosperous as we are, but they are not, simply because of the feeling of their governments that they could spend their way to prosperity. The reality is that there is no way one can spend oneself into prosperity. One must earn one's way to prosperity, and this applies to individuals, families, businesses or countries.

The Keynesian theories which are quoted and utilized by the apologists to justify these deficits simply do not work. Most responsible economists recognize this fact. Perhaps the theories were never given a chance to work because while governments have to increase the deficit or spend more to put the economy on the rise, they hate to run surpluses or, in other words, spend less to slow things down. Thus the government is always working on one side of the equation and never on the other side. In defence of Lord Keynes, he said that we must work both sides of the fence and that we must be prepared to run a surplus and hold down spending in order to take some of the heat out of the economy.

● (1430)

Probably more important is the fact that the Keynesian idea of deficit financing for growth is fundamentally inflationary. It has an inflationary bias because it works on the concept of putting out more money to stimulate demand which brings on more supply; supply increases to satisfy demand; that brings on jobs, economic growth and so on. The reality is that if you increase demand the price goes up and, as a result of that price increase, more people get into the business of supplying the goods. The price increase itself is inflationary. We all know that prices do not go down; they go up. The Keynesian approach is fundamentally wrong. I should not say it is fundamentally wrong but it is not the most appropriate because it has that inflationary bias.

I should like to consider now the question of how this deficit is financed. We have a borrowing bill which authorizes the government to borrow domestically and to borrow foreign savings. There are three ways available to the government and two of them are available to you or I.

Mr. Knowles: You or me!

Mr. Andre: To you or me, Mr. Speaker. I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: That is worse than splitting an infinitive!

Mr. Andre: That is right, and I could have committed that error. The deficit can be financed through borrowing from you and me who have saved our money. The deficit can be financed by borrowing the savings on the foreign market which is money that non-Canadians have saved. The deficit can also be financed by the federal government borrowing from the Bank of Canada, in other words, by printing money.

None of these methods is cost free; every one of them carries a burden. Every one is an obligation that has to be borne by those who come after us, the next generation of Canadians, the next government.

The same rules apply to the Government of Canada as apply to Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson, or the Andre family. The only difference is time. Because it is so large the government has the inertia that can carry it on. It moves at glacial speed. When standing still it is difficult to recognize what is happening without fine instruments. For individuals it can happen quickly and they can feel it. Business has a little more inertia than individuals but less than government.

In borrowing the savings of Canadians to finance this deficit, the Government of Canada is almost involved in a fraud. Let us consider what is happening today. To finance part of this deficit the government is selling savings bonds to provide the needed cash. Canada Savings Bonds pay roughly 12 per cent per annum interest. A rough average marginal tax rate in this country is 33 1/3 per cent. Let us take one third of income as being a rough marginal tax rate. Today the inflation rate is 10 per cent.

If you start the year with $1,100, an inflation rate of 10 per cent will leave you with $1,000 at the end of the year; otherwise you are going backwards. If you put that $1,000 into Canada Savings Bonds you will have $1,120 at the end of the year, but the government designates that $120 as income, as so it is taxable. If your marginal tax rate is the average, that means you pay $40 tax on the $120 interest, so you are left with $80. You have actually lost $20 of your capital to the government. It has defrauded you of your capital.

It is absolutely amazing to me that we Canadians save as much as we do. We are very good savers so the government is fortunate. It is able to continue with its profligate ways and spend, spend, spend, because millions of Canadians are willing to save their money and let the government use it. The government is defrauding them because at the end of the year they have less than when they started.

That is immoral to begin with, Mr. Speaker, but it is also extremely dangerous, and that fact is becoming widely known.

Mr. Evans: The first $1,000 of interest is tax-free.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member said that the first $1,000 is tax-free. Let us then take savings of $100,000 as an example. I am sure that as a responsible economist the parliamentary secretary would not argue with the fundamental premise I was putting forward. I notice he is shaking his head affirmatively.

It is very dangerous for the government to rely on people being willing to have their capital taxed away year after year after year. It is immoral, but it is also dangerous and that danger is being recognized.

In the Public Accounts the amount of Canada Savings Bonds is shown to be decreasing. In 1979, $19 billion worth of Canada Savings Bonds was outstanding; in 1980, $18 billion was outstanding, and I have forgotten the latest figure but I know it is less. The public is starting to wise up to the fact that the government is defrauding it of some of its capital, and the amount of money being put into that debt instrument is decreasing. The government then has to pay more interest for money, and in turn that means that debt management becomes much more difficult.

Foreign savings are worse in many ways than domestic savings as a means of financing the operations of government. When the interest is paid on foreign savings, it leaves the country altogether. The cash is collected in this country, it leaves, and so is not available to finance projects that would provide jobs and growth in the country. We are suffering considerably right now—

An hon. Member: Let the multinational oil companies take over.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member talks about national oil companies. What about a national automobile company? What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Recently I received a letter from an individual which I hope to put on record one day. He suggested a national automobile program which would assess each automobile a $500 fee. The money would be given to "Auto Canada", a new Crown corporation which would use it to buy a multinational automobile company. That sounds like a great idea. We could do the same thing with textiles, mines, petrochemicals—you name it. It is a heck of a deal, and I cannot understand why this government has not extrapolated the National Energy Program into these other methods.

The third option, that of financing the deficit by printing money, is a fraud. If the amount of money in this country increased by 10 per cent tomorrow it would mean that everything was worth 10 per cent less immediately. Money is just not a medium of exchange for goods and services. When the government decides it needs cash in order to operate and do all the good things it has in mind, and asks the Bank of Canada for the cash, all it is doing is dipping into the pockets of Canadians and defrauding them of part of their assets. It is stealing assets from individual Canadians for its own political purposes. Obviously it is highly inflationary and, as everyone knows, the level of inflation always falls hardest on those who can least afford it, the elderly, those on fixed incomes, and so on.

There is no pain-free way of running these kinds of deficits. There is no pain-free way of reducing them. The longer the government goes on accumulating deficit after deficit and adding to the national debt, the more difficult and the more burdensome will be the eventual repayment. No matter how imaginative governments might try to be, no matter how imaginative programs of the bureaucracy might be, the reality is that there is no pain-free way to reduce these deficits. If we finance our gasoline today while running this deficit, there is no alternative for future generations. They will have to pay. That fundamental fact cannot be dismissed. If we were using the money to invest today in an infrastructure or something of long-term benefit to the country, for instance, science and technology, education, what have you, that would be a different story. If that were done, then there is a payout, Mr. Speaker. It is the difference between an individual going to the bank and borrowing $10,000 for a trip to Tahiti or borrowing $10,000 to buy a backhoe. He is in debt $10,000 in both circumstances. But, after his trip to Tahiti, all he has are his memories. After his backhoe is in operation, he has something which can generate income and use to pay off his loan.

What this government has been doing to the country is going into debt year after year after year to finance the equivalent of trips to Tahiti. What we have are wonderful memories but no fundamental strength or investments from which to generate income to pay off these debts.

I come back to the area of science and technology as being a classic example of the foul-up. Nothing is more tragic, and nothing will be as damaging to our future ability to sustain growth and opportunity in this country than the failure of the government over the last ten years to invest substantially in science and technology in Canada. Surely there could not be a thinking person anywhere who does not recognize that technology is the base upon which we have to build as a nation. There are three fundamental strengths which Canada has: technology, our resources, and our food. We have neglected the technology side terribly, and right now we are kicking the blazes out of the energy side. Because of this neglect, future generations will have to pay a tremendous price.

How do we go about handling this deficit? How do we go about ensuring that next year we do not come back with a borrowing bill that says the government wants to borrow $17 billion, and the year after that $22 billion, and the year after that $25 billion? On and on and on it will go, which is just a repetition of the pattern we have been going through. How do we make sure that does not happen? I know in the budget address of October 28 the government said that that is not the plan, that it will be spending less. But that is what John Turner said in 1974. That is what Donald Macdonald said in 1975. That is what Jean Chrétien said when he was minister of finance. They have all been saying that since I have been here. It has been a constant theme of every single finance minister. All we have heard from ministers of finance is, "We are going to bring down the deficit. We are going to hold government spending below the GNP. We are going to bring Canada's finances into good working order." Every minister of finance since I have been here has said that. Yet here we have a deficit of $14 billion. Last year the deficit was $11 billion. The year before that it was $8 billion. These are the amounts they were looking for in terms of borrowing authority. The record says that next year the amount will be $17 billion. That is what the record says, and that is what it will be unless something changes.

How do we reduce this deficit? How do we start paying off the national debt? There are two alternatives. We can either raise taxes—raise money, raise revenues—or reduce expenditures, or both. How do we raise revenues? Can you raise taxes, Mr. Speaker? Is that method available to us? I do not think it is. I do not think raising taxes will in fact generate any more income. On the contrary it will probably result in a loss of income. The explanation for that is perhaps not that simple, but it is based on the concept that we are already collecting more revenue. The taxes in this country are already higher than Canadians are willing to pay. We are already trying to collect out of the hides of Canadians for the benefit of the national government more money than the people are willing to pay. In a democracy, that cannot be done. It probably cannot be done under a dictatorship or under a tyrannical regime. The theoretical base for this, as many in this House would be aware, has recently achieved some prominence among economic schools of thought, which are sometimes referred to as neo-conservatives in their approach. They are sometimes referred to as supply-side economists. There are other names.

If one were to make a graph of government revenues versus tax rates, one thing you know about that graph is that it goes through zero at zero per cent and 100 per cent. In other words, if the government tax rate were zero per cent, obviously government revenues are zero. The same thing is true at the other extremity. If the government tax rate is 100 per cent, revenue is zero as well. Obviously a government cannot tax at a 100 per cent rate. That is a theoretical extreme which is never achievable. If the government takes it all, there is nothing left.

In between those two extremities is a curve of some sort. It means there is an apex of some sort. There is a point beyond which increasing taxes actually result in a reduction in revenues. Where is that point? I do not know. Karl Marx said that apex was 30 per cent. He said that once governments start taking more than 30 per cent of what people earn, society starts to break down and fall apart. I do not think that Karl Marx was right in that theory, as in most other things, because we have now reached the 40 per cent level and we have not quite reached the breakdown stage. But then, who knows? Societies move at glacial speed. Maybe we are on that path and it is simply occurring because we are a part of it and we do not recognize what is happening. The anecdotal evidence to support that contention is everywhere. Former U.S. President John Kennedy, when he reduced taxes in the United States in response to a political promise, was somewhat surprised and gratified to find out that in fact revenues went up. The reduction in taxes was such a stimulus to the economy that income from that reduction more than made up for the loss of revenue due to that reduction.

The ending of slavery and the slave economy was based upon this concept as much as anything. It was not quite as moral a question as sometimes we think it was when we look back. The reality is that the British plantation owners in the early 1800s discovered they could get more work out of the slaves by paying them a salary than keeping them as slaves. As slaves they were essentially taxing their efforts at a very high percentage, probably 80 per cent, because they fed them poorly and sheltered them poorly. In essence, each slave was paying to his owner a very high marginal tax rate. When they abolished slavery and put them on salary, they found they were a lot more productive. It was the same as reducing the tax.

Nikita Khrushchev found the same to be true in Russia. When he told the farmers on the communes that, if they wanted, they could have small patches to grow their own vegetables, either for their own use or for sale in the markets, lo and behold vegetable production shot up. That was nothing but a reduction in taxes. They were telling them they could use part of their time to generate income, that they did not have to devote 100 per cent to the communes. Being able to devote that time to their own activities was, in essence, a reduction in taxes.

Further evidence that we are now taxing people beyond their willingness to pay is the growth of the underground economy, as it is referred to. This is the barter system or cash economy which is beyond the reach of the tax man, because there are no records. In a study by a University of Michigan economist, he found that 27 per cent of the United States economy was an underground economy. The GNP of the United States was a lot larger than their equivalent to StatsCan had assessed it to be because of this underground economy.

Every individual knows of instances such as the lawyer saying to the carpenter, "I will make up a will for you, if you will put a new bar in my basement." They work out that little deal and the transaction does not show up in any one's income tax statement. No tax is paid. It does not show up in the GNP because it is part of the underground economy.

That kind of bartering goes on everywhere. I wonder how many families have maintenance or cleaning people who are willing to work for them at a salary less than the going rate, provided they are paid in cash. That goes on everywhere in this country, and we all know it. The reason governments and economists started to pay attention was because of the strange phenomenon that was occurring with the growth of plastic credit cards. In theory that should have resulted in less need for the folding green stuff, yellow, orange or whatever we are now using, but in fact the amount of cash in society was actually increasing. It is being used by people operating in this cash economy which is beyond the reach of the tax man.

Why are they doing that? It is because the tax man is collecting more than they are willing to pay. It is as simple as that. In a democracy you just cannot tax people more than they are willing to pay.

Something else which concerns me is that governments are collecting what I refer to as sneaky taxes. Those are tax expenditures forced on individuals and the economy which never show up in a budget, in the estimates of government spending or in any other way by which the public can become aware of them. A good example of what I mean by a sneaky tax is the PetroCan tax. Petro-Canada has today made an offer to buy out Petrofina. Where will they get the money? They will get it through a special tax of up to $4 on a barrel of crude oil in this country.

The government says it cannot afford to negotiate a higher price with the producing provinces because of inflation and so on, but it has found a way of putting on this special PetroCan thing. It will not be a tax in the sense that it will show up in the Public Accounts or in the Blue Book, the estimates we get each year. It is going into a special account. No one will see that tax on their T-4 slip or have any measure of it. This is money the government has decided to spend instead of us as individuals.

When the press reports on government spending, that figure will not be in there. The minister will be able to say the government is holding down spending, that it has only grown by so much. That will be because it has decided not to count this other figure. It will just be put off on the side.

The crude oil import subsidy program is exactly the same. It is a special little account off on the side which never shows up. There are scores of these things.

Mr. McRae: It is part of the $14 billion debt.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member ought to do his homework. It is a special account. It does not have anything to do with this $14 billion, or with the Public Accounts of Canada. It will not show up in public accounts. It is a separate item. It would show up if we had a national account, something we should have.

Mr. Evans: We do.

Mr. Andre: The parliamentary secretary says "We do", but you have to be a real ferret to find it. The government has no interest in having the people base their spending on national accounts.

Mr. Evans: It is in the budget.

Mr. Andre: I know the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said it was in the budget. They said that on a public accounts basis our spending this year will be less than the increase in the gross national product, that it will only be 12.8 per cent, whereas it is anticipated the GNP will go up by 13.7 per cent. If you look at the national accounts basis, which they never mention in their speeches and which does not show up in press releases, you see that spending is going up by 15.9 per cent, which is quite a bit more than the increase in the gross national product.

That is a direct contradiction of promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Every year he repeats that spending will be held to less than the growth in the gross national product. It just is not true. It is not held to less than the GNP, it is more. We are not allowed to say that in this House because it is not parliamentary. However, if it waddles and quacks like a duck, it is a duck. I call it a lie.

There are all kinds of sneaky taxes which the government never talks about. Loans supposedly made to Crown corporations never show up because they are loans. We know they will never be paid back because a Crown corporation will not have the ability to do so. An example is the St. Lawrence Seaway. After the debt builds up the government says it will convert it to equity, and zippo, it disappears like magic, as though it were not really government spending.

Lotteries are a form of taxation. The government uses this money, which comes out of your pocket and mine, to spend. For some people it is a fun way of collecting taxes. Some may feel, I don't, that it is fun to bet on lotteries, but it is still a tax and does not show up in the government's spending.

There are other even more sneaky, almost sinister in their implication, taxes which the government imposes through regulations. For example, if you are going to build a pipeline or do some exploration work offshore, and this in fact is part of the National Energy Program, you have to contribute to a fund for environmental protection. I do not argue against that, but it is a tax. It does not show up in the accounts or the spending of Canada.

When the government appoints a new regulatory agency or tribunal before which people must apply and which must hold public hearings, the result is they end up hiring scads of lawyers at $200 an hour, the going rate for a half decent lawyer these days. If you want a good lawyer, it will cost you $1,000 an hour.

There are hundreds, thousands, millions and, indeed, billions of dollars being forced on the economy by government decisions, and it is all non-productive expenditure. This is just like a tax. It does not produce goods and services individuals want. It has been estimated in Canada that this kind of government enforced expenditure accounts for $15 billion, at least $5 billion of which is waste, with $10 billion contributing to making life safer and so on.

The fact is that the over-all tax rate on our society imposed by governments is much more than 40 per cent, and that is the total government take that is talked about in this budget as being taken out of the economy. The fact of the matter is that it is well in excess of 50 per cent, given all the other hidden taxes, regulatory expenses and what have you.

If we can ever get to the reason, I suggest it is that the public just does not know; people are not aware of this. We have to work like dogs for weeks and months, spend all kinds of time in the library pouring over all kinds of books to try to get even a hint of what is going on. One can get a general picture, but it is very difficult to get any accuracy, and the access to information bill is not going to help.

The reality is that in order to bring down this deficit, avoid saddling future generations and let future governments have the possibility of some independent action, this government will have to do something about spending. It will have to bring spending under control, and not just by moving it off to other sectors, which is what it is planning to do in terms of this transfer elimination of $1.6 billion in assistance to secondary education. That will not do it. The government cannot get rid of it by putting it off into separate accounts—the PetroCan account or the import subsidy account—so it is beyond the public eye and claim it is really doing something about expenditures. That does not do anything. That does not work. It makes things worse.

Every single economist or group that has looked at the question of government spending has ultimately arrived at the conclusion that the first thing which needs to be done is the adoption of a policy of openness and honesty about the spending process. It is must be brought into the light of day so the public really knows the cost of things. If the public really knows the cost and really recognizes that it will have to pay, and still asks for whatever it is, that is fine because that is not inflation. When they do not really know and when they think they are getting a free lunch and, therefore, ask for these new government services without recognizing that they are paying for it themselves, then we get into this inflationary thing. People are not willing to pay then. They go to the underground economy. If they belong to a strong union, they demand that their after-tax salaries stay the same even though production does not go up. If they are businessmen, they add it on to the price. Everybody protects himself, so when the government tries to play these games, all it does is adds to inflation and again burdens the future generation.

The government must be open and honest about the spending process, and it must do that soon. I would have government members re-read the Auditor General's report of 1976, and re-read the 1974 annual review of the C.D. Howe Institute. They should re-read the final report of the Lambert commission on financial management and accountability and, for goodness' sake, start applying these recommendations soon. It is not enough to stand up here year after year after year saying we are in a period of restraint and the government is bringing government spending under control.

So help me, since I have been here, and certainly for the last five years, every single minister of finance and president of the Treasury Board has said the same thing: "We are bringing government spending under control, and we are going to reduce the deficit." Every single one of them has made that statement, yet the deficit keeps growing and growing, the burden on the Canadian public keeps growing and growing, inflation keeps growing and growing and unemployment keeps growing and growing. We are on a crazy treadmill that is leading to disaster. We are like Massey-Ferguson, fundamentally sound and fundamentally well managed, but in debt beyond our means to repay and no way to get out of it. Unlike Massey-Ferguson and Chrysler, we do not have a big brother to go to for help. I suppose we will not be here and it will be the next generation that pays, so what the heck? In the meantime the government will have received its pats on the back.

To this day John Turner and Donald Macdonald are said to be great fiscal conservatives because they made all those speeches about how they were controlling expenditures. I heard their speeches, as did everybody else. Those two are great fiscal conservatives; that is their reputation. Yet, if you look at the history of what happened when they were here, you will see that that is when the system really went to pot. These great fiscal conservatives were the ones who are now making life so miserable for the current Minister of Finance, who I think is a sincere and honest man and would like to do a good job in the portfolio he is now managing. He is finding it darned difficult because of the job done by those who preceded him.

Difficult or not, I hope the Minister of Finance has the backbone to make tough decisions without letting ambition get in his way in terms of future higher offices he might have in mind. I hope he will make the tough decision of bringing spending under control so that a year from now we are not back here again debating borrowing authority because the government needs a "mere" $17 billion to sustain itself and pay for those wonderful, marvellous programs the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has thought up such as LEAP, LAP and so on.

I close with that plea. I do not mean to cast aspersions on the integrity of the Minister of State for Finance or the Minister of Finance, but I for one have listened to speeches identical to his in terms of bringing spending down, reducing the deficit and all those things. I have listened to that same speech essentially at least five times over the last five years. The results have been directly the opposite. Quite frankly, I will wait to be shown because I cannot accept at face value the statements being made. I hope I am wrong; I hope they are right, and I hope for once we will have a Minister of Finance who will put political responsibility ahead of political expediency. But I doubt that, considering what he has done in terms of the National Energy Program. In that respect he has certainly put political expediency ahead of what is good for the country. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I hope we would have had a further intervention on the part of government at this stage. After all, it is the government that is trying to justify the authority to borrow. It is not up to the opposition to prove that it should not be given that authority. This type of bill has been pushed into this position because—and this is supported by my memory and participation in debates over a number of years—the government has decided to be cute. This year's effort is an attempt to tuck it into an income tax bill. I do not know where the mandarins in the Department of Finance got the idea that somehow or another they should be able to slide things past Parliament.

Mr. Evans: It is a question of precedent.

Mr. Lambert: It is not a question of precedent, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) just said. There have been changes in the rules of the House. I remember the borrowing authority and appropriations bills which were debated in the House before 1969, when there was a habit of tucking into a bill and on rare occasions the government would admit to the necessity of increasing its borrowing authority. It is only with the advent of monetary and fiscal mismanagement that we have seen borrowing authorities grow and grow as deficit upon deficit have piled up. It is almost impossible to remember whether the accumulated deficit is $50 billion or $60 billion. What will we be looking at in the accumulative spending programs of the government for this year and next as a result of the pressures of inflation and the ever-present government attempt to scramble and scramble?

I remember in 1963 when the new Messiah on the financial horizon, Walter Gordon, came in with a total budget of $6.3 billion. Since that time we have experienced a continuing escalation of budgetary excesses, notwithstanding the supposed efforts of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who technically heads the administration of today. In a fiscal sense he does not care a tinker's damn what happens to the economy, so beset is he with chasing the greatest red rabbit—and I am not referring to a red herring—of constitutional change down the trail ahead of the Canadian public. Nero fiddled while Rome burned; in an economic sense the Prime Minister is playing entire symphonies of irrelevant music while the Canadian economy is being destroyed. Frankly, the whole exercise of this year has been a bitter joke upon the Canadian public.

Over the years I have made a number of speeches with regard to the perils of inflation and its results. Our 1971 dollar is now worth 45 cents, and I hesitate to think what our 1963 dollar would be worth. I doubt if it would be worth 25 cents, and that is within the living memories of many members of the House.

As a matter of fact, I hesitate to think what the 1944 dollar—that was when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) came to this place—would be worth today.

Mr. Knowles: It was 1942.

Mr. Prud'homme: It would probably be below zero.

Mr. Lambert: I am sure a dollar from that day would not buy a cup of coffee at the present time.

Mr. Rose: He still has it.

Mr. Lambert: This helps to show the ridiculous position of our finances.

Mr. Prud'homme: What about salaries?

Mr. Lambert: I am glad the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) is participating. He is suggesting that the salaries of 1942 were lower. That is so, but it is entirely relative; the position has not improved.

Under certain legislation before the House, a superior court judge will be paid $70,000 per year as of April 1, 1979. On the basis of the formula included in that bill—and this is the government's prediction of its control—a simple calculation increases that individual's salary to $195,000 per year, give or take a few dollars, in 15 years.

We must stop and assess what inflation has done. I know the general public has become immune to the thought of the amount of a million dollars. People do not understand what is a million or what is a billion. Government members of Parliament are all too happy to report that the government has committed millions of dollars in DREE grants to their various areas. If I were to try to boast to my constituents, or even to my neighbours, that the government spent that sum of money in our constituency in DREE grants, I would receive a slap in the face rather than an accolade. There is no pride in pouring hundreds of thousands or millions of government dollars into a particular area if it goes toward the establishment of industries without consultation with the concerned provincial government and if it is to the detriment of another area. We have seen, time after time, hundreds of thousands of dollars being spent in one portion of Ontario to establish a new plant which has only meant the closing of another plant. I have seen money spent in areas of Saskatchewan and British Columbia through slush funds, which has resulted in the closing of small factories such as one manufacturing trailers in a small city.

Bitter stories were reported to me by deputy ministers of industry. That was deemed to be progress; it was deemed to be necessary activity on the port of the federal government. It was the knife in the back of communities, because all too often new industry in an area lasted but a few years and then folded. The whole exercise has been a sorry chapter in attempts to alter the market bureaucratically. This cannot be justified, except that people received money and were able to subsist.

We always wonder how much $1 million is. I would say that the average individual has no conception whatsoever of what is $1 million. If a man were rich enough to say to his wife: "I will give you $1 million on condition that you leave and spend $1,000 a day", how many people in this country would love to have $1,000 a day to spend? But the condition here is that you cannot come back until you have spent it. If a person were to spend, on an average, $1,000 a day and stayed away until the whole $1 million had been spent, how long would it take? Do hon. members, and particularly those people who are listening to my voice at this time, have any idea how long it would take someone to spend $1,000 a day until he has spent $1 million? If I told them it would take two years and nine months, perhaps they would have a conception of what $1 million might be.

If, on the other hand, we were to play some other type of financial wizardry and we said to a person, "I will place $1 million in new $1 bills before you, and you can have it if you can tell me quickly how high the pile will be", you would discover that 1,000 new $100 bills would be about three and a half inches high. Now, 3,500 inches would be the height of a stack of $1 bills amounting to $1 million, and calculated in feet, it would be 292 feet. We look at skyscrapers in our average Canadian cities and we find that, apart from two or three major cities, there is no building which would be 292 feet high, because it would have to be a 29 or 30-storey building. That is how high $1 million is in $1 bills.

Then how much is $1 billion? One billion is one thousand million. How many billions of dollars have been asked for in this bill? The bill is asking for $14 billion. If we were to translate that into stacks of $1 bills—

An hon. Member: It would be higher than Jack's beanstalk.

Mr. Lambert: What kind of a forest of skyscrapers across Canada would we have with these stacks of bills? Just imagine, there would be a 29 or 30 storey building for each $1 million, so there would be 1,000 such buildings for each $1 billion.

An hon. Member: What would we use them for?

Mr. Lambert: Now we are saying there would be 14 times that number or 14,000 buildings 30 storeys high. I hope that the average listener can envisage just how much that represents. That is the borrowing authority; it is not how much is being spent. We are spending close to $60 billion a year at the federal government level, or 30-storey buildings of money.

That in itself begs description. It is difficult to imagine 60,000 of such buildings across this country made up of stacks of $1 bills.

An hon. Member: Let's hope there would not be a fire.

Mr. Lambert: In the judges' bill, Bill C-34, the proposed salary is $70,000, but 15 years hence, without any artificial review, it would be $195,000 a year, almost three times as much. That is a factor of 7 over 14, or 1.07 to the fourteenth. Some of us may not see it 15 years hence, but I trust that the majority of members of the House will. My goodness, we will have to have not one desk but two desks in order to accommodate the paper on which to write the numbers. We will have to do like they did in Europe after the war.

● (1530)

What did they do in France? They replaced the old francs with new francs. The same happened in Belgium and in Germany.

[English]

So, what do you do? You take $10 and you make it into $1. You take the currency and immediately devalue it, or re-value it to one-tenth of its former value. It is like what happened with the lira and the yen. Over the years they have suffered from inflation. This year, as a result of uncontrolled inflation, governments of various countries have, for whatever reasons, absolutely abdicated the responsibility of controlling inflation. This week the British government decided to abolish the pound note, because the pound has become irrelevant in their monetary system. I recall, as a university student, when the pound note was worth $5. As a veteran and student from Canada attending a British university, I was paid my allowance at the rate of $5 to the pound. And 35 years later the pound note is being wiped out because it is irrelevant. It will become a seven-sided brass coin. Instead of showing 20 shillings it will show 20 new pence. That is what inflation does.

The bill before us is a reflection of this kind of inflation. The next thing we will see, possibly, is the 5-cent piece and the 10-cent piece being wiped out of our monetary system because they are irrelevant. The penny is already of no value whatsoever. Hon. members may say, "Why are you harping on inflation?" I am talking about inflation today as I talked about the insidious dangers of inflation back in 1968 when this God-forsaken administration started. The same man who heads the administration today was the head of the administration at that time. He was more concerned about the irrelevancies of what makes this land tick. The average Canadian is interested in his job and whether he has sufficient funds for three square meals a day for himself and his family. He is concerned about having a decent roof over his head. He is the man who represents the earning capacity of this country, not the non-earners, the pre-18s and the post-65s. The wage-earner is the one who bears the brunt of the productive requirements of this country. He is the one who must bear the brunt of supporting the social systems we have in this country.

Depending upon how a country treats this productive force, so shall it succeed in taking care of the rest of its citizens. Frankly, here in Canada we have done a damned poor job. We face a problem over the next 15 years, the likes of which we have not seen hitherto. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) lies awake at night, as do his officials, considering how on earth the Government of Canada will get the money it requires to fulfil its obligations. There never has been a social welfare program undertaken which has subsequently been diminished. Oh yes, it looks good to do these things, but it is like those people who buy automobiles which are beyond their means so they can drive to church and look a bit better than their neighbours, or take holidays which outdo their neighbours. All it means is they are sinking deeper into debt.

We have impoverished the Canadian nation to the extent that nationally we will bankrupt. The thing which bemuses us is the speed with which the carousel upon which we are embarked achieves that end. It is all very well for the government to bemuse the citizens of this country with bread on the one hand and circuses on the other. But the day comes when they have to be paid for, and there is no such thing as money in the sky. There is no magic money tree. Everything one spends has first to be earned. God only knows how it is that we have people in this country and elsewhere with the galloping heebie-jeebies who spend not only this year's money but also the money for the next decade as well. They will not be around to reap the whirlwind. Members of my generation, who came into this House 20 years ago and who, with a few exceptions, are no longer around here, can bear witness to the fact that we have before us a borrowing authority for $14 billion compared with the total budget of $6 billion of those days. At that time $6 billion was deemed to be inflationary. We know that the Walter Gordon years, up to 1967, were highly inflationary because the results of his policies came home to roost in 1968 and 1969.

I recall that in July, 1969, the Prime Minister gave an extraordinary television address which he repeated on occasion thereafter. This was shortly after he had become leader of his party. I remember that in October, 1975, he introduced wage and price controls. I recall that in 1978, right after he returned from the summit conference in Europe, the Prime Minister again moved into the economic field. These three intrusions were unmitigated disasters for Canada. The man did not understand the situation. He spent most of his time offering the people of Canada bread and circuses to bemuse them. Instead of fighting inflation at its beginning, he merely put down cushions here and there. One such cushion is the indexing of pensions. The government has indexed pensions to the point that they are now so much a part of the system that they cannot be removed.

What is the cost for these indexed pensions in the public service and the armed services? When we have almost come to the point of minute-by-minute indexation of social security, the GIS and the war veterans' pension, the government still says that it does not matter, that we can funnel it in and feed the boiler. But the hard decisions with regard to taking hold of the economy and advising the people that they must make sacrifices to turn the situation around, rather than loading it onto their neighbours, would not win one vote in a barrel of votes. We saw last year the absolutely disreputable way in which the proposal to charge 18 cents for a gallon of gasoline to pay off that absolutely inane, insane subsidy which we pay on gasoline and home fuel oils which we import from abroad was rejected.

In the interval the government imposes price controls on our domestic producers for a resource which is non-renewable. This resource is owned by those producers and by nobody else, but suddenly we have become conscious of sharing when we never heard of sharing before. I have never heard of sharing by making a claim of ownership on my neighbour's assets.

Organizations such as the OECD and the organizations which belong to it say that Canada's policy of paying billions of dollars—and it will escalate—to subsidize people to overspend and over-use petroleum products is the height of human folly. Yet, this administration persists in carrying on with the mistaken view that by keeping prices down we can compete abroad. The proof of the pudding is that those abroad who pay $3 and $4 a gallon for petroleum products are out-competing us in our own backyard.

Mr. Deans: Why?

Mr. Lambert: Because our unit costs of production are too high due to inefficiency of management, production, and distribution within this country and, in addition, in many instances we are a small market competing against the production of a large market. It is ridiculous. Why should the productive surplus of France, Germany, Italy and Japan be able to withstand the cost of transportation, even at the higher rates caused by the high price of transport across the ocean, come into our country and still undercut our own costs? All we have heard today is that this industry and that industry bleeds and import quotas are needed because the industries cannot meet the competition. It depends on whose ox is being gored.

Who says the automobile industry or the farm machinery industry in this country requires particular attention and support?

Mr. Deans: Me.

Mr. Lambert: Why does the textile industry require special support? Why does the furniture industry and the footwear industry require special support when they have the advantage of cheap fuel? This support does nothing but bleed us. The causes are elsewhere. The cause may be that there is too much time lost on down time due to industrial inaction, that management is golfing or curling too much or what have you. But the cost of production is there, and it is too high.

Or is it that our contribution to social services is too high and, as a result, the earning base is being asked to carry too heavy a load? I would warrant that within 10 years to 15 years the earning base of Canada, restricted to those people who are 16 to 18 at the beginning and 65 at the end, will find it such an onerous burden to carry social services for non-earners that there will be a social revolution. Those social services are in the system, and that is why we are asking for borrowing authority of $14 billion this year.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

• (1550)

Mr. Lambert: I hope hon. members will allow me to speak until the hour of adjournment.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: I appreciate the opportunity given to me by other hon. members, and I hope that on a future occasion I will have the same benign attitude toward their request.

Mr. Deans: It is not benign, it is benevolent.

Mr. Lambert: I have not been overly partisan. I commend to hon. members the articles written by Don McGillivray who, as a member of the Press Gallery, has become one of the country's most respected economic writers.

Mr. Evans: He seems to think so.

Mr. Lambert: I may not agree with him all the time, but we cannot all agree all the time.

Mr. Evans: He knows as little about economics as anyone.

Mr. Lambert: I should like now to refer to the promises made in the last election campaign by the Prime Minister. Each of the few he made when he was allowed out of wraps has been broken or not fulfilled. First of all, he said that the Liberals would manage more vigorously the nation's finances in order to make more effective use of taxpayers' money. He promised to keep government expenditure growth under the rate of growth of the GNP. The rate of growth of government expenditures this year will be 11 per cent or 12 per cent. The rate of growth of the GNP in real terms will hardly reach 2 per cent. That is promise number one.

I have to laugh at the second promise. "We will achieve energy security at a fair price for all Canadians." The only people who are paying for energy today are the people of the three western provinces and primarily my home province. Under this harebrained program we are paying close to $4 billion to equalize the price of imported fuel, while on the other side of the ledger we are encouraging people to consume. I am sure the hon. member from Miramichi will agree that it has to rank among the most asinine of government policies from the point of view of inflation and within the limits of borrowing authority when we have to go out and borrow $4 billion additional because we want to make the weekend driver feel more comfortable and let him burn more gasoline.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is not quite that simple.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. gentleman is twinned with Alberta, but ovbiously he has not been out there.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Oh, yes, I have.

Mr. Lambert: Then he has not listened to what the people have been telling him. I should like to invite him to spend two or three weekends in my constituency. I will let him listen.

The third promise the Prime Minister made was to develop an industrial strategy which would provide jobs, growth and increased Canadian ownership and control.

I know what the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) will speak about when his turn comes—industrial strategy. We have not seen one iota of industrial strategy from this government or a strategy which would promote jobs. We have seen a continuing increase in the number of jobs lost. In my province the foolhardy National Energy Program will mean that on a cumulative basis in this year we will lose some 40,000 high-paying jobs.

I listened to the fatuous remarks of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) when he tried to convince us by reading from Oilweek about the number of drill rigs that are working. They are working on contracts from last year, Mr. Speaker. When the new 1981 programs come into effect, things will be different. It takes time to dismantle a rig. How long can a rig stand idle? The minister should listen to the drill rig people. Incidentally, these people are Canadians. Over 90 per cent of the drilling equipment in this country is owned and operated by Canadians, but they are going south of the border. That is denied by the ostriches opposite, those super-ostriches. They would not know what a drill rig looks like or what a service rig looks like. They are being shut down, and the men who take them to the United States cannot work there because the Americans do not allow Canadians to enter their labour market. So these men will be a double burden on the economy. First of all, they are losing high paying jobs, so their taxes are lost, but they still have mortgages to meet, and in the past they have made contributions to their communities. When they return, they will draw unemployment insurance benefits. It is a double whammy against Canada's economy.

We are living in the never-never land of preoccupation with the dross of our constitution and not paying attention to inflation, unemployment, job creation and industrial policy.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Even though they are not now in the House, I should like to congratulate the government whip and his deputy for having corrected a rather disgraceful situation that obtained most of this afternoon. It is true that more than 20 individual members have been in the House from time to time, but for most of the afternoon we were far below a quorum. I was tempted to call it but did not. I hope we will have 20 members here until five o'clock.

• (1600)

Mr. Lambert: You can share that blame yourself, Stanley.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I cannot let the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) go without some reply. While it is true there may not have been 20 members in the chamber at any one time this afternoon, there are many members in the lobby. The rules certainly do permit those people to come in if a quorum is called. I would not want the hon. member to mislead the Canadian public—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair had no call for a quorum this afternoon. The discussion is not in order at this point. At this stage we shall proceed to private members' business.

[Translation]

It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING FILING OF RETURNS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to provide (a) an option for spouses to file either a one family form or two single forms depending on the tax benefit (b) a trigger mechanism which would eliminate the current discrimination against single parents who wish to work outside the home instead of remaining on welfare.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some hon. members may wonder why I have chosen to speak on income tax matters while we have an income tax bill before the House. I had no idea when I submitted this motion when it would be called. While it would perhaps have qualified under the rules of order to discuss it at another time, I am pleased to have the opportunity to do so this afternoon.

Both parts of my motion arise from letters that I have received from working people who feel aggrieved by our present tax system. Other members have spoken about the difficulties in our economy and the squeeze this puts on working people. I do not intend to go into that at the moment. However, I will say that even Canada's three support systems, the family allowance, the child tax credit and the tax-saving exemption, discriminate against those working people with families on low incomes. All these measures favour high-income people, as do many of the other systems we have for transfer payments—for instance, unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan, federal and provincial home owner grants, the RRSPs, and the mortgage deductibility proposal of the previous administration. If I need to document those charges, I do not think I would have any difficulty in doing so.

Both parts of my motion deal with the need for quality child-rearing in a child's formative years and with the inability of our present tax structures to deal adequately with these pressing family needs.

Dealing first with the idea of what is called a joint tax return or an aggregate tax system—in some countries an aggregate family tax system—under our present laws there can arise a situation in which one parent working and doing a lot of overtime with only one source of income for the family can pay a higher tax rate than if two parents were working and the children were in some other facility, such as child care, day care, or with a neighbour, which is the more likely case. This motion seeks to amend or relieve what I regard, as do many other people, as an unfair condition.

I have a constituent who is the only breadwinner in his family. He and his wife have decided that while the children are small it would be in their best interests for the mother to remain at home. That is their decision and I would like to underline that point. The man is employed as a switchman in one of the towns I represent. He receives what is considered an adequate wage. By working a lot of overtime shifts he has what is regarded by many as an excellent wage. However, if both husband and wife were working and their combined income totalled the same as his income alone, there would be a substantial tax saving.

What the act does at the moment is to discriminate against those families who prefer to have the mother stay at home and the father work overtime, compared to the situation where both mother and father are working and earning the same total income as the one-earner family. I shall quote briefly from a letter I received from my constituent. He makes some not too flattering comments about politicians and talks about the overtime he works. His letter, in part, reads:

Most politicians (who on the whole are better educated and more economically secure than the average wage earner) frown at people like me, simply saying I contribute to higher unemployment—

The paragraph goes on:

Politicians then turn face and complain of the lack of Canadian productivity in the labour force and yet, because I sacrifice my time with my family and work long, hard hours, I am consistently penalized in many, many ways by the government, without ever being given any incentive to work.

Here is a man who worked 80 overtime shifts last year, yet he is saying he has no incentive to work. He must have some, so I cannot agree with him all the way on that point. His letter continues:

Actually, the true welfare bums are laughing at my stupidity in being "Joe Citizen".

He goes on to recount what he does to earn his income. I will quote a few of the things that he had to say. His letter continues:

As a family unit, my wife cannot afford to work even part-time to supplement our income (instead of my working overtime) because:

a) her wages are much lower than mine (on my overtime)

b) she would not be a deduction on my income tax

c) daycare is overly expensive and negates her income.

He goes on to say how concerned he is about his own children and the strain it might be on his family with the mother working outside of the home. He goes on to say:

I pay more income tax on $28,000 because of my overtime than would a husband and wife earning $14,000 a year each.

He says that at his income tax rate, because he is the only one who works, he pays some $5,800 a year with all his deductions allowed, as opposed to $4,500 if he and his wife were making that same total aggregate amount.

He then talks about what tax write-offs there are for executives and business people earning the same amount. They have transportation allowances and various tax loopholes. I have alluded to some of them. He says these people work eight hours a day whereas he works 16 to 17 hours a day because of his limited skills. His letter continues:

I lose almost all of the child tax credit because I must work overtime. Of my 80 overtime shifts, in fact 30 of those went straight to the government in income tax. I can't get any transportation benefits.

He tells me he lives 30 miles from his job. That might have something to say for those of us who are rushing headlong to raise gas prices. He continues:

The politicians say you choose where you live in relation to your work so that's your problem, despite the low vacancy rates.

He says he prefers to live in a more rural area and drive to work. That is his choice.

I think I have made some case that the Income Tax Act does discriminate. I am also aware that the family aggregate method of filing income tax is not unknown in other countries. I am not saying that it is widespread. It may even be diminishing because it is in the government's interest to collect at least $1,300 more from that man than if both he and his wife were working outside of the home and had their children in some daycare situation.

I do not think I need say much more about that; it deals in at least some ways with the (a) part of my motion. I am calling for the government to consider giving people the option of filing a single form or a joint family form in the aggregate, whether or not the wife is employed outside the home, simply because it is just and fair. If you do not do that, you penalize a lot of people who have made the choice that either the father or mother will remain at home and be involved in child-rearing, either because that is what they like to do or feel they do that best. In case anyone thinks this is somewhat of a slam against those who choose otherwise, I assure them it is not; but the tax system certainly does not favour the spouse for the purpose of child-rearing.

The second part of my motion has to do with a deduction and the way we handle our child care and day care system. I will deal briefly with section 63 of the Income Tax Act having to do with child care expenses. You can deduct child care expenses as long as they do not exceed $4,000. There are other details, but it is essentially a deduction. I wish to underline the point that it is not a tax credit, but a deduction off the top. It is not $4,000 you pay out for day care on the bottom, but a deduction from your tax payable at the top. If your income is $10,000 and you have four children each with a $1,000 deduction, your tax would be based on $6,000 rather than the other way, the tax credit, which I do not need to go into in detail. Most members are aware that the tax credit is much more favourable, favouring lower-income people, than the deductability system. It is my view and the view of many others—is it the hon. member's view?

Mr. Deans: Yes.

Mr. Rose: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) shares the view that section 63 of the Income Tax Act does not, in terms of fairness, come to grips with the problem.

I have an independent study here. I will not quote from it at length. For an Ontario family of four with one child aged 12 and another 16, with a total income of $7,000 or less, the total benefits under the three family support systems I referred to earlier, the net family allowance, the tax savings for exemption and the tax savings for child credit, amount to $632. For the same Ontario family with an income of $50,000, the total benefit is $970. If that is not discriminating in favour of those with a higher income, I do not know what is. It is a fairly serious problem.

Forty-nine per cent of the women in Canada in the child-rearing years are part of the work force. Of those between the ages of 20 and 44, over 60 per cent are in the work force. They represent parents of nearly three quarters of a million children under six years old. These mothers are working. That is a lot of children who are looked after by some kind of arrangement, often private.

Only 12 per cent of those children are in government day care centres. Where are the other 78 per cent? They are usually with their grannies, with neighbours or somewhere else. Some of the facilities may be excellent, but most are inadequate. They do not have trained child care workers to deal with these children.

There is a woeful lack of facilities. There is also a bias in the Income Tax Act which needs to be changed. The tax deduction system rises with the level of income. I already alluded to that in the quote I just gave. If you have little or no taxable income, you have little or no deduction.

The cost of daycare in Canada averages between $2,500 and $3,500 a year. That is far too heavy a burden for many families. They have gone the babysitter route due to the cost of government sponsored facilities. This is a serious problem.

Most of the money spent by governments through federal-provincial cost-sharing programs goes to the needy. Eighty per cent is used to support single parents in need of day care. We need to change the tax system from one of deductibility to one of tax credit in order to help other low and middle-income families.

I have with me, again supported by a great number of people, the Project Child Care study sponsored by the Metropolitan Toronto Social Council. Here are some recommendations from page 39. I direct this to the attention of Toronto members opposite. They suggest that alternatives to implementing the goals behind section 63 would be to replace section 63 with a tax credit and, second, provide an adequate supply of subsidized daycare. They say more than that, but I will not read any more of this study because time is getting on. They should encourage care-givers to view their operations as a small business by providing clarification of permitted deductions and help with preparing income tax returns.

In order to make the deduction you need to have receipts. As the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) has said, there is a barter, an underground economy, in terms of tax or lack of tax collected through a cash system which does not allow for receipts. That is the reason it is done that way. That is why so few people can benefit from the deduction.

In both cases, the business regarding the joint return and the change in section 63 to allow for a tax credit, it is important because it has to do with tax advantages or tax discrimination against working people. I would be extremely grateful if the Department of National Revenue would study this and try to ameliorate some of these extremely serious problems on a personal level which have come to my attention. If my constituents are finding difficulty, I am sure the constituents of other members are as well. This is not like a $100 million incentive to somebody to poke holes in the Beaufort Sea; it is a very human and very important personal matter for Canadian families, both married and single parents.

In summary, I strongly recommend consideration be given to offering a choice to families whether to file a joint return, even if one spouse is not in the labour force, and to making a change from the $4,000 deduction which favours those with higher incomes to a tax credit which gives a half decent break to the lower-income earners of which, unfortunately, there are many in Canada.

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, the two separate propositions contained in the motion of the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) cover a great deal of territory. In particular, the proposal that we adopt the family unit as the basic unit for personal income tax is an idea that is a bit like Pandora's box: it involves a lot more than appears on the surface.

Before discussing this matter, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal first of all with the first part of the motion which calls for the provision of a trigger mechanism which would eliminate what my hon. colleague considers a tax discrimination against single parents who are seeking employment and want to work outside the home instead of staying home and remaining on welfare.

I think the general consensus is that any such discrimination is far from desirable. Our tax system should not make it difficult for single parents who are anxious to improve their situation to seek employment and eventually support themselves. Also, one should not conclude that it is distasteful or improper for single parents to remain at home and spend as much time as possible with their children so as to give them all the attention they require as well as a good family life. This is a most worthy cause which is fully supported by society. I do not think that the public would blame single parents who do this solely in their children's best interests. What must be emphasized is that single parents should have an alternative instead of their activities being hampered or restricted by discriminatory laws.

● (1620)

Having said that, I should add that the Income Tax Act does not create the kind of discrimination that seems to be referred to in this motion. I say "seems to be" because the motion is not clear.

There is a provision in the Income Tax Act which exempts from tax most welfare payments made on the basis of needs tests. This applies both to single parents and to all others receiving social assistance payments. However, I do not think it can be argued that the Income Tax Act is a deterrent to a single woman trying to get a paying job to support herself and her children.

[Translation]

Let us consider the basic exemptions and deductions allowed that woman as a wage earner; I will quote figures applying to the fiscal year 1980. Taking into account personal exemptions and other deductions like job expenses, unemployment insurance premiums and Canada Pension Plan contributions, a single person could earn up to $5,104 before having to pay income tax. A single person may also claim for a child the equivalent of a married person exemption. Thus, a single person with two children could earn a little more than $7,800 before having to pay income tax. I sincerely believe that a province would very seldom make welfare payments to single parents earning about $7,800 a year.

Therefore, it is not fair to say that the income tax system discriminates against single parents who are willing to seek jobs and forgo welfare. In fact, the Income Tax Act allows a single parent to deduct up part of his child care expenses while working. We provide assistance to make things easier for single parents willing to work outside.

[English]

Let me turn now to a discussion of the first part of the motion before us which proposes the adoption of the family unit as the basis for levying personal income tax. This is a complex question, as the hon. member knows. The proposal raises many important issues, not only economic but also social.

There are arguments that can be made on both sides of the question, but there is one aspect of this motion which I suggest should be rejected out of hand, and that is the idea that married taxpayers should have an option between two different tax systems.

The suggestion is that they should have a choice between filing as a married couple or as individuals, depending on which gives them the most favourable tax break. This is a very unsound principle to introduce into our tax system because it is essentially unfair. It would create a serious discrimination against single persons, who would not have the opportunity this proposal would give married persons, that is, to choose between tax regimes depending on which gives them the best benefit.

It has often been said before that our tax system must be a fair one and that taxpayers must feel that it is fair. Without that feeling of confidence in the system the self-assessment approach on which our tax system is based just will not work. It does not require much imagination by hon. members to picture the wave of complaints there would be from single taxpayers if they were discriminated against in this way. No one enjoys paying taxes, but the process is at least tolerable if we feel that everyone else is paying tax on the same basis.

Turning to the central issue of the family unit as the basis for income tax, I think we must recognize the complexity of the matter. Making such a fundamental change in our taxation system would have widespread repercussions. Our present tax system tends to reflect not only our economic priorities and our ideas of equity, but also to some extent our social system. The present system takes the individual as the basic unit for taxation. It reflects the historic social reality of the family unit in which there was one main wage earner.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is a tax table which applies to both single and married persons and which enables a married person to claim exemptions for his or her dependants. When a dependant starts earning income, the exemptions are reduced until such time the dependant makes enough money to pay tax on his own income. In fact, Mr. Speaker, a great number of regulations prevent the division of income so that two or more salaried persons in the same family cannot pay less tax by dividing their incomes among the members of the family.

We should recognize that our tax system has progressed in an effort to reflect the family and family income concept, and the best example is the child tax credit, a measure introduced by this government. But there are also other provisions in the Income Tax Act under which a spouse can take advantage of a transfer of income or deduction from the other spouse.

[English]

This growing legal recognition of the family as an economic unit has also been evident in recent years in some provincial legislatures which have acted to recognize the equality of the marriage partnership. For some people it might seem a logical extension to apply the same idea to our income tax, and to adopt the family unit and family income as the tax base. In fact, it is not that simple.

The Carter Royal commission on taxation recommended adoption of the idea and put forward a variety of principles it said should be followed in doing so. For example, it said that where an individual and a married couple have the same total income, the individual should pay more tax. But this proposal of the commission was not adopted in the eventual tax reform of 1972. One of the reasons was that, although the commission's various principles for family taxation were aimed at achieving tax equity, they also would have led to great complexities in our tax law.

Since the Carter commission reported, there have been other serious representations along the same line. Not long ago the joint taxation committee of the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants said married couples should have the option of filing joint tax returns.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this position is the subject of much controversy. Women's groups who work for equality of women are strongly opposed to a joint return for married couples, as they argue that such a system would benefit the wives. In a family where both spouses work, chances are that the wife's income will be lower than that of the husband, and under the present Income Tax Act, her taxes would be lower than her husband's. If their incomes are put together and taxed as a single income, the result would be that the husband would pay less taxes and the woman would no longer pay any.

● (1630)

[English]

Women's organizations are also concerned that adoption of the family unit for taxation could mean a working couple might be paying a higher tax on their combined income than they would if they were earning the same income as single taxpayers. This so-called "tax on marriage" is just one of the social repercussions at which we would have to look very closely before adopting the policy advocated in the motion before us today.

Mr. Rose: That is not correct.

Mr. Cousineau: I would ask the hon. member to listen to my remarks, as I listened to his.

Mr. Rose: You are very interesting.

Mr. Cousineau: I thought I was, but it seems I am not.

Mr. Rose: You are, you are fascinating.

Mr. Cousineau: This situation could grow even more complex when we come to write a legal definition of family. The tendency has been to think of the traditional family unit as husband, wife and dependent children. But in writing this new income tax law, there would be some tough questions when it comes to other family groupings. For example, there are common law unions. How should we treat adult brothers and sisters living together as family units? What about religious communities? All these units may be pooling their earnings and resources in mutual support in the same manner as the traditional family unit.

There are other questions which must be addressed. For example, where a spouse, generally a woman, works at home on behalf of the family, she is not generally paid for her housekeeping work, nor is any tax paid on the value of this contribution to the family. If we start taxing the income of the family unit, should we include the imputed value of these services? Many questions have been asked.

[Translation]

However, in closing, I would like to say that I do not pretend to know the answer to all these questions, but that all these arguments show what a complex social and economic impact the approval of this motion would have. On the other hand, and I ask my hon. colleague of the New Democratic Party to listen carefully to this, I believe that it would be premature to reject this whole concept of family taxation without giving it further consideration, as we would need a public debate before making such a basic change in our income tax legislation.

[English]

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take a great deal of time, but I want to speak about one particular aspect of the problem confronting families which go from being two-parent families to being single-parent ones. In particular I want to speak about a very hypothetical—but obviously real in terms of the numbers in the country—single-parent family, mother-led, and the problems confronting her as she goes about trying to hold together the family unit with which she has been left, for whatever reason.

I want to begin my comments by reiterating what my colleague said in his speech today. It is important that we attempt, in whatever way we can, to encourage people to be involved in the economics of their own lives. We want to encourage people, wherever possible, to be a part of the work force and to be self-sufficient. We ought not to place impediments in their way. We ought to ensure, when we look at the combination of income support measures, together with the possibilities of employment within the work force, that there are no impediments. We ought to ensure that there are no unnecessary impediments in the employment system, the tax system, mother's allowance or other programs and that we do not lock people into poverty as a result of the systems we create.

The trauma for a woman who is suddenly faced with the problem of raising her family by herself is immense. The difficulties she must confront are almost impossible for many of us who have not had the experience to comprehend. Therefore, I want to suggest that we should do whatever we can in order to encourage that woman to get over the initial difficulties, to go on from there and to take her place in the work force. She must provide for her family during the time they are living with her as well as for her security in the future.

I should like to refer to the mother's allowance system of the province of Ontario. It pays a base amount for the woman and for each child. A woman with three children would perhaps receive $600 per month. I am not suggesting that is the actual amount; I use it only for the purpose of this argument. As the children grow up, the amount is decreased. When the children reach ages where they are seen to be self-sufficient, or as each child leaves the home, the amount is decreased.

If a child earns some money or the woman obtains a part-time job, the amount is decreased. The problem with the present system is that the woman is locked in; she is not encouraged to work. If she goes out to work, the amount of her mother's allowance is reduced if her income exceeds a very minimal limit. In the final analysis, by the time she pays her additional costs, she is no better off working. But, in the long run she would be better off working if she could see hope down the road.

If a woman in her late twenties or early thirties is left at home with three small children, she is given an allowance which is just enough to make ends meet. Her budget does not include setting aside money for a rainy day, to cover the cost of hockey sticks and uniforms for the children, to pay for the children's trips to and from the science centre, if they do not live in metropolitan Toronto, or for their trips to other attractions which other school children attend. She has only what is required to meet her day to day, week to week, or month to month commitments.

When she looks at the possibility of employment, she discovers that the income she will receive, particularly if she is working part-time because she wants to spend some time with her children, is lost on the allowance side. Therefore she chooses to stay on mother's allowance during the time her children are small in order to rear them properly because, as my colleague said, there are no proper daycare centres. It is very difficult to find them in many communities. Then the woman is in a bind every time a child reaches the age of being considered no longer dependent, the amount she receives is decreased. So, after a few years, the amount she receives for her three children is decreased to the amount for two, but she is still basically responsible for the same rental and costs of the necessities of life. When her next child grows up, her allowance is based on only one child in the home, and when the final child leaves, she ends up not qualifying for mother's allowance. By that time, instead of being 28, 32 or 34, she could be 48 years of age. Then where does she go to find a job? Her marketable skills when she was in her twenties, with which she could have found some part-time work, are no longer saleable.

She was not given the opportunity to maintain or further develop those skills so that they would be marketable and useful throughout her life and when her children leave home. So, at the age of 48 or 50 she ends up without the skills to find a job of any worth, and in fact on welfare, where she never wanted to be in the first place.

We have devised a system which does not take into account the problems faced by the single-parent family.

• (1640)

Most of us here think it would be better for the future of the woman to whom I referred, for her retirement years if nothing else, if she was part of the work force and therefore eligible to receive a pension and live in reasonable comfort. But aside from all of that, there is a problem which the children have to confront, because not only do they not have two parents like other children, but they are also faced with the fact that insufficient income is coming to the family to enable them to take part in the kinds of activities in which other children in our society take part.

When my colleague raises such a matter as this one and suggests we take a look at it, I am pleased at the government's response that it will not reject it out of hand, because we in the House have to sit down at some point and take a look at the way we develop programs for the support of people, and we must recognize that there are people who, through no fault of their own, are placed in situations for which they could never have planned and which do not fit into the system which currently exists.

In the case I mentioned, there is no reason why we cannot find a way to assist, in the case of a divorce. She will have to take on the burden of looking after the children by herself, of being her own handyman, of doing all the things which previously two people did. In the case of marital discord, in many instances there is at least a certain amount of opportunity to share the burdens of day to day life. I am suggesting that we should find time to take a look at the Income Tax Act and compare its impact with the social service programs which are available in all the provinces of Canada and in the territories. We should weigh that against the deduction system that is available in the Income Tax Act, and we should try to devise a way which will, in the first instance, provide a sufficient amount of money in the period immediately after the family has broken up, through death, separation or divorce, and beyond that, find a way to integrate the social service program with entry into the work force to avoid dramatic reductions in income at a time when people are trying to find their way.

Also, we should attempt to co-ordinate what goes on across the country so that we can enable people to feel comfortable in the post-trauma period in the knowledge that they will not be faced with unnecessary hardship, that they will be able to meet their obligations, that they will be able to turn their attention to providing for their children and themselves and to meeting their obligations. At the same time we must make sure they are encouraged to seek out new training to find jobs or to upgrade their own qualifications to fit into the marketplace or to find part-time employment relevant to the employment opportunities of the day so that they do not become trapped by a system which, in the final analysis, degrades them.

In essence, that is what my colleague refers to in the second part of his motion this afternoon. At least that is what I see as being a major problem for families. It often becomes an even greater problem particularly when the mother is the single parent. It is another kind of problem when the father is the single parent because he is expected, by conventional norms, to stay at work. No one responds in a positive way to a father who suggests he should stay home with his children and raise them, even though, when asked privately, everyone can see merit in having someone at home with children in their early years. On the other side of the coin, the father is required to find assistance in raising the children if he cannot find a nursery or a pre-school program, and he has to pay for it out of his income. Even though a tax allowance is granted at the end of the year, he has to find the money throughout the year, at considerable personal sacrifice, in order to reach the point at which he can claim it in his income tax return.

I do not think we have given nearly enough attention to those problems. What happens is that this sits badly on the conscience of people, it worries their minds, and either they do not work well at their place of work or they do not provide well for their children because of their ongoing concern about trying to meet their obligations.

In my contribution to this subject I want simply to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we need more opportunities to address these kinds of problems. What my colleague has done today is open the door, thus allowing: for the consideration of one particular aspect of the problem of families as it relates to the income tax. I suggest that that door might be opened even further and that we should take a hard look at the difficulties of the mother who finds herself attempting to raise her children, who desperately wants to be a useful part of society and, who would like to work and use her skills and yet cannot enter the work force because she cannot afford it and is not encouraged either by income tax exemptions, employment opportunities or the social service system. In the final analysis, she ends up as a welfare recipient which, I might say, she never intended to be in the first place.

I hope that over the course of the next year we in the House might go, in more detail, into the integration of those systems, try to find out what happens in each province and how we can co-ordinate federal income tax provisions and federal assistance programs for employment in an attempt to rationalize them in order that every Canadian may be given the same kind of support when the same circumstances prevail and that every Canadian may be encouraged, in those circumstances, to believe that they will be back in the mainstream of society.

We would like to encourage Canadians to be self-sufficient, as most of them want to be, but they should also know that at least they have something on which to fall back in the event they are unable, temporarily or for some good reason, to meet their own expectations as well as those of others.

I certainly appreciate, Mr. Speaker, having had the opportunity to express my thoughts.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I found the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) to be somewhat confusing and perplexing, because I believe the hon. member was implying in his comments that there are some real points of discrimination against single parent families when the single parent is working outside the home, as compared to a person who is on welfare and by choice staying in the home to take care of children.

I know there are problems. Some of the social organizations have put before us their impression of what some of these problems are, and I think they have to be dealt with, but I suggest that the proper way to take care of these problems is not through modifications to the Income Tax Act because it seems to me that right now the Income Tax Act does not contain discriminatory provisions with regard to single parents, as was alleged by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

I have looked at the act and have been doing some work with respect to it as of late. I cannot find the kind of discrimination which the hon. member alleges. It seems to me there is no single provision in the act which distinguishes between a single parent working outside the home and a single parent who is home on welfare. I think the point, put by the hon. member was that perhaps there should be some discrimination in favour of a person going out into the labour force, if I am reading him correctly. If that is the case, I might have some difficulty with that as well, because I would not say that the tax system should discriminate in such a way that a single person who wishes to stay at home and raise children should be discriminated against and that this should be incorporated in some way into the income tax system. If we wish to do that as an explicit statement of social policy through the form of direct payment, that is one thing but it seems to me that a tax system should be as neutral as possible, and progressive at the same time. In other words, it should affect everyone in the same circumstances in the same way. It should not be used as a means of discrimination.

I know of a number of areas in which, over the years and through various forms of modifications to the tax system, possible areas of discrimination have crept into the tax system. I am sure hon. members opposite will bring that to my attention.

I agree with the hon. member's earlier comment that there should be a broad review of the whole income tax structure to ensure that it continues to be a good example of equity and giving equitable treatment to all Canadians who are in similar circumstances under the system.

As I was saying, there does not appear to me to be any discrimination in the act directly with respect to the two groups about which I was speaking, single parents working outside the home and single parents at home on welfare. To the contrary, there is a provision allowing for the deduction of expenses incurred by a single parent for the care of his or her child while that parent is working, within limits. So there is some provision there which would give relief to a parent who wishes to go outside the home to work. This provision is particularly aimed, of course, at helping single parents who wish to enter the labour force.

There is another provision under which a single parent can claim the equivalent of a spousal deduction for one of his or her children. The practical effect of this is to increase basic exemptions for such a person, thereby allowing higher levels of earnings to be tax-exempt, again encouraging entry into the work force.

I should also note that for both the single working parent and the single parent on welfare there is no difference in personal exemptions allowed. So there is no discrimination on that point.

The only other relevant provision in the Income Tax Act is an exemption provided for most welfare payments which are made on the basis of a needs test, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau). This provision applies to all recipients irrespective of whether they are on social assistance or whether they are single parents, working or not.

I suggest that if there are legal discriminations or discouragements against single parents getting off welfare and getting out to work, they do not lie in the Income Tax Act. As I said, there may well be problems relating to the way provincial programs of social assistance are applied and the way in which such payments are cut back to reflect job earnings of the person who has been on welfare. I think that is a serious problem. In some cases we see in our welfare laws mechanisms whereby if a person decides to take on work, earning additional dollars, there is a one-for-one offset against the welfare payment.

Effectively, if you are earning $6,000 or $7,000 a year on welfare and if you go out to work, for every dollar you earn you lose a dollar of welfare benefit. Where, then, is the incentive to work?

Mr. Deans: That is what I was saying.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says that is what he was talking about. The question I ask him is this: should the tax system take the approach that if a person is on welfare and if he goes out to work to earn additional money, those additional moneys should be taxed in a different way? I would like to address the subject of joint filing, about which the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) was speaking, in a moment, but let us suppose what I said a moment ago was the case. Let us suppose a husband is out earning $5,000 and the wife goes out to work. Then, effectively, you have a joint system set up whereby the family would be taxed as if it made $10,000. But if the person was on welfare and went out to work, you could have a system whereby that person, although they made $10,000 through welfare and through work, the welfare would not be reduced by the amount earned and the tax would not apply. So you could have a system of discrimination set up in that way.

Mr. Deans: We need to have another forum for discussion. There must be an exchange.

Mr. Evans: I agree with the hon. member, we should have another forum for discussion. I hope that opportunity will arise.

I would like to turn now to the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody with regard to the tax structure and the possibility of individuals being allowed the option of filing either jointly or as individuals. In some rare circumstances I can see where there might be an advantage if one were to have a system of joint filing as opposed to a system of individual filing. The hon. member put forward the possibility that this could be triggered on an optional basis, the choice being made by the individuals involved. The hon. member for Gatineau, who spoke earlier, suggested that kind of choice in our tax system—where the individual selects the tax base which is most appropriate or in his best interest, from the point of view of which method leads to the lowest tax—would implement in our tax system a basic form of discrimination, which I do not think should be allowed, and which he also did not think should be allowed. Either we have a system whereby individuals file separately or we have a system whereby individuals file jointly. It does not seem to me to be in the interests of equity to have a system whereby the individual can select the basis upon which he will be taxed, from the point of view of which system will provide the lowest rate of taxation.

Given the progressive nature of our tax system, though, two people filing separately, as the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody pointed out, versus the same two people filing jointly, will pay lower taxes under the current system. The current system is, in fact, more favourable to two people filing separately than it would be if those two people filed jointly, because of the progressive nature of our tax system and the higher marginal tax rates as income increases. So if two individuals earn $15,000 and file separately, then they will end up with more after-tax income to spend than if they filed jointly and were taxed as though they were earning an income of $30,000. That is the situation we have now. It seems to me that is advantageous to the individuals. Of course, to a single parent it really has no relevance because there is only one income in that situation in any event.

I am sure the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody would not suggest that two people earning the same income as one—in other words, two people earning $15,000—should pay the same income tax as one person earning $30,000. That would seem to fly directly in the face of the progressive tax system which we have instituted to promote equity. I am sure Canadians would not feel that would be a fair tax system.

STANDARDS FOR INSULATION CONTRACTORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the widespread complaints being registered about unscrupulous insulation contractors who are taking advantage of the CHIP program to defraud both the federal government and home owners, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That installers of insulation under the CHIP program be required to conform to the stringent standards of safety and quality including the minimum R-value rating, material restrictions, mandatory fire-stops, attic vents, electrical fixture shields and vapour barriers and that the minister responsible be hereby instructed to enter immediately into an agreement which would empower municipal building inspectors to certify all installations as a condition of approval of payment to any contractor from CHIP program funds.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXCISE TAX

CALL FOR RESCISSION OF TAX ON NATURAL GAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas price increases of natural gas drastically affect chemical and fertilizer prices which promote more summerfallow and less extensive use of land, which means less production, lower dollar return, less machinery purchased and fewer manufactured goods used, all of which tighten the cost-price squeeze on Canadian farmers and affect adversely almost every other industry in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That this House recommends strongly to the government that the natural gas excise tax be rescinded at the earliest possible time; and failing this complete cancellation of the excise tax, that the excise tax at least be cancelled where the gas is used in any form of agricultural production.

HEALTH CARE

RENEGOTIATION OF FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that at this particular time the province of Ontario is experiencing a strike in its health care system brought on by the financial starvation of the provincial health care system through mindless, callous restraints on the part of the government of Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That the federal government, in renegotiating the Established Programs Financing Act, put the health of Canadians first by (1) not negotiating with a view to compounding the errors of various provincial governments by trying to cut back on their own contributions to health care; and (2) assure this House that they will not act unilaterally at any time to reduce their contribution to health care.

POTATO PRODUCTION AND MARKETING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I should like to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the National Farm Products Marketing Council, in its December 15, 1980, report on potatoes made public today by the Minister of Agriculture, refers in a most serious manner to the occurrence of questionable marketing practices, that these are widespread, and that fear of reprisal prevented many producers from speaking at the public meetings which were held, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne):

That the federal government establish immediately a commission of inquiry into all aspects of potato production and marketing in Canada, as it promised to do during the February, 1980, election campaign.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS IN MATAPEDIA VALLEY, QUE.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the demonstrations and the revolt which occurred over the weekend in Quebec's Matapédia valley, and considering that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) seems unable to forget his personal rivalry with Quebec minister Bérubé, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

That the House give the minister one week to settle the conflict, otherwise he should be transferred to other duties where he will not have to deal with the government of Quebec.

BANKRUPTCIES

REPORTED INCREASE—CALL FOR CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that total bankruptcies in Canada are up 17.3 per cent in 1980 as compared to 1979, as reported by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and in view of the fact that individual bankruptcies are up 23.4 per cent and business failures up 28.9 per cent from a year earlier I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That this House condemns the government for its failure to show compassionate consideration to those many Canadians facing bankruptcy because of this Liberal government's lack of a comprehensive economic policy, in its recent budget, to deal with record high interest rates, record high unemployment, and record high inflation.

That this House calls on the Minister of Agriculture to receive the report of the National Farm Products Marketing Council on the establishment of an eastern Canadian potato marketing agency with respect, and to introduce legislation to establish a national Canadian potato marketing commission with supply management powers so that we can proceed to put in place a proper solution to the problems of the potato industry.

HEALTH CARE SERVICES TO JAMES BAY CREE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion. It appears that the province of Quebec has reneged on the terms of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act resulting in 6,500 Crees of the James Bay territory being virtually without medical services since October last. The act clearly states that, in the event of inconsistency or conflict, the federal government under the terms of the Indian Act is to resume responsibility for medical care to the Cree people. No such aid has been forthcoming. A number of Cree children died last summer due to an epidemic of gastroenteritis. The recommendations of an investigating team of scientists have not been implemented and thus we can expect more deaths in the near future. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House instructs the chairman of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to seek immediately a reference that will enable the said standing committee to investigate this disgraceful and unacceptable situation before more children needlessly die.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF MEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on an urgent matter respecting our Canadian beef cattle industry. In view of the government's decision, announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) last December 31, that no Canadian beef import quotas would be in place for 1981, and, further, in view of current heavy imports of U.S. fat cattle at 6,000 to 7,000 head per week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Agriculture take immediate steps to have his meat importation bill, C-46, introduced for a quick second reading debate and referral to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, so that a proper debate on beef imports can take place as a necessary step to the establishment of Canada's first meat importation act.

LOCATION OF AIRCRAFT ASSEMBLY PLANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has finally announced that Downsview is to get the new Dash-8 assembly plant. No matter how surprised 20 other cities were that they lost out to the three cabinet ministers from the York region, it came as no surprise to Peterborough. ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

REPORTED STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER FOLLOWING MEETING WITH BRITISH PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He will recall that on June 25 last, outside No. 10 Downing Street in Britain, he was asked:

So Mrs. Thatcher in fact said there would be no problems under any circumstances in giving British consent to patriation?

The Prime Minister of Canada replied:

She didn't say that and I didn't ask her to say that.

Could the Prime Minister of Canada tell us whether the House of Commons can accept as the truth his statement of June 25?

● (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have the transcript. May I just reread the question:

So Mrs. Thatcher in fact said there would be no problems under any circumstances in giving British consent to patriation?

Mr. McKinnon: Read it all.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, the Leader of the Opposition just read it all. I want to know what I said Mrs. Thatcher said. It is not customary, when I afterwards meet the press in a scrum, to go into any details about what transpired in a discussion between two Prime Ministers or two heads of government. I was following this line at that point. I was following it in agreement with the British Prime Minister, that we would not get into details on this question. That is the reason why, when I came out from Downing Street, I did not go into any details. I put my customary brave front on by saying that the package was so good that the provinces would agree, that I was a Liberal, I was optimistic and I was confident that this whole thing would go through. This is what I told the press.

I have since indicated that in the private meeting—and in this I am not purporting to speak for Mrs. Thatcher, I am speaking for myself—I made it clear to her that we would be proceeding with or without the consent of all the provinces.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister emerging from a meeting with another Prime Minister wants to say "no comment", he says "no comment". What this Prime Minister said was that the Prime Minister of Great Britain did not say there would be no problems under any circumstances and that he did not ask her to say that. That was his statement on June 25. We now have a different version of the truth here in the House of Commons today. The Prime Minister, again referring to the transcript of his remarks when he did not say "no comment" but answered specifically, according to documents released by his office, was asked the question:

Do you think that there could be any difficulty in Westminster if the Canadian provinces and the federal government themselves are still at odds over the situation?

The Prime Minister of Canada replied to that question by saying:

Well, that's a hypothesis that I didn't ask her to examine—

He said quite explicitly that he did not ask her to examine that hypothesis. He also said quite explicitly, "I don't believe she did examine it". Can we accept as being the truth that statement by the Prime Minister of Canada on June 25?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I can only ask the Leader of the Opposition to read on, where I said after the words he quoted:

I assured her that next September I will be meeting the premiers after a full summer of work and that we hope to come either in the fall or later in the course of the next year with proposals which, I hope, are a final recourse to the British Parliament to end this situation . . . I'm optimistic about that and I didn't ask her to speculate on any other hypothesis.

I was saying then what I have always said for the past ten years, that I hope to proceed without opposition from the provinces, that I hope to have a consensus. That is why in the past ten years we have never moved to Great Britain, because we did not have the unanimous support of the provinces.

I was still saying that publicly in June to the press and to others because I did not want to make it obvious then that we were not hopeful about consensus, that we were determined to go even if the consensus did not exist. This is what I was saying publicly to the press in scrums and in press conferences. I repeat, this is what I have been saying for the past ten years. I was saying I was a Liberal, that I was optimistic, that I was hopeful in the course of the summer the Minister of Justice and his opposite numbers would put the piece together. That is what I was saying publicly.

Privately, I have told the House that I warned Mrs. Thatcher that we had never had unanimity for 53 years and it was possible, indeed quite likely because we had a separatist government leading one province, that we would not get unanimity. I stand on that, Madam Speaker. I can only say that until Mrs. Thatcher is prepared to say the contrary, and my word must stand. If she says she will not comment because she will not reveal a confidence, I hereby authorize her to say the contrary, if it is true.

The House has been told, and I repeat it today, that I told her there would likely not be unanimity and I did not know if there would be full consent of the provinces, but that we would come nonetheless in September or at some point in the course of the following session. I recognized when I talked to the press that I was still putting on perhaps the show of hoping against all hope that, in spite of 53 years of failure to get unanimity, perhaps we would get it this summer.

● (1420)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister calls it a "show." Other people would call it other things when someone says one thing publicly and a different thing privately, which is what the Prime Minister has done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has made it clear, at least in public, that he did not ask the Prime Minister of Great Britain to examine the hypothesis of there being disagreement in Canada which, of course, was what resulted. Let me ask the Prime Minister a question about an apparent attempt at clarification that occurred. Can he tell us whether there has ever been a written request by the Canadian government to the government at Westminster to clarify in writing how Westminster would proceed with a joint resolution on the Constitution from Canada and, if there was such a written request, will the Prime Minister tell us both when the request was made and the reply was received, and will the Prime Minister table the written request and the written reply so that this House of Commons and the whole country will know if the reply was limited to assurances that the joint resolution would simply be presented, not passed, to the Parliament at Westminster?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as to the introduction to the question by the Leader of the Opposition, he reproaches me for saying one thing privately and another publicly. I ask him and the House, in fairness, what would the reaction of the provinces and the Leader of the Opposition have been had I come out of a meeting with the British Prime Minister and said: "We will act whether the provinces agree or not"? He knows very well—

An hon. Member: That's what you are doing anyway.

Mr. Trudeau: —they would have said it was a provocation; there they are already in June saying our Minister of Justice will fail, and so on. I said publicly what I hope still to be the case, that there would be an agreement between the provinces. I repeat, I did not say publicly—and even with hindsight I do not think it would have been wise to say so—that indeed we had speculated on the fact that some provinces might disagree with the package, because then I am sure we would have had howls from the premiers and howls from the Leader of the Opposition, as he has howled before, Madam Speaker, at what he called provocation of the premiers when we announced in advance that maybe success will not take place.

In so far as his question about the written request is concerned, I confess I do not remember any such written request. I will check my memory and with my officials to see if there has been a written request to that effect to the British Prime Minister or to any previous British prime ministers. I do know that I would not even ask for that. I just said that we would take it as required that if they get a request from the Canadian Parliament they will have no choice but to act.

An hon. Member: And the reply?

Mr. Trudeau: The reply was that she agreed with that.

Mr. Clark: Without extending this too long, Madam Speaker, I think in terms of preface the Prime Minister of Canada should follow one rule, and that is that the Prime Minister of Canada should tell the truth. That is the rule that should be followed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1425)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, as to the question of any communication I ask the Prime Minister also to check with his Secretary of State for External Affairs, who said yesterday that such a letter had been received. I refer to a request made and a letter in reply received from Westminster. What I now want to have from the Prime Minister is an assurance that, once the Secretary of State for External Affairs is proved to have been stating the truth yesterday in his television interview, that letter and any written request occasioning that response will be tabled here in the House of Commons so that everyone will know all of the truth and all of the nuances which existed in that exchange of correspondence.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked if we had made a request in writing and had received a reply, and I said I could not remember any. Now the Leader of the Opposition is asking something else. He is referring to a letter to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred. It was a letter from the British Prime Minister. In it she said in essence what every British minister has said—and what the Prime Minister herself has said since the beginning—that the trouble was with the timing, not with the substance, and that they had no doubt that with a request from the Canadian Parliament they would have no choice but to put it through. She did say, as I told the House Friday, that the ministers had been told in September or October that with a charter in the package it would be more difficult. That was the position the British Prime Minister took.

Mr. Clark: Will you table it?

DATE OF PREVIOUS DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH MINISTER

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my questions are also addressed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statements he has just made regarding the exchange of correspondence, I request that he table that correspondence.

I would like to ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister on what date or dates he last met personally with any member of the British cabinet, at which meeting, or meetings, Canadian constitutional matters were discussed. Who was the minister, or ministers, he met with, and where?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I could not give the exact date from memory. If the hon. member had given me notice I would have been able to tell him, but I believe it was some time in December. It might have been late November, but I think it was some time in December, and the minister in question was the then minister of defence, Mr. Pym.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, that is the meeting to which I am referring, the meeting which took place on December 19, 1980. At the meeting of December 19, 1980, in Canada between the Right Hon. Prime Minister and the Right Hon. Francis Pym, did the Prime Minister express to Mr. Pym the extreme concern in Canada about proceeding with the constitutional resolution as planned by the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, once again I want to point out to the House that it is not customary for me or, I hope, any of my interlocutories, to give details of conversations held in private between a head of government and another head of government or important minister on a visit to Canada.

I regret that this has resulted in some lack of candour in discussing afterwards with the press what took place in the case of Downing street. I would like to take the same attitude with regard to the meeting I had with Mr. Pym in December. I am prepared to break this rule if the House forces me to, as was the case with respect to my discussion with Mrs. Thatcher. I do not think it is proper. I think that if the British government had any doubts about the course of action we are taking, they would have told us that they would not pass the resolution if it contained this, that or the next thing, but that they would pass it if it contained something else. I personally do not think that would be a proper attitude for the British government.

● (1430)

That is also the way that the present British Prime Minister thinks and the previous British prime minister thought, and that is why it seems to me that, so far as we are concerned, the matter is now settled. The British have told us that they would receive a request from the Canadian Parliament and that they would act on it; that if the package contained certain things, it would take a little more time. But there was never any question that they would look through the resolution to see if it was well founded, justified or acceptable to them.

NATIVE RIGHTS

AGREEMENT WITH COMMITTEE FOR ORIGINAL PEOPLES ENTITLEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. On October 31, 1978, the government signed an agreement with the Committee for Original Peoples Entitlement to settle Inuvialuit land claims. In the January 16, 1981, edition of News of the North, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is quoted as having stated in a letter of December 24 to the federal government's chief negotiator that:

—some parts of the agreement-in-principle, signed between the Committee for Original Peoples Entitlement (COPE) and the government, are not acceptable to cabinet and must be changed before a final agreement can be reached.

It seems that this government intends to repeat—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Manly: —the awful mistakes of the past. Does the government intend to honour the agreement with COPE of October 31, 1978, and has any agreement been reached by cabinet to renege on the provisions of the agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I apologize but, not having been briefed on this question, I do not have the answer. However, I will be happy to transmit the question to the minister, who is on his way back from his home in Hamilton.

Mr. Manly: Surely, Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister would be aware of the decisions which had been reached in cabinet on that question.

Can the Prime Minister tell us what priority he and his cabinet colleagues place on the settlement of land claims, and could he tell us how the Government of Canada can expect to negotiate and settle the other outstanding land claims in the territories if they reneged on the only agreement that they have reached thus far?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks how intent we are on solving this problem. I think the intent is clear from the indication given by the Minister of Justice on Friday before the parliamentary committee that he would be prepared to entrench aboriginal rights. We are therefore giving the guarantee that it is our intention that these matters be settled, we hope by political negotiation or, if not, by the courts.

Mr. Manly: We certainly hope that the commitment to entrench aboriginal rights will not be taken away by any amending formula, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Manly: On Friday, the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin raised the question of the James Bay agreement and the reneging by the governments with regard to the health care provisions. I ask the Prime Minister: Is the federal government prepared to stand by the James Bay agreement and to respect article 14 of that agreement to ensure that the James Bay Cree have adequate health care?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not have article 14 at hand right now, therefore I cannot give a precise answer, but I can assure the hon. member that our government played a large part in the negotiation of the James Bay settlement. The then minister of Indian affairs and northern development, who is now Minister of Justice, had a hand in it and had one of his special assistants sit in at the negotiations on his behalf. Therefore, I can only say that what we have negotiated was successful and we intend to see that the undertakings are carried out.

PREVIOUS DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH MINISTER

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the Prime Minister must appreciate that, with the lack of candour to which he referred earlier—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —and in respect of the one-sided version of what actually went on in the past, we have not been informed of all that took place. I should like to get back to the meeting which the Prime Minister had with the British minister, the Right Hon. Francis Pym, on December 19, along with other ministers of the Canadian cabinet. I should like to ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister whether Mr. Pym informed any minister of the Canadian government that it was only on October 6 of last year that the British Prime Minister, Prime Minister Thatcher, learned of the Canadian charter of rights, that it was only on October 6 that she had learned of the possibility of legal action in Canada, and that therefore, according to the British Prime Minister, it might become extraordinarily difficult for Prime Minister Thatcher's government to deal with the Canadian constitutional resolution because these complications had arisen so late. Does the Prime Minister remember that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, since the hon. member spoke in his question about lack of candour—

An hon. Member: He was quoting you.

Mr. Trudeau: —I would point out to him that he lacked considerable candour the other day in the House when he said he had some evidence about the War Measures Act which would tend to prove that the government had bungled it. He has been chanllenged by the Solicitor General to submit that evidence, either privately or publicly, and, of course, he backed down, as is his wont.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, once again I must preface my answer by saying that I would prefer not to divulge the nature of the private conversation, but since the hon. member has obviously been informed of its nature—by whom, I do not know—and is asking us to table documents, and since the hon. member for Provencher said he had written proof of some evidence that the Canadian government had not asked what they said they had asked, I would ask him to table it, if he is so certain of his point.

To get back to the question, Madam Speaker, I am not surprised if the British Prime Minister told Mr. Pym, who would have told me, that she only knew the extent of the package on October 6, as, I believe, the hon. member said, because the package was only made public at that time. Until it was made public in final form, nobody knew, not even myself, exactly what would be in it. We knew what we wanted to be in it. We had been saying for years that it should contain a charter of rights and a patriation formula. We knew what we had asked the provinces in June to be in it, but we did not know all of that summer until the September meeting what in fact would be the final resolution, whether it would include family law, a charter, some provisions on fish or something else. We did not know that until the negotiations were finished.

In that sense, I cannot fault the British if they say they did not know for certain what was in the package when I spoke to the British Prime Minister in June; I did not know myself. What the whole country knew is what we hoped to see in it, and what the whole country knew is that we had told the provinces that we needed action, at least on the people's package, which included the charter, by September. That was clear, but it was not clear until we had tabled the motion. It was not clear to members of my own party what would be in that motion until the days before when we had discussed it in caucus and in cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Getting back to the question whether there was an undertaking to present the resolution to the British Parliament at Westminster or to have the resolution passed by the British Parliament at Westminster, would the Prime Minister clear up, as I am sure he is quite willing to do now, whether or not the British minister, the Right Hon. Francis Pym, said to any Canadian minister at the meeting of December 19 that the government of Westminster does not dispose but rather proposes, leaving the British parliament itself to dispose, particularly with regard to constitutional matters?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I certainly would not give my seal of approval to that exact quotation, but anyone who is acquainted with the free parliamentary system knows that to be the case. The Prime Minister of Great Britain and the ministers who spoke to our ministers may well have taken that view. When I said the message from them, since October, has been that they would never look at the substance but that they knew that if the substance was more complicated it would take longer to get through, that is not a threat of any kind. It flows from the knowledge of how parliaments work—that it takes longer to get things through when the government does not have the unanimous approval of the House.

INQUIRY WHETHER CHARTER OF RIGHTS DISCUSSED

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask further questions of the Prime Minister about that meeting of December 19. We seem to find that material is running counter to what the Prime Minister has said heretofore. I would like to ask him if the Mr. Pym on that occasion advised the Prime Minister that members of both Houses at Westminster would be reluctant to do something which they felt was up to Canadians to take care of, notably, the charter of rights?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand what the hon. lady means when she says that what I am saying now runs counter to what happened at the December meeting. Would she please elaborate?

Madam Speaker: A supplementary question for the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, this is not a supplementary question; I am simply putting my question again.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister—if members on his side would like to listen—whether the Right Hon. Francis Pym advised the Prime Minister that members of both Houses in Westminster would be reluctant to do something which they feel is up to Canadians to take care of, notably, the charter of rights?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. lady withdrew the preamble of her previous question because it was quite inaccurate.

Mr. Pym and I did discuss this matter. The attitude I took with him is one which I have taken constantly in the House. That is to say, every amendment since 1867 passed in Great Britain concerning the British North America Act, first had to be discussed and passed in this House. This is what is happening with this amendment. Not only was it discussed in this House but it was considerably amended by a committee of this House. Therefore, the British could not and should not take the attitude that they were being asked to do something which this House did not do. This House is precisely passing on the charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Since the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands simply repeated her question I will allow her a supplementary question.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. My supplementary question is with regard to this same meeting. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the present Canadian court proceedings were discussed with the Right Hon. Francis Pym. If so, did the Prime Minister say that the thing to do was to act as if everything was all right, and then if the court decision were to be unfavourable to the government, the matter would be discussed again?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I pointed out to Mr. Pym that the courts were being used by the provinces as a tactical ploy to obtain a delay. I substantiated that by—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat my assertion in this House. The reason I said that is that we have six provinces wanting to contest the matter before the courts. The hon. lady shakes her head as if to say no. She will, at least, have to admit that that is right; six provinces are contesting it before the courts. Three of them are doing so with different questions. They are staging it so that it will all come out in a length of time. They have not been able to agree among themselves what questions they would ask. They have not been able to agree whether they would do it before one court, three or six. They have not even been able to agree on the timing. But they are not anxious to receive the answers quickly. They want to have the answers to one question before the other court studies the second series of questions, and so on.

This, to me, Madam Speaker—and I am just repeating my conversation with Mr. Pym—smacks of using the court to obtain political delay. When you do not have the courage to go to the people, and tell them that you do not like the substance, you do as the official opposition is doing; you discuss the modalities and the procedures because you know that on the substance you must agree with the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EDUCATION

POSSIBLE CUTBACKS IN UNIVERSITY FUNDING

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, that is the most applause I have received in a long time! My question does not have to do with the machinations of the "Tory International" but with matters affecting Canada.

My question is for the Minister of Justice who is also Minister of State for Social Development. It concerns recommendations which are before the social development committee of cabinet at this very moment. I would like to ask the minister whether or not there are proposals before that committee which would have the effect of cutting $1.5 billion of federal funding to our universities and over $500 million for both hospital and medical care. Can the minister tell us whether it is the view of the government that it has the power unilaterally to amend the established programs financing legislation without negotiating with the provinces and without dealing with the groups in question?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance answered that question in the House last Friday and I have nothing to add to his remarks. Those programs of course are always under government review and time comes when they must be renegotiated, so the Minister of Finance explained the government position concerning the renegotiation of those agreements with the provincial administrations.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I know the minister has other preoccupations; we are all aware of that. Nevertheless, there is a matter before a committee of cabinet which involves a very substantial question with regard to services which are to be provided to Canadian institutions right across the country from Newfoundland to British Columbia. He is the chairman of that committee. I think we are entitled to receive answers from him, not the non-answers we received from the Minister of Finance on Friday.

Are there proposals before this committee which would have the effect of substantially changing the responsibilities of the Government of Canada for post-secondary education? Can he at least give us the assurance that there will be no unilateral changes on the part of the federal government until such time as the parliamentary task force has had an opportunity to discuss the changes which the government is contemplating?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, some of these agreements with the provinces will reach maturity soon, at which time they will have to be renegotiated. We are looking into that matter right now. When the time comes we will negotiate with the provinces. At that time this House will be informed of the government's position in those negotiations, but it is completely premature to speak about it now.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MATERNITY BENEFITS—INQUIRY WHETHER AMENDMENT PLANNED

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It has to do with the eligibility requirements for maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. In view of the fact that in 1980 an estimated 17,000 women were denied maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, even though they were eligible to receive regular benefits, would the minister inform this House if there are plans to amend the act in order to provide expectant mothers in the labour force with an equitable law? If so, when does he propose to proceed with a bill to amend the present act?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I have indicated in the House before, there is a review of the Unemployment Insurance Act being presently undertaken. The findings of that review are now being considered. Certainly the issue of the "magic ten rule" relating to maternity benefits is a major topic in that review. I hope to have results some time this spring which could be made public for consultation with interested groups and members of the House. As soon as we come to an agreement with respect to the direction to take in the unemployment insurance area, certainly in the area of maternity benefits, we would then be prepared to propose legislation. I do not see that happening until we have had an opportunity to have some form of public consultation.

INQUIRY WHY RESOLUTION NOT REFERRED TO SUPREME COURT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Given the Prime Minister's replies in the House today to the effect that the provinces were using the courts as a delaying tactic and that he conveyed this impression to the British minister in December, why did the government not accept the option of short-cutting this so-called delaying process and refer the matter to the Supreme Court, as it did in the case of Bill C-60?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, for the very simple reason that we do not believe that it is up to the courts to decide this question, but that it is essentially a political question. That is the position of this government. What I did say to Mr. Pym, although it was not part of the answer I gave a moment ago, was that once the BNA Act was patriated with an amending formula and a charter of rights, any citizen can attack, if he wishes, any law which he believes to be ultra vires or illegal in some way. He can go to the Supreme Court and it will decide whether any part of the law is ultra vires. The courts make such decisions constantly. I believe there are some 30 cases before the Supreme Court right now dealing with constitutional matters. This matter would merely constitute one more case. If a citizen or a group of citizens does not want to be bound by the charter and wishes to prove that the charter is not legally binding, they can always take action in the courts.

Of course, our view is to the contrary, and all precedent is to the effect that when the Parliament of Canada submits a request to the British parliament, the British parliament has no choice but to pass the resolution in the form presented by the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, regardless whether the government looks upon this matter as a political question or a question of law, the fact remains that six provinces have decided, on a question of law, on the question of the process, to take the federal government to court. The point I wish to make is that the federal government could have taken the question to court itself as it did in the case of Bill C-60, and the question could be based on the unilateral process of the government.

Did the Prime Minister discuss this with the British minister? Obviously, if he were to convey the impression that the provinces were using the courts as a delaying tactic, then the obvious question from Mr. Pym or from anybody else would be, "Why don't you take it to court?" Whether or not that question was raised, did the Prime Minister tell the British minister why the government was not taking the matter to court itself?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I just told the hon. member why we were not taking the matter to court.

Mr. McGrath: I know, but did you tell the British minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I cannot recall whether or not I told the British, but I am prepared to tell them now that this is our view. In so far as the comparison to Bill C-60 is concerned, the point raised by the hon. member has been made before and I have answered it before. Bill C-60 purported to have the federal government, within the powers it has under Section 91 of the Constitution, do certain things within its jurisdiction. Until that time we had believed that amendment respecting the Senate was under federal jurisdiction. When we were challenged that perhaps section 91 did not authorize us to change the Senate as a matter of federal jurisdiction, I said that I was prepared to test that contention in the courts. It is up to the courts to interpret Section 91 as it is written.

This is our position and it will remain as our position when the charter of rights is brought home. If the courts want to interpret the charter of rights and believe that it is ultra vires, I will stand by their judgment. But first let us get the charter and the Constitution to Canada so that the courts in Canada may say what they believe is the law.

Oral Questions

PROCESSING OF RESOLUTION THROUGH BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my spontaneous question is also for the Right Hon. Prime Minister, but first I would inform my colleagues that the print is so small that I will have to use my glasses to read it!

Was the Prime Minister informed by Mr. Pym that any judicial challenges to the constitutional resolution might well be crucial with respect to the processing of the resolution through the British Parliament with the charter of rights attached? That is a specific question and I would invite the right hon. gentleman to give as concise an answer as possible.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, until now the questions asked have been with regard to what I told Mr. Pym or what I told Mrs. Thatcher and so on. I repeat, I hesitate to tell the House what Mr. Pym told me. If Mr. Pym wishes to say publicly anything which he told me, then I will release him from any secret to which he may think that he is bound. But it is not entirely proper for me to be the spokesman for Mr. Pym. If the hon. member insists and ask his question a second time, then I will assume that I must answer.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, this sudden concern or sensitivity for the conventions and proprieties with regard to the Constitution comes as a welcome surprise to us all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: No doubt the right hon. gentleman will find the proper occasion to inform the press with tongue in cheek of exactly what Mr. Pym said. Did the Prime Minister express the view to Mr. Pym that there would be many more challenges to the resolution following the challenges presently before the courts? Would the Prime Minister, despite his sensitivity to convention, let us know the answer to that question?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about my sudden concern for constitutional proprieties. This is not a constitutional propriety; it is a rule which I have adopted since I became Prime Minister and the press knows that well. When asked about a private meeting, or about a federal-provincial conference held in private, I am generally quite free in saying what I say, unless it is agreed that the conversations would not be revealed.

Mr. Fraser: Tongue in cheek.

Mr. Trudeau: But I have rarely broken the rule of revealing what somebody else has said.

Mr. Fraser: Just the version of what you said.

Mr. Trudeau: In these cases, I always refer the press to somebody else. If somebody else, either directly or indirectly, has informed the hon. member of what was said and the hon. member is asking about what was said, I repeat, I would want to make sure that that person does not mind the comments being repeated. If Mr. Pym or Mrs. Thatcher wish to make their position clear, then it is up to them to do so.

Mr. Fraser: Perhaps you would like an adjournment.

Mr. Trudeau: No. However, even with the help of my glasses, I cannot remember the end of the hon. member's question. Perhaps, Madam Speaker, you would allow the hon. member to ask his question again.

FISHERIES

INDUSTRY AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—INQUIRY RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It relates to the announcement made on January 19 with regard to the industry and labour adjustment program. In recognition of the serious difficulties in the auto industry and the anticipation of other difficulties arising throughout Canada, does the minister anticipate that some of the money allotted to that program will be provided to retrain fishermen who own vessels and shore workers in the fishing industry of British Columbia who, due to serious financial difficulties, are being driven out of the industry? Could the minister find some means by which a portion of those funds could be allocated to the British Columbia fishing industry in order to alleviate some of the difficulties there?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the committee of deputy ministers assigned the responsibility of developing the criteria upon which the program would be implemented is presently at work. I will take the hon. member's reference to the problems faced by some of the communities in the fishing industry, refer it to the committee and ask it to determine whether these problems are applicable under the criteria being developed.

Mr. Miller: My supplementary question is to the same minister. The minister has received representations from various fishermen's groups and probably also from individuals and Members of Parliament, particularly those on this side of the House. These questions are in regard to the serious difficulties that fishermen encounter in becoming eligible for UIC payments and the difficulties that those who are eligible to collect encounter in obtaining the benefits. People wait eight, ten or 12 weeks for benefits that they are legitimately entitled to.

I should like to ask the minister if his department has determined any mechanism by which they can streamline the method of dealing with the claims of fishermen, and in order to alleviate some of the workload in fishing communities that make claims, can some mechanism be established to train additional agents so that claimants can receive what is due to them immediately?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has raised a very serious problem. I have had discussions with my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans concerning that particular issue and we hope to be able to find a solution shortly.

INQUIRY WHETHER BRITISH MINISTER SUGGESTED SUPREME COURT REFERENCE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, with the permission of the Right Hon. Prime Minister I should like to come back to the exchange that took place between him and my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South regarding the meeting he had with the Right Hon. Francis Pym. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, during the fascinating discussions they must have had, both being experts on constitutional law, Mr. Pym suggested to him that it would be helpful to have a reference to the highest courts in Canada on the important constitutional questions, because members of parliament in the United Kingdom were a bit uneasy about adjudicating or passing judgment on Canadian law.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is a repetition of the previous question. I think it is probable that Mr. Pym said words to that effect. I took them to mean exactly what they convey, that it would be easier for the backbenchers in the United Kingdom to vote on this measure if it had the blessing of the courts. My answer to this line of argument has always been the same: it is not for the British front or backbenchers to judge whether what the Canadian government and Parliament is doing is right or not.

Mr. Clark: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: At long last!

Mr. Trudeau: My case stands, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: So does ours.

Mr. Trudeau: I hope hon. members opposite will read the blues and see what they are applauding so vigorously.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, may I ask the right hon. gentleman briefly about his proposition that this is a matter of politics and not of law. Would he not agree that, regardless of which country adjudicates this important matter, it would be better to do so in the highest Canadian court rather than on an ex post facto basis, leaving the burden to some citizen as the Prime Minister said, to meet the legal expenses, and to consider these very important matters when they are really not as relevant as they are now, before these important steps are being taken?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, that is the question I answered earlier when I said that this is a political matter. It is our view that it is for the Canadian people to judge what we are doing, not for the British people or British parliamentarians. The courts themselves will only judge when a matter is law; they will judge whether it is within or without the law. But this must be done in Canada, Madam Speaker. I submit that even the party opposite believes this because—

Mr. Clark: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: —when the hon. member for Provencher stated the position on behalf of his party, his position was prefaced—

Mr. Clark: We believe it but you don't.

Mr. Trudeau: —with the following words, Madam Speaker. I do not quote the exact words—

Mr. McGrath: Get it straight, now.

Mr. Trudeau: —but he said that the patriation was wanted by popular will, that the amending formula was wanted by the popular will of Canadians, and that the charter was wanted by the popular will of Canadians.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Epp: In Canada!

Mr. Trudeau: In Canada.

Mr. Epp: Done in Canada!

Mr. Trudeau: Done in Canada, Madam Speaker. That is why this House is doing in Canada exactly the things that the hon. member says it should be doing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have notice of a question of privilege but is the hon. member for Yukon rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Yukon on a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, my point of order concerns House business which might assist in future planning. The government House leader will be aware of the ruling of the chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada which has been widely exposed by the public media, and which stated categorically that the report from the committee will not be amendable in a substantive manner in the House.

I should therefore like to ask the government House leader if the government intends to proceed by way of a concurrence motion in the report of the committee and thereby deny the House the opportunity it would have, in the case of a bill or of a straightforward resolution, to move amendments?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of that ruling of one of the co-chairmen of the joint committee. Furthermore, it is very difficult to reply to this question since I do not know what is in the report of the committee. Finally, I am quite willing to meet with the House leaders if they want to see me about this matter. Perhaps they can give me an answer to the suggestions that I made as early as October concerning the form of the final debate on our constitutional package.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Arising out of that response, the government House leader will recall that last November he discussed with opposition House leaders the possibility of a special procedure which would recognize that we will not be dealing with a normal committee report but with one which is legislative in its effect. Does the government House leader have under consideration a special process whereby the proposed resolution could be dealt with in an orderly fashion, with amendments proposed in an unambiguous, straightforward manner?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: As I have just told my colleague, I am quite willing to discuss these matters at a private meeting, but not on the floor of the House. I had already begun discussions with the Progressive Conservative and New Democratic Party House leaders last fall. They even received material to submit to their respective caucus. I still have not received a formal answer. However, I am willing to meet with them again to discuss the form of the final debate on the Constitution at any time this week.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, after you have dealt with the question of privilege of which you have been given notice, and while I am considering that response with respect to a further point of order concerning House practices, I will simply give you notice now that I will be raising the question later this day.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NEIL—STATEMENT MADE BY CABINET MINISTER IN SENATE

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with respect to certain remarks made last Thursday evening by a minister of the Crown, namely, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is a statement which I believe affects the rights and privileges of members of this House. I will quote his remarks in a moment, but at this time I would indicate that the minister attempted to tie in members of the Conservative party with the separatist movement in western Canada.

As all hon. members know, a feeling of separatism is or has been building in western Canada. It is based on policies put forward by the government over the past several years, such as the arbitrary imposition of the metric system, gun control legislation, the attempt to repatriate the constitution unilaterally and, of course, the energy policy. These policies have caused a feeling of frustration and deep resentment which has never before existed in my part of the country. Naturally there have arisen individuals and groups in the west who have joined together in an attempt to bring their concerns to the attention of the government and of the people of Canada.

Among these people, of course, are some who have considered the possibility of separatism. In my area there are people who have expressed their concerns their frustrations, and have indicated to me their feelings of helplessness and their fears for the future of our country. I have spoken to many in this respect, and among all I have spoken to have found only one who espoused the cause of separatism—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has already spoken for five minutes and I still do not know what the question of privilege is all about. I wish the hon. member would come to that very shortly and then present his arguments to prove there is a question of privilege. I would then be able to judge the value of the question of privilege. It has been five minutes now and I still do not know what is the question of privilege.

● (1510)

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, I was simply trying to give the House and the people of Canada some background of the feelings which exist in western Canada. I will come to the statement to which I am referring.

Last Thursday evening in the Senate the hon. minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, as recorded at page 1608 of the Senate Hansard, made certain remarks which, as I have indicated earlier, attempted to tie members of the Conservative party into the separatist movement in western Canada. He was talking first about the Crow rates. I will not go into his preliminaries, but the Senator went on to say this:

> We are not going to get any support from western provincial governments or the opposition when we start down this road. All I said to the grain producers and the livestock producers, who have so much at stake, was that if they could agree among themselves on the stand the government should take in regard to a change, if any—and I am not sure there should be any change—then that would be a much more satisfactory way to proceed then to send a task force out in orbit, only to have provincial governments and the Conservative party saying, "Well, aren't we in great shape? We have the Constitution out there and we can really raise hell about that, and we can get our separatist meetings going with prominent Conservatives."

A little later he went on to say:

I have always been a Canadian. I think it is a good country and the Tories can flirt with separatism, their members can be converted, and they can send well-known Tories to stir up a separatist meeting for Knutson out in Saskatchewan—that's okay with me. I am a Canadian, and I will stay that way.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I do have to interrupt the hon. member now because I know what the basis of his question of privilege is, namely, a statement made in the other House. I must remind him of citation 314 in Beauchesne, which reads as follows:

The rule that allusions to debates in the other House of the current session are out of order, prevents fruitless arguments between members of two distinct bodies who are unable to reply to each other, and guards against recrimination and offensive language in the absence of the party assailed; but it is mainly founded upon the understanding that the debates of the other House are not known.

The other House obviously has rules to deal with its own questions of privilege. Therefore, those questions arising out of debates in that House should be dealt with there. I do not feel that I can hear the hon. member's question of privilege on the basis of this quotation and of those rules.

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, through no fault of ours the government has chosen to name ministers who sit in the other place. It seems to me that under these circumstances we have no redress with respect to any comment that they make.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does have redress and if he has a question to ask in the House about matters relating to the responsibilities of ministers who sit in the other House, even though there are ministers sitting in the other House, this is not a precedent. This procedure has taken place before. The rules provide well for any problems arising from this kind of a situation and that, too, is not an argument.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I have had an opportunity of considering the response of the government House leader to my questions concerning House practices and House business. In his absence I would ask his parliamentary secretary to convey to the government House leader that if he were to call a House leaders' meeting as he suggested, then he would find both myself and the hon. member for Winnipeg-North Centre in agreement and that that House leaders' meeting, we suggest, should be held tomorrow so that discussions at that meeting can be discussed in our weekly caucus. In summary, we would like that House leaders' meeting tomorrow.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I will take those representations and convey them to the President of the Privy Council. I am somewhat surprised, as perhaps the President of the Privy Council will be, that this surfaced on the floor of the House today since our position was well known since last October when we had discussions. I would think that perhaps this occurred in the absence of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, and perhaps the hon. member for Yukon was not fully aware of the discussions that had been held. Nevertheless, I am sure that we can sort out the matter. Indeed we must, before the end of the week.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I was here throughout that whole debate. What was said during that debate about the manner in which this resolution is to be handled at report stage and at third reading is the reason that I am afraid of the practices which the government is possibly going to adopt and that is precisely why I would like a House leaders' meeting tomorrow.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,712, 1,725, 1,742, 1,820 and 1,906.

IMMIGRATION FROM BRITISH ISLES AND REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

Question No. 1,712—Mr. Stewart:

1. For each year 1975 to 1979, what was the annual quota for (a) immigration (b) immigrants from the British Isles and the Republic of Ireland?

2. For the same years, how many applications for landed immigrant status were made by applicants from the British Isles and the Republic of Ireland and how many were (a) accepted (b) rejected at the interview stage or any succeeding stage of processing?

3. For the same years, what was the total number of landed immigrants from the British Isles and the Republic of Ireland?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. There was no annual quota set either for immigration or for immigrants from the British Isles and the Republic of Ireland.

2. Applications for landed immigrant (permanent resident) status:

	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979
British Isles	29,024	19,775	15,651	9,412	12,409
Republic of Ireland	1,334	635	540	519	625
	30,358	20,410	16,191	9,931	13,034

(a) Applications Approved:

	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979
British Isles	11,625	9,279	7,424	5,632	8,345
Republic of Ireland	527	398	343	270	446

(b) Applications Refused:

	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979
British Isles	17,399	10,496	8,227	3,780	4,064
Republic of Ireland	807	237	197	249	179

3. Total number of landed immigrants:

	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979
British Isles	34,978	21,548	17,997	11,801	12,853
Republic of Ireland	1,098	639	571	469	553
	36,076	22,187	18,568	12,270	13,406

NOTE: Because one application is often made for many people (i.e. members of the same family), the total number of approved applications (2)(a) does not represent the total number of landed immigrants actually admitted to Canada in any given year(3).

NUCLEAR AND GAS-TURBINE ICEBREAKER

Question No. 1,725—Mr. Herbert:

1. Was approval given in March, 1978, for the design of Canada's first combination nuclear and gas-turbine icebreaker and, if so, to whom was a contract issued and in what amount?

2. Has the design been completed and, if not, on what date will it be completed?

3. Will the icebreaker be in operation by 1985?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Supply and Services and Transport as follows:

1. Yes. No contract has been issued for the design.

2. No. It is estimated that the design will be completed within 30 months after the contract award.

3. Due to long lead time required for design and construction of a nuclear/gas-turbine icebreaker, it will be impossible for such a vessel to be in operation by 1985.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,742—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): (a) $4,243,000; (b) and (c) $3,672,000.

NOTE: No breakdown available of (b) and (c) of the question because the information we have is by reporting object which includes publications and other information.

LEAP PROJECTS CONTRACTED TO CONSULTANTS

Question No. 1,820—Mr. Orlikow:

For (a) 1978-79 (b) 1979-80, by province and territory, how many LEAP projects were contracted to private consultants and what were the salaries paid to the consultants?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): (a) and (b) LEAP projects are not contracted to private consultants.

Some LEAP projects contract with private consultants for a variety of services. No central register of such contracts is maintained.

DND CONTRACT WITH CANADAIR LTD.

Question No. 1,906—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence place a $50,000 contract with Canadair Ltd. for a field services representative to provide support for the CF-116 Freedom Fighter Aircraft Program and, if so (a) what support will the field services representative provide (b) for what period of time does the contract cover (c) are the contracts awarded on a continuing basis and, if not, how often are they awarded?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The contract was awarded by the Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence.

(a) The field service representative provides the following support services:

serves as a technical consultant to the Director of Aeronautical Engineering Maintenance (DAEM) at National Defence Headquarters (NDHQ); assists in evaluating technical publications, correspondence and messages;

affords rapid liaison between the contractor, Canadair Limited and DAEM/NDHQ on technical problems, flight safety matters, special investigations and fields queries; assists logistics cells and specialist personnel at NDHQ on technical problems arising out of operation and maintenance of the aircraft and aircraft systems; assists in supply matters by identification of equipment and spares; assists DAEM staff in reviewing technical correspondence exchanged as a result of the tripartite agreement to determine CF-116 (CF-5) applicability; receives, collates and maintains for quick reference all technical information emanating from the contractor or field FSRs relating to the CF-116 (CF-5) aircraft.

(b) The period of time covered by the contract is April 1, 1980, to March 31, 1981.

(c) The contracts are awarded annually on a continuing basis provided an approved requisition defining the services required is received from the Department of National Defence.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 177 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 177 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

GOVERNMENT PRESERVATION OF ARTIFACTS

Question No. 177—Mr. Friesen:

1. Have any departments or agencies of the government, conservation facilities for the preservation of artifacts of any description and, if so (a) where are these facilities located (b) what is the square footage of each facility (c) what does each facility do in specific terms (d) how many persons does each facility employ (e) how many conservators does each facility employ (f) do any of these facilities assist private individuals or agencies with conservation problems and, if so, how (g) what was the budget for each facility for (i) 1977 (ii) 1978 (iii) 1979 (h) are any of these facilities (i) rented (ii) leased and, if so, at what annual cost (i) what is the estimated value of the equipment used by the conservation personnel in each facility?

2. Is there any body or agency which co-ordinates all of these facilities and (a) if so, how many persons does it employ and how are they chosen (b) if not, for what reason?

3. How many of the conservators employed in each of these facilities were trained in Canada?

4. Do any of these facilities take advantage of the preserving capacities of the climate in northern Canada and (a) if so (i) what is the nature of these facilities (ii) with which "southern" facility are they affiliated (b) if not, for what reason?

5. Are any of these facilities set up with the sole purpose of developing conservation techniques to be employed in restoration of items deteriorating due to unique Canadian problems?

6. Have any of these facilities produced written material for publication on conservation problems or techniques they have confronted or developed and (a) if so, what is a list of these publications (b) if not, for what reason?

Return tabled.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Wednesday, January 28, consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Francis in the chair.

On clause 1—

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Wednesday, January 28, 1981, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration and the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster had the floor.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, I understand I have a few moments left. As I notice the furniture being moved about, may I ask the Minister of State for Finance whether today is the day we get answers to our questions?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I believe the agreement was that we would not go on with the clause by clause study—in other words as long as the debate would go on on Clause 1, I would not answer questions. Should debate on Clause 1 end later this afternoon, of course, I would be prepared to answer questions raised during the debate.

[English]

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, that makes it simpler. I will continue to ask questions, and I hope that at some later date I will receive the answers to them.

• (1520)

The minister knows that the spouse's tax allowance was copied from the Crosbie budget. Some of my constituents have been writing to me, and others have been telephoning. They are not as familiar with the ways and means motions as are some of us. Considering some of the language, as I explained earlier, we can understand that. They are wondering when this change will be made.

They would like to know whether a news release will be put out by the minister explaining to unincorporated businesses so they can be aware of the fact that, if a small businessman is making less than approximately $17,000, and if he transfers much of that income to his wife, then one or the other of the spouses will be in trouble in terms of getting the maximum deduction under the Canada Pension Plan. Will the minister assure the House that he will prepare easy to read literature so that the taxpayer can take advantage of these proposals? Many people do not understand how to apply for Canada Pension Plan benefits. When they are due to them, they sit and wait, expecting them to come automatically at age 65. This is due to a lack of information.

I have another question regarding the Small Business Development Bond. The minister adopted the Crosbie small business development bond, which is very commendable, but then proceeded to make it inoperable by shortening its time limit and restricting it to certain kinds of business ventures. The Crosbie budget was not passed. The finance minister reintroduced it in his so-called mini-budget of April. He said he would reintroduce the bond, but would not extend the deadline. On October 28, in his real budget, he extended the Small Business Development Bond for three months, to March, 1981.

March, 1981, is drawing near quite rapidly. Will the minister consider extending the time at least one full year? We would like to see it extended for at least a year. Several of my constituents are anxiously awaiting approval of applications for the Small Business Development Bond. Some fear they will not have the approval before the deadline which this government arbitrarily set. If it is really the government's belief that this bond will assist small businessmen in Canada, it is its responsibility to extend the deadline for at least one additional year so that people can benefit from it.

I wish to reiterate a few points which I hope the minister will not forget to answer. When campaigning for re-election, his party made a commitment to update V-day from 1971 to 1974 on farm land in Canada. If that is not changed, it will place a hardship on those who own farm land and want to transfer it from generation to generation. We recognize that if it stays within the immediate family now, it is not necessary to pay capital gains tax. But if it is sold after two or three generations, the capital gains tax will eliminate any benefit these people worked for. I hope the minister will comment on that.

I would also like to know what happened to the tax on Canadian wines which the Minister of Agriculture talked about during the election. Also, the Minister of Agriculture made a commitment to enlarge the Farm Credit Corporation. The only enlargement I have seen is the highest interest rates in the history of the Farm Credit Corporation which we have under this government. Will the Farm Credit Corporation have access to new funds? In its short term, the Clark government found an additional $50 million for the Farm Credit Corporation. Anyone who checks will see that is fact. That shows the difference in commitment to the Farm Credit Corporation between our government and this government.

I hope the minister can advise us that they will be enlarging the Farm Credit Corporation and not just interest rates. There are hundreds of applications in Farm Credit Corporation offices waiting to be funded. I hope this will be looked after so that young men and women wanting to farm will have access to Farm Credit Corporation money. I look forward to the minister's answers at a later date.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, with leave of the House I would ask for a brief interruption in the debate to seek unanimous consent with a view to tabling strictly technical amendments to this bill. It will be understood that after introduction of the bill the drafting was closely scrutinized so there would be no confusion. Some purely technical amendments mostly of an editorial nature were made and, should the House agree, I will table these technical amendments along with short explanatory notes. We have copies for distribution to the spokesmen for the various parties, if leave is granted.

The Chairman: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, the most serious problem we face in the country at the present time is the extraordinarily high interest rates which seem to be part of the government's policy. For at least the past seven weeks the Bank of Canada rate has been at a level around 17 per cent. That rate affects the borrowing costs of every business and every citizen of this country.

The effect of these extraordinarily high rates is unprecedented. The interest rate of treasury bills indicates what will likely be the Bank of Canada rate, looking down the road. As of Thursday, the sale price of six month or 180-day bills was approximately 16 per cent. When you look into the after market and the sale of like services for the balance of the year, it is not likely we will have an interest rate in this country at any time during this year determined by the Bank of Canada of less than 15 per cent. That does not bode well for the progress of business in this country. For example, in today's paper, Bob White, Canadian leader of the United Auto Workers, blames the nation's economic sickness on high interest rates and a lack of any stimulus by government. White said only the big speculators win when the government fosters high interest rates to protect the weak Canadian dollar, while working people lose jobs.

When we look at Bill C-54 we see there are only two or possibly three clauses which do anything for the business community with regard to creating jobs and getting our economy rolling again. The most important clause in the bill in this regard is clause 8 dealing with the Small Business Development Bond. To refresh the minds of hon. members, this measure was first introduced in the Crosbie budget of December 9, 1979, reintroduced in April, and reintroduced again in October. However, under this bill it is scheduled to expire on April 1, 1981. Even more disastrous is the provision which provides that unless the work that is authorized under the bond is completed by April 1, the bond provisions are of no effect. I have said on another occasion in this House in respect of this clause that it has been and still is virtually impossible for a small businessman to use the provisions, or to have been able to use them since it was first introduced.

On Friday a small businessman, Doug Flowers, principal shareholder and director of Glen Erin Skate Limited and Gold Line Curling Supplies, spoke to me about this matter in my constituency office and told me how his negotiations were going with the Toronto-Dominion Bank and the Royal Bank.

This small businessman wants to create a 35,000 square foot facility in Mississauga. That facility can be financed by an arrangement with his banker on a long-term first mortgage at 1.5 per cent over the GIC rate, which means for this small businessman a 15.25 per cent or a 15.5 per cent interest rate on a first mortgage. On that basis if he can do something he can borrow up to $825,000. He was hoping to use a Small Business Development Bond for the balance of his funding on a secondary finance basis and so be able to start this business, get the new expansion going and develop the 35,000 square feet of space. He has been advised by his bankers that unless the bill is through and all the work is done in accordance with the provisions of the bill by April 1, the Small Business Development Bond will, of course, be of no use to him.

The effect is then that if clause 8 is not extended, Doug Flowers and his company will not be able to complete the work they intended to do, and this project in the city of Mississauga, which will involve about $1.7 million, will not go ahead. The secondary financing portion that could be covered by a Small Business Development Bond at a net cost, after other allowances to the company, of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 13 per cent, will wind up costing, because of the prime rate activity encouraged by the Bank of Canada rate, in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent, and the project will not be viable.

The other day in speaking with the Minister of State for Finance, who is here, I explained this to him and he said there is going to be cost to the government in allowing the Small Business Development Bond to be extended. My conversation with him, sir, was that that was nonsense because there would not be any cost.

In the case of Doug Flowers he will put a project on ground that will produce $1.7 million worth of new construction, development, or whatever you want to call it, in 1981 in Mississauga. It will involve block layers, carpenters, electricians, building trades throughout, and the people who are going to supply the machinery and equipment. All of those people will earn money and will pay personal income tax.

While the government, by allowing the Small Business Development Bond to go through, will lose some income revenue by taxing interest in the conventional sense in that fashion, it will make it all up and more through personal income taxes paid by those people involved in doing the new things required under the provisions of the Small Business Development Bond. There will not be any loss at all in government revenue because there will be development. The bond will act as a stimulant and there will be no loss to government.

I would like to see the bond extended, of course, to cover the cost of carrying inventory and the cost of carrying receivables for small business. That was the original intent when the bond was first introduced by the former Minister of Finance. Even on its narrow base with the bond useful only for new development, there is absolutely no loss to the government.

There is no question about it, Sir, we are in a slack business time. We have the building industry not operating at anything like capacity; we have machinery and development not acting at anything like capacity, but if we can stimulate, through the use of a Small Business Development Bond, new development by small industry and small business, and we can give them a reasonable time to get their affairs in order and get progress going, then we will do something through this bill. We will get Canada growing and moving again.

Really what we are saying to the minister is that if he really believes in small business and really wants to show the country that he wants to make Canada grow and develop again, what he must do is take advantage of this concept produced by the former minister of finance under our government, and use it. The government adopted this concept when it produced the budget in October, but businessmen have not been able to use it because the statute has not been passed. The way the statute is now presented, expiring on April 1, they will not be able to use it at all.

During this time when interest rates are likely to be Bank of Canada rates at 15 points for the balance of the year, at least, and when the prime rate is likely to be 16 per cent, 16.5 per cent, and now 18.25 for the balance of the year, surely knowing that small business in particular has no option except to do its financing through the financial activity of the bank, this is the time to give small business the opportunity to borrow up to $500,000 to get a project going on an income debenture type of arrangement for at least a year. Obviously businessmen need certainty, and they need it for a period of time. They have to organize their affairs to get something going.

Again I want to point out to the minister that because the bond is limited to new activity, and because that new activity by its very nature will mean new employment and new investment—we are not financing old investment here, but new activity and new investment—there really is no cost at all to revenue. It will provide enormous help to small business, making small business in Canada grow again.

To amend that clause, extending it to the end of the next fiscal year, or at least to the end of this year, there would really be no net cost to the government whatsoever. We have said clearly to the government that if the government will move on this clause, give it careful consideration and change it, we might be prepared to look more favourably at some of the other parts of the measure, and perhaps expedite something. In this regard I believe we could have meetings of the House leaders.

● (1540)

Before I go on to make the minister aware that that is not the only thing wrong with this bill, although I would be pleased if he would consider the Small Business Development Bond, I would like to refer the minister to the provision with respect to cash accounting. Under the present rules farmers are the only people entitled to go on a cash basis. This legislation changes cash accounting requirements to allow fishermen as well to go on a cash basis. It is our view that all small business should be able to go on a cash basis, if desired. That would not cost the government very much. It would delay the payment of tax somewhat, but it would not cost anything. To the extent that it would delay the payment of tax I suppose it would cost something, but one of the things this government always talks about, but never does anything about, is relieving the paper burden and reducing the overhead costs of small business.

One of the enormous factors in overhead is accounting costs. This is particularly so for a small business with one or two employees trying to run a store or small professional office. There is a requirement to be on an accrual basis, to pay tax on money not received, to take reserves for doubtful accounts and to do everything, from an accounting point of view, which is appropriate for large businesses. This creates a burden for a small business because a small business does not have the necessary equipment or ability. Small businesses must hire extra accountants and others for help. If the government really wanted to encourage small business—and perhaps even unincorporated small businesses—and if it wanted to do it on that basis, it would do a great deal to stimulate activity and employment. Some of the things which drive a man out of his tree are the paper burden and accounting costs.

Many of us have spoken today and previously about the enormous complications of the Income Tax Act. It is horribly complicated even for the most sophisticated accounting firms. It has been suggested that very few accountants or lawyers in this country could say honestly that they understand the Income Tax Act from cover to cover. In the small towns of this country, away from such sophisticated and large accounting houses as Clarkson Gordon, Coopers & Lybrand, Laventhol and Horwath and Deloitte, Haskins & Sells, there is just no one who really understands the act and where we are going with it.

One thing which would help those areas particularly would be to go back to the cash accounting basis for small businesses. As I said, the cost to the government would not be too great. People would have to pay tax anyway. It is only a question of when the tax becomes payable. On a cash basis the tax is obviously not payable until you receive the money. That is the way it is for farmers. That is the way it will be for fishermen. Why can we not have it that way for the small storekeeper, the small professional or the person who is trying to get going in order to make Canada grow? Why do we have to impose on these people the horrors of accrual accounting and the tax implications of accrual accounting?

Another provision in the bill is with respect to the 3 per cent inventory allowance. All businesses today are suffering. The report of the Economic Council of Canada clearly points to the problem of inflation. Last year there was more inflation in Canada than in any of the years going back to wage and price controls. Preliminary figures already show that the rate of inflation this year will be in excess of anything we have ever had before. Despite the projections of the Minister of Finance in his budget, which he now disclaims, all indications are that the rate of inflation will be very close to 12 per cent this year. For business people that means that while they do their capital cost allowances on an historic basis, in many cases when equipment which has been depreciated wears out, it cannot be replaced because when a businessman goes to purchase equipment he finds that its price has increased two or three times.

It is not uncommon in the construction industry for people to sell four or five-year-old bulldozers for more money than they paid. Farmers today are often able to sell their tractors for more than they paid three, four or five years ago. That is not uncommon at all. That is the result of inflation.

There is nothing in this bill—including the inventory allowance which, to some extent, has been justified in order to cover the inflationary cost of replacing inventory—to solve the problem business people face because of the fact of inflation and the fact that our Income Tax Act at the present time, while it allows one to write off equipment on a capital cost allowance basis, does not allow one to reserve from profit the inflationary fact to enable the replacement of equipment and machinery without further investment of capital.

I would like the minister to give us his views with respect to inflation accounting, interest rates, and the Small Business Development Bond. Could he also talk about a cash accounting system for people other than fishermen and farmers?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Chairman, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to speak on Bill C-54, a ways and means bill to amend the Income Tax Act. It is very obvious that there is absolutely nothing in this bill for farmers, fishermen, or small businesses. As my colleague previously indicated, farmers, fishermen, and small businesses are facing extreme hardship because of high interest rates.

The small businessman has to carry an inventory. That is the lifeblood of his business. He has to carry that inventory at prime plus 2 per cent, which is about 20 per cent. There is nothing in this ways and means bill which deals with this, yet we are asked to approve a bill which would allow the government to borrow a great deal of money. One cannot help but ask whether we are borrowing this money to assist, for example, motorists from the northern United States who come across our border daily, or three times a week, to gas up their cars because gas is so much cheaper here in Canada. Two dollars of every six the American motorist saves at the gas pump in Canada is directly subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. Is that why we are borrowing money?

Are we also borrowing money to subsidize foreign fishing fleets which come to our shores to fill up with fuel? For every $6 saved there is a direct subsidy of $2 paid for by the taxpayer of Canada. That is one third. That is ridiculous. The whole thing escapes me.

● (1550)

Are we looking also at the airplanes, the overseas aircraft which land in Canada with their fuel tanks empty, and fill up here? For every $6 they save, we pay one third which is directly subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. All this government can do is borrow more money.

In my view there is something wrong there, there is some rot that is eating away at the core of this government. I cannot see why we do not address this problem, the solution of which is so important to every man, woman and child in our country if we are to keep our country together, and that is the energy agreement which must be reached between the Government of Canada and the producing provinces. It must be recognized that an energy agreement would break the flood dam and allow the heavy oil sands plants to proceed on schedule with the direct investment in Canada, of at least $20 billion of private capital. It is not the government which should go out and borrow money but it is the people who should invest. We should get the economy of the country rolling again.

The total difference between the agreement proposed by Premier Lougheed of Alberta and the proposal of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, between now and 1985 amounts to only 30 cents at the gas pump. That is the gap about which we are talking. But what is the difference in terms of jobs? It will mean thousands of jobs in central Canada. The megaprojects would attract other investment in Canada, investment which is badly needed in all areas of our economy, such as housing, pipelines and construction. What we should do is create an attractive climate so that people will want to invest their money here. It seems to me that once we reached that happy situation, we could say, "We don't want your investment, but if you really want to, you can invest at a lower interest rate". This would have the direct effect of bringing in more investment. That is what we should do, rather than riding on the coattails of our neighbour to the south and trying to keep up with their interest rates.

Now I should like to make a few comments about our farmers, fishermen, and small businesses. Last week when I was in my riding I discussed a number of problems facing the farmers in Athabasca, Bonnyville, Grand Centre, Glendon, and Lac La Biche. These gentlemen are genuinely frightened because, first, the funds of the Farm Credit Corporation are drying up and, second, the corporation must apportion the funds in such a way that a disproportionate amount of money will not go to small farming areas in my riding in western Canada.

The farmers are genuinely concerned because they are losing their herds. When the herd maintenance program was introduced, about 20,000 applicants were refused the subsidy. All they wanted to do with the subsidy was to use it to maintain their breeding herds so that they could expand their herds in the summer. We all know that their hay crops were devastated. They are genuinely worried because they are now borrowing funds from the bank, their cash flow has dried up, and they are paying interest at close to 20 per cent and, in some cases, 22 per cent.

I was also talking to small businessmen. One of them, a good friend of mine, has a men's wear store. He told me that although he is carrying an inventory, he is facing bankruptcy because his stock is not moving fast enough. There is no way in which he can move his inventory out of the store without taking a direct loss, and this threatens his very livelihood. Exactly the same thing is facing the small hardware merchants in country communities in northeastern Alberta. They carry an inventory which is far in excess of what they can move, and they are being killed by the interest rates.

What is the government doing about the small business development bond? It cannot be used for inventory; it can only be used for capital expansion. When the small businessman walks into a bank to discuss the small business development bond, he finds that the bank manager does not know what is happening because he has had no direction from the government. He has heard that it will be extended, but he has had no direction, so he is left dangling. In the same way small businessmen do not know what is happening. Again they are being left out.

Now I should like to discuss for a moment something which I believe government members should seriously consider. I am referring to the strong feeling which is developing in my riding, and indeed in many ridings in western Canada. What is being expressed is alienation. People are attending separatist meetings and West-Fed meetings. These are average farmers, businessmen and school teachers. They love Canada, they love their country, and they are expressing something that this government does not understand. What is so sad, Mr. Speaker, is that the government does not even know that it does not understand.

When the founding provinces came together in 1867 the terms of confederation for Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were that the provinces would own and control their natural resources. That was one of the main conditions when they came together.

In 1870 the region which is now the three prairie provinces was transferred from a trapping and trading reserve controlled by the Hudson's Bay Company to a colony of the new federated provinces. It became a colony of the new Dominion of Canada, the new federated provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. That same year, as a consequence of the Riel rebellion, Manitoba was created. Since Manitoba was not given control of its natural resources it really remained a colony in all but name.

In 1871 British Columbia joined confederation. But in 1858 it was organized and by 1866 had defined its boundary limits. So it joined confederation, but as a province which owned and controlled its natural resources.

In 1873 Prince Edward Island joined confederation. Very clearly this new province owned and controlled its natural resources.

In 1905 Alberta and Saskatchewan were carved out of the colonial territories. They were called provinces but, in fact, they were not, since they neither owned nor controlled their natural resources.

We see through this chain of events confederation taking shape quite rapidly. But there were actually three provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta which did not own their own natural resources. Every other province did.

In 1912 the boundaries of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba were pushed north to their present boundaries. Why were they pushed north? It was because of the richness of the resources contained in the northernmost parts of these provinces. Quebec and Ontario immediately received title, ownership and control of the natural resources in that expanded northern area. But, lo and behold, Manitoba did not receive control and ownership of of its natural resources. It seems inconceivable to me that this could have happened. Three provinces were expanded, but only two received rights over their natural resources. Manitoba did not receive ownership and control of its northern resources since it did not have control of the resources in the rest of the province at that time.

In 1930 there was a great deal of agitation developing in the western prairie provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. There was outright hostility. I cannot help but think that history is now repeating itself. We have only to look back. There was agitation, hostility, and talk of separation. It was only when this kind of talk developed, when farmers got together and met in small bands and groups which grew larger, that the government finally listened. We now see this same talk developing in western Canada. There are groups such as West-Fed. But what does our illustrious Prime Minister call this talk? He calls it blackmail. In 1930 it was not blackmail, it was an expression of how people felt. In effect they were saying, "You people in central Canada do not understand what is happening in the prairie provinces. You must understand what is happening before our country falls apart."

The problem with the energy agreement stems directly from the kinds of things I have tried to outline. It took Manitoba 60 years to gain control of its natural resources. In fact today Manitoba can boast that since it has been a province it has been without control of its natural resources for longer than it has had control of them. Alberta and Saskatchewan were able to gain control of their resources in 1930—50 years ago. When one finds this happening with respect to any agreement, any attempt in a budget or energy agreement which tries to take away the control and ownership of natural resources, people in the producing provinces will not accept that, since they will not go back to a colonial status. I urge the government to try to understand this basic fact. I urge it to get on with the job of negotiating a proper energy agreement.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening with some interest to the remarks which have been made during this debate. I want to say to the hon. member for Mississauga South that I am somewhat amused he finds it in himself to object so strenuously to the Bank of Canada's 1981 policy but somehow he lost his power of speech in 1979 when his own party was in government. The policies being followed by the Bank of Canada today are exactly the same as those followed by governor Bouey in 1979. The principles, philosophy, fundamental thinking, the same mind-set, assumptions, predilections, the same problems, excuses and inactivity which mesmerized the Crosbie-Bouey duo we faced in the finance committee are exactly the same as those of the Crosbie-MacEachen-Bussières trio which we are faced with today.

While I welcome the member for Mississauga South and all members of the Tory party who are opposed to high interest rates, we all know perfectly well their stand on this position is temporary, depending upon whether they are in opposition or in government. It simply depends on which side of the fence they happen to find themselves with respect to the reasons why they are opposed to the high interest policy of the government.

It would be improper for me to use this opportunity to engage in another discussion, as I have done in committee and as many hon. members have done, on the government's interest rate policies. However, one important point must be made, that the minister has been working on the assumption that the high interest rates which the country is suffering at the moment are a temporary phenomenon. We have warned the minister that this is not the case, that as long as these interest rates are tied to the situation in the United States and to a policy over which we have no control, we do not know where our rates will be. They will probably be very high because of the policies followed by the bank. Therefore it is necessary for the government to change its interest rate policy and to devise tax policies which will overcome the effects of these very regressive interest rate policies which are being followed.

Examples have been given by members of the official opposition and by my colleagues of the effect this thinking has had on the construction industry, the housing industry, small business, and on farmers throughout the economy. It is simply not possible for the government to say, as it has said, that this is a temporary phenomenon and it would be unwise for the government to act in a precipitous way in response to what is simply a temporary fever which is the result of the policies being followed in the United States.

It is clear that the problems facing the housing industry and the construction industry are not simply temporary, but are permanent. In my own constituency the level of unemployment in the construction industry has been well over 30 per cent for the past two years, and there are construction workers there who have been out of work for over two years and, as a result, have been forced to take on different kinds of jobs. This has been going on since I was elected to Parliament. While that may seem like a long time to the minister and others who have had to listen to me, it has been just over two years. That is somewhat of a condemnation of the kinds of policies which have been followed by the government, that there is such a situation where workers have been left, in every sense of the word, permanently unemployed as the result of the government's policies.

Rather than focus on the problem of interest rates, although I wanted to say something once again on this subject because it is of real concern and it does affect the over-all tax policies and the nature of those policies followed by the government, I want to add to my earlier remarks on capital gains and talk about the government's discussion paper on capital gains which, in a sense, has affected many of the proposals put forward in Bill C-54, which we are discussing at the present time. My disappointment with respect to the government's policies is twofold. My first disappointment is that the government has not made a decision as to how it will deal with the discussion paper. It seems to me that we should have received some indication from the government by now as to how the House will deal with this paper.

Mr. Blenkarn: We should have had a committee.

Mr. Rae: It is all very well for the government to present a discussion paper, the outlines of which I will try to summarize in a moment, and it is a study which deserves discussion. Unfortunately, I am not clear, nor has it ever been clear to me, how the discussion would take place. I can discuss the matter with the minister or we can discuss the matter among ourselves, and we can all attempt to come to grips with the subject matter, but surely the government must take some initiative. Will the paper be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, or a task force, or does the government intend to bring in legislation with respect to the capital gains tax, in the next budget, or will the paper be shelved forever? If the paper is shelved, it will not be the first such discussion paper, investigation or report, to see that end.

However, I am a little startled that we have not received one statement from a member of the government indicating its general attitude with respect to the proposals put forward. It may be because there is no unanimity in the government on its views with respect to capital gains. I expected a clearer indication as to how the government intends to deal with the problem, rather than it merely leaving the matter on the floor to see who picks it up and kicks it around. We can anticipate from the Conservative party a general defence of privilege which will lead them to argue that capital gains tax should be either abolished or reduced to a nullity.

The report discusses the problems of capital gains and the way in which the system presently works. I would like to raise those matters with the minister, as well as my suggestion on what should be done with the report. The study reveals that Canada has the lowest rate of tax on wealth inheritances and gifts of all the OECD countries. It shows that 7.1 per cent of taxpayers, all of whom had assessed incomes in excess of $25,000 in 1978, received two thirds of all taxable capital gains income. Even more striking, less than 1 per cent of taxpayers, with incomes over $50,000, received 43 per cent of those gains. The study also reveals that the combined federal-provincial marginal tax rate on capital gains is one half the rate on other income, and that the maximum federal tax rate on the income is a mere 21.5 per cent.

These findings should be no surprise to anyone. They can be explained in part by the elimination of federal estate and gift taxes in 1972 and the decision on the part of nine of the ten provinces to abandon succession duties, but they are also due to the leniency of our capital gains tax which exempts one half of the gains from taxation and allows recipients to minimize a tax by declaring gains only when they are realized.

On the first point which deals with the general question of wealth and inheritance, it is interesting to note that for the last year the federal government imposed an estate tax, 1971, it brought in $100 million which, in 1980 dollars, amounts to over $200 million. The deemed disposition on death capital gains tax is calculated to have collected $11 million for the government in 1978. I mention this fact because when I last spoke on this subject during second reading debate on this bill, I was upbraided by several members of the Liberal Party and of the official opposition who said, "Well, you talk about the fact that Canada has the lowest rate of tax on gifts and inheritances, Mr. Rae, but what you do not mention is the fact that we have introduced the capital gains tax and the deemed disposition on death to make up the difference". My response was that in fact the evidence showed there is no comparison between the income lost and abolition of the estates tax and the income which has been gained for the federal government through the imposition of deemed disposition on death.

The government cannot get around the problem by saying that the one half tax on capital gains satisfies the inequity created in our tax system, because it allows so much money to be transferred from generation to generation by very wealthy Canadians without having to pay any taxation to the government. I am not referring to average or lower income Canadians. I am referring to the wealthy Canadians.

There are really two systems in Canada. There is what I call the "fairness system", which is the system which applies to all employees. This system is progressive and it takes money from its source. Then there is what I call the "discrimination system". The discrimination system exists for those who have enough money to be able to invest in the shelters, to create trusts, or to be able to use the tax system to their advantage. The capital gains system is part of what I call the "discrimination system". If we make changes within the discrimination system alone, the effect is simply to increase the burden of the average taxpayer.

Let me give you a concrete example which is discussed in the government paper and which is affected by several of the measures proposed in Bill C-54. The minister will know that the widespread use of dividend and surplus stripping was one of the main reasons for the creation of the Carter commission. Surplus stripping means that instead of declaring a capital gain—instead of taking surplus off in the form of income, a decision is made to transform that surplus into a capital gain and not take it in the form of a dividend. This is something which can be readily done by personal incorporations, and indeed by the creation of several personal companies in order effectively to avoid any dividend tax at all.

The full taxation of capital gains would have solved the problem which lay behind the creation of the Carter commission in 1962. However, the government chose not to go that route, and instead taxed half of capital gains, and invented the dividend tax credit. At first the dividend tax credit was low, and there remained a considerable incentive to strip surplus in the form of a capital gain. The government therefore felt obliged to increase the size of the dividend tax credit, in order to create greater equality between the marginal rate for capital gains and the marginal rate for dividends.

