Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), who is responsible for fitness and amateur sport, recently withdrew funding from various native recreation and cultural programs without supplying any alternatives for these programs, and whereas these programs employ native people and the disruption of these programs has the potential of intensifying social problems within Canada's native communities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this government take immediate action to maintain existing programs and their personnel and accept native fitness and amateur sport in the same priority and on the same basis that all other Canadians enjoy.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

CALL FOR INCREASED SUPPLY OF LIVESTOCK CARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have a beef about the shortage of railway cars to ship livestock, so under the provisions of Standing Order 43, it is urgent and pressing. In view of the fact that the railways are drastically reducing the supply of livestock freight cars, even though they earn nine times as much hauling cattle as hauling grain, and since the CPR can afford $400 million to buy a can-opener company in the United States but refuses to buy cattle cars, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That the Minister of Transport stop the railways from giving farmers a bum steer and that the minister use section 262 of the Railway Act to require the railways to increase the supply of livestock cars in Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AMERICAN HOSTAGES IN IRAN—EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY AND CONCERN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter that is, and continues to be, urgent and pressing. Since most members just celebrated Christmas with family and friends, we ought to remember the plight of those citizens of the United States of America held hostage in Iran and the suffering caused by this travesty of international diplomacy. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House record our sympathy and concern for the Americans held hostage in Iran and express our solemn hope that their period of imprisonment will end so those innocent victims of international discord will be returned to their homeland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

EFFECTS OF PROGRAM ON INDUSTRY

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy and it deals with his national energy policy. In spite of the evidence, which is mounting daily, that the minister's energy policy is a disaster for Canada, the minister stated in the House yesterday and also last Monday that he has no intention of changing that policy. In contrast, prior to Christmas the minister and the Prime Minister said at least a dozen times in this House that they were willing to negotiate with the provinces, the industry or both.

● (1415)

Given the now documented proof that his policy is causing the departure of dozens and dozens of rigs and millions, if not billions, of dollars, the loss of jobs on a large scale and jeopardizing of the nation's security in oil, can the minister tell the House why he has taken this new, rigid position? Is it a matter of pride, or is he not aware of just what damage his policy is causing?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that on the contrary the object of the policy we have announced is to maintain the growth rate of inflation at an acceptable level and prevent it from rising to such high levels as those which now plague a great many industrialized countries. In addition our policy is aimed at preserving tens of thousands of jobs which would vanish because of unduly rapid increases in oil prices. That is substantiated again if we look at what is going on in a great many other advanced countries. Indeed the government and I have indicated quite clearly that we were prepared to negotiate in good faith with industry spokesmen and particularly with the Alberta government. I must point out to the hon. member that the government has already amended some of the budget proposals, especially as regards exploration wells, and that certain measures will be deferred until next year, in 1982. Besides, we have already made it clear that we were quite willing to meet with Alberta government representatives at the ministerial level or at the official level. The government in Edmonton has until now refused to meet at the ministerial level but again I say that we are available. I must point out that the government is firmly committed to reach the objectives we set for ourselves in the energy program but I must say that we did show flexibility in the implementation of that program.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, obviously the minister is not aware of the damage his policy is causing. His policy is not only wrong conceptionally, but it is wrong in detail. For example, is the minister of energy aware that the Canadian ownership regulations, based on the policy stated in "The National Energy Program", result in virtually every Canadian company, perhaps even Petro-Canada, being categorized as non-Canadian? Is the minister also aware that a policy change is required to amend this ridiculous situation? Therefore, if the minister sticks to his statement that "we will continue the present policy for 1981", which statement he made on Monday in this House, there will be no companies in a position to utilize this proposed Canadian incentive program because there will be no companies in Canada which are categorized as Canadian under the Canadian ownership regulations which his officials have put forward.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I suggest that what is most ridiculous is probably the very statement of the hon. member for Calgary Centre who claims that even Petro-Canada would not qualify as a Canadian company. In fact lots of Canadian companies meet the criteria set forth in the project aimed at governing the Canadianization of enterprises. I appreciate that my hon. colleague and his party are looking askance at Canadianizing business enterprises, that his party would rather go along with the multinationals. That is their privilege. But I must say that we have made public a working document which we labelled in English—the Leader of the Opposition is once again showing concern over his future, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: The document the hon. member is holding is called a discussion paper. Having issued a discussion paper we gave industry and all interested parties until February 9 to air their views so that we and the people concerned may review the criteria to be established. We have made that document public for discussion purposes. We have set February 9 as the deadline to submit comments and we have taken that approach because indeed we were interested in hearing comments and making the necessary adjustments.

● (1420)

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would suggest that the minister talk to Mr. Renouf, the official involved, because he could find that a policy change is necessary in order to make this working paper work. Currently all Canadian companies are "foreign" according to the regulations based on the policies he drafted. This is another example of the incompetence of that document and its details. Is the minister aware from information received from his officials or the industry that the 8 per cent petroleum and gas revenue tax, which is non-deductible from income in Canada, is deductible for U.S. incorporated companies operating in Canada? This means that a Canadian who wants to drill in Canada is better off to incorporate a company in the United States and have that company drill in Canada rather than do it directly. Is the minister aware of that absurd situation?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, about the first part of the hon. member's question, I remind him that the document he refers to was published under the authority of Mr. Renouf himself. Mr. Renouf having issued that document, he is the one who will gather all comments and see to it that the changes that might be necessary are made, and the final decision will rest with the government. As to the second point raised by the hon. member, he voices concern every day over the number of drilling rigs which leave Canada, so I am surprised he should now worry about those which might come up from the United States. I would say to him that thanks to the energy program and the budget which was tabled as well as the grants to be made—

[English]

Mr. Andre: Based on your policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: —the grants to be made as a result of the budget, Canadian companies will find themselves in an extremely favourable position as compared with the multinationals for which my hon. colleague enjoys carrying the torch.

[English]

EFFECTS OF PROGRAM ON INDUSTRY IN SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, has the minister no idea that a Canadian rig produces Canadian jobs, not just in the west but in Stratford, Kitchener, Toronto and the province of Quebec?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: That is the difference. Why do we not have Canadian rigs drilling in Canada instead of encouraging U.S. rigs that do not produce one job to come to Canada?

Let me ask the minister now about Saskatchewan. Is he aware that as a result of his energy policy in Saskatchewan—

Mr. Clark: He does not care about Saskatchewan or Alberta or British Columbia or Manitoba.

Mr. Nielsen: He doesn't know where it is.

Mr. Jarvis: —that many oil wells have become uneconomical overnight? I do not mean wells that were highly profitable, but those that were at least sufficiently marginal to keep operating? As a result of the oil policy, not just a few but hundreds are in a shut-in or a potentially shut-in position. The result, Madam Speaker, is loss of jobs, loss of productivity and more dependence on foreigners. Is the minister aware of this situation and, if so, what discussions are under way or are planned with his Saskatchewan counterpart to alleviate this very tragic situation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that in spite of his statement the media have carried out a survey of companies, particularly in Ontario, that were supposedly going to lose many, many jobs because of the so-called statements that were issued by some individuals in the oil industry. In effect, the Toronto Star—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: —has not been able to find any—

Mr. Andre: Nor has Pravda!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Beatty: That is the "Trudeau Star".

Mr. Lalonde: The Toronto Star has not been able to find a single spokesman for any company in Ontario that has said it lost any jobs. The hon. member knows that, according to Oilweek magazine, on January 6 there were exactly the same number of rigs operating as a year ago, roughly at the same time. In effect, even in Alberta, according to those figures, not a single job would have been lost compared to the same period in 1980.

In regard to the second point raised by the hon. member, I would remind him that the province of Saskatchewan has the highest rate of royalty of any province in Canada. This also has an impact on the netback that goes to the industry. I have had discussions with my colleague in Saskatchewan in the past and I intend to meet my colleague in Saskatchewan some time next week as well.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I hope that the minister and his department will start hiring Toronto Star reporters, since The Globe and Mail reporters obviously have not helped him very much in terms of his assessment.

In addition to the National Energy Program and its impact upon the oil industry in Saskatchewan, there are two other factors which depress the industry there. One is the government's export tax which is now pricing Saskatchewan heavy crude out of the marketplace in the United States. The minister knows how delicate and fragile that market is.

● (1425)

Mr. Clark: He doesn't know.

Mr. Jarvis: Second, our purchases of Mexican heavy crude at twice the price we pay Saskatchewan are displacing that heavy oil and the markets for it. The question is simply this: what does the minister propose to do about that?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am very happy the hon. member is raising this specific question. It will show him again that it is dangerous to rely on an erroneous and outdated opinion.

An. hon. Member: That is the Toronto Star.

Mr. Lalonde: It is dangerous to be manipulated by some foreign companies that have strong positions vis-à-vis the purchase of heavy oil from Saskatchewan. In effect, there will be no reduction in the production of heavy oil in Saskatchewan even after the announcement by the National Energy Board of an increase in the export price, because we have found other clients in the United States and the eastern refineries in Quebec are going to take more Saskatchewan heavy crude than they ever did in the past.

Mr. Kempling: Name the refinery.

DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

FUNDING OF PROJECTS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the Government of Canada seconded the UN resolution declaring 1981 to be the International Year of the Disabled, will the minister tell the House, and more importantly tell 700,000 disabled Canadians, why they have allocated only $1 million to projects for the handicapped this year, which represents a financial contribution of something less than $1.50 per disabled Canadian?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I take the question of the hon. member more as a representation in favour of the handicapped. We all support and share the responsibility for the handicapped including provinces, municipalities and other institutions in the country.

The government has put aside the $1 million which the hon. member has referred to for projects which communities or groups will present to the organizing committee in Canada. The provinces are also putting aside a similar budget. It is not identical because it will depend on the order of magnitude and what possibilities present themselves in each province. That does not preclude our departments of health and welfare across the country, or other departments in the various provinces, from having ongoing projects.

Very soon the federal government will announce projects for each department. We are expecting a report from the committee on which the hon. member sits; it has not been made public yet, although we expected it at the beginning of the year.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. I think the disabled community in Canada is looking to the federal government to give leadership to the provinces; it should not be following the provinces.

Because the province of Ontario is spending $12 million in commemoration of the International Year of the Disabled and British Columbia is spending $3 million, for example, will the minister not agree that the federal contribution is an embarrassment and a betrayal of the disabled and that the amount should be immediately increased to show that our concern for the plight of the disabled is real and not just plain tokenism?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, of course we would all love to have more money available. I do not want to dwell on the political aspect in the question asked by the hon. member, but he knows that the provinces now have a much bigger share of the tax revenues and resources of Canada than the federal government. His reasoning is totally upside down. As far as I am concerned, the provinces should be contributing much more in their budgets than they are for this program.

IMPRISONMENT OF THE MENTALLY ILL—CALL FOR AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary will be directed to the Minister of Justice since the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not seem to be taking this matter seriously.

Will the Minister of Justice undertake to present immediately a government bill to this House which will amend the Criminal Code to abolish the use of lieutenant governor warrants that permit mentally ill Canadians to be locked up for years on minor criminal charges? Will the government at least undertake to do that much for the disabled community?

● (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we have received recommendations on that subject from Mr. Fairweather, the Chief Commissioner of the Human Rights Commission. We are studying the possibility of proposing amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act and, if necessary, to the Criminal Code, but we do not feel we are prepared to do so in the next few days. We are now reviewing the problem and we hope to reach a conclusion within the coming months.

BANK OF CANADA

POLICY RESPECTING SETTING OF PRIME RATE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question today is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that as a result of the auction today, the Bank of Canada rate is still within a whisker of 17 per cent, having gone down the magnificent amount of three-one hundredths of 1 per cent. The minister has organized his Bank of Canada rate on the basis of one-quarter per cent over the treasury bill rate. The minister auctioned off $1.310 billion of treasury bills. His 182 bills sold at 15.3 per cent. His one-year bills sold out at 14.4 per cent.

Why will the minister not direct the Bank of Canada to determine its rate on the basis of its average sale of treasury bills—for example, on a sale of treasury bills at 15.4 per cent—to give a Bank of Canada rate of 15.65 per cent, instead of insisting on using the highest rate to determine the Bank of Canada rate and, therefore, forcing the base rate of interest in this country to be higher than it should be?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I disagree with the conclusion reached by the hon. member. It seems to me that the auction today reflected current market conditions. That is the purpose of the auction and that is what establishes the bank rate. I am pleased, as I think the hon. member is pleased, that even though he describes the change as a whisker, it is a whisker in the right direction.

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister will remember that when the governor was before the provincial minister of finance prior to Christmas, he said that the rate was higher than we would like to see, but we do not have any choices open to us. The minister knows we have choices open to us. We have a choice of directing the prime rate of interest of the Bank of Canada. We have a right to control who gets money in terms of the minister's powers. Bearing in mind that the bank prime rate determines what the prime rate is for every single borrower, every small business in this country, and even large businesses, every consumer and every householder is going broke at these rates.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Blenkarn: What does the minister propose to do?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member states there are a number of choices open to the government to influence interest rates in a downward direction. Whatever choice he sees that would be beneficial, any alternative to the present policy in my view would result in higher inflation and probably higher interest rates in the medium term. I do not know of any alternative that would be better for the Canadian economy. Let me put it another way. Any alternative that I have heard is bound to be worse than the course being followed by the governor of the Bank of Canada at the present time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT ON PROPOSED CBC-2 NETWORK

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. The president of the CBC was reported in this morning's Globe and Mail to have said to the CRTC at yesterday's hearings that he is convinced Parliament would be prepared to put up the $30 million required for the elitist CBC-2 service if it is approved by the CRTC. May I ask the minister what commitment has been given to the CBC in support of CBC-2? May I ask whether in fact he is prepared at this time to endorse this elitist proposal being made by the CBC?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): To begin with, Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. member's premise. When we are talking about television, the greatest challenge which faces television in this country is to get a greater number of Canadian signals on Canadian satellites and have more Canadian signals available to the Canadian public in general. At the moment, in English-speaking Canada 78 per cent of the TV programs watched by Canadians are of American origin and 83 per cent of the programs watched by Canadian children in English-speaking Canada are of American origin.

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

Mr. Fox: Perhaps the hon. member might be interested in some of the background. He might even be interested in some of the facts.

Mr. Clark: Don't abuse the rules.

Mr. Fox: If the Leader of Opposition is not happy with my answer, perhaps he can write me a letter.

The major challenge facing people in the communications industry, in government and in the broadcasting sector is getting a higher number of high quality Canadian programs produced. One of the ways is the method suggested by the president of the CBC—by having CBC-2. As far as the CBC is concerned, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Clark: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, in all of that time the minister studiously avoided answering my question, which was whether or not the Minister of Communications has committed the government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Beatty: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. There is so much shouting going on around the minister, perhaps he cannot hear me.

Madam Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member can start his question again.

Mr. Beatty: My question to the minister, which he did not answer, was whether or not the Minister of Communications had endorsed the elitist proposal by the CBC which, according to CBC's own statistics, would require every Canadian to pay $30 million for a service that would be available to only 17 per cent of Canadians. Has he endorsed that proposal? If he is concerned about the CBC discharging its mandate, does he not believe the CBC has a responsibility to provide at least the regular basic service to all Canadians before asking for a CBC-2 network?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, as far as the government is concerned it would be improper at this stage for us to endorse the proposal as it is now because the matter—

Mr. Clark: Have you acted improperly?

Mr. Fox: Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition would be interested in the answer. Obviously if a licence is issued, the matter could be appealed to the governor in council, and at that stage we would have to take a decision as to whether to maintain or not. As far as this government is concerned, we are vitally interested in seeing a higher number of Canadian quality programs being produced in this country and being made available to Canadians from coast to coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: No answer.

EMPLOYMENT

SUPPLY OF NURSING STAFF IN NOVA SCOTIA

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that Nova Scotia lost approximately 400 nurses in 1980 and 350 in 1979 to other parts of Canada and average salaries in Nova Scotia are the second lowest in Canada, even lower than in New Brunswick where the nurses are threatening to strike, will the minister tell the House if he has signed the order for bringing 100 nurses to the province on the request of the government of Nova Scotia? If he has not signed it, will he reconsider and look into the question whether he is being asked to help keep salaries down for nurses in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the question really relates to a much broader problem. Indeed, there is a shortage of nurses right across Canada and the situation is particularly acute in eastern Canada. We are facing at the present time a dilemma between the tremendous movement of nurses to the United States and to the western part of this country, leaving extreme shortages in hospitals in eastern Canada because of the cut-backs in training which took place three or four years ago.

The application in Nova Scotia has not been signed. We are concerned that we have not proceeded with the kind of program to ensure that we will be able to supply enough nurses in the years ahead. We have signed an agreement with the province of New Brunswick, with the registered nurses and the hospital association of New Brunswick. I would be very anxious to sign a similar agreement with Nova Scotia so we can come to the cause of the problem and develop not only an application to ensure their immediate supply of nurses, but also ensure a future supply without the kind of cycle of shortages we run into at the present time.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

PROPOSALS IN TASK FORCE REPORT

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister and it is on the subject of North-South relations. The North-South question is basically a question of life and death for some 800 million people. It is particularly concerned with the world economic situation. I and many other Canadians are upset by the antics and the general misfortunes the Prime Minister is having on his trip.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House now whether he has read the task force report which has been presented to Parliament? Has he been in discussions with other world leaders in the western bloc about some movement or action which can be taken in relation to international institutions? Has he seriously discussed with them a new gearing ratio in the World Bank? Has he discussed special drawing rights for the Third World?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I must say that I share the hon. member's interest and concern with respect to the whole question of North-South relations. I assure the hon. member that I have followed the work of the parliamentary task force. I read the report. I took it with me during the Chritsmas break and found it to be a very useful contribution to the current discussions on that subject.

The hon. member's specific points with respect to special drawing rights and a gearing ratio in the World Bank are currently under discussion, and at recent meetings of the World Bank before Christmas and of the IMF both these items were discussed. I have no doubt but that certain changes can be made in the operations of the international financial institutions to improve the situation for developing countries, but I believe that changes in those institutions, though important, are not the only way by which we can contribute at the present time to the improvement of the very serious situation which prevails in developing countries.

REQUEST FOR DEBATE FOLLOWING FOREIGN TOUR OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the government House leader. After the Prime Minister's first tour he gave no report to this House. I ask the government House leader to plan now to have the Prime Minister give a statement on motions when he comes back so that this House and the people of Canada can hear about what he actually has done in the Middle East, Africa and South America and be given a chance to have dialogue, discussions and debate on the subject.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to convey the suggestion of the hon. member to the right hon. Prime Minister. May I however draw his attention to the fact that between now and March 26 there will be six days allotted to the official opposition parties. They could very well set one of those days aside to discuss the trip of the right hon. Prime Minister to foreign countries. I am sure the Prime Minister will be pleased to join the debate, or arrange to have certain hon. members come up with the necessary information to enlighten the hon. member on those aspects which apparently interest him more than others.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED CHARTER OF RIGHTS—REACTION OF BRITISH OFFICIALS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, who will have read news reports quoting a British cabinet minister as saying that Canadian envoys in London were informed last year that Ottawa's inclusion of a bill of rights was unexpected and could delay the process in Westminster. Will the Minister of Justice tell the Canadian House of Commons whether Canadian representatives in London last fall were advised that inclusion of a bill or charter of rights could delay action by Westminster?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am not aware that there was such a problem. Prime Minister Thatcher said to the Prime Minister of Canada that when the Parliament of Canada passes a resolution, the parliament of Great Britain would act according to the British tradition in the matter as it has done since 1867, and that would be to agree to the requests of the Parliament of Canada as represented by a vote of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice is a little confused. My question and the press quote had to do with the meeting of envoys of Canada, the minister's colleagues, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of the Environment, with British officials in September. It was to that that reference was made.

Perhaps since one of the envoys is in the House, he could answer the question whether there was an indication or warning given at that time, or any indication given to Canadian envoys at that time, that the inclusion of a charter of rights was a surprise and unexpected, and that it could delay the process and the speed with which Westminster could respond to a joint address. This matter had been discussed among the prime ministers in June. Could the Minister of the Environment in his capacity as envoy on constitutional matters inform the House?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I do not think there was anything which could in any way be construed as a warning. Of course, in the general discussion there was an indication that a bill of rights was a matter of great general interest and therefore might prompt some discussion in the normal debate which would take place in the British house of commons.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Roberts: I think that is an answer to the right hon. gentleman's question. There was nothing which could in any way be accurately described as a warning.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rather regret, as I am sure the House and the country regret, that we were not told the whole truth as to the nature of the conversations last autumn which had to do with the legislative timetable of Great Britain.

However, let me ask the Minister of Justice, who spoke earlier of June, about that meeting on June 25 between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. At that time did the Prime Minister of Canada specifically advise the Prime Minister of Great Britain that the joint address from the Parliament of Canada would include references to a charter or bill of rights? Was there specific advice by the Prime Minister of Canada to the Prime Minister of Great Britain with respect to the inclusion of a charter or bill of rights at that June meeting?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, obviously I was not present, but I know the legal situation and the traditional situation in this matter. Since 1867 never has the British parliament ever overruled a resolution of the Parliament of Canada. It has always accepted resolutions of the Parliament of Canada. It has always accepted resolutions coming from the House of Commons and the Senate, and what is in the resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada is a matter for the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada, not Great Britain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BANKRUPTCIES

CALL FOR INCREASE IN GUARANTEED INSURANCE COVERAGE

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. When my colleague, the hon. member for Burlington, requested an investigation or inquiry into the circumstances under which Astra Trust Company was incorporated and, more particularly, why it is now in the process of liquidation, the Minister of State for Finance responded rather casually to the effect that there was no need to worry because the guaranteed deposit insurance would cover most of the claimants. When will the Government of Canada take some action to cause to be increased the amount of this guaranteed insurance coverage so that it will be comparable with today's dollar and the amount of coverage which would be in place in the United States of America?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, may I say that as a result of representations made by many members in the House I have asked the Superintendent of the Department of Insurance to weigh the possibility of having the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation review the current $20,000 ceiling. That study is under way and it is known that we will soon have new legislation covering loan and trust companies, and I think that before the legislation is introduced the study will be completed and the government will be able to make a decision in light of expert advice received from the Superintendent of Insurance. Superintendent.

[English]

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Finance and Minister of State for Finance well know, their files are probably thick with requests for this increased insurance coverage and promises that studies will be made. Today's dollar value compared with when this $20,000 limit was put in place is approximately 47 cents. Since it was put in place we have adopted programs such as the registered home ownership savings plan as well as retirement savings plans. Is it not about time that the government made a decision on an increase?

● (1450)

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I did explain to the hon. member that the coverage now provided by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is under review. Still I agree with some of the arguments of the hon. member. However, I would like to tell him that actuarial studies are required to determine whether the rate should be changed, according to what criteria and by how much. This cannot be done by flipping a coin in arbitrary style, it must be based on the contributions of companies and on the costs which may be incurred when companies will be faced with operational difficulties. But the hon. member and all his colleagues in the House as well as all Canadians may rest assured that the ceiling guaranteed by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is under serious review and that the government will take the necessary decisions.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

CANADIAN POSITION ON INFANT FORMULA FOR THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and it has to do with the fact that the World Health Organization executive is meeting this week and next to decide what to recommend to the thirty-fourth assembly in May. Until now, Canada has been taking the position of opposing a strict code which would deal with the promotion by the multinationals of an infant formula in the Third World. My question for the minister is whether Canada will be continuing to take this position at the meeting of the executive of the organization, or is the department considering a change from their support of mere recommendations to the support of regulations which would prohibit the multinationals from taking advantage of Third World countries and Third World mothers in this way?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): If I may, Madam Speaker, I would like to check with the office of Dr. Maureen Law, my assistant deputy minister, who is a member of the World Health Organization executive, to which Canada has belonged since May, what are the latest developments in this regard, because the session has been going on for several days already and I would not want to mislead the House.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Lately we have had a lot of travelling hot air on the subject of the North-South dialogue, a sort of Canadian chinook coming down from the Alps.

An hon. Member: He is no schnook!

Mr. Blaikie: I said chinook, not schnook. My question for the minister is this. Are there under way in her department efforts to integrate the positions which her department has taken at these various international assemblies, with the insight of the North-South dialogue, which is to say that resolving the North-South dialogue is definitely not integrating Third World countries into the global profit strategies of multinational corporations such as Nestlé?

Miss Bégin: The team of the Department of National Health and Welfare of this government does not suffer from a split personality, and I can assure every hon. member that the fight against poverty which we are carrying on in Canada is exactly what we undertake to do when we sit at meetings of international institutions such as the World Health Organization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR STANDING COMMITTEE STUDY OF STATEMENT BY JOURNALIST

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications, who is responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Following recent statements by a senior CBC reporter concerning the administrative incompetence at the French network of the CBC and in view of the conflict which has been going on for the last several months in the news service of this network, can the hon. minister tell this House whether he will ask the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture to check on the situation that this statement suggests since this recent statement coincides with comments made previously by another reporter who has now handed in his resignation to the CBC?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member, who is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, has asked whether I am willing to ask the committee to inquire into this matter. All I can say, Madam Speaker, is that the committee and its chairman are the absolute masters of their own procedures and that, if they want to question the officers of the CBC when the estimates of the corporation are submitted to that committee in the near future, they will have every opportunity at that time to call on these people who, I am convinced, only want to improve the quality of management within the corporation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INVESTMENT IN FOREIGN SHIPPING GROUP

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport on the involvement of CNR in marine transportation. At a time when the government is acting to Canadianize the energy industry, allegedly to create jobs and opportunities for Canadians, will the minister explain why his government authorized a $50 million investment by the CNR in the CAST shipping group, which is controlled from outside of Canada, when the funds will be used to build six container ships in Yugoslavia and South Korea, thereby creating jobs and opportunities not for Canadians but for Yugoslavs and Koreans?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is generally recognized that the company CAST has made and is making important contributions to port development in Canada. From the point of view of CNR, this investment is considered to be a good one so far as financial returns are concerned, and that is why the government has approved it.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, if the investment is a good one, as the minister says, will he kindly explain why, when there is no projected tremendous increase in traffic in the north Atlantic transport zones, CAST and the CNR are doubling their facilities in Montreal and doubling the number of ships available for the North American routes, and what is the justification for this action?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I do not understand the question too well because there is such a development in traffic in the container area. This is one area to which CAST has made an important contribution, and CN is part of that organization.

HOUSING

PREDICTED NUMBER OF STARTS IN 1981

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of housing. Can he tell this House what he predicts will be the number of housing starts in Canada in the year 1981?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): The information, Madam Speaker, which I brought to the attention of the hon. member yesterday was available to all members. It is the report of the Conference Board in Canada which sets that figure at 181,000. Personally I am inclined to believe that that figure is low, and at this time I am asking for advice from CMHC. I do not have that answer as yet.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that CMHC estimates their requirements in 1981 to be in the neighbourhood of 264,000, what new policies does he have to close the gap?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the figure to which the hon. member refers was prepared some months earlier. I do not believe that it is a current projection. In any event, as I have indicated in answers before, we are waiting to see what results, for example, the MURB provision in the budget announced earlier will produce. This is a figure which could introduce, for example, 10,000 to 15,000 units. As I said, when I have the information, which is current information based, for example, on the fluctuation of interest rates which impact the market, I will be happy to advise the hon. member.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM TO BE REPLACED

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question as well is for the minister responsible for housing. In 1979 the Community Services Contribution Program provided in excess of $150 million to assist 867 communities across Canada with various projects involving the construction of numerous utilities which otherwise might not have been available to them. In 1980 the dollar commitment was some $250 million. The government has cancelled the program. My question to the minister is whether he can tell the House what he proposes to replace this program with, and how much assistance can the municipalities expect dollarwise during the ensuing year?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I have indicated in an announcement to all members of the House, the program was not cancelled. In fact, the agreement which expired at the end of last year was not renewed. Notwithstanding that, the government indicated that it will continue to make payments under that agreement which expired last year until approximately March of 1982. There will be a further distribution of some $400 million to provinces and municipalities to assist them in fulfilling the traditional roles which they have had through the years.

We indicated as well that we did it in order to free room for new initiatives. I have indicated in the House before that one of those initiatives, for example, is the consideration of shelter allowance. This could possibly be a very expensive program, depending upon the extent of its introduction. This is one of the things we are considering as a replacement. I admit that it is not directed entirely to municipalities. The ministry and the corporation feel that our responsibility should be in more direct response to housing needs, not the needs of municipalities but the housing needs of Canadians.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, let me remind the minister that these funds have been utilized by municipalities for matters related to housing, such as sewerage projects and things of that nature which are extremely vital. My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In view of the fact that the program has been announced as being cut off and municipalities are experiencing difficulties in the Atlantic region, the maritime provinces, will the minister consider an emergency program at this time of financial assistance to help those communities get through a very difficult and unusually harsh winter?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member missed the import of my last answer to him. The non-renewal of the programs will have no impact on municipalities until 1982. The funding of the moneys will continue until 1982, so I am afraid the talk of emergency programs to municipalities in his region has no bearing on the action of the government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, may I direct the usual Thursday question to the government House leader and ask him what will be the business of the House for tomorrow and next week? It is my understanding that there might be a disposition to set aside Thursday as an allotted day. As far as he can, it would be helpful if he indicated the business well into next week.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, today we will complete second reading of Bill C-48. Tomorrow we will begin the study of Bill C-54 to amend the Income Tax Act and to give the government the authority to borrow $14 billion, and since the very nature of that bill implies that the study in committee be done in Committee of the Whole rather than in a committee of the House we intend, unless due notice is given, of course, to leave that bill before the House for the next few days. So next week Bill C-54, which I have just mentioned, will take all our time, except for Thursday which will be allotted to the official opposition.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I put a question to the government House leader regarding the House business for next week? As the government House leader must know, it used to be a tradition, when a prime minister or a secretary of state for external affairs came back to Canada from trips to other countries, that automatically a statement was made in the House. In recent times that tradition seems to have been dropped, yet I wonder if the government does not realize the importance of the North-South dialogue. Will the government House leader impress upon the Prime Minister very seriously the point suggested by the hon. member for Saskatoon East that some day next week there might be a formal statement by the Prime Minister on his North-South discussions so that there can then be responses from this side of the House?

I realize there is the usual comment that we have opposition days, but surely this is a matter of concern to the government and the whole country, and it ought to be worth a statement by the Prime Minister and responses to that statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague understands very well that under the provisions of Standing Order 15(3) the Prime Minister does not have to make such a statement. On the other hand, he will understand that the Prime Minister has always been happy in the past and will be happy to answer questions on the subject almost every day during oral question period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: Moreover, I am sure the Prime Minister will be happy to participate, directly or indirectly, in any debate on one of the allotted days as the hon. member just mentioned which are available to the opposition parties. I think this would be much more useful for the country than spreading some kind of panic regarding the economy when there is no reason to spread such panic, as his party did in the last few days.

I suggest that the hon. member should use question period and maybe one or two of the allotted days available to the opposition. If he undertakes to do that, I will be very happy to suggest to the Prime Minister that he consider seriously the possibility of making the statement about which the member talked. But we will take into consideration the time taken during question period on this subject, and if it has not been covered sufficiently during question period, perhaps then the Prime Minister will be happy to make a statement.

My hon. colleague just recognized that it is not an obligation, but on the other hand he will also agree the opposition will have many opportunities to ask questions of the Prime Minister on this subject. I am sure the Prime Minister will be very pleased to provide the opposition with all the answers he is willing to give them.

An hon. Member: Yes, the ones he is willing to give.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, we both understand the rules of the House and the obligations and privileges of the Prime Minister, but surely this subject is of such great importance that it ought not to be one on which the government waits for questions to which to respond. Surely it is a question on which the government should take the lead.

The government House leader has already promised that he will speak to the Prime Minister about this matter, but I hope he will put his weight as House leader behind the proposition that the Prime Minister ought to take the initiative of making a statement on motions so that, on the government's initiative, we can have a discussion of this important issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question. It is really generated most recently by the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre concerning the practices of the House. We have seen a quite regular and a much more frequent recourse to the use of closure by the government than had been the custom in the past. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated, apparently we now have a deliberate departure from the practice of prime ministerial statements on major trips undertaken while Parliament is sitting, at public expense, and presumably in the interest of public policy. In the past those have been the cause for statements on motions, of report by a prime minister on his return.

There was a rather soft undertaking to discuss the matter but a very hard indication that it was the view of the government House leader that he would prefer to have the traditions of this place changed, to have the only responsibility by the Prime Minister evidenced through questions, through the response to questions or through an allotted opposition day.

On at least two occasions earlier today matters were dealt with which obviously would have been better dealt with through statements on motions. The Secretary of State and Minister of Communications, in failing to answer a question by my colleague, gave a long statement of government broadcasting policy which should have been made on a statement on motions. The Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment, in his capacity as government envoy on the constitutional matters, indicated today that there had not been the full and complete reporting to the House of Commons which the House of Commons had the right to expect as a result of the consultations in Great Britain in the autumn concerning the legislative timetable of Westminster and the matters before this House.

I apologize for the long preamble to my question, but we are seeing a number of reforms and changes in parliamentary procedure by the government acting unilaterally. The government House leader will recall that the government I had the honour to lead brought in a comprehensive program of parliamentary reform.

Does the government intend simply to change the practices of Parliament by unilateral action, or is it preparing a comprehensive program of parliamentary reform which will be brought before the House so that we can consider deliberately how we want to change this Chamber, taking account of some of the excellent suggestions made the other day during the closure motion debate by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, taking account of the proposals put forward by my colleague and seatmate when he occupied the position of government House leader, and taking account of the very serious concerns about the adequency of parliamentary procedure felt by private members on all sides of the House? Will we have a full and comprehensive public, detailed proposal, or will we simply have the House traditions changed bit by bit unilaterally by the government?

● (1510)

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, of course I do not expect the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to think that I agree with his introductory remarks because they are highly politicized and do not reflect reality at all. But still the essence of his question is serious. That is why I will go along and answer because it has to do with parliamentary reform. But when he talks about breaking with tradition, Madam Speaker, it should be recalled that it was not the government which sent hon. members performing gymnastics before the Speaker of the House on the eve of a vote last fall when we were compelled and forced by the opposition to put an end to the debate which had been far too long.

Nor was it the government which today put a question to a minister, a question altogether foreign to his ministerial responsibilities. The Minister of the Environment replied out of courtesy, because we on this side of the House are very polite and quite prepared to overlook the procedural mistakes often made by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. So I want to set things in their proper perspective and suggest that the traditions of this House are being changed not so much by members on this side of the House as by hon. members opposite, in the two cases I have just mentioned.

As to the application of Standing Order 15(3) concerning ministerial statements the Leader of the Opposition knows full well that we are not compelled to make any and that we make some now and again when hon. members have no opportunity to put questions to ministers on certain subjects, say a new policy for example, or if during oral question period it was impossible to question a minister or the Prime Minister on a given topic.

In this instance, the Prime Minister will be in the House next week. There will be a daily oral question period as usual and of course hon. members will be able to put questions to the Prime Minister who will have an opportunity to reply. If it becomes obvious that his answers are not satisfactory or that the Prime Minister does not have enough time to give all the answers required to enlighten the House and the Parliament of Canada about his trip to foreign countries, then I am convinced that he will indeed consider the advisability of following the Standing Orders of the House to give more details to hon. members, either under the provisions of Standing Order 15(3) or in a statement, or again by offering his contribution during an allotted day when the opposition would have selected his trip as subject for debate. As I said earlier, the opposition will have at least six days to raise that subject if it so wishes. As to the substance of the question on parliamentary reform, of course it is important to think about it. Some traditions must be respected, others must disappear. I have said again and again that any change that might be made here will have been the object of discussions among members on both sides of the House. As far as I know, that process has been under way since I first came to this House in 1974, because our Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization has studied this question and tabled three reports on which no action was taken. And then we have the report introduced by the Progressive Conservative Party when they were in office and which features challenging ideas and other proposals that could stand revamping.

Other aspects of parliamentary reform deserve consideration since they flow from the recommendations of the Lambert report or of reports now on the order paper and issued by the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. They must all be reviewed as a whole. Once we have all the elements I think we will be in a position, within reasonable time, to come up with suggestions and arrange to have them discussed by all parliamentarians.

But it is obvious that parliamentary reform has become necessary and urgent if this institution is to reflect reality. What does "reflect reality" mean? Very simply, enabling Parliament to adopt enough legislation to meet current needs—

Mr. Clark: —adopt enough legislation?

Mr. Pinard: —adopt enough legislation to meet current needs.

I am answering the question seriously. I hope the right hon. gentleman will deign to listen because this is not a light subject.

To this day and for reasons which may be humanitarian but which we should not have to endure, the opposition has not been altogether co-operative in the adoption of legislation since Parliament resumed last fall. Unfortunate though it may be, it is the truth. Of course, we deal with consequential issues but it is also essential for the government to shoulder its responsibilities.

It was in that spirit, Madam Speaker, that earlier this week we were forced to serve notice that we would limit the debate, not impose closure as the Leader of the Opposition so liberally claims, but limit the debate. Why were we forced to limit the debate? Because the opposition parties did not want to hear anything about a reasonable length of time. Contrary to the statement of the Leader of the Opposition, we could not possibly decide unilaterally to limit the debate without first consulting the opposition parties and offer them an opportunity to explain to us what they think is a reasonable length of time. We asked them if they wanted to sit down with us and tell us what would be reasonable as additional time to debate Bill C-48 on second reading. They said no, so we did not have any choice.

Parliamentary reform is necessary. Why? Precisely because we had constitutional problems in 1980 and now in 1981 we must come to grips with energetic and economic issues. Madam Speaker, we now have on the order paper 40-odd items about which the government must take action to answer the expectations of the people. And all of a sudden the opposition parties decide to filibuster, so we are expected to let them take over and manage the business of Parliament while we stand idly by. If we were to agree to play that game we would simply be giving up on the responsibilities which the majority of Canadians entrusted to us in the last election.

One thing I want to make clear to the Leader of the Opposition is that we do want to co-operate with members across the floor. We are prepared to discuss with them. We are prepared to sit down and talk over a reasonable schedule to implement a legislative program which will command respect for Parliament from all Canadians, so that we can show to the people that we have here men and women who can govern the country in an orderly and rational manner while respecting the full rights of the opposition to voice exhaustive but certainly not dilatory criticism. If in my capacity as government House leader I were to let the opposition have a field day with dilatory tactics I would be falling far short of assuming the responsibilities given to us by the Canadian people.

I suggest I would not be doing the opposition a service, I would be doing my share to destroy this institution. I am convinced that that is not the intent of the Leader of the Opposition but I remind him that the best way to prove that indeed he seeks what is best for this institution is to be more co-operative and refrain from filibustering. We on this side are quite willing to sit down and negotiate and to that end we are prepared to set aside every other political consideration. All we want is to respect the obligations of a modern government facing a modern opposition, but in an orderly manner.

When we realize that for partisan motives the opposition will not co-operate, then we are forced to use the Standing Orders of the House and, in this instance since my colleague refers directly to the events of this week, to resort to Standing Order 75C. In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I cannot refrain from recalling publicly that Standing Order 75C is a rule of the House and that it has nothing to do with unilateral action on the part of the government. Standing Order 75C cannot be applied and, as government House leader, I have no authority to limit the debate without first offering to the opposition parties an opportunity to negotiate with us over what is a reasonable length of time.

That is an obligation which is spelled out in the Standing Orders and I went along with it but members opposite refused to negotiate a reasonable delay concerning the length of second reading of Bill C-48. Given such obvious and systematic obstruction we were forced to assume our responsibilities. We are hoping, Madam Speaker, that in future the opposition will not force us to act that way again.

Again I express publicly our will to co-operate with hon. members opposite and grant reasonable time for debate but it has become imperative, as the Leader of the Opposition wishes to change the Standing Orders, to launch parliamentary reform so that Parliament will be modern and efficient and reflect reality. Right now we are not doing anything more than attempting to do just that and to respect fully the obligations entrusted to us by the Canadian public and the people of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Order, please, I am wondering if I, as well, might not have to set a limit on an extended debate on a simple question, which required an answer of course, but it seems to me since I have already heard the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition I should now recognize another member on that side. It is not reasonable to listen to two speeches on the same question. We have now been on the same question for twenty minutes already.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I know you are running a clock with respect to the time limits, the time taken by members of the opposition and the government. I trust you will continue that practice and draw our attention to it, as you did the other day. I was quite surprised by the response of the government House leader because it did not draw anywhere near to my question, which is quite simple. I would like to know whether the government is now preparing any proposal for parliamentary reform which this House might consider.

● (1520)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, since there has been no preamble this time I will refrain as well. The answer is yes.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I had not intended to intervene, but the minister in his contribution made mention of the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments which I tabled in the House in July. Each day Madam Speaker has been asking whether or not I would like to call the motion for concurrence in this unanimous report which was placed on the order paper on July 17. In view of the fact that the minister has indicated an interest in this report and that, to date, he would be opposed to calling the motion for concurrence until after the task force on regulatory reform has made its report, and in view of the fact that the task force has now made that report, is the minister prepared to have the House debate concurrence in this unanimous report I presented on behalf of the statutory instruments committee?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I also mentioned that we were waiting for the report of the Economic Council of Canada on the same subject, which will be in February, if not earlier. In any event, even if that report were to be completed within the next week, it is not our intention to use the time of the House now to deal with those reports because we must deal with other bills involving matters of the budget, energy, and the constitution.

What I am saying is that these reports refer to the regulations which are linked very closely to parliamentary reform. In our view it is very important that these reports be considered at the same time as parliamentary reform. We would prefer to have these reports sent in due time to those who will be looking into parliamentary reform. I am willing to discuss this possibility with the hon. member within the next couple of days, but it is certainly not our intention to use the time of the House before Easter to deal with those reports.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, I would like to remind this House that how this whole debate began, and then wandered into closure, statutory instruments and all over the lot, was with a simple question on upcoming House business and whether or not the Prime Minister would be prepared to make a statement in the House on motions on his trip. I am aware that the Prime Minister has no obligation and that there is no rule requiring him to make such a statement.

We know that the government House leader cannot commit the Prime Minister at this point. All we want from the government House leader is an indication that he will ask or that he will somehow urge the Prime Minister with regard to this matter.

One of the most enlightening and interesting experiences for myself as a new member when I came to this House some years ago was statements on motions made by ministers. It was participatory democracy for the critics of the various areas, and it was extremely helpful. As observed by the Leader of the Opposition, that practice has greatly declined. Instead, we get ministers making what used to be statements on motions regarding policy and new departures and new procedures outside the House, or outside Room 130-S. I would urge the Prime Minister and other ministers to return at least partially to the practice of making statements on motions on important issues.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I thought I answered that question to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The reason why we were discussing parliamentary reform is because I was asked a question about parliamentary reform by the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition, and that is why I elaborated on the subject. But in so far as the question of statements by ministers is concerned, I believe I gave a full answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If the hon. member is pleased with the practice as it was in the past, that is fine with me, and I will speak to the Prime Minister when he returns. I just told his colleague that I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he consider making a statement, but I cannot at this stage confirm that he will do so, especially if question period is used for the same purpose.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is with respect to the business of the House, and it concerns a bill which was tabled some time ago and about which I have inquired on a number of occasions. The government has indicated that this bill is one of its priorities. I refer to the legislation with respect to access to information.

Before the Christmas recess the President of the Privy Council indicated that this bill would be tabled early in the new year, and that it was a high priority bill. In the course of his statements this afternoon on the upcoming business of the House over the next few months, the President of the Privy Council made no reference to this legislation. I would like to hear from him when we will see some action on this bill. When will the government call this bill for second reading and permit us to get into the kind of clause by clause study that is sorely needed, so that the secrecy which is so pervasive in this government will come to an end? Madam Speaker, what kind of priority does this bill have, and can we get an assurance from the President of the Privy Council that it will be called very, very soon?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the bill has in fact been tabled. The hon. member probably meant debated when he made the comment "tabled at the beginning of the new year". We consider the bill to be of high priority and we attach a great deal of importance to the access to information legislation, but because of our legislative program we cannot afford at this time to allot more than one day of debate to the second reading stage of that bill before we send it to committee.

Miss MacDonald: That is terrible.

Mr. Pinard: Once in committee, it could be discussed at length. The Tory party mentioned here in the House that it could not give us the guarantee that one day would be enough for purposes of second reading. On the contrary, their party spokesman indicated that they had many speakers on the bill. Under those circumstances I am not in a position to allow more than one day, but I am willing to discuss with the House leaders at future meetings the allocation of time for that bill. Surely, if less time had been used to discuss Bill C-48, we would have been able to send that bill to committee.

Nevertheless, like many other bills on the order paper, it is a bill of high importance. As I was saying earlier, it is necessary for us to come to some agreement on the limitations of time for some of the debates. I am willing to discuss the matter with the representatives of the opposition and I will include this bill in my discussions with the opposition.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, if the President of the Privy Council's excuse for delaying the tabling of this bill for second reading is that the official opposition has said that it will take more than one day, why is he not prepared to bring the bill forward for second reading and, at the conclusion of debate on that particular day, the public could judge for itself the attitude of both the official opposition and my party with respect to the bill? If the debate on second reading continues, then it is up to the government to determine when the bill will return to the House. Would the President of the Privy Council consider that possibility?

Mr. Pinard: If the hon. member's party is willing to give up one of its allotted days for that purpose, I would be glad to do so.

PRIVILEGE

MISS MacDONALD—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. AXWORTHY

Madam Speaker: I would like to rule now on the question of privilege which was raised on Tuesday by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I listened very closely to all the arguments and the interventions made by the minister and by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) during the debate. At the end of the debate I indicated that, on the face of it, I did not see a question of privilege, but I reserved my judgment so that I could look with ease at all the arguments which were brought forward. I have found no reasons which would make me change my mind.

I do not feel that there is a question of privilege. It certainly indicates that there was a very serious difference of opinion and it certainly was a very serious subject that was brought up. The seriousness of the subject alone, however, does not bring it within the purview of privileges, which would allow me to give it priority in debate.

I should like to add something with regard to my interrupting the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam. I must say that the meaning of some of her colourful language at some points escaped me. I did not quite know what she meant when she was alluding to a mole and I was a bit nervous, not wanting to get up at every moment. It appeared that she was getting very close to saying something that was unparliamentary. I am sure that I interrupted her flight of oratory and I am sorry for that, but those were my reasons.

I feel we have taken the subject as far as we can under the heading of a question of privilege.

MISS MacDONALD—REPLY MADE BY MR. AXWORTHY

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on another question of privilege. Naturally I accept your ruling on the previous one, but there is another question which I wish to raise on this subject and which I can do at this moment for the first time. It occurred during the minister's response to my remarks and I therefore was not able to raise it while the matter was being looked into by the Chair. This is the first opportunity that I have had to raise it.

Mr. Pinard: What about notice?

Madam Speaker: Would the hon. member resume her seat, please? As I understand, she is now raising a question of privilege which arose from deliberations having taken place yesterday or the day before yesterday. That makes it even more difficult. I stand to be corrected, but if the matter arose from deliberations on that day, then the member should have risen immediately after the question period. If the hon. member has another question of privilege flowing from the discussions which took place, then she could give me notice of it and bring it up on another day.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. FERGUSON—INCORRECT ATTRIBUTION OF QUESTION ASKED BY MR. BLOOMFIELD

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding comments made in this House yesterday by the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield) which were attributed to me by United Press International and which went out over the national networks. The error arose from the press using the "blues" which had not been corrected. My name was listed as the person who asked the question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). Although the Hansard that was distributed today is correct, I would respectfully urge that extreme caution be used to ensure that unedited copies of the "blues" are not used as the basis for news stories.

Madam Speaker: The point of the hon. member is well taken. I think the "blues" are used and I suppose there was a mistake in the transcription. I will investigate to see what measures we can take to avoid this kind of mistake in the future.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,493, 1,568, 1,602, 1,648, 1,713, 1,762, 1,779 and 1,784.

I suggest, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

CBC—LISTENING AUDIENCE

Question No. 1,493—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each city where a CBC radio or television station is located according to the latest audience listening statistics possessed by CBC, what is the average daily percentage of the total listening audience for each such station?

2. What are the percentages of the average daily listening audience of all other stations, including their call letters, serving the same area whose percentage is higher than the CBC outlets?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. According to the latest comprehensive bureau of broadcast measurement reports (averaged over a typical fall week 1979), shares of audience obtained by CBC-owned and affiliated stations in those urban centres where CBC-owned stations are located are as follows:

NOTE: CBC-owned television and radio stations operate in very competitive broadcasting environments. In the past decade the introduction of many new television choices, by cable TV and new local stations being licensed, has made Canada the most fragmented TV marketplace in the world. The CBC has also changed in this period, offering more Canadian programming than ever before, and thereby seeking to provide more distinctive TV programming than is found on other channels, at times to reach the mass audience and at others a more selective audience. In radio, a similar process has been going on for some years. TV and FM radio have dramatically changed the radio medium and audiences have become extremely fragmented. Today a station usually attempts to reach only a segment of the total population by programming a particular format. CBC AM radio, in English and French, attempts to provide the highest quality news and information programming, while CBC FM radio offers classical music and arts-science commentary, and these specialized services compete for audiences with a host of other radio station formats in most Canadian cities.

2. Since the requested information is provided by a syndicated ratings firm, the bureau of broadcast measurement, statistics required on non-CBC-network stations should be requested from the stations themselves.

GREEK SHIP "POSSIDONIA"

Question No. 1,602—Mrs. Mitchell:

1. Was the captain of the seized Greek Ship Possidonia charged for violating the Immigration Act under sections 53(2)(3) and part 6 95(m) when he refused to take back on board the three seamen whom he brought to Canada and, if not, for what reason?

2. Was the government notified, by wire, of the irregularity on September 5, 1980, by T. McGrath, president of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers, local 400 and was action taken to investigate the situation and, if not, for what reason?

3. Did senior immigration officials take the side of the foreign ship owners in the dispute without undertaking an immediate investigation and, if so, for what reason?

4. Were certain pertinent immigration documents left unsigned and, if so, for what reason?

5. Was the interpreter used in the hearing clearly on the side of the Greek ship owners and, if so, for what reason was the interpreter used?

6. Will the Minister for Employment and Immigration take action before the ship Possidonia leaves Canadian waters and will he instruct his officials to lay charges against the captain if the investigation now under way shows this to be necessary?

7. Will the minister take steps to prevent this kind of situation happening in the future?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Consideration was not given to prosecution under paragraph 95(m) because there was no evidence that the master had taken any action that might be construed as an offence described in that paragraph. In addition, there was compliance by the master of the ship with the provisions of regulation 53(2) and (3). Penalties, therefore, could not be applied.

2. Yes. An investigation was carried out by immigration officials.

3. No.

4. Yes, due to administrative oversight.

5. No.

6. No. There was no evidence of any violations on the part of the master or the transportation company.

7. No. The "situation" resulted from a pay dispute between the crewmen and their employer and, as such, was a civil matter—outside the commission's jurisdiction.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to certain questions which remain unanswered and which would take hardly any research whatsoever. I therefore find it difficult to see that there could be any reason for delay.

I refer first of all to question No. 136 which was placed on the order paper last April. It concerns the rental of a DC-9 aircraft by the Liberal Party of Canada which has not paid its bill to Air Canada for the use of that aircraft. It asks if Air Canada has received payment and, if so, when and how much did they receive. It seems pretty straightforward, but it is almost a year since that question was placed on the order paper.

I refer also to question No. 115 which inquires in a broader sense, in regard to the election campaign of February 18, 1980, what political parties rented aircraft from Air Canada, what they paid, if the bills were paid, etc. It is a very simple question, yet it has gone unanswered since the beginning of the session last April.

I find it hard to accept that these questions remain unanswered after hearing the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) say a few minutes ago that he believed in responsibility toward the Canadian people and that that is why he wanted progress on the items on the order paper. If he does, why does he or his parliamentary secretary not answer these questions a little faster? He also said that he was willing to set aside all political concerns in regard to major items on the order paper. I think he should be prepared to set aside political concerns in regard to questions placed on the order paper by the elected representatives of the people. We have a right to know, as the people of Canada have, what the answers to these questions are.

May I conclude by referring to another series of questions, without going into detail. Question No. 29 concerning Michael Pitfield and the Taschereau papers on national security; questions Nos. 672 to 675 inclusive concerning Michael Pitfield, and question No. 678 concerning Michael Pitfield are all on the subject of the money he received and apparently did not return, other than a small portion, during his brief absence from his office in the Langevin Block. Question No. 724, which is very simple, asks if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on June 2, 1979, stated, "Pitfield and those guys killed me on that".

I do not know what Michael Pitfield is, in the sense that he runs this country or is some mighty person behind the scenes, Madam Speaker. I sometimes begin to wonder if Michael Pitfield is Edgar Bergen and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is Charlie McCarthy.

I think it is about time that Michael Pitfield became accountable to Parliament and accountable to the committees of Parliament before which he has refused to appear, and the Prime Minister has refused to summon him. These questions on the order paper concern the mysterious Mr. Pitfield, holed up in the Langevin Block, who is the senior public servant of this land. He should be told that he must not hold up questions put by members of this House that are legitimate, and that the information should be given. Is this country being run by Michael Pitfield or by the elected representatives and the Prime Minister of Canada?

Mr. Nielsen: Michael Pitfield.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, perhaps I should answer a couple of the comments made by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did appear before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, before the end of last year. Unfortunately, Mr. Pitfield was abroad at the time making arrangements for the summit conference which will be held in Ottawa this year, and therefore could not attend on that day.

Mr. Cossitt: Who sent him out of town?

Mr. Collenette: That was a long-standing commitment. I should also like to draw the attention of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, who has a particular interest in the activities of the Clerk of the Privy Council, to the fact that he himself was not at the meeting that day, and had some of his colleagues ask questions. I thought the Prime Minister's answers dealing with Mr. Pitfield and severance pay were quite adequate, as did some of his colleagues who did not pursue that line of questioning with the Prime Minister.

I have to take issue with the comments of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville. If he reads some of the answers we have made available to the House, especially to questions he has posed, he will see that we have answered them irrespective of their political nature. Some of the questions put on the order paper by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville are highly political in nature, but that does not concern the government in answering them. In answering we try to get answers to all questions whether they are highly motivated by political concerns or not. I shall do my best to get answers to the questions that he enumerated a few moments ago.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning a statement just made. The parliamentary secretary said that when the miscellaneous estimates committee met—and I will quote his words as I remember them, subject to being a little bit out—I was absent from that committee meeting when the Prime Minister appeared and "I had some of my colleagues ask questions". I would like to assure the House that I did not arrange to have anyone ask any questions on my behalf. As a matter of fact, I certainly would have been there to ask my own questions but that happened to be the day for my annual checkup at the Kingston General Hospital for a heart condition. I have no hesitation in saying that is why I was not here. I think even that is a little more important than listening to the garbage from the Prime Minister of Canada.

Madam Speaker: As the parliamentary secretary asked that all of the other questions be allowed to stand, shall they stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, January 13, 1981, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to resume debate in opposition to Bill C-48. I am also pleased to see that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is here so that he can hear some of the environmental concerns which have been expressed to me by people around the country in relation to Bill C-48, even though we are not being given much time to debate it.

When I began speaking on Tuesday night, I, along with many other members of this House, eastern, western and northern maritime Canadians, were under the illusion that the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) had their portfolios of public interest entrenched in Bill C-48.

It is abundantly clear that the Minister of the Environment may not long uphold his parliamentary and Crown responsibility to keep the environmental moratorium in place on the west coast. I think that became quite clear as a result of questions I raised yesterday during question period both with him and with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Much worse though, he and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans have failed totally to incorporate the sound policies put forward to them by their own respective departments.

I shall quote briefly from a study done by the Department of Fisheries and the Department of the Environment called "A Study of Environmental Concerns—Offshore Oil and Gas Drilling and Production." I am sure the minister of energy is aware of this but he went to great lengths to keep some of the concerns raised for those two ministers out of Bill C-48.

Some of the concerns found on page iv of this document are:

Toxic compounds are used in drilling fluids without justification.

Effluent controls are developed and applied unevenly in offshore areas.

Impact assessments of effluent discharges are inadequate.

Operators sometimes do not deal realistically with the spill containment and clean-up problems likely to be encountered.

Field testing of containment and clean-up equipment and procedures is often inadequate.

Oil spill liability and compensation provisions are inadequate.

I will deal with that specifically later on. I know the minister of energy is touting the absolute liability section as being the main way of dealing with this issue, and I have some interesting comments to make about that.

The concerns listed continue:

Most offshore drilling and production accidents, including spills, are caused by human error, yet efforts to respond to the situation are unorganized both in Canada and United States.

Safety and anti-pollution equipment is being used without standards; those that exist are written in excessively general terms.

I might comment about this latter one. I have seen the Neels program. I notice that some areas supposedly in possession of large quantities of oil-spill equipment list it right down to having two or three pairs of gum boots, and having toilet paper on hand.

The concerns listed in this study continue:

Standards for old equipment are lacking. Data on failed equipment are lacking.

Detailed logistical and environmental information on relief well drilling capabilities are often not provided by operators.

Logistical provisions which could reduce the relief well drilling time are often not made. Environmental impact assessment information is often collected with little or no clear idea of how it can or will be used to influence those who make the decisions regarding offshore oil and gas drilling and production operations.

I would remind the Minister of Energy that he has specifically written the bill entirely into his own hands and, in an occasional situation, to his cabinet.

The next concern:

People having environmental concerns or expertise (including the public-at-large) are not given effective access to the policy and decision-making processes of regulatory authorities.

I am sure the minister is well aware that the regulatory authority is himself basically in cabinet. The concerns continue with:

The lead time for conducting environmental assessments is too short. Many proponents provide only a superficial, unevaluated review of the impact literature; they do not seek to profit from the environmental mistakes already made by coastal zone developers around the world.

I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that there is absolutely nothing in the bill to deal with very serious blowouts such as the Ixtoc blowout in the Gulf of Mexico last year.

The concerns continue:

Proponents draw inappropriate analogies between the proposed project and ones that have already been carried out and fail to uncover gaps in the literature.

Acreage releases are not planned over the long term to provide a focus for environmental assessment work.

Information on sensitive areas is either not presented in impact assessments or is left unlinked to key decisions relating to offshore oil and gas activities.

Development plans for production rigs do not make provisions for outside review.

The environmental assessment requirements in the draft Canada Oil and Gas Production Regulations do not indicate how assessment results are to be linked with the key decision milestones involved in offshore production.

There is no reference to the federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process in the draft production regulations.

I would draw that one particularly to the minister's attention. It is of concern to environmentalists around this country. The minister pointedly made sure that that reference was not in Bill C-48.

The concerns continue:

There is no requirement that proponents provide alternative pipeline routes to shore in their development plans or that these alternatives be considered by the public and by others having environmental concerns.

Problems encountered in the United States and the North Sea during the development and production phases of offshore operations have not been adequately addressed in this country.

Those concerns are just in the first couple of pages of this report.

In my view the Minister of Energy has gutted the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of their responsibilities. If they have any intention of having credibility on maritime issues in Canada, they had better attend committee meetings, at least, beginning next week, and assure that amendments are made and passed to deal with those items I have listed and with those that no doubt will be raised by witnesses in the coming days. At this point I will certainly put the Minister of Energy on notice that our party intends to pursue the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) acting as Deputy Prime Minister, that we will be allowed to call as many witnesses as we please on Bill C-48. We certainly intend to do that.

Surely it is the role of the opposition to map out weaknesses. However, there is a public responsibility that has not to date been upheld by these two particular ministers of the Crown. They have at their fingertips intelligent, scientific expertise that has been muzzled in the interests of partisan industrial expediency.

What is offered and clear for all Canadians to see is a blueprint for environmental disaster, the destruction, perhaps by insignificant increment, but ultimately the biological disruption of Canada's marine environment—as a direct result of failing to legislate, not to regulate, not to force British Columbians, maritimers, and northern Canadians to come and beg the Minister of Energy for the proper environmental studies, and that the proper studies be legislated and a sound regime for offshore oil and gas be put in place in Bill C-48.

I have here The National Energy Program for 1980. I am sure many members of this House and Canadians in general have taken the time now to read it. The minister is continually touting it as a great move in terms of Canadianization. I refer all members of this House to page 45 of that document. We find that the purpose of the bill is to:

Ensure active development of oil and gas rights.

At page 47 of "The National Energy Program" we find:

—vigorous and sustained exploration and development efforts should be expected. This has not always been the case—

Further down in the same paragraph we find:

This is no longer appropriate,—

It continues:

A main feature of the new system, therefore, will be stiffer work requirements,—

In the same paragraph we find:

Other means will include drilling orders, production orders,—

From page 48 we find a little section which I am sure the minister is sending out to environmentalists and those people concerned with the fishing industry around Canada. I quote:

Among the changes will be more rigorous requirements for environmental protection, particularly as regards responsibilities of operators and their absolute liability in case of pollution-causing accidents.

That sounds great. However, it falls apart pretty quickly. It is clear for all to see that the cumulative escape clauses which the energy minister put in this bill make absolute liability unlikely at best. If a billion dollar blowout were to occur off Newfoundland, Melville Island, or off the Queen Charlotte Islands, I can tell Canadians that under this bill as it stands, their recovery for lost fisheries, damaged beaches and so on is not even remotely guaranteed.

What is to stop every drilling rig from becoming individually incorporated? I am sure the minister is abundantly aware of the corporate loopholes which are available to avoid the absolute liability clause and to reduce and fractionally take it down to the point where a billion dollar blowout would in fact be carried on the backs of Canadians and the Canadian environment, and hardly on the backs of those responsible for the spill.

Looking at clause 62(1) of this bill, I note that the Crown is specifically indemnified from almost everything. In fact, I would go further and say the Crown is indemnified from everything, regardless of how or where it occurs.

I point out to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of the Environment, who is in his place, that there are plenty of Mack truck loopholes in this bill. I trust the two of them will see eye to eye long enough to put at least the basic regime for environmental protection into this bill.

There are abundant rumours already that the absolute liability clause will not only, as I already pointed out, get into the fractionalized state but will turn out to be no more than sleight of hand when this bill returns from committee stage. This was one of the very few potential incentives to good post-exploratory stewardship of the environment. However, the following is revealing.

I pointed out a moment ago a quotation that I am sure the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Energy could send to those people concerned about the environment. Here is one they can send out to the energy industry, just one page further on. I quote:

The new legislation for the Canada lands makes oil and gas rights available for development and hence is not directly concerned with pollution prevention per se.

You cannot have it both ways. You cannot send a little out here and a little out there. I would encourage Canadians to read this bill because it is the greatest jurisdictional grab of the century anywhere in the world. This is an area three times the size of the ten provinces combined. That once again says it all.

The dangers to the Arctic environment were laid out well by my colleague, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar). This includes areas such as Lancaster Sound where only a tiny fraction of the required scientific work has been done to understand the complex and fragile biological systems of that area. Yet every day there are announcements of nuclear powered icebreakers, LNG tankers three times the size of football fields moving through an area that I remind both ministers is so incredibly fragile that the tiniest mistake could disrupt the biological system and we would end up with little or almost no life in that area which is so crucial.

Where in this lengthy Bill C-48 is the requirement for scientific environmental study and evaluation by independent scientists? It is simply not there. Where is the clause to provide for mandatory public hearings? Gone. The interests of the Inuit, the maritimers, northerners and citizens of British Columbia are not given one paragraph or even one line in this document that I would describe as being greedy.

The people of Canada can take little solace from this document that their interests have been upheld or that the biology and environment of Canada will be protected as they can and must be. Canadians are environmentally conscious, and are sick and tired of corporate Liberal party apologists. This bill is a recipe for get bucks quick, regardless of the costs to the environment and future generations.

I would stress to the two ministers sitting here, avidly reading, that they speak to some of the senior scientists who are well aware of the costs which can be saved by having proper, long-term, broad based environmental studies done. If you disrupt the salmon fishery, you may cost the economy billions more dollars than simply rushing headlong into a rash program trying to grab gas and oil to buoy up a sagging Canadian economy.

The minister touts the 25 per cent Crown share as the outstanding benefit to all Canadians, but under a little pressure in this House on December 11 he admitted to the nymphomaniacs from the oil industry boardrooms to my right that the 25 per cent Crown share is nothing but a hollow promise. He said, as reported at page 5669 of Hansard, that the 25 per cent federal cash incentive grant would be made available to all explorers to offset the 25 per cent Crown share. Here you have it, and there it goes.

What consolation is there in this bill for maritimers for protection of the environment? I can tell everyone in maritime Canada, including maritime British Columbia and the maritime Arctic, that there is absolutely nothing. There is no ownership or protection, just the big Liberal corporate hand ripping off some profit.

What of the offshore in British Columbia, in particular relating to a question which was put to the Minister of the Environment yesterday? He said he knows of no reasons at this point why he should not continue supporting the environmental moratorium. I understand that outside of the House he indicated that perhaps the lifting of the moratorium in relation to gas and oil drilling would not affect the tanker traffic.

I have done enough investigation into this situation to know that there is only one moratorium that was put in place. I have a letter from the Minister of Energy dated September 24, 1980, where he lays out quite clearly that the environmental moratorium was put in place in 1972 during Canada-U.S. negotiations to deal with the risks and liabilities of oil tanker traffic carrying Prudhoe Bay oil down to the continental United States. The moment it was brought in to deal with tanker traffic in Canada-U.S. negotiations, at the very same time it shut down gas and oil exploration. I am sure both ministers know that. I am glad to know that the Minister of the Environment at least will stand up for that environmental moratorium to stay in place until there is some reason for it to be lifted. I am sure the House will have the opportunity to debate those reasons when they come forward.

What of the offshore in British Columbia, an area of crucial importance for the production of food, not only salmon, halibut, cod, herring, shellfish and so on, but an area just awakening to the vast potential of marine farming and aquaculture, something we will need not only in Canada but to feed the hungry millions of the world, as pointed out yesterday by my colleague from Saskatoon East during question period?

I challenge any Liberal in this House or any Liberal who will come to this House, and I am confident that not one will rise to accept the challenge to put on the record what broad based environmental studies have been done or will be done, studies that deal with the impact of oil drilling or exploration on Pacific salmon and groundfish, studies on the impact of oil and gas blowouts on the estuaries of such massive rivers as the Nass or Skeena, studies on the impact of spills on kelp beds, algae, beaches and so on.

The Minister of the Environment attended the National Survival Institute in Toronto quite recently and listened, as I did, to the chairman of the United Nations environment program where he pointed out the damage being done by toxic and other forms of pollution to the oceans. It is one of the greatest concerns we could possibly have. It is in that final area that we may find the solution to the problem of food for the world and also the production of oxygen to keep us all alive. This sudden, rushed plan is like building a skyscraper without ever having an architect or engineer draw up plans or test the ground for stability.

Bill C-48 is the trademark of a group of greedy, careless, quick buck artists prepared to take the profits and run, but not prepared to evaluate the true costs or to involve the public anywhere in monitoring, evaluating or determining the fate of the environment which provides their livelihood and the livelihood of every creature on this planet.

Unbelievable though it may seem, planning can in fact save money, as I pointed out to the Minister of Energy. It may take a little more time, but it is extremely important in the strategy of this country. Since the Minister of the Environment is here, I might point out that it is peculiar that north of 60 in this country the federal government only sees fit to have eight professional biologists doing all of the work related to an area much larger than most countries in this world and far more fragile than the majority of this planet. I would certainly urge the minister to increase dramatically the number of biologists in the north.

The rights of fishermen not only in British Columbia but also in the maritimes, and of Inuit fishermen, are eroded in this bill. The rights of coastal residents and native people are beaten back. Every Canadian can wave goodbye to another area of democratic rights if Bill C-48 is passed in its present form.

Let us take a look at who really benefits from Bill C-48 in British Columbia. First and foremost is Chevron. As I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources knows well, it is in the final stages of having Sea Consult prepare its initial environmental impact. The minister and his officials have indicated to me that shortly after that the environmental moratorium will be lifted so that Chevron can get on with its drilling when the new regime of Bill C-48 is in place. I am sure the Minister of the Environment will get in touch with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and make sure that there are public hearings and publicly funded interveners so that there can be coast-wide environmental studies before that moratorium is lifted.

Let us take a look at what interests Chevron has in British Columbian waters. Its present permit acreage is close to three million acres plus another million it has just farmed in from Shell. Lochiel Explorations, more commonly known as Mobil Oil, has 243,000 acres. Ranger Oil, which is again Mobil Oil trying to hide its name a little bit in terms of absolute liability, as I pointed out to the minister, has 197,000 acres. Union Oil has 112,000 acres. Shell Canada Resources has 50 per cent of 12 million acres, and Shell Explorer Limited has 50 per cent. The operator of Shell Explorer Limited is Shell Canada Resources. Here we find a little corporate trickery which very quickly undoes the absolute liability clause which the minister is touting to environmentalists as being the way of obtaining good stewardship of the environment from oil and gas companies.

Let us take a look briefly at the letters I have received from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I think they are well worth having on the record. The one I have in my hand is dated December 18. I received it from the minister.

> With the passage of the forthcoming new Canada oil and gas act implementing a new regime for Canada Lands, as described in the new National Energy Program which was tabled in the House on October 28, the confidential period for geological and geophysical data will be reduced to five years, or when the lands on which the work was carried out revert to the Crown, whichever is the earlier. In other words, when the act is passed, all results of industry oil and gas exploration acquired to date off the west coast can then be available for examination.

The bottom paragraph states the following:

> As you are no doubt aware, there has been no exploration for oil and gas off the west coast since 1972 (a survey in 1974 was experimental only)—

Perhaps the minister at some point in this debate will take the time to rise and tell us how, with an environmental moratorium in place, that 1974 activity took place, and since in fact it did take place I wonder if he would explain to us how much confidence we can put in the regulations under Bill C-48 when he has all the power to regulate in his own hands so that he can change them any time he wants. If there is a gas or oil blowout somewhere in the Hecate Strait, or somewhere off Melville Island, or somewhere off Hibernia, he has the power to decide whether that is a good spill or a bad spill, or whether someone pays or does not pay. I really question, and I think most Canadians question these days, whether this Parliament should be passing bills which do not have very strong environmental clauses within them under which the government and industry must jointly pursue a proper public involvement, proper hearings and proper studies in order that we know the true costs of what some of these proposals are.

The minister also said the following:

> Initial steps are now being taken to clear the area for renewed exploratory activity, including drilling, following the undertaking of appropriate environmental studies. Although the results of the 1967-69 drilling campaign by Shell were largely negative, subsequent geological and geophysical studies indicate that the west coast area may have a significant potential for hydrocarbons, particularly gas—

At this point in time I think the minister knows as well as I do—I am sure both ministers know—that touting gas, as Chevron is touting gas, is not really the potential they are interested in finding out about out there. The Geological Survey of Canada in its results released last fall made it quite clear that it expects a one in three chance of 300 million barrels of crude off the B.C. coast and a one in ten chance of perhaps as much as four billion barrels. It estimates again a possibility of as much 90 trillion cubic feet of gas. However, the point has to do with oil, and I think it is somewhat hypocritical, to say the least, of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to be touting gas or for Chevron to be touting gas when in fact the main economic ventures out there will be for oil. Most people around the world are very aware of the damage because of the Ixtoc experience, the North Sea experience and experiences around the world of damage which comes from oil spills either from tankers or from blowouts. This matter requires extensive environmental study and examination so that at least those most sensitive areas can be protected, if it is decided by the public that it is in the public interest to have those drilling programs.

In concluding, let me say that this bill is one of the hollowest promises of Canadianization ever put together in Canadian history. There is nothing to protect the environment either in terms of scientific study to reduce or eliminate dangers of exploration and drilling, or in terms of study and technical preparation to deal with blowouts and spills. This brings me back to another letter from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I hope my quoting from his letters does not stop him from writing to me.

Mr. Lalonde: I am just signing a letter to you now.

Mr. Fulton: Good. If the minister will send it over right now, I will read it into the record.

Mr. Lalonde: I would be afraid of being misquoted.

Mr. Fulton: We will see whether the minister can speak about the environment. The letter I have in my hand is dated September 24, and reads in part as follows:

> There is as you suggest, a moratorium respecting offshore exploration activity on the Pacific coast. This moratorium was established during the period of Canada-U.S. negotiations respecting the risks of and liability for, any environmental damage that might result from tanker traffic carrying Prudhoe Bay oil south along the west coast.

I encourage both ministers to read and re-read that section so that when they come into discussions of whether or not to lift that environmental moratorium they remember this day, and that it was put in place for that reason and to stop both tanker traffic and gas and oil exploration.

Let us look briefly at the Ixtoc blowout in the Gulf of Mexico just a year ago. Well in excess of $1 billion has been spent so far simply to deal with the blowout. That is in terms of drilling recovery wells and for the actual capping of the blowout area. There are yet hundreds of millions of dollars more to be spent to deal with the damage and the cleanup. In addition there will be unknown future costs because of the relatively limited environmental studies done beforehand so that some sort of measurement or mark point could be found whereby it could be determined what biological systems were seriously endangered by the gas and oil in the water.

The U.S. coast guard made a very important statement, of which I know both ministers are aware, that all of the technical knowledge of the United States at the time of the spill would not have filled a thimble because of the lack of environmental data there was to deal with it. Let not any member of this House forget that fossil fuels have an absolute finite limit to them. Someday soon they will all be gone. We must very soon take the alternative energy path which was laid out so well by my colleague, the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose).

This bill contains the seeds of the philosophy of burning down one's own home to find that last lost dime. That is something I would state in this House that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is clearly pursuing by not listening to the comments so well put by his colleague to his immediate right and by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I encourage the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to go to the library, get a copy and at least read the first part of it with respect to how to deal in a real way with the environmental concerns surrounding offshore oil and gas drilling production.

I am certain there is gas. The Geological Survey of Canada is seen around the world as a very credible organization in terms of looking at various geological formations and deciding whether there is likely to be gas or oil, and I think in relation to the Mist finds off Oregon, the finds in Cooke Inlet in the Gulf of Alaska and the very substantial recent leases given to Chevron and other companies in Alaskan waters that we should be very careful with how we deal with this issue. We should be very careful because it is almost inevitable—as a matter of fact, many scientists say it is absolutely unavoidable—that there will be a spill somewhere on the west, east or north coast of Canada in the very near future. We have very limited resources in terms of oil spill cleanup equipment.

I am sure the Minister of the Environment recalls a letter he sent to me recently indicating that there is inadequate oil spill cleanup equipment on the coast of British Columbia now to deal simply with a tanker spill. There we are only talking about, at most, a few hundred thousand barrels. When we are talking about a blowout like the Ixtoc or the North Sea blowout, we are talking about millions of barrels and we are talking about very sour crude, as we know. It mixes in different conditions. There are some very worth-while studies for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to look through.

As I pointed out earlier, the 25 per cent Canadian provision is simply taken away by grants. The 50 per cent Canadian ownership is a joke, as was pointed out by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). As every industry boardroom knows, profits and technology will still flow out of Canada at an alarming rate, and in ten years Canadians will simply have less to say about a much diminished resource. Canadians know that oil and gas belong to every one of us, and wrapping up in different paper corporate and political rip-off, as it is in Bill C-48, may impress the Liberal backbenchers but certainly does not impress anyone in this party.

The fake screams of the oil industry, which are constantly echoed by the boardroom nymphomaniacs to my right, along with the hysteria which we frequently witness from members such as the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), do not fool many Canadians. The oil companies still have the say. This bill makes them squeak only because they have to pay a little more, not very much, and all of their screaming is just smart business because, if somebody is going to tax you a little more, you scream. If you are moving a few rigs down to make better money in the States, you scream, and you try to get a political party to get a point across so that you can get back to the status quo where you have the biggest rip-off in the world, whereas now they are paying a little bit less but it is still in the same category.

As the critic for this party, I believe that it is in Canada's interest, certainly in terms of the environment, for the minister to rewrite the absolute liability clause, which I think has already fallen apart in the way it is written because it leaves all kinds of options which allow corporations to get around it. Having the amount drop to a specific figure, I think, is something the industry is, no doubt, trying to get the minister to do, and I certainly hope he does not do it. If he does, this bill will rate an absolute zero.

I should like to say, in summing up, Mr. Speaker, that having read this bill very carefully—I am sure the two ministers present in the House who have direct responsibility in relation to this bill know this—I find there is absolutely nothing here for the environment in terms of having broad based scientific research done beforehand so that we know in what areas they cannot drill. For example, Chevron has indicated to me that they plan to start drilling in Queen Charlotte Sound very near my home, and I know that winds there frequently exceed 100 miles an hour. I have been out there when there have been 50 foot swells and 20 foot chop. If the minister is going to try to impress on me that that is a safe area in which to drill, I think he should speak to some of the scientists who have been to the North Sea and know that the Queen Charlotte Sound area is considerably more dangerous.

I encourage the Minister of the Environment and his officials to come to the committee to propose the amendments which they have already taken the time to put in print at public cost, and to make sure that there is some relevant regime of environmental protection contained in this bill so that six months from now, six years from now, and perhaps 60 years from now, we will not have to say that Bill C-48 was the biggest environmental disaster that ever occurred in Canada.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise once again in this House in order to take part in a debate on a widely discussed bill which, fortunately, has the support of most Canadians. Last October 28, Mr. Speaker, the government tabled its budget and submitted its energy policy the aims of which cannot be reiterated often enough. First, security of supply, and ultimately energy self-sufficiency for Canada; second, the opportunity for all Canadians to be involved in the energy industries, especially the oil and natural gas sector; and, third, fairness in pricing and revenue-sharing between government and industry.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, energy self-sufficiency for Canada, which is our aim for 1990, combined with a reasonable pricing policy, may only be achieved through considerable government intervention. We must not forget either, Mr. Speaker, that here in Canada multinational corporations operate in privileged conditions compared to what they have to cope with in other countries, and by other countries, Mr. Speaker, I mean those in which they are still allowed to enter. We all remember, for instance, that just before Christmas Prime Minister Thatcher of Great Britain decided to impose a heavy surtax on all multinationals drilling for oil in the North Sea. But it is south of the border, in the U.S.A., that companies are definitely getting a good deal. The United States policy of deregulating the energy industry is a political scheme which, according to U.S. politicians, corresponds to their specific needs, which are not necessarily the needs of Canadians. To compare our energy policy and wish that it were identical with the American policy is, to my mind, like comparing apples and oranges.

However, Mr. Speaker, this deregulating policy in the United States is certainly very interesting for energy contractors and this is precisely one of the reasons a move to the south is attractive on the very short term. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, that self-sufficiency we want to attain by 1990 would mean nothing if we went from a dependency on the OPEC members to a dependency on multinationals whose boards of directors and shareholders have absolutely no roots in Canada. This is why it is imperative that we should intervene immediately within this industry, in spite of the upheaval that this implies. I am convinced that the Canadian people support an increased participation by government agencies and public corporations in the energy industries, but I am also convinced that if there is a shortage one day, the federal government would also be blamed. I believe that the Canada oil and gas bill will bring some relief to Canadians because we will have greater independence and security of supply.

Bill C-48, whose second reading was moved on December 11, shows that, as a responsible government, we want to find solutions to the problems of future generations of Canadians since it will allow all Canadian citizens, wherever they live, to share in the wealth of their country. To provide a better understanding of this bill, I would like to point out immediately that it does not affect the territory of the provinces, but only Canada lands. The territory included in the Canada lands is defined as follows in section 2 of the bill:

—lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources, situated in

(a) the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, or

(b) those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of Canada is measured, whichever is the greater;

Mr. Speaker, as the previous speaker noted, we are speaking about a very vast territory which includes an offshore area of 2.5 million square miles and 1.5 million square miles of land on the continent, which is more than twice the territory of our ten provinces. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) said so eloquently, and I quote:

The potential of this vast frontier region is comparable to its size.

Mr. Speaker, all these Canadian territories and the oil fields, which will no doubt be found there, can only enrich Canada. Mr. Speaker, with this bill, the Canadian people will certainly come out on the winning side.

● (1620)

It is with pride that I take part in this most important debate. The new legislation before the House represents one of the most important steps announced in "The National Energy Program" to increase the level of Canadian ownership and control of the petroleum industry to 50 per cent by 1990 on Canada lands. In effect, this legislation represents an affirmation of the government's view that these resources on Canada lands, including offshore resources, belong to all the people of Canada.

I have always tried—and my record speaks for itself—to emphasize that Canadian federalism is and must be based upon the concept of sharing. One of the most important ways to make that concept a reality is to ensure, as this legislation ensures, that all Canadians working through their federal government have the opportunity to participate in the oil and gas industry and thereby share in the benefits of its growth and development. We would be deluding ourselves if we thought for one instant that such sharing would be actualized and such an equilibrium obtained in the absence of direct intervention by our national government.

It is precisely this fact which underlies the 50 per cent ownership requirement with respect to the granting of all new production licences for oil and gas in the Canada lands. Also it is this fact which underlies the 25 per cent interest provision about which I should like to comment in further detail.

By way of review, and so as to refresh the minds of my colleagues opposite, this new Canada oil and gas bill provides that the Crown may carry a 25 per cent share in acreage where production had not started prior to January 1, 1976, in respect of all Canada lands in the offshore and in the territories.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deniger: I have heard members opposite try to qualify what we are doing. I will get to that, but first I want to give a message to my colleagues from the west. This package goes beyond this particular aspect; basically it goes to the concept of a country itself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deniger: As the House will recall, carried interest, which does not involve any sharing of past or present exploration costs, can be transferred by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to Petro-Canada or to any other designated Crown corporation which must convert the carried interest to a working interest where costs would have to be shared. This conversion must take place no later than the point in time at which a production system is approved for the relevant lands. Normally this would be in the form of a working interest at a point in time prior to the expenditure of some 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the total costs involved from the exploration to the production stages. If the minister chooses not to transfer the Crown share to a Crown corporation before the specified time, then this share will be made available by public tender as a working interest to Canadians, or to Canadian companies with a 75 per cent or more Canadian ownership rating.

This bill is very complex, very detailed, and very global.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deniger: I cannot imagine how one can talk intelligently about this bill and not basically refer to the bill as such; it is simply stupid. I have read the bill and I am quoting from it so that members opposite will not put in doubt any of the words I am saying, or any of the objectives of the bill. Our objectives are quite clear. We want the industries on the Canada lands to belong to Canadians, not to the multinationals. The multinationals in this country are privileged compared to the way they are treated in other countries.

Similarly if the relevant Crown corporation chooses not to convert the share to a working interest before the specified point in time, the share would return to the Crown and be made available by public tender to Canadians or Canadian companies having a COR of 75 per cent or more.

Much has been said of this 25 per cent interest provision on our new energy program. Indeed, one of the more esteemed members on the opposite side called it "confiscation". Members opposite, as well as certain oil interests, cry that we are expropriating lands which will scare investors away from new development projects. I have received letters, as have many of my colleagues, indicating that we have now changed the rules after the game was played. I disagree with members opposite and I disagree with the multinationals; I do not accept those arguments on the basis of several facts.

First, let us make no pretentions about the poor reception granted our National Energy Program by the private sector. This reaction is understandable, given the fact that the National Energy Program and its various provisions are perhaps against the immediate interests of the multinationals. Of course it is to be expected that oil companies will object to relinquishing a share of their oil interests to the Crown. However, as I have emphasized in all my speeches, our programs and policies must go beyond serving the specific interests of any one sector or region of our economy. For this reason we have attempted to initiate legislation which is fair to the industry, to the federal government, and to all the various provinces and regions of our country.

More specifically, we do not accept the arguments propounded by industry spokesmen and by my colleagues opposite to the effect that any aspect of our National Energy Program—more specifically the legislation concerning the Canada lands—is unfair to the oil industry or is detrimental to its future stability. Central to this position is the assumption that the petroleum industry will lack the needed cash for exploration and development of new sources of supply. Nothing could be further from the truth. In addition to the new pricing schedule increase in producer netbacks per barrel of conventional oil and the provision of a direct cash flow to the industry as a whole, the generous new system of exploration incentives, whereby companies will be able to obtain up to 80 per cent of their exploration costs dependent upon their COR, provides ample initiative to the private sector to invest in high risk oil exploration and development ventures. Surely no oil company or investor will lose any capital or the profits it might yield in the face of such extensive government subsidies.

It is true that the 25 per cent share provision in oil projects on the Canada lands being retroactive represents a change in prior policy that may alter the conditions under which some oil exploration projects were begun. But, is this really such an unusual move? Is it not so, each and every time a government announces new restrictions or controls deemed necessary to protect and enhance its national interest, that the conditions or rules upon which investors originally committed their capital will be modified as a matter of course?

As for the corresponding argument that the Crown is unfairly snatching something away from these investors, some such critics seem to have conveniently forgotten that the Crown, on behalf of Canadian citizens, in effect is taking possession of what it has already paid for. That is to say, in the absence of the complex system of tax incentive provisions, oil depletion allowances and so on which were in effect in the past, such exploration might not have begun at all, for, through those tax provisions, the federal treasury and all Canadian taxpayers have paid for approximately 90 per cent of oil exploration and development projects undertaken by the private sector in federal lands. Is it now so unusual for the Crown, as an investor like any other, to demand its due, namely, a reasonable share of the profits?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deniger: I have heard the arguments of members opposite, but I simply cannot agree with them. I understand the feelings of uneasiness and annoyance in the west, especially with the recent budget position on energy. These have not abated to any significant extent. All of the historic injustices which westerners have complained of for decades are being dusted off and discussed again. One frequently hears comments of western pride of economic achievement, coupled with statements of irritation over the perception that the tangible results of this achievement will be diverted to support central Canada, that is, Ontario and Quebec. This is an area of the country which has, from the western perspective, consistently been the economic winner at the expense of the west.

● (1630)

The quid pro quo for increased taxation in the west is not in evidence. The national government profile is low in western Canada and it is difficult for people to accept a lower level of regional participation in economic well-being without a greater sense of return from Ottawa.

I believe that the talk of separation by a vocal minority reflects the feeling of being dealt with unfairly, frustration over an absence of representation, a lack of knowledge about the contribution and the presence of the national government in the west, and a basic reluctance to assume the national obligations of regional economic success.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Because they know too much about what you are doing.

Mr. Deniger: Faced with the attitudes described above, and I am sure the hon. member opposite will be interested in my solution, it will be difficult for the federal government to obtain an objective hearing for its goals. The population will be more likely to follow the lead of provincial governments which are, in an electoral sense, more representative, and possibly more responsive—again also in a politically pragmatic context—to regional concerns.

I believe that if western Canadians were aware of more of the ways in which national government activity positively influences their lives, there would be considerably lower levels of irritation with this energy policy. It is also important to convey the fact that there are some important activities which only a national government can handle. In the west, it is important to reinforce the reasons for a national government, where the provincial governments are proclaiming the positions they would take if only they had the authority. I ask members opposite to convey this message. I believe this bill is a good example of an appropriate way to start.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, this new oil and gas bill before us today replaces all the current ad hoc legislation now in effect, with one clear, concise policy. This policy affirms the 25 per cent minimum federal incentive grants, in the case of future exploration, available to all explorers on Canada lands. These grants, to repeat, can amount to as much as 80 per cent in the case of Canadian companies with a COR of 75 per cent or more. In effect, this legislation is, in the case of past exploration, an all-encompassing version of, and replacement for, the PetroCan back-in provision. This change reflects the federal government's continuing contribution to frontier exploration through such tax incentives as the super-depletion allowance.

Finally, and most important, this legislation concerning the Crown share concept affirms our convictions concerning the Canadian public's right to ownership of all federal resources on Canada lands. It affirms our conviction that it is the people of Canada, from east coast to west coast, who must be heir to the benefits accrued from our dynamic, ever-growing oil and gas industry.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would recommend all members opposite, before making comments out loud which I find quite rude and offensive, to take the time to read the bill to talk to the people who were involved in the drafting of this policy. As members of Parliament, I recommend they look beyond their very local and regional approach, since this country will only grow, be one and united, when members from all parties in this House of Commons can see Canada as a whole, instead of biting off their noses to spite their faces, as they say in English.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member if, by any chance, he could share with us the name of the author of that speech on a very complex subject since it concerns an industry of which the hon. member has absolutely no knowledge. It was obviously prepared by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for publication this afternoon.

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, I am really very pleased that this question is being put to me because this is not my first speech, as you know, Mr. Speaker, and as the members opposite are aware. But some bills, as the hon. member knows, are obviously very complex. When I discuss with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) a subject with which I am thoroughly familiar, I can say to the hon. member opposite that I do not then need any notes to make my speech. I am well aware that according to the British tradition in the House of Commons, the use of written notes is forbidden in the House. The hon. member may rest assured that when circumstances allow I never use notes. However, in dealing with as complex a bill as this one—a look at Bill C-48 proves that it is a jumble of all past laws on energy, of complex tables, graphs, facts and figures—I must say to the hon. member, through you, of course, Mr. Speaker, that it is absolutely impossible to address the House responsibly without checking the accuracy of every word that is being said with the text held in one's hand.

As for respecting the traditions of British legislators, I fully agree with the hon. member opposite. Of course, it would be better by far if we were all, as the hon. member is, I am sure, able to make speeches on any topic whatsoever without holding a sheet of paper in front of us. Unfortunately, I have not been sitting here in this House as long as he has. I can assure him, however, that I would certainly rather be sure of what I am saying, by having the text before my eyes, and have confidence in what I am saying. As for the author of this speech, I want to assure him, once again, as well as all hon. members opposite, that not a single line of it was written by anyone other than my staff and myself. Not a single word. In closing, may I say that my speeches at least are neither written, suggested nor prompted by the multinationals which the hon. members opposite take such pride in representing.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the only thing that amazed me in the answer which was given to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was the pride which the hon. member took in his speech, which he read completely. To my mind the contents of it were so contrary to the bill that he should have been ashamed to admit that he wrote it.

He did say one or two interesting things about the energy package. I wish to refer to one of them. He says the energy package goes much further. Yes, that is right, those are his words—the energy package goes much further. I think this is one of the first bills which is preparing for the ultimate kill in this country. It will go much further. I also think it is one of the first steps in the grabbing of the resources back from the provinces, indirectly, if not directly. So the hon. member is right, it is only the first step. That is what we are afraid of—it will go much further. To me it indicates not sharing the wealth of the people of Canada but, rather, a greedy grabbing of the resources of this country.

Some day we will have provinces where we now have territories. If this government is in power when that happens, these resources will not be returned to those provinces. It took 25 years for the province of Alberta to get its resources back. It will take 75 years before the provinces of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon will ever get their resources back, if this government is around.

This bill represents the greatest power grab in the history of Canada. There are two words which predominate when considering this measure—totalitarian and stupid. It is so red that even the socialists oppose it, and properly so. This legislation goes far beyond what any democratic government should present to the people of Canada. I would like to deal with some of its clauses to see what the Liberal members who support this legislation think of them. We only need to look at the results to see what this total package is doing to Canada. These results have been outlined by a number of members, newspapers, and people all across the country.

The evidence of what is happening as a result of the legislation should give the minister and the government some indication of the impracticality of the energy package or policy of the government. Syncrude is cutting back. Texaco is leaving Fort McMurray. Suncor is in jeopardy. The AlCanadian Oil Sands project has stopped. The Union at Hibernia cannot go into production. Husky Oil is cutting back in Lloydminster and the Cold Lake project has cut down. Every major oil project in the province of Alberta is either in trouble, has shut down, or has left entirely. Is this government trying to destroy the country?

The government merely needs to look at the evidence. Surely there could not be such havoc in any industry of this country if the government were introducing good policies. The people of this country are mature. They are willing to risk their money if there is a reasonable chance of a reasonable return. But people will not take any risks when the government introduces policies which forewarn them that the government may greedily grab their endeavours. The government calls it Canadianization, but it is really nationalization. It wants to nationalize such operations as the tar sands in Alberta or anything that is being well done.

The people of Alberta know, and the people of Canada are becoming aware of the government's intent. All they need to do is look at the totalitarian principles which are being put into effect. For example, there is the government's unilateral action on the constitution. It does not seem to care about the beginnings of this country. It was the provinces which decided that they would come together and form a federal government. But this federal government presumes that it can tell the provinces what to do.

The federal government should realize that this country was formed through co-operation. This co-operation has continued over the years. There was not the divisiveness between the French and the English and the east and the west that there is now. This divisiveness is due to the policies of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government, and it is disturbing the people of Canada. This energy policy is merely one more example of the dictatorial attitude and the desire of the government to control everything.

Let us take a look at some of the clauses in this legislation. If there is to be competition in any responsible democracy the people must have a reasonable chance of a reasonable return. The fact that this is not happening is disturbing many of the smaller companies. The multinationals are not bothered by the situation because they can withstand the four years which this government will hold power, but the small companies are being driven out. The government has decreed that it will fix oil prices at the wellhead at less than half the value for a certain number of years. The proposed increases will not even cover the costs of inflation. These increases are being fixed by the government and not the marketplace.

Alberta does not have an industrial base and relies on non-renewable resources. If we do not use the money from those non-renewable resources properly, we will not have anything and we will be back in the same position we faced during the depression when hunger was rampant all across Canada. Surely the government can understand that we are trying to make Canada stronger, that if Alberta is stronger Canada will be stronger, and that this country is as strong as its weakest province.

The government has taken one province and said that it will weaken it, take over its resources and whatever it wants, or it will destroy it. This policy is destroying the oil industry. This policy will destroy not only Alberta but the entire country. The oil price at the wellhead will be fixed by the government, not negotiated or determined by the marketplace. The practice in this country is that prices are determined by the marketplace and competition. The result of competition is the price the consumer receives, but in this case the price will be fixed by the government. The great big granddaddy government knows best.

The government has also decided that the domestic price of natural gas will be fixed at even a lower level than the price of oil. It has imposed an export tax on natural gas which will have the effect of removing the chance for the industry to improve our balance of trade and to create jobs. The government has said that it will be the Americans who pay, but really the export tax will be paid by Canadians. But the point I am arguing is that the prices are being fixed by the supposedly free enterprise government. Its actions are really that of a totalitarian government.

Not only has the government imposed an export tax on natural gas, but it has also imposed a domestic wellhead tax. It is no wonder that millions of Canadian dollars are leaving this country. No businessman will invest his money in this kind of situation. Even if they made good in spite of the taxes, they face the possibility of the nationalization of their investments. The government is destroying the very fabric which built the economy of this country, under the guise of Canadianization, but it is really nationalization.

When hon. members and newspapers from coast to coast outline the adverse effects of the government's policy, the minister does not believe what they say. The minister said today that not one single person in Ontario has lost a job. I recently spoke in the town north of North Bay, and a lady there informed me that her son had lost his job. That is one single person. Even in that statement the minister is wrong. People are coming back to Ontario because they have lost their jobs in Alberta. How can the minister stand up in the House and say that not one single person in Ontario has lost his job because of the government's energy policy? It is complete nonsense.

The minister also said that not one single person in Alberta has lost a job. Does he think that the people of Canada are so stupid that they would quit their jobs in the middle of winter and walk away from a chance to earn good money? I suppose all is yellow to the jaundiced eye. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has made up his mind that he will not look at the facts because they will disturb his conclusions. So he says that not one single person in this country has lost a job. How ridiculous can a minister of the Crown be? This legislation is the forerunner of a package which will go much further, and that frightens us very much.

If the federal government would examine how this industry developed, maybe it would learn something and be able to put in place a policy to do the same thing for Canada.

The development in the province of Alberta did not come about easily. It is not by some lucky chance that the industry there is supplying oil and gas to vast regions of the country. A definite policy was set up that would encourage investment. Many years ago, before there was even one oil well, Alberta pleaded with eastern Canada, with the Canadian government and the Bank of Canada, to help in the development of the resources there, but no help was forthcoming. Then it sought help in England and in France, but none was forthcoming from them either. After that it applied to the United States, which was interested. Their people came up and dug thousands of dry holes, spending millions of dollars, before Leduc came in. They believed that there was oil and knew there was a reasonable chance of getting their money back, in time.

At that time there was a climate which invited people to invest their money, and they did. The provincial government did not invest, but it set up a fair policy whereby companies that made discoveries would get a share and the balance would be sold to other companies at the highest price. Before spending money investors knew what the policy was. As a result, today we have an industry, today we have oil and gas, and today we have the Heritage Fund. This did not come about by chance, Mr. Speaker, but is the result of free enterprise policies. The industry knew what the policy was going to be and it did not fear nationalization.

The province of Saskatchewan was slower to act than Alberta but eventually, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) said a few days ago, the former premier, the hon. Tommy Douglas, finally offered the companies a fair share if they would come in. They did, and that started the industry in Saskatchewan. All the industry wants is a fair share. It is not asking to avoid taxes altogether.

I was amazed to hear the Prime Minister say the other day that the rigs leaving Alberta were doing so because of taxes. That is not why they are leaving, Mr. Speaker; they are afraid of nationalization. They must have enough to live on. If the government is going to grab greedily more than its fair share, the companies will just go somewhere else in order to get a fair deal.

The minister can smile and laugh at this. Let him smile and laugh when he goes into the homes of the people who have lost their jobs, the people of Fort McMurray, where the whole kit and caboodle is going to pot because of the energy policies of the government. The minister tries to pretend that he is negotiating, but he knows in his heart that he is not. The Government of Canada made only one offer to the government of Alberta, and that was the first one. One complete offer is all this government made.

Mr. Lalonde: Five.

Mr. Taylor: The other offers were made piece by piece, and the hon. minister knows that.

Mr. Lalonde: How many were there from Alberta?

Mr. Taylor: The minister did that deliberately, and he knew what he was doing. He knew that Alberta would not accept that first offer, with the conditions it contained. It was a complete offer, but after that there was no other complete offer and the minister knows that. It was all done piece by piece.

If I were to going to sell my property and offered to sell my house today and then, after I received my price for the house, I said I would sell the land as well without saying what I would charge for the land, I would not have many takers, but that is what the Canadian government is doing. No one would enter into an agreement like that, Mr. Speaker, because it is ridiculous. Yet that is what the Canadian government has, in effect, been saying to the Alberta government. Time and time again in this House the government has said that it is offering to negotiate and that Alberta refuses. That is nonsense, Mr. Speaker; it is a fabrication; it is not true.

Mr. Lalonde: Read what Merv Leitch says.

Mr. Taylor: Alberta is prepared to negotiate as soon as the Canadian government is willing to meet it. But the Canadian government is not willing to negotiate, Mr. Speaker. It has offered the world price for the oil in the Fort McMurray area but has not said anything about the conventional oil. It must think the people of Alberta are stupid, but they certainly are not. They built the industry with the sweat of their brow and with hard work, so they will not give it up easily. They want a complete deal, Mr. Speaker.

Premier Lougheed made a complete and fair offer to the Prime Minister, an offer that was good for all of Canada. He did not ask for world price as some Liberals would have the people of Ontario believe. The offer was for 75 per cent of the North American price, not the world price, but the federal government wants to keep the price down to less than half the world price which would destroy this country's chances of building an industry.

As a result, Mr. Speaker, oil rigs are leaving the country and companies are cutting down on their investment. Every major project in Alberta has halted or is in trouble because of this energy policy. What must we do to persuade the minister that his energy policy is destroying the country, for that is what it is doing?

I wish there was a handful of people on the other side of this House who would look at the facts. If they went to Alberta they would see the oil rigs heading south and the 150 that are standing idle today. Someone told me that the Prime Minister said that only three or four oil rigs went across the border. People at a meeting I attended the other day laughed about that, Mr. Speaker, and wanted to know who is advising him. More than 40 or, I believe, 50 oil rigs have crossed the border already.

Why does the government want to mislead the people of Canada? Not everyone can go to Alberta to see what is happening, but I think members of the Liberal party should go. We have heard some talk about twinning, but where are those twins today? Why do they not go to Alberta to see what is happening so that they would know the facts?

An hon. Member: There has been an abortion!

Mr. Taylor: That is the only time that I would believe in abortion. I do not believe in the twinning policy, but perhaps it would have a good effect if they could go out there and look at the facts and, then tell the minister about them. He will not believe anything he reads in the newspapers and he does not believe members of this House. All is yellow to the jaundiced eye! He has made up his mind that no one is losing jobs, not one single person. He will be eating those words for many days to come.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills) moved that Bill S-16, respecting the President of the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill S-16 was given third reading by the Senate on December 11, 1980. The purpose of this bill is to grant a new charter to a religious corporation that is responsible for the management and control of the property, affairs and interests in Canada of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, commonly referred to as the Mormon Church.

I should explain to you at the outset the meaning of the word "stake". A stake is a territorial division of the Mormon Church. As such, it is roughly the equivalent of what would be a diocese in other churches. Within a stake there are generally about ten congregational units known as wards, each of which is headed by a bishop. A ward is roughly the equivalent of a parish as generally understood in other churches.

In 1927, by private act of the Parliament of Canada, namely, chapter 112 of the Statutes of Canada, 1926-27, the President of the Lethbridge Stake was incorporated as a corporation sole. A corporation sole is a corporation consisting of one person only, together with his sucessors in office, who are incorporated by law in order to give them the legal capacities and benefits of a corporation, which they do not enjoy as natural persons. One particular advantage is that of perpetuity.

One of the principal purposes of the corporation sole that is the subject of this bill is to manage and control the property, affairs and interests in Canada of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The corporation, in addition to managing the affairs of the Church in the Lethbridge area, acts in effect as a holding company for the property and assets of the various missions and stakes of the Church in Canada.

Hon. members may know that the first Mormons in Canada were pioneers who emigrated from Utah in 1887. These pioneers were agricultural settlers and settled in southwestern Alberta. In fact, they have a temple in Cardston, Alberta. The Mormons were responsible for the irrigation of southern Alberta and they began the first sugar beet factory there. The major contribution of irrigation is to food production in Canada.

Since its enactment in 1927, the original act or incorporation of the President of the Lethbridge Stake has never been amended. It contains, for instance, certain limitations on the holding of property that are now archaic and that can only be corrected by Parliament.

The purpose of this bill, therefore, is to repeal the original act of incorporation and replace it with a more modern, up-to-date charter. The bill contains a provision stating that, for all purposes, the new corporation, created by this bill, is deemed to be a continuation of the corporation created by Parliament in 1927.

Since this is a private bill it will be necessary for a committee to examine the allegations of facts set out in the preamble. I would propose, therefore, if second reading is granted, to ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, which is the committee of the House which normally examines private bills.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as is normally the custom, we are pleased to see this bill go to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Motions nos. 1, 4, 5, 22 and 28 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

The House resumed from Thursday, December 18, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Siddon:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the government, its departments and agencies and the governments of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Territorial Council of the Northwest Territories, since January 1, 1978, relating to the review and restructuring of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Mr. Michel Veillette (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to proceed with the statement I was making before Christmas, when I was interrupted by the clock. I was quoting among other things part of a working paper tabled at the First Ministers' Conference on the Economy held from the 27th to the 29th of November in Halifax and I was quoting the following statistics on fisheries:

The main species taken throughout the country are: whitefish (6,803.8 metric tons), pickerel (3,855.6 metric tons), great northern pike (2,721.7 metric tons), cisco (1,769 metric tons) . . . Locally, some species such as carp (Saskatchewan and Ontario), arctic char (Northwest Territories), sunfish, smelt, pike, lake perch and eel (Ontario) make up a substantial part of the catches.

The author of the paper then deals with the fishing gear, the accessibility of some lakes, transportation problems, parasites peculiar to some species and the impact of some contaminants, such as mercury, which have led to highly controversial restrictions and have resulted in lower catches of some species.

In addition to stock management, all matters dealing with the protection of the habitat, with processing, transportation and preservation, on which the quality of the product depends, and all marketing related activities have a direct influence on the income and standard of living of freshwater commercial fishermen. Incidentally, at this point I want to mention that according to the 1978 report, in 1972 most freshwater fishermen earned $3,700 and the average annual income was $5,900 whereas the national average in the fishing industry was $6,900 annually. The fact was stressed that, in central Canada, fishing was mainly a part time occupation and in the higher income brackets, only half was derived from fishing.

For all those reasons, in 1965 the federal government asked Mr. George McIvor by order in council to look into the matter and report on the situation of freshwater fishermen in the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, as well as in the Northwest Territories, with special emphasis on product marketing. The resulting report, the McIvor commission report, led to the setting up, on February 27, 1969, of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

The corporation, created by the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act of 1969, was established for the purpose of marketing and trading fish, fish products and fish byproducts in and out of Canada, to ensure the most rational marketing at every level of the industry, and the best and most stable prices possible for the fishermen's catches.

Initial costs in setting up the corporation were subsidized, but it is now financially self-sufficient and does not receive any financial assistance from Parliament. The corporation is financed through bank loans guaranteed by the Minister of Finance or even direct loans. It consists of a board of directors composed of a chairman, a president, one director for each of the participating provinces and four other directors each of whom is to be appointed by the governor in council for a term not exceeding five years. The corporation is accountable to Parliament through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. By its very nature and because of its terms of reference the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is an easy target for complaints.

Let us be fair. The corporation does not have but one customer, it has 3,500 of them in the sense that, in a position of monopoly, it serves some 3,500 fishermen spread out over a vast area consisting of four provinces and the Northwest Territories and which are as many partners whose interests are quite strongly differentiated. The corporation must buy all fish caught in fresh water by commercial fishermen, a task which it accomplishes directly or indirectly through designated agents.

The corporation sets an initial price to be paid to the fishermen. It sees to it that the fish is processed, packed and sold either on the domestic market or abroad, mostly in the United States which buys 90 per cent of our catches. It later pays a refund to fishermen as a final payment. Assuming everything proceeds in a normal way, it would be a miracle if all those involved in such complex dealings, on their own admission, were to be totally satisfied.

Therefore it was no surprise, on December 4, 1979, following a meeting between the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his counterparts of the provinces and territories involved, to learn that they had looked into the role played by the corporation and wanted it defined for the future, and that a federal-provincial committee of officials was given the task of preparing an in-depth analysis of the processing and marketing activities of the corporation, as well as its administrative, financial and operational structures. The interested partners were to be informed of the results of such a study at a meeting to be held in Winnipeg before the end of April last.

The April, 1980, meeting was never held. On the one hand, the study was pursued and, on the other hand, there was an election and the former government, which had commissioned the study, experienced certain problems. The study was finally completed and the report, we are informed, was recently tabled. What more can we ask? That we undertake a further study over the head of the committee which was set up for the very purpose? Personally, I do not see the need for it and I am sure hon. members agree with me on that point. The press release of December 4, 1979, which was over a year ago, stated, and I quote:

> In the meantime, the cabinet ministers unanimously recommended that the corporation pursue its activities as usual until the findings of the Winnipeg meeting are known.

But the Winnipeg meeting, for reasons that we already know, never took place. Since then, the report was tabled and it is there for all to read. Therefore, unless there are new issues of which we are not aware, I do not see why we should force hon. members to consider correspondence between interested parties relating to a matter which, to all intents and purposes, concerns only one department and the corporation it is responsible for.

Mr. Speaker, all that has been said until now leads me to think that some undoubtedly well-meaning people wanted and still want to broaden the social role of the corporation. To be quite frank, it appears some would want to turn it into a social development agency. I shall reserve judgment on that proposal and on the purposes of those who hold that view. I think that the issue before the House today does not go that far; it concerns essentially the current role of the corporation which is that of a sales and marketing agency. The correspondence asked for does not concern us in any way. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should grant this request for papers and I ask my colleagues to vote against it.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Under the provisions of Standing Order 48(2) which governs the debate on the motion now before the House, the time for the debate has now expired, with the exception that the Standing Order provides for the right of the minister to intervene for five minutes and the mover of the motion to intervene for five minutes, after which the Chair will put the question.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, when the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation was first formed in 1969 at the request of the provinces involved, the objectives of the new body were quite clear and straightforward; first, to market fish in an orderly manner; second, to promote international markets and increase interprovincial and export trade in fish; and, third and most important, to increase returns to the fishermen in that one and a half million square mile territory. That was a formidable task and, I might say, it was generally achieved.

The first objective was met. The corporation has been able to market fish in an orderly manner by investing in capital assets such as fish packing stations and filleting, scaling, grading and freezing equipment so that the fish can be held until the best market is found for it.

On the second objective, international markets have been created. In the early years, some 80 per cent of the fish was sold in the United States. That percentage is now 61 per cent with some 23 per cent going to the European markets and 16 per cent to the Canadian market.

The third objective, and this is the most important, is the returns to fishermen. Before the corporation was formed, the freshwater fishermen were pretty well at the mercy of the buyers. They could not speak as one voice as they do now, and were compelled to accept what the companies were willing to offer them for their hard work. Frankly, it was pretty meagre at times. That situation has changed.

Before Christmas the corporation sent out the largest payments in its 11-year history to the fishermen under its jurisdiction, final payments for the year 1980 that total $5.7 million shared among 3,500 fishermen from the prairie provinces, northwestern Ontario and the Northwest Territories. Those payments are a far cry from the small and unpredictable amounts they received for their fish prior to the establishment of the corporation.

These latest payments are only part of what has been received by the freshwater fishermen this year. If we compare the figures, we find that the figure for 1975-76 was $10 million. In 1976-77 it was $14 million. In 1977-78 it was $15.3 million. In 1978-79 it was $17.2 million. Then there was a phenomenal rise, to $25.5 million in 1979-80.

I think those are impressive figures. They mean that the corporation is doing its job and is ensuring fishermen steady incomes.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has asked why the report was not tabled sooner. I can tell him that it required a longer time to prepare than had first been expected. I may also say that there are no fundamental changes recommended and no requests from the provincial ministers for a meeting with them, and I remind this House that this is an area of the fisheries which is under the management of provincial governments. Certainly if a request were made for a meeting, I would be happy to accept.

Now that the corporation is successfully carrying out its mandate, there are members of the opposition who say there are many faults with its operations. How can they come to such a conclusion in the face of such a success story and still claim that it is not a good operation? Frankly, I simply ask them to look at the evidence.

It has already been pointed out that the report of the review committee of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation has now been tabled in this House. The general conclusion of this review committee, composed of provincial and territorial government representatives as well as representatives of the fishermen themselves, is that the fishermen are better off with the existence of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation than without it. The report contains several recommendations to improve the operation of the corporation, and I am informed that some of these recommendations are already being implemented.

I tried to get the hon. member to narrow the request he made for the production of papers. He did not accept my suggestion, and I regret that because the reality is that other than the normal confidential documents which are exchanged between governments—and I would have been ready to approach the provincial governments if a more precise list of documents requested had been submitted to me—I am fully in favour of full information being given to this House or to the general public. The fact remains, however, that because of the broad definition and because of the back dating of the documents which were requested by the hon. member to such an extent, I find myself in the position of having to ask the House to reject the motion of the hon. member.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, in presenting this motion to the House early in the present session my objective was to request of the minister a sharing with this House of a variety of concerns of which he is well aware, which have been made known to his ministry since the beginning of 1978. In fact the request for production of papers was to go back only as far as January 1, 1978, so I am rather surprised that the minister should suggest that we wanted to go back a great distance in time.

The purpose of the motion was to help bring before this House the sentiments which were expressed, and indeed are still being expressed, by some of the provincial governments and the territorial councils—most especially the territorial councils in recent weeks—pointing out a number of faults and anomalies which have crept into the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation which have led it to become something quite different from what was initially envisaged.

The FFMC is no longer a marketing board as originally envisaged. It is a vertically integrated monopoly. It is not democratic socialism, which involves private and public sector competition. It is much more pervasive than that in the manner in which it has destroyed community industries and particularly the community lakeside fishing industries of northern Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories. It has virtually destroyed Co-operative Fisheries Limited, a socialist co-operative in Saskatchewan which operated successfully for many years. It has bankrupted many buyers and processors of fish over the past decade.

Fishermen no longer have a yardstick of comparison in order to know whether the corporation and its chairman, who goes flitting around the world securing buys and deals—and the chairman should not be doing that at all—are getting an adequate price for fishermen. There is a history of sleight of hand in the management and the announcements of the economic state of the corporation. There is the question of payments to fishermen which have been adjusted by docking the transportation charges first in order to create the illusion that the payments to fishermen were 60 per cent of the gross return on fish when in fact they were only 50 per cent. There is the question of $10 million worth of loans. Who knows how much additional deficit has been incurred to allow those higher payments to fishermen this year, of which the minister and his chairman are so proud?

Has anything improved? I have here a copy of the Hay River newspaper dated December 3, 1980, which says "Fishermen pay for FFMC loss". At this very moment this winter the fishermen of the Northwest Territories are being docked an additional eight cents a pound from their final payment, an additional eight cents which the territorial government feels it has no obligation to pay, yet the chairman of the corporation is going around the western provinces bragging about the fact that the final payments are much increased this year and that all the fishermen are doing better.

What about the native fishermen of the Northwest Territories and of the western Arctic? My hon. colleague to my right knows full well the implications of this corporation, some of the questions of mismanagement and the impact these have upon the people he represents.

There was a number of positive recommendations in the report filed by the committee of officials. The next stage would have been to reconvene a meeting of first ministers and to act on those recommendations to which the minister has referred. I will read one final sentence from the general conclusion of the report, as follows:

> However, several modifications to the present marketing system appear to have merit in that they could generate new revenue to the industry without decreasing fishermen's incomes, or, in some cases, by increasing fishermen's incomes.

That suggests a recommendation for action, and I can only ask at this stage what action the minister plans to take next. I urge him to meet with the first ministers.

With that said, I hereby move that the question be put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

There not being five members who have stood in their places, I declare the motion lost.

Unless there is an indication by some hon. members that the House—

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am probably going to say just what you were going to say. In view of the hour and the fact that we are not voting, I suggest we call it six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Let us make it unanimous.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being unanimously six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.29 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock p.m., the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) had the floor.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with Bill C-48 I should now like to refer to some of the clauses to show that the allegation made at the beginning of my remarks that this is a gigantic grab for power can be confirmed in the clauses of the bill.

One clause in the bill states that the bill would permit the minister or his nominee to enter into exploration agreements without prior public notice where he does not consider it to be in the public interest to give such notice. A bill which provides such power to a minister is a dangerous bill. Under this bill ministers are given power to enter into exploration agreements without even giving prior public notice. That is not the democratic way of carrying on business and it is not the way in which business has been carried out for many years in Canada. The public is notified before the minister enters into agreements with anyone, and in the case of contracts everyone is given an equal chance. That is the way it should be.

Again the bill states that while the Crown share of 25 per cent interest does not require the Crown corporation holding the share to pay its proportional share of the exploration and development costs, the Crown corporation will have a full 25 per cent vote in all decisions of the operating committee. Why should Petro-Canada have special privileges? Surely it can stand on its own feet. In a democratic society, particularly a free enterprise society, a Crown corporation should compete with the other companies and not have a monopoly, because a government monopoly is no better than any other kind of monopoly. It is just as dangerous and it does the very same thing. So we are going to give special consideration to this Crown corporation. This discourages private industry and thus drives money out of the country. In a free competitive society people go where they have an equal chance to bid.

In clause 44 it is stated that the minister can declare that a significant discovery has been made and can then order the drilling of additional wells wherever he wants by any party under whose lands the discovery may extend. Surely if a company has spent several million dollars, and that is not unusual, and then makes a discovery, the minister can simply ask up to a maximum of three others to drill. Why is there not a proper plan so that when someone makes a discovery, they will know what to expect? The industries came into Alberta to search for oil because they knew they would get a fair deal. They knew what they would have and what they would not if they made a discovery. Those matters should all be laid down before the people invest their money. It is a logical and sensible way to do it. When people came to Alberta to invest their money, they knew the result might be a dry hole, but if they made a discovery, as was the case in Leduc, Redwater and Mildred Lake, they knew a certain portion of it would be available for others to bid on so that anyone, including them, would have a chance to bid and the highest bidder would get the particular land. They knew what was what.

One of the reasons for the Heritage Fund existing in the province of Alberta is that Alberta has been fair with industry. Because the industry knew that the government would be fair, they were willing to bid thousands and sometimes millions of dollars for some of the areas which had been proven to have oil or gas. Surely that is a sensible way to do it, rather than simply telling them in the act that if they make a significant discovery the minister can create a Crown corporation to take the rest of it or give it to other people. The minister may do it without bidding or purchasing the rights.

Why does the government want such power? Why is it not done above the table or out in the open so that industry knows what is going on? The minister can declare that a commercial discovery has been made and order the drilling of additional wells at the time and place of his choosing without limit on the number of such wells. A typical offshore well could cost $25 million to $50 million. Will the minister order the drilling of additional wells? Will the minister tell a company to drill one or two more wells at a cost of another $50 million? Why is it not done by open bid or giving companies an opportunity to bid? The money will come into the public treasury that way. In fact, millions of dollars came into the Alberta treasury from companies prepared to take a risk because of the chance to make a profit. They were willing to do the work and make a profit. They have done that, and there is nothing wrong with profit.

What are the penalties under the act if a company indicates it cannot drill? Well, let me outline the penalties for non-compliance with the act. It can be fined up to $1 million or imprisoned up to five years for each day on which the offence is committed. Why are those penalties included for someone who does not or cannot obey the direction of the minister?

Surely there should be some freedom of choice in the country. We are not living in Moscow, Russia. We are not under a communist regime. Why have they included this type of communistic legislation? That is what it is; that is what it is. When the minister orders a company to drill and it refuses to drill, it can be fined $1 million or be subjected to imprisonment up to five years. What kind of a country are they developing?

Under clause 59 any corporate officer who acquiesces to the offence is liable. Without going into any more clauses of the bill, I want to ask why any minister should have such power. Why do the backbenchers, particularly on the government side of the House, want the minister to have such power? Why are these things not done above the table by open bid so that everyone will know what is going on? The money would come into the treasury; the highest bidder could go out under government legislation.

I have only one or two other matters I should like to raise because I would like to leave some time for other members. This is a fight with one section of the industry, the multinationals. I have no particular love for the large companies, but they have done a job in this country. They came in and risked their money. Do hon. members opposite know the number of dry holes? I hear hon. members opposite laughing; I would like to see them invest some of their money when there is only a slight chance of finding oil or gas. The large companies risked millions of dollars. They spent millions of dollars before they even found anything. In fact, there are hundreds of dry holes. It is okay to sit back and laugh now that they have spent their money and have proven up wells, and then like some communistic government say, "We will take it over now that they have been found." That is not the kind of country Canadians want.

We should not forget that hundreds of good Canadians are working for these multinational companies. The multinationals can stand anything the government can do; they have the money to withstand anything. But, what about the small Canadian companies? I know the minister received a letter from a small Canadian company because I have a copy of it in my possession. As a matter of fact he received several letters which he did not read when he gave his speech; he read the other ones. Small Canadian companies are being forced to cut back; they just cannot keep up. The minister said there is not one unemployed person. He does not read his mail because that one letter indicated that 19 people were let go. There will be more let go if the government continues its ridiculous and nonsensical policy.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have shown a lot of patience with the misleading statements of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) including statements attributed to myself. He said that I stated in the House there was not one unemployed person in Alberta. I never said that. I said that the same number of rigs were operating on January 6, 1981, as there were on January 6, 1980, or the reverse. I indicated that there were 482 rigs and therefore the same number of people were employed on those rigs as last year. That is what I said, and I hope he respects the record.

Mr. Taylor: It is not a point of order. The minister said—and the record will prove it—that not a single person lost his job. I do not know why he wants to change his mind now. He did not tell the whole truth when he said that because hundreds of persons have lost their jobs.

Mr. Lalonde: Name them.

Mr. Taylor: It is this policy which is putting people out of work, it is killing the industry, it is not doing the country any good. The minister should withdraw his policy and implement one that is above the table and out in the open, rather than the under-the-table one contained in this act. This bill is not appropriate for a democracy. It might be acceptable in Moscow but it is not the kind of legislation we need in Canada.

I should like to continue with the points I was mentioning before I was so rudely interrupted. We need a climate which will encourage investment. Hon. members opposite can laugh; perhaps it is very funny but it is not funny for those people who are losing their jobs.

Mr. Lalonde: You are funny.

Mr. Taylor: It is not funny for the people of Alberta whose industry is being killed and all the things they have worked for are being thrown aside. The hon. minister is not losing anything over it. He is not even losing any sleep; he laughs about it. I do not think it is funny at all and my constituents who have lost their jobs and are losing their investment money do not think it is funny.