From a technical point of view, if the government wants to stop surplus stripping, the answer is to increase the size of the dividend tax credit so that it will be more attractive to take the surplus in the form of a dividend than in the form of a capital gain. The problem with what the government has done, however, is that by creating greater equality between dividend income and capital gains income it has widened the gap between both of those kinds of income and earned income.

For example, Mr. Chairman, a taxpayer who earns less than $18,000 pays no tax on dividend income. If all income is dividend income he can earn up to $37,000 and pay no income tax at all. At $18,000 he pays 18 per cent on capital gains income and 36 per cent on other income. You can see the discrepancy, Mr. Chairman, but watch how it narrows. If he makes $30,000, the marginal rate of tax is 16 per cent on dividend income, 24 per cent on capital gains income, and 48 per cent on earned income. For a taxpayer making $50,000 the marginal rates are 25 per cent for dividends, 27 per cent for capital gains, and 54 per cent for other earned income.

In other words, this technical change in the discrimination system has occurred which furthers the imbalance between the two systems.

This may all sound very technical, but let me point out that the revenue cost of the change in the dividend tax credit for 1979 was estimated to be about $200 million. This is not exactly an insignificant amount. There was a major tax cut for dividend holders, and that means that the government said, "Look, we are giving tax cuts, we are making tax expenditures in this area, therefore we cannot afford to make other kinds of tax cuts."

That is why I say that one person's tax loophole or benefit becomes another's tax burden. In this case 5.6 per cent of Canada's wealthiest tax filers were subsidized to the tune of $200 million by 94.4 per cent of the people. This is not the kind of subsidy or tax cut which can be readily understood or even known by the average taxpayer. It is fair to say that the changes which have occurred within the discrimination system in order to create greater equality between dividend income and capital gains income, have only had the effect of necessarily increasing the burden on the average taxpayer who receives neither capital gains nor dividends.

When the Carter commission made its report, and when the government's white paper and the government's tax reform were introduced in 1972, we were told that we could never have full taxation of capital gains because a full tax would have inhibited savings and economic growth, would have reduced the supply of risk capital and, in general, would have impeded capital markets.

These were simply assertions in 1972. I suggest to you, on the basis of the report which is before the House and the people of Canada at the moment, that in 1981 these remain unfounded assertions.

I find it ironic that without having the courage to draw such conclusions directly, the paper makes a very strong case for full taxation on capital gains.

There have, of course, been strong suggestions from many groups, particularly farmers, that the current taxing regime and capital gains have threatened the very existence of the family farm and small family business. There may well be cases of hardship arising from the deemed disposition of family agricultural land, and from the fact that valuation day is still 1971. These matters have been brought to the attention of the minister. I do not come from an agricultural riding so this was not one of the top items in the Liberal brochures that I saw in the last election campaign. I know from my colleagues who do represent agricultural ridings, however, that the Liberal promise to change valuation day was one of the planks, along with double-tracking of railways and other such flights of fancy, that was at the heart of the Liberal program in western Canada.

The point is that if there is a problem which affects the family farm, if there is a problem which affects valuation day, if there is a problem which affects the question of the small family business, these are all exceptions that can be made whether capital gains is taxed at half rate or whether it is taxed completely. The answer to the problems facing the family farm and the small family business is not to abolish capital gains for everybody but to attempt to make the law work where we want it to work, and to make the exceptions where we want to make them for particular purposes. The answer to the problem is not that suggested by the Conservative party, to abandon capital gains altogether. If we abandon the concept of capital gains altogether we will be back exactly where we were in 1962. We will be back with the same problems that led to the creation of the Carter commission in 1962. Indeed, I would suggest to the minister that we are almost there. The problems of capital gains and the problems of equity in the tax system are as great as they were then.

I see that my time is coming to an end, Mr. Chairman, and I wonder if I might conclude by saying a word about indexing of capital gains. With your indulgence, it will take about one minute.

Indexing has frequently been suggested as essential for capital gains, since many increases are not increases in real value but simply reflect increases in the general cost of living. As long as there is the 50 per cent exemption for capital gains, I cannot see any overwhelming reason for indexing capital property. If we were to move to the full taxation of capital gains, the case for indexing the value of capital property would obviously be strengthened, but only in the context of some more fundamental decisions about the general principle of indexing in the whole of the economic accounting system.

I cannot speak for other parties, Mr. Chairman, but this party is looking for greater leadership from the government in this field and in the field of fiscal arrangements. We want some indication of where we are going. We would like this matter to be referred to a committee; we would like tax reforms to be referred to a committee; we would like fiscal tax sharing referred to a committee and the established programs financing referred to a special task force. In all, we would like leadership from the government and an opportunity to participate in the evaluation of these problems so that we might give the kind of constructive advice that we have given the minister on many other matters of legislation, and as we hope to do in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to listen to remarks by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, the finance critic of the NDP. Although he has not been in this House very long, as he says himself, he has certainly been a very vociferous contributor to the debate on financial matters. It will come as no surprise to him that some of us in the Conservative Party do not agree with some of his statements. At times we find common cause with the NDP in matters of the environment or civil liberties, but at other times we have great reservations about their economic theories.

When all the chips are down, perhaps the twentieth century will reveal that one of its greatest fallacies and greatest failures has been the concept of socialism, and that a socialist is someone who does not have much and wants to share it with everyone.

We also listened with interest to a former great member of Parliament and former leader of the Crediste Party when he was here in this House. He was a great orator. I can remember one of his most famous one-liners when he said, "Mr. Speaker, if you take everything from the haves and give it to the have-nots, pretty soon you will have nothing but a bunch of have-nots." I think there is a lot of truth in what Réal Caouette said.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood noted in passing that people with high incomes tended to be the ones who benefited the most from capital gains tax. I suggest that that is really a penetrating look at the obvious. What we would like to see, of course, is more people with high incomes so they could be paying capital gains tax. We would also like to see the government be more flexible, and for it to carry on with some of the things that were noted by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster. We would like to see the government carry through with its election commitments, also referred to by the member for Broadview-Greenwood. We would like to see the government do something about changing the capital gains situation on family farms.

I believe, and perhaps the House would agree, that if capital gains taxes are not modified to some extent, and if indexing provisions are not brought in, they are really nothing more than a tax on inflation. They are confiscatory. Ultimately they will have the effect of taking away much of the incentive, much of the private ownership, and much of the capacity to own things which have always been and deservedly so, part of the tradition of Canadians.

I believe, the minister opposite would also like to see this done. I believe too that many members in the Liberal Party would have no difficulty—since everything is being predicated on the constitution these days—with a proposed amendment put forward by our party to include the right to ownership of property, and not to be deprived of same, without due process of law, despite some of the rather chauvinistic and unnecessary objections from some provinces, including some with Conservative governments.

It is obvious, as the Prime Minister admitted, that it is very important for him to have the support of the New Democrats. At least he was forthright enough to admit it. But since we are talking about financial matters and some of the aftermath of past polices, such as AHOP, which are causing so much difficulty for the hon. gentleman on the treasury benches opposite, it is interesting to remember that some of these policies which are now coming back to haunt the government, causing it financial embarrassment and causing it to worry about where it will get the money to meet some of its commitments, were the result of compromises the government felt it had to make with the NDP during the period 1972 to 1974. It is interesting to note as well that at least in the constitutional debate the government is forced into this position again.

It seems to me that the opportunity for us to say a few words today ought to be directed toward asking the minister some questions as to whether he is prepared to consider some specific changes. Would the minister be kind enough to take a representation of mine under advisement? It is one I have made before. It does not seek to do away with capital gains tax entirely as the member for Broadview-Greenwood indicated some of us might wish to do. I do not think that is realistic at this time. But I still believe the imposition of capital gains tax has caused Canadians a great deal of difficulty. It takes away much of the incentive which allowed this country to progress far more rapidly in the past than it has done since the tax was introduced. The revenues derived from capital gains tax have not been as significant as the government thought they would be. Capital gains tax has done more harm in stunting the economic development of this country. It has not provided as many opportunities and new jobs as were expected.

I suggest the same kind of mistake is being made with regard to Bill C-48, in changing the depletion allowance. I am not prepared to argue that 175 per cent depletion is necessarily equitable, but I do not believe the option which is being offered by the government in terms of this change in taxation is going to be productive as far as the industry is concerned, or as far as energy self-sufficiency is concerned. I may be wrong. But as I recall, under the existing provisions at least a company, be it a small Canadian corporation or a multinational, has a chance to recover on a non-taxable basis the expense it has incurred in drilling, looking for, or developing new oil wells. Under this proposed taxation arrangement, as I recall, there will be a grant of 30 per cent for exploration wells or 20 per cent for development wells. But ultimately that grant will be taxed.

I do not believe that small oil companies, whether they are Canadian or otherwise, can compete with multinationals which have marketing distribution facilities and a capacity to absorb this kind of up-front expenditure. I urge the minister and the government to take a close look at the kind of incentive which is being taken away. I am not arguing that some incentive ought not to have been taken away because the oil depletion allowances were probably overly generous. However, in this case the government is trading the devil for a witch. In a situation like this we will see a counterproductive atmosphere come into the development of the search for petroleum resources; small companies cannot compete.

I have an observation that I wanted to bring to the minister's attention on different occasions. It seems to me the attitude of some auditors and officials of National Revenue could stand some scrutiny from the top. We have all had complaints from constituents, some of which were ill-founded and some of which were based on a sense of persecution which, upon reflection, were really not warranted. Nevertheless I am firmly convinced that officials in National Revenue have become rather arrogant and rather insensitive. They are not exhibiting the same sense of being truly helpful. They do not seem to realize they are the servants of the people of Canada, as they used to be in years gone by. I have watched their work habits. I have watched things that have happened in my constituency. Taxpayers have been forced into litigation. Businesses have been menaced because of what I say, respectfully, is a rather arrogant and perhaps pointless insistence on the letter of the law. With a little discretion and understanding some of these businesses and people could have been saved a great deal of trouble. Indeed, the government would have benefited in the end by collecting more tax revenue.

I think there is something to be said for taking a look at capital gains on securities, in the same spirit as the government is looking at registered retirement savings plans and other benefits to help Canadians save and to prepare for their retirement. There is something to be said for treating the holders of securities of Canadian companies a little differently when it comes time to assess them on capital gains.

I know, and so does the minister, of some companies which encourage their employees to buy stock, sometimes by payroll deductions. Sometimes investors will deliberately buy stock in Canadian corporations for some other reason. Yet these people who go to the bank to borrow money to invest in Canadian companies, are treated exactly the same when they come to sell their securities as if they had shares in American Telephone and Telegraph, or in some other corporation which had no connection with Canada at all.

I would advance the proposition to the minister that if a Canadian can show that he is buying securities in a Canadian company for some worth-while purpose, such as for retirement or to put his children through university, and demonstrates this fact by holding those securities for a period of time, five or ten years, to indicate that he is not a speculator, he should be treated differently from someone who buys 100 shares in an industrial company only to sell those shares in a week or so to make a quick capital gain.

I think that capital gains taxes can be useful and equitable if applied with a little subtlety. To use another metaphor, they could be used like a scalpel instead of a blunt instrument. When it comes time to examine the tax options, to Canadianize, if we are going to use that word, certain sectors of our economy, we should not overlook the incentive that could be granted by using capital gains tax in a different way, to allow Canadians some tax relief, provided they are prepared to divert investment which might have gone into United States stock exchange or offshore to somewhere else in Canada. If they keep their investment in this country, they should be given some recognition and more important, tax breaks for doing this.

I recognize that the government is in a difficult position. It needs all the revenue it can get. It is very easy for us to make suggestions to it which involve saving money on the one hand and spending it on the other. Sometimes we are inconsistent in this regard, and I will be the first to admit that.

However, there is a great opportunity, if we look at the priorities and not fall into the trap that some Scandinavian countries have experienced. I read recently that The Netherlands is also coming to grips with this depressing reality. They have gone about as far as they can go in certain European countries with social programs they have begun since the last war. The next social crunch, if I may use that word, will be when people are suddenly confronted with the realization that they cannot go any further. Such a large amount from the budgets of those countries is being spent on the distribution of social benefits that there is not enough left for creation of the kind of wealth that has to be created, if they are going to continue distributing these kinds of benefits to their people.

One day in this House the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, as they say in vaudeville got off a pretty good line. I believe the hon. member for St. John's West was finance minister at the time. He said he had heard of Keynesian economics, pre-Keynesian economics, and now he was looking at pre-Cambrian economics. At the time I thought that some of the things the NDP were espousing were into another kind of economics called the Alfred E. Neuman version, the "What, me worry?" economic theory.

Mr. Sargeant: We are not worried about you, Elmer.

Mr. MacKay: You read Mad magazine too. I believe we are coming to a point in our fiscal and financial considerations in this country where, if we are not more selective with what we do, if we do not divert more of our energy and money into departments that create wealth and give Canadians incentives to do something for themselves and our country, and less incentive to stay home and use the social programs to get by, we will continue to sink in terms of relative prosperity in the world.

The minister knows this has been the case in the last few years. He would be surprised at the support he would get, not just from our party but from people across the country, if he would put a little incentive back into the economy, and a little restraint in terms of some of the social programs. While they may be very nice and very helpful, they are just not affordable.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-54 and the implications this legislation, if passed, will have on the economy and the future of Canadians and this nation.

Many items are dealt with in this document. It is a rather ominous document containing a good amount of material. Most of it deals with the mini-budget and the subsequent budget introduced by the Minister of Finance over the past year. As hon. members realize, it has not yet gone into effect despite the fact that the election of February 18 is about to celebrate its first anniversary.

Canadians generally will agree that one of the greatest hoaxes in our history was perpetrated last February 18 when the government was elected on a platform of economic recovery, and condemnation of the previous government's policies and of the previous finance minister's budget of December 9, 1979. They were going to improve the health of this nation. There were innuendoes that this would happen immediately. The fact is that today we have a situation much worse than it was a year ago.

We have record high interest rates. We were roundly criticized for allowing high interest rates when we formed the government. Times have changed. The remedy the Liberals had in mind at that time when criticizing our government no longer applies. Indeed, interest rates now are substantially higher than a year ago.

Canadians were led to believe that this Prime Minister and the Liberal Party could handle things much better than our government. They were led to believe that economic collapse was imminent if the government of that day was kept in place. Canadians were led to believe that everything would be very much better, indeed that the path would be paved with gold and lilacs if the Liberal Party was put back in power.

We have seen what happened. We have spiralling inflation. If it is not brought under control, we will be on the verge of a recession, if not a depression. This is all pointed out by the present high interest rates, the tremendous unemployment this country is facing, and the fact that bankruptcies in small businesses are up substantially over last year. We can live with an increase of 1, or 2 per cent. That could be a natural phenomenon. However, small business has faced an increase in bankruptcies in this country of over 17 per cent compared with last year.

What is the government going to do about this? In the mini-budget it promised a Small Business Development Bond. This gave business some hope for the future. They could go to banking and financial institutions and, on the strength of the words of the present finance minister, avail themselves of the Small Business Development Bond within the very near future. Business took heart from that. Months and months later we find ourselves in the situation where the Small Business Development Bond act has not yet been passed. An extension was given last year for three additional months in 1981. We see now that at least one of those three months has lapsed. Where are we going from here? It is very, very difficult to tell. What is the cost to government of the Small Business Development Bonds? It seems the government is not in a position to let us know.

We took heart in various sections of the country from the government's promise to allow us a manufacturers' tax incentives program. In my own province of New Brunswick, in my constituency of Fundy-Royal, there were many people who held high hopes that the manufacturers' tax incentive program would be one which would encourage manufacturers to locate in all sections of the country where development was down. Indeed, there were many people, including myself, who lauded the decision of the government to include that particular section in its budget. What have we found has taken place since the budget came down? We have discovered that this was not to cover all areas which are recognized as being in need of incentives, recognized as having the need for additional manufacturing facilities, and recognized as being generally regions of high unemployment, low family incomes, and low mean incomes. We found, rather, that the program was to be utilized as a tool to satisfy particular sections of those areas.

I find it very difficult to accept that the only regions it seems which were to receive this manufacturers' tax incentive program were regions represented by members of the current government party. I find it difficult that this sort of petty politics could possibly inject itself into the future of a region of the country which so badly requires the sympathetic consideration and ear of a compassionate government. Indeed, that is the way it is. There are only five areas in the province of Nova Scotia which are eligible and qualify for the manufacturers' tax incentive program, and all of those areas are represented in this House by members of the Liberal Party.

We have a Minister of Finance who lays the blame for our economic problems and woes at the doorstep of the Canadian people. We, as the people of this nation, have no one to blame but ourselves and our indiscretion in spending in our wanton way and our desire for greater and better things. We should be tailoring our cloth to suit our needs, says the Prime Minister, in so many words. I would suggest to those gentlemen that they try this on some of the fixed incomes the elderly and the poor have to suffer in this country.

The energy tax credit program which was such a vital and important part of the Crosbie budget has not been utilized in the present budget. What a blow this is to those people who depend so heavily on oil for their heat, warmth, and cooking, particularly during this winter which has been so desperate and so drastically severe. There is nothing in the budget to help these people. As a matter of fact they are now being treated to an increase in taxes on their heating oil which was not called for under the Crosbie budget. These people are finding it very difficult to cope with the situation, and that is absolutely understandable.

What do we find in the meantime? We find the present policies of the government are devoted to driving initiative, jobs, and exploration from this country to the United States and out of existence altogether. We do not see the initiatives being taken in this country that are required to get Canadians to work finding energy within our own boundaries, energy which we know is there.

I urge the minister to take a look at the government's energy policy in reference to financing exploration, now that it has determined the energy companies and the policies of this nation are moving toward nationalization. It is in the government's hands to determine the direction and to create a climate which will encourage investment in energy exploration. I encourage the government in this regard.

In Albert county in New Brunswick, which happens to be in my constituency as well, there have been known sources of oil shale for a good many years. Natural gas has been used in the township of Hillsborough for years, piped into the homes, but what initiative has the government taken to determine if it is economically feasible for Canadians to extract the proven resource of 280 million barrels of oil in the Albert county shale, just in one square mile alone? Nothing has been done to encourage any exploration work in this area, and that is a shame.

It is thought that in Albert county there could easily be something in the vicinity of 15 billion barrels of oil in that shale, but there is no incentive to extract it. That amount of oil is equal to the amount proven in the total Hibernia field off Newfoundland. What has been done about it? I have talked about it in this House of Commons on many occasions. The provincial government has made representations to the federal government for assistance, but it does not look very good for the future of the oil shale or the natural gas reserves in Albert county at this time.

I see that the time is approaching five o'clock, Mr. Chairman. Is it your intention to close debate at this time? Perhaps I could call it five o'clock.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal if he is present at eight o'clock in order to continue his remarks.

It being five o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress, and ask leave to consider the bill again later this day.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—National Security—Complaints by members of security service—Alleged discrimination; the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley)—Finance—Policy respecting inflation and interest rates; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Health care—Use of pre-natal screening kits.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF FIREARMS CONTROL PROVISIONS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be authorized to review the firearms control provisions, sections 82 to 106 inclusive of the Criminal Code of Canada, and that such review extend to all aspects of the firearms control program and include the hearing and consideration of the views of the interested persons and organizations and to make recommendations with respect to any amendments, alterations or modifications thereto that appear to the committee then to be necessary or desirable;

That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the committee be empowered to retain the services of expert advisers and to commission studies or research to assist in its work and that it also be empowered to retain such professional, technical, clerical and stenographic help as may be required.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this private member's motion standing in my name in essence asks that this House authorize a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to investigate, hear briefs, cross the country and employ counsel and advisers respecting the legislation commonly known as gun control legislation which is now part of the Criminal Code. I think it is essential that we now do this. I think the time is ripe for this Parliament and, as a matter of fact, this government, to find this an ideal vehicle to plumb the many questions which exist with respect to the administration of our gun control legislation.

Second, this would be an ideal vehicle for taking a very hard and searching look at the whole philosophy and concept of our gun control legislation and, obviously and most important, to

I think a little history is called for. In August of 1977 Parliament approved very comprehensive revisions to the gun control provisions of the Criminal Code. It was at that time and continues to this day to be one of the most sensitive issues to come before Parliament in recent years. It certainly is in the whole law and order field, in any event.

Hon. members should know that very large numbers of citizens of Canada are very directly affected by this legislation. There are more than three million gun owners in Canada, and gun owners and, I suggest, certainly non-gun owners alike are vitally concerned about the level of violence in our society which is related to guns and the use of guns.

The key provisions of the 1977 legislation established a system which required any person over 16 years of age who wished to acquire—by purchase, by borrowing or by trading—a firearm, to obtain a firearms acquisition certificate, commonly known as an FAC. A screening system was established to identify those with criminal or violent records and, obviously, a system then to deny firearms acquisition certificates to those people. That is the principle and the theory. In practice, of course, I feel—and I would like to hear some rebuttal—that that system has not worked and is not working, simply because those with that type of record or history are not stopped by this system. I am not talking about the spontaneous marital difficulty in which somebody reaches into a cupboard for a shotgun or a .22 to settle an argument by that means; I am talking about those who have histories of violent criminal activity or those with histories of using guns during crime. I suggest that in practice those latter people are the very people it does not affect, although it is supposed to in theory. If it does not affect those people, it does not affect anybody because it cannot possibly affect those whose spontaneous reaction to an argument is to reach for a gun for which they may already have a certificate.

The system simply does not work against those who have that record of criminal activity solely and simply because they circumvent the system by paying no attention to it. They ignore it. If someone is going to rob a bank with a gun, I suggest that he does not run down to his friendly local police station to get an FAC ahead of time.

Under the FAC system an individual does not need a certificate in order to possess any gun he acquired before 1979. I suggest that this is a very glaring practical gap in the legislation facing the police today. How do they know, for instance, when a person acquired an older gun? I suggest that most of the guns in use in Canada today were acquired long before 1979.

To assist the police in solving some of the problems they have—and they are very grave and gross problems—the police were given almost unprecedented wide powers to search for and seize weapons without warrant. I suggest that this has been criticized very severely in many civil rights, legal and justice quarters of this country. It is an unprecedented provision to write into legislation such as this, and I suggest that this is another area of scope which should be looked at very closely by means of an inquiry.

The administration of the whole firearms acquisition certificate system was turned over by the federal government to the provinces. Most provinces issue FACs from local police offices, with the notable exception of New Brunswick where all such certificates are issued from a central processing office, so therefore the main bulk of the administration—as far as the public perception is concerned in any event—falls on the shoulders of local police officers in local offices.

We all know that the enforcement of the Criminal Code itself is a provincial responsibility. However, due to the rather unusual administrative requirements of the firearms provisions, and especially the whole system of issuing firearms acquisition certificates and issuing business permits, the federal government of the day entered into a federal-provincial agreement—into many federal-provincial agreements, actually—whereby deficits incurred by the provinces will be paid by the federal government. As far as I can ascertain, there has not been a report since 1977 respecting the amount of moneys required in respect of this whole system. How much has been spent, for instance, by municipal police forces across this country in respect of firearms acquisition certificates and their administration? How much has been spent by provincial forces or out of provincial treasuries? We have never really received a report on how much the federal government has spent in total in respect of this whole system.

We have never been told which provinces have deficits and how much of a deficit they have incurred. I suggest to you, sir, that that information is available to the government, that it should be released, and that it should be released to a parliamentary inquiry.

In 1977, and again in 1979, it was estimated by the federal officials in the Department of the Solicitor General that a total of 600,000 to 700,000 FACs would be issued annually. Since this program has been in effect we have only had two reports to the solicitors general which show a significantly lower number than the number announced. In its first year, for instance, only 245,000 certificates were issued, not the 600,000 or 700,000 which we have been led to believe would be the number. Why the difference? What has happened? Were the first estimates—the only estimates we have had—that far out, or has there been that much of a decline in the acquisition of new weapons in this country?

What are the 1980 figures? The minister must have them by now. I hope that the parliamentary secretary, who, I would assume, will speak in this debate, has those figures and will give them to us. However, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that they are far out of line with the original estimates which were given to the House in 1977 when the legislation was passed. Either something has happened in the meantime, or it is the effect of the legislation, although I do not think so. Obviously that legislation was passed by the House with the misleading information to show that it was that much of a problem and that there were that many weapons traded each year since that time.

In 1979, for instance, there was a six months' backlog in the processing of applications to acquire firearm acquisition certificates. Presumably these have been cleared up, but a veil of secrecy has been drawn and a great deal of non-information has been coming out of the Department of the Solicitor General with respect to the time it now takes to obtain the certificates. I ask whoever will be replying for the government today how long a person has to wait for a certificate to be issued to him, provided he has no criminal record or no record of violent disorders. The National Advisory Council on Firearms was asked by the Department of the Solicitor General to provide independent advice on the program to the government. Is it still in existence, and where are the reports? Why have we not heard the concerns of this group? A veil of secrecy has been drawn over the whole matter of gun control registration in the last little while, and it is time that many of these concerns were answered.

I suspect that there is a great number of problems regarding administration, and I suspect that there is a great number of suggested amendments to the legislation which are ready to be processed through the House. Yet we have heard absolutely nothing about them. By the middle of 1979, without any of the confirming statistics which have since become available to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), 13 amendments to the legislation were identified as being needed. Here we are well into 1981 and nothing has been forthcoming, no statement, no statistics. For instance, some of the amendments identified well over a year and a half ago included such matters as safety training requirements under the act. Surely if we are going to be burdened with this type of legislation there should be an objective in view with regard to the acquisition of new weapons in this country by individuals, and some requirements with regard to safety training. This whole aspect has been ignored by the government. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that amendments with respect to that aspect have been ready for some time now.

Another real problem has been the whole matter relating to security firms in this country. An FAC is issued to an individual, not to a company. Most security firms require the ownership and use of a weapon, which is unfortunate, in my view. It is not possible, as has been suggested to this government by provincial governments, for some type of a blanket permit to be issued to these security firms?

Customs tariff amendments have been ready for some time as they relate to the importation into this country of firearms by Canadian citizens, but absolutely nothing has been brought forward regarding this by the government. Then there is the matter of dealing with non-residents who attempt to import weapons temporarily into this country without an FAC. This matter has not been tackled at all. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very real and continuing problem to the tourist industry in this country in so far as American hunters are concerned. No matter who is involved, a certificate is required in this country for anyone carrying a gun.

What do Americans do who bring guns across the border temporarily? Do they apply for an FAC? If they apply for an FAC, do the police forces in the country check their medical records or their violent tendencies, if any? I suggest that a double standard is being applied with regard to Americans who come in and Canadian citizens. I am not even sure that the government is enforcing these provisions of the act. All this is a can of worms. If it did enforce them, there would be a great anguished outcry from the tourist outfitters and from the whole tourist industry in the country. In many ways the government has shut its eyes with regard to the problem of non-residents who bring their weapons into this country temporarily for a lawful purpose.

Then there is the whole question of appeals, another matter which has to be dealt with. There is simply no appeal provision in the act at the moment with regard to those who are denied a free firearm acquisition certificate. There are other questions and other procedural problems in respect of the legislation regarding appeals. That is another area which should be considered very carefully by a parliamentary committee, I suggest. More problems have surfaced now since the first phase of that legislation was proclaimed on January 1, 1978.

The time for a complete review of the administration of the act is now long overdue and should be dealt with as promptly as possible. The proper body to deal with it is a parliamentary committee. The whole purpose of the legislation, the whole philosophy and the whole concept behind it, are to reduce the number of crimes committed with guns in Canada, and after two full years since the legislation was passed a valid question should be asked by all of us. The question is whether this legislation is achieving that purpose. I must say to you, sir, that I have grave doubts that it is. It seems to me to be a cumbersome, awkward, and expensive system. But I would like to know for sure. I would like to learn from those who must enforce it and from those who have a very expert and detailed knowledge of it.

● (1720)

The first two annual firearms reports—the only ones we have ever received—for 1977 and 1978 do not reveal any evident trend toward a sharp reduction in the violent crime rate. The statistics for early 1980, which we now have, show that violent crime, crime connected to guns, is on the upsurge in this country. Just last week the report of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Commission for 1980 was released. For instance, in metro-Toronto alone crime is up 9.4 per cent, most of which is violent crime. In the city of Toronto during 1980 ten citizens were killed during acts of robbery, compared to only one in 1979. Out of a total of 48 homicides last year in metro-Toronto, 18 people were shot to death. Robberies with firearms increased 23 per cent in metro-Toronto in 1980—386 in 1980 compared to 289 in 1979.

I end by saying this to you, Mr. Speaker. The Trudeau government in 1979 made a public commitment to carry out a review of the firearms control provisions of the Criminal Code. It was never done by the previous Liberal administration. The Clark government confirmed that commitment and, as solicitor general in that government, I publicly stated that it would be done. At that time I put on the Order Paper the very same motion which I put forward today. Some of the most pertinent statistics relating to violent crimes in this country have been hidden from view. But they are available. There is no need for further time to draw conclusions. I think it is time now for a parliamentary review by a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This would permit the provinces, the federal officials, the RCMP, individual groups and individuals, to present briefs and comment on legislation which, I suspect, is not working. Most of all, sir, that inquiry would be open and available to us all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on this motion of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). I must suggest that perhaps, like all existing legislation, it has to be updated from time to time.

I believe that the implementation of Bill C-51 in 1977 was a very big step to take. Perhaps people, hunters and gun owners particularly, were of the opinion it went too far. The passage of that legislation was certainly marked by some controversy. The successful though controversial amnesty recall program took place in November, 1978. Then the introduction of the firearm acquisition certificates and the business permit systems took effect on January 1, 1979. It must be noted, however, that the recall was regarded as very successful, if you talk to various police officers. The rank and file of law-abiding citizens were not affected by it.

As significant as those changes were, I think they should be reviewed in the context of the history of firearms control in Canada. It is now widely appreciated that Canadian law has controlled firearms in one manner or another for well over 100 years. I well remember during the Second World War when all firearms had to be registered. You had to sign to buy ammunition. The first permit system for the carrying of a small arm outside of one's residence or place of business was introduced in 1882. By 1934 the law required the registration of all hand guns. A change in the law in 1968 created three classes of weapons in Canada: prohibited, restricted, and unrestricted.

I bring this brief history to the attention of the House because I believe it sheds some light on why Canada has generally enjoyed a history of responsible use of firearms since we have advanced from a frontier society, which to a large extent depended on firearms. The conditions in Canada are a far cry from what we see in other countries around us at this time. The changes enacted by Parliament in 1977 continued the promotion of the responsible use of firearms, in the Canadian tradition. The one big change which was effected was the firearm acquisition certificate.

As I mentioned, the 1968 law created three classes of weapons: prohibited, restricted, and unrestricted. The conditions attached by that legislation affected the acquisition and use of restricted guns. There were no controls imposed on the acquisition of either long arms such as shotguns or hunting rifles. The criminal law amendment legislation in 1977 introduced control of long arms to the extent of requiring individuals wishing to acquire them to be screened by the police to ensure that they did not have a criminal record or a history of mental illness associated with violence.

I received a letter recently from a constituent of mine. She is now a married lady, and she spoke about this matter. She related to me an experience she had with a friend, her married brother and her sister-in-law one evening. A man, such as I referred to previously, with a history of mental illness, shot her friend when in the car with the rest of them. It is a tragedy she will never forget. This is the type of instance to which this regulation was intended to apply, not to the normal rank and file person who likes to hunt.

I like to hunt, on occasion. I was not affected by this legislation. Perhaps, in a sense, there is a reason why I was not affected. My first experience as a hunter, as one who loves the outdoors, was not just with the sport of hunting but the need for predatory control of the foxes which were wantonly destroying the poultry in our area. We used to raise those birds on the range. A few years after that we had a rabies epidemic. The hunters in the area would organize a fox drive in order to eradicate the foxes and this problem. A few years ago two of my employees had to go through a series of vaccination shots for rabies. Not long afterwards we all became very conscious of the need for organized hunters and the help they provided to the farmers and society while we were constantly trying to rid the countryside of those animals which do carry rabies.

There is another area to which this also applies. In mid-November we had a baby calf killed in pasture by a brush wolf. Naturally, the cow, on mother's instinct, hid the calf away during the daylight hours and she would return to it in the morning and the evening to feed it. One night we heard her bawling. We went to find her and we discovered the baby calf dead. So there is a need for the farmer and the hunter to have weapons available to them. This is certainly not restricted, in a sense. But if there is a backlog of people waiting for acquisition certificates I hope it will be resolved.

Another reason why I am interested in this legislation is because, when I was a teenager, just after World War II, I was involved in a fox hunt in which a friend of mine accidentally shot himself. It was a tragedy in the community which left a wife and three children. The real tragedy was that this man was a war veteran. He had been all through World War II and many battles. Then, as the result of one little accident, his life was ended. That shocking incident made me volunteer to become an instructor in the use of firearms. I wanted to see that the young people of my area were properly instructed in the use of firearms. Yet, this war veteran who had handled firearms during the battles of the war had his life stamped out by one simple mistake.

Another area about which I am concerned is the safe storage of firearms and ammunition. Part of the program of instruction dealt with the prime concern that every owner keep firearms out of the reach of children, by keeping the guns locked up in a place separate from the ammunition. I understand the concern of the hon. member who introduced this bill. According to his interpretation of the law, if somebody's home was broken into and the guns and ammunition removed, that person can be held responsible.

There was a case just a few weeks ago in which a policeman was shot and killed. The suspected individuals were apprehended near Orillia, after a trail of crime with ultimate tragic results which began near North Bay. I do not know whether the involved weapons had been properly stored, or the premises in which they were kept were forcibly entered. I suggest a review of this case could indicate necessary amendments or changes to relieve these problems. We should also review the matter from the standpoint that a break and enter occurred.

An area of concern to many hunters, particularly those in my area, is the right of the police to search and seize if they have reason to believe that the situation is dangerous. I understand the feelings of the policemen who must enter a tense situation, whether domestic or otherwise. The police are empowered to search for and seize guns in emotionally-charged situations of conflict. It enables them to deal effectively with the kind of situation which leads to almost two-thirds of the deaths caused by firearms each year in Canada. The intent of the legislation was to ensure that officers exercising such authority would explain to a court why it was impractical to obtain a search warrant in advance.

I understand the feelings of people who might be subject to search and seizure. I hope in the review which is under way that this particular section will be examined in detail, in order that it does not infringe upon the rights of normal law-abiding citizens. No doubt there are arguments for and against this point. I can understand the situation where a policeman is called to a crime as the result of some domestic dispute. Such an incident occurred this Christmas in my own village. A neighbour had visited another neighbour. I am not sure whether it was an emotional disturbance or whether it arose as a result of a celebration. The neighbour demanded a gun and was refused. The wife ran next door to call the police. In the meantime the fellow got a heavy rifle. When the unsuspecting police knocked on the door, it was opened and the neighbour fired. Luckily the police were not hurt, but an innocent bystander was injured.

I understand why legislators feel there must be an element of protection for persons who may be emotionally disturbed. The individual to which I just referred would never have considered doing such a thing under normal circumstances. Even though he went to another home to obtain a weapon, an innocent bystander was hurt.

I hope the evaluation being conducted by the Department of the Solicitor General considers such situations and will employ more acceptable and better-understood solutions for people in Canada who own weapons. I understand the study is examining the effects of the firearms provisions of the Criminal Code and that it is not merely confined to changes to the law passed in 1977. The review promised by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), following the completion of the evaluation study in 1982, will affect the review of the entire history of firearms control in Canada.

This study is a very important first step in the review. I hope to play a part in any further review and to reflect, as a Member of Parliament, the wishes of my constituents, taking into consideration the part played by law enforcement officers, average citizens, hunters, land and property owners. While I appreciate the strong interest of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland on this subject, I hope he understands the review would not be as useful as it would with the results of the study at hand. The time to make a decision on whether we should proceed with a review is when the evaluation study is made public.

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this matter, but I have the sinking feeling that for some reason—and I do not wish to be accusatory—government members intend to talk this bill out. Frankly, I find that very disturbing; I might even be so naive as to say that I find it rather surprising. I compliment the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) on introducing the bill. I believe that a review is necessary. This bill is consistent with the measure put on the order paper by the hon. member when he was solicitor general. At the time there was not a peep of complaint from the opposition party of the day.

If I understand the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson), the review is premature in light of the ongoing study in the Department of the Solicitor General. I do not wish to criticize public servants in that department who are allegedly conducting this study because I do not know what they are doing or whether they received direct instruction from the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to do a complete and expeditious study of the legislation under the Criminal Code as it affects gun control. I have no idea, and I will likely never find out.

However, rather than use this as an excuse to postpone a review, I would far sooner compare this situation to a similar motion which dealt with Canadian penitentiaries. Had we waited for the Department of the Solicitor General to conduct a review of the penitentiaries, we would all be serving life terms because it would never come. At that time a Liberal government was in power, so I am not being partisan.

• (1740)

At that time we were able to prevail upon the then solicitor general to say, "We have a Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, so let us give it a House order which will enable it to establish a subcommittee. Let it travel, let it call expert witnesses, and let it have the necessary staff."

Those of us who were exposed to that process said to ourselves at the completion of it, "This is the way the House of Commons and parliamentarians should work." We did not say that as Liberals, as Conservatives or as members of the NDP, we said it as parliamentarians.

At that time I detected a great lift in the morale of parliamentarians because they were part of a process that was not partisan. They travelled night and day and worked night and day in not too attractive surroundings and in an atmosphere not too conducive to morale, that of the Canadian penitentiaries.

I thought the report that was produced was an outstanding piece of parliamentary work. My friends opposite were members of that committee and there was a member of the NDP, a bitter political foe, Stu Leggatt, who now serves in the British Columbia legislature, who virtually put his heart into the report.

I have a terrible feeling now that there is some resistance over there—for what reason I do not know—to permitting a good and viable institution, a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, to fulfil a mandate not to criticize, not to change the legislation, but to review it.

We have all been the recipients of complaints about this legislation. I am concerned when I hear of the number of violent deaths increasing in metropolitan Toronto because the same might happen in my home town of Stratford. I have not yet seen the report of our police force for 1980.

I am sure my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is not one to say, as I am not, that this is all bad or this is all good. He said that we should create a vehicle in which parliamentarians could work together diligently and effectively to review this legislation. The operative word—and it was used twice—is "reviews"; not to change, not to amend, not to abrogate, but to review.

We all enjoy partisan politics—I as much as anyone—but surely in the context of having the president of the penitentiary committee before us, the government will not be so inflexible and dogmatic as to prevent that vehicle from instituting what I am sure hon. members on all sides feel is a very worth while project for parliamentarians and not necessarily only for public servants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this discussion, and I welcome the initiative of the hon. member opposite in raising this matter again.

When Bill C-51 was introduced in 1977, it was necessarily controversial and there were strong differences of opinion between those who wanted more rigorous gun controls and those who wanted fewer or no controls. In my constituency at that time people were very exercised because of a murder which had been committed by a person who was obviously mentally disturbed. He was able to buy a gun without question, took that gun and shot some innocent passersby. I remember very vividly the strength of the convictions and the views of those who felt that there surely was a case for making it extremely difficult for people to obtain guns.

At the same time, a colleague from British Columbia received a letter from a farm wife who was very worried in case the government made it too difficult for people to buy and store guns. This farmer wrote about a situation where a wolf had come on her property and she was able to save her child's life, only because she had immediate access to a loaded gun.

These regional differences had to be reconciled at that time and because there was no way to reach a solution which would be satisfactory to everyone, the government undertook to continue reviewing and evaluating the program.

A three-year evaluation and study is now being done under the aegis of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) by a consultant firm in co-operation with the provinces. I understand it is a very broad study which will examine all firearms provisions in the Criminal Code, not only the amendments put in place by Bill C-51.

The final report will be available in 1982 but there will be two interim reports. I suppose the question before us today is whether the reference to the standing committee recommended by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) is more useful if done now or when at least the interim report is available.

Those of us who were dealing with Bill C-81 in many cases found ourselves somewhat handicapped by lack of statistics. For instance, Statistics Canada did not start collecting data on a regular basis on the use of firearms in connection with crime in general until 1974, even though there were useful figures available before that on homicides involving firearms.

Although Bill C-51 was introduced in 1977, the changes to the restricted weapons system came into force on January 1, 1978, the amnesty recall program was in November, 1978, and the firearms acquisition certificate and business permits system took effect on January 1, 1979. In effect, if there were a reference to the standing committee at this point, we would be dealing with the experience of two years and would be without the benefit of the interim report on the study.

As the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson) pointed out, Canadian law has controlled firearms in one manner or another for more than 100 years. This is something which seems to be lost sight of because many people think that Bill C-81 was the beginning of firearms control in Canada. The first permit system for carrying a small arm outside one's residence or place of business was introduced in 1892, and by 1934 the law required the registration of all handguns. Controls on long guns had to wait for the 1977-78 amendments, although there were some changes in 1968.

Canada is fortunate in having had control of possession and use of small guns for the past 50 years, and it is important that these controls be maintained. The low handgun ownership rate probably accounts for the relatively low rate of homicide by handguns. If handguns are not readily available they cannot be stolen, misused, accidentally used or used for suicide; and suicide has to concern us as much as the use of handguns in murders, whether criminel murders or family murders.

If the level of ownership of handguns is very low, citizens will not feel they have to acquire them for protection. We have seen the unfortunate situation in the United States where law-abiding citizens feel that they have to own handguns for protection. In some cases, those guns are used against them by robbers.

● (1750)

Long guns, however, are now playing a significant part in homicides. It is reckoned that about one-third of homicides in Canada are committed with long guns. The new controls instituted in 1977 do at least provide us with a more effective way of limiting the number of those homicides. Perhaps it is particularly important to be concerned about long guns because they can be sawn off and used as handguns. Sometimes the ammunition for long guns is interchangeable with other types of ammunition. Controls tend to emphasize that any type of gun is dangerous and must be handled with care. This is not to impose unnecessary restriction on sportsmen who use their guns responsibly. In fact, much of the public's education on the use of guns has been initiated by sportmen's associations. One program in particular, organized by the province of Ontario in conjunction with sportmen's associations, is considered to have had important effects in reducing accidental deaths and injuries from the use of long guns.

As the member opposite pointed out, many people are concerned about the human rights implications of the present law. Of course, this is always a very difficult judgment call to make. The law gives police authority to search for guns in certain cases of domestic disputes when they have reason to fear a person is out of control and may be in possession of a gun. An officer who uses this authority is required to make a return to a court explaining why it was not practical to obtain a search warrant in advance. Needless to say, we would not want to see any further erosion of the principle that one's home is a place where a person is entitled to privacy. On the other hand, if an officer's action prevents a murder or a suicide, there would be a very grateful family.

Two-thirds of all killings by firearms in Canada still occur as a result of family disputes or so-called crimes of passion. These are dangerous situations, emotionally charged usually as a result of an issue between people who know each other well.

The question of suicide also arises in many of these cases. I agree it is a difficult judgment call for the officer. If one can find some better way of not only ensuring the protection of people's privacy, but also protection of human life, perhaps we should look at this again.

The question of safety continues to be an important one. When citizens become concerned about gun laws, they think primarily of guns being used by criminals in the course of other crimes. The last figure I have been able to find for that shows that about 7 per cent of killings as a result of gun use occur in the context of other crimes.

The amendments to Bill C-81 provided for the courts to impose sentences in the case of people in possession of a gun while committing another crime. The courts do seem to be using this provision which provides for punishment after the crime, but of course does not deal with the more important question of preventing such crimes.

Firearms acquisition certificates are considered generally to be reasonably hard to obtain in the sense that they cannot be obtained by a person on impulse. Evidence of character must be provided. However, criminals will always have their own sources in one way or another to obtain firearms. I am not sure that one can provide legislation to prevent any and every illegal act. It does seem as though the amendments which have been put in place by Bill C-81 up to now have provided us with improved controls and as well some useful mechanisms for their continuation.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the few remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). First I would like to give him some statistics since he claims it has become urgent to review the current legislation which has been in force for only a few years. I would point out to him that 18 murders were committed in 1975. I will quote a Statistics Canada publication which shows that in 1979 there were nine murders committed with only one type of firearm. It is a table entitled "Number, type of firearms and murders, by region and sex of victim, 1975-1979". I fail to see how anyone can conclude that such a study is urgent, since figures reveal that the total amount of murders with firearms did not go up but down. Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to my colleague that our intention is not to delay until doomsday a study which we believe is necessary, since it is now being conducted by an independent firm which will submit its report to the government in 1982. I think that the government is being dutiful in discharging its responsibilities. When the legislation was passed the minister specified that indeed it would have to be reviewed. The current study, which will take a few years if it is to mean anything at all, is being carried out by an independent firm. I do not quite see how the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs could study the same issue at the very moment when other individuals, who are totally independent and without any political interest, are conducting the same study in a scientific fashion.

I might also point out to my colleague that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs must now direct its efforts toward the access to information bill and I think that measure needs the close scrutiny of the committee members. I sit on that committee, and I will make it my duty to give it the best of my knowledge and to participate in the study of such an important piece of legislation. That is why we on the government side believe that undertaking such a study would be premature. On the other hand, I would like to tell my colleague that although that subject is being reviewed by experts outside the government, it might be studied by the committee next year. I think it is at that time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I apologize for interrupting the hon. parliamentary secretary, but it is now six o'clock.

[English]

It has been suggested, with the consent of hon. members, that we might move to Committee of the Whole, so that when the House returns at eight o'clock it will then be in Committee of the Whole.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

The Chairman: The House again in Committee of the Whole for the study of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

[English]

When the committee rose at five o'clock, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal had the floor.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock I was concluding my remarks with regard to the potential of the oil shale and natural gas fields in Albert county of New Brunswick. I was explaining how unfortunate it was that exploration investment money was being driven out of this country by the policies of the government. I had asked the minister to re-examine the policies to comply with the requests of provincial authorities, as well as those I have made at various times in this House, and to give some thought to exploring, and possibly exploiting, potential oil in the province of New Brunswick.

I wish to deal with an extraordinary group of people throughout this country. They form a substantially small group compared to the manufacturers and others with lobby groups that are heard. This group of individuals is critical to the nation. They farm the land and grow the food to feed Canadians.

This group is facing undue hardships. Interest rates are rising, apparently uncontrolled. The government has demonstrated a lack of interest in the problems they face. They must deal with rising fuel costs, labour problems and other hardships. They should be given special consideration.

If interest rates cannot be controlled, some consideration should be given to the difficulties in which they find themselves. They are experiencing dwindling profits, if any at all. We will be in dire straits if this group of very valuable individuals, the small farmers of the country, is no longer able to carry on because of the financial difficulties it is experiencing.

Assistance could be given in a way such as was suggested by the previous government. I refer to capital gains considerations, a matter which has been raised on several occasions by my colleagues. Members of the party to my left made reference to certain individuals in this party who are in favour of abolishing capital gains. I would classify myself as one of those. It is true that those who have money are able to make more money out of circumstances such as that. However, what is wrong with a climate where people with money are prepared to invest it at home so that other people can work, feed their families and enjoy all of the good things which this country should be able to provide for them? Unfortunately, what we have in the mini-budget and budget is a conglomeration of political wing-dingery which will not come to grips with the problems facing the nation. This nation has the greatest potential of any on the face of the earth. However, we find ourselves in dire circumstances with a very bleak future. There must be a change in rationale.

I ask the minister to re-examine these policies which are driving this country down the path of economic and social chaos, policies formed over the past number of years and still fostered by the government. We need new and innovative policies to lead us out of this dead end street which can only lead to economic and social collapse.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, as this is the second opportunity I have had to speak on clause 1 of Bill C-54, I will be fairly brief. There are a few matters I want to place on record prior to the in-depth clause by clause study of this legislation. I want to review with the committee a couple of motions under Standing Order 43 which I had the pleasure to move and to make some representations in the hope that the government will take action in these areas. It is obvious there is a great deal of concern among all Canadians over the inaction of our friends opposite. We find in reality that the budgetary proposals they have brought forward will do very little for many sectors of our society. This government has set a number of records in its term of office; a number of records of which it should not be very proud and a number of records it should bring forward legislation to counteract.

● (2010)

When we view the record of this government, we find under this administration we have record high interest rates, record high government spending, record high budgetary deficits, record high unemployment, record high taxation, record high inflation, and our dollar is at its lowest level in years. It is for that reason I moved my motion today.

We note from the reports brought forward by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that a record number of individual enterprises, businesses, individuals and corporations are facing bankruptcy in Canada. The figures that department has come forward with show that over-all bankruptcies in Canada were up some 17.3 per cent in 1980 as compared to 1979. As far as individuals are concerned, bankruptcies are up some 23.4 per cent, and business failures are up some 28.9 per cent from a year earlier. It is because of the inaction of this Liberal administration that so many sectors of our society are facing the difficulties they are facing today.

We brought forward a number of initiatives in the budget we presented when in government, and I am happy to see that a number of those initiatives have been accepted and were included in the budget recently brought down by the Minister of Finance.

There is one segment of our society which may be more notable than others on fixed incomes facing severe problems and difficulties, that is, the single parent sector. That sector accounts for approximately 9 per cent of our family population, and about 50 per cent of these individuals who are single parents have income levels below the poverty line. I should hope the government would give some special consideration to these individuals facing so many difficulties.

An hon. member of the New Democratic Party on Friday—and I cannot recall the specific individual's constituency—brought forward a motion pertaining to this very important problem. Hon. members came forward with a number of suggestions as to how we might help these individuals, not only in the area of taxation, but in the area of other legislation which pertains to them.

It is obvious when we note the actions of the minister responsible for the status of women, that callous attitude with which he treated the status of women group, he does not have any specific or sincere concern for them.

I hope the government will adopt a number of the recommendations these very valuable groups have come forward with, not only in respect of taxation measures, but in respect of other measures which affect single-parent families.

Coming from western Canada I should like to put on record some of the grievances individuals have in that area. While some of the topics I will touch upon do not directly deal with the legislation before us, I hope to connect those remarks to the clauses that pertain to this legislation.

The prairie region has fought long and bitterly against the colonial conditions imposed upon it by the populous and politically powerful region of central Canada. If forced to fight again it will. Today it is absolutely convinced that the tax policies of our Minister of Finance and the energy plans of our minister responsible for energy imply a reversion to the west's old colonial status. The west will not resume the role of a colony without resistance.

We not only have the budgetary measures as they pertain to energy, we also have the constitutional proposals which in essence make us in the western provinces, in fact all those provinces outside Quebec and Ontario, second-class citizens.

Let me just go back into a bit of the history. Historically the political and commercial powers of the centre have always merged their interests; the management of the resources of western Canada for the benefit of the central commercial empire of Canada was and is their principal joint venture. The mutual benefit from the merger was control of the resources of the prairies for the commercial benefit of the industries of the centre and the concurrence electoral support for industry's political allies in the east where it really counted. Both stood to win. The fact that the west stood to lose was a regrettable side effect that resulted from the nature of the nation.

Inescapably the purposes of the dominion and the national interest were and are still defined by the economic and political power blocs of central Canada. In 1867 one of the terms of the confederation of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia was that each province would own and control the natural resources within its borders. In 1870 the region which is now the three prairie provinces was transformed from a trapping and trading preserve of the Hudson's Bay Company and became a colony of the newly-confederated provinces. That same year Manitoba was converted from a colony to a province, but it was not a province like the others. The provinces of Canada owned and controlled their natural resources but Manitoba did neither. Manitoba was really a colony.

In 1905 Alberta and Saskatchewan were carved out of the colonial territories and called provinces but, like Manitoba, they were not permitted to assume ownership and control of their own natural resources. Their resources were retained by Ottawa for the purposes of Canada.

In 1930 anger, agitation, alienation, hostility and periodic talk of separation earned their reward. The ownership and control of natural resources were finally transferred to the prairie provinces. Only in the past 50 years have these provinces been equal partners to the founding partners.

The term "colony" is used carefully. The reality is that the resources of the three provinces were unblushingly used by central Canada for political power and commercial imperialism. For Manitoba's 60 years as a colony it had no adequate real or potential source of provincial revenue. Saskatchewan and Alberta were in a similar state. The three prairie provinces went into the depression and drought of the 1930s in terrible financial situation as a result of the public debt they built up, while Ottawa was looting their land and resources.

Surely viewing history any public policymaker would move with great care. Resource control in the prairie region, as a consequence of past experience, would clearly be viewed as a sensitive and potentially divisive issue. The west has always had to fight the central Canada instinct that western resources belonged to the east. For the long-term interests of Canada that may have been a good policy. Perhaps a strong industrial and commercial heartland was crucial to nation building, but what must be recognized is that, rightly or wrongly, the western provinces see ownership, control and management of resources as their only hope for equity, if they are to sit in on a game which has been fixed against them. The ability to control these resource is absolutely fundamental to the ability of the three provinces to manage their own economies. In the case of oil and gas, they cannot control price, and this quite evidently weakens their ability to manage their own affairs. If, in addition, a court should find they cannot determine the rate of production of oil, or any other resource, the prairie provinces joined by British Columbia will revert once again to being colonies of central Canada.

It may be that Ottawa can get a favourable ruling from a court or, through its declaratory powers, can dictate the rate of production of the oil fields of Alberta, but Ottawa would be remarkably foolish if it considered it. What Ottawa needs is not a legal justification but an understanding of the legitimacy of western Canadian concerns.

It would be useful if reason, justice and real understanding of prairie experience could be introduced into the discussions between Alberta and Ottawa. They would be a pleasing substitute for the cleverness of the Ottawa policy planners and for the skilful and cynical massaging of words by the public relations specialists in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

It would be helpful if Ontario came to understand how dangerous western alienation is to Ontario's long-term economic interests. But the real onus is on Ottawa. The real onus is on our friends across the way because Ottawa must learn that sharing, fairness and equity—words so freely used in the National Energy Program—are something more than verbal daggers to wound a debating foe.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Chairman, when I last spoke about Bill C-54, I had an opportunity to deal with two of the chief deficiencies in this bill and, indeed, two of the chief deficiencies in the act this bill seeks to amend. Those dealt with the general absence of fair play and equity which apply to both taxpayer and Minister of National Revenue alike. I also drew attention to the fact that in its present form this bill does nothing to alleviate the absolute inability the average taxpayer of this country, as defined by the act, has in understanding the terms of the act. I suggested at that time that it was the obligation of this House to draft laws which, if they are to be obeyed, are at least to be understood.

The Income Tax Act sought to be amended by Bill C-54 has its legal foundation and justification in Section 91(3) of the British North America Act, which permits the federal government to impose any tax by any mode or system of taxation, and it refers to the opening paragraph of Section 91 of that act, which grants to the federal government the right to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

The Income Tax Act has been used since its predecessor was enacted in September of 1917, originally as a temporary measure, for the purpose of achieving something other than the actual raising of revenues. It has been used for social purposes, and it has been used for the purpose of directing industrial or commercial activities on the part of Canadians. We know that the act has been used in that sense for the purpose of establishing the right of deductions for charitable donations, dependent deductions, and manufacturing and processing incentives. It at one time contained a provision to induce the Canadian public to engage in the very risky business of searching for mines and minerals by providing a tax exempt receipt system which applied to prospectors and those who grubstaked them. Those provisions no longer exist, presumably on the theory that it is no longer necessary to induce people to search actively and take the risks involved in searching for mines and minerals. There was a three-year holiday for mining companies between the time that a mine began to produce minerals in commerical quantities and the time when they became taxable. Similarly, that provision has been eliminated.

I use those illustrations to show that the purpose of the act has not been exclusively to raise revenues but, rather, to direct policies which are in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Accordingly, I come to the major objection to which I should like to draw the attention of the House this evening. My objection is that this bill fails by omission to deal with one of the most essential issues that should confront the government and this House. The bill makes no reference to sections 117 and 123 of the act, which provide the rates of taxation which are to apply to individuals and corporations. Our nation today is beset by high inflationary pressures and by interest rates which are, by their very nature, almost confiscatory in terms of their effect upon the business community in Canada. Because of inflation rates that run in excess of 11 per cent, individuals as employees who have gainful employment will stampede to extract from their employers additional revenues so that they may at least keep pace with the growth of inflation in Canada which the government appears unable to control. An uneasy circumstance will exist which will give rise to industrial disputes and work stoppages, which will have a detrimental effect on our ability as a nation to produce and sell our goods abroad and rectify the imbalance in our international payments.

These circumstances ought to direct the attention of the government to a very simple process, and that process must be the reduction of taxes. Even without current pressures which will be brought upon the Canadian economy it is just and reasonable, having regard to internal problems faced by Canadians, that adjustments of a substantial downward nature be made in the rates of tax imposed against Canadian enterprise and Canadian individuals.

The vast amount of tax raised through the Income Tax Act is raised from individuals and not from large corporations or small business corporations in Canada. Of the large amount of taxes raised from individuals, over 70 per cent, according to Revenue Canada's latest statistics, come from employees. If rewarded for their effort by a reduction in the federal government grab, these employees would be in a better position to increase the money supply at their disposal so that they might generate jobs for their fellow Canadians and put a much needed stimulus into the Canadian economy.

The Income Tax Act contains a provision which obliges employers to deduct and remit to Revenue Canada on a regular pay basis that portion of the income tax and Canada Pension Plan contributions which must be made by individual taxpayers who are employees. Without that provision it is doubtful that this country could last one year without a tax revolt. Taxpayers do not realize the immense amount of money they pour into the Treasury or the Consolidated Revenue Fund administered by the Government of Canada. It may be painless to them individually on a weekly, bi-weekly or monthly basis, but the hundreds of millions of dollars which are extracted in this fashion, the billions of dollars which go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, could best be spent by the people who earn the money, rather than by the government which has shown in the past every inclination to waste it. We could recite illustrations of that for the rest of the evening.

One of the great undertakings of the Prime Minister and of the current government is the creation of an international redistribution of wealth to be carried out under the guise of meeting commitments under the North-South dialogue. This country, through the generosity of its taxpayers who were certainly not consulted about the process, is pumping $1.2 billion annually into foreign aid. We have seen a recent illustration of that in an announcement today that Zimbabwe is to receive $50 million over a period of ten years. That, of course, is but a small illustration of the constant flow of funds from Canada to foreign nations, many of which are under the control of dictatorial regimes which have no respect for the ordinary, generally accepted principles of human dignity. Many of these nations, which operate under a one-party system and therefore might correctly be called dictatorships, have no reference to the democratic system, yet our government persists in the view that it is absolutely essential for us to make these commitments. To what end are we making these commitments?

In 1977 we saw an illustration of the way in which some of these funds were distributed, not directly by CIDA but by another government agency, namely, the Export Development Corporation, measurably assisted by Canadians. It was a loan of some $67 million, as I recall, to Inco which developed a mine in Guatemala as a result of which the work of miners in the Sudbury area was no longer essential because that company could acquire its raw materials at a cheaper price from Guatemala. What we see here is the citizens of this country paying with their tax dollars to put their fellow citizens out of work. That is exactly how the North-South dialogue will work and how the new international order will work. I think the public should be made well aware of it. Having put their fellow citizens out of work, the public was requested to contribute to the Consolidated Revenue Fund so that unemployment insurance payments may be made to those very people whom they caused to be unemployed.

It is the height of folly; it is something which, as individual donors, very few taxpayers in Canada—certainly no one who used his head—would pursue on an individual basis. I suggest to the government that the people best able to attend to the administration of their funds are the taxpayers of Canada. I suggest to the government, if it really believes there is a crying, urgent need expressed by the people of this country to assist others, it let them assist themselves by setting up a machinery whereby donations can flow in from the pocketbooks of those from whom the funds are now extracted by law. They should be asked to make the donations which their government now makes on their behalf.

I made reference to this after commenting upon the provisions of the British North America Act. I question the legality of the Government of Canada imposing taxes by any mode or system if it is not for the peace, order and good government of Canada. I recognize that Section 92 in dealing with the right of the provinces to extract direct taxation is confined to the use of those tax funds for purely provincial purposes. The same does not appear in Section 91, but the implication is there.

If we were at the point where we were last year, the issue would not be as significant as it is today. I asked the Minister of Finance in the House on November 17, 1980, the following question:

> In light of the change in government which we anticipate in the United States as the result of the recent election there and some of the specific promises by the president-elect to reduce taxation, despite the fact that the minister's budget was recently passed by this House, is it his intention to reduce taxes in Canada in order to correspond with intended tax reductions in the United States, so as to offset the magnet-like effect of attracting business in North America to those jurisdictions with the lowest tax rates?

The minister responded by saying that I was fully aware of the fact that the budget contained a provision for indexing. He might have gone on to say, although he did not, that he promised in his budget the great deductions would be indexed for 1981, but there was no promise for any future year.

Business is attracted to a climate which welcomes it, and the greatest welcome comes from an area in which that business may be conducted allowing it as much of a profit at the end as possible. Such a country is the United States. They will in fact reduce taxes across the board for individuals and for corporations, while our government stands still and does nothing. We need the enterprise and the investment of Canadians. Business must develop in Canada so as to offer jobs, not only to those who do not have them now, but to those who are coming into the work force and who desperately look to this government to lead the way. Instead of creating that climate, the government has turned its back on what is reasonable. It insists upon maintaining a high tax level in Canada so that business expansion will not develop here but will go elsewhere to a place where it is welcome, to a place where jobs will be offered to Americans and not to Canadians. Once the process is begun, it is extremely difficult to retard or reverse it. This government has given no indication that it is even interested in what is going to happen, and yet the handwriting is on the wall.

When Premier Davis journeyed to Japan two years ago, he was met by an observation from the Japanese to the effect that it was pointless to suggest that they invest in Canada because here the rates of taxation were too high for them. We are begging the Japanese to invest in our country; I think that is shameful in itself. We should be investing in our country ourselves, but after the great grab by the federal government, there is little left for anyone to invest. But they told us exactly what their position was. If one examined the foreign aid donations of Japan, one would find they are not as great in terms of their gross national product as are ours.

If one examines the percentage of donations to foreign aid by the United States, one will find that it is markedly less than ours. It is less than half. What has happened is that we are giving our money away so we can go to foreign nations and beg them to invest in our country. The whole situation is crazy. We should be encouraging Canadians to develop their own nation. Why would we ask Japan to come and develop our nation? They have been shrewd enough to look after their own finances well. Is it so that we can then let the dividends and profits from the generation of the business which they might hopefully establish here flow to the United States or Japan?

I earnestly beg the government to look at this issue and to give it the attention it deserves.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I think my remarks tonight will follow very closely the closing peregrinations of the hon. member for York North. Before I get to those remarks, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Mississauga South who very quietly this afternoon, with tremendous knowledge of the detail with which the program works, asked again for the third or fourth time that the government give serious consideration in this bill to the extension of the time allowed for the Small Business Development Bonds. It is only one of the items with which the Crosbie budget tried to reduce taxes on things people needed so that more money would be spent, more jobs would occur and more money would flow back to the taxpayer. It is a very simple request which the member for Mississauga South makes. Even if the government were to extend the expiry date a year he would be grateful. I personally wish they would extend it for at least five years and give small business, whether it be on the farm or in the city, a chance to use development money at about one-half the present interest rate. Within a year or so the government would find that the income flowing back from this program would be much greater than any loss they might suffer.

This is the third time I have spoken with respect to this legislation. I had a list of 13 subjects, but I think this will be the last. I wish to follow the theme expressed by the hon. member who just took his seat. If the task of the Minister of Finance and his official at this time in the economic history of Canada is to balance the budget, to get the country growing and expanding, the way it should be done is to take advantage of the evidence which is before the government, that is, tax rates in Canada today are not competitive with our main competitors. We can assume that is right without giving examples.

I have seen this growing over a number of years. The hon. member took advantage of that fact by mentioning the mineral industry. We developed a great mining industry in Canada by establishing a three-year tax exemption. This was to allow the mining industry time to pay off its debt and reduce its interest rate charges to a point where it could show some profit on its whole investment. Since that three-year exemption was removed, I have seen Canadian mining investment money move to other countries where they receive a higher return on their investment. The mining industry is one which is largely Canadian-owned.

I would like to give an example where this has taken place. Two of our largest industrialized types of companies, Algoma Steel and Steel Company of Canada in Hamilton, were engaged in a joint operation of developing what would have been the biggest iron mine in the world, north of Ignace, Ontario. In 1973 the provincial government got greedy and tripled the tax rate on large mines from 15 per cent to 45 per cent. Other provinces right through to the west coast did the same thing. In 1974 the federal government stepped in and in its two budgets of 1974 declared that provincial taxes and royalties were non-deductible. There was a 45 per cent tax by the province on a mining operation in a remote area north of Ignace, which is 200 miles from Thunder Bay, the federal government jumped in with a 42 per cent to 50 per cent tax rate, which was also non-deductible, then the effective tax load on that mining operation was over 90 per cent—45 per cent to the province and 42 to 50 per cent to the federal government, depending on the mine's income level. So those two large Canadian companies moved quietly across the border into Minnesota. They invested a billion dollars into developments of low-grade taconite, and today Canada imports raw iron from the United States. This puts Canadians out of work because of our tax laws.

Surely that is enough evidence in that one case alone, which affected the province of Ontario, where both the provincial government and the federal government in their quarrel and fight for revenues destroyed a very promising industry. This has all been admitted in the House. When the Hon. Don Macdonald was minister of finance he agreed this was so. He said we would have to obtain peace between the provinces and the federal government over this heavy taxation on resource industries.

At that particular time, when Mr. Tommy Douglas was in the House, the NDP were with the Conservatives asking for lower tax rates on resource industries. Now the NDP has allied themselves with this government. We have the two of them systematically driving industries out of this country. They then have the gall to turn around and complain that these companies in Ontario are importing iron from Minnesota, putting Canadians out of work. Who drove them out? This philosophy of driving taxes higher and higher to meet the demands of government drove two Canadian-owned, Canadian-controlled companies into development in high-priced ore in Minnesota. At least there they could make a profit out of their operations. But if they developed that iron ore in Canada they would lose money. I am simply saying the principle of reducing taxes to get more money is not only proven by quantitative analysis in almost every country in the western world, but it is clearly proven here in Canada where our tax rates are no longer competitive with the main competitors.

I want to conclude this series of hopefully constructive speeches on my part with how we can encourage Canadians to invest in their own country, to own their own companies in Canada as individuals and to make more money for the tax collector by investing in common shares. With present high interest rates all our large companies, in their fight for survival against these high interest rates, must shift from borrowing money at fixed rates to equity. Massey-Ferguson is putting out 30 million or 40 million new shares. Hopefully they can get rid of them. Stelco is moving into equity, as is Dofasco. In order to save themselves all our big companies must move into equity or they will be down the tube, just like the car companies. It is not only a question of bad management in borrowing money at these interest rates, but it is also a question of who it was who forced those interest rates up. It was a series of governments which did not measure on the basis of quantitative analysis of what was best, but on what the textbooks said one should do. Thus, we have this mad rush toward higher interest rates. The American nitwits, believing in the same rules and textbooks, are doing the same thing. This has been made clear by nearly everyone across this country, yet we have this determination to commit hara-kiri, suicide, or whatever one wants to call it, in the economic field. The very unique 1979 budget came out and gave a whole series of small examples on reducing taxation. One of them was on this question of encouraging Canadians to go into common stocks.

Of course, there will not be as much money in the beginning, but then there will not be a load on the company as it is developing. When the profits finally come the return from equity will be much bigger than the return from bonds. I would like to take the liberty of quoting for the record the proposal outlined in the 1979 budget which was defeated. I am quoting from page 11 of the budget papers, which reads as follows:

> That for the 1980 and subsequent taxation years, a Canadian common stock investment plan for individual investors resident in Canada be introduced in respect of which the following rules will apply:
> (a) an investor may have only one plan at any time,
> (b) up to $20,000 may be contributed to the plan in 1980, thereafter annual contributions may not exceed $10,000 and total net contributions may not exceed $100,000,
> (c) the investments of the plan will be restricted to certain short-term debt obligations and to securities of taxable Canadian corporations that are common shares, warrants or rights in respect of such shares or shares that are convertible into common shares provided that such securities are listed on a prescribed stock exchange in Canada.

It goes on to say that dividends, interest and so on will be taxable. Every member of this House wishes to see—and the government has announced it as a priority—that Canada's resources are owned by Canadians. We know that these resources cannot be owned successfully by Crown corporations. We have the experience of the whole world and, indeed, of Canada to demonstrate that fact. The answer is to let millions of common Canadians invest in common stock, if I may use the word twice, so that they may own as individuals. As individuals who own investments in these companies, they will watch carefully and maintain the pressure to ensure that there is efficiency and growth within the company.

The omission from the present budget of that program, parts of which I just quoted, means the loss of a glorious opportunity for Canadians to own more of their country through buying individual shares. Of course, they would expect to receive a larger return later on than if they were to buy bonds. We have all learned over these past ten years that any person who buys a bond is cutting his financial throat and will lose his money because of inflation. But here is a way of fighting inflation, of putting more people to work, producing more goods and, thereby, more revenue for the government to help reduce our deficit. The government could then look for other ways to reduce taxes.

The question of common shares has been in my mind ever since I came to this House. If one looks at the regulations put forward in 1957 with regard to oil, gas and minerals in the north one will be proud, as I was. I waited for so long for Canadians to have the opportunity to own their own country as individuals, instead of our industry being owned primarily by people outside the country. For example, in the case of our oil the provincial government regulations turned our oil industry over to foreign companies. But on the Canada lands which were controlled by the federal government, Canadians would have the first chance to own and control the resources as well as receiving the bulk of the revenues. Those oil and gas regulations were brought up to date and improved in 1976 and supported by my party.

To see those regulations destroyed through the legislation which came before Parliament this year was simply cruel. All the advances toward the objective of Canadian ownership, which is the purpose of the government, were destroyed by that legislation. This debate has been going on for several days, and the government has been very good in allowing hon. members to speak their minds. Most of the members who have spoken have tried their level best to put forward positive suggestions.

There has been the suggestion that the government try to save the Small Business Development Bond. I know that it is too late to go back and put in a section with regard to common shares. The time factor is too great. I hope the Minister of Finance and the government supporters behind him will remind each other over the next few months, before the next budget in the spring, to put that proposal back into the budget. Then all those other devices of reducing taxes and producing more to obtain more money for the tax collector will help to fight inflation, balance the budget and get this country back in shape.

This is not my view alone. An election was fought in the United States last fall on this very issue, and everybody laughed. They said, "Imagine reducing taxes to make more money, how ridiculous". However, there is the precedent in the United States in 1963-1964, and there are many more as well.

The first minister of finance to ever introduce such a proposal was the hon. member for St. John's West. I was not here for the budget speech, as everyone knows. However, after reading the budget paper, I realized that this was a very unique budget. Even though the government was defeated on that budget, I went out and spoke at meetings throughout my constituency and, although I found great excitement over the fact that the government had been defeated, there was an awful lot of sadness because the things for which I had fought and which had appeared in small measure in the budget had been voted down.

People had no trouble in saying that his was a good budget, or, at least, not too bad. It distressed me to see the election fought on issues which had no relationship to the fact that here was the first budget in Canadian history which was attempting to balance the budget by reducing taxes. As I have mentioned in the House before, the intellectuals of the English-speaking world will soon be teaching their classses about this unique budget. Before long, that viewpoint will go throughout the entire populous and will ultimately come back to Canada. Everybody knows what I meant when I told the Minister of Finance some weeks ago that I felt sorry for him because he had an economic policy which was suposed to be as disciplined as the 1979 budget, that he zigged when he should have zagged.

I ask the government to consider the proposals put forward by several hon. members with regard to the Small Business Development Bond and to do some real thinking with regard to the matters of capital gains, energy tax credits, reducing taxes in resource industries to increase production, reducing the taxes on the movement of energy and reducing the taxes on the more value-added industries because of cheaper energy in Canada. There is lots of energy in this country, we are a strong country. Let us get it on the go. Let us not muck up this country with the stupid idea that we must keep raising taxes and making tax laws more complicated in the hope of receiving more money, because there will not be any more money if the taxes are too high. I suggest in all seriousness, because we will be in this House together for four years, that we begin with this job right away or the opportunities which are before us now in this world of nations will be gone forever.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to endorse what the hon. member for Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain had to say about Canadian ownership of Canadian equity. Before becoming a Member of Parliament, I was involved for 20 years in the business community. I was president of a company which offered its common stock to the employees and encouraged them to buy it. No single action that company took in a period of 15 years was more positive and constructive to both the employees and the company than placing part of the ownership in the employees' hands. I might also say that there could be no more constructive force in the Canadian economy than placing equity in the hands of the Canadian people.

Just recently I returned from a visit to Sweden as a member of a task force which was investigating how Canada might improve trade with that country through a national trading corporation. Only a few years ago Sweden was held up as a model economy in the free world. I would urge all hon. members to go to Sweden today and see that model, that socialist experiment. It would be particularly interesting to my friends on my left.

In 1980 Sweden had a fiscal deficit of $18 billion. That is equivalent to a $50 billion fiscal deficit in Canada, yet Sweden has a population of only eight million people.

Mr. Sargeant: Do you know what you are talking about?

Mr. Thomson: In Sweden, if you earn $25,000 per year, you pay $13,000 in taxes. That means your marginal rate of tax is 75 per cent. If you earn $32,000, the marginal rate of tax is 85 per cent. That is the social experiment, Mr. Chairman. While I was in Sweden there was a rather large snowfall so I had to buy a pair of galoshes. They cost me 159 kroner or $50 Canadian. I could have bought them here for under $10.

Miss Jewett: What Calgary interest are you representing?

Mr. Thomson: The Swedes have nationalized the iron ore industry. They have nationalized the steel industry. They have nationalized their—

An hon. Member: We have done that.

Mr. Thomson: Does the hon. member want to listen or does he want to talk?

An hon. Member: I would like to listen to some sense.

Mr. Thomson: I thought it was my turn. Sweden has nationalized the steel industry, the coal industry and the shipbuilding industry. In 1970 their standard of living was the second highest in the free world; today it is twentieth. That is what the socialist experiment has done for Sweden.

Miss Jewett: They have had a Tory government for three years.

Mr. Thomson: They have the highest suicide rate in the world and one of the highest rates of alcoholism. What has the socialist experiment done for Sweden?

An hon. Member: Ruined it.

Mr. Thomson: This brings me to the question: Is Canada going down the same road?

An hon. Member: Oh, no!

An hon. Member: Oh, yes!

Mr. Thomson: No, Canada is not going down the same road! We are not living beyond our means! The Canadian government is not living beyond our means! We had no real growth in our country in 1980 and yet the level of government expenditures increased from $54 billion to $63.5 billion. In 1981-82 there will be a no-growth situation again, yet government expenditures will rise to $73.5 billion.

In 1980 the federal government took 25 per cent of the gross national product; in 1981-82 it intends to take 30 per cent of the gross national product.

What was it that caused Sweden to go downhill, Mr. Chairman? It happened because nobody cared enough to make the capital investment needed to create jobs. The government has taken so much money out of the economy that nothing was left with which to create capital investment. The same thing is happening in Canada. The Liberal government has made no effort whatsoever to restrain its expenditures.

Instead of focusing on growth and increasing the size of the economic pie, the Liberal government has focused on ways to take more and more revenue from the same size of pie and from a stagnating economy.

The Liberal government claims that it must have more revenue and that the revenue must come from the oil industry; that the oil industry is going to have to pay!

Mr. Chénier: That is what you wanted to do last year. The Canadian people would have paid.

Mr. Thomson: The sad part of this is that any knowledgeable authority—and I would not expect to find any on the other side of the House—would say that we must spend between $400 and $600 billion in the next ten years if we are to have the energy which will be required to fuel our economy. Yet the Liberal government tells us that it is not going to give industry the money to do that; that it is going to take it away from industry. That means there is no hope of energy security for the Canadian people. That is the policy of this government.

The October, 1980, budget of the Minister of Finance was not concerned with fiscal policy; it was simply a statement of the National Energy Program. Surely the cornerstone of any energy policy should be the assurance of supply for Canadians. That surely should be the most important consideration for the next ten to 20 years. Instead, the National Energy Program is a plan to penalize industry and discourage investment when it should be seeking ways to improve production and to eliminate the crude oil imports which in 1980 amounted to the staggering sum of $7.5 billion. It takes but a fraction of a second to say $7.5 billion, Mr. Chairman. But it is over 10 per cent of the gross spending of the federal government. It is 3 per cent of the gross national product. It is a staggering amount of money that does not need to be spent and that is the tragedy. Canada does not need to fork out $7.5 billion for imports when it could spend that money at home where it would create jobs and mean energy security for Canadians.

The worst part of this is the immorality of the government saying it is going to borrow $3 billion to subsidize the consumption of gasoline in this country, and that the Canadian people will assume that burden. That decision is immoral and there is no economic justification for it.

• (2110)

Assessments of the National Energy Program so far have indicated that the goal of self-sufficiency will not be reached by the end of this decade. Indeed, the National Energy Program itself will be a major hindrance to achieving this goal. How many people across Canada have said that time and time again? Is everybody in Canada out of step with the Liberal government and with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? Is everybody in Canada out of step with them?

Mr. Dingwall: No, only the oil industry.

Mr. Thomson: Who else? What about the Canadian Construction Association? What about the Canadian Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. Blais: How about Bill Davis?

Mr. Thomson: What about the bankers? Are they out of step?

An hon. Member: Tell us.

Mr. McKnight: There is not much point, you do not listen.

Mr. Thomson: The program is deficient on at least four major counts. First, the price of oil has not been increased sufficiently to promote conservation and to provide a return to the producer sufficient to promote exploration and development. Exploration capital is already leaving to seek higher returns elsewhere. Those are irrefutable facts.

Miss Bégin: The first one is easy to refute. Do you think people are dumb?

Mr. Thomson: There are none so blind that will not see.

Mr. Deans: You should coin that phrase.

Mr. Thomson: Second, the program is unrealistic in its treatment of western Canada. It fails to look upon the development of the west as a great opportunity for all Canadians.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Thomson: Nonsense? Go to Calgary, go to Edmonton, go to Estevan and see the rigs crossing the border. Watch the companies shutting down. For heaven's sake, open up your eyes.

An hon. Member: He is afraid to.

Mr. Collenette: There are more there this year than there were last year.

Mr. Thomson: You do not know what you are talking about.

Miss Bégin: Go easy. Listen to people.

Mr. Taylor: Go out and take a look.

Mr. Thomson: Third, the arbitrary and punitive thrust of the program makes it a focal point for forces that are attempting to divide the country.

Fourth, the program is a move to increase government involvement in the industry. This is a backward step. The oil and gas industry, as most industries, cannot be operated by government; governments cannot operate industry. Things are created and a country is built with entrepreneurial spirit whether or not hon. members want to believe it.

An hon. Member: Adam Smith lives again.

Mr. Thomson: The oil industry needs profit-orienting goals to produce continuing successful exploration and development.

Knowledgeable authorities throughout Canada have stated that the National Energy Program will leave Canada with substantially higher shortfalls in production in the 1980s, which will mean increased dependence on imported oil by 1985. Instead of seizing the opportunity for the oil and gas industry to make a substantial contribution to the economic growth of Canada, Canada's growth prospects under the National Energy Program are dismal, if not negative.

Some competent authorities have gone so far as to say the National Energy Program could be instrumental in producing a national economic disaster. At the core of the criticism of the National Energy Program is the issue of oil pricing and the attempt to isolate Canada from international energy markets.

The day after the Minister of Finance introduced his budget, I remember the headlines of the Economist in Britain. It read: "Canada resigns from the world." That is what we have done. Do you know of any other country in the industrialized free world which is pursuing the madness of energy prices at less than 50 per cent of world price, Mr. Chairman? Do you know of any other government in the world that is doing that? It is madness.

Miss Bégin: Is there any other country better than Canada?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Thomson: Canada must surely realize that this country is part of the world energy system. Do we not have to recognize that we are part of the world? Prices for petroleum will remain high. They will likely go higher. Given the relatively short life of our remaining oil reserves, Canada cannot afford to subsidize the consumption of such a valuable resource. I ask the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare to tell me which country is subsidizing the consumption of a scarce resource? Is any other country in the industrialized world subsidizing the consumption of a scarce commodity?

Miss Bégin: Name a better country than Canada.

Mr. Taylor: Alberta.

Mr. Thomson: I would not name it. I love this country. That has nothing to do with the economic policies put forward by the hon. member's government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomson: Only when Canadians establish the price of their petroleum resources near the levels at which most world petroleum is bought and sold will rational decisions regarding the production and consumption of petroleum be made in Canada. Prices must be higher if we are to conserve our scarce resources and continue to search in Canada for new discoveries rather than looking in the United States or elsewhere.

Mr. Andre: Or Senegal.

Mr. Thomson: Surely it makes sense to invest money in Canada rather than providing an incentive for companies to look abroad. Hon. members can laugh, but they will be laughing at the people who will be out of work as a result of the government's National Energy Program.

Apart from raising prices to achieve conservation, additional revenues received by the industry would encourage exploration. I could show hon. members case after case where the National Energy Program has had the effect of reducing producer netbacks to negative figures. In Saskatchewan and British Columbia it no longer pays to produce gas or oil from many fields. How can we possibly improve supply by making it uneconomic to produce and explore?

Higher oil prices now may ultimately be less expensive to Canada by speeding up energy resource development and reinforcing incentives toward conservation. The end result would be a reduced need for imports. Under the energy program the total burden of oil imports will eventually be borne through an additional tax on consumers of petroleum products, but in the interim taxpayers will continue to bear the burden of the rising costs of subsidies for oil imports. Reduced imports, therefore, would decrease government expenditures on subsidies. This would restore to the federal government some freedom of action in fiscal policy that a succession of federal deficits has taken away. A lower deficit with its reduced borrowing requirements would tend to reduce pressure on interest rates. I say to my friends on the left, "if you want lower interest rates, let us take a step in the right direction by reducing the federal deficit".

Borrowing requirements would tend to reduce the pressure on industry. The government would also have the option of cutting some income taxes. Heaven forbid we should ever cut income taxes. Such reductions could be made in individual income taxes or in manufacturers' sales tax. It is likely that an increase in petroleum prices substantially offset by tax reductions would not exacerbate inflation. We are all concerned with inflation. In addition to these considerations, it must be remembered that the cost of not raising prices might be actual shortages of petroleum products in the future.

Every region of Canada can benefit from the development of oil and gas resources in the western provinces, off the east coast and in the Arctic. The further development of other energy sources throughout this nation, whether from hydro-electric power, nuclear power or renewable sources, will also stimulate national economic growth. In past years, major development projects such as the TransCanada PipeLine, the resources boom of the 1950s and others have given Canada strong impetus to economic growth and have strengthened our nation tremendously. Let us pursue energy developments of the eighties in the same way, as a source of economic strength, as a key to rapid economic growth and increased productivity and as a spur to greater political and economic unity.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to be nearly as long, and I do not intend to discuss Sweden. However, I do not mind pointing out there is no doubt that with the introduction of the policies of the Conservative government in Sweden after the defeat of the social democratic party three years ago, Sweden did go downhill rapidly.

An hon. Member: He didn't know they had been defeated.

Mr. Deans: This not being the place to discuss that, I want to talk about conditions in Canada for a moment or two. I will deal with the matter I started to speak about on Friday last. Before I get to it, I want to raise with the minister, since we are talking about income tax, the tax rates paid by lower income earners in this country.

I was in Hamilton today to see constituents and to attend the funeral of a long time friend who served in the Ontario legislature for over 20 years. While there, a woman visited me in my constituency office in order to talk about problems that confront her. This woman, who works as a beauty parlour operator, earns approximately $6,000 a year. As she outlined her difficulties to me, it became very clear that on $6,000 one cannot afford to pay income tax.

This is a woman in her middle years, obviously independent and desirous of making her own way, not eager to become part of the statistics of government expense. She pointed out the rent she has to pay, her cost of food, which rises every day, her normal costs attached to living and her costs of going to work, providing uniforms and getting them cleaned. After adding up all those costs, what this woman really needed was the money she paid on income tax just to make ends meet.

The federal government should ask Alberta to give us a little of its oil money so that this poor woman will not have to pay income tax out of such a meagre wage. I listened to the hon. member for Calgary South speak about how the system works and the fact that the oil companies are not getting enough money, how they need more and more, and how they are going to raise their prices in order to get even more, which is considerably in excess of what they can use. It makes me think of this woman in my office pointing out to me her fixed costs over which she has absolutely no control. I wonder just where our priority ought to lie.

If the minister has an opportunity to respond, I ask him to share with us his thoughts on undertaking a review of the income tax structure at the lowest levels, for a start. Possibly it could be substantiated that our cut-off point is too low. In keeping with the obvious need, we should consider whether there are ways to introduce a higher level of personal deduction or some form of rebate or credit which would afford these people an opportunity to meet their commitments on a day-to-day basis. They just cannot make it.

Knowing the minister's interest in the matter, it is not necessary to go into detail. However, it galls me when a member of this place talks about the billions of dollars going into the coffers of the multinational oil companies to be taken out of this country and invested elsewhere. I think of this woman who was born in Canada, lived here all her life, has worked every day since her mid-teens and cannot make ends meet. The hon. member is prepared to raise her costs. This woman's heating costs will go up so that the multinational oil companies can take her money to invest in some other part of the world. I find that a difficult argument to accept. It is time that members of this House who raise matters of this kind got out of this place and spoke to those who built this country and cannot afford to pay any more. We should take a serious look at the system which now exists.

I read a story over the weekend which brought this back to mind. It is in the justice column of the November 17 issue of Maclean's magazine. I commend it to the minister as there is a certain amount of value to be gleaned from it. The story, written by Ann Silversides is headed "The Catch-22 of single parents on welfare".

This article states almost exactly what I raised in the House on Friday last. It speaks of the entrapment of people within the system and how difficult it is for them to get out of it. With a family to raise, they must find a job. They discover that women in the work force earn just slightly more than 50 per cent of that earned by men. Therefore, they must raise their family on an income considerably less than is normally considered to be required in order to survive in this country. This article confirms what I said on Friday when speaking on another piece of legislation.

I do not want to repeat myself unnecessarily, but we are facing difficult times in this country. There are ever-larger numbers who have to raise their families alone. Within the income tax structure and grant structures which flow from the distribution of income, we must find a way to support these people during their difficult transitional period, at the same time encouraging them to upgrade or use their current skills in order to fit into the work force. They should not have to choose between a job on one hand and welfare payments on the other. The vast majority would prefer to work. However, the income levels available to the majority of women are not enough to pay the bills. Unfortunately, because of the one-for-one ratio, if they accept a part-time job, they lose a dollar for every dollar they earn, placing them in a situation which deprives not only themselves, but their children. This interesting article refers to the problem of not being able to do for your kids what everybody else on the street is doing for theirs.

I just do not believe as I look at the billions and billions of dollars we spend and think of the tens of hundreds of billions of dollars we are projecting we will spend, and the fact that by and far the majority of that money, 99 per cent, will be raised in one way or another through the tax structure, that we cannot find a way here to undertake a meaningful review of the plight, first of the lady I spoke of whose income really does not afford her enough money to pay taxes, and of the people who, through no fault of their own in many cases, and in some cases perhaps even through a fault of their own, but who cares because it does not matter in the long run, are faced with poverty and with the problem of being trapped in a system which almost requires that they stay on social assistance. I know my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West who is sitting listening with rapture to what I am saying, is very sympathetic to this because I am sure he deals with people in this category frequently on the weekends. I am sure if he has the opportunity he will be saying to the minister, either privately in his ear or publicly in the House of Commons, that we have reached that point in time where we have to review the structure of the tax system with which we live.

I know the minister remembers the Carter commission and the work done by Mr. Carter—I cannot remember his name, who said that the whole tax structure has to be reviewed, we have to consider a dollar as a dollar; a buck is a buck is a buck and we must tax it that way. We cannot have different systems for different people. We cannot have a system in which the wealthier you are the less you pay in proportion because the more you can write off.

I think what we are seeing is Canada being bogged down by an inadequate non-progressive system. I should like to ask the minister whether he can explain to us at this point in time not only the content of this bill, which really in itself does not address this particular problem, but what kind of review is currently under way and what we can expect to see in the next two or three years before this Parliament is dissolved. I do not think this can go on much longer. It is not possible for this country to hold together, if we have such poverty at some levels and such wealth at others. I do not think we can argue with any degree of conviction for ever greater sums of money for the multinational oil companies, while at the other end of the scale we are completely ignoring the plight of so many Canadians who have worked all their lives but who, through no fault of their own are unable to earn sufficient to make ends meet, expecting that somehow or another they will dig even deeper, tighten their belts, as the Prime Minister once said, do without something, change their priorities and continue to pay ever greater sums to people who in fact have more than they can use now. I would certainly appreciate it if the minister could take a moment now to perhaps explain this to us. Is he going to do it later; a lot later?

Mr. Bussières: At the end of the debate.

Mr. Deans: You will not forget?

Mr. Bussières: Indeed I will not.

Mr. Deans: This is really important. It is probably more important than a discussion of Sweden's social structure. I have a sneaky suspicion we cannot do a lot about Sweden's social structure. I have a sneaky suspicion we cannot do anything about the financial problems of Sweden either, but I think we can do something about problems here. I say with the greatest generosity of spirit that I do not think all of the problems in Canada necessarily turn on whether we pay more for oil. I do not think that need be the crux of every argument we have here. I do not think it is necessary that we accede to greed and that we allow ourselves to be dictated to by OPEC nations' decisions on what oil is worth because they have the corner on the market. The oil in Canada belongs to us, to all of us, and the way we use it will determine the future of Canada.

We can only afford out of our gross national product to pay a certain amount of money for oil. We have obligations which go beyond paying just whatever it is that the oil companies would like. We have obligations to other people, and the only way we can meet that type of obligation of which I speak is if we have something left over after we pay the price of gasoline, the price of natural gas and the price of home heating oil.

I would ask the minister to address himself to these problems because I think in the long run they are going to be more important than whether we pay Alberta world prices.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to correct a few things that have been put on the record tonight about the government's energy and tax bill.

The hon. member for Calgary North was talking about the disastrous conditions in Sweden today. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain that it now has a Conservative government. I should like to point out that the Conservative government has only been in power for one year, and there is no way to correct 44 years of socialism in one year. They have a real uphill battle ahead of them.

In addition, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain mentioned something about cash flow. A speciality of members of the NDP is the giving of partial and false information to the Canadian public at every opportunity. Hon. members of that party like to talk about multinationals. I want to talk about Canadian oil companies. Hon. members of that party do not talk about these Canadian oil companies being driven out of this country. I am not here to defend multinationals, I am here to defend Canadian oil companies.

Let me point out that this cash flow is reinvested. If you do a little research you will find out that a lot of these companies borrow money to carry on their business. These are not a bunch of gouging Canadians stuffing profits into their pockets. Hon. members should get out on the campaign trail and tell the people the whole truth.

NDP members never mention such things as inflation accounting. I have heard very little about inflation accounting. If you do not make a lot of money today you will not survive. You must have high profit to continue in business because of double-digit inflation.

It is the Canadian oil companies which are being penalized by this national energy policy. I spent all last week and all weekend reading every paper and magazine available to me and I was unable to find anybody who supports the government energy package.

In addition a member from the NDP was talking about some poor lady who is suffering because of high energy prices. When we presented an energy package in the budget during the last Parliament, we had an energy tax credit to look after the low and middle-income earners. The NDP voted against that. They are not interested in some little old lady or a little old man or anybody else who is having a problem. They most certainly are not because they voted against assistance for the low and middle-income people, and the poor. You are utter frauds. You are against business, you are against profits, you are against entrepreneurs, and you are against anybody who is successful. Hon. members to my left would certainly penalize anyone who is successful.

Mr. Deans: Don't be silly.

Mr. McKenzie: So far we do not have a threat nationally from the New Democratic Party, but it is still a threat provincially, and there is no love between the NDP and the business community. They hate each other because the NDP is against business. I just explained why, and if members of the NDP think business people or people with investments to make will stay in a province or country with a little group like the NDP running its affairs, they should think again. All they want to do is nationalize business, penalize anyone who is successful, and have alcoholics and others like they do in Sweden.

I think I learned something this past weekend with respect to what has brought this on. The Liberals have dug up a socialist to draft their national energy package. I have here an article printed in the Alberta Report. The Liberals have found "golden boy Clark", a gentleman by the name of W. Edmund Clark of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The article is entitled "A student of socialist technique". Of course, that is something the Liberal Party is looking for because the Liberal Party drafted its present leader from the NDP. He is a former member of the NDP and an NDP organizer. The Liberals are well on the way to taking us into a socialist doctrine, and their first step is to nationalize the energy industry with its national energy package. This gentleman in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Clark, has stated that people can be forced to conform. He wrote a thesis on Tanzania a number of years ago, and according to the article I have in my hand:

> "Socialist Development and Public Investment in Tanzania . . ." is the title of W. Edmund Clark's doctoral thesis at the University of Toronto in 1975. The document is well known and . . . it is seen as evidence that the principal author of the NEP is a confirmed socialist—

The first requirement of this government with respect to anything it wants drafted would be an avowed socialist. What do you think of that, Charlie?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie:

> —and that the NEP itself may have as its purpose the nationalization of the oil industry rather than energy self-sufficiency.

According to statements made by various newspapers and magazines across the country, what we have is nationalization of the industry. The policy of hon. members opposite has nothing to do with self-sufficiency.

Another article is entitled "Continuing energy project delays darken outlook for steel industry". The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain can go back and explain that to the steel industry in Hamilton. Another article is entitled "Barrels of trouble: Marc Lalonde's energy program leaves our future oil supply dangerously vulnerable." But let us not worry about that; we will have gas rationing. The article goes on to say—and it is not just western hotheads who are saying so—and I quote: "Ottawa expects Canadians to cut down their massive oil thirst one quarter by 1985." This is what one oil man calls utter "magic".

We will also experience serious problems with respect to diesel fuel shortages. I have not heard any Liberals talking about that. The article says, and I quote:

> Diesel fuel shortages may only be an early sign of graver trouble in store. To the economists, shortages are inevitable. "Milton Friedman calls it the iron law of controlled markets," says one. "If you have a price above the commodity market value, you get surpluses, like our natural gas at present. If you have a price below market, like our oil, you have shortages. It's obvious."
> Obviously, it's not so obvious to Marc Lalonde.

I would like to read some more with respect to the socialist NEP package. Mr. Clark went on to say in his thesis on socialism, and I quote:

> The study is seen as a part of a larger effort by scholars everywhere to turn their attention to the issue of how to build socialist societies. It is my belief that socialist scholars in particular should devote more of their energy to analysing the problems of socialist societies and the problems of transition in socialism, and somewhat less to criticizing capitalists.
>
> Narrowly defining the role of institutions becomes particularly important in a political situation such as exists in Tanzania, where large numbers of the people are unsympathetic to socialism. One has to devise ways which force these people to act in the desired manner.

This is backfiring on hon. members opposite. They are not getting anyone "to act in the desired manner".

> What is critical for a country just beginning the road to socialism—

We have not just begun. We started a few years ago, about 1968.

—is that it abandons the notion of examining every project on its merits, but rather devise crude measures which force decisions along certain lines.

The NEP package could certainly be described as a crude measure.

In fact, emerging socialist countries must be prepared to overcompensate in order to break the grip of integrated structure.

This is the type of individual the Liberal Party drafts to design its National Energy Program.

Interest rates were mentioned earlier this evening. I want to point out that the Liberal Party and the NDP are not in the least concerned about high interest rates. They like to kid people that they are, but I want to point out that the very first order of business in the last Parliament was a motion calling for an all-party committee to deal with the high-interest rate problem. The prime minister of the day, the present Leader of the Opposition, had absolutely no reservations about accepting that, and he accepted it immediately.

An all-party committee was formed. It met for a number of months and did excellent work studying how to deal with this problem and how we could assess home buyers, small businesses and all the rest. The committee was ready to submit an interim report by the end of December of 1979, but a motion saying nothing was being done about high interest rates was brought in. That was an absolute lie. That committee sat for about three months. It was working on the problem. Many more witnesses were still to be heard. Did we hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, or any other member of the New Democratic Party mention that that all-party committee was working on that problem? We heard not a word. A ridiculously silly petition was presented in this House a couple of weeks ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North saying that something should be done about interest rates. Something was being done, and in this Parliament members of my party have brought in motions and asked questions about having that committee reappointed to deal with this problem. But all we hear is "no". That clearly indicates that hon. members opposite have absolutely no concern or interest. Interest rates could go to 30 per cent, and they could care less. That is the kind of nonsense which goes on in Ottawa now. The New Democratic Party should actually be described as "the public mischief party." What a little group of hypocrites! I have never witnessed anything like it in my life.

I was visited in my office last Thursday by members of the Winnipeg construction industry. They were very concerned about this energy policy. Last Friday I met with some officials from the aerospace industry in Winnipeg who were very concerned about the energy policy and how it affects their industry. The policy is having a ripple effect across the whole nation. It is affecting the steel industry and construction people. It does not matter who; people and industries will be affected by this ridiculous socialist policy. I want to quote from an article to show how the policy is affecting builders across Canada. The article states:

Prompt resolution of the Ottawa-Alberta energy impasse is the key to pulling the country's construction industry out of its present doldrums, says the president of the Canadian Construction Association.

Industry uncertainty created by the ongoing energy war is delaying millions of dollars of investment in such projects as oil and gas transportation and the development of Canadian hydro and nuclear power—

The statements go on and on. Here is another quote:

Impact of the Canadian federal tax and energy policies unveiled October 28 is beginning to show up in the form of industry budget cuts, project postponements, and an exodus of drilling rigs to the U.S.

When I spoke on this bill last week, I pointed out that it is actually one of the finest things that has ever happened to the United States. I think that President Reagan down there is on the right road, and he is certainly getting a great boost from the Liberal government in Canada.

● (2150)

The article goes on to read:

After more than a month to study the federal programs, several firms are announcing plans to cut budgets as much as 45 per cent.

I hope the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain will go back and tell the steel industry in Hamilton, "we will socialize the oil industry. Won't it be wonderful? We will socialize the industry, but you will all be out of work." The article goes on to read:

And one firm has shelved a $400 million enhanced recovery project because of the federal policies.

Even if the government changes its mind and brings in a few corrective measures, it will not reverse the situation overnight. A couple of press releases came into my office today about some limited corrective measures which will be taken with regard to the energy policy. However, I think it is too little too late.

The article goes on to speak about one of the multinationals. They hire people and they spend money regardless of what the government thinks of them. The article goes on to read:

Gulf cuts budget. Gulf Canada Ltd. plans to cut its budget 15 per cent or $900 million during the next five years as a result of the budget and tax program.

You cannot reverse that overnight. There is no such thing as a reversal after something like that goes into effect.

The article goes on to read:

Earlier, Gulf Canada had planned a 1981 budget of about $1 billion, its first billion dollar budget.

All this is shot down with this ridiculous socialist policy. As I pointed out the other day, the only reason for doing this is that they thought they would capitalize on the Canadian people's feelings about oil companies. They thought they would nationalize them and harass them. It is a ridiculous, irresponsible argument and it will backfire on them. We are hearing threats from the Prime Minister who talks about an election. Well, I hope that that election comes about fairly shortly. I would love to fight a campaign on this ridiculous energy policy which is being presented.

The article goes on to read:

But with an anticipated 30 per cent reduction in cash flow because of the federal action, Gulf Canada president John L. Stoik, said the firm had to reduce its spending plans. "We simply won't have the capacity to do any more," he said.

What is the alternative to all this? We will have Canada Works. We are on a treadmill. There is no way Canada Works can make up for the loss of investment money and all the jobs which will be lost as a result of this ridiculous policy. Here is another company, it is a Canadian company but that is all right. The Liberals are against Canadian companies also. The article reads:

Hudson's Bay slashes budget. Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Ltd. cuts its 1981 Canadian exploration budget by more than 45 per cent to $203 million from a planned $378 million.

There will be devastating effects from such large cuts and thousands of jobs will go down the drain. Why is the government doing it? The minister who is here tonight said he will answer at the end. I hope he will have a surprise for us. I do not know what he is waiting for because the longer he leaves it, the worse it will get. This is no time to be trying to implement ridiculous socialist policies or playing games with the Canadian industry. Let him forget about that multinational business, let him think about Canadian companies. Let him forget about the multinational nonsense, it has been bled to death.

I have here a recent article from The Globe and Mail entitled "As the rigs roll south". It reads:

United States President Ronald Reagan has done what the Canadian government has failed to do. He has abolished the remaining controls on domestic oil prices, a job already begun by former president Jimmy Carter.

"Restrictive price controls," said Mr. Reagan, "have held U.S. oil production below its potential,

We cannot have oil production below its potential. We cannot remain at the mercy of the multinationals, like the Liberal party has, Mr. Chairman. Never mind about the multinationals, let us start developing here. Never mind chasing the rigs south.

The article goes on to read:

Federal energy minister Marc Lalonde has scoffed at the idea of petroleum capital and equipment moving from Canada to the United States, has argued that oil drilling rigs are still operating in record numbers in Canada. He should have read a letter from an oil driller which The Globe and Mail carried recently.

I heard the minister's comment the other day about the oil rigs, that there are a lot of them still here. But what he did not mention was that when their contracts run out, they will go south. They will not hang around here to be harassed by the government.

The article goes on to read:

F. J. Garnett, president of Garnett Drilling Ltd., in Calgary—

This is a Canadian firm, it is not a multinational or some oil baron.

—explained the situation. November through March is normally the busiest drilling period in the oil and gas industry. Oil drillers are fulfilling contracts from oil companies accepted before Ottawa announced its National Energy Program—

This points out the dishonesty of the minister. Did he give that kind of an answer in the House? No, he certainly did not. He said that the oil rigs are all staying here, but he did not mention that they will all be leaving when their contracts run out.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Chairman, in the two or three remaining minutes tonight, I should like to respond—although I am very disappointed that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain has left the House—to some of the points he made. In his remarks he referred to the fact that there was a hairdresser in his riding of Hamilton Mountain who was finding a great deal of difficulty in paying his taxes on a $6,000 income. Of course, I fully sympathize with that problem, but I hope members in the House realize exactly what the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain was suggesting should be the answer to the situation of an entrepreneur in Hamilton who is finding difficulties in making a living. The bottom line answer of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is: can we not be reasonable and take money from the very rich foreign multinational businesses? My only response to him, some members of my family having had experience in the hairdressing business since I have an entrepreneur son who owns more than one hairdressing establishment, is that if we had a government today which gave serious consideration to the plight of small businesses, we would be creating a climate, an atmosphere and a government policy which would allow free enterprise to function more effectively in the marketplace. My answer to the problem of the entrepreneur would be re-establishment of a government policy which would provide incentives to the business community, which would stimulate growth in the business sector, thus enabling the hairdressing establishment to which the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain referred to function economically and efficiently in today's conditions. However, we have here a government which would sooner move this country, with the help of the NDP, to a form of socialism. In reality, socialism is a form of communism. It can be summed up in a single sentence: the abolition of private property. Just the other night on national television the President of the United States said, "Call it communism, call it socialism, call it what you will, it is taking property from the people".

● (2200)

It is disregard for the right of ownership, the free enterprise system, motivated by the Liberal Party and supported by the New Democratic Party, to a point where we have in Canada today a disincentive to be in business. I see hon. members opposite smiling, but that is what we have, Mr. Chairman, a disincentive in the free enterprise market today to stay in business and function, thanks to the present Liberal government.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—POLICY RESPECTING INFLATION AND INTEREST RATES

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight during the late show proceedings to refer to a question and answer which are reported in Hansard on December 5, 1980 at page 5403. My question to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was as follows:

I am wondering if the minister is finally ready to recognize that it is his policy of increasing the federal share of the gross national product over the next two years and financing that increase through increased borrowings that drives up the expectations of inflation and interest rates—

The minister's answer was as follows:

Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question was based upon an assertion that we were increasing our share of the gross national product . . . That, of course, is not true. If the hon. member looks at the forecasts and projections, he will find that over the period of the projection until the end of 1983-84 the share of the government in the economy will be precisely the same size as it has been in the past year.

I took the Minister of Finance seriously. On the chance I was wrong, I did as the minister suggested and went to the record. There is only one record of the government's intentions with regard to its share of the gross national product. Unfortunately that is not found in Hansard but in the appendices to the budget papers which are now referred to as Sessional Paper No. 321-1/306A referred to in No. 82 of Votes and Proceedings of October 28, 1980.

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I will quote some of the numbers found therein. Rather than quote them all I would appreciate if table 1.3, total outlays, could be printed in Hansard, otherwise I will be force to read all of the numbers. Does that meet with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed.

Mr. Bosley: Mr. Speaker, the chart shows the following figures particularly: total outlays, and under the category total outlays, per cent of GNP from 1979-80 through to 1983-84. Those figures shown as per cent of GNP for total outlays are 20.3 per cent. 21.1 per cent, 21.5 per cent, 20.8 per cent and 20.3 per cent. I refer again to what the minister said:

If the hon. member looks at the forecasts and projections, he will find that over the period of the projection until the end of 1983-84 the share of the government . . . will be precisely the same size—

It is true that if one reads just that table, that is the last year of the projections, the share projected will be the same as last year, but it is not true to suggest that over the period it will be the same. That is the first point.

Mr. Evans: Yes, it absolutely is.

Mr. Bosley: I refer hon. members to the table because it is clear.

There is a second point to be made which concerns the way in which the government conducts its bookkeeping. The second table to be included is table 4.1 of the same document, the fiscal projections—national accounts and public accounts comparison.

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
			($ millions)
Revenues
Public Accounts—budgetary revenues	40,159	45,200	52,935	61,600	69,420
(per cent change)	(14.0)	(12.6)	(17.1)	(16.4)	(12.7)
National Accounts—total revenues	45,187	51,630	63,590	74,105	84,125
(per cent change)	(14.3)	(14.3)	(23.2)	(16.5)	(13.5)
Expenditures
Public Accounts—total outlays	52,962	59,950	67,625	74,725	82,275
(per cent change)	(9.1)	(13.2)	(12.8)	(10.5)	(10.1)
National Accounts—total expenditures	54,412	63,550	73,650	82,600	91,625
(per cent change)	(10.3)	(16.8)	(15.9)	(12.2)	(10.9)
Net position
Public Accounts—financial requirements	−10,445	−12,155	−10,980	−8,415	−7,155
National Accounts—balance	−9,225	−11,920	−10,060	−8,495	−7,500

Mr. Bosley: The government has now embarked upon a new process. That process is to enter in net figures. It has been done for some time with respect to minor items. It is now proposed to be added under the petroleum compensation account. The effect is that the government will no longer be showing its true expenditures and true revenues but only showing net figures. If one looks at Table 4.1 one will find the actual expenditures of the government will not be the same as what the public accounts figures show, but $2 billion more in 1979-80. They are projected to be nearly $9 billion more than the public accounts projections in 1983-84.

● (2205)

If one takes those numbers, which are the true spending figures of the government, as a percentage of GNP, one will find that the percentage rises from 20.9 per cent to 22.3 per cent of the GNP in the last year, and the rate is higher in every other year. I rise tonight to say that I am partly worried by the attempt of the Minister of Finance, but I presume that because he does not know his figures, he is not purposely misleading the House. I am more worried by the fact that the government is committed to the never-ending policy of taking more and more out of the economy of Canada, thereby leaving less and less for other people with which to work. As one who has had municipal experience with projections three and four years hence, I know that those projections will be wrong. For instance, in the first table to which I referred, the GNP is projected to rise by 14.1 per cent and by 12.6 per cent. I suggest that that projection is quite optimistic.

What is wrong is not that the government is pretending that it will not increase its share of the GNP, but by actually increasing its share, the government will make it more difficult for Canadians to create jobs. The Minister of Finance in describing his financial objectives refers to the policy of gradualism. Although it is not clear in the minister's statements, it is quite clear from the tables that the minister's policy is one of gradualism—to gradually destroy this economy and to gradually put everybody in Canada out of work.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in listening to what the hon. member said, I find it very difficult to find anything in his last statements which I would consider to be of parliamentary value. Certainly, any hon. member who would accuse another hon. member—in fact a minister of the Crown—of intentionally destroying the economy of the country must be in great disrepute in his own mind for even thinking such a thing. It is absolutely asinine and it is simply not true. The hon. member must admit that he has overstated his case by a very long degree.

The fact is that according to the budget papers in 1979-80, federal expenditures will be 20.3 per cent of the gross national product and for the fiscal year 1983-84 federal expenditures will be 20.3 per cent of the gross national product. Any elementary arithmetic will indicate that the growth rate necessary to get from 20.3 per cent of the gross national product to 20.3 per cent of the gross national product is precisely the growth rate of the gross national product. It does not take a genius to figure that out.

If the hon. member is implying that the federal government will generate inflationary expectations by increasing the deficit, financial requirements and expenditures in that way, then how does he explain the figures shown in the budget which indicate, for example, that the financial requirements will decline from $10.4 billion in 1979-1980 to $7.2 billion in 1983-1984. How does the hon. member explain the deficit figures which would see a reduction in the deficit from $11.4 billion in 1979-1980 to a figure of somewhat less in the fiscal year 1983-1984.

The budget papers speak for themselves. The growth in government expenditures are clearly there for all to see, the deficit reduction figures are clearly there for all to see, and the financial requirements are clearly there for all to see. Indeed, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is following a policy of gradualism. I believe it is the right policy. Hon. members who think about the issues and understand the implications of the alternatives certainly support his policy.

HEALTH CARE—USE OF PRE-NATAL SCREENING KITS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, on November 18, 1980, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) what steps her department was taking with respect to the sale and promotion of certain pre-natal screening kits, mainly, the Alpha-fetoprotein kits which are designed to detect the neurological disease called spinal bifida.

• (2210)

My concern arose out of the fact that the manufacturers of these kits were then beginning a hard promotion campaign with doctors and that there was and is a significant uncertainty about the accuracy of the kits. The minister responded in the House by saying that the problem was "misuse" of the kits "more than anything else" and that she had written to provincial health ministers warning them of the dangers of misuse.

This response is inadequate in itself in so far as the misuse as such is not the only problem. This glosses over the fact that the kits themselves and their questionable accuracy is also at issue. I am glad that to some extent the minister has gone beyond her answer on that point in the House and has forbidden the sale of these kits and has restricted their use to research and investigative purposes.

Nevertheless, the minister's response at that time and in a subsequent letter to me is inadequate in a larger sense, because it is another example of the way in which the Canadian testing and approval system for new medical devices is totally unacceptable and is desperately in need of improvement.

The department contends that the onus is on the manufacturer to prove the safety and efficiency of medical devices. That sounds good except that the manufacturer must only do so if requested by the department. The department usually asks after there has been controversy and the product has already been widely distributed, marketed and used by many Canadians. This is not the kind of pre-market testing that Canadians have a right to expect from the government; in fact, it takes place more often in the United States than it does in Canada. What we have in Canada is a kind of post-market system of testing which uses Canadian people as guinea pigs.

I submit that we must no longer be content, and certainly many of us have never been content, although the government seems to have been for some time now, with a system that puts the onus on the Canadian people to get sick or die. It puts the onus on them until the medical device is proven unsafe.

The whole concept of the burden of proof in our society with respect to medical devices, with respect to new drugs, with respect to environmental questions of pollution, occupational health and safety, environmental health—the whole notion of the burden of proof must be transformed from that of putting the onus for proof on the victim to putting the onus for proof on the promoter of a particular product in the marketplace. Long-term tests of a particular product, for instance, must be done only with the informed consent of the people who participate in them. That is not an impractical proposal, Mr. Speaker. Officials of the department claim that people like me who complain about this are being ridiculous; that there are so many devices on the market that the department could hardly be expected to test them all.

The fact remains that only a very few of these devices, which fall into special categories, are tested at all. The Department of National Health and Welfare could find it within its budget, if it were motivated by a concern for the health and welfare of Canadian people, to increase the number of devices tested in this pre-market way that I have suggested and, as I requested in committee on one occasion, the department should do more to articulate the notion of burden of proof which would remove it from the Canadian consumer.

Finally, in the course of my work as NDP health critic, I have complained in this House on a number of occasions about the lack of adequate testing of certain products on the market which are related to health care. More often than not in my experience to this point, I have found that those products which eventually become a source of controversy and about which a great deal of concern develops, are products related to the health and welfare of Canadian women.

There are several things that I have had occasion to bring to the attention of the department. For instance, the question of toxic shock syndrome, because that sort of thing is not being researched. According to the department it was not a priority. Last year the contraceptive drug depo-provera was in question and as was the drug bendectin, a drug used by women. The list of things goes on and on about which there is a great deal of uncertainty in the minds of Canadian people. We seem to have no policy in which we can put some confidence.

• (2215)

Trying to get beyond the game of simply responding to questions that I raised in the House, I want to take this opportunity in the time left to me to urge upon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Frith), and through him to the ministry of health, that it is about time the Canadian government started to take these kinds of problems seriously. It should stop the system by which the Canadian people themselves are bearing the burden of inadequate pre-market policies employed by the Ministry of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are two specific points which the hon. member has raised. One deals with some remarks he made toward the end of his comments which revolve around the use of drugs and how drugs marketed in Canada come to be allowed on the market.

The record in Canada speaks for itself with respect to the safety record of the department concerning those drugs which are allowed on the market.

The hon. member's second point concerns medical devices. I can advise the hon. member that the minister instructed departmental officials in the fall of 1980, during the controversy over the toxic shock syndrome issue, to put more emphasis on the area of how medical devices are marketed in Canada.

When the issue was originally raised about the AFP test, I think the minister correctly pointed out in the House that her recommendation was that this was only one of the diagnostic choices available to physicians in this area of neuro-tube defects. The minister did point out how under specific conditions the test should be used. She further pointed out in the House at that time that she had instructed her provincial counterparts in a letter about the limitations of the use of the AFP test. She also suggested that competent AFP testing facilities should be developed under provincial jurisdiction.

With respect to the AFP tests, the minister also sent out a medical alert to physicians outlining the conditions by which AFP could be used as a diagnostic tool. She also instructed the department to come up with what we call a standard serum. In other words, the test itself could be compared to a purified sample, which is available here in Ottawa, and provided to any of those designated testing centres.

However, the test itself has been banned in terms of its sale by the eight manufacturers on the kit. At present, they are only being used for research and investigative work. The manufacturers as well have instructed physicians about the proper use of the AFP kit. I am confident, with respect to AFP, that it is basically under control.

I want to emphasize a point I made earlier. When it comes to a device which is allowed on the market under the medical devices regulations, the minister instructed her department to put more emphasis on those products and the way in which they are marketed in Canada. Quite frankly, and I say this sincerely, knowing the pharmaceutical industry to the extent that I do, I think the department's record with respect to drugs allowed and marketed in the Canadian drug field is an excellent one. I would take some exception to what the hon. member says are some deficiencies when it comes to the marketing of drugs in this country. When it comes to drugs being allowed on the market we probably have the safest record of the western industrialized world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

The House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF DESTRUCTION BY FIRE

Madam Speaker: Today marks the sixty-fifth anniversary of the destruction by fire of the old House of Commons. To remind us of this event, I have asked the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring into the House the wooden Mace. It was used in place of the one normally used in the House of Commons until such time as the beautiful silver and gold one was ready for our daily use here.

By the way, this wooden Mace has enriched itself with a bit of history. It was lent to parliaments in the West Indies when I believe their Mace was stolen.

FISHERIES

CALL FOR REDESIGN OF POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the policy announced by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) to close the Fraser River to gill netters for the 1981 season places an unfair emphasis of sacrifice on this group rather than a more equitable and reasonable compromise with the corporate fleets and other fishing interests, and in view of the fact that this policy will leave unrestrained the U.S. fishermen around Point Roberts, who will continue to take the very catch destined for the Fraser River, thereby nullifying any positive results for management and conservation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans redesign his policy to incorporate fairness and equity to ensure that the small gill netters are not sacrificed to the corporate fleets and other fishing interests, and do further urge the minister to take appropriate steps to monitor effectively U.S. catch of fish destined for the Fraser to provide for better management and conservation of fish stocks than has to date been realized.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

EXPRESSION OF SUPPORT FOR ROLE OF POLICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of this House in expressing our tangible and intangible support for the difficult, dangerous and delicate job our police are performing in making our environment relatively safe. If we have adequate, efficient and more community support for police in this country, people and property will be much safer. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That this House assure the police of this country of our unequivocal support and that police forces and police associations will be full partners in amending and implementing the laws of this nation.

Madam Speaker: I have been reluctant to accept congratulatory motions or motions of encouragement. Although I think the sentiments expressed in the hon. member's motion are quite commendable, I am afraid I cannot see the urgent and pressing necessity.

ASTRA TRUST

CALL FOR REFERENCE OF OPERATION TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion. Since a select committee of the Ontario legislature has heard evidence concerning the chartering of Astra Trust, which evidence raises the most serious questions as to political influences at work in the granting of this federal charter, and since the collapse of Astra Trust and associated companies has caused hundreds of Canadians to lose millions of dollars, worthy of the title "Bilking Ontario in the Eighties", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the matter of the circumstances surrounding the chartering, operation and collapse of Astra Trust be referred for a full investigation to the House Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR VIGOROUS IMPLEMENTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the submission made yesterday to the National Energy Board by Dome Petroleum that it expects Canada to be self-sufficient in oil by 1990, given today's announcement by Petro-Canada of its acquisition of Petrofina and given the embarrassing revelation by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that his original position on Petro-Canada was an error, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson):

That this House urges the government to pursue with vigour the implementation of the National Energy Program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POLICING SERVICES IN PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Unreasonable changes in the policing cost formula proposed by the federal government are causing great concern to many cities, towns and small communities in the eight provinces that have policing contracts with the RCMP. In many instances, sound financial planning has suddenly been completely disrupted by the proposed unrealistic increases. Any divergence from the present formula should have been phased in gradually, after careful consultation with all concerned. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House urge the Solicitor General to continue with the present formula as it applies to RCMP contracts with the provinces, and that any proposed changes to cost sharing arrangements be instituted only after careful consideration and consultation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) ACT, 1980

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING PHASING-IN PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House assures the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs that any legislation he introduces to shorten or eliminate the phasing-in period respecting pensions for widows of disabled veterans where the veteran's disability rate was below 48 per cent, and likewise any legislation to tie the 100 per cent basic rate of the disability pension to the average take-home pay of the five categories of public servants designated in 1972, will receive speedy passage, and this House expresses the hope that such legislation will be introduced at an early date.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

PROPOSED VISIT TO MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, tomorrow the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is visiting Brandon and western Manitoba, an underdeveloped area of Canada with great prospects now that jet service is becoming available. In view of its strategic location, close to the geographic centre of Canada and the North American continent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the Prime Minister seize the opportunity provided by his visit to announce development projects, such as the reactivation of the community services program, the decentralization of a federal department into the area, the broadening of the herd maintenance and fodder procurement program and other similar programs that would help the process of reconciliation so urgently needed in the Canadian body politic.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

REPORTED DUMPING IN NIAGARA RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning recent press reports which indicate that American industry and government dumped toxic and radioactive wastes into the Niagara River during the Second World War. If these reports are well founded, the health of residents of the Niagara peninsula is seriously threatened. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley):

That this House urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to investigate the veracity of these stories immediately, and to report his findings to the House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

REFUSAL OF LEAVE TO APPEAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This morning three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada refused to grant leave to appeal to the full court on the crucial question of the human rights of unborn children in Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the Minister of Justice look into this matter immediately and report to this House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING RESPONSE OF BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who on Sunday said that the Government of Canada had received from the Prime Minister of Great Britain, to quote his words, "an assurance in writing" as to the response of the British government to any Canadian request. Will the minister now tell the House of Commons the nature and extent of that assurance in writing?

● (1415)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, that assurance was contained in a letter from Prime Minister Thatcher to our Prime Minister and it was to the effect that the government of the United Kingdom would accept the responsibilities which it had already assumed and follow the tradition of proposing to the British Parliament, with its recommendation, our joint resolution.

I might say, Madam Speaker, that this is not a matter of a single letter; this is a matter of a course of conduct in which we have received repeated assurances from the government of the United Kingdom through its ministers since the time the hon. Minister of the Environment and I met with Prime Minister Thatcher in October. Beyond that it is a question of the explanation which British governments have always given of the tradition and independence of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I am rather surprised that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, knowing there had been a request yesterday for that document to be tabled in the House, did not take the opportunity to table it. I hope he will do that when he responds to my supplementary question. I notice he chose his language very carefully and said that the assurance of the British government was limited to proposing and recommending acceptance; there was not a guarantee, not an assurance of passage.

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs first undertake to table that letter on the floor of the House of Commons so we will know the whole truth about the communication in writing from the British; and, secondly, will he tell us whether the undertaking by the British extends to passage or simply to presentation?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, it is not traditional in dealings between governments to reveal the precise nature of the dealings which have occurred. We have no quarrel with the government of the United Kingdom with respect to these exchanges. There is certainly no reason why we should depart from the normal position in this case, and we do not propose to do so. If the government of the United Kingdom wishes to reveal the letter, that is their prerogative.

Mr. Clark: What about passage?

Mr. MacGuigan: With respect to the question of passage of the legislation, that is a very naive question for a member of Parliament to ask. No government and no member of Parliament can ever give an assurance of passage. All a government can ever do is to undertake that it will require that the measure be supported by its supporters.

Mr. Clark: The Secretary of State for External Affairs says no one can give a commitment as to passage. He said in his "Question Period" remarks on television the other day as a member of Parliament, "not only have they given a commitment to us to put it through"—in other words, passage. In other words, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is denying in the House something he said on television the other day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Secretary of State for External Affairs says there is no reason to depart from that tradition. There is a very good reason. The Prime Minister admitted yesterday that he has been engaging in what he calls less than candour in telling the people of Canada the whole truth about what has been going on regarding our constitution. In light of the interest in Canada in the treatment of our Constitution by another country, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs not reconsider his refusal; and will he not seek all the permissions necessary and give us an undertaking now that that written assurance will be tabled on the floor of the House of Commons so that all Canadians will have an opportunity to see exactly what was said about our Constitution?

While he is at it, will he tell us whether there were any other written assurances, whether there is any other documentation that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is keeping hidden from this Parliament, for any reason at all, that would inform the Parliament and people of Canada as to what exactly the attitude of the government of Britain is with regard to our Constitution, which we want to have home here in our country so we can deal with it?

● (1420)

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, as usual, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is failing to see the woods for the trees. This is not a question of a single letter or a single assurance. To the best of my recollection there is only one reference to this in writing, but we have received a series of assurances—some half dozen—from three or four members of the British ministry since the time when they fully understood what was proposed in the constitutional package. We have received those, and indeed they could have done nothing else because there is an unbroken tradition that British parliaments and British governments will respect the joint resolutions of this House on constitutional matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PREVIOUS DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH MINISTER

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, regarding these assurances I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. We know of one meeting with one member of the British government which took place in Ottawa in December. That, of course, was with the Right Hon. Francis Pym, who is now the government House leader of the parliament at Westminster.

Did Mr. Pym tell the Prime Minister during that meeting that the thinking of the U.K. government was that, "Yes, we will give you patriation with an amending formula; what you do with it beyond that is your business"? Further, did Mr. Pym tell the Prime Minister that he had some concerns—and he was speaking as the person who was nominated to be House leader—as to whether or not that bill would receive swift passage in the British parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is yes.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, during his press conference last week—this is very germane to what was discussed with Mr. Pym and a matter of public record—the Prime Minister indicated to the press that he had been told by the British that, with respect to a request from the Canadian Parliament asking Britain to amend the BNA Act, the government of Britain would have no choice, that it would be a government bill and that there would be a three-line whip?

Today in the British House of Commons in London Prime Minister Thatcher indicated that there was no such assurance and there in fact could be no such assurance. A three-line whip would indicate that the government would expect its backbenchers to fall into line and there would be limited debate. Yet the Prime Minister of Britain said today that there could be no assurance. The only way such an assurance would be given is if a bill was on the table of the house and, as no such bill has been received, no such assurance was given. What the British parliament is going to be asked to do is very important to its process.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House just exactly what assurances he did get? Perhaps while the Prime Minister is at it he might agree now to let us see the contents of that famous letter in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs puts so much faith.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, in reply to what the hon. member has asked I have a CP wire here which begins with these words:

> British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher today repeated with slight variation that a request from Ottawa for patriation of the Canadian Constitution must be dealt with quickly and in accordance with precedent and the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: How the British government in its wisdom decides to manage its business before the House is something which only the British government can decide, and I would not be in a position to demand that it proceed one way or another. What we are demanding is that they put the measure through.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, the British government has made it clear that it wants to make it a government measure, that it wants it to be proceeded with and that the whips would be on; but the way in which they will decide this and when they put the whips on is certainly something for the House leaders over there to decide.

Since the hon. member and his colleagues have been quoting so intently from the conversation I had with Mr. Pym, I am surprised that they have only quoted part of it. Maybe they do not have the whole record, or maybe they are hiding the part of the report that they do not want to show, so perhaps they could table their documents on the conversation I had with Mr. Pym. I would be happy to give the House the unequivocal commitment that Mr. Pym told me, on behalf of the British government, that they would not look through the measure, that it would look beyond it. Mr. Pym went further and said that the British government would pay no attention to opposition from the provinces. Thus spoke Mr. Pym to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MEDICAL CARE ACT

OBLIGATIONS OF PROVINCES RESPECTING MEDICARE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Approximately five years ago the government announced its abandonment of the 50-50 cost-sharing program for medicare services which ensured that for every dollar the federal government spent on medical services in a province, that province would be required to spend a dollar. At that time the Prime Minister said that he was willing to gamble that the provinces would live up to their obligations. We said that we did not like the gamble. I have just obtained a copy of a government study which indicates that the gamble taken by the government has not paid off.

Considering that over the past five years federal expenditures to the provinces for medical services have increased by some 12 per cent but provincial spending has actually declined by 13 per cent—leading to all kinds of practices which are destroying our medicare system, such as extra billing, opting out, increased premiums and even bankrupt hospitals—when will the minister take steps to ensure that the provinces live up to the basic principles of medicare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, with regard to timing, I am not sure that the impending election in Ontario is the best climate in which to discuss these very important matters. I am surprised that the Leader of the New Democratic Party would wait five months after the report by Mr. Justice Hall was made public before asking such a question. I suggest that to put into practice the recommendations of Mr. Justice Hall would be welcomed by all members on both sides of this House who believe that medicare is the best program for Canadians.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, after five months the minister's answers have not improved. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill has been trying to obtain straight answers from the minister on the recommendations of that report for many months.

I repeat, I have just received a copy of this federal government document. Very appropriately, the minister calls reference to the province of Ontario. This document shows that the province of Ontario is the worst offender with regard to refusing to spend its fair share of money on health care. Considering that the federal government contributions for medicare to the province of Ontario increased by 26.4 per cent over the past five years, while provincial spending by Bill Davis' government actually dropped by 64 per cent, when will the minister take action to ensure that Bill Davis implements universal medicare in Ontario?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, the facts about the decreased proportions of investment by provincial governments into health care expenditures should be well known to the hon. member by now. I also include the government of Saskatchewan in this category. I will answer the hon. member with a question: Would the hon. member want me to withdraw payments to the province of Ontario, with the eventual consequence of disrupting services? Would he want me to do that immediately, and does he think that this is the solution?

● (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: I suspect the report is only a matter of days or weeks old. It actually points out that there are two provinces which increased their spending; one was Prince Edward Island and the other was Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to come back to the basic principles involved and have the minister play straight with the House just for once with regard to this matter, since she has talked in nice general terms about her concern with medicare.

There were five basic principles established in the Medical Care Act when it was passed in Parliament many years ago, which are being undermined in most provinces in Canada. I want to ask the minister when she will bring legislation before this Parliament which will say that for a dollar to be obtained by a province for medicare it must spend a dollar for medicare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Provincial rights and jurisdiction in matters of health are well known. The report of Mr. Justice Hall has clearly indicated that rushing into action by the federal government can do one thing, which is withholding monthly payments to provinces which do not meet the five conditions under medicare of accessibility, and so on, which would disrupt services. He said very clearly the matter must be dealt with by the provinces at the provincial level.

Mr. Broadbent: What do you say?

Miss Bégin: I suggest the hon. member phone Mr. Cassidy and ask him to organize a campaign on that matter in Ontario.

Mr. Broadbent: We will.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER COMMITMENT MADE RESPECTING PASSAGE THROUGH BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I want to return to the representations which have been made by members of our government to members of the government of the United Kingdom. I want to preface my remarks by simply pointing out that, again, the Prime Minister was less than candid with respect to the report he made to the House. He did not read the complete paragraph of the Canadian Press release which says that Prime Minister Thatcher:

—avoided a direct answer as to whether any assurance had been given to Canadian government authorities that a "three-line whip" requiring government supporters in the House of Commons to vote the party line would be used to push patriation through the British parliament.

Of course, the Prime Minister conveniently, tongue-in-cheek, as a joke, forgot to mention that.

I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Trudeau: Ask me the question. You have prefaced it for me.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Prime Minister will have his opportunity if he wants to speak in the House. I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Trudeau: What is the matter, have you no guts? Are you afraid?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Secretary of State for External Affairs said there was to be a commitment for a three-line whip. The Prime Minister says not.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Was the hon. member for Saskatoon West rising because he wanted to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I apologize, Madam Speaker; the Prime Minister had trouble with his sphincter.

I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is telling the truth? Was it, as he reported in "Question Period" last Sunday, the fact that he got a commitment for a three-line whip, or is the Prime Minister leading us on again? Tell us the answer to that question.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, in none of the conversations in which I participated did I ask for any commitments from the British government. I received some in conversations, which they offered voluntarily in light of the tradition and their understanding of how they should best proceed. I did not at any time receive a commitment for a three-line whip, or any whip. I did not ask for such an agreement, but I did receive from them commitments with respect to the fact that they would follow the normal practice.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I have a short supplementary, Madam Speaker. According to the Secretary of State for External Affairs I gather the Prime Minister is misleading us about this three-line whip. There is a plethora of legal actions going on. I want to find out what did take place.

Maybe the Secretary of State for External Affairs can answer this question. Did the Prime Minister, the minister himself, or any minister of the government, inform the Right Hon. Francis Pym that it was open to the Canadian cabinet to consider the option of a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada after the Manitoba court had rendered judgment, regardless of whether or not the judgment of the Manitoba court favoured the federal government?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member has referred to the Manitoba judgment. I think it is probably time that it was mentioned in the House today, since that court has resoundingly endorsed the federal position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: What was the vote?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the commitment with respect to the whips was made not to me but to the Prime Minister, from Prime Minister to Prime Minister.

PREVIOUS DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH MINISTER

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the resounding endorsement referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was a split decision of three to two.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: Another three-line whip.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if, in his meeting with Mr. Pym on December 19, he suggested to Mr. Pym that it might be easier for Mrs. Thatcher to keep her own troops in Westminster in line if she gave a more clear public assurance to the federal government in Ottawa that she would support the federal government's position.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am not sure, without checking my notes, if I recall precisely all of the things which were discussed. I asked Mr. Pym a great many questions during the course of my meeting with him with respect to what would make the passage of the bill in the British parliament simpler. That may well have been one of the questions which I asked, but I would have to check my notes on that.

With respect to the Manitoba decision, I might say it is a question of which question you look at. If you look at question No. 2, it was three to one. In any case, the important fact is that it was a judgment in favour of the federal argument.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I trust that the minister will get back to the House and report whether, indeed, his minutes show that he did make that suggestion to Mr. Pym, since he suggested earlier that he did not make any such suggestion.

In view of the fact that both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have referred extensively to a letter which they have said was sent by Mrs. Thatcher to the Canadian Prime Minister, in which they purport it was stated that the British Prime Minister committed herself to supporting the Canadian position, will the minister undertake to the House that he will contact the British government to ask for permission to table that letter in the House of Commons, so that it will not be suppressed and withheld from the Canadian people?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, in that letter the Prime Minister of Great Britain repeated that she would live up to the commitment which she had previously made to our Prime Minister.

Mr. Beatty: Table it!

An hon. Member: Let's see it.

Mr. MacGuigan: That is a commitment which goes along with all of the other commitments, the whole series of commitments which we have received from the British government.

Mr. Clark: Why hide it?

Mr. MacGuigan: There is no magic in that commitment.

An hon. Member: Table it then.

Mr. MacGuigan: The same commitments were given in every contact we have had with the British government on this matter since it first arose. In addition to that, as I have pointed out before, that is what British governments have always done. We certainly have no intention of embarrassing the British government, or any other government, by publishing diplomatic correspondence.

JUDGMENT OF MANITOBA APPEAL COURT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Notwithstanding the brief announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and in order to dispel the concern and the alarming doubts which have haunted the conscience of several members of the official opposition concerning the legality of the government's constitutional approach, would the Prime Minister reassure the House and the Canadian public by informing them about the essence of the conclusions reached by the Manitoba Court of Appeal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, unfortunately I cannot give specific details because I have not seen the text of the ruling, but the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development informed me a few moments ago that, on the three aspects on which a judgment had been sought, the Manitoba Court of Appeal has ruled in favour of the initiative which is before the House by stating that it is legal and does not encroach on provincial jurisdiction.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask about his discussions with General Haig last week. In light of the fact that the Americans are indicating that they are going to cut back by 25 per cent on external aid, in light of the fact that some of the aid they are now giving, to El Salvador in particular, is anything but aid for the poor, and in light of the fact that the minister described his discussions as excellent, I should like to ask him if he really brought up the question of El Salvador with General Haig? Secondly, did he speak to him about the North-South Summit to be held in Ottawa and the way that the Americans will approach it?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, if I can recall all those questions, I will try to answer them. I did raise both questions. I raised the question of the North-South Summit with Secretary Haig, but I did not ask for a reply from him because the administration has just taken office. It has that question under active consideration, however.

With respect to El Salvador, I made the position of this government clear. It is one of opposition to the supply of offensive arms and I enunciated that to Secretary Haig. He was also able to tell me some facts about the situation in El Salvador which I had not previously known. We generally had a very good discussion of the issues in Central America.

With respect to the overall American aid program, my hon. friend has suggested that the Americans would be cutting back in their aid. There seems to be a controversy within the American administration at the moment. I made very strong representations, as the European community did subsequently, that it would be a tragedy for the world as well as for the United States if they were to cut back on their present aid programs.

INQUIRY WHEN PRIME MINISTER WILL MEET UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I should like to ask if he has made any contact with President Reagan yet and, if not, what he plans to do about bringing President Reagan into the North-South Summit in Ottawa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member probably involuntarily misstated the case. The North-South Summit is not to be held in Ottawa; the North-South Summit which is projected will be held in Mexico, if, as we hope, it takes place.

In so far as the Ottawa Summit of seven economic countries is concerned, North-South relations is one of the items on the agenda. I hope it will be dealt with very thoroughly by the participants. I have not personally contacted President Reagan on the subject yet.

THE CONSTITUTION

POSITION OF BRITISH PARLIAMENT IF RESOLUTION CHALLENGED IN SUPREME COURT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Now that we agree on the happenings on December 19 and the assurances that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said were given, I should like to take the Prime Minister a step further. Could he confirm that he learned in November, because of definite information that was given to the Secretary of State for External Affairs after constitutional proposals were revealed in October and after the provinces launched their court challenges, that it was the official and considered view of the government at Westminster that their parliament could not act if the constitutional proposals were being challenged before the Supreme Court of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member, I will do as his colleague from Saskatoon West did a moment ago and preface my answer by dealing with some other subject. I want to tell the hon. member for Saskatoon West that if I was, in his words, partial and selective—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Send me a memo.

Mr. Trudeau: —partial and selective in quoting from the CP wire, it is because the question that had been asked of me was partial and selective in quoting the other part of the wire. So I read the part that was missed by the Tory questioner.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member says shame because one of his members just quoted part of a despatch, then I think I share his view. Madam Speaker, the position of this government until now has been that we tried to be as open as possible with the British government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —in referring to my meetings with Prime Minister Thatcher and to other meetings of ministers with their opposite numbers in the United Kingdom. I want to tell the House very candidly—which is a word that I use—that what the British will do is something I cannot foretell. I have told this House what assurances we had. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and others have repeated those assurances. If the Conservative Party of Canada does not want to accept those assurances, that is up to them. I am not intent upon convincing them of the details of any conversation that went on.

Mr. Clark: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Trudeau: I am answering the question, Mr. Clark. If the British government and British parliamentarians want to choose some other course than the one they promised us to follow, that is up to them. I cannot, of course, dictate any conduct to the British parliament.

I just want to make it clear that, from the point of view of this government, the request put to the British parliament for amendment of the Constitution, as it has been put many times since the BNA Act was passed in 1867, must result in the British parliament acceding to the will of the Canadian Parliament. That is our position. If the British do not take that position, as apparently the official opposition does not take that position, it is for them to say; then we will take the argument from there.

Mr. Clark: Answer the question.

Mr. Epp: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, even though I did not get an answer to my first question. The Prime Minister indicates that the Conservative Party can decide what it wants. I am asking him whether he had assurances. He speaks about assurances. Did he have the assurance, as I asked him in my first question, that the parliament of the United Kingdom could not act if in fact the matter was before the Supreme Court?

Further, given that the Prime Minister has known for months now that the government at Westminster has officially said that it could not proceed if the constitutional proposals were being challenged before the Supreme Court, why does he then persist in saying that he has assurances, contrary to those views?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the first point is that the British have not said for months, as he says, what he said they said.

Mr. Clark: November 9.

Mr. Trudeau: Nor since November 9, Madam Speaker. From now on the position I am taking in this House, and I hope my ministers will take the same position, is that the British can speak for themselves. I do not think they need the Tory party in Canada to speak for the British parliament or the British government. As far as we are concerned, we have stated our views. I will not enter into any more—

Mr. Clark: I won't tell you anything else.

Mr. Trudeau: —cross-questioning about private meetings between our ministers, or between the British Prime Minister and myself. The House may not like this, but if they do not like it they can address themselves to the British parliament or to the British government.

Mr. Clark: This is our Parliament.

POSITION OF PROVINCES ON CHANGE OF POWERS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask if it is his view and the view of his government that the British parliament should be able to change the powers and responsibilities of the provinces without their consent.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think that would come under the heading of a legal opinion, certainly a constitutional opinion.