If the government of the day had done something similar to this when his father was in business, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would not be a millionaire today. His father had a chance to develop his business, and now the government wants to take that chance away from other Canadians. People only want the chance to go out and work and invest their money. If they lose their money, that is fine, but they want a reasonable chance to make a gain, and they should have that chance. The government should not deny Canadians that chance. The government talks about Canadianization but it means nationalization; that is its whole theme.

The other point I should like to mention, is that we should encourage investment. We must encourage investment. Not only that, we need some equity capital in this country. It is all right to continue borrowing but there comes a time when you must have some input capital. It is the foundation of the investment program in this country. If we have no equity capital we will not go very far.

What we need in this country is a climate in which the people can have confidence in their government, where they can invest in equity capital, where they can get out and work, develop this country and be able to make a profit. There is nothing wrong with making a profit. If we could get this bill withdrawn, bring in a bill which will show industry the government is above the table and that they will have a chance if they invest their money, then you would find Canadian dollars being retained in this country. We would find jobs starting up and we could get this country back on its feet again.

I hope the government will reconsider and throw out many parts of this energy policy. They call it a policy, I call it a totalitarian concept.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my contribution this evening will be short, since some 26 speakers have already spoken on this bill. This bill saw the light of day over a month ago and its predecessor, Bill C-20, saw the light of day about three years ago. Therefore, it seems to me it is time for this proposal to proceed to committee as quickly as possible.

What this bill does has been described by many already. I will limit myself and describe five areas in a very brief manner. The first one has to do with the fact that under this proposal the Crown will have an interest position of at least 25 per cent in all Canada lands, including all existing and future grants to be made.

The second thrust of this bill is that it will provide for a minimum acceptable level of Canadian ownership in frontier Canada oil and gas resources to be 50 per cent, with a provision in case of deficiency to be reserved by the Crown. That is in the name of the Canadian public.

The next major direction of this bill has to do with the fact that a Crown corporation will have the right to demand from relevant operators geological, well or other proprietary information.

The fourth area has to do with the revolving fund provisions for regional environmental studies by assessing holders of rights in proportion to their acreage holdings. I will return to this measure in light of the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

The fifth area I would like to describe, which the preceding speaker made reference to at great length, is that there are many provisions in this bill for ministerial discretion. I support this. One area of ministerial discretion has to do with the authority given to the minister to prohibit the proposed transfer or assignment of interests on grounds of public interest, therefore, in the name of Canadians.

The question which comes to mind after having looked at the major points contained in this bill is: Where will this legislation apply? It will apply to all the so-called Canada lands, which to me is a new term, and a very interesting one. It includes all the lands in the territories and the offshore, which together total an area of almost 2½ million square miles in the offshore and about a million and a half square miles in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I find those figures staggering. They total an area of almost twice as large as that of the ten provinces combined. This vast area will represent Canada's best prospects for large new reserves of conventional petroleum.

Let us look for a moment at what Bill C-48 really represents. I do not think we should look at it in isolation. I submit to you it represents another step on the road initiated many years ago when Parliament approved the National Energy Board Act, when Parliament established the Panarctic, approved the Petro-Canada Act, I believe in 1975 when it approved the Petroleum Administration Act and the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Act. What we see here is a series of desirable steps stretched over a number of years to develop a situation whereby, in Canada, the public sector will be put into a position to compete and co-operate with the private sector. That will be a good balance when established in the long run. We cannot yet say we have achieved this balance. To those in this debate who have said this bill provides for confiscation, we say that about $3 billion of the taxpayers money, in the form of deferred tax write-offs, have already been made available to the private sector in the oil and gas industry.

In addition, what this bill will do once enacted is give Canadians, by means of the 25 per cent public share I mentioned earlier, something which was very well expressed by the parliamentary secretary to the minister in the debate on December 17. I quote his remarks from page 5868 of Hansard: "the 25 per cent Crown share is in fact a long overdue catch-up for the Canadian people." I could not think of a more fitting and effective description of what this 25 per cent public share really means. I am surprised to see why members opposite, like the member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), cannot see the importance of this measure and what it really represents when put into historical terms. Contrary to what some have said in this debate so far, while this legislation will geographically apply in the north and the offshore, its impact will be felt in the boardrooms of western Canada and eastern Canada. It will be felt in Calgary, yes, but in Toronto, too, by Imperial, Gulf, Texaco, Shell and Suncor. It will be felt in the boardrooms of Montreal as well, at Petrofina and BP. Let us once and for all put to rest this red herring of an east-west confrontation. It is not fair, it is not right, it is not there. It will affect the whole nation in a variety of ways. It certainly is not to be interpreted as one which fires and fuels the tensions that already exist.

What is left here for me is to look at the position taken by the opposition parties. Since this debate started on December 11, inevitably one must have a look at what has been said. Let us start with the position of the Conservative party. On December 11, 1980, the member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) on page 5671 of Hansard is reported as having said:

> The broad objectives of this legislation are worthwhile and are certainly acceptable. One might go so far as to say they are motherhood; they are intended to increase production and Canadian ownership, as well as to provide a very stable tax environment.

I wonder how this sounds to the hon. member for Bow River. The hon. member went on to say:

> I agree with the minister when he says that it is important to have this legislation. We have been waiting for it for about ten years now.

But this afternoon, as we all heard, the hon. member for Bow River spoke violently in opposition to this bill. We just heard him comparing us to a communist dictatorship. How does he square that with the statement made by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre. The hon. member for Bow River in his outrage—and I do not know whether it was synthetic or spontaneous—in effect has indicated that the Tories are divided among themselves. The only conclusion which we on this side can draw is that it is business as usual as far as the Progressive Conservative Party is concerned. But when the hon. member for Bow River says he is strenuously opposed to this bill because it gives the government the power to set prices, I would invite him to tell us which government in the world today does not set prices for oil and gas.

When the hon. member rejects strenuously the notion of government intervention and says it is a very bad practice, he forgets, and I am sure since he comes from Alberta that it is inadvertent, the Alberta industry was saved in the 1960s by virtue of the Borden line, an initiative which was taken by the Government of Canada. If I remember correctly, it was taken by the second former leader of the hon. member's own party. It would be fair to conclude that all of the 100 Tory members of Parliament, minus one, seem violently opposed to this bill. They say it is bad and that it goes too far. I feel comfortable when they say so because I know then that we are on the right track.

Let us look at the NDP for a moment. The NDP says something that is rather curious. They are opposed to the bill and at page 5676 of Hansard we find this general reasoning flowing from the lips of their guru on natural resources, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), who said:

> Suddenly the minister proposes a new program of Canadianization. Essentially this is why we oppose the bill.

His reasoning as outlined in his speech seems to flow along three main lines: (1) suspicion of the government; (2) by saying that the legislation does not go far enough; and (3) accusing the government of claiming it is doing something progressive when there is really no change. I could not help but conclude upon reading the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that his logic is inspired by the rather peculiar principle that no loaf is better than half. That seems to be the inspiration and guiding principle of the NDP in its approach to this bill.

How is it that on the one hand the NDP can say there is nothing in this bill and, on the other hand, the Tories get upset and say that there is too much in it. I am at a loss to understand their attitudes. Are we witnessing here a case of mass psychology where 100 Tories, minus one, think one way and the NDP thinks diametrically opposite? It seems that is a classic case of an urgent need for group therapy for these politicians because there is no other explanation. For one group the legislation is so bad and for the other there is nothing in the legislation, but they both come to the same conclusion, that they will oppose the bill. The NDP oppose the legislation because their logic is that it is better to have no loaf than to have half a loaf.

In conclusion, I express my regret over the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Skeena, for whom I have the highest respect. The hon. member who is the NDP saint for the environment spoke this afternoon from an environmental point of view. If I heard him correctly he described the bill as an absolute zero. He went on to challenge any Liberal backbencher in this House to show that this bill makes provision for environmental studies. The bill in fact does make provision for environmental studies. Section 49, from page 27 to page 29, of the bill is devoted to such studies. It spells out in detail how and by whom an environmental studies fund is to be established and administered, including 11 subclauses with one subclause on regulations and one subclause indicating the fund is not to exceed $15 million. Instead of making silly challenges, the NDP critic might take the time to read this bill and do his homework.

We on this side of the House take a position which is between the Conservatives and the NDP. We think this bill is another important step forward in Canada's history. Whenever one goes outside the borders of this country today he learns that there is not a person who does not speak with envy of Canada and describes it as the world envy because of its natural resources. Generations of Canadians in this and the next century will benefit from the implementation of the ideas contained in the bill; of that I am absolutely certain. In the same way we now say it was a good idea to create Panarctic some 15 years ago; in the year 2000 they will say it is a good idea that we pushed ahead with Bill C-48, for the benefit of generations of Canadians, with its principles of public ownership Canadianization, and strong powers in the capital of the nation in the interest of the full community from coast to coast, from east to west and from north to south.

It is too bad the NDP does not have the guts to support the bill, and it is too bad the Tories once again, as at the time of the bill establishing Petro-Canada, have to be dragged so recalcitrantly into the twentieth century.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) takes his seat, would he answer a question?

Mr. Caccia: Yes.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member expressed concern about our stand on this bill. As he is aware, the bill seeks to obtain legal control in right of Her Majesty the Queen of the resources off the east coast of Canada which go out 200 miles. I am sure he is aware that in 1621 King James I granted the Royal Charter of Nova Scotia to Sir William Alexander. In recognition of the utter dependence of the early colonists on the sea for food and transportation, the King included as part of our territory a band of sea stretching about 120 miles southward from our coast. That band easily covers the area which is known as Sable Island and it covers part of Georges Bank as well as most of the Scotian shelf. I should like to ask the hon. member how this government can legally, in the name of Her Majesty, the Queen, take away from us as Nova Scotians, this territory which was granted to us by the King in the year 1621?

● (2040)

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any clauses in this bill that deal with that particular question but it seems to me what could be done in the name of the King in 1621 can be done in the year 1981 in the name of the Queen of Canada!

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the first time, and it is certainly the first time in my memory, we have concurrently before Parliament two government measures that are operating under the invocation of closure, under the rule of Standing Order 75C.

I refer, of course, to the government's constitutional package as contained in the joint resolution now before the joint committee of the House and Senate. We know that the parliamentary guillotine will fall on that committee on February 6, even though we have just commenced clause by clause study of the 59 clauses. We started on clause 1 yesterday. We know that under the order the House invoked by closure, that measure has to be reported back to the House and to the Senate on or before February 6.

When that measure was going through the House the point was made repeatedly, especially by those of us who had the opportunity to participate—and indeed, it was made dramatically by those who were denied the opportunity to participate—that the constitutional package was probably one of the most important bills to come before Parliament. We said that in the context of putting forward arguments on why the time for debate on that important measure should be extended.

It is interesting that Bill C-48, which is now before us, has had closure invoked on it at this stage. We know that the parliamentary guillotine under rule 75C will come down on second reading of this bill in less than an hour.

I heard the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), for whom I have great respect, and I am sorry he is not in the House at the moment but I understand he had to leave, participate in the debate a few moments ago. Some members may ask what is wrong with that. On the face of it there is nothing wrong, except when it is remembered that the hon. member for Davenport also participated in the debate last night which invoked closure on this bill. Indeed, I believe he was the last member to speak on the closure motion, putting forward arguments of why it should be invoked.

It would seem logical and fair to me that if he were to speak in support of a motion to invoke closure, a measure that would limit severely the time left to debate this important measure—a measure, I submit, almost as important as the one now before the committee in terms of its impact on the country—he should not then deprive somebody else of the precious right to speak in the few hours we have left by virtue of the invocation of closure, notwithstanding how important the message the hon. member felt he had to deliver in the debate.

I would say to the hon. member for Davenport that in a parliamentary sense that just is not fair. He is responsible for closure. He has to assume his collective share of responsibility for closure. By speaking tonight he deprived another hon. member who opposed the imposition of closure of the right to speak.

This bill brings a new element into the constitutional debate in terms of the Canada lands. It is that feature of the bill I want to address for a few moments this evening.

It is well to recall that the issue of resource ownership which is now a question seized by the constitutional committee and the debate surrounding the constitution in the country, was raised during the First Ministers' conference, particularly with regard to the offshore dimensions of that resource question. It has been raised in the House in the form of questions. It has been raised because the province of Newfoundland and the province of Nova Scotia have put forward claims to the ownership of the offshore. We have been told by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House that this is a question for the Supreme Court of Canada to decide. If the federal government claims ownership and if the provinces claim ownership, then I submit it is not unreasonable for the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to suggest that this matter should be settled by a third party, namely, the Supreme Court of Canada.

They also said during the meeting of first ministers that the package on the table, and presumably the package we are dealing with tonight in the constitutional committee, was merely the first phase of the government's constitutional proposals, and that the resource question would be included in the second phase.

Here we have two positions: one taken in the House by the government saying that the question of who has claim to the offshore is to be settled by the court and another position taken at the First Ministers' conference by the same government saying that the question of the offshore and the resource question will come in the second phase of the ongoing constitutional package.

What I find strange is that we now have this bill before us which will get second reading tonight by the use of the government's majority which makes a complete mockery of any suggestion that this matter should be included in the second phase of constitutional discussions or that it should be settled by the Supreme Court of Canada.

The bill assumes that the legal ownership of the Canada lands in the maritime provinces and Newfoundland belongs to the federal jurisdiction of Canada. That seems to me to fly in the face of what we have been told in this House and to fly in the face of the constitutional process that started this summer in which the first ministers were told that it was to be the second phase of the government's constitutional process.

Is the government now saying to the premiers who attended that conference in September that it has taken the offshore question off the list? Is that what it is saying by this bill? Is that the message going to the Atlantic provinces tonight? Or is the federal government telling the House and the Canadian people that there will be no second phase to the constitutional process, that the phase we have now is the final and irrevocable process.

On the one hand the federal government admits that the ownership of the offshore resources is a question for the Supreme Court of Canada, and now the government is asking Parliament to pass an act to give the rights of the offshore to the federal government.

I am not a lawyer, sir, but it would seem to me that given the due process in this country and the separation of the judicial process from the parliamentary process, the government would have waited until this matter was settled by the court. That is what we would expect and that is what the provinces had every right to expect.

Bill C-48 assumes that all the offshore area off the east coast of Canada is Canada lands owned by the Government of Canada for the people of Canada. My friend from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) put forward an argument on behalf of his province. My province has put forward another argument. I suppose this will have to be ultimately decided by the courts, the passage of this bill notwithstanding. But what that does to the process, I do not know. My province makes the case, and rightly so, and I have made it in this House, that we brought with us into the federation, into the union, our jurisdiction intact over the offshore lands, which is the continental shelf.

The government disputes that, and that is its right. I say that dispute should not be on the floor of this House in the form of a bill put through by the invocation of closure with the use of the majority. That should be settled by due process before the Supreme Court of Canada.

It assumes considerable importance for some of us because we are dealing interestingly with what the bill calls Canada lands. That means, of course, land under the sea on the continental shelf. We should take a look at what has happened to Canada land in the past. Prior to the Canada we now know there were lands which were Canada lands. We know, for example, that as a result the face of Canada has changed, not only with the creation of new provinces, but with the expansion by the federal government of the existing boundaries of existing provinces. I might say this has had the effect of placing the Atlantic provinces, by this bill, at an all time disadvantage because the only place we can expand our lands is by the lands which the government is now claiming in this bill.

It is well for us to remember what the Government of Canada did in extending the boundaries and what it meant for Quebec. It meant an addition of 379,000 square miles to the territory of Quebec in 1912, without which the province could not have the tremendous James Bay hydro development and all the vast energy that will mean for the province and people of Quebec.

The province of Ontario had its boundary extended by 237,000 square miles to the north and to the west to what is now the boundary of Manitoba. We have seen the boundary of Saskatchewan and Alberta each given an additional 250,000 square miles which were northern lands—Canada lands—under the jurisdiction of Canada and belonging to all Canadians.

Simple justice would indicate that the only boundaries of our region to be extended are those on the continental shelf. That is a natural extension of our land mass. The continental shelf is recognized by international law as the natural extension of a land mass of a coastal state. That simple justice is being denied to us by this government. We know. There is a good reason for it.

Off our own coast, Hibernia basin has a potential of 1 billion barrels of recoverable oil. It is there in commercial quantities. Unfortunately, I am sorry to say, the development of it is being held up because of this dispute. It is not being helped, I might add, by the passage of this kind of legislation. We know there is natural gas and probably oil reserves off the coast of Nova Scotia. The natural gas is there. Whether or not the oil is there in recoverable quantities has yet to be determined, but it is probably there. We know there is natural gas in commercial quantities off the coast of Labrador, all of which is included in the Canada lands in the bill now before us.

Coming from a province with only 53.6 per cent of the earned income of the average Canadian and with unemployment insurance in terms of our economy representing one-twelfth of the personal income in Newfoundland as compared to one-fortieth in the rest of Canada, we are being denied the right by this kind of legislation to be able to stand on our own feet economically as a result of what that tremendous oil resource would mean to us. That does not mean the Government of Newfoundland wants to grab it all and keep it all. The government of Newfoundland has made the case as to why it is so concerned with exercising its claim. First it wants to control the rate of development. That is very important to an old culture like ours. We know what has happened in other jurisdictions. We have a precious fishery resource, not only a social resource in terms of our people and our way of life, but we have a fishery resource on which that social resource depends. We must protect that and hence control the rate of development. The only way we can control the rate of development is if we control the resource. Let no one think that we claim that because we want all of it to ourselves. We are prepared to share with the rest of Canada. The Government of Canada will get its share from its tax powers. The developer will get its share from its royalties and Newfoundland will get its share. From our share we will be able to contribute in terms of the equalization formula to the rest of Canada. Is it wrong or is it fair that we should look for our place in the sun by something which we feel is justifiably and rightfully ours?

I was proud when we sat on that side, albeit for a short time. We had a policy in place which provided that the province of Newfoundland would own the mineral resources of the continental shelf. The ownership and legislative jurisdiction would be consistent with and subject to the division of legislative competence as between Parliament and the provincial legislatures under the Constitution of Canada; that the Government of Canada would continue to have legislative jurisdiction in certain areas such as environment, shipping, and so on. Those principles would be confirmed by the signing of an agreement which we agreed to enter into between the two governments and by appropriate legislative action and constitutional change. All that stopped with the change in government last year.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of this bill with the government claiming upon itself these Canada lands and so denying the right of the Atlantic provinces to extend in the only way they can is an act of grave injustice to the people of Atlantic Canada and one which hon. members opposite will have to account for when they face the people.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-48, an act to regulate the oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, is an act designed specifically to safeguard the interests of the people of Canada and their energy resources on our Canadian-owned lands, sometimes referred to as Crown land. In simple terms, these are lands owned by Canada as a nation or Canadians collectively and we all have an interest in the development of those lands and the resources on those lands.

I want to stress that this act does not in any way infringe upon the rights or ownership of mineral rights of the provinces, but in the interpretation of the bill, Canada lands are defined as lands that belong to Her Majesty in the right of Canada or with respect to which Her Majesty in the right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources. It is for this reason I indicated earlier that we as individual Canadians have a vital interest that must be safeguarded for our future generations. It is intended to ensure Canada's energy resources for the eighties and to upgrade and update existing legislation currently applied to these lands.

In simple terms, its intent is to ensure that the 300 million acres of land currently under lease in these regions is developed, bearing in mind the best interests of Canada and of Canadians and, in particular, ensuring that Canadian-owned companies are involved in the development and accrue the benefits from this development. I believe, however, before we go into the specifics of this legislation, in this debate on second reading, we should recap or compare in a very brief way similar legislation and regulation and returns to other companies in other nations.

Oil companies would lead us to believe that we in Canada are asking too much, but in England there is one state-owned company empowered to purchase 51 per cent of all oil production, and another one with a monopoly on gas production. In Norway, a Norwegian state enterprise established since 1973 is empowered to carry a 50 per cent interest in oil and gas rights in the exploration stage, and that rate can go as high as 80 per cent. Similar stringent state involvement also exists in Indonesia.

Mexico completely nationalized its oil industry many years ago, from the exploration and development stage, through processing, distributing and retail sales.

Venezuela has taken similar measures and, although several multinationals had been extensively involved in the Venezuelan petroleum industry, the industry is now totally nationalized under PetroVen and four subsidiary companies. But these four subsidiaries work very closely with the multinationals such as Exxon.

In the Middle East, in Saudi Arabia there are two state-owned companies, Iranco and PetroMin, and again these companies are working in the interests of the country and in co-operation with the multinationals. This same situation exists throughout the Middle East and it is worthy of note that the multinationals now handle less than 50 per cent of world trade. If the multinationals are willing to work closely with state-owned companies in other countries, under far more rigid controls and rules than we propose, why can they not work with Canadians in Canada?

It is not our intention to nationalize the oil industry. We have only one Petro-Canada at the present time. Some Canadians and members of this House would lead us to believe that the National Energy Policy is creating undue hardships on the multinationals operating in Canada, but when you compare the stricter controls and lower allowable involvement imposed in other countries, naturally they will complain. A negative reaction was to be expected here in Canada as we Canadianize our industry, through a more direct involvement of Petro-Canada and the involvement of Canadians investing in and securing our energy supplies for the years ahead.

One other interesting aspect of the energy policies of these other countries is the fact that very few of them charge world prices to their own consumers. In other words, they charge world prices for their exported oil and another price for oil and gas used for domestic consumption. Some of the comparisons are as follows: in Mexico gasoline is 20 cents per litre, in Venezuela 4.4 cents per litre, in Saudi Arabia 5.5 cents per litre, England 76.2 cents a litre, Canada 31 cents per litre, the United States 37 cents a litre, in France 90 cents per litre and Italy 100.08 cents per litre. This is all quoted in Canadian dollars.

This act is intended to replace the Territorial Lands Act, and Public Lands Act and includes amendments to the Oil and Crown Production and Conservation Act. But the basic objective is to provide security of supply for Canadians and to provide the vehicle for Canadian participation in energy development and revenue sharing.

At the same time, we intend to pursue the development of frontier oil and gas, while ensuring that Canadians receive a fair return for these oil and gas resources, optimizing the employment of Canadians and the use of Canadian goods and services in frontier gas and oil exploration and development.

Our proposed legislation and the National Energy Policy is the best in the world. It respects the needs of the oil companies and protects the heritage and interests of Canadians.

To those members who would suggest that a 25 per cent share in oil and gas rights for Canadians on Crown land is unjust, I would remind them that as a citizen and landowner who holds title to his land and the mineral rights, I personally would receive a 12½ per cent share of any oil or gas discovered on my lands in Ontario. Why should it be any different for all Canadians, on all Crown land that is owned by Canada and Canadians?

I remind the members of this chamber that it was in my constituency of Lambton-Middlesex where oil was first discovered in North America, at Oil Springs, Ontario. In fact, Imperial Oil Company was first established in the town of Petrolia, later to move to Sarnia and then expand to its current status. Some of those old wells are over 100 years old and are still producing. Further exploration is continuing and seismic work is being done. I witnessed a rig that was moved to a new site in Sombre township last Sunday morning. The point I am making is that this region, very small though it may be, in comparison to the vastness of the area that would be under the jurisdiction of this act, this original oil field has been producing for more than 100 years, and exploration work is still going on.

There is continuing interest in the Silerian Reef formation that covers the eastern part of the state of Michigan and southwestern Ontario. New wells are being found at varying levels and pinnacle peaks and salt domes are being sought. One particularly interesting area is the offshore regions in Lake Erie, and, although natural gas was discovered there many years ago, new wells are being discovered in new areas where it was previously thought none had existed.

But like other offshore discoveries of greater magnitude, such as Hibernia or the Beaufort Sea, new technology has enabled the drillers to locate those fields by using shock waves or seismic. On land, small shallow holes are drilled, small explosive charges are placed and listening devices wired in sequence. As these explosive charges are detonated in series, shock waves echo back from rock formation below, indicating depths of domes and basins far below. Similar apparatus is towed behind ships, and by using small compressed air explosions in the water, science has enabled us to identify similar domes and basins below the ocean floor.

When an abnormal formation is discovered, a grid pattern of seismic sounds is applied to identify the extent of those structures below and to determine the best location to drill a well.

In the act before us today, there is a definition included to ensure it is clearly understood that a significant find or discovery is one well, but a commercial discovery is more than one or a series of wells. Provision is included in this act in clause 44 to give the minister authority to make a declaration of that significant discovery in respect to these lands, and any adjacent lands where he has reason to believe the significant discovery may extend.

In clauses 45, 46 and 47 the minister may make declarations of commercial discoveries and order additional wells to be drilled on the relevant Canada lands at such time and places as the minister should indicate. In other words, if a company finds an oil or gas field on Crown lands, this gives the authority to the minister to ensure that Canadians know the size of the discovery and the extent of the region and the potential production.

This legislation relates to the minister. Most acts do relate to ministers, but while they do have authority, it is usual that that authority is delegated to other bodies. In spite of the fact that those other bodies may make decisions, the ultimate responsibility rests with ministers. It is not unusual in legislation to relate authority to those who have responsibility. Even though they may have other bodies under their jurisdiction, ministers still have the responsibility and have to live up to it.

Clause 48 ensures that the power is included in the act to order that production commence at the times and places and in the quantities specified in the order and that sales are made to specified persons and at prices specified in the order. By the same token, power is included to stop or suspend production for periods of time specified in the order. This provides an assurance to us that a large discovery will be brought to the attention of the Canadian people and that some large company cannot sit on a large discovery and say, "When you increase the price by so much we will start producing" or in other terms, "If you do not do certain things we will cut back by 15 per cent". We want to protect the people of Canada against such actions as this.

The last clause upon which I want to touch is clause 49 and the establishment of a revolving fund to ensure that proper environmental studies are conducted prior to the start of exploration work on the impact on our ecology during the drilling, development and producing stages in these highly sensitive regions of our environment.

I am well aware of the consequences in my own constituency when a dry hole is drilled and not properly plugged. There are hundreds of these in Lambton county. There are old wells from the 1800s which are no longer producing and which have been abandoned but left unplugged. They have since contaminated surrounding water wells because oil has come up to the water level in those wells and spread out through water veins. These unplugged abandoned wells have made it impossible to use modern further recovery techniques in these fields, and I refer to the fact that it is no longer possible to pressurize these rock formations. If we could pressurize these old formations, we could force out tens of thousands of barrels of oil which still exist in these fields. I am also aware of the damage this can cause to lands adjacent to a well or an oil field not only because of oil spills but also because of mud pits used in the drilling process and because of pipeline construction.

Just recently a constituent came to me regarding three very large gas transmission lines which cross his farm. Not only was there a tremendous displacement and loss of topsoil during the installation of these lines, but my constituent's whole underground tile drainage system was affected. Mr. Miseck lost a strip of land. If proper procedures and studies had taken place prior to that installation, the result would have been known and the land would have been restored to its productive potential. This was as recent as the 1950s, 1960s and early 1970s. This was in the province of Ontario. This type of environmental damage is much different from that found on Crown lands. We must be ever cognizant of the fragility of the ecology of the north, of the marine life in our offshore waters and the impact on our fishing industry, not just next year or the year after but ten or 20 years from now.

I have a particular interest in this area because of another situation in my own neighbourhood. A well was being drilled last summer and, in spite of all normal precautions and additional expertise flown in from western Canada, as the normal depths were approached a salt dome was penetrated, and the ensuing flow of brine saturated the site and may result in soil damage to land around that rig which may take years to recover.

In spite of modern technology and normal precautions on two of the best farms in Canada, which are less than five miles apart in my own neighbourhood both Mr. Miseck and Mr. Williams have incurred damage which may lower the productivity of the land for years to come. While these two cases do not come under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board or the Department of the Environment, I am pleased that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has the foresight to ensure that this does not happen on Crown lands, or, if it does happen, that absolute liability is assessed against the operators.

Naturally I am interested in ensuring that adequate precautions are taken, and I will be watching with interest what happens this spring as drilling resumes in my own area. I understand that five wells have been planned for my area for this coming year. These will be drilled by Canadian drilling companies which have not been discouraged or affected by the national energy policy and which have chosen to remain in Canada as responsible corporate citizens to work toward Canadian self-sufficiency. In fact, some of the preliminary work was a joint effort by a very large multinational company and a very small Canadian company.

If five of the very largest multinational companies can accept the restrictions placed on their operations by some of the nations to which I referred earlier, then I can see no reason why they cannot operate here in Canada as we work toward our objectives in the interests of all Canadians. Of course, very large corporations—I refer to Exxon, Shell, British Petroleum, Mobil, Gulf, Texaco and I could go on—would object to any change in direction of Canadian policy or any policy which would lower their profits in any country. As we are all aware, these profits have increased dramatically over the last few years. A policy which would increase Canadian control and ownership of our resources had to be implemented to secure these resources for our future.

It has been ten years since the industry was advised that the regime for the disposition of oil and gas rights in the frontier regions, the offshore and the territories would be extensively revised. This new Canada oil and gas act was originally introduced in the House as Bill C-20 on December 20, 1977. The bill before us tonight for second reading is needed both from the industry's standpoint and from the regulatory standpoint. From the industry's standpoint we must establish certainty as to the tenure of gas and oil rights in the fiscal regime, thus providing for a stable investment climate. The industry will know precisely where it stands. From a Canadian standpoint this legislation is required to lay down more specific rules and guidelines as we move toward our objective of increased Canadian ownership and security of supply.

I indicated earlier that I come from the oldest oil producing region of North America. I have grown up in the midst of that industry. I saw the phasing out of the old Canadian Oil Company refinery at Petrolia, Ontario. It built a new facility at Sarnia which was later bought by Shell just 15 or 20 years ago. Then we saw the establishment of the Sun Oil refinery at Sarnia next to the Imperial Oil refinery. This region became known as the "Chemical Valley", and a fleet of tanker trucks collected the oil from the surrounding oil fields and delivered it to these refineries.

Since those earlier pioneer days pollution has been a problem. Tremendous strides have been made to correct this, to eliminate the possibility of oil spills, to locate and plug old abandoned wells and to fill in old underground storage pits where crude oil was originally stored while it awaited refining. But this has happened over several decades. Now, as technology has advanced and people have become aware of environmental damage the same risk is not there. This legislation provides the necessary power to conduct environmental studies. As I indicated earlier, we intend to avoid the mistakes made by the early pioneers. We are placing total liability on the shoulders of the operator. In this context the legislation is clear, concise and simple. I endorse and support this legislation. It does not impose the stringent financial burdens on companies as the other oil producing nations to which I referred earlier do. This legislation reflects and fulfils the needs of the people of Canada. It has placed the emphasis on an early assessment of the oil and gas potential of our frontier regions, but this requirement will not be fulfilled at the expense of the fisheries or the environment. It is the intent of the legislation that proper assessments be made of environmental damage potential and then that the recommendations and findings of those assessments are adhered to. This legislation will be of benefit to all Canadians.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-48, an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, because of the impact of this legislation on my native province of Nova Scotia.

When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) introduced this bill on December 11, 1980, he called it a key element in the successful fulfilment of the government's national energy program. In his words, this bill:

—will establish a new and modernized regime to govern resources development activity in those immense frontier regions of our country known as the Canada lands.

He went on to say:

Our offshore regions cover an area of some 2.5 million square miles. The territories alone comprise another 1.5 million square miles. Together this is what we call the Canada lands, an area which is almost twice the size of the ten provinces combined.

Then the minister, warming up to his subject, claimed:

The promise of this vast frontier region is as enormous as its size. It represents Canada's best prospects for large, new reserves of conventional petroleum. It holds the key to our energy security . . .

Oil and gas rights have already been issued for 350 million acres in the Canada lands. Virtually all the area is considered promising in terms of potential reserves. Bill C-48 will convert these existings rights to the new land management regime thereby establishing it in a meaningful way.

We must ask how is this rich prize to be taken over. The minister left nothing to the imagination as he outlined his government's plans under seven major headings. I think it is only fitting that I repeat them because there is some misunderstanding as to why we are objecting to this legislation. The minister stated:

First, there will be stiffer work requirements through negotiated exploration agreements which include firm drilling commitments. Second, we will reserve to the Crown a 25 per cent share of oil and gas rights in the Canada lands, to be exercised through Petro-Canada or some other designated Crown corporation.

I guess that means more bureaucracy, Mr. Speaker, and more Crown corporations. The minister went on:

Third, there will be a minimum requirement of 50 per cent Canadian ownership, through the private or public sector, of production from the Canada lands. Fourth, we will ensure optimum employment of Canadians, and the use of Canadian goods and services in oil and gas activities carried out on the Canada lands. Fifth, we will provide ministerial authority to order production to commence and be delivered to Canadian markets in quantities and at prices specified in the order. Sixth, we will be providing a greater degree of control in the timing, direction, rate and level of exploration, development and production by various means. These would include drilling and production orders, earlier release of proprietory information, prior approval of transfers and assigment of rights. Seventh, we will ensure that Canadians receive a fair return for their oil and gas resources through a basic royalty of 10 per cent, with an additional royalty of 40 per cent of the net profits of a field.

This is, of course, a very tall order. The minister also stated:

—the Canada oil and gas act will bring existing oil and gas rights into line with the new regime, but in such a way as to ensure that if these rights are not actively developed they will be relinquished to the Crown. Existing permits, leases and agreements will either be converted to new leases and agreements within a year—

Only one year, Mr. Speaker.

—or will be surrendered to the Crown. Under the new regime, all exploration rights will lead to one type of production right only, namely, a production licence.

I have listened attentively to many of the speeches that were made, as well as to the minister when he made his initial speech, and I say to you, sir, that this bill makes a mockery of parliamentary democracy. You will note that when I listed the seven major headings as stated by the minister in the House, he kept saying "we will do this", "we will do that", "we will ensure", "we will provide". It is not Parliament, not the private sector that will do this, nor the peoples' representatives but the minister, whose background in the oil industry leaves much to be desired and is far from impressive, who will decide. Is it any wonder that when these proposals became known to the public, the oil, gas and well drilling companies started to leave Canada in droves? Instead of welcoming the minister's national energy plan, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, in full page advertisements in several of our daily newspapers right across the land levelled forceful criticism at the minister and the government saying that his proposals will only hurt Canadians by raising fuel prices, by making Canadians more dependent on expensive and insecure foreign oil. They said it will delay essential frontier exploration as well as oil sands plants and heavy oil development, it will cost Canadians more for gasoline and heating oil in the long run, and it will cost thousands of jobs which would be created by the oil industry right across Canada. The independent Canadian companies stated "we are the people your program was supposed to help, but it doesn't help us at all, it has stopped us in our tracks".

This policy, Mr. Speaker, has not only stopped the independent oil companies in their tracks. I say through you, sir, to the minister, that it appears to have stopped development and progress in all of Canada. All you need to do is look at the daily statistics that are being supplied. The minister, however, only laughs off these criticisms saying they are nothing to be concerned about, they are merely the big crocodile tears of the vast oil interests in Canada. I ask the minister, who is in his seat in the House today, whether he shares the opinion of Mr. Rowland Frazee, chairman of the Royal Bank, who stated in Montreal, on January 8, 1981, that the federal government should scrap its national energy program and concentrate on drawing up a new policy rather than worrying about the constitution. In the words of Mr. Frazee: "It seems abundantly clear by now that the national energy program is so seriously flawed as to be a non-starter, which should be withdrawn and reconsidered! Canada's number one energy priority should be self-sufficiency in oil, but 'high noon' confrontations between the federal government and the provinces are blocking progress". These are the words of the chief executive of one of Canada's biggest banks, but I doubt whether his advice and his suggestions will meet with any more acceptance by the minister than do the carefully worded suggestions and recommendations made by members of Parliament from this side of the House. It is somewhat like the words of the mother watching the parade go by, turning to dad and saying, "You know, dear, everyone is out of step but our John." That is the attitude of this minister. Obviously, the moves being made by the minister against foreign investment in his attempts to gain great Canadian ownership of the oil industry can only further damage Canada's reputation abroad and cause wasteful bickering at home. I say to the minister, through you, sir, that if he continues to pursue the policies as outlined in this bill, we will continue to see more projects delayed or go down the drain or, more accurately go down south. We will see the Canadian dollar fall still further. We will see the price which we paid for our imports increasing and our inflation continuing its upward spiral.

The clauses and proposals in this bill will never, I submit, help us to settle our domestic problems or our international difficulties. In my opinion, this government's inability to see the tremendous potential of this nation is undoubtedly its greatest weakness. This government, with its preoccupation for the acquisition of still greater power, with its determination to still further socialize Canadian industry and build an even greater bureaucracy is, unfortunately, causing all Canadians to forfeit their opportunity to build on our strengths for the future. That is the crime of this type of legislation. The minister has carefully detailed the powers and the privileges which he considers essential to be retained by the federal government under this bill for control of the Canada lands. Some still ask, "What are these lands?" In fact only a moment ago I placed a question, at his consent, before the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for whom I have a great deal of respect. In his answer he seemed to state that there was nothing about the ownership of lands to which I referred in the bill. I regret that he has not read his own government's "National Energy Program" of 1980, for, if he had, he would see what the minister is talking about when he speaks of Canada lands. They include all of the Yukon, all of the Northwest Territories, the Labrador Shelf, the Grand Banks, all of the Scotian shelf which includes Sable Island and the area adjacent to New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. That is what they intend to take, to rape from the rest of Canada through this type of legislation.

As a Nova Scotian I believe it is my duty and responsibility to place on the record the position of those I represent so that the minister and the government can evaluate the different points of view and hopefully through debate and discussion resolve the different problems facing both governments on this matter.

The exploitation of offshore oil and gas could be the most important commercial development of the twentieth century for Nova Scotia. Offshore oil and gas could give Nova Scotians the financial resources to attack deeply-rooted economic problems and strengthen weaker sectors of the economy. In our view it is a real chance for those of us who live in Nova Scotia.

Oil and gas production from our own fields would also provide badly needed independence from our presently insecure supply of increasingly costly oil imports. At present all the oil consumed in my province of Nova Scotia is foreign-produced and large federal payments are needed to maintain a uniform Canadian oil price to consumers. Reducing or eliminating oil imports would improve Canada's balance of payments and stabilize the cost of oil to Canadian consumers.

We realize as well that offshore oil and gas developments could also present problems if they are not properly managed and controlled. Experience in other jurisdictions shows us that large oil and gas developments can be highly disruptive. They can lead to inflation because the funds involved are so large in relation to the rest of the economy. They can disturb living patterns, for example, by causing real estate prices to soar. They can also harm the environment, a fact which has been mentioned earlier in the House and is well-known to all Nova Scotians who sadly remember and will never forget the disastrous Arrow and Kurdistan spills off their shores. Offshore oil and gas developments can overwhelm long-established local industries and small businesses, unless these firms can plan carefully with government guidance and protection to get their share of the action.

As Nova Scotians we believe strongly that the regulators and decision makers must have the closest possible direct links to the communities involved and be responsible solely to the jurisdiction most affected. This is one of the key reasons Nova Scotia insists it would be folly to allow the control and management of the offshore resources of the province to slip away from provincial hands.

Nova Scotia has already passed legislation to ensure that oil and gas activities, on and off the shores of the province, will provide the optimum benefit to Nova Scotians. In four separate acts provision is made by the government of Nova Scotia to determine the extent of employment of Nova Scotian workers and the use of Nova Scotian goods and services in all phases of exploration, development and production. Provision is made for regulations regarding education and training of Nova Scotians to enable them to participate in the many job opportunities which these developments will generate.

Finally, provision is made for the establishment of compensation funds to reimburse individuals who might suffer loss as a result of exploitation and development as well as pipeline or gas utility activities. I hope the House will realize that Nova Scotia has a strong and positive legal claim for ownership and control of its offshore resources. I repeat what I stated a moment ago in the form of a question in the House. Our claim goes back as far as 1621 when King James I granted the Royal Charter of Nova Scotia to Sir William Alexander. In recognition of the utter dependence of the early colonists—and of course this applies to the people who settled in my home town of Lunenburg—the water adjacent to our shores was granted to the province since the food the colonists required and the transportation mode was all by sea. In recognition of this dependence the king included as part of our territory a band of sea stretching about 120 miles southward from our coasts. This band easily encompasses Sable Island. That is why if Your Honour lived on Sable Island and an election was called—I am not certain how you would vote—you would be required to vote in a Nova Scotia constituency and your ballot would be counted in the Halifax riding. This band which the king granted to Nova Scotia in 1621 includes Sable Island, a large share of the controversial Georges Bank, as well as most of the Scotian shelf. These boundaries were observed for many years despite numerous conquests and treaty settlements. In fact, Canada's constitution, the British North America Act of 1867, provided that Nova Scotia's limits would be exactly the same after as before Confederation.

I think it only fitting that I remind the House the international boundaries of Canada have remained fairly constant since Confederation, but within Canada there have been many changes. As federal territories in the west and north acquired value, either through settlement or mineral development, they were regularly and without question granted to the appropriate provinces. In fact Nova Scotia, as a result of its pre-confederation division into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, is perhaps the only province in Canada which has grown smaller over the years.

For many years Ontario has asserted ownership and control over its minerals, as we have just heard from the last speaker, including oil and gas under the waters of the Great Lakes, and for the last two decades it has benefited from natural gas production in Lake Erie. These gas fields stretch southward nearly to the international boundary which exists between Canada and the United States. Nova Scotia sees no reason whatsoever why it should not have similar ownership of the resources which exist on its offshore banks. However, Nova Scotians believe that legal confrontation over the offshore jurisdictional question should only occur as a last resort. Once our views are fully known and understood, we are hopeful that our differences over these problems can be resolved through negotiation with the present federal government.

So there can be no misunderstanding, I wish to spell out the essential rights and powers which Nova Scotia must have to ensure that offshore development will be directed toward the benefit of Nova Scotia as well as Canada. These rights are exactly the same ones which are exerted by the provinces with respect to onshore resources. First, we believe Nova Scotia must have the power to control the pace of the development of its offshore resources in order to balance the possible formidable industrial expansion with the preservation of traditional social values and patterns. This requires that Nova Scotia have exclusive right to issue and set the conditions of all licences, leases and permits of all kinds, which relate to the exploration, development, production, transportation, refining and marketing of petroleum and petroleum products, subject only to the normal jurisdiction of the federal government in extra provincial trade.

Nova Scotia must have the right, sir, to a fair offshore resource royalty, rental and other revenue in order to fund education and training programs, to support administrative and regulatory agencies, to reverse the equalization payments system and to ensure that industrial activity in Nova Scotia is sustained after the offshore resources are depleted. Because of our high unemployment rate, Nova Scotia must have the ability to provide preferences for qualified Nova Scotian workers in the early years of development. This will be coupled with an intensive program of education and training, to bring as many as possible to the high standards required by this industry. Given moderate success offshore, it is expected that the need for these preferences will disappear within a very few years.

We also believe that Nova Scotia must be able to determine the conditions under which goods and services are supplied to industry operations, in order that Nova Scotia can obtain a share of these business activities—something we have sorely lacked for many years. Without some temporary preferences in the early stages of development, Nova Scotians will face extreme difficulty in entering the field against competition from large international firms. These rights and powers, when taken together, may seem to be comparable to ownership—without doubt, they constitute very substantial control of our offshore resources. However, ownership is not a precise term and there are many aspects of control other than those I have mentioned. Some are undeniably federal responsibilities; some are undeniably provincial responsibilities; and, of course, some are controversial, therefore, open to negotiation.

I believe prompt resolution of the controversial responsibilities is necessary in order to prevent delays in petroleum exploration off Nova Scotia's coast. I believe it can be achieved, either through constitutional amendments or within our existing constitutional framework. The Parliament of Canada, with the consent of Nova Scotia, has the authority to confirm by statute that our seaward boundaries are co-extensive with the boundaries of Canada for the purposes of resource exploration and development. The statute may include whatever terms and conditions are agreed to by the federal and provincial governments.

We in Nova Scotia hope our oil and gas potential can be developed; not through a process of confrontation, as appears to be the minister's position as outlined in Bill C-48, but rather through a process of consultation, which is the original manner in which the strength of our provinces was achieved and our nation developed. After all, sir, a chain is only as strong as its weakest link. Surely this government must eventually realize that legislation, which strengthens the economic position of our individual provinces, cannot help but strengthen the central government—and the nation. Unfortunately, Bill C-48 falls far short of its required goal. Instead of strengthening the provinces it seeks to take away more of their powers and concentrate that power in Ottawa. I say to you, sir, in conclusion, that this is a bad bill, an unjust bill. It does nothing to strengthen Canada and confederation. If the provinces are robbed of their resources they have nothing—nothing to work with, nothing on which to build. This is why I am opposed to this bill and why I intend to vote against it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Murphy: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order?

Mr. Murphy: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is my concern that if the hon. member for Gloucester wishes to speak he should not have been the last Liberal speaker before the motion on closure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I want to make two points in the couple of minutes which I have and then I will leave the rest of the time to the hon. member from the NDP.

The first point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that in this bill we are not dealing with any lands—

Mr. Murphy: You denied us the time, why should you be able to speak?

Mr. Breau: —within a province. Clause 2 clearly says that we are dealing, first of all—

Miss Jewett: One minute!

Mr. Rae: You do not want anyone else to speak. Do not speak yourself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. Breau: First of all, in the Northwest Territories—

Mr. Murphy: Let other members speak. You wanted closure, do not speak.

Mr. Breau: Secondly, those submarine areas adjacent—

Mr. Rae: I want to speak, too.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question to dispose of the motion now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lalonde) which was agreed to on the following division:

TRANSPORT

CALL FOR ADDITIONAL TRAINS TO MOVE GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas many farmers in Alberta and, indeed, in all the prairie provinces are unable to deliver their quotas because local elevators are jammed and some farmers deliver only by travelling many miles to elevators on alternate rail lines, and whereas farmers require a cash flow, the same as any other business, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the Minister of Transport move aggressively by making more cars and trains available immediately to move our grain from all of the prairie provinces.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DUPLICATION OF PROGRAMMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my motion is presented under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On Wednesday evening, January 14, the CBC "National" in Vancouver rebroadcast the first five minutes of news used the night before. This rerun happened the same day the corporation was defending its application for a proposed new CBC-2 network. Since CBC-2 will, if approved, be largely a schedule of rebroadcast shows, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That the CBC be urged to resist the temptation of using the CBC "National News" as a dry run for a possible CBC-2 network.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADA-U.S. EAST COAST FISHERIES TREATY—EXPECTATION OF U.S. SENATE APPROVAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing necessity. Whereas U.S. senator, Charles Percy, has indicated there will be movement in the U.S.-Canada east coast fisheries treaty, whereas this movement can only result in further compromises on the part of Canada, and whereas this House has unanimously endorsed the present treaty and rejected previous demands for further changes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House reaffirm its expectation that the current agreement awaiting U.S. Senate approval shall be signed so harmony can once again occur between U.S. and Canadian fishermen in Atlantic Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ASSISTANCE TO LAID OFF WORKERS AT SEPT-ÎLES AND SCHEFFERVILLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the lay-off of a thousand workers during the past year on the North Shore as a result of the closing down of the ITT at Port-Cartier, and following the 650 further lay-offs by the Iron Ore Company of Canada at Sept-Îles and Schefferville, I move, as the member for Manicouagan, seconded by the member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the House urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to spare no effort and take all means at his disposal to help without delay the workers of Sept-Îles and Schefferville recently laid off by Iron Ore.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. The presentation of this motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CALL FOR DIPLOMATIC EFFORTS TO STOP FLOW OF ARMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent concern which I hope will receive the unanimous agreement of the House. In the light of reports of over 600 persons killed in the last five days in fighting in El Salvador and of 9,000 deaths due to political violence in 1980, and in light of Canada's support for the United Nations resolution of December condemning military aid to El Salvador, followed by the present visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Mexico City and the recent visit of the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) and other ministers to Mexico, signifying Canada's interest in Central America's concern, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche):

That this House urge the government to increase its diplomatic efforts to stop the flow of arms to El Salvador, and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be encouraged to meet with the seven-man diplomatic mission of the revolutionary democratic front in Ottawa next week.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AIRPORTS

CALL FOR CESSATION OF ALLEGED DOWNGRADING OF AIRPORTS IN NORTHERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact the Department of Transport has reduced hours of maintenance at northern airports and apparently is also considering transferring MOT airports to territorial authorities which do not have the money adequately to maintain and expand them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Transport cease his systematic downgrading of airports north of 60.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

INCREASE IN AUTO PRICES—CALL FOR JUSTIFICATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In a report prepared for the Ontario government which was leaked and published today, it is indicated that within the auto industry, at the very best, one in five jobs will be lost in Canada, and that in Ontario the losses will be in excess of that figure. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government require the auto industry to appear before the finance committee of this House to justify its actions and in particular the raising of prices 36 per cent over the prices of the 1980 model year, and for maintaining a 16 per cent gap between the price of similar cars sold in the United States, thereby contributing to the disastrous economic conditions reported today.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

CALL FOR PROGRAM AGAINST USE OF MARIJUANA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an issue that has a direct impact on Canada's youth. It is a well-known fact that credible researchers and doctors have warned of the possible long-term, harmful effects of the prolonged use of marijuana, especially such use by young people. In light of these warnings, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House urge the government to divert some of its huge and proposed advertising budget toward a sustained, intensive education program designed to alert Canadians to the potential hazards of marijuana use.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PETRO-CANADA

HIBERNIA PROJECT—REPORTED STATEMENT BY CHEVRON OFFICIAL

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Earlier this week an official from Chevron, one of the key operators in the Hibernia project off the coast of Newfoundland, stated that the Hibernia project, under the present terms of the National Energy Program, is not economic. Since Petro-Canada is a participant in this project, would the minister advise the House of Commons whether he has sought the advice of PetroCan on this matter and, if so, does it agree with the conclusions reached by Chevron on this matter?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member would not want to misquote Chevron officials. What Chevron has said, if I remember correctly, was something to the effect that they would not be in a position to decide on the production of Hibernia unless they were assured as to the price they would be able to get for that production. There is nothing in the National Energy Program that provides any specific price for the oil that will be produced offshore. We said there would be consideration given to a special reference price, but that price has not been determined as yet and Chevron indicated that they would want to know what price they can expect for their production before they can start it. I find this a very reasonable and understandable position to adopt and I have no quarrel with it.

There is nothing in the National Energy Program that is at variation with this particular concern which they have expressed, and there is nothing in the NEP that prevents Chevron from proceeding with the Hibernia exploration and development. What they need and will require to know is what price they will get. That is what we will be negotiating during the next while.

Mr. Wilson: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The minister did not answer the question I put to him, which was whether he has discussed this matter with Petro-Canada. On Wednesday I asked the minister whether he had discussed the matter of the cancellation of the Syncrude expansion with Petro-Canada, and at that time he said he had not. We are talking here about two very important elements in the future supply of oil for Canada.

My question to the minister is, what is the role of Petro-Canada as a window to the industry? How is the minister utilizing that role of Petro-Canada in coming to conclusions as to how the National Energy Program should be implemented, particularly on this very important question of price for offshore oil?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to Syncrude. I indicated at the time that I had not discussed this particular aspect with the president of Petro-Canada. I am sure that since that time the hon. member has read the statement made by Petro-Canada that it disagrees with the decision taken by the other partners in the case of Syncrude. I think it is a pretty good indication of the sense of national interest by a national company, compared to that of private companies in this particular field.

As far as Hibernia itself is concerned, I have not had discussions yet with Petro-Canada as to what specific price would be required to bring Hibernia into production, except discussions of a very general nature a few months ago. I think first of all we have not had conclusive evidence yet that there will be the possibility of commercial production in Hibernia, although we are quite confident that this will indeed be a very good discovery.

As to the exact price that will be required for the oil, we will have to wait a while and have further discussions with all parties concerned. Petro-Canada will obviously be consulted in that respect. At the present time, however, it is premature to arrive at a specific price proposal. This is a matter that will be negotiated over the next few months. I must remind the hon. member that we are still a few years down the line before we have production out of Hibernia.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, surely the minister knows that before any decision is taken on production and future exploration we must have a better idea of price.

Supplementary to the answers which the minister has given, has Petro-Canada updated its financial projections for 1981 and for future years to reflect the impact of the National Energy Program on its exploration, development and production activities in western Canada? If so, would the minister advise the House as to the conclusions reached? Many private sector companies have done this and we are seeing large drops in cash flows proposed by these companies as a result of the National Energy Program. What is the position of Petro-Canada in the same area?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I will be very happy to provide the hon. member with the exact figures he has requested, and I will obtain them from Petro-Canada. However, I can draw to his attention that another Canadian company, Husky Oil, announced yesterday that it was not going to decrease its exploration budget this year but increase it. I can say that the Canadian government has approved an exploration budget for Petro-Canada for the coming year which is substantially increased over what it was before. There is every reason to believe that there will be more exploration, not less, carried out by Petro-Canada in 1981.

As to the specific figure requested by the hon. member as to how much exploration will take place in western Canada, I will obtain that from Petro-Canada. I have only the global figure with me now for exploration for the whole of Canada, including the offshore.

ALLEGED DELAYS IN TAR SANDS PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the minister recognize that the national energy policy and the lack of an agreement with Alberta is delaying virtually every tar sands project in northeastern Alberta? I am referring to the Alsands, Cold Lake, and more recently the Syncrude expansion and Suncor project being in jeopardy. Does the minister realize that the province must proceed with other projects to keep the economy in Alberta vitalized?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have to disagree with the statement that the National Energy Program is delaying the tar sands project, but I have to agree with the hon. member that the lack of an agreement with the province of Alberta is delaying those projects at the present time.

Mr. Wilson: You are not listening, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: We have made several proposals to get those tar sands projects proceeding, but Alberta refuses to negotiate any arrangement which would settle the question of the tar sands project independently from all of the other aspects of the energy discussions.

In that respect, I must say that I find it rather strange for a Canadian, and an Alberta minister in particular, to declare, as reported in The Globe and Mail yesterday, that Alberta decided to block approval of new oil sands plants mainly because their construction would have provided jobs for people mostly from outside Alberta. I find that passing strange.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I think the minister knows full well—and again it is the half truths that he is using—that he has not tried very diligently to get an agreement with Alberta. Recognizing that this is happening, that the lack of an energy agreement is there and that the national energy policy is delaying these projects from going ahead, will the minister be prepared in two or three years' time to cope with the strain on social services and the social injustices that will occur in Alberta? When he recognizes that his oil policy is a crock, he will have to change it and all these programs will be going at one time. What does the minister intend to do about the increased crime which will result from the overstraining of the economy of Alberta? What does the minister intend to do about the strain on the divorce rate, the strain on schools, hospitals and on all social services in Alberta? I have lived through this and I know what I am talking about. What is the minister prepared to do about those things?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am afraid there is not much I can do about the divorce rate!

Mr. Lawrence: You are sure?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You cannot do anything about energy either.

Mr. Lalonde: On the other hand, I understand the seriousness of the concern expressed by the hon. member. That is why we have made many attempts to get an agreement with Alberta in order to get these projects ongoing, projects which will benefit northern Alberta in particular, the whole of Alberta and the whole of Canada.

• (1125)

I must say that even after the rejection of our proposal in July by Mr. Lougheed I went back in September and offered him an additional price in respect of the tar sands plants. That offer was again rejected by my colleague in the government of Alberta. I have indicated that we are still ready and willing to discuss the question of the tar sands and heavy oil at Cold Lake separately, if necessary, in order to get those projects proceeding quickly and avoid delaying their construction. Unfortunately I have not been able to obtain any positive reaction from the government of Alberta as yet.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FIGHTING INFLATION

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. It concerns the inflation situation in Canada and the announcement today by Statistics Canada that in 1980 we had the highest annual rate of increase since 1975. Since the minister and the Prime Minister have declared war on inflation and have drafted an army of unemployed in order to fight this war, does he really think it fair to continue conscripting young people, the unskilled, those in eastern and northern Canada into this army, and not others, and does he really think that further restrictions on demand will reduce inflation when this policy has been tried for a number of years and clearly is not working?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the description of a policy by the hon. member does not represent a policy which the Prime Minister or myself support or propose to implement.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, if what I have described is what is going on, then I suggest the minister really has no choice but to recognize that that is exactly the implication of the kinds of policies he has been following. Since analysts in the industry are telling us that high interest rates and restricted supply have been responsible for runaway food prices, which has been one of the main problems facing the average Canadian in the past year, can the minister tell us why the government is continuing policies which, while they are supposed to fight inflation, because they restrict supply are really causing inflation in the food industry?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I disagree with the hon. member's analysis of the statements of the analysts. He is attributing the underlying forces of inflation entirely to higher interest rates. He knows perfectly well that inflation in 1980, during the course of the year we have just completed, arose from a number of factors much more widespread and diversified than high interest rates, including the increasing cost of food imported from abroad, which happens in Canada; higher energy prices arising from international markets and a decison of the Government of Canada to ensure security of supply for this country; bad climatic conditions throughout the world providing for increased prices for grain; and higher meat prices as a result of the normal cycle in that particular industry.

I would ask the hon. member to take a rather broader look at the forces which accounted for inflation in 1980. I would add that probably the higher interest rates we are suffering are more a manifestation of these underlying forces than they are in themselves the driving force behind inflation. I just want to add my analysis to the one the hon. member has given.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, the minister is prepared to allocate responsibility for the problem of inflation in Canada to every actor in the economic scene with the exception of the government and policies which the government itself can control. I find that an abdication of responsibility which in current circumstances is really intolerable.

My final supplementary question is this. The minister has expressed concern on many occasions about the possibility of a wages explosion. I wonder if he could tell us why he is not equally concerned with the ravaging effect that inflation has had on the standard of living of the average Canadian, on wages and on purchasing power; and does he not feel that a cost of living tax credit would do a great deal to show the average Canadian that the government is indeed concerned with the human cost of inflation? Is he concerned with assuring average Canadians that they do not have to seek personal solutions to a social problem but that the government is prepared to play its part in providing a solution to a very real problem for every Canadian?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I disagree with the hon. member's suggestion that the government is not concerned with the impact of inflation on Canadians, particularly on low and middle-income Canadians. One of the first things we did at the beginning of this Parliament was to increase the guaranteed income supplement to help what I consider to be the most needy group in the community. As the hon. member knows, we have a fully indexed old age security system, a guaranteed income supplement which is fully indexed, and the spouse's allowance and the veterans' disability pension also are fully indexed. All of these measures which impact most directly on the most needy are fully protected against changes in the cost of living.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member should take that into account when he asks for an additional cost of living tax credit. I think we have gone a long way in protecting the most affected citizens through the indexing provisions that have been passed and supported by the Parliament of Canada.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

INQUIRY RESPECTING STATUS OF FINANCING AGREEMENT WITH CHRYSLER CANADA

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the latest move by the U.S. government through the U.S. loan guarantee board to give further aid to Chrysler with attached conditions of employment, what is the status of the loan agreement between Chrysler and the Canadian government in view of the cutback of $400 million in investment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that the U.S. loan board has not yet made a definite decision to recommend the issuance of further loan guarantees. The day before yesterday they issued a statement indicating the basis on which they would be prepared to recommend the issuance of loan guarantees involving certain concessions by the parent corporation, the parent corporation's lenders and the UAW.

With respect to the Canadian situation, we have not agreed to any changes in the agreements we entered into with Chrysler last spring, and that is our position at this time. Earlier this morning I met with the leaders of the Canadian UAW to consult with them as a result of their participation in the discussions with the UAW in the United States. Now that I have had this consultation, I will be prepared to meet with the Chrysler Canada people, but our position is that we have an agreement with them and we have not agreed to any changes in it.

Mr. Kempling: I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Several Canadian parts suppliers are being asked to reduce prices, to hold prices at current levels, or carry Chrysler's account until other financial arrangements can be made. Where do they stand in any renegotiation of the loan agreement? Will the government seek to get assurances from Chrysler for Canadian businessmen who are assisting, at great risk and with no compensation? Will they get some protection?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I understand that the Chrysler Corporation in the United States is asking for concessions from its suppliers in that country. So far as I am aware, although I can check into it, none of the arrangements that are being contemplated by the U.S. authorities on the basis of which they may extend further loan guarantees involves protection for U.S. suppliers. But this is an aspect that I can certainly look into with respect to the Canadian situation.

AGRICULTURE

INCOMES OF FARMERS—INCREASED COST OF FOOD

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It deals with the increased price of food. The over-all increase in the cost of living index is 11.2 per cent but the rise in the price of food for home consumption is 14.8 per cent. My question to the minister is this. Since the minister has repeatedly stated that farmers' income remains static and is even declining, I should like to ask him how he squares this with the 14.8 per cent increase in the price of food, taking into account the fact that farmers' income is steadily decreasing?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member is getting his information. The income of farmers who are efficient, productive and well organized is not going down steadily. Statistics show that farmers' income is perhaps not exactly keeping pace with incomes in some other sectors of society, but farmers' income is still in the net profit position. I stand by what I said earlier that the agricultural industry in Canada is one of the healthiest in the world, and it is in one of its healthiest stages ever in Canada.

ALLEGED PROMISE TO CONTROL INTEREST RATES

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask him what has happened to his grandiose promises of a year ago to bring high interest rates under control as a means of stemming runaway inflation and stimulating our economy, having in mind the effect that interest rates are having on farmers, on the small business community and on the cost of the food basket, and in view of his budget prediction of a 9.7 per cent rate of inflation for this year which has now surpassed 11 per cent.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks what happened to the promise which I made. I want to remind him that I did not make any promises with respect to interest rates because I realized at the time when this phenomenon occurred that it was probably a very difficult problem to solve quickly because it is the result of underlying inflationary forces. I do not think we are going to get interest rates down to the level we would like until we get inflation down, and that will take some time. I have said that in the past and I intend to repeat it in the House of Commons and elsewhere.

COMBINES

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO DEAL WITH RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES AND PRICE GOUGING

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but first I would like to suggest to the Deputy Prime Minister some other techniques for reducing inflation. As we know, the high inflation costs reported today are partly due to the price of energy. I should like to suggest that some major oil companies have contributed substantially to inflation by restrictive trade practices and price gouging. The department's answer to this over a few months has been that they have conducted a seven year investigation into the industry and into these practices, that the minister has promised to report the results of the investigation in July, in September and in December, but we have heard nothing as yet. It has dragged on and on and more and more promises are being made. Another investigation is promised, but no action is taken. When will the minister give us some action instead of promises and instead of more investigation? When will we get action to deal with these restrictive trade practices and gouging?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that the Director of Investigation's report has now been completed. It is now being printed and translated and should be published in early February.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, this goes further than just reporting. The profits of the oil companies have increased up to 65 per cent in the first nine months of last year. Eastern refiners are looking at roughly a 100 per cent increase on their income margins, while U.S. producers have profits less than half of ours. I think that some of the problems have to do with the failure of the government to place before the House competition legislation which will work, as well as the failure of the minister to act vigorously in this area. Would he indicate to the House when that legislation will be placed before the House? I urge him to place it before the House early so that we can have a look at it.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I have already indicated on several occasions that I want to make amendments to the competition legislation. The relevant bill is now on the drafting board, and when it is placed before the House, I hope it will have the support not only of the hon. member who has just asked the question, but also of all our hon. colleagues, and thus quickly become law.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED—SERVICES OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The president of Eldorado Nuclear Limited told the Public Accounts Committee recently that his company intends to dispense with the services of the Auditor General as auditor of that Crown corporation. Knowing what a blow this will be to the principle of comprehensive auditing and to the principle that more, not fewer, Crown corporations should be audited by the Auditor General, will the minister tell the House if he has any intention to use his position to prevent the Crown corporation from firing the Auditor General?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, those decisions are made by the Crown corporations themselves and their boards of directors. Many Crown corporations have auditors other than the Auditor General, who come from the private sector. I am aware that Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. made such a decision, but to have both an auditor from the private sector and the Auditor General for this year. However, in due course it would like to have someone from the private sector as auditor like a large number of other Crown corporations. I fail to see anything wrong with having an auditor from the private sector. The question surprises me all the more as it comes from the party of the hon. member which is always so concerned about expanding the public sector, especially in the oil industry.

[English]

Mr. Clarke: Madam Speaker, the minister knows that the Crown corporation cannot take this action on its own and is not capable of making that kind of decision. I am asking the minister specifically about order in council PC-1980-3127 which replaces the Auditor General as the auditor of Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. and makes no mention of any outside auditor. Is the minister saying that this order in council is revoked and, if so, what is the replacement for it?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I should appreciate the hon. member sending me a copy of the order in council in question. I know one has been passed. The decision of the government merely confirmed that of Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. to the effect that, in 1981, the Auditor General of Canada and an auditor from the private sector would work together, or side by side, in auditing Eldorado's books.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MOZAMBIQUE—INCARCERATION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS—ACTION TAKEN BY UNITED STATES EMBASSY

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question should be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister, who will know that last week Canadians, including a renowned Canadian author and columnist, Barbara Amiel, were incarcerated in the Mashava prison in Mozambique during which time Miss Amiel almost expired as a consequence of contracting tropical diseases. Having regard to the fact that both Canadians were incarcerated without just cause by the government of that country, has the Government of Canada sent a stern note of protest to the government of Mozambique for the harsh and uncivilized treatment accorded Canadian citizens?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, seeing the Secretary of State for External Affairs is absent, I shall take notice of the question of the hon. member and convey his views and suggestions to the secretary. I shall make sure that the hon. member gets a reply as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Gamble: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. We know that the two Canadians to whom I made reference were released as a consequence of efforts made by officers of the United States embassy in Mozambique. We also know that when Canadian embassy officials assisted the government of the United States in securing the release of some members of its embassy in Tehran, the United States was very rapid in responding with a note of considerable thanks to the government of this country. Has Canada followed that same practice, and has it in fact thanked the government of the United States for the efforts of its officials?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in light of my answer to the previous question, it is obvious that I cannot say more, and there can be no question of a speed contest in that field if the United States were fast in thanking us for our action in Iran.

Are we as fast as they are in extending our appreciation in other circumstances? I told the hon. member that the subject is important, that his questions were serious, that his suggestion was very worth while and that I will raise the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the earliest opportunity and the hon. member will have a reply as soon as possible.

PROGRAMMING—USE OF RERUNS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Communications, who indicated yesterday his support of the concept of CBC-2, Télé-2, which the president of CBC has described as a network mainly of reruns of material run on tbe basic CBC service, Could the minister explain why he favours a concept of reruns, which has limited benefit to the television and film industry in Canada, over increasing Canadian productions on the basic service, which has direct benefits to the television and film industry in Canada?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was either not in the House yesterday afternoon or did not read the blues to find out exactly what I said because she is not interpreting my comments correctly. What I am basically interested in as Minister of Communications, as I believe are most people in the cultural community in Canada, is an extension of Canadian programming facilities and a greater amount of Canadian quality program production in this country.

When the hon. member speaks about CBC-2, I believe she takes CBC-2 in isolation from the general thrust of the government in this area. Our first priority at the moment is extension of services to northern and remote communities. Yesterday morning the new CTV service to the north was inaugurated through the co-operation of the CTV network and the CBC by using the CBC House of Commons network, which soon will be giving some 60 hours a week of new services to northern remote communities. Probably within the next two weeks TVA will also be using the Anik 3 satellite in another wrap-around system with the House of Commons proceedings, which will mean additional French language network services available on satellite in this country.

Second, I have also indicated my complete agreement with the CRTC's position of extending services throughout Canada and having a greater number of Canadian programs available throughout this country. I fully expect that through the CRTC hearings, which are to begin on February 9, on extension of services within the next six months we will have in this country new multi-channel services available via satellite, providing Canadian programming throughout all parts of the country. I think these are very important initiatives indeed.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Communications who, in spite of his lengthy statement, did not answer my question. My point is that we do not need a second network to bicycle replays and retreads. We can video-cassette them or buy video discs; we do not need a second network.

To be specific, the president of the CBC has told House of Commons committees and has already indicated publicly that, of the half billion dollar budget of the CBC, only $18 million is spent on private production. Why does the minister not direct the CBC to use the $30 million it is seeking for CBC-2, Télé-2, to increase the level of Canadian production on the basic service?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid I have to ask the minister to be brief.

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, what I was trying to point out to the hon. member was that what we are interested in is a much greater number of Canadian program productions done in this country, partly through the CBC and partly through the private sector. Hopefully the CRTC, which shares these types of objectives, will come up with the best way possible of doing so. We are interested in seeing an increase in program production by the independent program production sector in this country. The CBC increased its budget in that regard over the past few years. I know the president of the CBC is indeed interested in having additional program production material done by the private sector in Canada.

INQUIRY WHETHER OFFER MADE TO PURCHASE PETROFINA

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I believe he is the proud holder of a Petro-Canada credit card. Can he deny or confirm that Petro-Canada has made a purchase offer to Petrofina? If not, can he tell us whether eastern Canadians will be given the opportunity of buying gas from their own company, in the near future I hope?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Indeed, Madam Speaker, I am very proud to have a Petro-Canada credit card, but I would certainly like to be able to use it in Petro-Canada service stations in eastern Canada as Canadians already do out west. I know that a great many Canadians share my feelings. I am not aware of any approach made by Petro-Canada to Petrofina in recent months. I hope, however, that our over-all program announcing the acquisition of foreign companies will enable it to be possible in 1981 for Petro-Canada to buy out at least one, two or three foreign companies with a view to enhancing Canadian ownership in that sector.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

EXPENDITURE ON PROPOSED TERMINAL AT PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that apparently the Minister of Agriculture has either forsaken the farmer or does not understand economics, I should like to ask a question of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Minister of Agriculture stated that farm income is up and he thereby equated it with increased net income, which is not the case because net farm income is down.

Could the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board tell the House about, or table the details of, the $100 million expenditure by the Canadian Wheat Board for the Prince Rupert terminal?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Prince Rupert terminal will be the creation of a consortium in which a number of companies and pools are taking part. The federal government is contributing to it by way of a $22 million appropriation for facilities. I really do not see what is the issue because my information is that all of this is being processed now in a very satisfactory fashion.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, I just cannot understand how a member of cabinet fails to realize that there has been a suggestion by the Canadian Wheat Board that it will spend $100 million of grain growers' money, money which they cannot afford because of the programs of the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell us what this money will be used for and how it will be expended?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, my information is that the Canadian Wheat Board is not a member of the consortium at Prince Rupert. Occasionally I have seen reference to the need for surge capacity, but no decision has been made on that particular issue.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALICE ARM, B.C.—GRANT OF DUMPING PERMIT TO AMAX—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO CIRCUMSTANCES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. I am sure the minister is aware of the special dumping permit of Amax Limited which has been given to no other mine in Canada. It was granted during the 1979 federal election, unknown to the House. Until September 12, 1980, John Aird was on the board of Amax. On September 15, 1980, he became the lieutenant-governor of Ontario. His connections with the federal Liberal party are well-known.

Was there any direct or indirect communication of any kind between John Aird and members of cabinet or their staff regarding the permit for Amax Limited at Alice Arm?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have no knowledge of that, and I will make inquiries.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, yesterday in Vancouver the Nishga leaders, along with Archbishop Edward Scott, met with Amax. Church leaders in Canada, including Bishop Remi De Roo and the archbishop of the Anglican Church of Canada representing millions of Canadians, the British Columbia Federation of Labour, the Building Trades Council and the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union representing affected workers, along with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, are on record now as supporting a review, including a public inquiry. We in this House have been stalled since April of last year.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister rise in his place on this occasion and show some leadership by calling for a public inquiry? If not, will he inform members of the House and millions of Canadians that he will make an announcement in the House next week regarding a full public inquiry?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I will have the representations of the hon. member considered and will give him an answer as soon as possible.

PETRO-CANADA

STATEMENT OF OFFICIAL ON OFFSHORE OIL PRODUCTION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be kind enough to assist me in what appears to be an anomaly? I understood him to say, in answer to a question from my colleague, that it was premature to set a price for oil production on the east coast. Yesterday it was interesting to see one of the officials of Petro-Canada, the group vice-president for the east coast, reported as saying the following:

> —the oil industry needs to know what the price of the oil is going to be before offshore production can proceed. There is no point in the government saying to the oil industry: "Go find the oil, and then we will decide what the price will be." That's totally backwards.

He went on to say:

> A price needs to be set that will be close to or at world price if we are going to see these extremely expensive offshore developments take place.

Has the minister of energy been in touch with Petro-Canada? What is the basis for this apparent disagreement between the government's petroleum corporation and his own statements in the House?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must have misunderstood what I said at the time. I have no disagreement with the notion that the price must be set before production starts. We know that production in this field is several years down the line. Supposedly the member quoted a vice-president of Petro-Canada. I thought he was referring to the vice-president of Chevron, but even if he is a vice-president of Petro-Canada, I have no quarrel with the argument that there must be a decision on price. What the price will be is a matter which is being examined and will be decided in plenty of time for the necessary expenditures to be incurred for production purposes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could assist me with respect to another comment of Mr. Meneley, the same Petro-Canada official. In a headline story which appeared in the January 14 edition of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, he is quoted as saying that oil exploration will decline in 1981. In one article he is reported as saying that it will decline because of "an extremely serious worldwide shortage of oil rigs" which "continues to plague companies exploring off the east coast". He agrees with Mobil Oil Canada and Petro-Canada officials in this respect. Then in the same newspaper he says that oil industry production "in 1981 will likely decline because of . . . political pressure to try to change the National Energy Program". These are direct quotes of Meneley.

Does the minister not see the contradiction? On the one hand this Petro-Canada official is saying that "political pressure" will stop east coast oil production. On the other hand he is saying that there is a "worldwide shortage of oil rigs". Does the minister agree that these contradictory statements of an official of PetroCan, who appears to be taking a very high political profile in this important industry on the east coast, are not in the best interests of the east coast?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lalonde: I disagree with the hon. member, Madam Speaker.

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—ESTABLISHMENT OF SHORT-TERM STUDY—REPORTED LOBBY BY FOOD PROCESSORS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I would like to ask him whether he can inform the House how close the government is to establishing a short-term study, which has been talked about, in terms of the resolution of the Crowsnest Pass rates.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think quite close. It is not as early as I would like it but it is quite close. The main subject will be the creation of a task force, which would go into the subject and try to develop a consensus, which has already progressed quite substantially in western Canada.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, statements in the press have indicated that a lobby by eastern food processors has been a major stumbling block in terms of the government's resolution as to what direction they should go. Can the minister comment on this and either confirm or deny these particular reports?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am sure the interests of the eastern feeders and cattle people, as opposed to the interests of the western cattlemen, will be brought up in the discussion which is to take place soon among members of the cabinet. That will be but one factor among many others.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND TO PROVIDE BORROWING AUTHORITY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, yesterday I sent you a note indicating my intention to rise on a point of order today in respect to the commencement of the second reading of Bill C-54. The basis for my point of order is that this bill is out of order as currently constituted, by my reading of the rules and the precedents. In particular, Madam Speaker, I refer you, and the members of the House, to Standing Order 60(11), which states:

The adoption of any ways and means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

I underline the words "based on the provisions of any such motion."

Examination of Bill C-54 indicates that part I of the bill, consisting of the first two clauses, is defined as borrowing authority. Indeed, the first clause cites this part as a borrowing authority act, which is clearly out of the ambit of the ways and means motion passed by this House earlier this week, on January 13. It is clearly in violation of Standing Order 60(11), which states that bills must be based on the provisions of any such motion.

Previous speakers have been called upon from time to time to adjudicate points of order based on this Standing Order. These have resulted in precedents, the consequences of which are given in our bible, if you will, of parliamentary procedure, Beauchesne's. In that regard, Madam Speaker, I refer you to section 518 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne's, page 175. Section 518(1) says:

A bill, related to a ways and means resolution, must be based on, but need not be identical with, the resolution. The taxing power of the Crown is limited by such resolutions, but relatively minor widening of exemptions from taxation may be allowed.

Then reference is made to Journals, December 18, 1974, page 224. That is a decision by one of your predecessors, Madam Speaker, the Hon. James Jerome. At that time his decision was to disallow the point of order raised. In that decision he said:

Finally, the most desirable practice is for the bill to adhere strictly to the provisions of the motion, and departures, if any, ought to be the subject of the strictest interpretation.

So it is quite clear what the Speaker of the House had in mind at that time.

The second paragraph of section 518 of Beauchesne's fifth edition reads as follows:

The most desirable practice is for the bill to adhere strictly to the provisions of the resolution, and departures if any, ought to be subject to the strictest interpretation.

Then paragraph (2) makes reference to decisions of previous Speakers which gave rise to the precedent stated in that section.

It might also be worth while, Madam Speaker, to refer to Erskine May's nineteenth edition, page 790, wherein it states:

If any provisions of a bill are found to go beyond the resolutions on which the bill is founded, further resolutions must be passed before those provisions are considered in committee on the bill, or the bill must be amended so as to conform to the resolutions to which the House has agreed.

Quite clearly, Erskine May establishes that the bill must conform rigorously to the ways and means motion upon which the bill is founded and, as I indicated, a ways and means motion is an order to bring in a bill based on that motion and nothing further.

In presenting argument to this it may be that the government will cite as an example Bill C-11 of 1977, which was brought in by a previous Liberal government. In this bill a borrowing authority was combined with an income tax act. At that point in time no point of order was raised, simply because it was not recognized for what it was, namely, an out of order presentation. I would submit that the fact we may have violated the Standing Orders of the House on that occasion does not mean we are therefore to violate the Standing Orders of the House on every other occasion in any future development. It is also interesting to note that the successor government, the Progessive Conservative government in 1979, did not attempt to resort to that tactic of combining the two but, in fact, had a separate borrowing authority bill, in keeping with our previous practices. They also had a separate income tax bill.

It is hardly necessary for me to state, Madam Speaker, and I think it is self-evident, that the rationale for the precedents as summarized in Beauchesne and the precedents established by previous Speakers, is that should this become an accepted practice of attaching onto bills other items which are based on ways and means motions, which have only a tenuous association, then surely we would be establishing a precedent for venturing into, in a very major way, the way in which this legislature treats legislation proffered by the executive.

Such a major step in this direction is something which should be very carefully considered and something which should not be allowed to happen merely as a result of an understandable interest on the part of the government which is attempting to group together pieces of legislation in an attempt to get as much through as possible with as limited exposure as possible. I suggest that we treat this point of order seriously. It is not raised in a frivolous attempt to try to disrupt the government's legislative program.

Both sections of the bill, the borrowing authority and the Income Tax Act, are deserving of the most careful treatment by this House. We are not approaching this point of order from the point of view of trying to employ procedural arguments with regard to the substance of this legislation. It is a procedural argument which we believe goes to the fundamental operation of this House. We feel that if this situation is allowed to proceed unchallenged, or if perhaps it is found to be in order, then we would be venturing onto very dangerous ground.

We strongly recommend to you, Madam Speaker, that careful consideration be given to the decisions of your predecessors and to the citations in Beauchesne's, and we feel confident that in fact this legislation, as it has been presented, is out of order and that it is up to the government to make the necessary amendments.

Mr. Lambert: Madam Speaker, this is one more incident since 1970 in which we face the problem of a bill being introduced following the acceptance of the ways and means motion which differs in a material way from the ways and means motion. In the original instance it involved the so called income tax reform bill, and many more such instances have occurred. Mr. Speaker of the day did not judge that he would have to examine a three inch thick bill to determine the differences. I pointed out to him that I had counted, on preliminary examination, some 39 such instances. I will say that there was the distinction that since the government was able to introduce major amendments under those circumstances I was, therefore, as a private member, able to do so as well. That is the rationale of the 1970 decision, and Mr. Speaker did allow me to introduce amendments.

Subsequently, there was the question relating to some excise tax legislation of whether a bill had to conform strictly. That is not so. Generally—and the word is "generally"—there may be a change of wording and there may be—

—as the saying goes in English, one can dot one's i's and cross one's t's and add a few commas—

[English]

—but there cannot be any material extension in the scope of the bill. The procedure, as you well know, Madam Speaker, is that at the time of the presentation of the budget by a minister of finance, the ways and means motions are tabled. Subsequently, as is indicated in Beauchesne's fifth edition at page 175, the second paragraph of clause 517:

A minister of the Crown designates a day for consideration of the ways and means motion under the terms of S.O. 60(2).

And that has happened. Paragraph (3) goes on to say:

On the designated day, the ways and means motion is decided upon without debate or amendment.

And that would refer to the ways and means motion which appears in the Votes and Proceedings of Monday, January 12. I can recall the wording which you used, Madam Speaker, in so designating that motion. You said that if the ways and means motion is put and the House accepts it, then the minister has leave and the first printing is so ordered of the bill dealing with the ways and means motion.

But here is where we part company because Bill C-54 is an omnibus bill. It has two parts and is not the case where the ways and means motion is contained solely in the bill. It says that a bill will be introduced based upon the ways and means motion. As I look at Bill C-54, I see that the first portion deals with borrowing authority. If it is permissible to include borrowing authority, then the bill concerning income tax could be part of an omnibus bill with five or six subjects attached, and the subjects need not be generally related.

As we have learned from past experience, the government can choose to, shall we say, stitch together a number of bills or, in one bill stitch together a number of matters which are clearly compartmentalized and which amend certain legislation. This I believe was not meant to be.

I was a member of the procedure committee in 1968-1969 which brought in this change in the rules. I know that the subsequent minister of finance, Mr. Macdonald, who was also the government House leader, was the chief protagonist of the changes in the rules. It was clearly indicated that in order to facilitate a minister of finance in presenting the ways and means motion, this could be presented not only at budget time but at some other occasion, and since the motion would not be debated but merely voted upon, that there was the authority to bring in a bill based on the ways and means motion. At no time has anything been said to the effect that the borrowing authority provisions would be a part of this bill.

That is the practice to which my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), and I are objecting. It should not be. The bill should deal with income tax and income tax related matters, because there is also in the ways and means motion a clause to amend income tax application rule 71, and that is perfectly in order. But to include the other portion is totally and utterly wrong.

There is also the possibility that the bill may be considered to be in order. I must address myself to the possibility that the Chair will find that my colleague and I have not made our point. I refer the House to the debate on the borrowing authority bill which took place in the fall of 1979 when, for I do not know how many days, the House was consumed in reviewing interest rates, housing, and every damned thing conceivable because, somehow or other, the Chair felt that there was a thread running through the debate. Therefore, in dealing with an income tax bill in Committee of the Whole, we could have a general economic debate.

There is another point. The rules have never foreseen that provisions with regard to borrowing authority should be considered in Committee of the Whole. That part in itself cannot be considered in Committee of the Whole without the unanimous consent of the House, so I think the government has placed itself in a dilemma in regard to this matter. I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that the question really is not open, although it can be contemplated.

• (1220)

If you look at the intent of Standing Order 61, the points made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, the rulings of Mr. Speaker Jerome in considering these matters, as well as the remarks of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, and also the arguments by the former member for Peace River, Mr. Baldwin, and myself, I suggest that you will rule in our favour and that that portion of the bill dealing with borrowing authority will have to be excised.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on the point of order raised by members of the opposition.

I believe that the government is proceeding correctly and on the basis of precedent in seeking authority to borrow as part of an income tax bill. You will realize, Madam Speaker, that the Financial Administration Act provides that statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament to permit the government to increase its outstanding debt. That is the law.

Up until 1975 it was usual to tack on a request for borrowing authority to a supply bill. That was the practice. For the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) to say that it is not possible to deal with borrowing authority in Committee of the Whole, asks us to recall the practice that must have prevailed when, on supply, the Committee of the Whole usually dealt with the items of supply and with the supply bills. Of course, at a certain point we changed the rules to provide that the Committee of the Whole would not deal with supply in the usual way. That is a side argument made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, that would have to be examined in the light of the practice that must have prevailed when the borrowing authority requests were dealt with in the committee on supply. I do not know what difference in principle would exist in terms of Committee of the Whole that would deal with this particular bill.

The main point is that up until 1975 the request for borrowing authority was tacked on to a supply bill. Mr. Speaker changed that because it was true that in certain circumstances it would not be possible for the House to debate that request for supply. It was only because there was no opportunity for debate that the ruling was made. Subsequently the practice was continued of tacking it on to supply bills, with the understanding that there would be one day's debate. This was provided for.

In 1979 another practice was introduced. The borrowing authority was sought by adding a clause to the income tax bill, to amend the Income Tax Act. That was accepted; there was no difficulty; no point of order, and it was regarded as appropriate.

It is true that the former minister of finance and myself did introduce separate borrowing authority bills, and I think quite appropriately in those circumstances, because neither of us, in seeking very large borrowing, had produced a budget. That was quite a different circumstance. To ask the House to provide the borrowing authority before a budget plan had been produced might have been procedurally correct through some other method, but certainly it was sound to provide separate bills. These are the only two exceptions.

It was open to me in this particular case to select a number of options. It occurred to me that this would be the most appropriate option because the request for borrowing authority flowed from the budget statement. The income tax changes flowed from the budget and the economic statement of April, and the former budget. They were all part of the same general framework.

The only objection that was ever taken and upon which the ruling of the Speaker was based in 1975, was that no opportunity was given for debate in the House on the request for borrowing authority.

In the case at hand there will be full opportunity to debate on second reading the request for borrowing authority and to provide the House with an opportunity to relate that borrowing request with the over-all economic strategy of the government and with the income tax changes. It will be possible for the House to debate fully in Committee of the Whole the request for borrowing authority and all other matters, and it will be possible for the House to debate it at third reading. Certainly no parliamentary protocol or no parliamentary principle has been violated. In fact we are providing full opportunity for debate for all these matters in Committee of the Whole and on second and third reading, with the Speaker in the chair. We are solidly anchored on the precedent of 1977 when the borrowing authority was attached to an income tax bill and when no exception at all was taken.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I suggest that to cite the ruling of Mr. Speaker in 1975 is irrelevant in this particular case because the objection taken was that there was no opportunity to debate in the whole House. In this case we are providing opportunity to debate on second reading, third reading, and in Committee of the Whole. A ruling in that particular instance does not seem to be relevant to this case. The House is being given the opportunity to debate fully, in an integrated way, the over-all budget package through this method.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, obviously this is a technical point but I agree with my friends in the Conservative party that it is an important one.

May I say at the outset that my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has argued quite often that the whole question of the borrowing authority should be considered as an integral part of the debate on budgetary and financial policy. In that sense, at least in principle, he agrees, and I agree, with the contention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that the whole budget debate should take place more or less at the same time.

Even so, we do recognize in this place that we should follow the rules that we set down. Indeed, the rule about a bill based on a ways and means resolution is that that bill should be based on that resolution and should deal only with the matters in that resolution.

I point out, in an effort to harmonize these two positions, that when the Minister of Finance makes a budget presentation, and a vote in support of the general principles of the government's financial policy has been taken, that comes to us not just in one bill but comes already in two or three bills, a bill to amend the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Tariff Act, and maybe others.

It would seem to me that all that would flow from this point of order, if Your Honour agrees with the point that has been raised, would be that the borrowing authority ought to be in a separate bill. In other words, as the result of a budget presentation by the Minister of Finance that dealt with all of these matters, we would have not just three bills, but four bills.

I make this other point, namely, that one of the rules around here is that nothing can be done without notice. That is why we have motions under Standing Order 43 every day to try, by unanimous consent, to put propositions before the House for which there is no opportunity to give notice. But there has to be notice of any government bill.

In this case we had no prior notice that there would be a bill including the borrowing authority. The indication was that there would be a bill based on the income tax resolution adopted as a ways and means proposition. It was only when Your Honour read out the title of the bill that we got the words "an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds". I suppose in the title was the indication as to what was to be in the bill, but there had been no notice of that, not even an attempt to do it under Standing Order 43. It seems to me that if the government proposes to bring before Parliament, out of the budget presentation, changes in the Income Tax Act, changes in the Excise Tax Act, changes in the Customs Tariff Act, and something regarding a borrowing authority, there should be a proper procedural basis for all four of those elements.

The accepted procedural basis for the first three, the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Customs Tariff Act, is a ways and means resolution. At the same time the government could have put on the order paper a notice of motion of a bill to provide for the borrowing authority. I think it is in those terms that the House might think and Your Honour might consider the whole matter.

As must be obvious, I fully agree with the contention of my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, that these things should be considered together, but surely we must follow the rules at the same time. I noted that when the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) raised the point, he treated it as a serious procedural point, not as an attempt to delay the business of the House. I would imagine that if Your Honour feels that you must reserve on the ruling, that we would agree we might still go ahead with the debate on second reading of the bill, subject to Your Honour's decision on this important point, simply as to whether the borrowing authority should be in one of the three ways and means bills or whether it should be a bill by itself, but introduced at the same time.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, if you hold that the borrowing authority is correctly in the bill, then it seems to me you have created a conundrum of having a bill before us for which notice has not been given. We are entitled to ask the question flowing from what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said, namely, where does this borrowing authority come from? Notice of ways and means substitutes for notice of motion. But if you hold to the argument that the borrowing authority has no place in a ways and means motion, then you have a borrowing bill before the House which has not conformed to the regular notice required under the rules of the House. I would just put that to Your Honour as a very important argument.

My other point is with respect to what was said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The fact that something like this has slipped through once does not constitute a precedent. I would submit to Your Honour that in this particular instance two wrongs do not make a right.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Allow me to make a few comments, Madam Speaker. Strange as it may seem, yesterday we were censored for breaking with tradition but today, to support their argument they are quite prepared to disregard a precedent which was clearly established in 1977. It is important to recall that. What I respectfully want to bring to your attention, Madam Speaker, is the fact that the Standing Order which refers to the way taxes are to be levied in Canada is relatively limited. It is Standing Order 60. Sections 1 and 11 of that order which have to do with our problem and all the other sections, except perhaps section 2, refer to the budget, the budget speech and the budget debate. So when a government wants to levy taxes, contrary to the practice applicable to all other bills it has to table a ways and means motion and, of course, the ensuing bill must faithfully reflect the ways and means motion. And that is the whole extent of the very limited rules we must follow. The significant aspect in this case, in the ruling you have to make, is the fact that first of all it is not written anywhere, there is absolutely no order, no specific rule which states that the borrowing authority cannot originate from a bill to amend the income tax legislation. That is a fact, it is not mentioned anywhere. My colleagues opposite maintain that the borrowing authority should not be part and parcel of the bill but, Madam Speaker, they cannot tell you that it goes against the Standing Orders because it says so at a given page, in a given section. Nothing anywhere stipulates that it cannot be done. So that is the first basic and significant point—it is not forbidden.

When there is no rule to enlighten us we examine parliamentary practices. And as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) so aptly put it a few moments ago, according to parliamentary practice until 1975—I will not give more details, I will not repeat everything that has been said—the borrowing authority was found in supply bills. One day in 1975 a ruling was made by Mr. Speaker, I have it here as reported on page 924 of the Journals of the House of Commons for December 9, 1975, where Mr. Speaker said after a point of order had been raised, I will ask that the section having to do with the borrowing authority be taken out of the supply bill, but not a bill such as this one to amend the income tax legislation because, in keeping with our parliamentary practice and the Standing Orders, the supply bill is adopted without debate at the very end of a supply period. As pointed out by the Minister of Finance, hon. members would have no opportunity to debate the issue of borrowing authority. I will read the ruling because it is fundamental to demonstrate to what extent it cannot apply in this case since there is plenty of time for debate. I am still quoting from page 924 of the Journals of the House of Commons:

[English]

I would therefore suggest at this stage, when the supply bill is about to go through all stages before this Parliament without debate or without amendment, that in my view it can only go forward through that sort of process if clause 5 can be stricken from it.

[Translation]

That is the essential part on which the Speaker rested his ruling which did not refer to a case identical to this one but both have something in common because the borrowing authority was provided in a supply bill. The Speaker had stated that there was no time to debate that aspect and he had thought that in all fairness for hon. members it had to be taken out. That was in 1975. So the practice was dropped but there is another one where an obvious precedent was set in 1977, and here I refer hon. members to page 78 of Journals for November 2, 1977, when Bill C-11 had been introduced by Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Horner. I quote:

[English]

"An act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, was read the first time and ordered to be printed."

And so on.

● (1240)

And my last quotation appears on page 70. This bill including the borrowing authority was finally approved and passed, which creates precedent. It is not, as mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), because it was not consistent with his argument, what he described as a slip or a caper. It happened in our parliamentary system, in our procedure and it had been current practice for years. The borrowing power was related to a supply bill until the Speaker decided that there was not enough time to discuss it. We now have sufficient time to deal with it.

This was explained a while ago by the Minister of Finance. There will be second reading followed by consideration in Committee of the Whole and third reading.

Therefore, while in 1975 the Speaker was justified when he dissociated the borrowing power from a supply bill, that argument is no longer valid today, and secondly, we have the 1977 precedent. Third, no standing order prohibits it. And fourth, it is always important to consider the spirit of a Standing Order.

My colleagues mentioned a while ago that when quoting Beauchesne's fifth edition on page 177, we referred to the relation between the bills and the ways and means resolutions, which must be as close as possible to the ways and means notice of motion.

True, but what is the spirit behind this ruling since we are not told that we cannot include a provision with respect to borrowing powers? What is intended is that all the provisions of a bill relating to income tax, to the levying of a tax or to amendments to the Income Tax Act, be specified in the ways and means motion. If today there were new amendments to the bill introduced on Tuesday, or if there were provisions amending the Income Tax Act not specified in the ways and means motion, then, I would agree. My colleagues would be right, the bill would be different from the ways and means motion. It is in that sense that we should understand the need for the bill to coincide or agree with the ways and means motion. Reference is to the provisions dealing with fiscal measures. There is nothing in our rules to cause us to include any borrowing authority in the ways and means motion, there is nothing in our rules to prevent us from including in a bill amending the Income Tax Act, a borrowing authority authorized under the Financial Administration Act. That must be read in its context. The essential and required concurrence between the bill and the ways and means motion must exist in matters pertaining to fiscal measures, and not in matters pertaining to borrowing authority.

So, the hon. members opposite are right in saying that the bill must agree with the ways and means motion. If one looks at the bill, one sees it does in fact agree with the motion. They do look alike as far as tax provisions are concerned. But there is nothing anywhere to compel us to include any borrowing authority in the ways and means motion because that is not a taxation measure; there is nothing to provide that it should be included in a ways and means motion, and this explains why no reference is made to it in our motion. There is nothing inconsistent in that. And that is the fourth reason why I respectfully submit their argument is not valid. In summary, there is no rule against this, and we must consider the similarity between the notice of a ways and means motion, and the bill in the context and in the spirit of this taxation legislation. There is also the precedent I mentioned as well as the other reason.

Finally, my learned colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised the question of the absence of a prior notice. But there again there are two reasons why his argument does not hold. First, we are bound, by our Standing Orders, to give notice of a bill and not of its contents and provisions. We gave notice of Bill C-54 through the notice of the ways and means motion. We have therefore observed the rules in that respect. We gave notice of the bill, and in no way did we have to give notice of clause 1, clause 5, or chapter three. We gave notice of the bill, and by doing so we observed the rules. That is the first argument.

The second argument—I said there were two but in fact there are three—is to the effect that when the bill was read, when it was introduced, it was then the hon. member learned that the borrowing authority was included in the bill. But there was sufficient notice, Madam Speaker, and as a subsidiary reason I would add, as you said last Tuesday, that this notice was even more generous than what is prescribed by our Standing Orders.

Therefore, as early as last Tuesday, hon. members were made aware, through the introduction of this bill and its title, that the borrowing authority was an integral part of this bill to amend the Income Tax Act. It is therefore a subsidiary argument that I raise, because in reality no one has been prejudiced; this is a procedural argument to which I respond also with a procedural argument. The rules provide that notice must be given of the bill but not of the provisions it contains. So there has been no injustice and the rules have been followed.

The third argument which should settle the matter is that, again in the precedent of 1977, no separate notice was given of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act and to grant the government a borrowing authority.

I refer once again to the precedent with regard to the other matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Notice was given of a ways and means motion, but no separate notice was given for the borrowing authority bill. In parliamentary practice, precedents carry a lot of weight when there are no written rules. They are being invoked today. It will be noted that the argument I have just made is not merely a procedural argument nor merely a point of law.

This is because, essentially, even though we humbly and respectfully submit that we have a good case based on our rules, the precedents and parliamentary spirit, I believe that, in practice, the members of the House are far from being penalized by this procedure. First of all, they were given reasonable notice, second, they will have time to debate this matter, and third, which should please everyone, this will avoid the need for the House to consider separate bills which can be dealt with together, which is not irregular or abnormal and which could perhaps become a more usual practice in the future for combining related provisions. Now why has this been included in this bill? There is a precedent. We have the statutory authority to do so as the Financial Administration Act provides that the borrowing authority must be requested of Parliament. I do not want to repeat all my arguments, Madam Speaker, but parliamentary spirit has been respected, the hon. members are not being deprived of their rights, and the law and precedents give us every justification for the manner in which this bill has been introduced, and that is why I would ask you to dismiss the objections raised by my learned colleagues.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am certain that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) would not want to make any false representations to the House, but when he stated that a bill ensuing from a ways and means motion and including a request for a borrowing authority was introduced in 1977, he said that no notice had been given. Madam Speaker, I would like to quote from the Journals of 1977, on page 70, where we find the following:

> Pursuant to Standing Order 60(11), on motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Horner, Bill C-11, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, was read the first time—

Actually, this was based on a motion which covered both points, that is the amendment to the statute and the authority for the raising of funds. I therefore believe that the case which occurred in 1977 is not the same as the present one.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if I may, I would simply say that I fail to understand what the hon. member is talking about. This does not contradict what I have said. There was a ways and means motion. As I have said, no separate notice was given, and the hon. member has not contradicted what I have been saying.

Madam Speaker: The point of order raised is certainly very important. The arguments of the hon. members have been expressed very seriously, for which I thank them, since it will be very useful to me in making a ruling on this point of order. This point has been raised, as the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) said himself, to ensure that the rules of this House are being followed and not to drag out the debates of the House. I thank them for having acted in this spirit and I also thank all those who took part in the debate. However, this is a complex matter. I shall have to refer to all the precedents which have been quoted and analyse them so as to make a ruling in the best interests of the House of Commons. I shall therefore reserve my ruling on this point of order. In the meantime, I believe that we could proceed with second reading.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am just seeking clarification of your statement. I recognize the desirability of the Chair being precise in your ruling so as not to encumber future legislators with something done in haste. On the other hand, I wonder in respect of the procedure at this point what position we might be in if, for example, we spend the remainder of this day on second reading and the ruling of Your Honour is that this is not in order and that there must be two separate bills, as I believe to be the case. Are we then today debating a borrowing authority bill or are we debating an income tax bill? In my view those are two separate bills which should be based on the Standing Orders of the House. Therefore I wonder what will be the outcome. Will we be called back to repeat the initiation of each of these bills should that be your ruling when it comes down?

Madam Speaker: I think we can proceed to the discussion on second reading of this bill without prejudice to whatever has been said. I will study the matter and rule later on, but I think this can be done. I do not think the House will find itself in an impossible situation should I rule one way or the other. Therefore we will proceed with the second reading.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, Bill C-54 now before the House deals, as we have heard, with borrowing authority and a number of amendments to the Income Tax Act. It thus combines those elements of my recent budget and, in some cases earlier budgets, which are in most urgent need of legislative attention. Because this bill is so closely related to the budget, indeed because it flows from the budget I introduced on October 28, 1980, I should like to take this occasion to mention briefly the economic policy strategy outlined in the budget in the light of economic developments over the last few months. I believe this will assist hon. members in judging certain components in the bill.

As hon. members will recall, the basic economic policy strategy in the budget is to pursue a moderate and carefully balanced policy in a period when Canada, like other national economies, is facing a very difficult economic situation. In my recent budget speech I emphasized the need to deal with the inflationary pressures we are facing, and noted the possibility also of some deterioration on the price front due to more rapid rates of increase in energy and food prices. In fact the developments in recent months indicate that there has been somewhat more pressure on food prices than had been anticipated, related to below average yields of some crops and to lower marketing of hogs and cattle. More generally it seems even more clear now than at the time of the budget that inflation is the most serious and intractable problem facing the Canadian economy.

There have, however, been a number of encouraging developments since the budget. There has been a continued growth in employment, with the rise for the fourth quarter amounting to 1 per cent. In 1980 the proportion of the population with jobs was at a record level of 59.2 per cent. The recent trade figures have also been most gratifying, the balance of trade amounting to $18.7 billion at an annual rate in November, and $11.8 billion at an annual rate over the last three months. Unfortunately the very high levels of short-term interest rates abroad have tended to offset this strong trade performance and thus the Canadian dollar has been under downward pressure in recent months. Nonetheless, the indications are that the fourth quarter has shown moderate strength, and the actual outcome for 1980 as a whole is likely to be stronger than expected in the fall of last year.

In this context the gradualist approach of the budget, relying upon a balanced package of measures to bring down the rate of inflation gradually and promote employment and productivity growth, continues in my opinion to be appropriate and justified. Those who advocate more economic stimulus at this time should realize that such a course must inevitably lead to further aggravation of current inflationary pressure. It would also require abandoning the policy of bringing the size of the government's deficit under control.

At the other extreme there are those who would advocate more restrictive policies. The supporters of such policies must recognize, however, that they imply some combination of increased personal and corporate taxes or Draconian measures to cut government expenditures. Any such expenditure cuts would lead to disruption of important public programs since the growth of total budgetary outlays is already under restraint. Moreover, extreme restrictive policies would have high costs in the form of lost output and higher unemployment. Rather than either extreme, I attempted in my budget to adopt a strategy of gradual deficit reduction. As such it marks a fundamental shift in the stance of fiscal policy.

After 1974 the federal deficit and financial requirements steadily mounted as the government moved to stimulate the economy. Now the government has chartered a more determined anti-inflationary course for fiscal policy. The importance of this has been driven home by the resurgence of inflation. We heard and listened to further evidence on that point during the oral question period. This shift in the direction of fiscal policy should make more funds available for supplying expanding investment. It will thus provide useful support to the government's supply-side initiative.

A major factor bringing about the deficit reduction is the government's commitment to expenditure restraint. The growth rate of spending on total outlays, that is, the sum of budgetary expenditures, loans, investments and advances, is projected to decline from 13.2 per cent in 1980-81 to 12.8 per cent in 1981-82, and to slow to around 10 per cent by 1983-84.

The planned growth in spending is within the trend rate of the gross national product. It will bring the government's share of total outlays in GNP back down to 20.3 per cent by 1983-84, the same share as in 1979-80.

The slowdown in spending growth will be achieved in significant part by removing the burden of financing petroleum compensation payments from the general government revenues and putting it where it belongs. While this burden will be shared by consumers they will still pay less for energy than if we had moved more rapidly to international levels. Inflation will thus be restrained.

The cutback in expenditure growth will also be facilitated by the new expenditure management system under which the government is identifying its priorities within an over-all framework for restraint. With this framework—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister. It being one o'clock. I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

● (1410)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the debate was interrupted at one o'clock, the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) had the floor.

Mr. Knowles: Now he will have a chance to say something.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at one o'clock I was referring to the approach of the government to expenditure restraint. I said that the cutback in expenditure growth will also be facilitated by the new expenditure management system under which the government is identifying its priorities within an over-all framework for restraint. Within this framework there will be, nevertheless, room to finance new initiatives in the priority areas of energy and economic development.

These energy and economic development initiatives are an integrated part of the budget strategy. They represent an innovative supply-side approach to the inflation problem. In the past our tendency to focus too narrowly on demand management policies and our failure to tackle supply problems have contributed to the build-up in inflation. The budget took action to right this balance. Over the next three and a half years, $8.4 billion from new energy taxes has been allocated to help us achieve security of supply and reduce our vulnerability to oil price shocks.

Increased expenditures on economic development over the next three or four years will help bring about renewed growth in productivity and dampen cost increases. The amount of $1.5 billion has been set aside for a major expansion of our activities in such areas as industrial development programs, research and development, export promotion and transportation; $350 million has been set aside to promote industrial restructuring and manpower retraining in areas of particular need. I hope the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) will amplify our intentions in this respect very soon.

In addition, $2 billion has been set aside for western initiatives in areas vital to the growth and diversification of the economies of the western provinces such as western grain handling and prairie water developments. Thus, a grand total of $12 billion has been allocated in the next three years to essential productivity and supply initiatives. This should help to reduce inflationary pressures by increasing supply in Canada, which was one of the major themes struck in the budget presentation.

I should also like to comment briefly on monetary policy. The Bank of Canada's policy of restraining, and over the long run gradually reducing, the rate of growth in the money supply, parallels the budget strategy of gradually reducing the size of the deficit. In recent months the bank's interest rate policy has been directed to limiting the downward pressure on the Canadian dollar, because of the inflationary impact which would result from an excessive decline in our exchange rate. Subject to this constraint, and in the context of the very high levels of interest rates in the United States, the bank has also attempted to limit as much as possible the upward adjustment in Canadian interest rates. This policy reflects the same balanced and moderate approach which is the basis of the economic policy strategy outlined in the budget. As such, it is fully consistent with the government's economic policies, and I should like to reiterate the support given in the budget for the monetary policy pursued by the Bank of Canada.

Let me turn to a brief discussion of some of the other major items in Bill C-54 now before the House. Part I of the bill will provide for borrowing authority in fiscal 1981-82, and part II of the bill reflects various income tax measures arising out of the October 28 budget and those proposed in the fiscal and economic statement presented to the House on last April 21. I might note in passing that although borrowing authority in the last two fiscal years was provided in a separate bill, this was in circumstances in which borrowing authority was being sought before a newly elected government had brought down a budget. In more normal circumstances in the last ten years borrowing authority has either been combined with the income tax bill or with an appropriation act.

The $14 billion of borrowing authority being requested arises from $11 billion financial requirements set out in the budget, plus some allowance for contingencies related to foreign exchange operations. As hon. members will recall, the budget strategy is one of deficit reduction through restraint in the growth rate of our expenditures. The budgetary deficit is expected to decline from $14.2 billion this year to $13.7 billion next year. This is only a modest reduction, but it is a start and is important as a symbol of the strength of our commitment to deficit reduction. Larger declines in the deficit will be required as growth speeds up, with the deficit expected to decline to $11.8 billion in 1983-84.

With rising sources of funds from non-budgetary accounts, financial requirements decline more rapidly than the budgetary deficit. They will decline from $12.2 billion this year to $11 billion next year, reaching $7.2 billion in 1983-84. As a percentage of GNP, the drop is expected to be from 4.3 per cent in 1980-81 to 3.5 per cent in 1981-82, and to 1.8 per cent in 1983-84, the lowest since 1974-75.

In recent years most borrowing authority legislation carried a clause which automatically cancelled any unused authority at the end of each fiscal year whether or not new authority has been obtained. In the past when this occurred and new borrowing authority had not yet been passed by Parliament, the government was able to continue with its borrowing program on unused authority obtained in earlier years which was not subject to automatic cancellation. Since it was not always possible to foresee when Parliament would be sitting or what the parliamentary legislative calendar might be, these old borrowing authorities provided a useful degree of flexibility. During the first four months of the current fiscal year, however, almost all of this non-lapsed borrowing authority was used up. To provide some degree of flexibility in the future, the legislation proposes to exempt $3 billion, or whatever amount remains if it is less than $3 billion, from automatic cancellation at the end of fiscal 1981-82.

The $3 billion margin for contingencies being requested is in line with the margin which has been provided in recent years. The financial requirements for 1981-82 to which I have referred exclude requirements for foreign exchange transactions. There are major uncertainties arising from foreign exchange transactions, since either a major weakening or a major strengthening of the exchange rate would have an impact on the borrowing requirement. If the Canadian dollar were to be strong, then the government would have to raise more Canadian dollars to purchase foreign exchange. On the other hand the Canadian dollar could be weak, and the government would then be faced with the need to borrow foreign currencies.

The clause referring to the ability of the government to borrow and repay loans in foreign currencies is a technical one and is similar to a clause which was first included in a borrowing authority request introduced by the former government in 1979. Over the years Canada has borrowed and repaid funds in a number of currencies. However, in 1978 Canada made a number of large foreign loans and established standby lines of credit with a number of foreign banks. The clause was added to confirm Canada's right to borrow in foreign currencies.

The Financial Administration Act is currently under review, and a clause clarifying the government's ability to borrow and repay in foreign currencies would be included with any amendments to that act. Once such an amendment has been passed there would no longer be a need for this clause in borrowing authority bills.

As a matter of interest to hon. members, I would like to set out the government's debt program so far in the current fiscal year and the amount of borrowing authority which has been used up. Up to January 15, 1981, in domestic markets the government has borrowed a total of $9 billion. Of this amount, $5.3 billion was raised through the issue of marketable bonds and $4.6 billion through the issue of treasury bills, while net Canada Savings Bonds redemptions reduced the amount borrowed by $0.9 billion. In foreign markets, on balance, the government has drawn the Canadian dollar equivalent of $0.8 billion on its standby lines of credit with Canadian and foreign banks. The amount comprises $1.1 billion drawn in December and currently outstanding and a $0.3 billion repayment on these lines earlier in the fiscal year.

Since borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81 was not obtained until July 17, 1980, borrowing up until that date was charged to $2.9 billion of non-lapsing borrowing authority obtained earlier and carried forward. Virtually all of this non-lapsing authority has been exhausted. Since July 17 all borrowing has been charged to the new authority for the fiscal year 1980-81. As at January 15, 1981, there was approximately $5.1 billion of this authority outstanding. This is more than enough to complete the planned debt program in the final quarter of this fiscal year, and a considerable portion of this amount will likely expire on March 31, 1981.

To summarize our 1980-81 financing operations, at the start of the fiscal year there was $2.9 billion of non-lapsed borrowing authority outstanding. This was reduced to just over $100 million by July 17 when $12 billion in additional authority became available under the Borrowing Authority Act, 1980-81. At the end of December the amount still available was $5.1 billion.

This description of our recent debt program and the current position with respect to borrowing authority provides the important pieces of information necessary for consideration of this part of the bill. If members wish further detailed information I will be happy to provide it to the House at the appropriate stage in the proceedings.

Part II of the bill, hon. members may be surprised to learn, is the first government income tax bill to be introduced for debate since the fall of 1979. It includes certain measures first announced in the budget brought down by the former government on December 11, 1979, and which were reintroduced in the ways and means motion which I tabled on April 21 of last year, along with the income tax measures announced in the budget of October 28 last.

Some of the measures contained in the bill affect the 1980 taxation year and it is therefore important that this legislation receive consideration at this time so that Revenue Canada can be given authority, by law, to proceed with the processing of 1980 income tax returns. Taxpayers are already filing returns, many of which will require the payment of refunds as a result of measures proposed in this bill. Among the measures which affect the 1980 income tax returns, all stemming from the recent budget or the statement of last April, are the following:

—deduction of remuneration paid to a spouse by a person carrying on an unincorporated business,

—the exclusion for overseas employment,

—the refundable abatement for individuals in Quebec,

—changes relating to property transferred between spouses,

—deductions for travelling expenses of part-time employees,

—increased deductions allowed volunteer firemen,

—deduction of the cost of an aircraft used by an employee,

—changes affecting the child tax credit, employee loans, and teachers at Canadian forces bases abroad.

This is not a complete list but it does illustrate that 1980 income tax returns for a large number of individuals are affected by measures in this bill.

There are also a number of important measures for corporations, some of which went into effect on December 11, 1979, and most of which apply to the taxation year 1980. In addition to tax assessments, many business transactions and corporate plans are being delayed awaiting passage of this income tax bill.

I should also point out, Mr. Speaker, that draft material relating to the tax measures in this bill was made public on five occasions during the past five months. In addition to the details set out in my notice of ways and means motion last April 21, 169 pages of draft legislation were issued on August 28. Another ways and means motion and supplementary information were introduced with the October budget, and an exposure draft of the legislation was tabled in this House on December 19. Finally, additional information on the budget measures was set out in the ways and means motion tabled on Monday of this week.

These documents which were provided afforded taxpayers and professional tax advisers an opportunity to comment on technical aspects of the law before the formal introduction of the legislation. I would like to express my thanks to the many who responded with suggestions for improvements. The legislation now before us has been improved significantly by those suggestions.

In this regard I would like to refer to one important change which has been made in the oil and gas sector. The October budget proposed a change in the treatment of drilling costs that would qualify for the 100 per cent write-off as Canadian exploration expenses. It was to apply to expenses incurred after 1980. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), and I received a number of representations on this particular change and its possible adverse effect on drilling activity in the period before the new petroleum incentives program becomes fully operational. As a result, I have agreed to postpone until 1982 the changes proposed to the tax treatment of exploration drilling expenses. This change should have a significant effect on exploration activity in the current year, particularly that activity undertaken by Canadians whose exploration expenses also qualify for payments under the petroleum incentives program.

I would also like to mention that many of these measures, which make up the larger part of the bill, were proposed by the previous government and should therefore be generally acceptable to members opposite.

In addition, the bill contains the various income tax proposals announced in the October budget. Several important changes were proposed at that time. There is the new 50 per cent investment tax credit designed to encourage new manufacturing investment in the poorer regions of the country. There are important changes in the tax rules affecting credit unions to accommodate a number of problems of concern to them. One of those changes will facilitate the pooling of credit union funds for major investments in Canadian equities.

In order to help reduce shortages of rental accommodation and stimulate the construction industry, this bill will reintroduce the tax incentive for multiple unit residential buildings for construction starts between the budget date and the end of this year.

The bill will implement a number of changes to the treatment of exploration and development expenditures as a consequence of the National Energy Program. There are also several technical changes affecting business income, including the requirement that interest income of corporations and partnerships and certain trusts be reported on the accrual method. Most firms follow this practice, but some have opted to follow a different practice which results in a deferral of tax for interest accrued but not received.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this is undoubtedly an important bill. Members of the House will take the opportunity, obviously, to comment on its contents and on the problems affecting the economy. It is not the first time we have had an opportunity in this session to debate this subject. We had a very intensive six-day debate following the budget, and before Christmas we had a lengthy debate on economic conditions, both of which permitted a very large number of hon. members to express their views on fiscal and economic policy. It is obvious that members will want to add to their thoughts as this debate opens and, certainly, I will be listening very carefully in the hope I will receive advice which can be implemented and which will do more good than damage to the economy. There is always lots of advice, but if it were implemented it would probably worsen conditions. I am asking the House to give me advice which will improve, not worsen, the situation.

I remind the House again that the changes for the 1980 taxation year are important. They affect a large number of taxpayers who will be filing their returns, and I would hope that the authority will be given by Parliament so that refunds which may be owing to Canadian taxpayers will be authorized in time. I believe that this authorization can be given without depriving Parliament of a reasonable opportunity to debate the contents of the bill and the circumstances surrounding it, not only at second reading but at Committee of the Whole and at the third reading stage.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I must say in opening that it must be a considerable relief to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) finally, after so many months in office, to have a chance to deliver a budget address. He delivered a mini-budget last April 21 the contents of which he stole from the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who was the previous minister of finance. He then was forced to put his signature to and deliver the energy program of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) on the now infamous day of October 28. Today, for the first time since the minister assumed his high office of Minister of Finance, he has had a chance to deliver a budget address and apparently to indicate where he feels his policies are leading the country.

In his opening remarks, the minister commented on the length of time between the income tax amendments and the borrowing authority and the budget. I do not wish to rehash an earlier procedural debate, but for years and years, as the minister pointed out in his contribution to the procedural debate, the borrowing authority was attached to supply. Finally, as the Speaker was reviewing the matter, it was found that in fact this procedure was in violation of Standing Orders of the House and the matters were severed. To learn now that we were actually wrong all those years and that the matter really has more to do with taxation, does not really stand up under close scrutiny. Borrowing authority in fact is a stand alone provision in the same way as matters of customs tariffs and excise are stand alone provisions, though they flow from government policy.

The minister in his early remarks laid out his interpretation of the policies which he is following. He seems to be enamoured with the word "gradualist". He used it several times today, and apparently in an interview with a reporter of the Toronto Globe and Mail on Monday, January 12, in which he said:

> In a sense, I'm working in a gradualist approach because I believe it is less damaging in current circumstances and over time will have its results unless we have further shocks to the system.

The minister is engaging in an approach which unfortunately has become quite habitual to members of the government. For example, earlier in the same Globe and Mail article, the minister said:

> —the basic framework of his policies, as laid out in the budget, is to restrain government expenditures, bring down the deficit gradually, back the Bank of Canada's monetary policy and try to support industrial development, energy development and economic adjustment through government spending.

It is a political approach taken by the government to gain the support of the public. In searching for the phrase to describe this approach adequately, the only one I could come up with which seemed fitting is the "big lie" approach. The government articulates its policies in terms of goals of motherhood in the hope that these goals will be interpreted and viewed by the public and the media, which translate this House to the public, as the substance of its policies in order to perpetuate a fraud on the public.

For example, on October 2 the government introduced its constitutional proposal and said that it was very simple and would entail a flexible amending formula and better protect human rights. There were many who accepted that proposal at face value and there were some who even said they would endorse it, and I think of my friends to the left, who took that position and are now finding it rather uncomfortable. Only after a closer look at what was involved is it becoming widely recognized throughout the country that in fact the opening statement of October 2 on the goals of the government on the constitution could not be further from the truth. The reality of what the government is proposing in the details, and that is where it counts, is far more profound, far more dangerous and destructive to the unity of the country than anything suggested in those original motherhood goals.

Similarly, on the budget come energy address of October 28, the goals as articulated by the Minister of Finance who read the program, can hardly be opposed by anybody. The goals were to protect Canadians from undue increases in energy prices, to Canadianize the industry, to make the country self-sufficient, to reduce demand and to encourage conservation. Those goals are eminently sensible, and goals against which no sane person would argue.

However, upon closer scrutiny one will see that they are not so sensible. In terms of detail the approach is the "big lie". Unfortunately there are still some people in this country who do not quite recognize the fact, but every day more and more people are recognizing that the national energy policy is not Canadianizing the industry but is driving the Canadian entrepreneurs and Canadian companies—the driving force of the industry—out of the country. It has the effect of increasing state ownership perhaps, but certainly not of increasing Canadian ownership. These policies will not make us self-sufficient, because in this year alone we will lose between $2.5 billion to $4 billion of exploration, which Canadians would like to put into the industry, because it is all going south to the United States.

I know there are certain hon. members who like to think that the multinational oil companies are trying to pull a scam. They simply have to read the newspapers, and not just the headlines but the details. For example, yesterday Walkers Consumers Home, a wholesale Canadian company, announced that it was investing $600 million new money in the oil and gas industry in the United States. This happened after it looked at this National Energy Program designed to help the Canadian oil and gas industry, this program which the minister said on October 28 is going to result in a tremendous boom to Canadian companies and will Canadianize the industry. No one opposes that goal, but in reality it is doing just the opposite.

This apparent refusal to look at the evidence is disturbing. I suppose history has shown that the "big lie" approach works, however. If you say often enough that we are going to be self-sufficient and are going to be Canadianized, then apparently people will believe it, even though Canadian money is leaving the country. We are not Canadianizing, Mr. Speaker, and we are not going to be self-sufficient. This is the "big lie" approach and we have it again in this budget.

The minister says that the framework of the budget is to restrain government expenditures. When the details of the October 28 budget and government expenditures are examined they show that he was repeating the big lie put out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the election campaign when he made a pledge that the Liberals would "manage more rigorously the nation's finances in order to make more effective use of the taxpayers' money". He also said, "We will hold the line on government expenditure growth under the rate of GNP." That was the commitment, and the Minister of Finance says that is his policy.

According to this document, however, for the coming fiscal year the projections for the growth in government expenditures on a public accounts basis is 12.8 per cent whereas they are projecting in terms of growth in the economy, the GNP, inflation included, of 11.1 per cent. The minister can say, as he did to the reporter, that it is his policy to restrain government expenditure, but the numbers show just the opposite. How long can a democracy last when a minister can get away with that kind of big lie, Mr. Speaker? He says that is his policy when in fact his policy is just the opposite. That is on a public accounts basis.

On a national accounts basis, which really gets at government spending reality, not just public accounts used as a kind of fudge number—national accounts get closer to the truth—growth and expenditure for next year is projected at 15.9 per cent, a whopping increase of 4.8 per cent ahead of the gross national product according to their members. Yet the minister said to the reporter, and repeated it in the House today with a straight face, that their policy is to restrain government spending.