Mr. Lawrence: It is not hypothetical anyway.

Mr. Trudeau: I would point out to the hon. member that it seems to me that is exactly the position of the official opposition.

Mr. Clark: Not at all.

Mr. Trudeau: They have suggested they want patriation and an amending formula without the consent of all the provinces, and they have added to this that they want to entrench part of the charter, to wit, aboriginal rights and native rights. So they are saying that we can enact some part of the charter without the consent of the provinces. They are saying we can patriate the Constitution with an amending formula without the consent of the provinces. Therefore, I think basically they are saying the same thing. Their constitutional position is the same as ours, except that they do not have the courage to entrench the whole charter; they just want to entrench part of it.

● (1450)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I know the Prime Minister would like to play politics with my question, but it is seriously meant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: I know there are a number of people who are concerned with the answer. I shall direct my question in this fashion, Madam Speaker. It is an important one because it is not a question of law, as the Prime Minister said yesterday; it is indeed a question of understanding our politics. People would like to know whether it is the government's view that the British parliament can change the rights and responsibilities of the provinces without their consent. It is a simple question; I would like a direct answer.

An hon. Member: Yes or no.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I gave the answer. The answer is yes. What I am saying is that the Tory party said the same thing this week in committee—

Mr. Lawrence: Nonsense.

Mr. Trudeau: —when they said they would impose on the provinces by asking Great Britain to pass a statement in London affecting the rights of the provinces and saying that aboriginal rights will be imposed on the provinces without their consent.

An hon. Member: Read the transcript.

Mr. Clark: It is tough to destroy the public record.

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—EXTENSION OF PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the takeover of Petrofina by Petro-Canada. In spite of this takeover, which we on this side of the House welcome and have long advocated, will the minister agree that Imperial, Gulf, Shell and Texaco still dominate the oil industry?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: As a matter of fact, the combined company represents only 8 per cent of the revenues of the industry.

An hon. Member: Why not take over Kuwait?

Mr. Waddell: If my friends will just be patient, my question to the minister is this. Is the minister prepared to announce any set policies or plans to bring the real substance and future control of the industry under public ownership?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question tailed off into the customary indecision of the NDP, not knowing whether they embrace the policy we have adopted in the national energy plan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: For my own part, the government is very pleased that Petro-Canada has been able to negotiate arrangements which will lead to this acquisition and add to the public sector, as indicated in the national energy plan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I think the minister is being unfair.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Waddell: I am asking him to make some real dints into private industry, so let me ask the minister this. He referred to the national energy policy. When the policy came out, shares of Petrofina were $60 to $65 on the market. Now the government is buying the shares for about $120, at a much inflated price. Can the minister indicate how he would control in future takeovers the price paid. Could the minister also tell this House and the public how Petro-Canada will pay for those shares of Petrofina?

Mr. Malone: Tell us, Allan.

Mr. Lawrence: Make the rich pay.

Mr. Paproski: How about Canada Savings Bonds?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, on the first point which the hon. member has made, it has been the experience in previous acquisitions, either by Petro-Canada or by private companies, that in order to acquire control of a new acquisition usually a premium is required for the purchase of shares. The hon. member can debate the validity of that, but that has been the experience in this and in previous cases.

It has not been determined finally how the acquisition will be paid for, although the hon. member will recall that in the budget it was indicated there would be a Canadian ownership charge that would be used to finance acquisitions. It will be through this method that equity by the Government of Canada will be provided.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO PRODUCTION AND MARKETING—INQUIRY WHEN COMMISSION OF INQUIRY WILL BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It is in connection with the report of the National Farm Products Marketing Council which he released yesterday. The minister will recall that the council makes a very serious statement in its report respecting questionable marketing practices in the potato industry. These are widespread and it seems producers have been intimidated from talking publicly about their problems within the industry.

When will the minister establish a commission of inquiry into all aspects of the potato industry? This is a request I have made on a number of occasions in this House.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether I can go as far as the hon. member would like when he mentions a commission of inquiry into aspects of the potato industry. The National Farm Products Marketing Council has held some pretty detailed hearings. I am very concerned about some of the statements which are in their report to the effect that some producers appeared to be scared to give the evidence they really wanted to. We are investigating that and if we find that this is substantially correct, I intend to recommend some kind of commission of hearing.

FISHERIES

OPTIONS RESPECTING CONSERVATION OF SALMON STOCKS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. A few days ago the minister announced a complete closure of the Fraser River which will affect some 1,000 gill net fishermen whose livelihood is dependent upon that fishery. The decision was taken because of the seriously threatened state of the chinook salmon stocks.

My question is this: Why has the minister not chose to adopt some of the other management options put forward by his consultants and departmental officials which would have spread the burden of conservation more equitably among other sectors of the industry in British Columbia waters?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, what happened some days ago was that, as a result of consultation, all groups in the industry seemed to recommend very stringent conservation measures. I discussed that this morning with the assistant deputy minister who is stationed on the west coast. We are looking at ways to make other groups of the industry share in the conservation measures that we are envisaging. The final decision on this issue will possibly be made before next week.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to know that the decision is not final, but it has come to our attention that by shutting out the Fraser River gill net fishermen from the sockeye runs, that unfulfilled catch will be granted to the sein fish fleet. Would the minister clarify that question? Would the minister also admit that the problem with chinook stocks really results from a lack of effective enforcement over the years with regard to poaching in particular, and from the lack of this government's commitment to get on with resolving the Canada-U.S. agreement which is crucial to the completion of enhancement projects on the Fraser River?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, everyone who knows a little bit about the Pacific fishery knows that if we had enhanced, or if we were to have enhanced, the Fraser River stocks without bringing some equilibrium to the wild stocks, we could do very serious damage to the chinook stock which is so precious to us. We are endeavouring to take action with the full co-operation of the industry.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COURTNEY, B.C.—RECENT SUICIDES BY PRISONERS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. I gave him notice of it, but I am sorry it was so late in coming. The minister is aware that three people have committed suicide in the Courtney lock-up in Courtney, British Columbia. Two of them were teenagers, and the most recent case of suicide had been arrested on a mischief charge. The major problem would appear to be a lack of adequate supervision of prisoners in the lock-up and that the lock-up is a completely inadequate facility. The lock-up has been talked about since 1972 and a new one promised since 1977, but it seems to have been held back for restraint reasons.

Would the minister investigate the details of these recent deaths? Would he also ensure that prisoners in the Courtney lock-up receive constant supervision and would he further undertake to give us a date on which construction of the new facilities will begin?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me a chance to check the facts following the unfortunate death of this 18-year-old youth. I concede that the cells are not in an ideal condition. In fact, a coroner's jury made recommendations for improving the cells, and I am glad to report to the House that every one of the recommendations that were made I am told has been implemented. There is a construction program in place; it has not been delayed by restraint. The target for completion of the new facilities is the end of 1982, and they will be completed on schedule.

• (1500)

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, the stories that I have heard indicate the problem has been there for some time. Is the minister aware that the problem is not just the lock-up conditions, but the fact they are located in a blind spot and the supervisor is locked outside and cannot see in? With previous deaths in that particular area, one involving a 15-year-old girl and another an adult, there was a problem of supervision. Will the minister undertake that there will be no delay in bringing this matter before Treasury Board quickly, because I understand it is still pending? Will he also undertake to look carefully at the problem of supervision by civilian guards who work in that area?

Mr. Kaplan: I will do that, Madam Speaker. I want to repeat that the understanding I have is that all of the recommendations made by the coroner's jury have been put into effect. I will look into the situation to see if some temporary improvement can be made that will carry the present cells to the completion of the new facilities, which have been approved by Treasury Board and will be completed by the end of 1982.

Point of Order—Mr. McKnight

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. TOWERS—PROCEDURE RESPECTING S.O. 43 MOTION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I recognize that it is not given to members of Parliament to reflect on decisions of the Chair, but with regard to a motion I moved under Standing Order 43 today, I believe there is a misunderstanding between the Chair and myself. After looking at the "blues", perhaps the Chair might give a decision on that tomorrow. My motion was not a congratulatory message, but rather called on the communities of Canada to give support to police forces and police associations so that our country will be a better place in which to live.

Madam Speaker: It is often difficult at first glance to see whether a motion is in order. I had the feeling that it was a congratulatory message, or a message of encouragement. I was afraid that if I accepted the motion of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), tomorrow and on following days I may be in the position of having to accept motions with regard to nurses, doctors, and other members of the community without whom our life would not be the same. I will look at the hon. member's motion. If I have been unfair, I will certainly allow him to bring it forward on another day.

MR. NIELSEN—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a different point of order. While the Chair is looking at the motion under Standing Order 43 of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), she might at the same time look at the motion under Standing Order 43 moved by the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) which might commend itself for a comparison between the urgency of both.

I rise now to give notice of a point of order that I intend to raise tomorrow. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made extensive references to and citations from a letter from Prime Minister Thatcher to himself. Extensive references to and citations from the letter have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), both in the public media and in this House. I wish to correlate all those three sources of statements to the rules. I am now simply giving notice that I intend to raise the matter on a point of order tomorrow and give the Table officers an opportunity to advise the Chair in advance as to the precedents, and to offer the government House leader the same advantage.

MR. McKNIGHT—A PROBLEM IN MATHEMATICS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I will be very brief. I wish to bring to the attention of the House the courtesy which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) extended to those on this side by supplying us with 125 apples from the province of Quebec. However, in order to be fair, we received more cards than apples from the Minister of Agriculture. Knowing his penchant for good housekeeping, I would like to return these cards to the Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MR. WADDELL—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. TAYLOR

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As reported at page 6805 of yesterday's Hansard the following exchange took place:

MISS BÉGIN: Name a better country than Canada.

MR. TAYLOR: Alberta.

I wonder if the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) would take the opportunity to correct Hansard in that regard.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I would like to say that the rest of what I said is not in Hansard. I said "without Alberta the federal government would be broke", and I stand by that.

Mr. Waddell: It is clearly in the record of Hansard at page 6805:

MISS BÉGIN: Name a better country than Canada.

MR. TAYLOR: Alberta.

The hon. member refuses to change that. Are we in this House to understand he really believes that?

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) does not wish to correct Hansard, that is his prerogative. If he wants the text to stand as it is, it will stand as it is. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) cannot force the hon. member for Bow River to change words he thinks the hon. member said in this House.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I would like to say that I am not in any way responsible to any member of the NDP. If the hon. member does not like it, he can lump it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

TABLING OF MINISTER'S LETTER

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay upon the Table a file copy of a letter I sent to the executive committee of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women requesting that they make public their affidavit concerning the minutes of the January 9 meeting.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, having tabled the letter as he has done upon request, will the minister also table the reply he has received to the letter?

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 28, 1,459, 1,705, 1,706, 1,707, 1,808 and 1,815.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Question No. 28—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 253 of the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament which states in part "It is not the practice of Canadian National to disclose the names of persons or firms submitting tenders for the supply of services", on what date was this practice established and (a) who established it (b) for what reason?

2. Since Canadian National Railways is owned by the taxpayers of Canada, will the government institute an immediate policy of making public any information legitimately requested in the House of Commons about its operations and, if not, for what reason?

3. With further reference to the answer to question No. 253 of the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament which states in part "The amount of gross revenue paid by Blue Line Taxi Company Limited to the Crown is considered confidential to the parties involved during the term of the agreement" (a) who considers this to be confidential and for what reason (b) what are all the reasons the government permits any publicly-owned operation to keep its expenditures confidential (c) will the government now make this information public?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Transport, the management of the Canadian National Railways and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council offices as follows:

1. The cited practice is based on the needs and customs of the competitive commercial environment in which CN operates, including respect for confidentiality regarding the affairs of others proposing to contract with it. The time when that specific practice was adopted is unknown but doubtless predates the tenures of office of the present members of the board of directors and senior management officers of CN. The reason may be taken to be the protection of CN's ability to negotiate or call tenders advantageously.

2. Because Canadian National operates in a commercial and competitive environment it is not deemed desirable to impose upon that corporation disclosure policy which would place it at a disadvantage with its competitors.

3. Blue Line Taxi Company Ltd.'s contract with the Department of Transport for the provision of taxi service at Ottawa International Airport was a negotiated agreement dating from 1969. This agreement was terminated on April 30, 1980.

(a) It is standard business practice that financial information contained in such agreements is not released without the consent of both parties. To the knowledge of the Department of Transport, Blue Line has not consented to such release, either during the term of the agreement or since its termination.

(b) The question refers to payments by Blue Line to the Crown. As Blue Line is not a publicly-owned operation, this subquestion does not appear applicable.

(c) The government will not release the information in question without the consent of Blue Line.

GENERAL MOTORS

Question No. 1,459—Mr. Deans:

1. From 1965 to June 1980, how many ordersincouncil were issued affecting General Motors and its subsidiaries operating in Canada and what was the actual wording of each order in council?

2. What amount of customs duty was remitted for each order submitted concerning General Motors and its subsidiaries?

3. What were the commitments from General Motors and its subsidiaries in exchange for remitting each customs duty?

4. Did General Motors and its subsidiaries meet each commitment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: no orders in council were issued to General Motors by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

Question No. 1,705—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the government receive any funds for payment of the swimming pool at the official residence of the Prime Minister at 24 Sussex Drive and, if so, in what manner?

2. (a) Were such funds made by (i) cash (ii) cheque or cheques and, in either case, who gave the money or who signed the cheque or cheques (b) did the name of any organization appear on the cheque or cheques, specifically the Liberal Party of Canada and, if so, was there any obligation under the law to report such disbursements and the origin of such disbursements in existence at the time they occurred?

3. On what date was each amount received and who received it on behalf of the government?

4. Were records kept of any cheque or cheques and, if so, what was the (a) name of the bank (b) number of the bank account (c) actual address of the branch of the specific bank (d) name of the holder of any account involved?

5. What are the details of all or any knowledge possessed by the government in regard to sources of funds for building the swimming pool and is there any method by which the government can determine whether any of the individual donors could have been considered in any manner as being in conflict of interest?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): See replies to questions Nos. 1,233, answered October 28, 1975, Hansard page 8611; 1,294, answered July 14, 1975, Hansard page 7529; 2,211, answered May 20, 1975, Hansard page 5919; 2,691, answered July 22, 1975, Hansard page 7813; 2,692, answered October 14, 1975, Hansard page 8136; 2,773, answered October 14, 1975, Hansard page 8147; 3,323, answered November 7, 1975, Hansard page 8959.

Question No. 1,706—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Department of Public Works have any connection with the construction of a swimming pool along with its surroundings and contents at the official residence of the Prime Minister at 24 Sussex Drive during the term of office of the Prime Minister and, if so (a) what is a detailed description of all such connections (b) what are the names of all persons in the department who had any connection with the matter?

2. Can the department absolutely assure the Canadian people that any donors involved were not in conflict of interest?

3. (a) What was the name of the contractor and the names of all subcontractors (b) what were the dates, amounts of all payments made to the general contractor or subcontractors and for what work?

4. Did Mr. William Teron, former head of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, have any connection with the project and, if so, in what way?

5. Does the department have any knowledge of the identity of the donors and, if so, does it know from whom any of the money was received and on what dates?

6. (a) What was the full cost of everything connected with the construction of the swimming pool (b) did any money come from public funds and, if so (i) what was the amount (ii) what is a detailed explanation?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): See reply to question No. 1,705 answered this day.

PERSONS GIVING FINANCIAL GIFTS TO GOVERNMENT

Question No. 1,707—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the names and addresses of all persons who gave financial gifts to the government between January 1, 1973 and December 31, 1975 and, in each case, what was the (a) amount (b) purpose of the gift?

2. What are all of the details of how the money was spent?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1 and 2. The information requested in this inquiry is not available through any records retained in finance branch, services administration, or filed in Archives on its behalf. No record has been kept of detailed documentation supporting the Public Account preparation prior to the 1976-77 fiscal year. The only reported amount available starts with the fiscal year 1974-75. In the working papers for Public Accounts, there is a combined total for "Donations to the Crown" of $29,454. However, this cannot be broken down by individual donations and would include a significant amount from anonymous donors.

This lack of detail makes it impossible to identify the purpose of the gifts as requested in part 1(b) of the inquiry. If however, no restriction were attached to the donations, as is generally the case, they would be deposited into the Consolidated Revenue Fund to become part of the total cash available to the government. This would, in essence be the response to part 2 of the inquiry.

REPAIR AND MAINTENANCE CONTRACTS

Question No. 1,808—Mr. Herbert:

What percentage of repair and maintenance contracts were awarded by Defence Construction (1951) Limited on a fixed-price basis?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): All repair and maintenance contracts awarded in the fiscal year 1979-80 were on a fixed price basis.

CONTRACT REGULATIONS—DCL

Question No. 1,815—Mr. Herbert:

Are copies of the current government contracts regulations which pertain to the limits of authority under which Defence Construction (1951) Limited may increase the amounts payable under a contract available to the public?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes, the amendment to the Government Contracts Regulations as approved under P.C. 1980-2279, 27 August, 1980, was published in The Canada Gazette, Part II, Volume 114, Number 7, on September 10, 1980.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 864 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 864 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LOBSTER—MINIMUM SIZE LIMITS

Question No. 864—Mr. Gass:

1. What has been the minimum size limit for lobster in the (a) Gulf of St. Lawrence area (b) Victoria-Cape Breton County area (c) Richmond County to Halifax area (d) Halifax to the U.S. Border area and are the minimum size limits expected to increase in the future and, if so, to what size?

2. Will Canadian lobster fishermen be compensated by the government for decreased catches resulting from increased minimum size limits and, if so, to what extent and in what manner will the compensation be paid?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, February 2, consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Francis in the chair.

The Chairman: The House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax. When the committee rose on Monday, February 2, 1981, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration and the hon. member for Peterborough had the floor.

On clause 1—

Mr. Domm: Mr. Chairman, dealing with Bill C-54, what is most concerning to me as a member of Parliament from Peterborough, central Ontario, is that during this session of Parliament the Liberal government through acts and bills is gradually moving this country to what I perceive to be a socialist republic. It tends to impose this plan on the Canadian people through a program introduced first with the budget, followed by an energy policy, and now through methods of taxation, in particular this Bill C-54.

I am concerned that the members to our left, the New Democratic Party, in co-operation with the government of today, are making this move toward socialism possible. The danger about this gradual move to a form of socialist republic is that if we, as Canadians, are inclined to accept socialism here in Canada, we as Canadians may forget that was a word invented back in the late nineteenth century to make us believe it is different from communism. The recent troubles in Poland have demonstrated a real lack of freedom in that country, and the Russians have illustrated in their official news releases that socialism and communism are one and the same.

If there is any doubt in this House about the simile of socialism and communism and the right to own property, I would refer them to the statement just two nights ago on national television by the President of the United States. When he was appearing before the news media he said, "Call it socialism, call it communism, call it what you will."

The other very disturbing thing is that socialism or communism eventually leads to totalitarianism, and we have evidence of that start in our country today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Domm: I can understand why members to our left are somewhat upset on this subject of socialism.

An hon. Member: Because it is a lie.

Mr. Domm: They are upset because there is substantive proof, and an indication by this present government in concert with the New Democratic Party in Canada, that together they are going to adopt the kinds of policies which will move our nation, our country grown through the free enterprise system, into a form of socialistic government where we can take from those who have and give to those who have not, with no consideration of reward, incentive, legislation or tax measures that would add to the incentive of the free enterprise system.

Last night during the debate a member of the New Democratic Party used as an example of the kinds of policies they would like to see in place in Canada the case of a hairdresser in Hamilton who was finding it difficult to pay taxes. The very simple and basic answer the New Democratic Party would give, and this is recorded in my response last night was: can you not find some company, a major corporation, from which you can take that money—he was directing these remarks to previous statements by one of my colleagues—and pay the taxes for that person who is having a great deal of difficulty making that $6,000 payment? I remind the member from Hamilton—

Mr. Deans: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Domm: Mr. Chairman, it is my turn, and I have 20 minutes.

The Chairman: Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain on a point of order.

Mr. Deans: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the member is attempting to put words into my mouth. He is stating I said something last night which I did not say. I ask him to point to that portion of Hansard in which I said anything even vaguely resembling what he has now said, and if he cannot find it, withdraw it.

The Chairman: The hon. member has made his point.

Mr. Domm: The answer by the New Democratic member, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, to the problem of the hairdresser who found it difficult to pay this tax on $6,000 was: why cannot this Liberal government find that money to make it more easy for that constituent not to have to pay that tax? In reality the reason that hairdresser cannot pay tax on $6,000 income is because this government, in concert with the New Democratic Party of Canada, has failed to introduce policies, tax measures and incentives that would allow the free enterprise system to produce on its own. Free of government intervention in the marketplace it could produce on its own the profits necessary to generate the funds for this government to pay the bills. However, it insists, with the help of the New Democratic Party, on introducing policies in Canada which inflame government requirements for funds in order that it can satisfy this insatiable desire to spend money. We expect in Bill C-54 income tax measures which will encourage small businesses to function in order to produce the necessary profits.

We had hoped there would be some relief for the farmers in respect of capital gains tax in Bill C-54. What in reality is happening under this tax measure, Bill C-54, is that farmers are going to be forced to sell their farms to pay all the accumulated capital gains tax which could amount to a sum greater than a farm's selling price. The non-exemption for farmers under the capital gains tax has been a major factor in the decline in the number of Canadian farms. Farmers are being forced to add the cost of their tax to the selling price, and this has led to immensely high set-up costs for new farms.

The Clark government would have allowed farmers to roll over the proceeds of a farm sale into an RRSP. Whatever the Prime Minister might think of it, Canadian farmers are looking ruefully now for some assistance. They have major questions of concern, as does the public, as to why the government has eliminated the farm community from assistance through RRSPs to avoid capital gains tax. Members opposite in the government will answer that they can put it on hold, that they do not have to pay that capital gains tax if they hand it down from father to son. However, it just sits there and, with inflation growing at the rate it is today, and with the devalued dollar like it never has been before, reality will fall on those farmers maybe two generations from now in that they will have to pay that tax.

We had hoped for an energy tax credit as well for the low and middle-income groups. I can remember not a year ago that members opposite, when they were in opposition, and NDP members as well, just a little over a year ago, were asking for some assistance for low and middle-income groups in order to offset some of their increased costs of energy. In the Crosbie budget, defeated by the NDP and the Liberals, we had offered an energy tax credit to assist every individual on low and middle incomes in Canada in offsetting stress and strain brought to bear by increased energy prices. That was and is denied. It is not in the present tax measures brought forward either in the budget or in this new income tax legislation.

I say to the members of the New Democratic Party and of the Liberal Party of Canada, which I like to refer to as the "Liberal-Democratic Party of Canada", that we need to introduce into our economy systems of taxation which will add incentives to businesses and encourage the construction industry so that homes can be built to supply the needs of all those people who are finding it virtually impossible to acquire homes today.

As a Conservative government we introduced a mortgage interest deduction. We brought it in, but it was turned down. It was not passed. Not all Liberals voted against the mortgage interest deduction. Some of them had the guts to stand up in this House and support mortgage interest deductions. What happened was that the New Democratic Party members did not want mortgage interest deductions. They did not want to help low and middle-income people acquire homes. They felt it would only benefit the rich or those who have, and that it would not help those who have not.

I remind the members of the New Democratic Party to my left that there are many low and middle-income people in Canada today who are losing their homes through foreclosure, who are unable, because of high interest rates, to make their payments. What is the response when we in opposition say assistance is needed for people so that they can build homes, so that there can be added incentives for the construction industry and so that we can create jobs and a climate which will allow this country to grow? We get no co-operation from hon. members opposite. They do not feel these measures are necessary.

As late as last night in television releases it was noted that all the programs introduced on behalf of the construction industry of Canada have down sides. That came from a minister in the present government. The down sides of introduced programs were referred to, and I say that we want some up sides. We want some turnarounds in our economy. We will get turnarounds only if we encourage the construction industry, which is the greatest producer of jobs in the labour force I can think of which we can mobilize and put into action today. We could offer interest savings to home owners to encourage them to buy homes. In doing so we could then add an incentive to the construction industry which is very badly needed today.

What did Liberal members opposite do with respect to a property tax deduction? Do I hear any cries from the New Democratic Party because we no longer have that in our income tax program? We had to rely on the Conservative government of Ontario to offer relief to the people who find it most difficult to pay their property taxes. The provincial Conservative government of Ontario introduced legislation which provided property tax relief for home owners in Ontario in lower income groups, senior citizens and people on fixed incomes, the people most seriously affected, because hon. members opposite have lost their credibility and have no responsibility when it comes to energy tax credits, mortgage interest deductions, property tax deductions, and so forth.

What is happening? This government will take away from the provinces of Canada, through tax measures and energy policies, their revenue-producing resource base. Through expropriation and through legislation this government will acquire control of major corporations in Canada. When hon. members opposite seize that control through energy tax measures, they take away from the provinces of Canada the royalties they have always received and have grown to expect. They remove royalties from the provinces of Canada, because once the federal government takes an interest in those corporations, that opportunity and that revenue are taken from the provinces of Canada.

I warn the people of Ontario not to be taken in by the idea that always to acquire, to seize public ownership, to take state control of the free enterprise system is best for the people of Canada because, in view of what this government has done in the west with its present policies, I say, watch out, Ontario. Watch out for Inco. Watch out that this government down the road a piece does not feel it can set the world market price for nickel. How would the people of Ontario like it if the Liberal Government of Canada were to decide to set the price of nickel at 50 per cent of the world price? What would we in Ontario say? We would say exactly what we are saying now.

The main object of this government in the energy field should be to seek self-sufficiency. Because of tax measures, budgets, and income tax legislation, we are the poorest example of moving toward self-sufficiency in the energy field. Non-renewable resources will be gone, with them will go revenue, and when it is gone it cannot be reclaimed. We will have to go to the world price somewhere down the road. If we do not, we will have to continue to subsidize.

Let us look at the promises made by this government in the last election campaign. I could find only five made by the Prime Minister of Canada, and all five have been broken. This government has not lived up to one of them. First, the Liberals would "manage more rigorously the nation's finances in order to make more effective the use of the taxpayer's money". The Prime Minister made that pledge just before the people went to the polls and were conned into voting for him. He said, and I quote, "We will hold the line on government expenditure growth under the rate of gross national product". That is the promise; what is the performance? For the coming fiscal year the MacEachen budget calls for an increase of 12.8 per cent in total federal spending. It forecasts an increase of 11.1 per cent in the gross national product, including inflation, so government spending is not being held in line.

Second, the Prime Minister promised "to achieve energy security at a fair price for all Canadians". He ridiculed the Tories for having failed to make a deal with the producing provinces, and he said, "We will negotiate an increase of less than 14 cents" in the price of a gallon of gasoline. A year later negotiations with the producing provinces are completely stalled, and energy security is a fading dream. When I filled up to come to Ottawa from Peterborough this week, I found that there has been an increase in one year of 50 cents a gallon.

Third, the Prime Minister promised a "development and industrial strategy which will provide jobs, spur growth and increase Canadian ownership and control". The Prime Minister said, "This party will not simply stand by and let the recession come". The then leader of the opposition and now Prime Minister said, "We will fight it and overcome it". He said that every economic tool at the disposal of a Liberal government would be used to save Canadian jobs and to maintain Canadian growth. In the year since that speech the Trudeau government has made no effort to use any economic tool to stave off the recession. In fact it did not even bring in a budget until it had been in office for seven months.

As for the promised industrial strategy, it is still to be produced, and Statistics Canada has just reported that more than 30,000 more Canadians are out of work now than a year ago.

The fourth promise of the Prime Minister in the last election campaign was that he would lead "a national government that uses its strength to realize the aspirations and economic potential of each of our provinces". It would be "a national government that builds up rather than tears down" and would make the 1980s "a decade of opportunity rather than a decade of doubt."

Mr. Chairman, I will finish with just one sentence. Fifth, the Prime Minister promised to "enhance the security of every individual by helping those who most need assistance". He has neglected to do that. We are minus new capital gains tax provisions, energy tax credits, mortgage interest deduction, property tax deduction and energy savings for the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to take part in this debate concerning a taxation bill which once again will help the Canadian people while stimulating the economy. I hope that these tax proposals will be reflected in the 1980 tax returns of all Canadians. I trust further that, as soon as this bill is passed, all the members on this side of the House will welcome it as a beneficial impact on the economy.

Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the member who spoke before me. He still seems unable to distinguish between a socialist party and a Communist party since he still associates socialism with communism. During the time available to me, I shall try to explain that on February 18 of last year, the Canadian people chose, not the capitalistic philosophy of the Progressive Conservatives nor the socialist doctrine expressed by the NDP, but rather a party whose objective was to Canadianize these industries. This is why, as a member of the Liberal party, I have always disliked the leftist or rightist parties which go by that name in European countries. As for us in the Liberal Party, our objective is not to belong to the left or to the right, but rather to extend the centre so that the aspirations of all Canadians, whether from the west, the centre or the east will be reflected in our social legislation and economic incentives. This is why I say that the philosophy of the Liberal Party aims at extending the centrist position, and this is why on February 18 of last year the Canadian people chose our party rather than one or the other of the two extremes.

I listened yesterday evening to the hon. member for Calgary South who told us about a trip which I also made as a member of the task force on the national trading company. The hon. member talked about the economy of Sweden, which has been administered for a long time by a socialist government, and he quoted the following figures: if you earn $25,000 a year, you will pay $13,000 in taxes, and you can be taxed at a rate of up to 75 per cent if you earn $32,000, and at a rate of up to 85 per cent if your income is higher.

I have witnessed this situation and I think that my hon. colleague described it very well. He said that he bought a pair of galoshes for 159 kroner, to which I was also a witness. I told him, "John, if you had bought those galoshes in Canada, you would have paid $10, because this is what I paid for galoshes before leaving for this trip."

An hon. Member: What are 150 kroner worth in Europe?

Mr. Roy: In Canadian dollars, 150 kroner are worth about $50. I believe that this is a good illustration of what is the situation in Canada and how often we forget it.

I shall try to describe the pattern of the Canadian economy. During that trip, Mr. Chairman, I was proud to wear the Canadian flag, as I am proud today to wear a Canadian tie.

I was proud to see to what extent Canadians are well known for the reliability of their passport and also for the way they behave, for the role played by our embassies throughout the world, for the efficiency of our trade representatives in the industrial field. I would like to pay tribute to all those people for their outstanding dedication in representing Canada abroad. I would ask the parliamentary secretary who is here in front of me, to convey my congratulations to the people responsible for the excellent work they did and are still doing. I am speaking in the presence of the chairman of the special committee on the national trading company who was with me during that trip. We could see how anxious those people were to represent Canada as it should be. They are indeed good will ambassadors and worthy spokesmen for Canada's economic leaders.

I have other comments to make on the role played here by our commercial attachés who have visited all Canadian provinces as well. We also paid visits to the major Canadian cities where we met the industrialists and manufacturers with small and medium-size businesses, but the relationship between management and staff as we know it here in Canada—I do not want to reveal the contents of the report which will be tabled in the House but I would have liked to see our commercial attachés here in Canada show the same motivation as we have witnessed outside the country.

Mr. Chairman, I would rather restrict my comments to economic indicators and the progress made here in Canada. I will not use selective or partisan references, nor figures originating from political sources. The data and statistical tables I rely on were issued by the World Bank, by American statistics agencies and by the OECD, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. The significant aspect is that we are all aware that inflation is rampant, that it is an affliction which knows no boundaries, an evil found all over the world. But what matters as well after we have paid our taxes is the money left in our pockets to buy a house, appliances, food, consumer goods or any other products. I think that is what really matters and I will refer to economic indicators to depict Canadian conditions as they are. I alluded earlier to the role played by our trade representatives, our ambassadors throughout the world. Members of the official opposition are saying today that they are blind, deaf, that they lack objectivity or else that they are solidly anchored by partisanship and want to make Canadians and their economy appear as though they are mediocre and reflect a disastrous situation.

An hon. Member: They have a negative approach.

Mr. Roy: It is a negative approach and what was rejected last February 18 was indeed that negative approach which makes them criticize everything without objectivity. Everyone talks about inflation and, of course, we have inflation in Canada but, between 1960 and 1979, unemployment went up 520 per cent in Australia, 443 per cent in West Germany, 108 per cent in the United Kingdom, 90 per cent in Japan and 40 per cent in Sweden. At 27 per cent Canada ranks second behind the United States in job creation. I have here some figures which reflect the situation as regards job creation. In Australia, for example, a country with a rather rightist government, the number of jobs has increased by 12 per cent. In Sweden, under the socialist administration, the increase was 9 per cent. I should have liked, had we had more time, to speak a little longer about the Swedish socialist party, since the PQ government wanted to somewhat imitate or copy Sweden's socialist administration. I hope Quebeckers, come the next election, will remember the economic performance under the socialist or social-democrat system in Sweden where today more employees or workers are employed in the public than in the private sector. That is not what we intend to do, Mr. Chairman, absolutely not. But that is what some try to have us say or to make people believe. Members of the Progressive Conservative Party suggest that the Liberal Party has become a socialist party. On the contrary, we are a centre party and we want to enlarge the centre. We want to reduce the budgetary deficit, but we are aware of our responsibilities to the disadvantaged people as well as to small and medium-sized businesses in need of economic incentives. I intend to revert to that later. As for job creation, Canada was first among OECD countries. Our economy had the best growth rate for the years 1970 to 1979 with 55 per cent, as compared to France with 41 per cent, Japan with 38 per cent, the United States with 29 per cent and Sweden with 19 per cent.

● (1540)

What is important and what I realized on this trip is that food is less expensive in Canada than anywhere else in the world. That is consistent with the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture who often refers to the cost of a food basket in U.S. dollars—but unfortunately people do not quite realize it. Let us compare the cost of a food basket in Canada and elsewhere. In Canada, it costs $55.58, in the United States, $58.02, in Australia, under a fairly rightist government, $66.70, in Sweden, under a socialist government, $99.68, in Japan, because we are often asked to compare Japan's economy or economic performance to Canada's, the same food basket which in Canada costs $55.58 U.S., costs $135.10.

Let us now consider the number of hours of work needed to purchase those groceries. In Canada, seven hours of work are required and about the same in the United States. In Australia, a few more hours are needed; in Sweden, it takes 14 hours of work to purchase those groceries; and in Japan, 25 hours of work. Mr. Chairman, I could go on and on. That is an indicator of the Canadian economy, an indicator which members opposite never mention. They say, "The economy is in a slump. The government is going socialist." Well, let us talk about that. Reference is also made to the flight of capital, to an unfavourable climate for investment.

I have here a speech made by Senator Bud Olson, Minister of State for Economic Development, at the "Business Outlook for 1980" conference held in Toronto by the Conference Board of Canada. The minister mentioned that capital is an important source of growth for our economy, and I quote:

> We can always borrow abroad, of course, and that is what we have done in the past. In fact, the foreign percentage—as opposed to the national percentage—of investment capital in Canada has gone from approximately 5.5 per cent at the beginning of the decade to 9 per cent at the end. This is an increase of some $3.75 billion in foreign borrowings in that period.

So then, those foreign countries chose to invest in Canada and their investments doubled in the last ten years. They chose Canada because it was in their interest to do so. It is our responsibility to develop a climate favourable to investments. I think that these new tax measures contained in the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance are yet another government initiative designed to encourage job creation, stimulate small and medium-sized businesses and develop our industry.

I should also like to reply to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain who spoke last night. I have considerable respect for the hon. member who, at one time, was minister of agriculture. However, when he mentioned yesterday that we should encourage Canadians to participate increasingly in energy programs, in fact he was preaching Canadian ownership of Canadian industries. He mentioned how important it is for Canadians to invest in Canadian institutions and industries. That is precisely what we are doing. We are striving to Canadianize increasingly the oil industry. That is the Liberal program, the Liberal policy which was rejected by big business on February 18: they would rather continue squeezing money out of the Canadian provinces, the Canadian people, and continue to fatten up the oil industry. What have we done? One need but read what the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced: an amount of $100 million to help co-operatives and credit unions take a more active part in energy development.

The discussions launched last May with the various co-operative unions, whose membership exceeds nine million Canadians, should result in total investments estimated at over $1 billion. That is what we are doing now, Mr. Chairman. It seems to us that on the other side, because of partisanship or lack of objectivity, hon. members keep on preaching, without ever seeing the end of the tunnel. They are still in the dark or almost total darkness. That is the difference between an optimistic Liberal philosophy and that of the Progessive Conservative Party which is essentially capitalistic. It is that difference which tipped the scales last February 18. That is why the Liberal Party stands neither to the left nor to the right, and is trying to widen the centre. We want to listen to the Canadian people. We want to meet their aspirations making them a reality through positive legislation. That is what we want to keep on doing.

Mr. Chairman, we heard the hon. members of the opposition speak of a disastrous economic situation. Last week, once again some good news was announced with regard to the economy; mention was made of another favorable economic indicator, namely, a trade surplus of $8 billion. This is very encouraging. Furthermore, in order to promote the further development of our Canadian industries, of the small and medium-sized businesses, we must protect them because some countries also want to expand their world markets through a mixed credit system by favouring an interest rate to develop their foreign trade. We wanted to protect our industries. The minister announced a three-year program that was not designed to subsidize exports but simply to prevent Canadians from losing potential markets, because some countries use mixed credit to support their interest rate somewhat and thus deprive Canadian companies of contracts.

We took action. The government looked into the problem. The special committee which considers the advisability of setting up a national trading company had received representations from manufacturers. They pleaded with us to do something because contracts were being lost, because they were not competitive. The government decided to act, and over a three-year period projects worth $900 million will be protected in order to prevent the loss of jobs in the Canadian industry. That's leadership. One does not wait until the train has gone by to react. And that is what we are being told now. I have tried somewhat to feel the pulse of the economy in the housing sector, and I could do the same in other sectors. It has been done with regard to the food basket and the creation of jobs. I could deal with the development of small businesses through various economic incentives, but that is the objective we are aiming at through these new income tax amendments, Mr. Chairman.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like simply to say this: Canada is the country of the world which will meet the greatest challenge over the next few years. The Canadian people themselves are facing this challenge. It is our responsibility to take advantage of our geographic situation as well as our natural and human resources if we are to meet this great challenge.

Mr. Bosley: Mr. Chairman, it is normal during first reading of a bill, or during Committee of the Whole stage, that most interventions do not come from the government side so it is nice that we had one on this bill. We can expect the odd one—and that certainly was an odd one. As a Canadian, not as a Conservative, I get a little tired of the defence that government members make of their policies based on the fact that they have not ruined this country quite as badly as other policies have ruined other countries. I find that a very tiresome defence of policies for which the government is responsible.

The hon. member for Laval has charged that we are not being objectively critical when we say that we do not believe the government intends to reduce its deficit. We base this criticism on the demonstrated record of the government so far. I believe that evidence from the past is more useful than objective criticism and promises for the future. The record of the government is very clear on that. If I am not being objectively critical but am somewhat suspicious of the government's projections with regard to the deficit, I apologize to the hon. member and to you, Mr. Chairman. I am suspicious, however, and I think I have good reason to be.

Perhaps the most critical thing in the speech which may be indicative of the problem we face when we are accused of being partisan, is that having made a budget presentation which argued at length, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain expounded upon so eloquently last night, that the single best thing to get the Canadian economy going is to get Canadians to invest in it, the hon. member for Laval then refuted that argument by saying more money is being given to caisses populaires. No one objects to the government helping those who need help. What I object to is the government's philosophy that says, "We will take more, give out a little of it, and in this way give help." That is the philosophy which has landed us with our present problems.

I should like to compliment the government, however. Perhaps the hon. member for Laval would be interested in knowing that a number of Conservatives welcome some of the measures in this bill and believe that the government should be complimented on them. A measure that was welcomed in my constituency was the spouse's allowance introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The inclusion of a deduction for spouses' income in unincorporated businesses in this bill is a fantastic idea.

There are others that we like as well, and I will mention them with tongue in cheek. That seems to have become fashionable in this House; the Prime Minister is making a track record of it.

One provision that will help a small but unusual group of people is the provision for an employee aircraft deduction. Until the present time only businesses have been able to deduct aircraft expenses but now employees who have to use planes will be able to deduct that expense. I thank the minister for including that provision because it is going to be helpful to some workers in my constituency. I suspect the reason the Liberals included it is that they know how many Canadians may need planes to get to work in future if the economy continues to fade.

The overseas employment deduction will probably be just as useful as the last one. A number of my constituents are now finding that in order to do the work for which they are trained, they have to leave the country.

The volunteer firemen's credit will be welcomed in some of the small communities in Canada. It may turn out to be extremely useful because, looking ahead at the prospects for the economy, it seems there may be a lot of fires to put out. I am sure the government does not think of such things when it includes such deductions in legislation, but they will be needed.

Seriously, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of matters in the bill that will be useful, but I want to turn now to some things which are not in the bill but which should be in it. After I deal with them I shall expound upon why I believe they are not in the bill as I think the reason is indicative of the philosophy of this government.

I am very sad that the small business tax credit has not yet been extended. One of the problems facing Canadians today is the growing fear that not only will they not be able to create more wealth for themselves and others but that they may end up losing their present jobs. One way to combat that is to allow the small business sector to grow as quickly as it can because it is the foundation of employment in this country. I urge the government not to let the small business credit expire. In the tough times ahead it will be one of the few things to encourage people to invest in the small business sector, and that investment is vital if we are to survive this period.

For different reasons than those put forward by the hon. member for Peterborough I would urge the government—and I suspect without any hope—to reconsider its position on mortgage interest deductions. The argument for the deduction of interest on mortgages is often made by those who are currently paying off mortgages. I think there is another argument, however, that goes to the question of tax equity in our system. This point is not often made, but I should like to make it now.

Under the present system a young, struggling couple are rewarded through the tax system if they invest their money in RRSPs, and rent rather than own their home. That is the first problem. Anyone who does the mathematics of that proposition will find that there is in fact an incentive to remain a tenant and no incentive to become an owner. That is very well if one chooses to do that, but I believe it is silly to have a system that creates an incentive for people to remain dependent on landlords.

It is usual for young couples to struggle along and pay their mortgage without any help. That is the way they begin to build an estate. They discover, however, that once they have an asset they can borrow against it in order to increase the estate—to invest in Canadian stocks and bonds, to buy a piece of property or an asset that may increase in value. They discover that they can deduct the interest. They have built up an estate without any help. Home owners often do not realize that they are relatively well-off compared to those who rent a home. Once they get rid of the mortgage and are secure, they can borrow against that asset and become better off. That is all well and good, Mr. Chairman. But it is like telling them that when they are well off the government will help them become better off, but when they were not well off in estate terms there was no help for them to begin an estate.

There is a tax bias in this which, in my view, in addition to all the very sensible help offered to those who want to build rental property has partly led to the dramatic decline in the last 40 years in the number of Canadians who own their own homes.

I make that case, Mr. Chairman, because I think the case is usually made the other way—help for those who have trouble keeping up their mortgages. While that is a valid case, I would urge the government to help those who do not now own their homes to become owners. They are discouraged from doing so by the tax system. The community, as a result, has fewer home owners and it follows that there is less sense of commitment to the community.

I find it tragic that the investment tax credit in the last budget was so narrow. The Crosbie budget would have encouraged Canadians to invest in Canada. This budget encourages Canadians to invest in DREE areas. That is well and good because the underprivileged and underdeveloped areas need help as well to improve their position in the Canadian family. However, I would urge the government to remember that the idea of the investment tax credit was to encourage Canadians to invest everywhere in Canada. In the final analysis we cannot afford the luxury of saying that we only need investment in some parts of Canada. We are not that well off.

I am saddened to find there is no provision for an energy tax credit. There was no provision in the budget, and therefore there was no provision for one in this document. I am more saddened than ever not only because of the Liberal promise in the election that Canadians would not pay what we said they would pay for gas but that promise was made phony the moment the Liberals omitted the energy tax credit. The poorest Canadians are now without the tax credit and will pay more for their gas, even if it has only gone up ten cents a gallon, and every Canadian knows that it has gone up two or three times that already.

However, I am disillusioned because of this morning's announcement about Petro-Canada and Petrofina. Let me be clear in what I have to tell you about this. I will concede that most Canadians demonstrated in the election they believe Petro-Canada is not a bad thing. I think that was very clear from the polls. Certainly it is clear in my area. But most Canadians expect their dollars to be spent well. I for one do not like the idea that we will pay $1.5 billion for an asset worth $1 billion. But worse still, because of the way the system will go, Canadians will pay for that asset twice by borrowing. They will pay for it as far as I can tell, because there is no official announcement about how they will pay for it, through the petroleum compensation charge which will become another income tax, although it will not be represented as such in this kind of a document. Because it will be a petroleum compensation charge levied on gas and oil, it will be paid for by all Canadians, regardless of income. We shall all realize the effects of the failure to include energy tax credit in this bill.

Not only is the Government of Canada proposing that Canadians pay more indirectly for their oil and gas through wellhead levies, but now it is proposing that Canadians pay 50 per cent more than the assets which they propose to buy are worth. Canadians of all income levels will pay for that through their oil and gas without an energy tax credit for either of those matters. This will hurt those who can least afford the bill. That is precisely why the Crosbie budget included an energy tax credit for all households of moderate and low income. One of the tragedies of the re-election of this government is that it has failed to see that. I say to hon. members, if you are going to do what you are going to do, you have an obligation to protect those who can least afford these things, and you have not done it.

I suppose, Mr. Chairman, in a strange way none of these failures to include measures that will reduce the tax take of the government should surprise me. Last night in the late show I made some reference to the Minister of Finance's comments about what the government will take out of the gross national product. Members will find these references in yesterday's Hansard. The hon. member for Laval referred to the fact the government plans ultimately to reduce its spending and its deficits. The only problem with that is that the method the government proposes to use will not work, and the numbers which the government uses deny its own case.

If hon. members look in the appendix of the ways and means motion behind the budget on which this income tax is based, and look at table 4.1 in the appendix, which is a comparison of the national and public accounts of Canada, they will find that the Government of Canada proposes to increase its real spending from roughly $54 billion in 1979-1980 to roughly $91 billion in 1983-1984. As a percentage of the gross national product of Canada, that represents an increase from 20.9 per cent of the GNP to 22.3 per cent of the GNP. In other words, the government's own numbers indicate it plans to keep taking more out of the economy of Canada. Those are not the numbers the government quotes in the budget. The public account numbers are quoted in the budget. Those are the numbers which are created by taking the national accounts and eliminating from them all the figures which the government nets in.

What that means, for example, is that in the petroleum compensation charge, the government will take the money in and pay it out. It will never show on the books of the government. Any Canadian who does not believe what I have just said only has to read the budget because that is precisely what the government proposes to do, that there should be no accounting for that money in the books of the public accounts of Canada. It is on that basis the government claims it is not going to increase its spending dramatically. The real figures show that it is. The government then argues, and this Income Tax Act is to support this argument, that if it takes more out of the system now, as the member for Laval said, and then spends it, somehow the economy will grow again, in fact, in 1983 to 1984, and in 1982 to 1983, we will see a great increase in the GNP in Canada. That is the Minister of Finance's budgetary argument, Mr. Chairman.

If that is an argument which will work, then every Canadian has a right to ask why, having done it for 12 years, has it produced the situation that we are in today? Why are Canadians out of work in greater numbers than before? Why is Canada's inflation so rampant? Why does our dollar continue to fall on world markets? If it is such a good argument to restore the economy of Canada, why has it not worked when it has been used as the single Liberal economic policy to date?

I should mention one small matter, if I may, to correct the hon. member for Laval's figures. He has made a great deal out of Canada's job-creation record. I accept that Canada has done better than some other countries in the world. The premise of the member's argument is that because we have done better than other countries in the world, we should be satisfied. I have never understood being satisfied at reaching 50 per cent or 25 per cent of the country's potential. This country has the potential to keep everybody at work and to be, in significant ways, a much more vital and energetic country than it is today.

It is interesting to note that the figures which the member was using were 1979-1980 figures. This was during the period when we were in power. During the nine months we were in power the private sector of Canada created 300,000 jobs. The government did not do that because government does not create jobs or wealth. The private sector does that. The private sector created these jobs because it had faith in the economic future of this country. Some of that, in my view, was because of the then government. In the first nine months of this government's term, 75,000 jobs were created in the private sector. I suggest, as is true in that area, as it is true in the energy field and also in the investment field, it is because those on whom we must rely to create wealth, jobs, income and security for Canadians, have less faith in this government.

In conclusion, while there are measures in this Income Tax Act which are welcome, the tragedy is the omission of measures that are needed. Because they are not here is another indication that the government, when it was out of office, learned nothing about how to solve the real economic problems in the country. The government is back before us with yet another bill which, in the final analysis, intends to take more out of Canadian taxpayers' pockets because the government believes it can spend Canadian money better than Canadian taxpayers can. It is that philosophy which will destroy the economy of the country.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. member for Don Valley West. He has a well reasoned argument. I do not entirely agree with all of what he says. However, I must say that a majority of economists will conclude that most economic measures take about a year to come into play. If his figures on unemployment are correct, then I will have some problems with what he is saying. If it is true that it takes a year, then the 300,000 jobs created when his government was in power were a result of economic policies of the previous government. And the problems of the last year were as a result of this government being in power. That may be a bit facetious. It has about as much value as the statement itself.

● (1610)

I have one other general criticism. It is a sweeping kind of criticism. It has to do basically with the whole business of housing mortgages in which that government was involved. There are good reasons for doing that kind of thing when one has plenty of money to do it. However, at certain times governments have to move with their limited resources in the directions that are most important.

In this budget the government has said that investment in energy is the key problem that will face the country over the next ten to 15 years. Money will have to be found to solve this problem. There is a lot that can be said about directing capital into the housing industry and consumer industries at this time when so much capital will be needed for energy.

I enjoyed the rationale of the hon. member's speech. I must say that he presents himself very well. However, two speeches I listened to last night prompted me to speak today. I heard part of the speech of the hon. member for Calgary South, and the remarks by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine. I found them to be completely one-sided in their approach. Canada has a mixed economy. We have a bit of socialism, and private enterprise. With a population of 25 million people and such a vast area, the only way we can operate is with a mixed economy.

I will try to correct some impressions. I do not want it to appear as though I am anti-oil industry. I want to put on record what I believe to be the relationship between the Tory party and the oil industry as I have determined it in my eight years' experience here.

The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre came to my constituency where he made a very strong defence of the industry. He boxed himself into a corner as a strong supporter of the oil industry versus the consumers of Canada.

Before I came here, the industry was constantly preaching the notion that we have so much oil in this country we must do everything we can to create markets. They made arrangements with the government, and the Borden line was drawn. Those people living west of the Ottawa Valley line obtained their oil from Alberta, and paid a premium for it. That was one way of using some of the large amount of oil that we apparently had.

The Hon. Joe Greene was getting his information from the industry, the National Energy Board, and the department. It was to the effect that we had between 100 and 120 years' supply of oil and 700 years' supply of natural gas. We had nothing to worry about.

When I came here in 1972 the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was a relatively small operation. It dealt mostly with geological surveys, making maps and that kind of thing. The energy side was not all that important in the totality of it. The National Energy Board and the department obtained most of their information about reserves from the industry. They did not have the resources to determine this for themselves.

In early 1973 the 1972 reserve figures were presented to us. They indicated that the ultimate recoverable reserves of conventional crude oil in this country were 101 billion barrels. I am going back to this to try to show why Canadians do not believe this industry. I will try to indicate why there is a great deal of skepticism about that industry.

Some of us began to wonder about that figure of 101 billion barrels. We received bits of information from the department and from talking to various people. A very eminent petroleum geologist, Professor Ken North of Carleton University, appeared before our committee and told us that the figures were not realistic. He said that, if the figures were true, we must have a couple of Saharas in our midst, and this would have to be especially true with regard to the far north and the Arctic islands.

Some of us, including the minister, began to ask questions. Donald Macdonald, the then energy minister, stated in 1973 that the figures were not correct, that we did not have those kinds of reserves and we would have to cut back on exports to the United States. You should have heard the howls from the other side. They said it was terrible, "there is all kinds of oil in this country, it is ridiculous to cut back on exports."

The first stage was that we had so much oil we did not know what to do with it. We were looked upon as being some kind of strange animal for not wanting to sell our oil when we had so much of it. The second stage was that the oil was there, but we would have to find it and, in order to do that, more money was needed. The industry said that in order to find the oil more money would have to be spent and this would involve raising the price to consumers.

The industry said that if the price of oil were raised from $4 to $8 a barrel, there would be an 800 per cent increase in reserves. Seven years later we have had an increase, not from $4 to $8, but to $18, and the reserves are 35 per cent less than what they were in 1974.

That is the kind of information that has been given to the Canadian public. No wonder the public has become skeptical. I am not saying this to tear down the industry but to point out what the industry has presented to this nation and the fact that it has been wrong.

I remember visiting the Ranchmen's Club in Calgary where I met some people in the oil industry. I asked how they thought the Canadian people could believe them when they presented this kind of material. They told me that they were not lying or trying to distort the truth, but that they had been able to refine their information. They were doing a better job of determining the real reserves because of technological advances.

During a six-year period we went from 101 billion barrels to 15 billion barrels, even though we had only used approximately four billion. This is why the Canadian people are skeptical. I firmly believe that we in this country and, in fact, throughout the world, are in serious difficulty in terms of oil reserves. I have been saying that in this House for eight years. I would not have been saying that had I listened to the oil industry. The Canadian public have many reasons for not believing what they have been told.

I now want to deal with the position of the Conservative party over the past several years. Every time we have tried—

• (1620)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McRae: The point is I am glad to have your support. I just think you should be supporting us now because I think we have something good going now and you should be here. That is another argument.

Every time we tried to take some step to ease the situation, for instance we brought in the petroleum administration bill, when we brought in the emergency allocation bill—two of them as a matter of fact—when we brought in the petroleum monitoring bill to find out what costs were, and so on, and when we brought in PetroCan, we had virtual filibusters from the other side on every one of them. All these bills were attempting to do something about a declining oil and natural gas situation. But the response was, "We do not need these things. The industry will find it," and so on. There was that absolute faith on the other side that this industry could solve the problem.

The industry is going to have to be part of the solution, there is no question about that. I do not want to say the industry has been all wrong. The point of fact is that there has to be some kind of meeting between industry and government, and some corrections on the part of government to make sure we do solve these problems.

We are talking about the present budget, and I would just like to comment if I have a minute left or so about that budget. There are a number of things in it which I think will help correct this situation. There is no question but that there is a government interjection or intervention which has not been there in the past. This is why I find it so difficult for the NDP not to support what we are doing at this particular stage, because there is a government intervention in this budget in terms of the energy program. I do not think there is any question about that fact. It is a budget which says we are going to give more power to PetroCan, and buy some other multinationals, and so on. These are some of the things in this particular package.

It is also a program which I think does something most important. When looking at the total oil scene in this country, and I think this is important, the real future is in tar sands and in heavy oils. I do not think there is much more in strictly conventional areas. I do not think there will be many more increases in conventional crude. This is one of the criticisms, one of the reasons people talk about it being a bad thing that rigs are leaving Canada, but that is something I wonder about. I wonder why the rigs are leaving Canada and is that a bad thing at this particular point. Let us talk about gas at this particular point. We have thousands and thousands of gas—

An hon. Member: And if we have all this gas you are going to export it.

Mr. McRae: I wanted badly to say that myself. The NDP members are just agreeing with the whole program. We are giving all kinds of incentives to the industry—

An hon. Member: And that is why the rigs are leaving.

Mr. McRae: —to go out, explore, find this gas, then cap it, and then they want to export it. I do not want to export it, industry wants to export it. The industry says we must keep exporting. I wonder why governments give incentives to discover and export a resource that 20 years from now we are going to need desperately in this country. I will admit that if there is more oil to be found we should find it. I do not believe there is a great deal more conventional crude oil to be found, certainly below the 50th parallel in this country. I think they are correct incentives, but if some of them are not correct, and I am worrying about no one suggesting—

An hon. Member: You are talking about greater oil but—

Mr. McRae: I am worried about no one saying that there is not enough incentive in secondary tertiary treatment. I want to find that out and, if it is true, perhaps there should be more.

Basically let us go to where I think the real crux of the answer is, and that is in tar sands and heavy oil. We sat in our own committee when we were in opposition and were told through letters and so on that $20 a barrel was about what it was going to cost to bring on a barrel of tar sands oil. That is the figure we were given by the industry. That may have been a little low, and I will accept that. Now about a year later we are told that $38 a barrel is not enough.

An hon. Member: Why are you accepting it?

Mr. McRae: I would love to give another speech to explain it to the NDP, but that is not possible at this particular point. They are saying $38 is not enough and will not quite do it. I wonder why—

An hon. Member: Your minister is saying that.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan has the floor.

Mr. McRae: I am wondering why it is that because the world price goes up to $38 all of a sudden we must have world price, and all of a sudden we cannot possibly produce at less, when two years or a year before all we needed was half as much. That has been the history of pricing all the way along. If we went from $4 to $8 in 1974 we would have had an 800 per cent increase in reserves of conventional crude oil. Every time there is another big jump, and we are now at $18, reserves are down, and they have been reduced by 35 per cent.

I want to conclude at this particular point by wondering whether there are not many things about this industry that must be severely corrected, and whether there is not a need for a company like PetroCan, which provides an eye and an ear on the industry, to get to know these things and find out what is going on. I wonder if there is not a strong place in the industry for the government and the industry to work hand in hand. I do not think we can just rely totally on an industry which is providing us with this faulty kind of information, and has been for the last 15 years, with the government saying, "You do it, you are the only ones who can; the public sector has no business being involved in this."

Basically I think Canada has always grown as a country with a private and public mix. We are in a situation in this industry where there is a real crisis, and when that kind of crisis comes on in the petroleum, gas and energy industry, it is incumbent upon the governments of the country to take control of the situation and work the problem out along with the private sector.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Chairman, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to continue with this debate. I should like to make one small observation in response to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan. I have been wondering for a long time what the attitude of the government was to oil rigs leaving Canada and going to the United States. Now we have heard it very strongly put by the previous speaker who has said, or asked, is it really bad that rigs are leaving Canada? Let me suggest to the hon. member that it certainly is bad.

Each rig one sees out drilling for oil in western Canada in the prairie provinces represents an individual factory employing 25 to 30 people. I would like to ask the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan what he would say if 75 small factories from his province were leaving the country and going to the United States. I would like to ask him how he would feel about that. His view is that it is really not bad. He asks the question, is it really bad? You are damned right, it is bad, it is a shame, it is deplorable, and it is the result of the policy of the present government.

The previous speaker said that tar sands and heavy oil are probably the future for Canada. I agree with that. They certainly are. The hon. member referred to oil pricing. He implied that with the National Energy Program we cannot tie the price of this commodity to the world price; we must bury our heads in the sand and ignore the fact that we are part of the western world and that other countries are all raising their prices for this commodity. If we search through the national energy policy, we find that the price of neither conventional nor synthetic oil is tied to the world price when the world price goes up. However, the National Energy Program does tie that price to the world price if the world price goes down.

The National Energy Program clearly states that the price of synthetic crude or heavy oil from plants in northern Alberta will be $38 per barrel tied to the consumer price index as the world price goes up, but as the world price comes down the price will be $38 tied to the consumer price index or the world price, whichever is the lesser. In other words, the government opposite wants to tie the price to the world price if the world price goes down but not if it goes up. Why in God's name do hon. members opposite not make up their minds? I suggest to the members of the government that this is history. They need only look back in history to see exactly the same thing.

Hon. members opposite talk about not trusting information we get from the oil industry. I suggest that the people of western Canada are not prepared to trust the information they are getting from the present government, which is dominated by central Canada.

Let us look back in history for a moment. Let us look back to the First World War. The price of a commodity produced in western Canada was frozen. It was frozen with the same excuse that we could not tie the price of cereal grains to the world price. It was to be a made-in-Canada price.

Mr. McRae: It has been tied since, though.

Mr. Shields: During the Second World War exactly the same thing took place. History repeats itself time and again, and I suggest it is being repeated right now. If hon. members look through the national energy policy and read it again, they will see that the price of production from synthetic crude plants—I am talking about Syncrude, GCOS, Cold Lake, and any other plant which will come onstream in that area—has a ceiling of $38 a barrel tied to the consumer price index, which has no relationship, but if the price of oil goes down on the world market lower than $38, to hell with the cost of production; the price will go down with the world price. The price is being tied as the world price goes down, but this government will not tie it to the world price when the world price goes up. That is not very logical.

With respect to increases in prices I point out that inflation has robbed us of more than half our cost of living dollar in the past ten years. For gasoline our dollar is worth 33 cents in 1980 compared with what it was worth in 1970. With respect to our utility bills it is worth 38 cents; for food it is worth 46 cents; for home purchases it is worth 35 cents; for used cars it is worth 54 cents; for university education it is worth 50 cents; for rent it is worth 58 cents; for new cars it is worth 60 cents; and for clothing it is worth 66 cents. That is what inflation has done to our dollar. And we wonder why prices go up!

Between 1970 and 1980 over half the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar disappeared because of inflation. What has the government done about it? It has done absolutely nothing. It creates more inflation by purchasing offshore and by subsidizing. I shake my head at the ridiculous situation we find ourselves in today. I cannot help but wonder whether we have lost our marbles completely. We are prepared to import oil and pay horrendous subsidies at the expense of the taxpayer. At the same time we do not get on with the job of oil self-sufficiency in Canada. We are the one country in the world which has it within our grasp to achieve oil self-sufficiency, and we are not doing it.

The government across the way says that it cannot come to an agreement with Alberta, which is one of the major producers, but this government does not sit down and negotiate with Alberta. That is why there is no agreement. There were two things which Alberta would not negotiate. Alberta would not negotiate an export tax on natural gas and a tax at the wellhead. Through its National Energy Program this government has brought in the very two things it was asked not to bring in because they threaten ownership of the natural resource.

This takes us back again to the history of our country. Western Canadians want to be full partners in this federation. They do not want to feel that they are a colony which has no control on an equal basis with the other provinces. That is all they are asking.

In Calgary we read the headline "Oil drilling is booming," but it is not booming in Alberta or Saskatchewan any more. It is booming in the United States because the industry here is slowly packing its trucks and moving individual factories to the United States. Why? The industry is doing this because in the United States it can get a return on its investment much quicker. This is much to the delight of the United States government, which welcomes these people with open arms. The United States government is not putting up any barriers whatsoever.

Mr. Daudlin: Nonsense.

Mr. Shields: The hon. member across the way says "nonsense". He is right; it is nonsense. Why does he not tell the minister that it is nonsense? I know it is nonsense. I have been there, and I have seen. Has the hon. member been to the border to watch the rigs go by? If the hon. member is saying the whole energy policy is nonsense, I agree with him. Let him tell that to his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The measures in the budget dealing with energy actually discourage production. How can we get people to invest the vast amounts of money required for a new tar sands plant in Cold Lake or for a new tar sands plant at the Alsands project north of Fort McMurray? Each company is requesting the minimum, which they are prepared to accept as the maximum, of a 20 per cent return on a discounted cash flow basis. When the figures are worked out it amounts to about an 11 per cent or 12 per cent return on the actual investment. That is what the companies want. Without these companies in place in Alberta and Saskatchewan, there would not be much of an oil industry in Canada. In fact there would be nothing.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan mentioned in the course of his remarks the subsidy which the province of Ontario paid to the producing provinces, and particularly to Alberta, for western oil during the 1960s. I ask hon. members opposite to research this matter. Subsidies of ten cents per barrel, 20 cents per barrel, and one year it even went as high as 30 cents per barrel, were paid. But the total subsidy for that ten-year period prior to 1970 was less than $1 million. I would ask hon. members opposite whether they know the total subsidy, which has now gone the other way with Alberta subsidizing Ontario, for the ten-year period 1970 to 1980. The amount stands at just under $30 billion. Yet they ask why people in western Canada are upset—because they are not being listened to, and the government is not attempting to understand their feelings or the position in which they find themselves.

I ask each government member to search his or her conscience. I love my country, and I do not like what is happening. The proudest moment for me was the day I walked through the doors into this chamber to represent the great constituency of Athabasca. But I have watched the arrogance of the government. When I go home, sometimes I want to lie down and cry because of the attitude of the government and because it will not listen. I ask government members to go out to western Canada where they can see what is happening.

I would now like to talk on the Income Tax Act, particularly the portion which allows for the discrimination against men and women in the area of child care expense deductions. I thought that we lived in an enlightened society and in a country which would not discriminate against men and women who are single family parents. However, the Income Tax Act does discriminate. A man who supports a child or children cannot claim on the same basis as a woman who supports a child or children. There is something wrong here and the matter should be addressed.

I hope that hon. members opposite will read the national energy policy and make notes in the margin with the thought in mind of trying on the shoes of the people in western Canada who have invested their life savings in small drilling companies, small service companies, and small trucking companies. Many of these companies are now facing bankruptcy and receivership because the industry is moving away. I ask hon. members opposite whether they would feel threatened by a central government which is obviously moving toward a centralized approach to running the country. How would hon. members opposite feel if they saw their life savings disappearing and they were facing the prospect of starting over? Indeed, how would hon. members opposite feel if they felt that their only alternative was to leave the country of their birth and move, lock, stock and barrel, to the United States?

I am not being an alarmist. I am merely trying to outline what is happening in Alberta. Many friends of mine have invested every cent they have. Their wives work teaching school, nursing, and so on, to build up a small business in the oil industry. Many of these friends are now faced with the question of remaining Canadian or moving to the United States. These people are the kinds of entrepreneurs Canada needs to develop, but this budget is encouraging many of these people to pack up and move out. I hope with all my heart that members opposite will think the matter through, read over the energy policy of the government, and put their feet in the shoes of those people out west. I would be interested in their conclusions.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, in participating in this debate I wish to confine my remarks to two elements, if time permits. I am sorry that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the minister responsible for CMHC are not present. One element to which I would like to refer has been badly neglected in the proposal which is before us. Perhaps neglected is not the right word, but, rather, converted. The approach of the government in terms of inducements is completely upside down.

The area with which I am concerned relates to the conservation of energy. On page 98 of the budget papers there is a paragraph relating to energy conversion grants and their impact on income tax contributions. It is worth reading this entry because it displays very clearly the attitude of the government toward encouraging people to take conservation measures. The paragraph reads as follows:

Grants will be provided under the National Energy Program to assist individuals and small firms in the conversion off-oil.

That is the conversion from oil to another means of home heating.

As is the case with grants under the Canadian Home Insulation Program, an amendment is proposed to the tax law—

And here are the important words:

—to ensure that these energy conversion grants will be included in the income of the beneficiary. In the case of a married person the grant will be taxable to the spouse with the higher income.

A measure of this sort ought not to contain this form of inducement, but I suppose it is a method of extracting more taxes from the Canadian public. Goodness knows, and the Canadian people know as well as 'Goodness', that this government needs all the taxes it can get. Even then it is not doing too well in helping itself in its debt service. Giving with one hand, if you like, and taking it back with the other is very much the philosophy of this government. Whereas I think the matter ought to be done, and I am satisfied in my own mind that it would achieve the end which I like to think the government hopes to achieve, namely, fuel conservation, if it were turned the other way around, if a person were to spend for "conversion off-oil", as the expression is, or if he were to insulate or change the windows in his house to double-paned windows in order to effect heat conservation, and then the expenditure which he makes in this area could be deducted from the taxable amount of his income, not at the end but as a deduction in the course of calculating his income tax. I am speaking in domestic terms but, of course, it does apply in greater measure to industries as well.

● (1650)

The Canadian Home Insulation Program, known as CHIP, is a very strange program. It has its advantages. The $500 to the individual who insulates his home or instals double-paned windows is to be entered in his income tax return as taxable income, as revenue. But it is not revenue, it is an expenditure, and a legitimate one. It is legitimate because the home owner has intended to save fuel by involving himself in this particular domestic expenditure. Furthermore, in the industry there are—and I regret to have to say this—a number of fly-by-night organizations which pretend to know about home insulation. These companies do insulate homes, whether it be with fibreglass batts or urea formaldehyde and the dangers that that involves—and we certainly have had our dose of urea formaldehyde in the House this last few weeks.

But there are a great many enterprises which have gone into the business of insulating homes without any training whatsoever. They claim that they know how to perform this service. There is no proof that what they do will save the home owner any money. Therefore I feel there ought to be an additional element to this CHIP program. I see that the minister responsible for CMHC is back in the chamber. I like to think that his organization might very well take this into account.

There ought to be a method of measuring whether the insulation has been properly applied. We might call this a heat audit. There are thermo-metric scanners, infra-red scanners, if you like, which can indicate where heat losses occur. I suggest that it would be most appropriate, in addition to the actual insulation, to have this heat audit component as a requirement to a grant under the CHIP program. Someone mentioned to me that this heat audit would be very expensive, but I suggest it is not all that expensive.

I received an offer to have my house examined with one of these infra-red scanners. The charge was to have been $40. I asked if there was a special rate being given to me because I happened to be the man's Member of Parliament. He told me that that is what he would charge anyone to perform this service. We are perhaps fortunate in Victoria this year not to have had weather sufficiently cold to have carried out this scanning test. But I warn the House, when the weather does get colder—and it will—I will have this test carried out. I will then determine whether or not I actually need to instal more insulation.

There is one thing the minister responsible for CMHC may or may not know, and I suppose this also involves the Department of Supply and Services. It is that there are a number of these infra-red scanners, which are reputable. Their functions vary from those which will produce a read-out on a television screen, which can be seen at the time the examination takes place, to one which is rather similar to an electro-cardiogram, which fluctuates as the scanner goes across the roof or the front of the house. It indicates where the heat losses are occurring. There are five or six of these particular infra-red scanning machines which are fairly new.

I believe the Department of Supply and Services, in conjunction with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, has set up a standard for these particular machines. Curiously enough, the specifications for a standard which would be acceptable to the Canadian government are drawn almost entirely from one particular make of infra-red scanner. Furthermore, I am told that one of the government departments has acquired five, six, seven or ten of these scanners.

Apparently these scanners meet the government specifications which were taken from the makers' specifications and incorporated into a standard acceptable to the Canadian government. These particular scanners have been offered to a development corporation in Alberta. I understand the operators and the machines are to be flown to Alberta in order to carry out this audit for this development corporation, even though similar machines already exist in Calgary in the hands of independent operators.

The government has moved into this field, and taken the bread and butter, or the dollars if you like, out of the hands of some private enterprises which can just as easily do the operation in Calgary for the development company. I hope to develop this notion sometime in question period in order to find out exactly why the federal government entered into this field already occupied by private industry. I suppose, when one considers what has been happening in the past two weeks in the constitutional committee, and what we are seeing in terms of Petro-Canada's absorption of other facets of our industry, it is not surprising that the federal government should be moving in on private industry and destroying the livelihood of a number of companies.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress, and ask leave to consider the bill again later this day.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—National Security—U.S.S.R. cruise ship "Odessa"—Inquiry whether security checks conducted; the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble)—National Revenue—Inquiry whether taxes will be reduced; and the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose)—Communications—Licence renewals and transfers—Provision of policy guidelines.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Items Nos. 17, 18, 22, 25, 27, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42 43 and 44 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Before putting the question on Bill C-245, an act to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Chair ought to register reservations and enter a caveat as to the procedural acceptability of this bill. I am of the view that certain provisions of the bill may involve the expenditure of public funds, which can only be authorized by way of a Royal recommendation. However, since the Chair does not want to take too much of the time of private members' hour to rule now, I intend to allow the debate on the bill without prejudice to the decision which may have to be made on the procedural acceptability of the bill at the conclusion of the debate on second reading.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw) moved that Bill C-245, to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments. I do not want to get into a procedural debate with respect to whether the bill applies; I would simply say that the moneys referred to in the subject matter of the bill are not government moneys but moneys belonging to the producers of western Canada. I do not think they would come within the purview of the remarks you have made.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-245, a private member's bill, the effect of which is to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and to set up a trust for the purpose of taking certain moneys and using the interest on those moneys for the purpose of research and development. I will not go into a detailed history of the act or the administration of the act as I expect to have the opportunity to do so at some future time. Suffice it to say that the PFAA was passed in 1939. Its purpose was to give crop failure assistance to western grain producers.

The money for that purpose was raised by a 1 per cent levy against deliveries of all grains by producers in western Canada. The levy was paid into a fund set up under the act entitled the prairie farm emergency fund. For various reasons that plan was phased out in 1972 and, in August of that year, collection of the 1 per cent levy on the producers' deliveries was discontinued.

If one examines the Public Accounts of 1978-79 one finds that under the prairie farm emergency fund there is to the credit of that fund some $9,066,972. This money has been on deposit in that fund since 1972. It represents the balance remaining of moneys contributed by the western grain producers under that 1 per cent levy. In other words, it is producers' money; it is not taxpayers' money. I emphasize that, Mr. Speaker, it is not taxpayers' money. That money has been in the account since August, 1972, and has not drawn one cent of interest. If one uses the modest interest rate of 8 per cent, and if interest had been paid on that amount, the fund today would total some $16,781,528, but possibly a more realistic rate would be 9 per cent if averaged from 1972 until the present time. If interest had been paid on the fund at a rate of 9 per cent since August, 1972, today it would total $18,066,505. In other words, the western grain producers have lost some $7 to $9 million in interest on that account.

There is a great need today for research and development in all fields of endeavour, and agriculture is no exception. If we are to increase our production to meet the target of 30 million tonnes of grain as western farm organizations and the Wheat Board predict, in order to meet the demand for food in the world in the future, it is essential that we carry out an intensive program of research and development for cereal grains and oil seeds.

While Agriculture Canada does an excellent job in research and development, over the years it has spread itself very, very thin. Its funds are limited. I believe it is generally accepted in western Canada and, indeed, throughout all of Canada, that there is a need for funds specifically earmarked for research and development of cereal crops and oil seeds suitable for cultivation in western Canada.

If one examines the estimates for 1979-81 it is interesting to note that the Government of Canada, or Agriculture Canada, pays about $1.3 million to universities and other scientific organizations for research and development. At current rates, interest on the $9 million-odd in this emergency fund would about equal that $1.3 million.

It is with the need for funds for research and development in mind that I propose the bill we are debating today. The bill provides, first of all, for the repeal of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Second, it provides for the setting up of a prairie cereal and oil seed research and development trust. Third, it provides for the transfer of the $9,066,972 to the trust for investment. As I said earlier, that fund would generate well over $1 million in interest at today's rates. Fourth, it provides for the use of the interest on this fund for research and development on cereal grains and oil seeds suitable for production in the western prairie region.

The bill further provides for four trustees. Three of those trustees would be elected by the producers of western Canada who are listed as producers in the permit books, and they would be elected at the same time as the advisory board members of the Canadian Wheat Board. These trustees would have to be producers named in a permit book, and each of the three trustees would have to come from each of the prairie provinces.

• (1710)

These three trustees would name a fourth man who would be chairman of the trust. He would be an expert in the field of research and development in cereal and oil seeds. The trustees would hold office for a period of four years and they would determine what use would be made of the interest earned on the $9 million-odd. They would decide whether the money should go to a university or to individuals doing research in the area to which I have referred. Of course these trustees would be empowered to accept gifts or bequests from individuals or organizations to add to the capital of the fund.

This bill has received good press in all of western Canada. As well, the bill has been circulated to all the various farm organizations, local pool organizations, local UGG organizations and local elevator agents. I was most pleased with the support I have received for my bill. I have received many letters, and copies of them were turned over to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) for his consideration.

I might add that on October 30 last, a few days after the bill was printed, I wrote to the minister, sent him a copy of the bill, and solicited his support. I have had several conversations with the minister and I continue to hope that he will give speedy passage to the bill. He told me that he supported the concept of using these monies for research and development. He did, however, have some doubts as to my proposed method of dealing with the fund as set out in the bill. The minister was good enough to advise me earlier today that he would be proposing a motion this afternoon which, while it will not result in my bill becoming law, will open the matter to public discussion and input. Presumably it will result in a government bill some time in the future.

I do point out the urgency of the matter, however. At present day interest rates, interest accrues at the rate of some $3,000 a day on this fund, and that is money lost daily to research and development. I urge the minister to talk to the cabinet about this matter and try to persuade his cabinet colleagues to start paying interest on the money in this fund because that money is producers' money. Interest certainly could be paid on that fund at the same rate at which the Government of Canada pays interest on dominion government bonds. By following that course, when the trust is set up money would then be available immediately for the trustees who can decide to pay out funds which will get the whole process of research and development in motion.

I might say that since proposing my bill I have learned there is a move afoot by some farm organizations in western Canada to press for a check-off on the sale of grain deliveries for the purpose of research and development. This idea was proposed several years ago. It did, however, require a vote, which did not pass at that time. Undoubtedly any move for a check-off now or in the future would require a vote. I would suggest that such a vote could not be held for at least a year.

I would urge the minister after due consideration by the committee and by him, rather than waiting for a decision on any check-off, or a vote on any check-off, that he bring in a bill which would make provision for the board of trustees, or whatever type of structure upon which he decided, to have the power to receive the moneys which might be derived from the checkoff of funds. These could be added to the funds which are available from the prairie farm emergency fund.

I see that my time is almost up and I know there are other speakers who wish to make a contribution to this debate. I do look forward to the minister's comments and the motion which I understand he will propose at the close of his remarks.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on Bill C-245. I thank the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) for putting this bill before the House.

For almost a century now agricultural research has been supporting commercial agriculture and related industries in Canada. Initially, Canadian agriculture was faced with the challenge of farming in virgin territory, with limited resources. Early research focused on that fact. It did a good job of providing the kind of information which was necessary to provide the pioneers with the cultural success necessary to grow crops under those circumstances.

It is necessary that the knowledge about how crops can be grown be disseminated to farmers. Agriculture Canada has built up a research capacity as well as an educational distribution system. This has worked very well. It did not always get the information out, but it has worked very well compared to many other systems. There is no doubt about the need for research. I support the bill in its main approach because of this requirement. I support the idea of immediately making arrangements to put the prairie farm emergency fund into use for research rather than letting it remain in its present position as part of an account of the Government of Canada.

There is no doubt about a continuing need for increased funding for research. Development into cereals and oil seed production is an area which requires extra funds.

In several recent agricultural conferences in the west and in Ottawa during the last few years a great deal of time and consideration has been given to the increase in our export level of grains and of oil seeds to a suggested level of 30 million tonnes. To do that, it is necessary to increase not only the amount of land in production but also to increase production from each area of land. A great portion of this increased production, which would require about a 4 per cent increase in production per year, when at present we are only increasing at the rate of approximately 2 per cent a year, could be achieved through research if it is used in the right way.

● (1720)

We have committed our farmers to a great increase in production. The increase would be based on the increase in fertilizer, weed control, reduction of summer fallow, improvement in varieties, better moisture control, snow control, and expansion of irrigation areas. All of this can be increased by providing more knowledge to the farmers about their land and how to increase production on it. If the research is not carried out and the information given to the farmers, there is very little chance of reaching the potential sales levels indicated by the Canadian Wheat Board and other agencies.

There is no doubt that there are potential sales if we can raise the grain. As we know, our trade deficit would be much greater without the sale of grains and oil seeds from western Canada. For the well-being of our economy it is necessary to recognize the need for research and increased production in the west in those areas.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw presented one method by which these funds could be used. I commend him on his initiative in this direction. I agree with his basic approach, but only to the extent that it suggests one method of getting government funds into research. Several farm organizations have also agreed, but some have expressed concern that the hon. member's approach would set up one more administrative structure to administer a particular amount of money, without the kind of co-ordination which should be available for research in this area.

As a westerner I share the hon. member's concern that research into cereal grains and oil seeds for use in the prairie region should be expanded. The commitment of funds to another foundation will further fragment the public approach to research and development and allow the government to withdraw easily from yet another area of publicly funded research. This is a real danger in this area.

Research budgets in the Department of Agriculture have decreased in real terms. Increases have run at about 10 per cent annually. The director general of the western research branch says that 10 per cent does not keep face with inflation. They also say there have been necessary staff cuts each year because of that lack of increase. Researchers in the west have indicated that they need an increase of between 50 per cent and 70 per cent in research funds for equipment, travel, energy, and manpower.

On many occasions this government has indicated that it is striving mightily to increase production of western agriculture. However, this lack of funds in the research area does not indicate that much concern. The research component of getting to 30 million tonnes in export levels has been ignored to some extent. Ministers do not put their money where their mouths are.

There are some dangers in this area as well if we follow the hon. member's approach. The new prairie cereal and oil seed research and development trust would possibly overlap with present public programs by funding private, competing research. This may be another case of public funds—I know the hon. member indicated that these funds belonged to the farmers, but they are public funds—going to private ventures for the benefit of the private sector first, in plant development, and for the benefit of the public and producer second.

We face a number of problems in our transportation system because the function of that system is not an instrument of public policy. We have demanded that the CNR and CPR be integrated and publicly controlled in order to provide better service to the people of Canada. Rail transportation is a mess because private and public interests cannot work together. The same concerns apply to plant research. Public institutions suffer when private interests begin to gain control.

The government advocates the fragmentation of public plant research by its support of plant patent legislation. Corporate and multinational involvement in seed breeding will neglect the specific need of the Canadian market. It has happened in pesticide controls and is likely to happen in seed controls. Pesticide controls have been developed for other climates and markets. By shifting to small and private research, the process may be endangered and will not guarantee that optimum levels of research will be maintained.

There is a danger that this type of foundation will fund agrichemical firms, and these firms have demonstrated that private research focuses on development rather than research. Byron Beeler of Ciba-Geiby told the Canada Grains Council that he personally sees research divided into the discovery phase, and the exploitation phase; that discovery research will continue in the public institutions. Conversely, he believes that the exploitation of research can best be done by private enterprise.

In general, there is a need to support long-term research that is directed in the public interest. Public interest is not restricted to producers, but to Canadians. There is a need for an integrated food policy for Canada, and only the central government can orchestrate the development and realization of such a policy.

I appreciate the suggestion of the hon. member that the trustees of such a fund would be producers. This recognizes the dependence the producers have on research and development in agriculture. However, there are two problems inherent in this suggestion. First, the lack of input of non-board people fails to address the very serious problem of an integrated food policy for Canada.

● (1730)

The danger exists that the role of producers in this instance could lead to a more widespread belief that producers, and not Canadians as a whole, should be responsible for agricultural research. It is very necessary that we continue to recognize that basic research in agriculture in Canada should be funded by all the people of Canada, not only the producers.

In conclusion, I agree that the money should be taken out of general trust funds and put to work for the farmers, to whom it really belongs. I agree also there is a great need for research, and that is a good place to put the money. Unless the government is ready to come up with a more co-ordinated project which will not bury these funds or lose them to the farmers, unless the government is willing to refer the content of the measure to the committee, as suggested by the hon. member, then I think we should pass this bill in its present form so we make use of these funds as quickly as possible.

Again I commend the hon. member for Moose Jaw for his initiative in bringing forth this bill. If it does not pass, I hope at least the content of it will have some effect on the development and expansion of research in agriculture.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will deal with other parts of this bill which have been debated. The part I refer to is the repeal of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I had the promise of a minister of the Crown, the Hon. Mitchell Sharp, that the PFAA would not be abolished or repealed until certain things happened. These things have not happened, yet I am standing in my place today to say I am withdrawing my objection and freeing the government from any promise made by that minister, Mr. Sharp.

What I am talking about here is that the PFAA was good legislation. Money was collected from the farmers and paid for crop loss, apportioned where the need was the greatest. Unfortunately a political machine developed around this organization. People were hired on a political basis and certain decisions were made on political grounds.

In 1959 Parliament passed the crop insurance legislation. Now that this crop insurance legislation is widely accepted by farmers on the prairies, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has become obsolete and, therefore, should be repealed. In the 1974 election certain queer and distorted things began to happen. After the election was over several members of the House—the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton), and myself—did certain things. We reported these happenings to the Auditor General's department. Later on we reported the information to the criminal fraud squad of the RCMP. Charges were laid against some of the people who had done the things I have mentioned. The case was recommended by the magistrate at the preliminary hearing to go to court. That case has never been to court because the Attorney General for Saskatchewan, Mr. Romanow, has seen fit not to let it go to trial. Since this is a responsibility of the province, there is nothing the federal government can do about it.

The part I have not mentioned is that in addition to the criminal fraud which took place, the stealing of the farmers' money to be spent on political purposes, there was political fraud. This political fraud was aimed, to my certain knowledge, at three Conservatives and one NDP. It is not the type of thing one wants to mention. I think the supporters of the NDP in my area, certainly the supporters of the Conservative Party, and I am very sure all the supporters of the Liberal Party, wish it would die and go away. In essence I am saying I am prepared to let it die and go away; I hope it does not happen again. I just wanted to get this intervention on the record because of my personal feelings and my stand. As a Privy Councillor I think I have some responsibility to maintain the law in Canada. When I see the law broken, I think it is my duty to do what I can to report it and to see what action can be taken. I have never had the chance to bring before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections what that political fraud was, to let my fellow colleagues in Parliament judge what happened and make whatever ruling was necessary.

I am giving up that right to my privileges for the purpose of letting this very positive proposal of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) go forward. When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) speaks, I hope he will accept the concept of moving this forward and will remember that I deserve a bit of the credit, as I have had to suffer a pretty rough time about this matter and will have to keep pretty quiet as a result of this speech.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to say that we are very interested in the presentation by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), a bill to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and to use the revenues collected for research to the benefit of prairie farmers.

Bill C-245 proposes that funds remaining under the PFAA prairie farm emergency fund should be put into a trust administered by four trustees from the prairie provinces.

If I understand the bill correctly, the trustee's job would be to allocate interest paid on the moneys remaining in the prairie farm emergency fund to individuals or groups to carry out research on cereal grains or oilseeds.

I agree with the intent of the bill. It has the interest of the prairie farmers at heart. I am also happy the bill gives members of the House the opportunity to debate the issue and bring it to public attention.

However, I am sure the hon. member knows we on the government side have not been idle on this issue. A great deal of research and planning has taken place. We are in the process of putting the final touches, as I told him at the time he presented the bill, on a bill to accomplish much the same thing the hon. member's bill would propose and sets out to do. We feel ours may be a little bit better and will do this a little more efficiently, with even greater ultimate returns to the prairie farmers.

Before I talk further about the government's intention in respect of PFAA, I would like to discuss some of the background which directly affects any decision to be made about PFAA funds. Let me say this to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) who talks about the research budget: I do not have the exact figures with me, but if all other aspects of my department had held the status quo as well as has been the case with research, I would have no complaint about what we are doing in agriculture. The department for which I am responsible this year is spending about $156 million on research. That is the largest research budget for which any minister has responsibility in the government. When we talk about what we are doing in research, etc., I just hope we are not trying to get across to the people that we are doing nothing.

All other countries in the northern hemisphere are very envious of us for what we have accomplished in research, especially in cereal grain production, and also with the new varieties of canola seeds, commonly called rapeseed.

● (1740)

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was introduced in 1939 to help prairie farmers when they suffered crop failure. A levy of 1 per cent was deducted when grain was sold to licensed purchasers, and this amount was transferred to a special account called the prairie farm emergency fund. This fund played an important role in helping stabilize the incomes of grain farmers on the prairies for many years. I agree with the hon. member who just spoke that the administration of that fund lent itself to political finagling and political "everything you can think of." As a politician and as one who abhors those kinds of things, I was glad to see crop insurance become a reality. I think the fund did a good job. The intent was good; however, by 1972 crop insurance programs had become available in most parts of western Canada, and collection of levies was discontinued. Crop insurance was made available to all provinces in Canada in 1974.

Since 1974 the federal-provincial crop insurance program has provided farmers with protection against crop losses. I do not think any other country in the world has a crop insurance program like we do. I do not know of any.

In the United States there was a program called the disaster program. The former secretary of agriculture told me that is just what it was, a disaster. The program had all the things in it which should not be in a program designed to provide security for farmers.

How does our crop insurance program work? Farmers pay half the premiums, the federal government pays the other half and the provinces administer them. Since 1974 the federal contribution to crop insurance in the prairie provinces has been about $375 million. A man out there asked me the other day, "What have you ever done for farmers?" This figure does not include this year. It includes the years up to this year. The figure this year for federal participation will be one of the highest, because there were substantial losses in certain parts of the prairie provinces, especially in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. There were some losses in Alberta also, but prior to this year our outright contribution to crop insurance has been $375 million since 1974.

When the prairie farm emergency fund was discontinued, a bill was introduced to revoke the PFAA and transfer the money remaining to the western grain stabilization fund. If hon. members will recall, that was the intent at that time. There was much discussion; it was said that there would be no agreement to pass the bill. The debate would have continued, so the bill was allowed to die on the order paper, as was a second bill introduced in 1976.

At present the prairie farm emergency fund—and this is something the hon. member for Moose Jaw should know—is a non-interest-bearing account with a balance of more than $9 million. This is money the hon. member for Moose Jaw proposes to put into a trust.

Having this money work for prairie farmers through research is the ideal situation because, after all it is the farmers' money. It was money which farmers set aside to provide for income security. In my view there is no more important aspect to future farm stability and prosperity than the increased production potential afforded through research.

The hon. member for Prince Albert mentioned a desire to raise our production figures by 1990 to 36 million tonnes. I recently met heads of research departments at Saskatoon, and we discussed that. Some of them are very optimistic, as I am, that we can do that. One said we should not do that and that we should not wear out the soil because of the fact that people in other parts of the world are doing nothing about controlling their populations. The area in Canada I come from has probably some of the oldest farm land in Canada. I can show hon. members land there which is well taken care of and has been for many, many years. I am told that one farm was first cultivated in 1730, and it is one of the most productive in the whole area. It produces a variety of crops. Only the imagination could limit the productivity of that land. In my view there is no more important aspect to future farm stability and prosperity—and I am repeating this—than the increased production potential afforded through research. Some of my economists can show that for every dollar invested in research we get back nine. That is a pretty good investment.

Agriculture Canada has set a priority on production research in the western provinces. Already about 1,350 person-years in the department are allocated to the western region of the research branch, and more than $40 million is being spent annually by my department on western research. Some say that is not enough in view of the amount of production which comes out of that area, but let us look at our accomplishments in research in cereal grain and in canola seed. They have been phenomenal with respect to production in that area. We are doing the kinds of things which are needed to promote that kind of production, but I do not say we should cut back.

I come back to what the hon. member for Prince Albert said. This year we are adding 59 man-years to research in Canada. We can always say we are not adding enough, that we are short of bodies and so forth. Any good researcher always wants more. If he did not, he would not be a good researcher. The kinds of activities I have talked about have paid off in the past. Just as an example, almost three-quarters of the total wheat acreage planted on the prairies last year was sown with five hard red spring wheat varieties developed at Agriculture Canada's Winnipeg research station. That accomplishment is the envy of the world.

I am reading a book written by Grant MacEwan with respect to how agriculture in western Canada was developed. In the early days people were more interested in fur-bearing animals and that type of thing, but they said that the land would never be productive. They said it should never be cultivated. Palliser and the man who was head of Rupertsland gave evidence to the British, before the British sold that part of the land to Canada, saying that the land would never be productive. How wrong they were! We have become the envy of the world, but that is mainly because of the research which has been carried on. That is why the Chinese want researchers from western Canada who know how to farm in semi-desert and dry land conditions. These western Canadian researchers know the varieties of grass which will withstand the tremendously hard winters in that part of the world. We have some of the world's leading expertise in that type of research.

The government's research program to develop double-low canola varieties of rapeseed allowed that industry to grow—we call that the Cinderella story—from almost nothing to a billion dollar industry in just a little over 20 years. The expansion in that industry again can only be limited by the imagination. I learned the other day that by 1990 producers will be growing two million acres of rape in the far northern portion of Ontario, the clay belt, in other regions in the east, and also in parts of Quebec. It will be grown because new varieties will be productive and even better with regard to protein content and with regard to the oil, which we know is good for human or animal consumption, or for whatever we might want to use it. This is due to the research carried out by people in western Canada.

Research in canola seed in Canada in 30 years has superseded anything Japan has done in 300 years and anything Poland has done in 1,000 years. Those are the two oldest cultures which have used canola seed, previously commonly called rapeseed. With respect to the tremendous value of research and how it has improved production, I say that in many instances we have done more than any other country in the world. I only give these examples to illustrate that the government is fully aware of the value of research to the western farmer, and we are always ready to listen to any proposal from the western agriculture industry as to how to improve the service we provide.

We have advisory committees for our research stations, not in all areas but in those areas where producers make those kinds of representations. I think this system works very well.

There is a challenge before us. The Canadian Wheat Board estimates increased demand for Canadian grain on world markets could permit us to export 30 million tonnes or more each year by 1985. The only way to meet this demand is to increase production, and that means more production research.

My department intends to strengthen its research programs in western Canada. Proposals for additional research on production technology at the research branch's 15 western stations are now being developed. There is a special $4 billion program for western Canada. As far as I am concerned, a big part of it will be going toward—and we have already made proposals—increased research.

● (1750)

There are a number of new grain varieties which will be released shortly. They will go a long way toward increasing the production potential of that 30 million tonnes per year up to 1985. Many of these are resistant to diseases which have been important contributors to crop losses in the past. We are also sensitive to the need to diversify western agriculture and develop varieties of new crops suited to prairie growing conditions. The federal new crop development fund has already paid for a lot of valuable new crop research. I am sure the hon. member for Moose Jaw is aware of this fund, because each time I announce a program for an area, I send notice to the hon. member who represents the area. These matters should be of interest to hon. members, and they should be informed generally of what is occurring in the private sector, in the universities or in perhaps a private group of farmers working through their organizations which may be carrying on some unique research.

Results show that crops such as lentils, fababeans and a number of spices can be economically grown in the prairies. The first explorers on the prairies were searching for land which was rich in myrrh, spices and pearls. We are now able to produce some of those spices in the prairies. The researchers say that we can produce these spices and effectively compete in world markets.

We agree that the money made available from the prairie farm emergency fund should go into research, but there is a need to ensure this research is not a duplication of efforts. This is probably the only area on which I agreed with the hon. member for Prince Albert. Duplicating of efforts is a waste of money. Many times, on behalf of the Government of Canada, I sign agreements with other countries with regard to their research. I refer to countries such as Israel, Mexico and the United States. With many of these countries the agreement is based on a research exchange basis whereby, if a country is carrying on a project of interest to us, our scientists will work with that country's researchers and, of course, we reciprocate. This sharing of knowledge throughout the world can only help to better the life of mankind.

Research is readily exchanged around the world. If the countries of the world got along as well as their ministers of agriculture in exchanging research in order that mankind may have a better way of life, there would not be nearly as much trouble as there is in the world today. The government's plan will ensure that efforts are not duplicated. Agriculture Canada will be responsible for administering the revenues from an interest-bearing account that would be put toward research. In this way any duplication of efforts will be avoided. For example, this year I refused a new crop development program simply because there were four other stations conducting the same research as was being proposed, I believe, by the Palliser people. I believe that my refusal made them mad, but their program would have been the fifth such program.

This fund would be separate from Agriculture Canada's budget and would be maintained indefinitely to benefit western farmers. I can see a number of areas in which this new research program would benefit western producers. It could be used to support co-operative variety trials, zero and minimum tillage research, or to assess the potential of frontier areas for agricultural production. I am sure hon. members who watched the national news on television last night saw an example of such benefits. These are only a few possibilities.

Many people talk about the loss of land through urban and industrial encroachment. However, I am sure many people do not realize that most of the land in Canada which is lost is lost through salinization of the soil. Every year hundreds of thousands of acres are lost in this way; we must solve this problem.

Another exciting research project is being conducted at the Lethbridge station which deals with the "transfixation" of nitrogen with cereal grains. If we are successful in this research, it will mean millions of dollars in savings to people throughout the world. If a cereal grain is able to produce nitrogen in the same manner as legumes, clover, soybeans or peas—and our researchers say that it will come about—there will be tremendous savings in energy simply because nitrogen takes more energy to produce than any other fertilizer. Concentrated work is necessary in such areas.

Before any money is spent, there would be consultation with producers in western Canada on what type of research would be most beneficial. As the government's bill on this matter is still in the preparation stage, I cannot discuss the details at this time. Once again, I applaud the hon. member for Moose Jaw for his intent in introducing this bill.

Therefore, I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-245, to repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Shall the motion, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Accordingly, the order is discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Order discharged, bill withdrawn and subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock , I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

Income Tax Act

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: The House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

[English]

When the committee rose at five o'clock, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich had the floor.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, just before I called it five o'clock, I was talking about the various types of infra-red scanners. I was urging upon the government the inclusion of charges for scanning, certainly for domestic premises or houses, as part of the CHIP program, so as to ensure people receive value for their money.

At the beginning of my comments I was also urging upon the government that instead of making grants outright to people who undertook to insulate their houses, or to add double windows—in order to conserve fuel, that the costs for doing this be permitted as a legitimate deduction for income tax purposes, including the cost of a pre-installation and post-installation scan. I mentioned the cost of that scan would be in the neighbourhood of $40 for each operation. I do not think that is too much.

The criticism which may be levelled at me would be that perhaps a number of people who are having their houses insulated would not normally pay income tax. In this particular instance what could happen is that the person, who would not normally pay income tax, might very well apply for a refund for the expenditure up to a certain limit. This could also encompass the cost of scanning. This could be done through the submission of an income tax form indicating that there was no taxable income but that funds were paid out for insulation purposes under the CHIP program. Since they were not paying income tax, they were claiming a refund for moneys they had expended.

The message I want to give the government at this time is that there should be an allowance, not as a grant under CHIP but claimable as a legitimate domestic expense, whether or not a person pays income tax. Scanning should be included as part of the whole CHIP operation.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we had agreed to put an end to the debate on Clause 1. I shall take a few moments before—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but I would not want to mislead him. Another member has asked to be recognized, but he is not yet in his seat. Would the hon. minister agree to listen to the hon. member before beginning his comments?

Mr. Bussières: I have no objection.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I think there might be a disposition to move away from clause 1 at this stage. There may well be other members who wish to speak on subsequent clauses, but the minister has a number of questions which he must answer. Perhaps he might be given the opportunity to do so now.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. I confirm what the hon. member for Yukon has just said. I realize that there is no House order and any individual member can exercise his right. But we are prepared, as result of discussions this afternoon, to consider the debate on Clause 1 as concluded, except for the answers to questions. Then, as we move to other clauses, various members may want to speak on some of those individual clauses. But we are prepared to let this be the end of the discussion on Clause 1.

• (2010)

The Deputy Chairman: I therefore recognize the hon. Minister of State for Finance.

Mr. Bussières: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think that if I try to comment on every question that has been raised, we shall spend many more hours discussing this bill because there have been many interventions. A great many extremely interesting questions have been raised, but I shall try to be as brief as possible so that those members who have other points to make may do so during the clause by clause consideration of this bill.

I intend to go from the general to the specific in my comments as very general remarks have been made and very specific issues have also been raised during the debate on Clause 1 of the bill.

My first general observation will be to comment briefly on the remark made by several hon. members to the effect that this bill is extremely complex. Some members have even referred to clauses or parts of clauses which contain only figures or the numbers of subparagraphs, designated either by Roman or Arabic numerals or by small letters or capitals. This does not seem to make much sense, and it even seems to confirm that all tax or fiscal legislation is overly complicated.

However, I believe we must distinguish between common legislation which applies to all individuals who have to pay income or property taxes and those measures which apply to more complex tax-paying groups or companies, as the tax laws applicable to these companies or firms become more complex in proportion to the complexity of these companies.

On the other hand, if we go beyond the scope of the bill before us, we realize that these are general amendments to the Income Tax Act. Of course, if only part of a clause or even an entire clause is struck from the bill, the result may seem really very complex. But once the amendment becomes part of the over-all provision of the income tax legislation, it does take a clearly different sense, since it is then replaced in the general context of the section which this bill is designed to amend.

Second, I would like to come back immediately to certain objections or questions that have been raised. Perhaps I ought to deal with a general question which I wrote down, namely, the comments made by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood about capital gains and especially the working documents tabled by the Minister of Finance. As I recall, the hon. member raised two points. First, he was anxious to know what the government intended to do with the document. I would like to tell him what the decision is, but it has yet to be made. I might add that I fully agree with him and that we must have a debate, but it has to be properly channelled in the sense that it is not good enough to gather opinions from left and right and here and there throughout the country. We have to find a way of synthetizing and classifying these opinions so as to be in a position to make decisions concerning the relatively wide field of capital gains taxation. The hon. members also stated that the government, as such, has not taken a stand on that document. I suggest that since the purpose of the document is to launch a debate, and convinced as I am of the need to synthetize or, if you will, to channel the debate and gather information, we should wait for the feedback before taking a stand on the documents. Along with some of his colleagues, the hon. member pointed out that there are two schools of thought which might very well be at opposite ends of the spectrum. In other words—and this has come up several times in the course of the debate, some people would do away with all taxes on capital gains, yet others advocate higher tax rates on capital gains. I think as the debate progresses we will find out about public reaction to this, and it will be a lot easier to decide what is the best course of action within our taxation system.

I am not sure we will see an ideological coalition of Conservatives and Liberals and New Democrats once the government policy on capital gains is known. However, it will reflect the common sense which has always been the characteristic of Liberal policies.

One aspect of this bill has been the object of attention and lengthy comments. All members are concerned about it and I have the impression that it is of concern, more particularly and more especially, to one of my cabinet colleagues, the Minister of State for Small Businesses, for it concerns the Small Business Development Bond.

The first comment we hear about this measure is that its application is overly restricted, suffice to re-examine the expression itself to realize that its application must be restricted since it is a Small Business Development Bond.

I know that the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) would like it better if these bonds covered the inventories, the working capital and a wide variety of the financial requirements of small businesses. In addition, the hon. member is convinced that the government must use the available funds as judiciously as possible. And I am sure the hon. member will recognize that the decision to give priority to the development of small business by limiting this type of bond, especially in these times of high unemployment where the availability of funds is limited because of the government's commitment to restraint, is a government decision which will certainly be looked upon favourably by most people.

Other comments have been made about this provision. I think we will have the opportunity of discussing it later on tonight or at some other time.

Some members have also dealt with the greater flexibility which will be afforded with regard to the taxation of income from the sale of farm property, especially when such a sale is effected within the same family.

I would first like to indicate that those provisions already exist on the fiscal level to facilitate the transfer or sale of farm property between members of a family.

I must also add that the tax measures relating to such sales or transfers of farm property do contain certain restrictions.

● (2020)

For example, residence is excluded and there are various measures which encourage the sale or transfer of property to members of the same family. Now the wider question of whether or not to facilitate even more the sale or transfer of farm property relates to the taxation of capital gains, and since a working paper has been tabled, we think that it would be wiser and better to wait until the capital gains policy has been reviewed before changing the present provisions which are quite generous with regard to the sale or transfer of farm property between members of a family.

I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) also referred to the provision relating to alimony for common law spouses. He was surprised to find that this provision which was in the December 1979 budget was left out of this bill. I would draw his attention to the fact that it has not been left out, and I refer him to Clause 29 of this bill.

The hon. member has also asked us to reconsider the case of common law couples who could be entitled to a married exemption. It is clear that in our present taxation system married exemptions are only granted to married couples. It seems very easy to consider positively such a request, and it is not the first time that it has been examined. The problem lies in the fact that as far as common law couples are concerned we are dealing with personal conditions which are often changeable. It is quite difficult to get a clear and specific definition covering the cases which the hon. member would like to include. However, this study is made regularly and we are trying to draw up a provision which would entirely cover those cases, without being discriminatory.

It has also been pointed out that the non-taxable allowance granted to voluntary firemen set at $500 should be increased. I think it is essential to take into consideration the fact that the deductions granted for job-related expenses which are already set at 3 per cent can go up to $500 which gives a total non-taxable or deductible amount of $1,000. I think it would be quite difficult to consider very high deductions in very special cases such as voluntary firemen. However, such a provision recognizes the importance of voluntary work.

I would also like to use this opportunity to refer to the case brought up by the hon. member for Edmonton South. He raised the entire issue of voluntary work and possible amendments to the existing provision in the Income Tax which provides for a general $100 deduction for charitable donations.

The hon. member made some suggestions. I should like to tell him they are interesting but costly. I should like also to point out that last Friday my colleague, the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications, as well as other colleagues, had opportunity to meet with spokesmen of voluntary organizations. The whole question of how to help financially, through the tax system, the voluntary organizations or people making donations to those organizations is currently under review by the government. However we have to examine the cost of such measures and to what extent we can afford measures that would divert revenues still quite limited in the present circumstances.

The question has also been raised about benefits for parents who have to buy devices for the handicapped. I should like to point out, that a task force made up of parliamentarians will soon submit, if it has not done so already, a report on the needs of the handicapped. I am sure it will make recommendations to the Department of Finance about possible measures to help handicapped people through tax legislation. When this report is tabled, it will receive all the attention it deserves.

Some hon. members have also asked why the government has not retained the energy tax credit which was part of the December 1979 budget. I think this question has already been answered on several occasions in this House, either by the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. This government has introduced an energy program which protects all Canadian consumers irrespective of their income level against increases in oil prices. This government has planned increases in oil prices which will not create as much hardship for the consumers as those forecast by the previous government. In this way, with smaller increases, there is no need to give back with the left hand what we have taken away with the right hand. That is the reason we have not retained this measure.

Some hon. members have also raised the question of the investment tax credit, especially in designated areas. I am referring to the representations made by the hon. member for Rimouski-Témiscouata and by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. The question of the areas selected for designation which qualify for the investment tax credit, as always in such cases, concerns boundary lines. As a matter of fact, I suggest this credit is extremely generous, and as any measure—

● (2030)

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his allotted time has expired. He may, however, continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. members for allowing me to go on with my remarks. As for any tax expenditures, we know where they begin, namely when the legislation is passed by Parliament, but we never know where they will end with regard to financial implications. It is with this first concern in mind, as well as our desire to help the areas which need it most, that we have delineated the boundaries of those areas which qualify for this very generous investment tax credit. It is precisely because of its generosity and the fact that it is difficult to assess the cost of such tax expenditures that the government has seen fit to limit this investment tax credit to areas that need it most. Furthermore, the level of economic activity, the various rates of unemployment, the capacity of the area to generate investment and employment opportunities have been determining factors in the designation of these areas.

The member for Vancouver East was in this House earlier is concerned about housing problems and has been critical of a measure contained in this budget, namely, a tax incentive for multiple unit residential buildings commonly referred to as MURBs. I must say to the hon. member that this is not the kind of measure most likely to generate extensive residential development. However, it has been introduced because of the over-all economic situation and, above all, of the desire of the government to limit its spendings.

The government believes that in areas where the demand for multiple units housing is strong and consequently where housing is the least available, this measure will help generate the construction of such housing facilities and will also reduce the hardships faced by these areas with regard to their housing demand. Of course, when times are better, government expenditures would be much less burdensome and we could then afford to introduce more generous programs to help the building industry. But I am convinced that Canadians understand the situation the government is in now and its unwavering determination to limit its expenditures to meet only the most urgent needs.

Another question which was raised by several hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River, is assistance to workers in the north. I would like to remind the House that following the concerns expressed by several hon. members, namely, the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of State for Mines and the hon. member who made representations once again, the government imposed a moratorium on expenditures earmarked for northern workers. However, in spite of the apparent justification of some representations, I would point out that the danger and the inequity would be in using the taxpayers' money to make up for employment problems in some areas. I am talking about difficulties involving wages or salaries. I think we should find other means, such as more generous salaries to compensate workers who are experiencing difficulties in northern areas.

I still have many more comments to make, however I do not wish to abuse the generosity of the hon. members. When the provisions of this piece of legislation come up for study, I shall then take the opportunity to complete my remarks. I thank the hon. members for their kind attention.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On Clause 2—

Mr. Bussières: In the series of technical amendments I handed in yesterday, if my memory serves me right and if Mr. Short is not mistaken, we had a technical amendment to Clause 2.

Mr. Axworthy moved:

That subclause 2(2) of Bill C-54 be amended by substituting the following at line 20 on page 5:

"a specified employer, and"

Mr. Bussières: Subclause 2(2) of the bill provides that an amount not exceeding $50,000 may be deducted annually by certain employees of Canadian firms working overseas. That deduction is intended to improve the competitive position of our businessmen and Canadian firms working on construction contracts abroad. The addition of the word "and" to that clause in fact merely makes up for an omission when the bill was drafted.

Clauses 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 7—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the government to tell us why this amendment, if I understand it correctly, excludes from income housing loans received by shareholders and employees, which in effect gives a tax free benefit to directors and senior officers of corporations. It obviously gives tax advantages to people in those positions. I wish to ask the minister the estimated cost of this tax expenditure and why it is not possible for us to have, first, full taxation of this income since in effect it is income and, second, why it is not possible to have full disclosure of all loans to employees and officers of corporations, as is required in the United States.

● (2040)

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I shall answer the first part of the question of the hon. member with regard to the estimated cost of this expenditure. We have no accurate estimate of it. As one can see on reading the provision involved, it extends to the spouse an existing provision. It would, therefore, be extremely difficult to make an estimate, even a rough one, of the cost of this expenditure.

The hon. member asked why companies could not be required to reveal the name of the beneficiaries of this measure. Personally, I feel it would be very difficult to draw up a list of the persons concerned or to demand that their names be revealed. It could even become somewhat childish to have a small business reveal the name of one of its employees to whom a loan was granted toward the purchase of his home at a privileged rate of interest. I doubt that this type of information could help make business relations healthier in our country.

Mr. Rae: I must say to the minister that, in his answers here in Committee of the Whole or in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, I am always struck by the fact that he is a reformer for things general but a conservative for things specific. When asked specific questions, he suggests this is not possible in such a case. But I would simply like to suggest to the minister that we have here a matter of loans to employees, a substantial benefit enjoyed by a certain group, so we should ask ourselves: Why not tax this as income?

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I feel that this is not the only benefit employees can derive from their employment. This is a known type of benefit that has appeared for a number of years in the Income Tax Act, but it is not the only type of benefit. I feel that if we were, for instance, to require disclosure by lending companies or other corporations extending benefits to their employees in the form of mortgages or other loans, this would penalize the employees concerned, as compared to those working for other firms or corporations that may extend other types of benefits which would be exempt from disclosure.

Coming back to the basic point, I cannot see how such disclosure would improve the management of our corporations or even public confidence in those firms. In fact, the only advantage might be to satisfy the curiosity of a very small group of people.

Mr. Rae: Naturally, I do not agree that I represent only a very minute part of the population. When I hear the minister tell me that he advocates that idea because it has existed for a very long time, I wonder about the type of conservative proposal, or conservative defence he is putting forth.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately I did not base my argument merely on the fact that the provision has existed for a very long time. That, to my mind, is a little far-fetched. The argument I developed is this: this provision is a fact, it exists. It is a tradition that is not necessarily conservative. I am convinced there are many traditions the hon. member holds dear, to which he clings, which he is not willing to brush away off-hand. Because he cares about those traditions, because he clings to them does not make a conservative out of him.

On Clause 8—

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I understand, as a result of the very vigorous and articulate representations made by the hon. member for Mississauga South and many others on this side that the government is very seriously considering an amendment to clause 8 of the bill which might well become the subject of a House order tomorrow. If that be the case, perhaps we might find disposition to stand Clause 8 until these representations in respect of extending the life of the Small Business Development Bond might find their way into a suitable amendment to be brought forward by the government tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, Clause 7 of the bill has been carried. The remarks of the hon. member for Yukon, the deputy leader of his party in the House, are accurate. I fully agree that the House should stand Clause 8 and proceed with Clause 9, with a view to coming back to it tomorrow with proposals that meet the wishes of all hon. members, more specifically the Minister of State for Small Businesses.

Clause 8 stood.

Clause 9 agreed to.

On Clause 10—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with subparagraph (a) which, reading from the ways and means motion, as I understand it, makes some changes in respect of deductibility of registered defined benefit pension plans. It is my understanding that employers make contributions to defined benefit pension plans on behalf of their employees, and these contributions are tax deductible. Special payments are made for past service, or when benefit levels are increased, in order to overcome the problem of underfunding. Normally the amount of these special payments is regulated so employers do not underfund and thus put pensioners' incomes into jeopardy. I would like to ask the minister whether the government is now proposing that the maximums on these special payments, in order to avoid the problem of underfunding, be eliminated? Is that what is being suggested?

I wonder if I might ask the minister a set of questions on this subject and perhaps he can then discuss the answer with his officials. The problem I am raising is obviously related to the impact the elimination of these maximums might have on the problem of underfunding of defined benefit pension plans. I point out to the minister that 57 per cent of these plans, according to a recent study, are now in actuarial deficit. The minister would obviously appreciate the very serious problem this causes in bankruptcy proceedings when there is serious underfunding of these pension funds. In recent proceedings involving the bankruptcy of the White Motor Company, employees discovered to their horror that the pension fund had been vastly underfunded. This is now causing them very serious and real security problems; they are facing this difficulty.

What would the impact of such underfunding be, and why is the government removing the maximum payable and a special benefit payable, when this can clearly have an impact on the funding and on the solvency of these pension plans, many of which are currently underfunded?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, this provision is intended to give greater flexibility in the matter of the contribution of an employer to a registered pension plan over and above $3,500, which is the present limit for each employee. I should like to point out that the application of this provision on flexibility in the payments will be subject to the prior approval of the Minister of Revenue.

[English]

Mr. Rae: I am not attempting to delay this proceeding at all, but I am attempting to deal with the problem. It is my understanding—perhaps I have misunderstood—that the amount of the special payment that is made by the employer is currently regulated by the department just to avoid the problem of underfunding, which is already very serious. Is it not possible, if we decide to remove the maximums on an application from an employer because of difficulties that employer is facing, that the consequence of an application of that kind would be to aggravate the problem of underfunding rather than to solve it?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly the matter raised by the hon. member, I suggest there is no connection between the legislation and the problem he has raised, because increasing the amount of contributions over and above $3,500 will certainly not worsen underfunding or funding below $3,500. As a matter of fact, the purpose of this amendment is to make the ceiling the maximum, more flexible. I can find no connection between the matter raised by the hon. member and our efforts to make this legislation more flexible.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Can the minister tell us in what circumstances the government would be flexible in terms of the kind of funding which will be required, and will the employees, who are the potential beneficiaries of these plans, be informed when the government decides it will be flexible with an employer's contribution to the plan?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I do not understand or the hon. member does not understand the legislation. As a matter of fact, what is the purpose of this legislation? It is to allow an employer to contribute to a pension fund more than the current maximum of $3,500. Moreover, I do not think that this legislation deals directly with the matter which the hon. member has raised. There is no connection between the two realities; that is the problem.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to extend this discussion unnecessarily—

Mr. Peterson: Bravo!

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Willowdale can say "bravo", but I do think this is a problem. I am sure when he is faced with employees in his riding who come from bankrupt firms and who have had their pension funds denuded by their employers, they too will be raising some questions with him.

If it is not relevant in this context, perhaps the minister can give us the assurance that this is one of the things which will be discussed at the National Pensions Conference, in which I am sure he is taking an interest, as are others.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that this is one of the subjects which will be dealt with during the conference on pensions. I am confident that this conference will propose answers not only to this particular problem but also to a great many other problems related to pensions in this country.

On Clause 12—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, under present legislation the chartered banks of Canada are allowed to deduct from their taxable income any losses from bad or doubtful debts. This particular amendment allows banks to deduct or defer this deduction to subsequent tax years, which will presumably have the effect of increasing bank profits. Considering recent reports that banks are not doing too badly, and particularly the report coming from the Economic Council of Canada in 1978 that Canadian chartered banks actually overcharged Canadians to the tune of hundreds of millions of dollars—perhaps by 1980 reaching the $1 billion mark—has the Department of Finance determined the impact of this amendment on bank profits? Will this not allow banks to profit from record levels of bankruptcies due to high interest rates? I think this is a very crucial question, particularly in light of recent evidence brought forward regarding overcharging by Canada's banks.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, the intent of this amendment is in fact to place the banks' reserves for doubtful debts on the same footing as those of any other type of corporation. This should have no impact whatever on bank profits.

On Clause 16—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, this proposal makes a change in the capital gains tax. Part of the explanatory note says, and I quote:

> That where, as a consequence of the death of a taxpayer after September 5, 1977—

Perhaps I could ask the minister by what miracle that date was chosen. Who died on September 5, 1977, or who died on September 6, 1977?

> —an object certified under the Cultural Property Export and Import Act is donated to a designated institution or public authority, any capital gain from the disposition of the object be exempt.

This clause, as well as Clauses 18 and 20, deals with the question of capital gains.

[Translation]

I should like to remind the minister that when answering our questions on Clause 1 he said he agreed we should find a way to channel the discussion on capital gains. Now perhaps he should tell me how. If he does not know just now, when does he intend to tell us? Will it be in committee? How shall we discuss it?

Finally, why should we make minor changes in respect of capital gains when he admitted himself that he was waiting for the opportunity to consider the problem? We see now that he accepted some changes, and I would like to know why. What was the rationale for selecting that particular date of September 5, 1977? When will he be in a position to announce how we will, to use his own words, channel the discussion of the problem?

● (2100)

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to see that the hon. member pays so much attention to what I say when I answer questions, which is not usual if one has to answer many questions. Why September 5, 1977? What is the magic reason that made us choose that date? This is the day when the Cultural Property Export and Import Act came into force. That is the reason for selecting that particular date. That takes care of the first point. As to the second point, reverting to the argument I used with regard to the working paper on capital gains, I would like to point out to the hon. member that this amendment is a minor one, that it is of a technical nature and as such it does not have a significant impact on taxation.

As to the more general question of the government's intention with regard to the working paper on capital gains, I would say that several possibilities for discussion are open to the government. However, some of those possibilities are rather uncertain at the present time. I am thinking particularly of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which, as the hon. member knows, is busy considering several bills and has studied a working paper on our import policy. With such a workload, it would be difficult to entrust it with another task. There is the possibility of setting up a task force similar to those which already exist—and such as the member suggests— to consider the whole question of equalization and also that of the comprehensive shared-cost programs between the federal government and the provinces. That is another avenue which could be explored. However, the hon. member would agree with me that if we use that method of assessing equalization and cost-sharing programs, the possibility of setting up such task forces is still limited since it would drain the energy of several hon. members. If we gave priority to the study of equalization and cost-sharing programs for instance, we would be granting greater importance to the hon. member's suggestion than to a working paper circulated by the government a few months ago. There are also other avenues; concerned people are invited through media advertisements to produce briefs and to make representations to the department. That is another alternative which can also be used by the government. However, no decision has yet been made, not due to procrastination, but simply because some avenues we would have liked to resort to are already rather overcrowded at the present time.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the effect of that amendment will be, and I am sure our critic will not know because we have received no notice of the amendment. I am prepared to listen to the minister's explanation as to the effect of that amendment. But I would suggest that we might better facilitate an understanding as we go through the some 100 clauses left in the bill—if it is the government's intention to make further such amendments—if we are given notice.

Mr. Blenkarn: We have received notice.

Mr. Nielsen: We received notice?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, and they are okay. We received notice of these amendments yesterday from the minister. We have checked the amendments which are largely technical. They do not concern us at all; indeed they improve the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, the very brief explanation contained in the notes that were handed out yesterday is that many representations were made to change the date of the coming into force of this technical amendment. Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, this is an area of the law which caused me headaches at law school. I do not mind sharing that information with the minister. I would simply like to ask him so as to better understand. He will perhaps recall the discussions of yesterday concerning the problem of the relationship between capital gains income, dividend income and earned income. I would simply like to ask him—and perhaps he could confer with Mr. Short who might come up with an opinion on this—whether the effect of this will be to deal with yet another loophole in the perennial surplus stripping problem, or whether this has the effect of creating greater equivalents between dividend income and capital gains income at the expense of earned income. Could the minister tell us the intention of the amendment? I do not know what the amendment is all about.

• (2110)

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, one of the purposes of this amendment is to avoid that a possible taxable capital gain be turned into a tax exempt dividend. This will eliminate a loophole in the act and allow us to tax this type of capital gain. This is the exact purpose of this amendment.

[English]

Mr. Rae: The minister looked as tentative in giving his answer as I was in posing the question. I do not mean that as criticism. I am still not entirely clear. Perhaps Mr. Short or one of the minister's officials could comment on this problem. I was simply citing from the discussion paper in the example I was raising.

Does the government have any views on the problem of the relationship between these three forms of income and the fact that we have, in the name of closing a loophole, created a greater over-all inequity in the tax system? I see them shaking their heads; obviously I am on the wrong track. But if that is a problem, perhaps this amendment has no relationship to it. If so, perhaps the minister could explain how it does not. I am still not entirely clear.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I should have been more explicit in making my comments, even though I want to keep my introductions as short as possible. In fact, the problem raised by the hon. member is not involved here. The amendment concerns a corollary problem or a problem which is related to the much larger problem raised by the hon. member. This should be discussed in the course of the debate we would like to have on capital gains. This amendment removes a possible loophole, but it does not solve the much larger problem mentioned by the hon. member, which will be discussed and addressed in some way by the government when we undertake a more in-depth study in the course of a debate on capital gains tax.

[English]

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 24, as amended, agreed to.

On Clause 25—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised that hon. members to the right have not risen on this clause, since it seems to be a question of some importance to them; that is to say, the question as to whether or not the conversion grant given by the government of up to $800 should be taxable as income. If it is the intention of the government to encourage conservation, then the net effect of this conversion grant may be far less than the effective cost of the project. One considers something as income when it is income, but one does not consider something as income when all it is being used for is the conversion of a furnace, the installation of insulation and so on.

For example, the government could say to Mrs. Jones, "How much would it cost you to change your furnace from oil to gas?" If Mrs. Jones said, "It will cost me $1,600", then the government should say, "Here is $800, Mrs. Jones, we are paying half the cost." But, the government is not saying that. What the government is saying is: "Mrs. Jones, here is $800 which you have to declare on your income tax return." So, the government is really giving Mrs. Jones $450 or $500, which may be far less than the cost of the actual conversion. I agree with the principle—

Mr. Evans: It provides an incentive.

Mr. Rae: The member for Ottawa Centre, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, says it provides an incentive. My answer to that is that it does not provide as much an incentive as the government is capable of providing. As my friend from Kamloops said, it is misleading. They are saying that it is income. It is not income, because that money goes immediately to the expense of the conversion. Therefore, if they are saying they want to effectively provide a real incentive to people to convert from oil to gas, then there should be a program which is clearly either a direct non-taxable grant or a reimbursement in the form of a credit. It does not matter how they do it; they can either do it through the tax system or a grant system. The purpose is to provide an incentive, and there is no need to make it taxable as income. It is not income, because as soon as one receives it one spends it; it is not income in that sense. It is income which has been used up at the point of its being given away.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I am really surprised at the comments made by the hon. member. If we ask the taxpayer who receives such a grant to include it in his income, it is for equity purposes and because this government wants to help those who need it most. As one's financial position improves, there is a lesser need for help from the government. If we were to give a $800 grant to someone whether he earns an income of $9,000 or $20,000, this would be inequitable. However, as soon as this grant becomes taxable, the person earning $20,000 will have less money left over from his $800 grant, and thus the balance will be restored. I believe that the hon. member is sufficiently concerned about these liberal ideas to agree that such a subsidy should be taxable to achieve equity and to help first those who need it most.

Mr. Rae: The minister says that I am concerned about liberal ideas. I can assure him that the minister is not now expressing any liberal ideas. If he really wanted to be progressive, he could introduce either a non-taxable benefit or a tax credit, which would be even more progressive, and this is what he would be saying if he were sitting on the side of the opposition. I recall hearing him talk about a tax credit when he was a member of the opposition. A tax credit is a lot more progressive than the mere provision that the income will be taxable once it has been received by the individual.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, of course we could debate at length on how to apply such an incentive to change the volume and pattern of our energy consumption. However, in the program put forward by the government we have decided to offer grants on an individual basis and, as I said earlier, to ensure a greater equity in the use of that money by making it taxable as part of a person's taxable income. This is a choice which we made, and certainly this measure will be widely used in Canada. It will benefit all Canadians, while helping us implement our energy conservation program aimed at attaining self-sufficiency within the chosen time frame.

Mr. Rae: I do not want to lengthen the discussion, but I would like to suggest to the minister that for this year we will wait and see whether the program is adequate as far as implementing the energy conservation program referred to by the minister. Next year we will be anxious to get the figures to see whether the $800 taxable grant is indeed adequate for the implementation of the National Energy Program. We will want to look at the figures, and I must tell the minister that if he is genuinely sincere—and, of course, I know he is personally sincere—if the government is sincere with respect to self-sufficiency, they will have to do more than that to truly ensure that Canadians will conserve more energy.

Mr. Bussières: Very briefly, Mr. Chairman, I too am convinced that as a society we should do much more in that area of energy conservation, if we are to reach self-sufficiency. But I believe we should rely not only on government incentives but also on the awareness of Canadians to the need to conserve energy, if we are to attain self-sufficiency, and as well on their sense of responsibility and their commitment to reach the goal of self-sufficiency, in order to complement the various energy conservation measures included in the National Energy Program. Therefore, I feel that these incentives, combined with the efforts of each and every one, will allow us to achieve our goals.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I simply want to indicate to the minister one of the concerns of my party and myself about the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in her speech on January 19 regarding the proposal that a spouse be paid a salary from an unincorporated business and have that payment deducted as a business expense. Also the proposal allows Canada Pension Plan contributions on behalf of the spouse. I want to raise a couple of questions about this, one of which I raised with the Minister of Finance some time ago. Perhaps tonight the minister can shed some light on this problem.

The other question was raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in her remarks when she indicated that this provision allows the government to say it has fulfilled its commitment to include women in the Canada Pension Plan. I want to indicate to the minister that this covers only a handful of women; it does not cover those who cannot afford the Canada Pension Plan contributions. While we are supportive of this amendment which was, after all, proposed in the Crosbie budget, we do not regard it in any sense as an excuse for the government to claim that it is resolving the problem of pensions for women who work at home.

We are just touching the surface of this problem. We have made progress, and for many people and unincorporated small businesses it is a significant advance. Still, it is a very small step for mankind, if I may say so, and not one which can be regarded as an achievement. I found it ironic that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would take a proposal from the Crosbie budget and somehow claim that it was partially implementing the promises of the Liberal Party in the last election campaign that it would make some major reforms to the Canada Pension Plan. We are still awaiting those reforms.

Has the department given any consideration to the effect this clause will have or could have on family law provisions at the provincial level? I have raised this problem at some length with the Minister of Finance.

• (2130)

It concerns whether or not the payments made by a spouse to another spouse will be deemed sufficient, or will have any effect on the matrimonial property rights, in the view of the department, which have been established at the provincial level in virtually every province. As the minister will know, it is now the established law in just about every province that a spouse has, in a sense, a constructive equity interest in the case of many family businesses. This is simply because the woman has perhaps worked in the home while the husband has gone to work in a small business. There is now provision in most of our provincial laws allowing a spouse to argue on the premise: "I have an interest in that business because I have been working at home." That gives that spouse a constructive equity interest.

My concern is based on a question which has been raised with me by many women's groups across the country. It is a question which perhaps the department should at least think about. It is as follows: Will the fact that spouses are being paid allow the paying spouse to argue that there is no equity interest there because that interest, in a sense, has been bought off on a cash basis, on an annual income basis? Therefore she has been recognized for the work which she has contributed to the business. Does the minister see this having any effect on this matrimonial property law problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, concerning the problem of marriage law raised by the hon. member, I must say the legislation would have no direct effects, as he explained. However, I would like to come back to his opening comments and assure him that the government does not believe this bill will solve every problem. The government does not believe it will solve all problems involving the participation of a spouse to a pension plan, particularly the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan. We certainly understand and recognize that the scope of this amendment is quite limited, yet, it is a small step forward and small steps can go a very long way if we have patience and if we can wait for the opportunity which may come our way. In the present situation, this opportunity depends mostly on the financial capabilities of the government, inasmuch as those capacities could be involved in such legislation.

I think my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, did not mean that this legislation would solve all problems. I think she is sufficiently practical and liberal to realize that the bill we are discussing may be only a small step, but it is a step forward. I believe that if we keep moving on in small steps we will eventually achieve great progress, as this government usually does, but those measured steps must be in keeping with the government's ability to pay and our rate of social development.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, the minister did not answer the second part of the question. I do not know whether he thought it was too speculative or whether he was not prepared to answer it at all. But in answer to the minister's comments on the importance of taking the small paces or what we used to call banana steps, I think it was Frank Scott who said of Mackenzie King that his basic rule was never do by halves what one can always do by quarters. That seems to be the philosophy the minister is presenting today.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to indulge in some sort of philosophical discussion with the hon. member since my concerns before I entered politics were directly related to the phenomenology of perception. We might spend a night which would be most interesting for those who are interested in phenomenology, but rather boring for the others. At any rate, I would like to tell him that the legislation before us will have no conflicting or direct effects, I am told, with regard to provincial legislation or marriage law. I believe our basic concern was, through a tax measure, to bring about the answer to a problem faced by spouses who take part in the work of their partner in small and medium-sized businesses. We are adjusting to problems raised by provincial laws rather than interfering with provincial marriage legislation.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, let me say I hope the minister is right. But I ask him if he were a spouse who had been paying his wife a salary for a number of years and was then faced with the argument that his wife had some sort of a constructive equity interest in the business, surely that spouse could argue, "No, you do not because I have been paying you a salary." If that is the case, then I suggest we may have a problem. I am not arguing this to be mischievous, and it is not because I disbelieve in the proposal that has been made. When this question was raised with me, it made a certain amount of sense. If I were counsel to the person involved it is an argument which would not have occurred to me, however, having been mentioned to me, it is something which does make a certain amount of sense; that is the question. The provisions of much of our provincial legislation are based on the fact that now the spouse has a constructive equity interest, and cases coming from the Supreme Court of Canada are clearly pointing in this direction, even for common law spouses. Therefore once you start paying your spouse a salary, surely you can argue, "You do not have any other interest other than the salary that you are being paid".

I do not know whether or not it is a problem. I am simply raising this question with the minister. It strikes me as something which is worth thinking about, and for all we know, it may have an impact on matrimonial property problems at the provincial level.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, first of all, the amendment before us does not necessarily mean that a salary would be paid to the spouse. I am not a lawyer, but I suggest that if a problem is raised by a spouse who thinks he or she is entitled to some equity, for instance, in the business of his or her partner at the time of a divorce, it would be the responsibility of the court, according to the divorce law of that province, to rule on the matter concerning the rights of this spouse as far as his or her share in the business is concerned. I believe it should be incumbent upon the court to rule on the matter in the light of the provincial divorce legislation. I do not think we could provide in our tax legislation for theoretical cases of divorce since such conflicts come under provincial legislation and are settled through the courts.

On Clause 42—

Mr. Rae: I wonder if the minister could explain the purpose of Clause 42 with respect to employee loans and deal with a problem raised by Mr. Drache in a recent Financial Post article dealing specifically with this amendment. I am sure Mr. Drache is concerned. Perhaps the minister can explain the purpose of the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to remove any unwanted impact or effects which could arise when an employee obtains a loan from his employer and the rate applying to that loan is about the same rate which would be charged generally to the public at large. So, that is the purpose of the amendment we are now proposing.

[English]

Mr. Rae: I am still not entirely clear, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the minister can explain by means of an example. My understanding is the effect of this, which one might call a VIP change, is to effectively reduce the level of the benefit that employee is receiving by virtue of the fact he is receiving subsidized loan from his employer. Is that the purpose of the legislation? If so, can the minister tell us how much it is going to cost?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: I hope I have understood, Mr. Chairman. That is a little complicated. Indeed the provision is aimed at establishing the rate with reference to which we could assume that a benefit has accrued to an individual who has obtained a loan at a certain rate from his employer. So this provision is designed to set the rate which would be used as a standard of measurement from which we could work out the benefit by comparing the interest rate paid on the loan granted by the employer to the employee with that standard of measurement.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: That is only the first part.

Mr. Rae: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the minister only answered the first part of the question. Perhaps it is a two-pronged question. Has the minister or his department conducted a study as to where this tax expenditure falls? In terms of income groups, who gets the benefit of this tax expenditure? Also, what will be the cost of this new benefit to those who receive subsidized loans from their employers? What will this new benefit be worth?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I will say it is a measure which is widely used especially by employees in isolated areas. Reference was made earlier to benefits granted to employees in the north. It is a type of benefit which is granted to some people who are employed in the north. We also mentioned certain classes of institutions, for instance, financial institutions, trust companies, banks, or any other financial institution which will frequently grant such loans to their employees, and not only to their employees, because that type of loan can be granted in a very general way to their employees. I see the hon. member shaking his head. I am told it is currently being done. As far as estimated costs are concerned, I must say that we have no provision for evaluation. It is very difficult to set a cost evaluation for such a measure, and I regret to say to the hon. member that I cannot indicate the amount which could be involved in this instance.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I think we are entitled to at least a rough estimate. If the minister is going to carry out these sorts of changes, although they may be minor, they will result in a benefit or a tax relief for a certain group of taxpayers. Although it may seem like a large number, more than five people, in terms of the relationship to the 15 million people who filed income tax forms last year, it would be a minuscule proportion of those 15 million. Without being ideological, we are entitled to know, if this benefit or tax relief is being given, who is receiving it and how much it will cost. As I said to the minister previously—and we said this in the House many times—one person's tax benefit is another's tax burden. If a tax benefit is to be provided for these people, we are entitled to know how much it will cost. I can then go to my constituents and tell them the reason they do not get a cost of living tax benefit is the government is giving benefits like this to other people in society.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I mentioned a certain number of people to whom this provision could apply. As to the cost of the change or adjustment which is made on the basis of the rate taken as a measurement and the rate which is granted, I have been told that it would not exceed $2 million or $3 million.

On Clause 44—

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Chairman, under Clause 44(4) authority is to be granted to the governor in council, presumably, to establish certain rates of interest for the 1979 and 1980 taxation years. Could the minister tell us what rates he intends to establish for those two years?

Mr. Bussières: Did the hon. member say Clause 44(4)?

Mr. Nickerson: It is 42(4).

On Clause 58—

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, this provision allows the taxpayer to include units of mutual fund trust in his or her definition of a Canadian security for the purpose of the $1,000 deduction for investment income. I have some questions for the minister about this tax expenditure which arise from a series of ill-fated articles which misled the Canadian public when they appeared in The Globe and Mail following the minister's budget.

I am sure the minister recalls that this particular item of tax expenditure, along with a number of others, including the dividend tax credit, RHOSPs, changes predicted in RRSPs and so on, caused confusion when they were put forward. My questions really arise from the fact that this is a very costly deduction. It costs $665 million in forgone taxes. While it does benefit a wide range of taxpayers, obviously by far the heaviest concentration of those taking the full $1,000 exemption fall within the upper income tax brackets.

Just to show that this is fairly widespread, we know, for example, that there were 107,622 taxpayers in 1978 with incomes between $14,500 and $15,000 who each claimed an average exemption of $500 under this provision.

My question for the minister is really this: together with the RHOSP and other quite expensive expenditures this was supposed to be under careful study by the department and ready for the chopping block; is it still the intention of the government to study these very costly tax expenditures? Will we ever have an opportunity to discuss these in other than a very general and fairly unsatisfactory way, such as we have today? Is it the minister's intention—or does the department have any studies—to examine the differential effect of allowing a tax credit to replace the deduction for this kind of exemption for RRSP and RHOSP deductions?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be malicious but if we were to agree to the many suggestions voiced by the hon. member, I think we would have to stop sitting in the House in order to do our work in committee. It would not be an ineffective way of doing things, but still, I think that all taxation measures are constantly under review considering that the goal of this government is to have an increasingly fairer taxation system. We are continuously studying the various taxation measures. The hon. member based his statement on the premise that this measure was mostly used by people in the upper income brackets or, at least, in relatively high income brackets. I am told that this is not really true and that many people who have reached retirement age, or receive pensions to make that kind of investment; as well as people with average incomes as this provision is very interesting for them, while people with a much higher income will be interested in larger investments and perhaps also in more speculative investments with a much higher return. This may agree with the contention that the more you have, the more you want. So, this would confirm what we are told in connection with this particular measure.

The government is very much concerned with the various measures that imply tax expenditures, as it is difficult to estimate such expenditures. As I said earlier, we know where they start but we never know where they stop. Those measures are subject to permanent review by the department.

[English]

Mr. Rae: It is just before ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if I could just say to the minister that our frustration about setting up so many studies arises from the fact that we would prefer to be the government making the decisions. That is not the case at the moment, so we would rather be in the position as parliamentarians involved in the study of these problems, getting as many facts as we can and being as constructive about them as we can. Rather than sitting back and letting the government carry on as though we do not exist, I suggest that would be preferable. Faced with the choice of three things—total inactivity, being the government, or having the ability to participate—as long as we are in opposition we would like the opportunity to participate.

Perhaps on that constructive note I might call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL SECURITY—U.S.S.R. CRUISE SHIP "ODESSA"—INQUIRY WHETHER SECURITY CHECKS CONDUCTED

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, on January 12, I rose in the House wanting to ask the minister in charge of tourism about the policy of the government regarding the activities of a Soviet Union tourist ship, the M.V. Odessa, plying the waters off the coast of British Columbia going to Alaska. The minister had to leave the chamber for a minute, so I redirected the question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan).

It boggles my mind that we should have a ship under the flag of the Soviet Union exploiting the tourist trade in Canada. Our economy is in trouble. We have thousands of people who are unemployed. The marine industry in our country is hurting. Let us forget politics for just a moment. I am talking about a ship under the flag of the Soviet Union, a country which has a planned economy, arbitrarily establishes wages and prices and which can very arbitrarily under those circumstances assign workers to that ship.

Under those circumstances there is a Soviet ship undercutting our economy. Thousands of people who would like to work in our marine industry cannot because a ship under the flag of the Soviet Union is plying our waters, entertaining our tourists and leaving our people jobless. There is an absurd situation whereby the stewards on the M.V. Odessa are serving caviar to the capitalist patrons on the ship, while their countrymen in the Soviet Union are serving rotten cabbage to the gulags. The patrons of the ship are certainly in no gulag. I am sure the brochure I have in my hand will demonstrate that the ship is not for gulags. It is fully colour coded, and it amply demonstrates the sumptuous fare for patrons on that ship. A nation known around the world for oppression at home is now exploiting the tourist trade in Canada. I cannot help but think of the insult this is to many thousands of Canadians whose places of birth are countries dominated by the militaristic regime of the Soviet Union.

In Canada we have an open harbour policy. This ship has freedom to dock in the harbour of Vancouver. It has free access to the facilities at Vancouver. As I understand it, no tourist ship from any other part of the world could go to any harbour in the Soviet Union and have the same access to facilities and the same freedom this ship has in our Canadian ports.

I have asked the Solicitor General what we have done to ensure the security of our Canadian coastline in the event that not all members of the crew of that ship are stewards, or people in the marine industry, but are perhaps KGB officers. The Solicitor General was quick to reply that he is obliged not to answer questions of that nature because the operations of the security service are not described in this place in the degree of detail I was requesting. I was not really asking for that kind of detail. I want to know what assurance Canadians can have that there is security in Canada, in spite of the fact that that ship is plying Canadian waters. I notice that the map enclosed with this colourful brochure shows this ship hugging the British Columbia coastline, which is unguarded. We only have about two coastguard cutters in Canada, and we have almost no navy. Can the Solicitor General give the assurance—and I am not concerned with detail at the moment—that in fact normal security precautions have been taken?

The Soviet Union would gladly staff that ship with KGB officers. Just three years ago 12 so-called diplomats were dismissed from the Soviet embassy in Ottawa because they were not in fact diplomats. Is it unreasonable to suppose that some of the men and women employed on this particular ship are not in fact regular staff of the ship and have other clandestine duties to perform while serving on that ship?

● (2205)

Canadians deserve the assurance of the government that it has taken all the necessary precautions and that the coastline of British Columbia is being guarded.

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I answer the question raised by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). I shall deal with the security issue raised in the hon. member's question and leave him to ask a question on the matter of tourism of the appropriate minister.

The hon. member asked a question of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) on January 12 of this year concerning the Soviet cruise ship M.V. Odessa and whether specific national security investigations had been carried out on that Soviet vessel. This question raised a fundamental issue. I believe it is important to remind hon. members of the necessity to reconcile the need for secrecy in the daily operations of an agency such as the RCMP security service with the well-established principle of ministerial accountability to the House. No member of this House would deny the need for a security service to safeguard the internal security of Canada. I also believe that no one could expect such a service to operate effectively with the same degree of public scrutiny and revelation of its operations as other government departments.

Since the nature of the various threats to our internal security are clandestine and covert, whether those threats be sabotage, espionage, terrorism or subversion, it is inconceivable that the security service should be forced to reveal its operations, methods and records in public and yet at the same time be expected to counter domestic security threats. Therefore, when a question is asked of our government, the answer to which would reveal information of value to those who would subvert our democratic system, the minister responsible is forced to reconcile two competing imperatives—the need to ensure the continued viability of the security service and the responsibility to provide valuable information to this House and its members.

I believe that the commitment of this government to make more information possessed by its departments and agencies accessible is confirmed by the provisions of Bill C-43. However, even under the proposed access to information legislation, information held by the security service or details of its operations and methods are intended very largely to be exempt from public disclosure.

Even the revelation of whether an individual or group is of interest to the security service is in most circumstances of assistance to those who are involved in subversive activities. If in the process of such a revelation detailed insights are offered into the level of knowledge and operational methods of the security service, again the ability of that service to continue any particular operation or to use certain methods is undermined. Finally, if the subject of a question to the government concerns of foreign national, an organization of a foreign state or a ship such as the M.V. Odessa and if the security service interests were to be denied or confirmed, any such comment might well precipitate criticism or a complaint from the foreign government concerned.

For these reasons, the policy of successive ministers, including the Solicitor General and his predecessors responsible for the security service, is to deny specific details of security service files, operations and methods.

NATIONAL REVENUE—INQUIRY WHETHER TAXES WILL BE REDUCED

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, on November 17, 1980, I had occasion to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) whether, in light of impending tax reductions in the United States, it was anticipated that this government would follow suit and reduce taxes in Canada. The minister responded to me by referring to the provisions of his budget, which continue an indexation system. In his answer to me the minister went on to say:

—the kind of decreases in taxation which occur as a result of indexation and which occur in the United States because of such announcements.

In other words, they are the same.

These tax decreases take place automatically in Canada.

There is a substantial difference between an indexing system applied to deductions and rates in Canada which has the effect of simply placing taxpayers in the same position they would have been in had there not been the galloping inflation from which we suffer in this country, and a planned method of substantially reducing taxation.

I spoke on November 17 of the Kemp-Roth proposals which had been introduced in the U.S. Congress and from all reports with which President Reagan of the United States intends to proceed. In answering my supplementary question, the minister made the following comments. He said:

—the Canadian tax system compares favourably with that of the United States or any other tax system from the point of view of attracting investment and from the point of view of the burden on the taxpayer.

He went on to suggest that, in any event, the proposals to which I made reference were not as yet enacted in the United States.

With respect to his assertion that our tax system is as favourable as that of the United States or anywhere else, I think it is very important to have regard not to the rates of tax alone but rather to the amount against which those rates apply; in other words, under our statute, the taxable income. The minister will know that in the United States husbands and wives are entitled to file joint returns and split their income. The minister will also know that in the United States it is permissible to deduct interest payable on such non-business assets as personal residences. The minister will also know, if he examines the facts, that businesses in the United States are entitled to carry forward their business losses indefinitely, whereas in Canada we are obliged to restrict those losses which are carried forward to a period of only five years.

He will also know that in treatment of inventory evaluations the U.S. system is immeasurably more attractive to business than it is in Canada. Put succinctly, then, a 50 per cent tax rate against 50 per cent of one's income is decidedly less burdensome than a 50 per cent tax rate against all of one's income. So the minister's assertions, if they are based upon rates alone, are not the answer to the question.

It is well known by the business community, and by any employees of any business which has had a move to Canada from the United States, that the tax burden in this country is immeasurably greater than what it is in the United States. Therefore, the assertions which are made are not borne out by the facts. If the minister maintains his determination to sustain high levels of taxation in Canada, I submit the result will be most damaging to our entire economy. There are businesses with operations both in Canada and the United States which have their parent operations in Canada. There are businesses of the same nature which have their parent operations in the United States. In any event, businesses with operations on both sides of the border will naturally choose to conduct their sales operations and generate their profits in the area of lowest taxation. That will be extremely damaging to our future business development in Canada. It will be damaging to the opportunities for employment which are offered in this country.

● (2215)

It is also important to note that when expansion of a business enterprise takes place, that expansion is more likely to occur in an area of low taxation. Once the bricks and mortar, the plant and machinery, are in place in a foreign jurisdiction it will take nothing short of TNT to move it back to Canada. Accordingly, the losses to which I referred are of a permanent nature, or almost permanent, and they are something to which the minister ought to direct his attention.

We need additional funds, after tax funds, in the hands of consumers in Canada. It is necessary that they be available to spur the economy and provide jobs for Canadians.

The Kemp-Roth proposals to which I made reference are based upon the supplyside economic policy whereby it is accepted that it is more prudent to have a lower tax rate applied against a greater tax base than a higher tax rate applied against a smaller base.

A single, small tax bite from a large segment of the population which is employed, or businesses which produce more profit, is infinitely better for the economy than a large bite from an increasingly smaller group of taxpayers. Regrettably, that latter way is the direction in which this government is headed. High taxation policies are self-destructive. I urge the government to mend its ways before it is too late.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the November 1978 budget, the finance minister released a study which made a comprehensive comparison of the tax systems of Canada and the United States. The conclusion of that study was that Canadian tax rates compared very favourably with American rates. The level of business taxation was less than that in the United States. This differential was particularly apparent in the vital manufacturing sectors of the economy. The differential arose principally because of the generosity of the capital cost allowance system, in Canada, and because of the lower level of statutory tax rates applied to taxable income. The level of personal taxes in the Canadian system was lower for most taxpayers, particularly for those at lower and middle-income levels. This gap has widened since 1978. This is a consequence of a number of factors. First, the Canadian tax system is indexed. This has resulted in a deduction of tax by almost 15 per cent between 1978 and 1980. On the othe hand, the American tax system is not indexed. In the United States, there has also been a substantial increase in the level of social security taxes which are based on income, further increasing the gap. For example, U.S. social security tax will increase from $1,000 to $2,000 between 1977 and 1981 for a person earning $30,000.

A recent study published by the Congressional budget office in the United States highlights the importance of indexing in reducing personal income taxes. The study shows that over the period for which indexing has been in place in Canada, an indexed tax system such as ours, with no discretionary changes, would have reduced United States taxes by $17 billion in 1979, or almost 10 per cent, as compared to the actual taxes, incuding tax cuts, which were enacted. Thus the discretionary tax cuts which had occurred over that period in the United States fell far short of protecting American taxpayers from inflationary increases in taxes. This gap will continue to widen over the next few years so that the cuts currently being considered in the United States under the Kemp-Roth proposals may well fall short, in relative magnitude to those which occur automatically in Canada, as a consequence of the indexation of the personal income tax system. Thus there is no need in Canada—and I emphasize that—for specific tax cuts in order to match those contemplated in the United States.

COMMUNICATIONS—LICENCE RENEWALS AND TRANSFERS—PROVISION OF POLICY GUIDELINES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, both of my questions in the House on January 21 dealt with government inaction on the development of a communications policy which will ensure private broadcasting support for the objectives of the Broadcasting Act, which, among other things, states that broadcasting should "safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada". The Broadcasting Act also states that programming should be "of high standard, using predominantly Canadian creative and other resources".

● (2220)

The lack of movement in this direction is even more discouraging when one considers the fact that the government has had in its possession the original draft of what is called by some the Babe-Slayton report, entitled: "Competitive Procedures for Broadcasting—Renewal and Transfers", since April, 1980 and the final draft since September, 1980. This report was commissioned by the Department of Communications. It condemns the efforts of both the CRTC and the Department of Communications, the department responsible for policy decisions in broadcasting, for their total lack of success in achieving significant increases in the availability of quality Canadian programming, or in meeting the general standards which are set out in the objectives of the Broadcasting Act.

Some conclusions in the report condemn the inadequate performance because of the present licensing system. This report blames the licensing and transfer systems for much of the problems in Canadian broadcasting. Let me quote from page 1 of the summary of the Babe-Slayton report as follows:

> Canadian television broadcasting in the private sector is failing to achieve the goals set by Parliament in the Broadcasting Act, notwithstanding its extraordinarily high profitability.

As a matter of fact, profits of $88 million in 1978 are called "extranormal" at another point in the report. The report indicates that private stations rarely put Canadian programs in prime time. Sports and game shows are scheduled in prime time in the private broadcasting system. These programs tend to be low cost, of low complexity and employ few people. This is not necessarily to blame the economic objective of the private broadcasters. It is a fact that foreign shows, notably American, in terms of dollar per broadcast hour, cost five times more than Canadian programs. Therefore, it makes economic sense to the private broadcaster to import rather than to create. That is a problem we face in the broadcasting industry in this country.

As everyone knows, when a private station makes an application for a licence, certain promises are made relating to the Broadcasting Act vis-à-vis Canadian programming, Canadian talent and so on. But once a private station has been granted a licence, there does not seem to be any policing to see that these stations keep their promises. That is really the problem to which the Babe-Slayton report addressed itself.

Let me remind all hon. members remaining in the House that this is a report commissioned not by some outside group or by the New Democratic Party, but by the Department of Communications itself. According to the report, the major tool in the hands of the CRTC or any other regulatory body in terms of making private broadcasters live up to their responsibilities, is competitive hearings at times of licence renewal or at times of licence transfer, that is, when one licence granted on the basis of a set of promises is transferred or sold to another applicant.

In the past we have not exercised that control or discipline within the industry. Consequently, we buy and sell to the highest bidder. This is almost the way taxi licences are handled. There is really no commitment at all on the part of the person who purchases a licence to maintain the promises of the original applicant.

The CRTC licence renewal procedures virtually guarantee licence renewal regardless of the kinds of promises made by the original applicant or the person who has sought the transfer. There is a tremendously comfortable stability in the broadcasting industry, regardless of whatever promises the original applicant made, because of the virtually automatic licence renewals. This is one of the causes for the rather inadequate performance in terms of Canadian content which characterizes the whole private broadcast industry.

The report goes on to attack transfers and so on. I do not have a great deal of time left. However, with respect to the reports the minister's department has been receiving, I suggest it is time that the minister established some policies regarding transfers and licence renewals. It is absolutely clear that the present system does not aid the objectives of our broadcasting industry. A number of promises which were made to the people need to be kept. It is time the minister established a new policy based on the Babe-Slayton report which will guarantee that broadcasters in the private sector live up to their promises.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the competitive procedures issue, the Department of Communications asked two independent consultants, Robert Babe and Philip Slayton to do a study examining the issue further, and this report, on competition, was released to the public in order to stimulate informed public discussion of the issue. Over 200 copies of the study have been distributed to the public, including all members of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture and many other members of this House.

While in their report Robert Babe and Philip Slayton recommended adoption of competitive procedures for licence transfers, they did not recommend competitive procedures on renewals. Instead of the latter, they proposed two options which, in their view, would provide the benefits held to be forthcoming from competitive renewals without entailing the costs perceived to be associated therewith.

According to the first of these options, the CBC, CRTC or other public body would be empowered to tax all or most of the surplus earnings of television broadcasting and cable licensees and to apply such funds to the financing of independent productions commissioned by this public authority.

According to the second of the options proposed by Babe and Slayton, data gathering, research and other such support staff duties would be spun off from the commission and placed in a new agency entirely separate from the CRTC. This new office would play an adversarial role in licence renewal proceedings before the CRTC similar to the role played by the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

The consultants suggest that in addition to bringing to the attention of the CRTC apprehended failures of licensees to comply with promises of performance and regulations and cross-examining licensees and arguing appropriate remedies before the CRTC, the new office could also support research and interventions on the part of the general public. Babe and Slayton propose that this new agency could be financed by taxation of licensees. It could, they suggest, be empowered to attain any and all data deemed relevant to further its proposed duty of ensuring compliance with CRTC regulations and promises of performance.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, this is a very complicated issue and not amenable to quick and easy solutions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PARTICIPATION OF MEMBERS IN HEART MONTH HOCKEY GAME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing importance under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas members from all parties in this House participated in a benefit hockey game for the Heart Foundation last night, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand):

That the House of Commons of Canada congratulate the members in this House who participated in upholding the good name of this institution through their participation and express its wholehearted support for Heart Month in Canada.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House will want to applaud this fantastic feat accomplished by our hockey players last evening. They played a wonderful game.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

SUPPORT FOR CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has described the government's decision to withdraw the provisions of the constitutional package concerning suspension of the Senate's veto power as "the most cynical sell-out" in the government's attempt to win support for its constitutional package. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That on the basis of the proposition that it takes one to know one, this House recognizes the cynical sell-out of the NDP in its support for the government's constitutional package, thereby selling out Canadian sovereignty in domestic affairs to British control over our destiny which the leader of the NDP describes as "a civilized package".

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROCESSING OF CLAIMS OF FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would like to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas fishermen on the coast of British Columbia are waiting two and a half to three months before notice of qualification for unemployment insurance is being granted and are experiencing a further delay before receiving income, whereas the Department of Employment and Immigration seriously underestimated the claims this year by in excess of 100 per cent, consequently understaffed their offices and are unable to handle these claims, and whereas people are now being evicted and are unable to earn sufficient income, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration move immediately to relieve this disastrous situation by allowing sufficient staff to handle the claims that are before these overburdened offices to be processed quickly.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

LOBBYING BY PUBLISHER OF "THE GLOBE AND MAIL"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that A. Roy Megarry, publisher of The Globe and Mail, finally exposed his bias against the constitutional resolution and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) while lobbying on behalf of the provinces in London yesterday, in a speech probably ghost-written by Brian Peckford or Sterling Lyon, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

S.O. 43

That this House urge all reporters and other employees of The Globe and Mail to follow the paper's motto in the face of intimidation, that is, the "subject who is truly loyal to the Chief Magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures imposed by his or her publisher".

Madam Speaker: Although I have some doubts about the validity of this motion, I will put it to the House. Is there unanimous consent for the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH CARE

SASKATCHEWAN—LEVEL OF EXPENDITURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the decreasing amount that the Saskatchewan NDP government is spending on medical and hospital care to the level where the province now ranks eighth in terms of per capita expenditure on health care, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That this House instruct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to launch an immediate investigation into the seriously eroding level of expenditures by the NDP government on health care in Saskatchewan, and that her investigation determine whether an appropriate portion of federal funding is being directed to health care in that province.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that confusion still exists in respect of the government's herd maintenance program, and in view of the fact that government members turned down a motion under Standing Order 43 last week requesting a change in the criteria which would take into consideration the yields of hay and forage crops, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the Minister of Agriculture consider a change in the criteria to provide for payment of a fixed sum per animal.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

PUBLIC SERVICE

OPPORTUNITIES FOR UNILINGUAL EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the Supreme Court decision this week to reinstate English-speaking Donald Kelso as an employee at air traffic control in Montreal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House instruct the government to bring forth the necessary legislation so that paragraph 7 of the resolution of June, 1973, will be made law as part of the Official Languages Act, and that paragraph 7 of the resolution be expanded to include Crown corporations, so that unilingual public servants will not feel stifled in their jobs or denied promotion because they are not bilingual.

BANKRUPTCIES

CALL FOR REVISION OF LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Due to the fact that business bankruptcies are increasing and that hardship is being experienced by wage and/or commission earners who are directly affected by such bankruptcies and insolvency proceedings, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That this House request the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to revise immediately the statutes respecting bankruptcy and insolvency in order to guarantee that the class of creditors with claims for wages, salaries, commissions and compensation for direct services are given top or first priority over the payments to all other claimants; and further that this House expedite such statute changes.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

CALL FOR AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT EXTRA BILLING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government of Alberta has declared war on medicare in so far as extra billing by physicians is concerned, a practice that does violence to the Medical Care Act which is not only being tolerated by the Alberta government but is now being legitimized by institutionalizing it in the form of a panel which will ostensibly assess any complaints by patients and levy a tax on offending doctors; and whereas Premier Lougheed is reported to have stated that Alberta would resist a federal ban on extra billing to the point of doing without federal transfer payments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That the salary of the Minister of National Health and Welfare be reduced to the federal minimum wage until such time as she introduces legislation in this House that would amend the Medical Care Act to prohibit extra billing and show Premier Lougheed and other medicare-bashers that the Government of Canada will not be intimidated or sucked into using medicare as another jurisdictional football in the ongoing federal-provincial games.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Whereas the CBC proposes to expand its operation in the form of CBC-2 and Télé-2 and Canadian taxpayers are already subsidizing the CBC to the tune of $500 million per year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House rejects the CBC proposal for CBC-2 and Télé-2 until it shows it can at least be self-supporting as a result of providing programs that Canadians want and not what the CBC thinks we should be watching.

THE CONSTITUTION

POSITION OF BRITISH PARLIAMENT IF RESOLUTION CHALLENGED IN SUPREME COURT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Can the Minister of Justice tell the House whether on or before November 10, 1980, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was told by Westminster that Westminster could not pass Canadian constitutional proposals if those proposals were being challenged in the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think the position of the British government was enunciated very clearly by the Prime Minister of England, Mrs. Thatcher, yesterday, that when it receives a resolution of the House of Commons and Senate of Canada it will act promptly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I suppose it is not surprising that the prime minister of another country would be misquoted in this House, since we cannot get straight answers as to government policy in Canada from the Canadian government.

The Minister of Justice neglected to answer my question, which was quite explicit. Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs receive on or before November 10, 1980, an indication that Westminster could not pass Canada's constitutional proposal if it was under challenge in the Supreme Court of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, the position of the government on that issue is clear. The Parliament of Canada is called upon to vote on a resolution aimed at patriating the Canadian Constitution. As soon as Parliament has completed its work, the result of many deliberations over several months in Canada, we will forward the request of the House of Commons and the Senate and, in keeping with precedents, traditions and obligations, the government of England has agreed to deal expeditiously with the request of the government and the Parliament of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I can only assume that when a minister of the Crown refuses explicitly to answer a very simple and direct question, it is because he has something to hide.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me ask the Minister of Justice something else. He will recall that on several occasions the government leader here, the Prime Minister of Canada, has said that he had what amounts to a commitment by the British government that it would use all of its powers to force its party, its majority in its parliament, to support the passage of any Canadian proposal. That is called a three-line whip. He said that most recently on January 29 in this House when he said: "She will put on a three-line whip to pass it through the House of Commons".

I wonder if the Minister of Justice will tell the House of Commons explicitly at what date that undertaking was given to the Government of Canada and by whom it was given.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister said yesterday that the conversations between him and Mrs. Thatcher or her ministers are not to be debated here; if the British government has something to say, it can say it. Yesterday Mrs. Thatcher made very clear the position of the British government, which is that when it receives the resolution of this House and the Senate, it will act promptly, according to precedent and the law.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, this Canadian House of Commons has been given a solemn assurance by our Prime Minister as to a question of fact. I am trying to determine the basis of that solemn declaration and, consequently, to determine whether or not it is a fact. The simple way to clear it up is for the Minister of Justice to tell us when that commitment was given and by whom. It is a simple question. He can answer it directly. Again, if he evades it, it must be because he has something to hide.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I did not attend the meeting between Mrs. Thatcher and the Prime Minister of Canada. The Prime Minister of Canada made a very clear statement on that subject here and if the hon. Leader of the Opposition wants an immediate answer the best way is to adopt the resolution in the next few days and we will soon see what the Parliament of England will do.

DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I too would like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Last week the attorney general of Saskatchewan spent the whole week in Ottawa closeted with officials of the minister's department, and possibly the minister himself, discussing the constitutional package. Subsequently an official or officials of the minister's department and the attorney general went to Hawaii to discuss the matter further with the Premier of Saskatchewan. I should like to know if the minister is in a position to report on the nature of those discussions. Precisely what was put on the table? What was suggested by the federal government in order to obtain Saskatchewan's support for the constitutional package?

● (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, during the fall and since we came back after Christmas, I have had occasion to talk with many ministers of different governments about what we were doing, giving them explanations, discussing propositions and so on. We have done that with different governments and with the government of Saskatchewan. The hon. member knows our resolution and they know what it is, so it is up to them to make up their minds. They made some suggestions; some of those have been accepted and some rejected. The policy of the government is well known and it is being debated at this time in committee. We have almost finished the work in the committee. They know very well what kind of resolution the House of Commons and Senate will approve soon.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, if I may be permitted to say so, that was a "Waikiki response"! Or, en français, "une whacky réponse"! It is all right for the minister to flim-flam around but I asked a specific question. I should like to know whether a specific proposal was put to the Premier of the province of Saskatchewan to obtain his support for the constitutional package and whether an official from the department went to Hawaii to convey that to the attorney general of Saskatchewan. When does the minister expect a response? Is there any time limit? Has he received a response in the negative from the Premier of Saskatchewan, or what is the exact situation, without the equivocation we have heard to date?

Mr. Epp: Tell us about the Honolulu formula.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, since the hon. member wants me to answer him in French I would say that indeed we had discussions with the Saskatchewan government just as we did with other governments. They wanted clarifications, whether any changes were contemplated and we discussed that. The government has made its decisions and the study of nearly all clauses has now been completed. At his press conference about two weeks ago Premier Blakeney stated he would make up his mind once the House of Commons is through with its work. We have already taken our decision and the committee was advised each time we undertook the study of a clause or when we tabled amendments before it. The colleague of the hon. member knows full well the nature of the amendments proposed by the Canadian government.

ASTRA TRUST

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF OPERATION TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. Will he agree to refer the circumstances surrounding the chartering, operation and bankruptcy of Astra Trust and related companies to a parliamentary committee in light of the fact that a federal charter was turned down in 1972, that a provincial charter was turned down in 1973 because the principals were found to be unfit, and in light of the fact that on Monday a select committee of the Ontario legislature found that it was influence exercised on the part of certain politicians in the Liberal Party at the federal level which resulted in the charter being granted to Astra Trust in 1977?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, essentially, the question which must be answered is whether there was something irregular in the recommendation made by the Superintendent of Insurance to authorize the chartering of Astra Trust. The Superintendent of Insurance has assured me several times that the investigation carried out before the recommendation was made was quite thorough and that no external pressures, whether political or of another type, affected his recommendation to the then Minister of Finance that a charter be granted to Astra Trust. In view of these facts Madam Speaker, I do not believe that an investigation on the circumstances surrounding the chartering of this company is required.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, that evidence of the Superintendent of Insurance which the minister has just put before the House has been directly contradicted by evidence given under oath before the select committee at Queen's Park. There are dozens of references to interventions by Senator Stanbury, the then President of the Liberal Party of Canada. There are references to representations made by members of the House of Commons who are today ministers of the Crown, and the minister knows this. In light of this evidence—

● (1425)

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Rae: —how could he possibly justify not having a full public inquiry, when we know contradictory evidence has been given under oath at Queen's Park?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member fails to distinguish between two levels of decision-making. One is that of the office of the Superintendent of Insurance, which is responsible for looking fully into the application and recommending to the Minister of Finance whether or not a charter should be granted, and the other is that of the minister's office. I doubt that it is a crime or a matter of exercising undue influence for any hon. member in this House to get in touch with the office of the minister and say: Listen, where are you at with this file? Or, I should like to know whether or not an in-depth study is being made of this file. I do not feel that it could be seen as exercising undue influence or as elements that would disrupt the work of an official like the Superintendent of Insurance. If that is the type of intervention the hon. member calls undue influence, then I have a feeling a large number of hon. members in this House will find that the volume of their correspondence will go down drastically overnight.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the minister for whom I have the highest respect; he knows this because we have worked together. I suggest to the minister and other hon. members who have worked with him—

Mr. Nielsen: But we are not in bed with them.

Mr. Rae: I do not hesitate in saying that; I am referring to matters in this House. I say to the minister, in all frankness, that he is being extremely naive in this matter. This matter involves an elaborate scheme to bilk the citizens of Ontario of—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Rae: The minister has refused to allow the Superintendent of Insurance to appear before the select committee and, as I understand it, he has refused today to allow an inquiry to be held in Parliament. In light of these facts, how can we come to any other conclusion than that there is a cover-up involved in the activities of members of his party and members of the Conservative party of Ontario, which has consequences for hundreds of citizens in Ontario and their savings?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I must say that I have as much respect for the hon. member as he has for me, but I am somewhat surprised by his strong language which, I am sure, he will regret. The Ontario legislature committee had to deal with a company incorporated under Ontario legislation, and the inquiry focused specifically on the incorporation of that company. Even though the committee blamed the provincially incorporated company called Re-Mor, one should not draw the same conclusions about Astra, which was federally incorporated. The case is clearly different. Re-Mor came into existence after the incorporation of Astra and, as for myself, I am satisfied with the assurances given to me by the departmental officials, namely, that the charter was undoubtedly granted on its own merits and I do not see the need for an inquiry.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

OCTOBER, 1970 CRISIS—INQUIRY WHETHER FILES DISCLOSE BUNGLING

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Will the minister tell the House whether he is aware of any files or, indeed, whether there is any information in his department which discloses monumental bungling by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police during the October crisis, as suggested by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, my predecessor in the Clark government knows perfectly well that I cannot ask my deputy, as such, to show me files which were shown to my predecessor without his permission or without the permission of the present Hon. Leader of the Opposition. I am not aware of any such files which show monumental bungling on the part of the Prime Minister, the government or the RCMP. But I do know, Madam Speaker, that during the administration of the Clark government documents dealing with the FLQ crisis were sent to the McDonald commission. I think we should be entitled to assume here that if members opposite found the type of document to which they have referred, then those materials should have been sent by them at that time to the McDonald commission. They are not subject to the kind of restrictions which members opposite have suggested they are subject to.

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—VALUE OF SHARES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In answer to a question yesterday, the Minister of Finance made it quite clear that the primary objective of the national energy policy was to increase public sector ownership of the oil and gas industry, I might say to the detriment of security of supply in this country. Since again under the National Energy Program the burden of that policy must be borne by taxpayers and consumers in this country, my question is: what was the basis for the valuation of Petrofina in the recent take-over bid by Petro-Canada? It was a valuation which produced $120 a share, or a 75 per cent premium over the $70 price which the shares were trading at prior to the speculation that a bid was forthcoming. This led to a good degree of profiteering on the part of those who were in the marketplace. Was the basis for valuation on assets, cash flow, earnings, reserves, or was there some other basis?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I read Hansard yesterday and I failed to see the passage to which the hon. member has referred in the statement of the Minister of Finance. The position of this government is the one expressed by the Minister of Finance, that we should achieve energy security in this country during the present decade, with self-sufficiency by 1990; we should substantially increase Canadian ownership of the industry between now and 1990 and there should be a fair pricing system as far as consumers are concerned.

The purchase of Petrofina by Petro-Canada is part of the Canadianization process, which is in the same vein as the decision by Dome Petroleum last week to set up a 75 per cent Canadian-owned corporation in the private sector to expand Canadian ownership. Canadian ownership is a high priority of this government. It will be achieved overwhelmingly by the private sector, but the public sector will also be part of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I fail to understand why the minister cannot direct his remarks to the question I asked. What was the basis for the valuation, the 75 per cent premium? Why should consumers and taxpayers pay a 75 per cent premium over the value at which the shares were trading before this speculation took place? The shares were trading in the low $70 range. The market trading was stopped at $87.50. We now have a bid at $120 a share, which is a very large increase in the profits. These profits will be accepted by shareholders and speculators at the expense of consumers and taxpayers. What steps has the minister taken to investigate how these profits were made, who made them and what will his department and Petro-Canada do to avoid this sloppy procedure in the future, if there are to be other take-overs?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, it would be much easier to answer a straight question, if it were put that way, than one with a long preamble which completely distorts the statement of the Minister of Finance.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member, I must remind him that what he is putting forward is the same type of complaint as that put forward by the Conservatives in 1978 when Petro-Canada purchased Pacific Petroleums.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: I refer to Hansard of November 13, 1978, where the member for Calgary Centre, the member for York-Simcoe, the member for Northumberland-Durham—

Some hon. Members: Order!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF FUEL—EFFECT ON CONSUMERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Given the fact that the price of gasoline at the pumps during the year 1980 rose approximately 32½ cents per gallon—I am not using the metric smokescreen of litres; the price went up approximately 32½ cents a gallon during the year 1980, which is just an estimate, it may be higher—and given the fact there is the prospect of at least another 12 cents a gallon increase at the pumps, and a similar increase for home heating fuel, as a result of this acquisition of Petrofina by Petro-Canada, can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell me where his concern for the consumer is now? Does the minister have anything to say to the consumer about these increases?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to remind the hon. member that it is fortunate that Canadian consumers do not have to put up with a Conservative government, because oil prices would be much higher than they are now.

[English]

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF ENERGY TAX CREDIT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): When Canadian consumers see what they must now pay for gasoline as they drive into the service stations and what they must pay for home heating fuel, I think they would much prefer a Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister or the Minister of State for Finance. Since Canadian consumers are being faced with this tax to aid in financing this acquisition, and since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has hinted at further deals similar to the one with Petrofina, which apparently was just for openers—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): —is the minister now prepared to consider and, indeed, introduce an energy tax credit for lower and middle-income Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I remind hon. members that this measure, the energy tax credit proposed by the former Minister of Finance, was intended to offset the basic inequity contained in his budget and reflected in energy prices as well as in an 18-cent direct tax payable by consumers. Since the measures that we have proposed are fair and the prices generous towards all Canadians, we do not have to offset this by a tax credit such as the one suggested by the hon. member.

FISHERIES

FRASER RIVER, B.C.—PROPOSALS CONCERNING CLOSURE

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a straightforward question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. At a meeting I attended last Thursday in Vancouver, held by the Fraser River fishermen and others, it was made abundantly clear that the minister had not consulted them prior to initiating this drastic proposal concerning the closure of the Fraser River and other restrictions to commercial fishermen. Will the minister assure me and all members in this House from British Columbia that he will consult with the Fraser River gill-net fishermen this week before there is any decision on the part of the government to implement these drastic proposals concerning the Fraser?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, if the member would read the answer which I gave with respect to this matter yesterday, she would see these were, in fact, discussions which took place. There is a process in the British Columbia fishery called "the expectations for the coming year". We discuss with fishermen's groups what appears to be the promise of this or that fishery in this or that river. This is a normal process which has been going on for many years.

With respect to chinook stocks in the Fraser, which are badly depleted, we have been taking conservation measures. We have announced some of these measures. I made it clear yesterday that if there are to be strict measures implemented, then all groups in the fishery must share, and in this I include the sport fishery as well.

● (1440)

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, my question concerned the desirability of the minister himself, not his officials, meeting with the Fraser River fishermen. It is not good enough that he speak to a chamber of commerce because very few fishermen belong to that organization. Before the minister again, without any notice or warning, imposes further restrictions on what is the livelihood of these fishermen, will he consult fully with them?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I have never in my life spoken to a chamber of commerce, except in my riding where there were only 13 people present at that meeting!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc: The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria reminds me that I spoke at Grand Falls, a town in his riding. In that regard I apologize for misleading the House. The hon. member continues to talk about decisions having been made. I referred to discussions which took place as the fishing season approached. The predictions were made by scientists from a biological point of view. We have identified the areas in which there may be closures.

Miss Jewett: Talk to the fishermen.

Mr. LeBlanc: I cannot meet with every group of fishermen on every management decision which must be taken. I discussed this particular issue for an hour and a half yesterday morning with the assistant deputy minister from the Pacific coast. We went through the entire scheme, and I will do so again when firm recommendations come forward.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INQUIRY RESPECTING ALLEVIATION OF HIGH COST OF LIVING

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It follows on a previous question with regard to the adverse effect of inflation on the consumer. Specifically with regard to the high cost of rent and the high cost of foodstuffs, would the minister share with the House exactly what approach he and his colleagues, including the Minister of Agriculture and others, will be taking in order to alleviate the high cost of living for citizens in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, we are obviously concerned with the constant increase in prices, especially food prices. However, a recent study by the U.S. Department of Agriculture showed that of all industrialized countries, Canada is the one where food prices are lowest. It is also important to keep in mind that Canadians are the ones who have to work fewer hours for the weekly food basket. So I think that despite his just concern over price increases, the hon. member must find some kind of comfort in this, because, after all, Canada does fare quite well compared to all other industrialized countries.

ENERGY

PROPOSAL RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF HYDROGEN CENTRE

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to an announcement made last week by Premier William Davis of Ontario with regard to an industrial strategy which included a number of energy and other technical innovations. Within the package was the concept of a Canadian hydrogen centre. Has the minister had an opportunity to assess the proposal to the federal government included in that document which asks for federal government assistance and co-operation to make this hydrogen centre a lead agency to co-operate with the efforts in Quebec to rationalize the situation at Mirabel airport with regard to hydrogen and to help in western Canada with hydrogenation processes?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have examined this proposal which is consistent with several other proposals put forward on this matter in the past few months. I am supposed to meet my Ontario counterpart within the next few days for a general discussion on energy matters. I am sure this question will be on the agenda at that meeting.

[English]

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister will know of the special efforts being made in the field of energy conservation in Canada through government agencies and other agencies. Organizations such as Canartech, the Biomass Institute and a number of others are carrying on work on alternative energy forms. In view of the fact that the minister's main concerns are now centred around the negotiations or impasse in those negotiations with western Canada with regard to conventional oil supplies, and in view of the importance of alternative energy forms to conservation and to Canada's future, particularly with regard to energy self-sufficiency and warding off rationing, would the minister consider the concept of extending his department to include a minister of state for alternative energy and conservation?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the decision on such a proposal would be made by the Prime Minister, not me. Government organization comes under the responsibility of the Prime Minister.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

INFRARED CONTROL OF INSULATION MATERIALS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in view of the large number of thermal insulation contractors with minimal or even less expertise—some of them are even crooks—will the minister insist, before paying any grants for thermal insulation under his Canadian Home Insulation Program, that an infrared control be carried out both before and after the work is completed, in order to make sure that the installation is actually energy efficient and that the control costs be included in the total grant?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I take note of the interesting suggestion made by the hon. member, but I must point out to him that infrared tests may be rather costly and increase the cost of the program quite a bit. A system of spot checks and control is being enforced now. Every single unit is not checked, but the system seems to have worked fairly well up to now. I am sure, however, that there is room for improvement. I shall certainly look into the hon. member's proposal and report to him later on this matter.

THERMO-METRIC SCANNING PROGRAM

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I am told that the cost of thermo-metric control would be around $40.

[English]

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Supply and Services or, in his absence, his parliamentary secretary. Is the minister or his parliamentary secretary aware that officials within their department have offered their services and the recently acquired thermo-metric scanners free of charge to a Calgary development company to carry out a scanning program for that company, and that a group of public servants is being sent out, at public expense, to perform all the thermo-metric work for that company, despite the fact that there are in place in Calgary a number of infrared enterprises with the same type of equipment?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the specifics of the particular program, but I will make sure that the hon. member receives an answer as soon as possible.

HOUSING

REVIEW OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it is with regard to the CHIP program. Fifteen months ago a preliminary analysis of the program by CMHC stated that the program was not performing up to its original goals. A study is just now getting under way. When will the minister seriously review this program, because it has great potential, in order that the study may be presented to the Canadian people so that they know they are receiving their money's worth?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the program which has now been in operation for several years had met with certain difficulties but these were solved by the responsible agencies. If my hon. colleague has specific proposals to make with regard to improving it, I should be very happy to examine and implement them if, as he suggests, it is possible to improve the program further at this time. I agree with him that this program is extremely important in achieving our objectives in the field of energy.

[English]

Mr. Schellenberger: Madam Speaker, as the minister has stated, this program does have great potential. However, there are concerns that the money is not being adequately spent and it is felt that there could be improvement. Has the program been switched to the minister's department in order that certain changes can be made? In addition, will the minister look at changes in the application of the program and new types of incentives which may be more attractive to low-income home owners?

● (1450)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, responsibility for the program has been switched to my department. We are reviewing the program with the officials concerned, but at the present time there are no specific plans to make changes to that program, either in terms of the grants themselves or in terms of the basic administration of the program. However, if the hon. member has specific suggestions to make, I will be very happy to receive them.

BANKS AND BANKING

REQUEST PERFORMANCE BE EVALUATED AND MONITORED

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. My question is motivated by recent information which was brought forward by the Economic Council of Canada. In evaluating the performance of Canadian banks and their efficiency compared to banks in the U.S., the council found that Canadians had been overcharged by the Canadian banks to the tune of hundreds of millions of dollars annually over the last number of years. Is the minister prepared today to assure the members of this House that the performance of our chartered banking system will be thoroughly evaluated and monitored over the next ten years, so as to make sure the system becomes more competitive and that the overcharges of hundreds of millions of dollars will be eliminated or dramatically reduced?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, unfortunately I did not have time to look at the report to which the hon. member is referring. However I know that he did have opportunities along with his colleagues to participate in the debate on the banking legislation review and surely he will recall that one of the main objectives of that new statute was to make room for more competition by authorizing foreign banks to open branches in Canada and start banking operations. I believe that the growth and popularity of such institutions as caisses populaires and the arrival of foreign banks will spur competition in our banking system and that will appreciably improve its efficiency.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, perhaps the report of the Economic Council of Canada, which indicated these excessive charges, ought to have been made public and brought to the attention of members of the House during debate on the revisions to the Bank Act. Recognizing that that did not take place, my supplementary question is this. Will the minister indicate whether the government plans to introduce legislation this year which will allow trust companies and credit unions to compete more effectively with the chartered banks, especially in the area of providing loans and services to small businesses?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, in so far as the caisses populaires are concerned, it will be recalled that the banking legislation was reviewed recently and passed by the House and I think that under Part III the caisses populaires and credit unions were authorized to join the Canadian Payments Association, thereby finding themselves on an equal footing with chartered banks to offer a wider range of services to all their customers and to all Canadians as well. That is what I meant when I said that the caisses populaires would spur competition within the banking system and make it more efficient.

POST OFFICE

SPECIAL MAILING PRIVILEGES FOR WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the importance of the weekly newspapers to Canadians and the concern being expressed by publishers and owners of these papers that their special mailing privileges which they have traditionally enjoyed may be lost when the Post Office becomes a Crown corporation, can the Postmaster General assure the House that these special privileges for these important means of communication will be continued after the Post Office becomes a Crown corporation?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the answer is yes. The hon. member should know that a few years ago the Secretary of State and the Post Office Department signed an agreement under which we can indeed subsidize the postal rates granted Canadian magazines, newspapers and periodicals. Nothing indicates that the agreement will be cancelled. On the contrary the spirit of the agreement remains the same and I believe it will most certainly endure after the Post Office Department has become a Crown corporation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS—MAINTENANCE OF SERVICE IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Last week in the House, I think it was on Friday, despite an earlier decision by Canadian National to close its express terminals in Charlottetown and in Sydney, he announced that the government has now decided to keep those terminals open. Will the minister tell the House how many CN Express employees will be kept in the two centres? Could he also tell the House what level of service will be maintained in those two express terminals which were originally scheduled to be closed and will now be kept open?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have a letter going to members who represent the area. However, I had to look at it again because there were a few commas in the wrong place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: The short answer is that it will be local services. The office and the warehouse will be maintained both in Sydney and in Charlottetown. The employment level will be at about half what it is now, that is, 19 people in Charlottetown and 25 in Sydney. That will be guaranteed for a period of two and a half years from now.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Transport. Does the minister realize there has been a steady withdrawal of CN operations from the Atlantic region, and that the loss of this essential part of the transportation system in that region is causing severe economic hardship? Will the minister assure the House that the decision to keep open the CN Express terminals in Sydney and Charlottetown will not be at the expense of services and jobs in some other part of the operation of Canadian National in the Atlantic region?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I said. That is a guarantee I have given. The numbers will be about half what they are at this time. Already an erosion had begun to take place because of the elimination of the Rapidex system. However, I have used the historical figures of 40 in one case and 50 in another to establish the present level of employment.

CN EXPRESS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF MAINTENANCE OF SERVICE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. When is he going to take some positive steps to reassure people in the Atlantic region that the erosion, to which my colleague referred, is not going to continue, in the sense that he knows that more and more goods are being shipped directly from Quebec to Newfoundland, thereby weakening the viability of the mainline through the maritimes? He knows there are rail line abandonment hearings scheduled to be heard by the CTC. When will the minister make some public statement that will assure people in the Atlantic region that the obligation for CN to maintain a national service is going to be maintained? Can the minister indicate the reason, the logic, in truncating these services? Why not keep the Stellarton office open, which is in a major industrial area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I cannot prevent events from taking place. I cannot perform miracles.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: Nobody else over there can either.

Mr. Pepin: One thing I am trying to do is to take an approach to transportation in the Atlantic region which will be a constructive one. I have already had a number of discussions with ministers of transport in the Atlantic area. As a matter of fact, I had one yesterday with the minister from New Brunswick. In these discussions I have been trying to convince the ministers that we should take a global approach to transportation problems in the maritime provinces. That would mean a multimodal approach. It would mean the establishment of an envelope under which the federal government would commit itself to at least the level of subsidy that exists now. It would mean the establishment of trade-offs between one mode and the other. I am working very hard on that and with, I think, coming successes.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, could I just ask the minister this. Does he still hold to the policy that transportation is an essential tool of regional development, as was stated by the Speaker of the Senate when he held the minister's portfolio and as was stated by the hon. member for Vegreville when he was minister of transport? Will he assure the House that he still believes that transportation is essential and still has an essential place in regional development policies in this country?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I do.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. After consultations with my colleagues on both sides, I am glad to report that we had two very fruitful meetings yesterday and that we came to some agreement on three important matters. I will deal with two of them today, and with the third one tomorrow afternoon.

First, we had discussions about the bill now under consideration, Bill C-54. We agreed to the following House order which I will read and which, I assume, will receive the unanimous consent of this House. I move:

That during consideration this day in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, a minister shall propose an amendment to Clause 8 of the said bill relating to the Small Business Development Bond; and

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, not later than 6 p.m. this day, every question necessary for the disposal of the Committee of the Whole stage, the report stage and the third reading and passage stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment, before the House adjourns.

Mr. Nielsen: That is acceptable, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Madam Speaker, this motion is as the result of discussions to which we agreed. We welcome the proposed amendment regarding the Small Business Development Bond.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the proposal by the President of the Privy Council. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Pinard: Tomorrow at three o'clock, we will deal with Bill C-24. Tomorrow we will talk about the agreement we have reached regarding that bill. It will not take the full day. After dealing with all stages of Bill C-24, we will resume second reading stage debate on the borrowing authority bill.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): The second point I would like to deal with today, Madam Speaker, concerns the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. We had fruitful discussions on this item as well. I am happy to report that the spirit of our discussions was to the effect that this was in fact the ultimate and last request for an extension of the deadline of that committee. The following motion will be agreed to without debate. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

Point of Order—Mr. Nielsen

That, notwithstanding any previous order, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada shall complete its work and make its final report not later than February 13, 1981; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

It is clearly spelled out in the motion that it is to be no later than February 13. However, it is still possible, and I would even say likely, that the committee may report earlier than February 13. It would not go against the motion if that were to happen.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—THE CONSTITUTION—TABLING OF LETTER FROM BRITISH PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order of which I gave you notice yesterday. I will be as brief as possible. It concerns the tabling of documents in this House. You will recall, Madam Speaker, that reference was made yesterday, and I will deal with it in more detail in a moment or so, to a letter upon which reliance was placed when making certain points of debate. Reference was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) on the program "Question Period" last Sunday, February 1, to a letter from the government at Westminster giving assurance that this government's constitutional package would be processed without question at Westminster.

As you know, Madam Speaker, the nature of those assurances, if any, has become a matter of dispute in this House. On both Monday and Tuesday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs used the letter from Prime Minister Thatcher to support the contention of the minister and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that very sweeping promises had been made by the government at Westminster.

On Monday in this House the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 6769 of Hansard, and I quote:

It was a letter from the British Prime Minister. In it she said in essence what every British minister has said—and what the Prime Minister herself has said since the beginning—that the trouble was with the timing, not with the substance, and that they had no doubt that with a request from the Canadian Parliament they would have no choice but to put it through. She did say, as I told the House Friday, that the ministers had been told in September or October that with a charter in the package it would be more difficult. That was the position the British Prime Minister took.

Then there was an interjection by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

Will you table it?

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I quote from page 6817 of Hansard:

—that assurance was contained in a letter from Prime Minister Thatcher to our Prime Minister and it was to the effect that the government of the United Kingdom would accept the responsibilities which it had already assumed and follow the tradition of proposing to the British Parliament, with its recommendation, our joint resolution.

On both days a request was made that the specific letter be tabled. Yesterday nothing was done during the question period or during Routine Proceedings. Having now had an opportunity to review Hansard for both days, and having had an opportunity to review the provisions of Beauchesne, I am convinced, and I submit that it is the duty of the Chair to direct that the letter be tabled.

In support of that submission I draw your attention to Citation 327(5) of Beauchesne, which is to be found at page 116 of the latest edition. It sets forth as follows:

To be cited, a document must be quoted—

And this is the important portion of the subclause, in my submission:

—or specifically used to influence debate.

That is the other half of it. I submit that a ruling simply based on that portion of subclause (5), that the document must be quoted, would be sufficient in this case if in fact the document was used, in this case a letter, specifically to influence debate.

There can be no question in my mind, or in the mind of any reasonable member of this House, that the document was, to use the specific words of the subclause, "specifically used to influence debate". There is no question of that, even though it was not directly quoted.

I submit, if the Chair comes to the same conclusion I have that the letter was used on two successive days specifically to influence debate in this House, the Chair is bound to come to the conclusion that the document is such that it must be tabled under our rules, on request. As I pointed out, the request was made on two separate days, on several occasions. One further relevant citation, to be found in Beauchesne is 327(6), which reads:

If a Minister cites or quotes an official document in debate, he should be prepared to table it.

It might be argued, Madam Speaker, if one wants to be unduly confining, that the question period is not a debate in the sense used in these citations but, I submit, that conclusion cannot and should not be drawn. I suggest that a small "l" liberal interpretation of the rules should be applied, and has been applied in the past, I point out, because there is no question that what was going on yesterday in this chamber during question period, and the day before during question period, when this document was cited and used in support of the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and of the Prime Minister, was in fact debate.

● (1510)

I merely draw the Chair's attention to the Oxford Dictionary version of what "debate" is to support in a simple manner that contention.

Subsection (6), in my submission, requires the minister to be prepared to table a document if it is cited or quoted from.

There is one further point on which I am sure you will be advised by your officials, and that is that Subsection (6) also uses the phrase "official document". One must ask oneself, before coming to a rational conclusion on this submission, whether or not this letter was an official document. I simply want to refer you in this regard to a citation from the most recent edition of Beauchesne, 327(1), under the heading "Documents Cited". It states:

A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a dispatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the Table.

The following is the important phrase in this quotation:

This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevents counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

I am not going to go into the reluctance of the minister responsible for the status of women in respect of his shenanigans regarding the tabling of an affidavit that he used repeatedly to support arguments he made during that debate, but from that last submission I want to go to my final reference to you which is contained in the Journals of this House for Tuesday, February 22, 1972. This deals with whether or not we are considering here a public or a private document, because this has a bearing on the decision which I am calling upon the Chair to make.

At page 15 of Journals for that date the then Speaker said this:

I think the argument put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North is valid. The rule is clear enough. If a document is quoted in debate it has to be tabled. It was suggested by the President of the Privy Council that perhaps we are not dealing here with what is termed a state document.

I am sure that argument may well be made. The quotation continues:

This has always been the difficulty in the past—to determine what is a public document and what is a private document.

That is a decision the Chair will have to make in respect of the obligation to table this particular letter—is it a public document or is it a private letter? The Speaker went on to state:

My thought is that if a letter, even though it might have been written originally as a private letter, becomes part of the record of a department it becomes at that point a public document and a state paper.

There is no question about how the Speaker of that day dealt specifically with the nature of a letter which was required to be produced. The Speaker went on:

It seems to me that the documents to which the minister has referred are part of the official penitentiary files—

In this case this particular letter is part of the files of either the Secretary of State for External Affairs or of the Prime Minister.

The Speaker went on to say:

—part of the official penitentiary files, or documents within the possession of the officials of the department, and I would think that any document of this kind which is cited by the minister ought to be tabled in the House.

It does not make any difference whether it is in the minister's possession or that of his officials.

I ask you to conclude from subsection (6) of citation 327, which I have quoted for your assistance, that this document, having been cited, and it being an official document, in debate, should be tabled by the minister, and in my submission the Chair is obliged to enforce that parliamentary practice.

In respect of Subsection (5) of Citation 327 of Beauchesne, and I emphasize this in my final remarks and submission to you, it indicates that:

To be cited, a document must be quoted or specifically used to influence debate.

In my submission you work back from (6) to (5) of Citation 327, and there is no question that this letter was used to influence debate, that it was therefore cited and, therefore, need not be quoted from. I know that is the argument I will get from the government House leader, but it does not have to be quoted from.

I am not submitting that mere reference is sufficient to require its tabling, but I am saying to you, if you do not accept that lesser of the two arguments, once the document has been cited and once it has been used to influence debate, then it is deemed to have been cited and thereby falls within both these subsections and the Chair is obliged, in my submission, to require its tabling.

Madam Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the arguments and the citations from Beauchesne to support those arguments, but I do think I will have to look at the form in which the debate took place yesterday to determine the fact, as alleged by the hon. member, that it was specifically used to influence debate. At this moment in time I do not feel I can make a proper judgment and I would, therefore, like to take the matter under advisement.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, may I suggest that it was not just yesterday's debate, but also the debate on Monday. You stated you would look at the debates for yesterday when reviewing the matter, but I suggest our proceedings of Monday last are very important for consideration as well.

Madam Speaker: I will take that into consideration as well.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I had hoped you would have invited submissions to support this case and, if it is your pleasure, I would propose to try to counter the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

This is an interesting argument and I am sure you will deliberate on it, Madam Speaker, but I believe on three of four counts the hon. member for Yukon is wrong. I suppose I could deal with Paragraph (6) of Citation 327 which was quoted.

● (1520)

The hon. member for Yukon talked about the minister's citing or quoting an official document in debate. To my knowledge—and I have had a chance to look only in a cursory way at the debates of the last couple of days—neither the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) nor the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) cited or quoted from a letter between the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Reference was made thereto, and I believe there is adequate precedent in this House that the mere reference to a letter and the mere recalling of a conversation between two individuals do not constitute an absolute citation or quotation from a letter. It is also for that reason that when we come down to Beauchesne's Citation 327(7), the hon. member for Yukon was perhaps anticipating that I might use in our defence Citation 327(2), which reads as follows:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the Table of the House, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda.

I submit that we are talking about private correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and there is a long-standing tradition that one does not divulge the contents of private correspondence between heads of state because that would perhaps prejudice relations between the countries involved.

However, the hon. member for Yukon anticipated my arguing Citation 327(2) by referring to Citation 327(7). Citation 327(7) reads as follows:

> When a letter, even though it may have been written originally as a private letter, becomes part of a record of a department, it becomes a public document, and if quoted by a minister in debate, must be tabled on request.

Coming back to Citation 327(6), I clearly state unequivocally—and I choose to be proven wrong—that neither the Prime Minister nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs quoted from that letter, so therefore Citation 327(7) does not apply.

When one gets to Citation 327(5), I suppose here Your Honour has a very difficult job indeed because, as the hon. member for Yukon mentioned, Citation 327(5) states, and I quote:

> To be cited, a document must be quoted or specifically used to influence debate.

A number of questions arise. Is the question period debate in the full sense of the word? The hon. member may refer to the Oxford Dictionary. I would rather refer to parliamentary precedent, and I leave that in Your Honour's hands. It is my contention that the spirit and tradition of the question period are not that it be debate in the strict sense of the word but the elicitation of answers and information from the government. Indeed, various Speakers over the years have talked about the inadequacy of answers and about the information aspect of question period. I therefore submit that question period is not debate in the true sense of the word. I know that hon. members opposite perhaps have a different interpretation, but what is important here, and what the hon. member for Yukon has asked Your Honour to do, is to go further and actually decide whether or not those references made by the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs actually influenced debate.

If I may say so, it is very presumptuous on the part of the hon. member for Yukon to ask Your Honour as the Speaker of this House to take a very, very subjective decision as to whether any answer or any action in this chamber has actually influenced debate. On those grounds I think that that particular argument falls short.

I believe I have made three or four points. Citation 327(2) is absolutely clear when we are talking about private letters or memoranda, and since there was no quotation from that document, Citation 327(7) does not apply.

Similarly, as I have stated, citation 327(6) is quite clear in that neither the Prime Minister nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs quoted or cited from that letter. They made references to it. I am not even sure the Prime Minister made references to it. I think it was the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Prime Minister was talking about conversations he had with Mrs. Thatcher.

Finally, to ask Your Honour to decide whether or not any answer or any action taken in this place, whether in debate or in the question period, may influence debate, is somewhat presumptuous and, I would say, beyond your purview as Speaker of the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Whom do you recommend we ask to decide the question?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I shall be very brief. This question is very simple. The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has essentially based his argument on Citation 327(5) of Beauchesne and he has stated that the letter in question was used to influence the debate. There are two reasons why his argument is not valid. The first is that it concerns a personal letter. Even if someone had quoted from a personal letter, no private member or minister could be forced to table such a letter. As this concerns a personal letter, therefore Citation 327(5) does not apply. The second reason is that, to force a member of the House or a minister to table a document, a passage from this document has to have been quoted. In this case, absolutely no passage of this letter was quoted in the House by anyone. For these two reasons, namely, the fact that this concerns a letter of a personal nature and that no passage from it was quoted, it is obvious that we cannot force anyone to table the letter in question.

If the hon. member for the Yukon insists that it is true and indeed that a personal letter is involved, the fact of having tried to influence the debate by referring to this letter would amount to quoting from the letter. However, even if he were right, which we do not accept because I do not believe that this had any influence whatsoever on the debate, but even if we were to admit that he was right and that this could have influenced the debate, the fact remains that the document involved was a personal letter.

Citation 327(5) applies only to public documents and not to personal letters. No member of the House can be forced to table a personal letter even if an excerpt has been quoted. Citation 327(2) makes this very clear. Moreover, even if we were dealing with a public document, since there was no quotation, the argument that it might have influenced the debate is therefore denied, as the hon. members can see for themselves in Hansard. We have in no way influenced any debate whatsoever, and I would go so far as to ask of which debate the hon. member is talking. All this occurred during the oral question period and I do not know to what debate the hon. member refers. In any event, even if we were to admit that the Oral Question Period and I do not know to what debate the hon. way influenced. As you can see for yourself, Madam Speaker, the document involved is a personal letter of which no excerpt was quoted, and Citation 327 of Beauchesne which seems to me very relevant in this regard therefore settles this whole matter.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon knows that I have already heard him. Does he have anything to add to the point of order he has raised?

Mr. Nielsen: No, Madam Speaker, I do not intend to add to it. I merely invite the Chair, when considering the matter, to take what we would call in court judicial notice of the title on the front page of Hansard. Hansard is entitled "House of Commons Debates".

Madam Speaker: I will take this question under advisement and rule on it later.

MR. TOWERS—PROCEDURE RESPECTING S.O. 43 MOTION

Madam Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) rose on a point of order with regard to his motion under Standing Order 43. I said that I would look at the motion a little more closely, because it is very difficult when one is just listening to a motion in the House always to judge whether it is in order. Especially if the judgment is challenged I think it is prudent to read the motion a second time and to try to see whether my decision was a bit too hasty.

I did look at it, and I see no reason to change my view on that. I also looked at the motion presented by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), which I did accept and put to the House. There was a difference between those two motions which justified my decision to put the motion by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton, but I did not feel I could accept the motion of the hon. member for Red Deer.

● (1530)

The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton did expose reasons of pressing necessity, while the hon. member for Red Deer did not. The motion from the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton did refer to something that had happened within the last few days. Moreover, the motion of the hon. member for Red Deer put me in a difficult position. If I had accepted his motion, then the next day I would have had to accept a motion to encourage every other group in society which renders a service to the community, such as doctors, nurses, firefighters, and so on. It is a very commendable idea, but I am afraid it does not qualify for a motion under Standing Order 43. I regret that I have to refuse the motion.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Thank you for your consideration, Madam Speaker. One of the reasons why my motion was not presented in the form that you would like was that you had made an earlier ruling in the House that we were not to refer to what was taking place in the committee meetings with regard to the Constitution.

You will remember that the police commissions made a representation to the constitutional committee, and my motion was related to that. I did not refer to the representations they made to the committee because of your ruling. However, I thought it was of urgent and pressing necessity because of what we have heard today, that the resolution is to be returned to the House by February 13. The representations made by police commissions across Canada are tied in with my motion under Standing Order 43.

Madam Speaker: That is the difficulty in which hon. members put the Chair when they bring things into this House that are being discussed in a committee. The Chair has no idea what is going on there, and is not present during the deliberations. If the hon. member followed the rule that he should not cite proceedings of the committee in the House, I commend him for that, but he also has to follow all the other rulings and, when bringing in a motion under Standing Order 43, he has to do it according to the rules that apply to that Standing Order. Since he did not, I cannot accept his motion.

3. No.

Question No. 1,005—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was an attitude survey or anything of a similar nature taken in the past three years on employees of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if so (a) how many questions were on the survey (b) were employees instructed to answer the survey and return it to Mr. Robert Myre, Industrial Psychologist, c/o Stethem-Gareau Ltd?

2. Does the government consider such surveys as an invasion of privacy of public servants and, if so, what steps will be taken to correct the situation?

3. Did the survey show a low morale in the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and was it made public and, if not (a) for what reason (b) will it be made public?

4. What was the total cost of the survey?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: 1, 3 and 4. See reply to question No. 433 answered January 23, 1979, Hansard page 2448, 4th Session, Thirtieth Parliament.

2. The individuals were informed of the purpose for which the information was being collected.

The information collected in the said survey was provided by the individual employees on a voluntary basis and was forwarded directly to the consultant.

No individuals were requested to identify their returned questionnaire.

In conclusion, for the above mentioned reasons, it is not believed that the survey was an invasion of privacy.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Question No. 1,592—Mr. Cossitt:

At any time since questions were placed on the Order Paper by the hon. Member for Leeds-Grenville concerning Madam Claudette Nadeau of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, have auditors or other persons searched files in the corporation looking for evidence of certain expenditures and payments made on behalf of Madam Nadeau, or Yvon Gariépy, Master of the Royal Canadian Mint and, if so (a) has it been found that any files are missing and, if so, what is a list of all such items (b) on whose instructions was a search made?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: the field audit examination of the corporation's records by the Auditor General was completed on July 15, 1980. Since then no auditors or external persons have searched corporation files. However, it is common internal practice to review financial documentation including expenditures for budget analysis purposes and for replies to parliamentary inquiries.

(a) (i) No file has been reported missing.

(ii) Not applicable.

(b) If any such search is to occur, it is the vice-president, finance and administration who authorizes it as per normal procedure.

Question No. 1,593—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. J. M. Bertrand employed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if so (a) in what capacity and what are his duties (b) was he at any time chief of finance (c) was he on sick leave at any time within the past two years and, if so, for how long and was or was not the time involved approximately one month?

2. On what date did Mr. Bertrand return to work and, on that date, did he find on his return that his position as chief of finance was occupied by another person and, if so (a) was he advised of this before his return and, if not, for what reason (b) who occupies the position at present or the equivalent thereof (c) was the present appointment made by or on the recommendation of Madam Claudette Nadeau (d) what are all the details why such a step was taken?

3. Are senior appointments in the corporation made by Madam Nadeau and, if so, under what authority?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

1. Yes.

(a) Accountant in a probationary capacity.

Duties: Plans, organizes, supervises and controls the personnel, activities and other resources of the accounting division.

Plans, schedules and produces regular and ad hoc reports.

Establishes and maintains quality control over computer input and output.

Provides functional direction to subordinate staff in matters relating to corporation financial management practices.

(b) No, he occupied the position of chief of finance in a probationary capacity.

(c) This information is considered to be personal.

2. October 6, 1980. Mr. Bertrand was never confirmed in the position of chief of finance (see 1. (b)).

(a) He was officially informed on August 28, 1980, that his position would be that of accountant on probation.

(b) Michel Bourcier occupies the position of chief of finance in a probationary capacity.

(c) No.

(d) Not applicable.

3. The appointment of officers is made by the board of directors of the corporation in accordance with the procedure established by the Surplus Crown Assets Act, Paragraph 7(1), and by the bylaw No. 3 of the corporation, Paragraph 7.01, approved by order in council PC 1979-1054, March 28, 1979.

MASTER OF ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

Question No. 1,594—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In the past three years, was any money paid from public funds to "Le Cercle Universitaire d'Ottawa" by the Royal Canadian Mint and, if so (a) what was the amount per year (b) what was the total for the three years combined (c) for what purpose (d) how many persons were entertained and (i) on what dates in each case (ii) what were their names and the purpose of such entertainment?

2. Was Mr. Yvon Gariépy, Master of the Royal Canadian Mint, present at any of the gatherings or involved in arranging directly or indirectly such entertainment and, if so, on how many occasions?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. Money was paid by the Royal Canadian Mint but not from public funds.

(a) 1977 $3,051.88

1978 $3,594.29

1979 $8,176.24

(b) $14,822.41.

(c) in payment of meetings with clients, businessmen or other persons who have business dealings with the corporation.

(d) about 600 persons were entertained during the last three years

(ii) The purpose of such entertainment was to meet clients, businessmen or other persons who have business dealings with the mint.

The names are not being mentioned because their disclosure could reasonably be expected to be materially injurious to the financial interests of the corporation.

2. Mr. Gariépy was present at about 108 gatherings.

Question No. 1,789—Mr. Cossitt:

Has the government decided to dismiss Mr. Yvon Gariépy, Master of the Royal Canadian Mint and (a) if so, on what date and for what reasons (b) if not, is such dismissal under consideration and, if so, on what date will it take place and for what reasons?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) No. (b) Not applicable.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Question No. 1,790—Mr. Cossitt:

Has the government decided to dismiss Madam Claudette Nadeau, president of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and (a) if so, on what date and for what reasons (b) if not, is such dismissal under consideration and, if so, on what date will it take place and for what reasons?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) No. (b) Not applicable.

Question No. 1,791—Mr. Cossitt:

What is the name of the telephone receptionist at Crown Assets Disposal Corporation head office and is this person or anyone else refusing to put through telephone calls to members of the corporation, particularly Mr. Jean-Marie Bertrand and, if so, what are all the reasons that Mr. Bertrand is not being allowed to receive his telephone calls?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): D. Forget. No. Not applicable.

Question No. 1,792—Mr. Cossitt:

What is the average time taken by Madam Claudette Nadeau, president of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, to return telephone messages left for her, specifically from members of the news media or Members of Parliament?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): All telephone messages are returned as soon as possible.

Question No. 1,799—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. Michel Bourcier chief of finance for Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if so (a) on what date was he appointed (b) what is his exact annual salary (c) what are the details of his work experience, if any, in previous government services?

2. (a) Was Mr. Bourcier appointed to the position held by Mr. Jean-Marie Bertrand and was this done without Mr. Bertrand being informed and, if so, for what reason (b) was Mr. Bertrand demoted in salary and, if so, to what figure (c) is Mr. Bertrand occupying a desk without a telephone (d) what are all the reasons for the present treatment of Mr. Bertrand by the corporation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

1. Mr. Michel Bourcier is occupying the position of chief of finance in a probationary capacity.

(a) September 2, 1980.

(b) Salary range is $26,960 to $40,440.

(c) None, Mr. Bourcier has never been employed in federal government services.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 3, consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax—Mr. MacEachen—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-54 to amend the statute law relating to income tax. When the committee rose on Tuesday, February 3, 1981, clause 58 of the bill was under consideration and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood had the floor. I might mention that Clause 8 was allowed to stand. Shall Clause 58 carry?

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask when it is proposed to return to Clause 8 for the amendment that has been promised.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I would have no objection if we were to proceed now with Clause 8 which deals with the Small Business Development Bond. It is up to the House to decide. We may, however, go on and come back later to clause 8. It is all the same to me. We can either wait until the end or proceed with it at once.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman may I suggest that we do it now because it is the only tag end before Clause 58. We could then proceed in a more orderly way.

On Clause 8—

● (1540)

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, as indicated after the oral question period, following an agreement between the parties, the government has agreed to propose the extention of the Small Business Development Bond until December 31 of this year. Throughout the debate, numerous representations have been made by hon. members on both sides of the House for the government to extend the scope of this proposal. On several occasions the Minister of Finance and I have discussed this matter with the Minister of State for Small Businesses who was also concerned with the short period of the fiscal year in which the bond could still be negotiated. By granting this extention the government has naturally taken into account these various representations. It has taken into account the particular situation in which we find ourselves and which as also been underlined by hon. members, namely the fact that in a period of high interests rates investments for the development of small businesses are a much more difficult proposition. Considering our fairly high rate of unemployment, at the present time we should extend the bond deadline and enable those job intensive small businesses to meet the challenge of reducing the present high level of unemployment. I would not like to prolong the debate, and I am going to ask my colleague the Minister of State for Small Businesses to move amendments to Clause 8, which were agreed upon by all parties.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix) moved:

That Clause 8 of Bill C-54 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 44 and 45 on page 18 and substituting the following therefor:

"December 11, 1979 and before 1982,";

(b) by striking out line 14 on page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"1979 and before 1982";

(c) by striking out line 21 on page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"1979 and before 1982 in"; and

(d) by striking out line 24 on page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"1982, in whole or in part,".

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief in my remarks. I just want to confirm that this amendment arose out of the representations of myself and numerous other hon. members in the House, in particular the hon. member for Mississauga South.

I underline the arguments of the Minister of State for Small Businesses. At this particular time of very high interest rates, this measure is appropiate. It extends to small businesses the ability to borrow money at interest rates considerably less than would normally be the case for certain investments. Indeed it is a very welcome measure.

Today small business, as it has been for a number of years, is the number one generator of new jobs in the country. Too often we concentrate on the Chryslers and Massey-Fergusons of the world because of their size, and forget that in fact it is the many hundreds and thousands of small businesses which generate jobs, not the glamour operations.

If we are concerned about the unemployed and creating opportunities for them, clearly we must be interested in the welfare of small business in the country and, therefore, interested in promoting this particular feature.

Our first preference would have been for unlimited application of this particular measure. I do not know what the revenue implications are, but I doubt they are very profound. When the government examines the ramifications of this particular provision, I ask it to consider looking at the possibility of entirely eliminating the termination date at some future date. Certainly this provision is very helpful. Perhaps it is not as profound in terms of revenue implications as some other measures, but it is quite profound in terms of the jobs it can create.

In terms of future opportunities for enhancing the small business sector of the economy, the government might look at opening up its application. For example, this provision deals with incorporated small businesses, but I am sure we as members have all received very valid representations on opening it up to unincorporated businesses such as ranches and farms.

Finally I should like to deal with the provision regarding how this money might be spent. At present there are limitations on the types of expenditures for which these funds might be used. I ask the government to examine the possibility of opening up that provision somewhat. I have some confidence in the private sector, especially when it is competing. One thing we know about small business is that there is intense competition. So, the necessity of government to act as a policeman by providing direction is less important when we talk about small business, than perhaps in the large business sector where there is less competition and there is the possibility of size being used to abuse or to take unfair advantage of the marketplace. Then the government has a role to play. But competition is fierce in small business, and the marketplace works where there is fierce competition. Adams Smith's invisible hand is present, therefore there is less necessity for big brother in the form of the government acting as a policeman.

With my suggestions as to possible future improvements, I congratulate the government for the amendment to extend this provision for at least this year; certainly I am in favour of it, as is my party.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to see that the government has agreed to extending the date respecting the Small Business Development Bond. I recognize the role, as did the previous speaker, of small business. Not only does small business provide a great deal of new employment in Canada, but perhaps more important there is a great deal of activity in this sector. If one considers the directions the Canadian economy must take in coming years, one realizes that the creativity, innovation and willingness to try new ideas must be encouraged and nurtured at every opportunity.

I recognize the amendment to extend the provision for the rest of this year is a small step in that direction. Albeit a very small step, it is a positive one. I would be somewhat hesitant to make it open-ended into the future, because I would like to think it is not the appropriate way in which to support small business. Under the circumstances, until the final review is completed by the Minister of State for Small Businesses, it is very much an interim measure, a temporary step. Hopefully we can expect considerable improvements in the ways and means of encouraging, nurturing and supporting the small business sector of Canada in its innovative efforts.

Am I correct in understanding that we are debating only the amendment and that we will have an opportunity to ask other questions regarding the Small Business Development Bond later?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add to one or two of the points raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. I find it difficult to understand why the regulations would confine this to incorporated companies. Many of our small businesses are doing exactly the same thing. They are hiring people and serving the public. It seems to me there is a very strong argument with respect to legitimate businesses, incorporated or otherwise, receiving the same benefit. This is something which will benefit the entire country. Every one of these businesses which stays in business is good for the country. If they expand then they hire more people, which in a way alleviates some of the unemployment problem and serves business in helping its expansion.

● (1550)

I would also like to say that I attended the Western Stockgrowers' Association convention in Banff for one day last week. A number of cattlemen asked me about the Small Business Development Bond program. Some people have the notion that all ranchers and farmers are rich. This is not so. Many of our ranchers and farmers, particularly the younger ones, are having a hard job making ends meet. They, too, deserve every encouragement, since they are in business adding to the buoyancy of the economy. If they do well, the economy benefits.

I would again like to emphasize the point made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre that for farming and ranching businesses, many of which are not incorporated, there should be a definite provision made so that these businesses could include operating expenses, and specifically the purchase of cattle inventory. This is what makes a ranch. If a ranch is not able to secure cattle inventory, if the rancher must pay a high interest rate, it prevents the growth of the ranch. This causes unemployment and other ramifications. So, I would suggest to the minister that when the regulations are being drawn up this point should be remembered, that we endeavour to include the operating expenses of businesses such as small ranches and farms, specifically the purchase of cattle inventory and other such inventories.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to raise a couple of other questions while we are discussing this matter, particularly to emphasize the point made by the hon. member for Bow River. It is not often I agree with the hon. member for Bow River on many topics, but on this one I certainly concur 100 per cent. If there is one sector within the Canadian economy to which we must pay a great deal more attention it is the small farmer and the small cattleman.

I am privileged to come from a part of British Columbia which boasts of having some of the largest cattle ranches in Canada. I have some sensitivity to the needs, not so much of the large cattle operations, but of the small cattleman. Certainly in the last couple of weeks a number of cattlemen from my area—and I am talking about the people whose families have been in the area since the 1870s—have shown an interest in taking advantage of this type of program. I would like to lend my support to that of the previous speakers, asking the government to consider making the small farmer and cattleman eligible to take advantage of the Small Business Development Bond program.

I have two or three questions I would like to raise at this time. When one reads through this clause carefully it becomes evident that there are two beneficiaries of the Small Business Development Bond, the qualifying small business borrowers and, of course, the corporate lender. It would appear, from calculations I have made, that if the loan rate is at half prime plus 2½ per cent or more, this will result in greater benefit accruing to the chartered banks or the lending institutions than to the borrower himself. Would the minister confirm whether or not that is the case? If it is, then should we not be looking at placing a ceiling on the interest rates which can be charged so that we are not making it easier again for Canada's chartered banks to be making a profit? I do not think this is the idea of this particular piece of legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take up very briefly the points raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, by the member for Bow River as well as by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap whose comments were somewhat inconsistent with his first intervention, namely, to extend to all small businesses without exception, the privileges contained in the Small Business Development Bond and to extend them also to all kinds of investments. In the first place, I am surprised by the statements of the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the member for Bow River who often condemn this government for its careless spending and extremely burdensome budgetary deficit. This government knows that its budget deficit bears heavily on the Canadian taxpayers. It is committed to reducing the deficit, and this is exactly why it proceeds so sparingly with an expenditure like the one involved in the small business expansion bond program. Such a tax credit will apply—because it can actually be very popular—could result in a tax loss that is tantamount to a considerably high expenditure, and the government must consider this.

I think this is why the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap stated in the first part of his comments that this was not the best way of helping small businesses. In this respect, I would like to suggest that the Minister of State for Small Businesses is now conducting a study on the various financing needs of our small businessmen, whether for expansion, for working capital, for coping with their needs during periods of economic recession, etc. The study is under way, and when it is completed the government will come forth with measures that will respond much better to the needs of the small businesses than this type of bond. We may also come up with programs that will better cope with the financing problems experienced by small businesses. Because their scope will be known, they will be much less costly to the Canadian taxpayers than this type of bond.

I have also been asked whether banks will not derive larger benefits than the small businesses themselves from the way the tax credit will be figured out. I have not worked this out myself but, if I am allowed a few seconds, if an honourable member has a very brief comment to make, I would consult with the officials who have studied with the particular method of administering that program and then I could provide an answer more quickly.

[English]

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few brief interjections to reinforce what has already been said by the hon. member for Bow River and by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap about the Small Business Development Bond. I would like to emphasize how important it can be to the small, unincorporated businessman and the small farmer.

I think it is well known that in agriculture the amount of investment per job is greater than in any other segment of the Canadian economy. I do not have the exact figures with me but it seems to me, if my memory serves me correctly, that we are talking about $150,000 to $175,000 of investment capital per job in agriculture. This is because of the nature of agriculture. In most cases it is an annual production cycle so that we go through one production cycle per year, whether it be in the cattle business or in grain farming. The farming segment needs capital on a yearly basis, and in some cases on a longer term basis.

I point out that when interest rates fluctuate widely a great deal of uncertainty in the farming community can occur within a year's time. What happens in many cases is that, rather than go through the prospect of facing fluctuating interest rates, producers, particularly those in the cattle business, cut back. This move does nothing to help inflation because it is felt on the supply side. One of the proposals which make sense is the extending of the Small Business Development Bond to unincorporated businesses, such as farmers and ranchers. Regardless of whether farmers and ranchers are incorporated, they need large amounts of capital to operate. The amount necessary has increased dramatically over the past few years, and there is every indication that it will continue to increase.

● (1600)

As we become more productive in agriculture, more capital will be needed. It would make sense with regard to the supply side if people were encouraged to be more productive. However, in this instance more money at a lower cost will be necessary. I urge the government to extend the Small Business Development Bond to small unincorporated farms, ranches, and other small businesses. The mere fact that farms and ranches require vast amounts of capital to operate is a good indication, if the government is serious about fighting inflation on the supply side, of the need for extending the Small Business Development Bond to unincorporated farms, ranches, and other small businesses.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind the hon. member, if we are to situate the problem in a very broad context, that he stressed the need to encourage the production of goods in order to reduce inflationary pressures. It must also be kept in mind in the discussion of the inflation phenomenon that the argument is often made that huge government deficits feed inflation. This means that implementing the suggestion of the hon. member, that is spending more, would lead to an even greater deficit and therefore more inflation. I feel that no phenomenon should be studied singly, no problem solved in isolation. Instead, we must view the over-all economic situation in which we live. I indicated that this government being committed to reducing its deficit, its spending had restricted the application of this costly measure to the most urgent problem in present economic circumstances, that is, to the creation of jobs. That is why this bond applies only with regard to investments in the development of businesses.

As for the matter of interest rates which the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap brought up a few moments ago, the provisions of this bill do not provide for a formula on the basis of which to set interest rates. The businessman who wants to avail himself of this section of the law will have to see the representatives of those institutions that are authorized to participate in such a program and negotiate his rate or shop around for the best rate available, as some will be higher than others, and settle for the one he feels is the most attractive.

In fact, the tax advantages offered by this provision are primarily intended for small businesses because they are the ones we want to help. Of course, lending institutions will also derive tax benefits, which is one way of encouraging moneylenders to take an active part in handling those bonds. But the prime advantage is not meant to go to lending institutions. The benefits provided for here are meant to encourage small businesses to borrow and invest in their expansion.

[English]

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, very briefly I would like to reinforce the point made by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette with regard to the government giving consideration to extending the Small Business Development Bond to cover unincorporated businesses, including farms. We have rapidly reached the point in time in Canadian agriculture where the Farm Credit Corporation is becoming a secondary vehicle in the lending of money to agriculture. It is probably due to the tremendous amounts of money required in the agricultural industry. The government must be in a position to move in and, at least, guarantee loans made in the traditional way, particularly loans to younger farmers who wish to borrow from banks, credit unions, or caisses populaires.

I know of no other industry like agriculture which is made up of both small and large components all of which need tremendous amounts of capital. The United States is in the process of recognizing this problem. In some states a program in the form of agricultural development revenue bonds has been introduced. I have copies of the proposed bond. For example, the Alabama Agricultural Development Authority is considering this particular bond as a means of raising money in the marketplace to supplement the capital which will be needed in agriculture, without the government becoming heavily involved.

Obviously, the entire concept would not apply in Canada, because of the different tax structure and a number of other differences. Such a concept though may apply in the long term viability of Canadian agriculture. If the minister is interested, I would be happy to send him or his officials copies of the material which I received from Alabama. This material points out that there are methods, other than our traditional method of the Farm Credit Corporation, of providing the necessary amounts of money.

The Farm Credit Corporation literally ran out of money well before the end of its yearly mandate. If agriculture is to survive as a viable, prosperous entity in the 1980s, something must be done. While the minister is correct when he says that there will be an additional increase or draw-down from the federal treasury for small businesses, including those in agriculture, and considering that these people are looking at interest rates at from 19 per cent to 20 per cent, will the minister not consider extending the small business development bond to unincorporated small businesses and particularly unincorporated farms?

I know of many incorporated farms which are applying for the bond. Provided the tax system of taking half the interest rate offered and adding two percentage points to it favours these businesses, there is no question that the small business development bond will help. In the interim, until the House, or possibly representatives of all parties, working with the minister's department, can come up with new ideas for funding these small businesses, and particularly farmers, the idea I have mentioned should be considered. Many small businesses are forced to borrow money at the current exorbitant interest rates and, unless they receive a substantial increase in the price of their commodities, they will not be around this time next year. It is that serious. We are getting to that point in agriculture where credit is probably the greatest management tool agriculture has.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the comments made by the hon. member for Lisgar and I can assure him that I would be very glad to get the papers he referred to concerning agricultural development revenue bonds, and he can be assured that we would study them. I am sure my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, will also be interested in them. I also agree with him as to the importance of agriculture. I suggest energy is not the only problem in the world today, but food and the production of protein are another serious problem facing mankind. I agree with him that we should take heed of our country's tremendous capacity for protein production. It would be most unfortunate if we failed to make that production available by not providing our farmers with the money they need. So I would appreciate it very much if he could supply us with these documents, and he may be assured that we will give them very close attention.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I have a short statement before I pose my question. It is just for clarification. I was not suggesting for a moment that the Small Business Development Bond does not help small business. That is obvious. However, by my calculations when the interest rate goes above 2.5 per cent above half prime, the greater advantage then accrues to the lending institution. Since this bond was primarily designed to support small business, when you look at the interest rates which most banks are charging on the Small Business Development Bond, it is in excess of 2.5 per cent above half prime, which means the banks are the major beneficiaries. I assumed that was not the intent of this legislation. It is simply a statement.

My question is this: as others have indicated, the unincorporated business and a number of other exclusions from this particular clause eliminate most small businesses in Canada from participating in this legislation. Would the minister or his officials be able to agree with my calculations, which would indicate that perhaps nearly 95 per cent of small businesses in Canada are excluded from benefiting from this legislation because of the qualifying clauses? If not 95 per cent, what percentage would the minister say is fair?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I will deal first with the latter part of the question. As soon as a business is incorporated and meets the criteria, it becomes eligible. It is claimed that the criteria requirements will eliminate 95 per cent—that is the figure quoted—of the small businesses which might apply for these bonds. That is not consistent with our own estimates or those I obtained when I inquired very briefly from some of the lending institutions which have indicated that they had received a great many applications over the past few weeks and that all the applicants appeared to be eligible.

I suggest, therefore, that to be able to arrive at such figures, one would have to have access to all the applications which have been filed and be able to determine those which have been turned down because of the qualifying clauses in the legislation. I do not think that this would be technically possible at this time, because it would require having all these applications. The estimates we have now seem to indicate that the hon. member's concern is unfounded.

Concerning the interest rates and the profits lending institutions are likely to reap from the businesses which will apply for these bonds, if we take an 18 per cent basic rate and divide it by 2, we get a rate of 9 per cent. The additional 2 per cent rate which the bank would require would raise the interest rate to 11 per cent and that would be shared as follows: 7 per cent to the small business, and 2 per cent to the bank. It goes without saying, then, that there is a net benefit to the small business.

And as I explained earlier, it was quite obvious from the original draft of the Small Business Development Bond that it has never been considered as an incentive designed to encourage financial institutions into lending money, but as a means to allow businesses in need of money to expand without having to labour under an unduly heavy financial burden in these difficult times when interest rates are very high.

[English]

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I have just a couple of brief points. In response to the minister's question a minute ago, I would like to point out what we are doing with high interest rates. We are trying to attack inflation from the demand side. When we get to interest rates at the level they are, I would argue very strongly in terms of agriculture that we affect inflation very adversely on the supply side. The Small Business Development Bond, if it were expanded to include the cattle industry, and I will be specific here, could help us on the supply side by encouraging production. It may cost in the short run, but in the long run, because of the nature of the cattle business, it will help us in a two to three-year period to increase supply and thereby address some of the problems of food price increases.

Let me give you some examples. I have been farming for about 25 years. When I first started selling cattle, they sold for roughly 19 to 20 cents a pound. The interest costs right now to raise an animal to slaughter weight are approximately equal to what cattle were sold for 20 or 25 years ago. In some areas of the prairies now it costs as much to buy winter feed for a cow—and I made this point in the House here during our all-night debate before Christmas—as it costs to pay interest for its keep for the total year. That will give hon. members an idea of how interest costs can affect what we are doing as far as inflation is concerned on the supply side.

Would the minister seriously consider extending the provisions of the small business development bond to include the purchase of livestock? There is a certain precedent for this. Breeding stock have been eligible for loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act in the past. If the minister could do this, it would be somewhat in concert with what has been done in the past regarding farm improvement loans. I would urge the minister also to give serious consideration to extending this kind of provision toward the purchase of feeder cattle. Again, as I have tried to explain previously, when there are wide fluctuations in interest rates and a farmer is locked into a production period which does not let him take into account the fluctuations in the short term, it scares the farmer away from committing himself to keeping his lots full because he has to feed them over a period of three, four or six months, during which time interest rates can fluctuate widely.

Perhaps the minister would seriously consider classing breeding stock as a capital good for the purposes of this act, so as to come under the provisions of the small business development bond and, as well, extend the provisions to include feeder cattle. I admit that by doing this it will cost the treasury money in the short run, but I think it would pay off as far as increasing things on the supply side is concerned.

The businesses which benefit the most are the ones not taxable as far as the small business development bond is concerned. In some ways that is something like a tax contract, which I think we all agree is a good method of increasing production. Therefore I hope the minister will give some consideration to extending the small business development bond to small and unincorporated businesses. As I said, those which will benefit the most are the ones not in a taxable position. That could help to make them viable, and therefore eligible to pay taxes. This would be of benefit to the treasury down the road. It will not help the government at all as far as collecting taxes is concerned if these kinds of interest rates chase these people out of business. I would appreciate the minister's comments.

● (1620)

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, as I said a while ago, it would be pleasant to extend the application of that Small Business Development Bond even to cattle breeders. As I said, I am quite aware that if a large quantity of consumer goods are made available to consumers, the inflationary pressures will be reduced. I understand that quite well.

However, I would rather discuss the matter in relation to our agricultural programs rather than taxation. I indicated that the government was reluctant to extend that small business bond because of the substantial cost of that measure, and I think that in the present economic conditions, every investment dollar counts. That is why we had regretfully to restrict its application to the very limited field contained in the present provisions of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I have one last statement for the minister. Just so there will be no illusion created that is unreasonable, the word has gone out across the country that the Small Business Development Bond is indeed an answer for small business financing, or one of a number of answers. The point I want to make is that because of the number of qualifications, limitations or exclusions in the legislation, most small businesses in Canada do not have access to this legislation. I want to expand on that.

For example, we heard a great deal this afternoon about unincorporated small businesses. Depending on whose statistics and what numbers we use, if I averaged out accurately between the numbers usually available, we are talking about 930,000 active small businesses in Canada, of which 625,000 are unincorporated. That means they do not qualify for the small business development bond.

In addition, the Small Business Development Bond cannot be used for working capital. We all recognize that is where the demand is, working capital for the very small entrepreneur. The bond cannot be used to lease or rent equipment, or to buy second-hand equipment. By the time you tally up all these qualifications and limitations, you find there are actually few small businessmen who can benefit from this. I want to make that point so we do not feel this is the saviour of small business financing. We should have no illusions along that line.

I want to mention for the benefit of my colleagues to my right that when the hon. member for St. John's West brought in the concept of the Small Business Development Bond some months ago, which did not get very far, for an obvious reason, far fewer restrictions were actually included. This means that a great many more small businesses would have benefited. While the minister said today it is still open ended and it is therefore difficult at this point to say what it will cost, I suppose when the costs of the program were looked into and found to be in the hundreds of millions of dollars, these qualifications were considered necessary.

I want to leave one thought with the minister, and that is the difference between government spending, which we all agree must be curtailed as much as possible, and government investment. I suggest the money being spent by the government on this program for small business is probably one of the best investments we could be making. When you consider the way our money is distributed through various segments, programs and projects, many of dubious value when it comes to creating meaningful employment, I feel that the small business development bond is one of the more positive approaches. Recognizing its limitations and so on, we look forward to more legislation which will include improvements for the small business community in the next few months.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few comments about the Small Business Development Bond which was introduced by the Clark government. It was a step in the right direction, and we are glad this government is pursuing it.

This bond is not the total answer. We still have the problem of high interest rates, which are a very serious concern to small businesses and home owners. What bothers me is that I do not think the government is all that concerned about how high interest rates affect small business.

I wish to go back to the very first order of business in the last Parliament. The Liberal industry, trade and commerce critic, the hon. member for Windsor West, presented a motion calling for the establishment of an all-party committee to deal with interest rates. We in the Conservative Party agreed to that motion because we were concerned and wanted to do something about high interest rates. Our leader authorized the acceptance of that motion, and a committee was established to deal with the high interest rate problem.

The committee met for a couple of months. I have gone over the minutes of the 20 to 25 meetings. They contained a lot of worth-while information. The committee intended to call more witnesses. It was to have presented an interim report at the end of December, 1979, which would have assisted the government of the day to see what could be done about high interest rates and assisting small businesses and home owners. Of course we were defeated, and nothing further was done regarding the work of that committee.

I find it rather strange that this government has not re-established that committee to deal with this serious problem. A number of times we presented similar motions, asking why the government would not reappoint that committee. If the government was so concerned in 1979 about interest rates and wanted an all-party committee to deal with the problem, why will it not reappoint that committee which could make proposals to assist small business?

I find it strange that government ministers now say "no" to our motions when we said "yes" to theirs. The work of that committee has now gone down the drain. Their proposal for a Small Business Development Bond is only a partial answer. I ask the minister why the committee was not re-established to deal with this problem and to hear the rest of the witnesses. It could come up with a firm solution rather than a partial solution to the interest rate problem.

There is talk about interest rates going as high as 25 per cent. What will that do to small business in this country? This Small Business Development Bond program will not save them. I ask the minister to advise why the government will not reappoint that committee which it wanted so badly when it was in opposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member did indicate that when his party was in power it had to face very high interest rates and that one of the solutions considered was for an all party committee to examine possible ways to solve the issue of rising interest rates. He did state that a two-month study was made but apparently to no avail since in the wake of this study we did not witness a drastic drop in the interest rates. My opinion is that if you study the issue of rising interest rates in our country you have to conclude that it is not an isolated phenomenon taking place only in Canada but one which pervades not only the North American economy but economies of all industrialized notions. We are now facing difficult times. Inflation puts a constant pressure on the economy which reacts in various ways and the interest rates are only one of the reactions to these inflationary pressures. The position of this government has always been that if we truly want to return to lower and more sensible interest rates we must let all economic mechanisms interact in order to beat these inflationary pressures and as soon as there appears to be a trend toward a lower inflation rate, the interest rates will automatically readjust themselves downwards.

As I said earlier, it is not a phenomenon that can be singled out and treated in an isolated manner, it is a phenomenon that must be situated in the context of other macroeconomic phenomena, in the context of the economic trends prevailing in North America and other industrialized countries. Therefore I do not think that any single simple remedy will solve such a complex issue.

● (1630)

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: I have just one brief comment, Mr. Chairman. The minister said it was our proposal to establish a committee. It was not our proposal. We accepted their motion and there was mutual agreement in the House. The minister also said that no concrete results came from the meetings of the committee. Of course there were no concrete results because the committee did not have a chance to file its interim report. There were about a dozen more witnesses to be heard from, and another three or four months of work. Had that work all been completed I am sure there would have been some concrete results.

I would ask the minister and his officials to have a look at those minutes to see what they can find out. He might just reconsider his position in respect of reappointing that committee, because it really was doing a lot of good work.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8, as amended, agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Prior to matters relating to Clause 8 the committee had been considering Clause 58. Shall Clause 58 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 58 agreed to.

Clauses 59 to 63 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 64—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I have one short question I should like to raise regarding clause 64. The act currently provides tables for income up to $24,000. Could the minister indicate to the House what the new prescribed amount will be?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: For 1980 the new amount is set at $30,000.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I think on this particular clause one has to make the point that these excessive rates of withholding could certainly affect people on low income. An eventual tax refund does very little for those people to help pay their day to day requirements, providing food, clothing, energy costs and so on. We must never lose sight of the fact that, while tax refunds are fine, it is very difficult these days for many people to get by on a day to day, week to week basis, and this will do very little to assist them.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 65 to 69 inclusive agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member rising on Clause 70?

Mr. Riis: I rise on Clause 68.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: As a courtesy I would require the consent of the House to revert to Clause 68. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On Clause 68—

Mr. Riis: I would thank my colleagues for agreeing to forgive me when I was a little slow off the mark. I have a couple of questions I should like to raise with the minister.

The revenue from corporate taxes now comprises only 10.3 per cent of federal revenue compared to 23 per cent in 1950. Does the government feel corporations paid their fair share of taxes in 1980?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I will not question the figure put forth by the hon. member. It must be accurate though I cannot confirm that. The gist of his question is whether the government feels that big companies, commercial corporations, financial firms and others are paying their fair share of the taxes collected in Canada. It is both relatively easy and still rather difficult to answer that question. I can say without any hesitation that corporations account for a fair share of the government's revenues. I am positive about that.

One might be led to think otherwise by comparing percentages because that would give us a far from accurate idea of the situation. In fact one must take into account, above all other things, the generated income and the role played by businesses in our society. We have discussed that at some length during this debate and we have just been discussing that again for nearly an hour and a half, Mr. Chairman, when we were dealing with the Small Business Development Bond. Corporations account for a fair share of the government revenues and they also account to a large extent for the health of our economy. We all know that whenever there are problems within the economy or whenever the unemployment rate is high, for instance, we immediately look for measures—as we have just done for small businesses—which are likely to encourage businesses to invest money in order to improve the situation, create jobs and help Canadians to live better.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the House become cautious about our admiration for the government when we find that revenue from corporate taxation, which was 23 per cent in 1950, was 10.3 per cent in 1980. I realize this is a 5 per cent step in the right direction, and that raises my next question, and perhaps I should ask two. Why is this being proposed only to the end of 1981, if I understand it correctly? A study within the finance department in 1970 indicated that the average rate of corporation taxation was only 18 per cent. Has the minister's department estimated the impact of the surcharge on this amount?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, as to the additional amount to be generated, the answer is relatively simple, since we are dealing with a 5 per cent surcharge, which means that the additional revenue will represent 5 per cent of the revenue from corporate taxation. On pages 80 and 81 of the budget papers published with the last budget, one finds that for 1980-81, corporate taxes account for 22 per cent of federal revenue. This may put into perspective the figures quoted by the hon. member. Indeed, the figures I have come from official documents.

On Clause 70—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, I would like to move that Subclause 70(6) of Bill C-54 be amended (a) by striking out lines 33 and 34 on page 140 and substituting the following therefor:

each of which is the corporation's share of the income (determined in accordance with subdivision j) of the partnership for a fiscal period of the partnership ending in or coinciding with the year from an;

(b) by striking out line 12 on page 141 and substituting the following therefor:

(c) by striking out lines 42 and 43 on page 141 and substituting the following therefor:

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I must admit that I do not really understand the nature of the amendment. Perhaps as a result of the amendment my question has been answered. The amendment to clause 70 provides that a small business deduction will still be allowed where the shares of a small business are held by a venture capital corporation. Will this particular move not encourage the takeover of small independent businesses by venture capital corporations simply needing tax deductions?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, in the case of corporations such as SODEQs whose purpose is to provide capital for businesses, I believe that existing provincial statutes governing these corporations specify that the purpose of these institutions is not to take over corporations.

To a certain extent, the provision we are studying in clause 70 will favour or, if you will, allow diversification in the investments of the corporation, but it will not encourage takeovers as such.

The amendment ensures that the $150,000 ceiling is shared by all members in all cases where the business is operated through a corporation. In addition, such sharing of the ceiling among the various members will be prorated according to the participation in corporate income but not necessarily as a consequence since if I refer to SODEQs, for instance, those corporations are not set up to take control of small businesses but rather to provide capital to help them grow.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 70, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 71 agreed to.

On Clause 72—

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could make one quick suggestion. When ministers are moving amendments, if they could give us in a few words the effect of the amendments, I think it would save us a lot of time.

I would like to raise a point in connection with Clause 72. During the debate on clause 1 I dealt with deemed income. I would like to move an amendment—I am not going to, but I would like to—stating that deemed income, wherever it is applicable to income taxes, shall be deleted from the act. I know that would take a lot of time, and if the government did not support it it would go down to defeat, so I will not follow that course. However, I think I pointed out the other night the dangers involved with deemed income. I ask the minister not to use this in the agricultural or business fields unless there is a very, very definite reason for doing so.

I think deemed income is a totalitarian concept, and for some bureaucrat, who perhaps has no experience with a particular type of business at all, to deem how much income there is and not to allow expenses to be deemed, is really something which really frustrates our people.

The Minister of National Revenue told me in a letter that his department would use this very sparingly. I would like to see it not used at all. I think it should be watched very carefully this year so that the next time this act comes before the House we might be able to get rid of this entirely and wipe it out of the act.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I have a very brief comment. Certainly, we would be in a serious situation were we to delete every instance of the term "deemed" in the Income Tax Act. I am grateful that the hon. member did not introduce his amendment and so spared us very serious complications. However, I listened and the officials here listened very closely to the speech made the other night by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). He put forward special cases. He did so with his usual eloquence that reflects his concern with the day to day problems we face in our capacity as Members of Parliament. This is more or less the nightmare of all people when confronted with income tax.

I suggest everyone went through these difficulties when receiving a rather high assessment notice without knowing how or why. Because I would think everybody, come fiscal year end, tries to pay income tax as honestly as possible. When one receives such an assessment notice, one wonders what happened, one does not feel very easy in the intricacies, the nooks and crannies not of the National Revenue building but the Income Tax Act itself. I understand the hon. member. He referred to farmers for instance. Our farms have become large businesses. Unfortunately, farmers are not trained as accountants or income tax experts, and this can create problems when something appears to be a mystery in the Income Tax Act. His concerns are well known, they were listened to very closely and he may rest assured that the people responsible for drafting, formulating our tax legislation, will take very special care to consider his representations.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Chairman, I will speak very briefly. I think the hon. member for Bow River has raised a very fundamentally important question which perhaps should be discussed. I cannot recollect a discussion in my years here having to do with the Income Tax Act and the way in which it is enforced.

● (1650)

In many of its aspects the enforcement provisions of the Income Tax Act are more suited to a totalitarian state than to a democracy. Some of them are quite literally Gestapo-like, such as the one that permits the seizure of records. It really is a case of "guilty until proven innocent." It has always struck me as being rather hypocritical on the part of some of our guardians of public morality that they become so incredibly verbose and articulate when speaking of freedoms, justice, the criminal laws of this country, the way the courts function, the way information is available, censorship and so on, and yet they tolerate these enforcement provisions in the Income Tax Act.

We have all had experience with, or know of cases in our constituencies, where people have been victims of the enforcement provisions in the Income Tax Act. Some of the actions of enthusiastic tax collectors, backed by these provisions, are downright horrendous. The hon. member for Bow River told us of the poor farmer who was harassed for years by officials. Many of us who come from Alberta are regular readers of the writings of C. V. Meyers who was forced into exile in Spokane, Washington, because of the actions of the tax collector. A few years ago a businessman in Thunder Bay was so harassed by the tax collectors that he left the country. It would be appropriate for us to look into these matters and the danger of allowing them to happen. They are an invitation to sneakiness, if you will.

The enforcement provisions in the bill, taken to their illogical extension by overzealous bureaucrats from time to time, create a real contempt in the taxpayer. It is a dangerous situation when the tax collector and the taxpayer become adversaries in the real sense of the word, with one trying to outmanoeuvre the other and we are perilously close to that situation in this country.

Just recently a chartered accountant told me that he is being asked by clients to do things which, if he had suggested them five or ten years ago, would have led to the client firing him because such things were regarded as unscrupulous. There has been that kind of change in our morality. Granted some of it rises from the level of taxation but some of it is also as a result of the enforcement provisions in the Income Tax Act.

The hon. member for Bow River spoke of a specific provision that allows an official, to deem you to be in a certain position, and leaves it up to you to prove that you are, instead, a victim. That is contrary to our fundamental philosophy of justice.

I should like to close with an anecdote about an oil company executive who was being reassessed. The officials from the Department of National Revenue, armed with the authority of the act, seized his records. Among them were the draws he had written up for the oilmen's golf tournament which was to take place in a few days. He asked to have them back but there was no provision in the act that allowed them to be returned without a court order. We can never write a law that would guard against such silliness, but it is just as silly to have a law that allows such bureaucratic behaviour with immunity.

The matter raised by the hon. member for Bow River should be considered when the draftsmen examine this bill.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to emphasize the points made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the hon. member for Bow River about deemed income. I appreciate receiving a note on this subject from the parliamentary secretary this afternoon.

It is one thing for the department to have authority to assess tax on deemed income retroactively and for the taxpayer to have to defend himself, but if he cannot have some offsetting advantage in the way of deemed expense, then the adversarial system breaks down. It cannot operate if all the power is on one side.

I agree with the hon. member for Bow River when he says we know that we will not be able to have Clause 69 changed or thrown out, but that any reassessments that will be carried out concerning corporations dealing within arm's length be suspended for a year or, if the department reassesses on a retroactive basis, it should be done on an equal basis, so that if there is deemed income for an individual, that individual's corporation mut be allowed to have a deemed expense so that there can be an offsetting expense to claim as a deduction against tax. Otherwise it is conceivable that people who are even in low income brackets might reach the point of being taxed at over 100 per cent. I do not think that is the intent of the act.

If such interpretations can be put on the act I hope the tax department will clarify the matter once and for all.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre spoke of the adversarial system. I know cases of three or four officials of the tax department moving into a small community to do a reassessment. Word quickly spreads that such and such a person is being reassessed. This brings a lot of moral pressure upon him to pay the tax even though he may be quite sure that he is not liable. But in a small community a stigma attaches when three or four people from the Department of National Revenue show up to reassess him. It seems to be taken for granted that he is doing something wrong. The government has awesome powers with its bureaucracy and it does not have to justify the money it spends to collect tax. On the other hand, the individual taxpayer has to defend himself against that power of government, and that is where the adversarial system breaks down. It literally becomes the tyranny of the government on one side with nothing on the other side as a counterbalance. I urge the minister to take these concerns into consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment very briefly on what has been said. First of all, I believe that we must remember that our income tax system is based on a voluntary statement of our income, in other words, we receive a form to fill out on which we must state our income. I believe that this is the main principle. It is always easy to point out specific cases involving some intricacies. I can recall in my own experience as a Member of Parliament the case of people coming to see me to complain about harassment on the part of Department of National Revenue officials, cases where I tilted at windmills, where I fought to protect one of my constituents, and in so doing realized that this constituent had seriously neglected to declare part of his income and that the official of the National Revenue Department was quite right in cracking down on him, because if someone does not pay his taxes, you and I will have to pay them. If there is a shortage of revenues because someone has deliberately cheated on his income tax, as a result all of us will have to pay higher taxes.

Obviously, it is always possible to find specific cases where an official of the Department of National Revenue has overreacted. No one is perfect, either in the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance or any other department. There can be cases of abuse. I can see by the look on his face that Mr. Short is getting cross with me. Obviously, the Taxation Division is just about perfect, but perfection is quite rare! However, what we must all remember is that our taxation system is based on the willingness of individual taxpayers to make a voluntary statement of all their income.

Complications arise when someone forgets or neglects to show part of his income. It is also quite obvious that the more complexity to a business or the more sources of income, the more chances there are for a taxpayer to forget something and for the officials of Revenue Canada to discover these mistakes and send out notices. I do not question the fact that there can be regrettable cases, but I believe that, as a general rule, if everyone would observe the spirit of the Income Tax Act and make a complete statement without forgetting or neglecting anything, like we used to do when we went to confession, such problems would not occur.

[English]

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I should like very briefly to ask the minister a specific question which may not be within his jurisdiction. The other night I dealt with the possibility of the department proceeding with some reassessment of income tax on the basis of deeming income to an individual. I do not want to get into the details because the minister understands the situation. If there is to be some reassessment based on deemed income, can the minister assure us that individuals will be allowed to go back and amend their tax returns, so that there will be some deemed expense on the other side, or an offsetting expense, to cover it?

I know of individuals who incorporated on the basis of reasons other than avoiding taxation. They did it for the purposes of estate planning, dividing up assets among family members or whatever; they did not incorporate to avoid taxes. But when they are subjected to a reassessment only on the basis of deemed income, rather than their corporations being allowed a deemed expense, it seems to be a very serious breach of what the hon. member for Calgary Centre referred to, and I would like some assurance that there will be equality on each side in so far as income and expenses are concerned. It would go a long way toward alleviating our concerns about Section 69 of the Income Tax Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, this comes under the authority of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, but I am told that when it is not a case of tax evasion, the current practice is to allow amendments to the tax return that was submitted earlier. I would suggest that the hon. member get in touch with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to indicate his concerns. But my information is that the current practice is to allow that procedure which the hon. member mentioned except, of course, in obvious cases of fraud or evasion.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, after listening with interest to the remarks of previous speakers, I am moved to make a comment regarding the taxation system and the fact that one member will stand and indicate how the tax people are harassing good citizens and another member will indicate that our good citizens are misleading the tax department, and so on. One must ask where we are moving in a country which has, as its basis, a voluntary declaration taxation system, as the minister indicated, which assumes that people are honest and straightforward. It is the basic philosophy behind the collection of taxes.

In the next couple of months it will become virtually a national preoccupation of many Canadians to beat the tax man and to take advantage of every conceivable loophole. To fill out a simple tax form now requires the assistance of an accountant. Every year we add to the sections of the Income Tax Act, which makes it somewhat more complicated. Perhaps some loopholes are closed, but often in closing those loopholes others are opened up. People involved in the financial world today, particularly when it comes to accounting and taxation, are becoming very puzzled. The result is that a small but ever-increasing army of bureaucrats monitor the abuses of people in the system; it challenges these people even more.

What is at the root of this almost misdirection or this preoccupation with avoiding taxes? It must be said that the feeling of many Canadians is that the tax system is unjust. Many Canadians do not pay their fair share, while others bear the burden. We would be hardpressed if we spoke from our hearts in this chamber this afternoon and said that that is not the case.

When I tour the plants in my riding, particularly at this time of year, I find people are complaining about the taxes they will pay to the federal government. They are anxious to "beat the system". Perhaps one of the reasons for this is how their taxes are being spent and the feeling that the best use is not always being made of their taxes. This leads to more willingness to abuse the system.

I should like to leave that point by indicating that this willingness is caused by what appears to be a very unjust system which favours some groups in society at the expense of others, and by the recognition that one's tax money is not always going in what could be classed as a beneficiary direction. The end result is that it begins to stagger the mind. How many revisions can there be to the Income Tax Act? How thick can that document get before the entire system breaks down?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I found the hon. member's comments most interesting. I think he raises a very serious problem of ethics in society. Obviously, people have to be satisfied that the tax system seeks to be as equitable as possible, and I think this is a government concern. If we look, for instance, at the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance on October 28, 1980, it states, on page 15, and I quote:

[English]

We will only maintain a good tax system, however, if we keep on looking for ways to make it better. I am particularly concerned to ensure that the tax system is fair and is seen to be fair.

[Translation]

And it goes on. I think the hon. member raises an important point. People must be able to see the inherent fairness of the tax system. It is important and a concern which was indicated in the budget. The hon. member also raised the question of the use of the taxes paid by the taxpayers. That is also another very important aspect to consider. If, as a citizen, I get the impression that my government is wasting my tax dollars, I will start wondering and automatically I will think that I am paying too much tax and I will therefore conclude that there is no way out because they take the taxpayers' money and spend it foolishly.

I think it becomes increasingly important to inform people concerning the various government programs. However, a government which tells the public what the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is doing in a given area, how many dollars the Department of National Health and Welfare is contributing to the health fund of a province, is always running the risk of being accused of resorting to propaganda, even partisan propaganda. I do not think it is right to say that.

I think governments should do more to inform the taxpayers about the use that is made of public funds, precisely to meet the objective mentioned, namely, let people know how their money is spent, so that they may go on trusting the taxation system, the way their money is spent and have a more moral conduct and stricter ethics when it comes to filing their income tax returns. I agree completely with what the hon. member has said.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 73—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix) moved:

That Subclause 73(1) of Bill C-54 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 3 to 7 on page 147 and substituting the following therefor:

"the end of paragraph (c) thereof and by adding immediately after paragraph (d) thereof, the following paragraphs:"

(b) by striking out line 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion 13(7.1), and

(d.2) an amount equal to 50 per cent of the aggregate of all amounts each of which is the capital cost to him of certified property acquired by him in any of the 5 immediately preceding taxation years, determined without reference to subsection 13(7.1)"

Mr. Knowles: Explain!

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I do not want to prevent the hon. member who has just risen from speaking, but it has been indicated earlier. The number of copies of the amendment is limited. Perhaps I could briefly explain the amendment.

The amendment, like the clause, deals with the 50 per cent investment tax credit, and this technical amendment is an improvement which allows the investment tax credits to be aggregated during the five following years and deducted completely or in part from the taxes which become payable. This is a technical amendment which makes the full amount of the investment tax credit on certified property available to the taxpayer.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, the New Democratic Party has some real concerns when the government introduces this type of motion. It is our concern that when you switch from direct grants to tax breaks you are really not hitting the target at which you might be aiming. For one thing there is no proof that the organizations or corporations receiving these tax breaks really need them in order to develop in a particular region of the country. One of the problems we face in this vein is that the allowance became effective October 28, the night of the budget speech. If it were really an incentive to bring in corporations to some of the depressed areas of Canada then I believe it is something which should come into effect six, eight or 12 months down the road.

In fact what happened is that the companies which had already decided to build in a certain area were actually building on the night of the budget. All of a sudden they get a tax loophole which will enable them to gain a fair amount of money through tax savings, which they had not planned on.

Second, there is an area of concern related to the fact that there is no proof these corporations actually need the money. Any organization which fits the criteria, as specified, will receive the advantages of this tax rip-off. I am concerned that this program was not really being undertaken for industrial development, although I think some of the people behind it have good motives. In fact, though, it will end up as a tax rip-off.

I am also concerned that by using the corporate tax allowance rather than the method of direct grants, as is done under RDIA, then it gets away from public scrutiny. At the present time, if a grant is given there is a public announcement by the minister or departmental official who gets in front of the media showing off the cheque. But under this program the taxpayers of Canada will not know what is happening.

If the real goal is to develop more jobs in the depressed areas and to create more economic development, then I would like to ask the minister why the government did not increase the funding of the RDIA instead of creating this tax rip-off.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised by the strong language used by the hon. member. I do not think this legislation deserves the words he used. Obviously, the merits of various provisions, particularly those dealing with tax credits, can be discussed at length. The hon. member even went as far as to relate the concept of tax credit to that of tax evasion. I would not go that far. There are several schools of thought. Many people find that subsidies paid directly to this kind of businesses are more advisable because it is easier to determine the aim and scope of such subsidies, while others believe it is better to use tax credits because, according to them, they are less costly to administer, there are fewer forms to be completed, and so on. So, I believe there are several schools of thought. It may be questionable, but I think there are pros and cons. This provision designed to grant a tax credit to those businesses which plan to invest in specific areas is an important measure, in my view. It will enable some businesses to get started in those areas. First of all, it is very generous. I agree with the hon. member that, being very generous, it will enable some businesses to get started in areas where they would never have gone without the assistance of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, or even other federal or provincial programs available.

I know several of these regions, for instance the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula to which this provision will apply. Without such a generous assistance and even with it, I am not sure too many businesses will go and invest in these areas and that unemployment rates in the Gaspé peninsula will go down from 25 per cent to 10 per cent overnight, as the hon. member for Rimouski has indicated. I suggest that even with such a generous provision, we will not promote huge investments in these remote regions and improve job opportunities as well as the economic situation. I think that in a philosophical discussion on the nature of this measure, considering other programs in some respects, I might agree with the hon. member. However, we must always consider the specific situation and circumstances under which this provision was made. When applied, this generous provision is totally justified and, as I said earlier, I am not sure it will generate enough jobs to improve the social fabric in affected areas.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, if it is agreeable to you what I would like to do now is go through a number of different points. I hope the minister will have a chance to reply to them. He accused me of violence in my original presentation. I really do not think that is the situation. I am expressing a concern of our party, which is also a concern of a number of Canadians with regard to this particular measure. I will give some reasons for my concern.

● (1720)

The present Regional Development Incentives Act is biased toward large corporations. This measure will only accelerate that bias. The deputy minister of regional economic expansion provided me with some figures last year which indicate the type of problem to which I have referred. For the fiscal year 1979-80, $21.5 million under the RDIA went to what he called small corporations or organizations, which produced 4,680 jobs. I asked the deputy minister what large corporations received. He indicated that large corporations received $72.3 million and created 4,690 jobs. In other words, for another $51 million of Canadian taxpayers' money, ten more jobs were created.

I am aware of the argument that large corporations may create more jobs in the long term. However, I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap when he says that small businesses can create just as many jobs down the road. The only figures which we can rely upon are those which indicate what was produced. I am worried about the present RDIA and that the criteria used under the RDIA were used in the formulation of this tax measure as well.

We are concerned about whether the government knows what it is doing. Does the minister have an estimate of the number of jobs which will be created by this program and of the cost of the program to the taxpayers? In light of the information which I just gave to the minister on how the money under the present RDIA is being distributed, does the minister know how much money will go to large corporations and how much will go to small corporations? If the government is prepared to go forward with this program, we hope that it has these estimates.

I am also concerned about the fact that this particular clause was formulated with the assistance of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Does this mean that in future this will be the road taken by DREE, or can the government guarantee that there will be no cut in the funding by that particular department? I am concerned for companies such as SYSCO which need money but which do not qualify for money under this proposed program. When these companies need government assistance and that assistance cannot be provided through other programs, what will happen?

We foresee other problems with regard to this program. Although the map provided designates large parts of the country as being eligible under the program, if one looks at the criteria for a project to qualify, one will find that large portions of the areas designated do not benefit from the program. For example, projects in fishing and logging are excluded in certain areas. If these basic resource industries are excluded in a region where they are the major economic input, how will that region benefit from the program?

I wrote a letter to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion with regard to this program. He said in his reply that the DREE officials in Winnipeg had informed him that only Fire firms in the Churchill constituency had received development incentives since 1969. This fact, he said, supported my point that the criteria are too strict for many northern residents. The area of the province which is designated under this program is the northern region. In order to qualify for this program one must meet the criteria of the RDIA, which has given only five corporations in my riding any money at all, and the amounts given were very small. Perhaps the minister could answer those questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, first I would like to reassure the hon. member by saying that it is not at all a new way for the government to promote regional economic development. I think that the basic objectives of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion remain unchanged and still represent government philosophy.

I find the odd contradiction in the remarks of the hon. member. To begin with, he is afraid that the measure will turn out to be a financial bottomless pit and he says that major companies will stand to benefit, as in the case of other government programs. According to him, a glance at the map is enough to be convinced that a large part of the country will be eligible under this measure. But then he adds that, for instance, it does not apply to forest or mineral resources, etc. I would like to indicate to him that certain investment sectors are ruled out precisely because in such regions those investment sectors fall within the investment field of large companies. As an example, mineral or forest resources seldom require very enticing incentives for investors. What we do want, however, is that at Causapscal, Saint-Charles-de-Caplan or Grande-Entrée in the Magdalen Islands, we can have small businesses benefit from a generous tax credit to create local employment. For instance, we do not necessarily want to offer very generous tax credits to a large forest company which might be anxious to set up shop in the Matapédia valley. That is not the purpose of the measure and that explains the restriction. I hope this will allay the fears of the hon. member who does not want this to turn into a tax loophole or a financial bottomless pit.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Would the minister answer my specific question with regard to estimates on the number of jobs which will be created, where these jobs will be created, and the cost of the program?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to say how many jobs will be created with this investment tax credit, because we do not know how many applications will be received, of what type they will be, from what kind of businesses, and what they do. So it is hard to say until the program has been put to the test and implemented for a while, just where, in what regions it will create so many jobs, cost so much, judging by the number of applications, and so on. Unfortunately we cannot provide figures until the program has been tested for a while.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak on specific problems which concern my constituency. Earlier I mentioned that the only part of Manitoba included in this particular program was the northern area. The designated boundaries are almost the same boundaries which exist for the federal Churchill constituency. The one exception is the city of Thompson. This exclusion creates a problem with regard to industrial development under the criteria mentioned earlier. If there are to be any jobs created from this program in the north, they will probably be created in the larger communities. Thompson is the largest community in the north.

● (1730)

We have high unemployment in northern Manitoba among both the white and the native communities. We have a lot of one-industry towns in the north, but because the criteria the government settled on exclude the community of Thompson, the community where the development will most likely take place, the program in itself will probably not benefit the north.

My question for the minister is this: what process will be used to change the areas of the country that are designated? It is not set out in the act. What process can be used to change those areas?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, throughout the debate, various members—for instance our own member for Rimouski-Témiscouata and the hon. member himself—have questioned this dividing into regions and especially the fact that certain cities have been excluded. The hon. member spoke of his own town of Thompson. The hon. member for Rimouski-Témiscouata a few days ago mentioned Rimouski and another member intervened on behalf of another town. I would like to indicate that regulation provides that the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion may, on reasonable grounds, recommend certain changes within this general category as to areas that could qualify. But I would also like to indicate that the stronger, more prosperous and populous a city is, the more chances it has of attracting and generating investment.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, the government quite often uses figures for different types of programs. It talks about solid communities and all the rest of it. The point is, however, Thompson is excluded. The minister, on request from myself and on request from the city council of Thompson, has denied any change in his plans. He has denied Thompson the right to benefit from this program. But I would point out to the minister that Thompson's population has decreased by 5,000 in the last three years. It is not a solid economic community at this time. Inco still operates there, but at a much reduced rate. The government asks what the unemployment figures are for the city of Thompson. What is the average income in Thompson? Yes, salaries are high; unemployment is low. But the government has not looked at what has happened in that community over the last couple of years.

That brings me to my last comment, that what is happening with RDIA, what is happening with this tax incentive program, what is happening with a lot of other programs which are provided by the federal government, is basically ad hockery. We have a program here and a program there. We have a program which will suit some native people and we have another program to suit other groups. We have all sorts of programs. But my constituency office receives requests from many different groups who would like to benefit from regional economic expansion and from industry, trade and commerce. They would like to benefit also from this smorgasbord of government programs.

When I checked with the DREE office, the answer given was: "No, you do not qualify." If you check with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, he says "No, you do not qualify." That is the problem with this government. The Minister of Employment and Immigration, after this tax incentive was announced, ran to the press in northern Manitoba and said, "You are all going to benefit". Yet the minister of DREE points out that only five grants have been given to northern Manitoba in the last 11 years. And the minister who thinks he is somehow responsible for all of Manitoba thinks it is a great boom for the north. He really does not know.

The problem, of course, is that the government does not know what it is doing half of the time. The minister has just told us that he does not know how this program will be received. He does not know whether it will bring a lot of jobs. All we hear is, "We do not know this. We do not know that." I can understand that. I don't think anyone or any party is perfect, whether it be our party, the minister's party, or any other party. But I am concerned about the real lack of planning by the government.

The government does have a smorgasbord approach to development. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion prefers to call each of these smorgasbord programs another arrow in his arsenal. What it means is a hit and miss situation. You might have an arrow for this or that. I can tell you that some of the native people in my constituency have an arrow for you.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 73, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 74 agreed to.

On Clause 75—

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, I am not absolutely certain this intervention should be on Clause 75. In a bill of 225 pages it is hard for someone who is not a tax lawyer to find his way around it.

My question deals with deducting tax at source for commissioned salesmen, with particular reference to those who may have accepted the blandishments of the government and gone into MURB or oil drilling deferral schemes. If you take a commissioned salesman, for example, we all know his difficulty of the ups and downs of monthly income. If he has his tax deducted at source, he may have one large deduction and then have several dry months. He may find himself in difficulty because he has sent his money into the government. However, the situation gets even worse if he has invested in a MURB or in an oil drilling deferral scheme. In that case he has to pay taxes on a monthly basis. Say he pays $60,000 in taxes a year, so he pays $5,000 each month. But his MURB and his deferral plan will bring back a fair proportion of that to him. This is at the behest of the government. The government has asked people to invest in these plans. When the money comes back a year later, it comes without any interest. The government will have it for over a year before it is back in the taxpayer's power for him to get interest on it.

Has the government considered this is really borrowing money from that taxpayer without paying any interest? Would the government consider providing an exemption certificate, or something like that, so that if the individual has invested in a MURB or in an oil drilling deferral plan he can show that evidence and see some of his returns for investing—which the government asked him to do—before some 15 to 18 months have gone by?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I think the problem raised by the hon. member could apply in the case of commissioned salesmen but also in other cases. If we followed up the hon. member's suggestion, it might be prejudicial to other taxpayers when they complete their tax return. They will pay the amount directly since it is deducted at the source. As for an investment in a MURB, for instance, which is a tax-saving device available to Canadian investors, such an investment would not exempt a taxpayer from paying income tax, even though by investing in a MURB, for instance, he might derive a tax benefit later on that would compensate the income tax he will not pay now. However, I believe that the implementation of such a measure would result in a certain element of distortion in relation to other taxpayers.

"(2) Paragraph 149(9)(a) of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) there may be deducted an amount not exceeding its income for the year computed without including or deducting any amount under this subsection; and"

(3) Subsection 149(10) of the said act is repealed.

(4) Subsection (1) is applicable to the 1972 and subsequent taxation years.

(5) Subsections (2) and (3) are applicable to taxation years commencing after October 28, 1980."

Mr. Knowles: Could the minister explain that amendment?

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, these two amendments are fiscal deductions for charitable organizations or any other tax exempt organizations. Those organizations must spend a certain percentage of their funds in one year, that is 90 per cent, and those changes will grant them a one-year deferment of income in calculating the percentage to be spent. Such is the purpose of those amendments.

Mr. Knowles: Do you understand?

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Certainly!

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, Clause 114 of the bill includes one of the amendments dealing with qualified investment in deferred income plans as, for instance, the registered retirement savings plan or the registered home ownership savings plan. This clause constitutes a reduction meant to mitigate the penalties imposed on deferred income plans with respect to some investments which do not qualify. Representations have been made by various groups to the effect that this provision in its present form is for the most part ineffective since it applies only to unit trusts and does not adequately indentify a certain number of plans to which it should apply. The amendment we propose reduces taxation on some trusts which comply with the criteria listed in the amendment which was read so brilliantly by the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe).

[English]

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 114, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 115 agreed to.

Clauses 116 to 120 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 121—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, if the hour were not so late I might have had quite a bit to say about Clause 121 because this is the clause of the bill on which the Minister of National Health and Welfare spoke at length when we were on second reading of the bill some time ago. My colleague from Broadview-Greenwood touched on the matter when we were dealing with Clause 40 of the bill, so I shall just flag the matter for further discussion when the Minister of National Health and Welfare brings in the legislation which she has indicated.

● (1750)

As I understand it, the purpose of Clause 121, which is to amend the Canada Pension Plan, is to provide that when one spouse pays a salary to another, let us say in the case of a husband paying a salary to his wife which is recognized under the Income Tax Act, that salary can count for Canada Pension Plan purposes. As my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, said yesterday, we do not object to this.

We welcome extensions or improvements in coverage under the Canada Pension Plan or under related legislation, but we insist that the government must not take the position that this is enough in terms of covering spouses who work in the home. Even if the government provides for this kind of payment to be allowed, and even if the government permits spouses who work in the home to make voluntary contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, that covers only a very small minority of the women in this country who at the present time are not covered by the Canada Pension Plan. As I have said, we can debate this matter more fully when we get to that other legislation.

I have to say to the present minister that when he says in this case and in other cases that this is just a step and the government cannot go all the distance at once, I hope that will not be the end of it. I heard him make a speech the other night to that effect which reminded me very much of Paul Martin, who used to put it in a different way. He used to say, "We cannot do everything overnight". The trouble with these things that cannot be done overnight is the fact that sometimes it takes ten, 20, 30 or 40 years. I have seen some legislation take that long to come.

In this very connection I point out that the introduction of the spouse's allowance was supposed to be just a step to help some of those between the ages of 60 and 65. We are still waiting for the other steps. That is my fear with this proposal regarding the Canada Pension Plan before us in this clause, that it is a step which may be taken but that we may have to wait a long time for the fulfilment of the idea that all women who work in the home should have recognition for the purposes of pension coverage.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, time is running short so I shall not extend this now, but I shall have more to say about it later.

However, while I am on my feet there is a word of tribute I should like to pay to a particular person, and I want to take a moment to make that tribute. We have just dealt with the Old Age Security Act. Let me say that back in 1950 when we had a special committee on old age security, which led to the Old Age Security Act, a tremendous contribution to the work of that committee was made by a distinguished public servant who was then the director of research in the Department of National Health and Welfare. His name was Dr. J. W. Willard.

When we got to the Canada Pension Plan in the middle 1960s that same Dr. Willard was the deputy minister of welfare in that department. Again his contribution was invaluable. Dr. Willard had been ill for some considerable time. He died a few days ago and, in fact, I believe the funeral service was held this afternoon. We do not have the occasion to note contributions made by all public servants who serve this country, but I believe a word does need to be said about Dr. Willard, and in praising the work he has done we recognize the good work done by so many of those who work for us in the public service of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, there are just two things I would like to say. I commend the government for adopting this measure from the previous budget of John Crosbie. This means a lot to women and men. There is one correction I should like to make. There are many other things I should like to say as well but time is short. The bill refers to "the employment of a person by his spouse." Sometimes the lady is the boss and the man is the spouse. I would suggest it should read "his or her spouse."

Mr. Knowles: The Interpretation Act covers that.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member wanted to join the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the comments he just made in this House. I would like also, on behalf of the government and on my own behalf, to offer my deepest sympathies to Dr. Willard's family. I enjoyed the privilege of working under him when I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and Dr. Willard was deputy minister of that department.

I should remind hon. members of his qualities, of his great simplicity and especially of his unending devotion to public service. I am convinced that Canada had in Dr. Willard a quite remarkable, albeit humble, servant of the people working away from the public's eye. He was of the utmost efficiency and usefulness to the numerous Canadians who were fortunate enough to benefit from his advice. He always worked in the best interest of Canadians anxious as he was to see implemented in this country the welfare and social programs introduced by the various governments through the years.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Bill reported as amended.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, as reported (with amendments) from Committee of the Whole, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask, or assume, that since there have been several amendments made to this bill in Committee of the Whole it will be reprinted showing those amendments?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): We will consider the suggestion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as seeking an order of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the grossly insufficient amount of funding available to meet current Farm Credit Corporation loan demands which is threatening the viability of thousands of farmers, particularly the young and those starting new operations, and given the failure of the government to respond in a positive way, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the minister take the necessary immediate steps to increase the level of funding of the Farm Credit Corporation by at least $150 million and to ensure that the lending rate not exceed the current level of 12.75 per cent.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DROUGHT ASSISTANCE

REQUEST NORTHERN ALBERTA REPRESENTATIVE BE APPOINTED ON REVIEW BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I would ask members to give serious consideration to passing this resolution unanimously.

Whereas the eight-member review board which oversees drought assistance programs such as the herd maintenance assistance and fodder procurement programs in drought-affected areas of Canada is currently comprised of two members from Manitoba, three from Saskatchewan, three from Ontario and one from southern Alberta, and whereas the province of Alberta, particularly the northern regions where the effects of drought are equally devastating and are so sorely under-represented on this board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately appoint a representative from northern Alberta to sit on the review board in order to correct this glaring inequity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CHINESE NEW YEAR

RECOGNITION OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF CANADIANS OF CHINESE DESCENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an urgent matter which I am sure will have unanimous support.

Today is the Chinese New Year, and it is the year of the rooster. I am told we must beware of this because the rooster is a loner, a deep thinker, he dreams a lot but takes no action, is sometimes disliked but never a bore. In honour of this day I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That this House recognizes the many contributions of Canadians of Chinese descent and wishes them and all Canadians good health, prosperity and happiness in the year of the rooster. "Gung Hai Fat Choy".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This motion contains good wishes which I am sure we all want to extend to the Chinese community, but I cannot accept it under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

LACK OF EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES IN NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the province of Nova Scotia.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) proceed, please.

S.O. 43

Mr. Crouse: Yes, Madam Speaker, as soon as we have a little order behind me.

Whereas the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) did not appear at a recent meeting of Atlantic provinces health ministers on an urgent matter respecting medicare, failed to make any announcement on the long overdue business plan for Sydney Steel, and has failed to date to support his colleague, the minister for DREE, on the urgent matter of approving construction of a new fish plant at Lockeport where over 305 people are unable to find work, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House calls upon the government and the Deputy Prime Minister to explain the obvious lack of priorities for our province and its economic future, while today before cabinet the question of a massive bail-out for Massey-Ferguson holds the spotlight, since this aid will benefit workers in other countries while our people in Sydney and Lockeport walk the streets for lack of employment opportunities.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMMUNICATIONS

FUNDS REQUIRED FOR MARKETING OF TELIDON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I too rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Canada is about to lose its world leadership role in the development of Telidon, our unique version of videotex technology, unless a few million dollars are provided by the federal government. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That this House directs the government to heed the warning of senior officials of the Department of Communications and supply the necessary funding of $24 million over the next two years so that the final research and marketing of Telidon can be completed, having as it does a potential for 100,000 new jobs by 1990.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

OPPOSITION TO DEPLOYMENT OF NEUTRON BOMB—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

On Tuesday of this week the United States Secretary of Defence announced that he was seriously considering the deployment of the neutron bomb. In light of the fact that this weapon's deployment would only serve to heighten East-West tension, and in light of the fact that the neutron bomb, a weapon that destroys people but leaves buildings and property unharmed, would increase the risk of all-out nuclear war, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House instructs the government to join with the government of The Netherlands, which yesterday voted to reject the deployment of the neutron bomb in western Europe, and, further, that this House instructs the government to communicate this country's grave concerns regarding this matter to the government of the United States.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED RCMP INVESTIGATION OF AUDITING PROCEDURES IN SASKATCHEWAN REGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas one Patrick Aimee McCaffrey of North Battleford, Saskatchewan, a former employee of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, has submitted a list to the RCMP of 65 names of persons allegedly involved in suspicious dealings with the department and, further, has alleged that two complete house packages and a full semi-trailer of building material destined for the Red Pheasant reserve have gone missing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately request the RCMP to conduct an investigation of the accounting and auditing procedures of the Saskatchewan region of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in order to determine whether there is any further evidence of theft or conversion and report their findings to this House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CABINET

SPEAKING ENGAGEMENTS OF MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, but somehow I doubt that my motion will receive unanimous support.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): In view of the fact that at least two cabinet ministers have been booed off public platforms as a result of a Prime Ministerial directive which gives marching orders that, under no circumstances, will cabinet ministers make speeches anywhere in this country to any group unless they lead off discussing the Constitution and energy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the chief puppeteer instruct the marionettes on the Treasury benches to stick to their portfolio responsibilities when they go out to speak to Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST HOUSE CONDEMN MINISTER'S ALLEGED ELECTORAL PROMISES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that again yesterday there were demonstrations in the Matapédia valley about the setting up of a paper mill, and since the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) would rather deal with development in Africa than in his own area where he was parachuted, of course, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That the House condemn the thoughtless and irresponsible election and referendum promises made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Madam Speaker: In order to be put, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

PROPOSED U.S. LINKS TO CANADIAN CITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. A private American corporation, Satellite Business Systems, has applied to the U.S. Federal Communications Commission for permission to link its transmission services to five major Canadian cities. The minister's own department has shown that trans-border data transmission will lead to re-centralization of control by multinationals over their subsidiaries and a consequent loss of jobs in Canada. The Clyne commission agrees.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That since the proposed service will require Canadian permission, the government refuses to grant authorization for further foreign intrusion which threatens Canada's independence and telecommunications future.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE PRIME MINISTER

SPEECH MADE IN BRANDON, MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last night in Brandon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in a desperate attempt to aggrandize his own shallow self-interest, insinuated that if Westminster, the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, seven Canadian premiers, the energy producing provinces, the editorial writers of Canada and the majority of Canadian citizens disagree with his policies, then the "Prime Minister must be doing something right".

In light of the fact that the Prime Minister has accomplished nothing except to postpone forever energy self-sufficiency for our country and to split our regions irrevocably with his constitutional proposals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this House condemns the statements made by the Prime Minister, which have only served to encourage alienation and force Canadians to seek an alternative to a centralist regionally dominated government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

DETAILS OF CONVERSATIONS WITH BRITISH MINISTERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the minister met British ministers last November 10 did he say that if Canada was forced to choose, "his government would drop patriation rather than the charter?"

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, on Tuesday afternoon the Prime Minister suggested the course of conduct which he would follow henceforth with respect to questioning of this kind. He asked us to observe the same rule, namely, that we would not henceforth discuss the details of our conversations or meetings with members of the British government. However, I would say that I stand by everything I have said in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: The whole course of conduct of the British government throughout these meetings shows that they are prepared to follow the undertaking which they have made, namely, to present, with their support, our resolution to the British Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, throughout this week and at other periods during this Parliament, we have suggested to the government that it would be better for them and better for Canada if they would tell the whole truth to the people of Canada about our Constitution instead of hiding facts from the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has backed away from saying publicly what he may well have said privately, which is that the priority of his government is to have another country change our rights and keep our Constitution. He declines to say that publicly, although there is very good evidence that he has said it privately.

May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, in that meeting on November 10, with British officials in Westminster, he said that the Government of Canada would seek to entrench a charter of rights, even if we were not seeking the patriation of our constitution?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I stand by my previous answer. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition appears to have obtained, in some manner or other, all of the documentation in this matter. If he wants it made public, he may make it public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister has now given his view that the documents on which I am basing my questions are documents which are official and do reflect the facts. That is the clear implication of what he has just said.

Let me ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs this: is it the policy of the Government of Canada, given a choice, that it would prefer having the entrenchment of the charter of rights to having our Constitution home? Is that the policy of the Government of Canada?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am not sure that question in those terms ought to be addressed to me. But I can say that I know of no discussions in cabinet on that point.

Mr. Lawrence: What do you discuss in cabinet?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Why will the Government of Canada not tell the Parliament of Canada what representations were made on behalf of Canada?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the government, through its government spokesman, has told Parliament and the country the substance of the whole course of dealings between our two governments. All that matters to this debate is on the public record. The opposition is trying to concentrate on details which are entirely out of context with the entire course of dealings.

There is simply no question, nor could there be a question, about the obligation of the British government in this matter, nor about the position which the Canadian Government is taking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INQUIRY WHETHER CONDITIONS WERE STIPULATED BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I want to relay to the minister that if it is details we are talking about, we are seeing whether those details are the truth as the minister is giving them.

Can the minister tell the House whether on November 10, 1980, he was told by Westminster that Westminster could not have Canadian constitutional proposals if those proposals were being challenged in the Supreme Court of Canada?

• (1420)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the position which the British government has taken is to respect the principle and their obligations; it is to raise questions about the manner of implementation, particularly with respect to timing. Matters which were raised in all of the discussions, which the opposition would like to see as negative elements, were always in the long run, and usually in the short run, put in a very positive context by the British government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask another question of the same minister, which is in reference to information from his own department. Mr. St. John-Stevas said:

This question of highest importance since British Parliament could not not proceed if matter before Canadian courts.

That is not what the minister has been saying. In view of that British statement is this the reason why the government will not refer to the Supreme Court of our own country the legality of what they are asking another country to do to our Constitution?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Manitoba given this week indicates that the Government of Canada has no cause to fear any reference to the courts in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Read the judgment.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the reason why we have not decided to make any such reference is, as the Prime Minister has said repeatedly, because this is a political matter. It is not primarily a legal matter.

ACTIONS OF BRITISH HIGH COMMISSIONER IN CANADA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION AND RESPONSE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I preface my question with the observation that there is no doubt in our minds that the British government and the official opposition in Great Britain have taken the correct constitutional position on this matter, namely, that they should not change a comma or a semi-colon of a resolution which comes from the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are even beginning to sound like a Liberal!

Mr. Broadbent: The Colonel Blimps to my right may take a different colonial position, but that is the position of my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, my question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Can we get back to the questions?

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it is obvious that Margaret Thatcher's "presence" in their caucus yesterday caused them a little trouble.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Quite seriously, I would like to ask the minister, given the responsible position taken by the government of Great Britain and their official opposition, is he aware that the British High Commissioner to Canada has directly attempted to influence Canadian Members of Parliament, and other Canadians, on this important Canadian internal matter?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have had some reports of that nature.

An hon. Member: What did you do about it?

Mr. MacGuigan: If they were true, I might say that such conduct would, of course, be doing a great disservice to the government of the United Kingdom. It would be conduct completely unacceptable to this government. As the Leader of the New Democratic Party knows, among other incidents reported have been those involving some Members of Parliament including, I think I might say, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I am in the process of investigating these reports and considering what action should be taken, if any.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear that the minister is investigating this inappropriate activity.

● (1425)

Would the minister tell hon. members at what point the House of Commons may expect a full report on these serious allegations?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, because of the seriousness of the matter I would not, and I am sure that the government would not wish to act precipitously. It will probably take us some days to investigate and to decide on the best course of action.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, to be perfectly clear, if the minister finds that the British High Commissioner has in fact attempted to influence members of the House of Commons as well as, I understand, other Canadians, on an essentially internal affair, will he file a protest in the strongest possible terms with the British High Commissioner pointing out that the activity which he has undertaken is in flat contradiction to the commitments which his own government made in Great Britain?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, such conduct, if true, would not indeed represent the policy of the government of the United Kingdom. Certainly the course of action suggested by the hon. member would be one of the alternatives considered.

Oral Questions

INQUIRY WHETHER TIME FACTOR MENTIONED BY BRITISH REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, it is clear that the NDP has now declared itself a colony of the Liberal Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: My question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who on Sunday made the following statement on Canadian television:

There's never been a problem with the British government on the issue of principle. They accept this principle entirely. The only question they have ever raised with us is the question of timing.