It is sad that this kind of talk seems to have no effect on the supporters within that party. They are quite prepared to say, "Aye, sir." It is now apparently accepted public behaviour for politicians, when in government, to outline their goals, and then when their performance goes in exactly the opposite direction and they know that it does, no price is to be paid for it. That is the tragic thing that is happening. The big lie technique is used so frequently that we seem to have become immune to any analysis of it.

The minister's second point was that he is going to bring down the deficit gradually. Granted, in this budget document there is a projection of the deficit coming down, but how gradual is gradually? Independent analyses by groups not directly owing allegiance to the Minister of Finance show that his projections of what is going to happen to the deficit are not in keeping with the facts.

The minister is going to back the Bank of Canada's monetary policy. What a courageous position to take! It is strange to see what a difference a year makes. About a year ago his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), who was then the finance critic for the Liberal party, said that if he could not bring interests rates down he would resign. What a difference a year makes, Mr. Speaker.

What are the Bank of Canada's interest rate policies? It seems that they are something that come out of their policy in regard to the dollar—keep the dollar from falling in value and do whatever you have to do to interest rates in order to achieve that. In reality that means that we are in lock step with the United States and that we have to do whatever they do. This great nationalist government which promises to Canadianize the oil industry cannot seem to find a way to Canadianize the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Wilson: Keep interest rates up so that they will go down.

Mr. Andre: As my colleague points out, the policy is to keep interest rates high so that they will go down! Presumably as inflation goes down interest rates will go down, so what you have to do to make them go down is keep them high. If I sound confused, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I share that confusion with virtually everyone in this country, including lots of economists such as the Economic Council of Canada, the C.D. Howe Institute, and others.

The minister cannot be consistent even in the same paragraph. He talks about holding down government expenditures, restraint, bringing down the deficit and then he says that through government spending he is going to support industrial development, energy development, and economic adjustment. Through government spending he is going to restrain spending, but then through government spending he is going to support these figures. He cannot be consistent within the same paragraph.

Let us examine what he says. He is going to support industrial development. Who can be opposed to that? However, when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who would have responsibility in this area, was asked for his industrial development strategy which during the election campaign was absolutely promised to be forthcoming just as soon as the Liberals were returned to power, he said it has a lower priority than the constitution, and that they cannot get after it because they are working on the constitution. He cannot walk and chew gum at the same time!

Are all the economists, planners and so on, in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce sitting around moaning and groaning about the constitution? I have not seen the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce at any of the constitutional meetings. I did not know that the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce were involved in the constitution. Is the whole apparatus of the Government of Canada coming to a grinding halt while they try to convince Mr. Duclos and others like him who have a little bit of spine, that they had to support this imposition—

Mr. Cullen: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is the practice in the House to refer to hon. members by their constituencies. I am sure that the hon. member, being an experienced parliamentarian is aware of this.

Mr. Cullen: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I refer to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos). The hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) should have as much character and fortitude as the hon. member for Montmorency.

● (1450)

Mr. Cullen: I have more, but I talk some sense.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Sarnia is well trained; he knows when to say aye.

I think it was the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), in an earlier incarnation as Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, even before I was here, who coined the phrase "industrial development strategy". He started work on it then. I do not know how many years ago that was, but we are still waiting. In any event, this Minister of Finance says he is going to do it. How is he going to do it? By restraining government spending and holding the deficit in check. Then the government talks about energy development.

It is totally baffling how the Minister of Finance could on Monday, January 12, after seeing the impact of his October 28 energy policy, still maintain that there will be energy development in this country anything like what is needed. Obviously the Minister of Finance is not an ignorant man. He is not dumb. He is aware of what is happening. But because it does not fit in with the politics of the moment to acknowledge it, we carry on with this policy of the big lie.

We hear things such as, "This is what we are going to do. We are going to have energy development." The minister knows that is not what is happening. I know that his officials, below the deputy level, are scurrying for cover and saying that they did not have anything to do with that October 28 document, that they did not see it. We hear them say that it was done by EMR, the deputy, and one or two people around him. No one in finance had any say, and there are some honourable people in that department who would have liked to have had some say in producing a budget for this country. However, for some reason or other that task was turned over to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and he produced that body blow.

Unfortunately for the Minister of Finance, he is the one who will have to pick up the political credit for it. He will find that unemployment this year will be far greater than he had expected or planned. His officials never really had a chance to look at that energy policy. I gather no one in government did, other than the department of energy. But the Minister of Finance is the one who will have to pay the political price of accounting for that increased unemployment, the increased drain on the public treasury for its subsidies on the imports, and the increased strain on the dollar because of our increased balance of payments deficit, and on and on. The Minister of Finance will have to bear that cross put on his shoulders by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who somehow conned him into reading his energy policy.

Economic adjustment is another thing to which the minister is committed. What does economic adjustment mean? Is it another Department of Regional Economic Expansion? Do you remember that, Mr. Speaker? The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was supposed to cure regional disparity in Canada. How many years have we had of that department? And out of it we have regional disparity which gets worse and worse. What kind of economic adjustment is he planning here? I can only wonder and worry.

Sometime soon there needs to be a reawakening and a sensitivity to politics and to our political leaders in Canada. A closer examination is needed of what politicians and governments are saying and doing. We need a better way of holding them accountable. It is intolerable and of great concern, with potential enormous damage to our society, to our nation and to our democratic future, to have these kinds of big lie techniques utilized, apparently with some success.

For example, we can hear "our goal is that of self-sufficiency and increased Canadianization" but under that they introduce policies which produce exactly the opposite effect. We can see something of this sort in the October 28 budget where the minister said in one paragraph there will be no export tax "because I have talked to the premiers of the producing provinces," and in the next paragraph we read "but I am going to put a charge on gas sold to U.S. customers". That is a direct contradiction. There has to be a political price for that kind of political dishonesty, Mr. Speaker, otherwise it becomes common usage. We will destroy common language, destroy any respect for democratic institutions, and we will destroy the underpinnings of democracy itself. The next few steps to the total removal of any true democracy are not that far along the line. That price needs to be paid soon because the frustration levels, and the consequences of us not facing up to that and ensuring that we do not allow that kind of behaviour to happen will be pretty severe on our children and grandchildren. We have an underlying obligation as members of Parliament to leave the country in at least as good shape as we found it, and hopefully we will leave it in better shape. However, I am afraid we are failing in that regard quite badly.

This collection of budgets and mini-budgets, and what have you, which the minister has collected under this income tax amendment bill today, and the economic consequences which the minister described in his speech are, as I pointed out, at odds with the goals he talks about. I have pointed out some of the inconsistencies and downright deceptions, as have so many other members in this House in past weeks. However, I want to put on the record some of the observations made by independent groups, not by people associated with this party or other parties or people who have vested interests. For example, the Economic Council of Canada published an analysis of the budget in a document entitled "An Assessment of the Impact of the Federal Budget on the Canadian Economy". On page 4 of that document we read:

> The federal budget impact reduces the CANDIDE Model 2.0 growth rate in 1980 from -0.4 per cent to -0.6 per cent. Using the budget projections for energy investment further lowers the growth rate to -1.1 per cent. This is close to the Department of Finance projection of -1.0 per cent.

In other words, the Economic Council of Canada employing its Candide economic model, which has some credibility, is at least as good as the model of the Minister of Finance, which shows minus 1.0 per cent. For 1980, according to the Economic Council of Canada, the budget of October 28 made things 10 per cent worse than the government was saying.

In 1981, the Economic Council has pointed out that their model shows that the budget of October 28 reduces the growth rate from 1.4 per cent to 1.1 per cent. In other words, if there had not been that budget, we would have a growth rate projected this year of 1.4 per cent. Because the Minister of Finance took budget action, the gradualist approach he called it, growth rate will be reduced to 1.1 per cent. That is marvellous.

At page 6 of that document we find the following:

> Adding the alternative energy investment assumptions of the Department of Finance further reduces the growth rate to .5 per cent. This compares with the Department of Finance projection of 1.0 per cent—

● (1500)

So, using the economic model of the Economic Council of Canada, employing the last budget which was introduced, they conclude that for 1981 the growth rate will be half the level projected by the Department of Finance. That comes from the Economic Council of Canada, not a group of people who have partisan leanings, and if they do have any, presumably they would be Liberal because most of the members were appointed by Liberal governments. However, I do not believe they have any biases.

Then the Economic Council looked at the following years, and this is their conclusion. They conclude:

> The general impact of the federal budget appears to be one which increases the rate of unemployment. The pre-budget base case suggests an unemployment rate of 8 per cent for 1981 but our budget alternatives show the unemployment rate lying between 8.2 per cent and 8.6 per cent.

In other words, had there not been any budget at all, there would have been unemployment of 8 per cent, but as a result of the budget, unemployment will be between 8.2 per cent and 8.6 per cent, according to the Economic Council of Canada. They conclude that the growth in the GNP will range between .5 per cent and 1.1 per cent.

Another interesting observation of the Economic Council of Canada on this budget and the income tax bills which flow therefrom, is that one of the hidden impacts of the federal budget is its compositional effect on savings. It will have a tendency to reduce the percentage of savings occurring to provincial governments' corporate sector and personal sector, and at the same time decrease the proportion of disservice or increase the proportion of savings occurring to the federal government. I think that perhaps this tells the real story of this budget. The real story of this budget is to take money from personal savings, that is out of your jeans, Mr. Speaker, and my jeans, to take money out of the corporate sector, that is presumably money which might have been invested to create new jobs, to take money out of the provincial governments, which I am sure will delight them, and to put it in the treasury of the federal government. That is the over-all thrust of this budget.

In order to accomplish that, in order to give them those funds which they will undoubtedly dream up for some vote-producing expenditure programs, they are quite prepared to see unemployment rates go up by perhaps .5 per cent, and, I think more, because there are other considerations, but at least by .5 per cent. They are quite prepared to see inflation increase to alarming levels, much higher than previously anticipated. They are quite prepared to see the Canadian public bear that cost through less job security, through more unemployment and through higher costs, in order that they can collect those extra savings from the provincial governments, from the corporate sector and from the private sector.

Perhaps that is what the minister may have said in his interview with The Globe and Mail on January 12, that part of his gradualism was economic adjustment. It is the adjusting of other people's money from other people's jeans into his jeans.

That is the economic adjustment which seems to be the thrust of his policy, according to the Economic Council of Canada.

In the event that someone will argue that the Economic Council of Canada is a group that cannot be trusted, or that somehow they are prejudiced and therefore we should not believe them when they say that this minister's energy policy will make things worse, I should like to bring to the attention of the House a document called "The Canadian Review" by Data Resources of Canada, a Toronto-based company which is in the business of economic modelling. They, too, have a model of a Canadian economy, they too have analysed this budget, and they too have some observations to make about the budget. They say:

—the budget nevertheless has a restricted impact on real economic growth in the short run. Because of lags in the response of households, firms and governments to the new energy incentive programs, expenditures likely will expand more slowly than revenues until well into 1982. The budget therefore represents one more force weakening the prospective recovery in 1981-82.

They go on to state:

In comparison with the base solution with no policy changes—

In other words, no budget.

—the economic effects of the budget are more pronounced since the assumed changes in energy prices are larger. Consumer prices are increased by 1.2 per cent in 1981 and by 1.7 per cent in 1982. Real GNP is reduced by 1.1 per cent in 1981 and by 2 per cent in 1982.

So they too conclude, as the Economic Council of Canada concludes, that the budget will make things worse by at least 1.1 per cent in 1981 and by 2 per cent in 1982, worse than projected by the government. However, the Data Resources group, to their credit, also looked at the secondary effects of that economic policy. They analysed the fact that because the government failed to reach an energy agreement with the producing provinces, the government of Alberta has put on hold certain large projects, and therefore a number of companies have decided that they will shelve their plans. As a consequence, many of the things that were anticipated, such as new tar sands plants, new heavy oil plants, new development of oil and gas, will not be occurring.

The Data Resources group has done an analysis of this and has found that the aggregate effect of the secondary developments, which were not analysed by the Economic Council of Canada or by the Department of Finance, are to further reduce real output for 1981 by .7 per cent and by 1 per cent in 1982, with a considerable loss of revenue to the federal government. The cost to the federal government, for example, is an increased deficit in 1981 of 1.2 per cent and in 1982 of 2.5 per cent, which means that the figures which the Minister of Finance gave with regard to the reduction in the deficit, when he said that the deficit in 1981 will be $14.2 billion and then it will be a little bit lower in 1982, a deficit of $13.7 billion, are incorrect. According to the Data Resources group, it will not be $13.7 billion next year, it will be $15.2 billion. In fact, the deficit will continue to increase. I do not think there is any doubt about that, but presumably by then the Minister of Finance will be off in some new high office and he will not have to worry about it, but will let the next minister of finance worry about accounting for the fact that there is this discrepancy between predictions and actions. It is alarming and I think it should be of concern to real Canadians—

An hon. Member: What a slip!

Mr. Andre: —to all Canadians—it is the same, real and all Canadians—to allow that kind of misinformation, if you will, to allow our politicians to get away with misinforming the public when in fact they know that the situation is quite different.

Precisely what is wrong with our economy and what should be done to change it? One of the better analyses, the recent terse analysis in the popular media, was, I thought, done by Don McGillivray of Southam writing in the Montreal Gazette of January 14 where he describes those who believe that there is a trade-off between inflation and unemployment and those who believe that by increasing unemployment you can then reduce inflation. He describes these people as being the people who wrote the MacEachen budget last fall. He writes:

They produced the Thatcher economic policy in Britain. They seem to be gaining the upper hand in the incoming administration of President-elect Ronald Reagan in the United States.

He goes on to say that these people who believe that there is a trade-off between inflation and unemployment "talk in a kind of code about 'restraint' and 'gradualism' and 'disinflationary demand policies'."

● (1510)

If those words sound familiar, it is because they have all been used by this Minister of Finance. The last phrase was used by the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada. This is a tipoff as to what is really involved. They are all, according to McGillivray, and I share his views, followers of the economic policies of John Maynard Keynes who believes the government could use its budget to add to the demand for goods and services when things are slack and thereby raise the economy, and it could reduce demand by cutting its own spending and taxing away some consumer money when things get overheated. Then he describes that people these days are one-way Keynesians who seem to be in charge and seem to think if you raise interest rates, people will stop buying cars and houses, which will cause the producers of cars and houses to lower their prices and will cause some people to be put out of work and thereby will lower their expectations, so the whole thing will have a disinflationary effect. But, as he points out, the fact of the matter is the Keynesian policy just does not work any more, and it has not worked. The reason given by Mr. McGillivray, and I think there is some validity to this, although I do not think it is the whole story, the fact of the matter is that people who are out of work do not stop consuming. They stop working and they stop producing, but they do not stop consuming.

An hon. Member: What do you want them to do, starve?

Mr. Andre: Members of the New Democratic Party apparently are not willing to listen to any criticisms of that great guru.

An hon. Member: He is the captain of the gurus.

Mr. Andre: In fact the member says it is not his guru, but several times at least since we have come back he has talked about the classical Keynesian cure to what is wrong with the economy; increase the deficit, spend more which will generate demand, put people to work and we will all be in a bed of roses. That is exactly what I have heard them say.

The truth of the matter is there is something more fundamentally wrong with Keynesian policies or the Keynesian approach. It has a fundamentally inflationary bias built into it. To begin with, it calls on governments to run surpluses when the economy is overheated. That is almost an impossibility in a democracy. It is almost impossible for a government to run a surplus because the number of spending plans dreamed up by politicians, bureaucrats and others are absolutely overwhelming, and no matter how overheated the economy gets, the reality is there is some just cause out there for money to be spent on. It is almost impossible to run the kinds of surpluses needed to balance off the deficits that are incurred in terms of stimulus.

On the other side, it is fundamentally inflationary in instinct. The theory is that governments, by spending more, putting more money into the economy, stimulate demand and bring on jobs. However, there is a time lag. When you stimulate demand, the first thing that occurs is the price goes up. The first thing that occurs when there is increased demand is a price increase. After the price goes up, you get increased supply. The increased prices bring on the new production and you are up to new levels. You have this inherent inflationary bias in the process, and that is what is wrong with the New Democratic approach. They are talking about more government spending, stimulating demand and thereby helping inflation. Perhaps, but in the process this would raise inflation to a new high. That happens everywhere.

Therefore, when the Minister of Finance talked about supply-side economics, members of the NDP had a little hiccup of concern because to them that is a buzz word for neo-Conservatism or something, and it frightens them. When the Minister of Finance talked about supply-side economics, he was starting to get on the right track. Unfortunately, that kind of talk is equivalent to the kind of talk that he is going to hold down government spending while in fact spending keeps going on. It is talk but not action. He at least mentions supply-side economics, but in fact does not deliver. We are still chomping along on the old demand-side or Keynesian approach without any indication of any changes.

What sorts of indication would we expect to see if the minister was sincere in looking at supply-side considerations? What we would have seen in that budget was increased spending on science and technology, for example. We would have seen in there increased investment in the productive side of our economy, the supply side. We would have seen, for example, some tax changes directed toward increasing productivity. These are not unknown things in this economic world. The Minister of Finance, when asked by a Globe and Mail reporter why it is that Japan and Germany seem to be doing so well even when they have to pay world prices for energy and Canada cannot, said it has to do with the philosophy of the people. The minister blames our lack of performance in comparison to the Japanese and Germans on us. We are lazier than the Japanese or Germans, I guess. In fact, if he would look at what the Christian Democratic government had done in terms of productivity incentives, the supply-side economics, if you will, in the 1950s and early sixties he would get some valuable instruction on what can be done about increasing productivity. I might add that he should do the same thing in respect of Japan where productivity increases have been absolutely spectacular to the point that in just a very few short years, they have been able to produce automobiles at considerably less than our friends to the south who invented all the technology in the first instance.

The economic problems of this country are bad and, regrettably, getting much worse. The predictions for next year are bad; unemployment is going to be a great deal higher next year at this time than it is this year, and I say that regrettably; inflation will be higher next year than it is this year, unfortunately; and as a result of the energy portion of that budget, we are in for some very tumultuous months ahead in terms of unity in this country. Things are going to get worse before they get better. We are in a very uncomfortable position, and there is no sense of direction from the government. There is no sense of purpose. One is hard pressed to come up with a definition of what are the goals of this Liberal government. The Prime Minister is involved in some sort of North-South dialogue, running around in Brazil in his tennis shoes. No one quite knows what he is doing; looking for avocados in Austria. The Minister of Finance delivered an energy address which is having a disastrous effect on the country. The minister of industry says he cannot get around to thinking about an industrial development strategy as long as the constitution remains an issue. There is nothing happening in terms of transportation, agriculture or in any area of the economy that we can see.

Faced with that kind of drift, the energy industry people of my part of the country are abandoning this country as a place to invest. Tragically, they are abandoning Canada. They are leaving for the United States, or at least sending their money there, awaiting a change here or some direction or sense of purpose from the government. People in other parts of the country are in despair over what is happening. The polls tell us what all we politicians are hearing directly, that is, that most people think next year will be worse than this year. That is rare because people are optimists by nature. They usually think things will be better next year than they are this year, yet for the first time for a long time people are thinking things will be worse next year than this year. This really is a cause for alarm. Rather than groom himself for a potential higher office, which he apparently is doing—he is changing his image to protect himself from the political risks he might be taking—I suggest this might be an opportune time, for the sake of Canada, for the Minister of Finance to address in a real way these concerns Canadians are feeling.

This is an absolutely crucial period for the country. It is a time when leadership is needed, not in any small sense, but desperately. The Liberal party has the majority of seats. There is no way anybody else can exercise the leadership that is required. It has to be the members of the Liberal party. I plead with hon. members opposite not to sit silently in their caucuses, but to challenge their Prime Minister and their Minister of Finance to address the real problems of this country and to show some leadership. Let us get this country working again. We have the potential. If we had a government which understood that potential, appreciated it in a real sense and seized it, then perhaps there are few limits we could not achieve. But in the meantime, we are faced with addressing nothing less than the junk this government brings forward in the form of economic policy. In the days ahead, my colleagues will address various aspects of this bill. They will address the way in which this bill adversely affects small businesses, farmers, the private energy sector and private citizens.

Before I sit down, I might just say it is interesting to note that as I went through the ways and means motion for this bill, I found that with one or two exceptions, almost every attractive item of some benefit to Canadians—and I think improvement—was taken out of the budget of December of 1979 of the hon. member for St. John's West. Since that budget was, regrettably for Canada, defeated, there really has not been anything forthcoming from this government.

Mr. Wilson: This government is very tired.

Mr. Andre: Ironically, after not quite a year in office, this government is already looking very tired, run down, listless and leaderless.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to apologize to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) because in the last speech I gave before Christmas, I said something which I do not usually say. I said something personal about the minister which I want to withdraw. I said that the minister had neither profile nor courage. I withdraw unreservedly the remark that he has no courage. I think it takes a lot of courage to be a minister of finance in a Liberal government and to come before the House and present day after day the kinds of policies the minister has presented to this House.

Miss Jewett: Policies?

Mr. Rae: I use the term in its loosest sense. It is in that spirit I withdraw the notion that the minister lacks courage.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), who just spoke, discussed a term which has become fashionable. As all terms become fashionable, they inevitably become appropriated by the Liberal party and the Liberal government. The hon. member for Calgary Centre was discussing the question of the supply side of economics and the danger of our simply returning to priming the demand pump in an attempt to get the economy out of a recession, which I think we all agree we are in.

I want to say to the hon. member for Calgary Centre that due to the policies of his colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), it is true that I did have some things to say about the basic lessons of Keynesian economics, which I felt his government and his party had still not understood. If I may refer to a remark which I made in my first speech ever in the House of Commons, I said that the Liberal party was the party of pre-Keynesian economics and the Conservative party was the party of pre-Cambrian economics. I think that term is an epithet which deserves—not because I said it—to be revived from time to time. Indeed, in the face of certain real reactionary tendencies on the part of many people in our economy, in government and in politics, one has to defend the very elementary principles which Keynes put forward 50 and, indeed, 60 years ago about the nature of a modern economy. That is not to say that he had all the answers or that his prescriptions were adequate for the problems we now face.

We are living, as is self-evident, in a post-Keynesian era. It is remarkable that Keynes, who died over 30 years ago, would still be regarded somehow as the representative of modern economics. We have moved well beyond that, and by definition we are living in a post-Keynesian era. However, still faced with the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth century philosophy which we often hear from the Conservative party, one has to say occasionally a kind word about the man who fractured so many myths which were part of those views so many years ago.

With respect to the question of supply and demand economics, I would like simply to quote someone who I would have thought to be far closer to the views of the hon. member for Calgary Centre than I, that is, Mr. Irving Kristol, who is generally regarded in the United States as one of the primary philosophers of the new conservatism in the United States. Writing in the Wall Street Journal, one of my favourite newspapers for light reading, of December 19, 1980, Mr. Kristol had this to say, and I think it is a very intelligent remark:

> The trouble with this reasoning—

He was referring to the reasoning of certain conservative economists, and indeed some of it parallels very closely the things which were said by the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

> —is the curious disjunction it posits between "supply" and "demand". These terms are purely analytical concepts, indispensable to economists. But the real world does not consist of some people working on the supply side of the street while others saunter down the demand side. There is only one street, and we all walk in it together. Supply-side economics does not mean that demand should be repressed while supply is encouraged. For if demand is repressed, supply will be repressed too—as Mrs. Thatcher has discovered to her sorrow, and as every businessman knows full well, even if he forgets this knowledge when talking economics.

I want just to put to rest the theory—and it is very widespread—that this is no time to be encouraging demand, that this is no time to be encouraging consumers to exercise their choice in the marketplace—to buy, if you like—and that this is no time to be concerned about the fact that we have seen over the last three years a real drop in the standard of living and a real loss in purchasing power in Canada. This real loss in purchasing power is predicted, even in the budget of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, to continue over a period of two or three years and even longer. It is a fundamental error of policy to argue that the way to fight the inflation from which we suffer at the present time, or the way to get Canada moving away from the economic problems it faces, is to ignore problems of consumer demand and consumer purchasing power and the fact that the economy is working at a 75 per cent or 80 per cent capacity, and to simply concentrate on what is now chicly known as the supply side, at the expense of the real income and the real standard of living of Canadians.

That is not to say that the simple cutting of a tax or the provision of a cost of living tax credit will be sufficient. I do not buy the theory that one can simply return to the Kennedy tax cut of 1962 and 1963 or the policies which were so successful between 1945 and 1965 in stimulating the western economies and say that this is adequate today.

Clearly we are living in a new situation where there really are severe problems on the supply side. We are living in an era when cheap energy is no longer possible; indeed we are coming to the last 30, 40 or 50 years of the hydrocarbon era. We need some different policies if we are to deal with the increased international competition in the automobile industry, which will be discussed by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), in the steel industry, in textiles and in the petrochemical industry. If we are to deal with the international competition in these fields, we need industrial strategies and policies which will relate directly to the need for investment in these fields and long-term planning.

The accusation that we in this party are simply talking about the government wildly spending more money in terms of consumer purchasing power is totally inaccurate. It is simply not an accurate reflection of what we have been saying, nor what we have been talking about over the last five years in terms of an industrial strategy and the need to look at all regions of Canada in producing an industrial strategy and in planning for our future. It is very, very important for people to realize that these two matters cannot be separated. One cannot simply say that we should do something on the demand side and not be concerned about from where the supply will come.

For example, if the value of our dollar rises and we engage in a policy of simply encouraging demand, the impact on the balance of payments and on foreign replacement for products currently made in Canada will be very serious. It will pose a very serious problem. On the other hand, if the policies are mixed correctly so that we can start substituting for imports—and perhaps neo-conservatism is the first foreign import for which we should be substituting—then it makes sense to expand consumer purchasing power. But we must ensure it is mixed correctly with correct investment policies on the government side and on the business side so that Canadians will be able to purchase Canadians products. I should like to refer to the example of the human tragedy involved in what has gone on in the automobile industry in the last two or three years with the number of lay-offs and the number of people who have lost their livelihood. There is a slogan which the industry has characterized. It is: "Buy the cars your neighbours helped to build". There is nothing a Canadian would rather do than buy a car his neighbour helped to build, but the difficulty is that at the moment there is not one Canadian worker involved in the assembly of small cars which will be gas-efficient in the 1980s, and these cars are in demand.

This is because for decades governments have been willing to accept the investment planning and investment strategies of the big three and big four automobile makers that have been quite happy to make whatever they wanted here in Canada. They have not exercised any control over the long-term investment planning and investment strategy of the major car manufacturers. This is something which must be said. The decisions on supply, investment, what people make, what is produced in Canada, where people work in Canada and how goods are produced, cannot be separated from the fact that at the moment Canadians are suffering from real losses in their standard of living. To simply say that we will increase supply at the expense of the real standard of living of Canadians in my view is a very false choice, but unfortunately and clearly the one which has been taken.

In answer to my questions today, the minister said that the government did not intend to create an army of unemployed; that he did not accept such a characterization of his policy. It is not always pleasant for someone to have to call something unpleasant when it is. I am reminded of governor Bouey's statements in committee, on the radio, or in his speeches to the Empire Club and other democratic organizations for the average Canadian. He always refers to "slack" in the economy. He never refers to unemployment or unemployed people. He never talks about the fact that there will be tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of people out of work who do not have the means of joining with their fellow citizens in producing something or doing something useful with their lives. He does not talk about the fact that when people no longer do something which they think is useful, they become dispirited and despondent. He does not talk about those things, he talks about something called "slack". Of course he does, because governor Bouey is a human being and he does not want to think that the implications of government policies are very hard on people and cause real human anguish and problems. It is not possible to function in that kind of a world, so we all call things by something else; we invent neutral terms to define an awful problem. Bureaucrats spend most of their time doing this. They speak in a language which has no relationship to what is going on in the world, in society or in the human economy.

That is why I think an army of unemployed is being created today. The government is conscripting people, but it is conscripting them on a very unequal basis. Because of the restrictions on demand in our economy at the present time, if one lives in eastern Canada or northern Canada, if one is unskilled or happens to be born a woman and not a man, or if one is a native person, the chances are higher that he will end up joining that army of unemployed. We must ask ourselves two questions in fighting this war on inflation. First, we must ask ourselves whether it is fair, and the answer is no, because of the inequity of the policy which is being followed. Also, we must ask ourselves whether it is working, and the answer is no. It is futile. The policy of the government, no matter how one puts it, is to restrict demand both in terms of government spending and consumer spending and hope that it will have the effect of reducing inflation. This policy was followed by the government of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the old days, by the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he was prime minister, and by the Prime Minister now that he is again leader of the government. There is no distinction and there is no difference; it is exactly the same policy. There has not been a single shift away from the so-called expenditure line or path about which the Minister of Finance is so proud to talk. Well, one man's road to expenditure is another man's road to unemployment. That is exactly what has happened with the government's policy at the present time. It is a futile policy.

My colleague from Hamilton Mountain will be talking about how futile that policy has proven to be in the automobile industry. That policy has enabled us to see that all the reduction in consumer demand in the world has not had the effect of reducing prices in Canada. In fact, the prices of automobiles in Canada have risen 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the past year to 18 months. If you look at the oil industry, you see that the restrictions in demand will not have the effect of reducing the price.

In answer to questions from our party, the Prime Minister admitted that the oil companies had been making exorbitant profits over the past two or three years. One simply has to ask oneself: What kind of world are the people who make economic decisions living in? Do they seriously think the way in which to fight inflation and deal with the fundamental economic problems of the country is to constrict demand and say that an industrial policy is less important than the constitution and less important than the energy package? Do they not see that you cannot separate an energy package from an industrial program? Do they not see that these things go together? Do they not see that you cannot talk about Canadianization of the oil industry without talking about Canadianization of the industries which supply the oil industry? Yet, we are told these things are being put on the shelf. We are told they are less important to the government than the constitutional matters. I think the constitution is important. I also think the economy is very important. I think it will be a sad day for the Canadian people when the government decides that some of its pet projects will be seen to be very important but others, which affect the livelihood of Canadians right across the country, will be regarded as second best.

The government has presented us with an income tax bill. I said the Minister of Finance had courage. I think it really does take courage. It is the same kind of courage the emperor had when he walked down the street with no clothes on. It takes courage to come into this House with a pathetic series of housekeeping measures which have nothing at all to do with the major problems which face Canadians. These measures have nothing at all to do with the challenges facing our future, or the real inequities which exist, not only in our economy but in our tax system.

It is to those inequities in the tax system I wish to turn. One of the most interesting features which I found in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance was his referral, in a very general way, to some of the problems facing the tax system. He referred in a very general way to the philosophic question of whether one should allow for greater depreciation and greater tax expenditure on the part of the government or whether one should shift to a policy of the government giving direct grants, trying to get away from tax expenditures which have become so large in the past few years.

He then said they would be presenting a discussion paper on the taxation of capital gains. He said, apart from this, the major features of the income tax sections of the budget would have to do with the small business development bond and the 50 per cent investment tax credit for investment in DREE. The SBDB, as it is now called, was a policy that was started by his Conservative predecessors, which involved absolutely no innovation whatsoever. The investment tax credit idea for certain regions in Canada is an idea which is about as original as it was in 1963 when it was first put forward by Walter Gordon.

It has been introduced time and time again as an attempt to solve the problems of regional disparity in Canada on a very temporary and ineffective basis. But nowhere in the budget do we see any discussion of the philosophy behind the Income Tax Act. Nowhere do we find a discussion as to what the general purpose or thrust of the policy is. Nowhere do we find an attempt to say that in 1967 the Carter commission put forward certain recommendations and in 1972 the tax reform bill was passed in order to achieve certain results, this is where we stand now and this is where we would like to go for the 1980s. The fact is we are further away from the principle that a dollar, no matter how it is earned, should be taxed equally and fairly. We are further away from that principle than we were in 1967, when Mr. Carter put forward his recommendations in the royal commission.

I point out to the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen)—and I would like to hear him announce this at one of those meetings I am sure he holds regularly in his riding—that there are 24 Canadians who earned over $200,000 in 1977 who paid no tax. I would like to hear him tell that to the workers in his riding. The member for Sarnia can tell that to the petrochemical workers in his riding. If they tried to do that, Mr. Speaker, they would be thrown in jail. These are 24 Canadians who legally, because of the loopholes we have in our tax system, paid not a penny in taxes.

Mr. Knowles: A buck is not 'a buck is a buck is a buck' any more.

Mr. Rae: It depends on what your buck is and where it comes from.

However, Mr. Speaker, the government has produced its discussion paper. It has not discussed it. I have not seen a statement from the minister, nor have I seen one indication from him as to what his point of view is on the question of taxation of capital gains in Canada. But they have produced a discussion paper. I have not heard anyone discuss it. I have not heard anyone present a point of view about it. I have not heard the minister say, "I would like to see this referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs." But the paper has been produced and it does say some very interesting and useful things.

First of all, the paper says that of all countries in the OECD, Canada is tied with Italy for the lowest level of taxes on inheritance, gifts and wealth—.07 per cent of our gross national product. That is really squeezing the rich until you can hear the pipsqueaks. The United States taxes six times that much. As a percentage of the GNP, the United States receives almost six times as much in taxes from inheritances, gifts and wealth.

That is the Valhalla of the Conservative party. In the nineteenth century they were the colonialists from Great Britain. Everything was right in Great Britain and nothing was right in Canada. Now everything is great in the United States and nothing is right in Canada. Switzerland taxes at 1.09 per cent. I always thought Switzerland was a kind of haven for wealthy people. Not at all. You can see how the mythology is so wrong.

Listen to this remark from the discussion paper. Occasionally civil servants let themselves go in these reports. Here is one statement:

> Canada's extreme position may already be a cause of concern to the extent that it restricts the government's ability to promote a fair and equitable distribution of income and wealth in the country.

As the member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) just said, "Exactly". Amen. What can we say? If you do not collect it from the rich, you must collect it from someone else. We hear a great deal from the government about its being strapped for money and that there is a fiscal imbalance. I have spoken about this before in the House and I will not give a speech on it again tonight. There is a real imbalance in Canada. Why is it as significant as it is? One of the reasons is because this government has decided that the wealthy in Canada, and those people whose only achievement in life is to have chosen their parents wisely, will not be taxed. They will not be taxed in Canada as they are in every other country in the OECD—not just socialist Sweden or horrible Great Britain, but also in the wild and woolly United States.

We do not even have the same taxes as the state of Utah. The only state in the U.S. which does not have a succession duty and tax on wealth is the state of Nevada. There they have a Las Vegas philosophy, which seems to have been taken up by the Government of Canada as a taxing philosophy. The actions of this Liberal government surpass arrogance. It comes to the people of Canada one year after the brief Tory hiccup, and says, "Look, we face these tremendous problems. We don't have a tax base. We have a tremendous crisis in our fiscal imbalance with the provinces. We are facing terrific problems because of inequity in the taxation of oil and gas. There is a horrific deficit with which we have to deal. There is the fact that we are not dealing with other taxation problems and the country is in a tremendous fiscal problem. The public expenditures have run away and we must do everything we can to control them. We must cut back".

All one can ask is, "Who was running the store"? Where are they now? There are those who are here in another form, such as the hon. member for Sarnia, like life after death. Some of them have passed on to other places, jobs, commissions and royal commissions and the senates in the sky. However, some are still here, and they are the ones who are responsible. In 1972 the Liberal government, under the current Prime Minister, decided that it would abandon the field of wealth taxation, taxation on inheritance or estate tax. Since the elimination of the estate tax in 1971, it has had the effect of a lump sum transfer of $4.5 billion to Canada's wealthiest citizens.

In that year, for example, it was estimated that approximately $66 billion in wealth was being freed of any tax burden whatsoever and that the cost to the treasury in future taxes would amount to some $12.5 billion. Current estimates of wealth can only be approximated since it is hidden behind a statistical curtain, but we do know that personal income has increased by over three times and that personal savings have increased by over six and a half times since 1970. We also know that the concentration of wealth has increased dramatically since that year. In 1970, a grand total of 5,893 Canadian domicile estates were subject to a federal estate tax. These few estates had total assets of $1 billion, $210 million of which was contained in the 90 estates of millionaires which were reported in that year.

The point is that we cannot continue with a series of minor income tax proposals which fiddle here and fiddle there without recognizing that we face a major crisis, what I call a "crisis of fairness", in our tax system. I think of the people in my riding who receive their pay packet every two weeks and know exactly from where the taxes come. They see it every two weeks. They do not receive any fancy deductions, because they are employees and receive wages. They have none of the whole range of deductions which are open to those people who are self-employed, those who are able to turn themselves, as if by magic, into a personal corporation or those who are able to use a marvellous invention called the inter vivos trust in order to split family income.

As long as the government is prepared to say that there is a whole realm of wealth which can be transferred from one generation to the next without taxation, it will be those people whose taxes will continuously rise and whose purchasing power will continuously decrease. Inflation has the effect of increasing the wealth of those people who have it, and ravaging and cutting away at the real incomes and standard of living of those people who have nothing other than what they earn and what they have saved.

We look upon these measures with the realization that they are nothing but a stand-pat, pathetic—I would not call it "effort", because it is not an effort—series of proposals which do nothing to deal with the real problems. In the few minutes left to me, I would like to outline the approach our party will take during this debate. The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) will discuss the small business development bond. He will deal with the problems of the SBDB which, as the hon. member has said on many occasions, is simply a drop in the ocean and does not apply to those people who are not incorporated or would rely on the program for working capital. The program is so limited and so restricted that it only benefits a very few members of the small business community. It is better than nothing, but that is all one can say about it.

There is also the topic of MURBs, which is another tax haven and which will increase the number of those people earning over $200,000 who will pay no tax. It will enable us to give another golden loophole award next year because people will be able to shelter their income from taxation, but it will do nothing to solve the housing problem, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), who will point it out once again.

The investment tax credit does not really deal with the problems of the regions. The rate of corporate taxation has effectively declined. The rate in manufacturing is now down to 20 per cent. In the oil and gas industry, it is down to 11 per cent and in mining down to 10 per cent. In banking the rate is down to 9 per cent and 13 per cent. How many members can go into their ridings and say that the average employees in their ridings are paying taxes at a rate of 10 per cent, 12 per cent or 13 per cent. No member can because everybody is paying far more than those rates.

Finally, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) will discuss the energy tax proposals. I make the point that, in our view, the government is missing a golden opportunity to really advance public ownership in the Canadian oil industry, that it has, in a sense, gone after the wrong targets by focusing too much on the provinces and smaller companies and not enough on the multinational corporations. They are missing a golden opportunity to increase our self-sufficiency in oil and natural gas.

In closing, I simply want to say that this bill is a statement of bankruptcy. Unfortunately, we are not allowed to put the government into receivership. That is a decision which will have to be taken by the voters in a few years. I have no doubt that the kinds of policies which are being followed by the government will lead to the decision by the voters that, though Liberalism now appears to be so impregnable, so smooth, so self-confident and so oily in its determination to win over all Canadians to its point of view in the kind of condescending self-serving way we now recognize as being the key notes of modern Liberalism, they must reject this type of Liberalism for all time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 4 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Motions Nos. 14, 22, 23, 24 and 25 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

ADVISABILITY OF INITIATING INDEPENDENT COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of initiating an independent commission of inquiry to investigate the serious deficiencies within the administration of search and rescue services on Canada's west coast.

● (1600)

He said: It is most appropriate and, I believe, long overdue that we should have an opportunity to debate in this House a motion which is of such life-saving importance. I set down motion No. 26, Mr. Speaker, because events have shown in recent years that there is indeed a serious lack of co-ordination and there is a question of administrative inefficiency which must be addressed regarding the relationship of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to the delivery of search and rescue services, particularly on the west coast.

In March, 1980, I wrote to the Minister of National Defence and to the Minister of Transport urging them, in the wake of the Lee Wang Zin sinking on December 25, 1979, to initiate such an inquiry. Letters of response from both ministers, which I received later that month, refused to consider initiating such an inquiry. I subsequently submitted this motion to the House and today I want to present some of the circumstances, centering particularly on the Lee Wang Zin tragedy, but bringing up other numerous cases of what I believe to be administrative incompetence when it comes to saving human life.

In reply to my letter of March, 1980, both ministers indicated that they were engaged in an interdepartmental review of the co-ordination of rescue facilities between their two departments. In fact, Mr. Speaker, that review was commissioned by the former Conservative government under the then minister of national defence, the minister of transport and the minister responsible for marine transport. That review was to have been completed in the spring of 1980 and I was advised by those ministers that I would receive copies of the review within weeks. Now, nine months later, I still do not have notice of the findings of that review.

The basic problem is that the principal administrators of search and rescue, the decision-makers and politicians here in Ottawa, are apathetic about this crisis and about the loss of human life, which usually takes place in cold water.

This is a very serious problem for the people of British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, especially those who make their livelihood on the Pacific coast waters or who use those waters regularly for recreational and other purposes. This includes fishermen, pleasure boat operators, the B.C. ferries, coastal cruisers, those engaged in shipping, towing and flying, to a large degree.

I want to make it clear this afternoon that it is not my purpose to accuse or criticize individual persons who operate the Rescue Co-ordination Centre in Victoria or those who man the search and rescue services generally. These people are doing an excellent job in many respects and have saved many human lives. We commend them for that. The problem is that they are governed by bureaucratic directives and orders from above. The system is at fault. The attitudes among senior decision-makers within that system is what I call the "admiralty approach" to search and rescue, rather than the blood and guts approach which is required in order to get to the site of a tragic accident in time to save the lives of people in the water.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, a report which summarizes the findings and recommendations of the jury at the inquest on the Lee Wang Zin sinking in December of 1979 when the lives of 30 Taiwanese crew members were lost in an overturned vessel. The Department of Transport did not attend the scene until 38 hours after the first SOS signal was received.

I should like hon. members to imagine themselves for a moment in the position of a young Taiwanese sailor just having left the port of Prince Rupert after loading ore, on his way home to Taiwan to greet his wife and children. He is awakened at five o'clock in the morning, notices that the ship is heaving and rolling heavily, not in its usual fashion, is suddenly thrown into a catastrophic overturn, his bedding thrown around the cabin. He worries and wonders whether a distress signal has been sent. He calls for his friends, searches around the lower reaches of the vessel for them, feels the heaving motion of the ship from the underside of the berth where he is trying to hang on for dear life. He grows fearful and cold, his teeth chatter, he grows numb while he wonders, waits and hopes. Nothing happens. He waits for an hour, maybe half an hour, maybe three hours, perhaps 24 hours. He grows more and more numb, sleepy and weak. He gradually subsides, never to see the light of day again.

That was the tragedy that the crew of this vessel faced, that the rest of us can pretend to ignore. They were trapped within the overturned hulk of a seagoing freighter on December 25, 1979.

Meanwhile, at the Rescue Co-ordination Centre in Victoria, the distress signal had been heard and reported. It was a clearly coded distress signal, "SOS-EEC". The men at the co-ordination centre, however, took almost an hour to identify the ship. This is not necessarily their fault because they did not have an up-to-date copy of the international directory of ships' call signs and so could not identify the vessel. The identification is important because that is the only way the ship's name could be determined and thus its point of departure and the course it was taking.

At the coroner's inquest which took place in January and February of 1980, evidence was presented that a coastguard helicopter located in Prince Rupert, only 60 kilometres from the scene of the accident, did not become airborne until three hours after the first SOS signal was received. It was not until Boxing Day, 32 hours after the mayday signal, that the first coastguard vessel arrived on the scene. It had been undergoing a refit and had to be put back together before they could proceed to sea.

No attempt was made by the Rescue Co-ordination Centre to seek the help of Rescue 15, a group of 40 volunteer boaters operating out of Prince Rupert. If they had been asked, they would have been willing to respond to the first mayday signal. Indeed, they did obey a coastguard directive in the book of rules which prohibits self-dispatching. They stayed home. What kind of directive is it that prevents people from going to the assistance of their fellowmen?

A tugboat, the Cindy Mozel could have responded within an hour of the mayday call, not 32 hours, but it was not called. In fact, no general mayday call was relayed on all frequencies after the signal had been translated.

At Canadian Forces Base, Comox, the Labrador helicopters are normally on two-hour standby. That is how long it takes to get them in the air during off hours. It is a policy dictated by Ottawa and applied across Canada. On that day, however, it would have taken three and one-half or four hours to get the aircraft up there and then they would have had to refuel at Prince Rupert. The helicopters were not ready. They are reported to have been under repair at the time.

Eventually the Rescue Co-ordination Centre called for a United States helicopter based in Sitka, Alaska, because the United States had the equipment and the trained search and rescue personnel available.

Why do I call for an independent inquiry, Mr. Speaker? It is in part because other startling testimony was presented to the inquest which is documented in the coroner's report. The duty watch officer was not called to testify. This testimony was given by the commanding officer. The coastguard maintained that the crew died instantly and that therefore any rescue attempt would have been futile. What kind of an attitude is that, Mr. Speaker, to decide the time of death before the facts are known? There was a long distance assumption that there would be no ship in the area and therefore the relay of the mayday message was deemed to be unnecessary. This was testimony at the coroner's inquest. The Rescue Co-ordination Centre decided to delay help on the assumption that conditions were too rough. If you do not know where the vessel is or you only have a rough idea, how can you assume that conditions are too rough? The circumstances of the Lee Wang Zin are tragic indeed. I do not want to finger any particular individuals in these departments; the matter is in the past. But the threat of error rests in a whole series of problems, including inadequate equipment, delays in getting started, errors of judgment, procedural mistakes, refusals of offers of assistance from other vessels in the area, improper telephone numbers and communication problems.

These difficulties are not restricted to the Lee Wang Zin tragedy. They are common to many accidents in recent years on the west coast, most of which go unnoticed here in Ottawa because they involve fewer lives. But in any event, the problems are similar. They boil down to a question of distance and time. Can we get to the scene fast enough and do we have the required rescue equipment in order to get into the water to keep those people alive before it is too late?

This blood and guts attitude, characteristic of the British lifeboat system, of the volunteer system and of the Canadian Armed Forces personnel when they jump out of a helicopter into the water, and this eagerness of people to be involved in saving another person's life is what is important in mounting an effective search and rescue service. It has been characterized by one well-known and not too popular spokesman on the west coast that Canada's search and rescue operations are managed as follows: "They have one guy doing a job and ten guys slinging paper".

I want to tell you now about a 17-year-old girl named Sandra Klein. A year or two ago Sandra and her father were patrolling in the Gulf Islands. They were called to a scene of a burning sailboat. They were closer than any other vessel. She travelled single handedly in a 17-foot Boston whaler at speeds of 25 to 30 knots across 17 miles in 27 minutes. She arrived at the scene of the burning sailboat. There was no one on board. She spotted a floating form in the water. At the same time she noted adjacent to her on the scene there was a navy vessel, the YMR-4. This navy vessel did not have a small enough boat to launch into the water. The crew were clustered in the bow looking at the floating casualty. Sandra Klein jumped into the icy water. She supported the man and applied mouth-to-mouth resuscitation and applied it continuously as they were both lifted from the water by the navy vessel. That is an act of valour. Subsequently Sandra's act of valour was acknowledged by the Governor General by the granting of an award to this 17-year-old girl for her efforts in saving a man's life while the navy looked on.

I think this speaks of the change of attitude which is required in the delivery of search and rescue, particularly on our west coast.

Just this morning Lieutenant-General K. E. Lewis, Commander Air Command responsible for search and rescue at a conference in Ottawa in response to a question said, "Search and rescue is a highly visible and high profile operation." Therefore, decisions as to the involvement of Armed Forces Reserve units, or for that matter auxiliary assistance, were a matter of political consideration.

In his written presentation to the conference Lieutenant-General Lewis commended west coast search and rescue for assisting in the saving of 519 passengers' lives on the Prinzendam which burned in the Gulf of Alaska in Canadian waters last fall. His written presentation in part states:

> It is of interest to note that 442 squadron was notified at 0500 on a Saturday morning and within 3 hours was able to launch two Buffaloes, two Labrador helicopters and a full medical team.

I submit that two hours is not enough. It is too much time. When people are in cold water, particularly in winter weather, they are susceptible to hypothermia which is fatal within a half an hour, and a two-hour standby is far too long.

The government spent almost $3 million last year on west coast search and rescue to handle 4,200 rescue calls. That is approximately 12 calls each day year round, including winter time. The budget allows some $650 per incident in terms of funding for the main search and rescue exercise. The volunteers who are trying to organize along the lines of the British lifeboat brigade who use their own vessels and equipment are reimbursed $30 per incident.

These people recently approached the government requesting an increase to $70 per incident. That is one-tenth of what the gold-plated system consumes. They wanted only $70 per incident to meet the fuel expenses, to buy a radio, to provide rescue equipment on their private craft, but it was refused. These people are ready and willing to assist in search and rescue, but the government appears to provide very little assistance. Indeed, it treats these individuals as amateurs in some respects. Statements have been made. One individual was told when he was asked to stand down and not attend the scene of an incident that the taxpayer would rather have a government vessel do the work. That is typical of our society these days, isn't it, Mr. Speaker? Where is the spirit of voluntarism going?

Most individuals who are willing to participate in these rescue efforts are experienced on the water, whether they are fishermen, salvagers, pleasure boat operators, ferry captains, tow boat operators or others. These people can provide a valuable service if encouraged. The reluctance of national defence, coastguard and rescue co-ordination centres to utilize the services of Rescue 15, a group of 40 volunteers in Prince Rupert on Christmas Day a year ago should be proof that something is wrong within the system. As I have already said, the coastguard has issued a directive ordering volunteers not to respond to calls unless they are dispatched. It might cost the government another $30.

I had a most enjoyable week in Wales visiting British lifeboat stations, touring the watch stations, and the radio monitoring systems. Their rescue boats are maintained just as fire engines are maintained by a volunteer fire department. They polish brass, but they are there to provide beach watch and marine safety training to their communities. These stations are spaced ten to 20 miles apart along the coast. They can get to the scene of an accident in ten or 20 minutes, not two to four hours. This closely linked network of volunteer operated rescue stations has to be developed in Canada on both coasts working in co-operation—not being obstructed—by the formal search and rescue services administered by the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport.

We have just learned that a new rescue station is to be opened at Ganges on Saltspring Island. That station is 12 miles from the main shipping lane. It has cost over $400,000 in start-up capital. It is three miles from the open water and the main shipping lane is where most of our major and tragic marine incidents have occurred in B.C. Why was that station located 12 miles from the main shipping lane? That makes no sense. Why have we no float-equipped rescue aircraft with paradrop teams equipped with scuba gear available and on standby? Why do we have hovercraft that cannot move in a 70-mile-per-hour wind? Why do we have 100-foot cutters when we need more small fast boats with low freeboard to get to the scene of a floating person whose life needs to be saved?

I see that my time has come to an end. I wish the ministers were present today. I had been advised that they would be. However, I want to urge them to initiate an independent commission of inquiry, not another government review, into the whole state of the delivery of search and rescue services on the west coast where the city of Vancouver is located, the second busiest port in North America, second only to New York. We have in excess of 200,000 pleasure boaters, 5,000 or 6,000 commercial fishing boats, and many hundreds of thousands of people on the water the year round. Their lives are more important than the gold braid or anything else.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, first, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) on an excellent presentation and on making some very valid points on a very worth-while motion. I certainly hope that there will be sufficient time to vote on this motion.

The question which we must address in terms of search and rescue and the outline which the previous speaker gave concerning the tragic events surrounding the Lee Wang Zin are certainly very pertinent. However, it is history, and what is important now is to learn the lesson and to try to rectify the situation which led up to the incident. I should like to suggest that the first lesson to learn with the Lee Wang Zin is that one ounce of prevention is worth a ton of cure. That was a rust bucket which was sent to sea out of Queen Charlotte after loading in conditions which should never have occurred. A flag of convenience was deliberately set up so that the owners would never have to compensate for an accident. The first thing to remember is that we have a long-term commitment to the prevention of accidents at sea and in the air. That is the first order of business.

The second major flaw in the Lee Wang Zin incident is the fact that that ship was 12 miles offshore, within easy reach and flying distance of a helicopter. When the Department of National Defence, in spite of all their communication problems, launched their helicopters, they were unable to provide rescue service for those people. They went there simply to pick up the bodies, if they ever did get there. The first aircraft to go were the Buffalo. After three hours in the water, anybody found would be either dead or in very bad shape. You cannot rescue anybody out of a Buffalo. You have to be able to deliver a helicopter.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the first priority on the coast of British Columbia is to distribute along the coast the five helicopters which have been committed to Comox in such a way that there is an hour or less flying time between that helicopter and any area where an incident might occur. Both Boeing-Vertol which produces the helicopters used by the armed forces and Sikorsky which produced the helicopter at Prince Rupert, state that the costs to locate those bases around the coast of B.C. and refit the helicopters to be operated on those bases would be well under $10 million. In a proposal which I submitted for comment, I suggested that three helicopters remain at Comox, one be placed at the Canadian Armed Forces station at Holberg at the north end of Vancouver Island, and one at the Canadian forces station at Masset, and the Sikorsky air force helicopter be refitted for marine rescue service, be seconded to the armed forces for crewing and be used as a helicopter primarily for search and rescue out of Prince Rupert, with an effective, trained crew on it. If that were done along the coast of British Columbia and southeast Alaska, it would mean that there would never be a marine incident or a medical evacuation less than one hour's flying time away.

I myself and most of the people I have spoken to in this business—and I have travelled from Alaska all the way up and down the coast of British Columbia and through the state of Washington looking at coast guard search and rescue facilities—believe that helicopters are the key. You have to be able to deliver a crew to the site who can effect the rescue and provide the services there.

Next, we must consider the business of volunteers. We use helicopters at Comox and Buffalo aircraft during the spring, summer and fall months for searches of downed aircraft, and this consumes thousands of hours of search time. Two summers ago two aircraft were lost, one between Kamloops and Vancouver, which is a massive area, a mountainous terrain, and the other one was lost somewhere in the Terrace area. These two aircraft were searched for by the Canadian Armed Forces aircraft and also by a group set up by the provincial emergency program, an air patrol.

Eventually they found the aircraft at an absolute fraction of the cost, with more aircraft in the air and trained people working under supervision of search masters, and they did an excellent job. The point made by my colleague, the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta, is valid, that, in addition to placing those helicopters along the coast of British Columbia, the hard edge of a rescue service is delivered within an hour.

The second point is that a volunteer service, particularly a province-wide civil air patrol which can participate, be organized. They can get on the job as soon as the ELT goes off, as soon as the emergency is put in. They can begin the search and they can start covering the territory. It takes the armed forces, in some cases, 24 hours before they get a ground base and a search pattern set up, the aircraft refueled and ready to go. Then there is the tremendous expense of those searches to be considered.

Mention was made of the Klein family, Horst, his wife and daughter. The points made about them were absolutely true and, in fact, understated the event to the nth degree. There was a number of difficult rescues in which that family had participated. It is astounding. They were the first people on the scene when the ferry, the Queen of Alberni, was grounded at Active Pass. They were the first ones there to render assistance, and what is amazing is that they did not receive any information from the rescue co-ordination centre. They picked this information off a commercial broadcast on CKNW and then wound up in Active Pass as the first people to render assistance on the scene.

Sandra has been involved in a number of diving exploits which, unfortunately, have not been as successful, but these were difficult and dangerous commitments for which she was awarded a medal of substantial merit. What is really required, of course, is a marine organization across the entire coast of British Columbia which is properly equipped and given adequate recompense for out of pocket expenses. You cannot run a 180 on $30 for an event. You need so much an hour to cover fuel, the wearing down of your engine, oil, maintenance, and what not. If the government were to realistically pay these people to go out on air and marine searches, it would save thousands of dollars.

Many of the pilots who engage in those search operations are former members of the armed forces. They are expert fliers and they have had tremendous experience in searching and mountain flying. They have the qualifications to do the job. The people who are involved in Rescue-15, in the group in the Queen Charlottes, in the group on the central coast out of Bella Bella, in Powell River, in Campbell River, in the north Island, in the Gold River, all the way up and down the coast, are represented by people with tremendous qualifications and experience in the marine environment, whether they are fishermen, tugboat personnel or experienced mariners.

Then there is this problem of adequately equipping volunteers. The Canadian Marine Rescue Association is in its formative stage. It has not jelled yet, but it is certainly under way. I think more consideration should be given to the kind of training, assistance and budget which the government could provide, and especially to the equipment given those people. If it is inadequate, they cannot do the job.

I will give you just one example. Most of the people who work out of Bella Bella are quite familiar with the marine environment and with their own area. The minute a problem comes up in the area, if someone is lost—and this happened in the middle of winter last year during the election campaign—they come to the rescue. We were stranded there because of freezing cold winds building up ice on the aircraft which, as a result, could not fly. A couple of people were lost. Those people managed to set up a search locally. They checked all the places where they were likely to be.

The armed forces sent a helicopter, but it was not equipped with a radio which would allow them to talk to the provincial emergency program on the ground. As a result, they searched the whole area which had already been searched and they were not able to check the places where it was likely the people were lost. It is an unfortunate situation, but in these cases the first priority is for helicopters. We have to distribute them along the coast in order to cut down the response time. The second thing we must do is strengthen our commitment and make an investment now to save thousands, if not millions later on, in the volunteer service there.

I have made some very definite statements on the events surrounding the Prinzendam. I think that anyone would admit that had the oil tanker not been there to provide a base from which the aircraft could operate, 500 people would have been lost at the bottom of the sea. It was a happy incident or coincident that an oil tanker was there to act as a helicopter platform to work from and to evacuate the people. That, in my opinion, was the only thing that saved the lives of the people on that ship. Otherwise they would have been at the bottom of the sea. The Lee Wang Zin incident is history and we have to learn from that.

Out of that Lee Wang Zin incident particularly we must learn, and I would congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) for being open and frank in that regard. I think the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta was a little bit in error regarding the person in charge of the rescue co-ordination. He did not wind up having to testify. It was a junior coastguard officer who wound up testifying. The officer in charge was never exposed to a public inquiry at the coroner's inquest as to why this occurred. The Department of National Defence did its own in-house investigation. I attempted on many occasions to obtain that report. They refused to give it out. The Minister of Transport did make the report public as well as supplying staff to testify at the coroner's inquest. This gave people an insight into what had actually happened.

In the rescue services and marine pollution response of the coastguard of the United States, they have two kinds of interesting aspects and the first relates to helicopters. If somebody is missing, a boat is immediately dispatched to where they were anticipated to be. A phone search is made to make sure the missing person had not landed. This is immediately instituted. At that point, three people go out to the helicopter and the helicopter is warmed up. If there is not a firm response that those people have been found in 30 minutes, that helicopter takes off and heads off to the point.

That does not happen in Canada. We wait hours and hours sometimes before those things are launched. They should be on 24-hour standby and they should be looking at a 30-minute launch time or as soon as they can clarify a likely position.

The other thing the Americans have that we could learn from is their simulation exercise. The Lee Wang Zin accident was absolute chaos. They did not know whether they were punched, bored or chewed out by the rats as it came out in the final analysis. We could learn from those mistakes and we should learn from them.

I was not able to take part in an observation exercise in the United States, but I know they run simulation programs. They simulate an accident and bring in people who are involved from the coastguard, the navy, the air force and others from the public who have expertise. They examine the situation on closed video criticizing how the rescue program was handled and then make suggestions as to how they could improve this kind of response. This hones the edge to a very effective one.

In southeast Alaska and on the south coast of British Columbia, especially around Victoria and the southwest part of Vancouver Island, your chances are excellent of being rescued by an American helicopter if you run into difficulty, but your chances are not so good if you are being rescued by a Canadian helicopter which is probably stationed no greater distance away.

I should like to qualify those remarks. I know personally of events and incidents in which members of 442 Squadron at Comox have been involved. It is acknowledged even in the American coastguard that Canadians are capable of more activities than even they are. For example, if someone is in the water, no one from a U.S. coastguard helicopter will go into the water after him. You either get on the hook or you are in big trouble. They may get a navy diver to get in after you. The fellows in the 442 have training second to none in the world and their accomplishments have been excellent.

Our big problem relates to inadequate equipment. Resources applied to the program are inadequate. Consequently, the job cannot be done. This is basically a government problem involving helicopter distribution, response and the way we treat volunteers. We should invest in that very valuable resource, the people who want to participate.

The third priority is co-ordinating government resources. There are 14 federal government helicopters on the coast of British Columbia. There have been occasions when we could not get one into the air to look for someone. Even if we can get one into the air, often it cannot get to the scene in time.

On a beautiful night in the September before last, there were two people on a fish boat off the north end of the Queen Charlotte Islands, not too far from Prince Rupert. The moon was bright and the water was calm. One fellow fell overboard while trying to make a repair to the side of the ship. They radioed in and that was it. They never got a helicopter out and they never did find him. On that occasion, in beautiful weather, they were unable to respond.

We have 14 helicopters and something like 200 federal government vessels on the west coast of British Columbia, and we are not making effective use of those resources. I do not want to beat on the issue any longer about the Canadian coastguard helicopter at Prince Rupert, but it is an excellent machine and, in my opinion, it ought to be converted immediately for search and rescue. It ought to be seconded to the Canadian Armed Forces to be used for coastguard purposes, except when there is a search and rescue emergency at which time it should go out on that, without question, with a fully trained crew capable of finding and rescuing people.

Let me make just a few more points before I conclude. A lot of people in British Columbia tend to have a very negative response toward these facilities because of fragmentation, poor use of resources, and the inability to deliver a rescue platform in an effective time and I suggest it stems from small things like this.

Two weeks ago there was a phone call from people responsible for assisting British Columbians during the time of disasters such as flooding. There were areas in my riding which could not be reached by this provincial emergency group. They phoned the Canadian Armed Forces and asked if it could send a helicopter because they were unaware of what had happened to the people in the area. All communications had been cut off, but they knew there were extraordinary flooding conditions. The first thing the people in the Air Force asked was: "Who is going to pay for this?" That was the first word out of that mouth on the phone: "Are you authorized to pay for this?" I pay for that helicopter, everyone here and everyone in this country pays for it. The reason we pay for it is to have it available to respond immediately to an emergency situation. The first thing that should be done is the helicopter should be airborne immediately, go directly to the area and later there should be consideration about the transfer of funds.

How do British Columbians feel about the federal government's rescue resources and the services provided? When that is the first question asked, we do not feel very good about it, especially if you have watched a number of people die unnecessarily in the water.

I have been beating away at this point for two years. I have produced two reports and a basic outline for discussion. I have also produced a study into helicopters and the cost of placing them out, again for discussion. I think over a period of time the government's attitude has been changed. The opinion of former minister Otto Lang was that rescue services at sea are voluntary services provided for centuries by other ships at sea. From that point, we have seen a change. The government has undergone a helicopter upgrading program. The government has made a commitment to buy a 170-foot vessel and a commitment to station a number of 21-metre vessels in the area. The government has put in place an inshore rescue boat program which has answered about one-fifth of the incidents which have occurred off the coast of British Columbia and has undertaken an education program directed toward that very area of prevention. The government has also involved more extensively its other resources. The vessel traffic management system is now an effective resource. All of southwestern British Columbia, with a combination of aircraft, hovercraft and vessels, has access to these services. So the government deserves some credit. It is aware of this issue but not in the way Otto Lang was. I think it is seriously concerned.

● (1640)

However, this government has not gone far enough or fast enough. People are still in jeopardy because of poor rescue services. Helicopters and their proper distribution are vital, and the government has been receiving letters from every municipality and regional district along the coast asking that that program be put in place. The government must make use of voluntary services in order to make this program effective. Finally, we must get to the point where we are co-ordinating more effectively. We should not be empire-building in separate government departments. There should be more effective co-ordination. I suggest that would come about through a more efficient use of resources. There should be closer co-ordination between departments and the designation of another primary respondent other than the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne). There should be simulation exercises in which members of the public and trained professionals participate so that they can criticize what is going on.

I will sit down in the hope that the proposal of the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta will be accepted.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on behalf of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), who intended to be here, but was prevented from being here in the last couple of hours because of weather conditions in the part of the province of Quebec he is visiting today. I want to tell the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) that the minister had fully intended to be here, until a couple of hours ago.

I am pleased to rise on behalf of the minister and to make some comments in relation to the subject before the House. I think I have said on a previous occasion in relation to the exercise we are involved in now that I find the private members' hour to be perhaps one of the more valuable periods provided for in our Standing Orders. In the last 40 minutes, I have heard more thought-provoking suggestions from my friends across the floor than we hear in other debates in this chamber.

Let me say on behalf of the minister that any suggestion by a responsible citizen that any important government service, particularly one dedicated to the saving of life and the reduction of suffering, is deficient in its administration or operations is one which must be closely examined. The motion before the House certainly implies such a situation, and the reaction of the government is, of course, one of concern.

The Canadian forces, with their high readiness posture and ability to respond fairly rapidly in emergencies, are charged with the task of the operational co-ordination of rescue services. These services are provided from four rescue centres situated at Halifax, Trenton, Edmonton and Victoria. The Department of National Defence also furnishes air resources to each region, including special aircraft, helicopters and trained crews. Other defence aircraft, the primary task of which is not search and rescue, frequently participate in searches as a secondary role, as do aircraft from other government departments and those provided by many civilian pilots across the country.

The Department of Transport is the other major partner in this activity. The coastguard provides marine specialists in the co-ordination centres and vessels for marine operations. Crews and vessels from other departments are also available as required.

I mention these details in order to show that search and rescue cannot be handled by any one organization but must, if it is to be efficient and not prohibitively expensive, take advantage of all suitable vehicles the owners and operators of which are willing and available to assist in the endeavour.

It is a matter of record that in the past 12 months the people at rescue co-ordination centres and in operational search and rescue units across the country have responded to about 10,000 requests for assistance. It is a tribute to the knowledge, experience and dedication of those personnel that such a job can be done, and done so well. Their jobs call for very rapid evaluations of situations, often involving scant details and committing valuable resources which could well be more urgently needed elsewhere at the drop of a hat and risking their own lives to save those of fellow human beings.

This is the daily lot of search and rescue practitioners because accidents at sea and in the air have an uncanny habit of occurring in the most forbidding terrain, on rough seas and generally in adverse weather conditions.

Accidental loss of life under any circumstances is tragic. However, we must face the reality that regardless of the number of resources assigned to our national search and rescue program, it is not always possible to save all the lives, as much as that is our objective.

It is with that sense of reality in mind that following a major government review of marine search and rescue in 1976 two major decisions were taken which are now proving their worth. The first of these was to form an interdepartmental committee on search and rescue to advise ministers on policy, planning, resources and effectiveness. It is jointly chaired by members of the Department of National Defence and Transport Canada and involves officials from a number of other government departments.

The second decision was that the government would embark on a rational, sensible and credible continuing program to improve substantially search and rescue procedures and resource availability right across the country.

In order that the government might control the management of search and rescue regularly, the committee was directed to provide for review by ministers an annual plan in which the need for primary search and rescue response is identified.

Since 1976, five such plans have been produced. As a part of their development, a detailed analysis of the needs of each region is performed by local specialists who are familiar with prevailing conditions. These regional analyses are then reviewed by the appropriate departments of government, resulting in a consolidated national plan with recommendations for improvement. This plan is then reviewed by the interdepartmental committee to which I referred. It is ultimately referred to cabinet for decision.

Let me outline very briefly a few of the more important initiatives which have resulted from these two decisions I have mentioned since 1976.

First, the government directed an in-depth review of the co-ordination centres, which has recently been completed. A number of recommendations are already being implemented. I refer to such recommendations as functional relationships between Canadian forces and Canadian coastguard personnel in the centres, streamlining of procedures and changes to regional boundaries.

Second, the coastguard has developed an ongoing five-year acquisition and replacement program for search and rescue vessels, which is working out very well.

Third, while it is not possible to buy literally off the shelf a rescue helicopter which will meet particularly unique Canadian needs, in 1976 the government directed that the majority of the existing rescue helicopters be modified to provide improved foul weather day and night capability. The initial phase, involving improved communications, navigation equipment and external illumination, was completed three years later, in 1979. The second phase, which is now in progress, is providing longer-range capability for these helicopters, a much superior rescue hoist, radar to facilitate poor weather search and better radio communications with vessels. This will be complete by 1984.

Fourth, in 1977 the North American search and rescue business suffered a major setback when an unforeseen hazard surfaced in the batteries of the emergency locator transmitters.

These devices, which provide early warning of distress for both aircraft and ships, had to be withdrawn from universal use in the aviation community. As a result of persistent work by the interdepartmental committee, I have recently been advised by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) that he anticipates these devices will again be universally carried in light aircraft by the end of the present year. Provided regulations are rigorously enforced, this will be the single most significant factor in speeding up rescue in air distress. It will save lives and reduce suffering. It will also save flying hours expended each year searching for crash locations not pinpointed by the emergency locator transmitters to which I referred. This in turn will make crews and aircraft available to respond to other distress calls.

Fifth, Canada is participating in the international search and rescue satellite-aided tracking project. When emergency locator transmitters are in full use, this project will enable early warning of distress and quick localization of ELT signals. The system will begin testing and evaluation with the launch of the first satellite in 1982. When this ambitious project becomes operational, it will reduce significantly the loss of life and suffering involved in air and marine disasters.

The Department of National Defence has examined the adequacy of air response to marine and air incidents across the country. While concluding that current location of resources, their numbers and state of readiness are adequate, certain areas for improvement have been identified. In April, when considering the 1982-83 plan, cabinet will decide how best these improvements can be made.

I should like to use my remaining time to address more particularly the concern raised by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta. I thought it was important by way of general background to inform the House of some of the initiatives which the department, in collaboration with other affected departments, have been taking especially since these two important decisions of 1976 which underlie the present search and rescue thrust. Cabinet has been concerned with the situation on the west coast because the marine activity level is high and in the northern portion of the west coast there has been a small but significant concentration of marine distress incidents which is increasing annually. In December, cabinet approved a recommendation in the 1981-82 plan for a detailed review of the region. This will soon be conducted by members of the Canadian forces and the coastguard.

Our operational capability on the west coast is already high, and the following two examples clearly illustrate its flexibility. The first example has already been referred to by both previous speakers, the Prinzendam disaster from which 519 people were rescued without any loss of life in very adverse weather conditions. It is significant that in the southern portion of the region the coastguard hovercraft at Vancouver frequently responds to distress in United States waters. Similarly, Victoria can and does obtain the services of United States coastguard helicopters on standby at Port Angeles, Washington and Sitka, Alaska. This bilateral arrangement is both effective and economical.

On December 27 and 28 the squadron on Comox was asked to provide two helicopters to assist in the rescue of over 100 people caught in the flooding at Squamish, British Columbia. This work was hazardous, especially during the night. The rescue was successful because crews were available at short notice, because of their skill in aircraft handling under extreme conditions, and because of the competence of the rescue technicians who had to work in diving gear at the end of lifelines and in total darkness.

Also, I should mention at this point that the rigorous analysis of all factors involved in search and rescue incidents on the west coast has enabled the rescue organization to cope very effectively with unusually high peak demands over the last few years. In particular, I refer to the herring roe season when through a combination of education, prevention, and enforcement and judicious deployment of resources, we have been able to reduce considerably the number of lives lost during this relatively new and hectic activity. I believe this is further proof that the administrative system instituted in 1976 is bringing concrete results by ensuring a flexible response to changing requirements and a better utilization and co-ordination of all available resources; not only those of the government but also private resources which happen to be in the vicinity of an emergency.

In spite of the high confidence the government places in the operational capability of the people and resources on the west coast, the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport have examined independently the peculiar problem of northern British Columbia, in particular the Prince Rupert area, in so far as search and rescue are concerned. These examinations have confirmed that the assignment of dedicated coastguard vessels to this area this year and in following years will provide for effective responses to maritime distress.

We on this side of the House are not insensitive to the significant and tragic loss of life which has occurred off the west coast. At the same time, it has been determined that some of the loss could not have been avoided, even with unlimited resources. Nevertheless, a closer study of the requirements for air resources is necessary and will take place early this year.

The regular activities of the interdepartmental committee, the annual review of search and rescue by ministers, the significant progress achieved over the past four years by this process, and the record of achievements by search and rescue personnel, their vessels and their aircraft, do not reflect any need at this time for an independent commission of inquiry. On the contrary, current government policy is already ensuring regular, orderly and effective progress toward improving the probability of rescuing the passengers and crews of aircraft and vessels in distress situations. Therefore, the government must conclude that the proposed independent inquiry would be unnecessary, costly and disruptive to the continuous review and upgrading process I have described. For this reason I want to inform the members who have spoken in this debate that it is not the intention of the Department of National Defence to entertain such a proposal at this time.

In conclusion, the House will understand that my first responsibility during the past few minutes was to speak on behalf of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) and to inform members of the thinking of the Department of National Defence on the issues raised by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta. If time would have permitted, I would have addressed myself, as a Newfoundlander, to the subject of search and rescue as it affects the Atlantic coast. There are a number of issues in that regard which need to be aired, but I decided to discharge my first responsibility and respond as directly as possible to the concerns raised by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta and the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). Let me assure both members that their concerns will be scrutinized by the Minister of National Defence and others who are concerned about this important subject. If something needs to be pursued, I assure these members that it will be.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Siddon: Why didn't you listen?

Mr. Simmons: It is curious that the only time one gets the attention of some gentlemen opposite is when they agree with what is being said. For the rest of the time for some reason they enter into unfortunate obstructive tactics.

Mr. Dinsdale: You are filibustering.

Mr. Simmons: I have never viewed the important subject of lifesaving as any partisan issue. We on this side of the House—and I hope we have the support of everyone in the chamber—intend to latch on to whatever—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Question, question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

AMERICAN HOSTAGES IN IRAN—CONGRATULATIONS ON CONCLUSION OF NEGOTIATIONS FOR RELEASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the news that the United States and Iranian governments have reached agreement on the release of the American hostages in Iran, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House, on behalf of the people of Canada, extends its congratulations to President Carter and the government of the United States for the successful conclusion of negotiations for the release of the hostages; and wishes that the Americans be reunited with family and friends in the very near future. And that this House also extends its congratulations and appreciation to the Algerian government for the key role it played in the resolution of this difficult international crisis.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

McDONNELL DOUGLAS—ALLOCATION OF WORK UNDER CF-18A CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The most efficient plant for the production of wing and tail assemblies for aircraft in perhaps all of North America and, indeed, the world, is the McDonnell Douglas plant in Mississauga. Evidence of that is the fact that it is virtually the exclusive supplier of this equipment to McDonnell Douglas for the production of DC-9 and DC-10 aircraft. But something has happened and the work for the F-18 Hornet will not go to that plant but to some other plant which may not be as efficient. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That this House direct the minister responsible for the allocation of work under the F-18 contract to have the work done at the most efficient plant and, with respect to wing and tail assembly, at the McDonnell Douglas plant in Mississauga, Ontario.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIVE RIGHTS

CALL FOR RECOGNITION IN PROPOSED CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's commendable statement that there must be a "revolution in international morality" and that we must create "the feeling that we have an obligation" to the Third World, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the Prime Minister lead a revolution in Canadian political morality and indicate his willingness to recognize Canada's historic obligation to our aboriginal peoples and to include a positive recognition of their rights in Canada's new constitution.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CF-18A CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION OF BIDS FROM CANADIAN COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas McDonnell Douglas Corporation last Friday laid off several hundred workers in Malton, bringing their total laid off to over 600 since last summer, and whereas contracts for parts for the CF-18 aircraft are now being allocated, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield):

That the government give full and fair consideration to bids from Malton, Rexdale and Brampton aerospace companies in order to reinforce full employment and economic strength in this productive industry.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the said motion?

ABORTIONS

REPORTED INCREASE IN NUMBER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on behalf of those whose voices cannot be heard. Given the appalling figures released the week before Christmas by Stats-Canada which show a further alarming increase in the use of abortion as a means of population control, and specifically noting that 18 innocent children were sacrificed by abortion last year for every 100 live births, with 34 abortions for every 100 live births in my province of British Columbia alone, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) and endorsed by many members of this House with whom I have spoken:

That this House stand in silence for two minutes, in memory of the 65,135 innocent Canadian human infants whose lives were taken away by abortion during the past year; and furthermore this House admits, to its shame, that these acts have been taken with the consent of the Government of Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

NORMAN WELLS-ZAMA LAKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the unconscionable delays occasioned by Liberal footdragging on the granting of permission to construct the proposed Norman Wells-Zama Lake pipeline which have caused serious economic hardships and uncertainty in the Mackenzie district, as well as setting back Canada's goals of energy self-sufficiency and job creation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That permission to expand the Norman Wells oilfield and construct the Norman Wells-Zama Lake pipeline be granted as expeditiously as possible.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

THE CONSTITUTION—CALL FOR PROGRAM DELAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last week the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) confirmed that the government has another constitutional advertising campaign ready to go in the media of this country. In the name of national unity and common sense I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the government not to proceed with advertising relating to the constitution while the proposed resolution dealing with the constitution is being considered by the Parliament of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SPORTS

CONGRATULATIONS TO NATIONAL SKI TEAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that a Canadian skier, Steve Podborski, won his third consecutive downhill ski race in Austria last weekend, and in view of the fact that no North American athlete since Nancy Green has been able to duplicate this feat, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette):

That this House, on behalf of the people of Canada, acknowledge the importance of the contribution made by Mr. Podborski and the Canadian ski team to Canada's international sports reputation, and domestically to our national pride and self-esteem.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is a congratulatory motion. I see that the feelings of the House toward this great skier are tremendous, but I feel we should not have congratulatory motions under Standing Order 43.

EMPLOYMENT

CALL FOR DEVELOPMENT OF JOB-CREATION STRATEGIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion, under Standing Order 43, of national, urgent and pressing economic necessity. Whereas the chief effect of this government's economic policies to date has been a net reduction in private sector real job creation of 75 per cent in one year, and whereas this morning's announcement of support for those communities hardest hit by industrial lay-offs, while welcome, will solve only a very small part of the problem, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That this House instruct the government to convene immediately a national conference of representatives of business, labour and government to develop job-creation strategies never more urgently needed for Canada than now.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

CALL FOR AMENDMENT OF SECTION 45—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas there are 29 health units in Alberta, and whereas there are a considerable number of first-aid stations and nursing units throughout Canada, all of which provide essential services including preventative health services, emergency first-aid services and ongoing medical assistance; and whereas under section 45 of the Excise Tax Act the units do not qualify for exemption from federal sales tax as bona fide public institutions, therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House give consideration to changing the eligibility criteria under section 45 of the Excise Tax Act in order to allow exemption of these units as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAN—INQUIRY RESPECTING POSSIBLE LIFTING OF ECONOMIC SANCTIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the imminent release of the American hostages in Iran. Could the Prime Minister indicate to this House when and under what conditions he is prepared to lift the economic sanctions imposed by Canadian governments against the Islamic Republic of Iran?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we now have an agreement between the government of Iran and the government of the United States. To the best of our information, the hostages have not as yet taken off from Tehran airport. Since we said the sanctions would be imposed during the period of flouting of international law, I will certainly be recommending to my colleagues that we remove the sanctions relatively quickly. In Canada, unlike some other countries, it requires legislative action because it took legislative action to impose the sanctions. Therefore, I believe we will have to have legislation in the House to do that.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will want to check all aspects of that answer to be sure that he was not inadvertently in error in part of it.

IRAN—INQUIRY RESPECTING POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF FULL DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me, therefore, direct a policy question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister indicate when and under what conditions he would, as the head of the government, intend to resume normal and full diplomatic relations with Iran?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I really cannot add anything to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already said. The policy we adopted at the time of the hostage taking, first by the right hon. gentleman's government and then by mine, was in the context of putting pressure on Iran to release the hostages. It would be my thinking, and it is also the thinking of the Secretary of State for External Affairs judging by his answer, that when the hostages have been evacuated from Iran, which, incidentally, they have not yet been, we should then move toward a normalization of relations with Iran as soon as possible.

Oral Questions

IRAN—INQUIRY RESPECTING REPAYMENT OF DEBTS TO EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I direct my supplementary question either to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would ask whether one or the other minister of the Government of Canada could tell us whether the debts owed by the government of Iran to the Canadian Export Development Corporation are being repaid on schedule and whether the matter of compensation to that corporation and to Canadian firms who abandoned or who had projects cancelled in Iran prior to the downfall of the regime of the Shah will be settled prior to the resumption of normal and full diplomatic and commercial relations with Iran.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice. However, I would think that if there are outstanding problems relating to our economic relations with Iran we would want to take them into consideration before deciding to repeal the special act that we passed.

UNITED STATES—INQUIRY WHETHER MEETING WITH PRESIDENT-ELECT PLANNED—RENEGOTIATION OF EAST COAST FISHERIES TREATY

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister who on his recent trip was able to visit certain countries but, as we all know, was unable to visit certain others. Among these hits and misses was one opportunity which the Prime Minister missed, and that was in not accepting the offer of the President-elect of the United States to visit Ottawa in January. Because of the tremendous importance of our bilateral relations with the United States, can the Prime Minister now tell us what plans he has that are under way to meet with President-elect Reagan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, when the office of the President-elect suggested a meeting, it would have fallen in the time when I was toward the end of my Nigerian visit and at the beginning of the Senegalese one. I did not feel it was proper to ask these governments to set aside their meetings because the office of the President-elect suggested that there could be a meeting soon in his term of office. I believe discussions are ongoing between our ambassador, Mr. Towe, and the people in the entourage of President-elect Reagan; dates are being looked at but none has been suggested to me yet.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I hope we will have an early announcement of those dates, because I think all Canadians would like to see our relations with the United States become much firmer than they have been recently. On that basis I should like to direct a supplementary question to either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the remarks of the incoming secretary of state, Alexander Haig, the other day with regard to the east coast fisheries agreement when he said that the treaty would have to be renegotiated. This was further followed up by Senator Percy, who indicated that there would have to be concessions on both sides. Has the government indicated to the incoming administration that there is no interest in this country or in this Parliament, as we have served notice on three different occasions, of renegotiating that treaty, certainly not from a Canadian point of view since we feel it is basically a fair treaty to both sides the way it stands now?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. lady will realize the difficulty of doing both things suggested by her question at the same time. In the first part she suggested that relations with the United States should be improved, that they should be progressing, and even before the President-elect takes office she makes representations to the government that we should not budge an inch on the negotiations of the previous government. I am rather inclined to support the second part of the hon. lady's suggestion, but she must realize that in such matters, if we want to stand up for Canadian interests, we cannot assume it will always please the United States.

Mr. Clark: What a fraud!

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Perhaps he will remember—I will recall it to his memory—that on three different occasions the House passed unanimous motions that the east coast fisheries treaty should be accepted as it stands and should not be amended by arrangements with the United States Senate, such as Senator Percy seems to be working out with our Canadian ambassador in Washington. That is the kind of arrangement I would want the Prime Minister to signify that he is backing up from Canada's point of view—that there will be no concessions on the east coast fisheries treaty, that we will not give in either to pressure from the United States Senate or any other body, and I think the Prime Minister will find if he conveys that sentiment—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: Oh, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I should like the hon. member, especially since I gave her an opportunity to ask an extra question, to proceed with her question immediately.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. lady looks at my previous answer she will say that I agreed with her.

Miss MacDonald: There will be no concessions.

Mr. Trudeau: I was just pointing out that to take a very rigid stand in advance is not conducive to starting out, in the way she suggests, to improve relations with the United States.

Miss MacDonald: Of course it is.

Mr. Trudeau: That is all I pointed out. I remind the hon. lady that the fisheries treaty was negotiated under our government essentially by the minister of fisheries, the then secretary of state for external affairs, Mr. Jamieson, and with considerable help from the present Minister of Finance. It was something which was put together by our government and the administration of President Carter. Indeed the House supported it, and we are grateful for the support we have had from the opposition in this matter.

Miss MacDonald: Stick with it.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. lady urges me to "stick with it". I will bring the message and report it to President-elect Reagan the moment I see him.

Miss MacDonald: It may be six months away.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

COMMITMENTS TO THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question refers to the Prime Minister's recent trip and his recently expressed concern about the problems of the Third World. Would he explain briefly to the House why the Government of Canada has during the past decade failed almost completely to live up to its own commitment to the Third World and, given that failure, why does the Prime Minister expect the position of the Government of Canada now on the Third World to be at all taken seriously?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not think much that the government has done is taken seriously by the hon. gentleman's party, but I can assure him that the leaders of government and of state I have met on this recent trip do take the Government of Canada seriously. They do realize that we have not in the north—and Canada is one of the northern countries—progressed as much as they would like, but they recognize Canada's sincerity and our efforts in bringing the world closer to these solutions.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows full well that we are well behind virtually every Scandinavian country in this regard; we are behind The Netherlands and we are behind many, many other industrialized countries. Specifically, since it was his government which promised in 1975 the target of assistance to the Third World would be some .7 per cent of our GNP and that in each year since our contribution has fallen away from that target instead of toward it, to the extent that last year we gave about half what the government committed to give in the way of assistance to the Third World, will he tell the House whether the Government of Canada still stands by its commitment and, if so, when does it plan to live up to it?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the answer was given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a commitment he made publicly, I believe it was last month, that we would reach the figure of .5 per cent in 1985 and we planned to reach the .7 per cent figure by 1990. The hon. gentleman says that from 1975 on we have not progressed in proportional terms toward the goal I had set, and he is right. But he will recognize that from 1968 until, I believe, 1975 there was a considerable increase in absolute dollar terms and, of course, in proportion by the Canadian government and the Canadian people in contributing to the solution of the North-South dialogue through its CIDA program and others. So there has been progress.

I must remind the hon. member that around 1975 there was a particular series of economic difficulties which beset Canada and other of the developed countries and we fell victim to those. I can only express regret that we did not find more room in the budget to continue supporting the thrust of external aid in those years, but I would hope that, with the hon. gentleman's support, we will be able to do better in the future.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that in spite of the international financial difficulties to which he referred, since 1975 a number of other countries not only measured up to but in some cases exceeded their commitments. The Prime Minister has just said it is going to take until 1990, some 15 years, for the government to live up to its commitment made in 1975 to reach .7 per cent of GNP. That is almost as long as it is going to take the Government of Canada, if the Prime Minister's party remains in power, to get control of our own energy sector.

Since in the present year it is estimated some 450 million people throughout the world have a totally inadequate diet in terms of food, and since one of the things this country does very well is produce food, will the Prime Minister increase this year's budget for the world food program beyond what it now is and which in real dollars for 1981 is less than it was for last year? In other words, will the Government of Canada put up now and live up to some of its promises to the people throughout the world who badly need assistance?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, in the direction suggested by the hon. member I point out to him that just a few days ago in Senegal this government committed itself to an increase in its aid merely in the area of food to that country of some $5 million just to help them meet the present emergency. I of course agree that much more should be done in the field of agricultural aid. I discussed this problem, notably in Senegal and in Brazil. I must remind the hon. gentleman that food aid in this sense can be counterproductive, and this was well recognized in the report to which members of the hon. member's party subscribed, the recent report of the parliamentary committee on North-South relations. It was recognized that one must also assist agriculture in those countries and not just give food because that would tend to prevent them from solving their problem in the long run. The government is trying both to assist by food aid and also help through the transfer of agriculture and other technologies.

With respect to the hon. gentleman's preface, it is true that Canada is not among the leading nations in terms of its generosity in helping the Third World, but we are far from the worst. I think we are somewhat above the average of the OECD countries. I would accept support from the hon. member's party if he wants this government to reach the aim of .7 much sooner.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says "yes". Of course, he never has had and probably never will have the responsibility of governing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —but I am prepared to sit down with the Leader of the New Democratic Party or with his financial critic and find areas where we could cut expenditures in Canada in order to redivert funds to the Third World. I would be very happy to come up with a bilateral and hopefully even a trilateral agreement.

Mr. Lawrence: What about advertising for the constitution?

Mr. Broadbent: Okay, we will take you up on that.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, do rules of order apply to the Prime Minister or just to this side of the House?

Madam Speaker: I think the Right Hon. Prime Minister is waiting for the heckling to stop in order that he can continue to give his answer.

RECYCLING OF OPEC SURPLUSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Given that international trips to influence other leaders on North-South issues must be supported by strong policies at home, and given the latest report of the independent North-South Institute which said last week that Canada and the Canadian government had failed on 13 of the policies in the five-year-old international development strategy, can the Prime Minister now tell the House what priorities he will propose for his government to strengthen Canadian policies so that we will have some credibility in international negotiations?

Specifically, is the Prime Minister now ready to move on this single, most important problem in North-South relations, which is the debt trap of the oil-importing, least developed nations? Is the Prime Minister prepared to support international negotiations which will lead to a recycling of OPEC's huge surpluses and to expedite that by having the voting strength of OPEC in international financial institutions increased?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I find the hon. member's question extremely welcome and his suggestion very appropriate. Just as an aside, I suggest that his leader would benefit from rereading the question and the assertion that travel by leaders of this government can be conducive to helping the North-South dialogue.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The guffaws come from someone who wants his leader's job, but I can tell him that he does not have a chance. His leader is much better than he is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the point made by the hon. member for Edmonton South is exactly the point I made repeatedly in each of the countries I visited, and it is a point I raised with Saudi Arabia when I visited the country in November. That is one of the reasons we have been trying to influence these various countries into accepting the energy affiliate of the World Bank, which would be precisely designed to do the three things the hon. member suggests: help recycle OPEC dollars, permit the transfer of technology for the finding of more energy resources in the less developed countries, and give a greater voting strength to OPEC.

I point out that I think the idea is making progress. There was a meeting in December at which representatives of some of the countries with which I talked were in attendance, but as far as the Canadian government is concerned the hon. member will note that in the budget we undertook to set aside, I believe, $250 million for an international affiliate of Petro-Canada so that we could do this job at least bilaterally if by some chance it were not done by the affiliate of the World Bank.

Mr. Roche: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister's 12-year-old government had performed as well on North-South issues as did the Leader of the Opposition in his brief tenure as prime minister, the credibility of the Government of Canada would be much better with respect to North-South issues today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: I want to ask the Prime Minister if he intends to implement the North-South task force report, which was supported by all parties in the House. Several months ago in its interim report the task force said that Canada should support the four emergency measures to break the North-South deadlock recommended in the internationally acclaimed Brandt report: first, an extra $4 billion annually in aid; second, an international energy strategy; third, a global food program; and fourth, a start on reforming the international economic system. Is the Prime Minister prepared to put his leadership behind those emergency provisions now to break the North-South deadlock?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am prepared to agree with the hon. member that, if his party and leader had stayed in office, they might have done very well in the field of foreign aid. I was just pointing out to the hon. member that just a few days ago his leader complained that I was too preoccupied with North-South questions and that I was not dealing enough with economic questions in Canada. That is all I wanted to point out. I am in agreement with the hon. member that we should do more, and I hope his point of view prevails over that of his leader when we come to deal with these questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

INDUSTRY AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Earlier today he ignored the House of Commons and held a press conference to announce a special program rather than announcing it in the House. During that press conference the Minister of Labour indicated that none of the ministers could tell how the $350 million involved would be allocated as between equipment, high-priced consultants and help to individuals. In the October 28 budget the Minister of Finance announced that half of that $350 million would be spent in the social policy envelope. Could the minister assure the House that half of that $350 million, $175 million, will remain in the social policy envelope and provide help to individuals, or does he agree with the Minister of Labour that it could go for equipment and high-priced consultants?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Calgary West, who obviously was in attendance at the conference at which the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and I elaborated on the details of the program, was not listening to the description of the program if he thinks it is for high-priced consultants and so forth. The portion of the program which goes under economic development will be assigned as grants to companies to start new jobs in those communities in which there have been economic turndowns, lay-offs or plant closings. We think it is absolutely essential that we not simply maintain communities but that we help them grow and provide assistance so that they can develop and attract new industry. That is the purpose of half the program.

The purpose of the other half is to provide major assistance so that workers can develop new skills and new job opportunities can be developed.

That is the rough division of the program. The money will be allocated according to the discussions we have in those communities with organizations and committees which are established to inform us of the priorities those communities have for themselves in terms of their own assistance and their own labour.

● (1440)

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I take from that answer that we cannot have that assurance, that in fact we are going to turn over expenditures to appointed groups.

I should like to move on to another issue. Two of the programs announced this morning were, first, a portable wage subsidy program for people 45 years of age and over and, second, an early retirement program for people 54 years of age and over. May I ask the minister whether he can give an absolute assurance to the House that, when and if the constitution act of 1980 is passed, those two programs will not be declared illegal? Can he assure the House that there is nothing in those programs that will run counter to the constitution act of 1980?

Mr. Axworthy: There is absolutely nothing in those programs that will be illegal. When the constitution is passed, we will have the right of full mobility for all Canadians.

INDUSTRY

McDONNELL DOUGLAS—CREATION OF JOBS FOR CANADIANS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question which I should like to put to the Prime Minister. This morning, together with the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced a $44 million or $45 million expenditure over the course of the next three years for the creation of employment. Given the fact that we desperately need employment opportunities in Canada at the moment, and that is recognized by everyone, I wonder whether the Prime Minister might consider calling in McDonnell Douglas and informing them that since this government is spending $4 billion of taxpayers' money, that company has an obligation to create in Canada jobs to employ not only the 1,000 workers who are going to be laid off now, but also jobs that will employ additional Canadian workers who could be and should be working as a result of this extensive expenditure.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman's representations are, of course, taken very seriously by the government. It might be pointed out to the hon. gentleman that the offsets which were negotiated by the government in the purchase of the F-18 will total more than $3.2 million by 1995. Of course, the government is very interested in overviewing the regional distribution of the total offsets in order to ensure that within Canada there is total employment created as a result of the investments which are to be made primarily in the aeronautics industry, which is of interest to the hon. gentleman and will compromise about 60 per cent of the value of those offsets.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I should like to ask and I do not know quite who will answer, but I will ask it in the hope that someone knows the answer. The figure for 1995 is no good for us. There are tens of thousands of people unemployed today, and right now there are 1,000 people who have been laid off by McDonnell Douglas. We are spending $4 billion. I ask, why is it that it is impossible to require of that company that they create here in Canada jobs for the people who are unemployed today and who will perhaps not need jobs in 1995?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, under the terms of the agreement which was signed with McDonnell Douglas there was a recognition that that company would request from the marketplace, including Canada, bids in terms of the subcontracts that were to be let. I know the hon. gentleman is thinking about the structural package which involves four components which are to be included within the F-18. As the Minister of State for Small Businesses indicated to the hon. gentleman last week, the bids have now been received, they are being reviewed and a statement is to be made jointly by McDonnell Douglas and the government within the near future.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON PREPARATIONS FOR JUNE 1981 NORTH-SOUTH CONFERENCE

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the exchanges he had with the heads of state he met during his recent trip, especially the president of Mexico, have assured him that the preparations for next June's conference on the North-South dialogue are progressing? And in light of his talks with several heads of state does he feel that the June conference will lead to significant conclusions, particularly on issues such as the reform of the monetary system, of the International Monetary Fund, of trade and commerce and of recycling petro-dollars?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would answer the hon. member for Gloucester by expressing my thoughts and saying frankly that I feel moderately optimistic. I spoke with President Portillo and Chancellor Kreisky, the two co-chairmen responsible for organizing the proposed June summits. I assured them of our government's full support, both as a participant and as an adviser should they need further consultations with us. But I am unable to say whether the preparations are going well or not. I think I am confident that the conference will be held but there are indications that other countries have expressed some doubts.

Among others we do not know whether the United States will want to take part or not. I think that many of the invited countries will wait for the decision of the President of the United States before announcing their position. That is not our case. I can assure the hon. member our intention would be to participate in any event if the conference is held.

I would simply remind the hon. member that the main objective of my trip was not to prepare the North-South June conference, which is the responsibility of the two co-chairmen, but rather to make sure that the stage will be properly set for the conference which is scheduled for Ottawa in July and whose central topic will be the North-South dialogue. That was the first priority of my tour.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

JAMES CROSS KIDNAPPING—ARREST OF SUSPECT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Now that the last court hearing has been held in the case of the sixth man in the James Cross kidnapping case, one Nigel Barry Hamer, who pleaded guilty to four serious charges of being involved in the kidnapping during the FLQ crisis of October, 1970, in view of the fact that most of those arrests have taken place under the supervision of the RCMP, that Mr. Hamer was identified as being an accomplice very shortly after the actual kidnapping took place, that there has been constant police surveillance since then, and that there have been authorized telephone tappings of Mr. Hamer's telephone since then—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lawrence: —my question to the Solicitor General is simply this: Why has it taken ten years to arrest somebody who is obviously guilty?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, this investigation was conducted by the Quebec Provincial Police, although the RCMP co-operated fully over the years and provided information to that police force. I think the question which the hon. member has asked should be directed to the attorney general of that province.

Mr. Lawrence: The object of my question is, obviously, to try to find out if there has been any negligence, bungling, lack of co-operation or complicity to hide someone from public scrutiny in a very serious matter. Obviously the RCMP has been involved and the Solicitor General is in charge of the RCMP. Has he asked the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec this question? Has it occurred to him to ask it?

An hon. Member: Did you?

Mr. Lawrence: Obviously I could not until the individual pleaded guilty because the court case was in progress—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —but the Solicitor General can do so now. Has he asked these questions?

Mr. Kaplan: I have asked for a briefing from the RCMP on their responsibilities in this matter and I am satisfied, on all the questions that the hon. member asked with respect to the RCMP, that their behaviour has been satisfactory.

AIRPORTS

OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF NORTHERN AIRPORTS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Does he have any plans to remove those airports in Canada north of the 60th parallel from the ownership, control or otherwise of the Department of Transport?

● (1450)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is part of the policy that there can be the possibility of transfer of airports from the administrative jurisdiction of my department to the jurisdiction of the local territories. But if for practical purposes this should occur, my department would maintain its responsibility for the funding of these airports.

Mr. Ellis: My supplementary question is for the same minister. I must ask him if he feels that this will, in fact, improve or in any way better the safety of these airports.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the transfer will not take place if the safety is impaired.

REGULATORY REFORM

TASK FORCE REPORT—STATUS OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. After months of hard work, hearing from the private and public sector and from many government bureaucrats, the special task force on regulatory reform provided this House with its recommendations for regulatory reform on December 19. I would like to know from the President of the Treasury Board whether the government has taken any action with respect to the recommendations or whether it intends to take any action with respect to them. If not, why not? If it has done something, what has it done? And could we please have an answer to the question?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate him and the other members of the committee who delivered to us an excellent report. There were 29 recommendations contained therein which I had the opportunity to review over the Christmas break.

I can assure this House, Madam Speaker, that the government's commitment to regulatory reform is very solid. It is moving forward, and moved forward even during the time in which the report was being prepared. We are confirmed in our efforts by the tone of the report. In areas such as process, to which the report directs its attention, we are looking very seriously at each and every one of the recommendations. We have already developed a work plan in that particular area, as well as in the area of cleaning up the regulations. We must ensure that those regulations which are duplicative and outmoded can be eliminated. This would also involve statutes. Hopefully I will be able to bring forward a bill in the relatively near future to try to clean up some of the statutory duplications in other areas where these provisions are outmoded.

In addition, we are looking at the area of process, with which the report deals extensively. We are also looking carefully at such things as, perhaps, a regulatory agenda and other matters of that nature. I have already written to my colleagues in the cabinet, and I have sent to those whose departments are concerned with regulations a proposed work plan. I wish to assure the hon. gentleman and members of this house that not only is the report not gathering dust, but it is moving forward at an accelerated pace. Again I want to thank the committee for the efforts it made during such a brief period of time.

UNITED STATES AID TO EL SALVADOR

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. With the United States having now decided to supply lethal military aid to the increasingly repressive junta in El Salvador, in direct violation of last year's United Nations resolution which Canada supported, will the Prime Minister express now in the clearest possible terms this country's opposition to American military support of the junta? Will he, in his anticipated meeting with President-elect Reagan, a meeting which he alluded to earlier in the question period as being a real possibility, voice our grave concern with respect to American military intervention in El Salvador?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I certainly hope that the agenda would permit President-elect Reagan and myself to discuss such areas of regional concern to both of us.

I had occasion to talk about this matter very recently in Mexico. My understanding is that the United States is not at this time supplying military hardware to the junta and that it is re-establishing some of the bilateral aid programs which had been interrupted. If I am misinformed on the United States policy I stand to be corrected, but I would have to examine that policy.

I could say that it is not a policy that we would share or follow. As the hon. lady knows, this government has always refused to ship arms or any form of military hardware to countries which were trouble spots, such as this.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, I would like to preface my supplementary question to the Prime Minister by saying as the Secretary of State for External Affairs is now informing him, that there is an additional $5 million which is going into lethal military aid—guns, ammunition and combat helicopters—over and above the other $5 million in what is called "non-lethal" military aid.

The Prime Minister mentioned speaking about this when he was recently in Mexico City. I wonder if he was able to meet the executive members of the democratic revolutionary front from El Salvador who wished to meet with him in Mexico City. If he was not able to do so, and since executive members of the front will be in Ottawa this week, will he meet with them this week in Ottawa?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. lady that I arrived in Mexico merely in time for dinner with the president. I left the next morning. It would have been impossible for me to meet with such a group.

I accept the hon. lady's earlier point about the military aid. The Secretary of State for External Affairs informs me that she is, of course, correct. I was not aware of this.

In so far as meeting with the group, which she suggests, the Secretary of State for External Affairs tells me that he will be meeting with them.

FISHERIES

DESIGNATION OF PART-TIME FISHERMEN

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As the minister knows, a new licensing regime is under way in Atlantic Canada to determine who are part-time and who are full-time fishermen. Can the minister assure this House that no fisherman who has been designated part-time to this point in time will be denied the right to participate in the fishery this year to the same extent to which he participated last year, until such time as he has had an opportunity to test his part-time designation before an appeal committee? The minister may know that many of us are concerned that these appeal committees may not have time to hear all the appeals which are forthcoming. Can he give us some assurance with respect to this matter?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I certainly can give the hon. member some assurance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc: If hon. members opposite wish to listen they may learn a couple of things.

Madam Speaker, there were a number of appeals put forward by fishermen and they are being heard. Where there are simple mistakes which can be corrected by departmental personnel, this is being done—and there were some because we are dealing with a very large number of people. But no one whose status is uncertain will be deprived. There will be temporary permits issued for the coming season. This is particularly applicable to the herring fishery.

BANK ACT

INQUIRY WHEN REGULATIONS WILL BE PUBLISHED

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of State for Finance, may I direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the Bank Act was passed by this Parliament prior to November 30—almost six weeks has elapsed since then—and that under several of the provisions of the act regulations must be published and remain published for 60 days before they become operative, would the parliamentary secretary advise us when we can expect those regulations as a total package, so that the Bank Act will not be standing still for four or five months, or more, before it will be fully operative?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the regulations are moving along at a very rapid rate. I cannot give him an exact date as to when all the regulations will be promulgated. I can assure him they will be brought down very shortly and I will undertake to get an exact date for him, if I can.

MISS MACDONALD—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. AXWORTHY

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, you will recall that last week I raised the question of the pressure that was being brought to bear on the president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women and, indeed, on other members, by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who is responsible for the status of women. This matter took the form of both questions in the House and a question of privilege. In the minister's response during the discussion on the question of privilege, he quoted and, in fact, based his remarks and defence to a large extent on a statement from a press release, which appears at page 6140 of Hansard, and which reads:

The executive committee in December expressed concern about the timing of the constitutional conference.

That is the constitutional conference sponsored by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to be held in mid-February. The press release on which the minister based his remarks was authored, I understand, by a member of the executive committee of the advisory council, Win Gardner. By the way, Win Gardner happens to be a constituent of the minister's, but I dare say that the statement itself was dictated in the office of the minister. The point is that the minister claims now that the concern about the timing of the constitutional conference was expressed last December. Since he made that claim last Tuesday, his remarks have been challenged by the president of the advisory council, Doris Anderson, who, in an interview on "Canada AM" last Wednesday morning, made this statement:

There is nothing in the December minutes of the council that could substantiate that statement.

In other words, she was expressing a view which is quite contrary not only to what the minister claimed but to what was claimed by Win Gardner, a person who just the previous week had sent out a notice to some 3,000 women in Manitoba stating that the conference was still on in February. Her statement, which appeared in the Manitoba ACSW newsletter of January, made this comment:

The conference on women and the constitution, sponsored by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, will take place in Ottawa on February 13 and 14.

My question of privilege is that since my original question was raised last Tuesday, with which you dealt, Madam Speaker, the minister's statements have been questioned even more, and even directly refuted. The minister claims, and of course the House is asked to accept his claim, that the question about the timing of the constitutional conference which was scheduled for February was raised last December, that it came to his attention and to the attention of the council last December. But that is not reported in the minutes of the meeting of last December. A leading public servant, the president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, who is responsible to the minister and to this House, says that there is no truth to the minister's statement and nothing which would substantiate his claim that the conference was called into question last December, that the plans of last December were that the conference was to go ahead.

In fact, the plan, as recently as early this month, was to go ahead with the conference. Surely it is up to the minister to provide such proof, if indeed he can do so, that the conference was called into question last December. As members of Parliament we are entitled to that proof, if the minister can produce it, which I very much doubt.

Both the minister and the president of the advisory council must answer to Parliament. We are being asked to look at a question on which two points of view are being put forward and in which the positions which have been taken are increasingly divergent. That divergence of difference of view is being further developed and exploited by one of the members of the advisory committee to the council, a Miss Hellie Wilson. I will refer to her in the same manner as the member from New Westminster did because she has been acting, unofficially, as liaison between the minister and the Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

I learned within the last few days that Miss Wilson has taken upon herself, perhaps at the urging of the minister, to phone members of the advisory council and to tell them before their meeting later this week that, in the words of one of the members of the advisory council who had been told by Miss Wilson, "Doris Anderson must go." That is the kind of comment which this woman, who is acting as unofficial liaison between the minister's office and the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, is making.

What is really at stake, in a matter of growing importance to a great many women across this country, is the credibility, integrity and independence of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. If the minister continues to attack the council and its president irresponsibly, as he has been doing, then he runs the risk, unfortunately, of bringing about the resignation of a valued public servant, and the risk of undermining, for all time, the credibility of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women as an independent body.

Therefore I would ask that this question of privilege, because of this new conflict which has arisen since Madam Speaker's ruling, between the minister and the president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, be considered in the light of the president's probable resignation if this kind of attack continues, in the light that we do not have full information as to the arguments on both sides of this case, in the light that we as members of Parliament are becoming increasingly involved in this spectacle which this minister is creating, and that, therefore, the whole matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member does not deserve a very lengthy reply as there is one basic flaw in her argument. The question of privilege seems to be based upon a statement which I made in the House with regard to a meeting in December. I was quoting from a statement which was issued by the entire executive committee of the advisory council. It is not my assertion, but an assertion which was written in the statement which was released publicly, not by one person but by the entire executive committee.

I was simply repeating that statement in the House. I was very careful to make sure that the statement was put in quotation marks so that hon. members would understand clearly that I was simply substantiating my remarks to this House. If there is a question of validity about the accuracy of that statement, I would simply reiterate what I said before, that it is a matter which should be resolved between the president of the advisory council and the executive committee. It is the executive committee which decided against the proposal and which took its decision, and it is the president of the advisory council who raised an objection to that decision and who made the charges, not me.

The president of the advisory council has threatened to resign. I have not asked for her resignation. She is the one who has been carrying the public offensive. I am simply trying to keep the facts clear. I would suggest to members of the House that the best way to ensure the integrity and independence of the council is to allow it the right to decide on its own issues, not bring them into this House, as the hon. member has done.

If we have any concern, it is to make sure that the autonomy of that council is protected. That autonomy will not be protected by constant interference or intervention, or trying to find an issue that would bring it into another forum. The best way to protect the independence of the council is to show that we trust it to make its own decision.

In reply to the assertion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) I would simply say that I was reading from and reporting a statement. If there is an inaccuracy in that statement or if there is a difference of opinion between Mrs. Anderson and the executive committee, it should be resolved between them. I was not party to those meetings nor, as I have said, was I party to any of the discussions concerning the time of the conference until the executive committee requested a meeting with me to ask my opinion, which I gave. That is the only time I discussed the matter with any member of the executive committee in a direct fashion. That was the only time in which I raised—had the issue raised with me. I gave them my opinion and judgment and left it at that, saying it was up to the council to make a decision.

I would simply say, Madam Speaker, that there is no question of privilege. There is obviously a difference of opinion, but the best place for that to be resolved is in the council itself. That is the best way that both the interests of the hon. member and of myself can be maintained while protecting the council's independence.

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I should just like to say that the advisory council meets tomorrow. I am confident, as I am sure I have every reason to be, that it will fully support Mrs. Anderson in her valiant attempt to ensure that the independence of the advisory council is maintained. I am sure we will discover that that will have been accomplished, tomorrow.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has not argued that her question of privilege is founded in a way that has satisfied me. The fact that an alleged or real conflict which might have occurred—

Miss MacDonald: A real conflict.

Madam Speaker: —between the minister and the president of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women has accelerated or has been accentuated, does not in itself constitute a question of privilege. It might be a serious matter and a matter which might have very serious consequences as well—

Miss MacDonald: It sure will.

Madam Speaker: —but it is not within my purview to rule upon that kind of question. This is merely a matter of a difference of opinion, a difference of interpretation, between two members of this House, and therefore I must rule that there is no question of privilege.

AUTOMOBILE PRODUCTION AND SALES

Question No. 254—Mr. Herbert:

1. What percentage of the new automobile sales in Canada in (a) 1977 (b) 1978 were (i) fully manufactured in Canada (ii) partly manufactured in Canada (iii) imported?

2. What are the estimated percentages for 1979?

3. What was the percentage of Canadian content of the cars partly manufactured in Canada in 1977 and 1978 and what is the estimated percentage for 1979?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: there are no automobiles sold in Canada which are fully manufactured in Canada, in the sense that all of the workmanship, all of the parts and all of the materials originate in Canada. The nature of the industry is such that new parts destined for the assembly of new motor vehicles can flow freely between Canada and United States and vice versa—as long as a given percentage of new cars sold in Canada are actually cars assembled in Canada regardless of origins of components. Cars are imported into Canada and are also assembled in Canada with more or less imported parts. On a number of units sold in Canada basis, Statistics Canada estimates show that in 1979 domestic production (units assembled on Canadian assembly lines) accounted for about 34 per cent of total sales. In 1978 the figure was 27 per cent, and in 1977 24 per cent. On a value basis the percentages may be quite different depending on the mix of automobile by size and model. Input-output data suggest that in 1976 about 35-40 per cent of the value of total intermediate use (excluding parts for final sale) in motor vehicle manufacturing was Canadian.

Year	Produced in Canada (000's units)	Exports (000's units)	Produced in Canada for Domestic Consumption (000's units)	(Per cent of final sales)	Imports (000's units)	(Per cent of final sales)	Sales in Canada (000's units)

AIR CANADA PASSES

Question No. 739—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 77 which states in part, that Air Canada's practice "is similar to other Canadian carriers" in regard to the issuing of passes to those persons who have no government connection, what is a full description of "similar to other Canadian carriers"?

2. With further reference to the answer which states in part, that "the airline regards details of its promotional pass issuance as proprietary" (a) is Air Canada a Crown corporation owned by the people of Canada (b) does Air Canada report to Parliament through a Minister of the Crown (c) under what authority does Air Canada have the right to deny information to the elected representatives of the people (d) has the government lost control of Air Canada and its operations (e) is Air Canada immune to requests for information from members of Parliament or from the Minister of Transport and, if so, what steps will the government take to rectify the situation and does this come under the government's policy to permit more freedom of information to the Canadian people?

3. Is it the policy of the government to allow a Crown corporation to refuse information to members of Parliament and, if not, will this situation be corrected and, if so, on what date?

4. What is the name of the person or persons who made the decision that "the airline regards details of its promotional pass issuance as proprietary"?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the management of Air Canada and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council offices as follows: 1. "similar to other Canadian carriers" means that Air Canada conforms to the same rules of the Canadian Transport Commission and its practices, in the application of those rules, are the same as other Canadian carriers.

2. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) Air Canada withholds only that information which it regards as proprietary.

(d) No.

(e) Within a general framework of financial accountability and policy direction, Air Canada is not immune to requests for information from cabinet or Parliament. However, successive Canadian governments have allowed Crown Corporations operating in a commercial and competitive environment not to reveal publicly confidential commercial information, the disclosure of which would be injurious to their competitive position. This approach is in line with the policy reflected in the access to information bill.

3. See answer to 2. (e).

4. It is a corporate decision.

DISCOVERY TRAIN

Question No. 1,599—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What was the initial cost to the government of the "Discovery Train"?

2. What is the annual cost to the government for maintaining the train?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the National Museums of Canada that the reply to the above question is as follows: 1. The purchase price of the Discovery Train was $629,482 ($575,000 U.S.). Of this amount, $541,540 was donated from provincial governments and private sources, leaving $87,942 as the initial cost to the federal government of the Discovery Train. Following receipt of the rolling stock, made as a gift to the Crown, fabrication and start-up costs totalled $4,946,971.

2. The annual cost to maintain and operate the train are as follows:

1980-81	$3,016,759
Total:	$8,875,410

Included in these figures are salaries, travel costs, repair and upkeep, equipment, and communications.

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 1,349?

[Text]

*SHOE IMPORTS

Question No. 1,349—Mr. Blenkarn:

Is the government contemplating extending the quota arrangements for the import of shoes into Canada?

[English]

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Small Businesses)): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: on December 1, 1977, the government imposed quotas on imports of footwear for three years. This decision followed a report by the Anti-Dumping Tribunal, which concluded that imports were causing or threatening to cause serious injury to Canadian production and employment. The quota regime was in conformity with the provisions of GATT Article XIX. The import quotas cover all sources and all types of footwear, except footwear made of waterproof plastic, rubber or canvas, and downhill ski boots. Imports have been limited to approximately 32.5 million pairs annually, about 80 per cent of annual footwear imports between 1974 and 1976. In July, 1980, the Anti-Dumping Tribunal was asked to undertake an inquiry into whether imports of non-rubber footwear would continue to cause or threaten to cause injury to Canadian production of like or competitive goods in the absence of special measures of protection. To provide adequate time for the tribunal to carry out its investigation, the government announced that the global quota on footwear would be extended for an interim period of up to one year beyond the current expiry date of November 30, 1980. The results of the inquiry are expected in February. At that time the government will be in a position to adopt an appropriate import and industry sector policy. In the meantime, a number of specific footwear items aggregating about 500,000 pairs have been identified which no longer appear to pose a serious threat to the Canadian industry and accordingly will be released from the global quota's coverage on December 1, 1980.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND TO PROVIDE BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed from Friday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Madam Speaker: On Friday last the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) raised an important point of order in which he argued that Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, differed from the ways and means motions upon which it was based in so far as the bill provided a borrowing authority in Part I which had not been included in the ways and means motions. A number of hon. members took part in the debate, and I thank them all for their assistance to the Chair in this matter, and especially for the manner in which they gave it.

No argument was offered to suggest that the taxation provisions of the bill were not based on the ways and means motions. The arguments related solely to the inclusion of the borrowing authority in the bill, a provision which was not in the ways and means motions upon which that bill is based.

Hon. members also pointed out that prior to 1975 it was our practice to include a borrowing authority in the supply bill, but this practice was discontinued after a ruling by my predecessor on December 9, 1975, at page 924 of the Journals, partially on the grounds that under our supply procedures there would be no opportunity to debate the borrowing provisions.

Subsequently, borrowing authority has been granted by means of separate legislation, as in 1979 and in 1980, and also through provisions included in the income tax bill in 1977.

The argument was made on Friday that while the ways and means motions constituted effective notice of taxation provisions in the bill before us, there had been no notice of the provision of borrowing authority.

Members will appreciate that one of the basic principles governing our proceedings is that notice must be given of matters of substance to be debated in the House. This principle is reflected in our Standing Order 42(1) which reads as follows:

Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper—

No one will disagree that the authority to borrow is a matter of substance. Indeed, the borrowing authority aspect of the bill constitutes a separate bill as cited in clause 1, namely, "This part may be cited as the borrowing authority act, 1981-82."

● (1520)

I am, therefore, of the opinion that lacking specific notice for the borrowing provisions, these provisions, as contained in part I, should be struck from the bill, and I so order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I should make clear to members that I have no quarrel with the practice of combining in the same bill taxation matters based on ways and means motions with other matters, provided that the provisions of Standing Order 42(1) are fulfilled and notice properly given. Precedents to that effect can be found at page 42 of the Journals for October 20, 1978, relating to Bill C-10, and page 114 of the Journals for 1976 relating to Bill C-22.

I, therefore, order that the bill be reprinted with the necessary changes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, before proceeding with the remarks I wanted to make on Bill C-54, I would seek your advice and ask whether I may still comment on the changes which this bill will make to the Canada Pension Plan and so on, or whether that is the point you have just made?

Madam Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. minister may make the comments she wants to make before the House in the course of the debate. Should the occupant of the Chair feel that the comments are not relevant to the order paper of the House she will simply be called to order.

Miss Bégin: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am very pleased today to take a few minutes of the time of the House to voice my support for Bill C-54.

[English]

It was about ten years ago, in December, 1970, when the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada was tabled in this House, condemning discrimination in the Income Tax Act against spouses, more accurately against wives, who work in family businesses such as farms and neighbourhood stores. During these past ten years women's groups across the country have repeatedly requested an amendment to the Income Tax Act in order to permit the deduction of salary paid by husbands to wives as a legitimate expense for what is called unincorporated small business.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would particularly like to recall the very strong representations made by the association féminine d'éducation et d'action sociale, formerly Quebec's Catholic union of rural women, which under the dynamic guidance of Mrs. Dominique Goudreault of Nicolet had then changed its name and set for itself a vocation of feminism in support of women who had spent years looking after others. So in recent years the association established a work committee specifically for its 35,000 members, those who are in partnership with their husband in a small family business. I think it is accurate to say that roughly one third of those women are in agricultural undertakings, one third work in businesses of every description, and one third in what is known as small businesses such as corner stores, tobacco stores, grocery stores.

Nearly four years ago—I believe it was in the spring of 1977 when I was holding the national revenue portfolio—representatives of the association came to see me to explain in detail the injustice they suffer under our income tax laws because they could not deduct from operating expenses the salary that their husbands would pay them or their contributions to such social programs as unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan, the Quebec Pension Plan and so on. They were right, and since social changes do not occur overnight by any means, we had to wait until today to see at last the results of that feminine movement which has gained support from so many others throughout the country.

[English]

Bill C-54, therefore, answers this call for more justice for women who work for their husbands in small family businesses. It acknowledges in concrete dollar terms the contribution of wives who work in these small enterprises, such as family farms, or family stores in cities. It is another example of this government's commitment to improve the status of women in Canada.

One aspect in the bill gives me particular pleasure, both because of my present position as Minister of National Health and Welfare and because of my past association with the royal commission. Wives will now be able to participate for the first time in the Canada Pension Plan, which comes about as a result of a consequential amendment to the Canada Pension Plan contained in this bill. In effect, the adoption of the proposed changes will make the salaries paid to wives for employment in unincorporated family businesses pensionable earnings for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan.

In other words, wives will now be able to participate in their own right in the Canada Pension Plan, just like all other salaried workers in Canada. They will be guaranteed a full pension on retirement and they can protect their families against dangers of disability or death.

It is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that I am referring here to compulsory and not to voluntary participation. Whenever the owner of a non-incorporated business declares in his operating costs the salary paid to a spouse, for income tax purposes, he must automatically deduct from that salary contributions to the Canada Pension Plan. As in the case of any other payment made to the Canada Pension Plan, the employer, that is the husband, must also pay to the plan a further contribution equivalent to that of his employee.

According to the estimates drawn by the department, such an amendment, which is an improvement and a mere act of justice, would affect approximately 375,000 Canadian women who from now on will be contributing to the Canada Pension Plan. The parallel amendment announced by the Quebec government for the Quebec pension board would add approximately 125,000 contributors for a grand total of half a million Canadian women who will henceforth be in a position to contribute through their employers, that is their husbands, to public pension plans, something which they could not do previously. I am sure that all members from all sides of the House have some of them in their constituencies, because these women are employed in corner stores, and convenience stores in larger cities and in tobacco shops and grocery stores in towns and villages, or on family farms. This may also affect the wives of fishermen who have set up small businesses. Truly unfair conditions will thus be corrected.