How does the Secretary of State for External Affairs square that statement with the Canadian minutes of the meeting with the British held on November 10, which indicate that the British opened the meeting by:

—saying that passage at Westminster dependent on how soon measure reaches London and what it contains.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as I said earlier, I do not propose to comment on the details of whatever records hon. members opposite think they have. But I will say that the record as a whole clearly sustains the positions which we on this side have enunciated.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, there is certainly a three-line whip here, and the Prime Minister has imposed it on the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister not feel that having made this statement to the Canadian people on nation-wide television on Sunday—in which he said, in effect, that there has never been disagreement on the issue of principle—he has a responsibility to justify it, in view of the documents of the Canadian government which indicate that his statement is flatly untrue?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman is quite in error. As I indicated in the House on Tuesday, we have received some half dozen confirmations from members of the British government, including Prime Minister Thatcher, of their acceptance of the principle involved. There has never been any question of the principle in the discussions with any representative in the British government. The discussions have been about the subsidiary matters, the timing and how they are to handle their backbenchers.

COURT ACTION BY PROVINCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On November 10 the minister told Mr. Stevas that the legal proceedings initiated by the provinces were essentially a delaying tactic. Is the minister accusing the provinces in his representation to the British government of an abuse of legal process? How could the minister do such a thing, considering that he was once a dean of law and understands the right of provinces and of any individual in this country to appeal to the courts for decisions and relief?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member is also a lawyer, he might wish to read the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, which essentially takes the position that there is no legal dispute involved. That is exactly the position taken by the Government of Canada.

● (1430)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I take it from the answer the minister gave that he does consider the legal proceedings to be an abuse of the legal process and that is his response.

PROPOSALS MADE TO PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. I can understand the Leader of the New Democratic Party wanting to wrap another blanket around himself and the Liberal Party, especially in view of the fact that today the government of Saskatchewan has come out in opposition to the constitutional package. What was proposed to the province of Saskatchewan? What did it turn down? Would the minister now give the details, in view of the fact that the provincial attorney general has indicated the opposition of that provincial government to the package and has criticized the Minister of Justice for not making a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: What about Ontario and New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, during the course of this long investigation by the House of Commons in the committee, I have talked to a lot of the attorneys general. They have called me and discussed many aspects of this resolution that is about to be voted upon by the House of Commons and the Senate. Some of them made suggestions, and some asked questions. I had that kind of discussion with Mr. Romanow and he can make up his mind when we have finished, whether he accepts it or not. Our position is well known, that we were to patriate the Constitution, that we were to give a mechanism for an amending formula and, at long last, the great desire of John Diefenbaker to have a charter of rights in the Canadian Constitution will be realized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: What about property rights?

Mr. Clark: Why did you vote against it?

SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

INQUIRY RESPECTING REDUCTION IN FUNDING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Several days ago the minister announced the details of the summer employment program for students. Given that this year's employment situation is much worse than it was a year ago, would the minister explain why his employment program for students for this summer will offer $20 million less than the same program last year?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member made one mistake. The rate of unemployment for this year is identical to what it was last year at the same time, so that the premise upon which the question is based is not accurate. I would ask the hon. member to look at the entire announcement. We indicated that we were putting $59 million into a new program to deal with the employment problems faced by the disabled as well as those faced by the chronically unemployed, many of whom are young people. Our objective is to allocate our resources to try to find long-term jobs in the private sector for young people so that they can have a permanent job record and not just rely upon temporary summer employment.

Mr. Orlikow: I wish to ask a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The minister announced about two weeks ago his program for the employment of handicapped people. Most of us thought it was a good program. It is now obvious that what the minister has given with one hand, he has taken away with the other. Given the fact that we have continuing announcements of further plant closures and lay-offs, so that the unemployment situation this summer will undoubtedly be worse than it was last year, would the minister reconsider his proposals and bring forth more money for employment programs for students in the coming summer?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, we are always prepared to review programs and to try to make sure we are doing the best thing. I go back to the basic philosophy that we are trying to adopt, which is to use our very scarce resources in the most effective manner, that is, to target upon those who have the most difficult employment problems. It certainly is our judgment that where we should focus is upon those who have high levels of unemployment in the regions where jobs are scarce, and that in many cases we should apply that money to deal with the problems of the disabled and, on the general level of youth employment, let the general market take care of it with the stimulation of the economy that was so graciously provided by my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC CONCERNING HEATING SYSTEM CONVERSION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When the budget and the new energy policy were introduced, grants up to $800, or 50 per cent of the costs of heating system conversions such as from oil to electricity, were to be provided. Many Canadians are wondering what progress is being made in the discussions with the Quebec government and Hydro-Quebec, as they are apparently unwilling to go along with this proposal and could therefore deprive Quebecers, who are of course Canadians, of this grant. Can the minister tell us how his discussions in this regard are progressing?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I should like to report to the House and the hon. member that I met with the Quebec energy minister, Mr. Bérubé, last Tuesday, and that we discussed this specific issue. Mr. Bérubé told me that he intends to send us an official notice of the decision made by the Quebec government in this regard in the very near future. I believe that this will be a matter of days rather than weeks or months. As soon as I know the Quebec government's decision in this regard, I shall be happy to inform my colleague and the House of the results of the consultations now going on with the Quebec government. In any event, we are looking forward to the time when this program is available to all Quebecers.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER TERMS BEING FULFILLED

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. The signed contract between McDonnell Douglas and the Canadian government at Schedule A, Table 1, shows as a "firm commitment" new work on DC-9s, super 80s, DC-10 stretch, and KC-10s in the amount of $83 million for each of 1980 and 1981. This is the kind of work that could be done at the McDonnell Douglas plant in Mississauga where hundreds of workers have been laid off. Has this firm commitment, particularly for 1980, been fulfilled and, if not, why not?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman is aware that some questions were asked in the House recently relating to the lay-offs in Malton at McDonnell Douglas affecting about 700 employees. I have been made aware of that, as has the whole House. It is the result of a slowdown, a softening of the market, for the civilian aircraft that the hon. gentleman has described. Effectively that has had a negative impact on the offset program as it affects those particular components.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Another section of the same contract calls for a progress review at Milestone 6 on January 7 this year. A payment of over $11 million to McDonnell Douglas was also due on January 7, and one would presume it was contingent upon the progress review. Is the fulfilling of the $83 million firm commitment not a prerequisite to passing the progress review? Could the minister tell us if he has paid the $11 million?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to advise the hon. gentleman if the specific commitment relating to the KC-10 and the DC-10 in terms of the time-frame envisaged by Milestone 6 would entitle the full payment at that particular time. I will review the question of whether the payment has been made, and advise the hon. gentleman. I will advise him as well about the conditions that were met. I can tell the hon. gentleman that, to the best of my knowledge, the payments that have been made are in accordance with the terms of the contract and the strict enforcement of those terms.

PUBLIC SERVICE

THREAT OF UNION SUSPENSION FOR EMPLOYEES WHO IGNORED STRIKE CALL

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. During the federal clerks' strike last year, many non-designated CRs continued to attend their jobs. A number of these people are now being reprimanded by disciplinary committees of some union locals and have been threatened with suspension from the union. Is the minister aware of this? Could he tell me what protection an employee has if the threat of union membership suspension becomes a fact?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I would be most distressed to think that those CRs who fulfilled their legal obligations to the employer, namely, the Government of Canada, during the period of the strike, are being disciplined in this fashion by the unions. That has not been brought to my attention and I would be most concerned if that is the case. They are our employees, obviously. I should like to have any additional information the hon. gentleman has with respect to this brought to my attention.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, the reprimand is in the form of a letter which states as follows:

> The Union executive would recommend the strongest disciplinary action against those non-designated CRs who did not fully take part in the strike.

It goes on to say:

> A substantial contribution to the strike fund would cause the executive to review the member's case.

It gives seven days for a response in writing to the discipline committee, asks that the reply be marked private and confidential, and gives the address. Finally, it says to make all cheques payable to local 627. What protection does the government have for employees who are threatened with this type of blackmail and extortion?

● (1440)

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I will take the hon. member's question and concern under consideration. This is the first time this has been brought to my attention. As I say, these people are employees of the Government of Canada. The letter the hon. member refers to is counselling or would appear to counsel illegal activities on the part of those employees who honour their obligations to us.

SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

LACK OF ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister recently announced the new summer youth employment program. Will the minister tell us why, to date, this new program has not been advertised, and why, according to his own officials, there are no plans for an advertising campaign for this youth program until at least the first week in March? With a deadline date for applications of March 16, does he consider the approximate two-week notice to young people adequate, or is he really hoping that by delaying the advertising he will not have to bother with as many applications, considering that his own figures indicate the number of jobs have decreased by some 30,000?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the program for summer youth employment is one that has been brought forward by this government over several summers. It is well known to the students and to the educational system. It has certainly been our experience that there does not have to be a massive advertising campaign in order to generate response. In fact we already have a number of responses. As the hon. member well knows, information is being supplied through a number of employment centres in existence in the universities and community colleges. The program is already generating a high degree of response.

As the hon. member also knows, we made a revision to the program this year to put even more responsibility on the local Member of Parliament by again asking the member to undertake local reviews of these projects and provide for some management administration and certainly information development for these programs. Therefore we have no reservations at all, knowing that it is a well-known program which will be widely used. We request the co-operation of the hon. member and other hon. members to make sure that the judgment on the wide range of applications is judiciously done.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, this has to be the first government program where Members of Parliament are being asked to do the advertising. It is ridiculous. My supplementary question is to the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the minister responsible for government advertising. Can the minister tell us just what priority he has assigned to the advertising of the summer youth employment program and how he determines which issues warrant adequate advertising, if not those that will affect a very large, young and unemployed portion of the population?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will draw that question to the attention of the responsible minister so that he can give an answer in the detail the question deserves and the hon. member would like to have.

SHIPBUILDING

BUILDING OF VESSELS FOR USE IN ENERGY EXPLORATION IN BEAUFORT SEA

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Dome Petroleum, which the minister has extolled as a Canadian company, intends to construct a large barge for its exploration efforts in the Beaufort Sea. Although Dome originally approached a Vancouver shipyard which has the capacity and the manpower to do this, it now appears Dome will have this craft built in Singapore, with a resultant loss of some 150 jobs in Vancouver. In addition, a ship was recently built for Dome in Louisiana for use in the Beaufort Sea, which resulted in the loss of about 50 more jobs. Will the minister inquire into these allegations and demand that Dome build these vessels in Canada so that Canadian workers and Canadian shipbuilders will obtain the benefits of development of our Arctic resources? Will he also confirm that Canadian tax dollars are being used to subsidize the construction of vessels built in foreign countries?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will certainly bring the point raised by the hon. member to the attention of Dome Petroleum. I was advised by Dome that they intended to have some of their vessels built in British Columbia. I will inquire about the most recent allegation by the hon. member, but I wish to inform her that, to my knowledge, there is no subsidy for having ships built abroad.

Mrs. Mitchell: In view of the tremendous potential there is in the Arctic and northern Canada for development of advanced Canadian technology in the resource and maritime industries, and the fact that this potential is in danger of being taken over by foreign interests if we do not get a move on, what steps are the minister and his government taking to develop an industrial strategy related to the development of northern resources, energy in particular? What research and development funds are being invested? Also, what plans and programs are under way to retrain Canadians so that we do not have to import foreign skilled labour?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am happy the hon. member has raised this very important question. As she knows, there is now a bill before a parliamentary committee of this House, Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act, which gives the minister authority to impose very strict working conditions on the oil industry on Canada lands. This will mean the right to insist on Canadian ownership, Canadian services and equipment, and also the employment of Canadians. This bill is before the House. I hope it will be passed very soon so that we will be in a position to impose those conditions upon those who are benefiting from the exploitation of resources on Canada lands.

INCOME TAX

CHILD CARE EXPENSES—REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO ALLOW FATHERS TO CLAIM DEDUCTION

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The Federal Court of Canada ruled that, for income tax purposes, a father cannot claim a deduction for child care expenses. This is the ratio for the Gillespie case. As the minister knows, under the Income Tax Act the mother and not the father is irrevocably assumed to have custody of a child. Will the minister consider an amendment to the Income Tax Act whereby, if the father pays for child care expenses and has receipts for them, he can claim a deduction from his income tax?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. We are now applying the law on the basis of the way it stands, that is, if the father is to claim a deduction for the children he must show proof that he has had a divorce or a legal separation. Otherwise the custody is in the mother's name and she claims the deduction. Of course, amendments to the Income Tax Act come under the purview of my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY RESPECTING OIL CONSUMPTION TAX

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. On page 50 of the budget papers it is stated that the Canadian ownership accounts to be set up by the government will tax Canadian oil consumption up to $4 per barrel. This amounts to $2.7 billion per year. Can the minister confirm that when this tax is imposed up to $2.7 billion could leave the country each year to help pay for nationalizing the oil industry?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, I could not confirm that. It is a limit that is placed upon a proposed ownership charge, and the ownership charge that might arise from acquisition of Petrofina has not yet been determined. That will be known only when the final financial details are available. Certainly it is not the intention to require that sum of money to make this particular acquisition.

Mr. Wright: I did not say it would. I asked could it. There is a difference. Given that the $2.7 billion is provided from the budget, and given interest rates at the time of the budget, can the minister confirm that the government is prepared to pay up to $16 billion for the purchase of foreign-controlled Canadian oil companies? If he does not agree with that figure, what is the figure the government has determined?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Madam Speaker, I could not agree with that conclusion of the hon. member. A decision has been taken to make one acquisition. The cost to the taxpayers is not yet determined, but there will be a cost. One would only reach the sums of money the hon. member mentions by major additional acquisitions, and no decisions have been reached on that matter as of today.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

TRAVEL CONTRIBUTIONS TO CANADIAN UNIVERSITIES

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for your recognition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: My question is for the minister responsible for physical fitness and amateur sports. Since he took the fitness test he has not been able to get into the House, so I will direct the question to his parliamentary secretary. This is his great chance.

My question deals with a communiqué issued by the minister and has to do with travel contributions to Canadian universities. It stated that this is a "new federal assistance program". How can the minister justify calling this assistance program new when Canadian universities received grants in the 1978-79 athletic year from the federal government, and in the 1979-80 athletic year as well? Since these grants were originally on a trial basis and not intended to be perpetual, does this mean that these grants are now part of a permanent program, and since Simon Fraser—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: I want to make sure you are going to become a good minister so I will give you another couple, because she is liable to cut me off.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member is disappointing me after my recognizing him, but he is liable to get cut off if he does not come to his question.

Mr. Paproski: What is the amount being given to each of these conferences within the CIAU and to Simon Fraser for the athletic year 1980-81 out of the total grant?

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I should like to tell him that I will endeavour to obtain the statistics he is asking for, and as soon as I have them I can assure him he will be the first to know.

ENERGY

FORECAST OF REDUCTION IN CASH FLOWS OF OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I will attempt to be brief. I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Bell, vice-president of PetroCan, is reported in the Toronto Star to have made the statement that cash flows of the oil companies of Canada this year would be reduced by 25 per cent from that of last year. Does the minister agree with Mr. Bell's statements and, if he does not, will he give us some figures that I am sure his department must have?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, before agreeing or disagreeing I should like to read Mr. Bell's statement. I have not read that statement, but I would be happy to read it and comment to the hon. member.

DIFFERENCE IN ESTIMATES OF OIL COMPANY CASH FLOWS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I am sure that someone from Petro-Canada must consult with the minister occasionally before making statements. I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

In reply to a question by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, the Minister of Finance said in this House that the cash flow of the oil companies of Canada this year would be up 28 per cent. How does he balance that with the statement made by Mr. Bell in the Toronto Star that it will be reduced by 25 per cent this year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not seen Mr. Bell's estimate. I would have to see it and examine the comparative statistics in order to reach a conclusion. I still stand by what I said in the House.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROVISION OF HEALTH CARE SERVICES UNDER JAMES BAY AGREEMENT

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

As the guardian of the James Bay settlement which was entrenched in an act of Parliament, and since the minister has an obligation to ensure that services under that act are in fact given to the native people of that region, and since court actions are now showing that in fact that is not the case, how can the minister secure settlements with other natives in other regions of this country when they cannot even trust the legislation passed in the last few years?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I have gone into this in a fairly extensive way, certainly with Charlie Watt of the Inuit and Billy Diamond of the Cree, who were involved in the James Bay settlement. Might I say that we are concerned in a back-up way to ensure that health services under the agreement are provided in this area. The court action is now pending and it very much involves the whole question of whether or not Quebec has been providing adequate health services. In addition, the court will deal with the claim of Quebec that it has endeavoured to, but has been impeded from doing so. When questions like this are before the courts I do not think either the hon. member or I should go any further in commenting until the matter has been concluded in the courts.

Mr. Schellenberger: Madam Speaker, Parliament needs assurance that the agreement is being upheld. Will the minister tell us why the government has so far ignored Section 10 of the act which states clearly that yearly reports are to be submitted to this Parliament? Those reports have not been submitted for the past three years. Can the minister state why that is the case?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, I am well aware of that, and I am taking action. I might indicate that while the hon. member is offering this indictment he is also including his own administration of about ten or 11 months ago. Certainly I have asked for speed in respect of this matter and I hope to correct that very shortly, indeed. I would reiterate that once these court decisions are determined and the court has made a ruling, if it has identified areas of federal responsibility in which we have been deficient we will take action to correct it.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SIGNS

COST OF IDENTIFICATION PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services. It is my understanding that it is the intention of the government by the end of March, 1982, to spend in the vicinity of an additional $4.4 million on alterations to already existing federal government signs across the country, in addition to the $1 billion which has already been spent. I understand that the word "Canada" and a small Canadian flag over the last "a" in the word is to be added to the signs. Can the minister tell the members of this House whether this information is accurate and, if it is, does he not think the government could find a more useful way to spend such an enormous amount of Canadian taxpayers' money, particularly in light of the severe economic difficulties facing the government and the country?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Quite to the contrary, Madam Speaker, I feel the investment is one that is required, and one that all members of this House undoubtedly support except, evidently, from his comment, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. The Canada word mark is part of the federal identity program and is much desired at this very crucial time in our history.

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, is the minister telling members of the House that, in the opinion of his government, this Canada word mark project deserves priority status? The government certainly must be having difficulties in finding ways to spend the money. Is that what he is telling us?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, the Canada word mark, and the decal, which is made available in order to affix that decal on all government rolling stock, on all government equipment and hardware that is able to take the decal, are in effect a very sound and very good program and investment. It is not a question of priorizing it over expenditures. It is part of the government's ongoing programs, and its priority is equal to that of other expenditures which are being made in the normal course.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, following the agreements I was talking about yesterday, this is the third one:

That no more than one additional member from each party shall speak in the debate at the second reading stage of Bill C-24, to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces;

That, after the said members have spoken, the question shall be put and, if carried, the bill shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole;

That no debate shall be permitted at any stage after the second reading stage of the said bill, provided that the House or the Committee of the Whole shall be permitted to divide on any motion or clause related to the said bill;

That immediately the bill is reported from Committee of the Whole, notwithstanding any Standing Order, all questions necessary for the disposal of the report stage and third reading stage of the said bill shall be put forthwith and successively;

That a special committee to be composed of seven members to be named at a later date be appointed to act as a parliamentary task force on the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, to report no later than June 26, 1981, in order that its views may be considered in the negotiations with provinces leading to new arrangements to begin with the 1982-83 fiscal year;

That the committee examine the programs authorized by the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977, focussing, in particular, on fiscal equalization, the tax collection agreements, the Canada Assistance Plan, and Established Programs Financing; and that this examination take place within the context of the government's expenditure plan as set out in the October 28, 1980 budget;

That the committee shall have all of the powers given to standing committees by Section (8) of Standing Order 65;

That the committee have the power to retain the services of expert, professional, technical and clerical staff as may be deemed necessary;

That the provisions of sections (4) and (9) of Standing Order 65 be suspended in application to the said committee; and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when an interim or final report of the committee is completed, the committee may make the said report public before it is laid before the House.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, we have no problem in giving our consent to the order being sought. I consulted yesterday with the government House leader and the House leader for the New Democratic Party in connection with the speaker on behalf of our party. The hon. member for Calgary Centre will be our speaker and, since he has already taken part in the debate, both other House leaders have given their consent to suspend Standing Order 37(1) so as to enable the hon. member for Calgary Centre to be our spokesman in this matter.

One other matter which is not mentioned in the order put forward is that, as part of the arrangement, it has been agreed that when we are at the committee stage, Clause 3 will be dropped from the bill and will not pass.

Mr. MacEachen: It will be defeated.

Mr. Nielsen: It will be defeated.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, it is correct that the order proposed by the government House leader comes to us as a result of the discussions we have had, and we are prepared to concur in it. There is one reservation I should like to make, but it does not detract from our readiness to pass the motion, and that is that we never did settle the question of whether this new parliamentary task force should have the right to travel as it does its work. I simply reserve the right to the committee to ask for that if it finds that it needs it. That can be done later.

As stated by the hon. member for Yukon, we understand that the government and the official opposition will see to it that Clause 3 of the bill is not carried when we get into Committee of the Whole. We may find ourselves in the unusual position of being the only party to vote for something the government has put before us. We shall still vote for Clause 3.

However, we welcome the implementation of the assurance that, since Clause 3 is to be dropped, there is to be the parliamentary task force outlined in this motion.

I have just one other thing to say. It is not often that the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party find themselves in the same boat.

Mr. Nielsen: But never in bed.

Mr. Knowles: That is right. Just as the Progressive Conservative Party wishes its one speaker today to be a member who has already spoken, so we would like permission for the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill, who has already spoken, to be our one speaker in the debate today. I believe that is agreed among the House leaders, and I trust unanimous consent will be given thereto.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the proposed order. Does the House unanimously agree to this order? The suggestion of the hon. member for Yukon was not quite a modification, but it seemed to be an amendment. At any rate, does the House agree to the order as proposed by the President of the Privy Council, including the reservations made by the two other members who spoke?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: So ordered.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I will now ask the usual Thursday question. Can the government House leader give us an indication of what his plans are for the business for the remainder of today when we are through with Bill C-24, and for tomorrow and as far as he can go into next week?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the hon. members are aware that tomorrow is an opposition day. Next week, we shall proceed with the second reading of the bill to provide supplementary borrowing authority to the government. We are hoping to give second reading to this bill in the middle of next week, preferably on Tuesday, and if so, we would like to begin second reading of Bill C-57 to amend the Excise Tax Act.

As we all know, the Joint Committee on the Constitution must report by February 13, next Friday. I understand that it might report earlier; in such a case, I would be happy to review the order of business for next week in consultation with my colleagues of the opposition parties, but I must emphasize that it is urgent to give second reading to Bill C-59, and we would appreciate it if this could be done early next week.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: I have just one brief question with respect to that order, Madam Speaker. Could the government House leader give us an indication of how soon the government intends to move on the report from the joint committee once it is tabled in the House?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, at this time our intention is to deal with that report and with the Constitution as soon as possible after the report is made but, as I just said to my hon. colleague, I will first talk to him and to the House leader of the New Democratic Party before determining the day on which the conclusion of the debate on the Constitution will start.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I have just two questions I should like to put to the minister today with respect to House business.

First, has the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs yet indicated to the government House leader how soon he might have his legislation ready? We hope it will soon be before the House.

My second question relates to the fourth report from the Standing Committee on Transport, which I understand is a unanimous report which the members of that committee would like to have discussed, even if only for a couple of hours. Has the minister discussed this matter with the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi? Can he indicate whether arrangements could be made next week for a short debate on that report?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker, on the first point I will talk to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs about the request made by my hon. colleague.

On the second point, I have talked to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport, and it all depends on the progress we make next week on Bill C-59 dealing with borrowing authority. If we can complete the second reading stage of that bill early next week, I would be willing to consider a short debate on the report of the Standing Committee on Transport, but before committing myself I would like to have a conversation with the Minister of Transport.

● (1510)

I have commenced discussions but with the proviso that we deal with Bill C-59 in the way I have just mentioned. However, I have an open mind as to the possibility of debating very shortly the report which the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Hargrave: Madam Speaker, could the government House leader give us some indication of the government's plans with respect to the new taxation legislation dealing with the two natural gas bills? Could the government House leader also indicate, if possible, whether there might be some assurance after second reading that both of those bills might be referred to a standing committee of the House of Commons so that appropriate witnesses may be heard? I am sure he is aware of the very grave concern among the producing provinces of natural gas about these two taxation measures.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, this legislation is part of our national energy policy, which is very important to all Canadians. The suggestion just made by the hon. member, however, is very interesting. I am not in a position now to tell him what we will do with the legislation as to whether we will decide to deal with it in a standing Committee rather than in Committee of the Whole House, but I can say that I will consider his suggestion very seriously. I will talk to the minister responsible for the matter, and I will speak to the House leader of the hon. member's party in an effort to come to some kind of arrangement. If we can agree on limiting debate on second reading so that the standing committee can deal with the issue, that may help to conclude an arrangement.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—THE CONSTITUTION—TABLING OF LETTER FROM BRITISH PRIME MINISTER

Madam Speaker: After the point of order raised Monday by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), I had an opportunity to read Hansard for yesterday and Monday, as he had asked me to do, in connection with the tabling of certain documents in the House. In his intervention last Tuesday, the hon. member for Yukon had informed the Chair of his intention to raise a point of order about some of the answers given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) during question period.

The hon. member for Yukon then alleged that several times the hon. ministers concerned had referred to or quoted long excerpts from a letter which the Prime Minister is said to have received from the United Kingdom Prime Minister, Mrs. Thatcher.

It seems to me the Standing Orders are clear about the obligation of a minister to lay upon the table a state paper from which he has already quoted. I am sure all hon. members know Citation 327 in Beauchesne's fifth edition. It is true that the hon. ministers referred to that letter during question period, put after close examination of Hansard I was unable to find a passage which appeared to me as being a direct quotation. Having consulted the precedents, may I draw the hon. members' attention to a ruling of one of my predecessors, Mr. Lamoureux, which can be found at page 9599 of Hansard for November 16, 1971, and I quote:

I have to agree with the contention that if the reference made to a public document is not, as the citation says, a quotation from that document, it would be very difficult for the Chair to rule that the document ought to be tabled.

If a document has been actually cited or quoted in debate by a minister of the Crown, it has to be tabled. If only reference is made to it, I do not see how there can be an obligation to table it.

In his remarks yesterday the hon. member for Yukon stated that the Chair had the duty to order the government to table the letter in question. He rested his argument on Citation 327 in Beauchesne's fifth edition whose relevant section reads as follows:

To be cited, a document must be quoted or specifically used to influence debate.

I confess I was somewhat surprised by this citation, so I made it my duty to check the sources on which this Section (5) of Beauchesne's Citation 327 might have been based. Now, the precedents of 1957 and 1975 which can be found do not mention the fact that a document is used specifically to influence debate. One might even wonder whether the Chair can determine if a document did or did not influence debate. It is an extremely difficult judgment for the Chair to make. Therefore, I must return to the first section of the citation which is itself based on a quotation of Erskine May, and which did not change in any way the fundamental rule followed until now by all my predecessors. Indeed that is the ruling made in similar circumstances by Mr. Speaker Jerome on March 4, 1975. Among other things, he said, and I quote:

Surely, a reasonable interpretation of the words "quotation from a document" must mean a quotation from the body of a document—

He then specified just what constituted quoting. And, on April 8, 1976, along the same line of thought, he added:

However, this certainly has never been held to apply to a situation in which a minister—

—as in this case—

—has simply been asked a question about a document and given an answer.

Therefore an attempt to secure information based on a certain document certainly does not entail that it is necessary to table the said document.

Under the circumstances, I see no reason why my opinion should differ from that of my predecessors, and I cannot find any Standing Order under which the Prime Minister might be forced to table the document in question.

RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE TO AND FROM BROCKVILLE STATION

Question No. 65—Mr. Cossitt:

During each of the past three years, what is the estimated number of persons (a) boarding (b) disembarking from passenger trains at Brockville, Ontario (c) arriving in Brockville, Ontario on trains from (i) Ottawa (ii) Montreal, for combining two trains into one before proceeding to Toronto (d) arriving in Brockville from points west of Toronto for transfer to trains proceeding to (i) Montreal (ii) Ottawa?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises that VIA Rail Canada is unable to supply the requested information. An analysis has been performed on data filed by Canadian National Railways for the years 1976 and 1978. From the information, an estimate of passenger flows has been prepared for these years at Brockville. It was not possible to segregate passenger counts between departures and arrivals, nor was it possible to separate passengers by direction of travel. The following estimates are annual totals.

		1976 (000's)	1978 (000's)
(a) (b)	Passengers boarding and disembarking at Brockville:	51.5	54.9
(c)	Passengers travelling through Brockville on trains combined from or split into Montreal and Ottawa sections:
	Montreal section	90.4	110.0
	Ottawa section	89.7	104.7
(d)	Passengers travelling through Brockville from and to southwestern Ontario on trains combined from or split into Montreal and Ottawa sections:
	Montreal section	5.5	5.3
	Ottawa section	32.8	33.2

NOTE: Totals in (d) are included in totals in (c).

Estimates for (c) and (d) assume through Montreal-Toronto passengers travel on trains which do not stop in Brockville.

MR. PIERRE FRANCHE—NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

Question No. 160—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the former Minister of Transport or a member of his staff request Mr. Pierre Franche, chairman of the National Harbours Board, to telephone the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville and discuss the situation at the Prescott grain elevators and, if so, did Mr. Franche fail to do so until reminded by the Minister of Transport's office on Monday, November 19, 1979?

2. Did Mr. Franche, in a telephone conversation on Monday, November 19, 1979, with the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, advise that he would re-examine the situation and contact the member again by Monday, November 26, 1979, and, if so (a) did he make such a contact and, if not, for what reason (b) did Mr. Franche deny any knowledge of casual or temporary help being hired at the Prescott grain elevators and, if so, what are all the reasons that such a denial was made?

3. Did Mr. Franche state that he had been looking into the situation at Prescott for some weeks and, if so, how could such a denial as mentioned in part 2 be made legitimately?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. Yes, the Minister of Transport requested on the morning of November 19, 1979, that the chairman telephone the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville; this was done in the afternoon.

2. The chairman advised he would review the alleged increase in casual help and call him by Friday, November 23 or Monday, November 26, 1979.

(a) The chairman did not make any further contact in light of the statements in the Prescott Journal, November 21, 1979. The Minister of Transport was so advised on November 22, 1979.

(b) The chairman was not aware of the alleged increase in casual help. Upon inquiring subsequently, it was established that there was nothing abnormal in the increased casual help requirements since it was the height of the harvest season and there was a grain elevator strike in Montreal.

3. The chairman had reviewed the reorganization and dismissals that occurred. There was nothing abnormal in the requirement for increased casual help during this period.

IMMIGRATION—MR. ERIC PROCTER

Question No. 1,630—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Eric Procter deported from Canada by immigration authorities following an RCMP and departmental investigation and, if so (a) was it determined that he had worked in Canada without paying income tax (b) did he marry shortly before being deported and did immigration authorities consider this a marriage of convenience to avoid deportation (c) on what date was he deported and to what location?

2. Since his deportation, has Mr. Procter returned to Canada in the neighbourhood of Edmonton, Alberta or elsewhere and did he re-enter Canada on a ministerial permit and, if so, what are all the reasons for granting the permit?

3. To the knowledge of the government, has Mr. Procter a criminal record in England and, if so, what are the details of his record?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Employment and Immigration and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Mr. Eric Procter was ordered deported from Canada by an adjudicator at an immigration inquiry held on February 15 and March 12, 1980.

(a) No.

(b) He married Bernice Lee on March 11, 1980, which is the day before he was ordered deported. The commission did not consider this to be a marriage of convenience to avoid deportation.

(c) Mr. Procter was deported to England on July 19, 1980.

2. Since his deportation, Mr. Procter has returned to Canada to the city of Edmonton as a permanent resident. No minister's permit was issued.

3. A search of RCMP criminal record files, based only on the name Eric Procter, failed to reveal a file under this name which contained a criminal record from England. It should be pointed out, however, that a complete search of these records or identification to a particular file cannot be made without fingerprints.

DOT—PERSONNEL BRANCH, PRESCOTT, ONT.

Question No. 1,802—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of Transport planning to move the personnel branch of its depot at Prescott, Ontario, to Toronto and, if so (a) how many persons will be involved (b) is the minister aware that his predecessor made a commitment that this branch would not be moved and, if so, what are all the reasons for this change in policy (c) will the government consider reversing such a decision or plan?

2. Does the government consider it possible to hire personnel in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville by using a staff over 200 miles away in the city of Toronto and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No. (a), (b) and (c). Not applicable.

2. The Prescott personnel office, which recruits for the Canadian Coast Guard, has authority to hire skilled and semi-skilled tradespersons, ship crews and support staff for a large district stretching as far as Lake St. Clair. The hiring of marine specialists and licensed professionals is done by the regional office in Toronto because the search frequently extends across Canada. Recruitment based on this arrangement appears to work well and there are no plans for reorganization in this area.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LTD.

Question No. 1,814—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past ten years, what was the value of contract change orders approved by Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. and what was the value of the change orders as a percentage of the value of original contract completions?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The information is not readily available from the records maintained by Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. as the company's statistics are not compiled on this basis. To provide this information would entail the examination of a very large number of individual contracts for each of the past ten years and for this the company does not have the necessary resources. However, an analysis of the value of change orders as a percentage of the value of the original contracts for fiscal years 1976-77 and part of fiscal year 1977-78 was prepared in 1977 for the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability. The results of this analysis were as follows:

	Award Value	Change Orders	Per cent Variation
Major Construction	$37,221,803	$2,902,828	7.8
Minor Construction	8,444,149	407,642	4.8
Repair and Maintenance	5,727,472	441,956	7.7

An analysis of the value of change orders as a percentage of the value of original contracts completed to date in the fiscal year 1980-81 is as follows:

	Award Value	Change Orders	Per cent Variation
Major Construction	$46,032,337	$3,872,773	8.4
Minor Construction	5,082,610	308,175	6.1
Repair and Maintenance	23,147,306	849,924	3.7

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I did not want the parliamentary secretary to think that I had fainted away. I hate to raise once more points of order on similar questions that I have raised time and time again. However, I feel compelled to do so because in the meantime nothing has happened. I know that I usually get a lecture in response to this question and get told about the percentage of questions the government has answered. No doubt the parliamentary secretary will point out that the government answered 24 of my questions yesterday—maybe it was 27.

Mr. Collenette: It was 32.

Mr. Cossitt: Nevertheless, they were all on the same subject and they were about six months over due, so he cannot boast very much.

Specifically, my question is this: I have questions Nos. 121 and 122 on the Order Paper concerning defeated Liberal candidates, defeated Liberal Members of Parliament and so on, who have received public appointments. I have raised this point before and it should not take months simply to tell us the number of judges who have been appointed or the number of people who have been appointed to boards or commissions. Every day we read in the paper about one or two appointments. Surely we could get a complete list so that we could see it all in total.

Also, I have been continually asking about the Taschereau papers, which Michael Pitfield returned to the Public Archives at the request of the security committee of the cabinet and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Those questions have stood on the Order Paper, including others about Michael Pitfield, for months and months. I have asked this question before and I have been told the matter would be looked into. It seems as though Mr. Pitfield is some sort of an invisible ogre in the Langevin Block who secretly runs this country. We cannot find out what he is doing, what he has done, or what he is going to do. He is untouchable. I do not think that is right. He is the senior public servant in the land and he is accountable to Parliament.

An hon. Member: He is too busy for you.

Mr. Cossitt: The hon. member opposite says Mr. Pitfield is too busy for me. If Mr. Pitfield is too busy to answer questions to which the people of this country are entitled to have answers, then he should not be the senior civil servant in Canada. He should not be in that position at all if he is too busy to answer questions. Perhaps someone else should be hired—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is entering into debate.

An hon. Member: What is your point of order?

Mr. Cossitt: If the hon. member would listen, Madam Speaker, perhaps he would hear.

I have one final item which I would like to raise with the parliamentary secretary. A minister in the present cabinet told me he had signed answers to my questions. I am not referring to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), since those questions were dealt with before when answers were delayed. The other minister told me he signed them last November. They are still on the Order Paper. Can the parliamentary secretary clarify once and for all, when questions are sent back to the Privy Council Office by ministers of the Crown, how long are they kept hidden there until they are sent back here?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would like to deal with the hon. member's last point first. When answers are tabled in the House they have been approved by the respective ministers. But it is also the obligation of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) as government House leader, and myself as parliamentary secretary, to ensure that those answers in that final tabling conform to the rules of the House and to the spirit of the law and government legislation.

I would like to explain briefly to the House that with respect to answers tabled concerning the Minister of Supply and Services, which were signed some months ago,—and the hon. member received assurances from the minister in the committee—they did come forward to the Privy Council. I did read them. But, Madam Speaker, there is a directive which I think the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) will be pleased to hear about and which he will accept.

Notwithstanding the fact that Bill C-43 has yet to pass the House, the affairs of the government will be conducted as if that bill is now law. In that particular instance, dealing with the questions with respect to Supply and Services on, I think it was, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, I sent those answers back for further clarification to ensure that the answers fully recognized the ambit of the law now before the House of Commons. Hence the delay.

The hon. member has said there are other answers coming from another department. He has not told me which department, so therefore it would be difficult for me to follow it up to make sure that this is, indeed, the case. I do not want to go on too long, but we dealt with this the last time the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville had the floor with respect to questions on the Order Paper.

I cannot let the remarks of the hon. member with respect to Mr. Pitfield pass, since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appeared before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee before Christmas. The Prime Minister answers in this House for the senior public servant. The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville was not there to ask questions of the Prime Minister concerning Mr. Pitfield and the administration of affairs. I think that answers the particular point raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Cossitt: On a question of privilege, Madam Speaker. The parliamentary secretary apparently has a bad memory, or poor ears. He raised this same point with respect to Mr. Pitfield. He pointed out that I had not been at the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates when the Prime Minister was there. I cannot recall the exact date when this occurred. I pointed out that I was in the Kingston General Hospital having a heart check-up. The hon. member was already aware of that. I therefore suggest that what he says today means that he is either not listening or he has misunderstood what I said to him.

It is an affront of the privileges of this House when the parliamentary secretary says that the Prime Minister was there. Does he mean, in effect, that should cover everyone, including Mr. Pitfield? I can only say that when other ministers appear they do not seem to fear bringing their deputies with them. Why does the Prime Minister of this country fear bringing his deputy with him? Maybe the parliamentary secretary can tell us that.

Madam Speaker: It seems to me that this is a question which should have been asked at the committee hearings. The hon. member is placing me in an impossible situation since he is discussing what should be discussed in another forum.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, December 15, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-24, to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the House for waiving Standing Orders to allow me to participate for what amounts to a second time in the second reading debate on Bill C-24, respecting fiscal transfers to the provinces.

When second reading on Bill C-24 commenced on December 15 last we had some excellent contributions by the minister, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) in particular, and by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). They pointed out the concerns of their respective parties with regard to this piece of legislation with its three clauses.

The first two clauses deal with what is commonly referred to as the equalization arrangements in this country. They deal with changes brought about, or made necessary, as a result of new developments in the western provinces, in particular the tremendous growth in resource revenues. These are the provinces which contain the oil and gas, which recently have gone up so much in value.

We must maintain a nation with some degree of equality to each citizen, no matter where he lives, so that Canadians living in one province can enjoy services provided by the government, at a level roughly equivalent to those services provided in another province. The original motivation for equalization was, in fact, from my part of the country, from the prairies. During the twenties, thirties and, indeed, the early forties, this was an extremely impoverished part of the country—at least before Leduc. There was a great deal of resentment and bitterness felt by western Canadians until 1930 because the resources did not belong to the provinces. Then, during the 1930s, there was the depression which had such an enormous impact on the prairie provinces. It created real hardships, to the point where the province of Alberta defaulted on bonds.

During this time there was an interest by those provinces in having some fairness with respect to the taxation scheme. Corporate taxes were collected at the headquarters of companies, and those were companies which earned their incomes right across Canada from coast to coast usually had their headquarters in Toronto or Montreal. Since taxes were collected in Ontario or Quebec the western provinces had no accessibility to them. The western provinces, of course, had the same kinds of obligations, as did the eastern ones, to provide roads, hospitals and so on.

The Rowell-Sirois Commission was an outgrowth of that kind of concern and frustration. It is rather ironic to recall that the greatest objection to sharing or to any sense of equalization in those days came from the Liberal premier of Ontario, Mitch Hepburn. We did arrive, primarily as the result of the Rowell-Sirois report of 1952, although the present scheme was worked out in 1966, at an equalization scheme which has worked reasonably well. This equalization scheme is based on a fairly complicated revenue-sharing arrangement. It is a complicated formula which considers the normal types of revenues.

One of the types of revenues which is considered as part of the equalization formula is the funds raised by the provinces in offering land for exploitation of mining companies or energy companies. In the case of Alberta—and I am aware that the other two provinces are similar—in order to have a fair or even-handed approach to industry with regard to exploitation of the natural resources, the province has in place a system whereby companies offer closed bids for the right to explore a given piece of land.

As oil prices have increased and as new technology increased the prospects of further oil and gas discoveries, the price of that land increased dramatically. The price has increased to the extent that the amount of money collected by the provinces for these reports of land sales is very substantial and has thrown a tremendous skew into the equalization program, causing the federal government, with the consent of the provinces, to move this amendment which would remove those types of revenues from the equalization formula.

The second amendment to the equalization formula was probably included in the first instance simply because it makes common sense, and that is that no province with an average income higher than the national average shall be the beneficiary of equalization. We in this party—and I know the New Democratic Party shares the same view, as I am sure does the Liberal Party—feel strongly that the question of equalization goes to the core of what Canada is all about in a real sense. It is a tremendously complex, difficult problem, with which the nation will have to deal in the near future. Goodness knows, there are enough things threatening to tear this country apart, and to add to the current problems a major dispute over the question of equalization would, indeed, be serious.

For that reason we concur with and strongly endorse the notion of establishing a special task force on the question of equalization. In fact the hon. member for Mississauga South moved a Standing Order 43 on January 28 which was exactly to that effect, that this task force be set up. We very much welcome the acceptance of this suggestion by the government and the concurrence by the New Democratic Party. We look forward to participating in that task force, to helping broaden the understanding of the elements of equalization, not just to Parliament, but to the nation, and at least starting the process of building a newer and better way of sharing in this country which is not quite as fractious, disruptive and damaging as the sharing procedures which are being attempted through the National Energy Program.

The other aspect of today's proceedings which is absolutely vital is the question of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. This act goes back to 1946, but in its current form it goes back to 1966. It rebates to the provinces 95 per cent of the income tax collected from privately owned utilities. The reason for the act is very simple. It is based on the fundamental principle which must underline all federal taxation, namely, that taxpayers of equal circumstance, no matter where they are located in this country, should be taxed equally by the federal government. The tax system should not have built into it a bias which says that if one happens to live in this or that province one shall pay less or more federal tax.

PUITTA, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, put into the system this kind of fairness because of the development of provincially-owned utilities which, because of the BNA Act, are non-taxable by the federal government and which, as a result, caused a distortion. The users of publicly-owned utilities were not in fact paying the corporate taxes which users of services provided by privately-owned utilities were paying. Simply stated, it was absolutely inequitable.

PUITTA removed that inequity. Hence, we are in the situation today where we have agreed that we will leave PUITTA in place. I am not sure what my reaction should be, whether I should be thankful, happy or mad. It is rather like being faced with a robber who, by use of argument, force or some other means, you convince not to rob you. What should one's feelings be at the end? Is one suppose to be grateful to the potential robber because he did not commit the robbery? The reality is that no fair-minded Canadian could accept the repeal of PUITTA, nor could this party.

Mr. Nielsen: The NDP does.

Mr. Andre: Yes, the New Democratic Party could accept such a repeal because to them fairness is not part of the equation.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been listening with great interest to the hon. member, but there is an error in his analysis. The bill did not repeal PUITTA, it reduced the payments from 95 per cent to 50 per cent. I know that this does not affect the hon. member's analysis, but knowing that he wishes to be accurate in everything he says, I thought I would make the point.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the government, months before the bill was introduced, brought in the measures contained therein by order in council, which is completely contrary to representative government.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) for defending me. The parliamentary secretary is half right. In fact the initial move by the then minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), was to repeal the act in total. As a result of representations, he backed up half way. To go back to my analogy, as the result of many arguments we convinced the robber to take only half the cash in our pocket. Finally, we have convinced the robber to leave us with all the cash which belong to us. The hon. parliamentary secretary is correct, we were only half way home earlier, but now we are all the way home.

As I say, PUITTA simply puts equity into the system. The socialists are more interested in state ownership than in equity. They are struck on that ideology—

Mr. Blaikie: State ownership is equity.

Mr. Andre: —so that any biases, distortions, arm-twisting or thievery which will encourage people to look to state ownership as a way to relieve the pain or the losses is to be encouraged. The fact that it might be unfair, inequitable, or downright mean is immaterial, just as long as it has the intent or purpose of promoting socialism, and this new nirvana which will save us all once big brother runs the whole darn country and all aspects of it. All concerned, thinking Canadians who love freedom and democracy, pray that we will never see the day and that we will keep up the lonely battle against the forces of international socialism.

● (1540)

I will not intrude on the time of the House too much longer. I am pleased that this agreement has been reached. The removal of this threat to the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act is something to which this party is absolutely and firmly committed. We are obviously going to vote with the government when we defeat that clause. The question of an analysis by Parliament of the fiscal transfers arrangements between the provinces and the federal government and of equalization, is something that we believe is very valuable for the country and it is a responsibility that Parliament should assume.

We look forward to working with members from the government side of the House and with members of the New Democratic Party on this task force in the hope that we can provide a report that will be of benefit not just to the government but to the country.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-24 is an act to amend certain arrangements made over the years relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces. It is an attempt to deal with certain imbalances and anomalies that have arisen within the established equalization formula as a result of the significant increases in revenues that the energy producing provinces have experienced since 1973, anomalies such as that which has put Ontario, at present a have province, in a category where it qualifies for equalization payments. To the extent that this bill deals with something that is as fundamental to Canadian federalism as equalization, so fundamental in fact that the principle of equalization payments is to be enshrined in the Constitution, this must not be regarded as a minor piece of legislation.

We are dealing with a principle that goes back to the Rowell-Sirois Commission in pre-World War II days which progressively developed into the perception and consensus that it was the federal government's responsibility to bring all the provinces up to a common level of revenue and services.

The problem we now seem to be facing with respect to the question of resources revenue is twofold.

I wonder if I could have a little quiet on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker. I can hardly hear myself think.

The resource revenues place greater demands on the federal government, as there is a higher level of revenue for all provinces to be brought up to and secondly, to the extent that the government has not had adequate access to these new revenues it has experienced difficulty in affording the resulting increase in the cost of equalization.

This bill is one in a series of attempts to deal with this problem. On the one hand it reduces those revenues that the federal government must calculate into the equalization formula and thus saves the government money. On the other hand it allows the producing provinces to build up such things as heritage funds, funds which we in this party acknowledge as necessary to the future of the economies of those provinces which now depend on rich, but nevertheless depleting, non-renewable resources.

In all these manoeuvres there is, as always, somebody who ends up with the short end of the stick. As the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) said in debate on this same bill on December 15, 1980, it is neither the federal government nor the producing provinces which lose out as a result of these changes; it is the people of the have-not provinces who lose as a result of them. In this way it can be said that we are actually moving away from the equalization ideal, if the essence of equalization is indeed to help the have not provinces to maintain a level of revenue and services equal to some national standard. What is at stake here is the idea of national standards, an idea which I will deal with more fully when I speak of federal-provincial fiscal transfers as they pertain to health care in Canada.

This is why we in the New Democratic Party have called for a parliamentary task force on equalization. In the intergovernmental negotiations that will undoubtedly take place, Members of Parliament, representative of and concerned about all regions and provinces of Canada, should have a chance to study and to make recommendations about the way the imminent restructuring of equalization should take place for the benefit of Canadians, and not just for the benefit of the more powerful. Ways must be found to solve whatever problems there are, ways which do not endanger the standard of services available to Canadians in the have-not provinces, or wherever they may live. Canadians who have lost what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood has called "the game of geological roulette" must be assured a full share of the quality of life which is available in Canada.

In this context I should like to speak about the problem of those federal-provincial transfer payments which fall under the description of the Established Programs Financing Act, that arrangement between the federal government and the provinces which was arrived at in 1977 and which defines federal contributions for hospital insurance, the Medicare Act, post secondary education, and extended health care services.

At the time of its passing the NDP opposed this arrangement for reasons that merit repetition at this time. We were worried about several things. In addition to the obvious unconditional nature of the revenues transferred to the provinces via the transfer of tax points, there was a dangerous vagueness about the extent to which the revenue transferred to the provinces via the basic cash payment could be expected to be conditional upon this money being spent on the purposes for which it was intended. We were worried about the maintenance of a level of services consistent with the potential combination of federal money and unabated provincial support for these programs. A transitional additional payment was thrown in by the federal government for the sake of the poorer provinces. They would receive transitional cash payments equal to what was needed to bring them up to the national average. This was in recognition of the fact that richer provinces would receive more revenue from the tax point transfers than poorer ones.

Furthermore, the $7.63 per capita part of the basic cash payment which was included by the federal government in lieu of the termination of the agreement called the revenue guarantee, now appears to have been correctly perceived by the provinces as unconditional, if Justice Hall's conclusions are to be heeded in this matter. This points to the vagueness of a poorly worded and poorly conceived document.

Without getting into any more detail of what is a very complicated arrangement, the important thing to notice about all this is that the Established Programs Financing Act has resulted in a serious lowering of provincial contributions to health care, on a percentage basis. The result of this has been a serious cutback in services and quality of care available to Canadians who live in the provinces governed by those who have seen their new found economy in health care spending or direct federal government input into health care, as an opportunity to save money. There was an element of restraint in the 1977 arrangements both federally and provincially. Provincial governments would not have to spend a dollar to get a dollar as they did under the former 50-50 cost-sharing arrangement. There would be an incentive for competency. But there was also supposed to be freedom for innovation and expansion of health care as provincial governments used their new found freedom from federal strictures to respond more adequately to the needs of their people. The question then becomes one of whether the provinces have lived up to the moral as well as the administrative bargain that was reached in 1977.

With respect to individual provinces, one's judgment on the extent to which they have lived up to the bargain will in all likelihood be a combination of statistical and financial evidence, combined with a general impression of health care services in the respective provinces and observations about whether people, with respect to provinces, perceive their health care system to be in a state of relative decline.

I note this combined idea of measurement because the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), when asked by myself and others in question period, time after time, as to what she intends to do about delinquent provinces such as Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario, is fond of bringing up the province of Saskatchewan. This is supposed to be a bold political stroke on her part, or so it would seem from the self-satisfied smile which envelopes her when she devastates us like that. The Liberals, of course, have the dubious luxury of not having any provincial governments to speak about.

The fact remains that, statistically, the Saskatchewan government is shown in a document prepared by the Liberal finance department to be one of the few provinces where provincial per capita contribution has gone up since 1977 and where it can be said that all federal increases have been passed on to residents in the form of expanded health care program funding.

Further, it should be noted for the minister's benefit that the people of Saskatchewan have not risen up in righteous anger like the people of other provinces. Indeed, the Canadian Health Coalition cannot get anything going in Saskatchewan because health care is not an issue there. The government of that province is concerned about health care, and the people know it. Because health care in Saskatchewan is supplemented and complemented by other social programs of a preventive nature, it reduces the need for purely crisis-oriented medicine. Let us be done with the cheap shot misrepresentations about Saskatchewan which have been popularized in this House by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and her cohort in this, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie), and let us look at two of the greatest transgressors in the deterioration of medicare which Canada has experienced since block funding was introduced. I am speaking, of course, about Manitoba and Ontario.

In Manitoba, according to the same document prepared for the Department of Finance to which I referred earlier, federal funding has increased by 18 per cent to 19 per cent while the provincial government manages to contribute 13 to 16 per cent less than it did in constant dollars in 1975-76. A view of aggregated health function spending shows a growth in the federal share from 45 per cent before established programs financing to 52 per cent today, while the provincial per capita contribution has gone down from $163.45 in 1975-76 to $142.09 in 1979-80. The downward trend was overcome only once in that period, in 1976-77 when it went up, not uncoincidentally, in the last year of the NDP government in Manitoba.

These are the statistics, damning enough, but the human reality is far more significant. Tired, overworked nurses, underpaid and understaffed maintenance personnel, cranky doctors, people waiting on stretchers in halls for hours in order to be admitted to emergency or in order to have their laundry changed on Monday mornings because they no longer hire people on the weekends, postponed elective surgery, the aged, the infirm and chronically ill being sent home prematurely because of a lack of space, and a general lack of confidence, are some of the problems.

The people of Manitoba used to take pride in their health care system. Over the years they elected members of Parliament who were part of the fight for medicare, such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who fought for medicare against the reactionary and insensitive machinations of the Conservatives and the usual procrastination, reluctance and general lack of conviction characteristic of the Liberal party. The people of Manitoba will no doubt take steps to restore their pride in the way they look after each other come the next general election in Manitoba.

Now let us look at Ontario, a province which, because it never had a New Democratic government, has even more structural attacks on the principles of medicare than Manitoba. In Ontario, atrocities like widespread extra billing, hospital charges and premiums are piled on top of the kinds of things which Manitobans have had to put up with in the last few years. What an irony that, in one of the richest provinces in Canada, the political culture has not yet matured to the point where people in Ontario do not have to pay for their health care through the regressive mechanism of premiums.

Statistically, according to the document I have been referring to throughout, the federal share of health care funding in Ontario has gone from 41.5 per cent before established programs financing to 52.4 per cent at this time. Real provincial expenditures have decreased by 3 per cent while, in addition to federal increases, the people of Ontario have experienced a 27 per cent increase in what they paid through premiums.

Using figures submitted to the Hall commission, which were approved by the government of Ontario, we see that while increasing provincial per capita expenditures by a paltry 3.6 per cent, the government of Premier Bill Davis has managed to reduce its own funding by 29.3 per cent amid real federal increases of 27 per cent and real premium increases of 27 per cent. What, pray tell, are the people of Ontario paying for?

The "big blue machine" turns out to be a reference to the way in which the health of the people of Ontario is being choked off by the ham-handed and blind, stupid restraint of the Progressive Conservative Party of Ontario.

What is the answer? Under the present system the federal government, because it gave up the carrot in 1977 and has only the stick, has the threat to cut off funding. It is a very serious threat unless, of course, you are Alberta and have the political cheek to say, as the government of Alberta did the other day, that you are prepared to do without federal funding in order to get your own way and keep on being a province where extra billing and opting out take place at intolerable levels. Little Peter has threatened to run away from home.

The more serious question is what has happened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who once threatened the provinces. She now challenges the NDP to recommend the same thing. When we complained about the state of medicare in some provinces, she challenges us to recommend this as if it were something that she in her new found wisdom had never thought of.

Justice Hall recommended against any withdrawal of federal funding. He recommended against what the Minister of National Health and Welfare threatened to do so many times in the last two election campaigns. We are prepared to accept the wisdom of this judgment by Justice Hall, as long as it is accompanied by a commitment on the part of the federal government to change the Established Programs Financing Act in such a way as to make the provinces more accountable for the maintenance of certain national standards.

We suggest the introduction of a new form of 50-50 cost sharing. It would preserve the notion of flexibility while reconstituting health care and post-secondary education in Canada as a joint-federal-provincial responsibility, something we act together on, not something the federal government throws money at and then forgets about.

What we in this party are afraid of, and what I now warn the Canadian people about, particularly those in the poorer provinces or in provinces where the governments are hostile to medicare is that the federal government, instead of trying to rebuild and re-establish a co-operative federalist approach to health care and post-secondary education, will try to get out from under what remains of its responsibility in this area.

Contrary to the centralizing image of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on important social and practical matters such as health care, he has literally given away the store. On economic matters he seems to want power, only not to use it. He idly contemplates power while our economy falls apart for lack of planning and direction.

● (1600)

Let me return to the topic of medicare. We suggest the federal government should not compound the error of most provincial governments by negotiating the renewal of Established Programs Financing, as it must be renewed in the coming year, with a view to saving money. The goal should be to stimulate provinces to greater responsibility for medicare and for the federal government to maintain its sense of responsibility over health care.

One of the reasons the federal government has given in the last little while about its need to save money in respect of federal-provincial transfer payments, particularly in the statement in the budget as to how the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) looks forward to and anticipates saving money in the upcoming renegotiation of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, is the revenue squeeze the government has been in of late.

Indeed it would be ironic if, at the same time the Liberal government was moving to solve the revenue problem, as it did in respect of its recent National Energy Program by having accrued to it more of the revenues coming from resources in this country, it was doing so by trying to get out of its responsibilities in those areas where Canadians have traditionally looked to the federal government for leadership.

In 1977, when the present arrangement of Established Programs Financing was brought into being against the criticisms and opposition of the NDP, we were warned by the father of medicare, Mr. Douglas, the then hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, just what was involved in this particular rearrangement of the federal government's responsibility in health care. Let me conclude by quoting him as follows:

> The fact is that this bill will destroy the very thing which since 1945 successive federal governments have been seeking to establish, namely, national standards for the people of Canada by which the federal government, through equalization payments and sharing the cost of programs on a 50-50 basis, could assure that a little province like Prince Edward Island would be able to give its people services that are comparable to the wealthiest province of Canada, the province of Ontario.

He went on to state:

> This country was founded by men and women who had a dream that it was possible to bring together diverse groups of people with different cultural backgrounds, who spoke different languages but who could live together in a spirit of tolerance and good will. They believed it was possible that the strong would help the weak, that the wealthy provinces would help succor the poorer provinces and that we would build a standard of Canadian living which would be our pride. If we fail to do that, then we are not worthy of those in whose footsteps we follow.

My plea to the government and the Canadian people is the same as that of Mr. Douglas at the time. We should make up our minds that we will not allow the apathy which seems to be creeping into the federal government in respect of the attitudes of provincial governments toward our health care, to destroy the Canadian dream, of which medicare is an integral part.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) quote Mr. Douglas at the end of his speech because those very generous words somehow offset his mean and partisan attack on the attitude of some provinces and even of the central government with regard to the financing of certain established programs which, by the way, are not affected by this bill.

The purpose of this bill which was rather well explained, if I may say so, by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), is to amend two statutory programs. The first one deals with the equalization payments authorized under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977, and the second with the payments made under the Public Utility Income Tax Transfer Act. It will be recalled, that the equalization program is intended to transfer enough revenue to the poorer provinces to help them provide a reasonable level of service to the public without having to impose on taxpayers levels of taxation which would be greater than their ability to pay. I would like to indicate that the equalization program is based on a province's ability to provide these services. For the purposes of the program, the revenues that each province would get through average levels of taxation, according to its own tax base, are assessed and its future revenues, in cases where the province is above average, are adjusted upwards. This is a way of ensuring that the provinces have sufficient financial resources to finance public services.

The equalization program is one of the most important programs implemented by the federal government. I want to assure the House that the government is as firmly committed as ever to this program. As the hon. member indicated, it is such an important program that it was examined during the constitutional discussions with a view to including the equalization principle in the Canadian Constitution. The fact that the amounts paid out under this program are quite considerable clearly shows the federal government's commitment to this principle.

The basis of the equalization formula is a revenue fund from which the provinces can draw. As the bill indicates, the revenues are generated by oil and natural gas and in particular they come from the sale of Crown leases and reservations on oil and natural gas lands. The reason why these two sources of revenue are removed from the revenue fund is that since 1975-76 especially there has been a very rapid increase of these oil revenues which throws off balance so to speak the fund made of these various sources of revenues.

Therefore, over a two-year period, the revenues generated by the sale of Crown leases on oil and natural gas lands will be removed for purposes of equalization. I would also like to indicate that as a result of representations made in the course of the debate on this bill, the government decided to remove clause 3 of the bill on reimbursements under the Public Utility Income Tax Transfer Act. It has repeatedly been indicated during the debate—and the hon. member for Calgary Centre has reaffirmed it—that the financial consequences of this bill would be limited but that they would affect especially the province of Alberta. I should like to point out that it would also affect Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. Many organizations, consumer groups, Members of Parliament, even the Minister of State for Economic Development, Senator Olson, and my hon. colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), have strongly argued that this provision should be withdrawn from the bill. Therefore, I am pleased to inform the House that as a result of those representations the government will drop Clause 3 from this bill.

Apparently we will have to proceed in the following manner: when the bill reaches Committee of the Whole and the Chair calls Clause 3, the government will vote against it.

That change will not affect the two other provisions of the bill dealing with equalization payments namely the revenue and the average personal income for the three years on the basis of which no fiscal equalization payment may be paid to a province.

We also heard the leader of the government in the House suggest that a task force be set up to study the 1977 act on fiscal transfers, as well as the Canadian welfare system and equalization program. I have a feeling that the task force could come up with interesting suggestions before we renegotiate those various programs with the provinces. I am confident the hon. members who are appointed to the force will work constructively and positively in an effort to help the government—through those programs—to communicate better with the provinces.

I should like, in closing, to thank very briefly the House leaders of the opposition parties, as well as the critics of those parties, the government House leader, the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), for their co-operation which resulted in a speedy passage of the bill this afternoon.

I think this week could be declared parliamentary efficiency week since we completed study of the income tax bill yesterday and we shall proceed with third reading of Bill C-24 within a matter of minutes. Therefore, I thank all the hon. members for their co-operation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Clause 3 negatived: Yeas, 9; nays, 47.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed, from Friday, January 30, 1981, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time in little over a year that the House has been faced with a borrowing authority bill; this is the second borrowing authority bill presented to the House in this session of Parliament. The House will recall that in July of this year the government was given authority to borrow $12 billion. That was only eight months ago. So far in this fiscal year the government has borrowed from the public in general, on the open market and elsewhere, a total of $9 billion of new money. That is the figure, according to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), as of last January 15. Obviously there has been some borrowing since then, but in his statement the minister estimated he would need another approximate $3 billion to meet his requirements for this fiscal year.

When we went into this fiscal year the government had outstanding borrowing capacity, which had not lapsed, of $2.9 billion. To the $2.9 billion borrowing authority of the government at the beginning of the fiscal year one would normally add the $12 billion authorized in July, to give the government a total borrowing capacity in this fiscal year of $14.9 billion. As of December 15 the government had used up $9 billion of its $14.9 billion borrowing authority. At that point it still had $5.9 billion, and I remind hon. members of the minister's statement with respect to Bill C-54. Unfortunately for the government, Bill C-54 was altered by House order, so his speech on that bill was actually off the topic. The minister indicated that we had $5.9 billion left, and of that amount he anticipated he would need only $3 billion to the end of the fiscal year. That would leave the government at the end of March, 1981, with $2.9 billion of borrowing authority.

The government is coming to us and saying, in addition to the $2.9 billion of borrowing authority, that it needs an additional $14 billion. In other words, the government wants us to give it a blank cheque to borrow a total of $16.9 billion in the period ending March 31, 1982, which is more than the government has shown it needs for this fiscal year. Indeed it is significantly more than the government has shown in its budget for next fiscal year.

If one is to examine the budget presented by the minister last October 28, hon. members will note on table 1 the amount required for borrowing. Hon. members will also note the deficit in the revenue and expenditures on a national accounts basis. The deficit for the year 1981-1982 set out in table 3 is $10,060 million, and the note to that table indicates that it is an average amount. However, if we go back to the summary of transactions, we find that the amount the government will require, according to its budget figures, is no more than $11 billion. On the one hand, the government is saying that it will have borrowing authority for $16.9 billion, but on the other hand the government tells us in that fiscal year it will need only $11 billion. The House is being asked to approve the borrowing of $5.9 billion more than the government budgetary requirements indicate. This is an unconscionable request of this House of Commons. There is no way that responsible Members of Parliament, responsible as Parliament is to control the public purse, can in any conscience grant this request for the right to borrow money. I say, "No way". The government's figures do not add up. The government does not need that much money; there is no real requirement for it. The government is asking this House to approve $5.9 billion in borrowing authority over the maximum amount the government could possibly need, that is, in accordance with its budget.

The government tells us its budgets are right and it is capable of managing people's affairs; that is what we hear. The minister was in Toronto the other day talking about his monetary and fiscal policy, his policy of gradualism and his policy of restraint. We know about this government's restraint attitude. It is so restrained that the government is asking us to give it $5.9 billion more than it even wants in its budget! Is that restraint?

Let us look at some of the government's problems. It is only when we are responsible and pay attention to what is ongoing on a fiscal basis in this country that we, as Members of Parliament, earn our pay and earn the respect of the citizens of Canada. The problems of the government financing are simply horrendous.

Today, again, interest rates determined by the Bank of Canada stayed at 17.11 per cent. Some would ask, "Well, isn't it marvellous the government is able to keep interest rates at the same level of 17.11 per cent as it did last week?" But, the wire service report this afternoon, after the Bank of Canada's auction of treasury bills, indicated that the Bank of Canada so interfered with the bid on treasury bills this week that it was able to keep the 17.11 per cent rate from going to where it should have gone, that is, to 17.30 per cent. We will know exactly what happened at five o'clock this afternoon when the Bank of Canada report comes out, but it is clear from the information leaked so far that the Bank of Canada again cranked up the printing press, bought up treasury bills and increased the amount of government monetizing in order to keep the interest rate where, I ask hon. members? It kept it at 17.11 per cent, but that is the highest rate the Bank of Canada has ever had in its entire history. Is that managing?

The disaster of it is this: we owe the government, as of last week, a net debt—and I am talking net, net, net debt—of well in excess of $80 billion. The worst of that net, net, net debt is that most of it, a good half of it, is what any accountant would call a current liability.

Every week the government goes to the financial markets and must borrow at least $1 billion. In some cases it borrows up to $1,500 million every week. That is just to roll over its treasury bills and pick up an extra $100 or $200 million to cover its deficit. It is a weekly performance. Those treasury bills are written for 90 days, 91 days or 182 days. They are short-term loans. They are due. They are what an accountant would call a current liability. Of that current liability, in the statement of last week, the government owed $20.9 billion on treasury bills alone.

In addition to that, the government owes on Canada Savings Bonds not quite $17 billion. I want to speak for a moment about that form of debt, namely, that in connection with Canada Savings Bonds. As you know, Mr. Speaker, those bonds can be cashed at any time without notice. Therefore, they are a current liability of the government. Today we have a Canada Savings Bond interest rate of 11.5 per cent. We all know by looking at every bank advertisement across the country that one can go today to any savings bank, chartered bank or trust company in Canada and receive 13 per cent on one savings account. We all know that guaranteed investment certificates are being marketed today at 13.5 per cent, sometimes 13.75 per cent. Some smaller institutions offer interest on those certificates even up to 14 per cent.

We all know, if we have any intelligence at all, that the forward outlook for interest rates this year indicate that interest rates will remain high for the balance of the year. When one looks at the bid price of commercial paper running six or nine months down the road, and when one looks at one year paper, the rates quoted on the commercial market are close to 15 per cent, if not higher. That must indicate something.

It must indicate that the market believes interest rates are likely to remain in the 15 per cent range, at least for the balance of the year, while the Bank of Canada rate today, by its manipulations, is only 17.11 per cent. The interest rate forecasts indicate that at no time this year will the Bank of Canada rate, to wit, the rate at which the Government of Canada can borrow money, be below 15 per cent. That is a horror! We in this country have been faced with interest rates in the 17 per cent range on the Bank of Canada basis for eight weeks now, and there is no prospect of those rates declining. We are talking about that rate when we talk about government debt, money which it must borrow.

The Minister of Finance indicated in the budget that his cost of carrying borrowed money for this fiscal year would be $10.25 billion, but that projection was made on October 28 when interest rates were 5 per cent to 7 per cent less than today. That projection is wrong by a full four months. It indicates that the government's budgetary handling of debt costs is wrong. What I am afraid of—and what a number of members on this side and surely members opposite are afraid of—is that under this bill we will be giving the government borrowing authority so that it can borrow money to pay the interest on the money borrowed at the high interest rates that this high-interest government has created.

When we get into this whole problem we must look very seriously at where we are going in Canada. The late John Diefenbaker said, "Where are we going, where are we going?"

I should like to read into the record the remarks of Richard Thomson, chief executive officer of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, at the annual meeting of its shareholders. He said:

> The high level of Canadian inflation and the expectation of it continuing at even higher levels set a floor on Canadian interest rates as the Bank of Canada sought to maintain Canadian interest rates above the rate of inflation.

He went on to say:

> As United States rates jumped to new highs, the Canadian authorities, particularly the Bank of Canada, had the option either to increase Canadian interest rates or to witness a decline in the Canadian exchange rate.

The government, in its management, decided to keep interest rates high in Canada so that it could keep the dollar high. Well, let us look at the dollar for a moment. It has not done very well recently. At noon today it was only at 83.56 cents in New York.

The government has succeeded in keeping the interest rates exceptionally high. The disaster of that is that the bulk of the borrowing in Canada is being done by the government itself. So, when we on this side of the House talk about the terror of high interest rates to people who hold mortgages—and it is a terror—and when we talk of high interest rates affecting consumers—and it is really hurting them—and when we talk of high interest rates destroying business, particularly small business, the fact of the matter is that we are all paying for the disaster of high interest rates because we are all Canadians. We are all stuck with paying this horrendous rate on what amounts to current account borrowing which the government foists upon us.

It has been suggested that we could allow our dollar to drop, that we would be far better off to allow that to happen. A drop in the dollar would add to inflation about one-third of a per cent for every 1 per cent drop in the dollar. I suppose the truth of the matter is that if we really wanted to manage our economy properly then we could have both a strong dollar and low interest rates.

We all know that the budget of October 28 has been a disaster. Every financial organization from the Economic Council of Canada to the C. D. Howe Institute, every spokesman for every bank and every economic group, has panned that budget. The Economic Council of Canada's analysis of the budget indicated that it caused a 1 per cent rise in inflation alone for 1981. The budget is a disaster. Instead of encouraging energy activity, drilling, construction and encouraging investment into Canada, the budget drives investment out. No wonder our dollar goes down despite high interest rates. If we worked it the other way around, if we encouraged development in Canada, got rid of that energy package or reversed it, and did everything possible from a tax point of view to encourage development which is available in western Canada and the rest of the country, in terms of pipelines in the east and so on, we would be going ahead.

The only thing this government has done so far with respect to its energy package is to make a deal to spend $1.5 billion to pay shareholders of Petrofina $120 per share for shares which six months ago sold for $60. That is what the government has done. Isn't that dandy? My friend says they should have expropriated them at $60 rather than pay $120. And what did they receive? Some 1,100 service stations. Really, that does not make sense. Do we need to buy a bunch of used service stations when we are trying to build Canada?

Only recently the Petrofina station in Lorne Park reopened because the company, in desperation, finally turned it over to a local operator for next to nothing in terms of rent. The operator is having a hard time to make any money since nobody wants to buy the product, and there are too many service stations around, anyway. We have all driven around our constituencies and seen those whitewashed service stations. But, what does the government do? It goes out and spends $1.5 billion to buy a bunch of used service stations. That is stupid.

There are many things the government should be doing. It should be encouraging new investment. What is the use of paying the Belgians $120 a share for assets which are already here? If they really wanted some service stations, why not build new ones? It would create some employment. But, what does the government give us? Nothing but a bunch of used service stations.

Mr. Evans: You know as well as we do that we are buying a stream of future benefits. You are saying future benefits are not worth it. We say they are.

Mr. Blenkarn: The parliamentary secretary is talking about future benefits. I think the future benefits for most people in Canada should take the form of more jobs and higher pay packets—in terms of real value in their pay packets tomorrow than they have today. The assurance of the past four years, to most people, has been that their purchasing power for the same amount of work and effort has been less and less. Indeed, on average, Canadians probably slipped behind very close to 4 per cent in 1980.

● (1640)

The government must reduce its borrowing requirements, and it cannot be done by buying new service stations and borrowing money at 17 per cent or 17.5 per cent. The government must learn to better manage its accounts and not to borrow as much. What bothers me is the quantum of the debt requirements of this government for new money every year. The requirements in the budget were approximately $11 billion, and it was indicated that the requirements would be less for next year. That is not good enough, but it is good. However, I fear that in fact this will not be the case.

The problem is that the government's borrowing is beginning to crowd out the private entrepreneur, people who wish to take out mortgages and others, in terms of their ability to borrow money. When the government goes to the financial market it is with the highest possible credit rating, at least in its own country, although that may not be the case abroad. When the government goes to the financial market and is prepared to offer 17 per cent for money, as is the case with this government, it forces those persons who need money to match or better the government.

These people who must better or meet the government's ability to borrow in the marketplace are eventually crowded out. As the governor of the Bank of Canada has said, there is no limit as to how much the government will pay—it has a printing press and is able to pay. The effect of the government's willingness to pay these high rates of interest is that it crowds out business and development, and we end up with an economy which performs at less than its potential. As the Economic Council of Canada indicated at page 63 of its report:

> There has been no evidence that this has happened,—

It was referring to the crowding out.

> —but lenders have insisted on shorter duration agreements and new instruments with extendable terms. This means that the government must refinance a larger portion of its debt each year and thus it may face a debt management problem.

As a result, the government goes further into debt, crowds out other forms of investment, and deals more and more in the short term because people have no confidence in it all the time absorbing all the available money in the system. The result of the enormous deficit and borrowing requirements authorized by this bill is that it puts jobs and the hopes of Canadians in serious jeopardy.

I should like to speak for a moment about what I perceive to be some of the problems. I hope the task force committee which will be looking at the financial arrangements between the federal government and the provinces will become involved with some of these problems. In my view the most serious problem in this country is set out in the report of the Economic Council of Canada:

> A good part of the persistent federal deficit can be attributed to below potential performance. Moreover, because the resource royalties and surplus on the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, the combined deficit of all governments in Canada is expected to be replaced by a surplus . . . However, it is the large federal deficit, rather than the over-all government sector—

This is the cause of the problems of the federal government.

Because the federal government carries out the equalization system in Canada and because it has become involved in matters which constitutionally belong to the provinces—and as a result it no longer has the resources or other revenues to balance out—obviously it becomes necessary for the federal government to reduce its expenditures. The first step of the government should be to cease its involvement in matters of provincial concern.

Throughout the 1960s and 1970s this government entered into one field after another which, by virtue of the British North America Act, were within the competence of provincial governments. An hon. member from the New Democratic Party spoke this afternoon about medicare. While it is great to have a national standard, the operations of hospitals and medical services clearly fall within the scope of the provinces.

Mr. Evans: Are you against medicare?

Mr. Blenkarn: Of course not, but who must pay for it? Part of the expense must be transferred to the provinces in order to stop this federal borrowing. Let us let the provinces handle some of the problems they should have handled all along.

We in this Parliament have a tendency of wanting to get into every act in the country. For example, the budget of the minister responsible for CMHC for this year is in excess of $1.3 billion. I am not against housing—and governments have certain responsibilities with regard to housing—but does the federal government have any responsibility in the area of housing? I have heard members of this House, including some of my colleagues from Vancouver, cry about the housing problems in that city. The province of British Columbia is well off and can look after its own housing problems; it does not need to come to the federal government for assistance. This government should stick to the areas in which it performs well and not go into areas of provincial jurisdiction, because it merely gets into the position of needing to borrow more money.

As the result of the government's involvement in matters of provincial jurisdiction, the bureaucracy grows larger and the financial markets of the country become upset. The Economic Council of Canada suggested that the provinces, because of their resource potential and their methods of taxation, should have access to revenue and should have surplus revenue. We all know, when a government has surplus revenue, that the funds quickly disappear into new social programs and more government.

The problem with which the task force will have to deal is that equalization goes to the root of the federal deficit and, to some extent, to the root of our constitution. This problem should be attended to and solved immediately. When we talk about constitutional patriation, we must also look at the revenue or the dollar and cents end of the matter. It is absolutely foolhardy for provinces, with their surpluses or their easily-carried deficits, to be able to expand their programs while the federal government is requesting borrowing authority for $14 billion.

The government has gotten itself into a backward mess. It has become involved in fields in which it does not belong. However, the government is remaining in those fields, is trying to borrow money, is upsetting the entire interest market in Canada, is crowding out private borrowers and is upsetting the mortgage and business investment markets. It will not get down to the brass tacks of understanding where its responsibilities and those of the provinces lie.

• (1650)

I am glad this task force has been appointed. It will bring to the attention of the House the place where the responsibilities of this government begin and end.

In the couple of minutes that I have left, I should like to return to some of the provisions in the budget and to compare them with what could have been done to get Canada going again and to bring interest rates down, so that the country could grow and federal tax revenues would be more buoyant.

Last year's Crosbie budget contained a provision relating to registered retirement savings plans. If those plans had invested their funds in stock market equities and a capital gain was made, it would have been taxed as a capital gain when the plans were dissolved and not as income as is the case at present. That measure would have encouraged more Canadians to enter the equity market and would have lessened the debt field. It would have had the tendency of keeping rates down considerably, at the same time as providing equity capital for the burgeoning commercial activities that need frontend money in Canada. That provision is not included in the present budget, and that is one of the reasons we do not have the growth that we need to support our dollar and to avoid continually raising interest rates and bringing money into the country to finance debt.

There is the question of the capital gains tax itself. Recently, the government issued a white paper or a pink paper on capital gains taxes. This paper attempts to justify the capital gains tax. I was surprised that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) did not comment on the paper as, prior to his election to Parliament, he made many comments regarding capital gains. He said the tax was ridiculous, wasteful and harmful but he has not commented on this paper. I would be interested to see the government do what it should—bring that paper before the finance committee where it could be discussed and the justification for capital gains tax examined.

I know that one of my colleagues would like to speak before five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, so I will conclude my remarks.

Mr. Evans: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member would entertain a question?

Mr. Blenkarn: Certainly.

Mr. Evans: I listened very carefully to what the hon. member had to say. At one point he indicated that the government was asking for $5.6 or $5.9 billion more than the projected requirement. In the budget papers for 1981-82 the projected deficit is $13.7 billion and the borrowing authority is requesting $14 billion. Could the hon. member explain or tell me where his figures are to be found? I would like to know from where he gets $5.9 billion in excess borrowing authority.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to inform the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) from where the figures come. If he has a copy of the budget before him, he will see on page 23, "Table 3, Government of Canada, Revenues and Expenditures, National Accounts Basis". In a column headed "1981-82", which is the next fiscal year, the surplus or deficit—and it is deficit—is shown as $10,060 million.

Mr. Evans: From where did you get 5.9?

Mr. Blenkarn: If you start on the basis of what the Minister of Finance indicated to the House on January 15 that in this fiscal year the government had borrowed $9 billion—

Mr. Evans: It expires on March 31.

Mr. Blenkarn: All except $2.9 billion.

Mr. Evans: That was used last year.

Mr. Blenkarn: It does not expire; you still have it.

Mr. Evans: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) has the floor.

Mr. Blenkarn: The borrowing authority that the government obtained was for $12 billion. It had $2.9 billion, so that gives $14.9 billion. It spent $9 billion, so it has $5.9 billion left. The minister indicated that he needs $3 billion in order to finish the year. This will leave him with the $2.9 billion that he had at the outset.

Mr. Evans: A point of order. The hon. member is simply wrong—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. What began as a question and an answer is now debate. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I did not want to cut off the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) or the very interesting debate that was going on. The hon. member's comments have been most incisive, and I certainly want to associate myself with them. I think his description of the package before us and the performance of this government as a bit of a horror show was most apt.

The $14 billion borrowing authority that the government is asking Parliament to approve must be examined against the background of successive budgetary deficits. On page 43 of the budget document presented to the House on October 28, it is shown that for the past four years the accumulation of budgetary deficits amounts to some $40.1 billion. The projected figure for the next four years for the total anticipated budgetary deficit is $51.8 billion. That is almost $92 billion in budgetary deficits which have accumulated over a period of eight years. That clearly shows a government out of control, and I think most Canadians would find those figures incredible and shocking.

We are not capitalizing on the production potential of the country; instead we are following a philosophy of trying to borrow ourselves rich. We are not stimulating the economy or the production capacity of the country so that it can support expensive government programs. This is very disturbing. We are mortgaging our future and placing an almost impossible burden on our children and our children's children.

The hon. member for Mississauga South spoke of the country's net debt. By March our gross national debt will exceed $120 billion and the net debt will exceed some $80 billion. The interest on that debt is in excess of $12 billion annually. We are spending $1 in $4 on interest on that debt.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta)—Transport—Crowsnest Pass rates—Establishment of short-term study—Reported lobby by food processors; the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling)—Bankruptcies—Re-Mor management investment—C & M Financial Services-Investigation conducted by committee of Ontario Legislature; the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens)—Energy—Projected price increases for crude oil.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent that all notices of motions prior to No. 35 stand, by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the document prepared in or before October, 1970, which was either submitted to cabinet or prepared for submission to cabinet and which dealt with the restructuring of the Department of Public Works including the option to form it into a Crown corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will readily admit that my motive in putting this motion on the Order Paper was not to get production of the document referred to since I was already aware of its content. However, I believed it would give me an opportunity once again to shed some further light on a difficulty I have been working on over the years. I refer to the continuing duplication of efforts in various departments. This afternoon I want to discuss specifically property management and construction work as it applies to the public service.

The parliamentary secretary mentioned that the document was a cabinet paper. I might take issue with that. As far as I am aware, it never got to the cabinet table. I suspect it was just a presentation for the approval of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As I understand the story, this document was presented at the time of the October crisis in 1970, and as a result, it was put away for the time being. Eleven years later, we are still talking about what was proposed in 1970 and what still has not been done in 1980.

My original interest in this subject predates my entry into the House of Commons in 1972. I must admit that, as a construction man, in those days I was somewhat concerned about the efficiency, or lack of efficiency, in the Department of Public Works. I was anxious to find out for myself just what the situation was in that department. To put the parliamentary secretary at rest, I am not going to be too critical of the department this afternoon. In fact, I have been suggesting all along that the problem is that this department has not had a full opportunity to take over, as was proposed in 1970, complete control of construction activity and property management in the public service. It was not until 1975 that I started to put case files together. The more I did so, the more concerned I became.

It may be advisable to say a few words about the department by way of introduction. The Department of Public Works provides accommodation and related realty services to government departments and agencies. These services include construction of buildings, purchase and disposal of land and other real property, rental of premises and the maintenance, improvement and operation of properties owned or leased by the Government of Canada. In addition, on request the department supplies government departments and agencies with technical and construction management services for capital projects.

In his report, the Auditor General commented that there are two principal systems in planning for the acquisition of space. The planning and control system is used to plan the department's internal resource requirements based on projected work load. In order to be fully effective as a foundation for departmental planning and forecasting, the planning and control system must be linked to an extensive data base which includes cost inventory and other operating data. This data base has not been fully developed. Furthermore, actual expenditures were not being systematically compared to plans or budgets to determine the quality of the original plans, nor could changes in the level of funding be related to changes in resources required for individual projects.

The Auditor General concluded that the management of eight of nine projects examined did not demonstrate a reasonable standard of due regard for economy.

Among the Auditor General's recommendations, one can read that the role of the Department of Public Works and its program objectives should be clarified. The department commented on the recommendations and agreed with this one. For the past several years the department has been seeking approval for a modified role and mandate in the context of proposals concerning the rationalization of real property operations in the federal government. I might add that in place of "the past several years", one should read "a minimum of 14 years". In fact, in these short remarks, in which I can only lightly gloss over the problem, I shall be talking of the history of the past 17 years.

The Glassco proposals of some 17 years ago created considerable interest in reform. In 1964, a committee of senior public servants was convened to review the proposals and to make recommendations to ministers. The Glassco commission singled out for special mention the fact that real property activities had become diffused among a large number of departments. It suggested that the Department of Public Works should be made responsible for the planning and supervision of all construction required by civil departments and agencies.

As I said earlier, while I obviously have a few criticisms of the department to make, the reason I mention these and put them on the record is because I have felt all along that these criticisms are being used as excuses by other departments which have not, for various reasons, wanted to co-operate in this exercise of developing for the Government of Canada a single construction company.

Looking at some figures, we see that the Department of Transport from 1975 to 1977 carried out construction amounting to $160 million to $180 million a year.

In the Post Office Department—and this was looked after by the Department of Public Works—construction activity in those same years was running at $50 million to $75 million a year. I mention this because with the Post Office becoming a Crown corporation, it is possible that this construction workload may be taken away from the Department of Public Works.

I want to refer to the Department of National Defence; construction in those same years ranged from $50 million to $70 million per year. This work, of course, was carried out by Defence Construction (1951) Limited. I will say right now that if I had any criticism to make of any construction department, it would be DCL.

My reasons there are best illustrated by the construction work that was carried out at the St. Jean military base in Quebec. Construction figures for 1976-77 were $14 million; for 1978, $36 million; and 1978-79, $27 million. Sixteen contractors on that site had extras or additional amounts added to their contracts exceeding 20 per cent of their original signed contracts. That construction exercise at St. Jean, as everyone knows, went considerably over budget. Whether that was justified or not, I believe all construction work should be under the same set of rules and regulations.

● (1710)

It is extremely difficult for the construction industry to cope with the varying tendering methods of various departments, the Ministry of Transport, the Ministry of National Defence and, rather strangely, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which gets into the construction act as does, for example, the Department of Veterans Affairs.

I have put on the record before and I should like to mention again, that I saw absolutely no reason why the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should be building some steps on the east corner of the Parliament Buildings. I inquired the reason why that department was building them and was told at that time that department was responsible for the canal which belonged to Parks Canada, which in turn is part of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I want to put on the record once again that those steps down to the canal cost us over $500,000, and $500,000 to me represents something like $1,000 a week in interest alone to walk down those stone steps. I suggest that work should better have been done by the Department of Public Works, where it would have been publicly tendered.

Back in 1969 the mood was to change the Department of Public Works into a Crown corporation. I do not support that particular proposal. I believe that situation now has been put aside, and I doubt there is any inclination to make it into a Crown corporation. I am not sure that would resolve any problems at all.

The deputy minister at that time, who was put into his job by the Prime Minister with the specific responsibility for reorganization of the Department of Public Works, was Mr. John MacDonald, who today, in 1981, is the chairman of the Tariff Board court. He was saying that the responsibility of the proposed new corporation—whether one talks of a Crown corporation or a reorganized Department of Public Works is unimportant—would include the integration of the existing Defence Construction Limited. Twelve years ago it was being suggested that Defence Construction Limited should be wound up in its present form.

I received a rather interesting answer to a question I put on the Order Paper in connection with Defence Construction Limited. I must admit I found it rather amusing and I should like to read it. I was asking why the work of Defence Construction Limited could not be equally well carried out by the Department of Public Works, and the answer contained the phrase:

"Each time this matter was considered it was agreed that in order to meet the objectives of the Department of National Defence a quick response capability was required."

Of course, I could not resist the temptation then to ask a question as to why the Department of Public Works was unable to provide a quick response capability. "The decision", they say in the answer, "did not imply that the Department of Public Works was unable to provide a quick response capability." In fact, I think we had a bit of a runaround on that one.

I notice in the estimates for the year just concluded—and I assume this week we are to see the new figures—that the Department of Public Works budget is presently at $754 million, and I believe in supplements there was another $1 million added. In any event, the total for the year is some $755 million. That is quite a sum of money. In fact, if one adds the construction activities of Transport, National Defence and so on, one comes to a sum in excess of $1 billion.

The problem back in 1970 was one which is continually being experienced in our public service, the initialling of some agreement between deputy ministers and then changing position. At that particular time the two deputy ministers concerned were Mr. Simon Reisman, who was secretary of the Treasury Board, and John MacDonald to whom I have already referred. They were in essential agreement on the direction in which we were to be going.

However, the usual forms of delay were brought in, additional task forces were put into operation, additional studies were required, and then in 1970 Simon Reisman became deputy minister of finance. His place as secretary of the Treasury Board was taken by Mr. A. W. Johnson.

Reisman had expressed strong support for the MacDonald proposals from the very beginning and, indeed, with regard to several major points, had urged similar action upon the Department of Public Works previous deputy minister through 1968 and 1969. That, of course, was prior to the appointment of Mr. MacDonald who was sent there for the express purpose of reorganization.

There then obviously was some reluctance on the part of Treasury Board to proceed. I found it quite interesting that just a couple of months ago, on going through the minutes of a meeting of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, the same Mr. Johnson appeared as a witness, that is, Mr. Johnson who is now the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Let me quote him as follows:

I want to say something about my own preoccupation with efficiency because I really want to make it clear to the committee how strongly I feel about efficiency.

He went on to state:

I reflected a great deal . . . on the line of questioning about the comprehensive audit and efficiency.

He went on to state:

My interest in this field goes back a long way. My first five years in government were spent doing efficiency studies. I appeared on a platform with James Macdonell—

That was our last Auditor General.

—and with Walter Gordon, who was then in the consulting business in 1952. I published an article on efficiency in government and business in 1962 . . . As Secretary of the Treasury Board here in Ottawa, I was responsible for supervising the experimentation that was being done in the field of PPBS which has now got the new name of "Efficiency and Effectiveness".

He then said:

I do favour a comprehensive audit in the field of economy and efficiency.

Department of Public Works

As late as two months ago Mr. Johnson, who was then secretary of the Treasury Board, was talking about efficiency in the public service, yet despite all the studies that were done and the general agreement, there was no inclination to proceed to give the authority for the necessary reorganization of Public Works.

Why I am opposed to this overlapping of responsibility is that so often throughout the public service we find not only is there an overlap but there is, sometimes, something missing as a result. This makes it possible for everyone to blame everyone else for what is not done.

As late as last summer I pursued for some time some restructuring of our Canadian embassies in foreign countries, where I felt there were too many people duplicating effort from too many different departments. The Prime Minister issued a communiqué at that time in which he decided that the work of three ministries would be co-ordinated under one ministry. I sent him a note suggesting that was fine as a start, but then we should start incorporating the other four which are represented in our foreign embassies.

The reason I did this was that back some few years ago—five years almost—we had some difficulties in our coastal waters. I put a question on the Order Paper concerning surveillance of coastal waters and found that six different ministries have responsibility for surveillance of our coastal waters. This meant at that particular time that it was possible for six ministers to pass the buck when we had difficulty in a search and rescue operation.

There is so little opportunity in 20 minutes to say everything one would like. There is so much more I want to say and it is unfortunate I will not be able to develop the theme I wanted to, discussing changes in ministers as well as the change in deputy ministers. I will only name them. We went from Mr. Arthur Laing to Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé, and they have changed fairly regularly in the past several years. It is in part these changes at this level and the problems respecting the responsibilities of deputy ministers which leads us into a situation where if nothing can be done in a very, very short period of time, the chances are that all we need to do is wait for the next change, either in a ministerial or deputy ministerial position, and then we can go back to sleep for another year.

● (1720)

This work has been going on now for something like 17 years, according to the records I have here. This was dealt with very thoroughly in the Senate study on the accommodation program of the Department of Public Works. The recommendations deal specifically with what I have been proposing, the co-ordination of the activities of all construction and property management under one head. I hope some day someone will do something to get rid of this overlapping responsibility, which results in a waste of money and decreased efficiency.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, since I know how concerned the hon. member is about this subject, I suggest he be given a few more minutes to continue, if he wants to develop his theme. I do not know whether he wants to continue for a little while longer. I would certainly be prepared to yield the floor to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Are you short of speakers this afternoon?

Mr. Herbert: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I thank as well the members of this House.

Yes, it is true that I came with a relatively limited amount of material, knowing we are ordinarily limited to 20 minutes, but there is quite a bit more I would very much like to put on the record.

I would particularly like to develop the theme concerning the various responsibilities. Well after the conclusion of the task force sessions, and despite efforts over a two-year period, it was not possible to develop the necessary accord with the Treasury Board Secretariat—I referred to that before, and the gentleman concerned—for combining forces to move the mandate ahead.

The primary reason was that early in 1970 Simon Reisman was moved from the Treasury Board. Constitutional doctrine and practice holds that a minister is responsible not only for the direction of his department but also for its administration. The statutes also provide for the appointment of a deputy minister, but they are silent on his role. The minister is more than fully occupied by the overwhelming questions of policy and, as I have said here in the House often, that probably is a good thing. As a result the minister will not likely delve into the administration of his department and will, in my opinion quite rightly, leave the administration to his deputy minister.

The pressures of ministerial responsibility force the division of labour along reasonably clear and acceptable lines. I have also suggested that that is a good thing because probably most of our ministers—and I say this not unkindly at all but as an objective comment—are not sufficiently trained to be departmental administrators. Those who have the ability and knowledge to get into the administration of a department are probably smart enough to keep their fingers off.

A well-known gentleman who was very involved at that particular time, Gordon Robertson, was the clerk of the Privy Council at that time. He had been consistently sympathetic to what the Department of Public Works was proposing and, of course, the intent was to make a single designated agency. The Department of Public Works was battling the Ministry of Transport, the National Capital Commission—which I have not already mentioned—the Department of National Defence, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Revenue dependency was a contentious issue between the Department of Public Works and the Treasury Board Secretariat. I have made little reference in my remarks—because time did not permit—to revenue dependency, in which I firmly believe and I hope one day will be the method by which we operate. If I may, I would just like to refer to the Senate committee document produced in September, 1978. The document indicates that only under revenue dependency will the Department of Public Works be faced with the same kind of financial discipline which constrains private developers, a discipline which should lead to the construction of less costly buildings.

My original suggestion some years ago was that the estimates which are presented in the blue book to which I have referred already—assuring a total for the Department of Public Works of some $755 million for last year—should in fact be reduced to the salary of the minister and his automobile. I have been frustrated over the years in trying to get answers in committee with respect to the various amounts that are spent by departments for accommodation and so on and, of course, we always receive the same answer, that the moneys are actually spent by the Department of Public Works, and the figures are only given to carry in its estimates. I think the problem which will have to be very clearly identified is that if we ever get to full revenue dependency, we will have to lay down the law to various departments that the figures which will become part of their budgets must, of necessity, be fully understood so that they will be able to answer for those expenditures in committee.

I appreciate this opportunity to continue, but because I intentionally brought with me material only for a 20-minute speech, if I try to go on any longer I fear that I will include material which is not particularly relevant to the subject under discussion. May I only say again that my objective this afternoon is to point out once again the inefficiencies and the inadequacies of allowing six or seven different departments to have their own construction companies and their own construction forces. It would be much more efficient to centralize everything in one organization and, if the excuse for not doing that is any alleged inadequacy, weakness or inefficiency in the Department of Public Works, to ensure first that that department is a top-notch efficient construction organization which can operate in the most efficient possible fashion. If that can be accomplished, then we will have not only a substantial reduction in the number of personnel working in total throughout the various departments, but it will also be possible, via the reorganization, to identify better the millions of dollars which we are spending in the field of construction, acquisition of land, acquisition of building, etc.

I hope that in the very near future some positive move will be made to bring in the necessary changes which will result in these efficiencies.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, before I refer to the point at hand, the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), I would like to pay a sincere tribute to him because he is one of the few members of this House who takes advantage of this provision in the rules for the use of this time every second Thursday—but really most Thursday, because we do not have many private members' private bills—on notices of motions for the production of papers. I hope more hon. members of this House could be encouraged to use this period. It has been noted that the hon. member for Vaudreuil is often on his feet on Thursdays during this hour. That is because he takes advantage of the rules as they were intended, and perhaps other members could follow suit. When they look at pages 94 and 95 of the Order Paper hon. members will notice that there are only perhaps half a dozen notices of motions for the production of papers. If we are to continue to justify this hour being left in our rules, hon. members must take advantage of it. I hope other hon. members will follow the lead of my colleague, the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

● (1730)

I am very pleased to participate in this debate. I do not propose to focus on the substantive questions which the hon. member for Vaudreuil raised, that is the contemplated restructuring of the Department of Public Works in 1970. Rather, my remarks will deal in a more formal way with the protection of confidentiality of government documents.

I would like to explore the background to the important constitutional convention involved while we talk about protection of cabinet documents. Some of the remarks that I will make will follow on the heels of the debate we have had on Bill C-43, which I believe we debated last week. I think it is very appropriate that I deal with this aspect of the notice of motion put forward today by the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

In the few moments that I have I would like to examine the way other jurisdictions deal with executive powers and confidentiality of documents, and to look at the system of government where the executive is accountable to Parliament, such as ours. I will outline various examples.

I shall refer also to the positions taken by other parties represented in the House as well as to views put forward by persons knowledgeable of our constitutional institution. There is a general acceptance in our society, especially among members of this House, that the cabinet system should be allowed a certain degree of confidentiality so that it can make decisions in an atmosphere which is removed from the strains of public pressure. If ministers were expected to consider important issues and make decisions in a fish bowl, that is in full public view, they would inevitably feel inhibited in collectively deciding what is in the best interests of this country. They would be subject to the pressures of those who cry the loudest of the most effective of the lobby groups. This is a real concern in society today, and notwithstanding the fact that we protect the confidentiality of cabinet documents, we see that our system of government is becoming more and more imprisoned by the actions of effective lobby and power groups. In a sense the rights, responsibilities and the duty toward the ordinary citizen in society seem often to get on the wrong side of issues, or to get the short end of the stick. We find very effective, powerful, well-financed lobby groups able to influence decisions. It is my contention that if we were to make the system much more accessible, we would see this tendency to increased pressure from lobby groups become even stronger and perhaps work to the detriment of our democratic system.

The principal rationale for claiming protection for cabinet papers is that these documents reveal the process whereby the government, as a whole, establishes collective responsibility for actions that will be taken by individual members or by the Crown. Therefore, I think it is well accepted that the principal role of cabinet is political rather than administrative and that its political function merits special protection. This protection is founded on the convention that cabinet solidarity is essential to the maintenance of confidence in the ministry. Disclosing papers reflecting the process whereby ministers establish collective responsibility would jeopardize the unity and hence the viability of the ministry.

The confidentiality attached to cabinet documents is not merely a time-honoured tradition, but an important constitutional convention applicable in all parliamentary democracies based on the British system. It is recognized in the United Kingdom, in Australia and New Zealand, as well as in this country.

The authoritative statement of this convention is to be found in the judgment rendered by Lord Reid in his landmark decision, I believe in 1968, in the case of Conway versus Rimmer. That decision concerned the question of Crown privilege, but in it Lord Reid gives the views as to why the workings of cabinet ought not to be made public. In part, that decision read:

> I do not doubt that there are certain classes of documents which ought not to be disclosed whatever their content may be. Virtually everyone agrees that cabinet minutes and the like ought not to be disclosed until such time as they are only of historical interest. But I do not think that many people would give as the reason that premature disclosure would prevent candour in the cabinet. To my mind the most important reasons is that such disclosure would create or fan ill-informed or captious public or political criticism. The business of government is difficult enough as it is, and no government could contemplate with equanimity the inner workings of the government machine being exposed to the gaze of those ready to criticize without adequate knowledge of background and perhaps with some axe to grind.

In Canada the principle has been reflected in various official pronouncements over the years. I want to refer briefly to the 1973 guidelines applicable to notices of motion for the production of papers. Specifically, these guidelines provide for an exemption for "cabinet documents and those documents which include a Privy Council confidence". In June, 1977, the same approach is reflected in a green paper issued by the then secretary of state concerning public access to government documents. The green paper specifically endorsed the idea that there should be an exemption for cabinet documents in any future access to information legislation.

It is interesting to note—and too often some of us forget—that the official opposition, when it formed the government for a brief period in 1979, also felt that cabinet documents ought not to be made public. I refer to their proposed freedom of information legislation contained in Bill C-15 which put forth a quite articulate and most detailed exemption covering all types of cabinet records. That particular exemption would have authorized the withholding of any proposals or recommendations prepared or submitted to cabinet, as well as other related documents such as agenda of cabinet and documents reporting the deliberations or decisions of cabinet.

The exemption of the previous government also encompassed records used for or reflecting consultations among ministers of the Crown on matters relating to the making of government decisions or the formulation of government policies. As well included in the Conservative freedom of information bill was an exemption from the right of access to records containing briefings to ministers of the Crown in relation to matters that were before, or proposed to be brought before, cabinet. Finally, the exemption also covered draft legislation as well as cabinet discussion papers which were defined as being records containing background explanations, analysis of problems, or policy options submitted or prepared for submission to cabinet.

I should point out that I was quite surprised, I believe last Thursday night, by statements of the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he intervened in second reading debate of the access of information legislation put forth by the hon. Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) in Bill C-43. The Leader of the Opposition claimed that this government's exemption for cabinet documents had been extensively broadened to include discussion papers with "background explanations, analysis of problems or policy options". As well, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition expressed shock at finding in this government's exemption "records used for briefing ministers in relation to matters that are before or proposed to be brought before cabinet".

I would suggest that if the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition had been curious enough to read his own legislation on freedom of information before participating in the debate last week, he would have seen that, save for a very minor technical change, the cabinet document exemption in Conservative Bill C-15 in the Thirty-first Parliament is identical to the exemption in Bill C-43. I point this out not so much to correct the statements of the Leader of the Official Opposition—which should be done anyway—but to show to this House how two major parties can be in agreement with the nature and scope of confidentiality to be accorded to cabinet documents.

● (1740)

As well, by the very practice they followed during the short period of time the Conservatives were running the country, the previous government endorsed the principle of cabinet confidentiality. To my knowledge, the outgoing administration also abided by the guidelines which came into force in 1973 respecting the motions for the production of papers.

There is broader agreement between the two main parties, to which I would like to refer at this particular point in time. When the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments came up with its own proposals for freedom of information legislation in 1978, its report contained a recommendation to the effect that documents prepared expressly for or in connection with the deliberations or decisions of cabinet or the cabinet committee should be the subject of an exemption. I emphasize that the standing joint committee was composed of members of all parties represented in the House, as well as representatives from the other place. Therefore, on this particular aspect there was a parliamentary consensus in the full sense of the word.

Even among expert groups interested in the subject of government openness and freedom of information, there is a recognition that cabinet documents and cabinet procedures are worthy of special treatment. I refer in particular, to the model bill on freedom of information prepared in March of 1979 by the Canadian Bar Association. That model bill listed the exemptions which the Canadian Bar Association felt should apply to limit public access to government documents. The first exemption listed is the one dealing with cabinet records. In other words, the Canadian Bar Association probably felt that among all classes of information needing protection, cabinet records should stand out prominently.

This brief overview of the practices followed in other jurisdictions, of the constant position adopted by succeeding governments in this country, and of the views of the legal experts which I have given in the last few minutes, will show there has been over the years a consensus that the workings of cabinet should not be made public in a premature fashion, and that they should not be made public to the point where it would make the reaching of decisions a most difficult, if not impossible process. Therefore I would recommend that this House, in all its wisdom, reject the motion put forth by my good friend from Vaudreuil. As I said earlier, he put forward this motion with the best of intentions, with the best of motivations and with sincerity.

I wish to underline that the government is committed to the concept of open government. It has introduced legislation on access to information which is now before this House. We wish to proceed with that legislation and to comply with its spirit. Indeed, earlier this afternoon, in reply to the point of order of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), I dealt with the fact that answers tabled in the House, in response to questions on the Order Paper, must comply strictly with the provisions of Bill C-43, notwithstanding that the bill is not yet law. I think it is a very commendable directive which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has given to the government and to all of us on this side of the House.

Cabinet confidentiality should be preserved if we are to preserve the integrity of responsible British parliamentary democracy in the traditional mold.

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) I will have to make a brief review of the history of the Department of Public Works. First of all, however, I want to congratulate him for his interest in the Department of Public Works and at the same time try to reassure him and dispel some of his concerns.

Department of Public Works

If I may, I will go back a number of years to make a brief review of public works. In 1841—and that is quite a while ago of course—the Bureau of Public Works was created as an organization of the province of Canada, much in the same way as our Crown corporations today. In the early days of confederation the departments of marine, fisheries, railways and canals shouldered most of the responsibilities previously belonging to the Department of Public Works.

In 1879 the minister of public works was responsible for administering and directing the execution of all public works, except in cases specifically identified in other statutes. In its 1962-63 recommendations on real property the Glassco Commission pointed out that quite a number of departments were responsible for real property services. It recommended that DPW have exclusive jurisdiction over property management, excepting National Defence; over planning and supervision of all construction works required by the departments, as well as hiring the required experts. It would also be in charge of management of real property, planning of federal real property, acquiring such property through purchases or rentals, disposing of surplus real property, and applying the Municipal Grants Act. The costs were to be charged to departments and organizations in exchange for accommodation and real property services.

In 1964 a committee of senior officials was set up to study the recommendations of the Glassco Commission and emphasize the need for establishing a central real property index, the advantage of including all annual outlays for real property in the maintenance and operations budget of client departments, the merit of profitability studies—build ourselves or contract out—the excessive dispersal of real property acquisitions among six large federal departments and organizations, and the waste of resources resulting from keeping professional and technical staff in several departments.

In 1965 the consulting firm of Peat, Marwick and Mitchell made a thorough study of DPW operations. Their recommendation was to consolidate the internal management of the department. They suggested three possibilities: first, two operational groups, housing design and construction, each supported by district offices under a general directorate for planning policies at the central administration; second, six nearly independent regional offices directed by a small central administration responsible for policies and co-ordination; third, keeping a centralized department with specific responsibilities for planning and operations shared among the central administration and the regions.

In November, 1965, Treasury Board approved a new structure for DPW. This would give the department a solid base to delegate a large part of its responsibilities and operational authority to field offices and would satisfy the accounting requirements between DPW as a service department and its client departments. Following the consulting firm's report, DPW suggested that Treasury Board should appoint it the only real property agency for the federal government. In April, 1967, Treasury Board approved that suggestion and organized with DPW's clients discussions on the department's new mandate.

In June, 1969, a joint task force was established consisting of representatives from Treasury Board and Public Works. It was its responsibility to propose a solution in order to achieve a more efficient management of federal activities in the building and real property fields. In December, 1969, a central agency draft report recognized that the government's principles in real property management were obsolete, more specifically that building and real property management was still fragmentary, and that DPW's operations were based on conflicting objectives of service and control.

● (1750)

The report recognized the need for the central agencies and the various departments to take part in the solution of these problems. The same report recommended the creation of a Department of Public Works headed by a minister, staffed by a limited number of people, and responsible for a Crown corporation, Federal Property of Canada Limited, which would be the main operational agency that would satisfy the federal government's property needs. Those were Treasury Board's recommendations; the joint task force did not publish a final report.

In December 1969, the person who was to be appointed deputy minister of public works, Mr. J. A. MacDonald, saw the need for an important restructuring of the Department of Public Works. He specified the motivational requirements for the staff employed in central service agencies and drew a parallel with the private sector where success is rewarded and failure penalized. He also indicated the need to be cost conscious, which he considered a difficult if not impossible task under a system of parliamentary votes. He concluded by saying that the Department of Public Works should be made into a Crown corporation. He inquired of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the possibility for quick passage of an act authorizing the establishment of the proposed corporation. In reply, the Prime Minister asked the minister, Arthur Laing, and the deputy minister to undertake a comprehensive study of the whole organization and its operation and to submit a detailed report to the government. On December 22, 1969, the Prime Minister replied to a question asked at a press conference, that federal real property management could be more effective and that he had asked for all possible solutions to be analysed. He did not reject the possibility of creating a Crown corporation which would be responsible for some of the activities of the department.

A joint task force from Treasury Board and DPW was established in January, 1970, to examine the concepts outlined by the deputy minister and to prepare the comprehensive report requested by the Prime Minister. In this report published in June, 1970, the task force indicated that by creating a departmental agency without the status of corporation, would amount to establishing an owner corporation. The report also mentioned several problems that remained to be solved: first, autonomy for job classification and rates of pay; second, the difficulty of consolidating all property services in a single agency, and particularly the problem of related costs; third, quality assurance.

At the end of August, 1970, as cabinet would probably be considering the issue in the Fall, the deputy minister was informed that a full document would be needed to make a decision in principle about the type of real property management system deemed appropriate. Implementation plans and schedules were also requested. As a result the Privy Council received in mid-September a paper entitled "Proposals for Real Property Management".

Among the issues discussed in this report is the possibility of maintaining a departmental structure, while taking as much advantage as possible of the flexibility provided in existing statutes, to give to the service the businesslike thrust which was considered necessary. The report expressed the same opinion as the Glassco report, to the effect that the level of autonomy sought by senior management is due more to present or historical operational deficiencies in the system than to unavoidable weaknesses. While the working paper considered, as usual, other structural possibilities including that of a Crown corporation, it noted that, whether this might be acceptable or not at the present time, it is not necessary to prove that the departmental formula is totally unacceptable before considering a corporate structure. Each formula can be valid depending on the circumstances. It is then to be concluded that the departmental formula could be used if department managers availed themselves of the maximum flexibility provided by the statutes, if they had specific terms of reference, if they could operate according to a cost price method, and finally, if they received the co-operation required to gain the necessary level of autonomy as concerns management.

The principle of revolving funds would relieve the department from the process of the annual budget. The task force brought forward six points in favour of this type of organization: First, it would make it possible to do away with the former image of Public Works; second, it would improve commercial relations with the department's clients; third, it would be easier for the department to create an environment and a motivation beneficial to a self-financing system; fourth, it would help to attract and to keep the required managers, experts and technicians; fifth, it would show the availability of various control mechanisms suitable for a service organization; sixth, it would allow the department to be less service-oriented.

During the following months, the matter was discussed at various meetings attended by Treasury Board officials and representatives of the Privy Council. Consequently, at the beginning of June, 1971, the Prime Minister advised the minister and the deputy minister of public works that the restructuration of DPW would not be included in the legislative program of the government for 1971-72.

With regard to the current situation, we became aware over the last few years that is was necessary to improve the management of government programs and keep Parliament better informed. The Glassco commission, the Auditor General and the Lambert commission, considered those questions and made recommendations likely to bring about improvements. Moreover, the department had to consider those questions because of recent financial constraints. The Auditor General, the Lambert commission and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have recognized the necessity to divulge and justify rental costs of premises. Each one of them recommended the billing of rental costs and the management of DPW operations according to revenues as a first step toward that goal. In the spring of 1979 an interdepartmental committee under the Treasury Board Secretariat recommended that a plan be drawn up to ensure management of the DPW space rental program according to the revenues collected.

In view of the foregoing, DPW is currently working on the development of a system to collect from its client departments and corporations the utilization costs for the premises and the services provided to them. This system is supposed to allow DPW activities to become revenue dependent. This revenue dependency will be secured directly by way of changes based on market rates for premises and professional services.

By billing the department for expenses related to premises, management and professional services provided by DPW and its operating costs according to the revenue dependency principle, the efficiency and effectiveness of the department would be improved, as well parliamentary control over premises costs, would be reduced. The proposed system must provide for the management of space leased by the Department of Public Works or belonging to the Crown. The Department of Public Works is responsible for some 9,500 buildings and over 8 million square metres of space leased at an estimated annual cost of $650 million in 1979-80, with operating and maintenance annual costs of $492 million. This system must also provide for real property management as well as the management of professional services provided by DPW, such as planning and management of assets, architectural and engineering services, and purchase and disposal of real property. Those services are estimated at $135 million each year. The assets—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on a point of order.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has quoted from a document published in 1970, the very one requested in my motion. I suggest he could now let us see this document as he has read approximately two thirds of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): This suggestion may be discussed some other time. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of my remarks regarding this particular bill earlier today, I mentioned this country's growing gross national debt, the net debt, the fact that the interest on that particular debt is in excess of $12 billion annually, and the burden all that imposes upon Canadians. I spoke as well of the failure of the government to act in a responsible manner and of its lack of sound fiscal management.

A year ago this government won an election on the pretext that Canadians could get a "free lunch" when it comes to energy prices. It fought the election campaign on the pretext that this country could continue to borrow against the future. Now we are faced with some harsh realities that are the result of those election promises. We are paying more for energy and we face an increasing deficit over the next few years.

As I pointed out earlier, the combined deficits over on eight-year period amount to some $92 billion. Energy prices have increased 50 per cent since the defeat of the Conservative government and the country is faced with the prospect of larger deficits.

The government has failed to bite the bullet; it has failed to level with the Canadian people. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) shakes his head in a negative manner, but he knows that is the case; the record speaks for itself.

It is unfortunate that this government still has not learned its lesson. It continues on a policy course that has not changed.

Consider the tremendous potential of the country, particularly in the area of energy, and then consider the trend toward continued reliance on oil imports which will cost $20 billion to $30 billion annually.

The government should take steps to stimulate the private sector and get involved with the major producing component in our society—and that really is the answer to economic activity. Rather than providing the incentives and the climate that would motivate the private sector to take up the challenge, however, the government is involved in the wholesale takeover of a number of enterprises. Another corporation has just been gobbled up by Petro-Canada at a cost to the Canadian taxpayer of $1.5 billion. It is nationalizing, confiscating, destroying industries which are viable and productive and which provide jobs in the economy and spin-off tax dollars for the coffers of the government. It is really drunk with the philosophy of government ownership. It is doing this in the name of promoting Canadianization of industry. It is not Canadianization, it is nationalization. Surely there are more ways to encourage Canadian ownership of our economy than through government ownership.

● (2010)

Why not look at ways and means of encouraging individuals to participate in the ownership of Canadian industry. That is what this country is all about. That is what built this country. The government is not satisfied with that approach. It wants the whole loaf, to be totally involved. The government is on a course which is going to stifle, if not kill, the enterprising spirit of Canadians. It is a course which will discourage private enterprise and private investment. It will certainly impede the ability of our basic and fundamental industries to pursue a course of fulfilling their utmost potential. Above all, it will discourage innovation.

We have a government which is pursuing a policy of inconsistency as well. As one who comes from western Canada, I cannot help but note the government's deliberate attack on an industry that is based in western Canada. It tackles the oil industry in the west while on the other hand is attempting to hold on to and bail out industries in central Canada, in the course of creating deep divisions, discord and bitterness.

This government takes the position that jobs are more important in central Canada than they are in the west. However, when one looks at it, this narrow approach which the government is following is in effect hurting the central heartland of Canada. The development of resources in the west impact clearly upon central Canada. It clearly impacts upon its ability to provide jobs in manufacturing activities and economic spin-off.

One finds it almost preposterous when looking at the policy stance upon which this government has embarked. Every institution, council and advisory group is warning the government that it must change its direction. The latest one is the chairman of the board of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, Richard M. Thomson. I wish to quote what he has to say about how we can turn the economy around in this country. I quote from a speech he made to his shareholders on January 21, 1981:

> Central Canada, particularly Ontario, must not look upon the development of energy resources in the west and, indeed, off the east coast as an expensive burden but rather as an opportunity for the further development of Canadian manufacturing, the further integration of the Canadian economy and the development of secure petroleum supplies. It is most important that Ontario and Quebec get strongly behind the energy developments in both the west and off the east coast. This is enlightened self-interest; it means more employment for Canadians, an increased level of energy security and a stronger and more developed Canadian economy in the 1980s.

There can be nothing more truthful than that statement. What has happened is that this government has failed to enunciate an over-all economic development policy which will provide economic help and stimulus to all regions of Canada by providing a positive economic climate.

Why do we not have an economic blueprint for the eighties from this government? What are its goals and its short, medium and long-term objectives? What will be the role of the private sector? Will the government continue along the destructive route that it has established itself on at the present time?

What can we expect in terms of increased productivity, another very urgent problem in this country? What about investment? We will require a lot of investment, both public and private. What kinds of incentives will there be to encourage private investment, to build our railway infrastructure, and to build and develop our energy potential?

What about innovation, research and development, human resource development, training and re-training and developing skills for our work force? What about regional economic opportunities? We clearly have the potential to develop realistic goals in that area.

What about federal-provincial co-operation? That is clearly a fundamental requirement. We need to have the support, co-operation, working and meshing together of federal and provincial policies. That is a fundamental requirement. Will we, instead, have more unilateralism?

I hope this government realizes very quickly it will have to adopt a co-operative approach which will create confidence within the industry and trust with its provincial counterparts. I know what can be achieved if we work in an environment of co-operation and consultation, particularly with the provinces.

I had some experience when our government addressed some of the problems with respect to grain handling and transportation, port development and urban transportion. As a federal government, we approached the provinces, indicating to them that the problem of solving our grain handling and transportation difficulties was a joint effort. They respond to the challenge. Instead of a government which is going to the provinces seeking their co-operation, we have a federal government which is constantly attacking those provinces. As a result, we are not getting any satisfaction or results in the solution of our deepest and most fundamental problems.

This government is preoccupied with the constitution. This government's intransigence with respect to its energy program has created a vacuum of economic leadership in this country. As a result, as I said earlier, it has created deep division. We in this nation have failed to capitalize on the tremendous opportunities within our grasp. Indeed, we have failed to capitalize on some of our basic fundamental and indigenous strengths in each of our regions. I want to deal with some of those in more detail.

There can be no question that energy holds the key to our economic recovery. It holds the key to individual opportunities. It clearly holds the key to providing a more balanced economic growth and development in this nation.

The potential of our oil and gas industry for jobs, the advancement of technology, research and development, and industrial spin-off throughout the whole of Canada is almost staggering. It has been quoted that we are looking at 350,000 jobs, and hundreds of billions of dollars worth of economic activities spread throughout the land, yet we have a National Energy Program that is universally condemned. It is destructive to the industry and antagonistic to the producing provinces. It is creating division in this country and is detrimental to job opportunities, particularly for young Canadians.

It is creating a situation which penalizes exploration and penalizes Canadian companies. It is driving expertise, investment, equipment and machinery out of the country.

● (2020)

There is talk of exploration activity being reduced by 30 per cent to 40 per cent. I have here a summary of cancellations, postponements or reductions in exploration budgets totalling almost $18 billion. There is reduced economic activity. We talk about the exodus of drilling rigs from this country, 60 rigs have been moved from Canada. There are an additional 60 committed to move from Canada by April 30, 1981. When these rigs leave, they do not leave for six months but for a minimum of two years. I have said in this House before that every time one of these oil drilling rigs leaves the country, it is like closing down a factory which employs 40 to 50 people. Some 16 servicing rigs have moved. Contractors forecast the following casualities to occur by May 15, 1981: 200 rigs out of service in Canada without contracts; 86 additional service rigs out of service and scheduled to move out of Canada. I am reading from the report put out by the drillers' association which goes on to indicate:

> The drilling and servicing fleet being moved from Canada in the 184 days since the NEP was issued will eliminate 7,200 jobs at the field level, the downstream effect is estimated to eliminate another 1,800 jobs, or a total of 25,000 Canadian jobs destroyed. The drilling and servicing equipment forecast to be out of service by NEP will affect the jobs of about 10,000 people at the field level. If the shut down continues, the spin-off effect could cause the loss of jobs for an other 25,000 Canadians.
> On the present forecast trend 60,000 Canadian jobs are threatened by mid-1981.

Jobs in the west are just as important to the workers there as they are to people in central Canada. The megaprojects are shelved. Each synthetic oil recovery plans was scheduled to produce some $250 billion to $300 billion in economic activity over the life of these projects. Some 40 per cent of that money was to be spent in central Canada on steel, equipment, pipe, valves, engines, turbines, electrical equipment and vehicles.

Let us consider heavy oil. I happen to be interested in heavy oil because there is a fair amount of it produced in my constituency, yet the vice-president of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas said just recently in Lloydminster, as reported in the Edmonton Journal of January 28:

> The National Energy Program has made development of much of the heavy oil reserves around Lloydminster uneconomic . . .
> Sedgewick, who said he was speaking on behalf of the Canadian Petroleum Association . . . told the Lloydminster Chamber of Commerce the new 8-per-cent petroleum revenue tax and the new split in revenues upset "A fine balance" in Saskatchewan oil fields.

It goes on:

> The company cancelled the drilling of 350 wells and a thermal recovery pilot project scheduled for the Saskatchewan side after the energy program was announced.

We have evidence from the oil producers of southwestern Saskatchewan wherein they point out that those wells producing something in the order of 40 to 50 barrels per day are uneconomic. They will not be brought into service again when they are being forced to shut down for servicing because it is simply uneconomical to do so.

As a result of the National Energy Policy, Husky has had to cut back its development program of 300 wells by half for 1981, and there are serious concerns about the $300 million in expenditures proposed for various projects in Saskatchewan. Mr. Blair noted that a major portion of about 600 of Husky's 1,800 to 2,000 wells in the Lloydminster area may be shut in and the economic situation is recovery of the lifting cost.

Let us go on to look at other predictions. Imperial estimates that the energy policy will reduce domestic oil supply by 180,000 barrels per day by 1985 and by 600,000 barrels per day by 1990. Importing 600,000 barrels per day for one year at the current international oil price of $40 a barrel would cost $8.7 billion.

We find another quotation from Gulf:

> The recently announced national energy policy means increased reliance for Canada on imported oil—at a cost of $55 billion during the next five years.

It goes on to state:

> Canada's dependence on imported oil will rise to almost 600,000 barrels a day—

Then we must consider the province of Alberta, and this is where a very fundamental difference crops up between negotiations with Alberta and the federal government. The federal government predicts that under its National Energy Program, imports will be reduced to zero by 1990. Alberta has a different version. It suggests that under the National Energy Program, net imports will rise steadily to reach 525,000 barrels a day in 1985 and 734,000 barrels per day by 1990. When we look at this, we must realize that we could be spending another $20 billion to $30 billion per year to meet our oil import needs. The National Energy Program suggested that its objectives were security, opportunity and fairness. It is quite clear that all the evidence we have now been able to gather would point out that security of supply or self-sufficiency in petroleum products by 1990 will not be achieved.

When we consider opportunity, let us look at all the jobs being lost and the massive exodus. Let us look at fairness. As an Albertan I have to tell the House—and this view is shared by many Albertans—that it is not fair. Let me ask whether it is fair that we should be buying oil from Venezuela and other OPEC countries at $43 a barrel, while paying the government of Alberta $17.75 a barrel for conventional crude, which works out to 41 per cent.

Last July, Alberta proposed more rapid oil price increases, but not that much more rapid. Under Alberta's plan domestic oil would be selling for $19.25 this month instead of $17.75. In other words, Alberta proposed to sell its declining conventional oil at 45 per cent of the Venezuelan price but this government turned it down. Who are the bad Canadians, who is being unfair? Why is there a freeze in relations between Edmonton and Ottawa? Why are the oil sands projects not going ahead? Why is our industry faltering, and why are tertiary oil recovery projects collapsing?

The fact of the matter is that the program is clearly not fair; it is certainly not fair to Alberta and it is clearly not good for Canada. I can tell the House that Alberta's determination to fight this policy will not wane, and that the government of the province of Alberta has the support of its people.

We look at the National Energy Program and what it proposes to extract through taxes imposed on natural gas and oil. If one looks at the maximum amount it is able to recover with the Canadian ownership charge, one finds it works out to the shifting of some $37.5 billion from the coffers of the producing provinces to the federal government. Most look upon that not as an encroachment but, rather, as a raid. Out of the $37 billion which will be extracted over the next three years, some $2 billion will be put into a so-called western development fund. I can tell hon. members that that is pretty small potatoes when we consider the massive shift which has taken place. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) indicated in the committee one day that he thought part of that $2 billion would be used for transportation. He has now told me that might be very difficult.

● (2030)

The Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) aligns himself with the policies of this government and attempts to herald himself as the great preserver of resource ownership for the provinces. It was my impression that ownership rights are now entrenched in the constitution; ownership now rests with the provinces. The Leader of the New Democratic Party suggests that he can tell the province of Alberta how it should handle its royalty and taxing measures. He suggests Alberta is losing some $600 million. I do not think the people of Alberta need any of that hollow wisdom emanating from the mouth of the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Ownership is an existing constitutional right for the provinces, and this government is attempting to waffle and weasel out of it. We are clearly missing the boat in terms of exploiting our energy potential in this country. That is one of our natural strengths, and we are not taking advantage of it.

There are some other natural strengths we have which this government is failing to recognize. Agriculture is one of them. What I am trying to say is that by the government's motivating and providing a climate which would be conducive for these industries to flourish, we could be generating much more revenue for Canada and for Canadians. Agriculture is clearly one of those basic and fundamental industries which is being shortchanged by this government.

The movement of grain once again is in jeopardy. The other day the Minister of Transport said we will have to ration grain cars unless we make some changes to the Crow rate. I hope the Minister of Transport will cease associating himself with that statement, because all it does is further impair our reputation as a reliable supplier of grain.

It certainly does nothing to build up confidence in the minds of the producers we are asking to produce amounts of grain which would give us the opportunity to export 30 million tonnes of grain by the year 1985 or 35 million tonnes by 1990. We need an investment of some $14 billion to $15 billion in our railroad system, and much of this could come from private funds.

We could be looking at investment incentives such as incentives similar to MURBs or RRSPs, but this government has no imagination. It thinks everything which must be done simply by government ownership and by government control.

With respect to port development, this is another area in which we need co-operation with the provinces and with industry, but we have a federal government which would rather fight with the provinces than work with them.

With respect to freight rates, we must remove the anomalies which mitigate against the further processing and manufacturing of agricultural products and particularly grain products in Western Canada.

Western Canada has 27 per cent of the Canadian population but only about 17 per cent of the manufacturing activity. Only 8 per cent of the manufacturing activity takes place in the prairie provinces. I am not suggesting that the prairies should be an industrial giant like central Canada, but there certainly is potential for further processing and manufacturing of agricultural products on the prairies. There is no co-operation today. The two levels of government are in conflict.

There must be greater diversification in the agricultural industry. Today we are importing almost one third of our food basket; one third of our food basket is composed of imported foods. We are not expanding our productive potential in agriculture.

We have a problem in the beef industry today. The government has lifted all restrictions on beef and veal. There have been massive increases in imports, which cause depressed prices. We were promised a meat import law by this government. We are into the second month of 1981, and we still have no meat import law. Cattle producers are in serious trouble in this country. They have been losing money for the last two years. Many of the producers in my part of the country are saying they will either quit or face bankruptcy. Here again we have a situation in which there are some anomalies in terms of freight rates, feed freight assistance and pricing policy.

The size of western Canada's hog industry has been reduced by about 50 per cent in the last eight years. Ontario's industry has increased by 35 per cent, and Quebec's has doubled. There are some distortions which are creating that.

We all know that input costs have increased dramatically. Interest costs are crippling beef producers. The Farm Credit Corporation is out of money. It cannot lend any more money to producers, and this government fails to act.

I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 in the House today. It was rather strange that all the Liberals involved with agriculture seemed to agree. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) and the chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture cheered me on and said, "Yes, yes, we are all for it", but nothing is happening. I asked on a urgent basis for at least $150 million in increased funding, and I hope the government seriously considers that.

I am pleased that the government made some changes with respect to the Small Business Development Bond, and I commend the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) because I think he is a reasonable person. I think the small business development bond will be well accepted. I hope the government will apply that to unincorporated farmers as well as incorporated farmers. I hope the minister will still consider that, because there should not be any magic in applying for a Small Business Development Bond either as an incorporated farmer or as an unincorporated producer. I hope the minister will look at that, because I think we are dealing with the same kinds of producers here.

I turn now to the herd maintenance program. I have never seen a program as half-baked, badly-administered and grossly unfair as the herd maintenance program. It is really a charade; it is unbelieveable. I was talking to a constituent yesterday, and he said, "Trying to get information from that infamous Zenith number is like approaching the Kremlin. First of all, it is difficult to get through, and once you get through, you cannot get any answer." There have been petitions. The area of northeastern Alberta including Lloydminster, Bonnyville, St. Paul, Two Hills, Vermillion and Vegreville suffered just as much drought and hardship as the areas which suffered in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There was way less than 80 per cent of the normal yield. As a matter of fact, it was 25 per cent to 50 per cent below the normal yield. Petitions have been submitted, and representations have been made. The evidence is clearly documented. Applications are in and appeals have been filed, but nothing has happened. We have an appeal board now. My colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), moved a motion under Standing Order 43 recommending to the minister that someone from the northern part of Alberta be added to the appeal board. There is a gentleman on the board who represents the province of Alberta, but he hails from Taber. There really is a serious drought situation in northeastern Alberta, but nothing has happened. If it is intended to help producers, let it help all producers who were affected. There should be no discrimination.

In my own way I have attempted to outline some of the areas which I think are crucial to economic recovery in this country. Some industries and sectors provide the impetus to build an economy that is strong, productive and provides jobs. However, all of this must be done in a climate of freedom where there is some flexibility for individual Canadians, so that people can be enterprising, innovative and able to participate in our growth.

There is a need for urgent action now, not only in certain areas and regions, but there needs to be a general rethinking of this government's total economic approach. At one time I thought this government was on the road to working with private industry and the private sector as a partnership. But it has certainly shelved that policy. That is most unfortunate. It is unfortunate that the approach of the current government is, in my opinion, destroying the political and economic fabric of my country. I do not like what I am seeing.

Unless there are some dramatic changes, I think we will see increased hardship, increased frustration and perhaps a deeper division between regions and between Canadians. It could result in some very serious implications for our country and for individual Canadians.

There is no question—and I am speaking as a westerner—that western Canadians want to participate in the economic social and political activities of this country. We have much to offer. We have demonstrated that we are prepared to share. We have shared in the past, and we will continue to share in the future. But, for goodness sake, I hope this government stops exploiting division in this country. I hope it will start governing as a national government, rather than attacking half of the country and governing the other half.

The election is over. Canadians recognize that the government has broken a lot of promises. But, now is the time to get on with the job, to provide leadership, both political and economic, because we have a tremendous potential; it would be a shame if we lost that opportunity.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention as I always do to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who has just finished speaking. I regret that I was not in the House to hear his complete statement. Although it is not my intention to delay consideration of the bill now before us, I do, however, want to make a comment or two in response to his statement. He did make some observations which are not justified by the current situation. I refer particularly to the many questions of energy policy upon which he touched. I regret that time does not permit me to respond to all of them. However, I do want to emphasize that it is important that we keep in mind, as we look at the energy policy, that it does offer the private sector major incentives to develop in particular the offshore and the Arctic resources of our country. These are among the most promising sectors for new oil exploration. The policy also offers opportunities for further development of the conventional oil areas of Canada. Additionally, the policy does offer, by a new price incentive mechanism, the opportunity for tertiary or enchanced recovery in conventional areas.

An hon. Member: Everybody is moving out and shutting down.

Mr. MacLaren: The details of those incentive programs are under discussion with the industry. The hon. member opposite is clearly drawing some early conclusions from what he regards as evidence to the contrary.

Mr. McDermid: Leave Etobicoke, go out west and you will find out.

Mr. MacLaren: I would remind the hon. member opposite that when he refers to self-sufficiency and quotes various people who believe that we shall not achieve self-sufficiency by 1990, he concentrates, as many have done, on the supply side of the equation. He paid no attention to the vital role that conservation and substitution will play in our energy future. Nor for that matter, if he does want to concentrate on the supply side of the equation, does he quote those who have taken the contrary point of view from his. In quoting from recent submissions to the National Energy Board, he overlooks, for example, the predictions of Dome Petroleum, which indicate self-sufficiency by 1990, by increased supply only, without taking into account the role conservation and substitution can play.

The hon. member opposite, in referring to the criticism of the program by the head of one chartered bank, conveniently overlooked the contrary testimony of the chairman of another chartered bank. I make that point merely because there can be honest differences of opinion on policy. But it is equally evident that there are benefits to all Canadians in the program through Canadianization, through the gradual implementation of a made-in-Canada pricing policy, and through the more equitable sharing of revenue from this dynamic sector of our economy.

In his statement the hon. member opposite did not refer to the fact that in Canada the price of oil has risen quite substantially in the past six years, from $6.50 a barrel in 1974 to its current price. This is a level which does not satisfy many in western Canada, but which does, nevertheless, represent a very substantial increase of about 20 per cent annually over those past six years.

Mr. Mazankowski: Forty-one per cent of the world price.

Mr. MacLaren: That being the case, a massive financial problem has been created for the national government of this country when the volume of revenue directed to Alberta is taken into account.

The previous government grappled in its own way in its aborted budget with the same fundamental policy challenge facing Canada today. It is a policy challenge to the federal structure of our country which the recent governments have attempted to meet in a variety of ways.

For example, the federal deficit has grown, something which has not pleased everyone in Canada. This government and the previous one acted to constrain the growth rate in the wellhead price of oil. Also, we have phased out certain equalization payments concerning energy revenues. All those factors combined have still not prevented the rapid increase in government deficit. They have not prevented the provincial share of energy revenue from growing rapidly to the point at which the equalization system in this country is being called into question. They have brought into question the ability of the national government to sustain the equalization system, which has been a basic characteristic of the Canadian confederation in recent years. When the hon. member addresses himself to the National Energy Program in the future, I would ask him to bear in mind that one of the fundamental reasons for the approach taken in that program is fairness, in the sense of enabling the national government to offer those essential services, with which he is fully familiar, for the benefit of all Canadians, and to increase the share of revenue flowing to the national government to meet the legitimate demands of the Canadian people.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to make a few points with respect to the borrowing authority legislation for 1981-82. Bill C-59 asks this House to give the government authority to borrow some $14 billion. You will recall, sir, that in July, 1980, just some six months ago, Parliament passed, on division, a borrowing bill respecting some $12 billion. So this Parliament is really being asked to approve $26 billion by way of a blank cheque. I do not believe I have a mandate from my constituency to approve a blank cheque in the sum of $26 billion. We need only look at the bill to realize the gravity of the situation. It authorizes the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to borrow:

> —in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed . . . by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form . . . at such rates of interest and on such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve . . . fourteen billion dollars—

The government's financial administration is so bad that it must add an extra clause to this bill which allows it to borrow this money in any currency other than that of Canada.

What an enormous crime this is against the citizens of this country! Historically, the role of Parliament has always been the elected people against the Crown—the government—insisting that the king and the government give details as to what the money is for. In ages past our predecessors were prepared to go to the block. They were prepared to lose their heads and hold back supply until they received a satisfactory answer as to how the money would be spent.

I am convinced that the massive deficit of our federal government is distorting our whole Canadian way of life. From my own background as a solicitor I know that it is poisoning the relationship between the people and their government.

People are now actively interested in finding out what the penalty is if they do this or that to avoid taxes. They are actually devising schemes now with a view to evading taxes rather than the lawful avoidance of taxes. The underground economy is growing at an enormous rate. All of this flies in the face of a legitimate and fair income tax system, at least as it is perceived by the people.

Our deficit is poisoning federal-provincial relationships. It is leading to enormous disunity. It is absolutely clear to me, at least, that if it were not for this enormous deficit we would not have a government elected by central Canada.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) does not understand the oil industry. He is attacking the oil industry in western Canada, which is one of our most successful industries and which could provide enormous spin-offs to central Canada. A government elected by one side of the country is attacking the only successful industry we have.

It would be a legitimate subject of discussion if the government were proposing a tax on resource revenue, as long as it included electricity, mines and minerals as well as oil and gas from the west. We could not object to that because Parliament can impose any mode of taxation it wishes. But to impose a tax only on one segment of the industry is grossly unfair and simply wrong.

I wish to make a few comments about the government's financial situation. Then I wish to conclude my remarks tonight with some general comments. I believe we must set up yet another special parliamentary task force. We created one today which will deal with fiscal arrangements. We need a task force which will look at the whole area of government finance, both in terms of revenue and in terms of expenditures, including tax expenditures, as they are generally known.

When one looks at the finances of this government, one must look first at the Bank of Canada's weekly financial statistics sheet. I am looking at one such sheet for January 29, 1981. This should be required reading before anyone is permitted to stand in his place. It is a sobering document. It shows that the federal deficit is some $80.1 billion. It shows that $20.9 billion is owed by way of treasury bills. It shows some $16.9 billion is owed by way of Canada Savings Bonds. It also shows some $42.2 billion which is owed through all sorts of other securities. We know that between $7 billion and $10 billion of this total is owed to agents or lenders outside Canada. Indeed, we know that much more is owed outside because many of the intermediaries from whom we have borrowed by way of treasury bills and Canada Savings Bonds have themselves borrowed on the international market. That is how the massive petroleum dollar is recycled. We notice from this document that the federal debt as of January 29, 1981, was $10.9 billion greater than it was on January 30, 1980. We know that the Bank of Canada, which is a creation of the federal government, holds Government of Canada securities of $15.3 billion. That is $2 billion greater than it was on January 30 of last year. The meaning of this is that the government is creating an extra $2 billion which is not tied to productivity. That is what causes inflation.

Frankly, I am amazed that members of the NDP could fall for such a scheme, since they claim to be helping the ordinary person in this country. Yet, the inflation which they cause, in conjunction with the government by these massive deficits, are hurting the very people whom they purport to stand for. They have let down the poor and the elderly of this country.

There are a few facts which I want to read from the 1979-1980 public accounts. I see from this document that the budgetary revenue for 1979-80—the reason I use these years is that this information is in the public accounts and is certified as being correct by the Auditor General—is some $40 billion. To that figure we must add the money flowing to the government from the Canada Pension Plan, from insurance programs and from annuities amounting to some $1.9 billion. So that the total revenue into the government to the end of 1980 was $41.9 billion.

Incidentally, the average senior citizen believes that the contributions he or she has made over the years to the Canada Pension Plan have gone into a separate account, are invested wisely and are receiving a return from a solid, guaranteed account. Of course, that is not true at all. That money is spent in the day to day operating budget of this government.

Miss Bégin: Only in Alberta, in the provinces.

Mr. Thacker: It is not there.

Miss Bégin: Yes, it is. Check your facts.

Mr. Taylor: Well, why borrow then?

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is claiming that Canada Pension Plan moneys are put into a separate account. I would like her to show me the account because not one share certificate was bought.

Miss Bégin: It is in the legislation. You don't even know your facts.

Mr. Thacker: The money has been spent over the years. When one looks at the budgetary expenditures—

Miss Bégin: You don't know how to read it.

Mr. Thacker: —one will see that some $51.5 billion was spent. If we add to that loans to Crown corporations such as Petro-Canada and CMHC of some $1.4 billion, it is no wonder that at the end of the year the government must go out into the marketplace to get enough money to meet net financial requirements.