I remember that when I was minister of national revenue, my officials, faced with this feminist activism from usually very placid quarters, had said to me, "The only way we can deal with this unfair situation is for these small family businesses to incorporate." To this suggestion, women would retort, I think, most appropriately, "This is a way of life which we are eager to protect, a way of working for a couple of children who could not support an army of accountants, managers, administrators, and so forth. We want to protect a way of life with a minimum of paperwork and bureaucratic interference. That is the reason we cannot and will not incorporate. We want to maintain a family flavour to our businesses. I am very glad to see that our so-called system has adapted to these people instead of the other way around. I might add that—

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Lambert: It is ten years behind the time.

Miss Bégin: It is not ten years behind the time as the hon. member for Edmonton West suggests. If the member had any knowledge of the slow pace of social change, he would find that rather fast. Nothing is slower to change in any country than matters concerning income tax, for one very simple reason. The specialists—I remember the hon. member was a specialist as the parliamentary secretary to—

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question. Would the minister please wait for the first five minutes of my speech, and I will tell her what happened in 1971 when her administration—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member is not asking a question, he will have an opportunity to make a speech later.

Miss Bégin: I have learned in the last ten years concerning the development of more simple justice and better opportunities for women in the country, that any social change, be it more tolerance between Canadians of different ethnic origin, religion, or language, or in the development of better justice for women vis-à-vis the men in the country, occurs at a slow pace. I will always be impatient in front of the House because of the slowness of that pace. On the other hand, I realize that this is so because changes in mentality, behaviour and attitude cannot be legislated. They must be slowly pushed into evolution by public discussion, information, more education and so forth.

Those who established the tax industry—and of course I am talking about more people than simply those on the government side—considered or used to say a few years ago that such a change would open the door to "abuses". Any minister of national revenue is afraid of that word because we do not know for sure the exact calculated risk one must take in the face of a major change which will permit the use of an income tax provision in favour of many more people.

It is estimated that approximately half a million new Canadian taxpayers will benefit from this income tax provision, namely, women who work for their husbands. It will mean that one woman out of six will benefit. A significant additional number of Canadians will finally receive through the system the benefits they rightly requested, by removing an injustice in the Income Tax Act.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, what really matters is that Canadian women who can avail themselves of this correction or amendment to the Income Tax Act be made aware that this amendment has been or rather, I presume, will be adopted by this Parliament.

At this stage, I should like to thank particularly the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) who, jointly with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), made every effort in early December to inform the employees of the Department of National Revenue so that they may answer inquiries properly with regard to the implementation retroactive to January 1, 1980, of this income tax provision. If I may be permitted, I would ask every member of the House—

[English]

I think a provision such as this one applies to people everywhere in the country. I would like to ask colleagues on both sides of the House to include a little note in their householders, or to use their mailing lists, to reach as many small unincorporated businesses as possible in their ridings in order to let them know the deadlines are quite close. I think they are at the end of the month for family businesses to take advantage of this change in the Income Tax Act.

The enactment of this amendment to the Canada Pension Plan will represent an important step in the participation of women in the plan. It adds to other CPP provisions which were specifically designed to benefit women. For example, I can cite the section which permits the splitting between spouses, in the event of divorce, of Canada Pension Plan credits earned by either spouse during the marriage. Unfortunately very few people have taken advantage of the credit splitting provision. Between January, 1978, when the provision came into effect, and March, 1980, there were only 970 applications for credit splitting. In contrast, between 1978 and 1979, 86,000 divorces were granted in Canada outside the province of Quebec.

Numerous efforts have been made to inform women of their new right, efforts which have included periodic inserts in family allowances or pension cheques. Also advertisements were placed in newspapers, and letters were sent to provincial and territorial law societies. I am concerned that women are not using the program because they do not know of it. It is the old problem in most governments of getting the information to the people for whom the bills were passed.

As hon. members may recall from the material I sent in July of last year, I made another attempt at informing people by sending letters to approximately 32,000 lawyers across Canada advising them of the details of this provision and of its low rate of use. Personally I met with a few lawyers in past months who told me that the letter was their first opportunity to learn about the provision. So, we have increased the awareness of people who deal with matters of separation and divorce. They will ensure that more women benefit from the provision.

In speaking about provisions in the Canada Pension Plan which favour women, I should also mention what we call the dropping-out provision. This provision allows a parent who remains home to look after young children to drop those years of low or no earnings in the calculation of lifetime pensionable earnings on which Canada Pension Plan retirement pensions are based. The child rearing drop-out amendment was approved by Parliament before I assumed my portfolio approximately four years ago. By the way, it had the support of all parties in the House. It has not come into force yet because the provinces of British Columbia and Ontario very unfortunately refused to give their consent. The day they give their consent—very precisely, the day Ontario gives its consent—the provisions will be immediately in force and will greatly benefit women who recognize raising children to be one of their prime responsibilities.

We have calculated that the average net benefits to women with children will be increased by 22 per cent. If I may, I ask my colleagues to bring every pressure to bear on the government of Ontario, in particular, to drop its ban on a provision which will improve the lot of Canadian women vis-à-vis pensions in their own names.

Of course, these provisions are far from being perfect and they will not solve all the problems of women who have reached the age of retirement, but they will help to give them a reasonable pension. Some problems remain to be solved, namely, that of public pensions, which is readily identifiable, in particular the old age security income supplement for single people who have to apply for all or part of the supplement. About 75 per cent of these pensioners are women. Unfortunately, they are still below the poverty line in spite of the $35 a month increase which has been granted since the cheque of last July, at the cost of something over $500 million. I am of course talking about the old age security supplement for needy pensioners who are still below the poverty line. I simply want to emphasize that this aspect of the problems concerning pensions and women ought to be recognized. The cost of bringing all single pensioners above the poverty line, once and for all, if we could take this additional step today, would amount to approximately $700 million. I cannot tell when we shall be able to do so, but it will certainly not be this year or in the immediate future, because of the economic conditions, but it will certainly be for us a priority as soon as our economy shows signs of recovery.

I simply wish to identify the problems thereby indicating that because of a lack of funds we are unable to consider immediate solutions. Another problem has to do with women between 60 and 65 who, because they are widowed or separated, do not benefit from the spouse's allowance, the special program for the spouses of pensioners, and who, because of a very legitimate pride, do not want to apply for provincial welfare assistance to which they are entitled. In my opinion, this problem can be solved only by implementing a guaranteed annual income or a pension for people in need, not only for women, but for all people between 60 and 65 who are in need. To implement such a program or to bring about another definition of poverty would mean nearly $1 billion in additional expenses. This is why I would consider it dishonest on my part to give any hope of such a program being implemented in the near future. We want first of all to bring above the poverty line those over 65, and then we can determine how best to attack the problems of needy men and women under 65 who are not yet entitled to official retirement benefits. In any case, the hon. members are aware that the problem of pensions will be at the heart of the debate on social policies and their improvement in the eighties.

Last week, or ten days ago, we announced that a national conference on pensions will be held at the end of March, to which will be invited the main parties concerned in private pension plans in Canada, that is, representatives of employers in the small business sector, of provincial, municipal and federal governments in their capacity as employers and legislators, and other interested parties, not only management but also the workers, the unions and women's groups as well as groups of retired people. They are the only ones who have a first-hand knowledge of the weaknesses in our pension system because they suffer from them in their daily lives. I would also add that the situation of women who work without pay, that is housekeepers, is just as deplorable. Much can be said about improving their lot. This bill only tackles one aspect of their problem, but no more can be done for the time being. Generally speaking, despite the passage of time and the will to solve that old problem, working women are still locked in the lowest-paid jobs and their presence in the work force tends to be sporadic, at least during child-bearing and child-rearing years before their children start attending daycare centres and school regularly.

[English]

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me mention two other provisions of this bill which relate directly to my portfolio of National Health and Welfare. Before doing that, it has just come to my mind what the hon. member for Edmonton West may have been referring to. He and other members of this House have requested the improvement which is taking place today. I mentioned one group of women in particular because I think we owe them credit for the constant work and pressure and the presentation of briefs they have made toward this improvement, and that is the work of AFEAS. The hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) as well as, I suppose, the hon. member for Edmonton West who, for the short time his party was in power, expressed the same intent.

An hon. Member: We were defeated.

Miss Bégin: You could have done it before that but you did not. Hon. members had expressed the same recognition of this injustice in the Income Tax Act. This will be settled with Bill C-54, and all of us are very pleased about that.

There are two other measures in Bill C-54 that relate in part to my ministerial responsibility. One measure has to do with an amendment to the child tax credit provisions which will ensure that the credit received in a given year will go in as many cases as possible to the person currently looking after the child.

In the first two years of its existence the child tax credit has proved, and I think I have the concurrence of everybody on that, to be extremely successful in delivering a measure of financial assistance to low and middle-income families raising children. Millions of mothers are in the process right now of filing their 1980 tax returns to claim a non-taxable benefit, and I insist this time on a non-taxable benefit of up to $238 per child subject to a reduction, of course, if a family earns a joint income of over $21,380.

This current amendment is intended to resolve a problem which arose in a relatively limited number of cases, but I am sure hon. members will agree that the result will be important to the families concerned. The problem relates to children who undergo a change of custody in the month of December; for example, a child who is adopted in that month or who returns from the custody of an institution, or a child who goes from the care of one separated parent to the other parent.

The previous provision which based eligibility on entitlement to the December family allowance meant that the child tax credit would not reflect such a change in custody even though it occurred before the end of the taxation year. Instead of going to the parent who was currently looking after the child in the year the credit was paid, the credit would be payable to the parent who was no longer caring for the child or, in the case of institutionalized children, no credit at all would be payable.

The refinement—because it is a refinement only—contained in this provision is expected to benefit approximately 8,500 children who will move from the custody of one parent to that of the other in the month of December, or move from the custody of an institution to a parent in that month of the year. There will not be any impact on the total cost. It is simply a change in who gets the cheque, but in terms of hardship this surely is a very welcome measure.

I may dream—because I am not a specialist in the Income Tax Act; I am obviously not the Minister of Finance—that another change would be brought forward at a later date which would grant a tax credit pro rata per month according to the number of months in a given year since a child has been born or is still below the maximum age to qualify for the child tax credit, instead of according to the status of that child as of December 31. However, that is for the future. The present provisions are surely practical and welcome.

The last provision in Bill C-54 which interests me is an amendment to the Old Age Security Act which will ensure that any energy conservation grants received by pensioners after 1980 will not count as income for purposes of defining entitlement under the guaranteed income supplement program. This means that pensioners will be able to apply for and receive this grant without worrying that that will affect their pension situation.

Mr. Lambert: Why discrimination against the others?

Miss Bégin: Does the hon. member want to ask a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) seek to ask a question?

Mr. Lambert: I will do it formally so it appears on the record. If that credit will not be taxable in the hands of those over 65, why the discrimination? Those under 65 will have it taxed in their hands as though it were income.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into the specifics of that question or, I suppose, one of my colleagues will have a chance. I am the minister responsible for pensioners. We establish public pensions to be paid at age 65 for practical reasons. Officially a person is considered to be a pensioner at that age for the purposes of our payments. I am obviously talking about a program for which I have direct responsibility, the guaranteed income supplement, which measures the poverty of seniors. We have decided that a grant under the energy conservation program will not penalize seniors who are officially seniors, if I may put it that way, with respect to public pensions. There may be other dimensions to not granting that to people below age 65, and I will ask one of my colleagues to answer that question.

That being said, I think this measure should not have any difficulty getting the approval of all members of Parliament. I remind my colleagues in the House this afternoon that exactly the same thing has already been done for pensioners who receive insulation grants, which have proved so beneficial in helping Canadians upgrade their home insulation and cut their heating bills.

In concluding let me state again my support for the bill which is before us. It may look like a long list of all sorts of improvements, but let us analyse how many people it touches and how many women it reaches. It not only grants them decent salaries but also provides them with pensions. There is the provision for pensions and other related benefits in their old age. I will conclude simply by saying that I urge the speedy approval of this bill.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the child tax credit provision, I wonder if the minister could tell us when we can get justice for orphans so that they are not discriminated against?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: I wish I had been given notice of that question to be able to answer it properly.

[English]

The fact is that for a long time the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) has been pressing the government to correct the Family Allowances Act with respect to family allowances and orphans. Unfortunately, I am not in a position today to give him any good news, but I can assure him that I fully support future improvements to the system, which I am sure will come.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it would be recognized as an understatement for me to say that when the minister was discussing clause 123 of the bill she took in quite a bit of territory in her discussion of the position of women in relation to pensions and so forth. I had no objection, I welcomed her statement, but I hope the same latitude will be granted to the rest of us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair was listening very carefully during the minister's speech, and it appeared that her remarks were relevant to provisions of the bill.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that as a result of Madam Speaker's ruling the House is proceeding under Part II of the bill, that we will expect to see printed a new bill from which Part I will have been expunged, and that we are deemed and recognized at this time to be proceeding under Part II only. I think this is quite well understood.

The debate has changed dramatically since that time because I can say that 60 per cent of my speeches had to be set aside for some other date because, as we remember, last year when there was a borrowing authority bill here, it was debated possibly ten or 12 days, and everything under the sun, including the kitchen sink, was discussed ad nauseam prior to the byelection of November 16 or 18 or thereabouts. The bill was used purely as an electoral platform in the ridings involved, and the televising of the debates in this House was used in that connection.

However, we can now return to a much more relevant debate. I personally have found it very difficult to understand how the government was putting both its feet into its mouth by including Part I in this particular bill, which could have taken 20 days to pass, bearing in mind that it incorporated the economy as a whole under the government's own definition last year. The government would be hard put to say otherwise this year. Second, this bill invites extensive discussion of the energy policy brought about by certain changes in the Income Tax Act to implement certain parts of that energy policy.

I promised this busy minister that I would talk about consideration of the incomes of spouses and their taxability, and the consideration of spouses working in family businesses to be separate taxpayers. I invite the minister to read the debates on the tax reform which came into force in 1972 just before the hon. lady came into this House, because she will see that on many occasions when I was spokesman for the opposition with respect to income tax bills and these particular provisions, I insisted that we either consider, as they do in California, at the option of the taxpayer, the filing of joint returns, or that wives who are bookkeepers, telephone secretaries or what have you for two-man plastering firms or trucking firms, should be paid salaries like any other people.

● (1600)

I do not want to offend the hon. lady because I offended her once before by using a phrase that was somewhat on the crude side. Under the Income Tax Act it was cheaper to hire one's mistress than to hire one's wife. There were many areas of discrimination. To make my point I can use the example of the little Chinese corner store which is in my constituency, the little restaurant. We had the silly situation of the spouse of the proprietor of restaurant A working for the proprietor of restaurant B, while Mrs. B was working for Mr. A.

What utter nonsense!

[English]

But if the minister will go to her former colleague, who is now president of the Canadian Transport Commission and who was then minister of finance, and to the then minister of state for finance, who is now a member of the Federal Court, she will find out about the arguments that were used against me, both in Finance and in National Revenue. The tame majority on her side of the House obediently voted me and my colleagues down. We had no chance. What she is acknowledging today was honestly put forward ten years ago.

Mr. Blenkarn: Finally, they are accepting our wisdom. Finally they understand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has the floor.

Mr. Lambert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not know, but it seems to me that perhaps I preceded the commission in my submissions. I do not know that the commission reported before 1970. In any event, this has always struck me as something that was rather strange having had contact with my many Chinese friends in Edmonton who are in these little businesses, as well as with my Lebanese friends. I am referring to the "Ma and Pa" stores. But then I look beyond that, at the little country firm, the plastering company, the plumber's company, the country lawyer, doctor or dentist, those whose wives may be nurse-receptionists but whom it is immaterial to pay, except that it is a gratuity which the husband would be giving her. There would be no advantage to paying her.

Of course we must realize that there will be formalities. There will have to be a regular salary which will be agreed to; there will have to be deductions by the husband, and remissions to the Minister of National Revenue for monthly instalments of income tax deductions at source, for Canada Pension Plan and for unemployment insurance. The amount of paper work will appal these families, particularly if, in addition to that, they would have to hire a babysitter and then claim expenditure for child care. The paper work makes one wonder whether it is worth the candle.

However, I should like to point out one case to the minister. I have found in my practice as lawyer and as member of Parliament that former spouses have come to me and said, "What kind of damn fool arrangement am I in now? I was married, I have two children, my former husband lives in X. By reason of the court order, he pays me $500 a month, that is so much for support of the children and so much in monthly payments on the house which we own jointly as long as I live there. We have a joint tenancy. He is able, by reason of the fact that it is a court order, either under a judicial separation or under a divorce, to get that payment to me deducted from his gross income. It is entirely charged to me because I have the care of the children, but I am paying also"—and here is, frankly, where her lawyer is a mug—"income tax on the principal, interest and taxes on the house". The husband, who is a joint tenant, has the right of total inheritance. May I have the minister's attention, please?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please address his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. Lambert: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker. To continue the point, the husband being the joint tenant will be entitled to half of the proceeds, either on disposition by sale or entirely if his former wife should die. The spouse in this case, the mother looking after the children and the former home, is saddled with paying the income tax on the part of the payment she makes on behalf of her former husband, but he gains the entire benefit.

If the minister will reflect on that she will see that these women, who have not carefully thought out their settlements and whose lawyers have not done so either, have saddled themselves with an unjust proposition. Some of them ask why they should have to pay tax on the allowance for their children. They are allowed the children's allowance under the Income Tax Act, that is for dependent children, and therefore one counterbalances the other. I will say, however, that I think it is high time we looked at it again. We should look again at the children's exemption for those who are in receipt of family benefits, because that matter has not been touched for a considerable time and it is subject to review. That is not the only place where we could amend the Income Tax Act.

Now let us look at the Income Tax Act. I do not wish to speak directly to the minister, but I do not think that any of my remarks now reflect directly on any of her duties. So if she has other more pressing matters, I will understand.

When one looks at this bill, one sees the provisions of the budget of December 11, 1979, with some serious exceptions to which I will refer. There are some provisions in the December 11, 1979, budget which were a carry-over from the preceding budget of the now Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), which had not been incorporated into law. I have found some instances in the bill which go back to 1977. There is a thread which runs from 1977 through 1978 to 1979. There are areas in Bill C-54 which do not tie in with the budget of November, 1979. There has been a conspicuous elimination of relief for farmers under capital gains of permitting them transfers into registered retirement savings plans. This was to give them an additional one-shot relief from capital gains; but, no, that has been eliminated from this particular bill. Then there is the liquidation dividends paid to non-residents. Any reference to those in Bill C-54 has been eliminated. The definition of a Canadian corporation has been eliminated from this act. Worse still is the elimination of any energy tax credit.

I find rather touching the words of the minister on Friday afternoon when he said, as reported at page 6283 of Hansard:

> The slowdown in spending growth will be achieved in significant part by removing the burden of financing petroleum compensation payments from the general government revenues and putting it where it belongs. While this burden will be shared by consumers they will still pay less for energy than if we had moved more rapidly to international levels.

The point is that there is nothing but irrelevancy after irrelevancy, and total falsehood. I would not say the minister was deliberately misinterpreting the energy tax credit and the related features in the budget of December 11, 1979. But the energy package at that time—the 18 cents, first of all, was destined to cover the additional premiums due to be paid to eastern refiners to keep down the additional cost of fuel which would be purchased in the year to come. In other words, there was to be a reduction of that damned fool subsidy.

It is the most idiotic piece of hocus-pocus that has ever been perpetrated on the Canadian people—to subsidize the consumption of a decreasing natural resource while refusing to pay to Canadian producers anything approaching the market price of that commodity. It is brainless. The French pay nearly $4 a gallon for gasoline. It is the same thing with the Germans, the Japanese, and the British. The Americans are paying considerably more than we are. In fact, in many states Americans are paying over $2 a gallon. Here the Canadian public is being told, "You poor darlings, you cannot pay more than $1.25. We will pay Alberta and Saskatchewan oil producers 40 per cent of the world market price." Under the agreement between the Clark administration and the Alberta administration the level was to be 75 per cent of the Chicago price, or the world price, whichever was lower. That is a vast difference. The people of Canada were deliberately bamboozled by people who knew, or should have known, what they were talking about. They kept telling the people of Canada, "You shall have candy. The other people will take your candy away from you."

In that statement by the minister on Friday he said "The slowdown in spending growth will be achieved"—Ha! In other words, the rate of spending will not increase quite so fast, even though it is increasing beyond our control, because we have no control over the price we will pay offshore. If Venezuela, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia or Iraq decide to increase their petroleum $10 a barrel tomorrow, that is precisely what Canada must pay. Of course, the federal purse will take it in the neck. Everybody else adjusts to it and others out-compete us.

The song we have heard about Canadians being able to compete is downright foolishness. They cannot even compete now when they have a three to one advantage. There is something wrong somewhere. Either the cost of production through mismanagement, or the unit cost of production through our manpower is too high, or simply our unit cost of production is too high on a restricted market. Whatever the reason may be, it is not the cost of fuel—it would never be the cost of fuel.

Those people using natural gas are receiving a real break. And what advantage do they make of it? Nothing. All we hear are gripes that we are being out-competed from abroad and "we want this protection, this quota imposed." They want this and they want that. Canadians have become a "we want" society. It is high time Canadian society learned the facts, particularly people in central Canada. Yet the minister says "The slowdown in spending growth will be achieved in significant part by removing the financing of petroleum compensation payments from general government revenues and putting it where it belongs." It always belonged with the consumer, like every other thing.

It is only one particular group or class of producer in one area of the country, in one industry, which is getting it in the neck. All I say is that if oil were a commodity produced in Ontario or Quebec, we would not have the situation we have today. The government would not dare to annoy that group of taxpayers. But for Alberta and Saskatchewan—it says, "Give them the boots", and that is all it has been doing, but with an increasing danger. Once again, there will be a decline in revenue from income tax for the year 1980. There will be a decline in corporate income tax, both from foreign oil and oil supply firms and those hundreds of Canadian oil and oil supply firms, the activities of which will be considerably curtailed during this next year or two years even if the government's energy policy were to get back on the rails. It will be a repetition of what happened in 1971 and 1972.

● (1620)

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) will remember when he was a minister in the Alberta government how revenues for that province dipped very seriously as the result of the—

—manipulations—

[English]

—is what I would call it—

—mere manipulations—

[English]

—of so-called bright people dealing with a subject about which they knew nothing. At the time the director of research for the Royal Commission on Taxation admitted that they had not gone into the consequences of their proposals with regard to natural resources. I heard him admit that in the amphitheatre in the Banff School of Fine Arts at a public conference or seminar involving the oil industry. That man barely got away that day with his skin, and he certainly did not get away with that action in the literal sense.

In the same way we have so-called smart individuals in the Department of Energy who are playing around in a theatrical way and devising an energy policy which is doomed to failure from start to finish. The industry and the outside commentators are against the policy, and we see it everywhere, but there is no critical assessment being made by the government. The provinces involved—British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan—are absolutely flabbergasted. I predict that there will be a drop in corporate and personal income tax revenues for this year as the result of the energy policy by over 5 per cent in total. There will be a loss of 30,000 jobs in 1981 in those three provinces as a result of this policy. We are not talking about crossing sweeper wages. We are talking about people who are earning good solid wages and salaries the year round. We are talking about Canadian companies which are successful and which are a credit to the ingenuity and get-up-and-go of our Canadian businessmen.

We are in this situation because those people who are fussing around with the energy policy, from the minister down, do not know the difference between twelve o'clock noon and twelve o'clock midnight when it comes to the operation of the oil industry. Fools let abroad is what it amounts to. That policy will have nefarious results in so far as income tax is concerned. For example, I can refer to the most recent sale of leases which took place about ten days ago. This sale involved a mere $8 million when it should have been $80 million, but nobody is investing. Forty drilling rigs have gone, there are 100 more lying idle, and there will soon be another 100 more lying idle as the programs wind down and no new programs replace the old ones.

When one looks at this matter one feels like weeping. I will have many other opportunities to come back to this topic. The government ministers who are responsible, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), will have their noses rubbed into it very hard.

I have one other point I would like to make with regard to those three ministers. It concerns the government's policy with regard to the values of Canadian equities on the stock market. The day after the Minister of Energy announced his policy, he boasted that the market had opened strong and that there had been no deleterious effect as the result of his statement. By nightfall, it was readily calculated that over $600 million had been lost on face value by Canadian companies in the oil industry. That loss has continued and has not been recovered.

The policy is to Canadianize the industry. It would seem that the Canadianization is to take place through depressed stock values. If these men were financiers or operators in the stock market, they would be charged with deliberately manipulating the market in order to acquire stocks at depressed values as the result of the stories they spread around. These ministers deliberately acted to rig the market. But we are watching that darling of the government, Petro-Canada, which will use the dollars of Canadian consumers, raised through the imposition of a tax on a barrel of oil, to raise a fund in order to acquire interests in oil companies. It is there. However, that goes somewhat beyond this bill, and for that, Mr. Speaker, I excuse myself—but it is there.

One of the characteristics of this bill which bothers me is the absence of any real relief from capital gains tax. I oppose capital gains tax except when it is levied in a certain, limited way, only if it could not be levied in a different way. I do not like the concept of capital gains tax at any time. Capital gains tax was introduced in response to so-called land profiteering. Under the income tax law at the time, anyone who sold land as a matter of a business venture, and that involved more than just selling one lot, whatever profit he or she made was deemed to be income because it was a venture and, accordingly, it was taxed. The royal commission sat for a long time and brought forward a report with a loud voice. The government pondered, and then brought in a capital gains tax of 50 per cent. This meant that 50 per cent of the increase, rather than 100 per cent, was brought into income. The only exception was that the family home, whether rural or urban, was exempted.

We tried to get the family farm, in fact all agricultural property which was going to continue to be used for agricultural purposes, exempted from capital gains tax. Amendments were offered but the then Liberal majority voted against them. Whether a sale from a father to a son or daughter was involved, or a sale to his brothers and sisters, all within close family, and whether by life transfer or testamentary gift did not matter; those properties were subject to capital gains tax.

When the Hon. John Turner was minister of finance he exempted farm property that passed within a family once in a lifetime. That did not include the incorporated farm, however. For those people from western Canada where incorporated farms are very common, there was no relief whatsoever.

I know that the income tax department worked hard on this matter. If a father sold his farm to his son, and the father had used it as a general purpose farm but the son turned it into a livestock feeding operation, that was not deemed the same category of farming and so the sale was liable to capital gains tax. If a dairy farm in Ontario was converted into a sheep farm, or the reverse, that too attracted capital gains tax. After some awkward shuffling, however, that was changed as well.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this House should not be satisfied until all capital gains tax is removed from all agricultural land that is to continue to be used for agricultural purposes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: There has been talk about North-South relations, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I saw some advertising in which Cardinal Leger, formerly of Montreal, spoke about the necessity for the North to feed the South or else in ten to 20 years it might not exist. The capital gains tax in this country discourages and certainly inflates the cost of raising food not only for ourselves but in order to meet the obligations that the Prime Minister hopes we will undertake.

The situation is compounded by the fact that in 1971, when this House was considering the Income Tax Act, $1 purchased $1 worth of goods, but today it purchases only 45 cents worth of goods. An acre of land worth $1,000 at that time is now worth about $1,100 on the average when the index is applied. A young farmer who is asked to buy land at that price and finance it at today's interest rates will respond not only with a loud raspberry but with some rather shocking language which would be deserved.

Since the year the act was passed I would say that capital gains tax, on the basis of inflation, has increased the value of farm land by at least one-third, because the vendor always says that the purchaser shall pay and holds himself out to be exempt from the tax as much as possible.

The government is the chief beneficiary of inflation under the Income Tax Act, with the exception of the control that was put on personal income tax by the indexation provisions. Corporate income tax just goes up; it feeds; it is a cancer. On capital gains it is nothing much more than that.

I see that I have exhausted my time, Mr. Speaker, but I shall come back to this. I have enjoyed speaking to a House that I think has listened, and I hope I shall be able to deal with this in detail at another time. I wish to attempt to convince my hon. friends in this House and people in the country that one of the chief difficulties we have in Canada today is an income tax act which penalizes progress and rewards government as a result of inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, today I should like to undertake to discuss a number of issues in the time allotted to me. In the speech that I am about to give, I should like to try to describe the economic realities facing Canada and the western world which have provided the underpinnings of Bill C-54. I should like to try to evaluate the current economic policy of the government in this light and to provide the rationale for the measures included in Bill C-54.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on the criticisms put forward during this debate and prior debates regarding those particular policies and the inclusion, or lack thereof, of certain tax measures such as those mentioned by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

The most serious and pressing problem facing Canada today is the problem of inflation in its current manifestation, which we call stagflation. According to Dr. Haberler, a noted world economist, we can define stagflation as follows:

> Coexistence of sharply rising prices and wages and large unemployment and excess capacity both in the aggregate and in particular industries.

I think this describes the situation that we face in Canada today relatively well. That is our problem.

Before a solution can be found, I believe there must be a clear understanding of the cause of the problem. To understand the cause, it seems to me that one has to accept a very simple and irrefutable fact. Again I quote Dr. Haberler who said:

> Every inflation, including stagflation, is a monetary phenomenon in the sense that there has never been a significant inflation that has not been caused or accommodated by excessive monetary growth—and no inflation or stagflation can be stopped without monetary restraint . . . The longer inflation lasts the more intractable it becomes because money illusion—

Money illusion is, effectively, inflationary expectations or the basing of decisions on nominal variables rather than real after-inflation variables.

> —is eroded and inflationary expectations are sensitized.

● (1640)

Without money illusion, decision making on the basis of nominal rather than real variables, Keynesian economics does not work. Therefore, in today's society where the public has entrenched well established inflationary expectations, the current prescription of the New Democratic Party is futile and counterproductive. They say, for example, that to overcome our malaise we should have monetary expansion in excess of our ability to produce goods and services. In other words, we should have an expansionary fiscal policy as the tool. But to control the inflationary factors which would indeed result, we should have some form of an incomes policy, whether it be in the form of a prices review commission or in the form of generalized wage and price controls. I know some members have put this suggestion forward in the past.

The belief is that expansionary monetary policy would reduce interest rates, stimulate demand and investment and, therefore, employment and growth, and the incomes policy would control inflationary pressures. I am sincerely convinced the promoters of this policy, Mr. Speaker, are living in a fool's paradise. Without the existence of money illusion, that is again the lack of entrenched inflationary expectations in our society, expanding the purchasing power faster than output, we will do nothing more than generate increased inflationary pressure.

Mr. Blenkarn: That was your policy from 1975 to 1978.

Mr. Evans: This part of the prescription is precisely responsible for the persistent upward acceleration of inflation in western countries for the past decade and a half.

In the second half of the prescription, an incomes policy, or what I would refer to tongue in cheek, as the chicken version proposed by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), a half of an incomes policy, is a fair prices commission with roll-back powers, a necessary part of the over-all policy which has been put forward by the NDP because even they recognize the inflationary consequences of the expansionary monetary and fiscal policy of which I speak. They know that expansionary fiscal policy, accommodated by monetary growth, will result in exactly what I have described, so they propose Part II, which is the controls policy.

Controls have never provided a solution to inflation, and they never will because they do not address the problem, only the symptom. Rising prices are not the cause of inflation, just as a fever is not the cause of an illness. Therefore, while controls may allow a respite, as they were designed to do in 1976, during which the real cure—restraint—can be affected, they are totally inappropriate for the long term especially when the fundamental cause of inflation is being exacerbated rather than reduced.

I would like to draw an analogy for hon. members which, however, may be too simple. Let us suppose we have a kettle on the stove, boiling away. Let us suppose we do not like the steam coming from the kettle. There are a number of policy options you could choose. First, the heat could be turned down which would be the appropriate policy. Second, the kettle could be capped and the heat turned down and you get rid of the steam immediately. But that is a dangerous policy. It was proposed by Walter Gordon and his associates—controls and turning down the heat at the same time. The third option is to cap the kettle and turn up the heat. That is the NDP policy, which is not only dangerous but stupid. The way to stop the kettle from boiling is to reduce the heat. The way to stop inflation is to reduce the growth, and purchasing power, more in line with the average growth in output of goods and services.

Mr. Deans: You wouldn't know how to make tea with hot water, for goodness sake!

Mr. Evans: The NDP approach is equivalent to saying that the kettle is not boiling because we can no longer see the steam. But in both the physical and economic worlds the end result is clear and obvious—there will be an explosion.

Hon. members may now say yes, but inflation is one thing, stagnation is quite another. Stagnation of growth and employment certainly cannot be related to inflation. Certainly they are not caused by the same phenomenon. I suggest they are inextricably related. Further, if we do not come to grips with the problem of inflation, then the problem of stagnation will certainly worsen. This is so because of the effects which rising inflation has on consumers and on the business community. It creates great uncertainty about the future. It encourages current consumption. It discourages saving. It discourages investment, Mr. Speaker. It creates an attitude of living for today. It destroys faith in the future. Prosperity and rising standards of living are not consistent with such a scenario, and that scenario is coming to pass in the western world.

We have all seen the rise of the "me generation". We have all seen the growing pressure to enhance the well-being of this or that special interest group, not only to make them better off absolutely but to make them better off relative to other groups in our society. We have begun to devote our energies not to making Canada and Canadians wealthier, more fulfilled, but rather to bickering over our relative share of existing wealth. This is a sure prescription for social disaster. I contend that this social malaise has its roots in the economic malaise.

Miss MacDonald: It is in the Liberal party.

Mr. Deans: And it is caused by Liberal governments over the years.

Mr. Evans: When there is uncertainty and fear for the future, the reaction is to take what you can for today. This situation was well described by the late Professor Fred Hirsch in his book "Social Limits to Growth."

Stagnation is the result of the process I have described, and the signs are everywhere. We see a decline in research and development not only in Canada but in the United States and in other western nations as well. It follows, when inflation has created growing uncertainty about future rates of return on investment, when inflation has driven interest rates to high levels, by necessity investment time horizons shorten and quick payback is required on investments.

Research and development, which have long-term payoffs—

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The bill was altered earlier by Madam Speaker's ruling that the borrowing authority portion of the bill which deals with the economic condition of the country be taken out and stricken from the bill. This afternoon we are considering only income tax amendments.

My friend has spoken eloquently with respect to inflation, the monetary causes of inflation and that type of thing, but at no time has he referred to the bill or to the Income Tax Act. I suggest, sir, that he is out of order and I ask you to correct him, please.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Hon. members will have noted that I just arrived to replace the hon. member who was in the chair before me. If the speaker who had the floor had not confined his remarks to the bill, he would have been reminded.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, it is important that I try to point out the exact relevance of the remarks I am making. If you have designed an Income Tax Act and amendments thereto which will raise revenues, whether there be enough revenue for certain members or too much for others, it is important to understand the general economic context within which those revenue-generating measures are put forward. It is also important to understand the general economic context which relates to the necessity for certain tax measures to be placed within that tax bill and the necessity for not putting in others. That was the intent of my speech, and I suggest to you, with all deference, that that is a totally relevant subject to be discussing when we are talking about an income tax measure such as the one we are discussing today.

Mr. Deans: I don't know where.

Mr. Evans: I was talking about research and development. Tax measures are required to enhance research and development.

Mr. Blenkarn: Where are they in the bill?

Mr. Evans: Without growth in ideas, products and processes in Canada, Canada is sure to fall behind in the industrial world. In other words, stagnation is sure to worsen. Not only is investment in R and D stifled by rising inflation, so too are other investments in new capital equipment necessary to modernize and adapt our industry to changing circumstances.

● (1650)

One measure in the bill is the small business development bond which will certainly help small businesses to modernize their plant and equipment to make them more competitive in the world. Such investment requires stability and the prospect of fair rewards. But in an environment where we increasingly fight among ourselves over the spoils, is it logical that those who would invest can expect society to permit those rewards to be paid? I say probably not, and we see examples of that right in the House of Commons—unsubstantiated, though deeply-felt claims of corporate rip-offs and condemnation of individuals who take advantage of tax policies specifically designed to promote such investment. It is a "Catch-22" situation.

We want people to invest in small businesses or in rental housing, so we create in the bill before us tax incentives such as the small business development bonds and MURBs. But when an individual in our society invests so as to take advantage of these provisions, and as a result his taxes are reduced—and this was the intent, to reduce taxes, to increase incentive and to direct investment in a direction which is felt to be socially desirable—then we hear from certain corners of the House a great rail at those individuals, that they are ripping off the system. No wonder we face an investment problem. It is because there is a political schizophrenia. We encourage people to do it, and then we beat them over the head when they take advantage of exactly what we have asked them to do.

Similarly, we hear cries that rates of return on investment are too high, that business is taking too much, that we should increase taxes on the business community—that this bill should increase the taxes on that community—but we fail to look behind the scene to realize that reported profits have been greatly exaggerated by inflation, not only by rising prices per se, but more important by the gross underevaluation of plant and equipment used in their production. Current accounting practice requires that depreciation be charged on original cost and not replacement cost. During rapid inflation this creates a gross overstatement of net revenues and thus profits. But worse, it means that capital cost allowance, depreciation, does not come close to providing the funds necessary for reinvestment and modernization. As a result the quality of our capital stock deteriorates over time, productivity and competitiveness decline, and jobs are lost. These are the jobs we hear from the NDP are absolutely required, the jobs we agree are absolutely required. But the policies they believe should be included in this income tax bill would lead to less jobs being created in the future. Politically inspired rhetoric may be satisfying to some in the short term, but it is seriously wrong for the longer term.

We see the same myopic view in the media. On a recent airing of the program "Question Period", Don McGillivray, the national economics editor of Southam Press, asked in all seriousness why savers should expect a real rate of return when real wages have not been rising. If that is an indication of the depth of understanding of the savings and investment process of the national economics editor of our national newspaper, then it is no wonder the public is so confused. What is worse, the guest on the show, an economics critic of the opposition, who shall go unnamed in the spirit of non-partisanship, could not answer the question.

We must begin to realize that the money illusion is dead, that savers demand a real rate of return if they are to forgo current consumption in favour of future consumption. Why should we ask our citizens who wish to save for retirement, for the education of their children, or whatever, to subsidize through interest rates less than inflation those who wish to consume more than they earn today? Why is it that borrowers seem to be favoured in some parts of this House? Is it more noble to borrow than to save? I say absolutely not, and that brings me to my point. We must take steps now to alter this attitude, to reward savings since, without savings, there can be no investment and, I contend, no new jobs for the future.

I agree, though not often, with Professor Lawrence Klein, a Keynesian economist, at the University of Pennsylvania, who wrote the following:

We must go from being a high-consumption economy to being a high-saving economy if we are to re-industrialize and improve our standard of living.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In this review of tax policy, could the parliamentary secretary tell us where there is any inducement in the bill to increasing savings, as he mentioned? Can he at least give us the clause?

Mr. Evans: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. The rates of return offered by such measures as the small business development bond and the MURBs will be an inducement to saving. It will help individuals to put away money which they might otherwise have consumed in the current period, and to invest it for the development of small businesses and rental accommodations for the future. It is intuitively obvious that general and specific provisions are included in that particular piece of legislation.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could explain how the massive reductions in the depletion allowance and depreciation help savings?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I should like to remind the hon. member that oral question period is usually between two and three o'clock.

Mr. Evans: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure in future discussions the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) and myself can resolve the problem he seems to have raised.

Miss MacDonald: Just talk to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) about it.

Mr. Evans: We must promote policies which reward saving. I cannot believe the vast majority of members opposite, as well as members on this side, would disagree with that particular policy. I hope we will work together to develop policies which will reward saving, and allow a fair rate of return on investment, if we are to improve our deteriorating growth of productivity, if we are to create the industries and secure jobs of the future which I know all members are extremely anxious to provide. We must be willing to sacrifice some current consumption for a much better future. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) so aptly put it in his much-maligned and misunderstood statement, we must reorder our priorities. I think that is an intuitively and eminently sensible thing to be said at this point in our history.

It must be emphasized that the changes to which I refer are not a matter of choice; they are a matter of necessity. The world is changing rapidly. We must change, adapt, or we will surely be left behind. Our industries must be encouraged to modernize, to engage in research and development, to develop new products and processes, to become more efficient and competitive. In the future Canada will face stiff competition from abroad. The GATT will force us to respond; the less developed countries will force us to respond. We must begin to reduce institutional rigidities in our labour and capital markets. We must begin to enhance, not restrict, the free flow of labour, capital, goods, services and ideas across the country. We will not have the luxury of choice in this matter; we will do it now or it will be forced upon us later.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman)—External Aid—Consideration of tripartite aid to Third World countries; the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Municipal Affairs—Request for extension of community services contribution program; the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo)—Grain—Reimbursement of producers for loss of income from depressed prices.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 14, the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I made reference to this matter the other day. Motion No. 14 is in the name of the hon. member for Lévis who resigned this House some time ago. I draw that to Your Honour's attention. Perhaps we could decide whether or not that item should be stood. It seems somewhat silly to stand a motion if the member is not now in the House.

EXCISE TAX

SUGGESTED REMISSION OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS IN DISASTER AREAS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of remitting the excise tax levied on building materials used in the course of repairing and/or replacing building and other losses as a result of major natural disasters so deemed by provincial authorities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present this motion which the House has just heard read. It arises from a disaster which struck southwestern Ontario on August 7, 1979. It involved two tornadoes that struck a number of counties in southwestern Ontario. I have boiled down what I wanted to discuss today, in essence, to a proposal that the government should consider rebating the federal sales tax it receives for building materials sold to rebuild after natural disasters. I would suggest to the government that this is a form of undesirable tax inasmuch as it levies a tax on those people who have suffered a real loss as a result of something over which they had no control. In the words of many it could be considered an unjust or inhumane tax.

I should like to speak to this in the total context of the suggestion that this is a small part of the total disaster assistance matter which is of concern to the federal and provincial governments in Canada.

To put the matter into the narrow focus I want to emphasize today, it is my understanding there will be a response from the government, probably from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) who, I hope, when he addresses this question will not only tell us about what the federal government does by way of disaster plans, because that is very well laid out and is quite familiar to any of us who have experienced a disaster in our constituencies, but will also address himself to the question, either on his own behalf or, I would hope, on behalf of the government, as to the morality or the ethics of taking taxes from somebody who through no fault of his own, is forced to spend large sums of money on a rebuilding program because of a natural disaster.

The particular disaster that came close to me personally began in southwestern Ontario on the evening of August 7, 1979, and involved two tornadoes. I emphasize that this disaster involved tornadoes, because most disasters in which the federal government has been involved by way of assistance have been floods. A flood in most cases does not create the same level of damage to an individual as does a tornado. What I mean by that is that a person living in a rural area in the business of farming who is subjected to a natural disaster will probably be affected to a greater extent as a result of the tornado than as the result of any other kind of disaster.

Many people in the counties of Oxford, Brant, and Haldimand-Norfolk lost not only their homes but their businesses as well, that is, they lost their barns, their implements and their stock, as well as their income for the current year, namely, the crops. In many cases all of those things were lost in just a matter of a few minutes.

On that occasion there were two tornadoes about three-quarters of an hour apart, running parallel six or eight miles apart, for a total distance of about 50 miles.

As I make this plea to the government members today I would remind them of what Teddy Roosevelt said in the United States a number of years ago, back in 1910. When discussing the object of government he said, "The object of government is the welfare of the people." I want to suggest that if a government does indeed have the welfare of the people in mind its main role is to protect those people against things from which they are unable to protect themselves. A second role of government today is to do for the people those things they cannot possibly do for themselves.

Let me suggest to the parliamentary secretary and other members of the House that if the government is going to protect the citizens of Canada, one of the things it must protect them against is natural disaster. The fact that a government would exact taxes from those same people who, through no fault of their own, fell victim to a natural disaster, is hard to believe; it is almost unconscionable. I hope the parliamentary secretary will address himself to the propriety, the humaneness and the morality of a government taxing those who have suffered loss.

My whole story can be quickly summed up in a letter I received from a gentleman in Woodstock by the name of Mr. William Graham, a very well-known citizen in that area and across the country as he has been very much involved in the chamber of commerce for many years. This letter was sent to me on November 8, 1980, and I should like to read it:

This letter will confirm some of the discussions we have had over the past few months since the tornado of August 7, 1979, devastated this part of western Ontario and especially Oxford county.

As you know, at that time I was president of the Woodstock District Chamber of Commerce and at present I am Chairman of the Board of Trust of the Woodstock General Hospital. I am also president of a retail business (Reg Hall Ltd) and secretary-treasurer of a manufacturing company (Timberland Equipment Ltd). I am also still involved with the Ontario and Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

I feel my personal involvement in the community allows me to speak with some authority as to how the federal government dealt with the above mentioned disaster.

I would like to add here parenthetically, that this is essentially non-partisan inasmuch as this disaster occurred when my party was in government but was following rules, regulations and agreements which were formulated by the former Liberal government in 1970. I do not have any particular brief from a partisan point of view as I present this particular problem. Mr. Graham goes on to state:

I feel I can also speak with authority on the side of those who were affected as my personal residence sustained damage in excess of $40,000.00, and my personal loss for such things as landscaping, trees, driveways, excavating, tree removal, etc. will amount to well over $10,000.00.

This was a man who was able to insure himself to the extent he needed, but he still had a loss of $10,000 on things that were uninsurable.

He goes on to state:

At the time of the tornado I sincerely felt that you and your colleague at Queen's Park, Dr. Harry Parrott, were doing everything possible to expedite the financial commitment of your respective governments but, as time passed, it became evident there was no clearout plan in place, especially at the federal level, and a lack of participation by Ottawa certainly left a very bad taste in the mouths of many, many people.

As we have discussed on many occasions, I find it very difficult to understand why the federal government would want to collect taxes on building materials to rebuild a devastated area. I find such an act immoral or possibly I should say criminal. Many of those affected people did not know where their next dollar was coming from and the only thought in their minds was to get a roof over their family and a shelter over their animals, quickly, before winter came. From my discussions with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce who, as you know, had a conversation at that time with Mr. John Crosbie, then finance minister of the federal government, their findings indicated that the above mentioned tax exemption was a very popular suggestion with the politicians and not so popular with the bureaucrats in Ottawa who did not want the extra work in establishing a system to exempt 600 families from these taxes. I would like to see the federal government develop a plan in co-operation with the provinces for dealing with disasters such as the tornado.

I know there is a plan in effect but it does not deal adequately with this type of thing. This plan in effect gives the people of Canada the perception that the federal government, no matter which party is in power, does not care about the people of Canada who are faced with that kind of disaster.

Mr. Graham goes on to state:

This plan could be especially directed at putting into place proper funding arrangements. As far as I can understand, there is no such definite plan in place and I urge you and your colleagues in Ottawa to move on my suggestion.

● (1710)

He has a perception that there is no plan in place because there was no evidence from Ottawa that Ottawa had any concern about the fate of these people and about their deep financial losses.

I trust this letter will assist you in your efforts to move the politicians and bureaucrats toward the above mentioned suggestion. I sincerely hope so, I would not want to go through such a traumatic event again in my lifetime and I would hope that those who must would not have the worry of federal and provincial funding as we here in Oxford had in August, 1979.

Mr. Graham is obviously very concerned about the level of assistance and the evidence that the people at the senior government level do not care about people who suffer as a result of natural disasters.

I have just a few words to say about this disaster in order to explain what we were dealing with in this area at the time. This disaster affected about eight municipalities. As I mentioned, three counties were affected. Those were Oxford, Brant and the regional municipality of Haldimand-Norfolk. It affected the townships of East Zorra-Tavistock, Blandford-Blenheim, Southwest Oxford, Norwich, Delhi, Burford and the two cities of Nanticoke and Woodstock.

As a result of the losses which were suffered in this disaster a total of 688 claims were received by the committee which was put in charge of looking after disaster relief. About one-third of those were found not to be eligible. In that area 235 farms were affected, including 40 acres of apple trees which were completely wiped out. Eight churches were badly damaged, as were four cemeteries and 256 homes in the city of Woodstock alone.

The Ontario government, which is governed by the dominion-provincial agreement, is responsible for tornado relief and disaster relief and has now come up with some figures on the over-all costs. When this tornado first struck, it was initially estimated that there was $60 million worth of damage and that perhaps $20 million of that damage was not insured.

The final figures which Ontario gave to us indicate a total loss of $13.5 million, which is one of the biggest losses Canada has had for a long time as a result of a natural disaster. Of that, $5.7 million worth of damage was insured. That left uninsured damages amounting to $7.8 million. The committee in the local area which was charged with the responsibility of paying out relief funds paid out a total of about $7.1 million.

The losses sustained in that disaster were quite significant and should certainly be of concern to us as legislators who are in a position to produce the laws which should help people across the country.

One cannot help but take account of the fact that many people deserve recognition for what was done after that disaster. I refer to people at the federal and provincial levels as well as local people. I refer to the Ontario Provincial Police and the public utilities commissions of the various areas. The Mennonite Disaster Service did a tremendous job in supplying help to those who needed it. Various churches, service clubs and individuals gave their time, money and goods to help those who were affected by this disaster.

I want to say a few words about the roles of the two senior governments after this disaster. There is no doubt that there is a federal-provincial agreement now in place which, I submit, is very inadequate. I know now there are plans afoot to change this, and I will come to that matter in a minute.

As I mentioned earlier, the federal role is very imperceptible to the Canadian people. They do not realize that the federal government has any role at all. As we look into the changes which are to come along, that has to be addressed. The Ontario provincial government has usually adopted a stance whereby it guarantees a matching payment to local funds set up to establish relief. The Ontario provincial government promised a matching grant in the ratio of three to one and, in some cases, possibly as high as four to one. There is some argument about this. I have a number of documents which show that there was a promise of three to one matching grants. This was never finally achieved because the final grant paid by the province of Ontario to the local fund for relief was somewhat less than the $3.7 million or $3.8 million raised by the private sector in local campaigns. It is disappointing to me that the provincial government allowed people to believe that it would match personal donations in the ratio of three to one when in fact the ratio was less than one to one.

I know the Ontario government made other commitments, but the perception of the people of my area was that the provincial government would give $3 for every one dollar. There are many disillusioned people who would not now give in a similar disaster because of the way this was handled.

The effect of a disaster such as this was probably best summed up by the claims co-ordinator and his secretary who were in charge of the disaster relief program in the Oxford, Brant and Haldimand-Norfolk area. I have a 15-page document here in which they went through the chronological sequence of events during the rebuild period, and there is a summary at the end which is worth reading to show the emphasis put on the effect the disaster has had on human beings. The summary reads as follows:

> The lives of the victims will probably never be quite the same again, because in less than one hour on the evening of August 7, 1979, their lives suffered a grave disruption in the form of total destruction of all they had worked for, and in many cases, for the whole of their lives, and now retirement was not to be so comfortable. Many memories had gone with the wind, literally. Most just began to realize, late in the winter months, how the shock had affected their personal beings. Many years will pass before a recovery can be realized both materially and emotionally.
> Thanks to many generous and caring people, the trauma was eased somewhat.

Finally, I want to move to what I think should be the response of the government to the problem we have before us. Back in May of last year I asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and in my supplementary question I asked this:

> Does the minister condone the raising of revenues by the federal tax on building materials at the expense of those who have suffered immeasurable loss and grief as a result of natural disasters?

The minister's reply was as follows:

> Madam Speaker, I am sure that in certain cases the application of the tax system may have unfortunate effects such as the one he described, but there is not to my knowledge within that system at present a way by which these particular difficulties could be overcome.

I presume as a result of that question on May 20, 1980, that six weeks later, on July 4, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced the appointment of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) as the person to be responsible for, and I quote:

> —providing ministerial guidance for policy development, interdepartmental co-ordination and liaison with provincial governments in the area of emergency planning.
> Mr. Pinard's new responsibilities will cover federal planning related to natural disasters, major accidents—

I see an attempt by the government, and I praise the government for it, to recognize the fact that there is a problem between the federal and provincial levels with respect to funding after natural disasters and, more particularly, a problem regarding the federal government's image. This is not a big problem. I hope the parliamentary secretary does not try to tell us that to rebate this kind of tax on building materials would be a problem because the federal government already rebates to schools. It rebates 1.5 per cent of tender prices to schools. It rebates about 2.5 per cent of total hospital construction costs. I know there are certain criteria within which eligibility lies, but nonetheless this is done for many other public and municipal institutions when rebates seem appropriate. Gasoline taxes are rebated to farmers. There is just no reason, from a logistical point of view, why this could not be handled simply in much the same way as it is for schools and hospitals.

I see that my time is almost up. I want to close by appealing to this House, and to the parliamentary secretary in particular because I realize he has an important role to play in this area relating to the remission of federal taxes on building materials.

In the broader area of disaster planning I remind the government of something Edmund Burke said a couple of centuries ago which is still very apt. When he was giving his second speech respecting conciliation with America Edmund Burke said this:

> It is not what a lawyer tells me I may do; but what humanity, reason and justice tell me I ought to do.

I think all of us here in the House of Common as legislators must take heed of what Edmund Burke said, that we have an obligation to do what we ought to do. I urge the parliamentary secretary, as he speaks to this question, to address himself to the matter of whether or not there is an obligation on the part of governments to forgo that tax which is levied on the poor people who have suffered losses, losses which in no way can an insurance policy replace and in no way can funds raised by the public replace. Many of those losses consist of memorabilia, losses which cannot be replaced by money. The least we can do as a federal government is to forgo those taxes which we would take from Canadians, and rightly so in other situations, but not when they are the victims of a natural disaster designated as such by provincial governments.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can respond to some of the questions of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). He can rest assured that this government, and certainly the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), are extremely concerned about the problems he has put forward. It is my understanding that we will have difficulty in supporting this particular measure or this particular approach, but it certainly goes without saying that the hon. member has our whole support in his concern for disaster assistance, whether it be here in Canada or in other parts of the world. I am sure that his support is not only in the case of Canadian disasters but would go to other areas as well. An example of that, of course, is the disaster which has devastated villages in Italy recently. Certainly disaster assistance must be provided in such cases, as it should be in the case of the disaster in Mississauga.

If we want to establish some mechanism for assistance by the federal government, however, we should look for an approach which is both workable and efficient. There are some serious problems inherent in the proposal before us, I would contend, and that proposal, of course, is to provide for a remission of the excise tax on building materials used to restore buildings damaged or destroyed in the disaster.

The tax in question is the sales tax. The problem is that this tax is assessed on the value of goods shipped by the manufacturer of the building materials. By the time these goods pass through the hands of wholesalers and retailers to their ultimate use, the tax has long since been paid and is embedded in the price of the materials. So it is not at all clear how the refund can effectively be made, or indeed how to determine the amount that should be refunded.

I know the hon. member for Oxford has indicated that he hoped I would not raise the administrative problem and use that as a guise for saying that the government cannot accept his proposal. But certainly the administrative problems are obvious, whether one thinks of refunding the tax to the manufacturer who paid in the first place or to the eventual purchaser. The sales tax we are talking about is 5 per cent on the value of the manufacturer's shipment, not the 9 per cent rate which generally applies to other goods subject to sales tax.

When one adds on costs of warehousing and transportation after the building materials leave the manufacturer, plus mark-ups at the wholesale and retail level, the original 5 per cent tax becomes a considerably smaller proportion of the final price of the materials, perhaps only 2 per cent or 3 per cent. Furthermore, the cost of building materials normally represents about one-half of the cost of the average construction.

So when we consider all of these factors I submit that the 5 per cent sales tax is a pretty small part, not much more than 1 per cent of the final cost of the building. It is clear that refunding this amount to a disaster victim would not go very far in helping to re-establish that person in the style to which he was accustomed prior to the disaster. As a result, it would certainly seem to me that we should be looking at much more generous and larger funds to be paid to the disaster victims, and whether there should be included in that particular package of funds which goes to an individual something that could be called a refund of the tax. It does not seem to me to make any difference to an individual who has been victim of a disaster whether the moneys that are being paid to him are earmarked as a partial refund or a total refund of a sales tax. What really matters to the individual is whether funds will be made available by the federal government, the provincial government or the municipal government to help re-establish himself, irrespective of where that money comes from or how it is earmarked.

One other factor which should be considered is the administrative cost of remitting the tax. There is a direct way of handling a problem which I have just described, which is the direct payment of funds to the individuals affected. It seems to me that if you have so much money available to pursue these programs and we use part of that available money for the administrative cost of making a specific form of payment, money which if it were not spent for that perhaps could enlarge the amount of money available to the government to help the disaster victims, then it seems to me that that cost is something that is hard to justify. We should be using the moneys to help the disaster victims, as I have said. I suggest that this administrative cost might well be hard to justify in relation to the amount of the benefit we should try to provide under this particular program.

The kind of problems I have been describing are typical of the problems which arise when we seek to achieve a particular goal, whether to assist a certain group of taxpayers or to encourage certain kinds of business activity, or even to discourage other activities, by means of special tax provisions.

A year ago the Department of Finance provided an authoritative outline of what these special tax provisions have been costing in the way of tax revenues forgone. These so-called tax expenditures which were put out under the previous minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the present Minister of Finance, indicated that these figures run into many billions of dollars. Obviously the proposal being debated today would not be an expensive one. However, we should examine carefully not only whether the expense is justified but also whether a tax exemption is the best way of assisting people who suffer losses from natural disasters. The alternative method, of course, is through an expenditure program.

For many years there has been a policy on federal financial assistance to victims of natural disasters. One of the principles underlying this policy is that the provincial governments have the primary responsibility for dealing with disasters. Not only do they have the constitutional responsibility for property, but provincial and municipal services are the ones most closely and directly involved in dealing with the kinds of disasters we have heard discussed here today.

However, the federal government stands ready to assist provinces where the cost of dealing with a disaster is greater than the province could reasonably be expected to bear on its own. Since 1970 the formula has been that federal aid becomes available when total costs exceed $1 per capita of population in the province. The federal contribution starts at 50 per cent and there is provision for an even larger federal share if the losses are particularly heavy.

One of the points which the hon. member for Oxford mentioned was that the federal government is not seen to be participating in the assistance to individuals who have been struck by a natural disaster. I agree with him wholeheartedly that that is of great concern because I think the Canadian taxpayers should understand and realize that the federal government is actually involved in looking after their welfare when a situation like a natural disaster occurs. I think the hon. member is totally correct, the federal government is not receiving the kind of credit it is due when those kinds of payments and those kinds of assistance are being put out by the federal government.

The federal contribution, as I said, starts at 50 per cent, but the federal contribution does not provide for federal aid where losses could have been covered by insurance. With that exception, it includes the cost of restoring essential private property to its pre-disaster condition, or restoring small business enterprises where the owner's livelihood has been threatened by the disaster. I suggest this approach, Mr. Speaker, is a reasonable one. It does not attempt to respond to every situation involving property loss from natural causes.

For example, not long ago, as the hon. member for Oxford has mentioned, tornadoes caused extensive damage in his constituency. Almost all of the losses were covered by insurance. In any event, there was no request by the provincial authorities for federal aid in that case. Where citizens can provide their own protection through insurance, this should be the normal procedure. This is an area where the role of government should be to help with problems which are beyond the ability of individuals to deal with.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel this kind of problem should be dealt with by means of a further tax concession. At best, the proposed remission of sales tax would provide only marginal assistance, as I have indicated, even assuming that an answer could be found to the serious problem of how in the world to administer the particular tax remission. Where a case can be made for government assistance, I think it would be preferable to provide that aid through direct expenditure programs.

I thank the hon. member for bringing forward his suggestion and bringing this very important problem before the House for debate today.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, thank the hon. member for bringing this issue before the House today. I think it is important, not only from the point of view of those who suffer from disasters, both past and future, but it gives us an opportunity to look at the whole question of what disaster is. It enables us to look at some extension of programs which would apply to housing and building improvements generally.

As a new member of the House, it is surprising to me that our federal government has not already made compensation by removing the excise tax for victims of major disasters. I thank the government member from Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) for explaining some of the intricacies of the financing of these matters. The fact is we can find ways to do these things and we should not be leaving it to such complicated mechanisms. Of course, I realize the provinces, too, are involved.

It is also important that we look back at the kinds of disasters we have had in Canada. While I was waiting to speak, I talked to several of my colleagues who reminded me of a number of disasters we suffered in recent years. Mississauga was mentioned. In the port of Vancouver, which surrounds my riding, we suffer the possibility of disasters from explosives coming into our port almost daily, not to mention the very dangerous materials which are brought into that area by rail, truck and, now, by air as well. So there is a high possibility of disasters happening there.

We also recalled the floods in Manitoba. I think it was within the last two years where rural communities were inundated. Surely there was extensive damage to homes. In fact, whole rural communities suffered. They certainly would have appreciated help in the way of removal of the excise tax from any materials they would use for home repairs. In British Columbia, which is a mountainous community, houses are quite often built on the slopes of hills. We have disastrous floods in the spring. I recall on a number of occasions houses being flooded and, in fact, some houses being swept into gullies as the spring floods came down the mountainside.

My colleagues also reminded me of tidal waves. There was the Tsunami tidal wave in Port Alverni, which caused extreme damage to homes in that area. So there is no question we should do something about this immediately, to remove the excise tax and use mechanisms to make this a kind of relief for victims of disasters, not just for the person selling the building supplies.

We, in our party, believe that this measure does not go nearly far enough. We believe there should be no excise tax on building materials generally. Why should we be taxing and reaping a profit from the disaster our present housing crisis is creating? I know the IWA in British Columbia has a very strong policy with respect to the removal of this tax. It has pleaded for the removal of it. It does not like to see our Canadian forest products going over the border to the United States. The industry has not done too badly this year with regard to jobs, mostly because of the Canadian dollar and the fact that so many of our supplies, even our forestry supplies for housing, are going to the United States.

We would like the tax removed on building supplies generally so that not only would jobs be created for our people in the forest industry, but so that we would have more affordable housing supplies for the repair of homes and, of course, the building of new homes.

I think it is timely to look at the whole question of disasters. I spoke in the House last week, as did many other members, about the tragedy of our housing crisis in Canada. Surely this is a disaster of the first order which faces all of us in our constituencies.

If we look at the state of housing in certain areas, particularly on Indian reserves, what could be a worse national disaster and more of a national disgrace than that? Some 50 per cent of the people living on reserves are living in housing, if you can call it that, which is completely uninhabitable by our standards. The houses do not have running water, toilet or sanitation facilities. They do not provide any kind of warmth in the wintertime. In fact, the neglect of this housing is such a disaster that it is causing deaths in many Indian families.

Of course, just the removal of the excise tax on building materials will not completely solve that problem. The solution requires major and immediate government action to put more money into native housing and to work with native groups in order to do away with the bureaucratic hassles they constantly face. Thus, they would be able to get on with the job of upgrading present housing, bringing down the cost of construction materials, which this removal of the tax would do, and building new houses. We are far behind in this area, and it is a national disgrace.

I am reminded also of housing in some of our downtown areas, particularly in my own riding of Vancouver East. We have hundreds and hundreds of people who are living in really desperate housing conditions in downtown areas. There are workers from the forest and fishing industries of our province who have had health problems, and many women who are raising children on their own who must live in these conditions. They are living in fire traps, old rooming houses and hotels, with cockroaches as constant companions. There must be programs to upgrade this accommodation, and to build new accommodation.

I plead that the kind of incentives, including the removal of excise tax on building materials, not be given in such a way that the values of them go to the landlords or the absentee landlords who own this type of housing. It should be done in such a way that it would be an advantage to the people who need the housing. They deserve it and they have a right to decent housing.

There is also the need for the removal of this excise tax so that we may have a national program to improve older homes. Such a move would help undermine the escalated pricing which occurs as the result of speculation. In many of the older areas of Canada, such as the maritimes, Ontario and Quebec, if not the western areas, there are many houses which the owners cannot afford to repair and, as a result, that housing stock is being lost. I am glad that the minister responsible for CMHC has mentioned this matter as a priority. I wish that he would raise some money for the proposal. Major emphasis should be put on the renovation of older homes.

In conclusion, we feel that there should be no excise tax charged to people who suffer as the result of natural disaster. Even more important is the necessity to remove the tax from general building materials and, particularly, from materials used in the construction and repair of essential homes. We feel that the government should get on with such a program immediately.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) for introducing this motion. Nobody has control over natural catastrophes. They are an act of God. I was very disappointed in the comments of the parliamentary secretary. In the first place, insurance policies do not cover natural catastrophes such as floods, tornadoes, prairie fires and so on. There is no way that people, even if they have the money, can protect themselves from natural disasters.

I am always amazed at the way in which we scramble and jump to help those in another country who suffer a natural catastrophe. It seems that we can never do enough for such people. This occurred recently as the result of the Italian earthquake. Surely we should have policies which give as much to our own people as we are prepared to give to other people. Charity begins at home. I do not object to sending help to those in other countries who suffer a natural catastrophe, but I do object to the way in which we deal with natural catastrophes in our own country.

The parliamentary secretary suggested that the federal government could pay half the expenses and the provincial government could pay the other half. When one looks at natural catastrophes, such as the flood in B.C. during the Christmas season, one sees that millions of dollars must be spent to restore highways, railways, railway beds, bridges and so on. It has been my experience that once these expenses have been paid, there is very little left for the pockets of the people who suffered a loss as a result of the catastrophe.

A natural catastrophe occurred in my riding just a few years ago. While my home was not involved, a terrific flood carried away homes, filled basements with silt and ruined furniture. There was no federal government or provincial government help. Contributions came from private citizens. When these contributions were divided among those who had suffered, people who had lost as much as $1,500, $2,000 or $4,000 in property received as little as $75, $40, $20 for their losses, a mere pittance. These people had no way of knowing that the Red Deer River would flood.

The constituents of the hon. member for Oxford had no way of knowing that a tornado would hit their area. I saw the results of a tornado out west. It lifted buildings right off their foundations and carried them for 20 feet and dropped them on the ground where they would splinter and be completely ruined, along with the furniture. It is a terrible catastrophe and something which is very hard to believe.

Surely, after a catastrophe in which ordinary people lose everything they have, we should not give them mere excuses of how difficult and how much it would cost to administer a program which would merely give back the excise tax, which is all the motion asks. I am sure that we are capable, with our sophisticated bookkeeping systems of today, of working out the amount of excise tax which would be applied to such homes. I agree that this tax would not be enough, but it would help. It would also show such people who may have to rebuild and refurnish their homes, after they have spent a lifetime reaching that goal, that at least the government is sympathetic to their plight.

I have another suggestion for the government. When a home owner has lost his home as the result of a natural catastrophe, he should be able to deduct the cost of rebuilding and replacing what he has lost from his income tax. One may say that many people do not pay income tax. Most workers pay income tax, and it would help many people. I see no reason why the excise tax could not be applied at the same time. The difficulty is that when the catastrophe occurs, everybody is sympathetic, but as time goes by, very little of the help goes to the individuals to help replace their losses, and that is why I think we need a policy for Canadians which is based on the help the government is prepared to give to people in other countries who suffer a natural catastrophe.

I know that our hearts go out to those who suffer the ravages of a tornado or who suffer the effects of a volcano, and so we should help those in our country who suffer the loss of their buildings and their home, the people we know best. There should be an established policy. I hope that the next time there is a catastrophe, the party in power will establish a policy to deal with natural major catastrophes which will be just as good to the people of Canada as to people in other countries.

Removing the excise tax and deducting the cost of rebuilding from income tax, even if it is spread over two years or three years, would be a tremendous boost. At least it would show people that the Government of Canada is as concerned about Canadians who suffer a natural catastrophe. as it is about people in other parts of the world who suffer such a catastrophe. I strongly support this motion.

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, today we are being asked to support a proposal for tax relief by way of sales tax remission for persons who have suffered property losses from major national disasters. It seems that very often when it is felt that some group needs financial assistance or when some kind of social or economic activity needs to be encouraged, the solution is proposed by way of tax concessions. Perhaps the feeling is that we are not really spending public funds when we provide a tax concession. After all, it does not enter into the expenditure totals. Certainly, the past tendency has been that once the concession is written into the tax law, its annual cost in terms of lost revenue has been virtually ignored.

Tax concessions are not subject to the test of annual approval in the way direct spending programs are.

That situation has begun to be changed by the publication, starting a year ago, of a tax expenditure account. This provides estimates of the cost, in terms of revenue forgone, of the tax concessions now provided in federal tax laws. In reading this report, one is struck by the great number and complexity of these tax incentives and preferences. One is also struck by their very large cost, totalling many billions of dollars. Although the Department of Finance, in this publication, cautions that one cannot properly add them all together, because of the nature of the tax concessions, it is interesting to note that the total for 1979 is more than double the size of the budget deficit.

I should note in passing that this new attention to tax expenditures now means that the cost of new tax concessions is being taken into account in expenditure decisions of ministers. This is a progressive step, since it ensures that the impact on the total budget deficit of instituting new tax concessions will be fully taken into account in planning government expenditure priorities.

These considerations are relevant to debate on the motion before us. When we are being asked to provide a new tax concession, it is very valid to consider whether it would not be preferable to seek the same goal by means of some direct expenditure program.

In the case of losses from natural disasters, there is an established method for direct expenditure assistance by the federal government. Based on past experience, a policy has evolved on the scope of federal assistance and on the kinds of losses that qualify for aid.

The policy reflects Canada's federal structure in that it recognizes the prime responsibility of the provincial governments in dealing with property matters. Very often a situation can be dealt with by the local community, with provincial assistance. But where the disaster is of such a scope that it is beyond the reasonable capacity of the province, federal help is available. Since 1970, the policy has been that federal contributions are available when the losses exceed a threshold of one dollar per capita of population in the province. In Ontario, for example, this threshold would be about $8.5 million; in Manitoba, it would be just over $1 million. For total losses over this level, the federal government pays 50 per cent. The federal share can be even larger where the losses exceed higher thresholds—75 per cent of losses for the fourth and fifth dollar per capita of population, and 90 per cent for losses that exceed $5 per capita.

This policy does not cover losses on property that could have been covered by insurance. This is an understandable exception, since individuals should not be discouraged from taking reasonable steps to provide for their own protection when possible. Cost-sharing does apply to such things as the cost of meeting the immediate disaster situation, like emergency accommodation or the construction of temporary dikes, and also the cost of restoring public works and essential private property such as homes, barns and machinery, and small business enterprises, where the owner's livelihood has been threatened by the disaster.

I suggest that on the whole, this is a reasonable approach to the problem, once you accept the premise that the federal role should apply only to major disasters that are larger than the province should reasonably be expected to cope with. I note that the resolution we are debating states that it should apply to major disasters. However, it leaves it up to the provinces to decide when the assistance should come into play, and I suggest that it is not a good principle for one government's expenditures to be made on the initiative of another level of government.

In view of the fact that we do have a well elaborated policy of direct federal assistance, I find it hard to conclude that a further element of assistance should be provided by means of a tax concession. If governmental assistance to disaster victims is not adequate, then changes to the policy could be considered. But I should note that under the present approach, whereby provincial and at times federal support is available for rebuilding, the cost of sales tax on building materials is automatically covered. The same applies to losses covered by insurance.

A case can also be made for delivering assistance by means of direct expenditures rather than by tax concessions. There are situations where tax concessions are more appropriate, where the scope of assistance can be easily defined in tax law.

In the proposal before us, however, there would be large administration problems. It calls for remission of sales tax on building materials used for reconstruction of disaster losses. Since the tax is levied at the manufacturer's level on the value of goods shipped, by the time the materials are finally sold at retail, it would be most difficult to determine what part of the final price represented the original sales tax. We cannot talk in terms of remitting the tax at the manufacturer's level, since at that stage there would be no way of knowing which of his shipments would qualify for eventual exemption.

We are not talking about a large amount of money. The sales tax on building materials is 5 per cent. At the retail level, after all the intervening costs of shipping, handling and mark-ups, this tax would represent a considerably smaller percentage of the retail price. Bearing in mind the probable cost of administering such a specialized tax remission, I seriously wonder whether it would really be worth the effort.

In other words, what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that tax remission is not the way to go about solving this problem. I understand the concern and I appreciate the delivery and the passion of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) because of his close relationship to the two tornadoes in that area. I suggest to the House, however, that if we are to give more relief at the federal level than we have in the past, we should do so directly and not in a roundabout way by tax remission. This is costly from an administrative standpoint and it is difficult for the people who receive it to appreciate that it is federal help.

I understand very well what the hon. member for Oxford said about the present program not showing sufficient federal presence. That is unfortunate, because in many of these cases federal money will be present but not perceived by the people who receive it directly or indirectly. I say to the hon. member that not only do I agree with him on that point, but I submit that there are many federal programs where the same point could be made, that notwithstanding the fact that federal moneys are present in abundance in many cases, the federal presence is not felt by those who receive its benefit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND TO PROVIDE BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) had the floor.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Prior to the dinner hour the parliamentary secretary was speaking of savings and so on. I asked him in an earlier point of order about what items in this bill would refer to savings. He made comments about MURB programs. I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary knows it, but there is no MURB program in this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member making a point regarding relevance? If I may say so, the Chair has been very disturbed about the rule of relevance for some time during the course of debate. The Chair has done its best to call hon. members' attention to the point. In the case of the hon. member who is speaking, he prefaced his speech this evening by stating that he was giving part of the economic background to a measure concerning taxation. The Chair has had great difficulty in defining exactly what is relevant or irrelevant in the circumstances. In light of this explanation, the Chair proposes to allow a certain lenience to all hon. members, provided they talk generally about the subject.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting that the parliamentary secretary, knowingly or unknowingly—I presume unknowingly because I suggest he has probably not read the bill—referred to the question of MURBs in the bill, but they do not exist—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as you mentioned at the outset, I did discuss the purposes of my intervention. The major purpose was to try to establish the foundation for the current tax legislation now before the House in the form of Bill C-54. It is extremely relevant to the debate to understand why the government has decided to introduce certain measures and why it has decided not to introduce other measures which hon. members have raised in this House.

For example, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised a number of issues relating to energy which he said should be included in the bill. It is extremely important to understand the fiscal situation of the government and the reasons why the government has chosen to introduce some pieces of legislation and some tax measures and why it has chosen not to introduce others. Without that understanding, it seems to me the debate we are entered into now will be one which deals with very small, nit-picking issues. Now that hon. members understand, I hope they will take what I am about to say in a better light.

Earlier I talked about the problems of inflation, that inflation was the major problem. We must bring inflation under control for purposes of investment and productivity increases. The tax measures in Bill C-54 have a number of purposes, some of which relate directly to investment and productivity. Perhaps I was incorrect when I mentioned that the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) misinterpreted me, but I was referring to MURBs and small business development bonds as the types of measures the government was bringing forward. This particular tax bill is a small but very important part of the over-all economic package arising out of the budget.

The Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act will come forward in due time. Previously I was talking about the uncompetitive situations and inefficiency in the Canadian economy. All of us must agree that there are industries in the economy which are having an extremely difficult time. The current Chrysler crisis is an example of what I mean. The automobile industry, and Chrysler in particular, is facing extreme difficulty competing in world markets with its product lines and in its financial situation. We must ask ourselves seriously whether industries which cannot compete in world markets should continue to be subsidized. Will we protect inefficiency or will we be forced by world competition to move away from such behaviour? We must free up capital now used for perhaps subsidizing industries which no longer compete in world markets, because the GATT treaty will force us to do it, for the purposes of building the industries and labour force of the future. I know all members are very concerned that we have the training and facilities in place to ensure that our workers are trained to do meaningful jobs and get paid worth-while salaries.

The Chrysler case points to another problem. Competitiveness will have to be the cause of the union movement as well as management. We are seeing that kind of action taking place right now with regard to Chrysler workers. Workers will have to ask themselves honestly, as have Chrysler workers—and I commend them for it—is what I am receiving fair relative to what I am producing, or does it put the firm for which I work in a position where not only can it not compete in world markets, but the possibility of failure is very serious and real? As I said earlier, this will be done voluntarily or, as in the case of the automobile industry, world competition will force it upon us.

Let me turn to my final point, the role of government policy, specifically the budget and monetary policy embodied in Bill C-54, in responding to what I have described. The government understands the problem as I have described it. Its economic policy, including Bill C-54, is the beginning of the response we will see from the government in dealing with the problem. I believe the situation is serious, and both federal and provincial governments must respond. The October 28 budget is the beginning of this response, and I think it is an appropriate beginning. But first let me briefly address monetary policy.

I, like the minister, firmly endorse the actions of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Quite honestly, I think he is acting in the only truly effective way to bring inflation under control. He is reducing the growth of the money supply or the growth of purchasing power more into line with the potential output of the system. This is key to our success in conquering stagflation, as I pointed out in my earlier remarks.

Perhaps some will not argue with the policy of restraint itself, but with the means. They will say that interest rates should be held down and that the dollar should be allowed to fall. I would respond in two ways to this. First, the dollar has fallen from 87.5 cents earlier this year to 82.5 cents; second, interest rates have been kept below those in the United States with the consequent outflow of short-term capital. The Bank of Canada followed a balanced approach which puts clear priority on fighting inflation, one which does not succumb to what I would refer to as a Keynesian fallacy. This policy will continue, as the minister stated. It certainly should continue if we are to correct the basic problem facing us, that is, inflation. For if we succumb to demands for expansionary monetary policy and expansionary fiscal policy by bringing in additional tax measures under Bill C-54, then, while we may have a short-term drop in interest rates, the fires of inflation will be rekindled and we will set off another round resulting in even higher interest rates later.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) correctly noted this tendency for inflation and interest rates to ratchet higher in each successive cycle we have watched over the last ten years. The policy he proposed of easing monetary restraints, of expanding fiscal policies and of bringing in additional expenditure programs in Bill C-54 will ensure the perpetuation of this process.

From another point of view, others will say that the Bank of Canada is not being firm enough, that it should crack down much harder. I strongly disagree. The policy of gradualism will work and with less cost to society. The current British example is what happens during a hard crunch. We believe that such a policy would create a large number of Chryslers or a large number of industrial failures in the economy which would be highly disruptive and costly to Canadians.

With regard to the budget per se and the policies which have been translated into the tax measures in Bill C-54, they make a sound beginning in attacking the malaise I have described. Again the approach has been balanced, occasioned not only by choice but by the nature of federal fiscal realities. The minister has committed himself to a reduction in the deficit and in financial requirements. This is clear in the budget. Some will say that it is too gradual, that it should be tougher. Again it is a matter of balance. A tougher stand would require major tax increases during a recessionary period with much greater hardship on Canadians.

Those promoting the notion that great expenditure cuts are possible as an alternative to tax increases are simply fooling themselves, unless one would cut back on statutory programs to help those in greatest need, which is totally contrary to the commitment of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Canadian people. Indeed, that does not appear to be the case with regard to any opposition party since both call for major increases in such statutory expenditures. For example, the NDP calls for a cost of living tax credit to be included and a tax cut for low and middle-income Canadians. On the other hand, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has been even more aggressive. During the emergency debate, he called for the introduction of an energy tax credit, a shelter allowance, mortgage interest deductibility and an exemption for home heating fuels from the energy tax. With regard to the suggestions and the proposals of the right hon. gentleman, by using the figures in the December, 1979, and the October, 1980, budgets, I have calculated that these four policies would increase the deficit by $2.5 billion in 1981-82, climbing to over $5 billion in 1983-84. This is clearly inconsistent with deficit reduction and, indeed, with any notion of fiscal responsibility to which his party is supposedly committed.

The budget and this bill also set the stage for a redirection of fiscal priorities by placing heavy emphasis upon investment expenditure in the energy and economic development areas. Net expenditures in these areas will rise from $6.9 billion in 1981-82 to over $13 billion in 1983-84, making room for the new initiatives to be brought forward in the industrial and research development areas in coming months.

The government is also providing the foundations for an increase in productivity in Canada. A number of analyses have pointed to a number of causal factors in the decline of productivity: first, uncertainties which I have already mentioned brought on by inflation; second, the distortions in real rates of return, to which I alluded earlier, again caused by inflation; third, the lack of strong emphasis on savings and investment; fourth, legal-institutional setting which lessens the emphasis on competence and work effort; and, finally, reduced competition, paper burden, and the heavy burden of regulation.

This situation was correctly summarized in a statement by the U.S. Department of Commerce Advisory Committee on Industrial Innovation. It said:

> It is necessary to recognize that the problems that confront today's economy are primarily problems of an inadequate or structurally constrained supply of investments or savings. This situation is different from the economic environment that has been the setting for most economic policy-making since the 1930s' depression, during which the primary concern has been a macroeconomic use of tax policy to increase consumption and limit savings in the economy.

The government's commitment to combat inflation and reduce the deficit, making more room for private investment growth, is clear, and is reinforced by budget measures to promote economic development, and more such measures will be forthcoming. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have both called for a shift in priorities which will result in greater saving; the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has committed to bring in competition legislation; initiatives have been in place for some time to reduce paper burden on business; and new initiatives resulting from the regulatory studies done by the Economic Council and the parliamentary task force will be considered in the near future.

I believe these measures do indicate a commitment by the government to address the root causes of our economic malaise. The approach is a balanced one which promises to get us back on track in Canada without creating massive dislocations and hardships in the process.

Bill C-54 is one key element in that process of getting us back on track, implementing a solid and sound economic policy, and I urge all members in this House to give their full support to the bill. Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken gave an excellent speech prepared in respect of the borrowing portions of this bill. Unfortunately the borrowing portions of the bill were struck out by the Chair earlier today. If we ever heard an irrelevant speech, we heard one today. I am surprised that this Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans), with these very important amendments to the Income Tax Act, would not on second reading have led us through the details of this rather complicated measure so that when we reach Committee of the Whole the parliamentary secretary—

Mr. Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to inform the hon. member that I, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) will certainly take him point by point through the bill during Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: Thank you, sir, for interrupting the parliamentary secretary. He clearly has had a difficult time understanding this bill. He read well and he managed one question concerning the savings concept when he was talking about macroeconomics; when talking about how this bill was important in respect of MURBs. Unfortunately, he did not understand MURBs. The whole concept of MURBs was developed in 1974 by regulation 1105B of the Income Tax Act. That regulation expired on December 31, 1979. New regulations in connection with MURBs were introduced by this government. I do not have the new regulation number, but this has been done by regulation and it has absolutely nothing to do with this bill. Yet, the parliamentary secretary who is supposed to know about these things and is supposed to be able to come to this House as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance to help explain the minister's bill does not even know what is in the bill.

An hon. Member: He thought the borrowing part would still be there.

Mr. Blenkarn: I suppose my friend is right in that he thought the borrowing part would still be there and he had the department write his speech for him. The department wrote a wonderful speech about macroeconomics, which has absolutely nothing to do with this bill.

The parliamentary secretary mentioned the small business development clause, and I will be dealing with that in my speech in respect of the bill, but by and large what he said had nothing to do with the bill. He said we should improve savings, but all the way through the bill there are provisions where capital cost allowances are reduced and where allowances for exploration and development are reduced. In other words, the tax impact on the producing section of the country is increased. Yet the member talks about the necessity for increasing savings, and he talks about how the wonderful Liberal program is going to bring us to the new millenium. He has not read the bill and he has not even tried to read it, yet he comes to this House purporting to be the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, able to talk to us about the importance of this finance bill, a bill dealing with very complicated amendments to the Income Tax Act. Surely, Mr. Speaker, he ought to be chastised, if not by you, by his colleagues and by his minister.

Let me deal with one specific matter. He talked about the auto industry, he talked about Chrysler and he talked about the fact that we have to promote the sales of automobiles and so on. If he looks at the small business development portion of this bill, he will see it specifically excludes automobile and truck products from the provision of the small business development part. If anything, the bill discourages the purchase of automobiles and trucks. Yet, the parliamentary secretary talks about that as something the government is encouraging. He is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance—really!

Let us talk about the bill before us. First let me talk about the generalities in the bill. This bill is a cleanup statute. There was a budget presented in 1978 by the now Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). There was a budget presented on December 11, 1979, which was defeated. There was a statement called the "mini-mouse budget" on April 21. What happened to it? We never even had a vote on it. There was a budget on October 28 last year. We now have this very extensive statute attempting to clean up the income tax changes made over that three-year period.

One of the most serious problems we have in this country has been created by the delay, particularly of this government, in bringing forward income tax statutes in order that the business community could know where it stood. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stands up on a budget night making suggestions in common parlance in respect of changes to the Income Tax Act, people cannot rely on those changes until they actually see the statutes in cold print, yet the business community has over the past three years been invited to think of what may well be in the statute, but never knowing for sure what is in it because the statutes have never been brought forward for passage.

Thank goodness this government has at last brought forward this bill. At least now we know where we stand. As an illustration of the problem of not knowing where we stand, let me talk about the Small Business Development Bond for a moment. It is in this legislation. That concept was first enunciated by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Hon. members opposite threw it out. They thought it was no good. Hon. members to my left threw it out too. They thought it was no good. All of a sudden in April the concept of the Small Business Development Bond was reintroduced by the Minister of Finance. But did he introduce for the business community the details of the bond? Not on your life.

Mr. Miller: He doesn't know what the details are.

Mr. Blenkarn: Did he do anything? In a press release he said what he would do, and when young businessmen, and businessmen generally, applied to banks and lending institutions in order to take advantage of the provisions of a Small Business Development Bond, they were told that until the banks and lending institutions saw the details of the legislation and until it was passed, they would not lend. They were told that if they wanted to borrow money in the meantime, the banks and lending institutions would give them the option to convert to the Small Business Development Bond if, as and when it turned out to be all right, but there were no guarantees with respect to interest rates at all. What has happened is that businessmen have been hornswoggled, diddled around and played with since December 11, 1979, because no government, and certainly not this one, has been prepared to introduce the details of the legislation on which the lending institutions could operate.

The same applies to the provisions in this bill whereby spouses of sole proprietors can be paid a wage. That was first introduced on December 11 but, of course, voted out by these fellows because they did not think that budget was any good.

They introduced those provisions on April 21. They thought they were good on April 21 but no good on December 11. When all of a sudden they became good, legislation still was not introduced. As a consequence, all through 1980 sole proprietors did not know whether they could pay their wives or not. Here we are in 1981 enacting an amendment to the Income Tax Act for the taxation year 1980. All through 1980 business people had no sense of where they were going. They called the Department of National Revenue, and I remember many of them calling my office and asking me what they should do. In Toronto, the department told them it was not sure whether the statute would ever be passed. The department told them to pay their wives if they wanted to, but that they might have to pay income tax on it. It is about time governments made it a strong policy that when they introduce budgets, they forthwith file notices of ways and means. I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) nodding. It is about time they introduced income tax changes forthwith because in the business community, certainty is more important than almost anything.

When there are tax changes in budgetary provisions which are not included in specific amendments to the Income Tax Act, advisers to business people and to ordinary citizens in general cannot tell whether a thing is proper or improper. All they can go by is the general wordings of ways and means motions, which certainly are not in technical language, and they cannot give with certainty any advice to their clients.

Let me deal with the clauses in this bill. I propose to go through them from the beginning right through. The first clause with which I want to deal is clause 3(3) at page 3 which deals with volunteer firemen. A number of proposals were made, beginning in the spring of 1979 with respect to volunteer firemen. Throughout our country a great number of people work for volunteer fire departments. They feel that volunteer firemen should be able to deduct from their ordinary earned income up to $1,000 for costs associated with being volunteer firemen. Generally speaking, volunteer firemen are expected to pay for their clothes and those things which are at peril in fighting fires. If anything, what is in this bill is an insult to the volunteer field. The suggested allowance is up to $500.

That is not a tax credit of $500, but an allowance against earned income. Unless the volunteer fireman is in a tax bracket very close to 60 per cent, all he will get is a small percentage of $500. Let us assume, for example, that a volunteer fireman has an average rate of tax of about 20 per cent. That would mean he would be earning something in excess of $21,000 a year. At an average rate of tax, he will save $100, but out of his own tax paid earnings he has to pay the cost of another suit if his suit is ruined in a fire, the cost of boots or the cost of whatever is required. The allowance in this clause for volunteer firemen is insignificant, improper, unbelievably small and is a suggestion by the Minister of Finance that he does not appreciate volunteer firemen at all. I am not speaking in my own interests or in the interests of the city of Mississauga. When I first started practising law in the village of Port Credit, there was a volunteer fire department. I suppose its members were allowed $300 way back when a dollar was a dollar was a dollar.

Mr. Deans: When was that?

Mr. Blenkarn: Now, after a 120 per cent devaluation of the dollar in the last 10 or 11 years, they are allowed to deduct $500 from their taxable income.

Mr. Jarvis: That is shameful, you Grits.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is shameful. Hon. members opposite do not believe in the volunteer sector. They really do not want to do anything to help volunteer firemen, who are prepared to give their time, their effort and, indeed, their lives to their fellow man, to cover their costs. The amount of $500 ought to be doubled. That would not cost the treasury much money. If the treasury, the minister and this government had any feeling for the cause of volunteers, who are prepared to risk their lives, they should at least double the amount. The $500 suggested in this clause is an insult to volunteer firemen in every small municipality, township and hamlet in this country.

Let us move to clause 4, which is at page 5, for the benefit of hon. members who happen to have their bills here. All of a sudden there is a suggestion that those who are in receipt of income from offices or employment are entitled to deduct the cost of interest associated with purchasing their airplanes if they are required for their employment.

Let us look at this clause very carefully because if a salesman can show that his automobile is used in his business, then the cost of interest associated with its purchase may be deductible to the extent that the automobile is used, but with respect to an airplane, all one need do is have his employer require him to have an airplane. He does not have to use it. He does not have to fly it anywhere. If his employer requires him to have an airplane, he is entitled to have the cost of interest associated with its purchase deducted from his income.

Is that not wonderful! Today I was expecting the parliamentary secretary to have explained why only those with airplanes are given this allowance, but not those with cars who have to use them. Is that not interesting! There is no provision for renting an airplane, you cannot deduct it. There is no provision for renting a car, you cannot deduct it. But if you have an airplane and you are required to have one, you can get away with an allowance. When this comes to Committee of the Whole, I think the minister's parliamentary secretary had better be able to answer some very serious questions on that.

I will now refer to page 9 of the bill where the number of grants is dealt with. Throughout the Income Tax Act and throughout the regulations, we have provisions for grants for insulation and energy conservation. I do not want to get into the whole question of urea formaldehyde on this point and the way the government has bungled that issue—that is a matter for another day—but apparently these grants are to be taxable. Probably that is proper. Perhaps the government could tell us where the grants to businesses are going. Has the government a grant program for businesses, for corporations, or is the grant merely for homes? Because the grant clause in the bill seems to refer to property used principally for the purpose of using income. I did not know that the minister had decided all of a sudden to establish a grant program for property for the purpose of income. We would like to know about that new grant because, presumably, all of a sudden we have one coming in.

I will now move on to the next matter which concerns me, that is in connection with interest income. At the bottom of page 9, subclause 3 of clause 12, which continues on to page 10, contains a provision which states that interest income accruing to a business can no longer be treated on a cash basis, but must be treated on an accrual basis. Presumably there is some benefit to a revenue when it is treated on an accrual basis rather than a cash basis. But my friend, the parliamentary secretary, was talking about the advantages of business, helping business, and so on. I want to point out to him that what he is saying is that business must accrue interest and pay tax on interest, whether or not it is collected, instead of, as at present, using interest income of a business on the basis of a cash declaration. A great number of businesses wind up entering into financial transactions where the interest on the loan or on the advance or sale of equipment is not payable for two or sometimes three years from the time the original transaction took place. The effect of this clause is to make those businesses pay income tax in the current business year, even though there is no possibility of receipt of income on a cash basis during that year, the next year or even the year after that. The effect is to improve the flow of revenue to the government, but it seriously impairs the ability of a business to pay.

In effect, the receipt of income, or income that you have not received but you are due to receive, is subject to cash on an accrual basis. This is a change in the rules. This change in the rules is a serious problem for many businesses, and we will want to hear in the Committee of the Whole stage the extent to which this change is necessary because it will seriously harm a number of businesses, particularly businesses involving the sale of real estate.

On pages 17, 18 and 19 of the bill, there is a clause dealing with Small Business Development Bonds. Those are the clauses to which I referred earlier which enable a small business to treat its advances from a lending institution in a fashion which is very much like a term preferred or an income bond which was previously allowed. The effect is that the small business pays the interest from its tax paid surplus and the recipient of the interest receives the money in the form of a dividend.

Since the small business tax rate is approximately 20 per cent to 25 per cent, depending on whether the small business is a manufacturing business or a general small business in another field, it is paying a tax rate which is significantly less than normally paid by the lending institution. Consequently, the lending institution can reduce the rate of interest it charges on loans to the small business by approximately 25 per cent. In other words, sir, under the provision on Small Business Development Bonds, conceivably a small business could borrow on today's market for somewhere around 12 per cent or 12.5 per cent on a term loan, whereas it would probably have to pay 17 per cent to 19.5 per cent on a term loan on straight interest. The effect is that the small business has a break.

The problem is that this provision in the bill, under which nobody will lend until the act is passed, expires on April 1, 1981. So, in effect, this is a gift for nothing because it will expire almost by the time the act is passed. Therefore, small business will not have much advantage. Secondly, the terms of the Small Business Development Bond are far more restrictive than those that were contained in the budget of my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West. The money raised on this particular security must be raised to buy new productive equipment. Even the terms of the productive equipment are narrowed down.

As I mentioned earlier, you cannot include such things as automobiles or trucks. What you can invest money in is restricted. The problem with most small businesses is that they need money from banks and lenders to carry their inventory, their accounts receivable and their work in progress. But loans for that purpose are not allowed under a Small Business Development Bond. So, first, the act is narrow because it prevents the use of a Small Business Development Bond for normal commercial purposes, and secondly, the fool thing expires on April 1, 1981. Nobody has been able to borrow on it yet, and will not be able to until this act is passed, gone through the Senate and the rest of it. If he is lucky, a businessman may have two months to negotiate a deal. What foolishness!

Mr. Blais: It's retroactive.

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister says it is retroactive. Yes, sure it is retroactive, but nobody would lend on it, simply because they did not know the terms under which to make the loan. Does the minister know of anyone who has received one? He is the Minister of Supply and Services and is supposed to know these things. I do not know of anyone who has received one. I do not know of an institution which has made one yet.

Mr. Evans: Roynat.

Mr. Blenkarn: The parliamentary secretary says Roynat has made them—yes, option deals, not real deals.

Mr. Blais: Most of the banks have lent all their money under the program.

Mr. Blenkarn: Let us leave this question of the Small Business Development Bonds. There are a great many things in this statute which must be looked at very closely.

Mr. Blais: There are only two banks which have any money left.

Mr. Blenkarn: I do not know anyone who has made one and I suggest that the minister does not have any client or constituent who has made one. The minister believes his own press clippings—or his own press release, since he does not get any press clippings.

I would like to deal with a matter which appears on page 28 of the bill, the question of the 3 per cent inventory allowance allowed to companies in the business field. This inventory allowance was first invented as an allowance to help business fight the problem of inflation. It allows business to receive a tax credit or a tax allowance against their taxable income, a 3 per cent inventory allowance. In a sense, that looks after the problem of the inflationary effect of inventory re-evaluation. This particular section clears up some of the abuses with respect to the inventory allowance.

My point is this: the inventory allowance is not large enough. When this section was put in place, we were talking of inflation in the range of 5, 6 or 7 per cent. We are now talking of inflation, authorized and promoted by this government, in the range of 12, 13 and possibly 14 per cent. So, that inventory allowance should be increased. I say this in terms of the problem with respect to inflation to which the parliamentary secretary referred in his long remarks—perhaps irrelevant to this bill.

What the parliamentary secretary should be doing is proposing amendments to the inventory allowance which would increase it to 5 or 6 per cent to allow business, particularly manufacturing business, to have a better break against their inventory problems, which are created by inflation. As prices go up, the cost of replacing inventory becomes greater. Therefore, a tax allowance on inventory appropriate to shelter the inventory costs to some extent should be established. That inventory allowance is much more valuable to corporations paying 40 to 50 per cent in taxes. It is not as valuable to small business which only pays 20 or 25 per cent in taxes, but it is valuable. The inventory allowance should be larger in order to compensate for the inflationary effects on inventory.

On page 33, the bill deals with the question of cash accounting. At the present time, the only people entitled to be on a cash basis in business are farmers. The bill includes fishermen, to enable them to be on a cash basis as well as farmers. I have no quarrel with that. What really bothers me is why this government, which professes to be so interested in the benefits to small business, should not include them on that basis as well.

One of the great problems a businessman faces is when he suddenly arrives at year-end after having just made a sale. He must pay tax on that sale although he has not yet been paid for it. So he has a receivable. Big deal! He has a bank overdraft too. Big deal! He has the tax man screaming at him for money. Now, why are we not decent to this small businessman? Why select farmers and fishermen and not look after small businessmen in the same way? Is it because the small business community does not have the clout the fishermen or the farmers have?

I suggest this government had better smarten up and look after the interests of small business people. They do have clout and they will exercise it, particularly when they look at this bill and the horrors of accounting they face with respect to the wads of incomprehensible matter contained in it. It is about time the government seriously considered allowing those people who make up the small unincorporated businesses, whether they be fishermen, farmers or storekeepers, to conduct their business on a cash basis and to pay tax on cash receipts. I submit the difference in income to the government would not be that great. The cost of accounting on an accrual basis is an enormous penalty and it discourages people from going into business. It discourages people on every front. It imposes on them an obligation to pay tax before they receive the money. The elementary justice in taxation is you should not be taxed until you receive the pay. Surely small business ought to be treated as equitably as the act proposes to treat farmers and fishermen.

I refer now to page 40, which is an amendment to subsection 44 of the act. It deals with the question of replacement property. This section and other sections thereafter deal with the whole question of capital gains. I am sorry the President of the Treasury Board has left the chamber. He wrote a book called "Fiscalamity". Its subject matter was capital gains. In it he indicated how disastrous capital gains were to the economy of this country. It is clear in analysing this statute that the government has been weaving its way around the problem of capital gains. The truth of the matter is, despite the government's white paper cooked up by some person in the Department of Finance who does not know his up from his down, capital gains are a real problem. They are largely a problem because of the incidence of inflation. Most of the capital gains earned in this country today are not capital gains, they are inflationary gains.

At 10 per cent inflation, the value of your money is less than half in seven years and less than one eighth in 20 years. Most of the gains which are attacked under the capital gains provision of this income tax bill are really inflationary gains. People have not earned anything. In fact, they have more pieces of paper for what they put up. But they have not earned a thing, nor received a thing. These are inflationary gains. So, a number of these sections attempt to deal with these inflationary gains.

These sections are gobbledygook. What we should have is an inquiry before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs into the white paper concerning capital gains. The entire Income Tax Act with respect to capital gains ought to be rewritten. If there must be a capital gains tax at all, it must be indexed. I suggest that earning capital gains in Canada's economy with inflation is the same as the chance of winning a lottery. In other words, the chances of such gains are very small, and ultimately are not really capital gains.

If an organization is designed to make a capital gain, then surely that is income in the nature of trade. It is very unlikely in our society that one can make a real capital gain. The revenues which the government is presently collecting from capital gains tax, roughly $1 billion a year, is really an inflation tax. It is an improper, expropriatory, unjust tax. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), who spoke on Friday while I was not present in the House, mentioned that Canada did not properly collect death or inheritance taxes. He is right, but it is for the wrong reasons.

We do collect death and inheritance taxes when we have deemed realization on death. Unfortunately, we only collect it from some people. If one has a deemed realization on a huge gain on a single family home and occupies that house, then he pays no tax. But if one has money in a farm which was not passed on to an offspring, then God help him, and that phrase indicates the hopelessness of the situation. The farmer is destroyed because he is wiped out simply because such a sale immediately puts him in a 60 per cent tax range. If we take 60 per cent of 50 per cent of the gain, and the gain is all inflation, it means the farmer does not have anything like the purchasing power he thought he had to pass on to his family. The family may have to sell the place in order to pay the tax.

We must have an inquiry into capital gains tax and deemed realization of death. Perhaps we should exchange the capital gains tax for some type of estate tax, death tax or whatever one would like to call it. Certainly we could tax that type of transfer, but we should tax it equitably, unlike the present system which taxes persons who make taxable gains. But if a person does not make a taxable gain, but makes a gain, then that person is scot-free. It is unfair, inequitable and damaging to the economy of Canada.

Section 56 and a number of sections following deal with the support of children. I recently handled a most serious case in my constituency office which concerned a chap who had been ordered by the court to support his children from an arrangement in which he was not married. The chap found he could not deduct that support from his income. As I understand these particular sections, this will now be the case, and I think that is an equitable situation.

In the minute I have left, let me wind up by saying that, even though I have not finished with the statute, by and large, a number of these changes are proper. They should be proceeded with as quickly as possible. The Income Tax Act itself, however, should be reviewed by Parliament, it has now been ten years since the Carter commission and it is high time that we rewrite this statute to make it more readable, simpler and easier for people in general.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to engage in this debate which deals with Bill C-54, a bill designed to amend the provisions of the Income Tax Act. I sat in this House and listened to the comments of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) who, in making the majority of her remarks, directed them to the implications of subsections 3, 4 and 5 of section 74 of the act as it presently stands. There is no doubt that, justifiably, this government has taken upon itself the necessary steps to remedy one of the substantial, well-known inequities which appear in the provisions of our current tax legislation.

Subsection (3) of section 74, prior to the passage of this legislation with which we are concerned, permitted the taxation of income which was effectively in the hands of one spouse and which would otherwise have been paid and was indeed paid to another spouse in a proprietorship. Subsection (4) had the effect of allocating to a spouse who was a partner that portion of salary that was paid by a partnership to a spouse of one of the partners, while subsection (5) had the effect of permitting the minister, at his discretion, to allocate to either one of two partners the entire income of a partnership. Knowing the avaricious appetite of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), there is no doubt as to where he directed "in his discretion", to use the words in the act, that income. That income was directed to the taxpayer partner who had the greatest other than partnership income.

I listened with considerable interest to the remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare when she commented on the purpose of the bill, which was to effect simple justice. She made reference to the fact that it was extremely difficult for tax laws to be changed in other than a prolonged period of time. She mentioned the term of ten years as being reasonable for one to expect an abusive provision of this statute to be removed. Accordingly, it will come as a great surprise to the minister to learn that these sections in their basic present form, appeared in the Income War Tax Act which was introduced in this House in September, 1917.

What we are confronted with is a situation where it has taken a full ten years longer to deal with this simple justice than it has taken for all the constitutional negotiations between the federal government and the provinces, which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is inclined to speak of as being unreasonable for the purpose of the resolution of a problem of this nature. This problem, fortunately, is about to be resolved. It has taken a long time, but the government, in all fairness, should be commended for taking this position and for seeing the wisdom of a similar provision which appeared in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in December, 1979.

The minister to whom I earlier referred spoke of an endeavour by the government through this bill to adapt to the wishes of the people as opposed to the reverse, where the people, presumably, are to adapt to the wishes of the government.

As I indicated, she also spoke of more simple justice. With respect to this bill and with the exception of the sections to which I have just referred and with the exception of the relief granted to volunteer firemen, that statement is utter nonsense.

From the beginning of 1972 when the present Income Tax Act in its existing form, subject to amendments, was passed, the public generally believed that once the amended act took form, there would be the elimination of anomalies, inconsistencies and injustices that had prevailed in the past. Instead of creating something that could be understood by the taxpayers of Canada we have created a labyrinth, a quagmire through which only the most audacious may venture.

There is a principle in law which holds that the citizen is presumed to know the law, and ignorance thereof is no excuse for any offence committed. We all know that this principle is reduced to absurdity when dealing with the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

The act to be amended by Bill C-54 is rendered no clearer, no more uneasily understood than it was before. As a matter of fact, this bill perpetuates the inconsistencies, difficulties and complexities that have existed in the past and adds to them. In a moment I shall deal with some of those specific provisions.

Let me now turn, as an illustration of something that is overly complex, to the provisions related to the inclusion in income of a portion of contributions to an employee benefit plan. These provisions appear on page 4 of the bill and would constitute an addition by way of amendment to section 6 of the act as it stands.

What we are confronted with, if I may interpret and leave out some of the verbiage, is a situation where an amount included in income being that portion of an amount so received that does not exceed another amount, if any, by which the lesser of an amount exceeds the aggregate of an amount and that portion of one amount is the aggregate of other amounts, all of which are in excess of different amounts.

An hon. Member: Would you repeat that?

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, that leaves something to be desired from the standpoint of simple clarity. It is not a joking matter, as my learned friend across the House seems to think. Not only is there a presumption of law that the citizen understands and knows the law, but there is a penalty for failing to comply with the law.

What is the requirement of section 6 of the act amended by the addition of this monstrous and complicated provision which appears on page 4 of Bill C-54? In this case I refer to section 239 of the act, which has not been amended, but which nevertheless will be of substantial significance for those who think the matter is something to joke and laugh about. Section 239(1) of this act provides very simply and succinctly for anyone failing by way of evasion to include any amount in the computation of income—I can envisage a situation here where someone in desperation, seeing this revised provision in section 6, will throw the revision aside and simply neglect, because the words are so unclear and complex, to include the required amount in the computation of his income. That being the case, then according to section 239(1) of the act, he is subject to the following penalties:

(f) a fine of not less than 25 per cent and not more than double the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or

(g) both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.

In grave circumstances he may be prosecuted by indictment and upon conviction may be incarcerated for a period of not more than five years!

We are providing here for the calculation of income. We have an obligation, I submit, to provide a way in which people can understand what is to be included as income.

I recognize that there are a number of guides published on how one is to interpret this act and, presumably, how one is to interpret this bill. Those guides take the form of information circulars and bulletins issued by Revenue Canada. To the assessors of Revenue Canada, these publications have the force and effect of law, despite the fact that they do not, and the assessors can be persuaded to abandon their determination that the printed word is gospel, only with the dynamite of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

How have we come to the stage of enacting legislation of this complexity without regard to the general dictium to explain the requirements to the people of Canada.

It happens that immediately prior to this great tax revision that took place before the Income Tax Act of 1972 came into effect, the way they could best accomplish their needs—meaning the needs of the Department of Finance and Revenue Canada—was to make a determination of what they desired to achieve on a computer and through the use of algebraic formulae. The formulae and computer print-outs were then to be reduced to words by legislative draftsmen.

That is how we obtained this enigmatic piece of legislation known as the Income Tax Act, and that is how we come to have Bill C-54 before us.

It is not surprising, given the nature of the complexity of the bill, that government speakers have generally rejected the opportunity to deal with the substance of it. It is complex and it is difficult. It is our obligation, I submit, to prepare laws which we understand in the hope and expectation that the people against whom these laws are to be applied, will similarly understand them. That course has not been adopted by successive governments in dealing with tax legislation, since 1971.

I should like to deal specifically now with a problem that I have encountered in an examination of some of the provisions of the bill. We are aware that the ways and means motion, in paragraph 3, was to provide that certain Canadian taxpayers normally resident in Canada, who were absent from this country on their employers' business for a period of not less than six months, should be entitled to exclude from the computation of their income certain fixed amounts referred to in that resolution. Some of the operative words are as follows:

. . . an individual employed by a person resident in Canada or by a partnership or corporation in which such a person has a substantial interest—

Section 3 then goes on to deal with some of the specifics, but the words to which I wish to draw your attention are as follows, and I repeat:

. . . an individual employed by a person resident in Canada or by a partnership or corporation in which such a person—

That being a person resident in Canada.

—has a substantial interest.

● (2120)

In its customary fashion the Department of Finance and the draftsmen of this legislation have concocted a new definition. They refer to the person to which reference is made in the ways and means motion as being a "specified employer". The specified employer is defined, including a person resident in Canada as:

—a partnership in respect of which the aggregate fair market value of the interests in the partnership, each of which is owned by a member resident in Canada—

That extends so substantially the intent that is set forth in the ways and means motion that it completely changes the purpose and the intent as it appears in the motion itself. I know the answer of the government. These ways and means motions are not the law, they are not intended to cover all the specific requirements. But one would have thought, having regard to the way in which the motion laid out rather explicitly and in detail those requirements to be met before income might be excluded that, broad as they were, but nevertheless specific as they were, we would find contained therein all the essential elements to be dealt with when the bill was introduced. But instead of that we have a new element.

Prior to the introduction of this bill, it was assumed that the individual might be employed by a partnership in which a Canadian resident had a substantial interest. We now find that this individual taxpayer must be employed by a partnership, all of the partners of which, based not upon their partnership interest, but upon the aggregate fair market value of the interest in the partnership, are Canadians. If anything, this unduly creates complexities to deal with the issue before the House, which are completely unnecessary.

Why does the Department of Finance believe that it is essential if a taxpayer is absent from Canada, thereby not requiring him to include an amount in the computation of his income, that he must be an employee of a partnership of which all of the partners, on the basis of the fair market value of their interest, are residents of Canada. What possible difference could it make if one or two of them happen to be resident outside of Canada? What possible difference could it make in the majority of these cases when the taxpayer involved, being an employee in any event, would give up his residence in Canada in order to assure himself that he was in fact not taxable under our legislation?

One of the most fundamental differences, both illustrative of undue complexity and change from the time of the original motion by way of ways and means, changing not only the intent but the effect of the hoped-for legislation, is to be found when we deal with the issue of the Small Business Development Bonds. We are not concerned here with an individual who may or may not find himself, as in the case I illustrated earlier on, taxable in Canada because he left the country to take up employment elsewhere. We are dealing with a provision which was promised small business in Canada in April, 1980, and again promised small business corporations in Canada in October, 1980.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has in this House exhibited some exasperation with the questions asked of him as to the date of implementation of the provisions of the Income Tax Act as they related to the benefits of acquiring Small Business Development Bonds, saying that the business community, issuing corporations and lending institutions knew this was going to happen and the government would see that it did. Why then need we concern ourselves that the legislation may be just a little bit slow? I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. Because the intent as described in the ways and means motion has been changed dramatically in the bill before this House. One of the requirements to be found in paragraph (c) of section 9 of that motion was that the issuer was "in financial difficulty."

The issue of financial difficulty is a question of fact to be determined, I submit, on the circumstances in the presentation of some kind of requirement for money for a legitimate business purpose, and the lack thereof. How does this bill deal with the issue of financial difficulty. It is to be found at page 20. One of the requirements for these bonds is that the obligation, being the bond, is issued by the corporation:

(A) as part of a proposal to, or an arrangement with, its creditors that has been approved by a court under the Bankruptcy Act,

(B) at a time when all or substantially all of its assets are under the control of a receiver, receiver-manager, sequestrator or trustee in bankruptcy, or

(C) at a time when, by reason of financial difficulty, the corporation is in default, or could reasonably be expected to default, on a debt held by a person with whom the corporation was dealing at arm's length—

This suggests that a bank under any circumstances, whether it be by small business development bond or otherwise, would lend money to a corporation which had made a proposal under the Bankruptcy Act. This is utter nonsense. The suggestion is in order to be of any value that a Small Business Development Bond might be issued by a corporation to the bank when that corporation is in receivership. That is absolute nonsense. The suggestion is also that that occurrence might take place at a time when the corporation was in default under a debt due to a person with whom the corporation did not deal at arm's length.

That in itself would constitute in some cases an act of bankruptcy under our Bankruptcy Act. What lending institution, other than one which was in the business of sustaining business losses, would become involved in a small business development bond project of the kind contemplated by this bill. The answer is none but those who had taken leave of their senses.

What then is the purpose of the legislation? Why is it here? If you examine paragraph (c) of subparagraph (iv) to which I made reference, one of the requirements started out with the words "at a time when, by reason of financial difficulty". It was on the basis of those words that bonds, if any have been issued, were issued. Those were the words upon which the lending institution might have relied.

The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) made the comment that to the best of his knowledge it is unlikely any bond in fact has been issued which will qualify for these provisions. If indeed this is the case, such a circumstance demonstrates the prudence not only of the knowledgeable taxpayer, who expected an arrangement which was beneficial to him, to take advantage of low interest payments so that he could in fact carry on his business, but also the wisdom of lending institutions which were not prepared to be entrapped by legislation promised by the government in the past but never delivered. Such, of course, is the case confronting us today.

This matter is of some substantial significance. The government promised bona fide, legitimate Small Business Development Bonds in April, 1980. It promised the same type of bond again on October 28, 1980. Yet, it has delivered nothing which could ever meet the requirements of the borrower and the lender. This has been nothing but a sham and a subterfuge to deceive the business community of Canada.

This piece of legislation requires substantial change in committee if the integrity of the government is to be supported under any circumstances. But, the shocking thing is that the words illustrate the general concept which runs through tax legislation in Canada, that taxpayers will invariably design their plans to cheat Revenue Canada. Accordingly, phrases such as "at the time by reason of financial difficulty" and "with whom the corporation was dealing at arm's length" are included. Revenue Canada believes whatever plans businessmen make are designed to reduce the tax which might otherwise be paid.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts about one month ago, the president of Eldorado Nuclear confessed that one of the reasons he preferred outside auditors to attend to the needs of the corporation was that they would provide the corporation with good tax advice. As a result of legislation of the kind presently before the House and legislation of the kind it is designed to amend, we have created an entire army of people who do nothing but interpret, advise and consult. Billions of dollars of a non-productive nature are spent which do not produce a ten-cent growth in our real GNP because of legislation of the kind confronting us tonight.

They are hell bent on continuing the program, adding confusion to an enigma, to a mystery, for most people in the country. I have dealt with the penalties which flow from failure to understand and failure to apply these complex provisions.

In the time remaining, I should like to deal with but a couple of matters which I consider to be, in the words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in the nature of promoting simple justice in our tax legislation. I refer to two sections of the Income Tax Act as they stand currently. One of them is section 152(4) which provides that the Minister of National Revenue may at any time in the event that there is neglect, carelessness or wilful default, or in the event that a taxpayer has committed any fraud, reassess a taxpayer. The Minister of National Revenue, in the event that such an assessment is issued, is under an obligation imposed upon him by statute. In section 165(3) of the Income Tax Act, upon receipt of the appeal process against that assessment, which happens to be the filing of a notice of objection, the minister shall with all due dispatch reconsider the assessment and vacate, confirm or vary the assessment or assessments. This action is to be undertaken following the filing of the objection, and the taxpayer against whom an assessment of this nature has been levied has 90 days from the date of the mailing of the notice of assessment to take the formal step of filing, by registered mail, the required objection.

It has always puzzled me how it is that the minister imposes the assessment, presumably knowing the facts upon which the assessment is based, and the taxpayer is given 90 days within which to either file an objection or lose all of his rights, subject to some restricted limitations. He basically loses all of his rights to further deal with that matter, and the minister upon receiving the notice of objection shall "with all due dispatch" reconsider and attend to those required acts referred to therein.

One may ask what is the significance of that or why do we care? The fact of the matter is that having instituted the process, the taxpayer can do nothing until the minister moves and does what he is obliged to do under statute. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare has an eye for simple justice, she should refer to this section to place upon the Minister of National Revenue the same obligation which rests upon the shoulders of taxpayers, particularly when the minister presumably knew what he was doing at the time it was done. Why would it even take him 90 days to make up his mind, to confirm the assessment? Instead of that, he has 180 days, although it is not mentioned in the section to which I referred, before the taxpayer can take any step to appeal to a court or the tax review board for justice.

What may happen within that six-month period? Under the provisions of this act the Minister of National Revenue can in one day obtain an assessment against the taxpayer. On the same day, the minister can obtain a certificate of judgment from the Federal Court of Canada and on that day obtain a writ of execution out of the federal court, delivered and executed by any sheriff throughout Canada. Within ten days the sheriff can sell all the property seized from the taxpayer. There is absolutely nothing a Canadian taxpayer can do to stop the process. Of course the answer from Revenue Canada is: "Sue us, sue the Crown"; taxpayers are entitled to sue the Crown. But I ask, with what does the taxpayer retain counsel? The taxpayer has been stripped of every nickel and dime he possesses under the process I have described. The circumstances I describe are not wild figments of my imagination. There are cases where this has occurred in our country.

It is reprehensible that an obligation is not placed upon the Minister of National Revenue to do what should be done with all due dispatch. If need be, a time limitation should be imposed upon him so that the taxpayer can come before a court of competent jurisdiction, or a tribunal, such as the tax review board, for the purposes of determining whether the minister was right in all he has done, because everything he does under the guise of an assessment is properly done; he is not subjected to penalty.

These are significant matters in determining simple justice. I fail to find any reference to any remedial action in Bill C-54. I fail to find any effort made by the Department of Finance to rectify what has been an injustice in the taxing legislation of this country. It is well recognized by the courts in Canada that there is no equity in taxation. That is an accepted principle in law. But, we should not have our act abound with inequity, which is the position in which we currently find ourselves.

What is the motivating force behind assessors of Revenue Canada in issuing assessments of a kind that are unjustifiable? I had occasion before I entered the private practice of law to practise with what was then the Department of National Revenue. Assessors in the department receive their promotions on the basis of the assessments that are levied. There is no corresponding reflection on their records when those assessments are reversed. There is a personal inclination and motivation to pursue the type of reprehensible conduct to which I made reference. It is to this kind of inequity I submit to you that this House and this government should direct its attention. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will be fairly brief in dealing with some matters I feel are related to the bill before us. I want to speak about the principles contained within the act, the principles of taxation and the way in which taxes, once having been collected, are redistributed in our society.

I cannot recall an occasion when I have walked on the streets of Hamilton when someone has not come to me and said he was vitally concerned about both the level of taxation at the personal income tax level and, more importantly, about the way the government goes about spending the money it raises. Everyone has his own hobbyhorse, of course; everyone has his own area in which he feels the government is perhaps misdirecting his funds. People are expressing a frustration every day about the apparent desire of the government to continue to not only raise money, which I think we all understand is necessary, but over how the government determines its priorities in the expenditure of many of the dollars which are so difficult to come by for private individuals.

I was looking at a chart the other day which shows a dramatic turnaround in the balance of the total tax burden carried by the personal income tax sector over and against the corporate tax sector. Although the figures themselves may not be as meaningful, indeed, when you look at them in detail, as they are when you look at them baldly, they are still rather startling.

In 1980 the percentage of total government revenue raised from personal income tax will be 37 per cent while the percentage raised from the corporate tax will be 10.3 per cent. When you look at that over and against the situation which prevailed in 1950, you find that in 1950 the percentage of expenditures raised from personal income tax was 20 per cent while the percentage raised from corporate tax was 22.5 per cent. You have to ask yourself what has happened in society because we have moved the burden of taxation so dramatically from the corporate sector to the private taxpayer. We must ask what has happened in society that has required us to place such an onerous burden, particularly on the low and middle-income taxpayers, taking out of their income such a substantial amount of money at a time when that money might will be better used to purchase goods and services within the community and thereby creating an expanded economy that would enable the corporate sector, if I might say it, to pay a larger share of the over-all tax burden than it is presently paying, because it would be receiving considerably more of the expenditure moneys of the total population.

One cannot help wonder, and I wonder along with many of the people I represent, about the expenditures of government. People have reluctantly become accustomed to carrying the burden of inadequate government management. They have expressed, and I think quite rightly so, that the government does not do a very good job of managing. I think this is primarily because the governments which have been in power have had very natural tendencies to be reluctant to be managers of the economy. Governments do not see themselves in that role. They do not see that they have a responsibility to manage the economy, not only the tax area of the economy I am speaking of now, but the economy in general, and to have a say in the direction the economy will go and to have some influence on the final decisions which are made that so much affect the day to day lives of the people.

People are becoming increasingly aware that they are also having to carry the burden of inadequate corporate management through the tax structure. We have to look very seriously at that problem. It is bad enough that the average taxpayer, the low and middle-income taxpayer, the people who work in plants and can hardly make ends meet, should have to carry the burden daily of the government's stupidity, but that they should also now in this new evolving society have to carry the burden of inadequate corporate decisions through their tax structure is unconscionable. That is what we are seeing happening. On a day to day basis we see the corporate sector awakening to the new idea that it can come to government any time things go wrong and the government, under pressure, will have to hand out more and more tax dollars, primarily because of the inadequacy of the management of the corporations involved. Corporations have found a new method of funding their failures. It is not only becoming more common for small businesses to cry, and I think quite rightly so, that they are mistreated and having difficulty making it in the marketplace because of a very severely restricted economy, but the giants of the industrial sector are lining up one behind the other, unashamedly reaching into the public trough in order to finance their inadequate management decisions which have resulted in failures.

It is very difficult for me to rationalize with the people I represent that they should be burdened on a day to day business with giving handouts to the corporate giants of this world without their having some say in the decisions being made with respect to the futures of those corporate giants. That is the nub of the problem.

When I read the Income Tax Act and look at the suggestions being made, all I can see is a perpetuation of an existing inadequate and unfair system. I cannot express adequately how much I feel the injustice of what is happening in this society. It appears to me that bad management is to be rewarded and that people on the side of good management with foresight, good reinvestment policy and adequate labour relations policy seem to be asked to carry more and more of the burden, along with the average taxpayers of this country. The Chryslers come knocking on the door. The Massey-Fergu-sons come knocking on the door. There are so many of them it becomes impossible because, as we begin to look at them, we find companies which for years decried the management of government. They told government to stay out of their business. They said that government knew nothing about management and that they, the Chryslers, the Masseys and the others, were the people who knew how to operate in the marketplace.

Yet if we stop and look, we find that they knew nothing about how to operate in the marketplace. They did not know how to manage the businesses they were managing, and they are not alone. The problem with which we are faced is that we have to raise more and more money, not only to subsidize failures but also in order to maintain communities and families which are devastated by the stupidity of the corporations of which I speak. This is a cause for great concern, and I wish more people in this House would give some consideration to what really is happening in this society.

On the one hand, Chrysler is attempting to gain favour with the government in order to try to put back on the tracks a company which has been run into the ground. If we say no, we doom a great number of employees to very serious hardship. If we say yes, then we invite others in the field to line up at the door of the treasury building in order that they too can gain access to the same public funding, and in order that they too can have their bad management decisions funded at public expense. I think this is a cause for alarm. It is a fairly new phenomenon. Ten years ago one rarely, if ever, heard of major corporations knocking at the door of the government for handouts.

That has become a normal practice today, and what concerns me is that we are dealing with this in such a piecemeal fashion that the bottom line of the bill we will have to pay will in the final analysis far exceed the number of tax dollars we will be able to pull in through corporate tax. Eventually we will end up paying out more than we will be able to get back.

We must get a clear picture of what is really going on in this society. Why is it that in private lending institutions there is not an apparent desire to take some risks? It is their business to take some risks in the refinancing, redevelopment and reindustrialization which inevitably must take place in order to relieve taxpayers all across this country who, frankly, cannot afford at this point in time to fund out of their own tax dollars what in essence is the bad decision-making of a few individuals who are, incidentally, still running companies and still making decisions, which will again come back to haunt us. There are some serious problems here and, in looking at taxation and the distribution of taxation, the government will be required to look very long and hard at the kinds of programs which are introduced to try to accommodate the greed which I think has probably been in place over the last two or three decades and which has extracted from consumers substantial amounts, more than consumers ought to have been required to pay.

Having extracted that money, this greed has resulted in a refusal to put sufficient amounts back into the companies involved so that they could maintain levels of productivity and technology which would have kept them in the forefront of the struggle for adequate and reasonably low cost commodities.

Today I went to a press conference held by three government ministers. Those ministers were telling my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and me, together with the press, how they will spend another $350 million of taxpayers' money. They will spend $175 million of that $350 million on a number of grant programs and subsidization programs for workers who are dislocated as a result of the bad management decisions to which I have referred. Over the next three years, they will spend $175 million assisting in the redevelopment of the very companies and others which, by the very terms of reference of these programs, have also made bad management decisions. I must ask myself whether this kind of program is of any value to this country now or in the future. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will address that problem tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps when the hon. member speaks tomorrow afternoon he can tell us on what side he stands and what he is in favour of. I have heard a great deal of comment about both sides. It would be interesting if tomorrow he came down on one side or the other.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I was under the impression—perhaps I was misguided—I had 40 minutes during which to speak and that at any time during that 40 minutes I would be able to explain what I thought was the appropriate course of action to take. I did not realize I had to do that in the time frame set by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under S.O. 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AID—CONSIDERATION OF TRIPARTITE AID TO THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are well aware that a large part of our foreign aid budget is transferred directly from Canada to the poorly developed countries in a form called bilateral aid.

• (2200)

Similarly, people are well aware that more aid is transferred to multinational organizations like the United Nations, called multilateral aid. A less common form of aid which encompasses almost none of the budget for foreign aid from Canada is in the form of trilateral or tripartite aid. Trilateral or tripartite aid is not a new suggestion. It is only new in the sense that it has been brought forward in the North-South program for survival, the Brandt report.

In many cases you will find that there are all kinds of conferences and all kinds of reports such as the North-South dialogue, the Canadian House of Commons North-South Relations report, the report of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who was skiing in the Alps, and so on, but when you get right down to it, so often all these reports evaporate like so much hot air because they contain so little substance, so little that is specific on what we might do to actually make the improvements that are required in the developing and the developed countries. One specific idea which was brought forward in the Brandt report is excellent. As I read it, I knew who it was meant for because it related to Canada. I should like to read from page 140 of the Brandt report a passage which reads as follows:

> The emergence of capital surplus developing countries provides special scope for the establishment of projects on a basis of tripartite arrangements involving developing countries alone or in partnership with industrialized countries. Such arrangements should be supported by both developed and developing countries. Tripartite projects, including, when appropriate, industrialized countries, should be encouraged by nations with complementary resources such as capital and technology.

Our Prime Minister travelled through Saudi Arabia, a country with surplus petro dollars which, in fact, they had to recycle. That nation is known for its contributions to developing nations, specifically through bilateral aid.

But in addition to bilateral aid, there is another opportunity here. While Saudi Arabia has surplus capital, Canada has a great capacity for technological aid exchange. In addition to that, our plants can manufacture and produce surplus goods. So why should we not take the capital of Saudi Arabia and our capacity to produce goods and technological aid, put those two together and transfer them to a third country like Somalia?

In my question to the minister, I made a specific suggestion. The idea I suggested is that we combine the capital of Saudi Arabia with our technological capacity in so far as energy is concerned. In fact, Canada has just set up Enertech, a new corporation, which will do substantial work in research into our resources. Why should we not have Enertech together with CIDA and the capital of Saudi Arabia or that of another OPEC nation provide an exchange to a needy country like Somalia? Somalia is the fourth poorest country in the world with the most massive refugee problem in the world. Can we not, for example, transfer our solar energy technology to that country? We produce solar energy water pumps. The most basic element of life is water. Canada has the capacity to provide the pumps to bring out water from underground. Some nations are already doing it. Why not pump that water from the ground in Somalia, not only to provide water for the people but to provide water for their crops so that they can become more self-sufficient? Here is another kernel of an idea. As a Member of Parliament you wonder about these things, you have ideas and you bring them forward in the House of Commons.

The minister says that he will certainly be prepared to give serious consideration to that proposal. That was November 16. The minister has had time for consideration. The Prime Minister has been to Saudi Arabia. He has been to undeveloped countries. There is no excuse to not move beyond the rhetoric, beyond the North-South dialogue and have that measured in some real and tangible way by Canada. Here is a specific idea. What must I do to have the government take an idea like this? It is not my own idea. It is an idea resulting from a great deal of study in the North-South report. Why do they not take this idea and in a real way measure the success of all these reports? That success is when the kernel of grain reaches the stomach or the soil of that Third World nation, which is poor and needy.

I hope that as a result of having raised this question here tonight in this House of Commons that maybe I will have touched a nerve or chord somewhere in a member or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) on the other side of the House. I hope it will not be given some kind of passing, fleeting response but that it will be given consideration.

I brought forth the case of Somalia here in the House of Commons and also in committee. Others have done the same. What must we do to get through to the bureaucracy to tell them we have found a problem? We have found a need of the people to receive, not just this form of aid, but bilateral aid as well, to be identified as a country. Why can we not take the need to receive and connect it with our capacity as a nation to give and to share? I challenge the government with that tonight.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to commend the hon. member who has just spoken on his sincere interest in the developing countries. The government has, of course, been exploring for some time now with key OPEC-Arab aid agencies possible arrangements to utilize OPEC funds to help finance the provision of goods, capital equipment and services for development projects in developing countries.

Although progress has so far been slow, we are currently engaged in, or discussing, participation in some ten projects which have a total cost of approximately $1.6 billion. Most of these projects involve parallel financing of components of very large projects developed by the World Bank and regional development banks. We have been attempting to interest Arab donors in some form of co-operative arrangments for the financing of high priority development projects, such as the hon. member already mentioned, in sectors where Canada has a recognized competence, such as transportation, communications, hydroelectric generation and transmission. Additional meetings at the level of officials are planned for 1981 to explore further the possibilities of such projects.

If I may, I would like to end on this note. It is an excerpt from the task force report on the North-South relations, which reads as follows:

Adjournment Debate

In spite of substantial efforts at various times, Canada seems to have been able to achieve only limited impact in enlisting oil-rich countries in joint efforts, apparently the key objective here.

Apparently, the key objective of the hon. member's speech.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on December 15 I put a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), who is responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, concerning the community services program. I asked this question of him because he recently announced that in 1982 he would be ceasing this program, which has been providing some $250 million per year of assistance to municipalities for municipal infrastructure for housing programs, community improvement programs and so on.

I have had a number of representations from municipalities in my constituency which are very concerned with the termination of this program. They are especially concerned in two communities in my constituency where there are projects which are already committed, where the project has been tendered and where a contract has been let. So, for these communities which so far have no definite commitment from the government, it is a matter of great concern.

One project is the $4 million sewer and water infrastructure project for Little Current, to which the Community Services Contribution Program was to provide $1.29 million. Another project is with regard to the new community development in Elliot Lake at a cost of some $29.9 million, of which the Community Services Contribution Program was to provide funding in the amount of $4.6 million. It was to be used for this rapidly expanding community where the funds are urgently required.

What I would like to know from the minister tonight is whether or not the province of Ontario has recommended these two projects. I understand that the cut-off date for the projects to be recommended by the province of Ontario is February 5. I am interested to know whether the two projects have been recommended, and are included in the funds allocated for the province of Ontario over the next couple of years.

There is no question that these funds and the projects are urgently needed for the communities. In the case of Little Current, the projects are needed for reasons of sanitation and the municipal infrastructure. In the case of Elliot Lake, the project is needed due to the massive expansion of this town, because of the uranium mining industry in that community, over the next four years or five years. When this program was put in place, these projects were planned. The projects were tendered and the contracts have been let, so the Community Services Contribution Program is a major funding instrument to these communities. Both communities will be placed in a catastrophic position financially if the money, totalling some $6 million for both communities, is not made available.

I hope the minister will be able to respond and indicate that the province of Ontario has recommended these two projects for funding under the Community Services Contribution Program and that the federal government is now prepared to extend this program for at least another year so that these projects may be completed and the benefits can accrue to the community and as a result to the entire country.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond further to the question raised on December 15 by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) concerning the termination of the Community Services Contribution Program. The decision not to renew the program was a difficult one, and I would like to take this opportunity to outline the factors which contributed to the government's decision.

First, there was the question of whether it was appropriate for the federal government to continue funding the provision of services which, from a jurisdictional point of view, have been the responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities. It is not a matter of whether the program was good, but rather, who should pay for such a program. Second, there is the issue of accountability, whether the government responsible for raising resources through taxation should not also be responsible for the expenditures of such revenues. Third, the effectiveness of the program was analysed from the point of view of job generation and compared with other programs that demonstrate a better return from money spent.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the present climate of fiscal restraint contributed to this decision. In meeting the objective of providing more effective government, the continuation of existing programs has been studied with a view to providing funds for new programs or those of a higher priority. The decision not to renew the Community Services Contribution Program now results in more funds being available for addressing higher priorities in the fiscal year 1982-83. The task remains to determine precisely the federal housing priorities in the 1980s. The minister will continue to hold informal discussions with his provincial counterparts and with other interested groups on this matter. It is his hope that this will assist in developing federal housing priorities and programs and lead to the best distribution funds between them.

Under the Community Services Contribution Program, the federal government has allocated a total of $400 million for municipal projects, $150 million of which was for the 1979 program year and $250 million of which was for the 1980 program year.

Over 3,000 projects in some 1,000 communities will have received federal assistance. This is a significant contribution to the provision of local services to Canadians in every province.

The minister wishes to assure the hon. member that the government will meet all commitments under the present federal-provincial community services contribution agreements. As the hon. member is aware, concerns have been raised about the time committed for the use of the 1980 program year funds. The funding is scheduled to terminate at the end of March, 1982. However, the minister is seeking an extension of that date, to enable communities to have the time to incur the necessary expenditures. He is confident that this extension will be granted, on the understanding that fiscal expenditures in 1981-82 will be reduced to reflect expenditures to be made in 1982-83.

I do not have specific answers about the two projects the hon. member has referred to, but I am sure the minister will be able to provide him with that information.

GRAIN—REIMBURSEMENT OF PRODUCERS FOR LOSS OF INCOME FROM DEPRESSED PRICES

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, more than seven months ago I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the following question:

Will the Prime Minister fulfil his promise to reimburse grain producers for their loss of income so that some extra cash can be injected into the drought-ridden farm economy?

The Prime Minister's answer on June 2 last year was that the matter "is being considered". At this time, seven months and seventeen days later, compensation for farmers who suffered income losses due to the grain embargo is still being considered.

As late as December 10 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in an answer indicated as follows:

As far as I am concerned, we intend to live up to what we have said. As I said the other day in the House, we do not intend to welsh on any agreement made by the previous government; this is one we said we would fulfil.

It is good to see that the government is progressing after seven months, but I think all hon. members present tonight will admit that the progress is pretty slow. Let us review for a moment where we stand in terms of embargo losses.

The embargo was put in place on January 4 last year as co-operation with the U.S. in their action to protest Soviet action in Afghanistan. The embargoing of 17 million tonnes of U.S. grain immediately depressed Canadian prices of food and feed grains. Countries which sold into the Soviet market received as much as $50 per tonne more than the prices quoted in countries observing the embargo.

All of this added up to substantial losses for the Canadian Wheat Board which was forced to operate as an arm of federal government policy. This is very significant, because the Canadian Wheat Board is funded by farmers of Canada to sell, as is stated in the charter, "the most wheat at the best price". What we have is an agency, funded by the farmers, selling the farmers short.

We can imagine that the farmers of Canada were upset and that most members of Parliament were upset, including western Conservatives such as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) who brought this matter up in the House. During that period we had a delightful bit of fancy footwork by the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, Senator Argue, who said it was keeping up normal and traditional levels of sales. Those sales vary from 3 million tonnes to 3.3 million tonnes to 3.5 million tonnes, as the sales increased.

On the other hand, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) insisted that this elastic band embargo still meant restrictions on the amount Canada would sell the Soviets until even he changed his position and decided that the government could not agree to restraints at the United States level, but the damage had been done. By not aggressively selling wheat into the Soviet markets, we lost premiums, and we almost lost the market. The Soviet market is where we sell the best grades of wheat. We also lost a good deal of money, an amount which the federal government has calculated several times but has failed to disclose.

In this year, when we are supposed to have freedom of information, Liberal style, I believe that we have arrived at 1984 three years in advance. We are not getting any information. I suggest that the government is doing very well in the "new-speak" department when, on the one hand, the government insists that compensation is going to be paid, that it is very much on its mind, but on the other hand it gives no inkling of how much the government intends to pay.

Many of us believe that the government will try to slip a nominal amount in between the 1979-1980 crop year final payments, which were announced on January 8, and the interim payments which will be announced at the end of the month. I would welcome any guarantees from the government side that this will not be the case. Luckily, we have had some public guidance as to the losses.

The University of Saskatchewan brought forward a study about the middle of July. That study showed the losses were $117 million for wheat and $9 million for barley for the period January to June last year. This amounted to 50 cents a bushel for wheat, approximately $1,200 for each of the 150,000 permit holders in the west. This would be welcome payment to many farmers who not only have to look at their staggering bank interest, but who have to put in next year's crop and feed cattle now at very high prices.

I want to ask the government the same questions again: when is the government going to pay compensation; how much and how did it arrive at the rate?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with reference to compensation, as I advised the House last Tuesday evening in answer to a similar question, the government is considering the question of compensation to producers for losses attributable to the partial embargo on grain to the U.S.S.R. A report on this subject has been prepared by officials and is now before the ministers for an early determination.

When the question was asked on June 2, the hon. member referred to the drought situation then prevailing in the west, along with cash flow problems being experienced by producers.

As all hon. members are aware, the situation has improved significantly since June. For example, in June the international price for No. 1 Canada western Red Spring wheat in store Thunder Bay was $197.56 per tonne or $5.38 per bushel. The comparable figure last Friday was $269.62 per tonne or $7.34 per bushel. That is an increase of almost $2 per bushel in seven months. Prices of other grains and oil seeds are also up sharply. Exports are running at a level above the record established a year ago, and this large movement is reflected in producers' deliveries and consequently in cash returns to producers.

In July the government announced higher initial payments for the current crop year, and before Christmas the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board indicated, on December 16, that he expected to announce a further increase in initial payments early in 1981, possibly near the beginning of February.

Hon. members will also be aware of the final payments of the 1979-80 wheat and barley pools which were announced on January 9. The minister noted that the final payments will amount to a total cash flow of more than $730 million to the prairie economy, with about $446.8 million going to Saskatchewan, about $187.3 million to Alberta and the Peace River area of British Columbia and about $96.4 million to Manitoba. The board will this week begin mailing over 336,000 final payment cheques to prairie producers.

As I said on Tuesday evening, to the extent that actual loss can be determined, the western producer can expect to be compensated in the near future. Determination of the amount is a complex problem. The hon. member mentioned the University of Saskatchewan study which indicated a $126 million loss, and the Conservatives last Tuesday said that the loss was $75 million. Government experts also have an evaluation which will be announced when the compensation is announced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House has now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

RAILWAYS

GRANGE REPORT—CALL FOR IMPLEMENTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The derailment in November, 1979 in Mississauga could well have turned out to be a national catastrophe. Clearly unsafe methods with respect to the movement of dangerous commodities by rail through built-up areas must be better regulated. The Grange report makes 15 recommendations to improve rail safety. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House do direct the Minister of Transport to implement forthwith the Grange report, not diddle around for another year, as he has indicated he will, with more studies but take rail safety seriously and show some respect for the safety of Canadians living near rail rights of way.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUESTED RESCISSION OF CORN COMPETITIVE FORMULA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the support of this House in redressing an injustice to western farmers which has existed since 1974 when the Hon. Otto Lang forced the corn competitive formula for pricing feed grains on the producers. This corn competitive formula has had the effect of depressing feed grain sale prices and is costing the western producer millions of dollars each year. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the government accede to requests from the Canadian Wheat Board, the United Grain Growers and other grain associations, individual producers and western members of Parliament, and rescind the corn competitive formula for feed grain pricing to allow the price to float free and to allow the western producers to derive just returns for their grain.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ALLEGED VIOLATIONS IN EL SALVADOR—CALL FOR EARLY MEETING WITH U.S. PRESIDENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Now that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been informed about the size and lethal nature of U.S. military aid to the junta in El Salvador, and in view of the Prime Minister's stated intention to meet with the new President of the United States in the near future, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to meet very soon with President Reagan and at that meeting raise the issue of the political deaths and human rights violations in El Salvador, last year's UN resolution against foreign military intervention in that country, and the concern of all Canadians about the escalating U.S. military involvement in El Salvador, "not a policy" as the Prime Minister said yesterday "that we would share or follow."

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNITED STATES

EXTENSION OF BEST WISHES TO PRESIDENT AND PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recognizing that today marks the inauguration of the fortieth President of the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger):

That this House extends best wishes to President Reagan and the people of the United States, and prays that his term in office will be distinguished by continued friendship and co-operation between our two nations, and greater peace and prosperity throughout the world.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH

ANTI-SMOKING CAMPAIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing urgency. As most hon. members know, we are in the beginning of the fifth annual national non-smoking week organized by the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health co-sponsored by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The success of this event as a public education campaign on smoking hazards is reflected by the department's latest findings on the smoking habits of Canadians. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Lonsdale):

That this House recognizes the importance and validity of this campaign.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

INTEREST TO BE CONSIDERED DIVIDEND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that because of inflation Canada Savings Bonds no longer present an attractive investment for Canadians since banks and other financial institutions have a much more attractive rate of return for short and long-term investments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the interest received from Canada Savings Bonds and other federal government bonds be considered as dividends so that people purchasing such bonds can claim a tax credit on their income tax, similar to that which now applies to dividends paid by Canadian corporations to Canadian investors.

A positive move in this direction would not only substantially increase the sale of federal bonds, but would reduce to almost nil the redemption or cashing in of such bonds.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

CALL FOR INCREASE IN FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The $260 million the federal government is providing the Farm Credit Corporation is inadequate to meet its demands, and under the present high interest rate conditions many farmers are finding it very difficult to continue their operations. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That extra money should be provided to the Farm Credit Corporation, possibly as much as $200 million, and interest rates for farmers borrowing this money be frozen at the existing rate of 12.75 per cent. If these measures are not taken, the survival of thousands of Canadian farmers is threatened.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DIEFENBAKER CENTRE

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT TRUST FUND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I wish to bring to the attention of members of this House the fact that the Diefenbaker Centre at the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon, which is a national institution not only honouring the memory of a distinguished Canadian prime minister but engaging in living history and important scholarly research, is presently sorely beset for the lack of funds and receives absolutely no funding from the federal government. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House directs the government, through the Ministry of the Secretary of State, to establish a permanent trust fund, as was done for the Pearson College of the Pacific, so that the Diefenbaker Centre can continue to thrive and pursue its excellent work without the constant pressure of financial worries.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRY

INDUSTRY AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—DISBURSEMENT OF FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The government announced yesterday that it intends to buy a $350 million band-aid to stick on communities that have been TKO'd through lost jobs. Not content with pillaging jobs from other areas and carrying them off to their own ridings—as the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) and the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley) did when they snatched 200 jobs from Parks Canada in Peterborough and as the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) did when she snatched hundreds of jobs in east central Ontario by stopping the Eldorado Nuclear plant expansion in Hope township and moved it to her own riding—according to news reports this morning Windsor and Cape Breton are now front runners in this new Liberal sweepstake, so that areas where byelections are pending can count themselves lucky.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That cabinet consider that its duty is to disburse these funds fairly, on the sole basis of need and beyond the scope of partisan bias. In this way they have an opportunity to redress in some measure their previous policies of pork-barrelling patronage.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my initial question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who announced yesterday with two fellow ministers a certain program which he described as being:

—measures to respond to serious industrial dislocation situations. These measures will be made available in communities designated on the basis that they have recently experienced large scale industry dislocation that has directly resulted in a significant increase in the level of community unemployment.

Madam Speaker, my question to the minister is simply this: Why does he persist in coming forward with such ad hoc measures, in effect bringing in measures after the fact as opposed to bringing in a proper industrial strategy for this country? Why does he not bring in an industrial strategy which, as he told his interviewers in a recent interview, he feels rightly should take second priority to such things as the constitutional debate?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, what we announced yesterday, in my view and in that of the government, certainly should be one element of an industrial policy framework. What we announced is consistent with the need in this country right now to encourage industrial restructuring and the adaptation of labour to present and emerging situations in a way which will help bring about strong, permanent economic growth in ways which meet international competition.

I am sorry the hon. member does not agree with this but I think working people in his riding and across the country would agree with what we did yesterday in carrying out a commitment made in the budget of October 28.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Let me tell the minister that what workers in Canada want are jobs, not last minute aid programs such as he is suggesting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he is aware that the recent Bank of Montreal Business Review points out that "1980 was undoubtedly the worst year in Canada's post World War II history". According to the Business Review per worker output declined about 3.5 per cent and the gross national product in real terms fell about .5 per cent, the first drop since 1954. If the minister is aware of those statements, would he indicate to the House why he persists in saying that industrial strategy for this country should have second priority to the constitutional debate?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, it is not my position that industrial strategy should have second priority. At the same time, certain types of decisions must be made to provide a foundation for putting in place the right kind of industrial strategy for this country. We provided that foundation in the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on October 28. If the House will allow the Minister of Finance to present his measures so that they can be adopted—measures providing for some $6 billion in increased expenditures under the economic development program—then those kinds of decisions will enable us to move forward in the area of industrial strategy. The test of the hon. gentleman's commitment to this will come in the way he responds to my hon. friend's budget presentation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST MINISTERS READ INAUGURAL SPEECH OF U.S. PRESIDENT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in view of those answers from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce perhaps my supplementary question should be to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister undertake to the House, perhaps even promise, that he and his ministers will read thoroughly President Reagan's inaugural speech just made, in the earnest hope that it may give him and his ministers some better inspiration to bring in economic policies which will get Canada back to work? That is to say, better than results indicate at present.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I promise to read it myself, but I cannot make that undertaking on behalf of my ministers. I point out to the hon. member that he knows from experience that making speeches is one thing but carrying out their promises, as the former government showed, is another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—INQUIRY WHETHER AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY CONSULTED

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question arises out of the same announcement made yesterday. Even this government should know that planning ought to come first, particularly with respect to industrial strategy programs. This $350 million should be supplemental and complementary to that planned program.

There was a program announced earlier with respect to Chrysler Corporation. The woes of the Chrysler Corporation are only the tip of the iceberg on the troubled waters of the automotive industry. I was assured by a senior member of the automotive industry, this morning—

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member knows that his question is too long.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): After the introduction made by the lead speaker for the opposition, I will now ask my question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. May I ask him whether, before they announced that program of yesterday, they consulted with the automotive industry? Will he tell me whether a riding such as St. Catharines, which now has an additional 1,200 persons laid off, will benefit from that program as announced yesterday, when and how?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have had a number of discussions with the automotive industry, including the parts industry, over the past months and the views they have expressed certainly have helped us in formulating the kind of program we announced yesterday and other types of decisions I anticipate we will be making.

With regard to the other area of my hon. friend's question, certainly an application from St. Catharines for coverage under the program, the community designated portion of it, is open for consideration. In any event, workers in St. Catharines would be eligible for the expanded critical skilled trades training program, and individual projects from firms in St. Catharines involving industrial restructuring would be eligible for consideration even if it turned out that St. Catharines was not designated under the community-focused portion of the program, although an application on that basis could certainly be considered.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the same minister. May I ask whether he or someone else in his department has set the criteria by which application might be made and approved? Does this involve the matter of high unemployment, how long must that unemployment remain in existence, does it involve a matter of regional consideration, and how long must a community such as St. Catharines wait before receiving the benefit and aid of that program announced yesterday?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the basic concept underlying designation is that communities would be designated on the basis that they have recently experienced large scale industrial dislocation which has directly resulted in a significant increase in the level of community unemployment. We will be announcing further details about the way these criteria will be applied at the time the government announces the first group of designations, and I anticipate this will be in a matter of weeks. Certainly at this time we would be willing to accept suggestions from communities which may wish to be considered under this community focused program.

RAILWAYS

GRANGE REPORT—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of the commission by Mr. Justice Grange on railway safety resulting from the Mississauga mishap. While the minister wants to study the subject for a year, although it is obvious the recommendations of Mr. Justice Grange need to be implemented, will the minister immediately order the implementation of at least the first three of the recommendations of Mr. Justice Grange? Because if they are not implemented another 30 to 50 derailments will occur each year as a result of the wrong kind of equipment?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the premise is wrong, unfortunately. I never said this was a study group, and I never said it would report after a period of one year. The question raised by a member of the press was, how long did I expect the consultative committee to stay at work, and I said it might be a full year. This is an advisory committee, which is meeting for the first time next week. I will meet with it within four weeks. It will express to me in time a position on each one of these recommendations Justice Grange has made. We are going to make decisions very, very rapidly.

Justice Grange himself suggested a number of tests and a certain amount of research. The confusion created in respect of the one year is related simply to the suggestion that the committee will go on with these tests and do this research, which may take one full year. However, I repeat that decisions will come much faster than that.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, there is no problem about the continuation of tests. The first three recommendations of Mr. Justice Grange have called for the minister to instruct—and he and two of his predecessors have been questioned about this repeatedly for the last several years—the CTC or to request the CTC to act in the same way it did—very quickly—after the Mississauga accident last year with respect to the consist of a train. The CTC acted very quickly then. Will the minister ask the CTC to act under section 227 or section 100 of the Railway Act? The authority is already there to require the railroads to begin immediately implementing the first three recommendations of Mr. Justice Grange.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I think it would be unwise and certainly not very polite to the members of the advisory committee which I have created—three of them outsiders to the government—if I were to start announcing seriatim decisions on the recommendations. I will do it in a very orderly fashion. I will receive their views beginning four weeks from now and act quite rapidly, as the hon. member will see, as the proper information is obtained and the proper assessment is made by this advisory committee with respect to each one of the recommendations.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, the minister is still copping out. He is still acting like a sponge. Mr. Justice Grange and every recognized authority in transportation, including management, unions and experts in the field, know that technology has been in place for 30 years with respect to roller bearings and for a number of years with respect to hot-box detectors. Recommendations of the railway brotherhoods in connection with marshalling and consist of trains have been put before the minister and his predecessors repeatedly. He does not need another committee.

I would like to ask the minister if he will now call upon his colleagues and particularly the President of the Treasury Board—since Mr. Justice Grange was so critical of the restraint program—to stop the decrease in the number of safety inspectors, increase the budget of the CTC and increase the amount of training and the number of railway safety personnel.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I think any person with his head squarely on his shoulders—that would include the hon. member who is asking this question—would act the way I am acting in this matter. He would not on the basis of his own prejudices, knowledge or whatever decide on the day after the receipt of a document like this which of the recommendations to accept and which not to accept. That would be foolish. What I am doing now is the normal thing to do, and even the hon. member would do that if, incredible as it may seem, he were in my position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROLE OF CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister knows that in 1971, after 36 days of comprehensive hearings into a number of rail disasters, a whole series of recommendations were made. The inquiry was followed up and further reports were made in 1973. The minister knows from reading Mr. Justice Grange's report, which he has had for at least six weeks, that the CTC has been a sleeping policeman. Will the minister make changes in the personnel of the CTC so people can be satisfied that that organization, which is supposed to protect the interests of people generally, in fact works to do what it is supposed to do?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member says, Mr. Justice Grange has analysed all that and has not been, shall we say, very laudatory with respect to the position of the CTC in some of these matters. However, he went on to say that there are preoccupations, which he respects, in relation to the economic viability of some of the existing regulations, and he suggests that the time has come when the onus must be tipped from the economic preoccupation more to the safety preoccupation, that a social change has taken place in recent years. He suggests that the time has now come to incorporate that change in the rules and regulations concerning train transportation and safety. It is difficult in this context to hold a number of people responsible for a change which had not taken place in society as a whole. It may be that the time has come to do that, and that will be indicated by our reaction to the recommendations which Mr. Justice Grange makes.

● (1430)

Mr. Blenkarn: Am I to gather from the minister's answer that the CTC has been more involved in economics than in safety and that it has been in bed with the railways rather than doing its job of looking after the interests of individuals, of VIA Rail and so on? If that is the minister's view, surely it is time that the minister had a little purge.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blenkarn: My supplementary question, Madam Speaker, is in connection with the report. There are a number of things that could be done right now without a long study period. Will the minister order that trains carrying dangerous chemicals be no more than 4,000 feet in length? Will the minister order that dangerous chemicals be carried only in cars having roller bearings in their journal boxes? Will the minister order that the railways immediately commence installing heat sensors every 20 miles as recommended? In other words, will the minister take his responsibilities for safety seriously?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am inferring two things. The first one is that the preoccupation with economics is not one that should be pushed aside easily. If the CTC had done that in the past, I suggest that my Conservative friend would have been one of the first to chastise them for having done so. Secondly, I suggest that a body of people, such as the Canadian Transport Commission, cannot be held solely responsible for the behaviour of society as a whole throughout the years. Realizing now that the situation has changed, that people have changed their minds, it may well be asked to take a position which would be slightly different from the one it took in the past.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROPOSALS TO ACHIEVE TARGET

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. Yesterday the minister announced his increased commitment to research and development so that it could achieve 1.5 per cent of the gross national product by 1985. Unfortunately, the minister will remember that that was an announcement which was also made in 1978 for 1983. The reason that policy died is that the government did not bring forward any specific proposals for tax incentives and grants. I should like to ask what specific proposals or tax incentives and grants—that is, tax incentives for industries and grants to universities—is the minister bringing forward so that he can achieve the new target he set?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, not only did I announce yesterday the target for reaching the objective of 1.5 per cent of the gross national product devoted to these efforts, but I also laid out the structure for planning purposes of proposed expenditures on the part of the federal government in the various areas in which it has concerns, such as support for universities, support for research in the private sector and support for the mission-oriented activities of federal government departments. Not only did we establish the target date; we indicated the kinds of expenditures which, for planning purposes, we thought would be necessary for achieving it. We also suggested that the percentage level of the federal government's effort within that 1.5 per cent target date should be .5 per cent.

I am using this planning structure as a basis for continuing discussions with the private sector and with the universities. Clearly it is not in its full form with a detailed nuts and bolts approach. Further programs will be brought forward to the government to indicate how we will achieve or hope to promote the kind of growth in the private sector, which is quite considerable, which will be necessary if we are to reach that 1.5 per cent target. I am sure the hon. member has already looked at the material which has been provided. It does much more than simply establish the target date of 1.5 per cent for 1985. A great deal more information has been provided about the government's targets in order to achieve that.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, quite clearly the industrial spokesmen simply do not believe the minister. His credibility and that of his government is strained. Northern Telecom, a very important research agency, has indicated that the minister is using mere rhetoric and that the public is being lulled into thinking that something is being done. The Canadian Advanced Technology Association says the minister is dealing with symptoms, not causes, and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business says his policy is not worth the paper it is written on, and for a very good reason—the participation of the government is going down. When will the minister come forward with some real policy proposals so that we can have real research and development in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I would contest the assumption which underlies the hon. member's question. Indeed, yesterday in presenting our proposals to university presidents and a group of representatives of business associations in Toronto, I received a cautious welcome for the structure which we presented to them—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Qualified.

Mr. Roberts: In view of past disappointments, to which the hon. member has alluded, they are concerned to see what further steps will be taken, but the initial response to the announcement which I made yesterday has been rather favourable on the whole.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER HOSTAGE TAKING INCIDENTS WILL BE DISCUSSED AT HEADS OF STATE MEETING IN JUNE

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Now that the Iran-U.S. crisis appears to have been settled through agreement between Tehran and Washington, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether in the course of the meeting of seven western heads of state here in Ottawa next June it is his intention to raise the issue of hostage takings—I am referring to diplomats—and steps which might be taken should similar incidents occur in future? I am thinking specifically of the agreement between leading western heads of state in Bonn, thanks to the initiative taken by the then prime minister regarding air piracy.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion which I feel is excellent. That subject is not likely to appear as such on the agenda but, when we get around to discussing over-all political topics, I think it will be an opportunity to implement the suggestion of the hon. member and I thank him for it.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

CONTRIBUTION BY MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. On numerous occasions I have asked the minister when he will present a detailed, long-term strategy which could achieve the goal of 1.5 per cent of our gross national product directed toward research and development, and the minister's statement in Toronto yesterday did not tell us anything new. It has been known for years that the reason we have had R&D expenditures similar to those of Portugal is that our private sector, mainly the multinationals, has a dismal record of research and development in this country. It has been known for years that the private sector must increase its R&D to some 27 per cent a year for the next five years if we are to achieve the goal—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, my question is this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Jong: Is there anything in the minister's statement that would force the multinational corporations to increase their research and development in this country, or is his statement just another pious hope?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, of course I am disappointed that the hon. member is not more enthusiastic about the statement I made, but I think, as I indicated in my response to the hon. member for Rosedale, there is a considerable amount of information and commitment in that statement which marks a significant step forward in our planning for science and technology research and development in the government. I indicated very clearly in my statement and in my discussions yesterday that the relatively poor performance in general of foreign-owned firms and subsidiaries in the research and development area is a matter of great concern to us and that we do have under consideration ways and means of trying to improve that performance. We are particularly anxious that foreign subsidiaries develop more than they have at present world product mandates.

The hon. gentleman asks what those steps are going to be. It was not my purpose yesterday to outline those details. I ask him to be content and to be patient for a little longer.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, indeed, we have been waiting for a long period of time. The particular goal was announced in 1968 and it was announced again in 1978, but the announcements have all been pious hopes.

The other question I should like to direct to the minister concerns funding of universities. In the background paper which was provided with his speech, he suggested that the government's share of that 1.5 per cent was to be reduced to one third. However, he was also projecting an increase in the share of that projected goal by the universities. There is a contradiction there because the universities depend on government financing—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

• (1440)

Mr. de Jong: How can the government increase the universities share of research at the same time as decreasing the federal government's share?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, there are two principal ways in which the federal government assists universities. One is through the transfer of funds to provincial governments through established program financing arrangements for the support of post-secondary education. The other major instrument at our disposal is the activities of the Natural Science and Engineering Research Council. The hon. member will know that already this year we have very considerably increased the funds going to that council by something like $42 million. It is in the five-year plan of the Natural Science and Engineering Research Council that we hope to assist universities to meet the research and development obligations which we hope they will meet.

AGRICULTURE

APPLICATIONS BEFORE HERD MAINTENANCE REVIEW BOARD

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Last week the review board under the herd maintenance program was saddled with the problem of automatically reviewing applications which had been turned down. Was there any change in the criteria which gave the review board a little more elbow room in order to operate so that some of the applications that were turned down might be looked at more favourably now? If they are saddled with the same stiff regulations obviously they will come to the same conclusions.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, my understanding is that a meeting took place this morning in the city of Regina with the various people involved in the herd maintenance program, the forage assistance program and the review board. The review board is comprised of producers from each province. The majority of them are producers; I believe the three people on the review board for the province of Saskatchewan are producers. They have been instructed to be as humanitarian as possible within the realm of reason.

Mr. Korchinski: Madam Speaker, one of the conditions in which cattlemen might qualify for assistance is that their crops would have to be less than 80 per cent of the average. Anyone who knows anything about agriculture—and I am sure the review board would know—would know that the yield one receives is in no way related to the crop yield or the yield of the hay crop because one can have a short-standing crop and a good yield, or conversely, a rank crop which lodges and there is no grain in it at all. Have any instructions gone out to change the particular criteria, which in a sense are ridiculous because many of the areas rejected were areas that did not receive freeze-out payments and simply do not have any cash to continue?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I will know better when my colleague, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, returns to the capital later today from attending a meeting this morning in Regina, but I understand a lot of these matters have been considered. The recommendations on how this is to be administered come from the producer sectors of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, which is the group meeting in Regina this morning. There are 8,000 appeals, and as I said the review board is comprised of reasonable and responsible people who I feel will take the most proper attitude toward making decisions.

WILDLIFE

SLAUGHTER OF CARIBOU HERDS—QUOTAS ON KILLS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. During this period last year thousands of Canadian caribou were slaughtered as the two main herds moved southward from the Northwest Territories into northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Will the minister tell the House what steps if any the government is taking to prevent such wanton destruction this year and in future years, especially in light of reliable reports that in 1980 frozen lakes were littered with crippled and dying animals and carcasses with often only the tongues or hind quarters removed? In fact, this was wanton destruction.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, there have been meetings on the subject between my officials and representatives of provincial governments. An agreement under the Canada Wildlife Act between Canada, the Northwest Territories, Manitoba and Saskatchewan for co-operative action in establishing a migratory caribou board has been drafted by the Canadian Wildlife Service in Edmonton. The draft will be reviewed before the end of this month and after that it will be put in final form.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In light of what the minister just said, could he confirm that the failure of the government to control the slaughter of Canada's two main barren ground caribou herds in the past has caused one herd to decline from 135,000 to 38,000 in the last eight years and the other to decline from 105,000 to 70.000 in the last two years? In light of that destruction, will the minister tell the House whether the program he just mentioned will involve instituting and enforcing quotas on kills so as to ensure the survival of this precious part of our country's natural heritage?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, as I indicated in my earlier answer, the draft has not yet been reviewed. It is not in a final form for discussion, so it is not really possible for me to reveal to the hon. member today exactly what the details of that agreement will be and how it will operate. But as soon as the discussions are completed, which I expect will be in the very near future—before the end of the month—we will be able to give him more precise information about the aspects he has now raised.

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—POSSIBLE AMENDMENT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It is further to the federal herd maintenance program. The chief criterion creating problems for the committee in western Canada at this time, about which the producers are complaining, is the provision requiring a crop of 80 per cent or less before farmers are eligible for the program. It happens to be a turning point for a great many people, which is why the appeal committee has so many appeals before it. Is the minister prepared to recommend to cabinet that the 80 per cent provision be done away with and the need be assessed for forage in each individual case as an alternative method?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to inform the hon. member for Mackenzie who questioned me about this same problem that the senator in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board was not in Regina this morning; he was here in Ottawa attending a very important meeting.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Sometimes it is hard to know.

Mr. Whelan: I understand the meeting with the officials is still taking place in Regina. This matter is being considered. I cannot tell the hon. member what the results will be, but if the recommendation comes through strong and clear that a change should be made, we will try to follow it up within reason.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, this is the second time drought programs have run into administrative problems in western Canada. There was a committee which was supposed to keep them from running into problems. Will the minister and his associate ministers involved in the drought program continue to operate it once the program is out of the way so that we are prepared for the next one? The snowfall has not been very great out there and the prospect of drought is still quite imminent for next year.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the government, perhaps much to his surprise and much to the surprise of other people, decided to spend an equivalent of $67 million on this program to assist farmers affected by drought. It is a new program and it is a new experience for all people involved in administering it. We realize it would be better if there was something of a more permanent nature to set up a structure so that we could act in cases of severe drought. What the hon. member says is true. We have reports now on moisture conditions in the prairies. In some areas it is adequate, but in some areas it is very poor.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROPOSED SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND NEW YORK CITY

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the projected direct air connection between the national capital and the city of New York. My first question is with respect to time. There have been reports that it would take perhaps a year and a half before all the arrangements, both locally and internationally, can be made for that service to come to pass. Would the minister comment on that time frame and, if possible, would he be prepared to undertake to use his good offices at least here, if not in the United States, to shorten the time it will take before the final decision is made on this matter?

● (1450)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the subject is very popular with Members of Parliament as well as diplomats and businessmen. As my hon. friend knows, there are two ways of dealing with the matter. One method is by way of amending the Canada-United States bilateral air agreement under which Eastern Airlines now holds the franchise. The other method of dealing with the matter is if both the Canadian regulatory agency and the American regulatory agency were to agree on one of the candidates. It is with regard to the second method that it has been said it might take up to one year and a half to complete the arrangements.

I am trying to deal with this particular problem as wisely as possible. I am exploring both avenues. My interest in this case is almost as great as, if not greater than, the interest of the hon. member. I have taken, first of all, the bilateral approach to find out if Eastern Airlines expect to offer their service. Secondly, if Eastern do not wish to offer service, which appears to be the case, I would like to determine if any other American carrier would be willing to take over the route and, if so, under what conditions. An agreement with the United States would follow if this approach were successful.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that there are two Canadian carriers which are interested in this matter. I hope that the minister will emphasize that aspect in his discussions and expedite those discussions as quickly as possible. But there is one question which arises with respect to this matter, and it is with regard to either the intervention or the proposed intervention by Air Canada for the purposes of preserving a right rather than providing a service, as is the intent of the other two air carriers.

Would the minister be prepared to use his good offices to ask Air Canada if it has filed a request with the board to withdraw and, if it has not, to request that Air Canada not intervene so that an already tedious process, as the minister has described it, will not be made even more tedious? Would the minister give that undertaking to the House?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I will bear in mind what the hon. member has asked, but I would also like him to bear in mind the fact that I must work within the existing agreement between Canada and the United States. As much as I would like to be sympathetic toward the Canadian carrier, I must keep this fact in mind. I must also keep in mind the apparent preference of Ottawans for certain types of aircraft as opposed to other types.

On the subject of Air Canada, I must say that I have not gone into the details as to what has been said with regard to the requests of the two airlines, Air Atonabee and First Air, but I will do so and report to the hon. member at the earliest opportunity.

RAILWAYS

ROLE OF CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION IN SAFETY PROCEDURES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the President of Transport arising out of the Grange report. The commission saw fit to devote one section toward the CTC's inaction in various areas related to safety, as have been referred to by my colleague and particularly with respect to the general safety inquiry between 1971 and 1973 wherein firm recommendations were made with respect to the installation of roller bearings, hot-box detectors and regulations with respect to speed. The commissioner pointed out that there was absolutely no action taken by the CTC in any of those areas. Such action would not require money and there would be no impact in so far as the restraint order is concerned.

It seems that the CTC is not fulfilling its rightful responsibility in the area of safety. Would the minister seize upon this opportunity, given the ammunition which is available in this report, to call in the CTC and remind it of its rightful responsibility and obligations in this regard so that we may improve the confidence in and reliability of safe rail transportation in this country?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, if I had been a lawyer and visiting the courts regularly, I would have tended to take the point of view that society as a whole tends to be guilty of sins of omission and commission more so than individuals or institutions. What I mean to say by that is that it is very difficult for me, and I would hope for my predecessor as well, to chastise an institution for its interpretation of events brought about as a result of social thinking which was not entirely or exclusively the thinking of the institution. That is the position which I take. Consequently, I am more interested in what we will do now than in what has been done in the past. I will act accordingly.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, certainly I am interested in what will happen in the future, but I wish that the minister would respond to my question. Will he call in the members of the CTC and remind them of their rightful responsibility under the provisions of the statute?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I was intending to do that, but one of the members of the CTC is on the advisory committee which will be presenting its views to me. As I will exercise this responsibility personally, I will be in close contact with Mr. Gray regularly and will debate these points with him. One thing which impressed me in reading the report—and by the way I did not receive the report six weeks ago, but just on Sunday—is the balanced approach which Mr. Justice Grange takes in his report. For example, when he talks about speed he asks how we can talk about speed without taking into consideration the quality of the equipment, the training of people on the trains, and the safety devices, techniques and procedures which are used.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

FORESTRY

NATIONAL FORESTRY POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of forestry-related questions which I would like to direct to the Minister of the Environment who is responsible for forestry. I would like to remind him of an occasion when he spoke to a large major audience in the country and made the statement that he would commit the government to the national forestry policy which was laid out by his predecessor, which had as its goal the rejuvenation of the Canadian Forestry Service and, by the year 2000, an increase of 50 per cent in forest production throughout the country. The minister received cautions applause and cautions enthusiasm toward this statement.

What has the minister to report today with regard to these initiatives of his predecessor and agreed to by him? In particular, has he received a report from the multidepartmental committee which was to report in October and, if so, what is he doing to implement its recommendations?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the objectives to which the hon. member has alluded were worked out not simply by my predecessor—and I would give him full credit—but in conjunction with the provincial ministers under the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers of which, as the hon. member knows, I am now the chairman. We have been working actively with the provinces to reach those objectives. Some of the steps which we forecasted would take place have already taken place. For instance there has been, as the hon. gentleman knows, the appointment of an assistant deputy minister in charge of the forestry section of the Department of the Environment.

A whole series of studies has been undertaken by a variety of federal departments. Some of those studies have now been returned to the co-ordinating group in the Department of the Environment and others are still on their way. I could give an indication, if the hon. member wishes, of the status of each of the six studies which have now taken place, but perhaps he would prefer that I send him a letter outlining those studies.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, there was no real requirement for further studies. We all know that there is a serious situation with respect to a declining forest inventory and the dire need for forest renewal throughout the country. This multidepartmental committee which was to report in October was to give the minister advice as to what initiatives could be taken by the federal government to assist the provinces and the industry to replenish and renew our forests. The report is now four months overdue. Has the minister received the report of the multidepartmental committee and, if so, is he prepared to table it? If the minister has not received the report, does he know when the report will be available for study by those who will make the decisions?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I am not sure whether or not there is a misunderstanding between the hon. gentleman and myself. The departmental committee chaired within my department has had a series of meetings. That committee has assigned a variety of subjects to a variety of departments and asked them to report to the co-ordinating committee so that it can inform me. Some of those reports from other departments have come in on schedule but one or two have been delayed and we expect to receive them within the next couple of months.

● (1500)

The short answer to the hon. member's question is not as simple as he would like, but a variety of the studies that we expected to come forward have indeed come forward and we are waiting for a couple more. I am not sure if that satisfies the hon. gentleman but it is as accurate a description as I can give him of the process that has taken place.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

INQUIRY RESPECTING POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN PHASING-IN PERIOD

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I put a question to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. My question relates to this session's Bill C-40 under which the widows of veterans whose pensions were below 48 per cent may now qualify for pensions as widows. May we anticipate that some time soon the acting minister will bring in legislation either to eliminate or to shorten the six and one-half year phasing-in period in that legislation so that these widows, many of whom are getting on in years, will be able to receive their pensions while they are still alive?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can assure you that my interest in the question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is equal to his. I am also very interested in improving the lot of veterans. As hon. members know, the pensions and allowances of veterans in Canada are among the best in the world. I am realistic enough, however, to realize that Bill C-40 could be improved. I have just asked my department to give me a medium-term social policy objective for the next few years. I can assure the hon. member that the phasing out of the six and one-half years for these veterans' widows' pensions will be included in our consideration.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for the interest he has shown in that answer. May I ask if, while he is studying veterans legislation, he will also give serious consideration to amending the Pension Act so that the basic rate of the disability pension will automatically be tied to the average take-home pay of the five categories in the public service designated in 1972?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member has already been discussed at some length. What we are trying to find out in these modifications or improvements of the legislation for veterans is basically to determine whose needs are greatest. Sometimes it happens that modifying the basic pension rate, for example, does not necessarily correct the situation for the person in greatest need. That is what we are trying to do in this basic pension system and in the assessment now being carried out. I can assure the hon. member that the question of the basic rate of veterans' pensions will also be taken into consideration when we look at these matters.

FINANCIAL EFFECT OF PROPOSED OIL INDUSTRY NATIONALIZATION

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. The National Energy Program presented by the minister on budget night indicated the amount of dividends exported by foreign-owned oil companies in the year 1979. From that can be calculated the amount of savings to the Canadian people. These will come to $120 million per year after the government completes their nationalization of parts of the oil industry. From this can also be calculated the cost to the government each year in order to save that $120 million. The amount is between $1.1 billion and $1.7 billion per year. Can the minister tell this House whether he agrees with these figures and thinks that this is a saving to the Canadian people?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I shall take a look at the figures and if I have any reason to qualify them I shall let the hon. member know.

PRIVILEGE

MR. OGLE—LACK OF STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON RECENT INTERNATIONAL TRIP

Madam Speaker: I have notice of a question of privilege in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle). I want to tell the hon. member that his notice of the question of privilege was very brief and not very comprehensive. From what I gathered from it I am not sure that the hon. member is pursuing the proper channels in order to get the information he is seeking. I shall hear him, however, but he must go very clearly and rapidly to what he feels is his question of privilege, otherwise I am afraid I shall have to interrupt him.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed through you to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As a member of the House of Commons of Canada I believe that my privilege, as well as that of other members of the House, has been infringed upon by not having received an accurate explanation or information from the Prime Minister about his recent trip to South America, Africa and Europe. I believe it is very important that this House know what went on at those meetings that the Prime Minister had with other leaders of states, because it is extremely important that this House have accurate information on the question of North-South.

I have been a member of this House for two years and during that time we have never had a single opportunity to have a debate on external affairs, on policy, or anything like that. The 1975-80 policy of the government came to an end at the end of 1980, so we have no policy whatsoever now.

I believe it is necessary that I and other members of this House, particularly those working on North-South relations, have some kind of report from the Prime Minister so that we can at least respond to it and have an open debate in order that the country may know where we are going on this extremely important question that relates to the poor of the world. It is a situation that is becoming more and more complicated and worse for the poor. The rich are still standing back and not entering into the North-South debate with the kind of information, knowledge, and support that the poor are seeking. That is my point, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I gathered from the note that the hon. member sent to me that he was in need of or would like to have some more information about this question, but it is not for the Chair to obligate any minister, or even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to make a statement in the House. That is the choice of a minister or the Prime Minister. As the hon. member knows, there are opportunities to debate these questions, such as the question period, opposition days, or the other procedures at the disposal of members. I have therefore to say to the hon. member that he has no question of privilege.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I have been asked to present a petition in opposition to high interest rates which are causing a crippling burden for all Canadians, and which are bankrupting businesses and causing people to lose their homes. CENSUS—POLITICAL APPOINTMENTS

Question No. 162—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Will members of Parliament be permitted to nominate persons to be considered for employment in their constituencies in the various capacities that will be required for the taking of the new census and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so (i) will this be permitted to all members regardless of political affiliation (ii) will it be restricted to Liberal Members of Parliament only and, if so, for what reason?

2. Will it be government policy to permit Liberal Party officials in various constituencies to have an input into such nominations and, if so, for what reason?

3. Will the government consider removing the entire matter from any political level and require that appointments be made on the basis of merit and ability?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: 1. A number of sources of nominations for potential census employees will be used; primary among these is the ministerial referral system. Nominations by non-government Members of Parliament will be permitted.

2. Traditionally a list of nominations provided by government party MPs and local representatives has been a source for potential census commissioners. As this practice has proven to be extremely effective and efficient it will be continued for the current census.

3. Appointments are made under the Statistics Act on the basis of merit and ability as determined through written tests and personal interview assessments.

Order Paper Questions

PERSONS REFUSED UIC BENEFITS ON BASIS OF LANGUAGE

Question No. 236—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many persons have been refused or cut off from unemployment insurance compensation because they speak only one of the official languages?

2. Is a unilingual French-speaking claimant who moves from Quebec to a small rural town in British Columbia where the only job opportunities were for English-speaking or bilingual workers considered as not available for work?

3. What assistance is offered to such a person who is willing to broaden his or her job search but wishes to continue to live with his wife or her husband?

4. How many persons refused or cut off from unemployment insurance benefits for reasons of language, have had their benefits reinstated?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Persons are never "refused or cut off from Unemployment Insurance" benefit on the basis of language capability.

2. Availability for work is always a question of fact to be determined by reference to the particular circumstances of each case. The circumstances may be ones beyond the control of the claimant or ones deliberately created by the claimant. A unilingual French-speaking claimant could be disentitled because of self-imposed restrictions limiting his or her availability to an area in which the only job opportunities in the requested type of employment were for English-speaking or bilingual workers. In such a case, disentitlement would be due to the self-imposed restrictions on availability for work and not to the inability of the individual to speak English. A unilingual English-speaking claimant would, of course, be treated the same in a French-speaking area.

3. If a Canadian migrates to parts of Canada where a different official language of work is used and cannot be placed in employment due to his or her inability to communicate in the other official language, he or she may be referred for language training under the Canada Manpower Training Program. The aim of such training is to enable the individual to obtain work in the occupation of his or her choice or in other suitable employment.

4. Not applicable.

STATISTICS CANADA—RELEASE OF INFORMATION

Question No. 937—Mr. MacKay:

Does Statistics Canada have a policy of providing certain ministries of the Crown, senior public officials, and political advisers, selected statistical information prior to publication and, if so (a) which ministers of the Crown and senior officials receive such statistical data prior to release (b) which series of publications are provided (c) how many hours prior to release is each series provided (d) does the information provided prior to release differ in detail or in format from that which is later published?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada maintains a policy of simultaneous release of official statistics to all data users. However, it is government policy to allow certain exceptions to the simultaneous release rule. The pre-release procedures ensure that the number of pre-release recipients is restricted only to those persons who absolutely require it. Ministers concerned with key statistical series are expected to be prepared to answer questions both in the House of Commons and from the press as soon as the new data are released. In order for a minister to be able to make an immediate response, statistical data are made available to the persons concerned shortly before Statistics Canada release time.

POST OFFICE QUESTIONNAIRES IN EASTERN ONTARIO REGION

Question No. 1,391—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did postmasters or postmistresses in the eastern district Ontario region receive questionnaires asking among other things the number of Francophones living in the community and, if so (a) who authorized the questionnaire (b) what was its purpose (c) was it sent to communities where there are no Francophones?

2. Is the Post Office Department following a policy of creating, as soon as possible, bilingual postmasters and postmistresses and specifically is this being done in areas that are primarily or entirely English-speaking?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): 1. No.

2. Canada Post's policy for creating bilingual positions for postmasters and postmistresses is as follows:

when there is a need to provide supervision to employees in both official languages;

when there is a need to provide a service to members of the public in both official languages.

In areas that are primarily English-speaking, the requirements for bilingual postmasters and postmistresses is based on "significant demand" where these persons are required to serve the public. In areas that are entirely English-speaking, there is generally no requirement for bilingual postmaster and postmistress positions.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, January 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton-Mountain): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I spoke in this debate I outlined some problems which had been expressed to me by a number of people not only in my own constituency but in a number of other constituencies across the country during the course of my travels last year. It is fair to say these concerns about income tax were expressed to me even prior to the last election. People in Canada are vitally concerned about the way in which the government redistributes the income tax it levies. Many people are asking pointed and carefully considered questions about the priorities of the government. They have asked about what role the government will play in the future in the distribution of income tax, other tax, and the management of the economy in order that we can achieve a higher level of productivity, a better distribution of wealth, and a degree of economic stability.

I was asked why it was that in 1950 personal income tax accounted for only 20 per cent of the total revenue of the country but in 1980 that figure had risen to 37 per cent. And why at the same time corporate income tax in 1950 accounted for 22.5 per cent of the total revenue of the country while now it accounted for only 10.3 per cent. I was asked why it was that people were required not only to carry the burden of inadequate management by government, but now they are being asked to carry the burden of inadequate management by the corporate sector. As I said last evening, the largest of the large in the corporate sector have now found a new way of raising money to offset the bad management decisions which they have made over a number of years. It seems as though the corporate sector has found its way into the public trough during this time. It has found a door to the treasury and it is now imposing upon the taxpayers not only the normal burden but also the cost of wrong decisions made by the boards of directors and managers of large and, in many instances, multinational corporations.

There is no doubt in my mind that there is a role for government in setting the direction the economy should take, and in co-ordinating the efforts of both private and public enterprise—I use the word "co-ordinating" advisedly—in order that we can achieve the kinds of goals which Canadians have every right to expect we should be aiming for and some day should reach.

The most often asked question is: how can it be, when a multinational company runs into difficulty, that it is able to come to the government and achieve a key to the treasury, allowing that company to obtain funds raised through personal income tax, without that company making any major commitment to an over-all economic policy and strategy, or a major commitment toward expansion and growth or toward employing Canadians now and in the future? That kind of question is very difficult to answer because the decisions are being made and, in my view, being made wrongly.

If we are going to be asked, as undoubtedly we will be in the next few years, to play a larger role in the risk areas of the funding of major corporations, and if we are going to respond positively to those requests—and I am not suggesting that in all instances we should do that—then hand in hand with those responses must go a concurrent commitment from the companies involved that they will undertake to do everything they can to secure the investment of the public of Canada.

I have always held the view that if we spend taxpayers' dollars then we should be looking at investing them, as other people do, and expecting a return on that investment. Since in many instances the investment is a significant one, we should be considering where we fit in the decision-making process on how the development is to take place and the return we expect to see not only in tax dollars but in community involvement. We cannot continue to burden the taxpayers with ever-increasing income taxes. The low and middle-income earners and workers of this country are already paying as much or more than they can afford. In some instances these people are paying far more than they can afford. Therefore they should not be asked to give the labour they are asked to give in return for the income they get and, in addition to that, to pay tax which ultimately will be channelled through the government to the very corporations which are mismanaged in the first place.

We can see today a number of sectors where we are going to be placed under severe pressure by corporate decision-makers as to whether the government will give further tax concessions, allow a more rapid depletion or depreciation, or change the rules of the game to accommodate the desires if not the needs of these corporations. I am sure that it would not surprise you, Mr. Speaker, to know that one area which concerns me greatly is that of the auto industry and what is going on within the auto industry today.

Although the auto industry representatives will not be appearing before a Senate subcommittee today because it is inauguration day, they will be appearing before that subcommittee tomorrow to place before the United States government proposals for assistance which will, hopefully, in some way rejuvenate an industry in great difficulty. At the same time as that request is being placed before the United States government, the industry will be asked to make firm commitments. These will be commitments from which no deviation can be made without permission.

It concerns me that the same industry representatives will be appearing here some day, but not before a committee of Parliament. They will be appearing in private with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). They will have one of those little fireside chats about how the government can channel further the tax moneys of the public toward assisting those corporations. But in my view when they appear, they should appear first before a committee of this House. I think they should be asked to answer some fundamental questions about the nature of the industry in order that when we are asked to take more from the people of this country by way of income tax, a larger share of their income in order to subsidize this industry, we should have before us the answers to such question as: why is it that there is such a difference between the price of an automobile in Canada and the price of the same automobile in the United States?

Why is it that instead of maximizing volume and reducing unit price they have maximized the unit price and they are, in essence, attempting to recover for themselves far more than is expected to be recovered per unit from the American consumer? This action would put people to work and give the consumers of Canada a break. I think it is vital that those questions be answered before we get around to making concessions, grants, loans, and helping to restructure the economy.

I do not know whether or not you are aware of this, Mr. Speaker, but I thought it would be of interest to you, knowing the interest you have in this matter. The average price in Canada last year of the average automobile purchased by the average Canadian rose dramatically. The average price increase this year in Canada is 36 per cent over last year. That hardly reflects an industry which is doing all it can to try to maximize sales, to encourage consumer demand to go into the marketplace and buy those products, thereby increasing the productivity and the percentage of our manufacturing capacity which is used, and thereby leading to more employment throughout this province. That would result in an increase of consumer purchasing in general.

The increase level is felt by every single major North American consumer. The average car price for American Motors this year over last year is up 34 per cent. The price for Chrysler products this year over last year is up 28 per cent. The price of Ford products this year over last year is up 40 per cent. The price for General Motors products, excluding Cadillac, is up 35 per cent. And those are the prices in Canada.

The difference between the prices of automobiles in Canada and the prices of automobiles in the United States is quite startling. The difference generally accepted by the industry as being necessary—and I am not too sure how they ever came about it—is considerable. The average price in Canada for a North American automobile is $7,061 while the same car sold in the United States goes for $6,187. That is a difference of 14.2 per cent. Those figures are with respect to the sale of the same car. In some cases the prices are considerably higher.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the reason why people are vitally concerned about the government's expenditure program and the weight of taxation which they must carry, is because concurrent with this information goes the information that taxes continue to rise and handouts continue to be made from the government of these selfsame companies in one form or another. We must take a look at why that is. We must know for sure why there is such a differential between two automobiles manufactured by substantially the same work force with the same productivity levels and the same basic capacity to manufacture almost identical vehicles. Why is there such an outrageous difference between the sale price of a vehicle here and the sale price of a vehicle in the U.S.?

I think that is part of the management which people have a right to expect of government. I think it is part of the responsibility of members of this House to be aware of the answers to these questions. Therefore, it is part of the responsibility of government to make available to the members of the House the opportunity to be aware of the reasons for these and other disparities which exist, before the government makes its decisions with regard to handing out taxpayers' dollars for whatever it is that management determines it needs them.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that I despair when I look at the programs brought in by the government. I fail to understand the rationale. Yesterday I attended the press conference held by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). At that press conference they, too, decided it would be appropriate to spend more tax dollars. They decided the income tax level would have to remain at least as high as it is today in order that they would have available to them some $350 million over the next three years to spend on a number of different programs.

I will not quarrel with all of those programs; it would be foolish to do so. Some of the programs are necessary and I understand that. However, I must say that I am not at all sure how they will be made equally accessible across the country. I fail to understand how the decisions with regard to which municipalities are to receive the benefits over and above those which are not, will be made.

It is obvious to me, and I think to anyone who understands economic conditions in this country, that there are more than six municipalities which are detrimentally affected at the moment as a result of recent high unemployment. Yet we are talking about providing assistance to five or six municipalities a year, for three years. One must ask which ones will be cut out? For example, is Brantford to be included? Is Sept-Îles or Sydney? Which communities will receive it? Will the decision be based on a geographic basis? Will it be required that you be a Liberal member to gain access? I would not think so, and I certainly hope not. But one asks those questions since there are no clear criteria from which to make judgments.

When I look at the program I see it is designed in exactly the same way as government programs have been designed for at least as long as I have been following government. With respect to special industry and labour adjustment programs, which are entitled New Industrial Assistance Measures, the first focus will be on firms in the designated community encountering difficulties as a result of a product or market decline or as the result of inefficient or uncompetitive production methods. As I said last night, it seems as if we are rewarding bad management. If someone comes in and says, "I was inefficient, can I get some money?" that is the person who receives it. That hardly seems the way to go about it. But that is the first focus.

The second focus refers to firms in the community which wish to expand existing operations and take advantage of new and expanding market opportunities. That makes some sense except there is one fundamental problem which confronts all of us in Canada at the moment, that is to say, we are only operating at 75, 76 or 77 per cent of our production capacity, depending on which month you talk about. We have a 22 per cent to 25 per cent unused capacity. Surely common sense tells us that we should be striving to find markets for the unused capacity which exists. The primary focus should be to make it more attractive in the domestic market for people to purchase, and assistance should be provided in finding new markets outside Canada. In this way we can properly utilize our productive capacity which sits unused.

The program talks about firms from outside the designated community which wish to enter the community through the acquisition of, or merger with, the firm in the community. That may or may not make sense. The process one would have to go through in order to make that determination would surely be based on profit and loss, and the firm that is interested in merger or acquisition will certainly do that, with or without government assistance. In fact if there is any opportunity to make money in that field they will take it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I know you will be interested to hear what the minister said yesterday. He was asked whether these were grants or loans, and he said they were not grants and not really loans. In fact what the program says is "negotiated repayment provisions would apply to contributions." What it means is that if you succeed it is a loan; if you fail it is a grant. That is really very silly because we have no input as to whether there will be a success or failure, no say in how it will be done, and no part in decision-making other than the granting of the money in the first place.

I want to suggest there has to be much stronger provision for reporting when we are using taxpayers' dollars. That reporting must be done to a board which has an opportunity to review, wherever it appears necessary, the structure, both financial and economic, of the company involved. There has to be an ongoing test of whether the company is living up to its commitments, whether it is in fact employing people as it said it would, and there has to be a way of recovery in the case of default.

I do not want to belabour the point other than to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the concern which is being expressed by people in the country about the level of income tax they pay, about the fact that the government is not managing the tax well, and about the fact that the private sector has now been able to gain access to the taxes paid by individual citizens in a way that heretofore it has never been able to gain access, requires careful consideration by this House. I suggest to you, sir, that the Minister of Finance would do well to spend some time talking about the criteria for expenditure as well as about the criteria for the levying of taxes.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the previous member who raised a number of questions of importance under the general rubric of this bill. I cannot say I agree with all his diagnoses, but he certainly attempted to address some of the questions which are indeed right and proper to be discussed within the broad context of taxation legislation. I wish that I could say the same for a member the other evening who somehow found in the amendments to the tax act that, and I quote him: "The bill will destroy our common languages, destroy our respect for democratic institutions and destroy the underpinnings of democracy itself." That apocalyptic vision of what is intended by a tax amendment bill I certainly do not share. By contrast, I would again simply note the contribution made by the previous member and recognize the serious intent of his remarks.

In any event, my purpose this afternoon is to address those parts of the bill which specifically relate to the petroleum industries. I propose to do so in the order in which those measures are presented in Votes and Proceedings for January 12.

The first three clauses of Bill C-54 which relate to the petroleum industry, 26, 27, and 28, are simply carried over from the budget presented by the previous government last December. Those three clauses were not implemented when that budget and the government itself were defeated. They do, however, reappear in Bill C-54 to give substance to the commitment of the government to alter the deduction on costs incurred in acquiring oil and gas properties from a maximum of 30 per cent to 10 per cent annually, on a declining basis. We hope that the effect of this measure, a goal which we share with the official opposition, will be to slow the bidding up of resource land values and thereby to permit the petroleum industry to put proportionally more of its revenues into the further exploration and development of our resources. I cannot, of course, promise that this desirable result will flow from this present portion of Bill C-54, but this is a goal which we share with the previous government. I trust that it continues to meet with its members' support.

With regard to other clauses of the bill that pertain to energy, I would note 44, 81 and 83 which I shall simply characterize as measures that attempt to close possible tax avoidance opportunities. All of us are, of course, aware of the remarkable imagination of some taxpayers in finding upon occasion loopholes to avoid the payment of taxes. Those three provisions are intended to prevent certain abuses, at least theoretical abuses.

Five other clauses of the bill, 90, 92, 93, 94 and 95, also relate to the petroleum industry in Canada. They are of greater significance than the three I have just mentioned. It is for that reason I want to take a moment to discuss them in some detail. They reflect the commitment on the part of the government to conservation and to substitution, two aspects of the National Energy Program which have not received the attention they so much deserve. Indeed, the success of the program in achieving the goal of self-sufficiency in oil for Canadians by the end of this decade will depend in significant measure on the success of the conservation and substitution commitments which are reflected in these clauses to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. members will recall that two important objectives of our total program, in addition to the supply side of the equation, are to ensure that we do conserve oil and that we do substitute more plentiful forms of energy for our oil resources. In this regard, members may recall that our goal is to reduce oil consumption to 10 per cent of total energy use in the domestic, commercial and industrial sectors by 1990. Two major programs are in place to help give the private sector the opportunity to join in achieving those goals. Those two programs are the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program which is, of course, more commonly known as CHIP.

The first of those two programs, the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, will provide home owners with up to $800 to cover one half the cost of converting from oil to other energy sources, principally natural gas, but also in many areas of Canada electricity, propane, wood, and, perhaps a little later on, solar and other more unconventional forms of energy.

CHIP, on the other hand, is the principal means of providing federal funds to improve the energy efficiency of our homes. Currently households account for 15 per cent of Canada's total energy consumption. The National Energy Program provides for an increase in the total CHIP budget from about $195 million in the past fiscal year to $265 million for the fiscal year 1981-82.

I want to note for the benefit of the House the rapid growth of CHIP. It has not been without its growth problems, but the total success of that program is now evident. Certainly the increase in the number of those applying for the assistance available is reflected in the fact that in the fiscal year 1977-78 only 15,000 grants were made, whereas in the fiscal year 1981-82 there are some 500,000 grants projected at an estimated cost of some $265 million. This is a major increase in the extent and, indeed, the success of CHIP, which is given further substance in the bill before us today.

Hon. members will be aware that the goals of CHIP, that essential conservation program, are to reinsulate at least 70 per cent of the houses in Canada built before September 1, 1977, and, second, to achieve a one third reduction in energy used for space heating in reinsulated residences.

In our view, and I believe in the general view of the House, this program has been a successful one. It has, however, a greater role to play in the future. Is is partly for that reason that the responsibility for the policy and the financial control of CHIP will be transferred on April 1 from the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. In our view this will allow the government to stress the energy conservation aspect of the program over what might otherwise be seen as the more restricted building codes and requirements of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, I should note that the CMHC will continue to issue payments and inspect completed insulation work.

Hon. members may be aware that currently only housing units built before 1961 are eligible for grants under CHIP. It is the intention of the government, however, that eventually all houses built before September, 1977, will be eligible. The fact is, however, that at the present time only a limited proportion of the total potential number of residences which could be insulated have in fact been insulated. The current goal will be to bring up to the necessary standards those houses built prior to 1961.

Clause 90 of the ways and means bill now before the House amends section 12(1) of the Income Tax Act as part of the legislative approval for these two important conservation and substitution programs, CHIP and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. Rather than make these programs available only to low-income Canadians on some sort of selective basis, the government has decided instead to make them available to all Canadians without income testing. This is the most equitable and efficient way to help implement the conservation element which is such a leading feature of the total National Energy Program. However, as the bill states, the grants under these two programs must be included and reported as income for tax purposes.

If we move on to clause 92 of the ways and means bill, we find that the intent is to encourage individuals and companies outside the petroleum industry to invest in oil and gas exploration. With that provision, such an individual or, indeed, a company, is eligible to deduct exploration expenses from tax. As some hon. members will be aware, that provision has been in place since 1976, but the effect of the amendment is to extend this benefit into the future.

With regard to clause 93, I should like to take a moment because it is of real importance to the Canadian petroleum industry. In my view it reflects the flexibility of the government in implementing its energy objectives. Here we have part of the elaboration of the National Energy Program which was tabled in the House on October 28. This amendment results from representations made by the private sector, which has such an important role to play in ensuring the achievement of our energy goals.

We have heard criticism in this House and elsewhere that the National Energy Program places undue importance on the role of government. Certainly, as the chairman of Imperial Oil noted the other day, governments have and will increasingly play a leading part in the energy economy of any country. But in Canada so too will the private sector play a major part in the future energy development of our country. In this amendment we see reflected the representations the private sector has made to the government. We have found that the interests of the private sector can be accommodated within the framework of our general national energy policy.

The National Energy Program had the unforeseen effect of unduly restricting the definition of petroleum exploration expenses. We have now moved to widen that definition—loosen the definition, if you wish—so that the private sector will be eligible to deduct these expenses. For example, any dry well will be eligible for exploration expenses. Hon. members who are interested in this point may wish to refer to pages 78 to 80 of the bill. They will see there an amendment which has been welcomed by the private sector as a means of giving it greater flexibility in joining the government in achieving our common energy goals.

I might note parenthetically that the government is also working toward integrating the 8 per cent petroleum and gas revenue tax with the incentive grants system to make the program as flexible as possible for the petroleum industry. Here again I believe that we have an example of the government's flexibility in moving to meet practical suggestions made by the petroleum industry.

Clause 94 of the ways and means bill is another measure which relates to the encouragement of the active exploration in Canada for new energy supplies. Let me just explain this provision, or note this provision with an example. Let us assume that an entrepreneur invites me to participate in his drilling fund. Let us say that in December I gave him $1,000 for exploration, but the entrepreneur does not employ my money for, let us say, five years. Would I then be eligible to deduct $1,000 as an exploration expense this year? Of course not. The expense should be deducted only in the year in which the activity actually commences. The amendment in clause 94 of the bill ensures that that is the case.

By contrast, clause 95 arises from the petroleum incentives program, which makes a variety of cash incentives or grants available to the petroleum industry for the further development of our Canadian resources and in so doing, puts emphasis, on a greater degree of Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry. Both Canadian and foreign-controlled companies on Canada lands or frontier lands are eligible to receive depletion allowances at the rate of one third of exploration expenses. The same rate also applies to all companies for non-conventional and tertiary oil projects, and to crude oil upgraders. In addition to such measures, Canadian-controlled companies with at least one half Canadian ownership will be eligible for grants covering 15 per cent of exploration costs on provincial lands and one half on Canada lands. Canadian-controlled companies with more than three quarters Canadian ownership will be eligible for grants of 35 per cent on provincial lands and 80 per cent on Canada lands. The development cost grants of 10 per cent and 20 per cent respectively will apply to Canadian companies for expenditures in the non-conventional, tertiary and upgrading products.

Now that the government is moving in a decisive fashion to make incentives available to the petroleum industry, there arises a question of duplication with provincial incentives. Again let me note the intention here by providing an example. Suppose that an oilman drills in Alberta at a cost of $1 million. The provincial government gives him $400,000 for drilling and the federal government gives him $350,000. So the oilman in question spends only $250,000. But, in addition, the oilman can deduct the $1 million against his taxes. Assuming, as it is probably safe to assume, that he is in the 50 per cent income tax bracket, he reduces his over-all tax by $500,000. In essence, provincial and federal governments together have given that oilman $1.25 million for $1 million drilling.

This provision of the ways and means bill now before us avoids such situations by reducing the eligible expense by the amount of any assistance which that oilman receives from another level of government.

The amendments which I have noted today in the sections of the ways and means motion pertaining to the petroleum industry might be described as secondary aspects of our total energy policy, but they do represent a further implementation of the program. Bill C-48, which is now before the national resources committee, deals with exploration and development in Canada lands. The present amendments help to provide incentives, both on the supply side and on the restraint of demand side for all of Canada. Accordingly, these amendments form an important part of our total energy policy.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should simply like to note that the energy policy incorporates a variety of goals, goals of Canadianization, of supply and of conservation. Reflected also in that policy is the proposition that investors should receive a reasonable return on their investment but that profiteering will not be permitted. Also included in that policy, and indeed in the ways and means motion before us, is that ownership rights must be respected but royalty rates should not be excessive.

In tabling the National Energy Program, indeed in legislation which we recently debated in Bill C-48 and in the ways and means motion before us, the government is moving to balance many factors in the total energy equation in Canada. I hope that others during our discussion will wish to discuss some of these points as well. In any event, I hope that by drawing attention to those aspects of the bill which relate to the petroleum industry, the House will have further evidence of the determination of the government to provide incentives to the private sector, both to conserve oil and gas as well as to find additional petroleum for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, several years ago when the Hon. John Turner was minister of national revenue, I recall sitting in this House in Committee of the Whole dealing with the Income Tax Act. A number of members on this side of the House made certain representations to the minister requesting certain amendments to one of the clauses, and the minister agreed that he would bring forth such an amendment the next day. It was a fairly simple amendment, and one would have thought that when it came in it would consist possibly of one paragraph. However, much to our surprise, the next day when the minister presented the amendment, we found that it was some two and one half pages long and it was couched in such language that we wondered if it covered the situation it was intended to cover.

I happened to know the draftsman who drafted that particular clause and I called him and chided him for the lengthy, convoluted, and almost incomprehensible amendment. I suggested to him that it could have been drafted much more simply. The draftsman pointed out to me that because the department made use of computers, drafting of the legislation had to be done in such a manner as to comply with some arithmetical or algebraic formula so that the computer would understand it.

The situation has not changed because today we are dealing with a bill some 200 pages long containing amendments to the Income Tax Act, many of the clauses of which only the computer can understand. Yet we, as Members of Parliament, are called upon to pass judgment on these amendments, and the taxpayers who are affected by them are called upon either to interpret them themselves or else hire lawyers or accountants at considerable expense to interpret what should be a very simple provision.

I suggest to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that possibly the time has come to draft a new Income Tax Act in language not drafted for computers but for the taxpayers of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: The drafting should be done in such a manner that the people of Canada can understand it, in people's language, not in computer language. Not only is the legislation complicated because of computers, but I suggest the use of computers has completely depersonalized our tax system. It is becoming more and more difficult for taxpayers to receive clarification of their assessments.

For example, at one time it was fairly simple, at least in Saskatchewan, for a person who had a problem, or a client with a problem, to pick up the telephone and call the district taxation office in Regina. He could explain the problem and, generally speaking, in a matter of minutes he would have the solution. If the problem was more complicated and could not be handled on the telephone, then he could pick up the telephone and request an appointment with one of the assessors. He could drive down to Regina and the assessors were very happy to see him. They would sit down with the person, pull out the files and go over them. Generally speaking they would arrive at a solution to the problem because the files were in Regina.

There are still offices in Regina and Saskatoon, but the files are in Winnipeg; they have been centralized. One cannot go into Regina and see the assessor, one cannot telephone because he does not have the files. One must write a letter to Winnipeg, and if the assessor in Regina requests it, the file might filter down from Winnipeg two, three, four, five or six weeks later.

The other day I telephoned a lawyer friend and asked him for some comments about the Income Tax Act. He told me that such a simple matter as requesting an income tax clearance certificate in an estate required weeks, and sometimes months. He said that if a letter requesting the clearance was attached to the return and sent off to Winnipeg, apparently the letter requesting the clearance certificate was pulled off the return; the return went up one stream, the letter went up the other stream, and the streams never met. He said that it was a case of sending perhaps two or three follow-up letters before the income tax clearance certificate came through for the estate.

Has the hon. minister ever given any thought to suggesting the appointment of some senior department assessors who have experience in the field to be sent out to discuss the various problems with the lawyers and accountants who, on a daily basis, are dealing with them? It would seem to me that some senior assessors, after consultation, could make some excellent recommendations to speed up the assessment of and dealing with the returns of Canadian taxpayers.

It is not my intention to go into a detailed commentary on this bill, but there are one or two points I should like to discuss. I am pleased to see that the government is repealing sections 74(3), 74(4) and 74(5). In particular section 74(3) was the one which prohibited a taxpayer from paying his or her spouse a wage or salary and deducting same as an expense for income tax purposes, unless, of course, the taxpayer was incorporated, and then it was perfectly legal. Lawyers, accountants and taxpayers could never understand the magic of incorporation—why, because of simple incorporation, one could pay his wife a wage and deduct it as an expense for income tax purposes, whereas, if one did not incorporate, one could not do the same thing. For many years the government and the tax authorities have resisted that change. It was only after pressure from members of the official opposition that such a change came about. I would say it is a change that will be welcomed in all areas of the country, whether it is in the small business field or in the farming community.

However, I was disappointed in noting that the bill gave no relief with respect to capital gains. In the Progressive Conservative government's budget of December, 1979, there was a provision which granted relief to the farming community. It did not go as far as many of us hoped, but it was well received. Unfortunately that budget never became law, but I recall in the campaign for the 1980 election that the Liberal party, in trying to gain votes and popularity in western Canada, called a news conference in Regina, with great fanfare. Some of their big guns were there and they made pronouncements on what they would do if they formed the government. They announced the double tracking of the railway, but of course no one ever thought they were serious about it. They may have been, but the producers and people of western Canada knew it was a foolish idea.

Mr. Mazankowski: It was a lunatic idea coming from a lunatic spokesman.

Mr. Neil: No one took it seriously, but western people took seriously the undertakings of Liberal candidates that if they formed the government they would update valuation day from December 1, 1971, to 1974. There is absolutely nothing in the budget or in this bill to implement that policy. It does not look as if these promised changes will ever be implemented.

Last year when the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) tabled his budget, he also tabled a white paper entitled "A Review of the Taxation of Capital Gains in Canada". It is an interesting document, but after reading it one has the distinct impression that the authors would like to see taxation of 100 per cent of capital gains instead of the present 50 per cent, and possibly a return to estate tax or succession duty tax, both of which were withdrawn when capital gains tax was introduced in 1972. What does the white paper indicate? I should like to look at the conclusions on page 54, and read a few excerpts. Under conclusions, the review starts off by saying:

> Taxation of capital gains is an important element of the income tax system. Capital gains add to a taxpayer's ability to pay.

It goes on to say:

> From various perspectives, the current tax treatment of capital gains is imperfect. Taxation of only half of capital gains, and other tax preferences that lower their effective rate of tax, are counter to the principle of tax equity—

And the review says further on in the conclusions:

> Taxation of gains when realized, rather than when accrued, induces taxpayers to continue holding a particular asset longer than may be economically desirable.

Further along is says:

> A number of imperfections would be removed if Canada taxed all capital gains in full as accrued.

● (1610)

It seems to me in reading that document that it is a move toward 100 per cent taxation of capital gains. Let us examine what has happened since the capital gains tax was imposed in 1972. There has been a rapid increase in government spending. Our budget increased from some $16 billion to over $50 billion. There has been a rapid increase in inflation of anywhere from 8 per cent to 10 per cent per year.

If we set aside gains which are made on the stock market we can see that the value of property generally has increased in step with inflation. Real property, and particularly farm land, has increased by some 300 per cent, 400 per cent, or 500 per cent. But this is an inflationary increase, not an increase in true value. As a result we end up with a tax on inflation rather than a capital gains tax.

I am concerned about the effect of capital gains tax on farm lands and small business. The capital gains tax has a drastic effect on inflating land values far beyond reason, simply because every time a farmer tries to sell a piece of land, the first thing he determines is what his capital gains tax will be, which he then adds to the asking price for the land. If the farmer gets that price for his land, then that price becomes the guiding price for all farm land in the area. When another farmer in the area sells, he asks himself the same question and determines his capital gains based on the sale price of the neighbouring farmland and, in turn, adds that to his asking price. And on it goes as land prices spiral ever upwards.

Of course tax officials and some members of the government will argue that there are roll-over provisions of which the farmer may take advantage. For example, if a farmer sells his holdings to his son or his daughter at the valuation day price, or leaves his holdings by will upon his death, then there is no capital gain. But if the farmer sells his holdings to his son or his daughter at more than the valuation day price, then there is no roll over and he must pay the capital gains tax. The situation works only if the farmer has one son or one daughter.

But if the farmer has more than one child to whom he would like to leave equal shares of his holdings, then there are problems. In most cases he ends up paying the capital gains tax, and in many cases the land is sold outside the family. As a result there are fewer and fewer family farms because of the effect of capital gains tax on farm land. Prior to the capital gains tax family farms were becoming fewer and fewer because of the effect of estate taxes or inheritance taxes or succession duties, or whatever one would like to call it.

I listened with interest on Friday to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) when he spoke in this debate. It seems to me that the hon. member supports the taxation of wealth through capital gain and estate tax. I suggest that he and his socialist friends are rather naive. They do not seem to understand that our country was built on hard work and individual initiative, that Canadians are prepared to take risks to develop business whether it be large or small, a farm, a grocery store, a garage, a mine, or in the manufacturing industry. People took these risks to build a future for themselves and for their families. If hon. members will read page 6295 of Hansard they will find, part way down the page, the condemnation by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood of the government of 1972 for having abandoned the field of taxation of wealth by inheritance tax and estate tax. He then went on to say:

> The point is that we cannot continue with a series of minor income tax proposals which fiddle here and fiddle there without recognizing that we face a major crisis, what I call a "crisis of fairness", in our tax system. I think of the people in my riding who receive their pay packet every two weeks and know exactly from where the taxes come. They see it every two weeks. They do not receive any fancy deductions, because they are employees and receive wages. They have none of the whole range of deductions which are open to those people who are self-employed, those who are able to turn themselves, as if by magic, into a personal corporation or those who are able to use a marvellous invention called the inter-vivos trust in order to split family income.

It seems to me that the hon. member does not realize that it is the self-employed, the small businessman and the large business concerns, which create jobs for his constituents through their sacrifice and initiative. In many cases the proprietors or owners of small businesses, whether they be individually-owned or incorporated, take home less pay than their employees. The employer risks putting more money, tax paid dollars, into his business to enlarge it, to create more jobs, and to build up assets for his family and for his old age. Capital gains tax, estate and inheritance taxes, destroy and stifle the initiative that is necessary in order to expand or enlarge business and to create jobs for many constituents.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) last night and today. He condemned Chrysler and Massey-Ferguson for applying to the government for assistance. I did not hear him or members of his party say, "Let Massey-Ferguson or Chrysler go down the drain. They are the large corporations which we, as socialists, dislike and which we use as whipping boys." It seems to me that his party has been encouraging the government to grant assistance to these corporations in order to protect the jobs of their employees. They cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker; they are either for the corporations or against them. They cannot blow hot and cold at the same time.

An hon. Member: Or suck and blow.

Mr. Neil: I think it is time for members of the New Democratic Party and members of the government side of the House to examine the direction they have taken this country in the last 13 years. In those 13 years we have moved down the road toward socialism. Our productivity is down and we are rapidly losing the incentives necessary to expand our economy and to create the jobs required for our young people. The government has operated on political expediency rather than on a policy of what is good for the country.

The many give-away programs brought in by the government with taxpayers' money, higher and higher taxes and deficits that are bringing our country to the verge of bankruptcy, have taken away individual and community incentives. If the trend continues, I am afraid that instead of being one of the leading countries in the world as we were at the end of the last world war, we will become a Third World country, like those in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is taking such an interest.

I believe that these remarks should give all Canadians some food for thought, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): I would like to say "thank you" to my colleagues in caucus, Mr. Speaker. They are very understanding and perspicacious colleagues.

I am delighted to have the opportunity to follow the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). He made a point about the Income Tax Act with which I have to agree. The wording of the act is pretty difficult.

Mr. Kempling: It is terrible, not difficult.

Mr. Peterson: I am not sure that I would go as far as the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), Mr. Speaker. Just the other day I saw the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) sitting in the hall with a copy of the Income Tax Act which they were reading through. They were chuckling and seemed to be enjoying themselves, reading it like a novel. For most of us it is a very complicated document, one which was drafted in 1972 mainly by accountants for accountants.

This brings a story to mind, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members are probably aware of the provision in the Income Tax Act application rules to the effect that when establishing a capital cost allowance base, the cost, for income tax purposes, will be neither the greater nor the lesser of A, B, or C. It is very difficult to try to figure that out as the wording is so complicated. A friend of mine went to the restaurant one morning just before he was scheduled to make a speech on the bill. When the waitress asked him how many eggs he wanted, he replied that it would be neither the greater nor the lesser of one and three. He certainly made the point about the wording in the Income Tax Act.

An hon. Member: She gave him an omelette.

Mr. Peterson: I suggest that perhaps, as someone said about Mozart's music, the Income Tax Act is not really as bad as it sounds!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: We have to consider the intent.

One of the major problems brought up by the hon. member for Moose Jaw is capital gains. He referred to the study that was made of the Income Tax Act and spoke of the needs of small business and of farmers. I should like to add some concerns that I have such as the problem of the entrepreneur, where we are going to get the tremendous amounts of money that we will require in the future to meet Canada's investment needs, and what would happen if we were to change the income tax system and increase the rate of capital gains tax.

I think one thing that we should look at very seriously is the method of raising the funds necessary to meet our investment requirements for the future. That means that if Canadians who have built up their investment in Canada are prepared to reinvest in Canada, to re-deploy their funds in this country, they should be considered in the roll-over category. In the future, we will have to reconsider how those roll overs for Canadian entrepreneurs can assist Canadians to build the type of infrastructure, the type of economy and the type of country that we will need. That is why I think it is important that the study was published. It is not government policy but it was published in order to evoke thought, to provoke ideas. This is an exercise in which we should all be involved on all sides of the House. No firm position has been taken, and the provisions have not been implemented.

There is a great disparity at the present time between the position of the New Democratic Party and the Tories on what the role of capital gains taxation should be.

Mr. Mayer: I should hope so.

Mr. Peterson: Perhaps that difference will have to be ironed out, but above all else the major consideration must be to meet our investment and reinvestment needs in Canada in the years ahead.

I should like to say a few words about the budget, Mr. Speaker. First of all, it is a very responsible budget in the approach adopted toward fiscal policy which involves a gradual reduction in the deficit. No one likes to see the deficit so high, but in this time of recession to have undertaken more dramatic cuts would have served to stimulate inflation further. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) so eloquently and forcefully put it, inflation is Canada's most gnawing and pressing problem.

In addition, in its approach to monetary policy the Bank of Canada, since 1975, has adopted what I believe to be a very responsible position.

Mr. Wilson: Tell that to Herb Gray.

Mr. Peterson: I have heard members on the other side of the House suggest that we should get away from this approach. Perhaps the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) has some different ideas.

Mr. Wilson: I do.

Mr. Peterson: If he thinks we should expand the money supply at a rate faster than the growth in the economy, I am ashamed of him. I do not think he would have the courage to tell that to his constituents.

Mr. Wilson: Tell it to Herb Gray.

Mr. Peterson: Herb Gray has never advocated that our monetary policy should be other than it has been since 1975.

Mr. Wilson: That is absolute nonsense. You should have been here a year ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is the practice to refer to hon. members either by constituency or, in the case of a cabinet minister, by his ministry.

Mr. Wilson: Absolutely. Let us have a little bit of decorum in here.

Mr. Peterson: Thank you for drawing that to my attention, Mr. Speaker. I shall try to bring it to the attention of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre. I will not call him by the other names that I was thinking of.

Mr. Cullen: All of which should be polite.

Mr. Peterson: Very polite, but more appropriate, I think.

Based on the fiscal policy and this concept of monetary policy, this is a responsible course of action to take at a difficult time in our economic history and the economic history of all the western civilized world. If we are going to control inflation, we will do it by a gradual policy, not by any of these magical quick fixes that we have heard about. As members from the parties surrounding the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre have advocated from time to time since the budget was brought forward, it will not be by introducing a whole raft of new spending policies, even though they would like to see them.

• (1630)

Where we will have the most impact in helping to cure inflation is in the area of increased productivity. The budget was multifaceted. It looked at the problem of our economy from many directions. It was not just a fiscal document, it was a document which dealt with many aspects that impinge upon our economic life. I would like to cite one of them to hon. members, and then speak about it.

Since the budget was introduced, the Minister of Finance has stood up under the most scathing criticism which the opposition from both parties have been able to deliver. He still looks stronger than the day he started. His policies have stood up. They have been unable to come up with any alternatives to counter those fine policies—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He has turned grey.

Mr. Mayer: He is going down the drain. He is doing just fine.

Mr. Peterson: Let me quote what he said in his budget statement—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: If the hon. member over there wants to discuss agriculture, I will be happy to do so afterwards.

Mr. Mayer: It will be a short discussion.

Mr. Peterson: These western farmers have lots of land. The eastern farmers have to farm on a much smaller acreage. Therefore we have to be more economical and more conscious of our costs, and work every inch of our soil. We do not talk in terms of sections, we talk in terms of acres. I hear the hon. member from Burlington making a comment. I invite him to help me do the chores one day. I am sure that he could show me a lot.

An hon. Member: Another easterner putting a westerner down.

Mr. Peterson: I am not putting the hon. member down. I think you are good. I am jealous that we do not have the land that you have, nor the farm income that you have. I look forward to discussing these agricultural policies when we get through with this three-hour speech I am going to deliver on the merits of our budget.

I would like to bring to the attention of hon. members the budget statement by the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen.

Mr. Knowles: He is the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Peterson: The Minister of Finance. I get carried away each time. The Minister of Finance said:

> We intend to reduce the burden imposed on the economy by unnecessary regulation. The work of the Parliamentary Task Force on Regulatory Reform and of the Economic Council of Canada will be of great assistance in this endeavour.

That is why I am talking about the multifaceted aspects of the budget. Regulation has been defined as the means by which the government controls or determines the economic behaviour of the private sector. One of these means is through the Income Tax Act. I want to address some of my remarks to the question of federal regulations.

Our task force consisted of two members from the Tory party, one member from the NDP, and four members from the Liberal party. Incidentally, the idea of the task force was set by the previous government, a precedent which I think was a sound one and one which I hope will be followed in the future. I give them credit for the idea.

Our task force discovered that there are 140 federal statutes and 1,608 provincial statutes which deal with government regulation of the private sector. There are over 10,000 pages of federal regulations alone. Many of them are outdated, unnecessary, and unresponsive to the needs of the private sector and the business community. Many of the regulations came into effect not through parliamentary debate, where hon. members from all sides can bring forth opinions and views of their constituents, but by order in council.

Many regulations never see debate or the light of day until they are published in The Canada Gazette. Many of these regulations come out of the multiplicity of boards and agencies which have the power to regulate and to control our lives. We have two sets of laws, those which govern and regulate us, and those which are debated here in the House. I am sure that many members opposite wish we had more laws coming through here, the way they have been filibustering some of the ones presented so far.

Our task force was faced with a number of horror stories which this multiplicity of regulations has produced respecting the impact they have had in the private sector. Let me cite one example. We found that fire marshalls' regulations said that the boiler room door of a building had to open inwards so that in the case of an explosion it would be contained. On the other hand, the fire marshall said that the door had to open outwards. With such conflicting regulations the poor contractor did not know whether to hang the door opening inwards or opening outwards. In addition, we found that 13 federal departments deal with the area of occupational health. One chemical company wanting to establish itself in Canada had to go through 43 different municipal, provincial and federal regulatory agencies before it could get a licence to operate. There were other examples of multiplicity of regulations. I can think of provincial and federal inspectors going into food processing plants, some inspecting meat and some inspecting vegetables.

In our task force report we have proposed 29 recommendations to deal with many of these problems of regulation which is, like taxation, a means of controlling our economic behaviour. We have adopted a two-phased approach. One is a consultative approach, and the other is accountability.

First, let me talk about consultation. Most of these regulations never see the light of public debate. Because Parliament is already bogged down, instead of debate we have proposed that the public servants who are consulting and regulating the private sector must enter into a consultative process before making regulations. This will involve publishing a public list of people with whom they will consult. It involves an agenda of regulatory measures which will give notice of what is coming up so the public will be informed. We hope this will involve free publication of regulations so that the private sector will have an opportunity to consult with the bureaucrats, with the public servants, and with the ministers before regulations become law. We also hope that from the moment any public servant has an idea about a regulation, that that will go into the regulatory agenda to be published. That way regulations will not become cemented in law or the subject of partisan political advantage when it comes to trying to change them.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw entered into the debate on capital gains. This was a debate stimulated by the government publishing a study. I hope we will have more green papers and study papers and that members opposite will take them seriously and enter into debate about them.

Another aspect we feel will have an impact on slowing down the rate by which regulations are made—someone has referred to it as regulatory birth control—is the requirement of an impact assessment. Regulators will have to justify why they are regulating. The tendency whenever anyone has a problem today is to say, "Let the government fix it." We do not think this philosophy is always the best and will be applicable in every circumstance. Very often people should fix things themselves. The private sector should be concerned with fixing up a mess. This is why we want this impact assessment, to outline the problem and the possible solutions, to indicate who has been consulted, and also to show the costs and benefits to make sure that the costs of the regulations will not outweigh the benefits.

One of our approaches here is flexibility. We believe each department has different requirements. These different requirements are as a result of different constituents and the different public with which each will consult, being business, big or small, industry, labour, environmentalists, naturalists, consumers or whatever. Their requirements will be different. Therefore, within the guidelines which we have laid down, we believe each department and agency should create its own rules to meet the needs of its own particular constituents.

We are delighted with the report published by the Atomic Energy Control Board over a week ago. The AECB issued an invitation to all the people with whom it deals, to come forward and discuss with it the processes by which it will be governed. I would like to say that in the past this has been the practice of the Department of Finance to consult in many areas with its affected community. It has developed a good reputation, among accountants and tax lawyers, of consulting before it introduces certain measures in order to find out whether these will work or what is the best way to deal with a particular problem. I know they are doing that right now in terms of some loopholes which have been raised and discusssed in our finance committee.

The second point of this report again affects our economic performance in a fundamental way. One way I mentioned is through accountability. Our regulators, public servants and ministers who are regulating, our agencies which are regulating, should be held accountable to Parliament. This was determined unanimously by our task force. After all, we, as Members of parliament, are the ones who have to be accountable to our constituents for what goes on. We must answer to them. This is why I think the accountability aspect will be of great interest to all members in the House.

Since Parliament is at a bottleneck under its present rules of procedure, we have made certain recommendations. For example, some people who want changes in their statutes say they have been waiting for years to get them on the Order Paper. But we have not been able to deal with them, we have not had the time. So, we will not bring every regulation before Parliament. Over the long term, what we have suggested is that the standing committees should fulfil this function. The standing committees are experienced with respect to certain subject matters. The hon. member for Portage-Marquette has been discussing this with me. He sits on the agriculture committee and he would be the one who would more appropriately be seized with the responsibility of determining what regulations are best in the area of agriculture. He should be the one to determine which areas are the most worth while and which ones should be eliminated. Over the long run the standing committee should have that responsibility.

What are the barriers to the standing committees being seized with that type of problem at this moment? In our experience the present committees are too large. They number 20 to 30 members and, as a result, a committee does not function as a cohesive whole. Discussion in a committee is often highly partisan, and this is aided by the approach that what is before it is only things that the government asks it to consider, such as bills after second reading. We do not think that even the standing committees at this stage are adequately equipped to deal with this, until serious reforms are undertaken.

Our solution is an interim committee called "A Special Committee on Regulatory Reform," which would last for only two years and would be subject to a sunset provision whereby it would disband sooner if long-term parliamentary reforms are entered into. This special committee would consist of ten members. There would be a serious limitation on substitution of members. Staff would be hired. The committee would have the power to oversee the whole process of regulatory reform and to hold public servants accountable to ensure we are cleaning up this mess of existing statutes and regulations.

We also suggest this special select committee of no more than ten members could also fulfil a second role, apart from being the force and conscience of regulatory reform. It could also serve as a model for longer-term parliamentary reform. As parliamentarians we would have a free look at how this one type of small committee with staff and dedicated members works. It might serve as a precedent for overhauling all our committees so that members could have a more effective committee system.

I think implementation of these recommendations will have a major economic impact. They would help increase the spirit of co-operation between the public and private sectors through this process of consultation. We would end up with better and more cost-effective regulations. There would be a reduced burden of regulation on the private sector. It could serve as a model of parliamentary reform.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the experience of working together with members of the opposition on a small task force was one which was of great benefit to me personally. It was an experience I enjoyed. We had wonderful co-operation. We had very fine people working with us. I want to thank them, too, for the effort and the co-operation which they put into this report.

I think it is this type of approach, Mr. Speaker, which was embodied in the budget and is being carried through at this time by the minister and the government which will aid and assist in getting our economy moving through increased productivity, which is driven mainly by the private sector.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the very well reasoned arguments of the last speaker. I have listened as he stated with righteous indignation how he would change the whole approach to government by the party of which he is a member. He tells us how they would govern by regulation and order in council. He says there are 10,000 pages of regulations which must be changed. He says we are being strangled by regulation and that we must have changes in the rules.

The member should know that for years members on this side of the House have been making the same arguments but they have not got past first base with the government. The government has ignored them. I certainly hope that the committee, which I believe he was the chairman of, will have a greater degree of success. All of the problems he has been talking about are as a result of the Liberal approach to government, which is to keep things out of Parliament because they do not want to make Parliament too strong. They say, "Let us not change the rules because, if we change the rules, we might have to answer for some of the things we do." I suggest to the hon. member that rather than haranguing the House he should take those arguments into caucus and lay them on the table, taking the members of the government to task with those same questions. That is where we must get the action from. He will have no problems from this side of the House. We are on the record, we want to do the things he wants to do. But the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other members of the government will fight him, and fight him hard.

I am very pleased to be able to participate in the debate on Bill C-54. I will be dividing my remarks between some general comments with respect to financial matters relating to the ways and means motion and, second, commenting on some of the aspects of tax policy as they are affecting the National Energy Program, and through that program, the future outlook of supply and Canadian ownership of our oil and gas industry.

The first comment I would like to make is in relation to the direction which the government appears to be going in this budget in the area of savings and investment. There is a direction here which concerns me greatly because it appears the government is moving toward discouraging savings and the accumulation of investment capital.

I asked myself right after the budget was brought down, why it was so slim and why it was primarily energy policy. I asked why the normal budgetary elements were so very, very slim. The answer, or the conclusion, I came to was that we have only heard the first shoe; I think the other shoe is yet to fall. The initial direction which appears in this budget is that we are moving away from the directions which have been taken by the government in previous Parliaments and from the direction taken by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in his budget.

There are two things which have been removed from the December, 1979, budget, the first being the allowance to a farmer to transfer $100,000 of capital gain from the sale of a farm into a Registered Retirement Savings Plan, and the second is the provision for a Canadian common stock investment plan. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, that was to allow for contributions initially of $20,000 and subsequently $10,000, up to a maximum of $100,000 into an investment plan, and within that investment plan the income would be taxable but the capital gains tax would be deferred until the investment plan had been wound up. It allowed for the accumulation of capital and, therefore, the contribution of that capital toward the creation of jobs in this country.

The significance to me of the removal of these is that we are seeing a discouragement now of the accumulation of savings. There is no statement of intent, no statement as to why the government has chosen to exclude these from the ways and means motion. I ask myself whether this indicates a shift by the government away from encouraging savings, and I ask myself whether we have stopped there or whether we are going to carry on further into such areas as registered retirement savings plans, registered home ownership savings plans and the tax deductions of $1,000 of interest and $1,000 of dividend income.

In recent years the Canadian personal savings rate as a per cent of disposable income has been increasing, and increasing quite significantly relative to that in the United States. The figures are of the order of 5 per cent now for the United States as against about 10 per cent to 12 per cent here in Canada. In the 1960s and early 1970s it is my recollection that we were in about the same position, or possibly a little on the lower side, but because of the policies we introduced—policies which I believe encouraged saving—we improved our position. That helped in the creation of investment capital and, therefore, in the building of factories, plants and equipment. That is what creates jobs in this country and that is why it is important that we maintain these savings rates at the levels at which they have been.

If we look over the past two or three years we find that one of the primary areas of strength in our economy has been the area of private capital formation which created jobs. That was one area in which we did better than the United States. I would hope we would be able to continue to do better in the future.

The overwhelming significance of this is that in the 1980s there will be a tremendous demand for the large creation of investment capital in the areas of energy. The figure of $200 billion is widely used as the amount of investment capital needed for this country to achieve energy self-sufficiency by 1990. Other areas of energy investment amount to somewhere in the order of $100 billion to $150 billion involving such things as electrical and nuclear energy, pipelines, and this sort of thing. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association is calling for a capital need over the next ten years of about $150 billion. Those figures total somewhere around $450 billion to $500 billion, a very large amount of money particularly when you put it in contrast with the size of our economy today which is roughly of the order of $350 billion.

It is very important that we have these savings incentives in place if we are to be able to create jobs, achieve self-sufficiency in energy, create a proper research and development environment, and also solve the very tough problem we have with our manufacturing balance of trade, which I remind you is a deficit in the order of $17 billion to $18 billion. What that means is the exportation of jobs from this country to other countries of the world.

As I said, I am unsure why these two provisions were removed from the ways and means motion. Whether this is a harbinger of things to come I do not know, but I am very concerned about the impact this may have on savings and investment in this country. We in this House must look very closely at what is going to happen in the next budget. Canada needs the high savings rate we have had over the past few years. I urge the government, if it is thinking of moving in this direction, to have a second thought, because this is going to be very important to the vitality of our economy in the 1980s.

The next point I should like to consider is the matter of the Small Business Development Bond. This was first introduced, again by my colleague, in the December, 1979, budget. It was very well received by the small business community which was suffering greatly from the high interest rates in place at that time.

It was next introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his April mini-budget, if that is what we can call it, and now it has been extended, in the course of this recent budget, by a full three months, to the end of March, 1981. Why has the government not acted to expedite this program which has been so well received? During the same period not only have we seen a continuation of the high interest rates, we are experiencing interest rates even higher. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) said he was going to resign if the earlier high interest rates were retained, yet the rates are even higher now. We are seeing more bankruptcies and more difficulties on the part of small businessmen in competing with large companies in the marketplace.

The small business community is the backbone of our economy. It creates about 60 per cent of the jobs created in Canada every year and accounts for approximately the same amount in total employment in the economy. The small business community is the future of this country and it is the means by which we can gain back a greater degree of control, particularly of the manufacturing community in Canada. It is the sector of the economy where new big companies of the future will start. You remember that old adage that every oak starts from a small acorn. The small business community is where those acorns are nurtured. At this time the policies of this government are stifling the growth of those acorns. The small business community is being crucified by the high interest rates policies of this government.

The minister has blamed high interest rates on the federal reserve. I can hardly believe that, because about a week ago I asked the minister why the Bank of Canada sold $1 billion worth of securities to keep interest rates up when it clearly had the option of lowering interest rates. The Canadian dollar has gone up about 1.5 cents and American interest rates are down from their peaks. The option to lower interest rates was clearly there. The answer I got from the minister was that we are keeping interest rates up so they will go down. That answer causes one to scratch his head. It is difficult to understand when you hear that sort of gobbledygook or, if I can recall a word used by the former member for Hamilton West, "baf-flegab". Tell that to small businessmen who are fighting to stay in business in the face of high interest rates. They hear the Minister of Finance say that we have to keep rates up so that they will come down sooner.

NOVA SCOTIA BOUNDARY AND SUBMARINE LANDS ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND PROVINCIAL BOUNDARIES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West) moved that Bill C-226, respecting minerals and hydrocarbons in submarine lands adjoining the province of Nova Scotia, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works Bill C-226, which would enact the Nova Scotia Boundary and Submarine Lands Act which I had the honour to introduce in this House.

First let me say very quickly that the basic purpose of this bill is to resolve the dispute between the province of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada concerning ownership of offshore resources like oil, gas and coal. These would also include all hydrocarbons and minerals which fall within the normal description.

How would the bill resolve this dispute? It would do so by extending the boundaries of Nova Scotia seaward from the existing coastal land mass. In the result the submarine area of the Atlantic Ocean encompassing the continental shelf, or 200 nautical miles seaward, would become part of the province of Nova Scotia.

Let me review very briefly the historical facts which give rise to the federal-provincial dispute concerning offshore resources on the Atlantic coast which are pertinent to Nova Scotia's case for ownership of those resources. King James I granted a Royal Charter to Sir William Alexander in 1621. That Royal Charter included a band of sea extending seaward for 120 miles, including Sable Island. There were subsequent treaties involving England and France which confirmed the ownership of coastal territory by Nova Scotia, over the centuries. And those treaties and agreements continued up until the time of confederation in 1867. In 1867, of course, the British North America Act confirmed, in section 7, that Nova Scotia had the same limits at confederation as before. The BNA Act also gave the provinces all land, mines and minerals which belonged to them by virtue of section 109.

It also transferred Sable Island to the Government of Canada, thus confirming and indicating that Sable Island was indeed part of the province of Nova Scotia prior to 1867. The result is that Nova Scotia claims its submarine lands and resources, and it has passed legislation to enforce those rights of ownership. In particular, Nova Scotia has passed legislation respecting coal mines and, more recently, in 1958, it passed legislation respecting the harvesting of sea plants.

Submarine Minerals and Hydrocarbons

In 1980, the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia passed the Petroleum Resources Act, which defined "Nova Scotia lands" for the purposes of that legislation. Very briefly, section 7 said that the act applied to "Nova Scotia lands", and those lands included Sable Island and the seabed and subsoil off the shores of the land mass of Nova Scotia. In addition, the Petroleum Resources Act purported to apply to the seabed and subsoil of the continental shelf and slope and the seabed and subsoil seaward from the continental shelf and slope to the limit of exploitability. So Nova Scotia very clearly, by its legislation enacted in 1980, claimed the submarine lands and the minerals, including oil and gas and coal, which might be contained in those submarine lands.

At the same time we can contrast that legislative claim of Nova Scotia with the claim made by the Government of Canada in Bill C-48 which is now before the House of Commons and which is entitled the "Canada Oil and Gas Act". The Canada oil and gas act does just the opposite. It claims to apply to "Canada lands" and defines those lands in similar terms. In the result the Government of Canada, if the Canada oil and gas act is enacted, will lay claim to ownership and exercise jurisdiction over that area of the submarine lands adjoining Nova Scotia, extending seaward for 200 nautical miles and including the continental shelf. So the problem is evidenced by the passage of those two pieces of legislation: in Nova Scotia, the Petroleum Resources Act and, in the Parliament of Canada, the Canada oil and gas act.

The dispute with respect to ownership of offshore lands and resources must be resolved. Why must it be resolved? It must be resolved because we hear reports daily that it is delaying and hindering the development and exploitation of our natural resources off the coast of Nova Scotia and off the coast of Newfoundland.

Reports have indicated that executive officers of the Mobil Oil Company, which heads the syndicate exploring off the coast of Nova Scotia and off the coast of Newfoundland, have said time and time again that the continuance of this dispute and the failure to resolve the dispute concerning jurisdiction over offshore resources will delay and hinder future development and exploitation of those very resources.

How can this dispute be resolved? Of course, always by negotiation and agreement between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces affected by this dispute. However, for years such negotiation has failed to resolve the matters in issue.

On October 28, 1980, the National Energy Program was introduced in this House. The documents comprising that National Energy Program refer to this dispute. Briefly stated, the dispute was sought to be resolved by the Government of Canada giving to the provinces which have coastal lands 75 per cent of the wealth which would result from the development of those lands and resources. That was not acceptable to the provinces involved, and similar attempts to negotiate other arrangements have failed. What can we do to resolve the dispute? There is one other method, and that is to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada.

However, I think parliamentarians, and all Canadians, would agree that this is a very poor way to resolve an intergovernmental dispute. I believe the dispute is constitutional in nature because it arises from provisions in the British North America Act and from the arrangements which were made between the provinces which originally formed the confederation which became the Canada we know today. Because of that I think it should be resolved outside the courts. If it cannot be resolved by negotiation between governments, it ought to be resolved by the Parliament of Canada to the extent that the Parliament of Canada has the necessary jurisdiction and capability to resolve the dispute.

We know that all the provinces of Canada, as a result of meetings between them and at the first ministers conferences, have agreed to provincial ownership of offshore resources. With that in mind, we know that if the Parliament of Canada acts in this area, unlike the constitutional decisions that have been taken by the government, we will act with the consent and concurrence of the provinces of Canada.

Under section 3 of the British North America Act of 1871, the Parliament of Canada clearly has the authority to extend the boundary of a province. This is what Bill C-226 proposes. It will extend the boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia pursuant to the authority granted by that section. Of course, the result of extending the boundaries in this manner will be that the resources contained in those submarine lands will then vest in the province of Nova Scotia. This technique is similar to that used in relation to the extension of boundaries of other provinces, including the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. A better example, however, is the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba in 1912 by the Manitoba Boundaries Act which was enacted by the Parliament of Canada.

The bill which I am proposing in the House today for second reading follows the precedent of the Manitoba Boundaries Act. As I have said, it extends the boundaries of Nova Scotia, it defines the area involved in the extension, and it provides for the specific location of those boundaries by the executive authority. At the same time it preserves existing rights in submarine lands and, as required under the British North America Act, it provides for the consent of the province of Nova Scotia to the extension.

I have said that the dispute between the province of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada with respect to offshore ownership must be resolved. I have said that it is slowing and hindering the pace of exploration of the resources off the coast of Nova Scotia, and certainly it is slowing the pace of the investigation and of the exploration off the coast of Newfoundland because officers of Mobil Oil have said so time and time again. But more important, the exploration of our offshore resources in Nova Scotia has a tremendous effect on the resolution of our energy problems in the province. As has been pointed out to the House time and time again, Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces are at the whim of the foreign powers which supply oil through the OPEC agreement.

In Nova Scotia we pay the world price for oil, and this has a disastrous effect on the cost of electricity generated through the use of oil-fired thermal units. So we have to move to resolve these problems. We are doing so in the province of Nova Scotia in a number of ways. First and foremost is the conversion of oil-fired thermal units to coal and the development of the coal mines and resources which accompany that change. Second, we have instituted pilot projects to develop tidal power on the Annapolis River, and we hope that some day we will be able to develop tidal power in the Bay of Fundy. In addition, we seek the extension of the natural gas pipeline from Quebec to the Atlantic coast and to Nova Scotia. The fourth possibility is the use of natural gas delivered to the province of Nova Scotia by some other method. However, our long-range plan and our hope for the future is in the exploration and development of offshore resources.

I believe that Nova Scotia's energy future is dependent on the development of offshore resources, just as much as it is dependent on the delivery of natural gas to Nova Scotia, on the development of tidal power, or indeed on coal conversion. So I think that the failure of the Government of Canada to act to resolve this dispute is having an adverse effect on Nova Scotians and on all Canadians, because under our petroleum subsidization program all Canadians are called upon to support the price of oil delivered to the east coast of Canada and utilized in the maritime provinces and in Quebec.

The extent of this subsidy at the present is $3 billion a year. As you know, the actual subsidy program involves the Government of Canada paying the difference between the world price or the OPEC price for oil and the price for Canadian oil which prevails at the time of the delivery. As I have said, this subsidy program is costing millions and millions of dollars a day and is a drain on the resources of Canada, so it is in the interests of all Canadians to resolve these problems. One way to resolve them is to settle the offshore resources dispute so that the companies and the private sector involved and interested in offshore exploration can get on with their work and produce the results we all seek.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and members of the House for their indulgence. Let me point out again that while Bill C-226, which enacts the Nova Scotia Boundary and Submarine Lands Act, appears to be a local matter, it is indeed a matter of national significance because I believe it would resolve the federal-provincial dispute with respect to offshore resource ownership which will enable the quick development of our offshore resources, thus resolving in part the energy problem in Nova Scotia.

I know that other colleagues of mine on this side of the House, particularly the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), will want to make a contribution to the debate on Bill C-226, and I will yield the floor in the hope that members will see fit to give this bill second reading.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-226 is clearly to extend the boundaries of Nova Scotia to the greater distance of the continental margin. I shall want to address that point in a moment. Before doing so, however, I want to say how many points the hon. member opposite made with which we on this side of the House agree. While I do not intend to support his bill, for reasons which I believe will become evident, I do want to say that we agree with him that the differences between the government of Nova Scotia, and indeed of Newfoundland, and the national government should be resolved by negotiation. Failing that, there is the route of reference to the Supreme Court, but it continues to be our view that, if possible, this disagreement should be resolved, as the hon. member has suggested, by negotiation.

I also agreed with the hon. member when he outlined some of the energy projects that can be taken to benefit the people of the maritime region, from where my ancestors came. I have in mind particularly his comments about the extension of the Q & M pipeline, a policy which the government fully supports and which is an important aspect of the National Energy Program.

As stated in that program, the government believes that the ownership of the territorial seas is vested with the federal government, as are the rights and responsibilities conferred under international law out to the 200-mile limit. It is the right of the national government to dispose of or exploit the natural resources situated in those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada. Indeed, the Supreme Court confirmed this when it judged that beyond the lower water marks and outside the inland waters, the Government of Canada owns the area, has a right to exploit and explore it and has legislative jurisdiction over it.

However, the government, although committed to the proposition that large revenues generated from the exploitation of natural resources must benefit all Canadians, also recognizes that substantial benefits should go to the provinces. In that connection, I recall the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the last election campaign at Memorial University in Newfoundland, when he made a clear commitment on the part of the national government to ensure that the people of the coastal provinces and in the maritime region received the full benefit of the potential riches which should flow from the development of offshore resources.

The National Energy Program indicated that the government is anxious to resolve the ownership issue, if necessary, through the Supreme Court for many of the same reasons which the member opposite mentioned. It read:

—uncertainty about the legal control over such vital areas is not conducive to the rapid development of the oil and gas potential of this promising region.

It might be useful to look for a moment at the efforts made in recent years to correct this situation. As early as 1976 the government indicated its willingness to proceed with a joint reference by both the provincial government and itself to the Supreme Court to have the matter settled. The government has been awaiting the approval of Newfoundland in such a reference. In the case of Nova Scotia, its provincial government has consistently indicated that it did not wish to address this issue in the Supreme Court but, as the hon. member opposite indicated, would rather reach an agreement through discussion and negotiation.

Ownership is not the only issue, and in the particular case of Nova Scotia it appears not to be the key issue. The government of Nova Scotia puts more emphasis on the following issues: first, the management and administration of offshore resources; that is, the rights to issue licences, leases, permits and so forth; second, the control of the pace of development of offshore resources; third, the possibility to determine the conditions under which goods and services are supplied to the industry in order to obtain a share of these business activities; fourth, the ability to provide preference in hiring for Canadians living in Nova Scotia. I must say that this last point would give me some difficulty. Those issues have formed the heart of negotiations over the past several years. However, the government of Nova Scotia clearly indicated in the past its confidence in having the matter resolved through negotiations with the federal government.

I should like to refer to the memorandum of understanding of 1977 between the federal government and the maritime provinces in which Ottawa proposed a provincial 75 per cent and a federal 25 per cent split of offshore resources revenue. The government was prepared to bear all costs of administering these areas. The 1977 proposal was rejected only by the government of Newfoundland. However, in 1980 the government of Nova Scotia terminated its earlier agreement of 1977 and claimed offshore ownership. On that basis, it introduced the legislation which the hon. member opposite mentioned—the petroleum resources act, the pipeline act, the gas utilities act and the energy and mineral resources conservation act.

In September, 1980, the question of natural resources and offshore resources ownership was on the agenda of the first ministers' conference on the constitution. Several options were reviewed at that time. While Nova Scotia reiterated its claim, interest was expressed in examining administrative mechanisms to resolve the issue. I should like to quote from page 43 of "The National Energy Program" where it refers to the efforts in September to reach agreement. It reads as follows:

Seeking a speedy and fair resolution to this issue, the Government of Canada offered to:

Provide 100 per cent of provincial-type resource revenues to the adjacent province, subject to arrangements whereby, when the province reached an agreed level of wealth, these revenues would be shared with other Canadians.

Give the provinces a substantial voice in matters of direct concern to them, including in particular the need to minimize social, environmental and economic disruption in the region.

Unfortunately, the offshore resource issue was not resolved.

Following the September discussions which I just mentioned, the Premier of Nova Scotia made a distinction between his position and that of Newfoundland. I refer hon. members interested in this subject to the October 31 edition the Chronicle-Herald of Halifax which indicated that the premier, while still wanting 100 per cent of the benefits from offshore oil and gas to go to the province, thought the ownership question "can be put aside". Given the premier's viewpoint of a few months ago that ownership can be put aside and his concurrent view that a federal presence is essential, the bill presented this afternoon appears inappropriate and unwarranted at this time.