Miss Bégin: You don't know anything.

Mr. Taylor: Why don't you stand up and make a speech or dry up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor. I am sure there will be an appropriate opportunity to reply to what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Thacker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If we take the budgetary revenue of $40 billion and add the Canada Pension Plan input of $1.4 billion and subtract the budgetary expenditures of $51.5 billion and the loans to Crown corporations, there is a net financial requirement of $10.4 billion. This is the amount which the federal government will have to borrow from the Canadian capital market and the international market. That figure is not a figment of my imagination. That figure comes from the public accounts of Canada.

The government is really taking that money from the Canadian capital market, and this is causing serious problems because the government is competing against our citizens and private corporations for money, which may be invested in small and large businesses to create jobs, give people cash flow, bring on new products for sale in the international market and bring more money into the country, thereby creating more income tax revenue. The government has the advantage of being able to pay any rate of interest. Everyone knows that it has a deep pocket and that it can reach far into it.

I often wonder how the NDP can sanction such action because it does not bode well for senior citizens and the working man that party purports to represent. Such action fuels inflation. There are simply too many dollars chasing too few goods, and this distorts the productivity of the nation, which is really the bottom line because, whether we like it or not, we are competing in the international market. The only time Canada can move up an inch on the rest of the world is when we are exporting more than we are importing.

Canada also takes money from the international money market to pay for the deficit. In effect, what we are doing by borrowing in the international money market is competing against the lesser developed countries which could really use this money. We are doing the same thing in the oil industry. Canada is out in the international money market in spite of the fact that we are a country of a mere 23 million people sitting on the assets of half a continent. Morally, we should be self-sufficient in money and oil, but we are not. Canadians are out there like beggars competing and taking money from lesser-developed countries. This is absolutely wrong, and any government which would get us into such a situation and then carry on is clearly making a grave mistake.

Once again, members of the NDP seem to back this policy of the government. If one listens to their rhetoric, one comes away with the belief that they are interested in the poor people of the world. If they are really interested in the poor people, they should be standing up and fighting this type of program which is making us competitors in the world for oil and money. Canada should be a supplier of energy and money to the world. In this way we could really do something for the North-South dialogue.

Let us look for a moment at the revenue details. There are basically three types of revenue at the federal level. There is revenue from the personal income tax and corporate income tax, different forms of sales tax and then our return on investments. Let us look at the figures involved and then ask a few questions. Personal income tax revenue for 1980 was $16.8 billion, corporate income tax revenue was $6.9 billion and a tax on non-residents raised $.8 billion, for a total of $24.5 billion. That is the total revenue from people and corporations. Some $4.6 billion was raised by way of sales tax. Customs duties brought in $3.0 billion and excise duties amounted to $.9 billion. Oil export charges brought in $.7 billion. An excise tax on gasoline raised $.4 billion, and various other taxes raised $.5 billion. The total through direct taxation, was $34.9 billion.

The government receives returns on its investments. The Bank of Canada returned $1 billion. CMHC returned $.8 billion, and the Farm Credit Corporation returned $.2 billion. Our Post Office raised $1.1 billion, and from other sources the government received $.2 billion for a total of $5.1 billion. The grand total of all our revenue is $40 billion.

We must ask, and it is something at which the task force should really take a look, whether we are, by way of our individual income tax, paying a fair share. Is $16.8 billion out of $40 billion a fair percentage to collect by way of personal income tax, corporate income tax and non-resident tax? When that sum is contrasted with the sum of $34.9 billion, the amount raised by direct taxation and duties, we cannot say that our income tax system is progressing.

Again, we have the NDP agreeing with the government on direct sales taxes, which are not progressive at all and which clearly hurt the bottom end of the spectrum more than would a progressive income tax. If members of the NDP were genuinely concerned about progressive income tax, they would be fighting these sales taxes, but I do not hear them doing that at all.

What are our effective rates of income tax? Again, I must go to statistics for 1978, which are the last statistics available. The statistics include a detailed analysis of the returns. Some 14.3 million income tax returns were filed. If one received an income of $15,000, only 26 per cent of the taxpayers of the nation would pay more tax, and the effective rate would be 8.77 per cent tax. On an income of $20,000 only 13 per cent of the taxpayers earned more, and the effective rate was 10.88 per cent. On earnings of $30,000 only 2 per cent of the taxpayers of the nation earned more, and the effective rate of tax was 13.94 per cent. On earnings of $40,000, which is what many MPs earned a short while ago, only 1 per cent of all the taxpayers in all the nation earned more, and the effective rate was 14.93 per cent. At the magic figure to which MPs aspire of $50,000 only one fifth of 1 per cent of taxpayers would earn more money. Even at that high rate the taxpayer's effective rate on total income is only 17.47 per cent.

I should like to contrast that with some statistical information on Canadian incomes classified by occupation. There were 9.5 million workers in Canada with an average income of $12,979, and they constituted 79 per cent of the total taxpayers in the nation. In 1978 there were only 485,000 business proprietors in the country. That is a drop in the bucket because they are the people on the front lines, the man and wife at the corner store who work 80 or 90 hours a week. Their average income was $10,755, and they accounted for 3.33 per cent taxpayers.

Next we come to the poor old farmer, the person for whom I am trying to have the capital gains tax removed. There were 267,000 of them, and their average income was $10,741, the lowest of any class in our society. They constituted only 1.84 per cent of taxpayers. That is why some of us feel so strongly about farmers being ripped off by this capital gains tax. The roll-over provision is no longer effective because of what inflation has done to the value of land. The roll-over provision, based on the 1971 value, is insufficient for the 1.84 per cent of the population with an average income of $10,741.

I should like now to turn to the expenditure side of the government ledgers. We find three types of expenditures there. There are budgetary expenditures through all the line departments, loans and advances to Crown corporations and tax expenditures. The latter are the deductions such as marital exemptions and personal exemptions and superdepletion to oil companies, etc. The total amount spent by the departments is $51.5 billion. Some of the major expenditures should be examined in detail by the task force. For instance, the Department of Employment and Immigration spent $2.3 billion. We always need to examine these expenditures with a view to cutting them back or eliminating them. If we could manage that, then we could balance the budget, and that should be the goal of any government. We come next to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the oil price subsidy to find that the difference between the cost of imports and exports to the end of 1980 was $2 billion.

We know that for this year the actual outflow of money to subsidize imported oil will be $6.8 billion. We would not have to spend that money if we were self-sufficient in oil, as we could be. That could have an enormous effect on our fiscal balance.

Figures with respect to the Department of Finance are interesting. According to the public accounts of Canada, in 1980 we spent $8.5 billion to serve the public debt of $80 billion which I already mentioned. Fiscal transfers accounted for $3.5 billion; national defence, $4.3 billion; family allowances, $1.7 billion; hospital insurance, $2.4 billion; medicare, $.8 billion; Canada assistance, $1.6 billion; old age security, $6.3 billion and education, $1.6 billion.

I list these items because I think the task force should examine them. A non-partisan task force that uses some common sense and listens to people across the country would surely come to the conclusion that our federal finances must be put in order. I am sure we would all be prepared to listen to some rational and reasonable suggestions from that body.

Should we as taxpayers spend $2.8 billion net on oil import subsidies? Surely those should be paid by the people who use the product. For instance, if I want to drive my big GMC Suburban, as I do, and it costs $40 to fill it, I do not think people who are paying income tax should have to subsidize me. If I were paying it all at the pump, I would think seriously about how far I would drive, whereas now I go anywhere I want. The point is that other taxpayers should not have to pay for my gas. That does not happen in any other country.

These things come home to roost, Mr. Speaker. In 1973-74 when the OPEC nations increased the price of oil, Japan and Germany immediately faced facts and told their citizens that they would have to pay for it, whereas in Canada and in the United States the governments subsidized the increase with tax dollars. The effect of that is now being felt, eight years later. It is destroying our automobile industry. In 1973-74 Japan and Germany retooled their automobile industries to produce gas-efficient engines and cars. We continued in the old way and encouraged Canadians to buy big cars.

Holding down the price of fuel was a signal to Ford, GM and Chrysler to continue producing the monster vehicles we all wanted. Now, seven years later, they cannot compete with Japan and Germany which are taking an enormous percentage of our automobile industry.

The decision the government made six or seven years ago, which it thought was in the best interests of the country, turned out to be wrong. But will it change that decision? Absolutely not. It insists on paying to one province basically, but it could be three provinces, less than 50 per cent of world price for oil while paying world price to other countries. The government dictated that Petro-Canada must take oil from Mexico. It turned out that the oil is 60 per cent sludge. We pay world price when 30,000 barrels of the stuff is sludge.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) went to another country and said, "We will send our national oil company over here, and it will spend $250 million." That is absurd.

I want now to deal with the public debt. If we did not have the debt, we would save $8.5 billion. The hard reality is that if you do not owe money, you do not pay interest. If we had been realistic about gas prices since 1973 and if we had presented a reasonable program of tax increases to the citizens of Canada, we would not have that debt. Then, if we needed to help the automobile industry or to develop the oil industry, we would be able to go into debt. We would be able to go to the lenders and say, "We want to go into debt for $15 billion, not for operating funds, but to build something. We want to put two tar sand plants in, we want to fix the railways and we want to double-track the railways through the mountains." We would be able to make those moves when we need to.

The only problem with the Keynesian theory is that governments forget the other side of it. Keynes was absolutely correct. In bad times it is legitimate for governments to go into debt collectively to stimulate production. However, when times are good, and I submit all of the 1950s and 1960s were good times, they should have a balanced budget.

I think it is a fair criticism of the government that during the good years it took this nation into massive debt instead of balancing the budget and reducing taxes.

● (2120)

What would be the effect of putting an upper level on incomes? Although a Member of Parliament earns $50,000 a year, he still has a family allowance cheque coming into his home. The theory is that when you receive a high income, the tax system will take care of that and, therefore, you achieve equity.

We know in actual fact the tax system is not doing that. Our income tax system is raising only 16 per cent of our tax revenue. Sales taxes, which impact on poor people, take a much larger percentage.

Those who earn the top incomes, such as Members of Parliament, can afford tax solicitors and tax accountants to help them find all the tax shelters, whether it is a 100 per cent write-off for films, aeroplanes or super depletion where there is a $1.10 deduction against income for every $1 invested. This is done at the cost of ordinary citizens. Therefore, we are not achieving equity.

The same is true of old age security. I know of many senior citizens who care about this nation. They do not feel comfortable about our deficit and would be delighted to give up their right to old age security. The basis is very simple. They have worked hard, and they feel that this nation has treated them well. They were able to put money aside for their own pension plans. They therefore feel benefits should go to other people.

There could be a limit of $40,000 or $50,000. Those who earn above that would cease receiving family allowances and old age security. The Canadian people are prepared to make that kind of contribution to this nation.

A problem arises if people do not perceive the tax system to be fair. Unfortunately, that is the situation in this country today. People do not feel our tax system is fair and equitable. That is why they are beginning to cheat. This is the reason why the underground economy is doing so well.

I discussed the first type of expenditure. The next one is loans and advances which we, through our government, make to Crown corporations. Petro-Canada is clearly number one in this regard. Over the last five years we have pumped a billion dollars into Petro-Canada. The government had to borrow that on the market.

We are faced with a situation where we have to pay, through our Canada Savings Bonds and treasury bills, 13 per cent and 14 per cent on that $1 billion. The cost of that is about $130 million to $150 million a year.

In return for that money, we took Petro-Canada preferred shares. That is perfectly logical when you are creating a corporation. However, when we look at those shares, we see there are non-cumulative dividends. This means that if Petro-Canada in any one year does not pay a dividend on those shares, it is lost for all time. That does not strike me as being fair in terms of a business decision. The people of Canada expect their members of Parliament to ensure that they get a fair rate of return.

The other aspect is that Petro-Canada borrowed an additional $1.5 billion in order to buy Pacific Petroleums. In order to do that, it had to give preferred shares to the banks, which it did. Those shares have cumulative dividends. The banks have an absolute guarantee that they will always get their rate of return. The rate of return is tied to a couple of international monetary markets. If they feel a little shaky about it, they can make a call and Petro-Canada has to redeem those shares, plus accumulated dividends. The government has given a guarantee.

If they want to redeem those shares, they can insist on a premium of 2 per cent, so the banks cannot lose. The ultimate sweetener was that by doing it that way, they would not have to pay any income tax on the interest earned on the $1.5 billion they lent. That is an incredible situation.

A deputy minister of finance was on the board of Petro-Canada. The deal closed about November 1, and that special tax loophole was closed in the November 1978 budget. The man was clearly left in a conflict of interest situation, however innocent and well-intentioned. It was an enormous rip-off.

In spite of that, Petro-Canada was not doing well. The government stepped in and gave it a preferential back-in to the extent of 25 per cent, but it had to pay. It does that. It was still not making money, so when the Liberals came back into power they poured in another $80 million. Petro-Canada is still not doing well, so now we have the ultimate confiscation. It now has an absolute right to confiscate 25 per cent of our Canadian oil and gas companies.

The final insult is that Petro-Canada needs to buy another oil company. It is buying Petrofina. Six months ago, the shares were in the $60 range. When there is a potential sale in the wind, there are a lot of sales. Suddenly the shares went up to $86. I would like to see a list of those who bought the $60 shares and ran them up to $86.

Petro-Canada then made an offer of $120 per share. There was a doubling of the share value in six months. How will they pay for that? There will be a levy on every Canadian who drives up to a gas pump. Canadians will have to pay that for an oil company which has not added one barrel of oil to our reserves.

Petrofina has never gone out on its own to search for oil. It has never done the analyses, taken the risks or found anything because it does not have the necessary skills. This is not to criticize the officials of Petro-Canada, but the minute Petrofina becomes part of government, it will be part of a bureaucracy with a special way of doing things. That will kill the initiative to produce like Canadian Hunter does. Once the Canadian Union of Public Employees moves in, I wonder how efficient Petrofina will be.

I wonder if that is a wise use of our taxpayers' money. In the oil industry the provinces control the leases available and the rate of production from oil wells. The federal government determines whether there will be exports, sets the price for oil and sets the tax rate in terms of profits and rates of return. Under those circumstances the oil industry is like a utility. Ownership does not mean very much.

Why are we so worried about the multinationals when we are now in the position of taking our hard earned tax dollars and buying these companies? Capital will leave this country. Petrofina will be laughing all the way to the bank. As I said, six months ago its shares were worth $60, and now they will be sold to the Canadian government for $120. What will Petrofina do with that massive amount of money? It will take it across the border to the United States, put it into drilling companies there and make a bundle.

Will we have any more oil? No. We have simply taken over a company which was working and paying taxes. It could not produce oil unless the province involved said it could have a lease. The rate of production was set by the provinces. The price and the tax was set federally. I would be interested in hearing what the governments says about that in terms of a general argument.

Mr. Kaplan: It is so that Canadians will get the profits.

Mr. Thacker: Let us look at that. If Canadians owned shares of Petrofina, I believe their rate of return would have been something in the order of $8 per share. If they put up $60 to buy a share and got an $8 return, that would have been a reasonable rate. However, we are paying $120 per share. What kind of rate of return is that?

Mr. Kaplan: Ten times cash flow.

Mr. Thacker: What about the $120 we had to borrow? At 15 per cent interest, that will more than use up what the dividend will be, so we will lose money.

Mr. Kaplan: We are not borrowing it. You said yourself we are raising it by a tax.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills has about one minute in which to conclude his speech. I am sure other hon. members will have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Thacker: The last major point I was going to cover was with respect to tax expenditures. I have spoken about this in earlier debates. I believe this special task force should take a real look at tax expenditures.

• (2130)

In conclusion, I am convinced then that there is no need for this deficit, and there is no need for a $14 billion borrowing authority. We need to review the whole area of tax from the point of view of fiscal transfers, revenues, expenditures and tax expenditures, because in my opinion, with an honest look at the whole picture, we in this country could very easily and with very little manoeuvring—and certainly without hurting the people of the nation—have a balanced budget. It would lead to people feeling that the tax system was fair. They would then be prepared to pay their fair share because they would feel they were getting service from their government. I wish we could do that, but it sounds from the interjections on the other side that this is not even in their contemplation; maybe they will change someday.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, for 13 years in a row I have listened to the Liberals and the Tories sounding like kettles calling pots black, whether in or out of office. I am amused by the protestations regarding a fair tax system. I am amused by the protestations from one or the other, Grit or Tory, in or out of office, about borrowings and deficits. Both of those parties for 113 years have done exactly the same thing when in office. Neither one of them has learned anything, at least in the last 45 years. In fact, I find it amusing when they get up to tell us about the errors of socialism and communism. They say free enterprise is the best, the end all and the be all. We have had it for 113 years and there have not been any socialist governments in Ottawa.

Who got us into all this trouble? I ask the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker), or the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) what got us into all this trouble in the first place. There were no socialists in power. This was caused by good old free enterprise.

On the question of borrowing $14 billion, in addition to money not yet borrowed, I would just ask what it is being borrowed for. I listened to the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills and the hon. member for Vegreville. I wish the latter would quit being bitter because he really is a nice guy. He would have made a good minister, a damned good minister. He was a good one while he was there, although he had some dumb colleagues. The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills, who just sat down, talked about the Department of National Revenue and its spending. He mentioned hospitals, medicare and so forth. I did not hear him say that this spending should be reduced. I am sure he did not mean that. Far be it from anybody in this chamber to make that suggestion.

I find it passing strange that people from a province which has its mess of potash or pot of message, sitting on $6 billion or $7 billion, should have the second highest medical and hospital premiums of any province in Canada. They should be bloody well ashamed of themselves. I ask the hon. member from Lethbridge, or any other member from Alberta, whether that is any fair kind of taxation, any Christian or moral treatment through government financing?

A worse case is that of hon. gentlemen who come from Ontario and rave in this place about national government spending on medicare.

An hon. Member: How come so many people are moving into Alberta, by the thousands?

Mr. Benjamin: They are moving to Saskatchewan too. Do not worry. We all take turns being up and down, and when one is casting stones, one had better board up his glass windows. I have not heard any member of the Liberal or Conservative parties, either in or out of government, ever talk about the unfairness of a tax system which carries on the books of Canada right now an amount equal to our present deficit; $15 billion in deferred unpaid corporate income taxes.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, my credit union manager said today I could have a loan for a car at 17.75 per cent interest. If we only charged those corporations 10 per cent interest on the unpaid debt they owe the people of Canada, we would have another $1.5 billion. Where are those great restraint artists, the Tories and the Grits, every time we suggest something about the fairness of our tax system in this place? They say we cannot do that, it would hurt the people who sent us here and who we represent.

The thing about borrowing by our governments, national, provincial or municipal, is that those borrowings have to accomplish one of two things. On the one hand they represent deadweight debt. Let me take my friends in the Liberal and Conservative parties back to some fundamental economics of the dirty thirties and forties. Tommy Douglas and Clarence Fines showed you how to do it. The one is a deadweight to pay off genuine costs and expenditures of government for the people of our society. That is a deadweight debt and all of us share in the costs of recovering that debt.

Then there is the self-liquidating debt. It is not a debt, it is an investment. If a private corporation borrows $1.5 billion to buy out another oil company or some shopping centre, for some reason or other that kind of borrowing is quite all right and totally moral. However, if the government borrows for the same kind of purpose, that is terrible. There is something holy about a private dollar and something unholy about a public dollar. That is the nineteenth century stuff we are still hearing in this place.

Every industrial nation in the world, whether it is private enterprise, socialist, middle of the road like the Liberals—and that is where all accidents happen, in the middle of the road—have massive borrowings and massive investments in corporations which are in concert with the private sector or the co-operative sector. One could call this a cartel or whatever he likes. It is only here and south of the 49th parallel that people seem to think it is terrible if the government borrows a dollar, because deficits grow bigger and everything else. The CPR borrows and the shareholders have no say in that. At least the shareholders here and in our constituencies have something to say. If you go to an annual meeting of a major private corporation in this country and dig into their wastes and extravagance, you will have trouble. We are not pure here. We all agree we make mistakes. We all agree that at one time or another, individually and collectively, as the government or as the House of Commons, we may have spent or misspent money. If it is a private dollar, it is okay.

The hon. member for Vegreville was crying the blues for the oil companies. He mentioned oil drilling rigs and service rigs. Some of my relatives are in the oil well drilling and service rig business, and I have been around with them since 1945. In fact, one uncle was in on the first operations in Turner Valley in the thirties. Oil drilling rig companies and service rig companies are nothing more than contractors for petroleum corporations. They do drilling and oil well servicing for oil corporations. Very few, if any, oil companies which amount to anything have very many, if any, drilling rigs or service rigs. They contract that work out. The boys who operate the drilling rigs and the service rigs follow the oil corporations wherever they happen to be going in the world. As far as I am concerned, whatever the volume of flight of drilling rig companies or service rig companies out of western Canada, or any other part of Canada, there is at this moment, it is nothing new. It means these companies are victims, as are the people of Canada, of corporate blackmail. They will follow corporations which do not like a particular government, whether it is the one now in Canada or in some other country in the world. That has been their history and tradition and the way they operate.

I wish this government had some more intestinal fortitude, but it wants to be in the middle of the road. It wants to try to please everyone, but it pleases no one. At least my friends in the Conservative party end up pleasing somebody. It may not be the country, but they please a lot of friends, most of whom do not even live here. At least they will please somebody; I will say that for them, if they want to take that as a compliment.

When we borrow for investment purposes, whether it is a public dollar or a private dollar, that borrowing will be liquidated by those who use either the service or the product produced. I am sure my friend, the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills, would not have said a word in this place had a private corporation spent $1.5 billion to buy out Petrofina because he knows dammed well that Petro-Canada or whoever bought Petrofina would recover that investment out of charges to customers. The takeovers and the gambling which goes on between private corporations outbidding one another to take over what would be good business operations boggles the mind. Shareholders have little or no say.

There is no annual meeting or even a special annual meeting of shareholders. The bidding goes up and up and up between several private corporations, and if one wants to read the history of private takeovers for even just the last couple of years, one can find outrageous above-market prices paid. The stock exchange has shut down trading in shares a week or ten days later. However, if a government does this or if a Crown corporation does it, all of a sudden, overnight, that is terrible.

Well, we cannot have it both ways. It is still the people's money. It will still have to be recovered from those who use or buy the product of a particular operation which has been bought, whether it be public or private. Let us not have two standards. If we want to place strictures upon national, provincial and municipal borrowing in terms of what it returns to the people or to government—and assuming it is a self-liquidating debt—then we must place exactly the same strictures on private corporations, which do not have to answer and are not even accountable, as this government is, even when it does not like it, and that is most of the time.

I would like to give an illustration with respect to borrowing. My province was bankrupt toward the end of the war and had a credit rating of zero or less. It was like the Welsh story. When a soccer game was lost, a man said the score was 20 to zero, and "We were lucky to get zero". That was the case with the credit position of my province in 1944. However, over the course of the next 20 years we borrowed $600 million just for our power operation alone and another $250 million for our telephones. We took electricity to every town, village and farm, and we took telephones everywhere. It was a self-liquidating debt, and we now own those services. We borrowed the money in New York, Switzerland, Toronto; you name it. Even Mr. Diefenbaker helped us borrow some money with debentures in 1960, God bless him. That was public borrowing. It was self-liquidating debt. We did it in a little place like ours with less than one million people. Everyone said we were stubble-jumpers and that we did not know how to run anything, but we went ahead and did it anyway. However, it was investment; it was not debt. It was investment; it was not an expenditure, and if this government had the courage of its talk, it would be borrowing twice this much money.

We need $1 billion a year for the next 15 years just in our transportation system, and my friend, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) would like to have $50 million of it spent on stock cars. That would be an investment. The people who ship cattle would pay for those stock cars over the next 30 or 40 years.

But we sit around beating each other's brains out. We are like the hound dog sitting on a cactus. We have all those needles up our backsides, and we just sit and howl.

We need to invest another $1 billion a year in housing and in the lumber industry. If that requires government borrowing as well as private borrowing, we bloody well should borrow, because it is self-liquidating.

My friend, the hon. member for Vegreville, made a point in the latter part of his remarks to which I listened carefully. I think he was perfectly right. We disagree on how to do it, but there is so much to be done in this country. We have the people with the necessary brains and know-how. We have the resources. We have little or no excuse, when we think of other places. We rely on nineteenth century theory and practice. When are we going to learn? Hon. members opposite and to my right all sound like R. B. Bennett, Herbert Hoover and Mackenzie King. They sound like 1930 all over again.

An hon. Member: Where does Karl Marx fit in?

Mr. Benjamin: My hon. friend has been working very hard. Many of his predecessors in his party and in the party opposite have been working very hard to prove that Karl Marx was right.

Mr. Taylor: You are doing well.

Mr. Benjamin: Karl Marx said that capitalism will destroy itself. If we look around the world, we find that in nation after nation there is greed. When greed and selfishness has been supreme, people have risen up in rebellion, and the first people who were executed or sent to labour camps were not ex-Nazis or ex-free enterprisers. The first people who were executed or sent to labour camps were former socialists, trade union leaders or co-operative or farm leaders. That is the history of that, which is again why I say that we have not learned anything in 45 years. So-called private enterprise governments in western Europe for decades have adopted a system of borrowing to finance, and the investment is either by the state alone, the state in conjunction with private corporations or a three-way combination with the co-operative movement.

● (2150)

Alberta, believe it or not, has more money sunk into Crown corporations than Saskatchewan. I do not hear them complaining about the borrowings guaranteed by the province of Alberta. I do not hear them complaining about the borrowings for their Crown corporations. I just do not hear them.

An hon. Member: Don't confuse them with the facts.

Mr. Benjamin: Surely the question is not how much is being borrowed, but what is it being borrowed for? Should we be borrowing more for things that should be done for which we have been waiting many years? That is the type of question that should be dealt with in a bill such as C-59.

The repercussions and the results of the mindless Proposition 13 syndrome, which was imported into Canada from California over the last several years, is now catching up to California. What we hear are statements such as: "Too much government taxes. Our property taxes are too high," and so on. This sort of thing has spread like the bubonic plague, but it is now catching up to them and it will catch up here too. It does not matter whether it is a Conservative government, a Liberal government, an NDP government, or whatever, we need to have a planned economy. This fact has been recognized everywhere except in the northern part of North America.

We need a mixed economy. In other words, we should have a plan for the next five, ten, 15 or 20 years. However, if you mentioned a five-year plan 30 years ago, automatically you were labelled a communist. But if General Motors laid out a plan for the next 25 years, that was okay. This is the sort of scenario that we are moving toward. There is no real choice in the route we take no matter which party in this House is in power. Even if you have to hold your nose, you have to get on with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: Even if hon. members do not believe it philosophically, the reality of the survival of a decent, moral and civilized democratic society is a planned and mixed economy. In other words, we must have an industrial strategy, Mr. Speaker. That sort of thing has been proven and shown by example in a host of countries, many of which are not as well off as we are.

I do not want to hear any more about this terrible borrowing. We should be borrowing more than we are as an investment.

Mr. McDermid: The Liberals would agree with that.

Mr. Benjamin: I am sure that my good friend from Vegreville could have been the minister of transport for at least four years. I believe, and he will tell me if I am wrong, that he would have put a lot of public investment into several areas of transportation in Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: Private too.

Mr. Benjamin: Of course, private too. There is a mix. But without that kind of planning and investment which is self-liquidating, any government would be helpless.

Mr. Taylor: Why didn't you vote against them?

Mr. Benjamin: I have voted against this government more often than my hon. friend. In fact, we have some interesting figures about the number of times the Tories voted with the Grits and the number of times the NDP did. You should take a look at them, they are funny. Talk about being in bed, Mr. Speaker, I find that on a given night when I want to be in bed with them, there ain't room because Bill Davis, Hatfield and all the federal Tories are in bed with the Grits. The Tories have voted with them more often than we have, so there ain't room in the bed for us any more.

Mr. Blais: Don't worry, it is no big thrill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member is aware of the item before us for debate tonight.

Mr. Benjamin: As a former colleague in this House said on the same matter a number of years ago, "Even if it is true, we are going to keep a tight hold on our pyjama bottoms."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: When one talks about interest rates, which governments have to pay to the Bank of Canada, to private lenders or to foreign lenders, a great deal of fuss is made about it. The two gentlemen who spoke before me from the Official Opposition made some fuss about it. They should, because they have a lot of constituents, just like the rest of us, who are getting hit pretty hard by these interest rates. When you are faced with 17.75 per cent on a car which will be obsolete in two years, it is a problem.

Mr. McDermid: Borrow more, and that will fix it up.

Mr. Benjamin: I find it passing strange that you can never convince these free enterprisers about mortgage rates and consumer loans for essentials that we should have interest rates based on income, based on ability to pay or based on a similar system to our income tax. The answer we hear to a suggestion like that is, "No, you have to pay the market price. You can go down to the lovey-dovey finance company if your credit rating is no good and you do not have a secure job." That is private enterprise. Then these private enterprises have the nerve to get up and cry about interest rates. These free enterprisers leave me cold. They leave me frozen on both sides.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: I do not know why the hon. members are not up here trying to save these free enterprises. They just will not let them.

To return to a point I made earlier, I find it incredible that you can pay 18, 19 or 20 per cent to have a decent place in which to live and they can let the corporate sector in this country have $15 billion in interest free loans at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. So, I say do not talk to me about a free and fair tax system when the corporate sector not only has those deferred taxes, but pays a lower volume of taxes than the private individual. The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills ought to take a look at that angle. It would hurt a lot of shareholders who would probably have to take 25 cents or 50 cents a share less in dividends of corporate profits in order to pay their fair share of the cost of running this country.

An hon. Member: That is an old Arnold Peters speech.

Mr. Benjamin: So, if hon. members want to worry about the tax system for individual taxpayers, I suggest that they take a look at the other side of the coin.

When we consider borrowing I urge that we consider it as an investment in the assets of this nation so we can have a return on that investment over several generations and we can leave a hell of a lot more for others than there is at the moment.

An hon. Member: That is a big, big debt.

An hon. Member: That is fuzzy thinking.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, the last speech would make Mao Tse-tung look as though he should be the president of General Motors.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: I am used to receiving a lot of gas from this compost heap to my left, but tonight I think was the best example of what socialism would do to Canada. The speech by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) struck straight against individual ingenuity. All I can say after hearing a speech like that is that if the hon. member had his way, the government would be producing for itself until it choked. It would collapse in the cancer of its own growth and development. It would be without any individual initiative that should go—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—CROWSNEST PASS RATES—ESTABLISHMENT OF SHORT-TERM STUDY—REPORTED LOBBY BY FOOD PROCESSORS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight regarding a question I raised in the House a few days ago with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). It concerns the whole matter of grain transportation and, more specifically, the Crowsnest Pass rate. My objective tonight is not to discuss in any way the pros and cons of our grain transportation problems, because I believe the issue has been discussed enough in those terms.

My purpose tonight is to ask the Minister of Transport or his parliamentary secretary about the establishment of a task force. I believe this is necessary in order to resolve the problem of the Crowsnest Pass rate, which is very important matter to the whole economy of western Canada. It is my opinion that at this time the government must proceed toward the resolution of the freight rate issue.

It is interesting to note that most farm organizations in western Canada are now at the point of advocating a change in the terms of the rates. Obviously, all farm organizations do not agree on the type of change, but nevertheless it is very significant that these organizations, which generally represent most of the farmers in western Canada, are advocating a change at this time.

As I understand it, one of the stumbling blocks to implementing a change in the rate, is the tremendous amount of bickering in cabinet. The Minister of Transport is certainly not the master of his own destiny; he is being stopped by various cabinet ministers. We hear that two of those cabinet ministers are Senator Hazen Argue, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and Senator Olson, who is responsible for the economic development portfolio. It is interesting to note that both of these gentlemen, who are perceived as being against any change or study of the Crowsnest Pass rate, are non-elected members of cabinet. I think the fact that both men are non-elected is a great disservice to Canada at the present time. The government should listen to the majority of people in western Canada. Unquestionably, the majority of people want a change in the rates. The exact details of any change could be worked out by a task force, and from time to time the Minister of Transport has indicated one might be established.

I think a task force should address two or three specific matters. Obviously, the terms of reference must be established first of all. There should be a very specific time limit as we do not want to be seen as studying the grain transportation problem in western Canada yet again. The task force proposals could then come before Parliament to be debated. If any legislative changes were required in order to facilitate the task force findings, they could be done at that time. This would take the issue out of the realm of pure politics for a short period of time.

In my opinion, any change which occurs in the rate must address itself to the livestock industry first and then to the processing industry. I think both industries are being harmed at the present time. In western Canada there exists a chance for increased economic growth and diversification, but that will only occur through some change in terms of the Crowsnest Pass rate. In other words, change must be just that—it must be a change. It must not be just an adjustment in terms of what we already have. The Crow rate issue has become an issue of regional development in western Canada. This is why it is vitally important that the issue be reviewed outside the political sphere by a task force. I believe there is a chance for growth and diversification in western Canada through proper changes to the Crowsnest Pass rate. If we allow this opportunity to slip by, I am very much afraid that it will impede the long-term growth of that very important region of the country.

• (2205)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) for giving me an opportunity to speak on this matter. From what he has said tonight, I can see that he shares my concerns, the concerns of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) and those of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) about the urgency of this very important matter, and about the need to move toward a speedy resolution of the now famous, or I guess I should say infamous, Crowsnest Pass rates.

The minister has held many meetings during his western visits in the last few months to discuss the problems that flow from the Crow rate. Indeed, may I say here that he has received congratulatory notes from parties equally concerned. If I may paraphrase the comments, these urge him to continue his courageous efforts in seeking a resolution to the Crow rate. The hon. member for Lisgar also encouraged the minister, and I believe the tone of his comments was congratulatory as well.

I could go on and indicate the reasons changes are needed in the Crow rate, but I think the hon. member for Lisgar covered this area tonight, and I note that he too was urging a speedy resolution. I can refer the hon. member to the recent speeches by the Minister of Transport. In speeches to the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the Alberta Wheat Pool the Minister of Transport outlined in detail his position on the Crow rate. He emphasized his desire to seek a resolution openly and in full consultation with those most directly concerned. In speeches in Calgary and Regina before Christmas, the minister suggested that it would be useful to appoint a small task force, as has also been suggested by the hon. member for Lisgar, to work with concerned farm organizations to try to develop a consensus among those who are most directly affected by the Crow rate.

The hon. member for Lisgar has indicated that he realizes and understands fully the need for the development of consensus between those interest groups which, in some cases, have very divergent opinions with regard to the most appropriate method of solving this particular problem. Naturally, the government is anxious to consider the views of all those interested and would therefore seek the opinions of eastern food processors as well as the opinions of western farmers and in particular would consider the proposals forwarded by the western agricultural conference and the Prairie Farm Commodity Coalition.

In conclusion, may I assure the hon. member that the minister and his cabinet colleagues are working to resolve this most difficult problem as quickly as possible.

BANKRUPTCIES—RE-MOR MANAGEMENT INVESTMENT—C & M FINANCIAL SERVICES—INVESTIGATION CONDUCTED BY COMMITTEE OF ONTARIO LEGISLATURE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, on January 23, as reported at page 6503 of Hansard, I asked a question of the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) with regard to the bankruptcy of Astra Trust and its various associated companies. Hon. members are aware that a committee of the Ontario legislature has been examining the matter of Re-Mor Investment Management and C & M Financial Services and the relationship of these two companies with Astra Trust. It has now been shown that the three companies are interconnected through common ownership of share stock.

Let me deal with the question I put to the minister regarding the approval of the application to Astra Trust. We now know, through evidence given at the committee of the Ontario legislature, that the application for a trust licence was put to the Department of Finance on three occasions. I believe that the original application was submitted in 1972. At that time inquiries were made.

We know that the Superintendent of Insurance turned down the applications on two occasions due to concerns about some of the proposed directors. All of this information came out in testimony before the committee, although it has been denied in this House. Part of the testimony presented by some officials of the Department of Finance was given after reference to notes. They were not direct statements made by officials of the Department of Finance, but were statements from notes of lawyers.

One comment was that the Department of Insurance was mainly concerned with the financial details of the application and that the information supplied by the RCMP was not very reliable. I find that view to be absolutely incredible. Of course the proof of the accuracy of the RCMP reports is evidenced by the order to wind up Astra Trust and by the bankruptcy of Re-Mor and C & M. We note that fraud charges have been laid, and I am sure more charges will follow in this amazing and complicated financial collapse of three companies.

There is ample evidence from the report and evidence of the Ontario legal committee to cause the Government of Canada to conduct a full inquiry into this whole financial mess. It is known that the Superintendent of Insurance recommended against a trust licence. We know that extreme pressure was applied. The sworn evidence shows in the notes and other documents that dozens of memos and phone calls were made. One note quotes Senator Stanbury, in an August 11, 1975 note, as saying there would be pressures, problems and flack if this application were turned down.

What magic did these people in Astra Trust have? What hold did they have that they could keep this thing going for a number of years?

Phone calls and visits to the office of the then minister of finance occurred over a period of about two years. There was lobbying and pressure, and a dramatic turnabout occurred somewhere between October 21, and November 12, 1976, when the Astra Trust application was approved. When dealing with private investors in a trust environment there is a special set of conditions. Many trust clients are unsophisticated investors, while others are state trustees bound by the court to administer an estate in a particular way. Speculative investors do not normally seek out a trust company.

The troubles that settled on Astra Trust began almost at the start. Within 30 days of the issue of the Astra Trust licence, there was a stock split, five to one. The evidence of the committee shows that one major shareholder made $1.5 million on the split. He had real inside information. Other people made lesser amounts. Shares were put into a voting trust without authorization. It is evident that insiders made a bundle.

One of the people doing the lobbying for Astra Trust became a director and benefited by the five to one split. That causes one to wonder about the conflict of interest of former Members of Parliament. The person I referred to was a former Member of Parliament, a parliamentary secretary and chairman of the justice committee of the House of Commons.

I cannot believe that the Department of Insurance did not know of the five to one stock split; I cannot believe that the department was unaware of the agency certificates that were being issued; I cannot believe that the department was unaware of this misadventure in Spain when $2 million was invested in a condominium unit that was bankrupt before people got there. I find it strange that the operations of C & M were not more closely monitored when it was a condition of the granting of the charter that it be closed down.

If one turns over the coin, one must assume that the people directing Astra Trust felt secure in their operation. One would assume that a newly-chartered trust company would be very careful in its start-up operation. One would not think it would engage in stock splits and insider special deals, issue questionable certificates, open more branches than authorized, or venture into a condominium development in Spain without first clearing these matters and discussing them with the Department of Insurance or officials in the government in order to ensure that they were operating within the guidelines.

They must have felt they had adequate protection from some source that would allow them to operate in this loose fashion.

There is ample evidence and a sufficient number of unanswered questions to support a full inquiry into this matter. Beyond that, the trust industry would benefit from an airing of the matter. It just will not go away; the industry has been hurt badly by the Astra Trust fiasco. The time to act is now. I hope the minister will shoulder his responsibility and order a full inquiry into the matter.

• (2215)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 26, warrants issued by the Deputy Speaker of the Ontario legislature were served on Richard Humphrys, Superintendent of Insurance, and Richard G. Page, director of the trust and loan division of the Department of Insurance, requiring them to appear before the Ontario standing committee on the administration of justice. It is clearly established by legal precedent that a provincial body is without authority to investigate or inquire into the administration and management of a federal agency. This is a major principle.

Accordingly, Messrs. Humphrys and Page, although they appeared before the committee as required, took the position through counsel and at the direction of the minister, that since the only matters being studied by the committee that were within their knowledge involved their duties and actions as officers of a federal department of government, they were not required to give evidence before the committee. Their view was supported by the deputy attorney general of Ontario at the same session. The committee then asked if Mr. Humphrys would answer questions relating to evidence already given to the committee and to the interaction between federal and provincial legislation and regulatory activities.

After consideration and consultation with the minister, counsel wrote to the committee indicating that it did not seem possible to respond to this modified request without breaching the constitutional principle. The committee insisted on the validity of the warrants, and on January 29 counsel filed an application for a judicial review of their validity.

The government takes the view that matters relating to Astra Trust and the alleged involvement of Re-Mor and C & M are being adequately investigated by the Ontario Provincial Police, the RCMP and persons in charge of the liquidation of Astra, Re-Mor and C & M.

The minister is satisfied that the actions of the department of insurance in the matter were appropriate and there was no improper pressure applied to department officials at any time. A charter was granted to Astra Trust after careful investigation and inquiry, whether by the RCMP or other bodies, into every matter brought to the attention of the department. Close co-operation with the Ontario authorities took place at the time, and subsequently.

The department had no knowledge of the formation of Re-Mor and only learned of its existence in the spring of 1980. Termination of the activities of the trust company followed soon after. The department had no authority to look into the affairs of Re-Mor even had it known of the company's existence.

The principals seeking to form Astra Trust undertook to close down C & M after the trust company was formed, but the department had obtained a fully audited statement by an independent auditor of C & M before a trust company charter was granted. The audit report was without qualification.

ENERGY—PROJECTED PRICE INCREASES FOR CRUDE OIL

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, this evening I would like to refer the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde)—and I am sorry he is not in the chamber—to an exchange that we had over eight months ago on June 4, as it appears at page 1740 of Hansard. At that time we were discussing the possibility that the government might not be able to enter into an agreement with the province of Alberta and other producing provinces with respect to the price of oil in this country. At that time, the energy minister said:

> —we are in the process of negotiation.

That was on June 4, 1980. I asked the minister at that time, and I quote:

> Since this is the first time since mid-1977 that we are coming to the conclusion of an existing crude oil pricing agreement between Alberta and Canada, I would ask the minister: On July 1, in the absence of a further extension to the June, 1977, agreement—

Is it not true that Alberta may raise the price of oil unilaterally? The minister replied:

> I have stated repeatedly in this House that our purpose is to achieve a negotiated agreement. This is still our objective and first priority. I hope by the end of the month to be able to announce to my hon. colleague that indeed we have reached agreement.

I think it is only fair eight months later, almost to the day, that we ask the minister what has gone wrong. We have learned various things in the interval. For example, we have learned that in the energy program which was brought in with the budget on October 28 that prices are going to rise. In January, 1980, the price was $14.75 per barrel. By August, 1980, it had gone up to $16.75, up $2. By January, 1981, the price reached $17.75 per barrel.

• (2220)

The rather astounding thing which has received so little publicity is that this government has gone on to indicate it intends to raise the price of conventional oil to $66.75 by 1990. This will mean that roughly, between the time I asked that question and 1990, the government has in mind increasing it by $52 per barrel. That works out to an average per year increase contemplated by this government of over $5 per barrel.

During the campaign we were unfortunately forced into, and which we lost, the government lambasted us for raising the price of oil too quickly. Hon. members will recall in the budget debate they belabored the then minister of finance, who stated we were prepared to raise the price of oil in stages by $4 a barrel in 1980 and by $4.50 a year thereafter, subject to further adjustment after 1982 if necessary. In short, we were contemplating a lower price increase than is this government. We were truthful, they were deceitful. That is only part of the utter deceit this government exhibits and the utter contempt in which it holds the Canadian public. We find the real thing that government craved after as far as energy was concerned was revenue.

We have the startling fact revealed that in 1980 the total take from energy revenue sources was $2.3 billion. By 1983 this government anticipates that the revenue will jump by $6.7 billion to $9 billion. How would you feel if you were a member of the industry and saw a revenue increase during the same time-frame of only $2.1 billion, especially if you were a resident of the province of Alberta, while at the same time you saw a revenue increase on the part of this government of $3.4 billion, or if you take the three western producing provinces, a revenue increase of $4.5 billion?

In short, that minister misled this House when he said in answer to my question on June 4 that his top priority was one of negotiation with the hope of reaching an agreement. He misled this House by knowing at that time he intended to bring in a proposal which would gouge the people of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and the industry itself. In short, I would suggest that is why we have no agreement in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There are certain terms that are parliamentary and the hon. member is coming very close to an unparliamentary term. If he said "misled", I think he would have to stop at that, but the suggestion that there was a knowing misleading of the House, by the traditions of the House, is unparliamentary. I invite the hon. member to rephrase his remarks.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am not clear in what respect you feel I have said something that is unparliamentary.

● (2225)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the tradition of the House is that it is a breach and an unparliamentary expression to say that another hon. member has knowingly misled the House. If the hon. member confines his remarks simply to saying that the House has been misled, that is acceptable.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I think if you and the officer at the Table check the record, you will find that I did not say, as Your Honour has indicated, that he knowingly misled the House. I simply stated he misled the House, that it was deceitful and that he was gouging the people of those three fine provinces. In short, I was indicating that what has been revealed, mainly in the budget and the so-called national energy policy, since our question of June 4, has brought out very clearly the utter deceit and contempt in which this government holds the Canadian public with respect to this question of energy pricing and with respect to this government's handling of the entire energy issue in this country.

In short, we have an 18 cents-plus per gallon increase in the price of gasoline. Hon. members opposite did that by deceit; they will pay the penalty.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose engaging in similar intemperate remarks to those of the previous speaker—

Mr. Stevens: They are true, though.

Mr. MacLaren: —would advance our understanding of the pricing policies of this government, so perhaps I should take a moment and attempt to explain to the hon. member the basis of that policy.

It is evident from the hon. member's remarks that he does not understand the National Energy Program, which sets out the wellhead pricing schedule we intend to implement. Starting from a price of $16.75 for conventional oil in mid-1980, the price is to rise by one dollar increments every six months until mid-1983 when the increases will be accelerated, so that by 1990 the price of conventional oil will have reached $63.25 per barrel. The oil sands reference price will start at the international price level and move ahead at a considerably higher rate. Intermediate, between those two pricing schedules, will be a third pricing schedule to encourage tertiary recovery of oil.

The pricing elements then become the basis for establishing the blended price for all consumers, to which reference has been made in the Speech from the Throne and elaborated upon in the national energy policy.

The government stands ready to negotiate with Alberta the implementation of this pricing system. In preparation for that negotiation, officials of the two governments have been holding a number of meetings to clarify differences in data interpretation and to make recommendations to ministers regarding the issues to be settled at the ministerial level in the price negotiation.

I must emphasize that the federal government is eager to settle these pricing matters in the interests of all Canadians. At the moment, however, we are still awaiting an indication from the Alberta government as to its readiness to proceed.

The issue of oil prices cannot be separated from the issue of revenue sharing. The National Energy Program will ensure that the Alberta government has revenues far in excess of its expenditures for decades to come, while at the same time providing for a fair and equitable sharing of costs and benefits by all Canadians.

As we enter this all-important negotiation, we shall make it quite clear that nothing the federal government has said or done is meant to challenge the oil-producing provinces' indisputable ownership of their resources. Under these conditions there is no reason why a satisfactory resolution of the pricing issue should not be expeditiously reached in a manner which will best serve the interests of all regions of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

METHOD OF LOAN ARREARS COLLECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the present policy of CMHC is to hand over its clients' mortgage accounts to collection agencies without first verifying that the clients have received notification of arrears, as happened with a constituent of mine who was in arrears $112 but faced the horrendous fee of $1,487 which the collection agency had tacked on, a fee which I consider nothing short of legalized extortion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House instructs the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to call for an immediate and complete review of the corporation's method of loan arrears collection.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TAXATION

CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL OF TAX ON ADVERTISING IN NEWSPAPERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the recent energy package "budget" introduced a new 9 per cent tax applicable to advertising inserts, catalogues and shoppers in our newspapers, and whereas this is the first time such a tax has been levied in North America and it is detrimental and discriminatory to our smaller papers, is an inflation-fuelling tax to our consumers and threatens the existence of a number of local forums in many communities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the government withdraw this counterproductive tax and thereby assure our community newspapers a chance to survive and reduce the trend toward monopoly of the press by large corporations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ATTEMPTS BY BRITISH OFFICIALS TO INFLUENCE CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering statements, reported yesterday, by various elected and non-elected British officials, including the British High Commissioner to Canada, suggesting that our constitutional resolution should not include a charter of rights, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House of Commons rejects any attempt by British parliamentarians and officials to tell Canadians what we can or cannot do in our sovereign country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST THAT LISE PAYETTE BE REINSTATED IN FORMER JOB WITH RADIO-CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of this House to discuss an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Since the Quebec minister of social development and minister responsible for the status of women does not intend to run in the next election, and since the federal government is duty bound to promote the status of women, I move:

That the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications speak on her behalf to the president of the CBC so that she can be reinstated in her former job with Radio-Canada, at her former salary, preferably indexed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY WITH RESPECT TO EL SALVADOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, in light of the growing deep concern about Canada's apparent change of opinion about renewed American aid to the El Salvadorian junta, expressed publicly by the interchurch committee on human rights in Latin America and voiced through letters and telegrams to the Department of External Affairs from individuals and groups, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to reveal the evidence which has given him "reason to pause" and upon which he has based his decision to consider changing the direction of Canadian foreign policy toward supporting the legitimacy of arms rather than negotiations as a means of finding a resolution to the El Salvadorian problem.

ENERGY

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE ENERGY TAX CREDIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the government will be increasing the price of gasoline at the pumps by 12 cents a gallon to pay for its takeover of Petrofina in the near future, and that this increase will bring the total increase in the price of gasoline during the past year to 44 cents a gallon, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government immediately introduce an energy tax credit, similar to the one introduced by the former government, which would pay each year $80 for each adult and $30 for each child to a family with a total family income of less than $21,000 and would provide an average size family of four with $220 a year to help them meet the steadily increasing costs of gasoline and heating oil.

RAILWAYS

CONSEQUENCES OF RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT—NECESSITY FOR ROAD FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, rail line abandonment in many municipalities in western Canada has resulted in longer hauls on municipal roads, decreased assessments for tax purposes, and in some cases new roads will have to be built, thus creating additional hardship for many of these municipalities. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the federal government take the initiative and immediately arrange meetings with the provincial governments and municipalities affected by rail line abandonment, in order that suitable financing will be available for construction of roads which will accommodate the heavier traffic resulting from changing grain delivery patterns.

ENTRENCHMENT OF ABORIGINAL AND TREATY RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As a result of New Democratic Party activities, there is now all-party agreement that our constitutional resolution should include the entrenchment of aboriginal and treaty rights. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House of Commons unanimously agrees that, contrary to statements coming from British officials, our constitutional resolution shall include the entrenchment of aboriginal and treaty rights.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

FUNDING FOR NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDSHIP CENTRES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because the National Association of Friendship Centres provides an essential service by assisting native people migrating from reserves to cities, and because many serious social problems will arise if funding problems result in a drastic reduction of such services, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Secretary of State immediately reconsider his position with respect to NAFC funding, retain the successful grant system, and reject the proposed scheme of contribution agreements.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL RATES IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The postal rate for delivering a 30-kilogram first-class parcel from Edmonton to Indian Cabins, Alberta, is a reasonable $8, but if that same parcel is taken only an additional ten miles across the Northwest Territories border, the cost jumps to $54.75, an approximate 600 per cent increase. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That a review of postal rates in the Northwest Territories be immediately undertaken in order to bring them in line with those enjoyed in southern Canada.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RESOLUTION OF B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas members of the Telecommunications Workers' Union in British Columbia have been forced by B.C. Telephone Company's intractable bargaining stance in negotiations with the union, including the rejection of three consecutive conciliation awards, to take over all major telephone switching operations in British Columbia, and whereas B.C. Tel has maintained a justified reputation for poor service and inequitable labour relations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That this House have the Minister of Labour intervene immediately to order the company to accept the Peck conciliation report already accepted by the union; that jurisdiction over B.C. Tel be transferred to the B.C. government so that this company can be properly regulated and monitored to improve its performance; and failing this the House should recognize the improved service given by TWU members since they occupied the switching centres and place B.C. Tel under public ownership, granting substantial control to the union.

HEARINGS HELD BY CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, the CRTC is once again holding hearings to make adjustments and extensions to the satellite services without giving due notice. Considering the crucial importance of the results of such hearings to those citizens of our country to whom the new technology is the only link with the rest of the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the Minister of Communications direct the CRTC to delay the hearings which are scheduled to commence on Monday, February 9, in order to provide sufficient time for interveners from mid-Canada and northern Canada to present their views to the commission.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my questions to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. As a result of the announcement last night by the Premier of British Columbia that he will be proposing a compromise on the Constitution, will the Prime Minister agree to meet the premiers immediately to "end the divisiveness and get the people back to the bargaining table", as Mr. Bennett puts it. Has the Prime Minister received this message and what is his response today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it may have been received in my office, but I just arrived from Toronto a few minutes ago and I have not seen it.

Mr. Epp: I commend to the Prime Minister the type of approach I suggested to the Minister of Justice earlier today in the committee.

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): In spite of the government's repeated refusals to answer questions relating to our own Constitution, Canadians now know, for example, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister were told as late as November 10 that Westminster could not pass Canadian constitutional proposals if they were challenged before the Supreme Court of Canada. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if that is the real reason why, to date, he has refused to put that reference to the Supreme Court.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have indicated before that we thought this was a matter for Parliament to decide, not for the courts to decide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONTENTS OF LEAKED DOCUMENTS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would again like to ask the Prime Minister a question with respect to these documents. As recently as this morning the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, the chief constitutional spokesman for the New Democratic Party, asked the Minister of Justice whether the CBC reports concerning leaked Canadian documents—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Epp: I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the CBC documents which were aired yesterday are correct. If so, why was it that the contents of those documents, which are so pertinent to this debate, were withheld not only from Parliament, but also from the Canadian people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have made it clear on many previous occasions that I do not comment on leaked, confidential documents.

REPORT MADE BY CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSIONER

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, can the Prime Minister confirm to the House that two weeks ago the Canadian High Commissioner to London made the following report:

Pym repeated again and again that that Canadian measure in its anticipated form will be defeated in the Commons.

If so, why was this information withheld from Parliament and the Canadian people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have taken the view that if the British government or parliamentarians have any views to be made, they can make them publicly.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, can the Prime Minister also confirm that the Canadian High Commissioner also reported:

He also stated very firmly that patriation with amendment procedure would pass without difficulty.

Will the Prime Minister recognize the fact that 64 per cent of Canadians have expressed their wish to see the Constitution brought home to Canada and see major amendments made here in Canada and not in Westminster? Will he now accede to the clearly expressed wish of Canadians and ensure that any substantive changes to the Constitution will be made here in Canada and not in London?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it seems to me the hon. member is making an argument. We know his position. We know the position of his party is that they would like a charter for the Canadian people. They would like a Canadian Constitution, but they are not prepared to take the means to achieve it. They should take their responsibilities.

● (1120)

ROLE OF WESTMINSTER PARLIAMENT IN DEALING WITH CANADIAN RESOLUTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Considering that reports of the past few days have indicated that a number of Tory backbenchers in England may not support a constitutional resolution coming from Canada which included a charter of rights, would the Prime Minister make it unequivocally clear to the House that the role of Westminster is not to decide whether or not Canada is to have a charter of rights, and that this decision is to be made here in the Canadian Parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, yes, I can tell the Leader of the New Democratic Party that that is actually the view of my party and of the government, that the role of Westminster is not to look through or behind any resolution presented to it by the Canadian Parliament. The role of Westminster is not to judge whether a resolution is acceptable or unacceptable. Their role is to deal with the matter as a resolution from the Canadian Parliament, and whether or not the Canadian Parliament has been wise is not for them to decide but for the Canadian electorate to decide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADVICE GIVEN BY BRITISH HIGH COMMISSIONER TO CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in a similar vein, at a press conference yesterday the British High Commissioner made it abundantly clear that his notion of diplomatic responsibility included giving arguments to a Canadian member of Parliament for voting against a constitutional proposal which involves our constitutional independence. Considering that it is now quite clear that the British High Commissioner believes that it is his function to tell us, as parliamentarians, what to do in such a matter, would the Prime Minister tell the House what action the Government of Canada proposes to take with regard to the British High Commissioner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I understand that this question was raised in my absence from the House yesterday and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs answered that the matter was under investigation and that, if the reports were true, he was greatly disturbed by them. I shall wait for the results of the investigation before making any comment.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I understand the Secretary of State for External Affairs is taking his responsibility seriously, as he did yesterday. But following the minister's statement in the House, the British High Commissioner said at a press conference:

> If you see it would be easier to get patriation through the British Parliament in a certain way rather than another way, I think it would be sensible to take that into account.

That comment clearly constitutes interference, and the advice that Canadian parliamentarians should pursue a course of action contrary to what they might be deciding on their own. Therefore it seems to me that the matter requires no further investigation, so will the Prime Minister tell the House what action the government will take with regard to the matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, there are two matters here which need to be decided upon. The first is a question of fact as to what the High Commissioner has done and what representations he has made. I repeat, that this matter is under investigation by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The second matter is to decide whether the High Commissioner is expressing the views of his government or whether he is merely commenting on his own, which would throw a different light on the matter. I hope to be able to report to the House very soon.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

OCTOBER, 1970 CRISIS—INSPECTION OF DOCUMENTS PERTAINING TO PROCLAMATION OF WAR MEASURES ACT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, on Wednesday of this week the Solicitor General, in a strange but carefully worded answer to one of his colleagues, left the impression that he himself had not seen any of the documents pertaining to the FLQ crisis of October, 1970. Has the Solicitor General inspected any cabinet documents which led to the decision to proclaim the War Measures Act? Has he seen the communications and representations received at that time from the then Bourassa government? Does he know of the basis upon which the then minister, who is now the Speaker in the other place, publicly and grossly overestimated the size of the membership of the terrorist organization?

● (1125)

Has he seen, for instance, the evaluation reports done since then on the whole operation by the Department of National Defence and the RCMP and, finally, has he been made aware of a report that was at one time in the hands of another police force which concluded that the use of the army in such circumstances was "un désastre monumental"?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the last document referred to by the hon. member but I have seen many documents relating to the FLQ crisis. They are matters of public record. The documents that I was commenting on in the answer I gave a few days ago, were certainly not meant to say, nor did I say, that I had not looked at any documents relating to the FLQ crisis. The point I wanted to make was that I was unaware of any of the type that the hon. member referred to, and that if he felt constrained by rules of cabinet secrecy or confidentiality, or his oath as a privy councillor, from making those documents public, he should come and tell me which ones they were and explain to me, if there were documents other than those which he and the Clark government turned over to the McDonald commission. What documents is he talking about? That is what I should like to know.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, as a result of one of the Solicitor General's previous answers to me in the House the implication was clearly left—

Mr. Trudeau: What documents are you talking about?

Mr. Lawrence: —that the Solicitor General himself received a report either from the present director of the security services—

Mr. Trudeau: You have invented the document.

Mr. Lawrence: —or the Commissioner of the RCMP that one Nigel Barry Hamer had never been an RCMP informant. Neither of these two officers, of course, could possibly have based that report to the solicitor general on their own recollections or their own experience or their own knowledge. I ask the Solicitor General now if he has seen the documentation on which such an assurance to him and to his predecessors, could possibly have been based?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I asked the force that direct question and the answer that I was given, and I have no reason to disbelieve it, was that that individual, Mr. Hamer, was not a source of the RCMP.

THE CONSTITUTION

CALL FOR DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. If the Prime Minister is so certain, contrary to what appear to be absolutely all indications, that people prefer dealing with this paranoid patriation program, rather than coming to grips with high inflation, high interest rates and our other serious economic problems, will he forthwith put his theory to the test by dissolving this House and permitting the Canadian people, by means of a general election, to pass judgment on his government and on their NDP appendage?

An hon. Member: Right on!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member of the Conservative Party would describe as a paranoid interest in patriation a measure that was moved last May by a member of his own party, the hon. member for Edmonton East, and which had the unanimous consent of this House. If that is being paranoid, then the whole House is being paranoid. I think the hon. member is perhaps touched by paranoia.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I assumed that perhaps the Prime Minister would realize I was not talking against patriation in itself—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: —but against his paranoid obsession—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You just don't want to do it, that's all. You are against the principle.

Mr. Cossitt: —against his, to quote his own words, "touched paranoid obsession".

My supplementary question is this. If the Prime Minister is going to continue to ram this through the House, as he appears to be doing in his last, final attempt to get into the history books, will he give a firm guarantee now, to all members in this House who have not had an opportunity to speak on the constitutional question or resolution, that they will be given a chance to speak when the resolution comes back to the House? Would he tell us yes or no?

• (1130)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member as usual is a bit surprising. First he argues the matter is not important, that it should not be dealt with, that we should be dealing with economic matters, and then he wants everyone to speak on it. Let him make up his mind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: The trouble is you do not listen to the question.

RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF CN-CP VIA RAIL SERVICE CONTRACTS

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Whisper in his ear, Charlie.

Mr. Turner: The minister is aware that VIA Rail is currently renegotiating its service contracts with CN and CP.

An hon. Member: Just ask the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Louder, Charlie.

Mr. Turner: In view of reports that the railways have been overcharging VIA Rail by using compensation figures which applied when the old 80 per cent passenger subsidy deficit was still in effect, would the minister ask the Auditor General to carry out a full investigation of the current VIA-CN and VIA-CP agreements to see if our passenger rail corporation is the victim of a gigantic rip-off?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, that is the best question I have had in a long, long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: My hon. friend from London East is asking this question probably because of the $30 million in the supplementary estimates resulting from added costs to the operation of VIA. I want to remind him, and he knows this better than I do, that the services of the railways to VIA are sold under costing order R-6313 or the Canadian Transport Commission. VIA has no choice but to pay the bill and we have no choice but to reimburse VIA for having paid it.

Costing order 6313 is not universally accepted—not by the member particularly, I presume. The procedure is being reviewed now so as to improve it. Second, as the hon. member for London East indicates, the president of VIA is presently negotiating with the railways for fixed prices so that they will not be faced at the end of the year with added costs, and I am supporting him very much in this effort.

Mr. Lawrence: Is that a yes or a no?

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Given the employment figures released today by Statistics Canada which show that 945,000 people are out of work, an increase in the last month of 135,000, what programs, if any, does the government propose to implement to deal with this disastrous situation?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should take a look at the full report on the employment statistics for this month. They show there has been a substantial increase in employment in Canada. In the last month 57,000 jobs were created. The rates of unemployment are down from the same time last year. That is contrary to expectations of all the wise observers who said we were going into a disastrous unemployment situation. In fact the situation in the unemployment rate has improved over this time last year. We still think there is a lot of work to be done. There is a budget in place. There are a lot of investments coming forward. We have announced a number of new employment programs. I think we can take some satisfaction in that we are not experiencing the same drastic downfall which all of the Cassandras of this world expected us to experience.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. Last month 55,000 more people were unemployed in the province of Ontario than there were in the month before.

Mr. Lawrence: They are not all Cassandras either.

Mr. Orlikow: The rate of unemployment in Quebec is now 11 per cent. The rate in Newfoundland is now almost 16 per cent. For the last two years we have had a million people unemployed. Is the minister telling the people of Canada that under this government we will continue to have a million people unemployed in the future?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I am not saying that at all. What I am saying is that at a time when all of the industrialized countries are experiencing very serious downturns—for example, in Great Britain the unemployment rate has gone up substantially—our unemployment rate is coming down. That is something in which we can take some small satisfaction, but we are not satisfied that enough is being done. We do expect the full impact of the budget measures announced by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, to have some effect. Many of the incentives which are being offered under the energy program to provide further stimulation will bear fruit.

We will continue to work to see that we can concentrate our resources on those who are hardest hit by unemployment. That is why we announced a $350 million program two months ago to help those communities which are affected by lay-offs or closings. We are putting in place a package of government instruments to complement the workings of the private economy and to provide for cushions for those who are hurt by some of the downturns which they are experiencing.

PUBLIC WORKS

CANCELLATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. It deals with the cancellation, without reasonable and adequate notice, of the community services contribution program. The manner in which this program was terminated resulted in a rush of applications from many communities for inclusion in the program at the invitation of the minister. This, in turn, resulted in a shortfall of some $13 million in federal funds to assist some Ontario communities that qualify for the community services contribution program. Does the minister propose to honour his commitment to Ontario and provide funds to cover this shortfall?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has really had the advantage of researching the facts on the history of recommending the termination of the community services program. For example, it was first recommended in a report authored by the former minister and advice given to the former government in the fall of 1979. I understand that officials at all levels of provincial ministries and the federal ministry discussed that report in the fall of 1979. Early in 1980 I met with all of the ministers, including the ministers affected in the province of Ontario. I alerted them to the fact that we were considering not continuing that program. If the hon. member considers a year and a half's notice as a sudden rush to a decision, then I guess I would have to agree with his definition.

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, the provinces were misled by the federal government. They thought that the community services program would be extended by one year.

Would the minister enter into serious negotiations with the government of Ontario to resolve this problem which was a direct result of his abrupt termination of the community services contribution program without consultation with the provinces?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I would have to repeat in my answer again that I alerted officials in personal discussions with all of the ministers from every province of a possible non-continuation of that program. I would have to say that if there was any misleading—if anyone was taken down the garden path—it was the fact that the municipalities were not advised. Certificates of continuation under those provincial programs were issued by the provinces notwithstanding that they were alerted the program would not be continued.

THE CONSTITUTION

AMENDING FORMULA RESPECTING CHARTER OF RIGHTS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It arises from some of the answers he has given in the House today with respect to the Constitution. My question is very simple. If it is appropriate that this House enact a charter of rights and freedoms for Canadians, why is it not appropriate that subsequent parliaments alter a charter of rights and freedoms for Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the constitution is brought back with an amending formula, then we will have a way of amending our Constitution in Canada without going to the United Kingdom. If this House, and particularly if the Tory party wants to campaign, for instance, in a general election on the platform that it would take the charter out of the Canadian Constitution, and if it is elected on that basis, and if it has the support of, say, six provinces, then the charter will be out. But I doubt whether the hon. member would personally campaign against the charter—maybe the hon. member for Leeds would—but, if that is the test they want, I am sure we would be happy to meet them in a general election.

Mr. Gamble: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will recognize that he did not campaign in the last election on a charter of rights and freedoms which is now before this Parliament. The Prime Minister will also recognize that at no time has it ever been suggested that this charter in fact not be the law of Canada. What I would like to ask the Prime Minister by way of a supplementary question, however, is this. Is not the sum and substance of what he is proposing that the charter of rights and freedoms which is to apply to Canadians shall be enacted in a foreign jurisdiction with a foreign government, precluding any subsequent Parliament of Canada on its own, as this Parliament of Canada is now doing, from amending this Charter of Rights and Freedoms? Is that not in fact what the Prime Minister is doing?

● (1140)

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, that is what we are doing, and that is because the Constitution has no amending formula. Somehow the British forgot to put it in in 1867.

An hon. Member: That's nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I hear a lot of grumblings over there Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry, the British did not forget to put it in, they left it out deliberately.

An hon. Member: That's right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member opposite says "that's right", so what is the argument? They left it out deliberately because Canadians could not make up their minds, and that has been true for 114 years. Now Parliament is making up its mind. The hon. member's party says it is in favour of a charter of rights; the hon. member for Provencher on behalf of his party said unequivocally a couple of weeks ago that the Canadian people wanted a charter of rights and that the Tory party wanted a charter of rights. If they want it, why do they not vote for it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL CONTRIBUTE TO FINANCING OF INTEGRATED TRANSPORT SYSTEM IN MONTREAL

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On Wednesday of this week, the Quebec government announced that agreement had been reached to carry out the integrated transportation project on the island of Montreal. The agreement provides for the integration of commuter trains into the MUCTC network but does not mention federal government assistance under UTAP, the Urban Transportation Assistance Program. Can the minister give us some details concerning the federal contribution to integrated transport in the Montreal area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the terms used by the hon. member are revealing.

The first stage will consist in merging the suburban transportation system with the city of Montreal's own urban transit system. It was a matter of integrating those two elements. Yesterday's agreement is an integration agreement.

The second stage, which in fact is parallel, will consist in upgrading commuter trains, and that is where the federal government comes in. I announced recently that the Quebec government and the federal government had reached formal agreement about a special program, a special contribution partly under UTAP, which is aimed at upgrading commuter trains possibly to the tune of $80 million. The formal agreement has been achieved and its provisions are now being drafted. I expect to make a final announcement about it within two or three weeks.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

REQUEST CANADA OPPOSE DEPLOYMENT OF NEUTRON BOMB

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

In light of statements this week by the United States Secretary of Defence that the U.S. is now planning the development of the neutron bomb and deployment of that weapon in Europe, and in light of the Dutch parliament vote just a couple of days ago to oppose deployment of the neutron bomb in Europe, will the Prime Minister tell the House that Canada too is opposed to the development of the neutron bomb, and will he seek a vote comparable to that conducted in the Dutch parliament, and being conducted in other parliaments in Europe, expressing our opposition to the deployment of this weapon?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows the government's position on atomic weapons of any kind and we have stated that we would not use them and they would not be deployed on our soil. But, I do not believe it is for us to tell the Europeans who are debating this matter whether they would want to deploy the neutron bomb on their soil. I am prepared to take notice on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs of the present situation in this regard. I confess I am not aware of the vote in the Dutch parliament, but it would seem to me, as a general proposition, that it is a matter for Europeans to decide rather than for Canadians.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, as the Prime Minister knows, the deployment of this bomb would be in the context of the NATO alliance and, indeed, it is in that context that I asked the question. In other words, let me put it this way; would the Prime Minister in concert with other members of the NATO alliance consider protesting vigorously with them, the partners of Canada in NATO, the deployment of the neutron bomb, and vigorously protest it to the United States as well?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I just stated the position of this government as far as Canada is concerned. But Canada belongs to an alliance which includes the United States and which very heavily relies on the United States, and we know that the nuclear deterrent is part of the strength of that alliance. We have never condemned the United States for having the nuclear weapon so long as the Warsaw Pact countries have the nuclear weapon. We have urged both sides to engage in the strategic arms limitation talks and hopefully reduce the number and eventually the necessity for those weapons. Until that happens, Madam Speaker, we have no objection, on the contrary, to a member of the alliance having the nuclear weapon.

Miss Jewett: The neutron bomb?

Mr. Trudeau: The neutron bomb is one of the nuclear weapons. The question of its deployment is one that has not been raised to my knowledge with the Canadian government. If the European governments want to have the neutron bomb as part of their defence, as they have nuclear weapons on their soil now, it would seem to me that is a matter for them to decide. I would be prepared to listen to the arguments and test them in a meeting of NATO.

ENERGY

COST OF HOME HEATING FUELS IN YUKON

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources based on the effects of last October's budget.

Has he received a telegram from the B.C. tugboat industry council president, Alistair Pollock, complaining that the marine industry world price for fuel consumed in international trade is unreasonable and unjustified, and is he aware of the effect the tax legislation of last October is going to have on heating fuels soon in the Yukon since, under that legislation of last October, Yukon would have to be deemed as a foreign country and that tax would apply, as 83 per cent of the fuel used in the Yukon comes through United States ports? Is he aware of that quirk in the budget?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not received nor have I yet seen the telegram to which the hon. member refers. However, I am acquainted, obviously, with the decision in the budget to charge world prices for marine bunker fuel used in international transportation. I am surprised at the concern expressed by the hon. member when his party is pushing so strongly to have higher prices for oil, even in Canada. In this case it is oil used in international travel. As he knows, the overwhelming share of it goes to foreign ship owners who operate in international maritime trade. This is the reason why we have decided to charge the maximum price for that oil.

● (1150)

As far as Yukon is concerned, heating oil in Yukon will be charged on the basis of the Canadian price for Canadian heating oil and Canadian gasoline. The announcement in the budget had to do with marine bunker oil used in international transportation, not heating oil for homes.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I think I can take an assurance from the minister's remarks that home heating fuels in Yukon will not fall afoul of this quirk, as the Canadian Press story calls it, in the budget, but I ask the minister to look specifically into this in view of the fact that the CP story seems to indicate that the home heating fuels delivered through foreign ports—83 per cent of the home heating fuel used in Yukon is foreign—are caught by that taxing regulation. If that is a fact, home heating fuel costs in Yukon will rise by 56 per cent, and this would result in consumers in Yukon, who consume twice the national average with respect to home heating fuels, paying in some instances $2 and $3 a gallon for home heating fuels. Will the minister look into that and, if he finds it is a fact, will he take immediate action to exempt Yukon consumers from that provision in the budget or provide some sort of shelter or remedy which would prevent that effect on April 1 next?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I can immediately give the assurance to the hon. member that there is no question about charging world prices for heating oil in Yukon. There must be a misunderstanding on the part of the newspaper man who wrote this article. This has never even been considered. The only thing for which a high price will be charged is the marine bunker used in the operation of ships involved in international transportation. What they carry is something else, and as far as the price of home heating fuel oil is concerned, the present practice of having basically a single price for Canada, including Yukon, will continue to apply. I can assure the hon. member of that. Obviously prices vary across the country according to costs of transportation, but the basic price will remain the same across Canada.

COMBINES

INVESTIGATION OF RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN BELL TELEPHONE AND NORTHERN TELECOM

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about an issue with which I am sure he is very familiar and concerned, that is, the relationship between Bell Telephone and Northern Telecom, its subsidiary.

I want to ask the minister if he has any plans under consideration for measures, in addition to those available under the Combines Investigation Act, to investigate the incestuous relationship between these two corporations—perhaps under the Inquiries Act—before any major increases or, indeed, any further rate increases are granted by the CRTC to Bell Canada.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the bureau of competition has intervened before the CRTC to make representations about telephone rates with respect to the matter before the CRTC on this question. I have no reason to believe that in the future the director of combines will not pursue his activities along this line to assure total security for consumers across Canada.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I welcome the minister's reply. He is aware of the contrast between Northern Telecom's operations in the United States, where it has competition and where it lost $185 million, and in Canada, where it has a sweetheart deal with Bell. I want to say to the minister briefly that this situation leads to the same kind of extra charges per telephone call which consumers will be paying as those they may pay for every litre of gas in order to acquire Petro-Canada. The difference is that there is nothing involving Canadianization here. Rather, it is a reverse subsidization whereby Bell Telephone users are subsidizing the losing operations of Northern Telecom in the United States.

Does the minister agree that this matter ought to be considered very carefully now, particularly in view of the increasing evidence of wasteful and prolifigate management practices, particularly in Northern Telecom, which are affecting telephone consumers because of its relationship with Bell?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, of course that is a matter of judgment and evaluation. The hon. member appears to be categorical in his interpretation of the facts. I would suggest that qualified officials are appointed to weigh these facts and make appropriate recommendations. Rather than personally drawing conclusions, I would leave that task to those whose responsibility it is to do so.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

INQUIRY RESPECTING EAST COAST EXPLORATION

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Coming, as I do, from one of the four Atlantic provinces, I wonder if the minister can give this House the assurance that the National Energy Program is in fact a vigorous exploration program, especially off the east coast, that both domestic and foreign companies are or will be involved in a meaningful way, and that the program is more than, as has been suggested left and right in recent weeks, just a mumble jumble of wishy-washy words whispered down a wishing well.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I want to assure my hon. friend that under the National Energy Program, Canada lands, and particularly the east coast offshore, will see a very, very vigorous exploration program this year and in the next few years.

In this regard I was particularly pleased by the announcement made yesterday by Shell Oil, a foreign-owned company, that it will launch a major program to search for oil and gas off the east coast of Canada. This was in spite of the fact that this is a foreign-owned company which will receive smaller grants than Canadian-owned companies for carrying out that search.

I was also very happy that Shell Oil indicated that it is looking for Canadian partners to carry out this exploration, thereby achieving our goal of having much greater Canadian participation in the development of the oil and gas industry in this country.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

REMOVAL OF WEAPONS FROM CANADIAN TERRITORY

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question which is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam. In reply to her first question, the Prime Minister said that it is well known that the position of the government is that we are opposed to atomic weapons of all kinds and do not have them on our soil. Does this mean that nuclear weapons have been removed from Comox, where they have been on our soil for over a decade?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I thought the policy was made clear when we were discussing the F-18. The F-18 will be the new fighter aircraft in Canada, and it is not designed to carry nuclear weapons.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has given a nice answer, but it does not bear on the question I asked. Is he now informing the House, or did he a few minutes ago, that the nuclear weapons which are on site in Comox at the present time have been removed?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows the answer to that. We have stated repeatedly that our policy is to remove the nuclear weapons, but until the F-18 is in place they will not be removed.

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON—STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS ON REFINANCING

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has he any statement to make with respect to the present negotiations involving the Massey-Ferguson situation and, if so, could he tell us what form the statement will take? Will he be making a statement on motions, or how will this House first be informed as to what his conclusions are?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I have no statement to make at this time, but the matter is under active review.

Mr. Stevens: To the minister's knowledge during these negotiations has the government of the United States or the government of the United Kingdom been asked for any assistance with respect to Massey-Ferguson similar to what the Canadian government was asked for in the case of Chrysler?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I think that question would be easier to deal with when we are in a position to announce the results of the considerations we are undertaking at this time.

STATUS OF WOMEN

FEBRUARY CONFERENCE—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ASSIST IN MEETING TRAVEL EXPENSES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is also responsible for the status of women.

An hon. Member: So far.

Mrs. Mitchell: I am sure the minister is aware that a broad cross-section of Canadian women from across Canada are determined to carry on with the conference on February 14 and 15 to discuss constitutional matters and other matters of concern to Canadian women. I assure him that every effort is being made to make this a non-partisan event.

Since the minister indicated that he wanted wide participation of Canadian women in the process of developing a renewed advisory council, and since this conference will be pursuing other aspects of constitutional reform as it affects women and in fact would not be politically embarrassing, will he make the same provision for travel expenses to assist women to come here from across Canada as was provided, for example, for aboriginal groups? Will he support the women in their efforts to have an independent conference, which indeed will assist the process?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am always pleased to see any group in this country that wants to talk about the Constitution; it is a very important topic. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women is organizing a major conference on the constitution and, as a government agency, it will be receiving the full support of the Government of Canada.

An hon. Member: It had better not be a government agency.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I think the minister is fully aware that while the group is meeting, I believe, on the Monday of that week, certainly the views of a much wider group of women from across Canada, from all economic spheres and walks of life, must be part of the process. It will cost some women $400 to come from remote parts of Canada; they need assistance. Is the minister saying that he is refusing this assistance to women attending the weekend conference?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, not having had any involvement with the organizing of the conference, as I am sure the hon. member has had—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: —I will not be able to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Considering the particular objectives of hon. members of the NDP and the Conservative Party in that particular conference, I leave it up to their own devices to find ways of supporting them.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the minister aware in northeastern Saskatchewan, particularly in the White Fox subdivision, that the Wheat Board increased the quota to 20 bushels for barley but failed to provide boxcars at the same time, thereby making it impossible for farmers to deliver grain or to take cash advances? Is the minister aware of this situation? What does he intend to do about it?

PETITIONS

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDING FORMULA

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, with your kind permission I should like to present to the House a petition signed by 32,571 Canadians from coast to coast, and from north to south. It began with a small group of Calgarians who were concerned about the actions taken by the House in relation to the constitution. It speaks to the fact that many Canadians from all parts of Canada now live in Calgary and have seen that this petition was passed through friends and relatives to all parts of this land.

The petitioners seek to have their grievance redressed by the House, and to have the House deal with the resolution in a manner which will involve bringing the Constitution of Canada home to Canada, with an amending formula agreed to by the provinces, and all further amendments to take place in Canada.

WALTER TRUCKS

Question No. 1,465—Mr. Deans:

1. From 1965 to June 1980, how many orders in council were issued affecting Walter Trucks operating in Canada and what was the actual wording of each order in council?

2. What amount of customs duty was remitted for each order submitted concerning Walter Trucks?

3. What were the commitments from Walter Trucks in exchange for remitting each customs duty?

4. Did Walter Trucks meet each commitment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concered: 1. Copy of the Specified Commercial Vehicles Walter Trucks Remission Order PC 1965-1143 is shown below. Under the original Remission Order (Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965, (MVTO 1965)), there are four conditions to meet to qualify as a manufacturer, these conditions are set out in paragraph 2(1)(e) of the MVTO 1965. Failure to meet any one of these conditions disqualifies the company under the order. This company did not produce vehicles in the base year of the MVTO 1965 (paragraph 2(1)(e)(i)), therefore they were disqualified as a manufacturer under it. Order in council PC 1965-1143 created a base year which allowed Walter Trucks the same duty-free privileges as those companies qualifying under the MVTO 1965.

2, 3 and 4. As in the case of the MVTO 1965, the amount of duty on an individual company base is not known. However, the conditions as set out in PC 1965-1143 have been met by this company. See also question 1,457 tabled this day.

PC 1965-1143
AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA
MONDAY, the 21st day of JUNE, 1965.
PRESENT:

HIS EXCELLENCY

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL IN COUNCIL.

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, pursuant to section 22 of the Financial Administration Act and section 273 of the Customs Act, is pleased hereby to make the annexed "Specified Commercial Vehicles, Walter Trucks, Remission Order".

ORDER RESPECTING THE REMISSION OF CUSTOMS DUTY ON CERTAIN MOTOR VEHICLES, PARTS AND ACCESSORIES AND PARTS THEREFOR.

1. This order may be cited as the Specified Commercial Vehicles, Walter Trucks, Remission Order.

2. (1) In this order all words and expression have the meanings assigned to them by the Tariff Item 950 Regulations.

(2) In this order "Walter Trucks" means Walter Motor Trucks of Canada Limited.

3. Remission is hereby granted of all duty specified in Schedule A of the Customs tariff that is payable in respect of vehicles of the following class, namely, specified commercial vehicles, and in respect of all parts and accessories and parts thereof, for such vehicles, except tires, tubes and machines or other articles required by Tariff Item 438a to be valued separately under the tariff items regularly applicable thereto, on condition that

(a) a claim is made to the Minister of National Revenue for the remission;

(b) in the case of parts and accessories and parts thereof, they are -

(i) imported for use as original equipment in vehicles of that class to be produced in Canada by Walter Trucks, and

(ii) imported or taken out of warehouse during the period commencing on the 18th day of January, 1965, and ending on the 31st day of July, 1968;

(c) in the case of vehicles, they are imported or taken out of warehouse by Walter Trucks during the period commencing on the 18th day of January, 1965, and ending on the 31st day of July, 1968;

(d) Walter Trucks produces vehicles of that class in Canada in the period of twelve months ending on the 31st day of July, in which the importation is made

(i) the ratio of the net sales value of which to the net sales value of all vehicles of that class sold for consumption in Canada by Walter Trucks in that period in not lower than seventy-five to one hundred, and

(ii) the Canadian value added of which is equal to or greater than twenty thousand dollars; and

(e) in the case of a vehicle imported or taken out of warehouse after the 31st day of July, 1965, the claim for remission is made at the time the vehicle is entered for consumption in Canada.

4. Remission is hereby granted of sales tax on each vehicle for which Customs duty is remitted by this order in the amount of the difference between the sales tax calculated on the duty paid value of the vehicle and the sales tax calculated on the value for duty of the vehicle.

5. For the purpose of paragraph (d) of section 3, in computing the net sales value of vehicles sold for consumption in Canada by Walter Trucks,

(a) in the period of twelve months ending on the 31st day of July, 1965, there shall be deducted an amount equal to one and one-half times the net sales value of all vehicles of that class so sold by Walter Trucks in that period that were imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after January 18th, 1965, and for which no remission of duty is granted by this order; and

(b) in any subsequent period of twelve months ending on the 31st day of July, there shall be deducted an amount equal to the net sales value of all vehicles of that class so sold by Walter Trucks in that subsequent period that were imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after January 18th, 1965, and for which no remission of duty is granted by this order.

6. The Minister of National Revenue may take a guarantee bond or other security for the performance by Walter Trucks of the conditions on which remission is granted by this order in the amount of the lesser of the Customs duty payable on the vehicles, parts and accessories and parts thereof described in section 3 that are likely to be imported or taken out of warehouse by Walter Trucks during any twelve month period ending on the 31st day of July, as estimated by the Minister of National Revenue, or ten thousand dollars.

MOTOR COACH INDUSTRIES LTD.

Question No. 1,466—Mr. Deans:

1. From 1965 to June, 1980, how many orders in council were issued affecting Motor Coach Industries Ltd. operating in Canada and what was the actual wording of each order in council?

2. What amount of customs duty was remitted for each order submitted concerning Motor Coach Industries Ltd.?

3. What were the commitments from Motor Coach Industries Ltd. in exchange for remitting each customs duty?

4. Did Motor Coach Industries Ltd. meet each commitment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Copy of the Buses, Motor Coach Industries Ltd. PC 1967-489 is shown below. Under the original Remission Order (Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965, (MVTO 1965)), there are four conditions to meet to qualify as a manufacturer, these conditions are set out in paragraph 2(1) (e) of the MVTO 1965. Failure to meet any one of these conditions disqualifies the company under the order. This company does not produce complete vehicles, but produces bus bodies for the North American Market. Accordingly, they were disqualified as a manufacturer under the original order. Order in council PC 1967-489 allows Motor Coach Industries Ltd. the same duty-free privileges as those companies qualifying under the MVTO 1965.

2, 3 and 4. As in the case of the MVTO 1965, the amount of duty on an individual base is not known. However, the conditions as set out in PC 1967-489 have been met by this company. See also question 1,457 tabled this day.

PC 1967-489
AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA
THURSDAY, the 16th day of MARCH, 1967
PRESENT:

HIS EXCELLENCY
THE ADMINISTRATOR IN COUNCIL.

His Excellency the Administrator in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry and the Treasury Board, pursuant to section 22 of the Financial Administration Act and section 273 of the Customs Act, is pleased hereby to make the annexed Order Respecting the Remission of Customs Duty on certain Motor Vehicles, Parts and Accessories and Parts thereof.

ORDER RESPECTING THE REMISSION OF CUSTOMS DUTY ON CERTAIN MOTOR VEHICLES, PARTS AND ACCESSORIES AND PARTS THEREOF.

1. This order may be cited as the Buses, Motor Coach Industries Limited, Remission Order.

2. (1) In this order all words and expressions have the meanings assigned to them by the Tariff Item 950 Regulations.

(2) In this order "Motor Coach" means Motor Coach Industries Limited.

3. Remission is hereby granted of all duty specified in Schedule A of the Customs Tariff that is payable in respect of buses and in respect of all parts and accessories and parts thereof for use in the manufacture of bodies for buses, on condition that

(a) a claim is made to the Minister of National Revenue for the remission;

(b) in the case of buses, they are

(i) imported or taken out of warehouse by Motor Coach during the period commencing on the 1st day of August, 1966 and ending on the 31st day of July, 1968, and

(ii) produced from bodies manufactured in Canada by Motor Coach;

(c) in the case of parts and accessories and parts thereof, they are

(i) imported for use as original equipment in bus bodies to be produced in Canada by Motor Coach, and

(ii) imported or taken out of warehouse during the period commencing on the 1st day of August, 1966 and ending on the 31st day of July, 1968;

(d) in the case of

(i) buses that are imported or taken out of warehouse by Motor Coach, and

(ii) parts and accessories and parts thereof that are imported or taken out of warehouse for Motor Coach bus bodies, in any period of twelve months ending on the 31st day of July in a year subsequent to 1966, Motor Coach produced bodies for buses in Canada in that twelve-month period, the Canadian value added of which is equal to or greater than the Canadian value added of all bodies for buses produced in Canada by Motor Coach in the twelve-month period commencing on the 1st day of August, 1965 and ending on the 31st day of July, 1966.

4. Remission is hereby granted of sales tax on each bus for which Customs duty is remitted by this order in the amount of the difference between the sales tax calculated on the duty paid value of the bus and the sales tax calculated on the value for duty of the bus.

5. The Minister of National Revenue may take a guarantee bond or other security for the performance by Motor Coach of the conditions on which remission is granted by this order in the amount of the lesser of the Customs duty payable on the buses, parts and accessories and parts thereof described in section 3 that are likely to be imported or taken out of warehouse by Motor Coach during any period of twelve months ending on the 31st day of July, as estimated by the Minister of National Revenue, or ten thousand dollars.

ÉQUIPEMENT UNIVERSEL NAPIERVILLE INC.

Question No. 1,467—Mr. Deans:

1. From 1965 to June 1980, how many orders in council were issued affecting Équipement Universel Napierville Inc. operating in Canada and what was the actual wording of each order in council?

2. What amount of customs duty was remitted for each order submitted concerning Équipement Universel Napierville Inc.?

3. What were the commitments from Équipement Universel Napierville Inc. in exchange for remitting each customs duty?

4. Did Équipement Universel Napierville Inc. meet each commitment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Copy of the Buses, Équipement Universel Napierville Inc. Remission Order PC 1967-760 is shown below. Under the original Remission Order (Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965, (MVTO 1965)), there are four conditions to meet to qualify as a manufacturer, there conditions are set out in paragraph 2(2)(e) of the MVTO 1965. Failure to meet any one of these conditions disqualifies the company under the order. This company did not produce vehicles in the base year of the MVTO 1965 (paragraph 2(1)(e)(i)), therefore they were disqualified as a manufacturer under the original order. Order in council PC 1967-760 created a base year which allowed Équipement Universel Napierville Inc. the same duty free privileges as those companies qualifying under the MVTO 1965.

2, 3 and 4. As in the case of the MVTO 1965, the amount of duty on an individual company base is not known. However, the conditions as set out in PC 1967-760 have been met by this company. This company is no longer in business. See also question 1,457 tabled this day.

6. The Minister of National Revenue may take a guarantee bond or other security for the performance by Universel of the conditions on which remission is granted by this order in the amount of the lesser of the Customs duty payable on the buses, parts and accessories and parts thereof described in section 3 that are likely to be imported or taken out of warehouse by Universel during any 12-month period ending on the 31st day of July, as estimated by the Minister of National Revenue, or ten thousand dollars.

ATLANTIC TRUCK & TRAILER LIMITED

Question No. 1,468—Mr. Deans:

1. From 1965 to June, 1980, how many orders in council were issued affecting Atlantic Truck & Trailer operating in Canada and what was the actual wording of each order in council?

2. What amount of customs duty was remitted for each order submitted concerning Atlantic Truck & Trailer?

3. What were the commitments from Atlantic Truck & Trailer in exchange for remitting each customs duty?

4. Did Atlantic Truck & Trailer meet each commitment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Copy of the Atlantic Truck & Trailer Remission Order PC 1968-2109 is shown below. Under the original Remission Order (Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965, (MVTO 1965)), there are four conditions to meet to qualify as a manufacturer, these conditions are set out in paragraph 2(1)(e) of the MVTO 1965. Failure to meet any one of these conditions disqualifies the company under the order. This company did not produce vehicles in the base year of MVTO 1965 (paragraph 2 (1)(e)(i)), therefore they were disqualified as a manufacturer under it. Order in council PC 1968-2109 created a base year which allowed Atlantic Truck & Trailer the same duty free privileges as those companies qualifying under the MVTO 1965.

2, 3 and 4. As in the case of the MVTO 1965, the amount of duty on an individual company base is not known. However, the conditions as set out in PC 1968-2109 have been met by this company. This company is no longer in business. See also question 1,457 tabled this day.

1. From 1965 to June, 1980, how many orders in council were issued affecting, Central Truck Body Co. Ltd. operating in Canada and what was the actual wording of each order in council?

2. What amount of customs duty was remitted for each order submitted concerning Central Truck Body Co. Ltd.?

3. What were the commitments from Central Truck Body Co. Ltd. in exchange for remitting each customs duty?

4. Did Central Truck Body Co. Ltd. meet each commitment?

Return tabled.

FORD MOTOR CO.

Question No. 1,495—Mr. Young:

1. From 1965 to June, 1980, how many orders in council were issued affecting Ford Motor Co. and its subsidiaries operating in Canada and what was the actual wording of each order in council?

2. What amount of customs duty was remitted for each order submitted concerning Ford Motor Co. and its subsidiaries?

3. What were the commitments from Ford Motor Co. and its subsidiaries in exchange for remitting each customs duty?

4. Did Ford Motor Co. and its subsidiaries meet each commitment?

Return tabled.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT'S INDUSTRIAL POLICY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel) moved:

That this House condemns the government, and in particular the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for concentrating unduly on the bailing out of big, foreign corporations instead of on the implementation of a desperately needed industrial development policy, and for the resulting devastation of our small business sector, the absence of direction or support for industrial innovation, the surrender of domestic markets in manufactured goods to foreign competitors, the crippling of the construction and other productive sectors through high interest rates, and the resulting loss of tens of thousands of jobs.

He said: Madam Speaker, in speaking to the motion before the House I think it is important to acknowledge what I would regard as the high points in the motion itself. First of all we are saying that we believe the government has been unduly concentrating on the bailing out of big foreign corporation at the expense of settling a proper industrial development policy for the nation. We believe the government is dealing with immediate problems, as opposed to solving some of the longer-range problems which must be solved in the country.

As a result of this approach we have witnessed the devastation of the Canadian small business sector. We have seen that industrial innovation is not progressing satisfactorily and that research and development are not being funded by the provincial levels, by the federal level, and certainly not by the private sector, to the extent they should be. As a result of the impasse which is developing, we have seen that in virtually all instances the domestic market in Canada is being surrendered to foreign manufacturers. In short, we are in a stage where the economy is becoming more and more stagnant.

Foreign competitors are gaining greater access to our market than they ever have. The result is a crippling of the construction and other productive sectors in our economy due, in part, to the high interest structure which has been inflicted upon the nation by this government.

All of this has led us to the unfortunate unemployment situation which we have in this country and, as we express in the motion, the increase of tens of thousands on the unemployed lists over the last few months. This month alone we learned that unemployment jumped on a non-adjusted basis—an actual basis—by 135,000 Canadians, reaching 945,000 people out of work in Canada.

I would like to deal more specifically with the points I have touched upon. For example, what do we mean when we say that we believe the government has been concentrating unduly on the bailing out of big corporations? I would like to give two or three examples. What else can you call the situation in which the government only last November decided to advance $40 million to Imperial Oil Limited because it had created, if you like, a problem for Imperial which resulted in the first place from the federal budget ramifications and, in the second place, by the rather difficult conditions which the government inflicted on the oil industry through their National Energy Program? I would regard that as a typical example of where this Trudeau government tends to create problems through budgetary measures, through the inflicting of a National Energy Program on an industry. Then it turns around and starts bailing it out, in this case to the tune of $40 million.

I would like to give another illustration of the bail-outs of these large corporations. Michelin is another example. Here is a case where the government decided to give Michelin Tires (Canada) Limited $42 million in an attempt, if you like, to have Michelin rekindle the fires of its plant operations in Canada. There may be instances where we must help such plants or industries, but in the absence of an over-all approach one can see difficulties are bound to ensue.

With respect to the Michelin situation, as most of us in this House know, certainly we have been approached on the question, others which must compete in the rubber industry are now stating that to subsidize Michelin in this way is grossly unfair. Let us say Firestone in Hamilton or Goodyear in the Toronto area are saying that they find it difficult enough to remain viable without the federal government going in and helping one of their competitors in a way which, somehow or other, is not a benefit open to them.

I would like to touch on a different illustration of a bail-out which I would say is terribly costly for Canadians. As we know, Petro-Canada has made an offer to purchase Petrofina. It is estimated that the total purchase price may be in the order of $1.5 billion. The bulk of those proceeds, of course, will go to the Belgian parent company. I think it is most revealing that only two days ago the founder of Petrofina, Mr. Alfredo Campo, indicated to the press that he was amazed at the offer made by the federal government for the purchase of Petrofina. He stated that as a shareholder in the company he was delighted at the suggested price of $120 per share but that—and here I use his words—"But as a Canadian citizen, I say it is absolutely incredible. No private person would buy at that price."

Mr. Speaker, how else can we come to any other conclusion than that this government, and in particular the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and, presumably, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are rattling around within their cabinet in the most aimless, misdirected fashion we have ever seen? Here we have a government without an industrial plan, without any indication as to where it thinks the various sectors of our economy should be going. It has haphazardly given $40 million to Imperial, $42 million to Michelin, and it is presumably going into foreign lands to borrow $1.5 billion to pay $120 per share for a company called Petrofina, when the founder of that company turns around and says that is incredible. No private individual would be offering that kind of money for the company founded by Alfredo Campo, as he himself says.

Let us try to put this $1.5 billion in a better perspective. As we know, the interest the government will incur in the raising of that kind of money will become an ownership charge, as they call it. I suggest it should be called a nationalization charge. It will be passed on to every consumer of petroleum products in this country. As you drive up to the pump there will be that nationalization charge. I hope that every supplier will put on their pumps what the consumer is paying for Pierre Elliott Trudeau's nationalization program in this country. That is where it will be spelt out. Clearly, $1.5 billion at 10 per cent per year is $150 million which we will have to pay from coast to coast. The government will not get its money at 10 per cent, the effective cost is likely to be more like 13 per cent. So here we have possibly $200 million a year to be financed through a national charge at the gasoline pumps. Think what $200 million would have done to help some of the small businesses in this country which are finding it difficult to live with the interest structure the government has inflicted upon them.

Speaking about that interest rate, I hope that when the minister rises to speak on this motion today he will explain why there are two standards in his mind on this question of interest. I hope he will explain why last February, when he was interviewed on TV, he felt justified in saying that if he were a member of a government with this type of interest rate structure he would resign. As we recall, the interest rate structure he was talking about was approximately 15 per cent at that time. It is now nearly 18 per cent, and he is still a member of the government. I hope today he will try to explain why he feels that in February, 1981, it is alright to be a member of a government which has inflicted upon the Canadian public an interest rate of approximately 18 per cent when in February, 1980, somehow or other he felt he should resign if he was ever a member of a government which had interest rates of 15 per cent.

I would like to dwell on the implications of what we are talking about. What is that $1.5 billion they have committed the people of Canada to spend? Look at it. For example, there are roughly 460,000 small businesses in Canada. That amount of money represents approximately $3,260 for each one of those small businesses. If the government is eager to go out and raise $1.5 billion to buy Petrofina, and hon. members should bear in mind the fact that the proceeds of that money will go into foreign hands, we in this House must contemplate what those proceeds could do to help some of those small businesses. Let us say that one in three small businesses decides to take advantage of a relatively low interest rate loan from the Canadian government. If all the applications of those businesses were accepted, it would mean roughly $10,000 for these average small businessmen.

Let us view the matter in another way. Last year 6,500 businesses did not survive. Most individuals find it difficult to survive in Trudeau land and many businesses find it impossible to survive in Trudeau land. Let us say that the government brings in a program worth $150 million to help small businesses and forgets about that 10 per cent which it has committed to the purchase of Petrofina. As the result of such a program those 6,500 businesses would have received help in the amount of approximately $25,000 and would have made it into 1981.

The reason I am highlighting these points is I believe that, if the government knows no better than to govern by drift and indecision, it is time we in the House of Commons, who are told day in and day out that the Constitution is supreme, say, "Emperor, you are no longer running a government which is satisfactory to this country. You have allowed us to drift into an economic morass that we in Parliament must insist you correct".

It is no longer acceptable to the Canadian public to have two ministers within the cabinet, the minister of so-called economic development and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, at each other's throat. It is no longer acceptable to have the one known interventionist in the form of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, constantly warring with the other minister who is known as the non-interventionist. This Janus-like situation where one minister looks one way and the other minister looks the other way, cannot continue. The result is stagnation and indecision which are causing the nation to drift into circumstances which are uncomfortable at the present time and which will become even more uncomfortable as the months go by.

Let us look at some of the stark facts. I have already indicated that, according to today's Statistics Canada figures, the unemployment rate has now touched 945,000. Why is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce happy with that unemployment rate? Can the minister tell us why he believes that he has done a great job, or explain to the people of his own town of Windsor why the unemployment rate in that town has gone from 16.7 per cent in January, 1980, to 18.9 per cent at the present time. Is he proud? Surely the minister cannot pretend that there is no cabinet influence involved. There are three ministers within the cabinet who come from the Windsor area. I ask hon. members to think what would happen to that poor city if there were six ministers from that area in the cabinet.

While the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce may have done the worst, or the best—depending on how one looks at it—job for his home town, he has dealt crippling blows to other towns. I do not know whether he even goes to Montreal these days, but it had an unemployment level of 8.8 per cent last January. Today the unemployment rate in that city is 10.3 per cent. The unemployment rate in the Chicoutimi area was 9.9 per cent shortly before this minister took office, and today it is over 14 per cent. Regina, one of the cities which is normally looked upon as a relatively unemployment-free area, has seen its unemployment level, as the result of actions which are partly the responsibility of this government, jump from 3.4 per cent in January, 1980, to 7.4 per cent in 1981.

That is an example of the government in action and of the emperor ruling the country. Hopefully we will hear today the rationalization of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with regard to these problems. What can he tell us about his frustrations within cabinet and about the various plans which he has leaked to the press from time to time as to what he hopes to do on behalf of Canadian industry, trade and commerce?

Whatever happened to the overhaul legislation for the Foreign Investment Review Agency? It is almost one year since we were told that there would be significant changes with respect to the foreign investment situation in Canada in terms of government controls. I hope the minister will let us in on some of those internal secrets. I hope the minister will also be able to tell us why he feels satisfied with the low investment rate in Canada. For example, worker output declined by 3.5 per cent in 1980. This decline occurred after a 1.2 per cent decline in worker output in 1979. Is that why the minister virtually pleaded with the Prime Minister to make him Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

The trade deficit in manufactured goods is accelerating at an ever-increasing rate. Recent figures show that our trading position on manufactured goods with the rest of the world has reached a deficit of close to $18 billion. I hope the minister will tell the House why he feels that is satisfactory or will let us into the secret of what happened in cabinet that prevented him from doing something about it.

● (1230)

Perhaps we will hear an explanation for the negative real growth of last year, a condition that has probably not occurred in this country since World War II. We had a negative per capita real growth for four years but now in gross terms we find ourselves in a negative position. In other words, if we take away that artificial inflation that the government has thrust upon the nation, we find that the man who works for what he thinks is a decent wage, has really lost buying power in each of the last four years. That is what happened under the rule of this emperor and of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I hope the minister will take the opportunity that we have given to him today—I stress that it is us giving the government the opportunity to tell us what it intends to do—

Miss Jewett: We, not us.

Mr. Knowles: Mind your grammar.

Mr. Stevens: I will make no comment on that. In short, Mr. Speaker, the government has lived by outworn philosophies. Too many members on the other side attended the London school of economics and are tied up with this thing called Keynesianism. They are still drifting in that dreamy world—

An hon. Member: What about Freedman.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the lefties always like to speak from their seats. I hear one of them saying that Keynes came from Cambridge. If she were to go through the roster of those who pretend to be cabinet ministers in this country, she would find that they and some of their staff are disciples of the London School of Economics and at the time they were being taught there, Keynesianism was regarded as something next to the eleventh commandment.

That order is no longer in style in the western world, Mr. Speaker. The so-called demand management type of theory is archaic. What we must concentrate on is supply-management, which means a greater intensification and encouragement of investment, a greater concern that the plant, the tools, the equipment be supplied to workers so that they can compete not only for the domestic market but for the world market. The notion that you can spend your way into prosperity by artificially triggering demand is not effective in the eighties.

I would suggest that this government, drunken as it has been in the way it has run the country, could get away with that drunkenness only if most of the nations with which we compete were equally irresponsible. Traditionally Japan has run a good economy; traditionally Germany has run a good economy; traditionally the Swiss have also run a sound economy. Canada is the only country that persists in running an economy based upon unsound principles. There has been a tremendous change of direction in Britain. It is attempting to tighten its fiscal and monetary position in the hope of regaining its productive position in the world.

Our neighbours to the south have elected a new president. His cabinet is going to change the priorities of that country dramatically. As a result, the United States will have less government, not more government as is the case in this country. The United States will have less spending, not more; a smaller deficit, not a larger one such as this government persists in inflicting upon Canadians, and there will be deregulation of the private sector in the United States, not "the" regulation of the private sector.

This government can no longer persist in the reckless, careless, spending, interventionist approaches it has been using when its main trading partner is dramatically going the other way. The government can make certain changes, of course, or it can keep on artificially steering the country onside by allowing the dollar to fall in relation to the United States dollar. That cannot go on forever, however.

I hope that we will learn today that the government will offer a better program than the pitiful one offered by the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts). When he tabled it in this House he said it would encourage spending on research and development to the level of 1.5 per cent of the GNP. There was so little information in the package, however, that the so-called program was meaningless.

I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will tell us about something that is more impressive than the $350 million program for industrial restructuring and labour adjustment which he announced recently. The best thing about that program was the advertising that appeared before it was announced. A study of the glossy, neat publications reveals that the program was not designed so much for the restructuring or stimulation of industry as for picking up some of the corporate corpses the government left lying around the country.

I hope the minister will have something to say about the very telling arguments put forward by the Science Council of Canada and why he believes their suggestions cannot be implemented quickly.

The time has come when we in this House must insist that the government focus on the true problems which face Canadians. These are economic. It must realize that the three-ring circus known as the constitutional debate can no longer be in the spotlight, attracting its attention and time.

At a time when this country needs a sense of destiny and confidence it is incredible that it is being led by a man known as the emperor, who feels that the greatest issue we face is the technical argument about the patriation of the Constitution. Nobody disagrees with patriation, Mr. Speaker. But the Prime Minister tends to divide the country at a time when it should be united, when it should be gaining confidence in its destiny so that business and the private sector can bring prosperity back. Instead, the country is in a downward economic drift.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, because some of my colleagues will speak later. They will deal first with the position of this party on science and technology; second, our position on international trade, and third, some of the things that should be done for the clothing, textile and related industries. If there is time another colleague will deal with questions that particularly affect Atlantic Canada.

The government must come to its senses, Mr. Speaker. It must realize the serious economic deterioration that is occurring in the country. The time to act is now.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate which enables me to describe to the House and the people of Canada some of the efforts of the government to deal with the severe economic and industrial challenges that have emerged in the country and in the world in the context of the difficulties of Canada's major market, the United States, and other markets throughout the world. The efforts of this government involve creating a solid framework for a future of economic stability and growth.

● (1240)

The hon. member opened his remarks by attacking and criticizing a number of specific projects. In doing so he first attacked the regional development program of this government. This is a program aimed at lessening regional disparities in regions such as Nova Scotia. In fact he specifically criticized a program very strongly supported by the Conservative government of that province. He also attacked the National Energy Program which is aimed not only at creating self-sufficiency in energy in Canada, but at ensuring that Canadians have more than they do at present of the long-term benefits in the development of our own energy resources.

In the hon. member's motion, not so much in his speech, he completely overlooked that the well-being, if not the very existence of thousands and thousands of small and medium-sized businesses in Canada and their employees, depend on the well-being and the existence of larger firms, in some cases foreign-owned. For these smaller and medium-sized companies, the continued ability to sell their goods and services to these larger firms is crucial to their own survival. From time to time, if the federal government acts with respect to larger companies, it is because it must be mindful of the role they play in the well-being of the thousands of smaller companies, their employees, as well as the employees of the larger companies and of the well-being of the communities where they live.

The hon. member claims to be concerned about the well-being of small and medium-sized businesses. But in ignoring in his motion the important reality that I have mentioned, he shows the shallowness of his approach. This government believes it has a role to play in co-operation with the private sector to help all Canadians, everywhere in our country, to share in the benefits of prosperity and economic growth.

There is another aspect of the hon. member's motion which I think Canadians would look upon as being disturbing. It shows an amazing lack of knowledge about what the government has been doing in the area of industrial development in a relatively brief period. Take support for industrial innovation, for example. Just this morning my colleague, the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), announced a $27 million increase in the federal government's funding of the joint industry-government Telidon program. Telidon is a highly advanced product of Canadian communications technology which was described in a recent editorial as "the most sophisticated videotext system in the world." This very substantial increase in federal funds for a program which is jointly administered by the Department of Communications and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce comes on top of the more than $12 million already committed. It constitutes a major contribution toward-making the new industry self-sustaining nationally and in demonstrating the commercial competitiveness of Telidon in world markets.

There should not be any doubt about the multiple benefits of public support through the development of technologies such as Telidon which, to the hon. member who introduced this motion, would be undue government interference. I suppose one could take from what he said that the government should not be in this area. I do not think Canadians would agree with that. Telidon has already had impressive accomplishments in closing sales in Washington, D.C., Venezuela and Switzerland, and has other international sales pending.

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about Imperial Oil.

Mr. Gray: Telidon is gaining tentative acceptance as an international standard and it is leading to the creation of a whole new service industry for the provision of information for the Telidon system. Smaller Canadian companies such as Infomart and Hempton have invested more than $6 million in the research and development necessary to develop and market the data base essential to the Telidon concept. This concept will be important to thousands of workers and to smaller Canadian companies and the entire Canadian economy over time. But Telidon is just one example of the government's commitment to spur research and development and industrial innovation at higher levels than in the past, levels necessary to the enhancement of Canada's place in the world's economy. I believe there have been very substantial accomplishments in the past eleven months in this area.

For example, in April I announced the implementation of the special fund under the enterprise development program of my department to foster expansion in Canada of the already highly successful electronics industry. One example of the use of this fund is the very substantial expansion recently announced by a Canadian company called Mitel, already a world leader in the electronics industry.

Mr. Stevens: How come they are going to Wales?

Mr. Gray: Mitel has announced an expansion in the Ottawa area and in Bromont involving some 1,000 jobs, something which would not have happened if my hon. friend had stayed in office to the misfortune of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Stevens: Herbie, tell us about Wales.

Mr. Pepin: What is wrong with going to Wales?

Mr. Gray: In November we introduced a new federal office communications program. This is a program to support the office of the future concept and is aimed at capturing by 1985 a significant share of the burgeoning domestic and international markets for electronic equipment for the office of the future. These are just some examples of recent federal measures to encourage innovation and growth of more advanced technology in Canadian industries.

I want to single out one example for special attention. Just last week I announced that the government will provide $450 million in loan guarantees to The de Havilland Aircraft company to develop the Dash-8, an entirely new STOL aircraft which promises to entrench for the future the place that Canada has already established as the world leader in this type of aviation technology.

Following closely on the heels of the remarkable success of the Dash-7, the Dash-8 has already attracted 93 purchase offers, and de Havilland predicts the sales of the plane will exceed $3 billion by 1996 as well as create 3,000 new jobs at the company. I wonder whether the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) would now like to try to convince his many constituents who work at de Havilland that the federal government should not offer support for this kind of advanced technology industry. I wonder also whether any members opposite, including the member for York-Peel who in years past advocated the withdrawal of government support from Canadair and de Havilland, in light of the successes of these two great companies under public ownership, involving the employment of 10,000 people and world leadership in their field, will now at least have the decency to admit they are wrong and to change their minds about this.

Mr. Stevens: You have got to be kidding.

Mr. Gray: I cannot mention the Dash-8 program without also reminding this House that the government will, as well, be providing $50 million through the defence industry productivity program to Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Services of Canada. This assistance will help Pratt & Whitney to design and develop the PT-7, a new advanced turbo-prop engine to be installed in the Dash-8 and to be used successfully, I think, in similar aircraft around the world. Production of the new engine will begin in 1983 in Longueuil, Quebec. It will create 1,000 new jobs at Pratt & Whitney. These will be new high-technology jobs based on research and development, which this government has made possible through its commitment to industrial innovation.

● (1250)

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that over $1.3 billion, some 40 per cent of the Dash-8 project, will be available for subcontracting to companies across Canada, and some $400 million, some 40 per cent of the PT project, will also be available to subcontracting companies across Canada. These spin-offs will help hundreds if not thousands of smaller and medium-sized companies and help create, likely, thousands of jobs in addition to those created directly by these projects.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the minister that he better check up on the Challenger and Canadair's success. Apparently they have had to add so much weight the plane won't—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. If the hon. member wants to make a point of order I will, of course, continue to recognize him and hear him, but he should try to tie his remarks to whatever point of order he wants to make.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say this about my hon. friend's spurious point of order. What he says really proves my point. They have no commitment to the type of support which has led to the burgeoning of thousands of jobs in Canadair and de Havilland. He has proved my point by his spurious point of order.

I note that my hon. friend in his motion did not speak about the very important area of export promotion. Perhaps that implies that at least in this area he agrees we are doing a good job.

I want to draw to the attention of the House in this connection an announcement I made earlier this week in conjunction with the Council of Forest Product Industries of British Columbia and the government of British Columbia, in Vancouver. Specifically I announced that the Government of Canada would contribute up to $10.5 million over the next five years to develop new offshore market opportunities for the forest products industry of British Columbia, and the other parties to the agreement will contribute matching amounts.

This is an extension and expansion of a program that has already increased the exports of B.C. forest products to markets other than the United States from some $200 million to $1 billion in the past ten years. This program is important because it will further increase sales of these forest products, open up and diversify new markets, and create many thousands of new jobs. It is also important because it is indicative of this government's effort and ability to work co-operatively with the private sector and provincial governments as a basis for an effective and co-ordinated approach to economic development.

In this case we are speaking of the co-operative approach of the federal government, the British Columbia government and the forest products companies, with the active encouragement and support of the International Woodworkers Union. We have joined forces to improve and expand a sector of the Canadian economy which has always been very important and on whose future the livelihoods and prosperity of a great many Canadians, a great many companies, large and small, depend.

The very great emphasis this government places on developing the economy through expanding and diversifying our exports was, I think, again demonstrated in the recent announcement of my colleague, the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley), that the Government of Canada will provide funds to Canadian firms to match credit mixte terms being offered by foreign governments. We want to be able to match this where necessary to enable Canadian firms to meet more effectively international competition in export markets.

I seem to recall and I stand to be corrected about this, that it was not too long ago a Liberal government introduced a bill to increase the lending and insurance levels of the Export Development Corporation, the Crown agency which is now administering the new credit mixte as well as our other export financing program. I stand to be corrected, but did not the hon. member opposite cry loud and long that the activities of the EDC should not expand, but rather that they should be curtailed? Fortunately for Canadian business and Canadian workers those arguments were not accepted, and the Export Development Corporation is able to operate as a result of our recent announcement even more effectively in the interests of Canadian exports.

The same is the case with our other programs, the program for Export Market Development and the Trade Fairs and Missions Program, the funding for which we announced a few weeks ago would be substantially increased over the next three years so that more than $50 million will be made available to assist Canadian companies in their export efforts. For the most part these will be small and medium-size companies taking their first steps toward export.

Of course the other side of the export development coin, and equally important to a successful industrial development strategy, is what many people call import replacement.

I think of pre-eminent importance in this regard are the various funded programs we administer to assist Canadian businesses to develop new products, to expand production of products for which there is a growing domestic and foreign demand, to introduce new production technologies and, over all, to enhance the capacity of our manufacturing sector to produce the high quality, competitively priced goods Canadians want to buy, as well as to improve our efforts in export markets.

Let me give the House some idea of the extent of the government's effort in this area. I recall that in answer to a question last fall by an hon. member belonging to the official opposition, I pointed out that in 1979 close to 30,000 projects involving mostly smaller and medium-sized businesses were provided with assistance in excess of $1 billion through programs administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, like the Federal Business Development Bank, the Small Business Loans program, and the Enterprise Development Program. These programs are operating at similar levels this year in the interests of thousands of smaller and medium-sized Canadian businesses and their employees.

Yet there is still a great deal more we are doing to help companies expand the quantity and range of their products and so in many cases replace imports. For instance, as part of the new $350 million Special Industry and Labour Adjustment Program, there will be a new panel of the Enterprise Development Program through which expanded assistance will be made available for new industrial initiatives that do not fall under the existing programs I have outlined. Aside from funded programs, we also intend to use other policy and administrative mechanisms in increasingly innovative ways for the achievement of these kinds of important industrial goals.

One of the best recent examples of this is a program that has not received much fanfare, but is important all the same, the Front End Loader Duty Remission Program. This will result in several major manufacturers of this important type of construction machinery establishing plants in Canada which will not only exclusively supply the Canadian market but overseas markets as well. We estimate some 1,200 new jobs will be created. Although essentially administrative programs such as this do not always receive the kind of attention they deserve, I believe they can be very important instruments for securing world product mandates, reducing our relative dependence on imports, and fostering new economic activity.

There are other things I could talk about to show what we are doing with regard to our comprehensive and realistic approach to stimulating a dynamic and regionally balanced national economy.

There are fundamental elements, such as the sound framework announced in the budget of October 28 and the commitment then made to increasing federal expenditures on economic development over the next four years by some 22 per cent, quite apart from the restructuring program I have been talking about. There are policy elements such as the government's oil pricing policy which will keep domestic oil prices sufficiently below world levels to assure a sustained competitive edge to Canadian manufacturers. There are program elements such as our new Special Industry and Labour Adjustment Program, all measures aimed at enabling the industrial benefits of major projects development to accrue to companies and workers in Canada. Also, I think we have to work to develop measures to ensure the compatibility of the performance of major private sector entities with our economic goals as well as action to enhance the ability of government to use its purchasing power in ways that bring real industrial benefits.

I want to conclude by dealing briefly for a minute or two with the main element of my hon. friend's motion. I want to say that I believe there are times when the combination of the enormous costs of a business failure to workers, the communities in which they live and the entire economy, as well as the very real prospect that temporary and limited assistance from government can restore within a reasonable period of time an enterprise to full participation in the economy on a healthy and profitable basis, are such that serious consideration must be given by the government from time to time to providing limited and specific measures of temporary help.

● (1300)

I need about a minute more, Mr. Speaker, and I wonder if I could have the permission of the House to conclude my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray: In each situation the government's evaluation and decision should be made in the light of the unique facts of that particular situation. However, at all times I believe a major criterion must be whether through its assistance a company can be restructured to supply the kinds of products that will be demanded in the 1980s and 1990s and to provide the kinds of jobs Canadians want and deserve.

In addition, as distinct from the simplistic and, I might say, foolish approach implied in the hon. member's motion, I do not believe federal and provincial governments should always ignore companies simply because, even though their employees are Canadians, their suppliers are Canadian businesses and their production takes place in Canada, they are not at a particular point in time Canadian controlled.

Mr. Stevens: What is the Toronto Star going to say now?

Mr. Gray: Along with almost everyone else in this country, I believe we have to be concerned primarily about Canadian production and Canadian jobs and, because of this concern, direct our efforts to building a strong and healthy Canadian economy. We are doing this in the context of the development of a comprehensive industrial policy framework. I am confident that our objectives and our efforts will result in solid achievements in the interests of all Canadians in all parts of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock at which time, I might indicate to hon. members, it would certainly be a great relief to the Chair if I could come back either as "Madam Speaker" or "Mr. Speaker", but not both.

At 1.02 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I read the motion put forward this morning with some considerable interest. I could not help thinking, as I listened to the debate by members on both sides, of the inconsistency of the Conservative position and the lack of understanding on the government's behalf. I think the minister has reached a point where he no longer serves a useful purpose. Not only does he stand in his place and make inane comments about the economy and the way in which it might or might not develop, but he does not even have the common courtesy to come back to the House and listen to other members' comments. It is typical of the minister that he holds for himself all truth and virtue while he never recognizes that other people may have something of value to say. I am speaking not only of myself but other members who have participated in this debate.

● (1410)

I wish to begin by saying to you, Mr. Speaker, that it concerns me when people speak with such gloom and doom about the future of Canada. I happen to believe that Canada is probably the best country in the world. We have available to us what almost every country in the world would gladly give anything to possess. Yet, for reasons which have escaped me over the years, we have managed to mismanage all of the natural attributes of Canada. Other nations which come to us to obtain natural resources, or which go to the Middle East for energy, are able to cope in a much more progressive way.

I can only assume that one of our difficulties is the way in which this government approaches the problem of industrial development, the proper utilization of our resource base, the deployment of our manpower base, the way we would like to see our secondary manufacturing develop, our commitment to export and the understanding that we should be meeting the domestic market requirements of this country from within this country.

When I listened to the minister respond, all I heard him talk about was more expenditure by the government, more handouts and more involvement. I do not object to the involvement, but I think concurrent with government involvement in the economy must surely be some commitment in the public and private sectors toward working in a co-operative fashion. They must work toward some goals. I think a goal which might be useful to establish for Canada would be the goal of full employment. People say to me that you cannot have full employment, but that is absolute nonsense. Of course you can have full employment. Of course you can have jobs for everyone. But first you must determine that it is your primary goal.

To this point in time we seem to have established goals based on carrying a significant number of Canadians on the unemployment rolls as a matter of principle. I suggest the government would do well to reconsider that principle and to begin a process of analysis. First of all, there is no analysis. There is no indication of an analysis of the problems which confront this country. There has been no analysis of our potential. There has been no clear identification of our strengths and our weaknesses. There has not been any plan of action developed in order to utilize and harness the potential of Canada for the common good. There have been no attempts to try and make this the kind of country which will be the envy of the world, both in economic and in social terms.

Since there has been no such action taken, and since everything we hear of is piecemeal, ad hoc and meeting immediate problems of an emergency nature rather than planning for a better future, all I can assume is that the government has neither the will nor the desire to see in place the kinds of co-operative undertaking which I believe can be realized in this country.

Initially, I think we must stress a sense of responsibility, both in terms of government and the corporate sector. We must say that this country demands of all its component parts a commitment to it. I suspect that has been one of the main stumbling blocks which we have faced. There has been very little in the way of commitment to Canada and its future.

What we are talking about in this debate is an industrial strategy and the development of such a policy. I know this means different things to different people, but one thing I am sure about is that it ought to have been implemented ten years ago. Since it was not implemented then, that should not stand in the way of implementing it now. We should establish some short-term goals. We all understand that short-term goals to meet emergency situations are expensive, but they must be seen to be and understood to be short term. It must be seen that they are bridging a gap which has been created, in part, by world economic downturn and in part by a lack of adequate management and responsibility right here at home.

We must then overlay that concept with some long-term goals so that we avoid falling into the same pits we are digging ourselves out of today. Long-term goals would enable us to avoid the problems of having to bail out companies and providing short-term assistance year after year so as to derive some long-term benefit from the natural assets we have in this country.

We must first identify our strengths. One of our main strengths is that we have somewhere between eight million and nine million households in this country. By most standards that is a large domestic market. It is a market which must be served by Canadians. It must be nurtured and maintained so that the Canadian manufacturer can put his products into the marketplace for sale to Canadians. Then we must look at the export markets of the world and identify clearly those areas where we want to assist in the growth of those markets, in trading with them and providing for them, from our expertise, and buying from them in accordance with their expertise. I know the minister of trade has been working on this process.

I want to make it clear that I have absolutely no objection—in fact, I agree, unlike the mover of the motion—to there being public sector involvement. I also want to make it clear that public sector involvement cannot simply be the public sector underwriting the risk for the private sector. It cannot simply be handouts for the sake of maintaining something which is, in itself, not able to sustain itself in the marketplace.

If the public sector is to become involved, I think it must become involved in the same way that anyone else would become involved, through an equity position for the use of public funds. We would take the risk but we would also derive the benefit, where there is one. I suggest if the government were serious about its approach to this problem then that is where it should begin. That is where it would have started with Chrysler, as I suggested a year ago. That is where it would be going with Massey-Ferguson, as I suggested not long ago. That is the government's role, encouraging public involvement, but in a way which guarantees the taxpayers that if there is to be success, then that success will yield benefits to the Canadian taxpayer beyond simply the jobs which would flow therefrom.

As I said when I started, Canada is second to none in the world. We have everything available to us. It is mind-boggling that we should be looking with envy at Japan, West Germany or other parts of the world and saying, "My God, don't we wish we could be like that." I don't want to be like that. I want to see us take what we have here and build on that. I want to see us create an industrial environment here which will utilize all of the strengths we have. That is where industrial development starts. We have natural resources, depletable, non-depletable, non-renewable and renewable. We have them available to us.

We should be using these resources to build our society rather than shipping them out of the country. We have energy available in all its various and many sources which is capable of meeting our needs now and in the future. We should be using that energy to build the base upon which future generations will survive. The manpower of Canada is well educated, trained and capable and, contrary to what is said by some, is the equal, if not better than the manpower of many countries of the world. If only there were jobs and markets for the goods they manufacture which would utilize the full productive capacity of the companies at which they work, rather than operating at 80 per cent and 75 per cent capacity.

We have educational facilities to train and retrain people, to educate people to live together harmoniously and co-operatively. We have a financial structure, albeit conservative, which is strong. There is no need to borrow outside this country in order to make ends meet. We can do it on our own if we feel the urge and the necessity.

With those characteristics and others, there is no explanation why Canada does not have in place an industrial development strategy which reaches from coast to coast and gives opportunity to Canadians, no matter where they live, to take the very valuable resources of this country and develop them in Canada for the use of Canadians both now and in the future.

What are the problems now that we have looked at the attributes and benefits which are naturally ours? The problems are many. We face interest rates which are much too high because they are dictated by outside influences. We face a lack of direction in energy policy. Canada is spending hundreds of billions of dollars to find the last drop of oil. I wonder what that last drop of oil will be worth when it is finally found. Instead of using significant numbers of these dollars to develop renewable energy resources and instead of spending money to remove our current dependency on oil, what does the government do?

Perhaps the largest drawback to the development of an industrial strategy for Canada is foreign control over our industrial sector. The government cannot really get into exporting or directing, even with an industrial strategy, the growth of this country as long as the major decisions are made outside Canada. We must change this situation. We must insist that, even though the companies are foreign owned, the control and decision-making processes be conducted in Canada for Canadians while at the same time the companies are free and at arm's length in order that they can seek world markets for their products, thereby utilizing Canadian expertise.

We have an auto industry which is without a parts manufacturing sector. Why; because the government has failed to take action over the years to insist that the component parts be manufactured here in Canada. We have a farm community which is suffering at the hands of the banks and the other financial institutions to the point where bankruptcies are at an all-time high. We have a small business sector which cannot afford to carry the kind of inventory which it requires in order to be competitive in the large business sector. Why; because interest rates and carrying charges are too high and small businesses cannot afford to pass on the cost to the consumer. Therefore, the small business either absorbs it or cuts back on inventory, thereby becoming less competitive.

The average income earner in Canada can no longer afford the cost of housing. We no longer build houses for average people, although the material and labour are available to do so. The common thread which runs through all these problems is interest rates. They drag one down. Average house prices and mortgages today are too high. The carrying charge for interest alone ranges upwards from $8,000 a year, and the average income earner who takes home $14,000 a year cannot afford it.

We are faced with the situation of government renegotiating GATT with its adverse effects on many of the fledgling industries which are attempting to develop. We must be careful that we do not give away everything just to be the nice guys in the international community, which displays a set of rules by which it supposedly works. There are the rules which apply behind the scenes. While on the one hand Canada has many positive features which can be used to develop this country, there are a number of negative features. However, none of them are unmanageable. The problems can all be dealt with in an appropriate and careful fashion if one takes the initiative.

We do not need miracles; we need desire. We can build houses. In so doing, we create employment, not only in the housing industry, but through the building of those components in machine shops and factories which are necessary to make a house a home. We can stimulate consumer demand in such a way that the product which we are capable of manufacturing is purchased in the marketplace. Although it is difficult, we can control interest rates to Canada's benefit if we desire to do so. We can take steps to ensure Canadian control over foreign subsidiaries.

As a matter of practice, the government should canvass our industries for purchasing purposes. Not only can we find and develop alternative sources of energy, but the government can spend what must be spent to ensure that we have proper insulation programs. Considering all the work which would flow across the country from such programs, it is hard to imagine the extent to which we can go. We can produce our own mining equipment. There are so many things we can do, if the government thinks they are worth while.

We can create an atmosphere for corporations, small businesses and people which speak positively about the future and building of Canada based on its strengths. All this takes government direction, government commitment and a sense of co-operation which to this point in time has been lacking. It takes an understanding of the strengths and weaknesses of the country in order to utilize those strengths and to eliminate those weaknesses. We do not need this piecemeal attitude of the minister or the shrug and throw-up-your-hands attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he says, "I can do nothing about it. We have to carry on the way it is."

If all the sectors of this country work together, we can create a much better Canada and a much better industrial strategy. The government must become involved, and that is why it is important to take part in this debate today. I still hope to see the government develop a sense of what is important about this country and its future.

• (1430)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in this debate today. I think we will learn in a very real way what the major distinctions are in the economic policies of the three parties in this House. I do not say that in any partisan or pejorative way; I just say that we will see the differences in them. After listening to what was said by members of the opposition parties and by my colleagues about economic policy, the things that are wrong in our country, and what needs to be done to put them right, I think I can say that we have finally reached a point of recognizing the differences in the philosophies of the three parties.

I suggest that the differences can be summed up in this way: the Conservative party says, effectively, "Go out and do it yourself"; the Liberal party says, "Can we give you a hand to get the job done?" and the NDP says, "Get out of the way, we are going to do it for you." It seems to me that those are the distinctions.

If hon. members will listen to what is being said today and mark the distinctions made by the Conservative Party and the NDP, I think they will agree that the foregoing is not a bad summation of the differences between the three parties.

Mr. Stevens: What about Petrofina? Is that what you mean by helping?

Mr. Evans: I must be saying the right things, Mr. Speaker, because they are riled up.

The motion stands in the name of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). I have worked with the hon. member on economic and financial matters for some time and have come to like him although I do not necessarily agree with everything he says. At an economic conference I attended once I heard someone say, "I agree 95 per cent with half of what you say and 105 per cent with the other half of what you say but that in no way implies that I agree 100 per cent with everything you say."

Now, I should like to go through the motion in an effort to understand precisely what is being said by the hon. member. In all honesty, I must say that I think it is one of the most outstanding pieces of rhetoric ever put before this House in the almost two years I have been here. Let me take it one point at a time. It begins:

> That this House condemns the government, and in particular the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for concentrating unduly on the bailing out of big, foreign corporations instead of on the implementation of a desperately needed industrial development policy,—

I listened carefully to the hon. member's intervention at the outset of the debate and I had a hard time understanding his definition of an industrial strategy. I think it was, "Go out and do it yourself. Get the government out of your way. Don't let the government intervene in any way, shape or form." Is that an industrial strategy? I do not know if I am correct, but from what I heard today and from what I have heard in the past, I think that is what the hon. member was putting forward as an "industrial strategy".

The first point the hon. member raised was "bailing out". He mentioned the case of Michelin and said it was a bail-out of $45 million. He can nod his head to indicate yes or no, but I think he implied that was something we should not have done. He indicated that because we bailed out Michelin—and I do not agree with his definition of bailing out, but we will use it for the moment—the Ontario tire industry was having a great deal of difficulty. I suggest that is not entirely correct, Mr. Speaker.

The reason the Ontario tire industry is having difficulty is that it has not made a conversion to radial tires and the demand for the product being produced has simply evaporated. Michelin has produced radial tires for many years and is retooling and expanding its plant in the maritimes in order to produce more tires, not only for Canada but also to meet the demand in the world market. It is meeting a market need. It was not the bail-out that caused difficulty; rather, it established an industrial structure in the maritimes and enabled Michelin to compete worldwide.

I find it strange that such government intervention should be condemned. It seems to me that government intervention in the industrial sector should help industries that have a future to structure for that future so that they will be competitive in domestic and world markets. Certainly the funds provided in the Michelin case enabled a company to expand and become competitive in the world market by any standards. We hope that the same kinds of industrial restructuring will occur in the tire industry in Ontario and that it, too, will compete on the world market. I disagree with the hon. member's remarks about Michelin being a gross, unfair, unrealistic and stupid bailout. It was not.

Mr. Rose: It was not a bailout; it was a handout.

Mr. Evans: The other matter that the hon. member for York-Peel referred to was the $40 million given to Imperial Oil. That was a very interesting case. We all know of the difficult situation that exists between the province of Alberta and the federal government and the negotiations that are going on. We all know as well that Imperial Oil has plans to move on the tar sands development. We also know that if we had not put up that $40 million, there could have been a deterioration in Imperial Oil's ability to go ahead with the tar sands project once the political difficulties were ironed out. If that investment will ensure that the project can go ahead when the political negotiations are completed, then it was a wise investment and I think the future will show that it was.

Now we are being condemned because Petro-Canada has bought Petrofina. We have heard this time and time again. When Pacific Pete was purchased we heard exactly the same thing, yet I doubt if any financial analyst would tell this House or any other place today that Petro-Canada's purchase of Pacific Petroleum was a mistake.

If those hon. members who know something about financial analysis examine the takeovers and mergers that have occurred in the last four or five years, they will find that an average premium over market value prior to takeover was in the range of 30 per cent to 35 per cent. The price of Petrofina prior to the takeover, not last summer but after a great many events had occurred—

Mr. Stevens: Forty-two dollars.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says $42. The price was $87.50.

Mr. Stevens: After the run-up.

Mr. Evans: The price was $87.50 so a 30 per cent or 35 per cent mark-up would bring it to around $120. The hon. member for York-Peel is an astute financial man, so he will understand that if you are going to buy a firm and get control of it, you have to pay a premium. I will let history be the judge of whether Petrofina is a good investment for Petro-Canada and the people of Canada. I am convinced that it is. History will show it was a very wise investment of Petro-Canada on behalf of the people of Canada.

• (1440)

There are other areas where the federal government has played a role in the restructuring of industry which the hon. member did not mention. For instance, the Canadian forest industry mentioned earlier by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). The Canadian government was involved heavily in providing capital for the restructuring and revitalization of the Canadian forest products industry. That industry is now in a position to compete effectively worldwide. I did not hear the hon. member decry and condemn that particular government intervention.

What about the intervention and the incentives given by the federal government to the Canadian steel industry? By anyone's estimation, we have one of the most competitive steel industries in the entire world, including Japan. It is much more competitive than the American steel industry. Ours is highly efficient with all of the new technology which is partially a result of government intervention and incentives. I did not hear the hon. member for York-Peel decry that as a bailout. Perhaps at the time that is exactly what it would have been called, a bailout of the steel industry.

Mr. Deans: When did you do that?

Mr. Stevens: Specifically, what are you getting at?

Mr. Evans: By putting forward those incentives over the years it has allowed the industry to restructure itself and become competitive on a world scale.

Mr. Deans: That was available to all industry.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says that was available to all industry. I think he is effectively making my point for me. The hon. member for York-Peel, if he calls bailouts more than just cash, or if he talks about tax incentives as a bailout or any kind of economic incentive—in other words, the taxpayers of Canada participating with industry—has to admit that those kinds of incentives provided by the government have led to some spectacular improvements in industrial efficiency.

With respect to high technology, the minister spoke earlier about the $27 million grant in increased assistance which has been given to Telidon. He spoke about the incentives given to Mitel. I believe the figure for Mitel was $40 million. Correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Stevens: And they are going to Wales.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says, "they are going to Wales". The company is going to Wales to break into a very large and lucrative market in Britain, but it will be a Canadian company.

Mr. Stevens: Employing the Welsh.

Mr. Evans: I would have to question the hon. member's motives. Is he saying that our companies should not compete worldwide? If they should not compete worldwide, then would he say that we should not have foreign corporations in Canada? If that is the case, is he going to support FIRA holus-bolus and unequivocably?

Mr. Stevens: Margaret Thatcher thanks you.

Mr. Evans: I think the hon. member makes his own case when he needs to make his case, and denies everything that relates or flows from that case when someone else points out the holes in his logic. In the motion which the hon. member has put forward, we see the contention that the government's action has led to the devastation of small business. I would like to see evidence of that.

Mr. Stevens: Six thousand, five hundred small businesses went under last year.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says "Six thousand, five hundred small businesses went under last year". But 20,000 new ones were started, Mr. Speaker.

Let us get serious about this. Mr. Bulloch, the head of the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen, has said with regard to the extension of the Small Business Development Bond that this is a very good move for small business in Canada. Mr. Bulloch has not been putting forth comments that government policies have devastated small business. With regard to the energy program, Mr. Bulloch has indicated that energy prices should go up faster, implying perhaps that the National Energy Program is protecting his constituents—small business—too much. I do not see the evidence of the devastation of the small business community, which is mentioned in the motion put forward by the hon. member.

The hon. member made the point that there is no direction of thought for industrial innovation. I would suggest that that is not true either. I would suggest there are other kinds of problems in the area of research and development and innovation in this country which do not relate to the level of government incentives.

I just had a study completed for me relating to international research and development incentives. In other words, I wanted to find out what other countries do to promote research and development and innovation in their countries. My thoughts before the fact were that we would find other countries had large tax incentives, that there were major grants being given to research facilities and private firms. However, we found just the opposite.

Mr. Stevens: Take a look at Ireland.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says take a look at Ireland. I would suggest that there are probably other countries which have more effective R and D than the one he has just mentioned. Let me point out a few things perhaps for the edification of my colleagues. In the concluding remarks of the study we find:

> Other European and Scandinavian countries have less intense programs of R and D, but share many of the basic instruments for its promotion, chiefly, in the government sector, large agencies and institutes—

That is government intervention. The conclusion continues:

> —of concentrated research and programs of subcontracting R and D work to private laboratories; and, in the private sector, each country has its own high-technology export industries—

That is government supported. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce mentioned the Export Development Corporation. I think he also mentioned, quite correctly, that the hon. member for York-Peel disapproved of that when export incentive programs were put forward. To continue with the conclusion in the report, it reads:

—for which the market has rewarded high levels of industrial R and D.

In the first part, it is very interesting to point out that none of the high performance countries—and I should direct this to my hon. friend for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans)—in the area of research and development has worries or policies regarding the location where multinational firms choose to undertake their research. We do, or we should have because of the branch plant nature of our economy. There are countries, some with populations as small as Canada and some smaller that do not use those policies.

Mr. Deans: They do not live immediately adjacent to the head office.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member is pointing out some things I am sure we will want to hear about either from his colleagues or at the end of my speech, if he wishes, he can raise some questions.

Another interesting point raised in the study is this:

Conspicuous by their absence among foreign incentives for invention and innovation are significant tax measures designed to have a major effect on the level of R and D undertaken in each country.

In other words, the kinds of policies we hear being called for in the House by some hon. members, such as for major tax incentives to stimulate R and D and innovation, are policies simply not adopted in the rest of the world.

The French government was very concerned about the level of R and D and innovation. It examined tax incentives and other things. In fact, the French government rejected tax incentives because the French came to Canada to look at the very generous tax incentives that we have here for R and D, and returned having decided they would not work.

There has to be much more fundamentally wrong with R and D and innovation in this country than simply the existence, or lack thereof, of government tax incentives. We have a very good incentive system for R and D.