The bill does not address many issues which the government of Nova Scotia has brought forward on many occasions. Furthermore, it challenges the federal jurisdiction of the Canada lands offshore Nova Scotia. It does not offer anything of a constructive character to enable us to get on with the essential development of offshore resources so as to benefit the people of the region and indeed all the people of Canada. It would merely render a complicated situation somewhat more difficult of resolution.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by congratulating the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) for his foresight and loyalty as a Nova Scotian in bringing forward this piece of legislation to espouse a very just cause and to establish an important principle.

I think it would be useful to remind the House, as did the editorial which appeared in the Chronicle-Herald of Halifax some months ago, of some of the historic bases for the claims of the maritime provinces for greater equity in participating in the submarine resources adjacent to these provinces. I listened to the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) who, I think, said at one point that this did not espouse a very constructive course of action and intimated that we had not made a particularly great contribution. I do not want to misquote him, but I want to emphasize that we in the Atlantic region, particularly those of us in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, have some very valid historic claims to our undersea resources.

Also the parliamentary secretary referred to the 200-mile limit. I think it is true—and my opinion is shared by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) who is a most knowledgeable Member of Parliament on questions of energy and offshore resources—that the international law which is still relevant dates back to a 1958 law of the sea conference whereby Canada sponsored a resolution indicating that littoral states had sovereignty over their offshore lands on their submarine shelves, slopes, coastal flats, and so on.

As far as that goes, they had unlimited sovereignty until they were met by the claims of the other littoral states, even if they were many hundreds of miles away. I believe enough states ratified this convention so that it is still international law. Despite pressures which have not yet culminated in changing the international law, that is still the case.

With regard to our contribution to confederation, I would like to quote again from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald editorial. It might be constructive to acquaint the House with just what happened with respect to the Atlantic provinces as opposed to what was done for many other Canadian provinces. The article reads in part:

> Prior to the creation of Saskatchewan and Alberta as provinces in 1905, and the enlargement of Manitoba, Quebec and Ontario a few years later, the lands that Ottawa gave those provinces were mutually owned by all Canadians, including the three maritime partners in Canada—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.
> Not only were the maritimes required to relinquish rights to lands and resources in which they had previously held shared entitlement, they were not considered, consulted or compensated. Geographically disadvantaged, in that they are not butted by northern lands, they remained small in area, receiving no additional territory.

It is interesting to look at the respective geographical areas of our provinces. Prince Edward Island has only 2,000 square miles, Nova Scotia 21,000 square miles, and New Brunswick 28,000 square miles; as compared to the other provinces in Canada such as Quebec which has 595,000 square miles, Ontario 412,000 square miles, Manitoba 251,000 square miles, Saskatchewan 252,000 square miles and Alberta 255,000 square miles. The latter group of provinces was created out of lands which were the joint property of the maritime people and the maritime provinces.

As to making contributions, I am reminded of a story. A pig and a chicken, while sauntering down the street saw an advertisement in the local restaurant which said "Bacon and eggs, 69 cents!" The chicken said to the pig, "Isn't it wonderful, the economic contribution we are making?" The pig said, "To you it may be a contribution, but to us it is a total commitment." The maritime provinces have made a very great commitment, not only by coming into confederation under terms which disturbed our previous prosperous state when we were world traders and a major maritime power, but under terms which grafted us on to the then troubled colonies of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, and we have been disadvantaged ever since.

The approach espoused by the hon. member for Halifax West gives the Government of Canada an opportunity to do what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and his government of that day attempted to do, to give every region in Canada rough equity so that they can realize and be endowed with resources which will help them to grow and strengthen the total economic face of our nation, as opposed to the approach, as the hon. member for Halifax West has pointed out, in Bill C-48. His bill C-226 provides for a positive approach to strengthen our country by making available to areas of Canada that have been disadvantaged in the past, out of resources that are available, additional territory to bring their areas into a more equitable balance with some of the other provinces which had their territories increased some years ago.

There is no difficulty for such a move in so far as the precedents are concerned. The hon. member for Halifax West cited the British North America Act. One neat and tidy technique would be to follow the precedents in our constitutional history, some of which are the Canada and Ontario Boundary Act of 1889, the Ontario Boundaries Extension Act of 1912, the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act of 1912 and the Manitoba Extension Act. There is also the Alberta Act of 1905, the Saskatchewan Act of 1905, the Alberta Natural Resources Act of 1930 and the Saskatchewan Resources Act of 1930. Surely there is no lack of constitutional historic precedent for taking that move.

It is interesting to highlight and contrast the approach as epitomized by my colleague and that of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). On the one hand the government under Bill C-48 is taking hydrocarbon resources away from not only the territories, which is bad enough, but prematurely, before court action, from some of the senior provinces in confederation. It is not merely the simple act of taking these resources away which bothers me, but the attitude which can be found in the proposed Canada lands act.

There is a tremendous amount of discretion of a totalitarian nature in this bill. I will cite only one section of the proposed Canada lands act which bothers me in this respect, and it is with regard to the assessment of royalties. Clause 43(9) reads:

> Proceedings in an appeal to the Federal Court of Canada under subsection (5) shall be held in camera on request made to the court by a party to the appeal.

Subsection (5) deals with royalty disputes. As a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, I sense that this must trouble you as well. This particular piece of legislation also talks about privilege. But to come back to the attitude and posture of this government, why in the world would a party to an appeal to our Federal Court in this country be directed—and there is no choice, the court is told—to hold proceedings in camera. Is this piece of legislation equivalent to the Official Secrets Act? Are we getting back to the same kind of infamous section which we see in the Federal Court Act, section 41(2)? This is the kind of attitude which troubles me, apart from the idea of taking away from the residents of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon valuable natural resources which is bound to impede their progress toward provincial status.

It is worse for the people in my own province and the Atlantic region to see our historic grants which were given to us, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax West, by James I hundreds of years ago being totally ignored, as this government is ignoring the territorial claims of Newfoundland which were laid out when that province joined confederation. Then the government draws boundaries around our offshore lands and directs, thanks to this unparalleled ministerial discretion, any oil company, great or small, multinational or Canadian, as to where they shall drill, when production shall start, where the oil shall be stored, where it will be transported, where it will be refined, when it will be sold and what they will receive for it. Is that the kind of development which will help exploration take place in our offshore areas in Atlantic Canada and our territorial lands? I do not think so.

I do not believe that Bill C-48 can stand as it is presently drafted. I do not believe that any self-respecting company, whether it be in the petroleum industry or any other industry, would willingly work under such strictures. I see this Bill C-48, as opposed to the kinds of approaches espoused by the hon. member for Halifax West, as wrecking the chance for this country to develop the trillions of dollars needed to get us out of the unholy financial mess in which we find ourselves. I see it wrecking our chances for energy self-sufficiency, and I see it as being directly opposed to the traditional tenets of helping regions, helping people develop and giving them the resources to work with themselves.

After all, what the hon. member is asking for and our province follows the same philosophical approach that was once available to individuals, and still may be available in certain parts of this country, when lands were granted to people on the understanding that they would improve them, develop them and pay taxes on them for the greater good of the country. Surely, this kind of approach is preferable to this arbitrary, totalitarian grab for resources which is implicit in Bill C-48. I know, as the parliamentary secretary has said, that there are many problems inherent in a statute such as Bill C-48. There are bound to be some very tough negotiations as to what would be encompassed in these increased territorial grants to the provinces and the Atlantic region, but that can be worked out. It is not a great problem.

The attitude of this government is a problem, Mr. Speaker. This has been highlighted by putting the government on the spot by means of Bill C-226, and by pointing out that there is a just and equitable way to increase the economic potential and to redress past wrongs against the Atlantic provinces.

I commend this bill to the House of Commons. I hope my colleagues will give it sympathetic consideration; not talk it out, but let it go to the committee to see if it may not be the means of developing a different approach to offshore mineral and hydrocarbon development in the Atlantic region.

You probably know, Mr. Speaker, that at this very moment coal is being mined several miles off the coast of Cape Breton Island. This is not a very large precedent, but it illustrates there is no reason why a territorial grant of a substantial amount could not be made to benefit the Atlantic region. It would not affect navigation, fisheries or the rights of other maritime nations but it would greatly strengthen Canada's position in the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in the debate this afternoon and to support the substance of the bill before us. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) who proposed the motion. I believe it identifies the very real problem that affects confederation and proposes a solution which is quite commendable.

In 1867 when Canada was formed, our land area was only a fraction of what it is today. British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland were not part of the dominion. The northwest, stretching from Lake Superior to the Rockies, was owned by the Hudson's Bay Company.

Two months after the dominion was formed in the federal election of 1867, anti-confederationists captured 18 of the 19 seats in Nova Scotia. Indeed, the following year a delegation of Nova Scotian politicians travelled to London to seek the repeal of the British North America Act. Two years later, in 1869, the Hudson's Bay Company agreed to sell its vast territory, which included the future provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to the new Dominion of Canada for $1.5 million. Unhappy westerners who wanted no part of the new country instituted a rebellion under the leadership of Louis Riel. That is a moment in Canadian history. The creation of Manitoba followed, and Saskatchewan and Alberta were created in 1905.

Significantly, at the time of the Hudson's Bay sale of land to Canada, there were only four provinces, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec—Upper and Lower Canada. We might make a case that both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had a one quarter interest in the newly-acquired land that was later erected into our western provinces.

It is a matter of history that in 1912 Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec were greatly expanded to include the lands to their north which were very thinly populated and essentially unsettled. The maritime provinces, on the other hand, had been land-locked and could not be similarly expanded.

I therefore suggest that New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have an historic claim to that portion of the continental shelf that is owned by Canada and which joins their respective coast lines. A similar case can be made by Newfoundland.

The additional lands given to Quebec and Ontario just about doubled their land area, while the northern expansion of Manitoba to include parts of Keewatin, and the addition of parts of Athabasca and Assiniboine to Saskatchewan, more than doubled their original land areas. The addition of part of Athabasca to Alberta in consequence of its northern expansion just about doubled its land area.

In my view, it is quite significant that the tremendous resource wealth in these provinces is to be found to a great extent in the northern territories added to the original provincial boundaries. The pre-Cambrian shield around Hudson Bay in northern Ontario, the spectacular resources in northern Quebec and the energy resources in the western provinces are cases in point.

The natural area of expansion for the maritime provinces is in the coastal areas adjacent to their boundaries. In my view, the case is well made for the maritime provinces to have their boundaries expanded to include the coastal areas under the sea.

The maritime provinces have an historic, legal and moral claim to these areas. So, too, has Newfoundland. The Atlantic provinces, together, suffer problems related to regional disparity. One half of their provincial revenues are now in the form of transfer payments from the federal government.

I suggest to the House that the wealth contained in the offshore resources would help alleviate these problems and would certainly strengthen confederation. I should therefore like to support the bill introduced by the hon. member for Halifax West whom I hold in great esteem and I congratulate him for introducing it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think this subject can be approached from a very non-partisan point of view. In 1957 I took over as minister of resources or, as it was called then, national resources and northern affairs. This was a new department of government which was created in 1953 because we had been regarding our north and other resources with a kind of absence of mind.

When checking through the records of that new department in 1957, I discovered evidence that the problem that has been raised today by the hon. member was already in the minds of the administration of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. I spoke to the then leader of the opposition about it from a legal point of view, as he was very proud of his background and experience in that field. He said that he thought the only way we could expand the territories of the Atlantic provinces was to divide up the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Being a considerable authority on constitutional matters as well as matters of law, he proposed that the boundary line of the Gulf of St. Lawrence should run from Anticosti Island in the north, down to the Gaspé.

I enlarged on that idea, Mr. Speaker. I knew that the Department of External Affairs and my own department of northern affairs, in co-operation with all the other nations of the world, were working on what was called the international geophysical year. There was a worldwide conference which lasted two or three years, although it was only supposed to last a year and one half. I knew the kind of information that was being fed into that conference. The theory of how the continents were formed had changed dramatically from previous beliefs. All the current theories were being questioned. It was realized that the eastern seaboard of North America was once part of Europe, that we had been drifting apart and that the geology of the Appalachian region which runs from Greenland, through Baffin Island, down through the Labrador trough, the Atlantic provinces and into the northeastern United States, has the same geology as that of western Europe. The coal and iron mines of Germany, Sweden, Luxembourg, France and Great Britain are of the same structure as the coal and iron mines of the Appalachian region.

It was also abundantly clear, as the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) has pointed out, that this wealth does not stop at the high water mark but continues underneath the sea.

As part of the vision of the Diefenbaker period, we thought we could give the Atlantic provinces an equal chance with the prairie provinces, Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia by giving them enough territory with resource potential. We thought we could also give them an industrial strategy by combining in that area all the forms of energy we could get. For instance, coal, iron from the Labrador trough and the give-away gases from Venezuela, which we could get for long-term agreements at almost nil prices. We could build into that whole structure an energy network which would give this part of Canada, with perfect position for trade purposes with Europe, Africa, South America and the Eastern Seaboard of the United States, with access to supply from the Arctic as well as the Labrador trough, one of the great potential mineral areas of the world, some form of hope for the future.

I visited various governments, including Quebec. I suggested that we consider such a scheme. I wanted to include Gaspé because geographically it is part of that whole picture. Gaspé could tie up with the Labrador trough. An energy network could be built crossing from Cape Breton to Newfoundland to Labrador, picking up the power in the Hamilton River, and bring it down to Quebec City, Montreal and New York. We could develop the Fundy tides, develop the coal and use the cheap energy from Venezuela. We could then build an energy base which would economically give that area one of the strongest that any industrial complex could have.

It is rather difficult when you first make a proposition like that to have unanimous support among administrative governments which are busy with their problems. All I could get out of that first round of discussions was what appeared on the books in this House in 1957, which was the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act.

I repeat again, that act was not called an act for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, it was called the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act. I had the pledge of the Quebec government that it would co-operate to develop and participate in this industrial complex. In the actual act passed by this Parliament, as hon. members will see if they go back to read it, we were only able to arrange anything tangible with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That was the Beechwood project on the Saint John River, and the tying up of the two grids into a bi-province grid. We had long discussions with the province of Newfoundland about building that grid into Newfoundland and getting access to the power in the Hamilton River. All of this is history, but very important as a backdrop to what is in this motion today.

We missed our opportunity 20 years ago because there was a reluctance to give up that tremendously strong and historic pride which each of those island areas have. Nova Scotia is an island, connected a little bit with New Brunswick, Cape Breton is an island and so is Newfoundland.

However, I think I have said enough to point out that even though we did not succeed in achieving our full purpose in 1957-1958, we did succeed in going to the Law of the Sea Conference in Geneva and fighting hard for the fishing rights, along with all of the other causes we fought for, and we got unanimous approval that the littoral state could develop the resources at the bottom of the sea as far out until you met the other nation coming from the other side of the ocean with the technology of the time. That is the international law today, which was pointed out by the hon. member for Central Nova. We should take advantage of this opportunity even though it is 20 years later. We should push this idea forward because it is unfair and inequitable to leave four eastern provinces which have not received the same treatment as British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec have received out of this federal system and I think this motion could advance things very rapidly.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. Bill C-226 introduced by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) interests many from Atlantic Canada but, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) said, its dimension is much wider than just the geographical parameters of Atlantic Canada. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) gave a historical review of the expansion of other provinces where a lot of the natural resources are now. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) in his development of this matter shows the very real interest in it. But what has never ceased to surprise me in terms of the federal position versus the Nova Scotia and provincial position is that under our tax sharing proposals now and/or the equalization grants—let alone the cost of these imported oils—it is almost six of one and half a dozen of the other. If a province can develop that offshore mineral resource and thereby get the benefit and the money from it, then in time Nova Scotia or another province will become a have province in terms of the expected potential wealth. This will help offset what the federal government is paying now under the equalization formula. I was interested in the historical background which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain described. There is no doubt, as the hon. member for Halifax West said, the conflict has impeded development and we are losing out with this constitutional conflict on the shore.

I would just like to add that with the extension of the provincial boundaries, this will enable a province to develop its resource, in which all Canadians share. For instance, if the Nova Scotia revenue base is better, that province will then need less input and/or subsidy from many subsidized programs, let alone the basic equalization formula. Somewhere along the line I hope that the mandarins of the world will get together and say let us not impede development, let us expand it so that all Canadians can benefit. I compliment the hon. member for Halifax West for bringing to the attention of the House something which rankles eastern Canadians. We know at the moment there are more resources developed in the west. We do not begrudge them that. We obviously benefit from it in terms of sharing. We do not deplore the fact that as four of the original partners, the boundaries were extended to the western provinces and although we have a vicarious ownership in that land being part of the original entity, we are not small-minded Canadians. As the boundaries were extended for provinces in the west, and Quebec had its boundaries extended north, under the various statutes of this House, all we ask for Atlantic Canada is that we be treated the same by having the only land we have, which is under the sea, extended as proposed by the hon. member for Halifax West.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be a very popular fellow among the Members of Parliament from Nova Scotia after I talk out this particular bill. In the short time remaining, I would like to explain—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I just want to advise the parliamentary secretary that he has succeeded in his purpose. It is six o'clock, and the time for consideration of private members' hour has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre had the floor.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see such an attentive group of members who have come back from a nice healthy dinner. I hope that during the course of the next 28 minutes I will be able to give them some knowledge of what the problems are in this country and what changes they might encourage upon their government to change the very difficult position we are in today.

When we adjourned for dinner, Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the problems which small businesses are facing in this country and the very serious concern which small businessmen have with respect to the Small Business Development Bond, which has not been introduced in as expeditious a way as that community had hoped.

The minister clearly had an opportunity to help the small business people who are facing very difficult times with the high interest policy which he is following. Under this bond, interest would be treated as a dividend and, therefore, would not be taxable in the hands of the financial institutions, such as the banks, the trust companies and so on. In that way the small businessmen would be able to raise money at about 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the normal interest rate. We are talking about interest rates in the range of 20 per cent. The Federal Business Development Bank rate is at 22 per cent or 23 per cent today, I believe. That saving of 30 per cent to 40 per cent is a very significant amount.

The action we have seen is to extend this program for three months. By the time this legislation is passed, that will leave only two months. So, it is a very sorry and inadequate response to a very serious problem. Small business, the banks and other financial institutions have been waiting for over a year for action to take place. All we get is three months, one of which will have expired before the program is in place.

I am concerned about loans which were made in 1980, before the legislation was passed, but in anticipation of the legislation. I hope we will have a quick response from the government with respect to the action they will take and what their attitude will be with respect to loans which are made during that period. These loans have been taken out in anticipation of receiving the lower rate, in those few cases where banks would allow loans to be taken out. If those loans are not subject to the higher rate, it will cause hardship to the businessmen in this area. When you look at them, the small businessman's problems really are the same problems as those of many Canadians. The economy today is mired in stagflation. We have high unemployment, high inflation and low economic growth. Can you think of one policy, Mr. Speaker, which has been introduced by this government during the course of the last 11 months which is attacking that problem? I have thought about that and I have looked around for policies. I have seen the knee-jerk response to the Chrysler problem, a policy response which seems to be falling apart at the seams right now.

We have seen the government's interest rate policy. I sat in the television studio with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) when he said under pressure from the interviewer that he would resign if interest rates did not fall from the high levels they were at this time last year. It is almost a year ago since he said that. I watched him squirm. He did not have the guts or the honesty to back down from the pressure the interviewer was putting him under. He allowed himself to be pressed into saying he would resign if interest rates did not come down after his party became the government. He made that comment in the heat of an interview. We all know of that famous statement: If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen. The minister would do a great service to this country and to this House if he would get out of the kitchen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: The government has had an opportunity to get us out of this stagflation, and that is in the area of energy policy. In last year's report of the Economic Council of Canada, the council identified two areas of potential growth that were going to help the Canadian economy. The first area was the U.S. economy and the second was energy development policy in Canada. This year the council comments, and this was before the budget, that the U.S. economy has turned soft, so all we have left is energy development. As a result of the National Energy Program, all the signs are there to show it is an abject failure in generating economic development in this country. Those hopes which were expressed a year ago have now been dashed. It is a disastrous policy and it has to be changed. We have just seen a litany of criticism of the national energy program before the National Energy Board.

A National Energy Board hearing has been called to look into the area of supply, and we have evidence that we are not going to see the balance of supply and demand which has been projected by the National Energy Program in 1990. Instead we will see imports in this country of 600,000 barrels per day, about one third of our requirements. That is the evidence from a number of very knowledgeable observers in the industry. That is the problem we have to face in this country, and it will mean a tremendous outflow of capital just to purchase that oil. We have the opportunity to reverse that if we can get our house in order here. If we do not, we will find that the government is sacrificing jobs, sacrificing energy security, sacrificing economic growth into the 1980s and sacrificing the development of high technology in these new areas of energy development. It is doing this with a program which is the most ill-conceived anybody in this country could imagine. The voices are clear, whether it is from the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, representing Canadian owned companies, the Royal Bank of Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the C. D. Howe Research Institute or the Economic Council of Canada. The evidence is all there and it could not be more powerful, yet the government is digging itself into a bigger and bigger hole by promising no change. The government is going to stick with its policy, damn the torpedoes.

It is not enough that security of supply in this country will be threatened through higher and not lower imports, and through a very insecure world with the things going on in the Middle East, but in addition, jobs are being lost. That is the subject I would like to address this evening.

We have heard the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors advising us that oil wells drilled in this coming year will be down from the anticipated 10,000, and the actual 9,000 wells which were drilled last year, to 6,000 or possibly fewer.

That is the leading edge of a much greater problem which is going to affect other parts of this country, particularly Ontario and Quebec. It is in Ontario and Quebec where the compressors, the tubing, the steel, the trucks and the electronic equipment are produced. Alberta recognizes it cannot produce that equipment in that part of the country and it has to look to us. It will be communities like Welland, Hamilton, Stratford, Mississauga and maybe even Etobicoke, Orillia and Ste. Thérèse; many communities in this part of Canada, which will suffer. In the area of oil sands development, 40 per cent of the economic development from those projects affects western Canada, but 25 per cent affects Ontario and 10 per cent to 12 per cent affects the province of Quebec. This is not just a western problem, it is a Canadian problem.

Let me describe the significance of this as it relates to Bill C-54. What is significant is the impact of the tax on oil and natural gas. Consumers will have to pay the price, regardless. We sometimes tend to forget that, but in the end result it is the consumer who has to pay.

The federal tax grant will be three times higher than that in the December budget; $37.5 billion as against $12.5 billion in the December, 1979 budget. It is not just the amount of the tax we are talking about. It will be high, but it is the impact of the tax I want to address this evening.

Let us look at the reasons the National Energy Program is such a disaster and so ill-conceived in the area of self-sufficiency, Canadianization and Canadian unity.

We had set self-sufficiency as the number one objective in our program. When you ask what should you tax and what should you be trying to do through your tax system if you want self-sufficiency, you must conclude that you should try to encourage production and you should try to discourage consumption. We left the industry free to go out and develop the resources of this country. At the same time, we put on an excise tax to try to dampen consumption.

What is the Liberal policy? It has taxed production through the 8 per cent production tax and it has made natural gas exploration and development less profitable by introducing an excise tax on natural gas. This government is holding down production, and through low prices it is encouraging consumption. How backward can you be if you are trying to achieve self-sufficiency through your tax policies?

Let us look at Canadianization. Our policy was to encourage the acquisition of shares in this country by Canadians. I discussed the Canadian investment program earlier in my remarks. We encouraged the growth of the industry. Over the past ten years we have seen foreign ownership of the industry drop from 90 per cent to 70 per cent, and it was going down further.

What has happened as a result of this Liberal program? It has taxed production and that tax is going to hit the Canadian industry much harder than the multinationals because the Canadian industry is primarily production oriented.

That is their operational base, and they have a smaller capital base, but the multinationals have all the petrochemical manufacturing and marketing over which to spread that tax load. The multinationals are in a relatively better position as a result of this budget than the Canadian companies which we want to help the most. That is the problem with respect to the impact of the taxes which are levied under this budget and which are part of this ways and means bill. The result is that independent Canadian-owned companies are redirecting their investment activities offshore, and the multinationals are saying, "We will get by; we can make it through." That is the tragedy of this budget.

The House will recall that I was concerned about the incentive to save being reduced by this government, possibly in the next budget. The concern I expressed was that a void would be created into which the government might have to move to do the things which are not being done by the private sector because of the lack of investment capital.

I see that this energy program is creating the same kind of void in the oil industry. The multinationals will be stalled because they are not getting access to the exploration incentives they had before. The independent companies are weakened and are moving out. What does that leave? We must develop our energy resources in this country. It only leaves the state to do it, and that, apart from being something I believe is wrong philosophically, is wrong in very clear practical terms because the oil industry has always benefited from good, keen competition.

If I might remind hon. members of the West Pembina discovery about two or three years ago, that West Pembina field was like Swiss cheese. It had been drilled and drilled over the years, but someone came along with a new idea and said: "Let's try another way; we will go down deeper; we will go down 12,000 feet instead of 5,000 or 6,000 feet." That was the biggest oil discovery Canada has had in the last few years. That is why competition and a number of points of view and a number of ideas being brought to bear on a problem will discover oil and gas reserves in this country. That is why I think it is wrong to concentrate too much power and too much decision-making power in the state.

The desire on the part of the government to create these voids for the state is a very disquieting trend to me and to our party. We must be alert to this, try to stop it and draw it to the attention of people in this country because the implications will be bad for Canada.

Mr. Peterson: Don't exaggerate.

Mr. Nielsen: Have the guts to stand up.

Mr. Wilson: The final dangerous impact of Bill C-54 and the National Energy Program is the impact on Canadian unity. Again let me discuss this from the standpoint of the impact of the tax because that is what we are here for this evening. There are two key taxes in the National Energy Program. One is a production tax, which is basically a royalty. The other is a natural gas excise tax, which is basically an export tax or a wellhead tax. We can call it by different names, as the minister did in his budget, but it is still an export tax, and it is still a wellhead tax. Surely there are other ways by which the revenues the federal government wanted could have been raised, but no, it has chosen to do this and to have a head-on conflict with the producing provinces, which has led to the production cutback with which no one on this side of the House is happy.

We think that there have to be other ways of proceeding, but this is what has happened. Oil sands projects and the Cold Lake heavy oil project have been stopped. There has been an increase in the degree of alienation on the part of people in western Canada. I urge the government to make changes with respect to the impact of these taxes so that we can move ahead in this important energy area in the fields of self-sufficiency, Canadianization and national unity because we will all suffer if changes are not made.

Mr. Peterson: Tax the consumer is what you are saying.

Mr. Nielsen: Have the guts to stand up if you have something to say.

Mr. Wilson: There has been some suggestion that the province of Alberta will cave in with respect to oil sands development and that it will allow oil sands development projects and heavy oil projects to go ahead. However, that is misleading and it is a misreading of the problem. Alberta's problem today as a result of the National Energy Program is not in the oil sands area; it is in the conventional area. That is where jobs are being lost today. Canada's problem is in the oil sands.

Alberta's problem has to do with conventional discoveries and the fact that work is not proceeding in the conventional field. The solution ot Canada's problem is to solve Alberta's current problem, and that means an agreement on conventional as well as megaprojects. That is why we need a total energy package, and time is very much of the essence.

I think we all noted last week that Nova, an Alberta corporation announced its application respecting a $570 million ethylene project. There are others to come. Others are sitting waiting for approval to go ahead from the Alberta government. If these proceed, as my colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), said the other day, and then the megaprojects are piled on top of that, there will be tremendous social and economic strain in that part of Alberta. That is very much a concern to people in that part of the country, and we in this House must understand that because the pressure on the consuming provinces is there now. We in Ontario or Quebec—in the eastern part of the country—should recognize that we must come to grips with this problem in Alberta. We must understand Alberta's problems if we are to find a proper solution to the deadlock we are in today. That is why I say that the Government of Canada must change the impact of the taxes in these three areas.

In devising ways by which those changes are made, I think it is important that the federal government respect the jurisdiction of the province of Alberta in such a way as to encourage production, conservation and Canadian ownership.

From time to time hon. members opposite have said that we on this side are apologists for the industry or that we are looking out for the interests of multinationals. I do not feel sorry for the multinationals. I do not feel sorry for the independent companies.

Mr. Regan: You don't?

Mr. Wilson: However, I do feel sorry for people in Nova Scotia, Toronto or Montreal. Those are the people who will suffer. The independent producers put out some figures about a week or two ago which show that there will be a little blip in their profits, but then they will be on the way back up as a result of the program. However, that misses the point that if the independent companies and multinationals are not able to produce what we are capable of producing in this country, we will all suffer through lack of economic growth, insecure supply and possibly the breakup of this country.

In closing, let me point to one area in which I believe Bill C-54 is deficient. There is no relief for low and middle-income earners. There is no relief for farmers and fishermen under the National Energy Program. Hon. members will recall that back in December of 1979 we introduced an energy tax credit which did provide these elements of our society with some relief from higher prices. There is no doubt in my mind that there will be higher prices as a result of this energy program. The prices will probably be much higher than they would have been had we concluded the agreement which was clearly in place in December of 1979. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) proposed relief, and I urge the government, when it brings in these changes—and I say "when" not "whether" or "if"—to have regard for the proposal made by my colleague, as it has in practically every other area of the ways and means bill. Very few have been left out. That is the nature of the genius of the budget of December, 1979. It is all coming home to roost.

I ask members opposite to bring in this energy tax credit and so protect the people in this country who are less able to protect themselves. That is the only decent and humane way of handling what is going to be a problem of higher energy prices in this country. That is a plea that I leave in front of hon. members opposite.

Finally, to sum up, I urge the government not to discourage the creation and development of savings in this country, because if we introduce policies which will result in a reduction of savings and an increase in the inflation rate in this country, we will be rewarding spending, and when you couple those two elements, it will lead in the direction of weakening the productive capacity of this country to create jobs, to create new plant equipment, to create new technology. When we look ahead to the 1980s with the tremendous volume of investment capital that must be put in place, whether it is in energy manufacturing, mining or forest products, we find there is a huge demand for capital ahead of us. We must encourage savings to enable the financing of job-creation investment which is required in this country. Second, we must extend the Small Business Development Bond by at least nine months so that we can look forward to a full year of that very worth-while instrument. Finally, we should revamp the National Energy Program to change the tax impact and to bring in the energy tax credit.

Those are only a few of the steps necessary for this government in order to regain the confidence of the people.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, the Income Tax Act before this House today has a number of timely provisions that are of particular interest to our economy, our industry, our business sector, our farmers, our fishermen, and Canadian taxpayers in general.

Reflecting on the comments of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) regarding the Small Business Development Bond. I would remind him that, first of all, the passage of this act makes the Small Business Development Bond issue retroactive to December, 1979. These development bonds must not be less than $10,000 and not more than $500,000 for the issuer in the case of a Canadian-controlled corporation. The borrower, however, cannot deduct those interest costs as an expense, nor does the lender have to pay tax on the interest income.

The legislation has been available to the public since June, 1980, and the public was advised that it was to be retroactive. While this was intended to be a break for the small business people, I am alarmed at the fact that some lending institutions have been reluctant, particularly in rural communities, for various reasons, to give loans under this provision. Perhaps it is partly related to the fact that the lending institutions can make more money or gain a better net return by charging 2 per cent or 3 per cent over the bank prime rate. However, the passage of this bill will enable the lender to treat the interest payments as dividend payments. Therefore, they will be able to reduce the rate of interest charged on these loans. Thus a bank or other financial institution which would otherwise pay income tax of approximately 50 per cent on such interest should be able to offer rates which are approximately half of the rates charged on convention loans.

As I indicated earlier, there was some initial slowness in the acceptance of the small business development schemes. The proposed draft amendments were initially issued in June of 1980 as some lending institutions were reluctant to make contractual arrangements until these were available. After the details were made known, a period of time was necessary to design and initiate the schemes. It was because of these factors that the period of eligibility was extended from the end of 1980 to the end of March of this year, 1981. However, most major institutions now have these intruments available and loans are being made. I now expect the measure to be of significant benefit to small businesses.

The intent of this act, which incidentally continues the indexation concept, in reality meets our needs. The provision of an exemption for the volunteer firemen, for example, recognizes the contribution that these people make to their communities by contributing their time and expertise to ensure the safety of their homes, their families, their places of business, and to ensure that their communities are protected against fire and other hazards.

When the alarm sounds or the call comes, these persons drop whatever they are doing and answer the call for help. In many cases they are dressed in business clothes or suits that are not washable and which become soiled or damaged so badly that they must be replaced, and these people have had to pay the cost themselves. Therefore, the increase in the exemption has been raised to $500. It is welcomed by the volunteer firemen across this nation who contribute much of their time to ensure the safety and well-being of our citizens in the towns and villages, and particularly in the rural sectors of Canada. I am pleased to see this exemption included in this legislation. Again it is retroactive to January 1, 1980.

Another of the priorities of this act is to recognize the needs of the family operated small businesses which could include farmers, fishermen and all types of unincorporated businesses where husband, wife and family members work together as a team.

One of the reasons I entered federal politics was out of a sense of obligation, to ensure that the quality of life in rural Canada was preserved, maintained and enhanced. That quality of life is found in the towns, the villages and the rural countryside where there is a different set of values from those in the larger centres; a quality of life that reflects and respects the needs of others, a quality of life that is conducive to working together with a deep sense of appreciation and accomplishment.

As I travelled across this nation on many occasions through the towns and villages, past the family farms, I could not help but be impressed by the fact that so much time, effort and ingenuity had been invested in developing this nation. Canada was not developed from urban sprawl but from a strong and vibrant rural base which has spread from coast to coast. It was developed by people who invested and worked to improve and maintain their operations, people who believed in their creator, people whose first sense of obligation was the family unit.

Rural Canada is not only a way of life for those thousands of individuals who have chosen to work, to live and to raise their families away from the crowds and the hectic pace of the large city, but rural Canada is the sound economic base of all of society. Rural Canada and its contributions to our economy makes Canada one of only four nations in the world that are net exporters of food.

Whether we travel in the east, in central Canada or in the west, that quality of life is the same, and it provides an education for life. No other occupation teaches so much about birth, growth and maturity in such a variety of ways, about the splendour of the sunrise, the rapture of wide open spaces and the exhilarating sight of land greening each spring. This is the part of Canada where a person expects to give more to the world than he takes from it, where life is measured by what he has done for his fellow men, and as he sums up his days, he can stand tall and feel pride in the life he has led.

Small businesses and farms are interdependent upon each other to provide services and food for this nation. Small businesses supply 42.5 per cent of the jobs in the private sector. Gross farm receipts last year were over $14 billion, and we exported over $6 billion of this to contribute to our balance of trade, yet only 1.3 per cent of our total budgetary expenditures are spent on the agriculture sector. This is because farmers and small businesses are the product of a society dedicated to the work ethic and the ability of individuals to work co-operatively for the common good. In spite of the fact that our percentage of the total expenditures is so low, we are the most productive in terms of output per man in the agricultural sector of any nation of the world, and our research in this sector is among the best. We have provided our people with the best quality and the lowest cost food in the world, but Canadian farmers are the least subsidized of any nation and have the most stable income. Perhaps some day those producers will be like those brave people of World War II described by Sir Winston Churchill when he said, "Never have so many owed so much to so few."

It has been unfortunate that through the years the very people and entrepreneurs who epitomize the essence of rural Canada and the small business service sector have been discriminated against by our tax structure. I refer to spouses affected by the attribution rules which in the past did not allow a taxpayer to deduct as a business expense remuneration paid to a spouse who worked in an unincorporated business. Also it should be noted that any remuneration received by the spouse is not considered to be her income. As well, where a member of a partnership employs his spouse, a proportional part of the spouse's remuneration relating to her share of the business is deemed to be his income and not that of the spouse. Although I am mindful not to assume that the spouse was always the wife, in the vast majority of instances this has been the case. The law has been seen to discriminate against thousands of women who worked with their husbands in the operation of their family farms or in the establishment of small businesses.

The ways and means motion introduced on April 21, 1980, by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) included the proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act which would remove the attribution rules with respect to the remuneration received by a spouse of a taxpayer employed in his business or partnership. Draft legislation regarding this matter was prepared and published in August. I hasten to add that appropriate amendments to the Canada Pension Plan have also been prepared.

So that no further inequity or hardship may be encountered by the people affected by the law, amendments to both the Income Tax Act and the Canada Pension Plan are intended to be retroactive to January 1, 1980. I am pleased to endorse this major change in the Income Tax Act which will be of benefit to so many Canadians from coast to coast.

Another provision of Bill C-54 is the extension of the investment tax credit to a level of 50 per cent for specified regions of the country. I would anticipate that such regions, when defined, would be areas which have suffered hardships over the years for many reasons. Some of these regions no doubt would be victims of modernization and advanced technology which has rendered their particular industries obsolete, or it may be a region of this huge nation which, due to geographical location, has not developed as quickly as the rest of Canada.

Regardless of the reasons, the existing investment tax credit is a measure which allows for a tax credit for equipment purchased on a farm or in a business. This additional tax credit is an incentive which will allow for new capital investments made between October 28, 1980, and before 1986. This new investment tax credit applies to plant, machinery and equipment for manufacturing or processing as defined under the Regional Development Incentives Act. Such investments will be entitled to a 50 per cent investment tax credit. This compares with the existing tax credits of 7 per cent, 10 per cent or 20 per cent depending upon the region where the investment is made.

I am pleased to speak on behalf of this powerful incentive for investment in the slower developing regions of this nation which do not have the potential resources some other regions enjoy. When the Minister of Finance presented his budget, he indicated that the concept of sharing seems to be close to the distinctive fibre of the Canadian tradition. This concept of sharing, whether it is in equalization payments to the poorer provinces or increased incentives for development in those provinces, has one common objective—equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

The bill before us today is part of a package which will ensure the continuance of our high standard of living, ensure that increased personal exemptions are of assistance to all Canadians, and as a result of continued indexing, ensure taxpayers will not be pushed into a higher tax bracket by increased income which merely keeps pace with inflation. Also, I point out that indexing the refundable child tax credit maintains its real value.

Last but not least, this afternoon the newly-inaugurated President of the United States spoke of a new beginning and the need for an end to inflation. If we in Canada are to maintain a positive growth in our economy, then the Income Tax Act must be an integral part of the budget which will reduce our deficit over the next four years, enhance our share of world markets, and increase our energy price structure in an orderly manner which will assist in the fight against inflation. Previously, for every dollar the price of oil rose, the inflationary impact was about one half of one per cent. Therefore, by implementing the energy price increases in a planned and structured manner as we have, the economy will strengthen, we will encourage expansion in those poorer regions referred to earlier and be cushioned from inflationary pressures. The bill is designed to lower our deficit in a way that will not stagnate our economy. As the interest rates moderate, which has been the trend in the last four weeks, the Canadian dollar will strengthen. This was the case today; it closed today at 84.07 cents United States.

Bill C-54 provides the balance required to ensure a continuation of sharing and equality, the basis upon which the nation was built. Sharing and equality are the mechanisms which will build a stronger economic base and ensure an even brighter future for all Canadians.

• (2050)

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, before commencing, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson) on his well read but rather soporific departmental style speech. The subject under discussion tonight is Bill C-54, which deals with supposed amendments to the Income Tax Act. At least, that is what it was described as in the ways and means motion which was introduced in the House on January 12 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

However, upon reading the bill and turning to the first page, we find that it not only includes amendments to the Income Tax Act, but that it also contains a $14 billion borrowing authority. It was bad enough that Bill C-30 was brought in last year asking for $12 billion borrowing authority. It seems to be going up by $2 billion per year. I believe hon. gentlemen opposite were trying to sneak this by on us. It is yet one more sneaky trick in a very long line of Liberal sneaky tricks. But fortunately, Madam Speaker, when this matter was raised as a question of privilege a few days ago, ruled in favour of the view put forward on this side of the House, that insufficient notice had been given for the introduction of this matter. She ordered that the bill be reprinted and that proper notice be given on these important matters.

This type of action, this sneaky behaviour on the part of the government will not do. We will insist that the Liberal borrowing plans be brought out into the open, that they be inspected and investigated under the full light of day. In the election campaign of one year ago, promises were made by members opposite to the effect that they would work toward a balanced budget and that they would engage in responsible financial and fiscal policies. Canadians know that after years of Liberal misrule, the finances of this nation are in one horrendous state. Yet, they were once again conned into voting for that very party and, indeed, that very Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who had got them into the mess in the first place.

Where are the promises of financial responsibility now when the government is looking for this $14 billion borrowing authority. I would suggest that, like some other Liberal promises, they have just gone by the board. Before approving this borrowing authority, there are things which Parliament will want to know. Parliament will want to know to what use the money is to be put. Is it to pay for yet more current account expenditures?

As an example of this, we can cite the oil subsidies which have been provided to eastern Canada and Quebec for some time. Are we borrowing money so we can burn it up, so to speak? Is that what the government proposes to do with the money it borrows and which will eventually have to be paid back with interest by Canadian taxpayers? Or is it, for instance, to be given to Petro-Canada so that it may carry out the policy imposed on it by the government, that of buying out existing oil companies in this country, an action which will not result in one additional barrel of oil being produced? Or, is it to drill for oil wells in Senegal, instead of Alberta or the Northwest Territories.

Parliament will want to know what type of borrowing plan is in existence and where the money will come from. How much of this money will be borrowed abroad on world financial markets? In so doing, to what extent will Canada's future become mortgaged to foreign lenders or, if we are to borrow parts of this money in Canada, what upward effect will it have on the already high interest rates in this country? If we borrow these very large sums, and I noticed that in today's newspapers there were reports of borrowing, just today, of $1.5 billion, if the government takes out that surplus capital which has been saved by the people of this country, how much will be left for the private sector? What interest rates will the private sector have to pay for the use of that money?

I suggest that this House remains dissatisfied with the reckless spending and borrowing of the government and that it demands the pursuit of responsible financial policies, which will strengthen, not weaken, Canada as a leading nation of the western world. So much for the borrowing authority aspect of the bill. Now I would like to look at the income tax amendment provisions in general.

In looking through the provisions of the bill and, more particularly, the ways and means motion—and I must admit that I have a certain amount of difficulty, which I am sure is shared by most members of the House, in reading this taxation legislation in detail—one must give a certain amount of credit to the Minister of Finance, credit to the extent that by and large when it comes to the technical provisions of the bill, he has been intelligent enough to follow the lead of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), a man of undisputed financial acumen.

However, there are certain very important omissions. In their lust for yet more and more of the Canadian taxpayers' money, his hardgot gains, our colleagues opposite completely forgot about the humanitarian aspects of the Crosbie budget. In their lust for more control over all parts of the daily lives of the citizens of this country, they deliberately omitted those aspects of the Crosbie budget which would strengthen the private sector and assist the small investor.

Let us take a look at some of those omissions. Although it is not really an omission, I would like to merely mention the Small Business Development Bond because a number of speakers on this side have already referred to that topic. I would like to mention some of the other omissions. Probably most important is the energy tax credit which would have been brought in had the Conservative government not been defeated just a little over one year ago. People throughout the country and members of this House have to recognize that energy costs must rise. It is inevitable; it must happen. Under the Crosbie budget, measures would have been brought in which were designed to alleviate the burden which falls disproportionately on the less fortunate. It is not so in the present budget or with the amendments to the Income Tax Act which are being considered in this legislation, which socks it equally to both the rich and the poor.

The provisions laid down before us do not include the amendments which we would have introduced to the Income Tax Act, namely, mortgage deductibility, to give people the opportunity to own their own homes, thereby stimulating the Canadian construction industry in these times of hardship.

● (2100)

The Liberal approach is entirely opposite. By the deliberate retention of unnecessarily and unnaturally high interest rates, they again sock it to the average Canadian and they destroy any hope that the average Canadian has of ever owning his own home.

Now I come to a couple of omissions with respect to the measures that we would have taken to encourage investment, especially by the small Canadian investor.

Let me deal first with registered retirement saving plan investment. If you recall, Mr. Speaker, this was the system whereby taxable dividends paid into RRSPs would only be taxed at the capital gains rate rather than the income rate when that money was withdrawn from the plan. That was a simple yet effective treatment of taxable dividends from an RRSP, which would have benefited small Canadian investors and would have helped them put money into Canadian industry. This, in turn, would have helped industry finance the expansion we all wish to see.

Along the same lines, we could talk about the Canadian common stock investment plan. Perhaps I should refresh the memory of hon. members about this, which was a plan to be administered by a trust company under instructions from the investor. The capital gains on Canadian common stocks in the plan would not be taxable until withdrawals were made. This would, in effect, be a system of tax deferral for the small Canadian investor. Presumably when he drew money out of the plan, it would be at a time when his rate of taxation would be less than when he was building the plan up and it would therefore be to his advantage because he would pay not only a deferred tax, but a lower rate of tax. This was a measure designed to help the small Canadian investor invest in the future of this country.

This aspect of the Crosbie budget is missing, presumably because the government does not want Canadians to directly own Canadian industry. They are opposed to the view that Canadian citizens should own—and when I say "own", that necessitates that they be able to dispose of their holdings—because they have their own plans for the nationalization of industry. They want industry in this country to be under the direct control of government.

I could go on listing measures that would have helped farmers, fishermen and plain ordinary Canadians in general, but by now I think hon. members will realize that the sins of this government, in this particular instance, are not those of commission because what they have done is basically good; it is based upon what the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West proposed some 14 months ago; rather their sins are sins of omission. They have omitted the interests of the Canadian population, those interests which the Crosbie measures would have done so much to protect.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes you would allow me the opportunity to digress from detailed study of the measures and to talk in terms of general taxation philosophy.

Let us try to examine the differences in the philosophy of taxation which divides this House, one side from the other. On one side we have our colleagues in the Liberal Party, supported by their NDP bedmates. As they have stated so many times in unison, the prime objective of taxation in this country is the redistribution of income. That is really why they engage in taxation, because they want to redistribute income from some people to others and, presumably, mainly to themselves. Under such a theory, rates of taxation would remain very high even if there was no real need whatsoever for the money.

Although most people in Canada would support some form of progressive taxation based to a certain extent on the ability to pay, our colleagues opposite and to our left have taken this to the extreme with results that not even they expected. They have created a monster government which seeks to control and regulate every aspect of every Canadian's private and public life; a monster with an insatiable demand for yet more and more money.

Who provides this money, Mr. Speaker? Which section of the Canadian population? It is obviously not the poor because they do not have any. It is not the very rich for two reasons: first, because they are not very many of them, and, second, because very wealthy people can hire the right advice, the right lawyers, the right tax accountants and thus largely avoid paying a high rate of taxation. In the final analysis, people can leave the country. I understand that some have gone to that extreme.

The brunt of the Liberal and NDP high taxation policy is borne by the average Canadian. It especially falls on the wage earner who is unable to protect himself. Because of deductions at source, the taxpayer often does not realize what is happening. Sometimes I think it would be a good idea if deductions at source were to cease altogether and at some point in the year the taxpayer wrote a cheque to the Receiver General of Canada for $5,000, $10,000, $15,000 or whatever amount was due. He would then see how much money this government is taking out of his pocket and would realize the burden that is being imposed upon him.

Of the wage earners who are so badly hit, it would be, in my opinion, that those getting it in the neck, the miners, loggers, construction workers—people who work very hard and often in unpleasant conditions and as a consequence earn more and in my opinion in consequence deserve more—are the people who really get it socked to them. They are the people hardest hit by the Liberal and NDP lust for yet more and more public revenue, a lust that is bleeding the country dry. The policy of creating a socialist paradise with everyone reduced to the same level of mediocrity has been a failure. It has not worked and has resulted in practically everyone paying into the taxation system more than they should. On the other hand, we on this side of the House take the view that the interests of Canadians are best served by minimizing the impact of taxation. Of course, we have to raise revenues. All governments have to do the things which legitimately fall within the sphere of government, in order to provide for a national defence, to operate a justice system, and to undertake necessary and advantageous public works. These are the types of things on which governments have to spend money and for which they have to raise money. But on this side we never forget that every dollar spent by government comes, in the final analysis, out of the pockets of the citizens of this country.

There you have it in brief, Mr. Speaker. On the one hand you have the Liberal-NDP view. Let me reiterate. In their view you have high taxes, a complicated and manipulative tax system with the brunt of the tax system falling on the hardest working and the most productive Canadians. On the other hand, you have the Progressive Conservative view of low taxes, taxes as low as possible commensurate with the government doing its legitimate job. This is a simplified and equitable tax system, one designed to stimulate rather than stultify initiative and enterprise.

I want to say a few words on a subject very dear to my heart, that is taxation as it affects the northern territories of this country. First, I would like to congratulate the Yukon Territory in following the lead of the Northwest Territories in imposing their own territorial income tax. I notice that there are provisions within Bill C-54, which amount to enabling legislation.

In general, especially as it applies to federal income tax in the north, we must point out that of all the inequities in the taxation system, one of the most unfair burdens falls on the people of the northern territories. Unlike, say in Russia or Denmark, Canada seems to go out of its way to dissuade people from going into and living in the northern areas except those working possibly for the government or large companies.

The problem with taxation comes down to this: in the north living costs are considerably higher. According to statistics, they are anywhere from 25 per cent to 100 per cent higher than in the south. Because of the progressive nature of the income tax system, something like this happens: for someone earning $20,000 a year in the south with an income tax rate of 25 per cent, they pay $5,000 in taxes. But to enjoy the same amenities of life in the north, a person would have to make, say, $30,000 a year. However, the tax on that $30,000 is not in proportion. It is not $7,500, it is probably $10,000, giving a tax rate of 30 per cent. In effect, what you have is a higher rate of taxation for those people living in the north than for those living in the south. Governments and large companies give certain benefits to employees, especially for vacation travel and housing allowances to compensate for some of the more expensive aspects of living in the north.

Hon. members are all aware of the recent history of northern taxation in that until a year ago these benefits were not taxed, although they were supposed to be under the Income Tax Act. Governments had up to that time turned a blind eye to them. When the Department of National Revenue went out of its way to start levying taxes on these various benefits, there was a public outcry. This problem has been addressed by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), who appears to be fairly sympathetic to the interests of northerners, if for no other reason than he represents Labrador. A remission order on the collection of certain taxes has been issued. It was initially issued for a period of one year, expiring on the last day of 1980. That date has now been extended to 1981. However, it is just a temporary measure, and everyone recognizes it as such. It still has many inequalities built into it. For instance, certain vacation travel allowances are not taxed whereas an educational travel allowance is taxed. That is obviously very unfair. The only real solution to these problems is to adopt measures similar to those adopted in Australia.

We need to amend the Income Tax Act to allow for some form of tax credit or to allow for a deduction for those people who make their home in northern Canada. As I said just a moment ago, we have reason to believe that the Minister of National Revenue is rather sympathetic to this view. On this side of the House, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) has been active in developing possible schemes which could be put into effect. Other representatives of northern interest, such as northern governments, employer organizations, such as the Chamber of Commerce and the chamber of mines and employee organizations such as the various unions and the Northwest Territories Federation of Labour, made submissions along the same lines.

Let us hope the Minister of Revenue can persuade his colleague, the Minister of Finance to make the necessary changes in taxation policy which will take note of some of these common sense proposals.

Could you advise me how many minutes I have remaining, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has approximately 11 minutes.

Mr. Nickerson: I have some comments in closing which concern the costs of raising revenue in this country. Today I was reading an interesting publication called "Inside Taxation" which was published under the authority of the Minister of National Revenue. Two figures caught my interest. Apparently in 1970 it cost 79 cents to collect $100 worth of taxes. Ten years later, in 1980, the cost was $1.09 per $100 worth of taxes. In that ten-year period there has been an increase of 30 per cent. That is a real increase which is not due to inflation at all. In that time the $100, so to speak, has been subject to inflation as has everything else. It is a real increase in the cost of collecting revenue by the Government of Canada of something over 30 per cent in that ten-year period.

I would attribute that to several factors. First is the increase in the complexity of the taxation system. The Income Tax Act, and this is only a small part of it, in fact only a few amendments have been proposed as a result of a ways and means motion, but every year the Income Tax Act and the regulations made thereunder and various Treasury Board rules all combine to make taxation much more complicated than it needs to be. I recognize a necessity that it be fairly complicated, but I think it is getting out of hand. Second, in that ten-year period there has been an increase in tax rates in general, and the more money you make, the higher precentage you pay in taxes. The more incentives there are for you to avoid, or even occasionally evade taxation, the more taxes you pay. Of course, if that happens, then the more money the Department of National Revenue must pay to enforce that legislation, to force people to pay and prevent them from evading taxes.

There has also been a fantastic increase in the amount of paperwork which must be processed by the Department of National Revenue. I understand that the child tax credit provisions which were brought in necessitate the processing of an additional 1.5 million returns a year. In general, I think the people who work for Revenue Canada are doing a good job, even if it is with no help from their political masters. But because of the factors which I have cited, it seems that the cost of collecting taxes in Canada is escalating very rapidly. In comparison with many other countries, I still think we do a good job. The cost of collection is still just a little over 1 per cent. I understand in many countries it is significantly higher than that. But, in my opinion, it is a trend which must be watched. We should try to make the necessary changes to our taxation system so that those increases in the cost of collection do not continue to grow higher and higher.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to vote in favour of most of the provisions contained in Bill C-54 derived from the ways and means motion. At the same time, I would record my objection to several of the many important omissions which I referred to previously—omissions from the original Crosbie proposals. As far as the $14 billion borrowing authority is concerned, let us separate it and deal with it as it should be dealt with; that is, as a separate piece of legislation on which we can have a full-scale debate to find out what the government's intentions really are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I listened with a great deal of fascination and some surprise to the comments of the member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson).

I must say I object to an accusation levelled at me earlier in the day by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) when he suggested that he noticed I was sitting with a Tory member reading this particular bill, C-54, and enjoying it. I would like to tell the hon. member that we were certainly not enjoying this particular bill. It is the kind of document which is difficult to enjoy. As the member for Western Arctic indicated, it is difficult to read. It is a complicated document and, most important, it simply is an amendment to a much larger document dealing with the income tax system of this country.

Although Bill C-54 does address a number of taxation problems facing Canadians, I certainly find it to be generally a disappointing bill. It fails to make the serious changes required in terms of working toward an equitable and rational taxation system for Canada. I think most Canadians today from one end of the country to the other would recognize that our present taxation laws are discriminatory. They are unjust and unfair. In a sense, I must agree with the member for Western Arctic when he suggested that when you look at our taxation system and ask who pays taxes, part of the answer is that the poor do not pay taxes. They do not pay any taxes because they do not make any money, he says. I hope I am not misquoting him. He says the rich do not pay taxes because they have all kinds of fancy lawyers. They can take advantage of the numerous loopholes which are in our taxation system, which is biased in favour of certain groups within our society.

When I talk to the workers throughout my riding of Kamloops-Shuswap, and we talk about the taxes they pay, they express a hesitancy with respect to the taxation system and the amount of money they are required to pay. They feel this for a number of reasons. One is that they feel they are paying an unjust proportion since they know of certain groups, primarily those which are self-employed, those who are using one method or another to turn themselves into a personal corporation, as someone said, and are able to take advantage of the legal minds we have to use the loopholes in the existing taxation system to get around paying taxes. The people in my riding know that and it frustrates them. I suppose that is a reason why one of the best sellers of recent weeks has been a book indicating clearly how to get around taxes in Canada. It tells you how to find and take advantage of the loopholes. At this time of year it becomes almost a national preoccupation to be asking your colleagues, your accountant, and so on, how best to take advantage of Canada's tax laws.

I think one has to ask this question: Why is it Canadians are so anxious to avoid paying taxes? Why is it we are going out of our way and hiring myriads of individuals to police the voluntary taxation system of Canada, as the previous speaker indicated? Why is it that we are having this difficulty? Why is it people are hesitant to pay taxes? It is obvious. It is because of the unjust nature of taxation. People feel they are not being treated equally. Of course, they are also concerned with the way taxes are being spent.

One does not have to look far at all to see where that money is being spent. One has only to look at the topic which we will likely see emerging in the House in the next number of days with respect to, perhaps, tens of millions of dollars needed to conduct an advertising campaign to promote a certain viewpoint with respect to the constitutional discussions. That is the kind of thing which frustrates Canadians. Using hard-earned taxpayers' money in that way makes it difficult for one to rise to the challenge of the taxpayer. However, it is an unjust system and, presumably, this particular bill is an attempt to close off some gaps. It opens up some as well.

I still have some difficulty when I meet some of my constituents, particularly at this time of year, when people are filling out their income tax forms. They ask me to justify why some people who have incomes in excess of $200,000 do not pay any income tax at all. Why is that? Why do the members of the House of Commons perpetuate this particular system? I must admit, Mr. Speaker, I have a difficult time explaining that.

However, one could go on and on and indicate some of the problems associated with this particular bill. A number of my colleagues have done this, but I want to focus tonight on one particular area. That is the area of small business. All of us in this House would agree that high interest rates impose a relatively greater burden on small businesses than on large businesses. This is so, in part, because small business relies heavily on the chartered banks and other financial intermediaries for credit. Small business does not have access to the range of financing alternatives which large corporations have.

As record high interest rates began to take their toll in 1979 by pushing small business bankruptcies to post-war record levels, the Conservative government of Mr. Clark proposed interest rate relief through the Small Business Development Bond introduced in Mr. Crosbie's budget of 1979.

The Liberals promised lower interest rates during the 1980 election campaign. Again, true to their track record and to their word, they saw to it, once they were elected, that interest rates were raised even higher than the Conservatives would have raised them. Small business bankruptcies in the first nine months of 1980 rose 18 per cent over the corresponding period last year. But the value of the liabilities involved in these bankruptcies increased 28 per cent, to $560 million. However, this, of course, is only part of the story; the level of official bankruptcies do not take into account those thousands of instances involving thousands of individuals who are no longer able to make ends meet, quietly closing their doors and going out of business without going through the formal bankruptcy process.

In addition, the official statistics fail to account for the social strain business failures place on the general health and well-being of our Canadian communities. Under increased pressure from the business community and lacking a coherent policy of their own, the Liberal government dusted off Mr. Crosbie's Small Business Development Bond proposal for Mr. MacEachen's April 21, 1980, economic statement.

When the finance department, however, began formulating the details of Small Business Development Bonds, they discovered in June, 1980, that financial institutions held approximately $16 billion in existing small business debt, debt that would qualify for the interest rate subsidies through this new program. If rolled into Small Business Development Bonds, this alone would have meant a loss of somewhere between $500 million and $600 million to the federal treasury. With the federal deficit running at over $14 billion, as the previous speaker indicated, the Department of Finance could hardly view with enthusiasm a further massive loss of revenue to this degree.

The Liberal government began to impose qualifications, limitations and exclusions on Small Business Development Bonds. Small Business Development Bond loans then cannot be granted to unincorporated small businesses, including all sole proprietorships. They cannot be used to provide working capital, the most important capital requirements of almost all small businesses. They cannot be used for less than $10,000 or for more than $500,000. They cannot be used to acquire equipment or property for lease or rental to others. They cannot be used to buy second-hand capital equipment and machinery. It may result in stiff penalties at the end of the taxation year if a business holding a Small Business Development Bond ceases to be an eligible small business corporation because its lifetime cumulative earnings surpass $700,000.

Remembering now that the purpose of this legislation was to provide interest rate relief to small business, the effect of the restrictions, excluding the great majority of Canadian small businesses from benefiting under this legislation, is absolutely staggering. We have heard speaker after speaker indicate that one of the highlights of this particular bill was the fact that it would provide interest relief to the small businessman, and indeed it does that.

An hon. Member: You are right.

Mr. Riis: However, of the approximately 930,000 small businesses across Canada, the first restriction excludes over 625,000 firms that are unincorporated small businesses from receiving interest rate relief under the Small Business Development Bond program. Small businesses in the wholesale, retail, construction and manufacturing sectors are required to carry and finance relatively large amounts of inventory in goods and process. Inflation and high interest rates raise dramatically the operating costs of these enterprises.

The great majority of these businesses will not benefit from the Small Business Development Bond legislation because of the second limitation mentioned, expressedly restricting the use of Small Business Development Bond loans from providing working or operating capital, again one of the most crucial financial areas of the small entrepreneur.

Many small businesses are able to hold their start-up or expansion costs down by purchasing used equipment and used machinery. If this second-hand capital stock has been idle or underutilized, its purchase will have contributed to increased production and over-all capacity utilization in the Canadian economy. Under the proposed legislation, Small Business Development Bonds cannot be used to purchase used plant and equipment. This restriction will exclude many small businesses which simply cannot afford the high cost of new plant and new machinery.

Finally, the Small Business Development Bond program as now amended expires on March 31, 1981. The exceptionally short lead time, the failure of the finance department to effectively communicate the details of the program to the financial institutions and the virtually hopeless task of the head and regional offices of those financial institutions to communicate the details to their branches really dooms this program to a large extent before it is even passed in this House.

Contrary to the comments made earlier by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson), saying that this program was available, of course, in the summer and autumn of 1980, which is true, by and large, if one is to look at the way the financial institutions were introducing it across the country, and I think one can realistically say it has been in effect in any real way only in the last number of weeks. In addition, I would agree with what he had to say, that it will really serve in a disproportionate way the large metropolitan centres of Canada rather than the more rural parts of Canada.

The objective of this legislation, that is the Small Business Development Bond, is to provide interest rate relief to Canadian small businesses. Our best and most optimistic estimates of the number of Canadian small businesses which will actually benefit from a Small Business Development Bond is approximately 40,000. This is slightly higher than the unofficial rough estimate of spokesmen for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and the Canadian Organization of Small Business.

Under the Small Business Development Bond program, less than 5 per cent of small businesses across Canada will receive Small Business Development Bond loans at approximately half prime plus 2 per cent or 3 per cent.

An hon. Member: Only losing companies would want them anyway.

Mr. Riis: That is interesting.

An hon. Member: Only those which are not making a taxable profit.

Mr. Riis: The hon. member across the way indicates that only businesses that are losing would be interested in a Small Business Development Bond. That is an interesting observation coming from the Liberal benches.

The question one has to ask is, who benefits from the Small Business Development Bond? If the point I am making, that 40,000 businesses at best are able to benefit out of 930,000, is correct, who is it that benefits from the Small Business Development Bond program? I think that is a fair question to ask.

An hon. Member: The ones that are losing money.

Mr. Riis: Under the legislation, interest payments on a qualifying small business loan entered into after December 11, 1979, and before March 31, 1981, will be treated for tax purposes as dividends. As a result, the interest will not be taxable to the corporate lender, or deductible as a business expense by the small business borrower. Because the corporate lenders will incur no tax liability on the interest received, they will be able to reduce the rate of interest charged.

The legislation not only provides interest rate relief to qualifying small businesses, but also provides a tax shelter to corporate lenders, in particular the chartered banks of Canada.

Over the last number of weeks I have carried out an extensive analysis of the balance of benefits accruing to both corporate lenders and small business borrowers using different interest regimes through the proposed Small Business Development Bonds. On the bases of these calculations, the following observation can be made.

If the conventional loan rate formula is prime plus 1 per cent or 2 per cent, then the banks charging a risk administrative premium of 2 per cent above prime on Small Business Development Bonds will increase their after-tax interest income by a slightly smaller percentage than the small business borrower will have reduced his after-tax cost of credit.

Put another way, perhaps a bit more simply, the small business borrower will benefit relatively more than the corporate lender from the use of a Small Business Development Bond when the rate formula is prime and less than 2 per cent. However, if the conventional loan rate formula is prime plus 2 per cent or more, then banks charging a risk administrative premium of more than 2 per cent, that is prime plus 2.5 per cent, 3 per cent or perhaps even more in some cases, will increase their after-tax interest income by a larger percentage than the small business borrower will have reduced his after-tax cost of credit.

Put another way again, the corporate lender will derive relatively more benefit from the use of Small Business Development Bonds than a small business when the rate is prime and more than 2 per cent.

In order to get a better idea of how benefits from the small business development program are likely to be distributed between small businesses and corporate lenders, I surveyed the average conventional small business loan rates and Small Business Development Bond rate currently offered by a representative sample of banks right here in Ottawa.

It is clear from these interest rate quotations that the chartered banks will be adding sufficient risk administrative premiums above half prime on Small Business Development Bonds to ensure that the benefits under this program is in their favour.

● (2140)

In other words, the real beneficiaries of the small business development bond are the banks of Canada. At the rates they are charging—half prime plus 2 per cent, 3 per cent and 4 per cent—the great beneficiaries are the lending institutions themselves.

Mr. Peterson: Why do you want them extended to other types of small businesses?

Mr. Knowles: Go to your seat if you want to speak.

Mr. Riis: Although the Small Business Development Bond will provide badly needed financial assistance only to a minority of small and medium-sized businesses in Canada, at the most 40,000 it is a step in the right direction—again I recognize that it was not the kind of step the Tory government was prepared to take—in providing recognition that interest rates for small businesses are too high. However, the main beneficiaries will be the banks of Canada. Hundreds of thousands of other businesses in Canada, employing over 2.5 million Canadians, will continue to suffer the burden of high interest rates resulting from the Liberal government's misguided monetary policy.

What is this government saying to the small business community in Canada with this and other policies? Where is the leadership, vision and substance that Canadians have been searching for, hoping for and suffering without for over a decade?

I am a new member of this House. I am also my party's spokesman with respect to matters pertaining to small business, but I find my job of representing the concerns of my constituents and providing responsible input into the legislative process in order to help build a more effective and prosperous small business sector compounded not only by the difficult nature of our economic problems, but also by the secretive and misleading way this House and this country are being manipulated by this government.

Let me give a concrete example of what I mean by being misled and misdirected by this government. We debate today a bill to provide interest rate relief to small business in Canada through the introduction of Small Business Development Bonds. I hope I have been successful in showing that the benefits of this legislation will go to large corporate lenders in the form of higher after-tax profits and a small percentage of Canada's small businesses in the form of lower effective borrowing rates.

The lost revenue to the federal government, approximately $100 million to $200 million, will be made up by Canadian taxpayers.

Only two months ago the Liberals, together with the Conservatives, voted in this House together, over the objections of New Democrats, to pass Bill C-6, revisions to the Bank Act. Our objections centred around the certainty that the legislation, as amended, would not make the banking system in Canada more competitive and would not provide Canadian depositors and borrowers with better services at more competitive and reasonable costs.

What has been the legacy of Liberal and Conservative banking legislation in Canada over the past few decades? Let us have a look at this. An article on the performance of Canadian banking has just been published in the latest issue of the Canadian Journal of Economics. What is interesting about this article is that the study was completed while the author was working with the Economic Council. Though Parliament was considering the latest ten-year revision to the Bank Act, Members of Parliament were never apprised of or provided with the results of this vital and critical analysis. What did the study show? Permit me to quote from the report as follows:

> In this study I have supplied quantitative estimates of the costs to the Canadian public of market power and protection in banking. Although a number of approaches are used, all point toward the existence of extensive market power in Canadian banking markets and the fact that banking services would be priced lower in a more competitive environment.

Another important conclusion in the report is that the federal government is a party to, and apparently gains from, the maintenance of this protection provided to the banks of Canada. In his conclusion the author says, and I quote:

The current status of bank legislation appears to raise costs to Canadian firms and households.

Mr. Orlikow: Who is the author?

Mr. Riis: The author is a fellow by the name of George Lermer. What has been the cost? The cost to Canadians of an uncompetitive banking system is not in the thousands or millions of dollars, but in the hundreds of millions of dollars annually in excessive charges to Canadian businesses and Canadian consumers. The author calculated these costs for the year 1969 through 1973 to be hundreds of millions of dollars.

In 1973, for example, Canadian consumers and businesses paid $686 million too much—I emphasize too much—for loans and other bank services provided by Canada's chartered banks. Of this total, $504 million represents excess charges and profits, net of taxes, resulting from the monopolistic structure and practices of the chartered banks. In addition, more than $182 million in excess taxes were paid by the banks to the government on their super-profits. Let us look at what the Bank Act in its amended form has done for Canadian banks. Investment advisers across this country are advising investors, yes, to purchase a number of energy stocks—perhaps mining stocks in certain parts of the country—but there is one stock with which there is no risk attached, and that is stock in Canadian chartered banks. That should tell us something. That should tell hon. members opposite particularly something about what this new legislation has done in terms of protecting Canadian consumers and Canadian borrowers.

Mr. Evans: May I ask a question, Nelson?

Mr. Riis: In a moment. For decades Liberal and Conservative governments have hailed successful revisions to the Bank Act in the name of greater competition, better service and lower cost to Canadian businesses and consumers.

But that has not been the case. They have created in Canada a banking system which in 1973 overcharged Canadians $686 million, and that allowed the federal government to share in that plunder to the tune of $182 million. These figures are for 1973. In that year the excess charge was equivalent to one third of domestic value added attributable to Canadian chartered banks. I shudder to think what the magnitude of such excess charges are today in 1981. They are likely in excess of $1 billion.

How can the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) come before this House in good conscience and with a straight face telling the Canadian people he is concerned about the cost of living, inflation and the high interest rates small businesses and consumers have to pay? Out of one side of his face the Minister of Finance introduces the Small Business Development Bond to provide limited interest rate relief, and out of the other side of his face—with, I might add, the support of the Tory party—he puts in place banking legislation which will ensure that Canadian small businesses and consumers will be over-charged perhaps billions of dollars in the next ten years for the loans and services the banks will provide.

This is not responsible government. This is government manipulation on a colossal scale. This government has become a master of the politics of wilful deceit, opportunism and certainly of financial irresponsibility. This government has deceived the Canadian people and manipulated the Canadian people, kept from the House of Commons critical information during the debate on the amendments to the Bank Act and throttled the Canadian economy for over ten years with bankrupt and counterproductive economic policies. When one examines the alternatives to small business funding in Canada, one finds that a number of changes are required. I want to take a moment or two to articulate three or four of these. All hon. members of this House who have a great deal of sensitivity would recognize that the Federal Business Development Bank has some problems attached to it in terms of the services it provides to the small entrepreneur.

Here is a bank which started out with excellent intentions and with a mandate to provide that risk venture capital which provides innovative opportunities for Canadian entrepreneurs, and yet I think that unquestionably all members of the House would now recognize that the Federal Business Development Bank has not been successful in carrying out that mandate and that serious changes are required of it.

In my own riding, for example, serious limitations arose recently when a number of very innovative entrepreneurs with a most interesting concept to establish a manufacturing firm, which would certainly assist Canada in the deficit in its balance of payments, went to the Federal Business Development Bank and obtained a loan at an excessively high interest rate which was locked in for a considerable length of time just when the new legislation, the Small Business Development Bond legislation, was being brought forward. They qualified for that relief and then returned to the FBDB and asked to be let out of the commitment they had there, but were told that it would cost them about $35,000 to get out of the commitment. It seems to me that this is the kind of conflict we often find within government where one arm of the government is going one way to provide some assistance and another arm is going another way to provide a similar assistance, and yet there is conflicting legislation which, in a sense, hinders and frustrates the small entrepreneur.

In talking with members of the House from all parties, it becomes clear to me that providing an opportunity to the small entrepreneur to obtain working capital at a lower rate than is possible at present is highly desirable. I urge the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) to give serious consideration under the Small Businesses Loans Act to provide changes in the act to make available similar opportunities for entrepreneurs to obtain working capital. That is one of the handicaps of that act at the moment, and some changes would provide a very exciting and encouraging bonus for Canadian businessmen.

Some years back when government recognized that indeed there was a serious housing crisis looming in Canada, that young people were having a difficult time finding enough money to provide a down payment, the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan was brought in as a scheme under which persons could set aside money in an effort to accumulate enough money for a number of years for a down payment. One of the problems that working Canadians encounter, as I mentioned earlier in the evening, is the inability to set aside funds from their income and to protect them from the tax man as do other sectors of society. I wonder if it would not be worth looking seriously at providing legislation whereby Canadians from all walks of life could set aside a sum of money protected from the tax man over a five-year period, set aside $1,000 to $5,000 in an account so that in five years' time an individual could get together with two or three of his partners and they would have at their disposal $100,000, or $80,000 for a down payment on a small venture, on a new idea. This would provide an incentive, a model, an encouragement for Canadians to invest in the future of their country, to take advantage of that dream, that idea, that concept which I suggest probably exists in one way or another with every Canadian.

Mr. Mayer: It sounds like capitalism to me.

Mr. Riis: It might sound like capitalism to some people. To me it is an opportunity to invest in Canada's future, to provide the much needed venture and risk capital.

Mr. Mayer: For the individual.

Mr. Riis: Call it what you must. I think we all agree in this House that something like this is well overdue. It is the kind of thing which government should provide. It should provide an opportunity and leadership for that particular venture. It does not come from other areas, and perhaps where we differ is in the terms of the role that the government could play.

I should like to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by suggesting that high unemployment, double-digit inflation, a weakening Canadian dollar, plant closings, mammoth deficits in government spending and our balance of payments all point to mismanagement on a scale perhaps unequalled in Canada's history.

This government's preference for manipulation and deceit, its lack of confidence in the Canadian people is nowhere better demonstrated than in its present monetary policy.

The primary objective of monetary policy should be control of the money supply and credit conditions so as to maintain a healthy, stable economic environment. But this government has abandoned this objective in favour of maintaining the value of the Canadian dollar.

It is not coincidental that the countries in the world that are well managed have strong national currencies, and those countries that are poorly managed have weak currencies. Canada's currency is weak because our balance of payments deficit has deteriorated over the years to intolerable levels. No industrial nation in the world relies more heavily on the export of non-renewable resources to maintain foreign exchange earnings than Canada. Our balance of payments deficit on finished manufactured goods per capita is the highest in the world, and we finance much of this deficit by going deeper and deeper into debt through foreign borrowings.

That is why the Canadian dollar is weak. It is weak because of the historical failure of successive federal governments to provide leadership and a sound industrial strategy to ensure a balance between economic growth and manufacturing development in Canada.

The Canadian people know there is something wrong in this country. They want to understand. They want a government that is honest with them, that sees them as responsible participants and that will confide in them. They are prepared to make the necessary sacrifices if these are seen to be fair and equitable.

A policy of maintaining high interest rates to support a dollar that is fundamentally weak is more than an exercise in outdated cosmetics, it is an act of deception wreaking economic havoc from one end of this country to the other. Sooner or later we will be forced to make the difficult adjustments that should have been started years ago. The growing deficit in our balance of payments means that we must consume less from the rest of the world and produce more of what we need at home. We must also begin to sell more in the way of finished goods abroad.

I suggest we should free the Canadian dollar from the grip of this gradualist monetary deception. Interest rates should reflect the requirements for internal stability, and let the balance of payments impose a badly needed discipline on our behaviour as a consuming and producing nation.

We are a resilient and creative people. All we need is a government dedicated to democracy, willing to address the problems head-on and involve the Canadian people in their solution. The present government has failed on all three counts.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the minute that remains, would the hon. member entertain a question?

Mr. Riis: I certainly would, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to Mr. Lermer's analysis which was put forward. I worked with Mr. Lermer in the Economic Council. I wonder if the hon. member knows that Mr. Lermer's suggestion was to let more foreign banks into Canada to improve the banking competition. Could the hon. member tell us where the NDP stood with regard to the entry of foreign banks into Canada in the banking legislation which was just passed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has ten seconds in which to answer.

Mr. Riis: That is a difficult question to answer in ten seconds. I think the answer to the question is clear in that the chartered banks in Canada were quite open and were prepared to welcome foreign banks, which indicates just how successful the legislation was in providing competition.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADA PENSION PLAN—INQUIRY RESPECTING COVERAGE FOR SPOUSES WORKING IN THE HOME

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, October 31, 1980, I put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) with respect to reports attributed to her that she would be bringing in amendments to the Canada Pension Plan which would provide pension coverage for certain persons not now covered, including women who work in their homes. This was my specific question:

I want to ask the minister if she will make a statement at an early date concerning this legislation, and will she make it clear that any coverage for spouses, women who work in their homes, will be universal, not just a case of something made available to those who can afford to pay the premiums?

In her reply, the minister congratulated me on underlining the challenge we face, which is to open up the Canada Pension Plan to housewives. She said that in her view, it was not bad to permit women to pay $35 per month or something over $400 per year to obtain Canada Pension Plan coverage. But her reponse to my concern for those who cannot afford to pay such premiums was that she would not be able to come to the House in the near future with any proposal covering those who work in the home and cannot afford to pay premiums into the Canada Pension Plan.

I do not want to oppose any opening up of the Canada Pension Plan to let people in who are not now covered, but I think it is a gross mistake to open it for those who can afford to pay $400 or $500 per year, yet provide nothing for housewives whose income in the whole family is such that they cannot afford to pay.

As the parliamentary secretary knows, I am an unrepentant and unrevised universalist in social security systems, but I find that frequently when we press for improvement in our universal programs, the government comes back and says, "We must be concerned first with those who are most needy." We all know that the group of people who suffer the most in terms of pensions are unattached women from 55 years of age up and women who never worked in industry and therefore do not have coverage under the Canada Pension Plan. Those are the people who need it most, to use the government's language.

But what has the government done with respect to women in that general age bracket? First of all, a number of years ago it brought in the spouse's allowance and argued that the reason for the spouse's allowance was that two people could not live on one pension. So, the spouse's allowance was provided, but when we argued that it was even more difficult for one person to live on no pension, we got no satisfactory response. I say the spouse's allowance began at the wrong place in trying to cover women who are in need in terms of pensions.

Now what do we have? We have a desire to open up the Canada Pension Plan in two ways. The income tax bill we are debating when we are on government time, Bill C-54, contains a provision which will permit women who are paid by their husbands in any kind of family corporation or family business such as farming to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan and get the coverage they do not have up to this time. In addition, it will permit women who are not being paid by their husbands but who can afford $400 or $500 per year to pay in and get coverage. But that great mass of spouses, women who work in the homes, who never get any special pension coverage, are not touched or covered at all.

Both in the answer the minister gave me on October 31, 1980, and in the statement she made yesterday when she was speaking to Bill C-54, she stressed the point that she would not be able, because of the extreme cost, to cover these people on whose behalf I am speaking. If the government intends to take this action, let it not mouth the idea that it is bringing in plans to help the needy. It is coming at it from the wrong end.

I suggest very strongly, and, Mr. Speaker, you will know to what I refer, that the department call in some of the people who made up the task force which built the Canada Pension Plan. Most of them have retired and some of them may have died, but there are still a few around. I suggest that they be called in and asked to propose ways in which there can be universal coverage for women in the home. I suggest that the simplest way is to provide coverage to anyone who, in any year, is not a contributor to the Canada Pension Plan, by giving such a person a credit of so many percentage points which at retirement would result in an increase in that person's old age pension by what those percentage points amounted to.

I believe the parliamentary secretary will find that some of the members of that ancient task force would agree with that idea. As I say, I do not oppose any increase in the number of people who will get better pensions. I am all for opening it up, but I am terribly disappointed that the minister has gone back on the principle of universality and is making a proposal that will benefit those who can afford to pay the $400 or $500 a year, but which will not help those who need it most. Although the parliamentary secretary cannot give me an answer as to what will be done, since that is a matter of policy, I hope he will pass on my suggestion that there should be a new study of this whole matter.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the women who stay in the home represent 60 per cent of the females of this country. Of the five million females in this country, roughly three million stay at home. The minister has pointed out in the House that the government is now studying ways to provide some form of pension coverage for these women who stay at home. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out that part of the problem which we face, as we learned while investigating other countries in which pension coverage for women in the home is contemplated, is that only those who can afford to pay the contributions will receive benefits at the age of retirement.

This leaves open the whole question of those who are in need but who cannot even afford to pay into the pension plan. The minister is more than aware of the fact that this is one of the major drawbacks which the government must address when it looks at pension reform. I believe the hon. member is aware of the national pension conference which is to be held in Ottawa on March 31, April 1 and 2. This conference will attempt to address many of the problems which face the female component of our population.

There must be a study on this whole question of providing pension coverage to women who stay at home. Some of the alternatives at which we are now looking are a system of mandatory CPP contributions for homemakers, a separate national contributory plan for spouses working in the home, improved survivors' benefits under the existing Canada Pension Plan to mention a few. I realize that there is very little time left to me, but other parts of the plan include, for example, increasing benefits for single persons under the Guaranteed Income Supplement program. These are parameters which must be studied and which the government is actively studying at the present time. One of the government's commitments is to alleviate the situation which largely affects our female population.

UNITED NATIONS—SPECIAL SESSION ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, I am glad to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Frith) in the House at this great moment because he is one who understands the North-South issue as he, with the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) who is also present, and myself, is a member of the North-South task force that has spent a great deal of time on this issue which we are trying to profile in this House.

Tonight I want to ask the parliamentary secretary what he is doing to advance a one-day debate in this House on a government motion to discuss foreign affairs. The last time that this House had a debate on foreign affairs was December 19 and 20, 1977, more than three years ago. An awful lot has gone on in the world since then, particularly regarding the North-South issue. This year the economic summit will meet in Ottawa, as Canada is to be the host. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in the House yesterday following his trip, the North-South question will be foremost on the agenda. It is also likely that a summit of North-South leaders will meet in Mexico next June.

This, then, is the year to discuss North-South issues. But what is the Canadian government's policy on this? That is the fundamental question I am putting to the parliamentary secretary tonight. What is the government's policy? It is a reasonable question.

The North-South task force in which we participated made 38 recommendations and I should like to know which of them the government will take seriously. The Prime Minister has spoken in vague terms about increasing agricultural production and about a recycling process for OPEC funds, but I want to know the details. How can Members of Parliament respond on this issue which is of tremendous importance to the economic stability of our planet and Canada's participation in the North-South dialogue? How can we play our role as parliamentarians following on the committee work if we do not get a handle on what government policy is? I want the parliamentary secretary to address that question.

The Brandt report which has received international acclaim and which studied this issue has put out a full and exhaustive analysis of it. It focused sharply on what ought to be done to break the North-South dialogue so that we can make some progress toward closing the gap between rich and poor. It issued the following four point emergency provisions: first, a large scale transfer of resources to developing countries; second, an international energy strategy; third, a global food program; and fourth, a start on some major reforms to the international economic system. The North-South task force accepted those four emergency provisions and put them not only in the main report but also in the interim report so they have been on the table of this House since last summer. When I raised the question last May, I asked what the government was going to do about the four emergency grant proposals.

I put the question to the Prime Minister yesterday and I invite you, Mr. Speaker, to search Hansard assiduously, as I know you do every morning, and I know you will be unable to find an answer to the question because he did not answer. I ask the parliamentary secretary to address this question tonight.

There is no mystery about how to form a policy, Mr. Speaker. All we need are some basic principles; then we put the policies behind the principles. The six basic principles that ought to be the basis of a guideline for the formulation of a Canadian government policy in this crucial year of 1981 so that Canada can play its role in helping to break this North-South deadlock are the following.

The first principle is to put a floor under poverty. Under that principle would be policy implications about when Canada will reach the .7 per cent of gross national product as official development assistance that is the international target advocated by the UN.

The second principle is international food security. We must do more to increase production, to increase food reserves and we must do a better job on emergency assistance and food crises. Policies could be formulated to support that principle.

The third principle is to have international energy security. In support of that conservation would be highlighted, investment in energy development would be increased, and in particular there would be support for the World Bank's new affiliate on energy to develop energy in the developing countries. Under that principle there would be greater efforts to secure stability of pricing by OPEC, giving them stronger voting rights in international financial institutions so that they too, could play a responsible role in formulating a sound economic policy for the world.

● (2215)

Fourth is to have economic stability to help the developing nations, those which are hardest hit, the oil-importing, least developed nations which had a cash deficit last year of $50 billion while OPEC had a surplus of $115 billion. Something serious has to be done to help rectify that terrible imbalance in the world.

The fifth principle is very simple. It is self-reliance through trade. The North-South task force recommended several sound measures to promote more import and export with developing nations and to do more business with the vastly increasing population-based marketing potential for Canada in many parts of the world.

Sixth is to do something to reduce the terrible disparity between what is spent in the world on arms and what is spent on development. A sum of $500 billion a year is spent on arms; a sum of $30 billion a year is spent on development assistance. This is immoral and does not make any sense. Those are the principles, sir. I have already used up my time and I have not even started. It just shows you how badly we need some time in the House of Commons for those members who really want to participate and help the over-all formulation of a policy by critical input and analysis for which we have a responsibility as parliamentarians.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are two basic questions which the member opposite has raised. One is a major issue and one which he rightly calls for, that is to have some time in this House to debate the whole issue of North-South relations.

With respect to some of the other questions the hon. member has raised, I thought the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) attempted to answer some of his concerns on the various issues that affect the whole North-South dialogue.

Our government has a fair amount of legislation which has to be passed respecting measures included in the budget of 1980. We have a fair amount of legislation which has to come through in terms of enacting the National Energy Program which is a priority for the government. But, at the same time, if the member opposite would get the ear of his House leader and as well if we could have the same take place with members in the New Democratic Party, I am certain, given the importance which the Prime Minister places on the whole North-South dialogue, that perhaps we could have an all-party agreement to arrive at a suitable two-or-three-day debate prior to the summit in July, 1981.

The member has pointed out correctly that the Prime Minister has taken the North-South issue as one of the prime areas he wishes to address in termes of foreign affairs. His recent trip to Europe, Africa, South America and Mexico, which found him meeting with various presidents, is only the first step in which we hope the Prime Minister can play an important role as a facilitator. That is a role I strongly believe Canada can take in trying to get this whole North-South dialogue moving better than it has over the last decade.

I think the member opposite knows about some of the problems inherent when anyone starts to discuss the North-South issue. It is no easy task to convince industrialized countries of their mutual interests respecting countries in the Third World; in other words, the poor countries. Although this government's record is not the best in the western industrialized world, it is by no means the worst. Certainly there is room for improvement. However, the answers which the Prime Minister gave yesterday afternoon were in that vein. The Prime Minister mentioned the government has accepted the 0.5 per cent of gross national product to be the aim of the government by 1985. It accepts in principle the position that it should be at 0.7 per cent by the end of the decade. I think the Prime Minister recognizes that if we are going to accept the 0.7 per cent figure by the end of the decade, there will be a need for a tremendous selling job by parliamentarians on all sides of the House, regardless of party affiliation, to convince Canadians that the funds expended in the area of foreign aid are well spent. That is not simply the job of the government members. If you believe the whole issue of North-South is of paramount importance, I would say that every parliamentarian in this building will have to convince his home county.

NUCLEAR ENERGY—NATIONAL INQUIRY INTO DOMESTIC AND INTERNATIONAL POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise again on a persistent and continuing attempt to extract from the government some kind of information concerning what they are doing with respect to a nuclear inquiry. Let me just outline some of the background in brief, to put it in some context or perspective.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that while we were in government the previous administration had, in fact, brought before the House terms of reference with respect to a national inquiry. This would be a parliamentary inquiry which would review, assess and obtain extensive public input into the consideration of our domestic and international nuclear policy. We considered that a very important initiative taken by our government, since at no time in the course of Canada's history has the national government gone out to obtain public input with respect to nuclear policy. In fact, a number of provincial governments have conducted inquiries to set the basis upon which their policy would move toward. By way of example, I can mention two, Saskatchewan and Ontario. Both of these provinces have had inquiries with respect to the nuclear side of things and also with respect to uranium policy. Yet, the national government has been singularly absent from this kind of inquiry, although it has responsibility and jurisdiction over that particular aspect of our energy policy.

When I first raised this matter last year, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated to me that there would be an internal inquiry conducted, at which time there would be some provision for public input. Subsequently I raised the matter with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). He also responded to me that there would take place an internal inquiry by way of a number of studies which would be released and made available to the public for their input, consideration, observation and, in fact, that there would possibly be an opportunity for a parliamentary inquiry. The basis upon which the Prime Minister responded to me on that first occasion was that he did not think a parliamentary inquiry or a national inquiry, which we had proposed, was appropriate. This was because he felt time was of the essence and quick decisions had to be made in order to determine what the future of our nuclear industry would be.

What I have since discovered is that there is, in my view, none, or very little, action taking place on the part of the federal government with respect to our view of the nuclear policy.

In my estimation and submission, Mr. Speaker, the government has decided the course of action they will take. It has established a team to sell nuclear reactors abroad. It has already made its decision. Mr. Speaker, this is a shell game. There is absolutely no intention on the part of this government to have any sort of public input into what our policies ought to be.

The other side of the coin is that as a result of the lack of any type of inquiry or involvement on the part of the public, or an opportunity for the public to come to grips with this situation, there is a sense among the nuclear and the uranium industries that there is no leadership. In fact, we are facing a government which is giving absolutely no leadership and respect to the nuclear or uranium industries in our country. People do not know where we are going with respect to this matter. There is no indication whatsoever. As I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a shell game because decisions are being made.

If the inquiry which we had originally set up had been proceeded with, we would have had a report to the government by this time with respect to the situation in Canada today. Our government had set a time limit of one year on the original nuclear inquiry. The present government says we must have an internal investigation. They say we must have reports and that these reports will be made public. Our government had internal papers prepared which would have been available for a national inquiry. These papers and studies were available to the government when it took office. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary, if he is attempting to answer again today, that what has happened is that these papers have been available to the government on the basis of a discussion and on a basis upon which there could be public input, yet we have heard nothing, no announcement and we have seen no interest. My only conclusion can be that there is no serious interest on the part of this government in respect of having any kind of inquiry at all. We are faced again with something that is the opposite of the truth from the Prime Minister and from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and they are going to proceed on their own basis without an opportunity given to the people of Canada to in fact have a full public open discussion as to what our policy should be on the domestic and international side.

I will be interested in hearing whether the parliamentary secretary, again at this late date, almost a year after the government has been in office, can give some explanation as to what in fact the government's intentions are, or some indication as to whether we are going to have any kind of inquiry at all with any opportunity for public input.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has mentioned the previous discussion on this subject which he raised back in May. At which time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that the government, in light of the pressing problems facing the nuclear industry in Canada, would undertake an internal review.

Since then the government has indicated on several occasions that the background papers which would form in part the basis for such a review would be released. They include those papers to which the hon. member opposite has referred, the background papers which were prepared for the study proposed by the previous government, which have subsequently been updated. I am pleased to indicate to the hon. member opposite that those papers will be released in the next weeks. Comments and contributions of the Canadian public will be welcomed; indeed, will be solicited in respect of those papers.

The hon. member opposite may also be aware from a recent press comment that additional studies were undertaken; two in fact by the Woods, Gordon consulting group. Those papers will also be made available, with whatever restrictions may be necessary for commercially confidential purposes, a point which I am sure the hon. member opposite would recognize.

Beyond that, of course, we have had the benefit in Canada, as the hon. member has noted, of commissions and inquiries in a number of provinces in Canada; the hon. member mentioned Saskatchewan and two in Ontario. In addition there have been inquiries in British Columbia and New Brunswick. Those papers and contributions have also been taken into account in the review which has been conducted.

At the same time, I should point out to the hon. member, when he refers to what he considers lack of direction in the nuclear policy for Canada, the government has in the specific area of commercial enterprise, which he mentioned, been pursuing new opportunities for sales of Candu reactors abroad. At the moment we are actively pursuing new possibilities in Mexico and Japan and additional possibilities in Korea and Roumania. I do not think in that area there is any lack of direction by the government, as the hon. member suggests.

THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR STATUS OF WOMEN TO BE RELIEVED OF DUTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In the light of the resignation yesterday of Doris Anderson, President of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, protesting gross manipulation of the council by the minister responsible for the status of women who feared the council's February 12 and February 13 conference on the constitution would prove embarrassing to the government, and in the light of the council's original concept to be an advisory council reporting directly to Parliament as an independent body, not a political tool to any minister, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House demands the minister responsible for the status of women be immediately relieved of his duties in order to restore the independence of the advisory council.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR POLICY CHANGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Liberal government's energy policy in threatening nationalization of large and small successful oil companies and imposing increased federal taxes on provincial resources is crippling the oil industry, and whereas these policies are driving businesses and skilled labour and capital out of Canada which will set back oil sufficiency in this country at least ten years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the liberal backbenchers open their eyes to the facts and demand that the Prime Minister change these disastrous policies.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR CANADA

PROPOSED CONNOISSEUR SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Air Canada has announced the establishment of a new connoisseur service effective February 1, 1981, for passengers paying the regular economy fare with special service to avoid line-ups at airports, more spacious seating, complimentary bar and wine service, a first choice of meals, a first choice of magazines and newspapers and priority in boarding and deplaning. Unfortunately, this service will not be available to Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Atlantic Canada where full-fare economy passengers will pay more for less. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House direct Air Canada to renounce second-class treatment for the people of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Atlantic Canada and initiate its new connoisseur service on all domestic flights effective February 1, 1981.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CONSTRUCTION OF PULP AND PAPER PLANT IN MATAPÉDIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, I rise on an urgent matter under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

S.O. 43

In view of the fact that, for the last two years, the people of the Matapédia Valley have been wondering about the possibility of establishing a paper plant in the area; that the solidarity expressed last Monday at a demonstration held at Amqui proved the extent of the frustration of the people of the valley; that the economic situation in that area is characterized by an extremely high rate of unemployment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté):

That the Minister responsible for Regional Economic Expansion reach a decision as soon as possible on the matter, so that the people of the valley will know where they stand with regard to the setting up of a pulp and paper mill in that area.

Madam Speaker: That motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GARRISON DIVERSION

CANADIAN OBJECTIONS TO BE DISCUSSED WITH U.S. PRESIDENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the comments made recently by North Dakota governor Olson calling for the completion on schedule of the Garrison diversion project and his statement that there have been no official statements from Canada that the project would be harmful to Manitoba waters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That Canada's objection to the Garrison diversion project be put on the agenda at the first meeting between President Reagan and the Prime Minister and that a copy of the IJC report which officially explains the harmful effects of the project on Manitoba waters be presented to the governor immediately.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

FAIR SHARE OF BUDGET FOR COMMUNITY NEWSPAPERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and would ask all members of the House to give this motion at least fair consideration. Considering that the federal government is the nation's largest advertiser, spending more than $60 million last year, and recognizing that Canada's small independent newspapers are undergoing pressure from the large newspaper chains, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the members of this House recognize and support our local independent newspapers and request the Minister of Supply and Services to ensure that our small community newspapers receive their fair share of federal government advertising expenditures.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

IDENTIFICATION OF SITES AS REPOSITORIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 with regard to a matter which is becoming increasingly urgent and pressing, namely, the handling, storage and more specifically the permanent disposal of harmful and dangerous substances such as PCBs, which are still widely used by industry throughout the country and will be used for some time, even though replacement materials have been developed, for the reason that there are no facilities available either to safely store or, more ideally, to dispose permanently of substances such as PCBs, which have been proven exceedingly harmful to the environment and dangerous to human health. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That the government through its appropriate agencies and jurisdictions, and in co-ordination with similar agencies in the provinces, begin immediately to identify and prepare suitable sites in strategic locations throughout the country to serve as repositories for dangerous and harmful substances, and having established such repositories, to put in place regulations under which the use of such substances, particularly in the industrial workplace, can be eliminated.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AID

FINANCIAL AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE TO ZIMBABWE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the Canadian International Development Agency's extreme tardiness in living up to the promises made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) for a program of substantial assistance to Zimbabwe following Canada's prompt recognition of the new government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House urge the government to follow through with concrete actions, not just words, on the Prime Minister's spoken concern to increase aid levels when he was in Africa, specifically by directing CIDA to deliver on the promises for financial and technical assistance which were made to the government of Zimbabwe.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE MONARCHY

SUGGESTED VISIT TO CANADA OF QUEEN AND ROYAL FAMILY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an important matter. I am certain that every member of this House recognizes the unique and important role that the monarchy plays in Canada's parliamentary system of government and, indeed, in the very fabric of Canadian society. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House undertake, through appropriate protocol, to invite Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth and the Royal Family to schedule an official visit to Canada during 1981, to celebrate with all Canadians the adoption of the official Canadian national anthem.

Mr. Trudeau: And the new constitution.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Make that 1982 or 1983.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

RESIGNATION OF PRESIDENT—ALLEGED INTERFERENCE BY MINISTER

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the resignation of Doris Anderson as a result of the direct interference by the minister responsible for the status of women into the plans of the advisory council. The Prime Minister may be aware that that interference is documented in the transcript of the proceedings of the executive committee on January 9, which states that the minister strongly suggested that the conference on women in the constitution be cancelled because (a) the timing was bad since the conference was being held at the same time that the charter of rights would be tabled in the House, and (b) it would be an embarrassment to the government.

• (1415)

My question, Madam Speaker, is this. In light of this blatant interference by the minister responsible for the status of women in what is supposed to be an independent council, will the Prime Minister immediately demand that the minister resign from this particular responsibility? He is not responsible in this matter, he is totally irresponsible.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I regret the resignation of Mrs. Doris Anderson. I think she has done a good job and I am sorry to see that she took it upon herself to resign because I would have hoped personally that she would have continued. I understand there was a vote of the members of the council, and the result of that vote, democratically taken by members of that council, was to postpone the conference. Since that was contrary to Mrs. Anderson's opinion, she saw fit to resign which, of course, is her right. I think the hon. lady opposite, in suggesting that the minister was interfering in the process, is really suggesting that that democratic vote was made by irresponsible members of the council, which I would not accept, Madam Speaker.

Miss MacDonald: What we are talking about here is the resignation of the minister responsible for the status of women, and that is what is important to this House. What is at stake, and the Prime Minister must recognize this, is surely the integrity and credibility of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women as an independent body. It has not been allowed to be independent; it has been interfered with. Doris Anderson respected that principle, and she had no difficulty getting along with two previous administrations, both Liberal and Conservative. It is only with this minister that the difficulty has arisen. I ask the Prime Minister, therefore, whether he will immediately demand the minister's resignation from this responsibility or, better still, will he change the mandate of the council so it reports directly to Parliament and is not liable to be the political tool of any minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the answer to the question is certainly not, I would not ask for the minister's resignation. His accomplishments as minister responsible for the status of women since his appointment are very great indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He has introduced measures to ensure affirmative action in the public service, affirmative action clauses in all job-creation programs; he has ensured that a 75 per cent wage subsidy be paid to women in non-traditional occupations; he has ensured that priority be given to job creation which assists women, for instance in day care; he has reduced the minimum insurable hours for unemployment insurance from 20 to 15 hours per week—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. lady opposite knows that 75 per cent of part-time workers are women. He has sponsored a $1 million national ad campaign on women's employment; and he started a review of the unemployment insurance to, among other things, remove discrimination—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Trudeau: He started a review of immigration to help—

Madam Speaker: Order, order. I do want to remind hon. members that when a question is exceptionally long there is no reason why the answer should not be just as long if it is needed.

Mr. Clark: So much for an impartial Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order. This incident is really of no consequence. Let us resume the Oral Question Period. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

● (1420)

ALLEGED MANIPULATION OF COUNCIL MEMBERS BY MINISTER

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my final question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women, who could take a look at the example set by Doris Anderson with respect to adherence to principle. The minister stated flatly the other day—it is recorded in Hansard—that "at no time was pressure applied". In a documented chronology of events leading up to this fiasco the minister's assistant, Nancy Connolly, reported to Doris Anderson and to the executive committee on January 7 that the minister was determined that the conference must be changed and regional conferences scheduled instead.

In light of that documentation and in light of that evidence—and there is much more—I would like to ask the minister if he is still trying to weasel out of the charge that pressure has been brought to bear and that members of the council were manipulated by his office and therefore whether this whole matter should require his resignation from that particular responsibility.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it may be of some interest to the hon. member to know that in reference to that particular document the members of the executive committee who were at that meeting have signed a legal affidavit stating that the document is full of misrepresentations. That affidavit has been deposited with a lawyer. I do not know what the document says. I have not seen it. Obviously, the hon. member was privy to a confidential document to which no one else is, but I do know that an affidavit was deposited with a lawyer saying that the document was ill prepared.

I simply repeat to hon. members of this House that political pressure was not applied. The meeting referred to was requested by the members of that executive committee. They asked for an opinion; I gave them an opinion. I told them the decision was theirs to make and that we would live with the decision either way. That decision has been made by the executive committee and ratified by the entire council. That is a democratic process, and those who argue for the independence of the council should be reminded that the best way to preserve that would be to respect the decision made by a council of people who are very dedicated to the cause of women in this country.

SUGGESTED RESTRUCTURING OF COUNCIL

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, in the light of the controversy over what has or has not been said in terms of decisions being imposed from above upon the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and in the light of the public reaction personified by Lynn MacDonald, the president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, which represents 150 women's groups across the country, when she said that her group will have to rethink its position regarding a government-appointed advisory council, would the Prime Minister give serious consideration to restructuring the advisory council and widening its representation so that women's groups across the country can rely on the council to be impartial in the opinions it gives?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to answer the hon. member by saying that we would certainly be prepared to examine any improvements to the council which could be made, but I want to suggest that the council has already proved its real value through the work it has done in making major recommendations with respect to the constitution. Those representations were accepted by the government as part of our amendments to the charter. In fact, hon. members on this side of the House are the only ones who have strongly endorsed that particular plank and included it in our charter of rights, with which the opposition is in total disagreement. If anyone defends women's right, it is certainly this party, but we are prepared to meet with members of the council and discuss how their operations and procedures could be improved.

RECOMMENDATION THAT COUNCIL REPORT TO PARLIAMENT

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, what the minister is saying is that the council will continue as a political tool. My supplementary question is addressed to the Prime Minister, and it is on a matter of policy in relation to the council and to this House. A 1970 recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was that the council should report not to a minister but through a minister, as does the Human Rights Commission and as does the Auditor General. Women represent 52 per cent of our nation, and they ought to be heard. While there are many able women here, women are still underrepresented. Will the Prime Minister act upon that recommendation and see that this House receives reports of the actions of the advisory council?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will gladly look into that suggestion and ensure that a report on it is made to me. I just want to emphasize, in reply to what was said by the minister responsible, that at least we on this side have introduced a constitutional charter, binding on all Canadians, which would prevent discrimination against people on the basis of sex. I noticed last night that the hon. gentleman's party has copped out on that. They suggested they are prepared to defend rights when everybody in every province in Canada agrees, but, of course, we know from what happened in September that several provinces are against the infringement of rights, with the result that obviously the hon. gentleman's party has copped out on this again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

WIDER REPRESENTATION OF WOMEN ON COUNCIL

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister, who knows that we in this party urge very strongly—indeed I made a speech in the House—that the wholly inadequate section 15 be amended, and indeed it was a few weeks ago. The person behind that thrust was, of course, Doris Anderson; I think the right hon. gentleman knows that. The minister responsible for the status of women—and perhaps the Prime Minister does not know this—made three different speeches in this country, in Newfoundland, Montreal and Saskatchewan, in which he said that the proposals of the council under Doris Anderson were not good, that they had had bad legal advice.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that people in the whole of this country, and particularly of course the women, 51 per cent of the population, have written letters and telegrams of support to Mrs. Anderson for her position of protecting the integrity and independence of the council, and in view of the fact that one reason we are all so concerned is that there are patronage appointed people on the council and they do not have credibility in the eyes of the public—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett: Doris Anderson was the one person—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Miss Jewett: I would like to ask the Prime Minister—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was just about to ask her question. I would encourage her to do that.

Miss Jewett: I will, Madam Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would seriously consider having the council made up of people who are genuinely representative of all the women of Canada, ensuring they represent the immigrant women, the native women, the trade union women, the working women, and so on, in much the same way as other councils are made up. Would he consider that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as regards the preamble which the hon. lady put to her question, I agree, and that is why in my first answer this afternoon I said I regretted the resignation of Doris Anderson. I think she has done some good work. I would point out that in bringing in our amendment on the equality provisions in the constitutional charter we were happy to do so on the advice of the council and of many people in the country.

I want to remind the House and the hon. member that the first draft of the charter was based on the desire to get as many provinces as possible supporting us. The hon. lady knows, because I know she is in contact with the government of at least one province, that the provinces generally are against this non-discrimination provision, and that is why we have waited for the pressure to mount on the provincial governments as well as on us to strengthen the provisions of the charter.

In so far as her suggestion for appointing members to the council is concerned, I will look into it, as I said to the previous questioner. It was my impression that members of the council were indeed representative of women in all walks of life. The fact that they are appointed by the government, it seems to me, does not mean that they are captive citizens, nor does the fact that ten voted against the proposition to hold the conference in May rather than in February and 17 voted in favour. What is the hon. lady saying, that the 17 should be smeared as irresponsible but that the ten, because they agreed with her, should be treated as responsible? Should we replace only the 17 and keep the ten? I think the hon. lady is on a bad course of logic in suggesting somehow the members of the council acted undemocratically and as tools of the government when they voted in this democratic fashion.

• (1430)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, the fact that some of the members on the council who voted to keep the conference in February were Conservative—because of course the hon. gentleman knows the Conservatives also made appointments—does not remedy the problem. Therefore I repeat my question to the Prime Minister. Would he not think it advisable, now that the credibility of the council is destroyed—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett: —to have a new council, comparable to, say, the Economic Council of Canada, whose members would represent, for example, labour, native peoples, native women and other immigrant women? Would it not be better that they be on the council, not because they are Liberals, Conservatives or whatever, not because their first loyalty is to the government—

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, in all her questions the hon. lady suggested that somehow the politics of the members of the council influence their decisions. First, I do not know how she establishes the politics of those who voted on one side or the other. She said that the ten are presumably Conservatives. I do not have the names, does she? Does she know the politics of the members? It seems to me that if she does—and the hon. lady said she does—she is precisely contributing, as the other questions today, to destroying the credibility of this council by suggesting they acted politically. We do not believe it, but if hon. members continue to say it, of course its credibility will be destroyed.

I do not think anyone will find a way to name members of the council who have no politics at all. What will we do then? Should we ask their politics before accepting their appointment or count their politics every time they vote? It seems to me the parties opposite, in the name of protecting women, are in the process of destroying democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, since most of the women of Canada in fact question the credibility of the council—

Mr. Trudeau: How do you know that?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett: I wonder because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett: Since the majority do—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I wish the hon. member would ask questions and not make so many statements. I have allowed a few but my patience is coming to an end. Questions, please.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, I have one final question for the Prime Minister. Would he, as he has already been requested, seriously consider finding among his ranks someone who is genuinely concerned about women and the independence of the advisory council to be the minister responsible for the status of women?

Mr. Nielsen: A hopeless task.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I had begun to answer that question earlier when the opposition howled with anguish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I will continue the list of achievements of the minister since the month of April, 1980.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Trudeau: Apart from all these things, we established a task force to look at the situation of foreign domestics. We have put forward—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): He is entitled to answer.

Madam Speaker: Could I ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister to answer his questions briefly?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker. The answer is no.

THE BUDGET

ALLEGED INCONSISTENCIES IN TAXATION POLICY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance; it concerns the thrust of the tax policy in his recent budget. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on many occasions said that self-sufficiency is the number one objective of the government in energy policy. If that is the case, surely the policy should be to encourage production and discourage consumption.

In view of the fact that the policy set out in the budget of the Minister of Finance is clearly to discourage production through the 8 per cent tax and the excise tax on natural gas, and that clearly consumers are not sensing any comparable strong action to promote conservation, how does the minister explain this inconsistency in his policy with the objectives of the program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, it is clearly there. If the power of logic on the part of the Minister of Finance is not any better than that, I hesitate to guess what the next budget will indicate.

Canadianization is another one of the key objectives of the government in the national energy policy. Surely the tax policy should try to impact less upon Canadian-owned companies in the industry. Because Canadian-owned companies are primarily in the production area, the impact upon them is much greater than it is upon multinationals engaged not only in production but refining, petro-chemicals and marketing. Would the minister explain again the inconsistency in his tax policy with the objectives of the National Energy Program?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member says again that there are inconsistencies. He makes his own assumptions and attributes them to the budget and the National Energy Program. We do not accept this total disagreement shown by the hon. member with the objectives of the National Energy Program and with the methods taken to implement them, which in my opinion are widely supported by the people of Canada, if not by his party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GARRISON DIVERSION

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER DISCUSS PROJECT WITH PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister; it concerns the Garrison diversion project. As the Reagan administration is now in place, would the Prime Minister assure the House that the diversion project will be on the agenda for discussion in his first meeting with President Reagan and once again express our concerns over the diversion, especially if the entire project is completed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have raised this matter in previous meetings with the then president of the United States, as I am sure the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition did in his meetings. I will continue to do so.

REPORTED STATEMENT OF GOVERNOR OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The governor of North Dakota has made some very startling statements. He is reported as saying: "What we've heard from Canada has been unofficial." Also he said that no evidence has been presented that there will be any harmful effects to Manitoban waters. Will the minister assure us that he will contact the governor of North Dakota and at least give him a copy of the IJC report? Perhaps the minister could telephone the governor to explain these facts of life, because he is calling for the completion of the entire project.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, certainly I will see to it that the governor of North Dakota receives a copy of the IJC report. I suspect he is already very familiar with it and chooses to interpret it in his own way, but I know he and others in that region are very concerned because the government of the United States has been co-operating with us in not using funds Congress voted in any way which would imperil our waters. So we have been receiving the co-operation of the United States administration. It is that very fact which is distressing some of the local politicians in that area of the United States.

DISARMAMENT

PROLIFERATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS—SAUDI ARABIAN GRANT TO PAKISTAN

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On Monday it was reported that the government of Saudi Arabia would give $800 million to the government of Pakistan to finance that government's development of a nuclear weapon. All Canadians view with alarm the growing proliferation of such weapons throughout the Third World. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if, during the course of his visit to Saudi Arabia in November, he tried to impress upon the Saudi government the danger to world peace of such proliferation. Further, would he now promise to use all the diplomatic powers of the Canadian government to persuade the Saudis of the inadvisability of this particular grant to Pakistan?

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to a news report of yesterday. I do not know if it is accurate, but if it was made yesterday, it certainly could not have been brought to my attention before going to Saudi Arabia. I undertake, to keep the hon. gentleman's representations in mind when I return to Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, I realize the report just came out, but I anticipated that it might have been a matter of discussion since there had been previous talk about an Islamic bomb.

In the Speech from the Throne last April the government promised to "continue its strategy to suffocate the deadly growth in the nuclear arsenals of the world." Since April there has been very little noticeable suffocation, aside from the appointment of the ambassador for disarmament. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he can tell us whether or not his government has a real battle plan to bring about this suffocation. If so, will he bring it before this House as soon as possible so we can debate it?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, apart from appointing an ambassador for disarmament, who has been working along the lines which were suggested by me in the speech on disarmament to the United Nations, we have also appointed ex-Ambassador Ford as a member of the Palme commission on disarmament.

As for the hon. gentleman's suggestion that we debate these questions, our party would be happy to do so. I think hon. members of this House know that between now and, perhaps, the next six weeks, we have a very busy agenda doing precisely the things which the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party has suggested we do; that is to say, to pay more attention to the economy at home. When we have passed the measures of the Minister of Finance and have begun to deal with the constitution, then we on this side of the House would be happy to find a day to debate international affairs, particularly disarmament. Of course, if between now and then the opposition find it to be one of their priorities and wish to devote one of their days to international affairs, we might accept that suggestion and begin a debate earlier.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAN—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In today's Globe and Mail the minister is quoted as saying that the hostage-taking in Iran was abominable and a gross affront to all decent, civilized people. He is also quoted as saying that our embassy in Iran will be reopened within weeks. In view of these statements, would the minister explain the haste in re-establishing ties with Iran? Would he assure the House that no Canadians will be posted to Iran against their will so that they will have to serve with these indecent, uncivilized, international bandits?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has correctly quoted me on one part of my statement and incorrectly on the other. I certainly did strongly condemn the actions of the Iranians during the period of captivity for the American hostages. I said that we would likely re-establish diplomatic relations on a full scale, not within weeks but within months, some time in 1981. It is certainly not something which we will be rushing into. However, we will be removing the sanctions within weeks, since they were imposed for the specific period the hostages were held captive, just like other countries.

I assume the hon. member knows, as this House knows, that every Department of External Affairs officer is always prepared to go voluntarily to wherever in the world he is needed.

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

SPONSORSHIP OF CONFERENCE—SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF MATTER TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is responsible for the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. It is obvious from responses of the Prime Minister that he does not consider the minister to be worthy to axe.

I would like to ask the minister about a matter which has been bothering me and a great many Canadians. Why did the minister consider that the conference, which was to be sponsored by the advisory council, would be an embarrassment to this government?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I have explained to this House several times—perhaps the hon. member was not in his chair during those times—when my opinion was solicited as to why I thought the conference might be better held at another time we simply said there were a number of reasons. The most important reason was the fact that the recommendations had already been put forward to the cabinet by the advisory council. They had been accepted by the cabinet and recommended to the constitutional committee. Therefore, there was an opportunity for us to start looking at a second round of issues, particularly those dealing with family law, federal-provincial relations, childcare services and others. After my talks with a number of women's groups across this country, I felt they required more information and discussion so that they could bring those recommendations and ideas before the first ministers' conference, which will be held after the constitution is returned to Canada. That was the primary reason. When the question was posed to me it may be that I said, as part of the conversation, that it was certainly not my primary concern, that it was really to make sure that there would be a proper opportunity for a broad-scale discussion to take place across this country.

I repeat, Madam Speaker, that was an opinion which I offered. It was not in any way an attempt to impose an opinion; it was simply advice that I was giving. I understand the reason for the skepticism of members opposite since they are skeptical about everything, but those happen to be the facts, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the reason I may not have been in my chair is that the answers given by the minister usually cause me to lurch from the chamber to the washroom. On the basis of the minister's statement and the timetable imposed by the Prime Minister, theoretically the constitution is to be passed by the British parliament by the time all this preliminary work has taken place.

In effect, Doris Anderson, the president of the advisory council, has called the minister a liar. Since the minister's integrity has been attacked, I want to ask him whether under these circumstances he will not do the right thing, as he did with the O'Leary matter and with respect to the question of the Royal Albert Arms, and move a motion to have this whole matter referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, where witnesses can be heard under oath?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This would give the minister a chance to clear himself with respect to this scandalous interference with the advisory council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I am not responsible for the condition of the hon. member's kidneys or any other part of his anatomy. I suggest to him that in this case the facts have been put forward. Those who had to make the decision were members of the executive committee and the council. It would be very worth while if members of the opposition would provide that council of independent people, who have been committed to women's rights, with the recognition that they made that decision, without bringing it into question.

STATUS ACCORDED COUNCIL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): My question has to do with the question of respect for the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I wonder if the Prime Minister will tell the House if there is a policy reason as to why that council should not report to Parliament in the same way the Auditor General, the Economic Council of Canada and the Commissioner of Official Languages reports to Parliament. Is there a policy reason why the Government of Canada gives the council second-class status, reporting to a minister and not to Parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has been prime minister. He will recall that there are two kinds of advisory councils, two kinds of originators of advice to the government. There are many different councils which advise the minister directly, such as advisory councils in trade, health and welfare, immigration and sports. They advise the minister so he can keep their advice in mind when introducing legislation. I do not think these are second-class councils, or second-class people, to use the expression of the hon. gentleman opposite. If they were, why did he not make a change when he was prime minister? Why did he not make them all first class?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that we had legislation under preparation which would—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Clark: —change the status of that council. The policy decision was taken by the government I had the honour to lead to put the Advisory Council on the Status of Women on an equal footing with the Commissioner of Official Languages, the Economic Council of Canada, the Auditor General and other bodies of that kind.

I repeat my question to the Prime Minister with respect to policy. Why will he not follow the example we set? Why will he not accord to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women that first-class priority, that right to be free of manipulation and that right to report directly to Parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, since the question is repeated, I repeat my answer. I do not suggest that all members of advisory councils who report to ministers are manipulated. If the hon. gentleman thinks that, he should have changed them all. There are advisory councils to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce composed of respectable businessmen and union leaders. Does he suggest that they are being manipulated because they do not report directly to Parliament? I hardly think so.

● (1450)

In so far as following the right hon. gentleman's "example", he suggested that legislation was in preparation. Well, he knows this; this seems to be the kind of statement ex post facto like the one when he said there was an agreement on energy with Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There was.

Mr. Trudeau: If there was, why does he not produce it?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister can play what games he wishes. The public is catching up with him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It caught up with you, Joe!

Madam Speaker: Order. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Clark: May I ask the Prime Minister a simple question, Madam Speaker. As a matter of policy, is it the intention of the Government of Canada to preserve the status of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women as one which reports to a minister—a minister who on the record has manipulated that council, or will he, as a matter of policy, change that status and give the women of Canada the right and confidence of knowing that their council will not have to report through a filter that manipulates but will report directly to this House of Commons?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman continues his accusation of manipulating which I suggest is not only offensive to the minister but to the so-called manipulees. I wish the Leader of the Opposition would give me a list of the people who have been manipulated on this council. We would undertake to remove them.

I would also ask, if he wants to change the nature of that council, how many other councils there are, the nature of which should be changed, according to the hon. gentleman?

Mr. Andre: One for now.

Mr. Trudeau: They are suggesting one for now, but what about tomorrow and the next day?

Mr. Andre: What difference does it make?

Mr. Trudeau: What difference? I think if the hon. gentleman is asking for a policy statement, he should have a policy.

Mr. Clark: We do.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What is yours?

Mr. Trudeau: All he is able to give us are the "might have beens" of his government—had they remained in office they had legislation in preparation. We know about this kind of "might have been". That is what the Leader of the Opposition is—a great might have been.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: "Might have been Joe".

Mr. Clark: Better than a fraud.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED WASTE DISPOSAL SITE AT SOUTH CAYUGA, ONT.

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. The minister will recall that on December 9 last I raised a question pertaining to the announced intention of the province of Ontario to transport all their industrial toxic waste through the populated heartland of southern Ontario and dispose of it on agricultural land in the Niagara Peninsula lying between Lake Erie and the Grand River. The minister informed me at that time that his department would look into the matter and inform me at a later date. I would ask the minister now if this matter has been looked into and, if so, what decision has been arrived at by his department.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it is true that my department is aware of the proposals and has looked into them. In some ways I am naturally tempted to respond to the hon. member that he himself should get in touch with the government of Ontario directly, which is, of course, a government formed by members of his party. That government has the basic responsibility for the determination of disposal sites within the province.

I could say to him, however, since he has asked for a comment from me, that it is my view that it would probably be preferable if the government of Ontario were to establish a general policy on the criteria and conditions which should be applied to the location of those sites before determining the individual sites which are to be found, rather than to proceed in an ad hoc way looking at one site and another. I am reluctant, Madam Speaker, and you will understand why, to be overly critical of the activities of the government of Ontario in this regard. In a general way we recognize that there is a need to find sites for the safe disposal of hazardous waste, and also in a general way, through the meetings of the Council of Resource and Environment Ministers, we have promised to co-operate as much as we possibly can with that process.

Mr. Bradley: Madam Speaker, I have been in contact with the provincial government of Ontario, as have many other concerned people in the province. My supplementary question is also for the Minister of the Environment. There is a sense of urgency about the matter. In spite of the fact that 46 communities have supported the town of Dunnville and the region of Haldimand-Norfolk in their resolution requesting an adequate environmental assessment and hearing into this matter, the province has ignored their pleas and has announced the initiation of expropriation procedures. The concern felt in the Lake Erie area now, Madam Speaker, is not about acid rain but the possibility of acid drain.

I would ask the minister of the government supports proper environmental assessment and hearings on issues as important nationally as toxic waste disposal. If so, will it take whatever steps are available to it to ensure that the people of southern Ontario, and all people in the lower Great Lakes area, are properly protected against the potential of Love Canals in Canada through proper environmental assessment and hearings?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, clearly I am sympathetic to the concerns that the hon. member has expressed, but I am sure he would be one of the first in the House to protest if I were to take actions which were to pre-empt the legitimate responsibilities of the provinces. We are concerned in this area to proceed in conjunction with, and with the co-operation of, provincial governments. It seems to me that up to this point that has shown itself to be the most effective way in which we can proceed. On several occasions I have talked with or written to or been in communication with the provincial governments to draw to their attention our concerns about the necessity of detecting or finding possible locations of past dump sites which presently constitute a hazard to ecology or to human health. The response from some governments, and I would have to say the response from the government of Ontario, has been very supportive and forthcoming; it is less so, perhaps, on the part of some other provinces. As a result, I have indicated that I intend to raise this matter at the next meeting of the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers.

COMMUNICATIONS

LICENCE RENEWALS AND TRANSFERS—PROVISION OF POLICY GUIDELINES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I am sorry that the Minister of Communications is not with us this afternoon; I intended to raise a series of questions with him on this particular matter. Perhaps they could be taken as notice or I would welcome a reply from any minister who responds for him.

The minister's department commissioned what was known as the Babe-Slayton report concerning licence renewals and transfers. One of the things that the report did was to lambaste private TV broadcasters for failing to comply with the aims of the Broadcasting Act. It further called for competitive licensing procedures in transfer situations or in renewal situations as one means of making stations live up to their promises regarding Canadian programming.

Why has the minister shelved this report? Why have we heard so little about it? If he has not shelved it, when is he going to provide the CRTC with the policy guidelines it has strongly requested so that it no longer has to operate in a policy vacuum on this very important matter?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Communications is away from the House today on important government business regarding the National Film Board's affairs. I note that the hon. member indicated he had a series of questions to ask. In view of the fact that we are near the end of the question period, perhaps the best thing would be for me to take notice of those questions and ensure that the Minister of Communications is aware of the hon. member's concerns in order that he can respond fully when next in the House.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, the absence of a policy of competitive licensing recently allowed a Toronto-based cable conglomerate, a monster, to gobble up a Victoria cable company, despite the fact that as far back as 1977 Capital Cable Co-op had been promised that the department would deal "fully and fairly with the matter". I ask that the minister be informed of my question. Why did he not set aside the CRTC decision to allow Canadian cable systems to proceed in that application, especially when, at the time he refused to set it aside, he had the Babe-Slayton report in his hands recommending quite the opposite procedures?

● (1500)

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, as I have already told the hon. member, I will draw these questions to the attention of the Minister of Communications who, I am sure, will want to reply to them very fully as soon as possible.

RAILWAYS

ABANDONED RIGHTS-OF-WAY IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Since the minister has accepted the policy of his predecessor, the hon. member for Vegreville, to transfer the rail rights-of-way abandoned in western Canada to the provinces and interested individuals, could he update the House on the standing of that process and whether the order in how many other is about to be signed making this possible?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the discussion about these matters is going on with the provinces. However, we are discussing now only those rights-of-way which have been the subject of an agreement between the department and the railways. As far as I can recall though, the discussion is still being pursued. Some provinces would like more than what the government is in a position to offer but the impression I have from recent conversations with officials on that matter is that we are getting close to a resolution of it.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, could the Minister of Transport inform the House about the problems in these negotiations? He mentioned, as I recall, that some provinces wanted more transfers. Could the minister explain which provinces are giving his department difficulty and for what reason?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I cannot detail the position of each one of the provinces on this matter, but I will do so in a conversation with my hon. friend.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. EPP—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. AXWORTHY

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arose this afternoon out of an exchange with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) during question period.

I think it is important to the House that the record be clear. The minister can play fast and loose with what are details on the public record, but I want to tell him, and you, Madam Speaker, very clearly, that while he might disagree with components of any propositions made by anyone in this House, or for that matter any components of the charter, this party has endorsed the charter. That has been done quite clearly, in public and on the record. I would ask the minister to keep that in mind and I ask that he not use something which is obviously not in keeping with the facts. If he has regained his ability to read facts, I will send him a copy of the proposal.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has made his point, and I will allow that.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GAMBLE—DELAY BY MR. MACGUIGAN IN ANSWERING QUESTION

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of a question which I asked in this House on January 16. It was directed to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) but responded to by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). As reported in Hansard at page 6271, the question reads:

Madam Speaker, my question should be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister, who will know that last week Canadians, including a renowned Canadian author and columnist, Barbara Amiel, were incarcerated in the Mashava prison in Mozambique during which time Miss Amiel almost expired as a consequence of contracting tropical diseases. Having regard to the fact that both Canadians were incarcerated without just cause by the government of that country, has the Government of Canada sent a stern note of protest to the government of Mozambique for the harsh and uncivilized treatment accorded Canadian citizens?

The issue which gave rise to that question was important not only to the House but to all Canadians, Madam Speaker. It involved the entry into Mozambique by two Canadians, one of whom was referred to in the question, and an American companion. These people were denied the right to leave that communist-controlled country. When they endeavoured to do so in the usual course of their travels, they were detained by the immigration authorities of Mozambique. They were ultimately imprisoned, having been arrested by the secret police of Mozambique. Both Canadians carried Canadian passports and requested the right and opportunity to consult with and seek the protection of Canadian consular officials. The facts are that while Canada has an ambassador to Mozambique, he resides, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs will know, in Zambia.

Fortunately, between the time of the original detention by the immigration authorities and the time of the arrest by the secret police, one of the three people was able to place a telephone call to the United States consulate in Mozambique. After being imprisoned from December 31 to January 8 in the Mashava prison, a place where one in Canada would not countenance the housing of animals, they were released as a consequence of the activities of both the U.S. consular officials and the consular officials of Great Britain.

Immediately after release they were questioned by Canadian consular staff in Johannesburg. According to the Canadian ambassador to Mozambique he has filed a complete report and an analysis of the occurrences.

I submit this issue concerned the duty and obligation of the government of this country to protect its citizens when travelling abroad, and to see they are granted access to Canadian consular staff abroad. Nations, such as Mozambique, which have denied Canadian citizens travelling to their country the right of that access, should be subject to the stiffest of diplomatic notes of protest which this government can issue. In my submission, instead of that, the government has acted as a spineless coward in failing to respond to this customary need which Canadian citizens travelling outside of Canada should expect from their national government.

The President of the Privy Council responded to my question, found at page 6271 of Hansard, as follows:

Madam Speaker, seeing the Secretary of State for External Affairs is absent, I shall take notice of the question of the hon. member and convey his views and suggestions to the Secretary. I shall make sure that the hon. member gets a reply as soon as possible.

I have not as yet received a reply from either the President of the Privy Council, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or anyone acting for or on their behalf. Imagine my surprise when I read an article in yesterday's Toronto Star by Ellie Tesher, who gave an account of having communicated with the Department of External Affairs and of having been advised by the department that no note of protest had in fact been dispatched by the Government of Canada to the government of Mozambique.

Miss Tesher made reference to having spoken to someone in the Department of External Affairs. Of course, not preferring to rely on an article which appeared in a newspaper, I spoke to Miss Tesher. She confirmed the accuracy of the account which appeared in the paper and gave me the name of the official at the Department of External Affairs, whom I contacted. The person in question did not deny the accuracy of the article which I mentioned to her, having first examined and read it in the newspaper.

This question of privilege is not based upon my complaint that the minister of the Crown or any minister of the Crown has not answered a question in the House. I clearly recognize that if that were the substance of my objection and my question of privilege, it would be without foundation. However, it is based upon the failure of a minister of the Crown to honour an undertaking which he gave to me as a member of the House of Commons.

Let me say in fairness that the minister might allege that the time limitation included within the phrase "as soon as possible" has not yet expired. If that is the case, why is it that a newspaper reporter can, by the simple expedient of picking up a telephone, contact the Department of External Affairs and obtain all of the information which is not available to a member of the House of Commons?

The proceedings in this House become a laughing matter if question period gives rise to the simple deferral of issues which are important not to individual members but to the whole conduct of the affairs of this House. I am not alleging that there is a deliquency in failing to respond to a question, but that there is a refusal to commit the completion of an undertaking which has been given by a minister of the Crown to this House and to one of the members thereof.

The House is not well served by a failure of the kind I have described. I submit it is incumbent upon ministers of the Crown to discharge their obligations given in this House, without which the House cannot properly function. I therefore move:

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for attention.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the rather turgid presentation of the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) has certainly not contributed to an understanding of this problem. The reason why he has not got an answer, and the reporter whom he quotes did get an answer, is simply that they were asking different questions. The reporter was asking whether a note of protest has yet been sent. The answer to that is clearly no. The hon. member asked whether such a note will be sent. On that question of whether a note will be sent, we have not yet reached a final decision.

I wish to tell the hon. member and the House that, on the basis of the facts as we possess them at the present time, there is no foundation for any note of protest. The facts are as follows: Miss Amiel and two companions, one of whom is a travel agent, would have been presumed to know that when entering Mozambique a visa is needed. They entered Mozambique from a country which does not have close relations with Mozambique, South Africa, and which in itself is probably a suspicious factor for the Mozambique authorities.

They entered without a visa as required by Mozambique law. On attempting to leave Mozambique, they therefore had no valid visa on entry and no stamp on their passport. They were apparently detained because of the illegal entry. Within the bounds of Mozambique law, as far as we can ascertain, that seems to be a valid offence.

They were held rather long because of the holidays. We do not have a resident mission in Mozambique. I might say we are very grateful to the British and the American officials, especially the British ambassador, who assisted us in getting these people released from that country. I might add that our High Commission in Lusaka dispatched notes of thanks to those who rendered us this service.

While the circumstances of the tensions were undoubtedly very bad, there is no evidence that they were any worse than those to which citizens of Mozambique are normally exposed and to which others charged with the same offence would be subjected. In other words, there is no evidence of unusual treatment at all. On the basis of those facts as we now have them, there would be no grounds for a letter of protest.

The reason we have not yet answered the hon. member is precisely that we are awaiting a full report from our High Commissioner in Lusaka as to whether there are any other facts or aspects of the problem of which we are not aware. When we have received that final report and make a final decision on whether to send a letter of protest, at that point we will be in touch with the hon. member and give him the answer to which, I agree, he is entitled. However, at the present time there is no foundation to the question he has raised.

Madam Speaker: I am prepared to rule on the question. It is obviously not a question of privilege. The hon. member went to some length to say he was not complaining because he was not satisfied with the answer, but he was not satisfied with the way in which the minister dealt with the commitment he seems to have made to him, inside or outside the House. That, too, is a complaint. The hon. member might be highly dissatisfied with the sense of urgency of the minister and he can complain about it, but that in itself does not constitute a question of privilege.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. MACGUIGAN

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) would not want to mislead the House, but had he checked Hansard for January 16, 1981, page 6271, column two, the question asked by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) was "has the Government of Canada sent a stern note of protest to the government of Mozambique". To convert that into "will the government be sending" was, I am sure, inadvertently misleading.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member has raised a separate point of order, let me say that I was giving the sense of the undertaking. If all the hon. member wants to know is whether a note has been sent, obviously a note has not been sent. Surely what he wants to know is whether we will protest. He can ask the same question every day. I interpret the question to mean that when we have made a decision as to whether we are going to send a note or not, will we let the hon. member know, and, Madam Speaker, we will do that.

Madam Speaker: I am not sure whether that is a point of order. However, that exchange was probably conducive to bringing out more information. We will leave it at that.

MR. HNATYSHYN—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order in light of an exchange that took place between members of our party and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). During the course of his response, as I recall it, the minister said he was in the process of obtaining affidavits by members of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, ostensibly to proceed to undermine the chairman, Miss Anderson.

I rise on this point of order to reserve the right, after having had an opportunity of reviewing the transcript of the official Hansard, to see what the minister in fact stated, with a view to determining whether a question of privilege should be raised tomorrow. I do that as well because of the absence of the minister at this time. I think it would be appropriate for me to look at the situation to determine whether he is making reference to a collection of these affidavits, and, if that is the case, to request that these affidavits be made public and tabled in the House of Commons. I simply bring that point of order to Your Honour's attention.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,000, 1,334, 1,609, 1,767, 1,853 and 1,859.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

RCMP COMMISSIONER ROBERT SIMMONDS

Question No. 1,000—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did RCMP Commissioner Robert Simmonds receive a communication, message, etc. from certain representatives of the RCMP alleging that (a) RCMP senior officers were failing to provide full support for members of the force appearing before public inquiries (b) members of the force were not being protected from unwarranted interference of "their human rights" (c) inquiries into RCMP activities have "unsavoury effects . . . on the membership at large"?

2. What action, if any, has Commissioner Simmonds taken in the above regard?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as it concerns the Royal Canadian Mounted Police: 1. Yes.

2. Every possible assistance, in the form of the appointment of legal counsel, has been provided to RCMP members who have been required to appear before commissions of inquiry. The commissioner acknowledges the adverse affect these inquiries have had upon the morale of members, their families and friends. This can only be expected to improve when the commissions of inquiry are concluded. The commissioner and other senior managers are most sensitive to members' concerns and have done everything within the legal bounds of their responsibilities to ensure that members' human rights are protected. From the outset, Commissioner Simmonds has encouraged the complete co-operation of all RCMP members appearing before commissions of inquiry. He has undertaken to provide unreserved co-operation with the McDonald Commission of Inquiry and this co-operation continues to this day. However, the fact that the RCMP has been the subject of ongoing, highly publicized examination during the past three years before five different commissions of inquiry has definitely had an adverse effect upon the morale of many of its members but, in spite of this, their dedication to the duties of the force remains high.

FEATHERBED FILE

Question No. 1,334—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 100 stating that the Commission of Inquiry on the RCMP reviewed the Featherbed File in 1978 (a) was this done in camera (b) what are the names of all those present at the time the file was reviewed (c) at what location was the file reviewed (d) what judicial steps were taken to obtain access to the file (e) what RCMP officers were present at the time?

2. Is the review of the Featherbed File mentioned in the first report of the security and information of the McDonald Commission and (a) if so, on what page (b) if not, to the knowledge of the government what are all the reasons it has been kept secret?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

1. (a) The Featherbed File was examined in private at RCMP headquarters on two occasions in 1978; initially by Mr. J. F. Howard, Q.C., chief of counsel to the commission of inquiry and later by the chairman, Mr. Justice McDonald.

(b) On both occasions, the file was reviewed in the presence of RCMP officers. It is not in the national security interest to reveal the names of those officers who were present.

(c) See 1(a).

(d) None.

(e) See 1(b).

2. No.

(a) Not applicable.

(b) The disclosure of the contents of the file would be injurious to the security of Canada and the privacy of individuals referred to therein.

BURNS INTERNATIONAL LIMITED CONTRACT

Question No. 1,609—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the government issue contract numbered DA E0231-0-0799 to Burns International Limited to supply security protection for Place du Portage in Hull and, if so, what are all the details of the contract?

2. (a) Is the government aware that Burns International Limited is a subsidiary of a foreign company (b) is it government policy in the field of security to award contracts to firms connected with foreign interests whether or not the countries involved are considered friendly?

3. Does government policy differentiate between awarding contracts to foreign subsidiaries on matters not involving security and the awarding of contracts to foreign subsidiaries that do involve security and, if not, is it considering doing so?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes. Proposals were invited from 11 licensed Quebec security guard agencies with offices in the Ottawa-Hull area considered to be in a position to provide Public Works Canada with security, emergency and information services at Place du Portage, Phase I and II, Hull, Quebec, during the period November 1, 1980, to October 31, 1981. Six agencies submitted quotations, all of which were considered responsive, and the contract was awarded to Les Services de Protection Burns International Limitée, who submitted the lowest proposal. The total contract value was $419,623. A total of 33 personnel are required every day from Monday to Friday, with reduced numbers being required on weekends. The estimated total utilization for the contract period is 88,572 person-hours.

2. (a) Yes.

(b) It is the policy of the Department of Supply and Services when arranging for the provision of security guard services to contract for these requirements with the Canadian Corps of Commissionaires. In the instances where the corps is unable to provide the services, bids are invited from all qualified private commercial guard companies meeting the sourcing requirements and registered with the department. It is our general policy to contract for goods and services, including security guard services, from all qualified companies located in Canada. In this regard, both Canadian and foreign-owned firms are given the opportunity to bid on all government requirements. In the case of guard services, the companies involved and their employees must possess a provincial government licence, issued by the authorities in the province in which the services are to be provided. The present policy has been and continues to be subject to periodic review to respond to changing environments in the security field.

3. No, see 2(b) above.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,767—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Cape Breton Development Corporation for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I am informed by the Cape Breton Development Corporation as follows: (a) $100,000, (b) $40,000, (c) $40,000.

Question No. 1,781—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

(a) Advertising and publications charged directly to major sales programs. $ 164,000.
Advertising for retail stores, image of the Corporation, recruitment and annual report. $ 89,000.

(b) None;

(c) None.

APPLICATION FORMS FOR CERTAIN CONTRACTS

Question No. 1,853—Mr. Cossitt:

Does the Department of Supply and Services include in application forms for certain contracts, a request for a statement of assets of all those tendering and, if so (a) for what reason (b) will the government consider as a policy, asking for credit references in regard to potential clients rather than requesting disclosure of assets and stock values?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services requires all potential suppliers to complete a questionnaire in order to secure information on their legal, financial, technical and managerial capabilities for source listing purposes. The basic questionnaire includes a requirement for the supplier to provide a statement of its assets and inventory stocks.

(a) The purpose of the request for assets and inventory stocks is to inform the department as to the relative capability of the firm to supply the requirements of the federal government.

(b) The Department of Supply and Services continues to subscribe to the Dun & Bradstreet service which provides current ratings for many of the suppliers that do business with the government. However the Dun and Bradstreet ratings are only used on an exception basis as the normal means of protecting the government against loss in payments only upon delivery and acceptance of the goods. Thus the questionnaire is an essential part of the procurement process as it provides the basic sourcing information which the department uses to assess a supplier's legal, financial, technical and managerial capabilities.

FRAUDULENT GOVERNMENT CHEQUES CASHED

Question No. 1,859—Mr. Herbert:

1. During each of the past three years and in the current fiscal year to date, what was the total number and amount of fraudulent government cheques cashed?

2. What was the total amount of cheques cashed with chartered banks that the government did not proceed to collect through the courts?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. See list below. 2. None.

	Cheques Issued	Fraudulent Activity	Per cent
1977	113,015,409	8,023	.0071
1978	117,617,029	6,622	.0056
1979	126,045,607	8,087	.0064
1980 (to Oct 1)	92,627,747	4,025	.0043
		$ Amounts
	$ Value Issued	Forged Amount	Per cent
1977	$67,042,536,343.09	$1,249,116.00	.0019

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1520)

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, may I just bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, following his answers to questions on the Order Paper, or lack of them, that on May 14 I put some questions with respect to the McDonald commission of inquiry, and I am sure he would agree with me that since May 14 there has been ample time to supply me with some of the information. I would request that he look into this matter as soon as he can.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I will undertake to do that.

Income Tax Act

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed that they stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Tuesday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Madam Speaker, I should like to address those aspects of Bill C-54 which would significantly benefit Canada's small businesses. Without doubt this bill of over 200 pages is a highly technical one—

An hon. Member: That won't take long.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): The hon. member says it will not be a long speech. I hope he will have the patience and interest to stay in his seat for the 40 minutes I intend to use.

Without doubt this bill of over 200 pages is a highly technical one. It is indicative of the complexity of our tax structure, a complexity that is necessary in order for our Income Tax Act to be effective, but at the same time a burden in terms of understanding its implications and putting them into effect. Very often it leads to a degree of unawareness of forgetfulness with regard to the benefits small businesses already receive under our tax structure. These benefits are among the most favourable of western nations.

I cite particularly the small business tax deduction which reduces the tax rate for small firms by some 21 percentage points. In terms of tax expenditures, the cost of this one measure alone is approaching some $1 billion annually.

[Translation]

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, various tax measures have been introduced in the last four years that apply specifically to small businesses. Among those measures, there are tax concessions to promote research and development, a sales tax exemption for all manufacturers whose annual sales do not exceed $50,000, the tax exempt sale of a small business to the children or grandchildren of the owner, and provisions for the deduction of capital losses. Those measures, in fact, represent almost $1 billion in tax concessions. Small businesses also benefit from a number of tax measures that apply to businesses generally. I am thinking here of the provisions on accelerated capital cost allowances and inventory credit allowances.

That, however, Mr. Speaker, does not in any way mean that this is it where tax measures on small business are concerned. Bill C-54 is an example of what we can do, even now, to improve the conditions under which that sector of our economy operates and to open the door to further action at a later date.

[English]

This bill includes a number of provisions which, although not specifically intended for only small businesses, will nevertheless benefit this segment of our business community. I refer particularly to those provisions which allow Canadian firms to compete more effectively abroad by introducing a special tax treatment for their employees stationed outside Canada on longer-term projects. Small enterprises offer a significant potential for increased export activities, and many small Canadian enterprises are currently involved in turnkey projects abroad.

There are also provisions in this bill which could allow employees to deduct depreciation and interest expenses relating to automobiles required for use in their employment. Many of these employees work for small firms.

This bill also includes provisions aiming at increased participation in the energy industry by Canadian firms. Although this sector is dominated by large enterprises, it has also seen the start-up of many new small businesses.

[Translation]

In addition, of course, there is the 50 per cent investment tax credit on new plants and equipment for manufacturing or processing of products already granted under the Regional Development Incentives Act. This provision should prove quite valuable to small businesses thus allowing them to reduce their tax load. In view of the fact that in specially designated areas where this 50 per cent investment tax credit applies, small businesses truly are the spearhead and the backbone of all new economic development. I should like to add that by reintroducing the tax relief on MURBs we hope to stimulate the building industry which makes for an important part of the small business sector. This program makes it possible to use capital cost allowance on eligible rental buildings as a tax haven for revenues from others sources.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, under Bill C-54 small businesses will benefit from another excellent provision which is the extension of the tax relief for retailers converting their scales to metric. This tax relief has been extended from June, 1981, to the end of December, 1983. It represents a considerable saving for retailers who have not yet converted to metric. We can also mention the taxable grants offered to assist home owners to move off oil and convert their heating system to some other fuel. These grants will create opportunities for small Canadian businesses involved in that kind of conversion or some other related area. As you well know, Mr. Speaker, the implementation of the Canadian Home Insulation Program introduced in the House by the former Liberal government generated thousands of small insulation businesses all across Canada. It is, therefore, quite possible that this new grant program to promote the conversion of oil heating systems to some other form of energy will indeed generate thousands of new small businesses.

Also, I think we should note the importance for the Canadian economy in general and for small business in particular of the industrial restructuring program promised in the budget introduced by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and announced by my colleagues the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). I think that this $350 million which will be spent to promote industrial restructuring and manpower retraining will greatly help small businesses in areas of particular need to get set up, and to maintain and improve their operations.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, it is patently clear that the budget features two other highly significant tax measures more specifically related to small businesses. The first one will enable the owners of unincorporated businesses to deduct from their taxable income the salary paid to a spouse. This proposal will affect 600,000-odd businesses, most of which can be described as being small. Thanks to this new measure, any employee who is paid by his or her spouse will enjoy every fiscal advantage normally granted to regular workers. Farmers and fishermen will benefit as well from this measure, as indicated so eloquently last evening by my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson). Finally, Mr. Speaker, this bill will put an end to the various controversies created by the implementation of the Small Business Development Bond program, under which banks and other lending institutions are allowed, for tax purposes, to report as dividends any income from interest payments. As we know, tax regulations governing dividends are less stringent, and that enables banks and other institutions to offer prime lending rates.

● (1530)

[English]

Under this measure small Canadian-controlled private corporations can obtain low-interest rate loans of up to $500,000. These loans can be used to acquire fixed assets and finance research and development activities.

Small Business Development Bonds can also be used to refinance assets acquired after December 11, 1979, and to finance or refinance the obligations of small firms facing financial difficulties.

Although there have been some delays with regard to the introduction of this measure, the concept has been well received by the private sector. To date over $200 million of financing has been provided to small businesses under this measure.

This tax incentive has now been extended from its December 31, 1980, expiry date to March 31, 1981. What that means is that with its retroactivity to December, 1979, this measure will have been in place for over one year to permit as many small businesses as possible to profit from it during the period of its existence.

[Translation]

If we consider every measure I have just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, we realize that so far the federal government has loaned $3 billion to small businesses, either directly through the Federal Business Development Bank, or through loans guaranteed by the government under the Small Businesses Loans Act, or again under such programs as the business development program. Besides those $3 billion in outstanding loans to small businesses, it is well known that roughly $100 million is paid to small Canadian businesses through grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, or the National Research Council of Canada, or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, or any other department of this government involved in economic development.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset of my remarks, several tax measures such as preferred rates for small businesses, deductions for inventory financing, deductibility of the spouse's salary in a business and all those tax measures amount to about $2 billion annually in tax rebates. In other words, Mr. Speaker, and I think hon. members will agree with me, that represents for the federal government a very sizeable investment in the small business sector.

Naturally, rather than making a thorough study of the substance of Bill C-54, our colleagues from the New Democratic Party and from the Progressive Conservative Party saw fit to rehash their political philosophy and preferred to tell Canadians that there is nothing for them in Bill C-54, whereas they could have informed our fellow Canadians about the tax measures and proposals from which they stand to benefit. I suggest they are openly displaying their lack of responsibility but, coming from them, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing surprising in that.

[English]

Today I read the remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), who painted a bleak and inaccurate picture of the small business sector of this country which surprised me. I would like to tell him and this House that, despite an increasing failure rate, less than 1 per cent of businesses in Canada fail in any year. In addition, there are now more start-ups in the small business sector than ever before. While some 6,500 firms went bankrupt in Canada in 1980—and I think everyone regrets that—on the positive side of the picture we must be aware that approximately 50,000 started in 1980.

[Translation]

After having listed those programs as well as statistics and figures that are often quite high, Mr. Speaker, since I have been in charge of the Department of State for Small Businesses I have wondered whether our investments are always as effective as they should be. In other words, do we have the right formula? In a short book I was reading recently entitled "Murphy's Law", Arthur Black gives businessmen a rule to deal with bureaucrats. He says, and I quote:

When government solutions fail to answer your problem, alter the problem because you will never be able to change the solutions.

Mr. Speaker, I think that Mr. Black is mistaken, and I may add that I firmly intend to do my utmost to find suitable answers to the problems of small businesses in Canada. This is why, following my colleague, the former minister of state for small businesses, I have instructed my department to conduct a thorough study on every aspect of small business financing. At present, that study is divided in four main parts. The first part consists of a thorough study of the role and activities of the Federal Business Development Bank. Considering the importance of that institution, the results of that study will greatly contribute to a comprehensive visualization of the problem. The second part deals with the performance and the role of chartered banks with regard to small business financing. In the course of that review, loan applications received by banks will be studied; applicants, that is potential clients, will be interviewed, to determine whether or not banks have discriminated against small businesses. The third part deals with the role of financial institutions other than chartered banks. That sector is becoming increasingly important and seems mostly interested in assisting small and medium-sized businesses. It will therefore be necessary to determine in what financing sectors such good will may be turned to greater advantage, and we want to consider more particularly, in co-operation with financial but non-banking institutions, what answers they have given over the past two years to applications for financing, as far as risk capital and more especially rolling capital are concerned.

Finally, the fourth part of this review is a study conducted by the Economic Council of Canada. The Council set out to analyse a total of 24 items ranging from a critical review of all existing government programs to the financing methods used by businesses according to their size, and so on. This fourth part will be particularly useful when we analyse the results of the comprehensive study I mentioned earlier.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about the increase in interest rates and the negative impact that these rates can have on the financing of small businesses and the restraints that they can bring to bear on the working capital and inventory financing. However, I believe that we would be acting irresponsibly, at a time when this major review which deals specifically with these problems has not yet been completed, if we were to take temporary measures which had not been well thought out. The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap suggested yesterday evening—and I think that this is a very valid suggestion—that one of the things we could do would be to develop, as in the case of the registered retirement savings plans or the registered housing savings plans, a program to allow individuals to deposit every year up to $10,000, which would be taxed at a lower rate then other incomes and could be invested after five years, along with the savings of other individuals, in new small businesses. As I say, this is a very positive suggestion which deserves consideration.

In all the meetings that I have had throughout Canada with various groups of small businessmen through boards of trade or other associations, I was made clearly to understand that there is no need to develop new programs. They say, "There are already a great many programs available to us, and very often"—this is what small businessmen and businesswomen believe—"we cannot manage to study all the forms you send us and to sift through all the programs which might help us." What these people were telling me was not to develop any new programs but to keep the government out of their pockets if we want them to be happy.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is a very reasonable request. Of course, the Minister of Finance and myself want to consider the most appropriate methods to assist small businesses in addition to all the many and very generous incentives already in place in the tax system. We are quite willing and ready to consider further means of creating an even more favourable tax structure and climate for small businesses. One of the most popular and most highly rated incentives among businessmen is certainly the preferential rate that we apply to small businesses. As I said earlier, this rate is 23 per cent lower than for large businesses. We might be justified in time in considering a gradual taxation schedule for small businesses such as we have for personal income tax. We should perhaps review some time in the future the $750,000 limit now applicable to small businesses. All this is now under consideration, Mr. Speaker, but we are aware that we must still operate within the financial restraints of the national budget. Moreover, I believe that Bill C-54 introduced by the Minister of Finance is one of the most responsible bills ever brought before the House.

Indeed, we are not utopians like the New Democrats who say that a larger national deficit does not matter, nor do we advocate the neo-conservatism of the Progressive Conservative Party which says the deficit should be drastically reduced. In his wisdom, the Minister of Finance has chosen rather to avoid both extremes so as to promote harmonious economic growth while trying to reduce the deficit gradually so as not to create major restraints for Canadian citizens and businesses.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, small businesses in Canada already benefit significantly under the current tax structure. But I am quite ready to admit that there will always be room for improvement. Passage of Bill C-54 will add to these benefits and will be part of these improvements. It will contribute to the growth and development of a sector of our economy which I consider to be our vital majority.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on rising to participate in the debate on this important piece of legislation, I think I would be remiss if I did not respond to a couple of points made by the minister. He indicated in his remarks that the bill with which we are presently dealing is very technical and complex. I suggest to him that he pay heed to the suggestion, which was advanced by my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), in his contribution to this debate in the House yesterday, that perhaps the time has come for a new income tax act to be drafted in language more suitable and more accommodating to the taxpayers of Canada rather than to computers.

When the minister, in a sort of global attack on the opposition, suggested we were not dealing with the major thrust of the bill, perhaps he would do well to read, or to have some of his officials read, some of the speeches which were made here, because I think he would find some very important points and some very important recommendations were made which could be put into effect.

The minister also suggested that we should be noting the positive elements of the legislation. Let me tell him that it would not take very long to go over the list of positive elements in this legislation, so there would not be much of a debate. Second, the House should be reminded that a year ago, when we were dealing with a similar piece of legislation, a budgetary measure, the minister and his party seemed to put their political welfare ahead of the welfare of Canadians. To put it bluntly, when the shoe was on the other foot, when they happened to occupy opposition benches, we certainly did not see them going out looking for any positive elements in the legislative proposals which we put forth. So I suppose that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander in this case.

An hon. Member: It is you who have suffered.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is the Canadian people who have suffered in the process. That brings me to the fact that it is quite difficult to participate in this debate without reflecting upon the activities of a year ago. I think it is fair to recall that a year ago this nation was embroiled in a mid-winter election campaign which was brought about by the combined forces of the Liberal-NDP alliance, on the premise that Canada can continue on the road to economic disaster and can continue pursuing a policy of cheap energy. At that time we believed that as a government we had to embark upon a new course in establishing a realistic energy policy and a realistic economic policy.

Throughout the course of the election campaign the stage was set for a rather bitter debate in the country, and a great deal of confrontation between the east and the west which is still with us today. What is most disturbing to people in western Canada is the fact that we have a government which is now occupying the Treasury benches and which got there on a platform and policies of deceit, deception, and cynicism. There is no question about that. Liberals were aided and abetted in every shape and form by the NDP. It was rather interesting to see them huffing and puffing for an election a year ago because they were toe to toe with the Liberal opposition, both in body and in spirit. The Liberals proposed instant solutions which were politically enticing and attractively packaged, and of course the NDP thought they might very well gain some support so that they could form the balance of power.

An hon. Member: Don't be so bitter.

Mr. Mazankowski: Today some of the more enlightened members of that party are trying to extricate themselves from that union. It was a convenient bond then, but now they are finding it rather uncomfortable because they are feeling the pressure from western Canada to the effect that they are ignoring their constituencies and the people who are supporting them, and they are not standing up for the genuine interest of the people who sent them here to represent them. The NDP-Liberal alliance is under attack.

Last night the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) went into quite a tirade in which he tried to divorce himself from the policies of the Liberal government. I should remind hon. members of the statement which was made in June by the financial critic of that party when he was speaking on the Borrowing Authority Act and said the following as reported at page 2063 of Hansard of June 12:

> There is a total contradiction between the kinds of statements and the kinds of things that were being said about deficits, about spending, about the nature of stopping deficits, the nature of taxation, the nature of the recession and what the Liberal party would do when it was elected, and what its record has been since it was elected.
> There has been a total contradiction in the statements that were made by the financial spokesmen for the Liberal party prior to the election and what the government has been saying since the election. There is a complete contradiction, and that contradiction has to be brought home again, again and again to the Canadian people. But above all else, this party opposite is a party without a shred of principle, without a shred of conviction and without a shred of belief in anything, either political or economic.

Today the story is somewhat different. They conveniently join with the government on issues such as the Constitution. We are not sure where they stand on the energy situation but, needless to say, they are going off in all directions. The Premier of Saskatchewan is saying one thing, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) is saying another, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is saying something else, their leader is saying something different, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is talking about pensions. They are really running for cover.

If any member has credibility in terms of pursuing pensions for veterans, senior citizens and railway workers, I am sure no one else in the House has established a finer and better reputation than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; at least he has some principles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: What were some of the issues in the last election? What issues are immersed in this piece of legislation with which we are attempting to deal? During the election campaign the Liberals promised cheaper gasoline and petroleum products. As a matter of fact, on February 8, 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in a speech in Toronto, said that their price increase would be less than 14 cents a gallon, that there would be no new taxes, that there would be no increase in the excise tax, that there would be a made-in-Canada blended price, and that there would be a negotiated agreement with the provinces within a year. What else did they promise? They promised economic revitalization, cheaper interest rates, and a made-in-Canada interest rate policy. We all know what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) promised when he was finance critic. He said that if interest rates go up he would resign. Well, he is still here; perhaps that is why they call him "amazing Gray".

Also they promised an increase in the guaranteed income supplement, on which they delivered. They promised double tracking; they would link all the sidings along the CN mainline between Winnipeg and Vancouver so that the number of trains could be increased from 25 to 50 because of the parallel line. We now know that it has been discounted as an impractical solution. As a matter of fact, it is the most lunatic proposal I have ever seen. They promised to revitalize agriculture with a 12-point program. They promised help for small business. They promised changes in capital gains. They promised a four-point automotive program. The Prime Minister made a personal promise; he said that if he was elected he would resign within four years. I am sure that is one promise many Canadians are hoping will be fulfilled very quickly.

Let me review the record. What about the automobile industry? It has never been in more dire straits in the history of this country than it is today. In spite of the fact that the government is attempting to bail out Chrysler and to put the industry on a sound footing, there are still some very serious problems.

What about changes in capital gains? The hon. member for Moose Jaw very effectively dealt with that matter yesterday, but I think it should be repeated. The Liberal government promised a change in valuation day from December 31, 1971, to December 31, 1974.

There was a suggestion that some inflationary clauses would be enacted to take into account the impact of inflation. Something must be done to lessen the impact upon capital gains. The impact upon capital gains destroys initiative, discourages ownership, and stifles productivity. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw pointed out yesterday, many people who own enterprises, particularly in the small business and farming sectors, take very, very low wages and do not institute pension or retirement programs. When they sell their enterprises, the moneys realized serve as their retirement funds, yet ministers seem to be following a course of a more regressive capital gains tax rather than a progressive one. I think the future of ownership and private initiative is under attack as a result of the philosophy of the government which is shared by the NDP that ownership is bad, that people should be taxed from the cradle to the grave, and that any selling off of one's resources acquired over the years should be subject to a very punitive tax. I do not agree with this. Our economic program dealt very effectively with these matters.

Let me turn to agriculture. A 12-point program was to be instituted, but all we have seen is an increase in the farm loan act, which is a help. What is happening in grain movement? We are barely keeping pace with the shipments of last year, even with the advent of more hopper cars and improvements in the capacity of terminals and the entire operation. The government failed to establish a target for grain movement for this year. My party established a target of increasing exports by 20 per cent in the last crop year over the previous one, and we achieved it. There should have been at least a 10 per cent increase in anticipated grain movements in the export position of this year over the last crop year. As a matter of fact in terms of quotas a number of points in western Canada are still on a three-bushel quota while others have a nine-bushel quota. There is inequity in the opportunity for delivery, which creates many problems.

What about prices? The initial price of $4.25 f.o.b. Thunder Bay established by our administration is still in effect, while wheat sales are in the $7.50 to $8 range. Why does the government allow the Canadian Wheat Board to keep farmers' money? There should be an immediate adjustment in the initial price. Farmers are paying 20 per cent interest, and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board will not give farmers their own money.

Furthermore, the minister in the other place suggested that the farmers should not get their money at Christmas because they would spend it on Christmas cheer and presents, or they might have income tax problems. It is nonsense. Certainly they have problems, problems meeting their commitments and being forced to pay high interest rates. These problems are not helped by the government's approach to small business and the small farm.

I take exception to the fact that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is unduly politicizing that board. There is no reason in the world why he should be announcing the grain sales of the Canadian Wheat Board. They are the selling agency; he is not. He should not announce the final payments or the adjustments in the payments. The Canadian Wheat Board, acting on behalf and in the best interests of farmers, is doing the job. He should not attempt to enhance his political position and the political position of the government by associating himself and meddling with the glorious little announcements which are strictly the property of the Canadian Wheat Board. I take very grave exception to that.

● (1600)

The minister who spoke today did so at length about some of the proposals for small business. I agree that the Small Business Development Bond was a very good mechanism. But because of the uncertainty, the lack of knowledge as to what the long term would be, it had a very negative effect upon many enterprises which wanted to utilize the mechanism of the Small Business Development Bond. This government, if it really intended to provide some stability and some help to small business, should have announced its intention to carry on with the program for a year when it assumed office. But it went until the end of the year and then, of course, the people who had to plan their building programs were faced with that uncertainty as to whether it would continue. As a result, full advantage was not taken of that very good program.

As I said, this bill basically incorporates some of the major economic thrusts and philosophies of the government, but it is mostly fine tuning; there is nothing distinctive or unique about it. The other day when the minister was introducing this bill he said that there had been a lot of encouraging developments since he had brought in his budget. I am not sure where those encouraging developments are. There are certainly none in the oil industry. The headline in Alberta Business of January 16, 1981, reads "Industry Follows Rigs South". There certainly haven't been any encouraging developments in the automobile industry. There have been no encouraging signs in the agricultural industry, or in the housing and construction industry. The whole mess we are in is a result of the lack of leadership and the lack of the enunciation of a clear economic policy.

Let us deal with the double tracking. I have said it was a lunatic proposal. It was then, and it is now. What is happening, Mr. Speaker, is that we now have a situation where the railways are threatening to ration the availability of boxcars and hopper cars for the movement of grain. We have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) peddling the same garbage. My goodness, if we are to continue to develop and improve our reputation as a reliable supplier of grain to our customers abroad, we will certainly not be able to do it that way. The minister should denounce that statement. He should not associate himself with it at all. If he does, I am sure our customers in Japan and China will not look to Canada as a No. 1 potential supplier of product. They will say, "Well, they have got strikes, they have snow, and they have a bad transportation system. And now they are going to ration the availability of boxcars and hopper cars. Well, we cannot go there, unless we do so as a last resort." I suggest that will have a tremendously negative impact upon our future in developing markets and maintaining our markets abroad. I hope that matter will be dealt with.

I hope the minister will change his approach and tell the railroads, "I know the problem is with the matter of the statutory freight rates. Let's get on with the job." There is a consensus developing. There is much work which has to be done, but we must maintain the momentum. If we are to call upon our farmers to produce the amount of grain that we want to market abroad, then it certainly does not provide much confidence for them if we are not able to move the product. They are sick and tired of building granaries and storage facilities.

We have a transportation system which I know will work. It requires co-operation and leadership, but it will work. There are some things which will always be a problem. But someone has to take charge. I call upon the Minister of Transport to take charge. I know that other fellow from the other place has really no interest. I must say this about the Minister of Transport, though, at least he is prepared to sit down, listen and talk to the people of western Canada. He knows he does not have all the answers. This other fellow from the other place thinks he has all the answers. As a result, he is going nowhere. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my good friends who sit across the way who have some knowledge about western Canada, since we were on a transportation excursion both to the east and the west, that they know westerners talk straight from the hip. They will certainly sit down and talk to the Minister of Transport. I am not too sure whether sending that other yoyo out there to do the job does the party opposite and our country any good at all.

We talked about economic revitalization. Interest rates are the highest in history and yet the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is still here. Our dollar is the lowest it has been in 47 years. Inflation is projected at 11.7 per cent by the C. D. Howe Institute. That is the highest in 33 years. Employment prospects are bleak. Prospects for growth are at 1 per cent. Here again that is not my assessment. That is an assessment made by experts. We will have an accumulated budgetary deficit between the years 1980 and 1984 of some $52 billion. So, you know, economic revitalization has not come to pass.

With respect to energy, the promise was that gasoline prices would increase by less than 14 cents—that was from the mouth of the Prime Minister. I do not know about areas in other parts of the country, but I can tell you that in my area the retail price of gasoline has increased by 32 cents to 34 cents a gallon since the defeat of our government. It has seen seven different increases. Diesel fuel was 61 cents at the time our government was defeated; it is now 91 cents a gallon. That is a 30-cent increase—50 per cent.

There are four new tax increases proposed under the National Energy Program. There is the petroleum gas revenue tax of 8 per cent, the natural gas excise tax of 30 cents per mcf which will increase to 75 cents. There is the petroleum compensation charge which will reach $10.05 by 1983. Then we have a Canadian ownership charge so we can start a whole series of mini PetroCans and big PetroCans. We will have more national oil companies in this country than small businesses. That charge could be a potential $4 per barrel. If you add all these figures together they amount to some $37 billion worth of revenues flowing from the provinces into the federal treasury. Western Canada does not look at this as simply an encroachment. It looks upon it as a wholesale raid.

What has happened to the consumers? Well, there is no relief. Heating oils have gone up. The prices of natural gas in our particular area have increased anywhere from 60 per cent to 70 per cent. There has been no relief for the home owners, no relief for the aged, the pensioners, or low-income Canadians. There is no relief for farmers and fishermen. When we talk about the excise tax, there was relief for farmers and fishermen under our proposal.

So we have a situation here where there is very grave uncertainty, political and economic. There is deep division, which is the most disturbing element in our country today. There is discord, and bitterness which has developed. I say that is impairing, and will continue to impair, our nation if it is not corrected. To say the least, the state of our country today and the injury which has been inflicted on it, will be a long time healing, because we have a government today which is perceived as governing one half of the country and attacking the other.

And there is no trust. Anyone who travels to western Canada will find that out very quickly. Unless there is trust it will be very difficult to assure co-operation. The situation we are in now is caused by the infliction of unilateral action by the government. It is a process which violates the true spirit of co-operation, the true spirit of federalism, and the true spirit of a partnership. It is caused by the unilateral action with respect to the resource field. I suggest that the actions of the government on both counts is most un-Canadian.

I want to say in all sincerity that unless these policies are modified or changed, this country may not survive. While every political party and every government makes some mistakes—and perhaps some parties have made mistakes that cost them the right to govern—this government is making mistakes that could cost us the country.

I do not want to go into detail on the constitutional issues, and I may deviate somewhat from the text of the bill, but when we speak of the Income Tax Act and Canadians' ability to pay, I want to try to outline some of the difficulties which impair the ability of Canadians to pay. We are preoccupied by the constitutional issue and the energy issue. In terms of the constitution, I think the most important thing in western Canada at the moment is the perception of political inequality. It really is not just a perception, because a real political inequality exists between western Canada and the rest of the country. That should be the No. 1 issue, and it must be resolved. Our present political structure literally shuts off one half of the country from the political process. We should attempt to resolve this issue so that all regions of Canada may participate effectively in the decision-making process. That is one of the things that I believe is a grave error in terms of the constitutional package with which we are dealing.

The constitutional package does not clarify the resource issue, Mr. Speaker, and the amending formula is not acceptable. There are questions about the charter of rights that are so serious it is being challenged in the courts by six provinces.

Those are the things that irritate Canadians and the regions of the country. As a result, we are not delivering because the country is preoccupied with these issues, the economy is suffering, and individual Canadians are suffering.

The National Energy Program is bad for the west and it is bad for Canada; there is no question about that. If the economy is to be turned around, energy has to be the key. It is the key to economic recovery, to economic opportunity, and to allowing the west to take its rightful place in confederation.

The objectives of the National Energy Program are fairness, security, and opportunity. It fails on all fronts, Mr. Speaker. It is unfair to the producing provinces. It constitutes a wholesale and massive intrusion into the area of potential resources in which the average westerner sees the reconfirmation of the pre-colonial status, particularly as it concerns Saskatchewan and Alberta. It unilaterally sets the price at a level that does not match inflation. That is the first time this has been done, Mr. Speaker. It singles out the energy resources of the west. No mention is made of hydroelectricity or uranium. Yet in many respects the purpose of the National Energy Program is to garner funds for the federal treasury. If it is necessary to tax energy, Mr. Speaker, why single out the energy resources of western Canada? I am sure that no government could do that without being charged with lack of fairness, to some degree.

The National Energy Program is unfair to the industry because the federal government can arbitrarily confiscate 25 per cent of producing properties in frontier areas. It is unfair to companies like Suncor which pioneered and developed the oil sands process and was nearly bankrupted doing it. It was subsidized for many years before it showed a dismal profit. It is unfair to Canadian companies, in the words of Robert Blair, president of Nova corporation, who has pointed out that small firms suffer. A report in the Edmonton Journal of December 19, 1980, of an interview with Mr. Blair, reads in part as follows:

> . . . serious damage is being done to the small, largely Canadian-owned segment of the industry.
> One of the sad things "is the real and psychological damage being done to the smaller, Canadian-owned firms," he said in a Thursday interview.

It is unfair to Canadian companies. It is unfair to the heavy oil industry on which we placed so much of our hopes to achieve self-sufficiency.

Let me speak now about security, Mr. Speaker, in the context of heavy oil. A headline in a newspaper in Swift Current carried the headline "Oil Tax Increase Imperils 400 Jobs Sask. Mayor says". Today we are trying to preserve industry in central Canada, we are trying to bail out Chrysler, we are spending $350 million on a special Industry and Labour Adjustment program, and at the same time are deliberately driving Canadian industry out of the country. How foolish that is, Mr. Speaker.

Each of the little oil rigs that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) says is really nothing, is worth $6 million and employs between 40 and 50 people. Every time one of those rigs leaves western Canada a factory is lost because, in effect, they are small factories. We have lost over 60 of these rigs already.

Any hope of achieving self-security under this program has been scuttled; there is no question about that. I do not think anyone on the government side of the House appreciates the fact that our conventional oil reserves are running out. Something like 1.2 billion barrels are being produced today; the projection is that by 1985 that figure will be reduced to 680 million barrels, and by 1990 to 377 million.

The megaprojects are in a state of limbo. Cash flows are being reduced by 30 to 40 per cent. Exploration budgets of companies going out to look for oil have been cut by 30 to 40 per cent. I have mentioned already that at least 60 rigs have left the country. Over 170 are idle, according to my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). Some 2,600 people have been laid off already, by March 40,000 will be laid off, and there will be many more by springtime. In the province of Alberta last year some 9,000 holes were dug when looking for oil, but this year less than 5,500 will be dug.

It has been suggested that because of the National Energy Program there will be a dependence on imported oil of almost 600,000 barrels per day by 1985. The cost could rise from $6 billion per year to $14 billion per year. Over a five-year period the total drain of funds would be approximately $55 billion. That is a lot of money, Mr. Speaker.

Now let us consider the opportunities that have been lost and the jobs that have been lost. I can sympathize with members from Ontario and Quebec when they are faced with the prospect of jobs being lost in their constituencies, because I am experiencing the same thing. They might not appreciate it, but the effects of the oil industry are spread over the whole of western Canada and beyond. It provides jobs for westerners and for Canadians from central and eastern Canada who have gone there. Young people in my hometown are losing jobs every day. Many who went home for the Christmas break have not been called back to work because of the impact of the National Energy Program. It is having an effect on the opportunities for young Canadians and on their spirit, Mr. Speaker. It should be borne in mind that this industry is 90 per cent Canadian owned. The drilling industry is owned and developed in our own land.

Mr. Blair from Alberta Gas Trunk Line, now known as Nova, says that 600 of the 1,800 wells which Husky Oil has in Lloydminster may have to be shut in. This impacts on the whole economy of western Canada, but it impacts more on the total economy of Canada. This program discriminates against the individual Canadian who wants to continue to invest in the industry. Of course, as my hon. colleague indicated, the program is not a program to Canadianize, it is a program to nationalize. There is nothing in this budgetary package to encourage more Canadians to invest in the resource industry. That is something which I am sure individual Canadians from coast to coast would want to do, that is, to invest in the future of their country by investing in Canada's energy resources.

When we look at what has happened, western Canadians can only conclude that the government is pursuing a course of economic, social and political disaster. They do not believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources understands the totality of what he is doing. He comes across as being very arrogant and condescending and is suggesting to western Canadians that he knows what is best for them.

A reporter for The Globe and Mail called the minister, his cohorts and colleagues a bunch of arrogant amateurs. I have to agree with that statement. The minister must start showing some flexibility and some genuine concern for what his National Energy Program is doing, otherwise this division, discord and bitterness will continue to develop.

Western Canadians are worried because they see the massive takeover which has occurred in the oil industry. They are concerned this could happen in the food production industry. Energy and food will be two of the most important commodities as we enter the year 2000. There is a major concern within the forest industry that the government may engage in a wholesale raid on that very important industry as well. In other words, we are engaged in an exercise which is having a most profound effect upon the political, economic and social future of a very important part of our country.

As I said earlier, we live in a period of very serious and political uncertainty, with serious concerns respecting our economic future. Many Canadians cannot understand why, in this land of plenty, we should be involved in this stalemate over such a basic and fundamental issue, namely, the issue of provision of energy to propel the machines of industry and the wheels of transportation. We live in a fortunate country. We are one of the very few industrialized nations of the world which has the potential of being self-sufficient and having a secure supply of energy.

I suggest that this government and this minister get back to the drawing boards and back to the negotiating table with their provincial counterparts, and do so quickly. First, they have to establish some agreement respecting figures. The federal government says that the province of Alberta is going to extract some 43 per cent of the revenue. Alberta says that it will extract only 28 per cent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his allotted time has expired. He may, however, continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank all hon. members of this House for allowing me to continue. I will not abuse the privilege, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker.

I want to place before the House some recommendations which I think must be followed. First, the province and the federal government have to get back to the bargaining table. There has to be some agreement on a common set of figures. There is too much discrepancy about what is the provincial take. As I have said, the province indicates that its take is only 28 per cent while the federal government suggests that its take is 43 per cent.

There are differences of opinion with respect to supply projections. Under the National Energy Program, Alberta says that net imports will be 525,000 barrels a day by 1985, and 734,000 barrels a day by 1990. This will cost something in the order of $20 billion to $30 billion a year. Ottawa claims the reliance on imports will be 260,000 barrels a day by 1985 but by 1990, no imports will be required. Obviously, there is a major discrepancy and that is the first thing to be overcome.

The federal government has to recognize that because it moved unilaterally in placing before this House the kind of National Energy Program and pricing regime that it did, and because this is not going to be bought by the provinces, it will have to make the next move to get back to the bargaining table. There can be no question about that. There must be a demonstration of some flexibility, reason, and concern. It is universal now that the National Energy Program is very detrimental in many aspects. Unless the federal government takes a position of flexibility I can say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there will be no harmony and there will be continued discord and chaos in the country.

We have to work toward an agreement which is fair, fair to all regions and fair to all Canadians. Until such time as we approach it in that fashion, the division and animosity in the country will continue.

I say in conclusion that this is perhaps one of the most important periods in the history of Canada. It could very well be the turning point between failure and success, and I mean that in the broadest sense. We have the opportunity to transform this country into one of the great industrialized giants of the world. Canada has the potential, the strength, manpower resources and natural resources. We have it all. It is unfortunate that the difficulties we have are not those caused by nature. They are difficulties caused by governments and people. The time has come for us to get the show on the road. We must ensure that this very important issue is resolved quickly, not only for the west but for all of Canada.

It was said once, "What is good for General Motors is good for Canada." We should now say, "What is good for the west is good for all of Canada." Strong regions mean a strong country. The provinces of Ontario, Quebec and eastern Canada will all reap the benefits of a satisfactorily concluded agreement. Therefore, I urge the members of this House to prevail upon the cabinet to get back to the negotiating table, and to do it quickly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise today to speak on Bill C-54, an act to amend the Income Tax Act.

The Income Tax Act is a piece of legislation which touches all Canadians. I am sure many of us in the House today wish that it did not touch most of us as directly as it does. However, we all know that the legislation is essential to the financing of government programs and services. The Income Tax Act does far more than simply provide the wherewithal for us to run the nation's business, it also contains many different measures aimed at stimulating the economy of the country.

Today I would like to speak briefly on one of the measures contained in Bill C-54, the special investment tax credit, which was described by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on budget night as a bold and experimental new program to help deal with regional inequalities in the country. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and as the member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, I know a considerable amount about regional disparities and inequalities. That is why I heartily support this measure, for I know that the special investment tax credit program will go a long way toward reducing regional inequalities in this country.

By providing this 50 per cent tax credit, the federal government, through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, will be able to help generate much needed industrial development in some of the most seriously affected parts of Canada. These areas, which are marked by both high family unemployment and low per capita income, can be found in every province and territory. And while these areas contain only some five per cent of the Canadian population, it is important to remember that this is the five per cent most in need of this kind of assistance.

As you might expect, since the program was announced on October 28 there have been many requests for it to be broadened, to include a larger portion of the country. While I agree that there certainly are localities outside the designated areas which could well benefit from the program, economic realities necessitate the focusing of available funds on those parts of Canada where this program can be most effective.

Let me say a few words, about this innovative program. Simply put, it is a tax credit. That means that a company, or individual, making an eligible investment in a designated area is entitled to deduct 50 per cent of the cost of that investment from the federal income tax payable. For example, if a business person invests $100,000 in a new manufacturing facility, he or she will be able to deduct $50,000 from any federal tax which is payable. If there is no federal tax payable in that year, or very little, the business person may defer the unused credit to a future year.

There are, of course, some restrictions on how and when you can use some of these credits. For example, an entrepreneur must reduce any capital cost allowances available to him or her by the amount of the tax credit in order to avoid duplication of benefits. Also, the credit must be used within five years of the year in which the investment was made.

However, these restrictions aside, it should be noted that the administration of this program is very simple. No prior approval of projects is required. All industries which are defined as manufacturing or processing operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act are eligible. Furthermore, the fiscal advantages are automatic from the moment an entrepreneur makes an eligible manufacturing investment. All that is required is to claim the credit as part of an income tax return. If Revenue Canada requires any clarification on the eligibility of the industry or the area in which the project is located, it will obtain this from DREE.

Let me return now to the eligible areas in which the program will apply. As I said earlier, the program is aimed at those parts of Canada which lag behind others, economically speaking.

For a variety of reasons, people living in those areas do not have the opportunities available elsewhere. Perhaps they are geographically isolated, too far away from the centres of economic activity to benefit from that activity. Perhaps employment opportunities do not exist simply because it is not financially attractive for an entrepreneur to locate or expand in such an area. There is a host of reasons why these people are in need. But, whatever the reason, action is required no matter where these people are located.

Just where are they located? With the help of Statistics Canada, DREE has been able to identify those census divisions, containing approximately 5 per cent of the Canadian population, where the family unemployment rate is greatest in relation to the national average and where the per capita income is lowest relative to the national average.

But statistics alone do not tell the whole story. In order for the special investment tax credit program to be effective, it was necessary to use these statistics as a basis for decisions requiring human judgment. I am sure that claims could justifiably be made that the criteria I have just described would warrant the designation of additional census divisions in the Atlantic region in particular. However, it must be remembered that the special investment tax credit is intended to be an incentive to stimulate industrial investment in areas of greatest need.

If the whole of a province were designated for eligibility purposes, for example, there would be no financial incentive for a firm to locate in the area of greatest economic need. That is why the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) placed the constraint on the program that, generally speaking, not more than 40 per cent of the population of any one province would be eligible for the special tax credit. However, I should point out that there was an exception to this 40 per cent rule in Newfoundland, where the designation of all the region of Labrador raised the provincial percentage above this level.

Similarly, the statistics did not take into account the fact that in some census divisions, while the average family unemployment rate may not be the highest and the per capita income may not be the lowest, there are, nevertheless, many people living in rural or isolated areas who are much more disadvantaged than their fellow residents who live in the more urbanized parts of the country. It was with a view to helping these people that the minister decided to include some census divisions in the northern parts of the country, especially in Ontario and western Canada.

I would like to take a few minutes to describe briefly the areas that are covered by the Special Investment Tax Credit program. In British Columbia the northeastern part of the province covered by the Peace River-Liard census division 55 has been designated. This includes Dawson Creek, Fort St. John, Fort Nelson and Liard River.

In Alberta the northwestern part of the province covered by census division 15 has been designated, with the exception of the urban area of Grande Prairie. Located here are places such as High Prairie, Peace River, High Level and Fort Vermilion.

In Saskatchewan the northern part of the province has been designated. This area, covered by census division 18, includes La Ronge, Buffalo Narrows, La Loche and Uranium City.

In Manitoba the northern part of the province, with the exception of the urban area of Thompson, has been designated. Here, in census divisions 19, 21, 22 and 23, we find communities such as The Pas, Flin Flon, Norway House and Churchill.

● (1640)

In Ontario we have designated that part of the province north of the 50th parallel of latitude. Included here are communities such as Sioux Lookout, Red Lake, Sandy Lake and Moose Factory.

In Quebec the part of the province north of the 50th parallel of latitude, with the exception of the urban area of Sept-Îles, has been designated. This includes Fort George, Gagnon, Natashquan and Fort Chimo.

The Gaspé region, covered by census divisions 02, 03, 04, 05, 06, 07, 08 and 09, has been designated, with the exception of the urban area of Rimouski. Included here are such centre as Rivière du Loup, Matane, Gaspé and New Carlisle.

The Magdalen Islands which is census division 01 have also been designated under the program.

In New Brunswick the northern and eastern parts of the province have been designated. These areas are located in the following census divisions: Kent 08, Northumberland 09, Madawaska 13, Restigouche 14 and Gloucester 15. Here can be found communities such as Edmundston, Campbellton, Bathurst, Chatham and Richibucto.

In Prince Edward Island, the area covered by the Kings census division 01 has been designated. This includes centres such as: Montague, Cardigan, Souris and Murray River.

In Nova Scotia, Cape Breton Island, which is covered by the counties of Inverness 15, Richmond 16, Cape Breton 17 and Victoria 18 census divisions, has been designated, as has the nearby part of the Eastern Shore covered by Guysborough 13 census division. Included are communities such as Port Hawkesbury, Ingonish, Sydney, Glace Bay, St. Peters and Canso.

In Newfoundland, Labrador, census division 10, and the coastal regions of the Island of Newfoundland, with the exception of the Corner Brook area and the Avalon Peninsula, are designated. These areas are covered by census divisions 02, 03, 04, 07, 08, 09 and 10. This includes communities such as Happy Valley-Goose Bay, Port aux Basques, Trout River, Bona Vista and Marystown.

In the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the government has designated all of these territories as specially designated areas under the program. This, of course, includes communities from Whitehorse and Old Crow to Frobisher Bay and Pangnirtung.

You will note that in this list of eligible areas the cities of Grande Prairie, Thompson, Sept-Iles and Rimouski are excluded. Understandably, residents of these areas would like the program to apply to them. But it must be remembered that the program is limited in its application to some five per cent of the Canadian population. Also, the areas designated are those most in need of assistance.

Urban centres generally offer greater economic opportunities than do rural or isolated areas. This is the case with the cities in question which do have more employment opportunities and other economic advantages than in their surrounding areas.

There are two other points I would like to address before leaving the matter of statistics and eligible areas. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has been asked why Statistics Canada data have been used and whether changes will be made to the designated areas. If I may respond on behalf of the minister, I would point out, as far as the first matter is concerned, that Statistics Canada provides authoritative, national data on population and other factors which have been used as the bases for things such as this program for many years. In addition, DREE wants to evaluate the achievements of the program over time, and census information provides the best means for doing this.

As to changes to the eligible areas, I would mention that the minister has indicated that he will be closely monitoring the program and that he will not hesitate to make improvements if, and when, these become necessary or appropriate. However, the minister has also stated that before any changes can be made the program must be subjected to an evaluation. Therefore, given the need for time over which to make this evaluation, the minister cannot foresee my changes to the eligible areas in the near future.

Speaking of evaluation, what are the benefits expected from the Special Investment Tax Credit program and against what will this evaluation be made? As envisaged, the benefits will be both economic and social in nature. By this bold initiative in regional development, the federal government is demonstrating, in a significant way, its interest in people living in economically disadvantaged areas of Canada. It is offering new hope to these people and it is challenging the private sectors to take advantage of this very generous offer and to make industrial investments which will be of benefit to themselves and to the people of the areas in which projects are located.

The economic benefits which will accrue from these investments are manifold. Employment opportunities will be generated in areas where such opportunities are now extremely limited. The investments themselves will have spillover effects, as well. Because the investment must be of a manufacturing or processing nature, jobs will be created in the primary and tertiary sectors of the economy. That is to say, jobs will be generated, for example, in the harvesting of resources to be used in the manufacturing process. They will also be generated in the service sector in responding to the need, for example, to supply or repair equipment in the manufacturing operation, or to provide personal services to employees.

The measure of success of the program will be, in part, the extent to which the program lowers unemployment rates and increases per capita incomes in the census divisions where it applies.

These benefits will, of course, be measured against their cost. At this point we can only estimate what the cost will be since we do not know how many firms will take advantage of the program, nor do we know what the size of the projects will be. The government is hoping that both the number and the size of projects will be large because the benefits to the areas of need will, of course, reflect this scale.

However, when I state that the costs can only be estimated at this time, I should hasten to add that the program must be developed with cost considerations in mind. For example, I referred earlier to the fact that there would be no duplication of benefits, in the sense that a firm cannot claim both capital cost allowances and the 50 per cent tax credit. Similarly, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, as well as other federal government departments, will take this new program into account when a firm applies for a benefit from other discretionary programs. That is to say, in deciding whether a grant, repayable incentive or loan guarantee should be offered under DREE's Regional Development Incentives Program, the minister and his officials will decide whether such an inducement is needed in addition to the 50 per cent tax credit in order to get the firm to establish, expand or modernize a facility in an eligible area.

I think it is important to point out, as well, that the program is aimed primarily at profitable enterprises—firms that have demonstrated their ability to succeed in the marketplace. Therefore it can be expected that the projects generated by these firms will be viable ones. Therefore the government can expect to receive increased corporation taxes, as well as personal income taxes that will become payable from residents of the area—some of whom may have had to rely on government assistance up until the present time.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will be assessing the costs and the benefits of this program over time, and will provide information both to the House and to the public in the light of this experience.

I have not dwelt on the technical aspects of the Special Investment Tax Credit program, but perhaps I should make a few remarks in this regard. The program became operational on October 29, 1980, in the sense that the capital costs of assets acquired on or after that date will be eligible for the 50 per cent credit. Assets must be acquired by December 31, 1985, and the credit must be claimed within five years of the date of acquisition.

● (1650)

As I said earlier, DREE is responsible for the direction of the program. Industry eligibility is determined with reference to the definition of a manufacturing or processing operation under the Regional Development Incentives Act. The definition of eligible capital property and other similar terms will be determined with reference to the Income Tax Act. Similarly, the calculation of the tax credit, the use of capital cost allowances and so on will be the responsibility of Revenue Canada.

The administration of the program has been kept as simple as possible. There are no prior approvals involved. There are no restrictions in terms of minimum or maximum size of project. The tax credit is simply claimed as part of a normal income tax return.

This last point leads me to my final comment. Recognition of the need for differentiated taxes between regions, and in particular for the higher investment tax credit rates for DREE designated regions, was given originally in 1975 and expanded in 1978.

In the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé, the tax credit today is 20 per cent, and in other regions designated under the Regional Development Incentives Act 10 per cent, unless the special investment tax credit applies. So those regions which do not qualify under the Special Investment Tax Credit program will continue to benefit from these existing inducements for regional industrial development.

I believe that the Special Investment Tax Credit program offers an exceptional opportunity for the industrialization of certain regions of Canada and that it will provide significant benefits to the 5 per cent of the Canadian population that is in the greatest need of this kind of development.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, Canadians find themselves in severe economic straits, and the government finds itself extremely limited in the options open to it because of the hodge-podge of economic theories which have been the government's trademark over the past two decades.

The government's theory of exercising restraint is hard to rationalize. For example, it lays off employees, and closes its eyes to the acquisition of goods, services, materials and facilities. The government thinks nothing of adorning federal buildings across Canada with exotic plants and interior landscaping, of which the huge hothouse created by the Bank of Canada on Sparks Street here in Ottawa is a classic example. It would be preferable, in my view, to erect a picture of a woman in New Brunswick picking potatoes for a living, or a lumberjack in snow up to his chest earning a living cutting trees. Perhaps with a constant reminder of how hard Canadians work to supply tax revenues we might move ahead with parliamentary reforms to enable members of Parliament to play a meaningful role in eliminating waste and extravagance and in developing a more efficient government administration.

For years the government decided that it would be unpopular to have a modest increase in taxes or a cutback in spending, so it took the long way home and simply expanded the money supply, thus feeding the fires of inflation. And now it deals with inflation in the traditional and classical way by employing monetary policies which, in effect, feed the fires of unemployment.

It is always the little fellow who pays, and when the government is forced to increase taxation it is done in a merciless way. The energy taxes proposed by the government do not exempt low-income Canadians—they are not sheltered with energy tax credits such as those the Conservative government proposed—and they pay at the same rate as the wealthiest people in the land. That is exactly what I mean by a tax with a vengeance and without mercy. Again, it is the little people of this country who pay.

When the government's anti-inflation policies close manufacturing plants or cause lay-offs of employees, production drops, and we have the classical situation where the drop in supply is more dramatic than the drop in demand. With too many buyers chasing too few goods, prices go up, again feeding the fires of inflation. The government's policies for dealing with inflation are counterproductive. Short-term solutions have become long-term tragedies.

It is a preferable answer to abandon the spectre of nineteenth century solutions to twentieth century problems and deal with and address the reality of today. Our aging production facilities need to be rejuvenated, and the key to that rejuvenation surely is research and development.

The winds of change are blowing in advanced industrial states, and the signs of change are apparent in Canada too. The leading performers in our Canadian economy are firms that produce high technology products and systems. These firms provide good jobs for their employees and require support services that directly or indirectly involve almost every trade.

A government somehow has to learn the lesson that one of the elements in combating inflation is to increase the supply of goods, both domestically and in our export markets, so that prices go down and more Canadians are employed and become taxpayers sharing the burden of government, so that taxes can go down and the demand for social services can be reduced. It is my view that the government is doing right now exactly the opposite of what it should be doing to create jobs and fight inflation.

The tax system that supports the National Energy Program tabled on October 28 will indeed impinge on almost every sphere of Canadian activity for years to come.

The government has correctly excluded the Bay of Fundy, which is located between the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, from Canada lands. This area is essentially untested for energy resources, and it would appear to be in the classification of high-cost exploration risk.

The tax table accompanying the National Energy Program indicates that the after-tax, after-incentive cost for a Canadian company conducting an exploration program would be seven cents per dollar spent on Canada lands against 34 cents in the Bay of Fundy. For a foreign company it would be 28 cents versus 53 cents. The province of New Brunswick is in no financial position to offset this differential if it is to see its offshore resource potential property evaluated. There has been one hole drilled in the Bay of Fundy, but a number of promising structures remain to be tested.

A ship-borne seismic survey by Chevron-Irving this past summer indicates a renewed interest in looking at this important area. I am concerned about the financial incentive to pursue exploration in the Bay of Fundy as a result of the tax program being proposed by the government. I am also concerned about the policy statement of the government that the Foreign Investment Review Agency will vigorously enforce its investment criteria in the energy sector.

Again, the government policy whereby it does not want to see the oil companies use their cash flow to expand into the non-energy part of the economy impacts adversely on the province of New Brunswick.

Over the past decade New Brunswick has received as much as one quarter of its non-hydrocarbon and uranium exploration expenditures from oil companies or their mineral exploration subsidiaries, most of which are foreign controlled. These firms have sufficiently large exploration budget allocations to justify spending a small portion in relatively high-risk areas or to test new exploration concepts in the areas of unproven potential. Following the decline in the role of junior mining companies in the late 1960s they became leaders in mineral exploration activities.

I suggest that oil companies which have established a level of mineral exploration expenditures over the years should not have their continuing participation frustrated and, indeed, if their participation is to be discouraged by the federal government, it should first see in place a comparable alternative financial source to carry on this development in New Brunswick and other areas that suffer from regional disparity.

The federal government's program does not adequately recognize the potential for New Brunswick oil shales to play a major role in the development of alternate energy forms. New Brunswick's capability to finance research and development in oil shale is limited. The extent and potential of New Brunswick's oil shale are attractive. It has not been defined, nor is it generally recognized, but the evidence collected in the only area recently tested in any detail indicates considerable potential. The one square mile drilled by Canadian Occidental Petroleum over the past number of years comprises about .1 per cent of the area known to be underlain by oil-bearing shales. The Occidental work has shown that the principal zone in the one square mile area contains 8 per cent to 10 per cent hydrocarbon, or several hundred million barrels of petroleum.

It is not unreasonable to assume that at least 5 per cent of the oil shales are of comparable or better quality. If this is so, the potential is for 15 billion barrels or more. Surely, a potential of this nature requires exploration, research and development, and this in turn requires that tax incentives be provided by this government. Instead, the government appears to be moving in the opposite direction and discourages exploration in New Brunswick.

Canada has offered Saskatchewan a five-year, $50 million heavy oil research and development program. It allocates nothing to New Brunswick in terms of development of our oil shales. The role allocated to development of the oil shales in the national energy inventory is disappointing because an active exploration program, coupled with the necessary research and development, has great potential in helping to solve our national energy problems and in providing badly needed jobs in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

My search for the base data used to arrive at the areas designated for the special 50 per cent tax credit provision mentioned in the bill before us was greatly assisted by the member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), for whom I have a high regard, when he asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), as reported at page 5288 of Hansard of December 3, 1980, if the minister was prepared to publish the base data used in the establishment of the program, and when he further asked him to confirm that the program is being put forward as a pilot endeavour for the next year.

The minister said, in reply, that he would have never dared to make those designations, either on gut feeling or as an arbitrary decision. The minister said he took the 5 per cent of Canadians who are in most need, and in no province could he designate more than 40 per cent. He further stated that all the statistics have been made public.

If the designation of the census divisions eligible for the program was not arbitrary, why were they limited to 40 per cent of the population of Canada? Are not these in themselves arbitrary criteria?

Is the program only, in the words of the member for Madawaska-Victoria, a pilot endeavour for the next year and, if so, will this not make potential investors reluctant to participate in what may be a start-stop program?

Later, in response to a point of order I raised, the minister said he made a commitment to the parliamentary committee on regional development that during the year he would try to refine the designation to try to correct it as such. He said that there were three criteria: the highest family unemployment rate in Canada, the lowest per capita income, and an isolation factor.

Why did the minister not mention the isolation factor in his earlier reply to the member for Madawaska-Victoria, and why is it not mentioned in the information release on the program which says simply, "The program is aimed at the 5 per cent of the Canadian population suffering the most from high family unemployment and low per capita income?" Are isolated areas included regardless of unemployment and income levels? Also, "isolated" and "northern" appear to be synonymous as all northern areas are included, except for northwestern British Columbia and northeastern Alberta. Why were those areas omitted? The information release notes that each province and territory has at least one census division in the program. Was this a requirement; that is, was one area from each province and territory included, regardless of relative levels of family unemployment and per capita income?

The information sheet also notes that "the eligible areas generally account for less than 40 per cent of the population of any one province," but the minister's statement to the member for Madawaska-Victoria says that "in no province could I designate more than 40 per cent." However, in his reply to my point of order, he moves back to a more conditional phrasing when he says:

In no province should the regions designated cover more than roughly 40 per cent of the population of the province, otherwise there would be no incentive.

Is the 40 per cent criterion a requirement of the program or only a general target, and in either case why, if more than 40 per cent of a province qualifies under the other program criteria, should regions be excluded from the program? Why would there be "no incentive" if such regions were included? Will there be the opportunity to refine the areas designated and the criteria for designation before the program goes into effect this year and, if not, what value is that pledge of the minister if, in the words of the member from Madawaska-Victoria, "The program is a one year pilot project only?"

In the testimony of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to the Senate finance committee, he said that the upper limit of revenue loss set for the program was $15 million. He added that it was not a requirement of the program that at least one census division be eligible in each province and territory, and he said that it would be possible for a company to get a combination of the tax credit and a regional development incentives grant which would be more than the company could get in a regional development incentives grant. I would like to hear the minister confirm that the upper limit of revenue loss under this program is $15 million, an amount the Liberal senator from Northumberland, Mr. Thériault, described as "minuscule".

I would like to hear the minister confirm that it is not a requirement of the program that at least one census division in each province and territory be included in the program.

If the Minister of Finance was correct in stating that it would be possible for a company to qualify both for the tax credit and a regional development incentives grant, which, in combination would constitute a larger incentive than the regional development incentives grant for which it would otherwise be eligible, why does the information release say that "stacking of the 50 per cent tax credit with other incentives is not generally permitted" and that "the tax credit will be taken into account in determining the need for an amount of incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Act"?

Will any companies qualify for the tax credit which could not qualify for grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act? If not, is it not merely a substitute for the Regional Development Incentives program in the designated areas?

I have to confess that I find it very confusing to attempt to rationalize the minister's program which bisects parts of provinces within a region in determining where the new 50 per cent tax incentive program will apply. The stated objective is to promote industrial development in those parts of Canada most adversely affected by economic disparities. I find it very difficult to rationalize this approach with the application of the program spread over every province and territory in Canada instead of concentrating on regions which suffer from disparity.

The mystery deepens when we refer to the areas that are identified and those that are not. Take the province of Quebec, for example. The areas identified take in the eastern Gaspé and northern Quebec, excluding the urban regions of Sept-Iles and Rimouski. Yet the maps supplied to me by the minister indicate that, according to the program criteria, the counties of Labelle and L'Islet should be included. Yet they are not. In Ontario everything north of the 50th parallel is included, yet the county of Haliburton, the only county in Ontario to meet the program criteria, is not.

In New Brunswick the county of Queens is the worst off in the province in terms of income and meets the other program criteria, yet it is not included. In Nova Scotia the counties of Cumberland, Digby and Yarmouth meet all the program criteria, yet are not included.

All these counties could have been included in the program, even with the arbitrary 40 per cent rule, yet they are not there. Moreover, because of that rule the entire Avalon peninsula in Newfoundland and census division 05 in the western part of that province which meet the unemployment and income criteria are not included.

Meanwhile, a number of census divisions are included in the program, it seems purely on the grounds of isolation or a rule that one census division in each province must be included.

It is little wonder then, why I have asked and am asking to have the date base, the maps I have been given, and any related information which was used in arriving at these designated areas, tabled in the House.

When I look at these discrepancies and note the fact that every area in the Atlantic provinces which is included—with one small exception, that of 4,700 people in part of Guysborough county in Nova Scotia—is represented by a member of the government caucus, questions arise in my mind, and there are questions put to me by other people which I simply cannot answer. I would, therefore, like to have the statistical information upon which this program is based.

I finally received more information from the minister in which he confirmed that census divisions were chosen as a geographic basis for the program. The main reason for this selection was that statistics are available on that basis which will permit, in the future, an evaluation of the program's impact on the areas now designated. He mentioned as well that Ontario and Quebec are minor exceptions and that partial census divisions were designated in the north in order to preserve the criterion of isolation to which he referred.

The minister confirmed that the three designation criteria applied to the different census divisions were: highest family unemployment rate, lowest per capita income, and isolation. In addition two other constraints were applied. One was to have the program applied to only those areas where approximately 5 per cent of the neediest people of Canada reside. The other constraint was to limit the designation to a maximum of about 40 per cent of the population in any one province in order to induce industry to locate in the most needy areas in the province.

The precise criteria applied with respect to the family unemployment rate and the per capita income are as follows: the family unemployment rate had to exceed the national average by at least 30 per cent, and the per capita income had to be less than 89 per cent of the national average. The minister felt the combination of these criteria resulted in a very stringent and severe approach to designation. It appears the figures of 30 per cent and 89 per cent were not based on any objective criterion of what constitutes hardship but on the colour coding system used to define different levels of unemployment and income on the maps. This is arbitrary in the extreme.

Moreover, the department utilized an isolation factor to add a few more census divisions to those otherwise designated. For example, they added northern census divisions or partial ones in Quebec, Ontario, and some of the western provinces. In the west, in particular, the department felt this criterion of isolation would also serve to include many native people who are not accounted for in the unemployment and per capita income data provided. Yet northeastern Alberta and northwestern British Columbia, excluded from the program, have larger native populations than the census divisions included from these provinces. Again I must ask why?

I have yet to receive the economic indicators on which the minister based his selection of the different census divisions to which the new special investment tax credit program will apply. But the maps he supplied show that the information base was the 1976 census for unemployment and the 1976 Revenue Canada figures for income. Since income data are available for census divisions for 1978, the use of such out-of-date data disturbs me. But leaving that aside, on the basis of the information which he has given me it seems serious discrepancies exist which he should want to remedy.

It is difficult to offer constructive criticism of a program with a view to its improvement when the data base which accompanied most other government programs, particularly those winter works programs promoted by the Department of Employment and Immigration, such as Young Canada Works and programs of that nature, have always had the data information released and made public so that the designations and allocations of funds made out of those programs could be verified. This program appears to be an exception.

In closing, I think the principle of this program is an excellent one. I should like to see its implementation perfected, and that is the reason why I offered the constructive criticism the minister invited.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my speech today is to inform and reassure the people with regard to the Canadian tax policy, to stress the responsiveness of our Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and finally to expound, with a great deal of pride, on the typically Liberal decisions contained in the last budget.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, although political observers had predicted a tough budget with increased taxes for everyone, Canadians were pleasantly surprised to find a budget where the government had sought on the one hand to recover all that was humanly possible for the administration of government programs and on the other hand to plan an even fairer distribution of the economic load, and finally, to be more constructive, positive and dynamic, to prove that the Liberal government wanted to involve every sector of our economy in the solution of our current economic problems on a short, medium and long-term basis.

However I do not claim to be a tax expert and it is as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) that I want to comment on a bill which has been consistently described as very technical and yet which meets in a positive way the needs of the people. Therefore, I do want to assure all Canadians, Mr. Speaker, that one of my concerns is the equitable distribution of the tax load, the other being our desire to help the most vulnerable and have-not members of our society overcome present economic hardships.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss in the House today one of the most equitable tax systems in the world, applied in a country where the quality of life continues to be one of the best in the world. The Canadian tax system was inaugurated, out of necessity, in 1917 to allow the country to collect the funds needed to administer the country. It has greatly expanded since that time with the implementation of various social programs aimed at promoting the well-being of all Canadians, as for instance old age pensions, family allowances, the Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance. The tax reform helped this system make Canada one of the best places in the world to live. It is a good idea to mention this in the House and to convince ourselves of it, and the opposition in particular should know that its masochism is very costly for Canada and all Canadians, and today more than ever before. All governments are faced with serious economic problems at this time, we all know this, and ours is no exception.

An investigation carried by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development confirmed it.

In 1978, tax revenues in Canada made up 32.3 per cent of the gross national product, thus our country ranked fifteenth, far behind Sweden with 53.1 per cent. This same investigation in a comparative study of tax revenues collected by the three levels of government indicated that Canadian provinces and municipalities receive a larger portion of tax revenues than their counterparts in other countries. According to some comments on the results of the OECD investigation, such comparisons do not reflect the distribution of the tax burden among the taxpayers nor does it permit comparing personal taxes with corporate taxes. To answer such comments, Mr. Speaker, we would have to explain the entire social philosophy underlying the Canadian tax system but as I do not intend to use all my time to deal at length with the nature of the Canadian tax system and its effectiveness in promoting social justice and economic welfare. I will merely state that such are our aims and that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I would rather dwell upon the value of the system.

First I should like to say that according to a study in which were compared the levels of personal and corporate income tax in Canada and the United States, personal income tax in Canada is lower by 1 to 1.5 percentage points than what it is in the United States. The same is to be said with respect to our respective corporate income tax levels, but this is not necessarily true, however, for all industries.

Let us now have a look at the income tax actually paid by individuals in various income brackets. Again, these data may be found in the Statistics Review for 1978 which reports on the income tax returns submitted by Canadians for that year, the most recent one for which such data are available. In 1978, Canadians with between $1,000 and $5,000 in taxable income paid an average of $3 in income tax; in 1977, the preceding year, they had paid an average of $9. Those whose taxable income was between $15,000 and $20,000 paid $2,396, while those with a taxable income between $30,000 and $35,000 paid an average of $6,134. Those in the $50,000-$100,000 income bracket paid an average of $15,564, and so on. Those earning $200,000 and over paid an average of $107,495 in income tax. These figures clearly demonstrate how our progressive income tax system based on income levels does operate. Moreover, these figures show how this system can adjust the taxation rates to protect the incomes of individuals against the throes of inflation. For instance, the $3 average tax paid in 1978 was a reduction from the $9 paid in 1977; the $2,396 average income tax paid by taxpayers in the $15,000-$20,000 income bracket showed a reduction from the $2,564 paid in 1977, and so on and so forth. I do not intend to talk about indexation today, for it has already been dealt with at length.

However I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that indexation is one element of the tax structure that can benefit the individual taxpayer but not the corporations. I should also like to point out that since indexation has been implemented way back in 1973, the federal government has lost $7.5 billion of its share of revenue whereas the loss for the provinces has amounted to $2.3 billion. Indexation is applied not only to the tax rate but also to a large number of exemptions and credits to which each and every Canadian taxpayer is entitled, and low-income Canadians benefit more from those credits.

Let us consider, for example, the child tax credit. In 1978 a single parent with three children and an average income of less than $18,000 was getting on the average a tax credit of $711. Married people in an identical situation received an average credit of $600. With respect to those who were entitled to the child tax credit in 1978, a total of 1,698,270 people with an income of less than $18,000 obtained an average credit of $393, while 770,106 families with an income over $18,000 received an average credit of $268.

This type of taxation structure takes the financial situation of every Canadian into consideration. It allows the individual to show on his tax return the annual deductions and credits to which he is entitled. It should also be noted that the tax returns are simple enough since two thirds of all Canadians complete their annual returns themselves and that most of those who call on professional tax services are either independent workers or small businessmen whose taxation situation is more involved.

As I said earlier, a great many people believe that high income earners have great wealth which should be distributed equally. However, if every fraction of income over $30,000 were to be collected as tax and redistributed, every Canadian would receive only $150 and this would not help to develop our country in the long run. This brings me to the second aspect of our tax system, that is, the incentives available to private businesses.

As everyone knows, our tax system provides many deductions and exemptions for individual taxpayers. In the case of businesses, these deductions take the form of fiscal incentives aimed at developing the business sector during periods of economic recession or at creating employment during periods of high unemployment. These incentives are offered for the benefit of all Canadians and not only to help businesses increase their profits. Indeed, they encourage companies to take risks when an unfavourable economic climate would require them to be more cautious. Without these incentives, many businesses would decide to abandon their investment projects, which would be to the long-term disadvantage of our economy. Fiscal policies are often an important factor in these decisions. For instance, fiscal incentives have the advantage over subsidies that they can reach a vast population much more quickly. Businesses may easily determine whether they are eligible for an incentive and they can quickly take advantage of it. However, because these incentives are well known, they are bound to be criticized by the public who, too often, fail to understand their objectives. Once established, the incentives are rigorously controlled to ensure that they are used legitimately. Whenever there is abuse, the Minister of National Revenue requires that the proper legislative amendments be made. Such a regulating or tuning mechanism, if you will, may be applied over the years, and minor changes made until the desired results are achieved.

The deduction granted small businesses has, among other things, been adjusted that way. The reduced rate applies to the income of actively operated businesses, and is intended to encourage their development and the updating of their technology through the tax savings achieved. That reduction was granted because small businesses at times find it difficult to borrow in the money market and obtain the funds they need to expand. However, there have been cases where it applied to individuals not operating businesses actively.

The department also takes steps to ensure that the tax system is applied fairly. For instance, it is easy for them to check the salaries of employees, for instance, through salary deductions and information supplied by employers.

To ensure that independent workers, small businesses and corporations pay their fair share of taxes, the department carries out tax audits. For that purpose, computers print out a list of taxpayers who draw income from a source other than salaries or wages and break them down into two categories: first, corporations, namely, wholesalers and manufacturers; second, private individuals, namely, professionals, business owners and farmers.

The lists are used to select files for audit purposes, a process which may involve industry as a whole or a given group of taxpayers. Such audits have already been carried out in the scrap iron industry, the clothing industry, the tourist industry and the pharmaceutical products industry. Indeed, this last project has yet to be completed. As a result of audits in the scrap iron industry, 94 court proceedings were launched and $17 million in taxes were recouped.

Obviously the tax system has different objectives when it comes to collecting from individuals and businesses.

In the case of individuals its main purpose is to ensure social justice for all, whereas the objective is much wider for businesses since it is to strive for greater economic security for all Canadians. That is why a comparison of the tax load shouldered by individuals and companies must go beyond what is reflected by the figures. I have the figures here but they apply only to taxable income. In 1978 corporations paid $6.5 billion in taxes on a taxable income of $19.6 billion, an average tax rate of 33.4 per cent. Small business owners paid $616 million in taxes on $3 billion in income, that is a rate of 20.3 per cent, and the employees paid $16 billion in taxes on taxable incomes of $79.7 billion, a rate of 21.2 per cent. Still we should not forget that many other factors must be taken into account in this comparison, among others the number of taxpayers in each category, which is quite significant: there are about 9,568,000 employees, close to 600,000 business owners and professionals, and 441,000 corporations. The legislative measures contained in Bill C-54 were the object of a close examination which took into account the main objective of our tax system. That is the best protection possible for the rights of all Canadians.

These measures are designed to create a balance between the rights of the individuals and the business incentives which are sometimes necessary. Earlier in the year the Liberal government released the draft of many of the amendments contained in this bill in order to gather the opinions of the taxpayers before introducing the actual legislation. Bill C-54 takes these suggestions into account, some of which had even been introduced by the previous government in December 1979. They were among other things, measures allowing people running unincorporated businesses to deduct wages paid to their spouses, and interim provisions with regard to the Small Business Development Bonds enabling them to obtain financial aid at lower interest rates in order to compensate for revenue losses incurred because of these measures and to help finance the increases anticipated in other areas. A 5 per cent surtax on top of the federal tax payable by corporations has been introduced for a two-year period. Furthermore, the bill contains tax relief provisions for volunteer firemen and for employees working on temporary assignments abroad, as well as for other cases where there is income tax related to family law provisions.

This bill also contains measures proposed in the October 28 budget for individuals and businesses, including provisions aimed at improving regional incentives in areas of high unemployment and low incomes. It also contains a great many technical changes which take into account constructive comments made by businessmen and tax experts as well as various readjustments regarding the implementation process which I discussed earlier. So Bill C-54 has been devised as a way to help Canadians of all walks of life through our taxation system. We are therefore presenting this bill for second reading hoping that after having heard the various speeches and thought things over, hon. members will give it the approval it deserves.

[English]

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in the debate on Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax. On January 16 the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) issued a press release relating to this act. There were several things in that release that I should like to refer to briefly.

The first is that the minister, when speaking about Canada's economy, said that we are in a period when we, like other national economies, are facing a very difficult situation. If the minister wants to compare Canada with other economies, Mr. Speaker, I think he should do it in an open and honest fashion. He should examine the strongest economies in the world today and compare Canada with them. I refer especially to the economies of Japan, Germany, the United States, and Switzerland, which are the four strongest in the world today. Those economies were not built, like Canada, on natural resources, and the abundance of fossil fuels that we are able to take advantage of. In spite of that, however, those economies have been developed to a point where they are now placing this country in serious economic difficulty. This is not being done on the basis of cheap labour, although that is a misconception held by many people in Canada.

I should like to point out to the minister that although we are in a difficult economic situation it is not for the same reasons that other countries, with which we compare ourselves, have had to face. They have surmounted their problems and in many cases are now in a better position than Canada, in spite of the resources that we have. This has come about because of the way they have managed their economies, by increased efficiency of production, by entering world markets with car production and other things, and by the way they have adopted science and technology as a basis upon which to build an industrial economy.

The minister referred to his budget speech and to an earlier budget. In April, 1980, he mentioned in a ways and means motion many measures that were included in the former budget. I question how much credit he should take for that however, and whether he has given proper credit to the people who instituted those measures. I see an hon. member shaking his head. When I read that I found it difficult to understand whether the minister referred to something he had put forward or something that had been put forward by the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

On page 4 of the press release the minister referred to industrial development and the grand total of $12 billion to be allocated over the next three years to essential productivity and supply initiatives. He said that this should help reduce inflationary pressures by increasing supply.

I have heard mention in this House, as have my colleagues, of the possibility of a government industrial strategy being introduced. We have yet to see any specific policy that would bring this about although we are all waiting expectantly for it. A program for the expenditure of $350 million has been established to promote industrial restructuring and manpower retraining in areas of particular need. I am not sure where the areas of particular need will be, nor exactly what kind of retraining will be involved, and I question whether that is the direction that an industrial strategy should take. Perhaps we should proceed in the same fashion that other nations have, by providing a true industrial strategy and investment for the future.

The third point I should like to make concerns the minister's comment that he would like to reiterate the support given in the budget for the monetary policy pursued by the Bank of Canada. I have several comments about that, Mr. Speaker. The first is that by allowing the Bank of Canada to have a floating rate, the minister has taken himself away from the responsibility of setting interest rates in our country. That in itself was politically expedient and I give the minister credit for doing that. It took a lot of pressure away from him. It also takes the government away from the responsibility of looking at what the Bank of Canada is doing with the bonds it is bringing forward. Putting extra bonds on the market really forces interest rates up and by doing that it has control over interest rates. This point has been brought out by other members on this side of the House and is something which impacts particularly on industry and on the farm community, both of which are important to the economic health of the country.

My understanding is that the Bank of Canada is selling more bonds than it needs to, and these treasury bonds are one of the reasons why the interest rate in Canada is staying as high as it is. The Bank of Canada may believe that by keeping interest rates high and restricting money for lending it will help fight inflation. That may be so, but it is at the expense of the economy, small businessmen, farmers and others who are needed to generate activity in the country. If the minister is supporting the policies of the Bank of Canada, I suggest that he needs to do it in a very honest way by saying he is abdicating the responsibility, if he chooses to take it, for the monetary policy of the country.

I would like to touch on some specific issues. There is one major issue on which I questioned the minister a few days ago. It concerns the Small Business Development Bond. Like a good many other economic measures, people are starting to question what the priorities of the government are, and whether or not the government is putting effort into the areas that need it, in order to look after the affairs of the nation. We all agree the constitution is important, and all the things concerning energy are important. But the economic basis and the structuring of institutions which lend money for businesses are matters in which we are all interested. The Small Business Development Bond is a specific instance which comes to mind. This bond was brought forward at least 13 months ago. It was given support about nine months ago, I believe on April 21, by the government in a ways and means motion. Since that time and up until now it has still not been put in place nor has it been defined in such a fashion that the business community understands what it is all about.

The minister said his department spoke to banks and that he understood they knew what it was all about. However, I must question that. I suggest that if the minister or his parliamentary secretary looked into it he would find by going beyond the big cities and into banks in some smaller rural areas that the bank branches do not understand what that bond is about, and there is limited access to funds. The larger branches have kept the money or have given directions to their smaller branches in such a way that people have not had access to that funding opportunity. That is a very important point, because here we are 13 months later at a time when that bonding will be stopped as of March 31, as I understand things stand now. Many people still do not know that that advantage is available to them.

I will cite an example of an incorporated farm. There are many of those. Owners of these farms might want to build a new barn. First, banks not knowing it would be law were reluctant or not giving proper direction, because they did not understand what the opportunities were. Accountants were in the same position of not fully understanding all of the ramifications. But now people are finding out that these things are possible and we are in the middle of winter. In my area about eight feet of snow is on the ground and people are finding out that they can get a bond to build a barn. But let me point out that on March 31 a person can only take funding for that portion of the barn that is actually erected. Money cannot be obtained for the materials bought, only for whatever portion is actually standing.

I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary or the minister understand that point, but I ask them to look into that. Perhaps they could find some way to extend the March 31 deadline. Even if they do not wish to extend it beyond the time period, perhaps they could look at it in such a way that people who are applying for these bonds, who are reasonable and honest about what they want to do but cannot do it because of time and weather, are given an opportunity to take full advantage of this interest rate level which is important if people are to expand their business or continue to survive in what is otherwise a hostile economic environment. I ask the minister, through the parliamentary secretary, to look into the point I have just raised. I also ask if he could look into extending the date beyond March 31.

I understand from the Department of Finance that this is anticipated to cost the government, in lost revenues, $50 million per month for each month it is functioning. It is my understanding also that it was between $200 million and $400 million which they feel has already been lost in lost revenue. I seriously question where a figure like that could come from, and I wonder how you estimate what is lost in revenue as compared to what is generated in additional revenue because people are doing things and business activity is created. I do not understand how someone could calculate that. I ask the minister whether there is an explanation. If there is, I will be happy to try to understand it.

There is a brief being prepared on behalf of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. Mr. Charles Gracey has been instrumental in helping to draw up this brief. A motion has been drawn up supported by my local Bruce County Cattlemen's Association on behalf of the farm community across Canada, concerning this bond. The Canadian farm community has asked if this measure could be extended to unincorporated farms. This is particularly important for cattlemen. It is a subtle point, but it is confusing to a lot of people. I understand they are not able to claim interest charged against their income tax if they take advantage of this bonding. That is another area which will have to be balanced. The Cattlemen's Association request will have to be considered in the light of that as well. Will the minister look at that and consider that request?

In many cases there is no difference between an unincorporated and an incorporated farm. On the same concession road in any part of Canada we could find a farmer who has 200 acres and has incorporated for a variety of reasons, while across the road there is a farmer with 400 acres, who may be much more productive, which has nothing at all to do with being incorporated, but he cannot take advantage of this opportunity. That is a discrepancy and an inequity.

My second point concerns volunteer firemen. This concerns firemen in my area. Some time in the past we had ongoing discussions with a parliamentary secretary who is not now in the House of Commons. Those discussions were to help develop this increase which has occurred in their tax deduction. I think it is clear that the government has continued to support the measure, and it means that it understands the essence of volunteer firemen and that these people make a contribution, often at their own expense, which is valuable to smaller communities in Canada. I believe there are 20,000 firemen who are making a contribution on a volunteer basis. They do deserve the kind of respect suggested here.

I also make the point that this has not been duplicated in other areas of volunteer work. I suggest there is a difference. I suggest also that the historical fact is that they did have a deduction. A concession was made at one time. It was quite reasonably made on the basis of the contribution these people were making to their local communities. It was a very worthwhile effort. I support the government's measure there. I suggest it continue to look at whether there is a proper level of funding for that.

I would like to spend a little time on the energy conversion grants. This is another example. I do not know whether more information has come out in the last week or two concerning this program. The idea of the grant is good, and I support it. It helps to get away from oil, something worth while. It frees up fuel oil which can then be upgraded to gasoline, or whatever. In that sense it is a worth-while measure and should be encouraged. The fact that it is taxable is another matter. This is a serious consideration. It means we are reducing the net amount of the grant by 15 to 50 per cent because it is taxable. If we had the tax credits we were talking about in addition to this, there would not be much argument. However, the fact is we do not. I wonder whether the taxable nature of this will stop the program from having the full impact it might have otherwise had. We very much want to encourage the program and the subsidies it will provide.

The fact that this program allows us to make a gradual conversion is good. The fact we can take 50 per cent of it this year and 50 per cent next year, if we want, is good. The fact that it can be related to solar energy at a lesser percentage is also good.

There are a number of inequities in the program which are confusing and make it difficult. These are probably the reasons why the program is not yet functionable. I stand to be corrected, but my information, from having tried to find out over the last several months since this was announced, is that we do not have the agreement of all the provinces. I know the discussions are ongoing.

The difficulties arise when we talk about the opportunities available in the different provinces. An example is somebody who is already off oil. A person may have converted from oil to natural gas, a very rich form of energy, a fossil fuel, and now wishes to put in a wood stove to complement that. It makes a lot of sense, using a renewable energy instead of one that is non-renewable.

There are many such inequities which make it difficult to rationalize across the country. The Northwest Territories, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland have an opportunity to use this grant in a very special way for retrofitting and allowing increased insulation, and this does not have to be applied just to take them away from oil. That is a good point.

The government should seriously consider extending that program so that it can happen right across the country. That would make more sense and would be a lot easier to administer. I am sure there would be general support for it across the country, and I encourage that to happen.

With regard to that grant, another inequity is the fact that those who rent their homes do not get any net benefit from it. These are often low-income people and those who live in apartment buildings. Some must pay their own energy costs. Their landlord has no real need to get off oil, so they continue to sit there, paying their own energy costs. There is no direct relationship to trying to conserve or get off oil, as they do not get any advantage from it. That is not true in every case, but in some cases. It is another area that should be examined.

Another point is the spouse's deduction. Some of the additional problems are related to how far this deduction or deductibility goes. I am having trouble obtaining specific information. We seemed to get a little more information along the way. The fact seems to be that spouses can pay into the Canada Pension Plan and be eligible for benefits at some point in time. I understand they cannot get unemployment insurance benefits, but I am not sure on that. This is an example of where we have a program that has apparently been in place since last April, possibly before, for people to take advantage of, but no one is clear on what it means or what the opportunities or options are.

We have a situation now, three quarters of the way through the month of January, past the normal year end for many people. They now wonder whether they should have paid their wives for the labour they provided to the business or farm. The question is whether it is possible to make this retroactive. Can they write a cheque for the work that was done last year? If it is not possible because of a certain deadline or time lapse and is no longer legal, why was there not a good educational program? There should have been an explanation to the public and the members of this House.

I have seen no specific information, directives or guidelines which would allow us, as members of Parliament, to get this information to our constituents. If that was an honest effort to bring out a program to help people, why did we not get the information which would have made it work? If there is that kind of information, will the government now be lenient and give people the opportunity to take full advantage of that? I ask the government to look into it.

Significant in what were not mentioned in this bill are measures to help small businesses and farmers, capital gains tax measures in particular. With the increased economic pressures on the farm today, as farmers retire they have to look at the investment they have had, and the capital gains they have accrued in their lives.

I understand the government promised to increase capital gains tax exemptions for farmers during the last election. If ministers did not do that, I stand to be corrected, but my understanding is they promised to do that. According to the information that has come out so far, the white paper on capital gains tax, it really does not address the situation for the agricultural community. It does not improve the status of farmers vis-à-vis the capital gains tax. I wonder why that was not included.

I mentioned briefly the energy tax credit. When looking at energy prices this is something that has to be seriously considered. I know that some of the work being done on energy by a special committee of which I am a member is with regard to the tax credit system on energy. We are looking at this in several special ways. The question is how to address the problems which will result from increasing energy prices.

Since the last election the government has permitted the price of gasoline to rise by 30 cents a gallon, or thereabouts. That is approximately what would have happened had the Conservative government remained in power. What measures are being taken to compensate for the difficulties of people on low and fixed incomes? What is being done to alleviate some of the burden, some of the real social consequences which have resulted from those increases?

I am not arguing against an increase in energy prices in order to allow us to maintain both security and self-sufficiency. However, I wonder whether it is responsible to allow that to happen with the broad, over-all effect of making no differentiation between the different strata of our society, those who need assistance and those who are able and will continue to be able to afford it.

I understand the government made some effort to give them some deductions. Ministers suggested prices would be lower. That was one of the bases of their whole approach during the last election campaign. If it has not happened, and I know there could be a number of reasons for that and I will not try to address them, then, I wonder why they would not look at that particular segment of the population and try to address that specifically as a welfare and social measure which is responsible and necessary at this time.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In February, 1976, Robert Andras, then minister of manpower and immigration, increased Government of Canada annuity interest rates from 4 per cent to 7 per cent. In the communiqué, he stated, "It should be noted, however, that both the increase in the rate of interest and the percentage increase in the annuity will be subject to periodic review depending on future fluctuations in interest rates". The 7 per cent interest rate is now unfair, inappropriate and dishonest. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government do forthwith increase the interest rate on which calculations are based for the payment of the Government of Canada annuities to the same rate of interest presently paid on Canada Savings Bonds, and that the rate of interest on annuities fluctuate with the rate of interest paid to those who lend money to Canada on Canada Savings Bonds.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EFFECT ON P.E.I. ECONOMY IF CN EXPRESS OFFICES CLOSED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This week 17 of the 41 CN Express employees on Prince Edward Island received notice they are to be laid off on March 1, despite assurances from the government that the elimination of CN Express on the island is being reconsidered. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House condemn the government for ignoring the severe economic hardship P.E.I. will experience should CN Express be terminated there, and that the Minister of Transport honour his commitment to explore every possible way to prevent P.E.I. from becoming, except for Newfoundland, the only province in Canada without CN Express service.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

SHARED COST PROGRAM—ADMINISTRATION OF GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas this House has been debating a great deal the supply of oil and gas, for example, drilling in Alberta, tar sands development and pipelines, and has virtually ignored the things most people can relate to, such as programs converting their oil furnace to gas or electricity; and whereas the minister of energy, in talking about grants of up to $800, said in this House on November 14, 1980, that "we will arrive at arrangements with all provinces very soon as to how the program will be worked but especially concerning conversion to electricity", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That the federal government stop dragging its feet in its negotiations with the provinces and allow the grants to be administered by provincial utilities like Hydro-Quebec in order to protect the consumers from rip-offs, and, finally, that the federal government make the $800 grant exempt from taxation.

IRAN—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, in view of the most recent accounts overnight of beatings and other physical and mental abuse suffered by the American hostages at the hands of their Iranian captors during their 444-day detention, accounts which have shocked the world community, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the Canadian government refuse to re-establish full diplomatic ties with Iran, and specifically refuse to reopen the Canadian Embassy in Tehran, until an international investigation of the treatment of the hostages is completed and the world community is satisfied that Iran will henceforth live up to the obligations of international law.

RECOGNITION OF EFFORTS OF UKRAINIAN COMMUNITY IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of great importance to the Ukrainian community in Canada. Considering that this House has not met on January 22 for the past six years and considering that the date of January 22 marks the commemoration of the 1918 proclamation of Ukrainian independence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House recognize the continuous efforts of the Ukrainian Canadian community to uphold the fundamental principles of freedom and democracy for the benefit of all citizens of Canada.

SERVICE TO NORTHERN COMMUNITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I stand under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that there is considerable confusion and consternation in the north concerning the government's plans for northern airports, and since budget cuts and reduction of maintenance service reinforce the uncertainty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the government deal with the issues of northern air services only after extensive consultation with territorial governments and other interested parties in the north.

Whereas Canadian National Railways is planning cuts in CN Express which will, if carried out, close half of its 70 terminals and eliminate over 1,200 jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright):

That the Canadian Transport Commission permit no closure to take place or job to be eliminated without a proper hearing being in the communities affected and evidence indicates that the closure is justified.

PROPOSED TERMINAL AT PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of recent reports that the Canadian Wheat Board is offering a $100 million interest-free loan to the consortium that plans to build the new grain terminal at Prince Rupert, and in view of the fact that the interest costs for the loan will be a charge against money realized from sales of producers' grain and, in effect, an act of conversion or theft by the board of producers' money, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board instruct the board to withdraw its offer and cancel their plans for such a loan, and further that the minister have the law officers of the Crown review the Canadian Wheat Board Act and, if necessary, bring in amendments to ensure that the powers of the board are restricted to the basic principles on which the Canadian Wheat Board was established.

EFFECTS ON OIL SUPPLY—IMPACT ON CASH FLOWS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Daily we receive reports of the disastrous effects of the program on future supply of oil in this country. We have heard from the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal, the Toronto-Dominion Bank, and today Chevron announced a cutback of $330 million in its exploration program, with a Mobil $164 million cutback in addition to many other cutbacks by both independent and multinational companies.

When will the government accept the fact that all these actions which have been proposed by the companies, plus the advice which has been received, indicate that the National Energy Program, particularly the tax policies under that National Energy Program, is leading this country into a very serious supply crisis in the 1980s? More specifically, will the government withdraw the National Energy Program and replace it with a white paper, so that there can be proper discussion of the energy program following which specific policies can be introduced?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to withdraw the National Energy Program. As I stated yesterday, the main elements of that program are widely supported—

● (1415)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where?

An hon. Member: Even you don't believe that.

Mr. MacEachen: —by the Canadian population. If the hon. member's point is that the new federal taxes are affecting the cash flow of the industry, that, of course, is readily accepted because any tax which is implemented without loopholes is bound to have that effect.

However, despite the effect of the taxes on the industry, I think it is absolutely clear that the cash flow available to the industry is ample and growing. There is no other sector in the Canadian economy which has the opportunity for growth and development this industry has. I think the hon. member ought to bear that in mind instead of repeating the doleful dirges he has repeated today in his question.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, everyone agrees with the broad elements of the program, but the actual details of the program are undermining those elements, particularly in the area of supply. Has the government been monitoring the current National Energy Board hearings on supply at which company after company is saying that the supply objectives of the National Energy Program will just not be met and that self-sufficiency is not possible under the National Energy Program in this century unless there are changes?

If the government is not monitoring these National Energy Board hearings, will the minister do so in order that he can amend the National Energy Program at the earliest possible stage if the supply objectives of the program are not met?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's support for the main outline of the National Energy Program.

Mr. Clark: Canadianization.

Mr. MacEachen: I am delighted that he supports the major elements of that program. He has suggested that changes ought to be made. No one on this side of the House has ever opposed the notion of changes if they are justified. As the hon. member knows, just before Christmas I had tabled in the House changes to the definition of exploration expenses in response to representations from the industry, and as discussion continues there undoubtedly will be further modifications if they are justified. However, what the hon. member fails to get across in his question is that despite the National Energy Program the cash flow to the industry as a whole is very substantial. It is growing, and when we add the incentive payments, growth in the cash flow to the industry in 1980 and 1981 will be very substantial indeed.

Mr. Clark: Why are they leaving Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Therefore, the hon. member ought to bear that in mind as he contemplates the details of the program.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the impact on cash flows is very substantial. It is causing companies to cut back severely on their exploration programs to help us achieve self-sufficiency. Those cutbacks are severe and we will not achieve self-sufficiency as it stands.

● (1420)

Let me move on to my supplementary question. I mentioned earlier that three banks have stated their objection to the National Energy Program. Clearly there is a message here, Madam Speaker. Their clients, the oil companies, have told them that they will not be able to finance the activities which had been under way prior to October 28, and their financial position has been quite drastically weakened as a result. Has the minister discussed the impact of the program with the chartered banks in order to take their advice as to changes which might be made in the National Energy Program?

Mr. MacEachen: As a matter of fact, Madam Speaker, I have had occasion to discuss briefly, for example, the National Energy Program with the president of the Bank of Montreal, who recently made a statement in which he supported the National Energy Program and the elements and goals of that program. In fact, it was a very supportive statement, in contrast, I might add, with some of the not so favourable and not so objective comments made by other bank presidents.

The hon. member has again stated that the industry will not be able to finance development activity, and I want to tell him that the cash flow of this industry in 1981, even without the incentive payments which are provided, will be 28 per cent higher than it was in 1979.

An hon. Member: Nonsense, flim-flam.

Mr. MacEachen: Is that an industry that is being hard done by? I again ask the hon. member to think over his question.

CUTBACK BY MOBIL OIL

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to ask the minister this question, and I am concerned not only because of the supply aspect, Madam Speaker, but because the $164 million or 46 per cent cutback bodes serious economic consequences for the Atlantic provinces. My question to the minister is whether the government has been in touch with Mobil Oil and has it determined precisely where the cutback will take place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am not aware of what has been done by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I personally have not been in touch with Mobil.

OWNERSHIP OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My supplementary question has to do with the question of jurisdiction, because the Mobil announcement, in addition to the uncertainty of the government's energy policy, cited the whole question of jurisdiction as being one of the reasons they are cutting back at this time.

Perhaps I should direct my question to the Prime Minister and ask him why the government has shifted its position. Last fall it indicated that the energy offshore question would come in the second phase of the constitutional talks, yet in the energy paper preceding Bill C-48 the government says it is anxious to refer the matter of ownership quickly to the Supreme Court. Now we have Bill C-48 which stakes out the government's claim in terms of the Canada lands, thereby pre-empting the whole question from being discussed at the first ministers' conference. I now submit that the consequence is just further uncertainty and perhaps further cutbacks.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am afraid I do not understand the hon. member. Surely when we have an energy policy, we have to deal with Canada lands. Whether the offshore is in those Canada lands or not will be a matter to be decided either by negotiation, as we have attempted to do for the past ten years, or by the courts; but surely you could not have an energy policy without dealing with the Canada lands, and the matter of what is included in those lands will be determined in some other way.

HOUSING

LAND BANKING—REFUSAL OF REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE BY CITY OF VANCOUVER

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for CMHC, whom I would like to welcome back from the city of Vancouver which, to quote him, has the hottest housing crisis in North America. The mayor of Vancouver asked the minister for $15 million to help establish a land bank program, which is absolutely essential to de-escalate the extreme situation going on in the housing field in that city, and also to build affordable housing. How can the minister justify to the House the fact that he refused this help for Vancouver when apparently he agreed that there is a terrible housing situation there, and when he also admitted that he has surplus funds available in his community service grants budget which could be used for this very purpose? Why does the minister have to wait for advice from a real estate conference in March before acting on behalf of Vancouver?

● (1425)

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, in my discussions with Mr. Chabot, the provincial minister for housing and with the mayor, I think it was generally understood that the land banking proposal, the request for $15 million, was a long-term or medium-term plan of the mayor and council in addressing the question of need, the point being that if lands were made available in the future possibly the problem being experienced now in Vancouver and in the lower mainland would not be as acute. It is a request for all governments to join in co-operation, as we have in the past, under some program for addressing housing needs. I think the mayor was more concerned with the immediacy of the problem. Of course, in that respect we have been able to respond immediately with the designation of social housing units, from an initial designation of 600 last year to over 3,000 for the year ending 1980. I am directing my attention to the immediate needs, and I thought the mayor, the councillors and the provincial minister with whom I met understood that as well.

ADDITIONAL SOCIAL HOUSING FUNDS—ELIMINATION OF SPECULATION

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, certainly the situation in Vancouver demands action now. Why wait for spring; it is now that a solution is needed and the planning should start.

My supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Last week the minister said that he would forward my request for additional social housing funds to the cabinet social development committee. The first part of my question is: Will the minister confirm that he submitted it to, and supported it in, the social development committee? Second, since the monthly increase in the value of a home in Vancouver is greater than the earnings of a worker, and the vacancy rates in at least six other major cities in Canada are very low, what action will the minister take to bring in a 100 per cent capital gains tax in order to eliminate this terrible speculation in housing?

Presence in Gallery

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the interests of brevity, the answer to the first part of the question is yes and the answer to the second part is no.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I will return to the minister responsible for CMHC. Perhaps the minister is aware that last week the hon. member for Oshawa was in Vancouver—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to omit her preambles and go immediately to her question.

Mrs. Mitchell: Does the minister support the economic recovery program proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa which would include lower mortgage interests, revitalizing CMHC, increasing non-profit housing, leasing Crown land for housing, and reinstating community services grants to municipalities?

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the hon. member made submissions on the designated day last week. I think there were ten points which perhaps reflected her idea of an economic recovery program. I indicated in my first answer that the government is addressing a number of those points in order of priority, where we think we can achieve the most immediate good in response to the present tight market. For some other areas such as the community services program to which she alluded, the money and space will not be free until 1982.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS FOR AUSTRALIA

Madam Speaker: I should like to draw the attention of members of the House to the presence in our gallery of the Minister of Communications and leader of the House for Australia, the Right Hon. Ian Sinclair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, since the Minister of Supply and Services is not present in the House at this time, perhaps Your Honour could see me at a later time or later date.

NATIONAL RESOURCES

ZINC—STATUS OF PROPOSED REFINERY

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It is with regard to the proposed new zinc refinery in Belledune, Restigouche county, New Brunswick. Could the parliamentary secretary inform the House as to the status of this proposed new refinery, in light of excellent world markets for zinc? Can he inform the House as to the anticipated construction date of this important refinery, which will bring many permanent and much-needed jobs to the area?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, no money yet has been requested of the department for that operation. However, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has committed over $1,600,000 to preliminary engineering and design work for the facility. Because it has put that amount of money into the design work and preliminary engineering, the department feels the project is a very positive possibility.

EMPLOYMENT

PROGRAM FOR THE DISABLED—ASSURANCE OF FULL PARTICIPATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister called a hurried press conference together this morning to announce $59 million for the disabled and the chronically unemployed. I regret the announcement was not made in the House, where we could have made a suitable response. In the absence of that opportunity, I would like to ask the minister how much of the $59 million is allocated to the disabled. Over what period of time will it be available, what assistance and what assurances will be given for permanent employment at fair wages?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in my response to the hon. member I would like to elaborate on the press release, which was based upon the program announced in this House previously, when we announced our general employment strategy last summer. The program is a two-year experimental program. It is designed to provide employment opportunities in the private sector for the disabled, the mentally and physically handicapped and those who have disadvantages in the workplace.

The program is designed to give grants to the employers. It is our assessment that once that takes place, once the disabled are able to overcome that first barrier of obtaining a private sector job, they will then be able to stay in that job and demonstrate their worth and therefore obtain a high degree of commitment to continuity over a period of time. Our commitment is to take a look at this experimental program, at the sum which was paid, and if it seems to be a good program and provides for the incentive we need, obviously the government would be prepared to examine whether or not the program should be expanded.

Mr. Dinsdale: Madam Speaker, I have already had feedback from the disabled community pointing out that employment in sheltered workshops and temporary employment at low wages has been the chief deterrent in the past for permanent employment of the handicapped. Will the minister give us assurances that qualified disabled people will be able to participate in all government programs? They want to be integrated. They want to be part of the community and not earmarked in this special way. They want the assurance that they will be provided assistance from all government programs, including assistance for the setting up of small businesses and, particularly, the provision of technical aids designed to overcome motor and sensory disabilities which make full employment possible. This is the only way in which they can become fully employed.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member will recall that we have introduced affirmative action programs in the public service. One of the groups included in that program is the disabled or the handicapped. We have also introduced the affirmative action principle as part of our over-all job-creation program. Again, they are one of the identified target groups which will receive special assistance. As part of the announcement today with respect to the program for the disabled we are offering grants of up to $5,000 to any employer who takes the physically or mentally handicapped as part of the employment package to renovate facilities or provide special equipment where necessary.

OLYMPIC GAMES

1988 WINTER OLYMPICS

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. As the minister knows, the city of Calgary is bidding to host the 1988 Winter Olympic Games which will be awarded in October of this year. What is the minister doing to help the city of Calgary in its bid for the 1988 Winter Olympic Games?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Calgary East for his question. His interest in the Olympics bid by Calgary is well known. I want to assure him that my department is totally supportive of the bid by the Calgary Olympics Committee. I might add that it is an excellent committee which has been doing the work of seeking to have the games awarded to Canada for 1988.

We have given an official indication to the Olympics Committee that we endorse Calgary's bid. On Monday, in Calgary, I will be indicating a contribution by my department toward the cost of the bid, which is, of course, a very expensive undertaking. We have approved in principle, if the bid is successful, assistance in the form of revenue-producing stamp and coin programs, which we think will be helpful. We are very supportive of the efforts of the Calgary Olympics Committee to convince the Interprovincial Lottery Commission, which now has control of the lotteries of this country, to allow Calgary substantial revenue from those provincial lotteries, or to establish a special lottery to make the financing of that undertaking possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that today the bank rate indicates continuing blind adherence by this government to its high interest rate policy. In light of that, the minister indicated a week ago that he would be fair to Canada Savings Bonds holders. The minister will know that the rate is only 11½ per cent, while banks, trust companies and other financial institutions are paying higher rates. Will the minister now be fair to Canada Savings Bonds holders and increase the rate to 12½ per cent?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I have mentioned to the hon. member on a number of previous occasions, I am obviously monitoring the rate of Canada Savings Bonds. In that regard, on one occasion late last year the rate was adjusted.

Despite the comments which he has made today the Canada Savings Bond is still a very attractive instrument. I have not yet reached any decision to alter the rate at the present time.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, the minister will know that $261 million worth of Canada Savings Bonds were redeemed last week. He will also know that probably more will be redeemed this week, as the high interest rate policy of the government carries on. It costs the government a great deal of money to place those bonds, at least 1 per cent. Will the minister, in the interest of running a reasonable economic system in Canada, do something to retard the redemption of these bonds? Will he at least be fair to the people? Will he pay the people the kinds of rates which he is prepared to pay to the big banks and the bond market generally for money which he borrows?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, of course we intend to be fair to those who have purchased bonds. The Canada Savings Bond has certain features which no other instrument has. For that reason, in addition to the interest rate, these other features, which are attractive to subscribers, must be kept in mind. I will certainly keep in mind the question of fairness so that the fair thing will be done at the appropriate time.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

USE OF PESTICIDES—POSSIBLE HEALTH RISKS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On June 23, 1980, the minister assured Canadians that there was no evidence that pesticides tested in the U.S. by Industrial Biotest Laboratories "represent a health hazard to users or as residues in food." Yet on January 7, 1981, the Regina Leader-Post revealed that secret Canadian government memos obtained in the United States indict IBT for fraudulent captan safety studies. The memo reveals that as early as 1978—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question, please?

● (1440)

Mr. de Jong: Is the minister still prepared, in light of the recent disclosures about the health hazards of captan, to stand behind her statement of June 23, 1980, when she claimed that there is no evidence that any of these pesticides represent a health hazard?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that on January 7, I believe, the CP wire service carried a story on the possible health risks associated with captan. Generally speaking, the information contained in that story was correct and corresponds with what I said in the House previously. Replacement studies were initiated by the registrants some time ago because tests on captan which were carried out by Industrial Biotest Laboratories in the United States were invalid. The results of a critical cancer study are expected to be available some time this month.

Mr. de Jong: I have a supplementary, Madam Speaker. The secret Canadian government memos also revealed that five pages of the test reports were altered by IBT after Chevron Chemical Company, a major manufacturer of captan, expressed concern about the high number of mutations found in animals exposed to the chemical. Yet the Canadian government has asked Chevron to carry out new testing on captan. Can the government assure the Canadian people that falsification of testing will not occur again?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, a Canadian ministry is not and cannot be responsible for invalid tests performed by an American laboratory. The objective of any monitoring of tests by a government is to ensure that they are valid, well done and not falsified. As soon as the weaknesses of the IBT tests were known, they were declared invalid and the proper course of action was taken. We are continuously attempting to ensure that all tests are valid.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED CONDITIONS FOR RESTORATION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH IRAN

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, who will recall that on Monday he said that his government will "move toward a normalization of relations with Iran as soon as possible". Would the Prime Minister assure the House of Commons now that restoration of full diplomatic relations with Iran will not take place until at least these two conditions have been met: first, that there be an investigation into and report on any torture or violations of the human rights of the American hostages; and, second, that Iran has demonstrated that it will accept the normal international standards of behaviour governing diplomats abroad?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there are two aspects to this question. The question about resumption of diplomatic relations with Iran by the Leader of the Opposition presupposes that we have broken off diplomatic relations which, of course, neither his government nor mine has done. We still have diplomatic relations with Iran. The question is, when will we take concrete steps to send our mission back to Tehran? As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the other day, that certainly would be done in months rather than in weeks.

The return of diplomats will depend largely on the assistance which Canadians need in Iran, if any at all, whether those are Canadians needing consular help or businessmen seeking to resume operations or regain some of their losses. So we cannot answer this question in advance; it will be decided in the best interests of the Canadian people.