I have a few points that I want to put on the record for hon. members' consideration. First, the countries leading the world in R and D generally have educational systems where science is vigorously promoted even at the primary school level and through high school years. We all have to admit that is not the case in Canada. I think all members will have to agree that it certainly is not an area where the federal government can do very much, unless we would like to see a constitutional intervention into an area of provincial jurisdiction. We have to work on that. That is a problem which we all have to work on together, federally and provincially. It is a problem which I think we will have to come to grips with very quickly.

Secondly, most of these countries have large scale programs for the diffusion and transfer of information ranging from data banks to institutes where basic innovations are developed for commercial use. Again I think the innovation and research and development area is an area where the Liberal philosophy has been a philosophy of saying: Let us give you a hand, let us work together, and it is the one that will work, because the evidence seems to indicate that that philosophy and approach is working throughout the entire world. These are the things we are putting forward, and the things I believe the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be putting forward as an industrial strategy. This will be a co-operative strategy, not a full-fledged private sector strategy by itself, and not one that suggests the private sector should get out of the way and let the government do it. It will be one that shows co-operation and one in which there is some hope of success in light of what we have seen in other parts of the world. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I will not say I am happy to be taking part in today's debate of condemnation of government policy on research spending. I do not suppose any concerned citizen would be happy to be condemning the government in which he has put his trust, but I am content to take part in it, and I am intrigued to follow the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), having listened to his definition of the philosophies of the three parties, and how they would help Canadians to accomplish even more than they accomplish today. We do accomplish a great deal today and we would not stand in the way of anyone who wants to endorse the announcement of the government of help for Telidon. That is the kind of thing that perhaps could have happened earlier, before Telidon ran into marketing problems in the United States. Comparing the $27 million to the $100 million France is putting into their project, I think this may be another case of too little and perhaps too late, but we will hope for the best.

The philosophy the hon. member espoused was one in respect of which I noticed that two of the parties would have government involvement in the private sector. "A helping hand", he said of the Liberal philosophy, and a "government takeover" if it was the NDP. Perhaps government involvement would be good in the private sector, as the hon. member says. Perhaps he can get the Post Office people to take their expertise into the private sector and we can then really get this country bunged up tight.

Another point he mentioned was the value of Canadian Petrofina prior to the government's intervention and helping hand in the oil industry, something which should make a good joke out west. Let me point out to the member that a year ago the value of Petrofina shares was $50. That is about the level the public thought the value should be. It has not done anything as a company since then to greatly enhance that value. The only thing that has changed has been the federal government's interest in acquiring it. Everyone who owned shares, of course, got interested and excited. The value went up to $60 last September, and to a $70 range in December, and that is less than one quarter of a year ago. In January shares were $87, but our government saw fit to offer $120, more than double the value of the company's shares. Whether you agree with that or not, I expect soon to hear the Belgian government giving its Belgian croix de guerre to our Minister of Energy for having retired their national debt while he added to ours.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilchrist: The last point the hon. member made was that the federal government could do nothing to help the educational aspects of science policy and that, of course, is a complete cop-out. I will get to that later.

There was an interesting article in the Ottawa Citizen today to which perhaps the hon. member will allow me to refer. Let me get to what I really wanted to talk about.

I have no difficulty in supporting my colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) in his motion condemning the government on its research, science and industrial policies. Nor would any concerned Canadian who has taken the time to look at the facts; absolute unassailable facts, Mr. Speaker, of the economic decline of this nation and the inept government of the past 13 years, to be specific. That is the time at which research spending levelled off. Up till then we were doing a pretty creditable job, when Mr. Trudeau came on the scene.

My problem in trying to support the motion is to find out which issues to talk about and which ones to leave alone, there is such a plethora. I could deal with the most serious consequence to the Canadian people, the loss of jobs about which we have talked at some length here today. I could talk about high unemployment and the relative high unemployment of this government in a year of office compared to only six months of the past government which virtually doubled the rate of job creation.

Another aspect of Liberal neglect and mixed up priority which could be discussed at great length is the second-class status given to the small Canadian-owned businesses by government which offers millions of dollars a day to giant corporations like Chrysler and Esso, but fails to recognize the needs of the small business community which does not have the clout or the votes, and I guess thereby does not get the gentle helping hand of this Liberal government. Even now, a year after taking over, the small business loan legislation brought forward by the Conservative government has not been passed by this government but which has finally and maybe reluctantly agreed to extend in order to help small business. Of course we would applaud that.

The motion of censure really mentions the innovative capacity of our industrial sector being starved due to lack of policy, and it mentions the trade deficit in manufactured goods and brings to our attention the surrender of our domestic markets to foreign competitors. Inasmuch as that is my main bailiwick as science and technology critic, I think I will deal mostly with those.

All of the things mentioned in the condemnation are true. The trade figures which were so proudly released earlier this week showing a $7.9 billion surplus fail to tell the true story. Certainly the export figures are up, but they are off in manufactured goods, the kind of export product which has created jobs for Canadians. They are down $700 million, a deficit in total in manufactured goods of $17.75 billion. That represents $17.75 billion of foreign-produced goods bought in Canada more than we sold them, and that is the same number of dollars in lost Canadian jobs; jobs lost because of the blindness of Trudeau governments in the past 13 years which have failed the people of Canada whose trust they had. Those governments failed to invest the sums of money needed to develop the skills and technology which would have put Canada in the forefront of international trade. They failed to create real jobs in the goods-producing sector which would have earned foreign dollars. Instead, they have squandered the same number of dollars on LIP and FLIP, short-term artificial job-creation programs which are still continuing today but which will quickly vanish like Liberal campaign promises.

Do you think the government will ever come to its senses? Do you think it will ever listen to the concerted and unanimous voices of the science community, the academic community, the industrial community, all those people whose business it is to innovate, create, educate and develop the skills which produce the goods that pay for the jobs that raise the standard of living and develop the pride of accomplishment of a nation which has the resources, as my NDP friend said, and has the usable energy and the people with the intelligence to make this country great?

Do you think this government will ever listen to its own knowledgeable people like Dr. Larkin Kerwin, president of the National Research Council, who outlined a financial analysis of research projects completed by the National Research Council? Dr. Kerwin, like many other concerned scientists, knows that value of research in the creation of valuable, high technology jobs and in the generation of real wealth to the citizens and governments of Canada through the production of internationally competitive high-value exportable goods. He has described the benefits to Canada of modest investment in research returning three and fourfold the number of dollars in value, and in short order.

• (1500)

According to Dr. Kerwin, who analysed the years 1973 to 1977, during that period the National Research Council had undertaken about 450 industrial projects with about 230 Canadian companies. Ninety-three million dollars was spent or invested by the council on these projects. The industries concerned experienced, in short order, profits of $1.8 billion which, of course, were used largely to pay for Canadian jobs. They also paid out $350 million in corporate taxes on that money, and this gave the Government of Canada a return of $350 million within four years on an investment of $93 million. It was not only an excellent investment, but also a first-class means of stimulating the economy.

When hon. members opposite say we are doing things with Challenger jets, STOL aircraft, the Mitels and the Telidons, they simply make our case for us. They only fail by not doing enough. I believe this illustrates some of the gigantic pay-offs a country receives from government investment in research and development.

New foreign sales cut into spiralling trade deficits. What a lesson we might take from that! Technologies, instead of non-renewable resources, are explored, and new jobs are created. Local and secondary industry grows and diversifies. Increased government revenues reduce hideous federal fiscal deficits. Depressed regions in Canada receive vibrant new incentives which release federal compensation funds for even more research and development, and more Canadians find jobs.

My New Democratic Party colleague talked about jobs. He talked about full employment for all Canadians being possible, and I agree with him.

Mr. Deans: Thank you.

Mr. Gilchrist: It is not only possible but also highly desirable. It is probably the highest political objective we could have.

Again I refer to the National Research Council on this matter. Dr. Kerwin has unequivocally stated that the spending of .5 per cent of the gross national product more on research and development would create 400,000 new jobs. That would mean the elimination of half the unemployment in this country. Just think of what could be accomplished if we spent 1.5 per cent or 2 per cent more on research and development. We would have no unemployment. We would be giving no gold watches at 65. We would be asking people to hang on for another two or three years. There would be too many jobs for Canadians to handle.

Research and development are part of the dual portfolio of the minister responsible. He has a second responsibility. Therefore, instead of getting the high priority it deserves, the research and development portfolio is getting only part-time action from a minister, who is not able to give his full attention to it because of his other portfolio, the environment, which is also important. To add insult to injury, the same minister is not even a member of the powerful cabinet committee on priorities and planning, so what chance does the desperately needed research and industrial development strategy have? What chance do young Canadians have for jobs or for years in active, dynamic Canadian businesses when we have ineffective ministers of industry, trade and commerce and science and technology? They are ineffectual and invisible. They are buried. They are lost under the smokescreen of constitutional clap-trap which, for a year now, has hidden hopeless ministers under hopeful flag-waving.

The kids who do not find jobs in careers will discover what really lies under that smoke, and the jobless waiting for Uncle Sam to cast a few crumbs our way and put a few Canadians back to work in factories which cannot compete with the United States factories will one day wise up to the dereliction of this Liberal government.

The Concise Oxford Dictionary has a word for the breach of faith shown by this government to the people of Canada through the huge and increasing annual deficits which this government has run up, the $15 billion or so a year right about now; the breach of faith to senior citizens, who retired with modest savings and who have watched those savings erode under 10 per cent or more annual inflation; and the breach of faith of the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts), who made the greatest non-announcement of the year a couple of weeks ago with great pomp and circumstance at the board of trade news conference with a pathetic regurgitation of that old promise to increase research spending to 1.5 per cent of the gross national product by 1985, a figure which will not be met and which, even if it was, would be totally inadequate. There has been a breach of faith by a minister who manipulated words to imply greater effort and striving by the government but who did not admit until the next breath that the government's share would be less as a percentage of expenditures and that the private business sector, which gets that helping hand from the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, will get no help from the government to increase its research spending.

Then to reduce the government's credibility further, there is not the slightest mention of how all this was to come about. There was no mention of tax incentives. There was no mention of tax penalties for non-performance by foreign companies which like to keep their research and good jobs at home. There was no mention of grants. There were just hollow words. There were the same hollow Liberal words we have heard for 13 Trudeau years and which have turned this wonderfully potentially rich jewel of a country into the world's richest banana republic.

To get back to the point of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre about education, let me quote from this very day's Ottawa Citizen, which reports the betrayal of the entire scientific community of Canada by the scuttling of the five-year research funding program brought in by the previous Conservative government which this government and this minister said earlier in their term of office they would support and enhance. I would just like to read a little bit of today's item. It is headed "Scientists blast federal government for double-cross". It reads as follows:

> In what scientists consider the ultimate double-cross, the federal government has scuttled a major program for revitalization of university research and scientific training programs.
> The five-year program, run by the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, was approved in principle last May amid applause from university, government and industry officials across the country.
> Designed to get Canadian researchers back to work and offset severe shortages of young engineers and scientists, the plan called for significant budget increases for the council until 1985. Despite reassurances the five-year plan would continue this year, however, it has been quietly sabotaged.

The last sentence says:

> "Never before have I seen a government announce with so much fanfare, a policy that it canned a month before," says Cowan.

What kind of government would treat its citizens like that? What kind of Member of Parliament would sit mute and sphinx-like while the Trudeau, MacEachen, Lalonde triumvirate, the three musketeers who cavalierly direct the affairs of this country, are cutting and slashing the country into several parts? Is there no Liberal member with the courage to speak up for the economic reunification of Canada, instead of the constitutional severing of its parts?

Perhaps that is unfair. Even the Liberal member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) on December 18 last in this House called on his own minister to accelerate government investment in research to the 1.5 per cent it claims it will get to by 1985, and to do it right away. Is there no other Liberal conscience which rebels at the thought that it voted and lied about an 18-cent gasoline tax but now condones a 10-cent or 12-cent tax, which will go on forever, to pay for the purchase of what must be the dingiest collection of gas stations in the country? This will now allow the bureaucracy of the Government of Canada to get out of the offices and into the streets to compete with and put out of business the small retail gasoline station owners. Will nobody on the other side of the House rise in his place and deplore the spending of a billion and a half Canadian dollars, almost double the value of the company whose shares it bought? All that money is being sent to Belgium, when it could be used to create more Canadian jobs and find more Canadian oil.

● (1510)

It is clear that no one on that side will speak for all Canada, and that is a shame. With a government which is all speech and no action, with a Minister of Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment who speaks about increased research funding and job-creating while cutting back on the government's share, with a Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) who speaks of industrial growth and job creation while unemployment in industry continues to climb, even in his own constituency, one would think that a government which only speaks would at least speak for all Canadians. Is it any wonder my colleague moved to condemn this well-speaking, smokescreening and underachieving Liberal government, and I unreservedly supported the motion on behalf of all Canadians whose faith in their government has been breached? The word I looked up in the dictionary to explain the phrase I used earlier was "treason".

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on an industrial development policy. Of course, these words mean different things to different people. It seems to mean to some from whom we have heard today—let the private sector do as it wishes. But, this kind of laissez-faire economy ceased to be viable a very long time ago. To some rather trendy economists talking about industrial strategies, it seems to mean some kind of economic engineering. We have heard talk of picking the winning industries and dropping the losers, which often sounds as harsh as it sounds impractical, because a losing industry means unemployed people and, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once said, unemployed people are not a series of statistics but a series of individual tragedies.

In much of the talk we hear about developing high-technology industries, there is a remarkable lack of sensitivity to the many people who would be left unemployed and to the fact that many of these people are women with children and households who cannot—if a textile industry in Quebec or Ontario should close down, for example—easily move to Alberta or become employed in a high-technology industry.

When I talk about an industrial strategy, I think of a set of policies, of an orderly and integrated way of co-ordinating government policies and, above all, of a human approach with care for the ideals of social justice, for individual dignity, for safety in the workplace and for industrial democracy. Occupational health and safety must be a particular concern at the present time, because we are still losing far more days of work and industrial productivity as a result of illness or injury on the job than as a result of strikes. Unless there is a progressive sharing of the material wealth of society, unless there is active participation in decision-making by the workers who produce that wealth, we will not succeed and, perhaps, we would not deserve to succeed.

I should like to refer to one of the more promising initiatives which arose out of the study the government initiated a few years ago on various industrial sectors when government, industry and labour worked together in partnership. As one might have expected, the report indicated that umbrella organizations in industry and labour were less successful in relating to each other. For example, a meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers Association and the Canadian Labour Congress was not always terribly productive. But given a situation in which people with similar interests, such as workers and management from a particular sector of industry, got together to discuss the problems of that industry, ways of making it more productive and more prosperous, the members reported that they found more about which to agree than to disagree. Obviously this was because people in the same industry have similar knowledge and interests. A union leader can read a balance sheet as well as anyone else; he knows the product and he knows its possibilities.

The more formalized European type of three-way participation—industry, labour and government—may not necessarily be for us at this time. But it is quite clear that there is very active participation in a less formal way and that this can certainly be enhanced. The moneys which the federal government made available to the labour field some time ago for continued education are certainly being well used. This is increasingly resulting in well-informed and sophisticated labour leaders who have much to contribute to our future industrial development.

These people-oriented initiatives may not sound as glamorous as economists' talk of industrial restructuring and technological innovation, but nevertheless they can help turn the economy around.

I would like to refer to some other elements which I consider to be very important in a set of co-ordinated industrial strategies. The first element is energy, which has already been addressed by a number of speakers today. It is obvious that Canada has not only possibilities but reasonable assurances of security of supply for a long time ahead, which will attract investors and will give us a competitive edge, as long as we make the best use of it.

The measures of the National Energy Program are designed to increase Canadian ownership and Canadian control. While we want to do this humanly, reasonably and responsibly, I do not think we need apologize for any of it.

Obviously the question of research and development is important, as is the entire question of supporting our high-technology industries which are the wave of the future. Telidon has been mentioned a number of times today and some of the measures the government has taken to assist Telidon, both domestically and internationally. For example, the Telidon service will be used in information programs of the Canadian government and in demonstration programs partially funded by the government. This type of demonstration, domestically, is important as a base for international sales, and we have seen recently one large international sale with the assistance of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Among the best producers of jobs, perhaps now and in the future, are the small innovative high-technology businesses, the kinds which demonstrate evidence of entrepreneurship, while being small enough and local enough to use local labour and facilities. Our small business policy can assist organizations of this kind with loans and grants. Also the Foreign Investment Review Agency has a special policy for small businesses, which wish to invest in Canada, to reduce paperwork and to make simpler the process of approval or non-approval.

● (1520)

Obviously the question of export assistance is extremely important. Our overseas officials are becoming more involved in this issue so that our Canadian businesses have sophisticated assistance to penetrate overseas markets.

The whole question of infrastructure is a very important part of industrial strategy. With our large country, when one talks of infrastructure one immediately thinks of transportation and communication.

The question of the use of government purchasing power to assist Canadian industries is one which I raised as long ago as 1977 in committee. Since 1977 we have seen a tremendous number of innovations in this area. For example, we have seen government purchasing power used to help domestic industries by specifying two or three examples of office furniture or typewriters so that the company could have a longer production line and make economies of scale. With this base some of these companies have then been able to expand into overseas sales. There are a number of ways in which government purchasing power, which is quite considerable, can be used to aggregate the market and provide a domestic base which then allows a company to do other things overseas.

On the domestic front, one severe and continuing problem is in interprovincial regulations which effectively prohibit free trade across Canada. The federal government raised this matter in constitutional talks with the provinces, since we cannot have a strong Canadian economy without a national domestic market. We can only build a strong export trade from a unified domestic base. I am one of those who had hoped that in our Constitution we would have enshrined the principle of a common market across Canada. I am not without hope that, even if it is not enshrined in the Constitution, it will come into practice if we continue our negotiations.

When we do buy overseas, the area of industrial offsets is also one in which tremendous progress has been made. Ten years ago, if the government made a major purchase overseas, we did not seem to be able to organize an effective exchange, other than having some parts made here. But there has been a tremendous change since then. I was the parliamentary secretary to the minister of supply and services when the negotiations were ongoing about the offset program in relation to fighter aircraft. As recent announcements show, this is a much more sophisticated arrangement. In return for placing a large contract overseas, we receive, not a simple contract for making parts, but a transfer of technology so that jobs can be created in Canada and remain in this country long after the ordered item has ceased to be useful.

Increasing Canadian ownership is basic to all these things and crucial to our development. Unless we have more control of our economy we will again be watching profits drain off to other countries. I say this not in any spirit of recommending wholesale nationalization or attacks on our partners—we want investment in Canada and we need it; we want friendly relations with our allies and neighbours. But we also want investment in Canada to benefit Canada and not only benefit multinational companies which have no particular commitment to Canada. When a multinational company shows itself to be a good corporate citizen, when it is willing to do research and development in Canada and create jobs, it must always be welcome. We must not be afraid to be firm with companies which do not show any commitment to Canada. We have a long tradition of being fair and reasonable in our negotiations. I know that will continue. I think to that fairness and reasonableness must be added increasing firmness to protect our resources and our jobs.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to discuss various important topics concerning industry, trade and commerce. Among other things, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has the overall responsibility to further the growth, productivity, employment opportunity and prosperity of the Canadian economy. In light of the present condition of the Canadian economy and after more than a decade under a Trudeau government, the minister has his work cut out for him.

Canada is one of the few countries in the world which has the potential for energy self-sufficiency. This is an enormous plus for any country, but the energy policy put forward by the present government seems to be doing much to harm the goal of energy self-sufficiency in Canada. Business needs a sensible, stable and long term energy plan so that it can better provide for the future.

Canada is also very fortunate to have an abundant supply of resources in terms of both a variety of raw materials and human resources. In theory, we should have a strong economy second to none, yet this does not seem to be the case.

Countries such as Germany and Japan, which import substantial amounts of raw materials and petroleum for energy needs, have vibrant economies. Canadians ask themselves why. The answer is effective policy and planning and a desire by governments to look after their own countries and their own people first.

People respect hard-earned success and action in the face of challenge. Perhaps that is why more and more Canadians are losing respect for the present government, which has had more than enough time to design and implement some sort of effective and far-reaching industrial development strategy for Canada. We cannot afford to surrender our domestic markets to foreign competitors.

We see unacceptable rates of unemployment and inflation and crippling interest rates in Canada today. Nothing is more demeaning for a person who is able to work, who wants to work and who has a family to support than to be unable to find a job. The government should make the creation of jobs and a comprehensive industrial policy its highest priority, and it must not forget the importance of small business to Canada's economy. When our people are working and our plants are at capacity, then perhaps the government can direct its talents to other measures.

Canada is one of the largest countries in the world. We can go a long way in a north-south or east-west direction without ever crossing our borders. The government must start within Canada to solve the real problems affecting Canadians before it goes off looking for others. We need to ensure that industry and business in Canada survive, grow and compete to serve markets both in Canada and abroad. This goal is vital and basic. It requires immediate government attention. Small business needs help now, as it is a vital contributor to employment and the Canadian economy.

We must maintain and strengthen our domestic market in Canada so that Canadians have access to a variety of Canadian goods. The Canadian textile industry has some 1,000 plants located in most parts of the country and employs some 90,000 men and women. Together with the clothing industry, these two industries create total direct employment for some 185,000 people and add to the total indirect employment of another 300,000 people, accounting for total employment of some 485,000 people.

The textile and clothing industries are the largest manufacturing industries and employers of production workers in Canada. One out of every eight jobs in Canada, one out of every four jobs in Quebec and one out of every seven jobs in Manitoba are in these industries. Canada's textile and clothing industries shipped over $8 billion worth of goods in 1979.

In the primary textile industry the average establishment employed some 80 people and had average shipments of $3.7 million in 1977. Establishments vary in size, from a large number of small establishments, some 400 employing fewer than 20 people, to a couple of dozen establishments employing more than 500 people. Statistics for 1977 indicate that over 70 per cent of textile establishments had fewer than 50 employees and that some .6 per cent had more than 1,000 employees. The bulk of the industry's output is produced in establishments located in non-metropolitan areas with populations of less than 100,000. For example, the Celanese textile plant located in my riding of Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington employs some 900 people and is located in an area with an approximate population of some 80,000 people.

Over 60 per cent of clothing manufacturing establishments in 1977 had fewer than 50 employees, with only .5 per cent having employees in the 500 to 1,000 range. The bulk of the industry is in Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, with other smaller companies in small and medium-sized communities in Ontario and Quebec.

The textile and clothing industry is a very important source of employment for Canadians and a very important input to our economy. We must ensure that this industry survives and grows. The government must create a comprehensive industrial policy that looks hard at the needs and concerns of the textile and clothing industry.

We have heard stories to the effect that souvenirs such as plastic miniature Canadian mounties purchased at well-known tourist attractions are produced in countries other than Canada. I suppose if we carry this further and the Canadian textile and clothing industry is not given the support it deserves and requires, in the future it may be possible to see real mounties on Parliament Hill wearing real uniforms which are made in a country other than Canada.

Due to the external pressures of world trade and politics foreign suppliers could decide to turn off supply. We all know how cold the winters are in Ottawa. The point I am trying to make is that it is not healthy to allow Canadian industry to disappear. Canadian industry employs Canadians. The problem with increasing dependence on foreign goods is that without proper controls we could be signing the death warrant for our own industries. We may not notice this happening if it is gradual, but the fact remains that if it happens, we run the risk of being held to ransom by a monopoly of foreign suppliers. When all aspects of production, quality and quantity reside with others whose first interest is not the Canadian interest, that makes us economic prisoners and reduces our standard of living.

The government must ensure that Canadian industry is protected now and for the future. This will involve hard work and long-term planning. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) must show leadership, direction and support in getting Canada on its feet and on its way to restoration to a position of respect and strength, not on its way down the garden path where the government has been leading us in the past.

The textile and clothing industry is attempting to strengthen its position in Canada in order to prepare itself for the future.

This is a big job. The industry is becoming more capital intensive. For example, new equipment in the textile and clothing industry can require investments in the hundreds of thousands of dollars per production worker. To spend this kind of money to grow for the future, industry must be aware of and part of a long-range industrial strategy. The government must get into the act by providing the support and assurance necessary for this long-term planning.

Of major concern to the textile and clothing industry is the threat of low-cost imports from other countries. Total imports of textiles and clothing in 1979 amounted to some $2.5 billion. While 70 per cent of clothing imports are affected by quotas, Canada still imported some 170 million garments in 1979, which works out to some eight garments for every man, woman and child. Measured by weight, only some 41 per cent of Canada's 1979 consumption of textiles and clothing was produced by Canadian workers, while at the same time United States workers produced some 89 per cent of the consumed products in that country. Canada is one of the world's most open markets to imports of textiles and clothing from developed and developing sources.

Canada lags well behind the United States and the EEC in taking advantage of the international agreement which permits the limiting of textile and clothing imports from developing countries. Only some 7 per cent by volume of textiles are covered by these restraints.

Bilateral restraint agreements are international agreements between countries like Canada and "low wage" countries which set quotas on the import of certain textiles and clothing into Canada from those countries. Most industrialized nations such as the European countries and the United States have such agreements. Canada's existing bilateral restraint agreements are due to expire on December 31, 1981. This is of great importance to the textile and clothing industry in Canada since necessary high cost capital expenditures must be justified on reasonable expectations of continuing protection against "low cost" imports as well as an appropriate rate of return. Industry has generally been prepared to make such expenditures with an eye to whether or not the pay-back period on such costs does not extend beyond the import restraint period. Industry requires support and certainty for long-term planning. The government must listen to the concerns of business in order to foster necessary growth.

The federal government established the textile and clothing board in 1970. Its mandate was essentially to advise and make recommendations to the government on matters affecting the textile and clothing industries. The board's latest report was made public in the summer of 1980 after a very extensive review of the industry. Evidence was presented in the form of 150 briefs, and the board also held 132 private and public hearings across Canada. The board states in its report:

> Canada cannot continue to accept increasing quantities of textiles and clothing from "low cost" and state-trading sources. Such an approach would destroy government and industry efforts to maintain in Canada a modern, efficient and competitive textile and clothing industry.

In general terms the principal recommendations of the textile and clothing board in its latest report were that bilateral agreements and quotas should be extended to cover the period from January 1, 1982, to December 31, 1990, that there should be better administrative controls on imports from all countries, and that growth rates of imports of clothing from low-wage and state-trading countries be no higher than the growth rate of the Canadian market.

I urge the minister and his government to announce its decision on the board's report no later than March 31, 1981, so business can look with more certainty and support to the future and get on with needed investment and growth.

The textile and clothing industry is composed of small and medium-sized firms which are all vital to the continuation and vitality of the industry. The innovative capability of business and industry looks to the minister and his government for proper direction and support, which I hope will be forthcoming soon. Time is of the essence.

• (1540)

The Canadian Apparel Manufacturers Institute has reported that the Canadian shirt industry is in a desperate situation. Over 700 shirt workers in Quebec have been laid off or lost their jobs in the last year. This disclosure calls for quick government action on the textile and clothing board report and stresses the need for proper direction and support for an industrial strategy for Canada. The government should help Canadian business through any advantageous procedures available under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and other international agreements. Someone has to stand up for the Canadian interest. Surely it is not too much to ask the Canadian government to do this.

I have been advised by the Canadian Apparel Manufacturers Institute that it is not asking for money to bail out its industry. It is asking that our elected representatives act in a manner consistent with Canada's international rights and obligations to support the continued existence of the industry.

The industry needs the help of the minister and hopes it will be forthcoming. The industry is not asking for the shirt off his back, but if the government continues with its present lack of direction and support, the shirt on the minister's back may not be made in Canada in the future.

I had the opportunity to visit with the plant manager and union representatives at the Celanese plant at Millhaven in Ernestown township and was encouraged to see the understanding and co-operation that exists between management and employees in their effort to expand their textile plant operations for the future.

I ask that the minister and his government show the understanding and co-operation that will support and encourage the industry to grow for the future and thus prevent further loss of jobs.

Canada cannot be allowed to sink gradually deeper and deeper into foreign control of our domestic market. Canadians must provide for Canadians so that we are in the driver's seat for our future, and the government must help us drive forward, not backward. Its past and present lack of direction has turned us around.

The recently announced community program for economic development does not address the serious problems with which the textile and clothing industry is faced, but it cannot and must not be phased out because of the job implications. We need action on the part of government now in order to avert another Chrysler situation in Canada, where massive government financial aid is required. We need a proper climate in which to update and modernize.

Investment in new plant and equipment requires a proper climate in which to update or modernize, and only the proper attitude on the part of this government can provide it. The whole question of renewal of the textile and clothing sectors is one of the basic issues that should be addressed in an industrial development policy.

Textile companies are capital and technology intensive, factors that have created good working conditions and better productivity. Productivity has to be encouraged in any operation, especially in government.

Protection of our small domestic market is essential to our standard of living, and it is not too much to expect from our government.

I share the concern of many textile workers in my constituency that the recommendations made by the textile and clothing board should be implemented fully in order to ensure that Canada continues to have a healthy textile and clothing industry. Failure to act will result in massive unemployment in Ontario and Quebec and will have an extremely serious effect on the economy in the Kingston area.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to support the recommendations of the textile and clothing board and implement them as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)): Mr. Speaker, this is a rather long and somewhat complicated title to say out loud. In my opinion, trade, and especially foreign trade, is an essential part of an industrial strategy, and it is in this context that I rise today to give an admittedly brief but detailed outline of the initiatives taken in the last few months by the government to promote Canadian trade and Canadian export of manufactured products. Canadians may not always realize this, Mr. Speaker, but Canada is an exporting country. In fact, Canada's percentage of its gross national product allocated to export is the highest, or one of the highest, among our trading partners in the OECD. Mr. Speaker, Canadian exports represent 30 per cent of our total economic activity. And in spite of extremely difficult economic conditions in the last few years and on almost zero growth in real terms experienced by our trading partners in the OECD, it was reassuring to learn a few days ago that our economic performance as concerns exports had enabled Canada to increase the value of its exports by over $10.9 billion to $76.1 billion. Not only have we increased the value of our exports, but we have done so in nearly all sectors of economic activity. For instance, there has been an increase of $1.6 million in wheat export, an increase of $1.2 million in pulp and paper and newsprint export, and even an increase of $400 million in equipment export.

We can go even further by pointing out that, because of our privileged relationship with our neighbour to the south, our trade with the United States has accounted in the past for 70 per cent of our trade. It is therefore extremely comforting that more than two thirds of the increase in our exports, for a value of about $7 billion, during the year 1980 over the previous year can be attributed to our efforts to develop new markets or markets where our penetration was not as effective in the past, such as Japan, the Pacific rim countries and western Europe.

I refer to this because, although this privileged relationship with the American giant to the south must and will be maintained, it is healthy for Canada to find new markets, if only to take advantage of the major economic growth which the countries that I mentioned earlier will know during the eighties at a time when, according to the economic forecasts of international experts and agencies involved in this area, our more traditional markets will experience some stagnation or a very slight economic growth in the coming years. Thus, if Canada wants to continue to increase its exports and keep its traditional share of the international world trade, it will have to do so in new markets. Well, opening new markets is not as easy as it may seem, especially for Canada's small and medium-size businesses which are used to supply local or national markets and occasionally expand into the United States where conditions are similar to ours when it comes to trade practices, market trends and consumer habits. They feel it is very costly, complicated and seldom very motivating to fly across oceans and go knocking on doors of tradesmen in Hong Kong, Singapore, Kuala Lumpur or elsewhere where trade practices are different, where costs are very high and where the amount of time spent doing business prevents industry leaders from looking after their own operations back home.

● (1550)

That is why the Canadian government has offered incentives, and here I have in mind the program for Export Market Development which makes it possible for a small Canadian business to avail itself of a kind of prospection insurance, to travel abroad, and explore markets in an attempt to pick up sales orders. Trade being what it is, a businessman may or may not succeed, but should he fail he can at least hope that the Canadian government will repay him part of his expenses. I will be told that any businessman who wants to export should be able to pay his own way to secure new markets and, in principle, that is correct.

But unfortunately, because of traditions or through force of habit, small and medium-size Canadian businesses have been reluctant in the past to jump into the unknown whereas, for instance, the great majority of exports from the federal Republic of Germany are channelled through such businesses. Other countries like Canada or France have shown a tendency to let the giants operate and to let major companies—often Canadian branches of multinationals—use their markets or their information facilities. Our companies would rather act as subcontractors or, as I said earlier, fill the needs of local markets. When economic activities elsewhere are such that each year they record a growth rate of 5 per cent 6 per cent or 7 per cent a businessman may be satisfied with that approach if he considers stagnant conditions back home. If any Canadian business, big or small, is to survive it must seek out markets to boost its sales.

So, Mr. Speaker, it may be correct to say that Canadian businesses ought to be able to open markets on their own, but reality is such that measures like the program for Export Market Development have been fully endorsed by the Canadian business community, most particularly by small and medium-size businesses. So much so that at the end of 1980 all funds had been spent and there was a mini-revolt among Canadian businessmen. Two or three months after the money was gone we had to get more for this program and that shows how popular it is, but what is a lot more significant is the fact that small and medium-size businesses have begun to show interest in export markets.

In reply to this request, the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley) announced on January 5 that the government would double the funds made available under this program as well as those made available for exhibitions and missions. What about exhibitions and missions? This is another program which provides assistance to small and medium-size Canadian businesses by increasing their exposure and showing their goods abroad without having to travel, to contact local agents, to move in line like a travelling circus loading and unloading their products, since it is the government which takes charge most of the time of the logistics when Canadian products of competitive quality are being displayed abroad. These programs make the export markets more accessible to the corporations which want to take advantage of them. They are quite popular. Even if we are not used to international trade fairs, and although a number have been held, there is one in Ontario for spare parts for cars. As far as I know, it is an approach which is largely used in Europe, especially in Germany and Great Britain. As I said earlier, this program is a tremendous success, so much so in fact that we have also doubled the funds for this program.

Third, an important aspect of Canadian exports deals with capital intensive projects. A parliamentary committee, and I shall come back to this in my closing remarks, is looking into that matter. However, outside the work of that parliamentary committee, Canadian businesses have had occasion in the past to explore the possibilities for Canada to export for capital intensive projects or what is commonly known as turnkey projects. According to their findings, whether they were dealing with turnkey or capital intensive projects, or big projects involving huge amounts of money, when otherwise competitive Canadian companies which had availed themselves of the advantages and services offered by the Export Development Corporation went abroad to offer their services, competing companies from other countries, especially France and Japan, enjoyed credit facilities through their governments that were so much better than ours, in the sense that all things being equal, or even occasionally the Canadian offer being superior, the credit terms offered by the buyer country were such that French or Japanese companies were awarded the contracts. What technique was used? That is known as a credit mix. What, then is a credit mix? I shall try to explain in a few words, Mr. Speaker.

Rates of interest are not the same in all industrialized countries. In Canada, they are, as we know, around 15 per cent; in the United States, 17 per cent; in Europe, depending on the country, they run from 9 to 15 per cent; in Japan, they stand around 7 or 8 per cent. So, with the case of a contract to export goods for a huge amount, since these goods often go to underdeveloped countries, or countries with insufficient funds available, part of the exports have to be financed. In most cases, government agencies do the financing; in Canada, the Export Development Corporation does it. So, in order to prevent government institutions from outbidding each other with regard to interest rates, developed countries have agreed never to offer a rate that is lower than a set percentage; at the present time that rate is 7.75 per cent. It is known as the floor rate.

Those countries with a national interest rate of 7.75 per cent do not have to grant any help to their local businesses. But a country like Canada, with higher interest rates through its Export Development Corporation, does have to provide guarantees to Canadian financial companies in order to bring down the interest rate to a level near the consensual rate. But there are always some shrewd types, Mr. Speaker, who find ways to thwart deals freely entered into by the parties. This is particularly so with the French who have developed and implemented a technique called joint credit. What is joint credit? The consensual rate is offered for the normally allowed part of the export guarantees, i.e. 85 per cent of a project.

On the other hand, a few months before, a minister has negotiated with the government of the other country a deal or a draft deal under the terms of which the French government undertakes to grant financial assistance to stimulate that country's economic development. Then what happens? For a given project, the French government will say: "If you accept the submission of the French compamy, we will provide the consensual rate of 85 per cent. And for the remaining 15 per cent, we will offer a preferential rate, either an interest-free loan or a loan with a minimal 2.5 per cent or 3 per cent interest rate with such repayment conditions, say over a 20 to 25-year period, that the financing is brought down to 4 per cent or 4.5 per cent." That is how it is possible to overtake competitors offering 7.75 per cent.

Canada has been fighting for years—I will conclude in just a minute, Mr. Speaker—to get OECD partners to comply with consensual agreements. Unfortunately, we have not been as successful as we expected. That is why on January 5, the Minister of State for Trade announced that Canada would no longer let itself be outwitted in such a way and that where a foreign government supports in this manner a foreign company bidding for a contract for which a competitive Canadian company is also bidding, the government would meet up to a maximum of $900 million in business not in grants over the next three years, the conditions offered by the foreign government.

That provides a terrific opportunity for Canadian firms to finally compete on an equal basis and on an equal footing with foreign companies that are supported by their governments.

I see that time is flying and that I will not be able to discuss the parliamentary committee on the establishment of a national trading company. Perhaps some of my colleagues who are here today will touch upon this subject. In any event, this is one of the government's latest moves, to ask a parliamentary committee, a task force, to examine the additional technical support that could be offered to small and medium-sized businesses in order to encourage them to move onto the export market. That clearly shows, Mr. Speaker, that there is an actual willingness on the government's part to encourage Canadian business on the commercial and export levels through all available means.

[English]

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) is just leaving as I wanted to make a remark or two about his comments concerning the acquisition of Petrofina. I thank the hon. member for returning.

Unfortunately, I did not catch all his remarks, but I gather he was trying to justify the acquisition price of $120 per share by the fact that the price was $87 per share when negotiations commenced. I would ask the hon. member, and perhaps he can give me an answer at a later date, how he can justify paying $120 per share today for a company which was selling its shares on the market one year ago at $50 per share, particularly when 60 per cent of the assets of Petrofina in Canada are comprised of service stations, the real estate on which the service stations are located and a refinery? I would like to know how he could possibly justify a premium of $120 per share over the figure of $50 a share a year ago in the improved asset value comprised of hardware such as a refinery and service stations. That certainly does not make any sense to me. There is one other matter I should like to point out to the hon. member. If he or I personally decided to buy a share of Canada Petrofina at $120 and we borrowed the money to do so from the bank, we would have to pay 20 per cent interest. In that case we would have to pay $24 in interest per year on the original $120. Canada Petrofina earned, or will have earned approximately $8 a share in the year just ended, 1980. As a result the hon. member and I would both happily or unhappily enjoy a loss on our investment of $16 per share, being the difference between the $24 interest cost and the $8 in earnings from the company. What surprises me is how PetroCan shuffled the deck or the money in order to make this a good deal for every Canadian taxpayer. That is a mystery to me.

There is one other comment I would like to make about the acquisition of Petrofina by PetroCan. This acquisition does not add one single barrel of new oil or one cubic foot of gas to the reserves of the Canadian people.

Let me return to a consideration of the matter of trade and the economic environment in which Canada finds itself today. I do not think we can look at Canada, as the Liberal government is prone to do, in isolation from the rest of the world. Things are moving at a very rapid pace; technology is changing very rapidly on a worldwide basis along with trading patterns and competitive forces. We cannot just look at what we are doing in Canada, isolating ourselves from the rest of the world.

The Liberal government has its priorities wrong. Perhaps one of the best examples of the error of its priorities can be found in the acquisition of Petrofina. I do not see how that will assist economic development in this country.

At home and abroad the competitive position of Canadian industries is being steadily eroded. Whether you like it or not, the government may be doing in its eyes all these good things for Canadian industry, but the fact of the matter is that we had a trade deficit in manufactured goods in 1980 of very close to $18 billion. That is five times the trade deficit in manufactured goods we experienced in 1970. Whether we like it or not, we are losing the game. From 1970 to 1977, and these are the latest figures I could get, the proportion of the Canadian market served by imports grew from 26 per cent to just over 31 per cent. We are continually importing more and more goods to supply the Canadian economy.

Canada's share of the world's manufactured exports dropped from 5.6 per cent in 1970 to 3.8 per cent in 1977. We are losing the game. The difficulties of the Canadian manufacturing sector are chronic and will continue to be chronic until we face up to some fundamental changes in our economy. Government tinkering is not going to solve our problems.

Industrial development policy in Canada is not a quick fix—all of us would agree with that—but it does require major changes in the way we view the world economy. For many years Canada has followed the comfortable approach that if it takes its lead from the United States, it will still be better off than most of the other competitors in the world economy.

The reality is that United States industry has lost a great deal of ground and is still continuing to lose ground, and while the United States may have lagged behind the world economy, Canada has languished and today stands not one step behind the leader but two or three steps back of the pack. For Canada, heavy dependence on viewing events in the industrial world through the eyes of the United States has become a liability, and I think the greatest evidence of that is the example of Chrysler. I do not think one could name a better example. We have been on the coattails of the U.S. economy and expecting to ride on the coattails of the U.S. economy, and now we find ourselves with a Chrysler situation, a Ford situation and, I might add, a Massey-Ferguson situation on our hands.

The signals Canada has been getting have often been wrong and all too often too late. That is what has happened in the case of Chrysler. That is what has happened in the case of our automobile industries. We in Canada have not adapted to the real world of automobile production.

The industrial development policy of the Liberal government is at the bottom, I suggest, of its priorities, and has been for a decade. What are the policies of the Liberal government? I suggest its policies are to nationalize industry. Another policy on which the Liberals have placed a great deal of stress—I suppose because it has great political appeal, although I am blessed if I understand why—is economic nationalism. Economic nationalism is a sickness and a disease, and it can do nothing but hurt Canadian industry and drive jobs out of our country.

I suppose the other major thrust of Liberal policy for the last decade has been a preoccupation with government intervention. I suppose that mentality is most clearly demonstrated by the National Energy Program.

I suggest that these policies, nationalizing industries, economic nationalism and government intervention, have left the Canadian manufacturing industry in serious jeopardy. I said earlier that Canada cannot isolate itself from the world. We should be encouraging foreign investment to come here and participate in the development of our country, under our rules, and we should be encouraging Canadians to venture abroad and participate in the development of the free world.

Liberal industrial policy focuses on increasing the role of the government in the economy and diminishing the role of the private sector. This government is more concerned about creating bureaucracies than creating wealth and growth. This government wants to bail out the losers. That is Liberal policy. Instead of building on our strength, the Liberal government focuses on our weaknesses and a national policy of helping the big corporations which cannot compete and ignoring our small and medium-sized businesses.

The government says, "Let's help Imperial Oil, let's help Chrysler, let's help Massey-Ferguson, but let us not pay any attention to our small and medium-sized businesses." These latter businesses are truly the opportunity area for Canada's future. Those are the companies which today will build the opportunities for tomorrow for Canadians and build opportunities for our children to have work and to have jobs.

Government trade policies have led us to selling our non-renewable resources to finance an enormous balance of payments deficit, which is growing at a staggering rate. While research is recognized as the cornerstone of improving our manufacturing industry, the Liberal government has completely failed in its policies to encourage adequate research by Canadian industry. I say that in spite of what has been said this afternoon.

I just do not believe, and I do not think any other Canadian or Canadian company believes, that if the government provides an incentive for research, research will not take place. The fact is that the government has never had an incentive policy for research in this country.

Canada has enormous potential to improve its export position in the area of capital projects by assisting small and medium-sized businesses, but instead of offering incentives to the private sector to improve its export position, the government focuses on interventionist policies in the belief that since the private sector is not doing the job, obviously the government can do it better.

Continued foreign borrowing to cover the trade deficit is a poor policy choice because it commits the country to pay a rising sum in interest and principal repayments. I think interest on our foreign debt this year will be approaching, if not exceed, $10 billion a year. That is a staggering sum of money.

What we have suffered from in the last decade has been an emphasis upon the redistribution of existing income rather than the generation of new growth and new income in this country. Canada is surely at a point in its economic history where more savings should be directed into new productive business investment and Canadian ownership.

The choice before Canadians should not be to take further strides in the direction of state control but, surely, to restore the balance in favour of individual enterprise. We will have to make a choice. We will have to choose between these two value systems. We will have to choose whether we will head for further state control or return the balance in favour of individual enterprise. I think that is a crucial factor in determining Canada's economic future. It is my belief that that future depends on the spirit of entrepreneurship.

Investment in plant and equipment in the last ten years has been inadequate. The result is that we have not sufficiently increased our capacity to respond to the potential downstream growth in demand for Canadian goods, either domestic or foreign. We desperately need capital investment in this country to modernize and bring our factories up to a competitive position.

Instead of allowing for a free flow of goods, capital and human resources, the Liberal government has attempted to control these aspects of our economy in a way which completely defeats industrial growth.

For established industries in need of adjustment the Liberal government has relied on protective tariffs borne directly by the consumers of this country instead of offering programs to industry which would enable it to restructure and modernize. For sectors with high-growth potential and outstanding opportunities, the government has avoided any selective targeting to allow these companies to compete in world markets and has instead used a scatter-gun approach to the deployment of government funds and assistance.

I do not think Canada can continue to tolerate a deficit on manufactured goods of the staggering proportions I have just mentioned, $18 billion a year, because if we do, and as we further increase this deficit, we will be forced to rely on the continuing export of our non-renewable resources. Where does this lead us?

I think it is absolutely crucial that Canada improve its export position in manufactured goods. There are 945,000 people out of work in Canada today, and as the competitive position of Canadian industry continues to be eroded, more and more people will find themselves out of work. That in itself is evidence enough to attack our problem of importing increasing amounts of manufactured goods into Canada.

If Canada is to improve its export position, we must improve our technology through research. Tax incentives or tax credits must be offered to encourage at least a doubling of our research efforts in Canada.

The other vital element of improving our export position is to lower the cost structure of our manufacturing industries. Corporate income taxes in this country represent far too high a proportion of the costs of manufacturing for us to be competitive in world markets. As I said, the Liberal government continues to focus its attention on tariff protection, training programs, taxation, punitive energy policies and an incoherent regional development program instead of encouraging the private sector to be more competitive.

● (1620)

In concluding my remarks I should like to give another result of the crazy, idiotic economic development policy of the Liberal government. To date the National Energy Program has driven 120 rigs out of our country. I am sure hon. members on the other side of the House have received copies of the estimates to which I am referring. The Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors indicates that by May 15 a further 201 rigs will either go across the United States border or will become idle. That will mean a total of 320 rigs in Canada will be idle by virtue of the National Energy Program.

Mr. Collenette: Oh!

Mr. Thomson: The hon. member scoffs, but these are facts.

Mr. Collenette: You are rigging the facts.

Mr. Thomson: I am quoting these figures from a letter which was sent to every member of Parliament by the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors.

Mr. Collenette: They were going to cut back before the NEP.

Mr. Thomson: No, they were not. The government does not listen.

Mr. Collenette: Sure they were.

Mr. Thomson: The hon. member said that they were going to cut back before the NEP. Does he think they were going to cut back by 320 rigs? The member should not be absurd.

Mr. Collenette: I do not believe you.

Mr. Thomson: The member does not know about what he is talking. He does not believe me, but these are the facts. The association indicated:

> The drilling and servicing fleet being moved from Canada in the 184 days since the NEP was issued will eliminate 7,200 jobs at the field level. The downstream effect is estimated to eliminate another 18,000 jobs, or a total of over 25,000 Canadian jobs destroyed.

With the further 201 rigs idle, in addition to the 120 rigs that have already gone across the border, the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors indicated:

> The drilling and servicing equipment forecast to be out of service by the NEP will affect the jobs of approximately 10,000 people at the field level.

Also the association indicated:

> If the shut down continues, the spin-off effect could cause the loss of jobs for another 25,000 Canadians.

Therefore, the loss of 320 drilling rigs will cost this country 60,000 jobs. Where are the priorities of the Liberal government? If the country is to have an effective economic development program, it is essential to scrap wasteful and production-retarding government regulations which devour capital but produce no wealth. We must restrict the over-all role of the government in the economy in order to enhance personal incentive. Above all, we must stimulate increased supply and production instead of increased demand and consumption.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I really did not have any particular intention of speaking in the debate today, but I was sort of provoked into it. I do not have any particular objection to the motion condemning the government for bailing out foreign corporations instead of implementing a desperately-needed industrial development policy. It sounds like the industrial strategy about which my party talked for the past three or four years, especially my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

The resultant devastation of the small business sector, certainly the situation respecting bankruptcies, has been tragic. It was caused by high interest rates, the lack of support for industrial innovation and the surrender of domestic markets to manufactured goods. All of those matters are true. The foreign competitors in our local markets are crippling construction and other production sectors, there are high interest rates; tens of thousands of jobs have been lost. No one could quarrel with those facts. They are happening.

It is extremely important to ask what the Conservatives would have done differently.

Mr. Taylor: Everything.

Mr. Rose: I know what they would have done differently. They are greater ideologists than the members of my party, but we are the ones who are always accused of being ideological. What do they say? They say, "Don't intervene". I heard the former hon. member for Crowfoot say that there should not be government intervention into the agricultural sector, that the government should leave cattle ranchers alone, but that government regulations should be used to keep out competitive Australian beef and to give them land at ten cents per acre.

Another comment I heard was that the government should not regulate. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson) said, "Don't regulate us. Just leave us alone. We will be fine." Then many of the industries and resource companies will be using the air and water as a sewer. They will pass on their pollution and social costs to future generations. That is what they mean by "don't regulate". They do not want to be regulated because they might want to form a cartel and fix a few prices; then the government might find out what they are doing and ruin their competition.

Also they say, "don't redistribute income". Does that mean that they are opposed to medicare, which is a redistribution mechanism? Are they opposed to pensions, which is another way to redistribute wealth? What about welfare? Should we just leave it all, create a lot of capital and a lot of J. P. Morgans? Will the rest of us be well off? It is utter clap-trap, but we hear it all the time. They asked for a better balance between individual enterprise and the state and indicated that corporate taxes were too high. Approximately 25 years ago corporate taxes paid half the national revenue; today it is roughly 20 per cent. The Conservative Party is asking us to return to this. I cannot support it, and I do not think most Canadians would support it. That is one of the reasons the Conservatives lost the last election.

Mr. Collenette: Right on.

Mr. Rose: They talk about industrial growth not occurring. They ask, "Where is it occurring, where is it occurring?" It is occurring in places where industry, government and labour work together and plan for industrial growth. It does not work in non-interventionist societies at all. It works in Japan, West Germany and Sweden. There is industrial growth in those places, but not in the United States, because the fact is that there is no economic growth in many mature industrialized societies.

We kid ourselves when we say that there will be industrial growth by cutting taxes, that corporate taxes are too high or that interest rates are needed to create tight money to limit inflation. None of these things have worked. We must face that none of these things have worked.

They do not want any government intervention but they want selected targeting in certain industries. That would provide certain industries with government help, but they do not want government intervention. There is a lot of contradiction in those terms.

Also the hon. member for Calgary South said that we should not export our raw resources. From where on earth does he think the wealth of Calgary came? It was from the rape of the resources and the sell-out of one million barrels per day to the United States between 1965 and 1971, but some of them will get up and say that it was not one million barrels per day except in 1971. That is from where the wealth came. I agree the manufacturing sector is declining; no one quarrels with that. Why is it declining? Is it because Canadians are non-productive or certain government policies have hastened the decline in manufacturing? That is exactly what happened. That is why the governments which have been in power across the way for the last ten or 12 years—and it seems to me like forever—need to be severely criticized, but the solutions offered by the loyal opposition are far worse than the disease.

They talk about no bailouts to big foreign corporations. What about Bill Davis' $30 million to Ford? Isn't that a bailout to a big, foreign corporation? So there are only some big foreign corporations that we should not bail out. After all, Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson and some of the others are apparently no good. I would like them to go to the Chrysler dealers in their own communities and find out how they feel about the bail-out of Chrysler. Are they willing to accept the job losses because of that disruption, I suppose it is called? I have forgotten what euphemisms are used to describe people being put out of work while industries readjust. Most Canadians are not willing to accept that kind of free enterprise, nineteenth century approach to our economy. It does not work any more. It never did. It causes nothing but tragedy, so do not ask us to buy it on that ground.

What I think we need to do as far as bailouts are concerned is, if we have a foreign corporation which needs to be bailed out, to say, "Okay, we will give you $500 million out of the public purse, but we want $500 million worth of equity." "When you make all that money digging holes all over the Beaufort Sea, because we have given you $100 million, Dome Petroleum, we want part of the profits to accrue to the Canadian people."

A while ago someone here said Petrofina did not produce one drop of oil, not one cubic metre, not one inky, dinky spot of oil—none, they produce not enough oil to mark your pants and require them to be cleaned. Who does produce the oil? Exploration companies produce the oil. The big multinationals produce the oil. When we raise the price of oil, do we receive any benefit from it? No. We pay not only through incentive grants, but through higher oil prices, so they can make bigger profits to ship more money to the United States, or wherever. Since 1975 $3.5 billion in dividends, interest shares and profits have gone to the foreign multinationals.

Since the Conservatives are so anxious to bash around big foreign business I would like to know why, when they were in office for that glimpse of time—when they enjoyed that nine-month pregnancy—they did not give birth to a far more difficult and tough foreign investment review agency.

It seems to me that one of our problems is that we have a decline in manufacturing because the people who are our mid-sized manufacturers have selectively sold out to foreign interests. On the one hand we give them R and D incentives, they begin to succeed and then they look attractive to the hungry eyes of the foreign corporations. After we have given them all that money, they sell out. Over the last year, if you look at all the applications which came before FIRA, something in the order of 80 per cent to 85 per cent have been approved. When we get the kind of R and D we are talking about, if it will help—and nobody is certain that it will—there is a great big question about whether or not R and D does help. I will go into that in a moment.

The point here is that we do not have R and D in this country because we do not own our own manufacturing industry in large measure in this country. That is why we do not have the R and D here, because it is all done by the parent company in the United States, or wherever it is located. We had an example of this the other day, and we will have more of it. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) raised the question having to do with the telecommunications industry.

One of the biggest growth industries in industrial democracies in the west will be the telecommunications industry. We heard about Telidon today and the $27 million over two years which the government will use for it. I congratulate the government for that. But one of the biggest industries in the United States and Canada, too—and we have a substantial lead—can be threatened if we allow foreign satellites to carry data and transmit it back and forth, to and from Canada's major cities.

There is an application now by Satellite Business Systems for permission to hook up to five Canadian cities through the Federal Communications Commission in the United States. What will that do? It will hook IBM and some of the other big giants in the United States into their subsidiaries in Canada, allowing them to do an end run around the telephone companies and various other carriers and our own Telesat, enabling that kind of information to flow back to the United States with the potential loss of thousands of jobs.

Is this the NDP, those woolly-headed, weepy-eyed, impractical dreamers saying this? Of course not. A hard-headed ex-judge of the Supreme Court, one time head of MacMillan-Bloedel, J. D. Clyne, said in his report that if we allow the communications industry and the data processing industry to escape our national borders, we would lose thousands and thousands of jobs.

Let us not talk about bailouts. Let us talk about economic nationalism for a change. Sure, we need to assist small and medium-sized businesses. Of course we do, because they create far more jobs than big businesses. Someone estimated that if every business employing over 500 were nationalized then 60 per cent to 75 per cent of the people would be working for small private business. Nobody wants to throttle small or private business in this country, but what we have allowed to happen with them is to be selectively, continuously and progressively sold out so that we do not own them any more.

If all we will be doing by aiding them through R and D, and other kinds of incentives—of course we do not want any government intrusion, but we would like some incentives for small and medium-sized business just to make them grow so they will become an attractive prospect to a foreign business because we have a gutless, toothless FIRA program in this country—then this party is not in favour of it. We will oppose that kind of thing.

Someone said we have no "Buy Canadian" policy. I believe it was the lead-off speaker who made that remark. He is right. We had an example of a dry dock slated to be built for Vancouver. Where is it to be built now? Japan. One wonders where Dome Petroleum Company, that recipient of the bounty not only of our resources but of numerous incentive grants, and the last one I heard of was for the Beaufort Sea in the range of $100 million, will buy their oil barge. They are dickering with Singapore. Do we do anything about that? Of course not, because we are loyal Canadians, we are staunch and we want to protect our local industry, since to do otherwise would be supernationalistic, even jingoistic. Of course we cannot have that. Where does Dome plan to buy its ship which will work in the Arctic? You guessed it. Louisiana.

A little while ago someone spoke about R and D. Certainly R and D has been inadequate in this country in certain areas. Dr. Kerwin, the head of the National Research Council for Canada, produced these figures based on 1968 records. According to our gross national product, the amount of money we spent on R and D is .9 per cent, or not quite 1 per cent. And we rank twelfth in the industrialized world. Those figures are with respect to government spending.

We rank eighth in the world with respect to our R and D in the energy field. Guess what we put most of it into. Do we put it into alternatives? No. Of the $157 million allocated in 1978—and I can give you later figures if you are interested—we spent $108 million on nuclear energy. With all the controversy in that area, frightening as it is, we still continue to put all our radiant eggs into the Candu basket.

Do you know what we spent in 1978 on renewables, Mr. Speaker? It was 5 per cent of our research and development money, which amounted to $8 million. When we talk conservation on the supply side, which is where we are still spending most of our money, 80 per cent of the money in the National Energy Program will go to the supply side, so we can live as we always have, as energy gluttons. How much will we spend to limit demand? How much did we spend in 1978? Some $14 million, or 9 per cent, which will be bumped up to 12 per cent, so we do not freeze in the dark. This is a ludicrous kind of arrangement for R and D. Let us look at the figures as compared with the United States.

● (1640)

Compared to the United States, Canada's rate of contribution to R and D is .9 per cent of its GNP. The industry in the United States and Canada accounts for 41 per cent of spending. The United States spends 2.3 per cent of its GNP on R and D. Industry contributes 71 per cent of that amount. This supports what I have been saying. Since a large portion of our manufacturing and resource industries are not owned and operated by Canadians, we do not have a very large contribution to R and D. The record is very discouraging.

Dr. Kerwin, head of the National Research Council, said that the contribution to R and D is not high enough, that as a result we are not developing the kind of growth and are not taking leadership in certain industries in which we excel and, therefore, must put more money into R and D. By 1985 the contribution to R and D should be at least 1.5 per cent of the GNP. Even at that rate, Canada would still be one percentage point behind the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are getting restless. Is my time just about up?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: You have about two minutes.

Mr. Rose: I was just getting warmed up, although I may have cooled off many other hon. members. I agree with the hon. member for Calgary South who said that we should have selective targets. If R and D is thrown at every industry, it does not mean that it will pay off. I have here an example given by Hazel Henderson in a paper published by Doubleday & Co. which cites that:

> —the well-known cases of the steel works in Horndal, Sweden and the textile factory in Lowell, Massachusetts, which, with no additional inputs of capital over 15 and 20 years, continuously increased productivity at an average of 2 per cent annually.

That does not necessarily mean that all industries are equally suitable and will benefit from a transfusion of R and D. Research and development is a matter of motherhood. What we should be aiming our R and D programs at are areas such as those of high technology where we have a chance of developing, maintaining and expanding the Canadian interest. Another example would be alternative energy. In this way, Canada can accomplish a great deal, which it will not accomplish, as the motion says, as long as we sit here and only react to the United States. We must act, and the time is now.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring a most grave matter of privilege to the attention of the House. It centres around the absolute contempt which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has shown for the House today. If I may, I would like to take you through certain circumstances.

This morning on the national news it was announced that there would be an announcement with respect to Massey-Ferguson. I asked the minister in the question period at approximately 11.55 this morning the following question: "Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has he any statement to make with respect to the present negotiations involving the Massey-Ferguson situation and, if so, could he tell us what form the statement will take? Will he be making a statement on motions, or how will this House first be informed as to what his conclusions are?"

The minister replied: "Madam Speaker, I have no statement to make at this time, but the matter is under active review."

I have since learned that not only did the minister have a statement, but it was actually being typed and prepared at the time of my question, not for presentation to this House of Commons, but to a press conference which the minister chose to call by posting a notice in the press gallery which stated:

> The Honourable Herb Gray, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, will be available to meet with members of the media as follows:
> Date: February 6, 1981
> Time: 3 p.m.
> Location: C. D. Howe Building
> 235 Queen Street
> 11th Floor
> Executive Complex
> Subject: Massey-Ferguson

In spite of the fact that the minister was questioned this morning on this matter, that today was an opposition day on a motion which touches on this matter and that the minister spoke in this House on that motion between 12.30 and one o'clock today, he gave absolutely no notification to this House that he intended to make an announcement today concerning Massey-Ferguson. The minister chose to hold a press conference at three o'clock to present a prepared text and a backgrounder concerning his position on Massey-Ferguson. Even after the press conference, the minister failed to return to this House to give an explanation as to what he has in mind with respect to Massey-Ferguson.

I intend to go into more detail on my question of privilege, but I would merely like to give notice at this point. If my question of privilege is not found to be valid on the point I am raising, then this chamber becomes redundant. It is absolutely immaterial as to what we wish to debate or what questions we wish to put to the minister, if he is allowed to be so contemptuous of what is the supreme body of this nation.

I give formal notice of my intention to raise a question of privilege on this matter. I hope we will at least be given the opportunity to debate the matter fully before a decision is taken as to whether a minister of the Crown can treat this House as contemptuously as we have witnessed today.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, you have given the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) latitude to develop his question of privilege this afternoon. I realize that these questions are usually dealt with in the normal way following question period, but I would like to respond to the hon. member since he has outlined his case. The hon. member has given more than mere notice, and if he is allowed to make his arguments this afternoon and raise them again on Monday, then he is having two kicks at the can, to use a colloquial expression, and I resent that very much.

The hon. member should know that there is no obligation whatsoever on a minister to make a statement inside the House as opposed to outside the House. In fact, it says in Beauchesne's at page 264—

[Translation]

This is what Beauchesne says, and I quote:

The option of a minister to make a statement either in the House or outside it may be the subject of comment, but is not the subject of a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, this is absolutely clear according to Beauchesne's citation.

[English]

I resent very much that the hon. member has chosen at this point on a Friday afternoon, after having almost completed an opposition debate in which the minister took part—and while there are only two Conservative members left in the House—to raise this matter. It is an opposition motion, and yet we have this ridiculous scene with only two Conservative members in the House.

Mr. Stevens: There are four.

Mr. Collenette: Four, then.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a brief word about the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). As the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) has said, there is no legal or procedural obligation on a minister to make a statement in the House. However, I must say that when I heard the minister answer the hon. member during question period this morning by saying that he had no statement, I concluded that what we heard on the radio this morning was wrong and that no statement would be made today.

● (1650)

For the minister to make that statement outside the House this afternoon is, I think, pretty close to contempt for the House.

While I am on my feet, I may say to the hon. member for York-Peel that he should make sure he has the right to raise a question of privilege on Monday. I hope he will not rely on the notice he has now given but will send Madam Speaker written notice on Monday morning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think we have heard enough on this point for the moment. As has been indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), there is a procedure by which notice can be sent to the Speaker. I presume this will be done if the hon. member intends to pursue the point further.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, in the short time left in this debate I should like to touch on one or two matters. I am always interested in what the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) has to say. One or two points he made in the early part of his speech caught my attention. When the government bought Pacific Petroleums, he was one of those who made a lot of noise and claimed it was a bad deal. Now, two years later, I am told that Pacific Petroleums is worth two or three times what was paid for it.

Any purchase that can double in value after two or three years is certainly a good deal. In 1976 $340 million was paid for Atlantic Richfield, and now the company is worth over $1 billion. These companies have shown pretty nice profits, and they indicate what has happened in the oil industry. When we bought Petrofina, we thought it was a good investment. Sales at the pumps for Pacific Pete increased by 15 per cent overnight, and there was a tenfold increase in credit card sales.

When private industry buys something, it expects to receive a return on the investment, but we do not hear anything about this when the government makes a purchase. It is almost as if the government spent that $1.5 billion, not that it invested the money and expects a considerable return in the years ahead.

The minister read a list of cities where unemployment has increased in the last year. I should like to list some cities where things have gone the other way. In St. John's, unemployment decreased from 13.5 per cent to 11.1 per cent; in Halifax, from 9.1 per cent to 7.5; Quebec City, from 9.8 per cent to 8.9 per cent; Sudbury, from 10.3 per cent to 8.3 per cent; Toronto, from 5.6 per cent to 5.3 per cent; Vancouver, 8.8 per cent to 4.4 per cent; and in Victoria, from 8.6 per cent to 7.3 per cent. It goes both ways, and to present just one list does not give the whole picture.

I have been disappointed that there has been so little discussion in this House over the years about the theories that govern world economics, so I was very pleased that the hon. member for York-Peel injected that into the discussion. Max Saltsman, a former NDP member of this House, used to bring this sort of thing up, but I have not heard any discussion along these lines recently.

The hon. member for York-Peel said that Keynesian theories no longer prevail. I expect that he never accepted the Keynesian theories, although they seemed to work fairly well for many years. Several times over the last four or five years when the subject has come up in the House I have said that the Keynesian theories do not work when there is stagflation. The hon. member spoke of supply side economics and a sort of "new approach", but I wish he had defined his terms a little better. I assume he was referring to supply side economics or the Milton Friedman monetarist viewpoint of the University of Chicago as contrasted to the Keynes-Cambridge theory. Friedman's view is that all one has to do is control the money supply and allow total freedom in the market, and the market will solve all the problems.

The hon. member for York-Peel has left the chamber, so I cannot debate this with him, but I hope to return to it on another occasion.

There is another point with respect to the supply side theory that deals with a fairly strong interventionist policy. When we deal with the energy situation, we are really dealing with supply side economics or interventionism as opposed to the monetarist, open market theory Milton Friedman tends to support and the hon. member and his party tend to support. It seems to me that we have moved a long way toward intervening on the supply side.

When we speak of an industrial strategy, I think we are really speaking of a lot of things that were in the budget.

Inflation is highly structured. The major inflating factors are energy and food. A great deal of the cost of the food component is determined by increases in energy prices. We have a very selective, structured type of inflation. The hon. member's supply side economics would ignore that kind of inflation and let the market govern itself, even though there is no longer a simple, open food market. It is a very structured market today. We must examine multinational corporations involved in farming in order to determine whether with respect to farm marketing and the grain industry, particularly in the United States, another structure must be dealt with.

The perfect market some people talk about just does not exist. I wonder why people who believe the Milton Friedman theories about supply side do not take that into consideration.

When we talk about an industrial strategy, we are really talking about structuring something. If we take a structured inflationary factor like energy seriously, we are recognizing it as the major component in inflation.

People claim that we must do something about the supply of energy in order to combat inflation. That is precisely what was done in the budget and the National Energy Program. The government was saying that the way to reduce inflation is to do something about energy in a structured way. That could be called an industrial strategy.

In the two or three minutes I have left I would like to talk about the government's industrial and labour adjustment program and the $350 million allocated for it. This program is really a stopgap in a total industrial program. It is very important because in the last two years two mines have shut down in Atikokan which is in my constituency. There is only one other small industry and the rest of the business community is service industries. Of a population of 6,500 people, 1,200 are out of work.

This community fits into the $350 million program in every way. I submit to the minister that it is really an ideal candidate for the program because the structures are already in place for the development of a new industry.

I believe the community will be designated under the program because it meets the requirements. This would provide support for people who have been thrown out of work and whose unemployment insurance benefits have run out. There would be support for long-term employment and earlier pensions. The program would put a community such as this one back on its feet and give the people who have been resident there for 20 or 30 years some real hope for the future. I commend the program to the House, and I hope Atikokan and other communities will be designated under the program.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), that proceedings on the motion have expired. The House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED MERGER OF POLITICAL PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I should like to propose a motion. When asked on a recent CBC radio program if the Prime Minister's truthfulness, or lack of it, in informing Canadians on constitutional matters affected the NDP's determination to support the Liberal government, the NDP leader was quoted as saying, and I quote: "His particular honesty on this question, frankly, is irrelevant to the constitutional essence of the case", I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That since, in a choice between truth or Trudeau, the NDP leader prefers Trudeau, therefore the party should formalize their relationship and have Liberals and NDPs conduct all their affairs jointly from now on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR DISCONTINUATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The fact that the Liberal National Energy Program is counterproductive to Canada reaching energy self-sufficiency by 1990, and given the fact that under this program Canada will require 500,000 barrels of oil imports a day by 1990, at a cost of $23 billion annually to Canadian taxpayers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government scrap its National Energy Program and that the whole question of energy self-sufficiency and energy policy be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works and that they formulate a sensible and realistic energy policy for Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

UNANIMOUS SUPPORT FOR ALBERTA FEDERATION OF LABOUR IN FIGHT AGAINST WESTERN SEPARATISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Alberta Federation of Labour unanimously endorsed a resolution to fight western separatism, and I quote: "With all our means and resources to keep Canada strong and united from sea to sea", and in view of the fact that the federation stated that small farmers, business people, working people and pensioners would suffer in the event of separation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

That this House lend its support to the Alberta labour movement's commitment to Canadian national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Mr. Clark: That means they withdraw the National Energy Program.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1410)

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) want to speak to the motion?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

S.O. 43

Mr. Lang: Madam Speaker, I think we are at a crossroads in Canadian history at this time—

Some hon. Members: It is too late.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am awfully sorry that I did not see the hon. member rising before the motion was passed. Once it is passed, of course there is no point in debating it. So, I recognize the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong).

DISARMAMENT

SUGGESTION UNITED NATIONS HOLD GLOBAL REFERENDUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Every day ten nuclear bombs are manufactured. There now exists enough destructive nuclear power to kill every human being some 20 to 60 times over. The nuclear powers are now developing strategies based on the notion that "limited" nuclear wars can be fought and won. A major new initiative for peace is needed. A global referendum on disarmament would focus human attention on this single issue and would create a collective human voice so unique in the history of our race that it would echo in the hearts and minds of all people. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to move a motion at the United Nations General Assembly calling for a global referendum on disarmament.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INCREASE IN PREMIUMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On October 28 the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) announced a 33 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) confirmed this figure the following day. The fact is that in every wage level but one the increases were higher—most over 40 per cent and some up to 46 per cent. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration make a statement on motions setting out the full truth about the new rates and their impact on Canadian workers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

CALL FOR SPEEDY ACTION ON MEAT IMPORT LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas live cattle prices have dropped significantly since the beginning of 1981, causing uncertainty among cattle producers; whereas the cattle industry has long advocated a beef import law to protect both producers and consumers against wide fluctuations in markets; and since the Standing Committee on Agriculture has not yet met during 1981, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House instruct the government House leader to consult with the Minister of Agriculture so that Bill C-46, the meat import law, be referred to the House Standing Committee on Agriculture as soon as possible in order that this important legislation be passed post haste.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

KENT ROYAL COMMISSION

USE OF TAXPAYERS' MONEY FOR CARTOON PRIZES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It was my understanding that the purpose of the commission on newspapers, the Kent Royal Commission, was to investigate the conduct of two newspaper chains which were responsible for literally killing two newspapers in this country and virtually carving up the country into spheres of monopoly control—not to squander the money of Canadian taxpayers. Evidently I was mistaken, Madam Speaker. In light of the fact the commission has set up a competition in which it is offering $1,600 in prize money for cartoons to be used ultimately in the commission's report, and which undoubtedly will be slanted in favour of the commission's views, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the commission provide the Parliament of Canada with the terms of reference which authorize it to engage in such extravagant behaviour at the expense of Canadian taxpayers' money; moreover, if the commission persists in carrying on with this competition, that the prize money be deducted from the substantial per diem rate of the members of the commission.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

SETTLEMENT OF NORDAIR OWNERSHIP—REQUEST THAT INTERESTS OF QUEBEC AND NORTHERN TERRITORIES BE PROTECTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent matter.

Since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) seems incapable of making a decision about which group ought to be able to buy Air Canada's interest in Nordair, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the Minister of Transport quickly settle the issue of Nordair's ownership and make sure that when this matter is finalized the interests of Quebec and of the Northwest Territories are adequately protected.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RECOMMENDED PATRIATION WITH VANCOUVER AMENDING FORMULA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Canada is a federation of ten provinces and two territories, and whereas a majority of the provinces favour the patriation of the Constitution with an amending formula only, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That this House recommends, in the interest of Canadian unity, that our Constitution be patriated with the Vancouver amending formula, and that all other changes be made in Canada by Canadians through their Parliament and legislatures.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

PENSIONS

CALL FOR INCREASE IN OLD AGE SECURITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), I move:

That this House recognizes that couples 65 years of age or over have to spend one fifth of their income on food, and that food prices are rising at the rate of 14 or 15 per cent, which means that the present system of indexing falls short of enabling senior citizens to remain above the poverty line, and this House therefore calls on the government to implement its promise to provide help where help is needed by making an immediate increase in the rate of the pension paid to Canada's senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

MINISTER'S STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO CABINET'S POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to the minister's minutes of his meeting of December 19, the minister said:

In cabinet we are extremely attached to the charter. If we had to, we would put it ahead of patriation.

Was the minister speaking on behalf of the government when he made that statement?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the statement, "In cabinet we are extremely attached to the charter." is certainly self-evident. The other statement was my interpretation of people's views. As I said the other day, it is not a matter which has ever been discussed in cabinet, to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I would then like to put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Is it the position of the Government of Canada that, given a choice, as suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Government of Canada would prefer a charter to patriation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we have not been faced with that choice, and we do not expect to be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave a representation on behalf of cabinet, and on behalf of Canada, which was not supported by his government, has the Government of Canada sought a means, since that time, to indicate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was speaking something other than the view of the Government of Canada when he made that representation?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, at the time I spoke I was involved in active discussion. My expression was rhetorical, and well known to be such.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Tongue in cheek!

Mr. MacGuigan: The purpose of my comment was to indicate how devoted the cabinet and this side of the House are to the charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we now have the Secretary of State for External Affairs admitting the accuracy of the quotations in the minutes which were a record of his conversation of December 19. These are minutes which have been published, which he has seen, which he has indicated, in one particular, were cast not as reflecting the government's view but as reflecting only his own view. We have heard before that some of the positions uttered by the Government of Canada and on the public record were less than candid, tongue in cheek, or rhetorical. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs, knowing that the people of Canada are interested in knowing the whole truth about the government's position on this matter, issue an edited version of those statements indicating which are rhetorical, which are tongue in cheek, which are less than candid, and which few are the truth?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I believe I detect some rhetoric on their side as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: As we have said repeatedly, Madam Speaker, we have no intention of publishing the minutes of those meetings. One cannot draw any conclusion with respect to the whole minutes from the excerpts which the hon. gentleman claims I have now confirmed. The fact is, that does not lead to any conclusions about the rest of the minutes.

• (1420)

DETAILS OF TELEPHONE CONVERSATION BETWEEN CANADIAN AND BRITISH HOUSE LEADERS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who in exchanges in the House, both on October 31, 1980, and November 3, 1980, advised the House that he was fully aware of all the details of a telephone conversation between the then British House leader and his own government House leader. Was this the first time when the minister was made aware of the difficulties which the British government felt it would encounter with the constitutional proposals, or is it his contention that he was not advised of these problems until his meeting on November 10, 1980, with the then British House leader, Mr. Stevas?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the British government made it clear in the first conversation I had with them that there were difficulties in the way. They also made it clear that, despite those difficulties, they would do what they were required to do by convention.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, to follow up on the question of what was actually told to the minister, following the November 10 meeting in London, the Secretary of State for External Affairs told the news media, according to a CP wire story, that when this matter was discussed the only possible problem was "one of timing". However, the Canadian government telex report on that November 10 meeting noted that the British House leader clearly stated to the minister that passage at Westminster would be dependent on how soon the measure reaches London and what it contained. Which of these two reports is being given tongue-in-cheek or which one is being stated as rhetorical? Can the minister tell us which of these two versions is the truth?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, as we have stated many times, the spokesmen of the British government have frequently referred to the difficulties they will encounter as to how soon they can pass our resolution through their House. Obviously there are some difficulties with respect to some members of their backbench. For the British government it is a question of when this resolution can be brought forward in the House, and, therefore, a question of timing.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question comes back to the question which I have already asked. Why is the minister afraid of telling which of these two versions that have been presented is the true one?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am not afraid of anything that has gone on the record.

Miss MacDonald: Except the truth.

Mr. MacGuigan: We have taken the policy that we will not confirm statements which the opposition or others are publishing, whether it be word by word or line by line. There is the diplomatic tradition that such things not be revealed.

Mr. Clark: You just broke that tradition.

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON—GUARANTEES TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is with regard to the announcement of the deal between the government and Massey-Ferguson. It has now become apparent that British, French, German and Italian banks sought and received assurances from Massey-Ferguson that Massey-Ferguson would continue to invest heavily in their respective countries. Could the minister explain the amount of the underwritten shares which each of the governments of these countries undertook in order to assist those countries and Massey-Ferguson in maintaining its operations in each of those countries?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, in so far as I am aware, the government of Britain through its export guarantee board undertook to guarantee some $90 million in preferred shares which the British banks are taking in lieu of the debt which is owed to them by Massey-Ferguson. I shall have to check with respect to the other participants. With respect to the federal government and the government of Ontario, our decision was linked with the benefits to Canada of Massey-Ferguson continuing its operations and becoming a stronger and more viable entity in terms of production and jobs for Canadians.

● (1425)

GUARANTEES RESPECTING CANADIAN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. In return for the British guarantee Massey apparently assured them that there would be no redundancies in the Coventry plant, in the Manchester plant, or in the Perkins diesel plant in Peterborough. Could the minister point to the agreement and show this House the clause that guarantees there will be no lay-offs or dislocation of employment in Canada as a result of the commitment we have made?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have obtained a commitment with Massey with regard to the upgrading of their operations and employment in this country, including the maintenance of employment at existing operations. The exact wording will be available to the House and the public as the details of the agreements are worked out and reduced to formal written form. There is certainly nothing in our agreement with Massey or with the province of Ontario that is intended to lead to any reduction in employment. Our objective and our commitment are to do just the opposite.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, am I to understand that the government has committed itself to a $200 million loan guarantee and that there is not yet a piece of paper on which the commitments of Massey are put down? We do not know whether they will maintain employment and we do not know how much they are going to invest in this country. They have committed themselves to investment in other parts of the world but this government has absolutely nothing other than a lot of hot air.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, it is obvious from the hon. member's question that, if there is hot air, it is coming from him and not from this side of the House.

An hon. Member: Call another press conference.

Mr. Gray: It shows how interested his party really is in maintaining jobs, and increasing jobs for Canadians. If we had not moved, there would not be, over the next couple of weeks, either the existing jobs in Massey or the increase in jobs that our agreement is going to bring about. Hon. members opposite do not care about that. Hot air, that is their concentration of effort.

An hon. Member: Those are your friends—the NDP.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, first of all we are not providing loan guarantees but guarantees of the capital risk of a new equity investment. What we have agreed to, and what the government of Ontario has agreed to, is based on definite commitments with respect to production and employment in Canada. These are recorded in written form and they will be recorded in contractual form. This will be made available to the House and to the public as soon as this aspect of this activity is completed. I might say that I should like to see this done as soon as possible so that my hon. friend's concerns can be shown to be groundless.

TRADE

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S PARTICIPATION IN EXPORTATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL TO JAPAN

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it is in response to the successful conclusion of a major export deal for northeast British Columbia coal to Japanese markets. While only sketchy details are available at this point, I should like to ask the minister what the extent of the federal involvement is for the procurement and cost of the infrastructure that is required to facilitate the shipment of that coal?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to be very specific on this subject this afternoon but information will be available in the coming days. Federal participation takes three forms. The first is the contribution to the site preparation, the offsite services, and the access road. Then there is a guarantee of $3 per tonne throughput charge at the port. Third, there will be considerable participation by CN in the improvement of the main rail line. The very specific details will come out, as I said in the coming days. It is difficult to give the degree of subsidization at this point because of the change in the volume of the sale, but some of it will be on a non-compensatory basis, for example, the access road will be paid by DREE, but most of it will be on a cost recovery basis.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. It is said that up to $1 billion will be required by the two governments, that of British Columbia and of Canada, to put the necessary infrastructure in place, townsites, rails, roads, port facilities and so on. That is a significant expenditure of money. Is it the minister's intention to table in the House the extent of the federal involvement and say whether it is the intention of the federal government to recover its investment in the various components of this massive scheme?

• (1430)

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, in due course I am quite sure we will. By way of illustration, CN will probably invest $300 million in this, maybe even more, for the purchase of trains, strengthening of lines, and so on.

An hon. Member: Double tracking.

Mr. Pepin: But all of that is on a full cost recovery basis. As my hon. friend is interested in knowing the full extent of the non-cost recovery aspect, I can advise him this should come up within the next few weeks.

FISHERIES

LAY-OFF NOTICES TO EMPLOYEES OF NEWFOUNDLAND COMPANY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I am sure the minister is aware of the serious unemployment in Newfoundland. Today there are 32,000 officially unemployed. Is he aware that one of our major fishing companies, Fishery Products Limited, is sending out notices to 700 employees informing them that they will be laid off in two weeks' time because they cannot get access to fish stocks, that the northern cod allotment for the offshore fleet, which I think is 47,500 tonnes, will all be caught within the next two weeks, and as a result, there will have to be serious lay-offs in the Newfoundland fishing industry?

Can the minister advise the House what steps he is taking to see that the raw material is made available to the fish-catching fleet to keep the important fishing industry in operation in Newfoundland as well as in the rest of the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I would have thought that a company as important as the one to which the hon. member referred would not have issued lay-off notices on the basis of a press story. Second, I would have thought that, in a situation where the whole argument for increased quotas was based on year-round plants having year-round fish, major companies would not have opened what are, by definition, very seasonal plants, and in some cases put on a double shift—in other words, catch all the fish they could in a matter of a few weeks and then immediately expand the processing operation, which endangers the viability of those plants which have become year round, which are dependent on year round supply.

Those are the problems with which we are trying to deal. I tried to reach a consensus with my Atlantic coast provincial counterparts at a meeting last Friday. There was no consensus, so we will have to try to make the best management decisions we can.

I would have to say that the arguments made to preserve quotas on northern cod, on the basis for the need for market, on the need for year round plants, and on the basis of keeping crews busy 12 months of the year, are shot to pieces by actions of the very companies which were asking for a 12-month supply of fish, by agreeing they should take it in a matter of three or four months.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I am not interested in arguments. The minister has jurisdiction over the fishery, and the firm, Fishery Products Limited, is a leading firm and has been for 50 years in the Newfoundland fishery with year-round plants and a huge trawler fleet. The company has two trawlers under construction now, specially ice strengthened, at Marystown, worth $7 million each. That demonstrates its interest in the future of the fishery.

My question to the minister is this: what will the minister do to see that companies like this one, which has thousands of employees, will be able to keep those employees working this year in fish processing operations in Newfoundland, which has the worst unemployment in the whole of the Dominion of Canada? That is what we want to know. What can the minister do? The minister has jurisdiction. He is snubbing the provincial minister of fisheries day after day.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: What action is the minister going to take?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member, who has been travelling, has not been following the debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Where have you been?

Mr. LeBlanc: It is to protect the supply of fish for those year-round plants that I have asked the companies to exercise—

Mr. Clark: That are putting people out of work.

Mr. LeBlanc: —some control over their fishing efforts and to make sure that, come next August or September, they do not all claim an increase in the quotas on the basis of running short of fish. I think plants which have been open, which are by their nature seasonal plants, or plants which have put in second shifts, as many of them have, in fact are showing that irresponsibility which I have been trying to master for some time.

An hon. Member: So much for the fishermen.

Mr. LeBlanc: You would not know a fisherman from a cow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We know the flim-flam.

Mr. Clark: Roméo baloney.

ASTRA TRUST

DEPARTMENTAL DELAY IN LAUNCHING INVESTIGATION

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Finance I have a question for the Minister of Finance concerning Astra Trust which was chartered by the federal government in 1976 and started operating in 1977. I am sure that it will be of some interest to the House to know there were already so many problems with this company, and with associated companies also controlled by Mr. Montemurro, that in 1978 the federal Superintendent of Insurance was attaching conditions and only renewing the trust company's charter for three-month periods.

My question to the minister is this: why did it take the department two years between 1978 and 1980 to find out the nature of the scam which was involved? How was it possible for the department to continue to allow investors in southern Ontario to invest in a company when it knew in 1978 that this operation was fishy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the minister of state has been handling this particular aspect of the department's operations. I would suggest that he will get more satisfaction if he were to ask his question of my colleague who will be in the House tomorrow.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, in light of the answers which both the hon. member for Burlington and I have received from the Minister of State for Finance, I am not sure I agree with the minister that we are getting very much satisfaction from any minister in the government dealing with this problem.

An hon. Member: It is a cover up.

Mr. Rae: If the minister is not interested or aware of this problem, believe me, Madam Speaker, he will be interested and aware of this problem by the time we are finished dealing with it, because it involves a very important problem for many investors.

My question for the Minister of Finance is this: how was it possible for loans to have been made to a company called Canadian Recycling Ltd.—it is rather an appropriate name in light of the circumstances—and for loans to have been made to many of the directors of Astra Trust, and to individuals linked for ten years to organized crime? How was it possible for those loans to have been made over two and three years, between 1977 and 1980, and for the department to do nothing to warn other innocent investors in this company that there was something dreadfully wrong with this operation, as well as with the operation of Re-Mor Mortgage, and C & M Consultants Ltd., and Canadian Recycling, the four companies involved in this operation?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I never implied that the hon. member would get satisfaction in complete perfection. I just said that I thought he would get more satisfaction from my colleague than from me—

An hon. Member: What is new?

Mr. MacEachen: —and I am certain of that in light of the answer I am now going to give to the hon. member, which is the same as the former one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

COMMUNICATIONS

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE FOR DEVELOPMENT OF ELECTRONICS INDUSTRY

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that Canada will face a $4 billion to $5 billion annual trade deficit in office electronics by the year 1985, and in light of the fact that the minister has stated that the challenge of making significant inroads into the burgeoning multi-billion dollar office electronics market is beyond the capability of any single Canadian firm, would he indicate to this House what appropriate steps the government is taking to make the electronics industry more competitive and to increase its exports by winning world markets?

An hon. Member: He has already announced it.

Mr. Andre: ElectroCan.

Mr. Crosbie: ElectroCute.

An hon. Member: ChryslerCan.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the very important question raised by my colleague. I would point out that a few months ago I announced the federal government's intention, particularly through the Department of Communications, to launch an office communications program. This is a matter of vital interest not only to my department but also to the department of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. At that time we indicated a total possible commitment on the part of the government of some $12.5 million. I was pleased to announce on Friday a commitment by the government to the Telidon program amounting to $27.5 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1440)

Mr. Fox: You know yourself, Madam Speaker, that this is a technology in which Canadians have a leading edge—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Fox: —ahead of both our French and English competitors. We feel that with this added injection into the Telidon program—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fox: —combined with the additional $100 million which industry intends to contribute, we will have a very successful electronics program in this country.

FISHERIES

REGULATION OF HERRING FISHING ON WEST COAST

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As he knows, there are many very worried herring fishermen out on the west coast owing to the government's lottery, presumably the computerized lottery program, for entry into the herring roe fishery. I should like to ask the minister whether all bona fide herring fishermen will automatically qualify for entry into the roe fishing season and whether native fishermen or any other groups will be exempted from the lottery or given any other kind of classification in the lottery.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand what the hon. member means by a lottery. As he knows, the herring season in 1979 was the scene of considerable disorder, and in fact of threat to the herring stocks because of pressure and the lack of discipline on the spawning grounds.

In 1980 there was a strike and the herring stock which was taken was much lower than usual, and therefore there was a conservation aspect to this. But in 1981, according to the reports of the biologists, we had to question very seriously if the type of management breakdown which had occurred in 1979 was tolerable and, in fact, if there should be a herring roe fishery at all. We decided in favour of the herring roe fishery, considering that salmon and herring roe fishermen have had rather difficult seasons. However, we did not institute a lottery. We tried to give fishermen a choice as to the zones in which they wanted to fish so as to ensure some order, and that is still the subject of some discussion. I do not understand what the lottery issue is all about.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, if the minister does not know anything about the lottery, he is way behind the fishermen out there who know all about the lottery system. Conceding the fact that a conservation program has to be established, and the fishermen are the first to agree to that, I should like to ask the minister whether he recognizes the fact that a conservation program is necessary and that new regulations had to be put in place. Since he had them in place in 1980, why did he not use them instead of introducing a new program? The fishermen were already prepared and geared for those regulations. Why did the minister not do that, instead of instituting a new system in 1981 which was totally unproved? Furthermore, I should like to ask the minister whether he is planning to use the present system with regard to other stock, such as salmon, later on, for the fishermen.

Mr. LeBlanc: In answer to the last question, I have not heard this suggestion, although there are those who advocate that area licences might make sense. That is one of the items on which, I hope, professor Pearce in his report will give us some suggestions.

Maybe the hon. member confuses the lottery with multiple choice. What the fishermen were asked was: "If you are given an area licence, what is your first, second and third choice?" From what I hear, practically everyone was granted his first choice. I do not think the hon. member would advocate a drastic change in the regulation in the middle of a strike, which was the case in 1980, but I also do not understand his view that what was supposed to be good in 1980, for some reason does not seem to be good in 1981. I should like to hear his arguments on that.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

REVIEW COMMITTEE'S ASSESSMENT OF GOVERNMENT'S PERFORMANCE

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Communications and it deals with the mounting criticism of the federal cultural policy review committee which has succeeded the informal advisory committee which was set up by his predecessor, the Hon. David MacDonald. In view of the fact that both the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister responsible for cultural policy are members of the review committee, how can the minister assure the House that the committee will evaluate fairly and properly the performance of the government on cultural issues?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I think the important role of the federal cultural policy review committee is to address the problems of the future, and I think it is a good idea and advisable to have some of the officials of the Department of Communications as members of this committee. I think that if the committee felt cut off from the people who have been administering the federal cultural policy over the years, this would not allow it to have all the information it requires to come to concrete proposals. I think it is a sound idea that the committee be able to benefit from the experience of the department and have access to the feelings of departmental officials on ongoing programs, and be able to develop, with the concurrence of departmental officials and with their advice, a sound cultural policy for the future.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. If we extended his logic, we should have every single civil servant in the Department of Communications on the Applebaum committee. May I point out that the Canadian conference of the arts has publicly stated that "Many members of the arts community and the media are skeptical about the credibility and independence of the committee process." In view of the fact that the review committee will be holding only five regional public meetings, how can the minister assure the House that members of the arts community who wish to participate in the inquiry process will have the opportunity to do so?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I think it is giving very little credit to my immediate predecessor, who is from the party opposite and who named many members of the federal cultural policy review committee, to intimate that they would have so few qualifications as to be completely dominated by two of my civil servants. It is quite the contrary. I agree with my predecessor that the people who were appointed were eminent people, people of high quality who had a great contribution to make.

As to the number of hearings, I believe that the committee members are intent on seeing to it that they are able to communicate with as many Canadians as possible. I am sure that every member of the cultural community and every member of any professional association knows very well how to communicate and to make his point of view known to that committee. Indeed, I think it is an excellent committee. Of course it has been strengthened since we took office, and I am looking forward to the report of that committee.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION DECISION TO STOP SERVICE PROVIDED FOR DEAF TELEVISION VIEWERS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications who will be aware that 1.5 million Canadians who suffer from a hearing disability were shocked a few days ago to learn that the CRTC had ordered Rogers Cable in Toronto to stop the practice of decoding the closed captioned programs for the deaf and showing them on a special channel to provide a service for hearing-handicapped Canadians. What action does the minister propose to take to ensure that that service is restored immediately?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I sympathize completely with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member. As he knows, the service was closed down by CRTC because the licence issued to Rogers Cable TV apparently did not include the authorization to carry such a service. The chairman of the CRTC has decided to hold a public hearing on the matter as soon as possible, and the date of March 10 has been set for hearings in Toronto on this subject. I trust that the matter at that time will be settled by CRTC to everybody's satisfaction.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the minister will know that his answer is certainly not satisfactory for the people who have been deprived of that service and who will continue to be deprived until the CRTC reverses the decision it took. In view of the fact that the minister, on several occasions over the course of the last several months, has indicated that a Telidon mini-decoder will be available for deaf Canadians within the next few months, can the minister tell the House exactly when that mini-decoder will be available on the market?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, of course the short answer to that question is, as soon as possible. My officials inform me that they have received some proposals from industry which they are at present evaluating. I should also point out to the hon. member that part of the $27.1 million which I announced last Friday to support the Telidon program is for research and development, and a portion of that is earmarked for developing an improved Telidon captioning decoder.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY WHETHER MRS. LISE PAYETTE WILL RESUME EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question also is directed to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. Can the minister tell the House whether it is true that Mrs. Lise Payette is no longer actively involved in politics with the Parti Québécois and has resumed her political activities at the CBC French network to promote Quebec's independence? If so, will she rate the red carpet treatment from the minister or the president?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that I have no indication about this. Mrs. Payette did not tell me what she intends to do in the future. I have no idea whatsoever whether she wants to apply for a new position with the CBC French network. The hon. member may not know this but I can tell him that the CBC now has a well-established practice whereby people who have been active in politics are not allowed to play host on public affairs programs for a period of about three years.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

TESTING OF CHEMICAL DEFOLIANT AT CFB GAGETOWN—RELEASE OF REPORT BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. On January 26 the minister told this House that the reports of the incident in 1966 at CFB Gagetown were available to everyone, but in a conversation with the minister's office last week I was told that the document I received from the United States government, because of freedom of information in the United States, could not be released by the Canadian government. I wonder if the minister could square his earlier statement that this report is not secret with the more recent admission that, in fact, the report cannot be released by his government.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, with respect to this question it is normal for me to state again that governmental documents which come from other countries are subject to authorization by those countries to release their own documents. At the same time we would not like the United States to release some of our documents when we have an agreement with that country with respect to such documents. I think it is just normal that the United States has the right to make its own documents available. As far as I am concerned its documents belong to it and not to Canada.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, I do not find that a very satisfactory answer, for obvious reasons.

The minister has gone to great lengths to deny that this test was related to the development of chemical warfare agents destined for Vietnam, but in a Canadian document entitled "Vegetation Control at CFB Gagetown" it is stated, and I quote:

> U.S. interest is understandable. A great amount of effort has been expended to find some means of destroying the jungle canopy of Southeast Asia.

Will the minister now admit that, beyond a shadow of a doubt, National Defence officials knew in 1966 that they were assisting in testing, the results of which would be put to direct use in the U.S. effort in Vietnam?

● (1450)

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, it is very easy to impute motives in discussing problems such as this one. I want to assure my hon. colleague opposite, as energetically as I possibly can, that as far as we were concerned that experiment was in no way related to the Vietnam war. I feel that since this matter was brought up, Madam Speaker, it has been established that we had overgrowth problems; we have documented proof that the problem existed already in 1964, that studies were made later on, in 1968 and 1969, and that some of those problems still remain at Gagetown. Therefore, linking this experience with the war in Vietnam is absolutely wrong.

ENERGY

STATEMENTS BY MINISTER RESPECTING AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On a recent tour of northeastern Alberta, including Bonnyville, Cold Lake and Grand Centre, the minister made the following statement: "There will be a resolution of the constitutional and energy problems within months".

Then later, speaking to people in Grand Centre, the minister said, and I quote: "Those who have put their hearts and their money into these projects won't be disappointed much longer".

Will the minister report to the House what development regarding an energy agreement with Alberta has taken place to allow the minister to make these optimistic statements or, indeed, does he have any reason to make these optimistic statements and, if so, how many months does he think it will take before an energy agreement will be reached?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I hope very few months indeed, but obviously this is not dependent only on the federal government. I can report to the hon. member that there have already been two meetings at the deputy ministerial level, and there have been further meetings at the level of other officials. I have indicated to the government of Alberta that we are ready to meet at the ministerial level when it is ready and as soon as it is willing. I am still waiting for an answer in that respect.

Mr. Paproski: Humble Lalonde.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, is the minister's statement then to be taken in northeastern Alberta as being less than candid, like statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, on the contrary, that statement is totally candid. The only limitation to an agreement is the willingness or unwillingness of the government of Alberta to come seriously to the table. If it did that, we could reach an agreement soon.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRORATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS—INFORMATION PROGRAM

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. Because of the phased-in lowering of the 48 per cent disability entitlement in Bill C-40, approximately 1,500 widows became eligible for pensions in 1980. As of December, 1980, the Department of Veterans Affairs had heard from fewer than one third of these widows inquiring about their eligibility.

Can the minister tell the House if he has formulated a plan for contacting these other widows to make them aware of the fact that they now have a pension entitlement?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I understand the concern of the hon. member about the question of veterans' widows' pensions. I think the department is doing everything it can to contact these widows. Information is being made available in different parts of the country to make these people aware of the possibility of pensions for them.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, can the minister assure the House that because of the relatively simple procedure for establishing the eligibility of these widows, their pension applications will be processed with a minimal waiting period? The minister says he thinks the department is taking action. Will he make sure that the department is taking action?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I will make sure that what the hon. member is asking will be done within the least possible time.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

STUDY OF DALHOUSIE AND BELLEDUNE, N.B., PORTS

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the long awaited information with respect to the ports policy which was introduced a couple of years ago, in view of the difficulties we are experiencing at the two ports in northern New Brunswick at Belledune and Dalhousie—but specifically Belledune—and in view of the negligent attitude and inattention on the part of the National Harbours Board, particularly the gentleman at Saint John who is responsible for that port, I wonder if the minister could indicate when we might receive some information in this House regarding the long-awaited news with respect to the direction of ports, and if he could indicate that there will be some action taken with respect to having the National Harbours Board bring forward the study which was commissioned a year and a half ago on the port at Dalhousie and the port at Belledune.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, with respect to the ports policy as a whole, progress is being made now. The policy should be ready for cabinet study in the next month or so, or possibly even earlier than that.

With respect to Belledune and Dalhousie, I will consult the National Harbours Board and make a personal report on that subject to my friend.

TRADE

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY RESPECTING QUOTAS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister will know, as a result of a recent meeting he had in Canada with Japanese minister Tanaka, that he was unable to negotiate any arrangement with the Japanese for the fabrication of Japanese automobiles in Canada. He will also know that for some long time now the Japanese have been very successful, through non-tariff barriers, in excluding the importation into Japan of Canadian manufactured goods. He will also recognize that the Japanese share of the North American automobile market has been increasing apace.

In light of these facts I would like to ask the minister whether it is possible that the government is now considering the imposition of quotas on the importation of Japanese automobiles to Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, when it comes to investments by Japanese companies in North America, including Canada, it should be borne in mind that the Japanese automotive industry is not owned or controlled by the Japanese government. It is in the private sector. In spite of this, and I quote from the official press communique of Mr. Tanaka's visit: "Mr. Tanaka said his government was sympathetic to these Canadian objectives," one of them being increased Japanese sourcing of parts in Canada and investment in automotive facilities, "and would encourage Japanese automotive manufacturers to respond positively."

● (1500)

Also, during Mr. Tanaka's visit he confirmed that the agreement between the United States and Japan on access to sourcing by the Japanese telecommunications entity would be available to Canada on a non-discriminatory basis thus making available to Canadian companies the opportunity to bid on some $3 billion worth of manufactured goods. In spite of the continuing problems my hon. friend has mentioned, I think we are making progress.

When it comes to the matter of quotas on Japanese vehicles, the U.S. International Trade Commission, in spite of the higher levels of penetration of Japanese imports into that country, did not find injury nor did it recommend quotas.

Therefore, I think our first priority should be to continue to seek a much higher level of Canadian content in Japanese vehicles sold in Canada, North America generally and in world markets, and continue to monitor the situation in light of what U.S. authorities might do and the level of Japanese imports. Increasing Canadian content should be our first priority.

Mr. Gamble: Madam Speaker, the minister will recognize the non-tariff barriers of which I spoke are supported by the government of Japan and encouraged by that government. They have been very successful for years in keeping out the importation of Canadian manufactured goods. The minister will also recognize that France has imposed a quota. There is a bill in the U.S. Congress to impose a quota on the importation of these cars. I should think the minister would be very concerned about the interest of Canadian auto workers, some of whom live in his own riding. When will the government take it upon itself to form a lead in this area rather than act like a jellyfish able to be pushed around by a foreign government and its commercial interests?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the Japanese government, like other members of the GATT, did agree to codes to move the level of non-tariff barriers. I am sure we expect Japan to comply with that code to a no lesser extent than any other member of the GATT. With respect to the matter of quotas, if the U.S. Congress legislates quotas, in my view it will be necessary for the Canadian authorities to consider taking parallel action within our own legal framework and in light of our own circumstances. That is why I said we are watching the Canadian situation and the American situation very closely. Because we have an integrated industry on a North American basis, I think we must be very careful about the timing and extent of our actions.

At the present time I think our priorities, in the interests of Canadian workers, should be to strive to increase the level of Canadian content in Japanese vehicles sold in North America and around the world and, in the meantime, to keep in touch with the situation so that we are ready to take other action in the interests of Canadian workers and the Canadian economy should circumstances make that necessary.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—NOTICE OF INTENTION OF MR. STEVENS TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) who addressed a matter last Friday concerning the conduct of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) which the hon. member for York-Peel feels is contemptuous of this House. He has asked me to file notice in his name, as he undertook to do last Friday, of his intention to raise a question of privilege. He is unavoidably absent today. He intends to raise it at the first opportunity. In the meantime I have filed a notice in the form of an intended motion which, if after listening to the hon. member for York-Peel you find there does exist a question of privilege, he will be moving. This motion may not be in the precise terms of the motion filed today by way of notice, but in similar terms.

Age 25 plus	4,339	201	4,540
	5,531	639	6,170

2. Yes. (a) Permanent Staff (since August 1/76) 188

Sub-Contract personnel 227—Recruited abroad

(b) Permanent Staff: England 123; Scotland 7; Northern Ireland 26; U.S.A. 32

Sub-contract personnel: 60 per cent Europe; 40 per cent U.S.A.

(c) Skills that are in short supply and not available in Canada: aerodynamicists, stress analysts, structures design engineers, electrical and electronics engineers, tool designers, tool planners, tool and die makers, skilled machinists.

Before Canadair hired from abroad they advertised extensively in all Canadian provinces—fully complying with regulations of the Department of Employment and Immigration.

3. Yes. Canadair maintains two-year projection of manpower and skill requirements and gears hiring and training programs accordingly.

MR. ALLAN ROSS

Question No. 1,624—Mr. Epp:

Is Mr. Allan Ross, a Liberal candidate in the 1980 election, employed by the government and, if so, what (a) is his annual salary (b) are his duties (c) is the length of his contract, if any?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): In so far as the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is concerned, the reply is as follows: No.

(a)(b)(c) However, Mr. Allan Ross had a contract in the amount of $4,000 with the Employment and Immigration Commission between April 16, 1980, and June 1, 1980, to act as a member and, under the direction of the chairman, Manitoba task force on LEAP and Outreach, conduct interviews and visit project sites in order to contribute to the drafting of the final report of the task force to the minister.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

Question No. 1,884—Mr. Epp:

1. Did any member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada play any role, whatsoever, in the preparation of the draft resolution which is now the subject of consideration by the committee and, if so, which members?

2. (a) Was (i) the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (ii) Senator Carl Goldenberg (iii) Senator Jack Austin (iv) Senator Maurice Lamontagne, involved in any way, whatsoever, in the preparation of the draft resolution (b) were any of them involved in any discussion regarding the parliamentary strategy or the communications strategy of the government in relation to the introduction and attempted passage through Parliament of the draft resolution and, if so, who and in what capacity?

3. Did any member of the committee see a copy of the draft resolution at any time before it was presented to the House of Commons and the Senate and, if so (a) which members (b) in each case, on what date?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. No.

2. (a) (i) No.

(ii) No.

(iii) No.

(iv) No.

(b) Neither the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice nor any of Senators Goldenberg, Austin and Lamontagne was involved in any discussion regarding the parliamentary strategy or the communications strategy of the government in relation to the introduction and attempted passage through Parliament of the draft resolution prior to the convening of Parliament on October 6, 1980.

Since that time, all have participated as members of caucus and of the special joint committee. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice has had additional participation in that capacity.

3. Copies of the draft resolution were generally available to all Members of Parliament on the evening of October 2, 1980. No member of the committee was shown a copy of the draft resolution prior to that time.

Question No. 1,885—Mr. Epp:

Is any employee, either on contract or full time, of the Department of Justice, providing briefing material, special documentation or advice to any government member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): When the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada was organized, representatives of all parties on the committee were advised that government officials would co-operate in providing information to members of the committee to facilitate the work of the committee. They have co-operated with members of all parties of the committee in providing information.

Question No. 1,886—Mr. Epp:

1. Is any member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada receiving any special compensation or remuneration, directly or indirectly, from the Department of Justice which prepared the draft resolution on the Constitution and, if so, in what nature and for what purpose?

2. Is the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie receiving special compensation or remuneration for his service as parliamentary secretary to the minister whose department prepared the draft resolution and, if so (a) in what amount (b) under what authority?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. No.

2. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie receives compensation or remuneration for his services as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice under the authority of the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, as provided by that act. He receives no other compensation or remuneration for his services as parliamentary secretary.

Question No. 1,887—Mr. Epp:

Did any agent, official or cabinet minister contact any group submitting representation to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada prior to their submission of an oral or a written presentation and, if so (a) which groups were involved (b) what was the nature of the contact (c) which representatives of the government were involved (d) what were the dates of contact?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Officials, the offices of cabinet ministers and Members of Parliament have been contacted by groups submitting or contemplating submitting representations to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada for information regarding the committee. Such inquiries were referred to the joint clerks of the committee. No record was kept of such contacts, of the number thereof, of the specific point of contact or of the dates of contact.

Question No. 1,888—Mr. Epp:

Does the government have in its employ, directly or on contract or in any other way, any son, daughter, other close relative or spouse of any member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada and, if so (a) what is the name of the person (b) what is the relationship of the person to the member (c) what is the responsibility of the person (d) did the person play any role in the preparation of the draft resolution under consideration and, if so, what was such role (e) is the person now involved in any official way with matters affecting the present deliberations of the committee and, if so, what is the role and what are the matters?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): This information is not available to the government and obtaining it would: (a) be prohibitively expensive, and; (b) involve making direct inquiries either of every member of the special joint committee or every person in the direct or indirect employ of the government.

(c), (d) and (e) See reply to question No. 1,889 answered this day.

Question No. 1,889—Mr. Epp:

1. Is Mr. Eddie Goldenberg in the employ, directly or on contract or any other way, of the government and, if so (a) what is his relationship to Senator Carl Goldenberg or any member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada (b) what are the specific conditions of his employment, including remuneration, responsibilities and reporting relationship?

2. Did he play any role whatsoever in the preparation of the (a) draft resolution now before the committee (b) parliamentary strategy regarding the approval of the draft resolution by the House of Commons or the Senate (c) communications strategy of the government regarding either the draft resolution or government constitutional positions?

3. Does he have any continuing official role respecting matters which affect the present deliberations of the committee and, if so, what is the role and what are the matters?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. Yes.

(a) Mr. Goldenberg is a son of Senator Carl Goldenberg.

(b) No direct remuneration is provided to Mr. Goldenberg by the government. The contract for Mr. Goldenberg's services is with the law firm of Lang, Michener, Cranston, Farquharson and Wright of Toronto by which he is employed. That law firm presumably provides his remuneration. His responsibilities are to provide professional services to the Ministry of Justice, as a special adviser, particularly in respect of constitutional matters.

2. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) Yes.

3. Yes. Mr. Goldenberg continues to provide professional services as a special adviser to the Ministry of Justice.

Question No. 1,890—Mr. Epp:

Did (a) the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (b) Senator Carl Goldenberg (c) Senator Jack Austin (d) Senator Maurice Lamontagne, see a copy of the draft resolution which is now the subject of consideration by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada at any time before that draft resolution was presented to the House of Commons and the Senate and, if so, in each case, on what specific date did he see the draft?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Copies of the draft resolution were generally available to all members of Parliament on the evening of October 2, 1980. No member of the committee was shown a copy of the draft resolution prior to that time.

TRADE COMMISSION OFFICES

Question No. 1,933—Mr. Herbert:

What is the current annual budget and the personnel strength of the Trade Commission Offices in (a) Jamaica (b) Trinidad and are sub-offices maintained in the territories covered by the two offices?

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

(a) Jamaica

Industry, Trade and Commerce Program Personnel and Budget:

1 Canada based officer

1 locally engaged officer Total budget $24,800

(b) Trinidad

Industry, Trade and Commerce Program Personnel and Budget:

3 Canada based officers

2 locally engaged officers Total budget $99,500

There are no sub-offices maintained in the territories.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, generally when one rises in this chamber he commences his speeches by saying what a privilege it is to make comments on the particular bill or subject matter. I suppose, in all honesty today, one should more properly stress a real concern about having to again rise to talk about a borrowing bill introduced by a government which has already borrowed itself deeply into debt. Canadians should be worrying about the fact we are now living very much on borrowed time and how that will affect our future. What we have here is another bill asking that we as Members of Parliament grant this government the right to borrow another $14 billion. In the last four years this government has already borrowed $40.1 billion and the projected deficit by the government of the day for the next four years is $51.8 billion.

In short, what we have here is a government which in an eight-year period is asking for borrowing authority amounting to nearly $100 billion in order to cast out the debts of the present and future citizens of the country. What is more concerning is the fact that the cash requirement of the government at the present time, by its own admission, is $11 billion, yet it puts a borrowing bill before Members of Parliament for authority to borrow some $14 billion. In other words, the government is allowing $3 billion for spillage; it is borrowing $3 billion more than its cash requirements for pocket change.

Part of the reason these huge borrowings undertaken by the government have a tendency to go unnoticed by the public at large is that the public simply does not understand the concept of what is a billion. A dollar bill is precisely six inches long, therefore two of them would equal a foot. A million dollars in dollar bills would stretch from Ottawa to not quite Montreal, but a billion dollars would go from Vancouver to Halifax and back 2.5 times. That is the amount of borrowing at which we are looking; it is a huge amount of money. The government is not only looking enough money to go across Canada 2.5 times; it is trying to wallpaper all of Canada with a debt which, if we look at last four years and the next four, will amount to just short of hundreds of billions of dollars of borrowed money.

I have heard members in the House of Commons talk about the multinational oil companies and their drain of money out of the country. The truth of the matter is that this drain of money out of the country is nowhere near as significant as that of our foreign borrowing. That is by far the biggest drain of financial capital out of the country. It is not the private sector which is creating the drain, it is the government and its huge borrowings, to the extent that when citizens pay their taxes, one quarter of those tax dollars does not buy them anything related to hospitals, roads, airports or government services. One quarter of all tax dollars paid is used to pay the interest on the accumulated foreign debt. Any citizen would be very perturbed by the fact that one-quarter of his tax dollars virtually buys him nothing, but is used to pay for the interest of a wasteful government.

The government thinks in terms of an artesian trough, it believes somehow the money is housed in some bottomless well. The government believes its prerogative is to dream up ideas of spending, to go forward and collect money borrowing and borrowing, taxing people more and more, and providing less and less.

By March, 1981, our gross national debt will exceed $120 billion. Again we must bear in mind that a billion dollars in one dollar bills will go from Vancouver to Halifax and back 2.5 times. That is the amount of debt this wasteful government is imposing upon Canadians. The interest charges against that amount will be $12 billion a year, making it the largest expenditure citizens pay with their tax dollars.

When we address this question of borrowing, there are two precepts from which we can view it. The first is that we could borrow less because the government could spend less. That is one way of getting this problem in hand; it could spend less or the government could make itself more thrifty. If it is the view of government that it does not want to spend less because it believes these services—whatever they might be defined to be—are absolutely necessary, then the other method is to create more wealth by stimulating the private sector. In other words, this would create greater wealth, putting people in higher tax brackets and the government would have more revenue. If the money is needed, and it is the desire of the government to have its citizens raise more money, I can only say that this government and its policies must be condemned as a dismal failure.

The automobile industry of southern Ontario is in its weakened position today because the government did not have the courage of its convictions, following 1973, to move more closely to a reasonable world oil price.

We have heard various myths that somehow OPEC has set an artificial price. Certainly the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) would have people believe that OPEC has caused world inflation, but somehow he fails to mention to Canadians that Australia, Norway, Great Britain, the United States, and a list of other countries are all at the world commodity price for oil. In fact, some of them are even higher than the world price, such as Mexico, and are not members of OPEC. Another fact that should be borne in mind is that OPEC controls only 26 per cent of petroleum production in the world today.

The Japanese import all of their energy, be it uranium, coal, wood, oil, natural gas or whatever. In 1973 Japan thrived with reasonable world oil prices. Their automotive industry is thriving in the world today. By choice our government tried to protect industries, for example, by allowing Chrysler to continue to build its 14 foot-long cars. This rests as an albatross on the necks of Liberal Members of Parliament. Through their phony energy policies, they caused the people of southern Ontario to be in a position today where they are crying out for job opportunities. They practised a policy for politics, not for reasonable economic conditions which world conditions were dictating at the time. If we compare our situation to that of the Japanese in a time of a world energy upsurge in price we will note they have moved to a world leadership position in the automotive industry. We in North America, particularly in Canada, because of a lack of wisdom, have virtually destroyed an industry. Had we protected that industry with reasonable economic policies, we would today be in a position of not having to borrow more and more money from the foreign trough.

Another myth perpetuated by the Liberal government today is that somehow the imported oil which comes to Canada is brought here for Canadians at below the world price. That is just not the case. Imported oil is at the world price. It does not matter if gasoline is being sold for less than the world price at the pumps; imported oil is purchased at the world price. If the government is not taking it out of ones pocket at the pumps, it is being taken out of his pocket, even though he may not see it go. They cannot bring $38 or $40 per barrel oil into the country and sell it cheaper at the pump, then charge the person paying taxes an additional amount and then try to convince him that somehow he got a deal because it was below the world price.

We in this nation had the benefit of one strong industry, the petroleum industry. It was one industry upon which we could have built and tremendously accelerated other industries of the country. I should like to talk today specifically about the enormous advantages to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, had this foolish government not gone forward with its National Energy Program. This program has virtually destroyed the potential for development all across the country. Had it not been adopted I suggest the government would not be requesting the authority to borrow $14 billion today. The National Energy Program is destroying energy potential. It will cost billions of dollars in lost wealth that is simply drifting across the border into the United States, into the northern part of South America and into the Middle East. Literally it will cost us hundreds of thousands of jobs in Canada.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has now spent more time in the Middle East than in the province of Alberta. He was over there dancing in the tents for 40 days and 40 nights, talking about $40 per barrel oil. We are not really willing to negotiate above $17.75 a barrel for oil in Canada. The fact of the matter is we are looking at considerably more than that, for all the new oils which will be required in the future, be it in situ, heavy oil, tar sands, north shore, off slope or the offshore oil of Newfoundland. The light, sweet, pump crude of days gone by, and with only eight years of supply left it is rapidly running out. If we look at what is left in those wells which would come from enhanced recovery we are again looking at a much more expensive investment. The government's reaction to this, for mythical reasons that I cannot comprehend, is to use the phrase: "Canadianize the oil industry". That is a nice cliche, but after having them do the work they did we are now trying to make these oil companies the bad guys in the eyes of Canadians. The truth of the matter is that the oil companies have created more wealth in this country than any other group of companies, or government initiative. What the government is really saying is that it is not Canadianizing the industry but nationalizing it. It will take the industry and put it under government directorship.

• (1520)

As a person from western Canada, and as one associated with a province which is in the field of oil production, it makes me livid that members of the government party take the view that somehow there is something clandestine about the oil industry and we must nationalize it. In effect, the government is telling Canadians there is something terribly wrong with the multinationals who are operating in western Canada. But here in central Canada the Chrysler Corporation receives $240 million in guaranteed loans, and it is a multinational corporation. Similarly in the past few days the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) struck a deal with Massey-Ferguson which left that corporation with the feeling that it, too, was blessed multinational. What a "Canadian" multinational is should be put of its employee dollar investment is outside of this country. In short, what you have is a government which is trying to nationalize western Canada.

I should like to refer to a recent article in the Toronto Star which talks about some rumbling in the Liberal caucus. It quotes the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Deniger) as saying that Nordair is:

—not an Ontario regional carrier. It's based in Montreal and we can't afford to lose another head office. That's my basic fear.

He goes on to say:

What you have to understand is that the airline industry is as important to Quebec as the auto industry is to Ontario. If we lose this industry, it's our economic future that's at stake.

I hear what the hon. member for La Prairie says. I have a great understanding and a great deal of sympathy for what he says. It does not sit well with me that what I hear from the other side, as a group, is that somehow they want these protections for their industries, but have, I sense, a lack of either genuine understanding or concern about the fact that these industries which must be centred somewhere else, could create an enormous amount of wealth for all of Canada. The view is that the government bails these industries out with handouts, whether they be airlines, the automobile industry as represented by Chrysler, or the tractor industry, such as Massey-Ferguson. They bail out these multinationals while the successful ones, the ones having no problems, are painted in some way as anti-Canadian. I ask why? It is claimed there is some drift of money south. Anyone who has looked at this situation will know that the vast majority of money which leaves this country is not because the companies are taking it out but rather because the government is paying interest on its foreign debt. Why is it paying interest on its foreign debt? It is paying on the money to buy out oil companies, but that is certainly not the only reason. Why did the government just spend a billion and a half dollars buying Petrofina? Perhaps so we could put a Maple Leaf flag up and call those stations Petro-Canada. Of course Canadians would like to have some participation in their oil industry, but there certainly must be other ways for Canadians to participate than by the government spending $1.5 billion on something which will not create one more drop of oil. What this country needs to do is pay its debts and allow oil companies to get on with the business of finding more oil.

Whoever it was from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources who ran down to Mexico to purchase junk oil did not know what he was buying. If we never had junk food around we sure now have junk oil. Part of the Canadian myth is that oil is oil, is oil. There is a difference between light and medium weights, sweet crude or heavy oils. There is also the Maya oil which is thick, sludgy and its chemical content is high. In this deal the Mexicans arranged that the oil would be supplied at irregular intervals. This meant we would not necessarily receive the oil in the wintertime when we need it the most but that we could receive it all in the summertime. The deal arrived with a clause which said that we could not pass the oil from our country, it must remain in Canada. We do not have the refinery capacity to refine it, since all our heavy oil refineries are working to capacity. What are we doing? We are bringing in Mexican oil to the east coast of Canada. If must then be transported to western Canada in order to refine it there. At the same time the heavy oils from Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, and the Swift Current area are being shipped south into the United States because we do not have the refinery capacity for that type of oil in Canada. For a government which thought it was buying light or medium-weight sweet crude it certainly got a crude awakening when it found out this was heavy, sludgy oil dumped on us at enormous cost and inconvenience to the refineries. Once again, I would say that more dollars are leaving our country as a result of this mismanagement than are leaving for other reasons.

The government is moving to bail out the Chrysler Corporation which is now in trouble. Massey-Ferguson is also in trouble and the government is moving to bail it out. But these are different multinationals since they are based in the area of Canada where there appears to be a majority of Liberal support. All of a sudden multinationals are not so bad, they receive government aid. I do not know why they do not rename them Car-Can or Tractor-Can. Why doesn't the government nationalize these corporations? It prefers to pick out an industry which affects some province far away, a province in which it lacks support. The government therefore feels it has a legitimate right to gang up on it and use what muscle it has—although to me its muscles looks more like kneecaps on a sparrow than anything else. We in western Canada tend to think that Petro-Canada consists of those two doors behind a service station. We have not had a program of Canadianization, we have had a program of nationalization. A Calgary Herald survey indicated that 376 Canadian drilling rigs will move into the United States before the ramifications of the October 28 energy budget have come into effect. This move will cost Canadians some 22,000 jobs. What this means is that on the one hand Members of Parliament are being asked to give the government licence to go forward to international borrowing markets to obtain $14 billion while on the other hand it is this same government which will chase out 22,000 jobs.

Let us take a look at the advantages to the people in the province of Ontario if we are to develop our regional capacity in the way in which it should be developed.

● (1530)

One Dome Petroleum gas field on the Arctic coast of the five potential fields would produce 150,000 man-years of employment in Ontario throughout the life of that field. This development would have an enormous impact on the economy of Ontario. Yet this clandestine government in its view on the question of energy is causing the people of Ontario and Quebec the loss of jobs and the loss of economic growth. This past year two tar sands plants did not continue development because the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was not able to negotiate a pricing arrangement on oil. This fact means a loss to Ontario of $108 billion over the 25-year life of one tar sands plant. That is only one plant. Hon. members will bear in mind that we require nine plants if we are to reach energy self-sufficiency, and each plant would require 8 billion in initial investment.

To start development on one plant would mean an infusion of $800 million into the economy of Ontario through the iron and steel industry, but the government said no. Such a development would create $370 million in the metal fabrication and machinery industries of Ontario. Once again the government has denied the province this opportunity. This development would create an additional $325 million in the transportation equipment industry of the province of Ontario. For manufacturing and processing, such development would mean another $740 million, and for financing it would mean $370 million. In the area of trades and services, such a development would mean an additional $750 million for Ontario.

The Minister of Energy has been known to visit western Canada and to say that, "If we allowed the price of energy to increase the province of Alberta would become rich beyond our wildest dreams." I would ask all Canadians to bear in mind that when any region of Canada becomes richer, it is a matter of a very short period of time before that money which is created or generated is recirculated back through the manufacturing basin of Canada.

There is no doubt in my mind that the St. Lawrence Seaway Great Lakes system which runs through Quebec and Ontario will continue to be the manufacturing basin of this country. When citizens of a particular region come into more money, they do what everyone else does, they spend it. They buy appliances, cars, clothing, toasters, refrigerators, suits and dresses, all of which are manufactured in central Canada thereby creating wealth and jobs in that area. A western Canada economist told me recently that approximately 80 per cent of the generated wealth from the regions will circulate throughout central Canada within six months of its creation.

The misjudgment that the region will become richer and that the rest of the country will not gain from that richness is affecting all Canadians in a very negative way. This situation is having the effect of chasing jobs out of not only Alberta and Saskatchewan, but also Ontario. It is not a situation of one part of the country versus another, it is a situation throughout Canada. Surely when each member of the family is strong, then the family is strong. But the government seems to be picking on members of the family.

On the one hand the government is granting money to companies like Chrysler and Massey-Ferguson and, on the other hand it is trying to nationalize another industry. I have no objection to Canadianization, but let us not be caught in the myth that Canadianization and nationalization are the same, because they are not. Nationalization is vastly different from providing incentives to the citizens in order to achieve Canadian ownership. The government should be providing some incentives. There is no sense in the government, which has the job of governing and regulating, becoming mixed up in the private sector. Once this happens the referee becomes a player on the team. It is not cricket to have all these Canadian-owned companies and the multinationals turn over their records and their expertise to, for example, the National Energy Board, a government agency, when that agency is also in league with a national company, Petro-Canada, the two involved in the same field.

I would like to cite some further data which outlines the advantages to central Canada if some of these regional projects were developed. Such development would mean that we would not be faced with having to borrow another $14 billion. The expenditures of one tar sands plant over the next 25 years are estimated at $85 billion. Using the CPA multiplier effect on money at 3.4 per cent, each plant would create $290 billion over a 25-year period. There is the potential to build eight such plants in the next decade and a half. In terms of balancing our payments, decreasing our foreign debt and reducing the tax burden on Canadian citizens, the effect of such a development would be enormous.

Instead, the government, for its own self-serving motives, would rather create the image that there is an enemy within the Canadian family and that, therefore, the government must control and dominate a field which belongs to the provinces. However, that does not stop the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce from signing a $240 million cheque for a company based in Ontario and saying, "Boys, I hope you make it." That minister is now sitting down to negotiate with Massey-Ferguson.

We in the west want to know what is so awful about our multinationals, in light of the fact that a multinational based in central Canada receives the blessing of the government. Somehow, there is a mix-up in the thinking of the Liberals. In their view the people of the regions cannot control the energy supplies but that it can only be done by a central government. If the private sector is endorsed in central Canada, then certainly there must be an element of trust that we in western Canada can play our role in making a stronger and better country. In no way do we support this narrow thinking that only the central part of the country has the right to be able to participate in the decisions which affect the entire country.

The people of the regions, be they from the Atlantic region, the north or the west, do not mind the toot, but once in a while they would like to be able to pull the cord. If the government continues to take away from the sense of participation of these regions, the feelings of alienation which have recently surfaced so strongly will grow and grow. This sense of unfairness will continue to grow if the government continues with its heavy-handed view that only the central government has the right to govern and shape the destiny of this nation.

Five years ago the per capita debt was $851. That was regarded as a staggering amount. At the moment of birth every baby inherited a debt of $851; today at the moment of birth each baby inherits a debt of $2,874. That is an increase of 229 per cent, Mr. Speaker.

There is a great difference in a way members on the two sides of this House think, Mr. Speaker. There are those in this party who believe that wealth is created by production while some opposite seem to believe wealth can be created by borrowing. Taxes are then increased in order to pay for the debt. We do not need to borrow more to provide more services, Mr. Speaker. What we need is to provide Canadians with the incentive to produce more and thus generate wealth. If we could achieve that we would not need to borrow $14 billion abroad to meet our $11 billion requirement, the extra $3 billion being for spillage.

This country has great potential to generate wealth through the development of energy resources but a stumbling block has been put in the way by this government. At the present time there is a surplus of red meats in the country, aggravated by the influx of imports yet the government has not put quotas in place. In the last six or seven years we have lost between $200 and $500 million per year of international grain sales. The grain was available on the prairies but our transportation system was incapable of getting it to market. With the debt this Liberal government has run up it would certainly be a great advantage to the country to have this $200 to $500 million coming to the farmers every year and to collect income tax on it. If things like this were taken care of the government would not need to go abroad to borrow these enormous sums of money.

The government elects to build such monuments as Mirabel, a white elephant, a Taj Mahal of an airport far away from the city a great inconvenience to passengers. Indeed, a travel agency in Boston advertises in Canadian newspapers that it is easier to fly to Boston and then go on a world trip than to use Canadian airports. That airport was a horrible misjudgment and we can only guess at the reason for it.

No sooner was the election of February 18 last year over than the Liberals were saying they would have to review the commitment made in 1979 to develop the port of Prince Rupert for the movement of tremendous volumes of grain.

It is no wonder this country has to borrow money when the infrastructure that would make the nation work is not being put in place, either for political reasons or simply for lack of confidence.

There is potential for the development of high technology in this country. We could be world leaders in several areas, and certainly in the health field. Already we are respected for our petroleum technology but we could lose our position very quickly if the government continues to cut back the cash flow in that very important and much needed industry. There is an enormous potential for the development of the coal industry as well.

Surely if a country like Japan, which only has the resources of fish and tin, and imports the bulk of its food, all its energy and raw materials which it manufactures and ships to world markets, can become one of the two top economies of the world, Canada which wants for nothing and has the resources of agriculture, forests, minerals and one-third of the world's freshwater, ought to be able to function without borrowing on world markets. Our borrowings over the last four added to our estimated borrowings four years hence will amount to some $100 billion and this will be carried on the backs of future Canadians. It is a shame that a nation of 24 million educated people cannot manage on its own. Japan, with an island population of 110 million has virtually no unemployment.

I see you are giving that signal which indicates my time is about up, Mr. Speaker. I want to conclude by saying I am tired of speaking in this House on motions to grant the government permission to borrow more money when it is so wasteful. This government must come to realize that the creation of wealth will permit us to stop borrowing. It must not continue pretending it is necessary to live so meagrely when all we have to do is develop the enormous potential that is on tap.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, we have been asked to pass Bill C-59 to allow the government to borrow $14 billion as may be required for public and general purposes.

When asked to proceed with a borrowing bill such as this, one cannot help but come to the conclusion that something is clearly and drastically wrong in this vast, beautiful and endowed country. The money borrowed will directly subsidize offshore oil from Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Mexico. It will subsidize the foreign airlines which fill up their tanks in this country, and it will subsidize the drivers who cross the border from the United States and fill up their cars with cheap gas at our pumps. The system is absolutely cock-eyed, Mr. Speaker.

When we consider borrowing, on the one hand we speak of the need to keep out foreign investment or American capital and then on the other hand we go to the New York markets, where we will most assuredly go, to borrow $12 million. This American or foreign capital is not required for the development of our resources or our economy. This bill will allow the government to borrow foreign capital. As the Canadian economy weakens and the dollar drops, as most assuredly it will, we will be paying back in foreign currency what we borrowed with a weaker dollar. This is absolutely astounding.

All of us can agree with the stated objectives of the national energy policy. I shall zero in on one, namely, Canadianization. Certainly we want Canadianization but we do not want nationalization. There is a difference. State ownership by the people is absolute nonsense. The government is then put in a position where it can gain control of a resource or an industry; in other words, a monopoly. A government will use anything in its power to remain in power. You then purchase commodities at the government store. It is a very dangerous precedent. It is a very dangerous way to move. We are free enterprisers.

The entrepreneur is the one who goes out and creates wealth. My colleague who spoke before me indicated the government has to realize that it is the creation of wealth which is the backbone to our economy. It is not the redistribution of wealth. A healthy economy cannot be had by government decree. To create a healthy economy in Canada the climate must be provided in Canada so that investment will take place in Canada. We cannot isolate ourselves from the rest of the world but we are attempting to do that. There is a great hue and cry of no more foreign investment and that we do not want foreigners investing in Canada. I ask hon. members to think for a moment what would happen if this edict were applied by the United States against Canada, by Australia against Canada or by the Middle East against Canada? We have Canadian companies in the oil sector, in manufacturing, and in technology moving into multinational status. They are not denied access to the U.S. market or to the U.S. manufacturing sector. We have classic examples of Canadian companies moving on the international scene; for instance, Atco Industries, the Simmons group of companies and Bow Valley Industries. There are many others including Seagram's and Canadian Pacific.

What would happen if the other countries started to take a very isolationist view of their economies? We cannot isolate ourselves from the world but we are attempting to do that. How are we doing it? We say that we cannot allow the world market price on oil to determine the price of that commodity in Canada. Instead, we say that we will set the price at 40 per cent to 45 per cent of the world commodity price because we want a made-in-Canada price. This forces industry and investment out of Canada and into the U.S. or the Australian market because a much quicker return can be had there. What is business anyway? Business is taking money which belongs to you, putting it on the table and gambling with it. That is what you are doing. People who invest invest to make a profit. They hope to get a return of 10 per cent to 12 per cent. But in the meantime they are helping to build, create jobs and are making the economy move. With the present government, there is no possibility of this happening.

Since the National Energy Program and the budget were introduced in October a number of things are starting to happen in the oil industry much faster than anyone realized. Sixty drillings rigs and 16 service rigs have left Canada. The Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors expects less than 5,800 wells to be drilled during 1981 in the western basin. A further 60 drilling rigs are committed to leave Canada by April 30. Each drilling rig employs 25 men who are trained, understand their jobs and are technically qualified. Each drilling rig is a self-contained factory. I have mentioned these things before in this House. Now we are talking about 60 more factories leaving Canada by April 30. We are looking at a reduction in jobs somewhere in the neighbourhood of 30,000 in western Canada alone. That does not stop there. It has a multiplier effect. Those jobs are lost also in Ontario. People do not buy trucks, the manufactured goods, the steel, the pipe, the compressors, or the motors. It has a rippling effect right throughout the economy. It is shameful to see this happening.

One of my colleagues spoke earlier about research and development and the necessity for direction in this area. Today in northeastern Alberta, there are 36 large research and development projects. I am talking about companies such as Texaco, Amoco and Petro-Canada developing in situ recovery processes for the tar sands. I could go on and on. In research and development investment potential ranges from $10 million to $280 million to $400 million. This investment is in straight research and development.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, do you know that Canada has developed the technological expertise ahead of anyone else in the world in tar sands and heavy oil recovery?

● (1600)

We are not the only country to have tar sands or heavy oil. There are tar sands fields in the United States and there is shale oil there. It is also found in South America. Right now there are two plants in northeastern Alberta, one an open pit proven process undertaken by the Alsands consortium north of Fort McMurray. They are ready to go, with an investment of $10 million. No company is coming to the government saying, "We need government guaranteed loans to do this." This is capital which is in place, ready to move.

I should talk about that for a minute because it has a horrendous effect on northeastern Alberta, on the Alberta government and economy, because they have to put in place instantly a town for 15,000 people. Can you imagine the cost of instantly setting up a town for 15,000 people, with the necessary infrastructure, the railroads, the highways, the schools and the hospitals? That cost is to be borne totally by the provincial government, and sometimes we lose track of that. It has been estimated that one tar sands plant will cost the taxpayers of Alberta directly between $2 billion and $3 billion. I should like hon. members to understand what takes place when one of these plants starts its operation.

Let us consider the Cold Lake plant, a first of its kind, giant research project. It is waiting to go ahead in Cold Lake. When we talk about research and development, we mean a team of people which has been brought together. There is a team ready now waiting and planning the development of the Cold Lake project. There is another team of engineers which is ready and waiting to develop the Alsands project. What are we on the verge of losing? Mr. Speaker, I cannot stress strongly enough that we are on the verge of losing forever those two large teams comprising engineers from right across Canada, because the Alsands consortium and Imperial Oil, which are ready to go at Cold Lake, are no longer prepared to carry these teams. This government recognized that when the Imperial group from Cold Lake came to the government and said, "Look, we are not prepared to hold this team together, we are not prepared to keep this project on stream, unless the government is ready to make the commitment to hold the team together at a cost of $40 million." The government came through and said, "We will put it up on the basis that it will be repaid if the Imperial Oil plant starts operating at Cold Lake." June 1 is the deadline. If that research and development team is dissipated, scattered and moved around to other jobs, we will not see it again. It takes years to put such a team together. Where will they go? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that they will go to the United States where work on the shale deposits is going ahead very fast and the same kind of technology is involved. I suggest to you they will go to Montana where the oil sands are in situ. I suggest to you they will go to the oil sands fields in Venezuela, and to many other places in the western world. We cannot afford to lose these experts. We are on the verge of putting technology at the disposal of Canadians, technology which we will be able to sell right across the world when the energy crunch comes.

Instead, what are we doing? We cannot sit down with the producing provinces to work out an agreement. If this government approached the producing provinces as if it were really prepared to sit down and negotiate, we would have an energy agreement within a month. Just think for a minute what it must be like, as one of the producing provinces, requesting the government not to impose under any circumstances an export tax on gas or a tax on oil at the wellhead. The producing provinces are saying, "Look, if you tax at the wellhead, that is the first tax and you will control the resource, but control and ownership belongs to the province. If you put an export tax on natural gas, you control the production of natural gas, and that belongs to the province. We will negotiate everything but those two things." The whole national energy policy was based on raping the producing provinces by putting a tax at the wellhead and by putting an excise tax on natural gas.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) tells us, "I am ready to sit down with the producing provinces at any time, but they will not sit down with me." He says, "We are ready to negotiate an energy agreement, but they do not want to negotiate." The provinces have said in answer, "Show us you really mean business and we will sit down with you." In this House, in answer to questions put by hon. members on this side and by myself, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have indicated they are not prepared to change the national energy policy. I say to you, sir, that the present government should be prepared to say to the producing provinces, "Look, maybe we have made a mistake with this national energy policy, everyone in the industry says we have, and the economic community says we have." The government should say, "Let us take another look at it, let us bring in the principles that are involved, let us sit down and work out an agreement." If it did that, I believe an agreement could be reached. It takes men of good will, but good will is not spread in the producing provinces by ministers going out there and making one statement and then coming back to the House and making another. Good will is not created by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources going to Alberta and saying that the oil companies always cry about a new energy policy. At least they did not bring in the CIA, as they have in other countries. All that does is create animosity, and I find that deplorable. What do we see in terms of negotiation?

We see headlines and news releases emanating from Ottawa about the greed of the producing provinces. I say to hon. members opposite that there is not greed. The producing provinces want fairness and equity. They want to be treated like every other province in confederation. The government must understand that the producing provinces in western Canada are no longer prepared to remain second-class citizens. They want to be able to stand beside Ontario and Quebec and say they are equal. That is not too much to ask.

We are not talking about price. In its offer of last July, Alberta said it would freeze the royalty rate at its present level and not raise it again for the life of the agreement, meaning that if the price of oil goes up there is lots of room for the federal government to move in and take more and more.

This government is obsessed with splitting up the economic pie. I suggest the government should become obsessed with creating a much bigger economic pie, but this government will not create a bigger economic pie with this energy policy and budget; it will create an atmosphere which forces the industry right out of Canada, and mega projects to cancel their plans.

Ten billion dollars of investment has gone down the drain north of Fort McMurray at the Alsands project; $11 billion is on hold at Cold Lake; Syncrude Canada, ready to expand so it could increase its output by 60,000 barrels a day, has put $3 billion on hold; Texaco Canada, ready to spend $240 million to upgrade its experimental project—still experimental—has said, "No, we are putting that on hold because we do not know what is happening in Canada; the place has gone crazy." Amoco has pulled out and said, "We cannot afford to spend any more time on research and development in the tar sands because we do not see a stable political climate in Canada". Amoco says we do not have a stable political climate in which to invest in research and development or in the tar sands heavy oil industry. I find that to be absolutely shameful. I could go on about projects which have closed their doors and said they will not continue. When we talk about oil rigs leaving Alberta and Saskatchewan, we are pooh-poohed by hon. members on government benches. They say this cannot be happening. I am telling them it is happening. It is happening to an extent which even the most doomful forecasters at the time of the energy policy and budget in October did not anticipate. It is happening to an even greater extent than that, and we do not have much time because once the rigs are gone, they will not come back. It will take years to recover the loss of technology which goes with that, let alone the rigs.

There is a list of people who have pleaded with the government to pull in its horns, to lay the national energy policy on the table and go over it again. I suggest that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources sit down with the principal players in the energy industry. I suggest he call in independent Canadian oil companies and the large multinationals. I suggest he bring in representatives of the federal government and of the provinces, sit down and really examine how to set a national energy policy which will make the economy of Canada hum.

Can hon. members imagine the economic effect in Canada there would have been today had there been an energy agreement? Can hon. members imagine what would be happening today if the Alsands plant at Fort McMurray was under construction and going, and if the one at Cold Lake was under construction and going? There would be a ripple effect throughout our economy which would be unbelievable but a beautiful thing to behold. There would be a boom in the industry of central Canada. People would be getting up in the morning anxious to get out and contribute to the development of our country instead of lengthening the lineups at unemployment insurance offices. It would be unbelievable.

We talk about billions of dollars and what they do, but one plant alone would bring an injection into the economy of Ontario of some $6.5 billion. This would be a direct injection because where are goods and services bought? Where does the industry buy equipment, pumps and pipe? It is all purchased in central Canada. In respect of two plants the injection would be $12 billion, yet the government puts forward a borrowing bill to give it authority to borrow $14 billion, as may be required, for public works and general purposes.

This money will be put toward guaranteeing loans for Massey-Ferguson, pulling Chrysler out of the pinch, or whatever, but the one industry which is moving—and moving the rest of the economy with it—the government attacks through the national energy policy. I plead with hon. members opposite to talk with their Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and tell him how absolutely necessary the energy industry is.

How much time do I have left, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Another seven or eight minutes.

Mr. Shields: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: No, no, relax. Take your time.

Mr. Shields: I want to read a letter into the record. Hon. members might be interested in this letter. It is from Merland Explorations Limited. It was written to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on December 23. It says:

Dear Sir:

During the past month, the staff of Merland Explorations Limited and our financial consultants have been studying the National Energy Program and the Budget released by the Canadian federal government on October 28, 1980 (and associated "White Papers") with the purpose of determining its effect on the Canadian oil and gas industry in general and upon Merland Explorations Limited in particular. Merland is a member of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada (IPAC) who have communicated with you previously regarding this subject. During these communicatons, you have invited further communications with individual companies. This letter is intended to communicate to you what Merland's studies have concluded and present some alternative solutions to the problems.

● (1620)

Before I go into detail concerning the National Energy Program and the budget, I think it would be appropriate to give you some introduction to Merland Explorations Limited.

Merland was incorporated in 1926 as a federal company and is now listed on the Toronto and Montreal Stock Exchanges. Merland has experienced very rapid growth in the last four or five years from activities in the Canadian oil and gas industry. We are involved in oil and gas activities in the United States to a much lesser extent.

We are very proud of the fact that our cash flow and net earnings have increased substantially over the past few years, however, it should be noted that our investment in oil and gas exploration has increased at an equal rate. Merland has funded its exploration and development activities over the past several years from its cash flow and production loans from the Royal Bank. In each of the past several years we have invested considerably more in industry capital expenditures than our cash flow.

From the information that I have available to me, I believe that Merland is approximately 90–95 per cent owned by Canadian citizens or Canadian corporations. Our eight members of the Board of Directors are all Canadian citizens and residents of Canada. All of our officers and employees are Canadian citizens.

Merland is a hyper-active, highly motivated and very successful company whose success is due primarily to a very competent Canadian staff with excellent guidance from our Board of Directors. Merland is, or was, certainly one of the brightest stars in the Canadian Oil and Gas Industry of which every Canadian and the Canadian government could be proud.

The federal budget and Canadian Energy Program introduced by the Canadian government on October 28, 1980 has introduced a number of measures which will surely have a negative effect on Merland Explorations Limited, hundreds of other Canadian owned oil and gas exploration companies and the whole oil and gas industry in general.

I don't believe there is a Canadian who would disagree with your stated objectives of the new Canadian energy policy being as follows:

1. Canadian self-sufficiency in crude oil and natural gas supplies.

2. An increase in Canadian ownership and control of the oil and gas industry.

3. More appropriate and fairer sharing of oil and gas revenues.

However it is doubtful that the Energy Program and the Budget introduced by your government recently will accomplish any of the stated objectives but will throw the oil and gas industry into complete chaos and confusion thus reducing exploration and development activity. This slowdown in activity will by necessity cause a ripple effect which in turn will hurt all or most other Canadian industries. If Merland Explorations Limited is a typical negatively-effected company, the Canadian automotive industry, the steel industry and hundreds of smaller manufacturing industries will be hurt. The majority of these manufacturing industries are located in Ontario and Quebec.

There is no doubt also that the negative effects caused by your new program will cause Merland and many other companies to move ever-increasing amounts of investment capital to the United States and other countries where financial returns are better and government policy is more stable and receptive. As far as Merland Explorations Limited is concerned, we now estimate that our cash flow and net earnings will be reduced by approximately 12 per cent and 25 per cent respectively in 1981 because of your new program and these lower values will continue into the foreseeable future.

One therefore has to question whether the objectives of your Canadian energy policy are in fact as you have represented or are there other unspecificed objectives in mind.

To be specific in my feelings toward your new policies, I note that the 8 per cent PGRT tax and the 30-cent MCF petroleum compensation charge are very well defined and industry and consumers are expected to begin paying these new taxes in 1980 thereby having the effect of increasing federal income and decreasing industry cash flows immediately. Consumer costs will also therefore increase immediately. These new levies and taxes will restrict the ability of Merland Explorations Limited to carry on its business of exploring for oil and gas in Canada as surely as night follows day. This same situation will occur to many other Canadian companies. I have to ask again: Is this one of the objectives of your new energy policy?

Because my time is running out, I will go down to the bottom of the page.

I would also ask you to give the following thoughts some very careful, openminded consideration:

1. It will be a national disaster if the Cold Lake heavy oil project and additional tar sands plants are not preceeded with as these projects are essential to our energy needs and to maintain Canada's leadership in this type of technology. Any politician, at whatever level, who is associated with the possible cancellation of these projects will go down in history as an architect of the economic collapse of Canada.

2. The people of Canada still consider Canada as a capitalistic and free enterprise country and are very proud of this in spite of what many politicians are trying to preach and profess.

3. The population of Canada is quite willing and able to pay for higher energy costs as have been experienced in every other western country of the world except Canada. So oil and gas prices should escalate much faster than your program has suggested.

4. Contrary to your government's beliefs, separation of western Canada is quite possible if this area continues to be treated as a colony. Keep in mind that western Canadians are psychologically quite different from people in Quebec who have been in the warm, comfortable bosom of the Canadian federal government since confederation. Western Canadians have grown up working and fighting for a better life and the current energy problem will be dealt with with the same vigour and stamina.

5. The fairest and simplest method for the federal government to obtain additional revenues is through a reasonable taxation scheme of company profits.

6. The reckless and uncontrolled expenditures of tax deductible capital in the oil and gas industry whereby commissions are earned according to how much is spent rather than how much is earned should be stopped.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-59 entitled an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority. This is a short but frightening bill giving the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) the authority to borrow up to $14 billion for public works and general purposes through the issue or pledge of securities of Canada at rates of interest or terms and conditions as approved by the governor in council. No other act by this government, except the introduction of this bill, could indicate to Canadian people the truth of the charge levelled against it by the former Auditor General of Canada, Mr. James Macdonell, when he said this government is losing or is close to losing control of the public purse. The bill covers little more than a page and, except for the general purpose clause, gives absolutely no explanation covering the government's intended expenditure of this vast amount of money. One billion dollars is one thousand million dollars; $14 billion is therefore $14 thousand million. It is a new horrendous debt load to be placed on the backs of the citizens of this nation, citizens who are already crying out against the excessive tax burdens they must carry as a result of the mismanagement of their affairs by the federal Grits in office under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The bill claims in its first paragraph to be enacted by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons. If only that statement were true; unfortunately it is not. The parliamentary system has become so rigged that the government with a majority in the Commons can ignore all the opposition parties. The first act by the Prime Minister was to change the rules so that his government, his party, could limit debate. Afterwards he boasted about his actions saying we pulled the ground out from under them. Parliament has a completely new set of rules. I think it was Pogo who said, "We have met the enemy and he is us." In this case the "them" to which the Prime Minister referred, is us, and we are the representatives of the Canadian people whose voice is all too often silenced by the majority in this House.

● (1630)

Until the present Prime Minister took power, Canadians were in the habit of trusting their government. So far as provincial and municipal governments are concerned, they probably still do. Banking on this trust, the present Prime Minister was able to change the rules, so that he could set about changing our society. After the rules were changed, he said:

I have the feeling of a mechanic who is returning a car or something and getting the thing ready to go.

However, he neglected to tell us in which direction he intended us to go. In 1969 he said:

We have to change the constitution to keep it up to date, to give the federal and provincial governments the new rules which are called for in a new society.

Now, some 12 years later, we are gradually getting a glimpse of Mr. Trudeau's new society. Very few Canadians like or approve of what they see.

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, I have noticed that for some time now—and I do not know whether it is done accidentally or deliberately, or whether it is a small, well-orchestrated campaign—the Prime Minister of Canada has often been referred to by his family name, something which is not allowed in the House under Beauchesne's Citation 319.

Mr. Pinard: That is quite true.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's point is well taken. It is the custom of the House to refer to individual members by constituency and to members of cabinet by their function or positions in cabinet.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was referring to the Prime Minister of Canada, but in future I will recognize the custom.

Coming back to the comments I was making, some 12 years later we are gradually getting a glimpse of the Right Hon. Prime Minister's plan for this nation. Many Canadians do not like or approve of what they see. For example, on July 10, 1980, the government forced passage of its authority to borrow $12 billion in this House. At that time the government refused, just as it is refusing today, to say how the money would be spent. In its budget, October 28, 1980, the government gave itself a blank cheque for at least another $50 billion. I will explain later on my reason for that statement.

In my opinion the government is seeking far more power than it needs to achieve its stated objectives. The $12 billion of last June and the $14 billion of today total $26 billion. As I stated just a moment ago, the blank cheque the government is seeking could total $50 billion under the present so-called budget, or an additional $2,000 from every man, woman and child in the country.

The borrowing proposals of this government are unprecedented in this country's history in their sheer magnitude. Moreover, this massive amount of money will be used at the government's discretion with virtually no public control whatsoever over what is to be done with it. The implications of such enormous and unfettered spending power are so immense that even the terms "horrendous" and "frightening" may well be too mild to describe them.

Not only will this huge blank cheque result in an unimagined transfer of capital from the private sector to the public sector, but it will also revolutionize the Canadian political system. Its impact could extend far beyond the borders of this country, bringing serious, adverse international repercussions. In light of the Right Hon. Prime Minister's proclaimed "new society", it is not too far-fetched to suggest that this abridgment of our freedoms through excess taxation could shift Canada overnight—from 1981 to 1984—into a totalitarian nation having a one-party rule instead of the previous system where we prided ourselves in our freedoms and our democratic traditions.

One might say that my views are far-fetched, that I am exaggerating the situation, but I call in defence of my statements and my claims the words of the present Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance as delivered to a luncheon meeting of the Canadian Club at the Royal York Hotel in Toronto on Monday, February 2, 1981. Among other things, the Minister of Finance stated on page two, the third paragraph:

The same men and women who operate our factories, staff our offices and teach our children make up the society we are so determined to preserve. The economy is not simply an engine of production, not just the source of GNP. It is the mechanism for meeting the material needs of society. And by the same token, the expectations and desires of society must not exceed what the economy can realistically produce.

I repeat that the expectations and desires of society must not exceed what the economy can realistically produce. I wish the Minister of Finance were in the House at the present time, but I say to him, neither should the expectations of government, for when the government's desires exceed what the economy can produce, the end result is the same.

What is the end result? For the answer I turn to the fourth paragraph on page two of the minister's speech wherein he said:

When this connection is forgotten or neglected, all dialogue loses its meaning, and as both history and current events throughout the world so vividly demonstrate, dire consequences often result. All too often when the demands of society are at odds with the ability of the economy is protected from society or society is protected from the economy, and, in the extreme, capitalistic fascism or revolution is the result.

If one simply substitutes in the Minister of Finance's speech the words "the demands of government" for the "demands of society", then the conclusions he reached are identical, namely, freedoms within the economy are repressed and the end result is revolution. These men who lead the country, they know the answers, and sometimes in veiled statements they are making them in speeches in places other than this House.

At page three the Minister of Finance went on to say:

Within a democracy we cannot protect ourselves from ourselves.

He could also have added, "or from excessive government expenditures and actions", and again his conclusions would have been the same.

After reading the speech of the Minister of Finance, I could not help but be appalled, as I am certain all Canadians who read it would be appalled, at the manner in which on pages four and five by direct statements and innuendos he pitted one province against another and he pitted the east against the west, which does little or nothing to bring about unity in the country.

Obviously members of the present government are all candidates of the Dale Carnegie course on "How to Win Friends and Influence People", for the type of comments made by the Deputy Prime Minister in Toronto does absolutely nothing to bring about the unity within the nation which is required at this time.

The Minister of Finance's double-talk continued throughout his entire speech. On page seven he stated:

The gradual tightening of government expenditures was in part designed to remind Canadians that attitudes must change. As we strengthen our economy, we must not ask more from it than it can provide.

This statement leads me to ask: Why is he doing just that? Why is he asking more from our economy than it can obviously provide? Surely in defence he cannot claim that he and his colleagues have strengthened the economy of Canada. If so, they are obviously unaware that as a result of the national energy policy, 60 drilling rigs and 16 service rigs have left Canada, nearly all bound for the United States. Since the National Energy Program was announced on October 28, I understand that 60 more rigs are committed to leave Canada by April 30. How can this government claim a strengthened economy by mid-1981 when a spokesman for the Canadian Association of Oil Well Drilling Contractors states that the equipment that will have left Canada or which will be sitting idly in Canada will amount to more than half the Canadian industry's ability to drill and service oil and gas wells in this country? When Canadian oil companies cut back their planned 1982 expenditures from earlier anticipated levels by as much as 40 per cent, as a result of this government's taxation and energy policies, surely it is time the cabinet re-examined its policy, not only its national energy policy but its spending policy as well. The energy policy is as harmful in Atlantic Canada as it is in western Canada, which leads me to ask in Nova Scotian terms: How many storm signals are required by this government before they alter course? As I previously mentioned, disunity is rampant throughout the entire nation, for one reason or another.

An hon. Member: Even in the Conservative Party.

Mr. Crouse: The dream of self-sufficiency in energy continues to elude us. Our true unemployment picture today is in excess of one million Canadians. Our inflation rate is at an all-time high. The purchasing power of our dollar vis-à-vis that of the United States is at an all-time low. Sir, there are times when I hope—and there is someone mumbling opposite, surely in the next three weeks to a month he will have an opportunity to make a speech and I guarantee you one thing, Mr. Speaker, I do not make a habit of interrupting anyone. I will not interrupt him and I will ask him to do the same while I am endeavouring to put before this House the desperate needs of the Canadian people, especially of my people in Nova Scotia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: There are times when I hope that I am simply having a bad dream, but unfortunately it is only too true. Most of the problems to which I refer can be directly related to the policies and the programs which have been enunciated by this government, their action or inaction. Yet little or no mention of these awful problems appear in any of the government's projections. Even the government's financial-economic forecasts ignore the huge blank cheque demands being made as though this would never be used. But I fear that the $14 billion being requested here today in Bill C-59 is only the tip of the iceberg. A further blank cheque could be demanded later by a budget provision giving the government the power to impose, whenever it chooses, a Canadian ownership special charge on all oil and gas consumption in this country. It has been estimated that this charge could generate total revenues of up to $3.5 billion a year. If, as the government suggests, this cash flow is to be used as a means of obtaining investment capital then it would be sufficient to finance the debt charges on a borrowing of possibly $30 billion, or more. Moreover, if such a loan is used in the way this government plans, additional cash flow would become available to enable the government to compound its borrowing capacity. In total, then, as I see it under this system, the government could get its hands on something in the order of $50 billion or more. It has already had $12 billion last year, and it will have $14 billion when this bill is passed. That is, $26 billion, and we have only just started.

To obtain this enormous amount of capital all the government needs to do is issue a proclamation that the special charge is coming into effect. Of course, the economic consequences would be enormous, rendering the latest government forecasts essentially obsolete, but then, of course, they already are absolete when related to the October budget. The ability of the federal government to acquire this massive amount of money is stated explicitly in the budget and in the enabling legislation. Yet none of the new legislative proposals, including Bill C-59, say one word about how the money must be used and, as indicated, their inevitable economic and revenue impact is ignored in the government's forecasts. This government, as far as I can see, is giving itself a completely free hand to spend not only the $12 billion, plus today's $14 billion, but some $50 billion as it sees fit, without any specific statutory restraints. In fairness to the Minister of Finance, when bringing down his budget he did devote one brief paragraph to this subject. He stated:

> Petro-Canada will be charged initally with the task of acquiring the Canadian operations of one or more multinational oil companies. As in the past, the financing for such acquisitions will be obtained in large part by borrowing in foreign capital markets. But additional infusions of equity capital may be required. To provide that capital the government will establish a Canadian ownership account. Revenue for the account will be provided by a Canadian ownership charge . . .

That is the end of the quotation, Mr. Speaker. In addition to giving itself the right to impose an additional burden of up to $2,000 on every man, woman and child in Canada, the government has issued notice to the major foreign-controlled oil companies that their days in this country are numbered. In my opinion this take-over plan amounts to the most ambitious program of nationalist-inspired socialistic state intervention in the economy attempted by any government in Canada's history, and I have looked back over the pages for quite a number of years with respect to this issue.

Government officials deny that the plan constitutes expropriation of the petroleum industry, since the Prime Minister does not like these unpleasant words. However, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), in other budget documentation, provides this information:

> The ownership and control targets for large firms and public sector participation are voluntary. It would be preferable to meet the ownership targets by guidelines and flexibility, rather than through legislation. The government will, however, carefully review developments, to see whether satisfactory progress is being made under these voluntary ground rules.

When you analyse that statement, Mr. Speaker, the message is quite clear, namely, "Surrender or we will expropriate." Already Petrofina has been acquired at a cost of something in the order $1.46 billion. In light of what has been said by the Minister of Finance and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the question one must pose is: Who will be next? That is something we could sell lottery tickets on. It could be the new guessing game in Canada: Will it be Gulf Oil, will it be Texaco; will it be Imperial Oil; who will be next? There is no need to worry, if you guess one of the other companies and buy some stock in it that you will not be well paid for your efforts by the government. The government, backed up by its taxing and borrowing powers, will certainly make you a profit if the company you select is taken over by this government. Look what they handed to the owners of Petrofina by way of a profit in excess of market value. Given the amount of capital this government's blank cheque will permit it to raise for this purpose, no multinational oil company can rely on escaping the government's take-overs.

In my opinion, this type of massive expropriation program raises all kinds of policy questions. Venezuela, Cuba and Brazil, to name but a few, all followed the take-over role with disastrous consequences for their countries' economies. Canadians, of course, have been led to believe that their governmental system is somewhat different to that in those countries. But now, in light of what is happening today, many Canadians are simply not so sure. We must ask ourselves: Do we really want the Prime Minister to be the head of Petrofina, Imperial Oil, Gulf Oil or Texaco? Do we really want him to delegate the position to one or more of the top mandarins in Ottawa who have so mismanaged the government's finances that last year the deficit exceeded $14 billion, and next year it is predicted to exceed something in the order of $14 billion but which now appears to be headed for $16 billion or more? With men like that minding the store we must ask ourselves what will really happen to Canada's economy.

● (1650)

Despite the years of debate in this country concerning foreign ownership, it is still not apparent to me, although I read the Financial Post, the Financial Times and just about every financial paper I can find, that a national consensus has emerged approving the buying-back of foreign ownership, let alone having it done by the federal government. The basic problem is not a new one. Given a majority government, there are virtually no effective constraints on governmental spending power in Canada. After all, Parliament serves merely as a rubber stamp in approving the government's expenditure estimates. A majority government's spending authority is essentially unlimited. This government merely has to get its hands on whatever it wants, then it can fritter it away in any manner it likes.

As we all know, the party in power can ignore its own promises and its commitments. When the Conservative government was defeated, the Grits promised lower energy costs than what were outlined in our budget. Unfortunately, there have been eight increases in the price of gasoline since the Grits came to power on a promise of keeping prices lower than we predicted in our budget. So much for political promises. What it all boils down to is a question of trust. Without even being given any logical explanation for the proposed expropriation of an industry, can we be confident that the government has come up with the best solution for our country's problems?

Without even being told how the government could achieve its stated objective of maintaining competition among different companies with the same government ownership, can we be confident that the industry would operate efficiently enough to make the benefits of expropriation greater than the costs? Would the expropriation plan do anything to assure the adequacy and security of Canada's future energy supplies? Would net benefits really accrue to Canadians in economic terms if we take into account the $50 billion price tag which is involved?

In any event, what reassurance can we have, apart from the soothing words of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that the billions of dollars being taxed from Canadians will not be spent for some purpose quite different to that which is proposed? Regardless of the merits or otherwise of nationalizing the petroleum industry, there is absolutely no justification for this House to give the government a $14 billion blank cheque. If we have so much money to spare, we must ask ourselves are there no other useful ways to spend that money?

What about research, industrial development and industrial strategy? If our industries are to be competitive in world markets, we must spend more on research in order to bring our products up to the competitive levels of other industrialized countries. Our primary industries need encouragement. In my riding, the fish processing industry in Lockeport could use a financial shot in the arm in order to become re-established after a disastrous fire six months ago. If this government wants more co-operation from all the parties in this House, it must come clean with its economic priorities and spending programs, so that all members will feel they have a part in reshaping the destiny of this country.

Unfortunately, the wording of this bill does not lead to that objective, but, rather, continues to bring about mistrust and concern over the true objectives of this government, its policies and programs. I ask the cabinet, "What are your plans for industrial development?" For example, what are its plans for the reconstruction of the National Sea Products plant at Lockeport. Lockeport is a hard-luck town, having lost a large part of its retail district some years ago and on July 23, 1980, the National Sea Products plant was destroyed by fire, throwing some 305 people immediately out of work and creating serious economic conditions for many more, since the plant represented more than 50 per cent of the economic base of the Lockeport area with a payroll in 1979 of approximately $2.5 million.

I am certain these facts are well known to the government as I forwarded numerous representations to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) concerning the matter. In the interim, officials of National Sea Products have provided government officials with detailed plans for a new plant. But as late as June 27 I was informed that the company had not received an offer from DREE and, of course, without it the company cannot make plans to finance the loan it will require to rebuild this $11 million or $12 million plant.

In response to a question in this very House which I put to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacLellan) on January 13 concerning this matter, he stated:

> A proposal will be made to the advisory board of the department within the next few weeks, and shortly after that the minister will be able to give a decision to the hon. member.

Since I received that response back in January, I must ask "Why the delay?" We seem to have millions of dollars to back up Massey-Ferguson and for other industries, some of which are in other lands. What is wrong with helping our own people who, through no fault of their own, cannot help themselves? The fire destroyed their only opportunity. They cannot turn to the land because the soil is not very productive. They can only turn to the sea, and this plant must be rebuilt.

Any money which is provided to National Sea Products for the reconstruction is simply seed money or pump-priming money. Merely to begin the construction of the plant would immediately put some of these people to work. Once the plant is finished, as is evidenced by its long history, the revenue accruing back to the federal government as well as the provincial government from the income tax paid by the company and the workers would soon bring back the seed money to Ottawa. Why the delay? Why is it that we in Nova Scotia are always given a blind eye and a deaf ear although we have not one, but two Liberals in the cabinet representing that province? I hope they will take my words to heart and do something about this matter in the not-too-distant future.

If this government is looking for ideas concerning the manner in which Canadians can be put back to work, let it start with the Canadian businessman or the private sector. Canadian business must be involved and encouraged to invest. It is not overstating our case to say that we must retool our economy for the tough world which is coming. The Japanese and the Germans did it following World War II, and we can all see the results. To start us on the road will take some very smart businessmen and planning. It calls for confidence in our economy and nerve to take the risks but that, after all, is what private industry and private business are all about.

Next, we urgently need more research and development. The world of the 1980s and the 1990s will clearly be one in which economic and industrial gains, from which stem social gains, can only result from productivity gains. Among the most likely sources of these gains is improved technology. As Canadians we have become very comfortable in accepting the hand-me-down technologies of other countries. Our research and development expenditures, once 1.4 per cent of our GNP, have declined to a pitiful .9 per cent when the competition level is at least over 2 per cent.

If we wish to become technologically independent and competitive in the scientific seed-bed of economic progress we will have to do better. The alternative is that we pay the full price of being shut out of the growth industries of the future. I am not saying that investing more in research and development is the sole responsibility of the federal government. The federal government can help and encourage, but I believe the private individual and the private businessman must actually be the major contributor.

Another requirement of Canadian business is that it take an international approach to opportunities for growth. With our balance of payments situation and our limited domestic opportunities for economies of scale, our whole approach to doing business and expanding it must be built on a global perspective. The simple truth is that the future belongs to the world, and in this area, the federal government with its world-wide chain of high commissioners and trade commissioners can be most helpful.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie)—Pension Act—Inquiry respecting delegation of authority under Section 33; the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins)—Customs tariff—Request for removal of duty on body armour; the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant)—Canadian Armed Forces—Reported testing of chemical defoliants.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Items Nos. 25 and 27 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION—SUGGESTED MEASURES TO PROTECT ENVIRONMENT OF MANITOBA

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking those measures necessary to ensure that there is no damage caused to the Manitoba environment by the completion of the Garrison diversion unit in the State of North Dakota and, that such measures to be considered could include:

1. the convening of a joint meeting between provincial, state and federal authorities affected by the Garrison project;

2. the offer of legal and technical assistance to those citizen's groups in Canada now attempting to halt the progress of the Garrison diversion; and

3. the bringing to trial in the World Court, the government of the United States, should Canada be unsuccessful in its efforts to receive satisfactory assurances regarding the future safety of her environment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, getting up to speak on this matter in the House is a little like the "good news—bad news" syndrome. The good news is that I always enjoy speaking in the House on matters of concern to my constituents. The bad news is that it is rather sad, after so many years, that very little has been done to solve or end this problem.

To understand the issue of the Garrison diversion unit fully, one must consider its history, particularly its history in North Dakota. The desire to use the waters of the Missouri River to irrigate the drylands of northern North Dakota is older than the state of North Dakota itself. The first documentation that shows an interest in using this water and in constructing such a diversion is dated 1887. At much the same time a constitutional convention which preceded North Dakota entering statehood took place, and a request was made of the United States Congress that such a diversion be built. Nothing was done. However, in the 1930s, when the dust bowl that ravaged much of the prairies, including North Dakota, occurred, the desire and the dream for an irrigation system using the Missouri River waters grew again. It became quite strong, and in 1935 appeals were made to the United States Congress for the construction of this diversion unit.

Garrison Diversion

Pursuant to those 1935 appeals, the United States Army Corps of Engineers and the American Bureau of Reclamation began considering the feasibility and the engineering possibilities of constructing dams along the Missouri River system. The plan put forward at that time was known as the Pick-Sloan Missouri River basin plan. In a document dealing with Manitoba and the Garrison Diversion Unit, it is stated that in 1943 Congress authorized the Army Corps of Engineers to construct the mainstem series of dams on the Missouri River and that at the time the United States Interior Department's Bureau of Reclamation was awarded the Garrison diversion unit. Work began on the Garrison dam in 1947, and it was completed by 1956.

Subsequent to the completion of the Garrison dam, proposals were put forward for the entire irrigation unit. The plans put forward in 1957 and 1959 did not meet the cost-benefit requirements of the United States government, and they were rejected. A plan was put forward in 1962 which was approved by the United States Congress in August, 1965.

The paper that I referred to earlier describes the unit that was authorized in 1965 as a "multi-purpose water resource project to divert Missouri River water into central and eastern North Dakota where the water will be used to irrigate 250,000 acres of land, provide a municipal and industrial water supply to 14 cities and furnish recreational and fish and wildlife opportunities throughout the area".

What the plan does, essentially, is to take water from the Missouri River, transport it in an easterly direction across north central North Dakota into a reservoir called the Lonetree reservoir. This reservoir acts as the hub of a wheel. Flowing out from the Lonetree reservoir the water goes northward through the Velva canal, eventually into the Souris River and into Canada. Flowing eastward through the New Rockford canal, the water eventually goes into the Sheyenne River and then into the Red River which goes into Canada. It flows southward along the James River feeder canal into the James River, the Wild Rice River and again into Canada.

The Lonetree reservoir is really the crux of the whole problem in Canada and more particularly in Manitoba. It is at the Lonetree reservoir that the water from the Missouri River breaches the continental divide and becomes linked with the Hudson's Bay drainage basin. This link-up eventually causes most of the problems. It brings water, biota, chemicals and parasites into the Canadian water system which are completely foreign to Canada.

Subsequent to the authorization given in 1965, construction on the Snake Creek pumping station which is an integral part of the system, was started in 1968. In 1970 construction of the McClusky Canal, one of the largest parts of the project, was started. The most recent work on the Garrison diversion unit was a tender called in 1980 for construction of the New Rockford canal.

In April, 1969, the Canadian government became concerned about some of the possible adverse effects that the Garrison unit would have in Canada. At that time the first of many notes between Canada and the U.S. state department and our embassy in Washington was passed. Canada sent a note verbale requesting information on the Garrison unit. In October, 1971, the first diplomatic note was sent protesting the adverse effects of the Garrison diversion unit return flows. The Canadian concern reached the point in 1975 where the whole issue was referred by the United States and Canada to the International Joint Commission which, after an extensive and very good study, filed a report in 1977.

This is where I have a problem, Mr. Speaker. Since 1977 nothing has been done to implement the recommendations of the International Joint Commission. There have been no bilateral negotiations. Nothing has been done, and it is this lack of action that my motion addresses.

Let us consider the recommendations of the International Joint Commission. The report filed in 1977 clearly stated that the Garrison diversion unit, if constructed and completed as designed, would have adverse effects on the environment of Manitoba. It concentrated on three particular areas of concern. The first was water quantity; increased flows of water would come into Manitoba at certain times of the year. The second was water quality; there would be an increased chemical content in the water coming into Manitoba. The third, and probably the most critical in the long run, was the adverse impact that would be felt by the biological resources of Manitoba. This includes an impact on fish stocks in Manitoba, and wildlife stocks among other things.

● (1710)

I should now like to speak about the effects of Garrison on the fish stocks in Manitoba. First I would like to read into the record some comments I made in October, 1980, when I was speaking on a motion concerning fisheries in Canada. I shall quote from a technical report issued in February, 1979, by the Fisheries and Marine Service. It is entitled "Potential Effects of Exotic Fishes on Manitoba: An Impact Assessment of the Garrison diversion unit". I shall refer to three fish which will have serious impact in the province of Manitoba. First is the rainbow smelt. In this connection the report reads:

> —we believe that rainbow smelt will be successfully introduced and established in Manitoba waters . . . We believe that smelt, when introduced to Manitoba, will cause the collapse of lake herring populations in Lakes Winnipeg, Manitoba and Winnipegosis and will have a major negative impact on the lake whitefish fishery in the north basins of Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba.
> Smelt will also have negative impacts on walleye fisheries in certain locales of Lakes Winnipeg, Manitoba and Winnipegosis. Declines in the abundance of higher-valued species will result in decrease in fishermen's incomes such as occurred in Lake Erie during the late 1950s.

The report goes on about the gizzard shad. It reads:

> —we believe that gizzard shad will be introduced and can be established in Lakes Winnipeg, Manitoba and Winnipegosis. There are suitable environmental and habitat conditions, food supplies and spawning areas for establishment of gizzard shad populations in these waters . . . Magnitude of impact may range from minimal impact to the worst possible impact of total collapse of walleye and sauger populations in these lakes.

With regard to a third fish, the Utah chub, the reports reads:

> In summary, Utah chub have a high reproduction potential, a potential for population irruptions and likely can establish in Manitoba waters . . . . Furthermore, if in Manitoba waters Utah chub will have a negative impact on indigenous fishes and may become a nuisance to anglers and commercial fishermen (through sheer volume of catch in the nets). We expect Utah chub will compete with whitefish and walleye for food and likely displace, to a major extent, existing forage species, particularly minnows . . . .Therefore, we consider this fish to represent the same potential for major impact as rainbow smelt or gizzard shad.

Now I shall quote some figures. The report gives a table of percentage reductions in population size. They use three figures, the lowest, the most likely, and the maximum. I will use only the most likely figures.

In the Lake Winnipeg north basin, the effect on the lake whitefish will be a 50 per cent reduction; on lake herring it will be 75 per cent; and on walleye and sauger 50 per cent. In the south basin of Lake Winnipeg, the effect on the lake whitefish will be a 5 per cent reduction; on the lake herring a 5 per cent reduction; and on walleye and sauger a 50 per cent reduction. In Lake Manitoba, the effect on the lake whitefish will be a 30 per cent reduction; on the lake herring it will be 75 per cent; and on walleye and sauger 75 per cent.

The end result of this potential hazard to Manitoba fisheries will be nothing short of disastrous. In all the studies and the bantering back and forth there is one very important group of Manitobans who have been ignored. I am referring to the native people in the province of Manitoba. In a report prepared by a Winnipeg consulting firm, Rieber-Kremers and Associates in 1969, concerning the impact of the Garrison diversion unit on Manitoba Indian communities, they point out that at present some 17,000 Manitobans would have their livelihood seriously affected. Projecting into the year 2033 when the Garrison Diversion Unit is expected to have its greatest impact, the population figure at that time is projected to include 37,000 Manitoba Indians. At present these people rely on the fishing industry for their livelihood. In 1979 the value of the fishing industry to natives in Manitoba was $1.9 million. As well, native people rely on fishing for subsistence. In other words, they catch fish to stay alive.

I shall now quote from the Rieber-Kremers report as follows:

We now come to those impacts which are not known and have not been dealt with in government sponsored studies, namely, the area of socio-cultural impacts. The Indian people in the impact zone are identified as having a viable culture distinctly different from other Manitobans. Attempts on the part of the IJC and government agencies to analyse the impacts solely in the form of bio-physical terms have led to the absence of a detailed examination of the impact on the socio-cultural base resident within the communities and of possible far-reaching changes that could occur, which would have a serious and lasting effect on daily life. The threat of the project is not only to "income", as described above, but to the very survival of a whole way of life based on the land and water. This area of impact is perhaps the most serious and yet most difficult to quantify. However, it can be stated with reasonable certainty that because both commercial and subsistence fishing are an integral part of the communities' socio-cultural structure, that this base will be detrimentally affected as a result of the project.

To come a little closer to home, I want to speak about a community in the northern part of my constituency called Easterville. It has 800 to 900 people. Almost all of the people are native, non-status and status Indians. In this community there are roughly about two dozen full-time jobs, such as working for the band office, village office, the school, the co-op store, and operating the "honey wagon." That is about it. There are no other full-time jobs in Easterville. The fishing season comes twice a year. During the fishing seasons almost every adult male makes his livelihood by fishing. That is the only income for the year for the vast majority of people in this community. If the fishing industry is reduced by 50 per cent, as has been projected because of the adverse effects of Garrison, serious effects on this community will be untold. I just hate to think of how it would hurt such a community.

Let me now summarize. We in Manitoba have not been reassured in the past with regard to the government's concern about the Garrison diversion project. We have not been reassured by the United States State Department or the Executive Branch that the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 will be adhered to. Construction goes on all the time while we get these reassurances. When President Carter was in power we had a brief respite when he cancelled a number of water projects. However, in the last year, in a mad scramble for votes, he went soft on environmental issues and allowed a rather sizeable appropriation for Garrison to get through the House. Nor are we reassured by what we see in the immediate future.

The new governor of North Dakota, Governor Olson, said that it was up to Manitoba to prove that any harm will come to the province. We have the proof from the IJC and from many other studies. We cannot accept that kind of an argument. We are not reassured by new President Reagan and his interior secretary Watt who have never been especially strong on environmental issues in the past.

The bottom line for myself, for my other colleagues from Manitoba, and, in fact, all Manitobans, is that we oppose the Garrison diversion unit as designed. If we are sending out signals to the Americans, I want to make it fundamentally clear that we do not mean to interfere in their internal politics. We do not care what they do with the water inside North Dakota. But when that water threatens the very livelihood of Manitobans, then we do care.

As a politician representing a Manitoba constituency, I must accept the doubts. We cannot afford to take the risks of allowing any of this foreign biota to come into Manitoba. I might remind hon. members that in the lakes of Manitoba the carp fish was not native to Manitoba until some fisherman brought it in there in his bait pail. Carp fish now run rampant through all of the major lakes in the province. I might also point out that in Australia rabbits were not native. I think we all know what has happened in Australia as far as the rabbit population is concerned, only two of which were originally brought into that country.

Therefore we cannot allow one bucket of North Dakota water containing a gizzard shad, a rainbow smelt, a Utah club, or whatever, to come into Manitoba. We will not accept the fish screen which has been proposed by the American constructors of the Garrison diversion unit. It is not feasible that such a screen could sucessfully protect Manitoba waters. We will not accept the feeble platitudes of American politicians, such as Governor Olson, that there is no proof that harm will come to the province of Manitoba. The only thing we will accept, and I hope that the government sitting opposite listens to us, is that not one drop of North Dakota water from the Garrison diversion unit crosses the boundary into Manitoba. That is the only thing.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member raised this important matter. The discussions are indeed at present at a critical level. It is an issue on which Canada's stand is supported by all parties in the House.

I should like to begin by restating once again the government's continuing, firm and unchanging position on the Garrison diversion project. The government is unalterably opposed to any transfer of water from the Missouri basin to the Hudson Bay basin which would involve the transfer of foreign biota, that is, foreign fish species, parasites or diseases. The government's position, which is supported by the findings of the International Joint Commission, is that any such transfer would have serious and totally unacceptable consequences for the people in the province of Manitoba.

The government has received a number of suggestions from other hon. members in the past on possible alternative approaches toward reaching the goal on which, I think, all members of the House are agreed. I am pleased to have the opportunity to review past endeavours and to bring hon. members up to date on the current state of negotiations.

Since April of 1969 the Government of Canada has made its concerns about the Garrison diversion unit known to the U.S. government in a number of official communications. In a note of October 23, 1973, the Government of Canada informed the Department of State of the continued grave concern of the Government of Canada over the project's potential implications for Canada, and its conclusion, based on studies conducted in both countries, that the proposed project would run counter to the obligations assumed by the United States under article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty. Article IV states that:

—waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other.

The Government of Canada welcomed the assurances given in the reply U.S. note of February 5, 1974, that the United States:

—will comply with its obligations to Canada not to pollute water crossing the boundary to the injury of health or property within Canada. No construction potentially affecting waters flowing into Canada will be undertaken unless it is clear that this obligation will be met.

The governments of Canada and the United States subsequently asked the International Joint Commission on October 22, 1975, to undertake an impartial, binational investigation of the transboundary implications of the Garrison diversion unit, and to recommend such measures as might be taken to ensure that Canadian waters are not polluted to the injury of health and property. In so doing, the commission was asked specifically to consider the transboundary implications of the project for water quality and water uses and the nature and extent of the impact on commercial and recreational fisheries in Manitoba of the possible introduction from the Missouri River system through the Garrison diversion unit of foreign biota.

When it became clear that the International Joint Commission could not complete its study before important scheduled budgetary decisions relating to construction of the Garrison diversion project were to be taken by United States authorities, the Government of Canada became concerned that these decisions might not be based on a full knowledge of the potential effects of such construction on Canada. Accordingly, on October 12, 1976, the Government of Canada requested:

—that further construction and decisions on construction of the Lonetree reservoir be deferred until after the commission's report has been received and subsequent consultations between the governments have taken place.

In making this request, the Government of Canada expressed particular concern that filling or operation of the reservoir could affect waters flowing into Canada.

In February of 1977, the U.S. government in its reply undertook that "a contract for the construction of the Lonetree dam will not be let until after the report to governments of the International Joint Commission has been received and subsequent consultations between the two governments have taken place."

Meanwhile, the International Joint Commission had established the International Garrison Diversion Study Board, composed of experts from both governments, to carry out the necessary technical studies for its investigation. The board reported in January of 1977 that:

—the Garrison diversion project as envisaged will have adverse impact on water uses in Canada.

The board projected a total annual loss to the commercial fisheries of Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba in the millions of dollars.

The International Joint Commission conducted public hearings to receive comment on the board's report. On the basis of the board's report, testimony received at its public hearings, and other submissions, the commission reported to governments on September 16, 1977.

The commission concluded that construction and operation of the Garrison diversion project as envisaged when the study began would cause significant injury to health and property in Canada as a result of adverse impacts on water quality and adverse and irreversible impacts on some of the more important biological resources in Manitoba. The commission recommended that portions of the project which could affect waters flowing into Canada not be built.

At that time it was understood by the Government of Canada that the U.S. Department of the Interior was preparing a modified Garrison plan which would take into consideration both the expressed Canadian concerns and the recommendations of the International Joint Commission.

A draft modified plan was published by the U.S. Department of the Interior in February of 1978. In the view of Canadian federal and Manitoba officials, the draft plan did not appear specifically to consider the transboundary effects of the project which were detailed by the International Joint Commission. Canada again made it clear to the United States that the risk of transfer of foreign biota to the Hudson Bay drainage basin had not been eliminated or significantly reduced by the draft revised plan. The plan indeed anticipated the transfer of such biota to the Red River via the Sheyenne River. The International Joint Commission had characterized the need to prevent biota transfer as "overriding everything else".

Canada again requested that these observations be passed to all relevant agencies of the United States government and that they be provided to Congress which had expressed concerns regarding the international effects of the project during earlier consideration.

Over the summer of 1978, Congress discussions took place and they seemed to ensure that Canadian concerns were fully recognized and respected. Canada expected that the U.S. Department of the Interior would take into consideration all these matters.

We were therefore deeply concerned by indications that the recommended plan of the Department of the Interior would, in fact, provide for transfers of water, and hence foreign biota, from the Missouri to the Hudson Bay drainage basin.

Accordingly, in March, 1979, the Government of Canada advised the U.S. government that it would consider the submission to Congress for authorization of any new Garrison diversion plan involving interbasin transfers before the U.S.A. had the benefit of formal consultations on it with Canada as contrary to the spirit of U.S. assurances and the recommendations of the International Joint Commission. These assurances have been recognized by the Congress, and the need for such consultations has been identified by the International Joint Commission and acknowledged by U.S. authorities.

● (1730)

At that time Canada requested consultations on any new Garrison diversion plan before such a plan was submitted to Congress. We also requested an assurance that a final plan would not be espoused by the United States administration unless it could be demonstrated that U.S. treaty obligations and commitments to Canada could be met, with full consideration given to the recommendations of the International Joint Commission.

Consultations were held in March, 1979, at which time Canada reiterated its clear and unchanging position, and the United States once more renewed its assurance to honour its obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty.

The Government of Canada was therefore seriously concerned when, in June, 1979, the U.S. Congress appropriated an additional $9.7 million for work on the Garrison diversion project. This appropriation took place in spite of vociferous Canadian objections, including a strong diplomatic note of June 18, 1980, and vigorous efforts on the part of the federal and Manitoba governments, individual Members of Parliament, and private citizens' organizations. While the directive accompanying the appropriations bill specified that the funds not be spent on project features that would directly affect Canada, it was disturbing to note that the funds were appropriated for use on the currently authorized 250,000 acre plan, and not a modified plan, which we had understood to be under consideration.

In a diplomatic note dated October 1, 1980, Canada pointed out that in the absence of any significant project re-design new construction would appear to be leading inexorably toward completion of features that would ultimately result in violation of the Boundary Waters Treaty. We pointed out our understanding that satisfactory resolution of the serious bilateral implications of the project would precede any further decisions which would allow new construction to begin.

The authorization of new funds under a plan that has not been modified in any way to take into account Canadian views or the conclusions and recommendations of the International Joint Commission is a cause of deep concern to us.

By diplomatic note of December 1, 1980, Canada received from the United States an outline of just how this new appropriation would be spent. The expenditure of some of the funds, we were told, would be deferred until after consultations between the two governments. The U.S. Office of Management and Budget has since required that the funds be spent; however, we have been assured that the funds will be expended only in the West Oakes test area, which does not affect Canada.

We now stand at a critical point in bilateral consideration of this issue. The United States has proposed that a process of bilateral consultation commence in March of this year. Canadian scientific and technical experts have been briefed on the latest U.S. technical developments in order that consultations can be based on a firm understanding of the technical issues involved. Such a process will certainly be approached with caution, but we should not overlook the potential for favourable resolution of this issue, which is perhaps greater now than before.

The stage is set for consideration of the issue on a basis more suitable to mutual agreement, in that the State Department has proposed that the upcoming consultations will be centred on possible design modifications to the reduced 96,300 acre plan. The State Department has also agreed that consultations will be based on the recommendations of the International Joint Commission and will deal with the Canadian objection to any inter-basin transfer of water. In other words, Canada's basic and often repeated concerns have been accepted as the basis for consultation. The stage is finally set for constructive discussion of those issues which are crucial to Canada.

This meeting would appear to incorporate the hon. member's suggestion as put forward in the notice of motion for the convening of a joint meeting between provincial, state and federal authorities affected by the Garrison project. The bilateral consultations proposed will provide ample opportunity for affected parties to make their views known. The Government of Canada certainly intends that the government of Manitoba will be fully involved in all preparations for the consultations and will be represented among the Canadian participants.

Clearly, any developments must be viewed within the context of the new United States administration and Congress. The Government of Canada is considering and re-evaluating the most effective methods of ensuring that the new Congress and administration are fully aware of the seriousness of Canadian objections to the project. Our officials in Washington have been working actively over the past few months on this. All hon. members are aware that discussions are now under way to arrange a visit by President Reagan to Canada early in his term of office, and this will provide another opportunity to review the issue at the highest level.

The federal government and the government of the province of Manitoba are working together, and it is important that Canada speak with one voice on this issue. The two governments, the Government of Canada and the government of Manitoba, have well in place the legal and technical bases on which Canadian opposition to the Garrison project rests, and this co-ordination has been one of Canada's strengths in discussion of the issue to date. The individuals and the citizens' organizations that have made their viewpoints known have also contributed.

While we are dealing here with a possible violation of an international treaty, one perhaps would not want to speculate too much on possible sanctions, although the hon. member has raised this possibility. I think it is important to remember that Canada has had long and friendly relations with the United States. Our relations have generally been based upon co-operation and respect for international obligations, and we hope that this final round of negotiations will result in a satisfactory arrangement in which Canada's environment is protected.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter for the province of Manitoba. I have stated for a long time and I have felt for a long time that it is certainly not a partisan issue. It is one which I hope transcends partisan political boundaries, and I am glad that the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant) raised this question this afternoon through a private members' motion.

I am not sure I agree totally with some of the things the hon. member requests in his motion, but I certainly agree with the intent of the motion. We cannot for one lapse of time take for granted that we will not have problems with our water if it comes from the United States into Canada as a result of the transfer of water from the Missouri to the Hudson Bay basin. I will not get into the engineering end of this, or why we do not want the water, because I think these were covered quite adequately by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake.

What does concern me is the fact that this is an international affair; there can be no doubt about that. This matter involves an international boundary and, as such, the responsibility for showing leadership with respect to Manitoba and Canada clearly rests with the federal government.

When I see a private member's motion such as the one raised here this afternoon, I am led to comment that the federal government has not been doing what it should be doing in terms of taking leadership and seeing that the area of Canada which will be affected is aware of what the federal government is doing and, not only aware, but also satisfied that what the federal government is doing is what it should be doing.

Groups have been organized in Manitoba to go down to North Dakota to protest the further construction of the dam in question.

• (1740)

The thing that concerns everybody is that each year as the project goes on more money is allocated to it, and each year that more money is allocated to the project we get impetus to have the project completed. With the completion of the project we will get the transfer of the water and therefore the problems. This is borne out in local papers in Manitoba.

I have an article here from the Daily Graphic of Portage la Prairie, November 17, 1980, reporting that the U.S. consul-general in Winnipeg urges Canadians to be heard. Michael Carpenter, the U.S. consul-general in Winnipeg, stated:

> Manitobans must stand up and be counted in their opposition to the Garrison diversion project, the U.S. consul-general in Winnipeg said in Portage la Prairie Saturday evening.

Here is an American consul-general saying Manitobans must stand up and be heard. Here is an article from the Brandon Sun of November 19 last year and the headline is "Flashing Amber Signalled for Garrison Construction". Again, I am talking about the proceeding of the construction of the dam.

There is an article in the MacGregor Herald, which is a local paper in southern Manitoba, of November 19, and the headline is "Audubon Society's Case No Comfort to Canada". I will quote from the first paragraph:

> A spokesman for Canadian groups opposing the Garrison diversion project said he was not optimistic about the National Audubon Society winning its case to halt or scale down the project after hearing the proceedings of a U.S. federal court case in Washington Friday.

The Audubon Society is an American based society. Its members are also concerned about the ongoing construction and completion of the dam.

Another headline from a local paper dated December 10 reads "North Dakotans Not Getting anti-Garrison Message". I will finish with a quote as recent as January 21, and the headline is "North Dakota Governor's Statements on Garrison Deplored by Manitobans". It goes on to say:

> A joint meeting of Canadian and American citizens in Jamestown, N.D. has produced a statement that "deeply deplores" North Dakota Gov. Al Olson's recent assertion that the Garrison diversion project should proceed until it is proven it could harm Manitoba's fishing industry.

We do have a lot of concern. There is concern on both sides of the border. If the federal government were doing what it should be doing, and that is showing some leadership in this area, we would not necessarily be having all of the concern by local people as to the detrimental effects this project will have on Canadians, Canadian waters, and Canadians' ability to earn their livelihoods on into the future as they have in the past. On this issue there can be no compromise. There is reference in the motion before us to taking the American government to court. I certainly would think that it would be something of a last resort. If that is what we have to do, then we have lost our case.

The only way that Canada is going to be saved from the harmful effects of the Garrison diversion project is if the water is not diverted. There is no engineering solution that will let water come without some of the problems coming with it. Until there is such a time, and I doubt very much there will be a satisfactory engineering solution, there is really no compromise as far as Canada is concerned in this matter. We have concerns with pollution of water, we have salinity problems which will come down Canadian rivers.

I have spoken to city officials in the town of Portage la Prairie, a city of about 15,000 people, and they estimate they would have to spend as high as $3 million on a water treatment plant to keep their water at the standards that it is now if water is transfered from North Dakota into the Assiniboine River. Those are the areas of concern local people have. There is really no solution in terms of the fishing industry in Manitoba as there is for cleaning up the water by spending millions of dollars.

Once the water is diverted, with it comes the foreign species of fish, the fish diseases, and the ensuing problems. Then it will be too late to reverse the situation. You cannot say to the fish, "Hey, you fish, go back to North Dakota. You are not wanted here." That is an impossibility, and we all know that. Our concern is very legitimate and it gets to be more disconcerting all the time as we see this project getting closer and closer to completion by the fact that there has been additional money spent on it.

It is clearly a federal government responsibility. The previous government speaker mentioned the government is seriously concerned. I should hope ministers would be more than seriously concerned. As a federal government, they should be letting the government of the United States know in as strong as possible diplomatic language that we cannot, under any circumstances, accept water from the United States.

The previous speaker also mentioned they would like to have the provinces involved in preparations for any meetings. That is very nice, but I think the federal government should clearly show some responsibility in taking the lead and seeing that they are not only involved in preparations but that the federal government go ahead and do what has to be done in terms of letting the Americans know what our real feelings are about this.

I have raised this question in the House several times before. One of the suggestions made was to take an all-party delegation from this House to the United States at the appropriate time. I have spoken to the minister of external affairs and he says that he does not know whether this is the appropriate time. We know now that Mr. Watt is the new Secretary of the Interior. It seems to me that now is the time we should be approaching Americans to see, as the new administration gets set up in Washington, that they know of our concerns on this side of the border and what our feelings are. It is deplorable that the federal government has not taken any more of a lead in letting the Americans know up until this time what our position is. I say that because, upon reading the local papers, I notice a lot of concern that the federal government does not know what is our position.

We hear a lot of concern about the east coast fisheries treaty. Nobody is saying that is not an area of concern; it certainly is. But if the fish treaty is not settled this year or next year, the fish will still be there. The point with this Garrison problem is that once the diversion is complete we will have the American foreign species of fish in our water systems forever. I would like to see more emphasis put on this matter by the federal government. It is clearly a federal responsibility because it crosses an international boundary.

One of the things pointed out to me was that both the senators from North Dakota are on the appropriations committee, and that is very significant. There could possibly be two votes for any future appropriations for Garrison. Again, I must emphasize that this is not a partisan issue, and I am glad to see it raised in the House. I am not so sure the previous NDP government of Manitoba did as much as it could have in terms of letting the Americans and our federal government know that as the construction of the dam proceeded problems would be caused. I have heard criticisms of the present government of Manitoba as a result.

I am familiar with some of the things the provincial government is doing in Manitoba. It has done things that I would have sooner seen the federal government do. For instance, the premier of Manitoba has sent telegrams to several American elected and appointed officials pointing out Manitoba's objections to the Garrison project. I am sure that would have been better done by the federal government. Because of a vacuum at the federal government level, the provincial government has had to step in and we have seen citizens' groups step in. Had the federal government been doing its job, we would not have heard the concerns expressed by local citizens and by provincial, municipal and urban governments in Manitoba.

I do not wish to speak at great length on this bill. Many of us from Manitoba have shown a great deal of interest in this matter in the past number of years. I should simply like to close by saying it is high time the federal government showed some leadership in this affair, did more than express its serious concern, and offer to involve the province and its local people in it.

I think it is time they took the lead and saw to it that everything was set up, so that people, all levels of government and all parties in this House were involved in letting the Americans know that it is the appropriate time before the new American administration gets too far along in its life. We in Manitoba cannot, under any terms, accept water from the Missouri basin being transferred into the Hudson Bay basin.

● (1750)

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the subject raised by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant). He covered a fair amount of what I intended to say about the background of the project. I am grateful to him because it allows me to get on to the second part of my remarks. He covered quite adequately what is involved in this irrigation project. He explained how the water would get from the Missouri basin to the Hudson Bay basin. Also he covered some concerns which I intended to express in so far as the introduction of foreign species into Canadian waters is concerned. I thank him for covering those areas quite adequately, and I would like to move on to the second part of my remarks.

In so doing, I should like to respond briefly to the comments of the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) which were, by and large, helpful, but which in one detail only tended to contradict his appeal for non-partisanship. Having made that appeal a couple of times, he then went on to imply that somehow the Government of Canada had not taken a position.

I believe those members who were listening will attest that the position of the Government of Canada was made as recently as 5.25 this afternoon. This is not the first time the position has been made, but in case the hon. member did not hear the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) articulate the position of the Government of Canada on this matter, I should like to repeat it for him. At that time my colleague said that it was the firm and unchanging position of the Government of Canada that we are unalterably opposed to any transfer of water from the Missouri basin to the Hudson Bay basin which would involve the transfer of foreign biota, that is to say, foreign fish species and parasitic diseases. She went on to say that we were supported by the findings of the International Joint Commission, that any such transfer would have serious and totally unacceptable consequences for the people and the province of Manitoba. Those comments were made by my colleague approximately 35 minutes ago, but obviously he did not hear them. It is a fairly clear position which indicates our concern. We have made that concern known on a number of occasions to the people in power in Washington.

At this point I should like to review some of the things the government has done to ensure that the ill-effects about which the hon. member for Portage-Marquette and the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake talked do not take place. First, it is important to stress that the Government of Canada and the government of Manitoba have worked quite closely together on this particualr subject, as it is understandably a mutually-shared concern. Since at least 1969 there have been constant consultations in Canada to ensure that all our respective concerns were taken into account and were properly addressed. Manitoba officials made an important contribution to the IJC study to which the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake referred. The government of Manitoba has been an active participant in our meetings with United States officials on this subject.

We believe we have achieved substantial progress in having our concerns addressed by the United States. The United States government, in a number of official communications, has assured us that it would honour its treaty obligations not to pollute our waters so as to injure health or property in Canada. That is a very important assurance. It has also pledged that the construction and operation of works of direct concern will be held in abeyance until we have been consulted.

Hon. members are aware that the United States Congress has recognized our concern. In my view this has been a major step forward. This degree of assurance that Canadian interests were acknowledged and were to be considered has not always been the case. In the early 1970s the proponents of the project appeared to assume that the massive project would have little or no adverse impact of any kind, let alone effects on Canada. At that time the emphasis was on engineering studies. Information on flow returns, the quality of those returns and specific areas to be irrigated, had not been fully developed.

Through an extended process of keeping pressure on for more information, we know with far more precision what is likely to happen. Through a process of analysing that information, providing the United States with our views, and informing them very specifically and firmly of our concerns, they know what we are talking about. I believe it would be appropriate, then, to review some of the things we have done to ensure we knew what was happening and what was likely to happen to Canada, and how in turn we made sure the United States knew our views.

In 1969 the Canadian government sought detailed information from the United States government on the project. However, at that time environmental studies had not been undertaken and therefore specific details were absent. At that time the United States national environment policy act had not been signed into law. Indeed, it was not signed into law until January 1, 1970.

Meetings were agreed to in 1973 to exchange information and views. However, even by then Canadian authorities were expressing some reservations. By 1973, although available information was still very much incomplete, a very stiff diplomatic note was sent to the United States expressing our concern and demanding assurances that we would not be injured.

It should be noted that during this time period and, indeed, down to this day, a number of organizations in the United States were also raising what United States courts found to be legitimate concerns. In particular, United States courts offered a number of judgments on several factors relating most directly to impacts on wildlife and the adequacy of the environmental assessment process undertaken by the proponents.

In any event, in early 1974 the United States government replied to our 1973 note with the first of a series of assurances that we would be protected, that is, the United States government would, as we would in our turn, honour its treaty commitment under the Boundary Waters Treaty not to pollute waters flowing into Canada to the injury of health and property in Canada. Further it agreed to a process of ensuring that we would be heard and our problems would be taken into account when works which would potentially affect us were under consideration.

The next major step forward was to refer the question to the IJC for an impartial study. The results of that study have already been detailed by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake. In summary, the commission concluded that Canada had every right to be concerned.

Following the IJC study, both Canada and Manitoba have continued to keep the pressure on. The next major development was the proposal by the United States administration, or more properly the Department of the Interior, to Congress, of a plan which would irrigate some 96,000 acres instead of the originally proposed 250,000 acres. In 1979, by means of diplomatic notes and in meetings, Canadian concerns focusing on the problem of biota transfer were expressed concerning those features of the 96,000-acre plan which were common to the original plan, namely, the substantial interbasin transfer of water involved.

During the period from the release of the IJC report until the Canada-United States discussions on the revised plan in 1979, the United States Congress also took note of Canadian concerns. Until after the release of the IJC report, the United States Congress had not specifically indicated that funds for the project were not to be spent on project features directly inimical to Canadian interest unless and until we have been consulted. While we regret that Congress had not earlier taken our concerns into account, the conditions applied after the release of the IJC report have continued.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Borrowing Authority

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, when the House went into private members' hour at five o'clock I was speaking on Bill C-59, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority. At that time I pointed out that the role business and government can play in strengthening our economy is an important one. I stressed that one of the requirements of Canadian business is that it takes an internationalist approach to opportunities for growth in this country. I also stressed that more research and development is required, not necessarily by the federal government alone but also by the business community.

Of course, there is a special role for the federal government. In my opinion the government's attention should be focused on economic policy rather than on disputes over power and jurisdiction. What is needed today is a farsighted and responsible framework of economic policy, including appropriate fiscal and monetary approaches. To bring this about I believe leadership is required, and that leadership must realize the three most important objectives of this government should be the stimulation of private investment, the lowering of the inflationary spiral and the development of petroleum self-sufficiency, all of which could be the springboard for future growth.

Just as I believe that the Canadian businessman has to learn how to work with governments, and in particular the federal government, I also believe that it has to improve its approach to the private sector. If business is to do its job for Canada it needs respect from the government, not confrontation. It needs recognition of its role. It needs room to breathe. It must not be muzzled and smothered by bureaucratic red tape. This has happened under the government's national energy program. The results have been chaotic. Surely it is not too much to ask that the energy antagonists sit down, consult and mediate, for we desperately need an end to the present unnerving uncertainty which the present situation is producing.

Another recurring need for all Canadians is a marked improvement in the efficiency and speed of government decision-making. As I stated earlier, the development of an entire community, namely, the town of Lockeport in Nova Scotia is at a standstill as a result of this government's inability to reach a decision concerning the cost and size of the fisheries processing plant to be replaced. I say to the government, through you, sir, we can and must do better.

Unfortunately, today this government is placing great emphasis on state control. Yet state management of the Canadian National Railways in Nova Scotia leaves much to be desired. For example, on November 5, 1980, we in Nova Scotia were informed by the Canadian Transport Commission that it planned to remove 11 agency positions in our province, eight station buildings and 12 contract on hand representative positions. Of the 11 agency positions to be removed, seven are in my constituency at Chester, Mahone Bay, Lunenburg, Liverpool, Lockeport, Shelburne and Barrington Passage. Of the eight railway stations to be removed seven are in my riding at Chester, Mahone Bay, Lunenburg, Liverpool, Lockeport, Shelburne and Barrington Passage.

Of course, this type of action is a far cry from the promises made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister when he was campaigning for votes in my province—promises which were endorsed by all Liberal candidates campaigning ad infinitum up and down the province. At that time the Prime Minister said, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on January 26, 1980:

> We will use revenues raised through energy taxation to make big projects happen—railway building, pipeline construction, a western electrical grid and coal liquefaction are only a few of the projects that the energy boom could produce.

● (2010)

How can one equate that kind of promise with the actual fact? Is it any wonder that Canadians and Nova Scotians in particular are mistrustful of any promises which are made by this government. Mr. Speaker, if you call a proposal to remove 135 miles of railway line plus eight station buildings in my province a program of building railroads, I do not want to be around if ever a plan or program of railway destruction is developed. Heaven help us down our way.

The strange fact about all these proposals is that they are made at the time when economic conditions on the south shore of my province have been slowly and gradually improving, especially in the Bridgewater area with the advent of Michelin Tire. That town has grown from 4,000 people to 8,000 people. The fisheries are expanding gradually and the Bowaters paper plant in Queen's county is expanding. Yet, with all these improvements, the CNR was unable to get their share of this new business. This leads me to ask, "How much growth and expansion must take place before this state managed CNR can get its share of the action?" Or to put it yet another way, how long will it take Petro-Canada gas stations to follow the scenario I just mentioned with regard to CNR railway stations?

In closing, I wish to remind this government that it cannot provide prosperity within this nation by nationalizing our industries. The most important requirement for prosperity in Canada during the 1980s and into the future is unity. We are one country and I hope we always will be, for it is not only a sound principle, but it makes good economic sense.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about the borrowing authority and the reasons why the government is forced to return to this House of Commons time after time to ask permission to borrow substantial sums of money. I spoke to people last week both in my constituency and in Windsor, many of whom expressed a concern about the way in which the government spends tax dollars. Because of the difficulty for the average individual to meet his or her tax bill, there was a sense among these people that the federal government was not nearly careful enough in the expenditures it undertakes. As one lady said to me, "If it were their own money, I wonder if they would spend it in the same way." I could only answer her that I doubted it very much.

Therefore, on behalf of the people whom I represent and, I believe, on behalf of a large number of people throughout Canada, I would like to express a sense of frustration. Many people have almost reached the point of resignation to the government spending money in a way which they themselves, given the opportunity and the knowledge necessary to make an enlightened decision, would not follow.

The government is borrowing money because it has not managed the economy well. It has run into deficits. Over the years it should have accumulated a surplus because Canada was operating for many years at a considerable high in economic terms. The government ought to have been able during those years to have accumulated a surplus which would have enabled it to offset periods of economic dislocation. Unfortunately, the government never seems to approach its responsibilities in that frame of mind.

With regard to the way in which this bill is written and presented, Mr. Speaker, it is time the government took a long and serious look at what it puts before Parliament. Before the government asks Parliament to approve further indebtedness, surely it has the obligation to file with us in some considerable detail the way in which it intends to use the money for which it seeks authorization to borrow in whatever currency in the world it desires. Surely, there is a requirement for the House of Commons to evaluate the expenditure program of the government against its capacity to raise money domestically before coming to any conclusions about whether or not the government ought to be given the authority to borrow.

Surely there should be a clear statement from the government about the areas of the economy where it feels growth will take place so we in the House may evaluate the projections against government expenditures and revenue potential to determine whether or not there will in fact be the capacity generated over a period of time—one year, two years or ten years—to offset the large amounts of borrowing which takes place.

When the government comes before the House of Commons, and I include the government backbenchers who surely must also answer the same fundamental questions as we on this side must answer when they go to their constituencies, it must explain what it intends to do with the money which it must borrow from the marketplace this year in order to satisfy the fears of people.

Mrs. Appolloni: What about child tax credits?

Mr. Deans: Do not give me that list, I will be coming to it. I would be very cautious about interfering at this point if I were the hon. member. If the government were dealing with a well managed, growing economy and could say that it could stimulate the kind of new, financial resources necessary to meet, for example, the $200 million commitment which it has just made to Massey-Ferguson, then perhaps we as members would be able to answer some of the questions being asked. If the government could show where there would be clear returns to the coffers of the province of Ontario from the approximately $200 million it is about to subscribe to Chrysler, then perhaps we would be able to decide whether it makes some sense and whether some benefits would flow to the Canadian economy which would allow for the generation of the kind of wealth necessary to meet our commitments both in the short term and in the long term. But that is not clear.

Let me outline a picture of what is happening in this country. The average weekly earnings in Canada have risen by 10.6 per cent this year over last year, but the consumer price index has risen by 11.2 per cent. Obviously, from those two statistics, one can draw the conclusion that the taxpayer, given that the consumer price index has risen more rapidly than wages, will be strapped even further both in terms of buying consumer items and in terms of paying taxes.

With regard to the banks, general loans for this year have risen by 17.8 per cent over last year. But at the same time as general loans are rising by 17.8 per cent, housing starts are down by 16.2 per cent, which shows that the money loaned by the banks is not being loaned for housing, but for other purchases. Take the figures I have mentioned and place them with the bankruptcy rate in the farming community, which is up almost 79 per cent, up almost 17 per cent domestically and up almost 17 per cent in the small business sector, and it is obvious that the money being loaned by the banks at the current high rates of interest is in effect undermining the economy. It is not providing the stimulus upon which to build a more stable economy and provide better employment opportunities.

If we examine these four things we see that if wages increase only 10.6 per cent, the consumer price index 11.2 per cent, bank general loans 17.8 per cent and housing starts go down by 16.2 per cent, there will be fewer dollars in the consumer marketplace to buy the products that the vast majority of people must buy if the economy and employment levels are to be maintained.

An hon. member gasped a little when I started to speak. I would say to him that it is important to have an understanding of what is happening in the economy before approving of the government going into the money market for additional funds.

It is clear that the total number of dollars available for consumer purchasing in Canada will continue to go down. The total number of dollars that banks make available for loans will rise and so the indebtedness will rise. The total number of dollars available to buy the goods and services that people must buy if the economy is to regenerate itself simply are not in the market.

If we examine the manufacturing capacity of this country we find that it stands at 78.5 per cent, down from 79.4 per cent last month and 84.8 per cent a year ago.

That is the measure of the other component factors; as there is less money in consumer purchasing power, as we owe more and more to the banks, as there is a decrease in housing starts, as the size of the labour force grows over the number of jobs currently available, then we can only conclude that the ability of the economy to generate sufficient dollars to meet the ongoing expenses, is under severe pressure.

I understand the need of the government to borrow on an ongoing basis, Mr. Speaker, in order to meet current account problems which it is hoped will be offset by increased revenues as the year goes by, but when it comes to the total amount of money spent, then we find that the economy is not moving ahead fast enough to offset the additional expenditures.

That would not be so bad if the government could point to an over-all plan of attack for the development of the economy over the next four or five years, or if it could say that we are going to be able to generate new wealth in the economy and in the process accumulate the necessary cash flow to meet our indebtedness. The government has no such plan, however. There has never been a five-year expenditure program and revenue program put forward by the government. It is clear from the way expenditures are going at the moment that more and more available consumer dollars will be spent on energy and less on the purchase of consumer products. If that is the case we can anticipate that there will be an even further decline in employment opportunities, a further decline in manufacturing capacity usage, a larger increase in the number of people who have to borrow in order to maintain their standard of living and a further increase in the number of bankruptcies.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is necessary that the government place before us some kind of program showing how it proposes to bring about the recovery of the economy it has systematically allowed to be undermined.

Mr. Crosbie: Right on!

Mr. Deans: This is a matter of grave concern, Mr. Speaker. This is no frivolous matter; it is the very essence of our reason for being here. It speaks to what is going to happen to the young people who are Pages in this House and who will be looking for other jobs shortly. It speaks to the problems of my children and those of other people and whether they will be able to earn a living and be able to provide for themselves in the future. This is what we would all like to see.

No doubt my son is watching this debate tonight. I insist upon him doing that; it is a punishment for being my son. I know as he watches tonight he ponders his future and thinks about what he will become. There is not a sufficient number of seats in this House to accommodate the children of all members so there will have to be other jobs for them on the outside. They cannot all find jobs in the press gallery, so somehow or other they will have to find other work. If we do not lay the groundwork for economic stability now, those young people will not be able to find employment that will yield the revenue they will need to maintain the standard of living we have established for them and which we hope will be provided for generations to come.

I am disappointed that the government, through this minister, has chosen to introduce the borrowing authority bill at this time. I would rather the government would bring the budget in earlier and set out a program year by year, not just when it takes a fancy to; that it would show what it proposes to spend in the following 12 months, how the money is to be raised, whatever revenues can be raised and then tell us if there is to be a shortfall, and that during the following 12 or 24 months it will be required to borrow or will be able to repay some of that borrowing from revenues, and some of it will have to be carried as a debt.

I think that kind of financial system would go a long way toward allaying the fears of a great many Canadians who are worried about the kind of government we have, and about its ability to pay the bills.

The government does not spend its own money, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure hon. members know that. It spends our money, the money of people who are not working or who are threatened by the economic downturn; of people who are concerned that their children will not be able to find jobs or who are unable to find jobs themselves within their own communities. All these people are very concerned about the expenditures of government and the way government decides to commit their money.

This afternoon I questioned the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) about his announcement of a $200 million guarantee for Massey-Ferguson shares. I inquired if he could tell us if any of the other five major governments, British, French, German, Italian and the United States are concerned about Massey-Ferguson's future, and had made similar kinds of guarantees? Which governments have been asked and responded with similar kinds of guarantees? Mr. Speaker, only one of the five even entertained Massey and that is only because it had a commitment from Massey to maintain operations in the United Kingdom. That government got a commitment from Massey that it would maintain the Perkins engine plant at Peterborough and would maintain the truck plants in Manchester and Coventry. What the company got from that government was: "Yes, we will assist, but in return for that assistance, we will expect new development to take place in the engine plant." Incidentally, this was guaranteed by Massey. This new development will be an attempt to put together British Leyland and Massey for the production of the new combination diesel petroleum fuel, which is combustion engine fuel. They got commitments from Massey that it would maintain its investment and employment at the tractor plants. But what did we get? The minister says, "Well, we do not have an agreement yet." The minister also says, "Massey is going to do good things." We all hope it is going to do good things. But, damn it, we are committing $200 million which, presumably, we will have to borrow since it is not provided for in the budget. If we do commit $200 million which in government expenditure is not a great sum, but is to the average individual, then the least we can expect from the firm involved is that it makes ironclad commitments against which it has to perform; commitments for employment which require them to pay penalties: penalties which must be paid in other parts of the world if they do not live up to their promises.

There should be commitments in Canada to develop product lines in keeping with world demand. That is what we expect in return. That does not mean we are not prepared to make the commitment of dollars in support of the firm. It means that in return, as in any other enterprise, we would ask that there be a clear and understandable commitment in writing to the Canadian public, to the people who work for Massey-Ferguson, that there will be a significant Massey operation in Canada with a world mandate. That is what the measure of it is. That is what the minister fails to understand. That is what is wrong with the government's expenditure programs. The government commits money without giving any consideration to what the total cost is to the Canadian taxpayer or to whom it will benefit.

The government is now in the midst of negotiations with Chrysler. Chrysler is looking for a continuation of the commitment made last year. Chrysler wants the government to continue to back a $200 million guarantee. But they want that in return for a much reduced commitment of investment. The commitment of investment they made a year ago is not worth the paper on which it is written. What they committed themselves to do in Canada was to build a product line already obsolete. The government then asks that we authorize the borrowing of additional funds while it guarantees loans to major corporations who, through mismanagement, have failed to provide the necessary good judgment to keep the economy of Canada strong. The government has committed moneys to these companies without any tangible way of enforcing the commitments made by the companies to the people of Canada.

I suggest to you, in the event I sound negative only, that the answer to the Chrysler deal is obvious. It was obvious a year ago. It is equally obvious today. We must have investment in Canada proportionate to the total sales in Canada which must be undertaken concurrently with investment in the United States.

If the sales ratio is five in the United States to one in Canada, then we should have 20 cents invested in Canada in new product line and development for every dollar invested in the United States, and each made at the same time. That is commitment. That is measurable. You know then you are going to receive at least a fair opportunity to be part of the new and expanding operation of the Chrysler motor company. I suggest that kind of commitment, together with an equity position in either Chrysler or Massey—or both for that matter—would show sound judgment. It would, therefore, give a large number of people some confidence in voting the necessary authority for this government to go into the marketplace and to borrow even further.

This is what is wrong with the process we go through. There is nothing in the estimates placed before this House for loan guarantees for these companies. We have not had a chance to deal with them anyway, but even when the time comes we would be unable to pass any kind of reasonable judgment about the appropriateness of the money being spent by the government in these undertakings. The minister does not have the common decency to come into the House and place his proposal before the House of Commons. He sneaks off in the dead of night to hold a press conference. He whispers in the ear of the press. Let me say this: it is time the public business of Canada was conducted in the House of Commons.

Mr. Crosbie: Right on.

Mr. Deans: It is time this government started to accept its commitment to spend tax dollars in a reasonable, sensible and understandable way.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, there are as many problems about granting this government, as there are with almost any government, the unfettered use of borrowing power. Over the years I have felt it would have made more sense if the government were required to come back quarterly to this House for approval. Perhaps the government should come back at the end of each quarter and present its expenditure requirements for the next quarter so that we would have a handle on what is going on. Right now the House of Commons and the Members of Parliament do not have a handle on the expenditures of the government, its borrowing or the degree to which government exercises reasonable control over fiscal matters of the country.

As a result of the way in which this government has operated over the last number of years, and as it obviously continues to operate, what we will see is this government taking upon itself responsibilities which were never intended to be granted to the executive branch. It will have spent money long before it ever tells the House of Commons about the methods to be used to raise that money. It expects in return that we in the House of Commons will approve borrowing as if somehow or other it did not make any sense or any difference; or that it simply did not matter.

When I was speaking of the auto industry I wanted to draw into the picture the state of that industry. I was speaking of Chrysler and what I would do were I given the power—and God help I should ever have it—to make the decision. I know exactly how I would deal with Chrysler. I think the majority of Canadians would deal with Chrysler in the same way. In fact, I am sure they would. Many people have suggested to me that they cannot understand the government's motivation and attitude. I have said the government's motivation is political, but no one understands the government's attitude.

A study has been published, which shows the auto industry in this province, which is basically the auto industry of this country as it is substantially located here, is in very serious trouble. A major plan of redevelopment will have to take place for the auto industry if it is to survive in anything like the way it operated over the last 15 or 20 years. The study was done in the province of Ontario. I am sure you are aware of it, Mr. Speaker, but I want to refresh your memory as to the detail. The study was done for the provincial treasurer of the province of Ontario, at his behest. It predicts that the recouping of lost jobs foreseen in the coming year could be a shortlived relief. It says that the jobs which will be gained in the short run will be short run jobs, and that by 1985 Ontario could have 35,000 fewer assembly and parts plant jobs than the nearly 100,000 it had in 1978. Incidentally, that is consistent with what I have been trying to tell the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the last year. It suggests that Ontario will be saddled with the sort of vehicle and parts production which is rapidly becoming obsolete, and that is consistent with what I have been telling the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the last year. There may not be the money or the willingness to convert some plants to the production of better selling vehicles if the rough years ahead spell doom for Chrysler, gloom for Ford, and a heavy debt load for General Motors. That, as you will recall, sir, is consistent with what I have been telling the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the last year. This report simply backs up the analysis which many of us who are familiar with the industry have been making about the industry.

● (2040)

You will recall that when I came back from meetings in the United States, I explained there were serious problems ahead for the automobile industry and that we must have a vehicule for putting back together an automobile industry which would have a stake in Canada.

The report goes on to say:

> The Auto Pact has become irrelevant. If we have favourable costs for labour, steel and power, then we should be better than 10 per cent of North American production and that's what we should press for.

That is what I have been saying to the minister for the past year.

The report goes on to say that Ford at the moment, although it is doing reasonably well:

> —isn't selling enough full sized cars to use the plant capacity of 650,000 engines a year—

You will recall that that is the whole operation, for which they were given some $65 million about three years ago. I could not very well stop that here, but I tell you, sir, I explained what was going on to the then minister of finance of Ontario, Mr. McKeough, and to the premier of Ontario at the time. I pointed out to them that what would happen would be a rip-off, and that is exactly what happened.

The report goes on to state:

> It is highly probable that by 1985, General Motors will have the only engine plant in Ontario, and after 1985 there might be no engine production at all.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the Ontario engine and component production was worth $2 billion in 1978? This report is saying that unless there is a serious attempt by the government and by industry to put back together this vital part of the economy of this country, it is entirely possible that by the year 1985 we will have lost another $2 billion industry in this country.

The article goes on to say that:

> The domestic producers plan to import 1.8 million engines from Japan, Mexico, Brazil and Germany for the U.S. and Canadian markets in 1983. The Auto Pact allows the engines to be brought to Canada duty free.

What I am saying to you, Mr. Speaker, is that if we are going to have a recovery in the automobile industry in Canada, we cannot allow it to be dictated by decisions in Washington. We must make decisions in Canada for Canadians, and we must understand that the automobile industry has a stake in this country and an obligation to provide the kind of economic stimulus which its stake obviously should be able to provide.

There is a substantial market in this country, large by any world measure. It is being eroded by a continual lack of foresight on the part of the auto industry. I suggest it is time this House of Commons demanded of the government that it set before us a joint plan for action, a plan which involves both the industry itself and those of us who have an interest in the redevelopment of that industry for the future use of Canadians, both in terms of jobs and in terms of maximizing the manufacturing capacity which will, in the future, create the kind of stability we must have.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when I said to you earlier that wages had risen, but not as much as the cost of living, and therefore the number of available dollars for purchasing consumer products, such as automobiles, had fallen, and that bank interest rates, bankruptcy and higher number of dollars out for loans were undermining the economy, I was suggesting to the minister it is time we stopped dealing with these things in isolation. We cannot deal with them in isolation any longer.

You cannot talk about borrowing authority as if it were not tied into anything else. You cannot talk about Chrysler as if it were not tied to the remainder of the automobile industry. You cannot talk about Massey-Ferguson without understanding that the farming community's level of bankruptcies is at an all time high, that the cash flow of that community is down, and that they cannot purchase the products that could be manufactured, even if Massey-Ferguson were willing. But, more important, if the government is going to become a source of revenue for private industry, as it now appears it will be, then, for heaven's sake, place before us the over-all strategy necessary to make enlightened decisions about where this government is leading us, about where this government is hoping to go, and at least put in place the checks and balances, the methods which can be used to evaluate the performance of these companies which stand with their trunks in the trough, sucking out the tax dollars of people who can ill afford to pay them in the first place.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, I find it a most frustrating experience to have to deal with a government which does not seem to understand that there is a relationship between what you can spend, what you can borrow, what you can raise, and what people can afford to pay. I say it is past the time for the government to show us and the people of Canada clearly what it is it intends to do by way of the development of an over-all economic and industrial policy which will assist the recovery in the short run, while at the same time laying the ground work for the kind of stability and job opportunities we all know should be here in a country with such fabulous wealth, in a country which has by far the most in terms of natural and human resources. There can be no excuse for the kind of mismanagement that has been allowed to occur by this government over a long period of time. There certainly can be no excuse for failing to come to grips with it now that it is so evident.

I therefore suggest it is wrong to expect that we should, with a shrug and a wink, pass on to the government the authority to borrow again before we can see clearly how it expects to spend and to repay what it already owes.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us contains only two clauses. Yes, that is all it takes to authorize the government to borrow $14 billion for the fiscal year 1981-82. The bill seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currency as well as in a Canadian dollar. The amount covers the projected budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements tabled in the October 28, 1980 budget, $10.98 billion, excluding foreign exchange transactions. It also requests that all borrowing authority conferred by the bill which remains unused shall expire March 31, 1982, except for unused authority under $3 billion.

The budget's forecast financial requirements of nearly $11 billion are exceeded by the request for $14 billion. In other words, the government has produced a confusing, conflicting budget which will spend about $14 billion more than it will take in. That is an increase of $3.9 billion over what the Crosbie budget projected as a deficit. In fact, the budget will cost $2,730 for every man, woman and child in the nation.

It would be much easier to support this bill if the deficit were in the form of an investment in infrastructure or projects which would build the areas of this country that suffer from regional disparity. They would then incur the great dividend of being able to help themselves.

The Atlantic provinces now receive one-half of their revenue from Canada, and that is a deplorable situation which cannot continue. This budget deficit, however, does very little to help solve that problem and thus reduce the need for continuing and increasing assistance to the have-not provinces.

One of the aspects of expenditure, the legacy of budgets which continually weaken our dollar, erode our personal savings and drive investment away, is that now nearly one dollar out of every four dollars goes toward paying off the national debt. I do not begrudge one cent spent on regional development because I realize that this is a giant stride toward reducing transfer payments and social justice payments to assist Canadians who, through no fault of their own, find themselves unemployment or underemployed.

But I believe there are some very real areas where savings could be made. After a series of order paper questions I have developed the fact that in general almost every department of government has seconded people from the Department of Justice to add to their growing empires and use as resident legal talent. In addition, almost every department of government has a highly recognizable public relations department. Let me suggest to the minister and to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that one area which should require early attention is that of requiring one department of government to supply a service for another. What I have in mind is that the Department of Justice should supply the legal services for all the departments of government and that this service should not take the form of adding another administrative officer or another section to a department. I think the minister should consider and address the question of whether Department of Justice personnel should be dispersed at all or as generously as they are at the moment.

I feel this is even more important in the field of public relations; only one department should supply the services for all others. In my opinion, there is costly duplication going on, and it should be stopped.

In this regard I dislike very much seeing our tax dollars, more than $60 million of them, being spent on public advertising campaigns conducted by the government. There may be occasions when this is necessary, but I suggest this is one area which bears much more careful scrutiny.

I believe that the spending of millions of dollars on interior landscaping, together with the thousands of dollars which are spent on objects of art which are located on, in or around our public buildings and appear, to my uncultured eye, to resemble more closely escapees from a junk yard, should be stopped until the budget is balanced and then, and only then, should we address the question of how to decorate our public offices. Personally, I think we should sponsor a series of paintings depicting Canadians at work; women in New Brunswick picking potatoes, fishermen off the coast of Newfoundland, coal miners deep down in the mine shafts of Cape Breton, prairie farmers, trappers in the north, lumber men in Quebec and factory workers in Ontario. There should be pictures and paintings of the taxpayers of Canada who work so very hard to make ends meet and are required to pay federal taxes. That is the type of art work I would like to see adorning the hallowed chambers of our government offices. I think the example set by pictures and paintings by these hard-working Canadians is one worth following.

It has come to my attention that some very small changes in operations have resulted in some very considerable savings. For example, a very slight change in the quality of paper has the potential of saving over $100,000 in printing costs in the House of Commons. A change in the method of purchasing pallets of paper has saved $10,000, and I believe between $20,000 and $30,000 is being saved in the purchase of cleaning materials. I have already complimented the officials involved and encouraged them to continue to move in this direction. I am sure all hon. members who, like myself, are quick to criticize will also be quick to praise the officials responsible for these commendable activities.

I have other suggestions which I will be making in committee, but I want to deal tonight with two major ways in which we can stop a tremendous output of money from the federal treasury.

One of our major expenditures is in subsidizing imported oil. This will be well over $4 billion this year. That is no small factor in the federal deficit and the rate of inflation. In coming years, as new and unconventional sources of oil are brought onstream, Canada can become self-sufficient. That is the bottom line answer to this drain. It will not be easy, but it is possible. Oil is there in the oil sands or under the water. The problem is to get it out.

The solutions to the economic situation lay largely in solving the energy problem, and this in turn requires three basic elements. Ottawa and Edmonton must make peace and create a climate in which the private oil industry can work effectively.

The oil price must be raised to levels sufficient to generate revenue for energy exploration and development, but consistent with the development of our nation and a shelter for Canadians in the lower and middle-income group. Ordinary Canadians everywhere must do all they can to cut down on fuel waste.

An exploration boom in Canada would result in a boom for Canadian industries which supply goods to the oil industry and its employees. The spin-off benefits would spread across the entire nation. This problem can only be solved if our people take the broad view, not thinking just of their city or region but of the entire country. If all Canadians work together, we can end our dependence on insecure supplies of oil from foreign countries at constantly increasing prices. I believe this is the first major step to restoring stability to the Canadian economy.

Another way in which we must move to reduce the large and growing amount of transfer payments to the have-not provinces is to help these have-not provinces build their infrastructures so they can become self-sufficient in the long run, and reduce their dependence on the central government in the medium term. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is the government's instrument for moving in this direction, and it has done much to commend it.

The key to DREE's success is a broad scope and narrow focus. Its success depends on the extent to which every department of government is given a development mission, which is not diminished by being spread across the country but, instead, is focused on regions of disparity.

In the war against regional disparity DREE must be in the forefront of the battle. That means it has to be adequately funded to carry out its responsibilities. This has not been happening. In 1969 DREE's budget was 2 per cent of the federal budget, while in 1980 it was about 1 per cent. In 1970-71, 53 per cent of DREE's budget was allocated to the Atlantic provinces. In 1977-78 this dropped to 38 per cent.

The erosion of the DREE budget must stop; it should be restored to its original profile and purpose. Giving every department of government a development dimension, restoring the vitality of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and making it the leader in assisting areas which suffer from regional disparity require the personal attention, commitment and active participation of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). He must vest in his minister responsible for regional economic expansion the power to give leadership in this field and to require it of other departments of government. Without it the concept of regional economic expansion is threatened.

● (2100)

It is not difficult when one looks at the per capita incomes and the family unemployment rate of Canadians in the various provinces of Canada to identify the Atlantic provinces as one region that requires this attention. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has helped the have-not areas of the country provide public services at national standards they could not afford to perform themselves. DREE has been particularly helpful to small business and I would like to just say a word about it.

The greatest complaint I hear from small business is about the amount of paper work. Strings attached to government programs cost more than the assistance is worth in some cases. Eighty-eight per cent of the Canadian work force or nine million people are employed by firms with fewer than 100 employees and less than $5 million in annual sales according to a national accounting firm. These firms account for 20 per cent of the gross national product or $40 billion annually in sales. They are particularly dominant in service industries and retail trades.

Small businesses are prime sources of risk taking and innovation. They respond quickly to changes in business conditions because they are not burdened down by bureaucracy, and because they are regionally based they are highly receptive to local needs and tend to promote balanced development.

According to Thorne Riddell, a highly respected national firm of chartered accountants, a recent study found that 80 per cent of new business cease operations within three years of opening. Fraud, over-expansion and problems with key products account for 24 per cent of the problems. But the really serious matter which causes 70 per cent of all business failures is management shortcomings. Many small business operators it seems do not have the skills needed to plan, forecast, control and lead their firms.

Small business is the most efficient job creator and what small business operators need more than anything else is access to basic decisions and general support even in the form of constructive advice. What they do not need is more paperwork. This is something for us to seriously consider as we try to reduce our expenditures and create more taxpayers by creating more jobs and supporting more small businesses.

The government finds itself in severe economic straits and extremely limited in the options before it because of the hodge-podge of economic theories that have been the government's trademark over the past two decades. There is a great need to enable members of Parliament to play a more meaningful role in eliminating waste and extravagance and in developing more efficient government administration.

We must urge the government to seek a balanced growth across all of the nation, with business development and job creation in all parts of Canada. We must address the problem of moving people from unemployment to employment, from social assistance to income earning. By creating more taxpayers to share the burden we can reduce the burden of taxes on all Canadians.

Instead we seem to have moved into the simplistic solution of expanding the money supply that feeds the fires of inflation, and now the government deals with inflation in the traditional and classical way, by employing monetary policies which in effect feed the fires of unemployment.

When the government's anti-inflation policies close manufacturing plants or cause lay-offs of employees, production drops and we have the classical situation where the drop in supply is more dramatic than the drop in demand. With too many buyers chasing too few goods, prices go up, again feeding the fires of inflation. The government's policies for dealing with inflation are counterproductive. Short-term solutions have become long-term tragedies.

A preferable answer is to abandon the spectre of nineteenth century solutions to twentieth century problems, and deal with and address the reality of today. Our aging production facilities need to be rejuvenated and the key to that rejuvenation surely is research and development.

The winds of change are blowing in advanced industrial states and the signs of change are apparent in Canada too. The leading performers in our Canadian economy are firms that produce high technology products and systems. These firms provide good jobs for their employees and require support services that directly or indirectly involve almost every trade.

The government somehow has to learn the lesson that one of the elements in combatting inflation is to increase the supply of goods, both domestically and in our export markets, so that prices go down and more Canadians are employed and become taxpayers sharing the burden of government. Then taxes can go down and the demand for social services can be reduced.

With more taxpayers each carrying a smaller burden the Canadian economy can move forward, our expenditures can be reduced, our incomes maintained, our standard of living can be improved and we can develop a tax system that deals fairly with Canadians in the lower and middle-income group. Then we can deal fairly with our senior citizens who are eking out a slender living on small incomes that are being constantly eroded by the ravages of inflation.

We can enable senior citizens to live in their own homes as long as they are able to do so, and treat them with compassion and understanding when they are not. There are many things we can do in this country if we adopt enlightened economic policies. As long as the government continues on the treacherous path on which it is embarked we are never going to balance our budget, control inflation, create jobs and help disadvantaged Canadians to the extent they require.

Economic policies implemented by this government for the whole nation have a tragic impact in the Atlantic provinces where the frail economies of that region are the first hit, the hardest hit and the last to recover from policies of restraint, tight money and restricted credit. The government's restraint program sees practically no federal public works projects creating employment in the province of New Brunswick this winter.

The dredging of the Miramichi River included in the estimates passed in this House last year has not taken place. The extension of the St. Leonard airport runway is not even on the drawing board. The tender calls for the training centre for Canadian Forces Base Gagetown and the "J" divisional headquarters for the RCMP are set back a year. The Dalhousie-Belledune port study is moving at a snail's pace and so is the market square project in Saint John. Port and harbour development in Saint John has not had a word of good news since the Conservative government left office.

DREE's participation in highway development in New Brunswick is diminished. The development of oil shale in New Brunswick, which has a potential as big as Hibernia—15 billion barrels of oil locked in the shale—is so far down on the National Energy Program inventory you need a telescope to find it. Why is this so?

For one reason the government is preoccupied with the constitutional issue to the exclusion of economic priorities. With over 30 cabinet ministers falling all over each other it seems no one can initiate action on the serious economic problems facing Canada at least until the Prime Minister becomes a modern day father of confederation.

In the meantime, the Canadian economy is in bad shape and is rapidly getting worse. Consider the Canadian National Express cutbacks which will result in 540 lost jobs in eastern Canada. What was the major factor in the losses that led to the cutbacks? A Financial Post article makes it clear that mismanagement was the major factor. It is a familiar story. A Crown corporation does not have the incentive to be efficient; that is the incentive provided by the profit motive.

However, the Canadian National Express has a special responsibility. A private company concerned only with profit can concentrate on the high volume customers and routes and forget about the average little Canadian who wants to send an odd-shaped Christmas parcel. CN Express as a public company has an obligation to serve the average little Canadian even if it makes no profit or actually loses money in so doing.

In recent years CN Express has become largely a trucking operation rather than a rail operation. But as fuel becomes more expensive it is likely the rail operations will become more and more important. The point has been made often that rail is far more energy efficient than highway transportation. With every increase in the price of oil, with the growing uncertainty and insecurity caused by strife in the Middle East, it becomes more imperative that Canada rebuild its rail system to the standard of comfort and efficiency that already is a fact in Europe and Japan.

● (2110)

In the United States, while state governments are cutting back on funding for freeways and building up their rail systems, Canada is allowing Canadian National Express to lead the way downhill for this important segment of our transport economy. The government should stand firm against these cutbacks and press for an improvement in all rail services, freight, express and passenger.

Mr. Pepin: Did you write that?

Mr. Howie: If the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) listens, he will learn something.

It is not enough to play the old army game in saying we will close two-thirds of the operations in the maritime provinces and hope that people will say, when one station in Cape Breton and one in Charlottetown are kept open on a reduced scale, it could have been worse. This old trick will not work any more because maritimers have been fooled once too often, and in the maritimes people like little to be fooled.

It is intolerable that in the city of Fredericton rail travellers have to begin and end their journeys with a bus trip. They have the rails in place and they have the station. All it takes is an enlightened minister of transport to give the green light to the railways. This will help Canada conserve energy and put in place a modern rail transportation system.

I have now come full circle. I am right back where I started. I am advocating that Members of Parliament be given a meaningful role in enabling us to cut waste and extravagance. I believe the Canadian taxpayer should be given more value for his dollar. I believe that a major change in the economic policies of our government can reduce government expenditures by investing, instead of spending, in regional economic expansion. I believe energy self-sufficiency built on co-operation and mutual trust can be accomplished. I believe this nation has the resources and educated population to create jobs for all Canadians and, by increasing the number of taxpayers, reduce the burden on everyone. In that way we can balance our budget and reduce our taxes. All it takes is the will, the ingenuity, the hard work and the leadership. Right now we are waiting for the leadership, and we have been waiting a very long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House this evening is a very important one for all Canadians. If we talk about parliamentary history, the reason for this bill goes right back to the beginnings of Parliament. I am sure some members were better history students than myself, but if they remember their history, back in 1066 King John met a group of his knights at Runnymede. They informed him they would no longer blanketly pay money to the Crown unless they had some kind of a say.

Some hon. Members: It was in 1215.

Mr. Mayer: I am sorry, I have the date wrong. It was in 1215. I am sure 1066 was close enough for the government which I am sure operates in much that way; a few hundred million dollars or a few hundred years here or there does not really make a lot of difference. I thank hon. members for the correction. The principle or the point is still valid. People were tired of paying money to the Crown without having a say in how the money would be spent. That complaint was continued, and today we have an entire institution based on the precedent that the government should be held accountable for its spending.

As governments spend more and more, by definition they become less and less accountable for their expenditures. We have what amounts to one vote every four years on a multitude of things, from how the Post Office works, to our foreign affairs policies, to a multitude of internal workings in Crown corporations, to transportation systems, and to everything else. What happens is that a lot of these decisions are diluted in the electoral process. Under normal circumstances a voter has only one vote every four years in which to cast judgment upon the performance of the government in all these areas.

I would argue that as opposition members we have very little say, if any, in calling into account the government's spending. We know how the committee system works. I have been here for almost two years, and that is long enough to know what it meant to take estimates out of the House and put them into committee. It gives opposition members a lot less power in terms of calling the government to order with respect to its spending. Also it has diluted considerably our jobs as members of Parliament to represent the people who elected us and to hold the government of the day accountable for the amount of money it collects in the way of taxes and the way in which it spends it.

What disturbs me and a lot of members on this side of the House is that we have now gone beyond the point of having any accountability for the way the government spends its money, yet we are being asked to blanketly approve and give the government authority to borrow money, without any real signal from the government as to what it intends to spend it on. We do not want to know down to the last cent on what the government intends to spend it, but it would be nice to have an idea as to the general direction of government spending.

I have to agree with the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) who called into question some of the spending practices of the government. I ask them to give some priority to spending money in terms of some infrastructure or investment so the citizens of the country will be in a position where they can be more productive. In that sense it is an investment and it will show a return. We are not given any indication of this by the government.

In fact, one of the major government expenditures in the budget will be the payment of interest on past government debt. We do not see any direction in this current bill as to how that situation will be alleviated. The last estimates I saw indicated that something like $11 billion of the current budget will be used to pay interest on past government debt. I think this is an horrendous figure.

I do not think any of us can talk about millions or billions of dollars and have it mean very much. I have heard members attempting to explain it by laying dollar bills end to end and this kind of thing. But, to talk about it in terms of a percentage, it means that one out of every $4 in taxes the government collects from its citizens will be used to pay interest on past government debt. It will not be used to finance any programs. I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) here this evening. It will not be used to help him solve the transportation problem in western Canada. It will not be used to build any new facilities for people in eastern Canada. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is also here. It will not be used to finance any research in agricultural programs in order to help the farmers of the country be more productive. I have seen some of the minister's recent speeches in which he talked about Canada becoming more self-sufficient as far as food is concerned rather than importing it. This $11 billion, which will go to pay the interest on past government debt, will not tackle any of the problems the Minister of Agriculture rightly pointed out require some attention. This is something the taxpayers of the country have a right to know. They should know what in fact the government is planning on doing with this $14 billion.

If the government had some intention of spending it on improving the productivity of the country, we would all think that worth while. Perhaps we would not agree in which areas it should be spent, but, nevertheless, we would agree in principle it was a valid expenditure in the sense that it was an investment and hopefully would return some dividends to the country. We have not been given any such indication at all. In fact, quite to the contrary, the government is asking for almost $11 billion or $10.98 billion. In addition it is asking for $3 billion as a contingency.

All of us operate small businesses in that we run our own personal affairs, operate households, balance budgets, and on occasion borrow money. If we went in to see our bankers in order to borrow some money, the banker would ask, "Why do you want to borrow this $1,400?" What would happen if we indicated we required $1,100 to meet certain commitments—and we understand some of the commitments in the budget in front of us—and that we needed $300 for contingencies, but did not say what the contingencies were for? I am not so sure the banker would be very happy, in terms of the documentation which we were giving to him to back up the need for our loan. Yet that is exactly what this government is doing. The only difference is that in this case the government is asking the taxpayers of the country to act as its banker and it is not telling us the elected Members of Parliament what, in fact, it plans on using this money for. I will get into that aspect later.

But there are all kinds of suggestions as to what the government could be using this money for. What would make sense to me and what would find favour—I am not saying complete favour because given the nature of the opposition I think sometimes we can oppose things for the sake of opposing them—if the government needed additional money it would see fit to have some confidence, in the members who are in this House, come back to us in eight or nine months, or whatever, and say, "We need additional money". In that case we could then talk about the specifics of the $3 billion it needed at that time. We are simply being asked at this time to approve a blanket borrowing of $14 billion, made up of $11 billion, $10.98 billion which they need for specifics, plus an additional $3 billion that is not identified. The government just says it needs it for contingencies. I would see nothing wrong—and I think we would be much more inclined to let this bill pass—if the government would simply ask for the $11 billion now and say in six months time that it wished to present a bill asking for $3 billion more.

In terms of fiscal sanity or fiscal management that makes sense to me. I see no reason why that course could not be followed. It would certainly make Parliament a more accountable place. I think Parliament is becoming less accountable all the time. This would give us in the opposition a much better chance to scrutinize the kind of spending the government wants to carry out on behalf of the people who elect us and send us here, at great expense I might add.

I would like to talk a bit about the kind of example which the government sets. We have seen much controversy in my part of the country, western Canada, in the past several years regarding our transportation system. I think people are aware that we have lacked the adequate transportation facilities to take advantage of the amount of grain production which we are not only capable of producing but, more important, which is in very great demand around the world. I think a commonly accepted figure—although it is hard to put an exact figure on it, and it can be an estimate at best—is that during the past two or three crop years we have lost a half a billion dollars in sales, in terms of exporting grain from western Canada to customers around the world. Admittedly, a half a billion dollars does not sound like a lot of money in terms of the budgetary deficits this government is facing, but half a billion dollars, in terms of sales of grain, which we had on hand, is a sizeable amount of money. It is a sizeable amount of production, as far as grain farmers are concerned. This figure is for actual sales of grain which we had to deliver but could not get into export position because of our poor transportation facilities. That is one side of the coin.

The other side of the coin is more important. It is our potential. We all know that farmers, given an opportunity to produce, are very ingenious people. They will produce if they are given that opportunity and, above all, an incentive. Had we been able to move the additional half billion dollars worth of grain we would then have had empty grain bins, money in circulation and the incentive for grain producers to produce more. To my mind, we lost at least an additional billion dollars in terms of potential production and sales, had we been selling and transporting to market the grain we have on hand in western Canada now. That is a lot of money, Mr. Speaker. It involves more than just a half billion dollars or a billion dollars.

Farmers are well known for being good spenders. Once they get money they spend it; they spend it on machinery, repairs, and on fertilizers. Much of it is recirculated throughout the rest of the country, and in this way it is spent many times over. That spending and respending, in economic jargon, is called "the multiplier effect". You can talk in terms of spending that money two or three times over. This very easily leads you to a figure of $3 billion or $4 billion, in terms of additional economic activity in our economy.

I have figures in front of me from the Parliamentary Library which show the share of the GNP or the total amount of expenditure which the federal government can take from that amount of money. It equates to roughly 30 per cent of it. If we take 30 per cent of, say, $4 billion in additional economic activity throughout the economy, we see there is a net benefit to the government by way of tax income of a billion dollars. That is an estimate but it could very easily happen. That billion dollars could go a considerable way toward cutting down the requirements of this government's borrowing needs.

As I emphasized, these are the kinds of measures I think the federal government should be taking. It should be taking the lead in seeing that we do have a transportation system which will give us a chance, not only in western Canada, to produce and generate economic activity, provide jobs and income for our families. This would create spin-offs which would accrue to other parts of the country. As has been pointed out many times before, a lot of this money would accrue to central Canada where most of the manufacturing takes place. It would accrue to companies such as Massey-Ferguson, which we know is in financial difficulties. These are the areas in which this measure would help. We would not need some of the bailouts and government activity we see the government now involved in with some of these larger companies. To my mind these are the kinds of measures the government should be taking a lead in, and seeing that they are accomplished.

I must be critical here, despite the fact that I am not really a partisan person. I would like to see the government get its act together in terms of what it is saying with respect to the Crow rate. The Minister of Agriculture was in Edmonton a week ago where he talked about the Crow rate. I will quote a passage from a speech he gave to the Alberta Rapeseed Growers Association on January 29, 1981. He said:

> I know that you people in this room have a variety of opinions on the Crow rate yourselves. You say let's make a decision. Well, I'm of that opinion too. And I feel the question must be settled soon—I would say by the start of the next crop year if possible.

In terms of the way the government operates, I think that is a pretty optimistic statement, given the background of the Crow rate and how it is imbedded in politics in western Canada.

The minister responsible for the Wheat Board in the other place stated to the press just over the weekend that he really did not care if the Crow rate was ever settled. As far as he could see it was a benefit to western Canada and he did not care if it was ever settled at all. We have the Minister of Agriculture saying he would like to see it settled, hopefully by the start of the next crop year, which is August 1, 1981. We have the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board saying he does not know whether it needs to be settled at all.

I will now talk about the Minister of Transport, who I see in the chamber. I know he has been trying to get some support in cabinet in respect of putting a position paper through for presentation to the farmers of western Canada. This would get some kind of discussion going and some kind of consensus in terms of what should be done with the Crow rate. Essentially, we have three ministers of the Crown taking different attitudes on the same issue.

The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board spoke to the western agriculture conference about two weeks ago, and said that the ballgame was back in the producers' court. He wanted to see the producers arrive at a consensus before the government did anything.

I would argue that if the government would show an example, and if it could arrive at a consensus—keeping in mind that I have just referred to the position of three ministers very vitally involved and they are all different—then maybe they could go to the producers and tell them to arrive at a consensus because the government had done so. It seems to me very presumptuous for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to castigate producers by saying that nothing will happen until the producers arrive at a consensus on this very emotional subject. It is an issue which is very much imbedded in western Canada in terms of its economic history, in terms of its political history and in terms of its settlement history. He asks the producers of western Canada to arrive at a consensus when, in fact, the three ministers responsible cannot do so.

These are the kinds of things which I think deserve some attention on the part of the government. As far as the federal government is concerned, leadership is essential. I just went through the arithmetic to point out that there should be some onus, if the federal government is taking some of its responsibilities seriously, to settle this issue, because it will result in a net benefit not only for western Canada but for the whole country.

I could go on and talk about the stupid things we have been doing with Mirabel. I understand that the subsidy Mirabel needs to remain in operation is something in the range of $1 million a week. It costs us $50 million a year. The Minister of Transport is shaking his head. Am I too low? Is it higher than that?

Mr. McKenzie: It is $52 million.

Mr. Mayer: I was giving the minister the benefit of the doubt, since I like to round off my figures.

● (2130)

It was indicated in a press release just this past week that the government intends to disassemble and sell off some of the land surrounding Mirabel. If it had been handling things in a business way, it would not have bought all this land for which it no longer has a need. The money spent on this land could have been spent toward the infrastructure about which some hon. members have talked this evening. Such expenditures would have returned dividends to the country, perhaps to the extent that the government would not be asking for all this borrowing authority.

I understand that because of the price of gasoline in Canada, people are crossing the Canada-U.S. border to buy gas at our cheaper rates. Before Christmas, I travelled to North Dakota where I spoke to some farm equipment dealers. I learned that farmers with hundred gallon tanks under their pick-up trucks were crossing the line into Canada to buy our gasoline at roughly 50 cents per gallon cheaper. Some hon. members have constituencies close to the United States border and are aware of this situation.

Mirabel is another case in point. As I understand it, several foreign airlines land at Mirabel simply to refuel. They do not unload or pick up passengers or freight.

Mr. Pepin: That is no longer.

Mr. Mayer: It seems as though Canada is trying to become the Santa Claus of the world. I do not know how we can continue like this.

Mr. Pepin: It is much better than a Crow rate at Mirabel.

Mr. Mayer: If we are spending money in the Crow rate, at least it will be used to get some of our products to world markets thereby earning foreign exchange or allowing us to trade for Japanese cameras or whatever. But to allow foreign carriers to land at Mirabel to take on gasoline which is subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer is setting Canada up with its 22 million population as the Santa Claus of the world.

Mr. Pepin: It is not true.

Mr. Mayer: I hope this practice has stopped. The information which I had is that this was occurring before Christmas.

Mr. Pepin: Do not believe everything you hear.

An hon. Member: It is a white elephant.

Mr. Mayer: The hon. member has referred to a white elephant. If the government had been spending our money wisely, it would not be going through the process of getting rid of the surplus land around Mirabel.

I would like to say a few words about a couple of programs of the Department of Agriculture which have been in operation over the past year. I see the Minister of Agriculture is present in the House. I know he is aware of and has been concerned with the Agricultural Stabilization Act as it applies to hog producers. The abbreviation for the Agricultural Stabilization Act is ASA. We all know that ASA stands for acetylsalicylic acid which is aspirin. The way in which this act has been administered has given many producers a big headache.

For example, some producers who lost money in the previous fiscal year ending March 31 have sent in applications to the Department of Agriculture which, as I understand it, will not be mailing out some of those cheques until this March. This means that some of the producers who were counting on that money will have waited one year before receiving payment. If the producers looked after their hogs in the way the government is administering this plan, most of the hogs in this country would be dead and there would be no need for the plan because the producers would be out of business.

Weaning operators were not named under this plan. However, the minister, in his wisdom, realized that many of these producers had a legitimate complaint and took the appropriate action. It seems to me that if we can name a cow-calf operator as a beneficiary of the act, there should be no reason why we could not name the weaning operator as a beneficiary. Essentially these producers are producing the same kind of commodity, namely, a young animal for further finishing. This group is eligible for payment under this act of $1 per head, but they will not receive their payments until after the payments have been made to the hog producers. These people could be waiting for over a year to receive their payment.

With the sophisticated equipment available to the government for keeping records and printing cheques, certainly a system could be put in place whereby this assistance could be made available to the producers at a time closer to the production period in which the producer had a financial problem. If the payments are not made closer to that period in time, then the benefits accruing under the plan are largely ephemeral because by the time the producer has received his cheque he has gone out of business or he has survived on his own. In either case, the payment is of little value in terms of some producers remaining in business, and that is the intent of the plan.

In some respects the Agricultural Stabilization Act is a good measure because it gives the producer the assurance of meeting some of his variable costs in periods of high production and low prices. I know the minister will say that if the producers had a better marketing system they would not need this Agricultural Stabilization Act, because they would have a guaranteed price under a tightly controlled supply management system.

One wonders because of this slowness in payments to the producers if the Department of Agriculture is not trying to force some of the producers into these supply management programs for cattle and hogs with which the minister is so much in favour. I urge the minister to take seriously his responsibility to livestock producers in Canada and consider the financial plight of many of these producers because of low prices, when the Agricultural Stabilization Act comes into play. I urge the minister to do as much as he can within his department and with Treasury Board to get these payments out closer to the production period so they will have some meaning to the producer.

I am also concerned about the way in which the herd maintenance program has been administered. I realize the program was hurriedly set up because of the drought situation in western Canada and parts of northwestern Ontario this spring. The announcement of the plan was welcomed and I for one thought it was a good plan. Money was simply made available to producers on a per head basis. The producer was then free to decide what he would like to do with the money; whether he would buy feed from his neighbour or from further away and pay transportation costs. The producer could decide whether he would bale straw or buy grain. The producer received money which he could use according to his management decisions. The program was good simply because an individual operating with his own money will make the best use of that money. When the government said it would help the producer to maintain his breeding herd of cattle, the producer was not obligated to take part in one specific plan, transportation program or whatever to become eligible for assistance.

Under the initial plan, $140 was available for each dairy cow, and $70 per beef cow to a maximum of 300 head. Subsequently the plan was cut down to $70 per dairy cow and $35 for each beef cow. I talked to one producer who said that he would have been better off had the government kept out of the matter and not announced any plan at all. As the result of the original price allotment the price of feed went up in my area from $50 to $70 and $80 per ton. When the government cut the initial allotment by half, the producer was forced to pay more for the price of hay than he would receive per head from the program.

I do not know why the government chose to spend as much money as it did advertising the herd maintenance program in western Canada in the printed media, radio and television. If it had used the expertise which apparently was available to develop that sophisticated advertising program and put it into the substance of the program itself, everyone would have been better off. That was only the start of the problems with the herd maintenance program.

At the start, the assistance was to be paid on the basis of municipalities. The minister then recognized that rain does not necessarily fall according to municipal boundaries. Then it was decided that the plan would be administered on the basis of crop districts within the prairie region. That made more sense, except that the plan was to be administered on the basis of an 80 per cent grain yield. I have spoken to producers who had only 20 per cent of their usual annual hay yield and yet had close to a normal grain crop. So there is not necessarily any correlation between a poor hay crop and a poor cereal grain crop.

I have also spoken in the last month or six weeks to producers in the west whose applications had been turned down, some for very technical reasons. I know of two brothers who farm together; one received assistance, and one did not. I have heard of neighbours who worked together, one living across the road from the other, and one received the assistance while the other did not. Nobody knows why, so people say, "If my neighbour gets it, then I should be eligible."

I know the minister has established a review committee to look into these problems, but I am sure many of these problems could have been avoided if thought had been given to the way the program was developed and administered. Its present administration has caused some ill will in western Canada.

Just after the new year I had occasion to visit the offices in Regina where the plan is administered. The people administering the plan were doing a good job under very trying circumstances, as they had a large number of applications with which to deal, and they worked in a small office. I must compliment them on the job they are doing, but they were trying to work with a plan that had not been given enough thought.

I see that the Minister of Agriculture is in the House tonight. We have not seen much of him recently, but I know he has been busy travelling. I have followed his journeys around the country, and I have read most of his speeches. An hon. member who spoke earlier told us that his son was forced to watch when the minister was making a speech, and he jokingly mentioned that it was punishment. I do not know if I want to make that sort of comment about the minister's speeches, but I did read most of them.

I am very concerned about what is happening to the proposed meat import law. I can trace the history of the catastrophe which has fallen upon the Canadian beef industry since 1976, when Australia and New Zealand sent massive amounts of beef to this country. For a long time cattlemen all across the country have been asking for a beef import law. The bill was finally introduced before Christmas, but it was a meat import law rather than a beef import law. It will apparently apply to things other than beef. We applaud the introduction of that bill, but we have not seen anything of it recently.

The minister will be well aware of what has happened to cattle prices since the new year. There has been a ten-cent per pound decrease in the price of live cattle. This is the time of year when producers make decisions about how many heifers to breed, about the size of cow herds for the coming summer and the size of the resultant calf crop a year from now. This will determine the amount of beef available to the Canadian consumer two years from now. This is a critical time of year for many people in the beef industry. They must decide how many cattle to keep and how many heifers or cows to breed for the coming year. The minister has not shown any interest in this meat import law.

It is disgraceful that the Standing Committee on Agriculture has not met this year. This afternoon I presented a motion under Standing Order 43 protesting this. The agriculture committee is very able; it is one of the least partisan committees of this House. It has a genuine interest in agriculture in this country, but it has nothing to do at the moment.

If the bill were referred to the committee, it would receive immediate attention and fairly swift passage, but for some reason the minister cannot seem to prevail upon his House leader to bring it before the committee.

The drop in live cattle prices has come about largely because of imports from the United States. That is another story, and I hope to get into it later. It is mainly because of the influx of U.S. fat cattle that beef prices have dropped. Feed prices have risen, which I think this is a healthy sign as far as general agriculture is concerned. Interest costs are high, and this is one of the major factors in the cost of finished animals. These costs are even greater than the yardage cost of keeping an animal. It would give some stability and assurance to the beef industry in western Canada if the government cared about it, and if the meat import law were brought before this House and passed. I admit that it would not solve all the problems of the industry, but it would be a major factor in bringing stability to the beef industry. I therefore urge the government to give serious consideration to referring that bill to committee as soon as possible.

As I said earlier, the committee has not met since before Christmas. I think that is deplorable. It is a very good committee, but it has nothing to do, and important legislation just waits.

Things like that disturb us when we are asked to comment on the government's spending plans. This borrowing bill does not take into account nor answer some of the legitimate questions of Members of Parliament about what the government intends to do with the money.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) spoke eloquently this afternoon about the debt awaiting newborn children when they enter the world as Canadian citizens. I did not write down the figures he used, but I think he said something to the effect that five years ago each newborn Canadian would assume a debt of $800 and that today it would be something like $2,200. That is a deplorable situation.

When we campaign for election to this House, we speak to people all across the country. I think the most exciting people I talk to are young people. I am sure we have all had meetings with high school students, and I know I find these more intimidating than the all-candidates meeting arranged by different groups in constitutencies. Young people ask very solid, penetrating, simple and straightforward questions. They want to know their future, their chances of earning a living, of staying in the province or the region of their choice and of pursuing their lines of interest. We cannot help but admire them for the questions they put to us, but then we think about the debt the government is passing on to them. Their questions are legitimate, and they are questions Members of Parliament must ask the government. These things concern me when I study this borrowing authority bill.

Let me conclude by emphasizing a couple of points. We all realize that the government must borrow more money. That is a way of life for all of us whether we operate businesses or farms or practise professions.

• (2150)

Whatever we do to earn a living, we should realize that when we borrow money, we have to be accountable for that money being repaid. In turn, the people from whom we borrow must be satisfied that we are responsible and able to repay it. In my opinion, this bill does not meet that kind of criteria. I think all of us would feel much better if we could be confident that the government, which is asking to borrow massive amounts of money in currencies around the world, would use that borrowing to invest in this country for a more productive future. By doing that we would have less debt to pass on. We would be able to leave the young people of this country with a place and a chance to make a living, just as we started out, without some of this massive government debt we all now bear.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to read part of Bill C-59. If this bill is passed, it will give the government authority to borrow $14 billion. In part, clause 2(1) reads:

—by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rates of interest and on such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole, fourteen billion dollars, as may be required for public works and general purposes.

That statement alarms me. It does not give any definite purpose for the borrowing or any indication of what the interest will be. Nor does it give any consideration to terms. It simply asks the House of Commons for a blank cheque to borrow $14 billion. When I heard hon. members of the NDP supporting this bill so vehemently the other day, I could not help but think of the phrase which would seem to symbolize what they were saying. They were saying that the government now has a debt of some $80 billion; it is going to borrow another $14 billion; in other words, it is trying to borrow its way out of debt.

I think it is possible to borrow one's way out of debt. The statement often used in the west that this country was built on credit is correct. It was not built simply by borrowing, but by making sure the money borrowed would create and produce. But too often the borrowed money is used for routine services.

I could not help but think when I heard members of the NDP urging the government to borrow more and saying $14 billion is not enough that they want to hasten the day when this country goes bankrupt.

During the last few years we have not reduced our national debt. We have been increasing it continually. We are not borrowing our way out of debt; we are getting deeper and deeper into debt. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) were running a private business in Canada this way, they could not get a loan from a bank. They would be bankrupt along with the other 5,000 or 6,000 companies which have gone bankrupt recently. Practical people in Canada fear that we will go bankrupt. The only difference between the NDP and the Liberals is that we would go bankrupt faster under the NDP. The NDP would really have to speed to go faster than the Liberals are going right now; they would have to put everything in super high gear. I am concerned about this.

A difference should be pointed out to NDP members and to Liberal members who support this bill. Simply borrowing will not get us out of debt. I can borrow $1,000 from the bank if my credit is good. If I use that $1,000 to live high, to take a trip or to buy the girlfriend a beautiful new outfit as a Christmas present, to go to a hockey game to see the parliamentarians play or go to national league play, I could spend that $1,000 without any difficulty. But, when the time comes to pay it back, I then realize it has not created a thing, nor have I produced any more wealth.

I read in the paper the other day about someone from the east who had moved to Calgary. He said he was living in Calgary because people in the west produce and create. It is not that people do not create and produce in the east, but his impression was that too many of the eastern people were getting into the habit of borrowing money for routine expenses. They were not using their money to produce additional wealth.

Let us examine the following proposition: how will I pay back $1,000 plus the carrying charges and make a profit if I do not produce new wealth; it is impossible. It would be just as difficult if I tried to raise myself from the elevation on which I stand by pulling on my boot straps. I can pull and pull and pull, but I will never get any higher. If I want to get higher, I have to make an effort, climb a ladder or do something to reach a higher elevation. If I am to make use of the money I am borrowing, I have to produce new wealth. If I borrow this amount of $1,000—I am using the nominal amount of $1,000 to make it easy to follow—and I buy some calves or cattle and a really good bull and thus produce more cattle and more cattle, it will not be too long before I will be able to pay back the $1,000 plus the carrying charges and have some profit left. By doing this, I have created some wealth.

The same thing can be said if I buy some land, sow it and work it; I then produce wealth. Perhaps I might buy some additional land and fertilize it. The same thing happens; I produce more wealth and I can repay the loan. But that is not what the Canadian government has been doing. It has been borrowing and borrowing and borrowing to the point where we now have $80 billion in debt, and we are still borrowing. We cannot even see daylight at the end of the tunnel. We are going deeper and deeper into debt. If we keep this up, we will go right into the chasm of bankruptcy, and that is a pretty black hole.

Canadian people do not mind borrowing if the money is used to create new production and new wealth. That is the way to do it. But simply to borrow to use the money for routine expenses or to hire more people who produce nothing—they might do some work, but they produce nothing—will not get this country off the rocks or off the shoals we are now going toward. We will simply go deeper and deeper into debt.

When people say this country was built on credit, they are talking about the kind of credit of which I referred a minute or two ago. Breaking new land, creating new wealth, creating new production: those are the things which will increase the gross national product. The more we borrow simply for routine expenses, for high living or for trips, the more we will plunge deeper into this chasm of debt.

It is now ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I want to deal with the shame of some of our foreign debts when I resume, with your permission, tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PENSION ACT—INQUIRY RESPECTING DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY UNDER SECTION 33

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, on November 18, as reported at page 4805 of Hansard of that day, I asked the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs the following question:

In recent months Canadian Pension Commission claims for awards under Section 33 of the Pension Act, that is for funeral and burial grants, have had to wait many months for adjudication because of staffing problems. Would the minister consider implementing the proposal of the Woods Committee which would delegate authority to the senior pension medical examiner in the district offices to adjudicate matters of a routine nature under section 33 of the Pension Act? This action on the part of the government would go a long way in assisting widows of veterans during a time of great emotional and financial strain.

The minister promised to look into the matter, but to date I have not heard anything further. I hope to have an answer tonight from the parliamentary secretary.

I should like to point out also that the Department of Veterans Affairs has a long backlog of cases in all facets of its operations. The measure which I am suggesting tonight, which was also suggested by the Woods committee, that there be district offices in the provinces, would help alleviate at least one bottleneck in the department.

On the same day, on November 18, as reported at page 4806 of Hansard, I asked the following supplementary question:

At the present time the grant under section 33 of the Pension Act for funeral and burial expenses is not to exceed $550 for the funeral director, plus the cost of the grave, the opening, closing and a marker. For the Department of National Defence this amount is $850. Would the minister increase the amount allowed for a funeral and burial as provided by the veterans' burial regulations and Section 33 of the Pension Act to correspond to the amount provided by the Department of National Defence? I am sure this small increase for a decreasing number of widows will not be inflationary.

I understand that the maximum burial grant now is $625. This is still too low, in view of the fact that grants from the Department of National Defence are $850, and of course, the devastating effects of the Liberal budget and the National Energy Program are causing serious consequences for low income and middle-income widows in the country.

Also, questions have been asked recently about the length of time veterans have to wait for their pension applications to be processed. The problem is that many of them are dying before their applications are processed. On January 30 of this year a question was asked in the House, pointing out the length of time it takes to get a hearing before the Pension Commission or the War Veterans Allowance Board. The government member who asked this question pointed out that:

As a Member of Parliament one hesitates to recommend to a veteran that he go through the appeal procedure, since it takes so long.

That is quite a devastating statement coming from a member of the government party. The minister answered as follows:

I can assure the hon. member that the backlog will most likely be eliminated within six or eight months.

We have been listening to that for years. For years we have been told that the backlog will be cleared up and that it will only take another six or eight months.

In today's question period I asked the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs a question with regard to veterans' widows. I said that because of the phased in lowering of the 48 per cent disability entitlement in Bill C-40, approximately 1,500 widows became eligible for pensions in 1980. I said that as of December, 1980, the Department of Veterans Affairs had heard from fewer than one third of these widows inquiring about their eligibility.

● (2205)

If only one-third have been heard from, I suggest to the parliamentary secretary tonight that as the proportionate pension was to be phased in over six and a half years, the phasing in period should be reduced to, say, five years. That would allow more widows to become eligible for pensions in a shorter period of time. I would like the parliamentary secretary to look into this so that we can reduce the length of the phasing in period because of the small number applying.

I also asked the minister to make sure his department is advertising and contacting widows to notify them that they can apply for this pension increase.

I am also very concerned because the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has not been called to deal with these particular questions. Problems are mounting, and I hope I can get some commitment from the parliamentary secretary tonight that she will raise this matter with the minister, so that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs can be called as soon as possible.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, before I begin I should point out that the hon. member opposite has asked not one but four questions. I have only three minutes in which to reply, so I will deal only with the first one, if I may.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) should be thanked for the opportunity he has given the House to clarify the subject matter he raised on November 18.

The Pension Act provides that the matter of approving burial grants by the Canadian Pension Commission is not routine but is dependent upon the size of a pensioner's estate, and an individual decision must be made based on each case. To enable a decision to be made, the commission is required by law to determine the size of the estate and whether it is sufficient to pay for the expenses of the last illness and burial. It often takes considerable time to obtain this information from surviving family members or executors of an estate. The matter of delegating authority to district offices of the commission to deal with these claims has been considered, and approval has been given to work toward decentralizing decision-making on these applications.

The Pension Act provides that the amounts payable in burial grants are the same as those authorized for the Department of Veterans Affairs under the veteran's treatment regulations. The conditions under which the Department of National Defence and the Department of Veterans Affairs determine the amount payable to funeral directors differ. The Department of National Defence pays for the funerals of all service members regardless of the financial circumstances of their families, as this is regarded as a condition of service. The Department of Veterans Affairs pays a funeral grant as a matter of right when a veteran's death is related to his service and when the death results from other causes, on the basis of the financial circumstances of the deceased's estate. The Canadian Pension Commission pays a funeral grant when a disability pensioner's estate is not sufficient to cover the expenses of his last illness and burial.

Each department determines its rate using different criteria. The DND rate is based on the national average cost of a civilian funeral. The DVA rate is based on the national average rate paid by provinces and municipalities for funeral costs which are their responsibility.

As the hon. member said, the DVA rate has been revised regularly since 1975 and was increased to $625 as recently as June, 1980. We will continue to ensure that the rate is closely monitored.

In both departments the aim is to provide that servicemen and women or ex-servicemen and women are buried in dignity and in a manner which honours them as people as well as their service rendered to Canada. The present rates are considered to achieve this aim.

CUSTOMS TARIFF—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF DUTY ON BODY ARMOUR

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, recently I asked the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) a question about bulletproof vests for members of our law enforcement agencies across Canada. There is a 25 per cent duty on importing such body armour into Canada. "Body armour" and "bulletproof vests" are terminologies for the same thing.

● (2210)

In view of the information the minister gave me, if we are producing good quality bulletproof vests in Canada, then I agree we should protect our own industry and jobs for Canadians.

My real concern arose out of the serious acts of violence we hear about today, and quite often the personnel of our law enforcement agencies become the targets of such violence simply because they symbolize the law and its administration. It is up to us as citizens who want law and order to lend our real support to them if we expect them to do the crucial and necessary job which all of us want done.

This important task of supporting our law enforcement agencies applies to municipal, provincial and federal police and other security agencies. Policemen should not have to purchase bulletproof vests on their own; this item should be part of their regular or normal equipment.

There should be considerable testing of such equipment to make sure it is practical and dependable. It is my understanding that there really are not any set standards in operation now in Canada. If a company does not meet specific standards, then it should not be allowed to sell its product on the market. If it does produce a product which meets proven standards, then purchases could readily be made from that firm for law enforcement agencies anywhere.

With regard to the information I received from the minister's officials, I find the name of one Canadian producing company, which I have since been informed does not at the present time produce body armour but is considering doing so. The company did produce this product for a period of time but stopped a short time ago. The company in question is doing considerable research, I understand, with the RCMP and other useful sources. Even at this time and under these circumstances this company's production is probably six months down the road.

The second company the officials discussed with me is still producing bulletproof vests and is making sales abroad, for example, in some countries in the Middle East and a few in the United States. The reason this second company is not making very many sales in the United States is because of the stiff competition there from companies which have a lot of experience in the field. There is no reason why we cannot produce a good Canadian product or products if we make use of all research facilities applicable for experimentation and testing. I should add that the second company in question has sold many of its vests to some municipal and other police forces in Canada, and it has also worked very closely with the Department of National Defence—and is still doing so.

Ironically enough, this Canadian company has had its equipment tested by an American firm which I believe is called H. & P. White Co. Ltd. This company springs from the old Henry Packard and White Co. Earlier in this century, this company was approached by Al Capone, who asked it to build him a bulletproof car. Today, the offspring of that company is renowned for the testing of bulletproof vests. Anything approved by it passes the test and becomes a government approved and lawful item of body armour.

The Brinks Security firm and special constables at the Olympics in Montreal, for example, have been and were provided with body armour, some of which was made in Canada. Therefore, from my limited research on this subject, I am convinced we can produce a good product in Canada.

In the best interests of all our law enforcement agencies, including military police and special agencies, my main interest in raising this subject is twofold. First, we should have very strict testing of body armour made in Canada, and it must be tested by well-qualified people. By the same token, foreign imports should also receive the same stringent test. A product of this nature should not be allowed on the market until it passes such tests. We in Canada are quite capable of supplying our own domestic market as well as foreign markets, but we should put more emphasis on testing and approvals.

Second, this should be part and parcel of standard police equipment. Individual law enforcement officers should not have to pay for their own. Surely we do not have to wait until more tragedies occur, such as the one which started in my constituency and ended in the constituency of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) just before Christmas, before we apply a serious policy of co-ordination at all levels of government and make every effort to protect and assist our law enforcement officers when carrying out their duties.

I and many others would like to see this happen in all jurisdictions, again in order to help protect those individuals across Canada who try to make Canada a safe place for all to live. I cannot emphasize enough, regardless of whether a peace officer is municipal, provincial or federal, that they are in fact participating in this important aim. I would like to see a sincere effort in co-ordinating this matter with various levels of government and at the same time in ensuring that the vests are of excellent quality and Canadian made.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first I commend the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins) for his analysis of the situation we face with regard to body armour and the hazards facing our law-enforcement officers. In fact, I would go so far as to say that everything he said tonight was something with which I could agree entirely. The area to which I am able to respond as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance deals specifically with the question of the 25 per cent import duty placed on body armour at the moment under the most-favoured nation customs duty. Indeed, the possibility of removing the customs duty on bulletproof vests for police officers was reviewed very carefully by the Department of Finance in response to a number of requests, not only from the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke, but from users who advanced the argument that the vest is a piece of safety equipment which should be accorded the same duty-free privilege as firemen's safety helmets and industrial helmets.

The investigation of the department revealed that duty free entry for firemen's safety helmets and industrial safety helmets, such as miners' helmets, was established in the late 1920s at a time when these helmets were not produced in Canada. In 1947 Canada entered into a commitment under the general agreement on tariffs and trade not to impose a customs duty on these helmets. On the other hand, bulletproof vests are produced in Canada by at least two companies, one of which is International Uniforms Limited of Montreal that manufactures several varieties. As the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke indicated, this company sells these vests not only in Canada but also to outlets in the United States. Currently this company is working very closely with the RCMP to further improve its product so that all the standards to which my hon. friend referred will be met as they should be. The other known producer is Safeco Manufacturing Limited of Scarborough, Ontario. Currently that company is not producing but is in the research phase of developing products which I am sure will meet the standards to which my hon. friend referred.

It is my view that the operations of these two companies would be adversely affected if the duty on body armour vests were removed. I think it is desirable to have this kind of equipment made in Canada to the standards recommended by my hon. friend. Granting tariff protection to Canadian manufacturers will assist in realizing this objective and help manufacturers to expand sales in Canada and abroad.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—REPORTED TESTING OF CHEMICAL DEFOLIANTS

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, on January 23, on January 26 and on January 27 of this year and again today, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) a series of questions surrounding the matter of the testing of chemical defoliants at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown in June, 1966 by the United States army.

The government's answers to the questions my colleagues and I directed on this matter have served more to cloud the issue than to enlighten those of us who sought answers.

● (2220)

Two fundamental questions arise out of the Gagetown incident. First, what is the nature and extent of Canada's involvement in chemical and biological warfare testing and, second, why have Canadian governments repeatedly denied—and in fact continue to deny to this day—that Canadian chemical research at any defence establishment in this country was for the aid of the American effort in Vietnam?

The credibility of the Department of National Defence is at stake in this matter, and every day that department continues to deny Canada's role in chemical warfare testing only adds to its incredibility. After we discovered that Winnipeggers had been used as guinea pigs in a 1953 test over that city, the Minister of National Defence told us that this was the last revelation, that there were no other instances of open air testing. Well, six months later we learn of the Gagetown tests in which the carcionogenic chemicals, Agents Orange, White, Purple, and Blue, were used. Now that the government has stated categorically that there were no other tests, I am sure we need only wait a few more months for yet another incident of that kind to come to light. Surely Canadians deserve better from their government than this feeble display of excuses following one after the other.

On March 10, 1970, the then minister of defence, Leo Cadieux, issued a statement to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence detailing Canada's participation in chemical and biological warfare testing. The document stressed that Canada's only involvement was from a defensive point of view, to test defensive measures to be used in case of attack. There are, however, two very interesting points that should be drawn from that 1970 document.

In describing Canada's role in any testing, the report indicated:

—it is therefore entirely Canada's decision whether certain experiments will take place on Canadian soil.

The report also went on to indicate categorically:

—It should perhaps be stated in this connection that no research carried out by the Department of National Defence has affected the use of chemicals in Vietnam.

Obviously these 1970 statements do not jibe with what we have discovered happened at Gagetown.

Now the minister and his officials have gone out of their way to puff up a story about the 1966 tests being related only to brush control experiments at CFB Gagetown. The Department of National Defence and the minister himself have insisted that there was no suggestion on the part of Canadian defence officials or the U.S. Army that the tests were for the development of chemical warfare agents, specifically defoliants for use in Vietnam.

It seems that these gentlemen cannot read if they insist or deny that Canadians, or Americans for that matter, had intentions of putting the results of the Gagetown tests to use in Vietnam.

Technical Memorandum 141, Defoliation Tests in 1966 at Base Gagetown, New Brunswick, Canada, a U.S. Army document, indicated:

—large areas similar in density to areas of interest in Southeast Asia were needed—

The memorandum went on:

—this land located at CFB Gagetown, Oromocto, New Brunswick, was suitable in size and density and contained a mixture of conifer and deciduous broadleaf species in a dense undisturbed forest cover that would provide similar vegetation densities to those of temperate and tropical areas such as Southeast Asia.

It is clear that the Americans were using Gagetown because conditions were similar to those of their interest in Southeast Asia, that is, Vietnam.

The Canadian version of the report on the 1966 Gagetown test entitled "Vegetation Control" shows beyond a doubt that Canadians were well aware of the reasons for U.S. interest in testing in Gagetown. I quote from that report:

—U.S. interest is understandable. A great amount of effort has been expended to find some means of destroying the jungle canopy of Southeast Asia.

In 1966 Canadian officials knew that the Gagetown tests were a result of U.S. Army desires to destroy the jungle canopy in Vietnam. In 1981 Canadian officials do not seem to be able to make that connection.

Two other reports confirm that these tests were to aid the U.S. effort in Vietnam. A Pentagon official recently confirmed that the Gagetown tests were indeed Vietnam-related. Second, a book entitled "The Science of 2, 4, 5, T by Rodney Bovy and Alan Young stated that the U.S. military:

—did not disperse experimental or untested herbicides. Field tests for military purposes were applied in Puerto Rico, Hawaii, Thailand, Canada and other areas.

The ominous part of that last quote is that it leaves open to speculation the possibility that other tests could have been carried out in Canada. Agent Orange and related chemicals are not harmless, as the minister suggested.

My questions on this issue have yet to be answered by this government. I want to know when the government will stop this ridiculous charade of innocence concerning the government's participation in Vietnam-related tests and admit that it was a willing co-conspirator. When will the government explain why it has involved itself in such testing of offensive chemical weapons? Finally, when will this government come clean with the Canadian public and detail the nature and extent of all chemical and biological warfare testing in Canada?

• (2225)

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I remind hon. members that in 1966 the Americans were doing extremely well in Vietnam. Indeed, I believe they controlled three quarters of the land. Therefore, it was not necessary for them to do any experiments in Canada. They had all the land they wanted in Vietnam. It is a fact that for its own reasons the Department of National Defence co-operated in the testing by the U.S. army of chemical defoliants at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown in 1966.

It is also a fact that all of the materials used were commercially available and registered with the Department of Agriculture for commercial use on forest, pasture and range land. These chemicals had been in use for quite some time before the Gagetown tests and have been used more extensively since then for hydro and highway bush clearing operations, as well as by commercial users.

It is also a fact that the Gagetown tests were carried out entirely on isolated Crown property, miles from the closest inhabited areas. The fact that the spraying was done from a low-flying helicopter in calm weather conditions makes it virtually impossible that the chemicals would have been spread outside the test area.

Let it be said that we are not talking here of a massive area or of entire forests but rather of clearly marked plots totalling less than 400 acres well inside the boundary of the camp, which itself contains over 250,000 acres. Furthermore, the 2-4-D, 2-4-5 T mixture was tested on considerably less than the 400 acres.

Bush control at CFB Gagetown has always been a problem of considerable magnitude. Evidence of the problem is not only contained in departmental documents but also in publications such as Hansard, page 7281, of August 26, 1964, and the minutes of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence of June 26, 1966.

It is a matter of record that Canadian interest in the testing of chemical defoliants was purely in finding a better product for bush control at CFB Gagetown. This fact is very clear in the report of the Canadian liaison officer which the hon. member opposite requested and received from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne).

I would like to emphasize that the Department of National Defence will not distribute documents that belong to another government; however, when the hon. member opposite asked for the Canadian document relating to the Gagetown test, he promptly received a copy and was also given a tour and a briefing at base Gagetown when he asked for one.

Having been given the facts, it was either irresponsible or simply ignorant of NDP members opposite to link herbicides with chemical warfare, as they have repeatedly tried to do. Let me also say that it may be an indication of their intellectual integrity that, in question period earlier today, they quoted only one sentence from the document the minister made available to them, and it was quoted out of context as well.

Let me suggest that the most significant health hazard in this matter may well be the anxiety created by the irresponsible allegations and innuendos of NDP members. I believe their interest in keeping this matter alive should be seen for what it is—a convenient political expedient to make headlines.

The department has acted very responsibly in this matter, as it does in any other matter. All information on the spray trials has been made available to the federal Department of National Health and Welfare and to New Brunswick health authorities. The department will co-operate fully in any further study which relevant authorities may want to undertake in the matter. In the meantime, the three Canadian personnel who were directly involved in the trials have been medically examined by competent authorities and given a clean bill of health.

In conclusion, what we have asked ourselves and what the members opposite should also ask themselves is just how relevant the matter of some very limited brush control spraying done 15 years ago is when we all know that the same compounds have been used and are still in use extensively by agriculture and industry in many places. If their concern is about the essence of the matter, namely, the safe use of chemical products not only for agricultural but for all purposes, they should state their case clearly and not make false allegations and innuendos.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