With regard to normal relations, since the remark quoted by the Leader of the Opposition is the answer which I gave, I should say that I believe the remarks were made in the context of sanctions. The sanctions were taken specifically to obtain the release of the hostages. The hostages have now been released. I believe that it would be the policy of this government, though it has not been made a decision as yet, to lift those sanctions, as, indeed, they have been lifted already by the EEC, Australia, Japan and other countries which wish to re-establish normal relations with Iran.

But this being said, we are concerned as a government about the news of ill treatment of the hostages, and we will wait for further information before taking any concrete steps, particularly in light of the fact that the object of this exercise was to ensure respect for international law, especially the Vienna convention on diplomatic immunity. As I argued very early in this whole crisis, I think that much of what happens will depend on consultations between the major parties concerned. We will be in touch with many of the countries which took steps similar to the steps Canada took.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we have had a long answer and little enlightenment as to what will guide the policy of the government. The question both Monday and today had to do with the resumption of full and normal relations with the government of Iran. On Monday the Prime Minister said that those full and normal relations would be resumed "as soon as possible". The Prime Minister is now quoting his Secretary of State for External Affairs to suggest that perhaps there will be a longer time period.

I have raised two conditions which we believe should be among the conditions necessary before that resumption is achieved. One is that there be an investigation into and report on the torture and violation of human rights relating to the American hostages; and the second is that Iran demonstrate that it is prepared to abide by the normal diplomatic customs in relation to diplomats abroad. I would like a simple answer to the question whether or not those two conditions will have to be honoured by Iran before full and normal diplomatic relations are established by Canada with Iran.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the answer to the second question has been given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this House when he dealt with this matter the other day, the same day as I dealt with this matter. He said—and I remind the Leader of the Opposition that if he is interested in this question, he should review what was said by the minister responsible—that we will not send diplomats to Iran until we are certain that the Iranian authorities are prepared to respect diplomatic immunities and the provisions of international law as laid down in the Vienna convention. The answer has already been given, and it is part of government policy.

As to the first part of the question, I am not quite sure who will carry out this investigation, what the suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition is or what is the international convention which he has in mind. It seems to me that this is a matter for the United States first and foremost. I repeat, we will be consulting with the United States as to what means they envisage in order to ascertain the facts of the matter.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the mystery is just exactly what principles will guide the government in this matter. I hope that the Prime Minister will consult with his Secretary of State for External Affairs when he returns and make a clear, concise, unambiguous statement as to what will guide them. Would the Prime Minister consider placing on the agenda of the upcoming economic summit in June, which will be hosted by Canada, the subject of terrorism perpetrated by governments against diplomatic personnel, so that such action would automatically trigger the kinds of economic sanctions discussed one year ago at the United Nations?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I answered that question just a couple of days ago in reply to the hon. member for Sherbrooke. I remind the hon. member, as did the hon. member for Sherbrooke in his question, that it was Canada which achieved movement in the area of international terrorism at the Bonn Summit. This subject was raised again by Canada at the summit last year in Venice. As I said, I am prepared to raise the subject again this year. Hopefully, Canada will be successful in having positive steps taken, as we had steps taken after the Bonn Summit.

ENERGY

WELLHEAD TAX ON OIL—EXPORT TAX ON NATURAL GAS—REQUESTED WITHDRAWAL

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said yesterday in Alberta that he is prepared to negotiate at any time with Alberta on an energy agreement. The Minister of Finance today has indicated that he is prepared to change certain clauses of the agreement. Is the Minister of Finance prepared to withdraw the 8 per cent wellhead tax on the production of oil, and is he also prepared to withdraw the export tax on natural gas, as proposed by the producing provinces?

• (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sure that when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was talking about negotiations he used that word with some care. Negotiations imply a willingness on the part of all participants to make adjustments. It is in that spirit that we are prepared to negotiate, on the understanding that those with whom we negotiate are also prepared to make accommodations and changes. That is the only spirit in which we would approach negotiations that would have any hope of success.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I would like to question the Minister of Finance once again. Will he clarify very simply whether he is prepared at least to negotiate the 8 per cent wellhead tax on petroleum and the export tax on gas?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, we are prepared to discuss with the producing provinces—

Mr. Shields: Are you or are you not? Yes or no?

Mr. MacEachen: —all items which might lead to the conclusion of an agreement that would be fair to all parties. But to suggest at this stage that the Government of Canada should indicate unilaterally what items it is prepared to withdraw—

Mr. Epp: Never.

Mr. MacEachen: —would be a rather foolish operational method which I would not expect any hon. member to suggest.

AIRPORTS

OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF NORTHERN AIRPORTS

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On January 19, the minister stated that he would not transfer responsibility for northern airports to territorial governments if safety was impaired by the process. Will the minister further reassure the House by telling us that he will not transfer responsibility until such time as it can be demonstrated that air services in the north will be improved by the process?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): That is the idea, Madam Speaker. If I remember correctly, this policy has been in existence for three or four years. One transfer took place under this policy in the past. It is now being reassessed and future decisions will have to justify that all economic and safety aspects are met. I think the general proposition is that there are a number of instances where a local government can do a better job, with a small airport particularly, than the national government.

DISARMAMENT

AGENDA ITEMS FOR MEETING WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In preparation for the meeting with President Reagan, would the Prime Minister take the initiative and seek to have included on the agenda for discussion the policy of gradual suffocation of armaments as proposed by Canada at the United Nations in May, 1978. In addition, would the Prime Minister seek the support of the United States government for holding a disarmament conference in Europe, as proposed by the French and Polish delegations at the Conference on Security and Co-operation which is scheduled to resume in Madrid on January 27?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as to the first part of the question, for which I thank the hon. member and which is one very central to the Canadian government's concern, I would certainly hope that the United States would accept putting the question of east-west relations on the agenda in any forthcoming meeting I would have with President Reagan. It is essential that we discuss this together because it will obviously be an important part of the discussions we will eventually have at the summit in July.

In that regard, I can answer affirmatively to the hon. member's question that not only will we be discussing, for my part, the policy of suffocation but the other two elements of the speech on disarmament I made to the United Nations in 1979, that is to say, the resumption of the Strategic Arms Limitation talks and the comprehensive test ban.

As to the second suggestion made by the hon. member regarding the French proposal, I would say at this stage, not having examined it in detail, that we are in favour of confidence-building measures, which I know the French proposal suggests. In that sense I can answer that part of the question affirmatively also.

EXTERNAL AID

CONCEPT OF TRIPARTITE AID

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister endorse the concept of tripartite aid as outlined in the Brandt report, and does he see a special role for Canada in this aid format?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker. The concept of tripartite aid was explored by our government long before the Brandt report was thought about. I recall having discussed it at Commonwealth conferences in the early 1970s. I discussed it again recently during my visit to Saudi Arabia and other countries. I proposed support for the energy affiliate of the World Bank, a suggestion which came from Mr. McNamara. It was a subject which I had discussed with Mr. McNamara before leaving Saudi Arabia. I did urge that proposal not only on the Saudis but on the Germans and on the French. It is a form of tripartite assistance where capital would be joined with technology from developed countries, both of which in this case would serve to seek greater energy self-reliance in the less developed countries.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question if for the Prime Minister. That parliamentary task force on North-South relations stated that Canada seems to have been able to achieve only limited impact in enlisting oil-rich countries in joint efforts. Because of the government's failure in this area, would the Prime Minister consider initiating, prior to the North-South discussions in Canada this year, a series of trilateral demonstration projects whereby Canada would provide technological expertise and equipment in conjunction, perhaps, with Arab financing for assistance to a country particularly in the poverty belt of Africa, such as Somalia? Would the Prime Minster consider several demonstration projects to get to the specifics of this particular aid form which he supports?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I proposed more than a demonstration project; I made a concrete proposal and Canadian government support for it. The hon. member, and I think his words should be noted carefully, indicated that the Canadian government had failed because it had not convinced the oil-rich countries to let us use their capital with our technology in Third World countries. That can be described as a failure of our government, Madam Speaker, but it can also be looked at as a natural disinclination by oil-rich countries in a surplus position to let somebody else use their capital.

It seems to me the demonstration projects suggested by the hon. member all have this difficulty. These are the difficulties which we have run into in the past. It takes an extraordinary amount of good will and generosity to give your capital to someone else so that it can be used in a third country. I do not fault the Saudis, among others, for being reluctant to embark upon that. That is why we have pursued the cause of the energy affiliate, because it would permit the oil-rich countries to have a greater say in such an affiliate through their votes. That is also why, as a fall-back position, this government in its energy policy has set aside some $225 million or $250 million to be spent over the next five years to help bilaterally, with our funds and our technology, the LDCs in finding energy self-sufficiency.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the Minister of Indian Affairs has now designated $150,000 to the Nishga Indians to fight the Amax marine dumping, would the minister please tell us where he is at in the process of rescinding the special dumping permit issued to Amax?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member indicating acknowledgement of the funds going to the Nishga to enable them to conduct research.

As far as the demand for an inquiry, which the hon. member has made several times both to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and myself, might I say that a panel of experts has been set up to look into the matter, notice of which has been communicated to the Nishga tribal chief, Mr. Gosnell.

• (1500)

If he finds that unsatisfactory as to a communicated vote to my colleague and myself, we will be prepared to consider some alterations for that type of panel to increase its participation and we would welcome its views. As the hon. member knows, that is the substance of the discussion the minister of fisheries, the hon. member and myself had yesterday.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I understand he is preparing to rescind the special order in council dumping permit to Amax. Can he bring the House up to date as to where we are at in that process?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I have not had before me a recommendation to this effect. Basically, the Nishga have told us they are not opposed to the project going ahead. They would like to be assured the project is conducted in a safe way. That is also our aim and our interest. We are trying to find a way to get a scientific review of the project, not a legal one because it is not a legal problem. It is a question of scientific judgment and that is what we are working on.

EMPLOYMENT

CUTBACK OF SUMMER JOBS FOR STUDENTS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. This morning the minister announced the Summer Student Employment Program for 1981. As he knows, for people aged 15 to 21 this is a very important matter. Will he advise the House why he felt it necessary to cut back on the number of summer jobs for students from 70,000 to 49,000?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member will look at the statement, he will see that we say the number is 49,000. However, there are several streams to that program, including the cadet program and the student for hire program. There are several streams within the confines of that program.

The other allocation was to put further money back into the community employment programs to provide for ongoing work in the chronically high unemployment areas. Also under the new program we announced this morning is the program for the employment of the disadvantaged. A large number of those will be young people who have been chronically unemployed in those areas. It goes back to our basic philosophy, which is to try to target our resources at those who have the greatest need. We feel that those with the greatest need are the young people in the marketplace who have the most difficulty finding a job, and they should be given the greatest source of assistance from this government.

Mr. Crombie: Is the minister saying out of all of that that there will be 21,000 fewer jobs for students this summer?

Mr. Axworthy: No, Madam Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wish to ask the government House leader some specific questions with respect to the business of the House. Last week the Chair struck down the first part of the tax bill, indicating the government will have to fund some borrowing authority, if it intends to do so, in another bill. Can the House leader tell us his plans with respect to that and where the bill would stand in the order of priorities if he did indeed bring it forward?

Also, we have some indication that there is an intention to introduce an excise tax bill. I wonder if the House leader might comment on that. The customs tariff bill is presently on the order paper, which the government wishes to call. Is he prepared to say something with respect to that?

In answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, he indicated there were processes in place for some institutional reform. We know the freedom of information bill is on the order paper. I understand from his parliamentary secretary that some parliamentary reform proposals are being prepared. Will he confirm that is the case and indicate what priority he attaches to each of these matters to which I have alluded?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in so far as the borrowing authority is concerned, we will be in a better position to give some indication to the hon. member in the near future. The same answer applies to the excise tax bill.

With regard to the customs tariff bill, there is an agreement among us. Following consultation, we agreed to dispose of second reading stage of this bill tomorrow afternoon. There will be one speaker per party. The bill will then be sent to a standing committee of this House rather than Committee of the Whole. That is the understanding among House leaders, and that will be done tomorrow.

Following that, we will resume debate on second reading stage of the income tax bill now under discussion. I hope that bill will go to Committee of the Whole at the beginning of next week. There is a good indication that that is a serious possibility. I think it would be very useful to allow members to deal with the specific provisions of that bill. It would be much more useful than sticking with second reading stage to which so many days have already been devoted.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, essentially this is the business for next week, and we hope that we shall also have consideration in Committee of the Whole of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act. As everyone knows, today is an opposition day. Finally, as concerns the last request of the Conservative House leader in relation to the question of parliamentary reform, I believe that my reply to his leader was complete. Once again I will say that this matter is very important for all members of this House. It is true that we are now working on some parliamentary reform proposals and I hope to be able to brief all the hon. members on the subject reasonably soon, but my colleague will understand that we have a relatively full agenda for the coming weeks and months as we have to consider very urgent matters dealing with the economy, energy and the Constitution. Therefore it is not very likely that our proposals can be fully approved and made public for discussion purposes before Easter. However, I hope that between Easter and the summer break, we shall be able to make these positions public so that they may be analysed and considered by the House as a whole.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the House leader did not comment on the freedom of information bill which was the one matter I mentioned. That can be discussed among ourselves, or perhaps he may wish to comment on it now.

There is one other item I want to put to him as a matter of practice. When his predecessor, the Minister of Finance, was Leader of the Government, it was the practice for us to submit to him a suggested list of allotted days to cover a period of time. That would act as a guide to the government in choosing allotted days. Of course the government was not bound by those days because they were allotted one at a time. I wonder whether that practice would be agreeable to the government House leader, given the fact that we have a fair number of them and a rather large legislative program to accommodate.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker, with pleasure. I followed that practice last spring. It was not done last fall because all the allotted days were grouped together for the period of supply. I intend to suggest a list. It will not bind the government, but may be useful to House leaders. With regard to today's allotted day, I did consult with my colleagues. It is at their request that I allotted today rather than last Tuesday, which would have been more practical for the government. Therefore, my answer is yes, I will be pleased to provide him with a list.

In so far as the freedom of information bill is concerned, as the hon. member well knows, this House is faced with a very heavy schedule for the next weeks and months. Many times I have asked if there was agreement to deal with second reading stage of that bill in one day. If that were the case I would be pleased to try to find one day which would be suitable to all parties.

The Conservative House leader indicated that he has a long list of speakers and that possibly two days minimum would be required. With so many budget bills and tax bills which have deadlines, it is practically impossible at this time to set aside two days. In addition, we have the constitution to deal with and all the energy measures, as the hon. member knows.

If the opposition wants that bill to be very thoroughly studied by the standing committee, I will be pleased to discuss setting aside a period of time not exceeding one day in the very near future. I hope the Tories will agree to not more than one day's debate, taking into consideration the very heavy burden facing us and which we must deal with in order to assume our responsibilities.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is unfortunate that this discussion concerning freedom of information has only been in respect of the number of days. Would it be within the purview of the government, leading to further discussion, to have a long day allotted to the freedom of information bill? Would that be within the thinking of the government and, if that is the case, would it be within the thinking of the government that we might have a long day allotted next week to this matter?

● (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I shall be happy to take this positive suggestion into consideration. It now seems that the Progressive Conservative Party is prepared to agree to one long day of debate. The Secretary of State has also subjected me to a lot of pressure. I shall be happy to take the suggestion into consideration and, if need be, to discuss it with the House leader in the near future at a meeting of the House Leaders.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, in respect of the bill regarding access to information, we are quite prepared to enter into discussion on a shortened debate so it could be given second reading and referred to the appropriate standing committee.

In respect of the customs tariff bill, I am happy to confirm the agreement we revived, the one we had in December, to limit ourselves to a one speaker per party debate on second reading tomorrow so that bill can then be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

I noted also the request of the minister that we get into Committee of the Whole on the income tax bill, C-54, as soon as possible. We are disposed to do that, it being understood, of course, that on clause 1 of the bill it will still be possible for members to make general speeches, the one difference being that they would be 20 minutes each instead of 40 minutes.

I hope the minister will pay some attention to the very friendly answers I have been getting from the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, and that if that minister tells the government House leader he has a piece of legislation ready I hope he will fit it in, without question.

May I also ask the government House leader about Bill C-42, the Post Office legislation turning the Post Office into a Crown corporation. We were put under great pressure about that last October and November. The bill is back on the Order Paper. Can it not be called fairly soon?

I have one other question. The other night when the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare was answering a late show question by the hon. member for Edmonton South, part of the question being, "Could we not have a full debate on North-South relations and other matters with reference to external affairs", the parliamentary secretary suggested we might get together and each of the opposition parties might contribute one of their opposition days and the government might contribute a day so we could have a full debate in this area, particularly in the area of North-South, and perhaps even more. I wonder if the government House leader would be willing to enter into some discussions about the possibility of having such a full-dress debate on these important matters?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have three answers to three questions. First concerning veterans, I will be glad to talk with the acting minister and I hope to be in a position to give a satisfactory answer in the reasonable future.

Second, concerning the Post Office, I have started discussions with the Postmaster General and I think we will be in a position to know if amendments will be required at the report stage. As soon as this is clarified I hope we will find some time to dispose of the report and third reading stages of that very urgent bill within a very short period of time in the very near future.

Third, in respect of North-South, this is a subject that is very important to the Prime Minister, to this party and to this Parliament. I welcome the suggestion made by the hon. member. It deserves to be considered very seriously and I intend to raise that matter at a future meeting of House leaders so that if the opposition is willing to give some of its allotted days then it might be easier for the government to try also to give a bit of its time, which is very precious and needed for all the programs about which I talked earlier. We are willing to take that into very serious consideration in the very near future.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, a week ago today I asked the government House leader if he would discuss with the Prime Minister the possibility of his making a statement on North-South arising from his trip. Of course the government House leader had to leave it to the Prime Minister. Is there any chance of that being implemented, having a statement on motions by the Prime Minister on his recent trip and on North-South generally?

An hon. Member: That used to be the practice.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I hear the comment that that used to be the practice. Let us take into consideration the fact that we are dealing now with a Parliament which follows two elections within a year and which has a very special and heavy burden that former Parliaments did not face. These are very special circumstances. In any case, the Prime Minister answered questions on the subject during the question period. I do not want to use an allotted day to ask the Prime Minister to make that statement, thereby depriving the opposition of their precious time. I think the suggestion made previously by the hon. member is much more sound. That suggestion deserves serious consideration and I would prefer to consider the possibility of using allotted days, and perhaps some government time, to deal with this issue. In the meanwhile, the Prime Minister is here every day and I am sure he is delighted to answer questions on that very important subject.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have just one thing to add that I neglected to say when I was last on my feet, and that is to indicate my agreement in respect of the proposals regarding the customs tariff bill. Our speaker will be the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for Don Valley West rising on a point of order?

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I rise—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but I want to know if the hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Bosley: Yes, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: On government business?

Mr. Bosley: It is about House business.

Madam Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Bosley: Last week, on Wednesday, the Minister of Labour and the Secretary of State for Communications agreed that they would appoint a special mediator in regard to the Montreal French CBC strike. My understanding is that the mediator or special envoy has now reported. This matter is very important to us in the House, Madam Speaker, and I only ask whether we are going to get—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is not a point of order addressed to what we call government business. If the hon. member has a point of order to raise, I will recognize him later. Just so the hon. member realizes, I am trying to hear hon. members in the order in which they have asked for the floor. We have others who have asked for the floor on certain questions which have to be dealt with before that which the hon. member is talking about, and I will recognize him with pleasure later.

I have received notice of a question of privilege from the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare whom I now recognize.

PRIVILEGE

MISS BÉGIN—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. CLARK

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which, through you, affects the privileges of all hon. members in the House and which I relate to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and to an incident yesterday. Anyone in the House who reads yesterday's Hansard will notice, I think, a very serious breach of privilege on which I want to comment today.

[English]

Page 6410 of Hansard of the debates yesterday indicates to us that in the middle of an exchange between members during the question period, after you had called some members to order the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition at one point said clearly, and we all heard him and, of course, it is recorded in Hansard:

> So much for an impartial Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Miss Bégin: This was broadcast across the country from coast to coast, and it has been reprinted in some newspapers in French and in English.

● (1520)

It seems to me that this has brought an amplification across the country of an attack against the authority and impartiality which make the Chair the institution without which this Parliament cannot function.

[Translation]

For instance, if I may be permitted to note that Beauchesne thus defines your characteristics:

[English]

The chief characteristics attached to the office of Speaker in the House of Commons are authority and impartiality . . . Reflections upon the character or actions of the Speaker may be punished as breaches of privilege. His—

Her; this is an old book.

—actions cannot be criticized incidentally in debate or upon any form of proceeding except by way of a substantive motion.

[Translation]

I could go on at length in this vein but I will refrain because it seems to me that the matter is much more serious than a legal question. For several weeks, I would even say for several months, hon. members have certainly noticed that in some corners of the House every opportunity lends itself to making disparaging insinuations against the very office of Speaker of the House. Like many of my colleagues I am not fully conversant with our procedure. I think that most of us do not have legal training, which indeed strikes a healthy balance in the representation of Canadians. Still we cannot operate properly if, through you, Madam Speaker, there is lack of respect for the rules of the House. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition did let slip unfortunate comments in the past. I do not know why. We all have our ups and downs, some weeks or months are more difficult to live through. But we cannot tolerate that the fundamental institutions of the House be held up to ridicule to the extent they were yesterday. As proof, witness the importance given to our debates by the TV media which show on every screen throughout the country the acts of a person whose personality and duties we fully respect.

I might add that it is rather ironic to listen to the intervention of the Leader of the Opposition who seems anxious either to destroy you, Madam Speaker, or destroy the role you are playing among us, or perhaps to create an atmosphere of disorder in the proceedings of the House. I cannot say what motivates him. But it is ironic indeed that such a direct and flagrant attack against the office of the Speaker of the House is made by the Leader of the Opposition during an exchange of questions, allegedly in support of a better status for Canadian women, allegedly in support of Canadian women who have significant achievements to their credit, at the very moment when members on both sides of the House were speaking for others instead of letting women themselves air their views. And then the Leader of the Opposition could not do any better than launching an attack against the first female Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada in a way such as I have never witnessed before in the eight years I have been here, which happens to be the length of her mandate as well.

Since the beginning of the week we have had many questions about the Advisory Council on the Status of Women—and we will be hearing more about it today since that is the subject chosen by the Progressive Conservative opposition—and I have noted how very easy it is, and unfortunately very sanctimonious on the part of certain people, to appear as champions of the cause of women, in words but not in deeds, supposedly to promote equality and simple justice for women.

I find it particularly deplorable that the Leader of the Opposition did not enrol for more courses in sociology and social psychology. Had he taken a course on institutions, he would have learned that institutions have life, personality, those very institutions of which he always poses as guardian. He has been preaching to us about that ever since he got elected, always posturing as the specialist of great issues. He would have learned that if people who work within an institution lack respect for it, it does not exist. To my mind that is the most serious consequence of the insidious attack which the right hon. gentleman probably let slip during question period yesterday.

The only thing left for me to do, Madam Speaker, is to demonstrate as best I can that such an attack against you was indeed a breach of privilege. For example, Sir T. Erskine May sets it out very clearly, I think, in his nineteenth edition, page 152, and I quote:

[English]

As examples of speeches and writings which have been held to constitute breaches of privilege or contempts may be mentioned:

First of all:

Reflections on the character of the Speaker and accusations of partiality in the discharge of his—

Or her.

—duty.

[Translation]

And then he gives a whole series of references to cases over the years where this type of attack was the first example given of a breach of privilege of each member of the House.

Having established as best I can, I think, the inadvertence and the unfairness of the comments which the Leader of the Opposition probably let slip, I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that in all likelihood there was a breach of privilege. I am aware that the Leader of the Opposition is well known for his respect for formalities, we have often heard him speak on that subject.

[English]

I therefore ask him to withdraw this unfortunate remark. If he does not, and Your Honour finds a prima facie breach of privilege, I propose to move:

That the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition in regard to the impartiality of the Speaker be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege. I will be brief, and I will obey the rules of the House.

First, I must express my surprise that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), who has risen on this day when the government is desperate to demonstrate its respect for women, did not give me notice of a question of privilege relating to me, and my surprise that she did not rise at the first opportunity available to her, which was yesterday—if she was sincerely interested in this question—instead of simply using this matter as a means to shorten a debate on an allotted day.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Clark: That deals with the minister.

Respect for the Chair is crucial to the conduct of this House, and I would not want to see that respect eroded by any member of this institution. My interjection yesterday was inappropriate for an officer of this House, and I consequently withdraw that interjection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail).

Mr. Harquail: Madam Speaker—

An hon. Member: No. That is the end of it.

Mr. Paproski: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sorry. Indeed, since the right hon. member has withdrawn the words, which I am sure went beyond his thoughts, the question is now closed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BOSLEY—CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—RADIO-CANADA JOURNALISTS DISPUTE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which has nothing to do with House business. My point of order is this. Last Wednesday, as reported in Hansard, the government agreed to appoint a special mediator to look into a most unhappy strike that has been going on in the CBC in Montreal. I understand the mediator was appointed and so I was expecting a statement on motions today. Since I gather he has reported to the minister and our interest in this matter is critical because, unhappily, there is a growing sense in Quebec that the government is not interested in settling the strike because it prefers the news blackout on constitutional matters, my point of order is to find out from the minister whether he proposes to speak on this on motions, because I think a member of the House has asked him to do it during question period. I think the minister has an obligation to report on motions on the mediator's response to him. I assumed that it would be done as soon as the report had been made to the minister, which I think is now.

Madam Speaker: Did somebody wish to respond to that?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member has no point of order. He was unable to get the floor during the question period to ask a question, which would have been the proper way for him to bring this matter forward if he had an inquiry to make. Certainly there is no point of order.

The mediator who is seized with the responsibility of investigating the present situation with regard to the strike to which the hon. member has referred is vested with that responsibility. Any report he has made has been of an interim nature. He has spoken of meetings with the parties pending a meeting of the membership of the union over the weekend. Indeed, as I said at the time of his appointment, he was appointed to carry on exploratory mediation to see if the parties are in a mood to make the concessions necessary on both sides for an agreement to take place. That may be a very difficult course to steer, and I do not believe the mediation is helped by having a daily report in the House on the result of his meetings. That is not the way that mediation works.

I want to stress that the role of the Department of Labour is that of an arbiter, a helper between management and the trade unions involved. There is no proper way by which we can force parties to change their positions or to agree, under a free, collective bargaining system. Our role is to provide help at the appropriate moment, and we are attempting to do that through the appointment of one of the most able mediators existing in any jurisdiction in Canada. That is all I can say on the matter at present, except to repeat that obviously there is no point of order.

Madam Speaker: I think I have to tell the hon. member that his point might have been raised more properly during the question period. I know that the hon. member was trying to get the floor, and I must tell him that he was next on the list but the clock did not permit me to recognize him. When hon. members wish to pursue a question of this nature, there is a proper time at which to do it.

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60, I am now tabling a notice of ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act (1) and a notice of ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act (2).

Pursuant to Standing Order 60, I would ask you to designate the required order of the day for consideration of the two notices which I have tabled today, and for notices Nos. 13 and 14 on October 28, 1980.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1981

MEASURE TO CORRECT ANOMALIES IN CERTAIN ACTS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (for the Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-56, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts subsequent to 1970.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am told that there have been consultations among the House leaders and that there is unanimous consent to deal with the three stages of this bill without debate right now, because it is a non-controversial bill.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, Madam Speaker, today is one day in which Parliament will live to deal with the three stages of the bill on anomalies.

Mr. Knowles: We agree, but it will be an awfully short lifespan.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and the second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,692, 1,699, 1,801, 1,897 and 1,969.

[Text]

CRASHES BETWEEN TRAINS AND OTHER VEHICLES, PEMBROKE, ONT.

Question No. 1,692—Mr. Patterson:

1. During the time in which records have been kept, how many fatalities have occurred as the result of crashes between trains and other vehicles at the so-called Five Mile Crossing, east of Pembroke, Ontario, where the CPR tracks cross highway 17?

2. Since 1950, on what dates did crashes occur and how many persons were killed in each case?

3. Has consideration been given to installing pre-warning lights at the crossing?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: 1. Six (since 1931).

2. December 11, 1977, 1 killed, 1 injured; February 11, 1979, 1 injured; October 24, 1980, 2 killed.

3. Crossing is presently equipped with a warning signal, standard flashing lights and bell, and advanced warning signs. Pre-warning lights are not a standard form of installation. Pre-warning or advanced warning signs are the responsibility of the road authority.

QUESTIONNAIRE TO ENGINEERING AND SCIENTIFIC SERVICES GROUPS

Question No. 1,699—Mr. Herbert:

Did Statistics Canada send a questionnaire to engineering and scientific services groups in 1979 and, if so (a) to which groups (b) how many persons (i) were questioned (ii) responded?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: in 1979, Statistics Canada did send a questionnaire to businesses providing scientific and engineering services.

(a) Questionnaires were sent to consulting engineering firms and to businesses providing other engineering and scientific services.

(b) (i) In the consulting engineering group, 3,778 firms were sent questionnaires and in the other engineering and scientific services group, 3,025 questionnaires were sent out.

(ii) Of the 3,778 consulting engineering firms, 2,834 replies were received; 2,559 responded of the 3,025 other engineering and scientific services group.

RENOVATION OF SWEENEY HOUSE, JONES FALLS

Question No. 1,801—Mr. Cossitt:

Is Parks Canada renovating a building, formerly a residence near Jones Falls, in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville and, if so (a) for what reasons (b) what will it be used for (c) at what cost?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Yes.

(a) The Sweeney house was designated of national historic significance along with ten other defensible lockmaster houses along the Rideau Canal. Only two of these houses, one of which is the Sweeney house, remain in their original format, that is, one storey without major alterations. The defensible nature and construction make them unique in North America and possibly the world. In addition little interpretation of the "average" family home of pre-Confederation Upper Canada had been done. These factors led to a recommendation from the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada that Parks Canada restore the property. The recommendation was made in the Jones Falls unit plan and accepted and approved as part of the management plan for Jones Falls.

(b) Uses—(1) Open to public (if staff permits), seven days a week during July and August and five days a week from May 24 to Thanksgiving. Parks Canada will provide an introduction to the house and demonstrate pioneer crafts as staff permits.

(2) The building will be open to school and special groups (by appointment) from April 15 to May 24 and again from Thanksgiving to approximately November 15.

(c) Cost—	Phase I (exterior)	$32,767.00
	Phase II (interior)	27,689.50
	Furnishings and costumes to November 27, 1980	10,463.00

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE STAFF

Question No. 1,897—Mr. Stevens:

On (a) October 31, 1979 (b) October 31, 1980, how many persons located in, or reporting to the Prime Minister's office received their salary from (i) the Prime Minister's office (ii) the Privy Council office (iii) other departments?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): (a) (i) 91, (ii) nil, (iii) nil.

(b) (i) 64, (ii) nil, (iii) nil.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Question No. 1,969—Mr. Cossitt:

Are there instructions in the Privy Council office that questions on the Order Paper concerning the government and its relations with the Liberal Party, such as appointments of Liberals to various posts, etc., be delayed in their answering and, if so (a) is it government policy not to answer such questions for lengthy periods of time (b) is the government in a position to state when questions of this nature will be answered?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): See reply to question No. 5,364 answered May 10, 1976.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 58—ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo) moved:

That this House condemns the blatant interference by the minister responsible for the status of women in the plans of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to hold a constitutional conference, demands the resignation of the minister, and urges that the mandate of the Advisory Council be changed to enable it to report directly to Parliament, as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970.

He said: Madam Speaker, in introducing and speaking to the motion today we as members of the opposition do so because of our concern about the credibility of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, the important role it has played in the past, and the important work yet to be done.

In addressing the resolution before the House today and in introducing this matter for discussion, we do so in order that Canadians will be more aware of the important issues which affect the life of our nation, particularly 52 per cent of our nation.

For a moment I should like to make reference to the formation of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. It arose out of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in December, 1970. The commission recommended a council which would be directly responsible to the Parliament of Canada to advise on matters pertaining to women and to propose legislation and policies to improve their status. In May, 1973, the council was officially established. In acting on the recommendation of the royal commission for change in legislation, the council was to introduce measures to improve the status of women. These were not to be presented to Parliament but to the government through the minister responsible for the status of women.

History records that at the first meeting in July, 1973, the council clarified its terms of reference. It outlined that it was to advise and consult on matters pertaining to women and to report annually; to undertake research and suggest research topics which could be carried out by governments, private businesses, universities and voluntary organizations as they relate to the status of women in Canada; to establish programs to correct attitudes and prejudices adversely affecting the status of women; to impose legislation, policies and practices to improve the status of women; to systematically consult with women's bureaus of similar provincial organizations and with voluntary associations particularly concerned with the problems of Canadian women; and to maintain a liaison with the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women and other national and international organizations as may be relevant.

In following its mandate since 1973, the record will show that beginning with distinguished Canadians committed to the cause of Canadian feminism, the council played an important role in the life of Canada and in the raising of the consciousness of Canadians about the plight of women in many cases.

In the past the council gained the credibility and confidence of women and women's groups through advice given to the government on many issues including the following: adult occupational training; the appointment of women to boards, commissions, courts and the Senate; equal pay for work of equal value in the labour force; unemployment insurance criteria; maternity benefits; child care and the proposal for a national day care act; changes to the Criminal Code, including rape and prostitution legislation; employment programs and career upgrading for women; changes to the Income Tax Act, particularly as they affect dependent spouses; pension plans and the eligibility of housewives; benefits to female survivors; native women's rights; economic hardships facing older women and single parent families; and last but not least, the widely-acclaimed paper directing attention to the implications of the constitutional proposal. I mention these to show the significance of the council's work, that it is not in one corner or somehow a group merely directing its comments to an interest group, but widely affects the Canadian population.

When the council was first established, members were recognized for their expertise and their previous involvement in the concerns which I have just outlined. They brought stature to the advisory council; they gave it a reputation because of their own reputations. One might think of Sophie Stedman, the 1980 persons award winner, who had years of experience with business and professional women. One might think of Grace Hartman, the present vice-president of CUPE or the past president of the National Action Committee, who is recognized by feminists. There are many others who could be mentioned, but if we look at what has happened to the council from its beginning, we find that too many of its present appointees had little previous connection with women's groups, or at least they are not recognized contributors. They have had little previous experience and expertise with the issue facing today's women.

They attain their stature and expertise from their appointments to the council as a result of the politicizing of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. It is politicized by the appointment of friends of the minister and campaign workers. This has meant that there was an easy possibility of interference by the minister which, after a long and subtle progression, has led to the resignation of the chairman, Doris Anderson.

A second result is that women's groups and other voluntary agencies across the country do not feel they were represented as they used to be. In the last few days, since the resignation of Mrs. Anderson, there have been comments from those who contribute to the awareness of women's issues across the country. Lynn MacDonald, President of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, a voluntary group representing 150 women's organizations across Canada, said the postponement of the proposed conference showed "a lamentable loss of credibility" for the council. She added:

> The time for regional conferences proposed as a consolation prize to the women of Canada has long past. From the beginning the government failed to consult us, failed to consider us, and for a long time refused to hear us in discussion of constitutional change.

Miss MacDonald concluded that her group would:

> —re-think its position on the government-appointed advisory council . . . whether such councils appointed by politicians from among their political friends can reasonably be expected to speak for women is open to question.

● (1550)

Miss MacDonald's concerns were echoed by Linda Ryan-Nye, co-chairman of Women for Political Action, and Mary Cornery, co-ordinator of the Canadian Congress on Learning Opportunities for Women, and Laura Sabia, first and former chairman of the Ontario Status of Women Council.

What should the council be? First and foremost it should be an effective voice for women and women's groups. It must be, and must be seen to be, an independent and impartial advisory body. It must be viewed as a credible force in order to maintain the necessary liaisons and information ties with women's groups across the country. It must be seen as a body which can speak freely, even sometimes to the embarrassment of the government.

I would like to remind the House of the events which have led up to the discrediting of the council and to the questioning of its integrity. If we go back for a moment and think about the matter of constitutional input and discussion, we find that in September of 1980 the advisory council planned a national conference on the constitution for September 5. This was cancelled on September 2 due to the translators' strike. It was rumoured by several women's groups that political pressure caused the postponement.

I would like to move on to October, 1980. The National Action Committee's national conference on the constitution, to be held in Winnipeg, was cancelled when a request for $22,000 from the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) was refused. This was money which would normally have been made available for groups such as this. The minister was asked to intervene on the committee's behalf, with no result. In comparison, other groups were receiving funding from other government sources in order to make their presentations before the constitution committee. We find that $1.2 million is allocated to the native peoples in order to allow them to travel and prepare their representations.

Later in October the National Action Committee held a small consultation conference for members in the Toronto area only. The minister was the guest speaker at this conference. He is quoted in the press as having "misjudged his audience, pompously talked down to them, patronized them, insulted them and then had the colossal effrontery to tell them to blindly accept the proposed charter of rights in the Constitution as a 'great leap of faith'."

Moving on to December, the advisory council rescheduled its September conference for February 13 and 14, 1981. It hired an organizer for the conference and speakers were lined up. Notices were sent out across the country. The minister agreed to host a reception and a luncheon. Then, in January, after suggestions from the minister's office, the advisory council executive invited the minister to a meeting. He suggested regional conferences might be better than a national conference, which would bring 600 women to Ottawa just at the time the House is debating the constitutional amendments.

The executive voted 5 to 1 to cancel the conference until a later date, as the date in February might embarrass the government. A few days ago, on January 20, the entire council convened and voted to cancel. The president of the council, Doris Anderson, resigned.

We have before us, Mr. Speaker, a motion calling for the removal of the minister from his responsibilities and the restoring of the integrity to the council. Before us is a case where intentions and actions do not match. There is before us evidence of the failure of the minister to represent the concerns of the women of Canada, from a variety of sources. It is ironic that such a motion should be before the House when, in the throne speech delivered to this House, there were more references to women than there had been at any time before. These references suggested an increased commitment to women's programming and the issues in Canada which affect women.

Here in the House yesterday, during question period, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave the minister credit for a number of achievements in an effort somehow to support him in his ministry. Women's groups have commented to me their views on several of the points the Prime Minister read to the House from a memorandum handed to him. I would like to reflect on several of those points.

First, we were encouraged by the Prime Minister to believe that the minister's leadership was significant and that he had introduced measures to ensure affirmative action in the public service. The minister had established affirmative action in three departments. He set up a system of accountability within these departments. He has trained affirmative action counsellors. He is doing further statistical studies, too, for example, comparing the success rate of the public service with the private sector in terms of upward mobility of women employed.

But, here is the other side of the coin. He has stated that it will take about four years to implement this program. Yet, south of the border in the United States, evidence shows that their compulsory affirmative action program with the private sector took merely two years before structural systematic changes were evident with regard to upward mobility. Why does the minister say it will take four years when only three departments are involved, compared with the entire private sector in the United States?

The second of the Prime Minister's affirmations with respect to the minister is that he reduced the minimum insurable hours for unemployment insurance from 20 to 15 hours per week. This is a move which merely returned unemployment insurance to the status quo. Under the last Trudeau government, the former minister of employment and immigration raised the minimum insurable hours from 15 to 20 hours. Since that time there have been many outcries from women's groups claiming that this is unfair to part-time workers, 75 per cent of whom are female.

The third of the testimonials recited yesterday stated that the minister sponsored a $1 million ad campaign on women's employment. I have a copy of a December 22 letter to the minister from the National Action Committee objecting to these ads. The letter pointed out that the assumptions in the ads were, first, that women's work is trivial and, second, that women are a reserve army of labour and, third, that most employers are unaware of or have forgotten about women workers. The minister has not yet responded to this letter. We have also been told that the minister received strong complaints from the Canadian Labour Congress regarding these ads, through his affirmative action program in CEIC.

I would like to mention another item from the litany of the Prime Minister yesterday in praise of the minister responsible for the status of women. It is that the minister started a review of unemployment insurance to remove discrimination, among other things. The fact is that the minister did not start this review, but he continued the review which was in progress under his predecessor.

● (1600)

The minister did give the mandate to a task force, which will not be reporting until the spring of this year. So changes will not come into effect in the year 1981-82. The recommendations will be reviewed by Parliament. Women's groups suggested to me that, as a result, changes will not be ready for the fall deadline for inclusion in the 1982-83 fiscal year. Possibly the changes will be here in time for election year.

As I have consulted women's groups and talked with others about their disaffection with the minister responsible for the status of women, I have heard it rumoured that the minister has never yet visited his office at Status of Women Canada, which is symbolic of where his priorities lie. His predecessor met three or four women's groups per week in the Status of Women office.

Women's groups have expressed dissatisfaction with the minister's unwillingness to meet with him. When he does meet with such groups, one source says that he assumes the role of an instructor on women's issues, often correcting them.

A second small but telling comment is the apparent lack of support by the minister for striking government translators who were requesting improved maternity benefits. One women's group tells me that when the minister was asked to speak on their behalf to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) he refused. The minister was unable to produce from External Affairs a female diplomat or any woman knowledgeable in women's issues to attend in an advisory capacity the UN Mid-decade Conference for Women in Copenhagen this year. The minister did not attend the constitutional presentations of the advisory council, of the National Action Committee or other women's groups which have gone before the constitutional committee.

In recent weeks there has been much alarm over the introduction of a multimillion dollar program by the Minister of Communications in support of office automation. Letters have been sent to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) soliciting his support for the implications of this action on women in the work force, most of whom are in clerical positions and who see an end of their employment. There was an acknowledgment today that a letter was received, one month and one week since its writing.

I mention these facts in support of the motion today which calls for a change, and to suggest that there are many things to indicate that there is not the caring or commitment there is in the words and speeches made by the minister from time to time since assuming this responsibility. The resignation of the president of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Doris Anderson, and the resignation in these last days of several members of the board, members of the staff, and the questioning across the country of the allegations that the minister has applied undue political pressure to the council, instead of encouraging women to voice their views on the constitution, regardless of what may be the cost in terms of immediate political deadlines, suggest that the current crisis will undermine the confidence that women's groups have had in the past in the council, and that the issues which the council seeks to serve will be undermined.

Women's groups across Canada have lost confidence in the minister who is supposed to have their best interests at heart. There is also a need, as our motion suggests, to depoliticize the council and restore it to its former position of expertise and prestige in our communities. One of the considerations which might be given to the representative nature of that council in advising government and Parliament, is that in the future nominations for the positions on the council be solicited from women from coast to coast, that these nominations be reviewed by an all-party committee which would then make recommendations to the minister, allowing some latitude for the geographical decisions and other decisions which would be part of the final decision. This would help to restore confidence in the council as an independent, impartial body with considerable stature and effectiveness.

Such a move would return the council to its original direction and mandate, as suggested by the royal commission, that the council report directly to Parliament. We are suggesting that this council is not an advisory group to a minister on a specific subject, whether it be sports, business or some related interest group, but, rather, a council which cuts across the life of Parliament and the life of the government.

Let us be reminded that there are deep women's issues involved in many of the departments of government which require a strong and committed advocate on behalf of the implementation of women's concerns, whether they be in the areas of employment, labour, regional economic expansion, justice, the Solicitor General's department, national health and welfare, veterans affairs, fitness and amateur sport, communications, consumer affairs, industry, trade and commerce, the Secretary of State's department, and immigration. They cut across matters of Indian affairs, international development, finance, national revenue, the Treasury Board, national defence and external affairs. These are but a few of the interfaces in terms of the life of Canada where the concerns of women and their rights ought to be heard.

In light of the rumours, the allegations and the unrest, we urge that a change be made in terms of the spokesperson in the life of government who will represent these concerns. We also call upon the government to return to the recommendations of its own royal commission and see that, as is the case with the Human Rights Commission report and the Auditor General's report, the report of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women comes directly to this House. Therefore, I have moved, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

> That this House condemns the blatant interference by the minister responsible for the status of women in the plans of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to hold a constitutional conference, demands the resignation of the minister, and urges that the mandate of the advisory council be changed to enable it to report directly to Parliament, as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970.

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we in this corner of the House support fully the motion introduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean). Indeed, I have listened with care and interest to his remarks and can say, I am sure on behalf of all members of my party, that we agree entirely with everything he has said in his carefully prepared address. We have an addition which we would like to make to the motion, but I will come to that in the course of my remarks. It does not take away anything from the motion but, rather, adds something to it.

One of the points made just now by the hon. member for Waterloo was with regard to the incredible advertisement which the minister responsible for the status of women had put into every major Canadian daily newspaper. I do not have the headline with me at the moment, but I remember it as vividly as I have ever remembered anything. It congratulated women for having "helped out" in the Second World War. This is the advertisement, under the jurisdiction of the minister responsible for the status of women, that women were in fact a reserve labour force, that women were a secondary part of the labour force, and still are. You would not talk about them having "helped out" if you did not think that was what they were going to do once again.

I suggest, therefore, that not only should the minister resign as the minister responsible for the status of women, but he should also resign as the Minister of Employment and Immigration if his view about the role of women, who now constitute 40 per cent of the labour force and in a few years will constitute 50 per cent of the labour force, is that of a reserve force. If his view is that they are people who help out in the employment needs of this country, then he should not be the minister of employment any more than he should be minister responsible for the status of women. It takes, to quote the minister, "a great leap of faith", also pointed out by the previous speaker, to see the minister continue in either of these capacities.

There is no question in the minds of all of us on this side of the House, and I should think in the minds of a great many on the other side, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) from what he said yesterday, that Doris Anderson was a particularly strong, effective, challenging president of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I think we can all agree to that. Perhaps she was a bit too independent, too strong, and perhaps too challenging. But she brought a degree of confidence to the operations of that council—and I have been watching it, as many of us have for years—not seen since its early years under Katie Cooke.

When the minister says, as he did yesterday, that the council should be congratulated for the work it has done on the recommendations it made to the constitutional committee, he should realize that what has made the council so effective in those recommendations has been the leadership provided by the president of that council. Enormous staff work has been done by the administration which she built up, because she is a good administrator. This too is evidenced by the quality of the research she had prepared by absolutely first-class women constitutional lawyers preparing the recommendations for the constitutional committee. Therefore it is a tragedy that it is she who has resigned and not the minister.

I think there is no question in anyone's mind, despite everything the minister has said to deny it, that the minister did make it very clear indeed that he would prefer not to have the postponed constitutional conference held in mid-February. It may be the council members dropped too quickly, like dominoes, at least 17 of them did, and I admire the ten who did not. It may be that they were too influenced because they are close friends or former campaign workers of the minister. It may be that they acceded to his request, acceded to his wishes—let me put it as wishes—too quickly. But from all of the evidence we have now seen in the documentation which is available to everyone, the minister was determined that the conference should not be held, and he was able to bring 17 members of that council into line.

On television last night we heard him say that he thought he had the support of the women of Canada in what he was doing. I wonder whether the minister has had an opportunity to read any of the letters or telegrams, or hear about the telephone calls which have come to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, some focusing on the importance of holding the conference as scheduled in February, many on the importance of the council's integrity and independence, and many covering both of those, as well as their support for the president of the council.

Does the minister know, when he says that he has the support of the women in Canada, who has been writing, phoning and sending telegrams? There have been well over a hundred who have done this and I would like to list some of them for the record. Groups as well as individuals have called in. Just a few are the Newfoundland Status of Women Council; the Canadian Federation of Business; the Canadian Congress on Learning Opportunities for Women, Women for Political Action—the National Action Committee has already been mentioned—the Women's Research Centre in Vancouver; le Réseau d'Action et d'Informations pour les Femmes du Québec; the Nova Scotia Association of Women and the Law; the Voice of Women; the Coalition of Women's Groups; the Social Issues Committee of the YWCA; the National Association of Women and the Law; the Ontario Status of Women Council; the P.E.I. Advisory Council on the Status of Women; the Organization of Working Women; the Elizabeth Fry Society of Kingston, and the National Board of Directors YMCA of Canada, and so on.

Mr. Nielsen: The YMCA and the YWCA?

Miss Jewett: Both the YMCA and the YWCA, yes.

These are just a few of the organizations that have written to support the holding of this conference, which the minister was determined to have cancelled and in which he has succeeded, that wrote to support the integrity of the council from that kind of political interference, and that wrote to support Doris Anderson as the strongest president of the council there has ever been.

This raises the question of whether a council, whose members have a political loyalty to the minister, can survive. I do not think the present council can because of what has happened. But I have every wish, as I am sure we all do, that there be an advisory council. We will perhaps have to change its name. We do not want to see the minister enfold it into his department, which I sometimes think is what he has in mind. I think what he would really like is to have everything relating to women, women's programs in the Secretary of State's department, the women's bureau in the Department of Labour, but above all, the advisory council itself, to be part of his department. He does not want them out there talking. He does not want them criticizing government policy. He does not want them giving suggestions to the government, even good suggestions, as on the constitutional proposals. Therefore, it is all the more urgent, if that is in his mind, for us all to find ways and means of strengthening the council. Surely one of the most important ways is to get away from patronage appointments.

It is really shocking that over the years the council has been, in most instances, filled with people who are there because they have worked hard for the party in power, or because they have been campaign organizers, or because they deserve some small reward. They may be excellent women, many of them are. But unfortunately their first loyalty, given the way they are appointed, or the criteria of their appointment, is to the party.

What we should have, and many of these women might qualify on other grounds, is a council structure which will ensure that the membership of the council is not appointed just because of their political affiliation, but because of their involvement, interest in and concern for women's issues. They could come from the great broad strata of women in this society and not from the rather narrow social class they now come from. They should be working women, unionist and non-unionist, native women, immigrant women, and housewives. If possible, they should be elected and not appointed.

The minister had an opportunity in the year or so that he has been minister to get a more broad and representative council. He threw it away. For example, at least six recommendations came from the Canadian Labour Congress. Recommendations were made by excellent women such as Mary Eadie. Recommendations came from rights for Indian women, Mary Two-Axe Early. There were representations from Nova Scotia from women such as Alexa McDonough, an excellent woman in the field of social work.

An hon. Member: Now in politics.

Miss Jewett: Now in politics but was not then. Actually, there were a number of people. I could mention Lee Grills from my province.

Mr. Dupras: A Liberal.

Miss Jewett: Actually she is a Liberal.

Mr. Dupras: It is just that you surprised me.

Miss Jewett: She showed on the National Action Committee a greater interest, understanding and concern about women than one might expect with her political affiliation. These names were suggested. They are all active, energetic, intelligent, independent people, and they were all turned down. The cabinet did not accept any of those suggestions. In other words, the minister did have a chance. They put one woman on that council out of 29, one woman from the labour movement who, I understand, has now resigned because the minister refused to accept any of the recommendations from the Canadian Labour Congress.

The minister is not only guilty of downgrading and patronizing women, but of ignoring the women in this country who represent sectors of our society other than the very narrow band from which he made his recommendations to cabinet. Therefore it is important that we urge upon this House, specifically the government, to do those things requested in the motion, in other words, condemn the interference by the minister responsible for the status of women in the plans of the advisory council, persuading 17 of the 27 present to cancel the conference. Cancellation of the conference was basically to slow down the momentum which Anderson was bringing to the discussion, the elucidation of women's issues.

The request for the resignation of the minister goes without saying. We equally support the further recommendation in the motion that the council should report directly to Parliament. The structure of the council must be changed. It must cease to be a patronage body. With a patronage body you cannot always count on independent, spirited people performing the function of an independent council. We believe that is equally important in order to preserve the strength which the just resigned president gave to the council.

We would make one important addition to the opposition motion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That the motion be amended by adding, following "1970", the following words:

"and that the membership of the council be appointed or elected by and from the organizations in this country actively involved in women's issues."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member for having provided the Chair with a copy of the amendment. The Chair finds the amendment to be in order.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise with a degree of interest and anticipation to join in this debate. I very much welcome the opportunity to discuss the issue of the status of women, in this House. I found it somewhat disappointing, having spent almost two full days in this House just before Christmas defending the estimates of my department, that in some 16 hours of debate only 40 minutes were spent discussing women's issues. Therefore I am glad to see that the opposition members have now discovered the fact that women exist in this country and that they are now prepared to bring the issues forward. They obviously intended to bring their motion forward during this period of zeal and interest. Therefore it is important that we have an opportunity both to discuss the issues and to set the record straight.

The tone of the debate was probably set by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean). When he concluded his remarks he said, "in light of these rumours and allegations". That very much summarizes the exact nature. The basis upon which the case is being made by members of the opposition is exactly that, rumour and allegation, and not much in the way of fact.

I thank the hon. member for Waterloo for clearly defining for us the source of his argument and the arguments his colleagues will be raising. Rumours and allegations are certainly no stranger to politics and no stranger to this House, and certainly no stranger to the issue which has emerged over the past four or five days.

I welcome this opportunity to set the record straight. Perhaps the hon. member for Waterloo, an honoured and respected member of this House, will be prepared to change his mind once we get away from the rumours, allegations, mythologies, innuendos and forms of character assassination which have coloured this debate, and get down to some of the basic facts as to what has taken place, the role of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and the objectives, goals and concerns of this government as far as women in this country are concerned.

● (1630)

I am sorry the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) is not able to spend some time to stay with us, because some of my remarks may be addressed to her.

An hon. Member: I am just having a smoke.

Mr. Axworthy: Fine. I would certainly invite the hon. member to go out and have some of her refreshment, but I would point out that there has just been a recent study I am sure the hon. member would be interested in, which indicates that smoking is not really very good for your health.

An hon. Member: Try not to be patronizing.

Mr. Axworthy: Let us deal first with some of the initial testimonials being offered to try to demonstrate that somehow there is this great, universal sort of overwhelming antipathy or sense of frustration about the work that we, as a government, and I, as a minister, have been trying to do.

I do not have all of it here but I do happen to have within my notes a letter from the Native Women's Association of Canada, because I will be addressing that group tomorrow evening. That is a group representing the entire range of women who have perhaps been the most deprived and the most discriminated against, and who have perhaps suffered and been the most serious victims of society's indifference. If I might, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read into the record what they have to say. I do not usually do this, but seeing that members opposite were so anxious to rush to the quotes from Laura Sabia, that well-known objective reporter of events, I thought perhaps they might be interested in hearing what the native women of Canada think. They said:

Dear Mr. Axworthy:

In recognition of your positive actions on behalf of native women, the Native Women's Association of Canada would like to invite you to speak to the Board of Directors in Winnipeg, Manitoba, January 23-25, 1981.

I would like to quote further, if I might:

The programs and activities you have initiated for the training and employment of Native women and your philosophy of consultation with the NWAC on this matter is of great significance to the NWAC. We would like to provide you with the opportunity to speak with native women from across Canada to elaborate on your plans and to hear from women working in the communities their concerns and ideas.

There is one example of a group which I think should be treated with great respect in this House. I do not pretend I have universal popularity with the Laura Sabias or the NACs of the world, but I do say there are a number of women's organizations I have also received communications from which do have some degree of support and some degree of good reaction for the initiatives we have tried to introduce.

I would now like to come, if I might, to the so-called record, because the hon. member for Waterloo was very anxious to read what he thought was a refutation of the kind of initiatives we have introduced, and tried to provide an ongoing commentary or criticism of them.

First I would like to explain to members of the House that part of the responsibilities of the minister responsible for the status of women is not just to take direct initiatives on his own but, in addition, to try to co-ordinate the activities of the entire government; to bring information, to make interventions, and to try to support the work of other ministers who are working in an equal way. So much of the work is not necessarily on the visible side because much of it takes place around the cabinet table, takes place in correspondence, and takes place in direct communication trying to bring to their attention concerns that are raised.

In that case I think the role to be played is one that is not necessarily identifiable by achievements or track record. Even saying that, I think it is possible for us to demonstrate that the commitment we made in the throne speech has gone a long way toward being carried out. I would contrast it very dramatically with the record of the previous government, which also had a similar nine months in office. If you look at their exact achievements for women and the number of initiatives that were introduced, it comes up to a big fat zero. They were very good on talk, very big on rhetoric, and they made a lot of fine speeches, but when you look at the record there was not one single important initiative taken on behalf of the women of this country during that nine months in office. In fact some of the things we have done were opposed by the Conservative Party.

At the very first meeting I had with Mrs. Anderson of the advisory council, she brought to my attention the major concern women had about the issue of minimum insurability and the fact that the statute removed some 200,000 women from eligibility for unemployment insurance.

I have here a statement made by my predecessor in this position, Ronald Atkey, when he was speaking to a meeting at St. Andrews-by-the-Sea last September in which he indicated that the Conservatives did not plan to change last year's Unemployment Insurance Act, a statement which infuriated women's groups. Mr. Atkey, my predecessor, said it was not in their interest to do that.

I did make the change. I did reduce the eligibility to bring large numbers of women under the coverage of the Unemployment Insurance Act, contrary to the advice and position taken by my predecessor in this office on behalf of the then Conservative government. I would suggest to the hon. member for Waterloo that when he takes a look at the record he should begin to look at the record of his own government, and make an interesting contrast and comparison of what they did not do with what we have done.

The hon. member spent some time trying to disparage our initiatives in the area of affirmative action. I could provide you with the commitment made by the Conservative Party in the May election campaign as to what they would do in the way of affirmative action. It was far less than the steps we have taken. They would set up additional things for the office of equal opportunity. Let me quote from the news release issued by the Conservative Party on what they would do. They said that the Progressive Conservative Party would provide more clout to translate rhetoric into an affirmative action program within the federal public service. They were going to provide more clout. That was their commitment to the women of Canada.

What we have done is introduce a well-designed program of affirmative action beginning with three departments, as I have said in this House many times, because that was the limit of our resources. That program will provide the ability to make changes in the Public Service Act and to make changes in legislation and regulation to bring about substantial reform in the placement of women, handicapped groups and native groups in the public service. That "put down" of hon. members who say we have hired an affirmative action council is one thing, but do they want the program administered by people who are untrained? The hon. member also said that we are now doing a statistical study. Does he want us to make major changes in the public service without knowing what facts and information we are considering.

I would contrast that with the very callous attitude taken by the former President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) who started to slash the public service, that one area which provides perhaps the most important opportunity for women employment in this country. There was no consideration given to protecting the rights of women employees in the public service at that time. They got slashed and hacked like everybody else.

An hon. Member: That's rubbish.

Mr. Axworthy: Don't give me that stuff. Let us stand on the record.

I am saying we introduced the affirmative action program as a first stage in moving toward the private sector approach. Why did we do that? It was done because it was recommended by the advisory council that before we take initiatives in the private sector the federal government should provide affirmative action within its own public service. Again we responded to those recommendations and are following them through in a very careful and managerial way.

At the same time I have stated publicly many times that I intend to initiate a discussion before my colleagues in cabinet on the use of contract compliance in the private sector, because that is one of the most important means of reducing barriers and overcoming the limitations women face in the work force. I think hon. members opposite who are honest with themselves will admit I have said that in this House, have said it publicly and am committed to it. I have said to a number of women's forums across this country that I will fight for that issue because it is a critical component of any major strategy to bring about change for women and to bring about greater equality in the workplace.

Beyond that certain things were not mentioned. We introduced a program of affirmative action in our job-creation program. Again this was based upon recommendations made by the advisory council. They pointed out, and I think quite legitimately, that job-creation programs sponsored by the federal government did not include affirmative action principles. What did we do with the job-creation program which was cancelled by the Conservatives, with the result that there was no direct job creation? We introduced affirmative action principles which are now in place and working. I ask hon. members of this House to compare the records.

● (1640)

In addition, we introduced a major initiative with respect to the training of women for non-traditional work. The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam produced some critical surveys of the ad campaign we introduced to encourage employers and women to begin to move into non-traditional areas. She is welcome to her opinions, but they are not universally shared. We have received a number of congratulatory letters, which I will bring to this House. I will distribute their actual wording, because they do not talk about women moving into the work force on a temporary basis.

We are committed to providing the opportunity for women to move into non-traditional areas, and to back up that commitment we have introduced a training program which will provide 75 per cent of the cost of training women in those areas. That program has been taken up.

I draw the attention of hon. members to an article written in the Ottawa Citizen just after the Christmas break, telling of two young women in this city who had been going from temporary job to temporary job but who have now signed up for that program. I think one is a machinist, and the other is in some other form of skilled training. They said that this is the first chance they have had to get permanent new occupations. I am not saying that is enough, but I am committed to those goals.

I ask hon. members to remember what did not take place in the nine months of the previous administration. There were no training programs for non-traditional work. There was no affirmative action program. In exactly the same amount of time we have spent in office the previous administration produced none of those types of initiatives. If we are able to get our act together in nine months, why could hon. members opposite not get theirs together? Perhaps they could not because they were too busy making speeches about what they were going to do and not busy enough actually doing it.

I think it is important to deal with the issue of constitutional change because that is the focal point around which much of the controversy of the last four or five days has centred. Let us start with a different history than perhaps hon. members opposite are prepared to bring into this House.

From where did the original idea for a constitutional conference for women come? Did it come from Mrs. Anderson or the advisory council? No. I was the one who raised the issue with the advisory council.

Mr. Nielsen: On whose suggestion?

Mr. Axworthy: On my own. I raised the issue and asked Mrs. Anderson in a meeting whether the advisory council would be prepared to take on that responsibility. Why? I felt it was important and I felt that a charter of rights would be one of the most important steps forward for women in this country in decades. If hon. members want to ask what is important in terms of the role of women in Canada, we can point very clearly to our commitment to introduce non-discriminatory clauses and to provide guaranteed entrenched rights. Such entrenchments and guarantees have often been criticized by hon. members opposite. They say we should not be providing these and we should wait for the provinces to do it. That is the theory. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) got up and said, "No, no, we are for a charter of rights," but he forgot to mention that they are for a charter of rights only if the provinces agree.

However, at the September conference the provinces very clearly said they do not agree with a charter of rights. Without one where would women be left? They would be left without a guarantee of rights in the constitution. We are committed to this issue. We took a step far beyond anything hon. members opposite were prepared to take, and we are prepared to take it now. If hon. members opposite are committed and really believe in the equality of women, let them stand up and say they will support this government in its move to provide a charter of rights in the Constitution of Canada. I do not hear them saying that. What they are really saying is that there should be provincial agreement.

Mr. Lyon of my province said we do not need a charter of rights and Manitoba would veto any attempt to include one under the formula discussed. What is the result? The result is a great big zero in terms of the position taken by the Conservative Party of Canada as far as women are concerned.

The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam said that I made statements critical of the stand taken by the advisory council with respect to the Constitution. That is quite wrong. I wholeheartedly endorsed that stand, and in fact wrote to some 40 or 50 women's groups across Canada inviting them to make representations to the committee. I wrote a letter on October 28 of last year indicating that a committee was established, and inviting those groups to appear. Furthermore, I was prepared to meet with a number of women's groups—which I did during the fall of last year—from one end of Canada to the other and to talk with them about the constitution. I made certain comments about the stand being taken on a legal basis that in some ways it did not go far enough and that some of the legal questions should have been examined.

Is there something wrong when a minister of the Crown treats an advisory council with great respect, as I did, to the point where I was prepared to get into a discussion with its members? I did not treat them in a perfunctory way. I treated them with such respect that I was prepared to talk with them and give them my ideas. If that is somehow an abrogation of ministerial responsibility, then there is a very strange understanding among hon. members opposite as to what a minister should do. Surely a minister should be prepared to engage in dialogue and discussion.

I will conclude my discussion of this by asking how the recommendations which were brought before the committee were accepted by this government. Do hon. members think that they translate by magic? A number of ministers were around the table, including myself and others, who supported and represented that point of view. Changes in the constitution were made and amendments put down by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), incorporating the recommendations of the advisory council and of other women's groups. If hon. members are looking for a clear demonstration of commitment, willingness to listen and responsiveness, what clearer evidence can be provided than the fact that we did take those recommendations seriously, and did bring them forward as government recommendations to the joint committee on the Constitution?

I suggest that hon. members opposite are guilty of selective editorializing in relation to the evidence. I suppose that is a polite way of saying they really are not shaking the whole deck down.

I am very much committed with respect to this issue. When it came to the issue between the executive committee and the council, I stated all along the simple principle that it was up to the council to decide. It was not for me to decide whether a conference should be held. It was up to members of that committee to decide. If they had decided to cancel it in the first place, that was their decision to make.

The only time I became involved in their discussions was when they telephoned my office asking if I would meet with them to discuss the matter. Contrary to allegations which have been made, never at any time did I deal directly with members of the committee or members of the council. They approached me. I met with them on a Friday morning. They asked for my opinion. I gave it to them. That was the last contact on that discussion. They made their own decision. It was a controversial decision.

One of the members, the president, disagreed with the decision and took her dispute to the public charging that there was some kind of political manipulation. What is manipulation? I suppose there are enough good politicians in this chamber to know that if a politician really wants to manipulate, he must get on the telephone, twist arms, and try to persuade. I did none of those things.

Mr. Nielsen: How did you do it?

Mr. Axworthy: I did not do it at all; that is the point. Allegations have been made which have never been founded.

I will go back to the hon. member for Waterloo who seemed to say that his case is founded on rumour and allegation.

Mr. McLean: I did not say that. I said it is supported.

Mr. Axworthy: I apologize. He said it was supported by rumour and allegation.

Mr. McLean: The facts are there, and there are others.

Mr. Axworthy: There is a slight nuance there; I accept that.

Miss Jewett: You got the mole to do it.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact is that that was a dispute between the president of the council and the executive committee. The next forum for that to be discussed in was the entire council. I recall how, with great zeal, before the council met the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam said, "I am confident that tomorrow all things will be resolved by that council."

Miss Jewett: I was.

• (1650)

Mr. Axworthy: There were none of the castigations, none of the insults or abuse that we have heard since then, except when the decision went against what she thought it should be. Then they became subject and victims of her wrath because they were saying at that time, "We do not have to worry, we will be vindicated." The fact of the matter is that they spent four and a half hours in secret session—secret, I guess, to all of us except to members who received some documents, which I have yet to see.

An hon. Member: All of us have them.

Mr. Axworthy: I am sure that the hon. member has better pipelines to the council than I have. Perhaps we should be asking who really is tampering with the council, because I have not seen those minutes which hon. members opposite have and, if there is political interference, then I suggest that perhaps members opposite should be asking themselves about their own role in all this business.

The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam has been very quick to make personal attacks upon members of that council, to engage in a pretty intensive form of character assassination on certain of those members. That is really reprehensible, and considering the kind of reputation which the hon. member used to have in terms of being prepared to present facts and issues in a fair way, I think that the kinds of personal attacks in which she has engaged do not befit the honour and dignity of a member of this House. She is really using the privileges of members of the House to make personal attacks which, if she had made them outside this House, might have subjected her to some very serious liabilities.

An hon. Member: Sorry I get under your skin.

Mr. Axworthy: But that, Mr. Speaker, is her style, that is the way she wants to conduct her business, that is the way in which she represents herself, and that is fine.

But the fact of the matter is that the council met and decided to support the position taken by the executive committee. And again, members here have said that it was not a fair decision. They are saying in effect, "We do not believe in democracy unless it happens to go our way. We only believe in the democratic process when our side wins." I know that this has been the feeling since last February and March among members opposite, because one can still see it on the faces of some of them. They still cannot believe that democracy spoke the way it did. But the fact of the matter is that that is the way a democracy works, and people make those choices. You can make all the allegations and innuendos you want, but they were the ones who made the choice. The real regret that I have, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Is that your leadership chances are shot.

Mr. Axworthy: —is that in the kinds of charges that have been made during this debate on this whole issue by hon. members opposite they have been far more responsible for discrediting the council, questioning its credibility and besmirching its ability to operate than anything that anybody on this side of the House has done or has contemplated doing. That is because they have used the council as their battering ram. They have tried, for their own political reasons, to use the work of the advisory council to achieve whatever political objective they have. I happen to think that the reason is that they know we are succeeding in making real reforms and changes for women and they do not like what they see. That is what really frightens them, that is what bothers them the most. They know we are making real progress in these areas and that we are going to make further progress because we have a number of other initiatives in mind. That is what gets to them really deep down, and that is what they are afraid of.

In terms of the charges that were made, I have stated in this House several times, and will continue to state, that those are the facts. I believe that it would be in the best interests of the advisory council if the issue were dealt with on the facts, not on the basis of rumour and allegations, as the hon. member for Waterloo stated, because that is the best way in which we can pay respect to that council and preserve its independence and autonomy.

I would agree that probably it is worth while to look at the structure of the council and at its role. Before hon. members say, "You are changing your tune", let me say that that is not true because, some six weeks ago, I spoke at the steering meeting of the Copenhagen conference and indicated that one of the initiatives is to take a look at the structure of the council. I had some concerns as well, and one of those concerns was raised with me by women across Canada, namely, that the council has become far too centralized in Ottawa and was not reaching out in terms of its regional grasp in providing a distribution of information and ideas.

Let us clear up some of the facts about the council. Members say that it should report to Parliament. It does report to Parliament. The reports issued by that council are public reports on the day they are issued. They do not go through me. I, as the minister responsible, exercise absolutely no judgment or control, and in fact I am not even consulted about them in most cases. All that happens is that I get my complimentary copy at the same time as hon. members opposite do. Those reports, which have provided the basis for some very harsh criticism of government activities over time, have been used by members opposite as a way of raising questions in the House. They are a very legitimate function of the council which should be protected and enhanced.

But there is also a certain value to the council having a relationship with a minister of the government so that there can be some contact and advice going back and forth, so that Mrs. Anderson, as she did at her first meeting, can sit down with me and say, "I am concerned about the problem of unemployment insurance, we would like you to make changes", and we are able to make changes. There is a certain tangible benefit in having this kind of connection.

In discussion with other people and in my own mind I have raised the question of whether perhaps there should be a separate ministry, but we had the experience in Ottawa with the ministry of state for urban affairs, and other groups, and we found that one thing they lacked was a line department or the ability to deliver goods and services. They were simply co-ordinating agencies which did not have the large resources and personnel which could bring about changes. One of the advantages of my particular portfolio which merges employment and immigration and the status of women, is that we are able to provide the kinds of initiatives we find in Affirmative Action, unemployment insurance, new employment programs or new training programs, because it means that some minister does not have to come to me to cajole or plead. As the minister, I can respond to those initiatives and make the changes right away.

I want to make it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite prepared to meet with women's groups. In fact this afternoon I wrote a letter, which I would be prepared to read here, to the presidents of six major women's organizations. It reads as follows:

I would like to have your views on the best means of ensuring an effective advisory council on the status of women. Women's groups were the catalyst for the council and it is your views that I value as I review the recognized structural problems of the council.

To that end, I would appreciate meeting with you on February 16, 1981 at 5.00 p.m., so that together we can ensure that vital independent research on women's social, economic and legal position is available to Canadian women.

We will consult with them to see what kind of recommendations might be made to bring about those kinds of changes, and I will listen to them as I have listened to them in the past in making changes. Hon. members opposite have a legitimate point when they raise the question as to whether the council with its present structure is the best means of ensuring that information, ideas, commentaries and criticisms are being expressed. I share this concern and am prepared to act on it, as I have already done in this letter which I have sent today. However, let us not throw out the baby with the bath water, let us not run the council into the ground, and let us not so degrade it and downgrade it that there is nothing left to preserve or enhance.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I accept the partisan nature in which such matters are brought before the House by opposition members, but let me make one final comment, and that is that the kind of bluster, and sometimes blasphemy, we have heard, the kind of rumour and allegation that have been expressed, will not in any way deter me from what I consider to be my mandate, one in which I personally believe, which is to help this government provide greater equality for women in Canada. That is an objective for which I will continue to work, regardless of what members opposite have to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Adjournment Motion

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties concerning private members' business and the listing of various bills on the Order Paper, and it has been agreed that Bill C-303 in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil, will reappear tomorrow on the Order Paper printed as Bill C-256, and that Bill C-256, which is now on the order paper, will appear as Bill C-303, and tomorrow at four o'clock we will be debating the new bill, C-256.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the proposal of the parliamentary secretary with respect to Bill C-256 and Bill C-303 for debate tomorrow afternoon. Is there unanimous agreement to that proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I believe you would have to add that the changes on the Order Paper mentioned by the parliamentary secretary will be made; I think that must be a House order.

Mr. Knowles: Whatever way it must be done, we agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Accordingly, it is agreed and so ordered.

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McLean.

That this House condemns the blatant interference by the minister responsible for the status of women in the plans of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to hold a constitutional conference, demands the resignation of the minister, and urges that the mandate of the advisory council be changed to enable it to report directly to Parliament, as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970.

And of the amendment—(Miss Jewett) (p. 6464).

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, first I say to the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) on behalf of my party that indeed we accept the amendment to our motion which she put forward. In fact we are glad to see it incorporated in the motion.

Then I should like to turn my attention to the minister who finished his remarks by saying that he did not want to run the advisory council into the ground. May I say to him that he certainly made a good beginning at doing so. He certainly has caused a great deal of concern in the country among men and women as to what his actions have perpetrated in the last number of days.

The minister tried to defuse the issue by referring to a questionable list of achievements. I would say they fell more into the category of rumour and allegation than anything I have heard here this afternoon. Perhaps the achievement for which he will be longest remembered by women across the country is the fact that he pressured the advisory council into a position where the chairman of the council was forced to resign. That is the achievement for which he will be most noted; that is the achievement which has caused anger up and down the country. Certainly I for one am angry, and I do not think I am the only woman in the country who is angry about it. If the minister has not felt or heard that anger, then he is more insensitive than I thought.

Seldom have so many women been united in their condemnation of a minister of the Crown and in their support for a highly-respected public servant. Seldom, if ever, has a so-called independent advisory body been dealt such a devastating blow to its credibility. We see events pile on events. Today we have seen the resignation of three more members of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women—

An hon. Member: Name them.

Miss MacDonald: They are members of the research staff, members involved with the advisory council. The reason was that they can no longer stomach the minister's interference with their activities or the government intimidation which is also part of the whole fiasco of recent days.

Today, yesterday, and all this week, we have seen hundreds and thousands of letters, telegrams and telephone calls pouring into Ottawa from women and some men all across the country offering their support for Doris Anderson, and condemning the minister. Members have referred to these, and in case the minister has any question I will give him an example of some already received from hundreds of women, and from organizations representing hundreds of thousands of women who have been appalled and angered by what has taken place. He will be pleased to know that there is even one from the vice-president of the Willowdale Federal Liberal Association.

Miss Jewett: Good.

Miss MacDonald: They will be coming in the thousands. I warn the minister that the response from women has only begun. The minister attempted to put up a defence. Since this issue broke all he has been doing is seeking to defend himself, because he has no other role but to try to defend himself from something in which he has committed a very grievous error. The minister knows that he has interfered with the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. He knows he had jeopardized the very raison d'être of the council or its very mandate for existence, that of proffering independent advice on issues related to women.

The proof of this can be seen clearly in the chronology of events which led up to the final cancellation of the advisory council conference on the Constitution. It was scheduled for last September and postponed because of the translators' strike; then rescheduled for February 12 and 13. On December 12 the minister agreed to host the reception and luncheon at that conference. He was well aware of the conference dates at that time, and he did not seem to think then that the conference needed to be cancelled or would be embarrassing. Even if there was any doubt in the minister's mind, certainly there was no doubt in the minds of council members, not even on the part of the executive committee.

According to the documented chronology, it was full speed ahead and all systems go, until, of course, the minister decided to lower the boom. The council members were "advised" to revise the already well-advanced plans for its constitutional conference. But this advice did not come from the minister or his office until January 5 after almost a month of preparation had elapsed. What is more, the advice was not sought; it was given in that special way that ministers have of giving advice. It originated in the minister's office. It was not requested by the chairman or the council. It was tossed out like a spanner in the works from the powers on high.

On January 5, the chronology indicates the following:

Doris Anderson is away. Hellie Wilson speaks with the minister's office and reports that the minister wants regional conferences instead of a national conference. Hellie Wilson stops the press releases and letters from going out as scheduled.

There was no meeting, no vote, not even the courtesy of a telephone call to the chairman; only quick and total obedience expected by members of the council—follow along. Perhaps obedience is a sad word to use, but that is what transpired.

On January 6 Doris Anderson returned and found out what the minister suggested. The chronology indicates:

Doris Anderson phones Nancy Connolly, the minister's assistant, and explains that cancelling for a second time would be extremely damaging to the credibility of the council. Nancy Connolly says the minister seems determined. Doris Anderson asks to meet him.

In fact, it was decided that the whole executive committee would meet with the minister. They asked to meet with him not because they wanted his advice which they could subserviently follow—do not put them in such a patronizing position—at least that was not the expectation at the outset. Rather, they wanted an explanation as to why the minister should have unexpectedly interjected his determined and different course of action into an already planned conference. After all, at least some of them were mature, could make up their own minds and were used to operating in an independent council up until then. It was only natural that they should ask for a meeting with the minister. The documented chronology bears that out.

On January 9 the chronology indicates:

The executive all agree to listen to the minister present his position. They will point out the problems for the council if the conference is postponed again. Then after the meeting they will decide what action to take.

● (1710)

So, they met with the minister on January 9. And what was the result? I think the minutes of that executive meeting speak for themselves, as do the results. I wish to read from the minutes of that meeting on January 9. I read from the unedited, unrevised transcript of the proceedings of the executive committee of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I quoted from it in part yesterday, where the minister strongly suggested to the advisory council members that the conference on women and the Constitution be cancelled because the timing was bad, because the conference was being held at the same time that the charter of rights would be tabled in the House.

Second, he said, it would be an embarrassment to the government. That was at this meeting. And the members decided after these suggestions, this determined effort by the minister, that they would poll the members of the executive committee to find out how they reacted to his suggestion that the conference be postponed. I will read the statements of each of the members. Win Gardner, a member of the executive committee, said:

My reasons for voting for cancelling the conference on women and the Constitution has nothing to do with the fact that the minister is a dear and close personal friend of mine. I am voting for cancelling the conference because we looked like fools the last time and I am not ready to look like one again and put our minister in an embarrassing situation toward his government.

Joanne Linzey stated:

I agree with Win and vote for cancelling the conference.

Florence Ievers stated:

I say that it's about time that we start playing games the same way the government plays games. We should start being nice to them. So if this conference is going to be an embarrassment to them, let's play it their way and cancel it. I vote for cancelling the conference.

Hellie Wilson stated:

I don't wish to embarrass our minister so I vote for cancelling the conference.

Lucie Pépin, at some length, stated:

I thought we are doing what we are told. I think it is about time that we learn how to do things. This is my personal way of thinking. We have a minister. We are supposed to advise him. We try to do things our way. The way we are doing things was not very effective. We have to take into consideration we have made mistakes and we have to make compromise and start to listen.

Further on in her statement she said:

I am voting against having our meeting in February. We must keep our mouths shut, no press releases until we definitely know something.

Those statements are from the minutes of the meeting. They are exact quotes from the people who spoke at the executive committee meeting after they had met with the minister and listened to what he had to say.

Mr. Axworthy: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is asserting that this is a record from which she is reading these alleged comments. It is not as she states, since these statements have been challenged by a legal affidavit which claims false statements and misrepresentations have been introduced into those minutes. I think it would be proper for the hon. member to recognize that her so-called statement of record is not a statement of record but one which is substantially challenged by five of the six members who were at that meeting. They have filed an affidavit to that effect.

Mr. Nielsen: Why did you not produce it when you spoke?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I know that anyone can produce an affidavit. I have not seen it. I could take out an affidavit saying that I jumped off the top of the Peace Tower this morning, but it would not be true. I am not sure just what to attribute to that affidavit.

It is quite true that, if the minister was so interested in the affidavit, and so interested in trying to discredit the document from which I spoke, why did he not address himself to it and produce any affidavit, if he could do so? I know that the minister gave advice. The people who gave in to that advice, who kowtowed to the minister, have now probably taken out an affidavit. They kowtowed once and they will probably do it again. That is what I have been trying to point out—people will give in to pressure.

What is truly disturbing about these events is how easily some of these people were manipulated. They reneged on their commitment to the women of Canada to hold a constitutional conference. That is what happened. Fortunately, there was one who would not renege, one who put principle ahead of political partisanship. That person is Doris Anderson. She assumed her role, her responsibilities, and adhered to principle in the face of pressure. That is what the minister has not addressed.

As I said yesterday, what is at stake here is not individuals, whether it be the president, the minister or the members of the council, but the future of the council itself. At stake is the existence of the council, its right to exist as an independent body, free from political manipulation. The problems we are trying to address in this debate are more far-reaching than this one series of events, devastating as they are. We are not witnessing an isolated incident of ministerial manipulation but, rather, a situation which is endemic to this government's attitude toward the status of women, that is to say, to speak down to it, patronize it, and to take little heed of it. That has been symptomatic of the government throughout. Ministers have tried to put the whole council and, in fact, issues of interest to women, in a subservient role.

I imagine this is the beginning of some kind of plan which the government has which, I think, has probably got a more sinister purpose in the long run. I have no doubt that the minister's goal throughout all of this is to demolish the Advisory Council on the Status of Women completely. His goal is to do away with its independence, first of all, and to challenge its president and force her resignation, and then to let the council drift in limbo until such time as he suddenly emerges with a new role for it, that role to be a kind of mini-department which would, perhaps, be glossed up to say it has its own minister. Then it would come completely under the domination of political partisanship. That is probably what the minister has in mind. That means that any kind of independent body, such as exists today, would certainly disappear.

How different is that from the original intention of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, to have a powerful body speaking and operating independently within public view. I would like to remind the minister of what the Royal Commission on the Status of Women recommended back in 1970. They said:

> We recommend that a Federal Status of Women Council, directly responsible to Parliament, be established to advise on matters pertaining to women and report annually to Parliament on the progress being made in improving the status of women in Canada.

We certainly did not see any sign of that yesterday when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) responded here in the House, comparing the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to advisory councils on trade, health and welfare, immigration, and sports. The Prime Minister, the minister's leader, sees no difference between the way in which government deals with the problems of women in society and the rights of women—their human rights—and the problems caused by trade regulations on manufactured commodities.

In fact the Prime Minister puts the rights of 52 per cent of the population of this country on the same level as building a sports arena. That is what he did here yesterday when he compared advisory councils to trade and sports councils. He put the Advisory Council on the Status of Women in a very secondary and second-class position. But that, of course, is to be expected from a Prime Minister who never once, in the 12 years he has been in office serving in this House, rose in his place to speak on the rights of women, in any debate on this issue.

When the advisory council was first set up the spokesman for my party, who is now the Human Rights Commissioner, warned that these things might happen. He said that, indeed, the government was ignoring what the Royal Commission on the Status of Women had recommended, by appointing instead a committee to advise through a minister. Mr. Fairweather said the government of the day:

> —ignored that good advice and took a different route appointing what is, in reality, a committee that is to report to the minister. The results will enable us to judge who is right.

● (1720)

That is what Mr. Fairweather said back in 1973. Judgment day has come and we are only too painfully aware of how right the royal commission was.

Mr. Fairweather made another statement seven years ago which is now being borne out:

> I hope the ACSW members never let up on their recommendations to the government and that they push this minister until he wonders why he ever made the appointments.

Every minister up until now has been able to survive the push of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women except this minister. He has not been able to take that push, to respond to it or learn from it. Instead, he dealt with it in his own inadequate fashion, which is by changing his position and using that position of power in influencing the council and directing it against the challenger, against the president of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I have no doubt that he expected her to cave in. What must have surprised the minister was that the president of the council stuck to her principles and resigned.

But where does that leave us? I realize that I have only a few minutes left, and I would like to finish by saying that with the advisory council now in a shambles, with its credibility severely eroded, with women across the country condemning the blatant manipulations of the council by the minister, we must try to undo the damage which has been done. It will be difficult to find a successor of the calibre of Doris Anderson. But the government will stand a better chance of recruiting such an appointee if that person can be assured from the outset that the council will be truly independent, that it will not be manipulated, that it will in future be able to report directly to Parliament. Only then will the council's credibility be restored, but the minister's credibility will remain in limbo for much longer.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I rise with mixed feelings this afternoon, feelings of sorrow and anger. I feel that the two hon. members who have raised this issue so eloquently and in such a damaging way to the women of this country have also damaged me to some degree. I have always been an independent thinker. I have worked very closely with a number of women who have served on this particular advisory council and have had a number of conversations with them. I feel that there has been a great deal of damage done to all of those who serve on this committee and, indeed, to all the women in the country.

It is unfortunate that the opposition only become interested in issues affecting Canadian women when they perceive that they may be able to score a few cheap political shots.

Miss Jewett: That is about as cheap as you can get.

Mrs. Erola: These shots are at the expense of Canadian women. We talk about principles. There are always the accusations in the business world and in the world at large that women tend to take their marbles home when nobody wants to play any more. I contend that that is part of the issue which is at stake here.

I feel that the innuendo and gossip which have been injected into this entire debate have been, again, at the expense of a number of very credible women. Let us look at some of the women who make up the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. Who are they and where do they come from? It is interesting to note that there are four teachers, a speech therapist, a linguist, a professor of sociology, a broadcaster, three communications personnel, an accountant, a city councillor, six nurses, a lawyer, a lay minister, community workers, and women with backgrounds in labour and in government. Are these women who are quickly and easily manipulated? Are these the kind of women, women who represent the women of this country, who would be subjected to manipulation and who would not think independently? I suggest that these are women of great achievement in this country and who act very independently.

Yes, there will be resignations. I expect that there will be at least ten resignations.

Miss Jewett: Are you asking for them?

Mrs. Erola: Certainly no one is asking for resignations, but certainly they are not unexpected. I do not think, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has suggested, that there are thousands of women in this country who uphold the allegations which the hon. member has made. I think that there are a great many women in this country who are asking, "What are the facts?"

Mr. Nielsen: They are in the minutes.

Mrs. Erola: The minutes are in doubt because, as the hon. minister has just mentioned, an affidavit has been filed. I personally resent the way in which this whole case has been presented in this House. I feel that the damage has been devastating and that it will be a long time before the true status of the council is regained.

Mr. Nielsen: Let us have the affidavit.

Mrs. Erola: I think the affidavit can be presented. There are some things which must be said in this House on the role of an advisory council. As a minister I, too, have an advisory council and I too feel that I must meet with these people regularly and that exchanges must be as frank and as open as possible. Never at any time has it entered my mind or the minds of any of the members of that council that I would at any time attempt to manipulate their thinking or their positions. I feel that these councils must be available to us? If we wish to listen or to react positively to the people of this country, then we must be in a position to talk with them regularly and openly.

I would like to add that it was not the minister who requested the meeting. It was the council which requested the meeting in December and he complied with the wishes of the council. It was obvious that at that council meeting there was some frank and open discussion which is now being interpreted as manipulation. I feel that there are many, many instances in which I have met with members of my advisory council and our views have differed, and differed very greatly, but at the same time we have all walked away from that council table saying, "That is the way you see it and this is the way I see it".

I suggest that the minister faced exactly the same situation in the December council meeting. He walked away feeling that the views of all had been expressed frankly and openly, and that they were free to take their decisions based on that discussion. It is obvious that these people made some decisions. It is obvious that they, in fact, followed through and that it was a very democratic process. I feel very strongly that these women should be left free to run their organization with as little intervention as possible from this House.

I suggest to members opposite that the intervention which has taken place in this House has put the role of the council in doubt. I feel that these people must be able to contact and report to a minister very quickly and very easily. I feel that the advisory council which comes to my office regularly reacts very quickly and responsibly and tells me when we are doing something wrong. I can tell you that these women have been very quick to point out to this minister, as I and some of my colleagues in the House have, when something has gone awry.

This government, and particularly this minister who has been very sensitive to the needs of the women of this country, have made such progress. But I suggest that it is this progress which has brought on the attack from members opposite. I am very upset by what has happened, and there are women across this country who agree with my position. The general feeling in my conversations with women who are mostly in the business world and in the political world has been that the damage has been devastating, that we are acting "as women usually do", with petty bickering and arguing, which serves us no good. I suggest that we cease and desist immediately and that we get on with the business of seeing that positive and affirmative programs are put in place, programs which we are free to criticize and, if they are good, which we are free to support. It is time the women of this country began to work together. I thought, and I felt deeply, that we were doing just that. I thought that we were making progress with some of the female members opposite, that we had common causes. We must work together to ensure that we reach the goals that we share, but I suggest that has not happened. This very incident which has been brought to this House is going to do a great deal of damage in the long run to many women who have fought hard to bring their cause to the fore and who have done some positive things.

The Advisory Council on the Status of Women was invaluable to this government with its advice before the proposed constitutional resolution of October 6 and during the consequent committee hearings. I can tell you that as a woman one of the proudest moments I had in the past few years was to hear the presentation these women made before the constitutional committee. It was very well done. In fact, it was brilliantly done. There were people across the country who agreed that it was one of the finest presentations made to the committee. It was a very proud moment for me, and I think it was a very proud moment for most women of this country. Furthermore, the government listened. I listened very carefully and made the changes which the council of women felt were necessary.

An hon. Member: What about another meeting?

Mrs. Erola: There was no embarrassment about another meeting. I do not buy that line of "embarrassment" at all. Was it a positive meeting? Was it a meeting that was going to be useful in terms of timing since the proposal would be coming back to this House on the sixth? It was a question of timing. It was not a question of embarrassment. We are very proud of the amendments we accepted, amendments about which the women of this country feel very strongly. I do feel—

An hon. Member: You should feel strongly.

Mrs. Erola: —and should feel strongly about them, I agree. I find it difficult to accept the fact that the council of women was not free to act. The advisory council went into action immediately and made some very profound and good changes to that Constitution. They acted very independently at that time.

When we talk about consultation I might say that during this last couple of months I have had a number of occasions to call upon these women. I asked: Is this the way we feel about it? Tell me what you feel about it. A number of people have been to my office. I feel this relationship is jeopardized to some degree because I feel, as a minister, that I must have freedom to talk to these people and to feel the temper of the women in this country. As ministers we often do not have the opportunity to reach out, to test the waters, so to speak. We must have these advisory councils ready to tell us when we are moving in the right direction and when we are not moving in the right direction. I, for one, very much resent the allegations that have been put forth in this House. I do feel that the cause of women has not been served well by the actions of members opposite.

I suggest to hon. members that they examine what they have done—

Mr. Nielsen: What about your seatmate?

Miss MacDonald: The minister should examine what he has done.

Mrs. Erola: —and that hon. members examine what they think they should be doing in a very positive way.

We are looking to the women of this country for sound advice. We want them to come to these councils to say exactly what they want to say and up until this time I feel they have been able to do it. All of that is now thrown into question and into doubt. I think it has been a very convenient vehicle for some people to mount what I consider to be unethical campaigns.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Speak to the minister.

Mrs. Erola: The time has come for the women of this country to speak up and say there is something wrong when a number of women, a very few, can manipulate the situation to their advantage and in so doing, cause a great deal of damage along the way.

It is time that we had a second look at where the women of this country are going. We should support the Advisory Council on the Status of Women as fully as we can.

Miss MacDonald: And make them independent.

Mrs. Erola: They are independent. They are an independent group answering to a minister.

Miss Jewett: Answering to him?

Mrs. Erola: I will correct that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Erola: I should say talking to a minister.

With regard to the charges of interference on the part of the minister, I am personally satisfied that there was no interference. Indeed, if I may quote directly from the press release of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women for January 13, 1981, the council stated, with respect to the issue at hand, the following:

> Sensing that the time of the planned February conference was no longer opportune, and feeling strongly that the conference ought to be rescheduled, the executive committee of the Advisory Council sought a meeting with Mr. Axworthy to discuss the matter with him. Mr. Axworthy agreed that the issues might get a better airing at a later date but stated that the decision was the council's to make and added "we can live with it either way".

That is a direct quote confirmed by the minister. The press release continues:

> "It was clear, after speaking with the minister", said Win Gardner, Senior vice-president, "that the issues we wanted to discuss at the conference, such as jurisdiction of divorce and social services, would not be on the government's plate at that time and that therefore attention would be greatly diverted from these important issues".

The release added:

> "At no time was cancellation of the conference even considered", said Win Gardner. "The matter of rescheduling is to be brought before the full council meeting next week, and the executive committee will of course abide by its decision".

We now are all aware that the council decided to postpone the conference by a democratic vote of 17 to 10. At no time was there interference from the minister. I am positive that is the way it happened, despite the gossips who said otherwise, who phoned and who phoned back what we have heard in this House.

It might be interesting to look at some of the accomplishments and some of the things that are happening in this country. Win Gardner said something rather important in her statement. She suggested we look at our divorce laws, at child care, at maternity leave, at the real problems facing women of this country. Lord knows we need day care centres. We have not addressed half of the problems that need addressing if we intend to look at the role and at the status of these women. We have dealt with the problem of the charter and we have dealt with it very positively. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women did that very effectively. Now let us go on to deal with some of the very real problems which I feel the women of Canada are demanding. This sort of petty bickering leads us nowhere. We must get on with the job and dispense with the silly issues which are being raised here by members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate on the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean), which reads as follows:

That this House condemns the blatant interference by the minister responsible for the status of women in the plans of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to hold a constitutional conference, demands the resignation of the minister, and urges that the mandate of the advisory council be changed to enable it to report directly to Parliament, as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to quote a few words heard at the world Conference on the UN Mid-decade Conference for Women which took place in Copenhagen on July 15, 1980:

We have to act right now with determination with a view to maintaining our efforts to achieve our objective, namely that 1981 will end the oppression of women at the economic and social level.

Mr. Speaker, those were the words spoken by the employment minister in July 1980 at that conference in Copenhagen.

● (1740)

[English]

Things have changed a lot since the minister uttered those words in Copenhagen. Anyone watching television in Canada today might have seen an interview with two writers, Joanne Kates and Eleanor Wright-Perline over the CTV network. The interviewer asked:

What kind of track record does Lloyd Axworthy have anyway? I mean, Doris Anderson is saying that he is the one that ought to resign. What do you think?

Joanne Kates replied:

He has got a miserable track record with respect to women. As minister responsible for the status of women, he hasn't facilitated or done anything that improves our rights in any way.

Eleanor Wright-Perline admitted that the minister had a lot of good intentions, that a lot of sympathy had been declared over and over again with a lot of "charming smiles". We have seen them from over here. She also stated that he had given explanations, saying things like "you will understand my position" and "these things take time". She went on to say:

—there is no point in having the ear of the government unless you also have the government's active support. Look at the record, look to see how few of the recommendations of advisory councils have been implemented by the governments which appointed them.

Miss Kates went on to say:

—the federal government has stubbornly refused to give funding to those women's groups so that they can do things like get to Ottawa and make presentations to the government.

Those could hardly be seen as positive actions on the part of the minister who made such a profound statement at the world conference in Copenhagen just six months ago. That does not surprise anyone, certainly not those on this side.

The Liberal government in 1977 brought in a bill to make major changes to the unemployment insurance program in this country. It had far-reaching effects on all Canadians, particularly women. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women appeared before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration and told that committee that the government had not consulted the council before drafting and presenting the legislation. What is an advisory council for if it is not permitted to advise?

On the constitution, the government brought in the resolution which still has not been reported back to this House. The plight of women and other women's issues were ignored in the proposals put forward by the government. When the Advisory Council on the Status of Women was finally invited to appear before the constitutional committee, it stated it had not been asked, until the second round of meetings, to have any input into the constitutional proposals.

The members of the advisory council were not the only ones to be ignored; there were other groups such as the handicapped. In fact, many groups appeared before that committee and complained that they had been ignored. What can we expect from a government with a leader who only yesterday responded to female members on this side of the House in one way and to male members in another?

At page 6409 of yesterday's Hansard, when answering the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, "I think the hon. lady opposite—". In replying to the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), the Prime Minister said, "—as regards the preamble which the hon. lady put to her question—".

Mrs. Mitchell: He is a sexist.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. member says he is a sexist. At page 6413, replying to the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant), the Prime Minister said, "—the hon. member refers to a news report of yesterday". Therefore, we have two classes of members acknowledged by the Prime Minister, the head of the government. We have hon. ladies and hon. members. I do not know why the Prime Minister cannot refer to all of us as hon. members.

Miss MacDonald: Hear, hear!

Status of Women

Mr. Clarke: The Prime Minister apparently did not learn anything from his one-time member for Vancouver-Kingsway, whom he referred to as "the hon. lady". She took particular issue with the Prime Minister, saying she had been elected as a member of Parliament without regard to sex; that she was not here as a lady at all but as a Member of Parliament. I am not sure she won her argument, but she did take issue with him. That was at least five years ago and the Prime Minister has not learned anything.

Miss MacDonald: Not on the issue of women. He just doesn't learn.

Mr. Clarke: I also want to refer to the words of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) when speaking to the press today. He is quoted as saying that the only thing he regretted was that there was a "major issue made about a matter I felt should have been resolved by the council without all this publicity".

The obvious question that comes to mind is why is the minister afraid of the publicity if he does not have anything to hide? Was he worried because the council did not just take his suggestion, meekly fold its tents and go away rather than make a fuss as Doris Anderson did? Was the minister worried that his interference with the council would come out? He may have been thinking that if the constitutional committee had reported when it was scheduled to do so, on December 9, the advisory council would not yet have scheduled its meeting and he would not have had the problem. Perhaps that is what he was trying to hide. One cannot be sure with this minister and this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, let us reflect for a moment on the creation of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. In 1973, the then minister of labour, Mr. Munro, made a statement on motions in the House. That seems strange, Mr. Speaker, because nowadays statements on motions are always heard outside and not inside the House. Let us reflect for a moment. The minister said, and I quote:

> The purpose of the council will be twofold: to bring before the government and the public matters of interest and concern to women, and to advise the government on actions that it deems necessary to improve the position of women in society. These terms of reference are purposely very broad in order that the council will have freedom to take whatever action it considers necessary. The council will also have authority to publish its reports, recommendations and statements. In this way the council will be in a position to keep before the public, as well as the government, the whole question of the status of women.

In reply Mr. Gordon Fairweather, then member for Fundy Royal in New Brunswick and spokesman for our party on that subject, said, again I quote:

> The royal commission, after all, recommended in 1970 that the advisory council on the status of women should be established and report to Parliament. The government, unfortunately, ignored that good advice and took a different route by appointing what is, in reality, a committee that is to report to the minister. The results will enable us to judge who is right. Despite what the minister says, in my opinion the terms of reference he enunciated today are much too restrictive.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look back upon the incident which occurred in the House yesterday. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked the right hon. Prime Minister whether there is a policy which prevents the council from reporting to Parliament as do the Auditor General, the Economic Council of Canada and the Commissioner of Official Languages. Mr. Speaker, he could have added a few more organizations, for instance the Library of Parliament, the electoral boundaries commissions for the decennial report, the internal economy commission, contested elections, the Economic Council of Canada, the Queen Elizabeth II Research Fund and the annual report of the Council on Official Languages. All those reports are tabled in the House, Mr. Speaker.

But what did the Prime Minister say? He replied, and I quote:

> There are many different councils which advise the minister directly, such as advisory councils in trade, health and welfare, immigration and sports. They advise the minister so he can keep their advice in mind when introducing legislation.

I emphasize this:

> —so he can keep their advice in mind when introducing legislation.

As I said, in 1977 the advisory council stated before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration that the government had not consulted them about the unemployment insurance bill, a very important measure for women.

● (1750)

[English]

In the few minutes remaining perhaps I could add some positive notes to the debate. The government opposite often complains that we complain too much and do not give them the real answers. We showed them what the real answers were on many subjects.

The Prime Minister was being particularly, if not unparliamentary then certainly impolite in talking about the "might have been" policies of this side.

Le me run over a few of the things that were done by this side in the short time we were in government. Let me start out with a reference to what the Minister of Employment and Immigration said. He said we had done nothing in our time in government. The records show that 24,000 women were placed in jobs in the time we were in government, compared with the 10,000 this minister has put into jobs in a similar period.

During the first six months of the government of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition the profile on the status of women was greatly enhanced because of the very strong personal commitment of the then prime minister, the minister responsible for the status of women and several other ministers, most notably the minister of employment and immigration.

Increased resources were allocated to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. In fact, the budget was increased by 89 per cent over the budget provided by the Liberal government in the previous fiscal period. That budget went from $740,000 to $1,400,000, and $401,000 was added for the "statut de la femme Canada" that organization in the bureaucracy. It is interesting to note that while the government opposite gave $740,000 to the advisory council, the government of Quebec gave its women's council, le Conseil de la Femme, $1.8 million, well over twice the amount.

The legislative reality of our government's six months in power is Bill C-6, which extended the spouse's allowance beyond the death of the elder spouse; the proposed sexual offences legislation was going through cabinet committee and was ready for drafting; some of the Outreach funding which had been cut off by the former government was restored and that program was under review when our government fell; amendments to the Income tax Act to recognize women's contributions in unincorporated businesses and farms had been proposed and only because of our defeat, was stopped; an employment strategy was ready for cabinet, and the list goes on and on. I see that time will not permit me to go on with them but I have four pages of accomplishments here.

Perhaps I could just finish with one sentence. In addition to the motion which suggests that the minister should resign, with which I agree, perhaps I could conclude by recommending, among other changes, that the advisory council be given new terms of reference which would enable it to report directly to Parliament on its own initiative, that is, from time to time whenever it felt necessary, and also that new members of the council be vetted by the council itself and that present council members be given the right to veto appointments of members. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately time is limited. I am distressed today that I have to stand up in the House under these particular circumstances. I am outraged as a Member of Parliament and as a Canadian woman at what is happening today, at the way the women of Canada are being manipulated for crass political purposes and not for the benefit of the women of Canada. This is so that the opposition parties can take cheap political cracks at the minister responsible. This in no way helps the women of Canada. I want to put on record as a woman of Canada that in no way do Canadian women approve of being used for cheap political purposes.

The whole point of the argument is that women do not allow themselves to be demeaned by what is happening in the House today. Those women of Canada who preach democracy will live by democracy. The implication of the debate in the House today is that those women who preach democracy cannot bear to abide by its rules and cannot exercise their freedom of speech. By the way, freedom of speech is given to a minister of the Crown just as it is to any other Canadian. He must be given the freedom to voice his views. With democracy, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) should remember, comes the responsibility to accept the will of the majority. In this case a vote was taken and a majority of that council decided to postpone the meeting. What happened? A few people took up their buckets and spades, refused to play the game and ran home. I admire Doris Anderson. I would have admired her a heck of a lot more if she had stood by her guns and had seen the fight through. What she did was provide another excuse for a very facetious and stupid debate in this House today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but, it being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at six o'clock the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence and hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) was in full flight.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Did the hon. member who was speaking call it six o'clock?

Mr. Cousineau: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I called it six o'clock. It was in fact about thirty seconds after six. Accordingly, I interrupted the hon. member pursuant to the Standing Orders. Someone later asked me whether that might indicate that the hon. member had been deprived of her ability to continue at eight o'clock, and I know of no reason why she should be.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I hope the foregoing interruption does not mean that the Tory members, who have brought forward this motion in order to protect the rights of women, are really trying to stop this woman from speaking.

When we stopped for our dinner break I was talking about quitters and about my anger with respect to quitters. I was talking also about my sadness at the fact that these same quitters did not have the sense to realize that, far from making them heroic defenders of women's rights, their actions reduced them to mere pawns in this political process and this game of embarrass-thy-neighbour, particularly if the neighbour happens to be a minister of the Crown. That is in fact what happened. The whole purpose of today's debate is not to promote the status of women in Canada; it is to try to embarrass the minister responsible for the status of women. Why should we embarrass him? He was elected by the people of Canada. His party was elected by the people of Canada to govern the country. My Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in whose judgment I have perfect faith, appointed that man to look after the status of women. What has he done since that time?

Has he made self-righteous, patronizing speeches? Has he patted women on the back and used them as pawns in this House of Commons? No, he has not; he has worked for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: Far be it from me to enter into the empty rhetoric which has assailed my ears today. I want to prove how this minister has worked for the status of women.

This is a time when we are cutting back. The Tories are the first to tell us about the desperate financial state we are in and about our dreadful deficit. Hon. members opposite should not deny this. They tell us. What does the minister responsible for the status of women do at this time of financial restraint? He increases from $700,000 to $1.2 million the amount spent on women's programs to promote the status of women. That is an increase of 70 per cent in, I repeat, a time of cutbacks. The minister supports the Canadian national association of sexual assault centres and its annual conference to discuss sexual assault legislation. The list is long. I could go on, but I want to stop on that point.

Mr. Nielsen: Please do.

Mrs. Appolloni: This minister has not only shown interest in the status of women in Canada but, by his own initiative and forcefulness, he has also pinpointed one of the main problems of women, and if you guys are sincerely interested in what the women of Canada are facing, perhaps you could do me the courtesy of listening.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mrs. Appolloni: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) said that women are offended because people call them ladies.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are not a bunch of guys. We are hon. members too.

Mrs. Appolloni: The hon. member's remarks lead me to my next point. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra was incensed at the insensitivity of the minister responsible for the status of women and at what he had done to women. What has he done for women? He "allowed" the Prime Minister of Canada to call the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands "the hon. lady". Is she incensed? Frankly, I would be thrilled if the Prime Minister of Canada called me a lady because, despite my anger at this moment, that is one thing I want to be. I want to be a lady.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Bully for you.

Mrs. Appolloni: However, that is not the point. My Prime Minister, who recognizes qualities we sometimes wonder about—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Appolloni: He recognizes qualities, and he is accused of being a sexist because he calls a female member a lady. After a tiny bit of research I found that on the same day, recorded on the same page of Hansard quoted from by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, the same Prime Minister of Canada called the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) "the hon. gentleman".

● (2010)

Oh my, the Leader of the NDP is called a gentleman. I do not hear the NDP standing up screaming "sexist". I do not hear anybody screaming "sexist". My Prime Minister—and I call him mine because, by Jove, I also elected him and I am proud of him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You can have him.

Mrs. Appolloni: My Prime Minister, with his discerning qualities, called the hon. member for Oshawa a gentleman. Frankly, I might not agree with the leader of the NDP, but I have to agree that he is a gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: Do I hear objections? The point I am sincerely trying to make is that women in Canada and women all over the world do have problems—of course we do, and men have problems too—but we are not asking to be treated so specially that when people disagree with us, we pick up our buckets and spades and run away because we do not want to play the game any longer.

We want to be listened to, we want to have our views considered, but if we lose the argument, by Jove, we do not go running off, or we should not go running off, and giving up everything. That is not what this life is about. As members of Parliament in particular, we know darn well we are going to lose arguments. We lose arguments daily with the opposition, and even sometimes with our own party. So what do we do? Do we resign? In this case, the vote was 10 to 7. So what happened to them? The ten who were defeated resigned. If it were a case of losing votes and resigning, then I think the Tories should have resigned long ago because they have lost votes, and they will continue to lose votes long into the future. Are they going to resign every time there is a vote?

In essence, that is what we are talking about. We are talking about freedom of expression, and that freedom of expression has to extend to a cabinet minister. I hear the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands saying something that I cannot catch, but I think I have the drift of it. She too was a cabinet minister. I am sure that she too in her job—which she did very responsibly, I think—had to listen to advisory councils of various kinds. Is it because she was afraid to reject their counsel that she and her leader made such asinine mistakes as when they tried to shift the embassy to Jerusalem? Is that the kind of government we have, a government which has to accept all the advice it gets from advisory councils? What are we making of advisory councils? What are we doing by this debate today? What we are doing is fettering them. They will no longer want to speak to a minister in case what they tell him comes to the floor of the House, which is exactly what happens. On the other hand, we are fettering the minister who could be terrified of speaking to any advisory council, again in case it comes to the floor of the House. Will all this increase the status of the advisory council? Nonsense. The debate today has turned that advisory council, which could have been, and has been in the past, a very fine instrument, into a pitiful bunch of disappointed women. That is what has been achieved by the debate today. This debate has not helped by one iota the women of Canada, and at that I am incensed, I am angered and I am tremendously saddened. The women of Canada do need help, perhaps not the ones who complain because they are not a Mrs; they are probably a Miss, but they do not want to be known as such so they call themselves Ms. I will defend their right to call themselves whatever they like, even if they object to being called ladies. But, Mr. Speaker, they do not have the right to speak for the millions of other Canadian women who feel, as I do, that there are genuine problems which can be addressed and catered for by this particular minister who, as well as being in charge of the status of women is in charge of employment and immigration.

I will tell you about some of the problems I am talking about. I am talking in particular about the problems of the unwed mother.

An hon. Member: Oh, now we get it.

Mrs. Appolloni: Now you are getting it! The opposition whip will now get it. He will get an earful because I know what I am talking about, and this is not empty rhetoric. At least half the Advisory Council on the Status of Women will have a very simple and quick solution to the problem of these women, which is to get them abortions. I have been through that. I do not think they should have abortions. I think they have the right to have their children. But I do think it is society's responsibility to help a woman not only to bring a new Canadian citizen into the world but to make sure that he or she is treated equally to any other baby, wanted or unwanted, in Canada.

And now I come to the minister in charge of the status of women who is also in charge of employment and immigration. Because of the kinds of things that women like me speak to him about, the kinds of problems he works on are such things as training programs for these women. I wonder if any members in the opposition who have entered into the debate today have gone to places like the ones I have gone to in Toronto?

An hon. Member: They would not let me in.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, the temptation is great, but I shall refrain from personal comments. As I was saying, these training schools in Toronto are funded by the minister's department. In them they teach the girls skills which, in ordinary circumstances, would be marketable skills. But the minute they leave that course after graduating, the minute they have learned that skill which is necessary for them and for their children so that they can earn their daily bread, what happens? They have problems with child care. There are no day care centres, and they have problems if, God forbid, the child becomes sick. Who pays for the medicine then? Ordinarily, the Department of National Health and Welfare would, but because these women have been on the training course, they are on welfare. They should be able to earn their own money. What do they earn? They earn the bare minimum. I defy any member of the House to tell me how a woman can raise a child today on the minimum wage. I say this, leaving partisan politics aside. I say that it cannot be done. So what happens? They are cut off from welfare because they have been on our training program. But there is a hiatus between the time they are on the training program and the time they start earning just enough to keep themselves and their children. They have lost welfare payments and they are encouraged to go back to work, not for a few weeks but forever.

These are the kinds of programs we have to address, the problems about which the minister has already spoken. There is the problem of sexual assault. What does sexual assault mean, apart from the rhetoric? I will tell you what it means. It means the violation of a woman's body, the most horrendous crime on our books. It means putting out your hand to that woman and helping her to retrieve her own self-respect and get rid of her tremendous fear of anyone who is male, be it her husband, her brother or her father, whom she has known for years. As sensitive as many male members may be to this subject, I honestly do not believe they understand the real meaning of this kind of crime. But I believe our minister understands this. By himself he will not be able to eradicate these horrors with which women are faced today in increasing numbers, nor will this cabinet nor future governments be able to do so because there will first have to be a tremendous change in the attitude of society. These changes will not come so long as the Canadian public just sits back and watches the debates, which they can do now because of television. What is the Canadian public worried about today? It is worried about the future of fuel supplies and about the cost of fuel. The Canadian public is worried about the children and whether they will find jobs in the future. The Canadian public wonders whether there will be a united Canada in ten years' time. On the international scene we know that entire populations are dying, not because of what a minister said to some female who resigned, but for lack of food. The Canadian public also knows that people in other countries of the world are imprisoned for exactly what the minister did; they expressed their views and they were imprisoned. The minister expressed his view and he is in a pillory today in the House of Commons.

• (2020)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: I hear the defenders of women's rights applauding the act that he is in a pillory. What are they doing for women's rights? They put up speakers to say that the Prime Minister is chauvinistic because he calls a female a lady; I believe the lady should be thankful she was called such.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the comments of the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni). I have often listened to her observations with great respect, but this evening I listened quietly in an attempt to understand the drift of her message. I know the member is a true and faithful supporter of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the party he represents. One can always tell when the government is in a difficult position—the decibel level rises very substantially in defence of an indefensible position.

Miss Bégin: That is sexism.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A lot of people in televisionland will not appreciate that I have the great fortune of sitting directly across from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). This is one of the great joys of my life; I am able to watch her in action. I observed her rise in the House today on a specious question of privilege. I appreciate the fact that she very often says things without thinking before she speaks, so I accept the last interjection on the same basis.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I think I have struck a sensitive chord.

Miss Bégin: I should like to point out that what the hon. member just said is an attack on the privileges of all women of the House. In the last months sexism has arisen more in the conversations in this place than when I first became a member of the House.

When I spoke this afternoon some male members opposite made vulgar references to the fact that some people have problems in certain months. Tonight the member started his speech by referring to the woman who spoke a few moments before him and by talking about decibel levels. Nature did not make all vocal chords exactly the same—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Miss Bégin: —and I think that type of innuendo is sexist.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, will I be allowed an opportunity to speak on that point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) on the point of order raised by the hon. minister, but I do not think it is reasonable to suggest, with the state of the argument at this point, that the Chair can find a case of privilege in the remarks raised. I say this because it is important for the Chair to distinguish between debate which may not be acceptable to some members in some parts of the House at some times, and the actual matter of privilege. I think the hon. minister may or may not—and I make no judgment on it at all—have a point of debate, but I do not see that I can find a question of privilege. Before a final ruling in that regard, I will listen to the hon. member for Saskatoon West.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think I understand the drift of what Your Honour will finally adjudicate on this matter. I fully subscribe to the point of view that there is absolutely no point of order. In case there is any doubt that my remarks were directed toward the hon. member for York South-Weston—and I think the blues will underline this—let me point out that I did not discriminate with respect to any member on the government benches. They all speak in high decibels because their position is very weak. I say that without regard to sex, origin or location. I did not in any way suggest that it was the hon. member for York South-Weston, for whom I have the greatest respect. All members of the House are equal regardless of their sex, which is a point the hon. minister does not understand. She does a disservice to her position when she suggests that such is not the case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be somewhat concerned when I direct my remarks to a male member of the House of Commons. Hopefully she will not rise every two minutes on points of order suggesting that I am attacking the males in the House.

I should like to talk about the minister concerned, because I think he is the basis of this entire motion. We as opposition members have the right to question and look at the actions of ministers of the Crown.

During the course of this debate we will be looking at the actions of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who is responsible for reporting to the House on behalf of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. Since the minister's appointment to his portfolio, he has reminded me of a character in Al Capp's L'il Abner. This minister is the Joe Btfsplk of the current cabinet. Wherever he goes, whatever he does, there seems to be a storm cloud crashing around his head and lightning striking everything that comes within proximity of him. The minister has the propensity to get himself and the government into absolutely unnecessary difficulty. I make my remarks today as an opposition member because I want to be constructive and help the minister. He is one of the few elected ministers from western Canada so I have a very deep interest in his welfare. I know the minister fully appreciates that we have an interest in things indigenous to western Canada. Liberal cabinet ministers and dinosaurs are rare objects of antiquity which must be protected. In particular members from western Canada must attempt to advise and help the minister in the pursuit of his responsibilities. The minister has become a spokesman on virtually every western Canadian topic which has crossed a cabinet desk.

I was interested in an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper which has had a long tradition of supporting the Liberal Party of Canada. The editorial made reference to the minister's propensity for getting into difficulty. I bring this up not for the purpose of embarrassing the minister—the Lord knows he does enough to embarrass himself—but I should like to read the conclusion of this particular editorial:

> In many ways, Manitobans are fortunate that their sole representative in the federal cabinet is an active and ambitious man. There is reason for concern, however, that if Mr. Axworthy keeps puffing himself up at his present rate, one day he will simply burst.

This is the minister's home town paper, a paper of long-standing Liberal persuasion. I am concerned about the minister, so I am trying to explain the error of his ways and to put him on the right track. Hopefully, after this debate he will stand in his place and do the right thing. I will tell him what he should do. What we have today is a situation where the minister is attempting somehow to answer this very precise and specific accusation. I think it is fair to say that it is, in a sense, an accusation that he has manipulated the Advisory Council on the Status of Women contrary to the best interests of that body and of women in Canada today. As the minister responsible for that council he has taken an unprecedented step by this manipulation.

In his defence he does not deal with the particular topic. No, he has decided he will take another tack. He will rise in his place and recite for this House his many accomplishments in this government with respect to women's rights and women's issues in Canada.

• (2030)

When the question period started yesterday, or possibly the day before yesterday, the minister must have been thinking that maybe there would be a few questions asked of himself and the Prime Minister with respect to this issue. So, before question period, down the steps trundled the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the minister responsible to the Prime Minister for the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. He handed the Prime Minister an envelope which contained a list. The list, if we can believe, Mr. Speaker, was the list the Prime Minister tried to read into the record yesterday of all the great accomplishments of this minister. It was a self-serving document which was presented to the Prime Minister to defend the minister. The Prime Minister read it. Of course, it broke the place up. The place went into chaos. There was thigh-slapping and laughing and the Prime Minister was not able to finish reading it. I am sure if he wants to present us with copies we are prepared to have a look at it. But that is not what is at issue here.

I do not doubt the sincerity and the ambition of the minister. He wants to get ahead in Liberal circles. He wants to do a job which will lead to him being perceived as a Liberal leadership candidate. We want to ensure that he moves on and succeeds, since we think there is political advantage in it for us.

I want to say to the minister that the issue here is purely and simply: What has he done to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women? What has he done to the position of women across Canada through the action he has taken? I think these actions were taken foolishly and without serious consideration being given to the implications of women's interests in our country. The speakers on the government side have stood in their places and complained because we are now in this debate. Somehow we in the opposition are to be held responsible for this whole mess. What an amazing proposition that is, Mr. Speaker.

I was not aware of the fact that the president of the advisory council was a paid-up member of the Liberal Party. I was not aware that she had been a candidate for the Liberal Party in the federal election. It certainly could not be said that the president was a person who was a political partisan in opposition to the government. This woman has said in public pronouncements that there was political interference with the operation of the advisory council. This is according to the record we now have, the minutes of the meeting of the advisory council.

They can flim-flam all they want about this issue. The advisory council was intended to be independent. The royal commission recommended that it report directly to Parliament, as opposed to a minister, but in its wisdom the government decided it should report to a minister. The underlying principle was that it would be independent.

The minister has broken the trust that he had with the women of Canada by interfering with a decision to hold a conference on the constitution of our country. The minister tries to answer the criticism by saying, "Well, of course, it really is a matter of timing, since now it would not serve any useful purpose for the advisory council to have a national conference on the constitution. Really, these issues are not on the plate of the government now. The issues have all been decided and the constitutional committee will now deal with these matters."

The fact of the matter is that while the advisory council made an admirable submission to the constitutional committee this conference would have been an opportunity for the council to have the benefit of a wide-ranging point of view from a number of women and women's organizations. And what is wrong with that? What is wrong with giving that kind of opportunity to the council, even though, as a result of the arbitrary time limit imposed by the government, it was obliged to make its submission before having had the chance to hear from the women of Canada?

The chronology will indicate that the planning went ahead as early as June of last year, with the minister's concurrence. The minister was to host a reception in September of 1980 when he would speak to the conference. Elaborate plans were made to hold this convention but it apparently had to be called off because of the translators' strike. Ostensibly, that is the reason why the meeting did not go ahead in September. That premise has been challenged by many women who were involved. They said there was an understanding with the translators that the conference would not be picketed. But be that as it may, it was decided to postpone the conference until February of this year. That was all done in the knowledge of the minister at the time.

Arrangements went ahead to hold the conference and Sheila Zimmerman was hired to organize it. Lucie Pépin undertook to phone the Quebec speakers. The members of the advisory council were all set to hold this conference. The minister says he was then consulted about what his view was with respect to the conference. Mr. Speaker, I challenge the minister's version of the circumstances which took place. I now have information that prior to the time the minister says he was first apprised of these circumstances, namely, on January 5, 1981, a memorandum was sent to Doris Anderson from Hellie Wilson. It said, "Talked to Nancy Connolly—". Before I read the memo I must explain who Nancy Connolly is. She is the minister's assistant who speaks on his behalf. The memo reads:

Talked to Nancy Connolly yesterday. Minister wants regional conferences instead of national conference. Phoned Win.

I will deal with Win in a moment.

She thinks executive should discuss.

This memorandum indicates the minister's office initiated the discussion with respect to this matter prior to any discussion or any request for a discussion with the minister. If I am mistaken—and I do not believe I am—then the minister should bring forward facts to show I am wrong. He says he has an affidavit as to what happened at the meeting of the executive. He says there are these phantom documents which are somewhere in the possession of some unnamed lawyer. His defence relies on that premise.

Yesterday, in question period, I suggested to the minister that the honourable thing to do would be to stand in his place and suggest the whole matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Then the affidavit could be produced. Evidence under oath could be given, as was done the last time that committee met. At that time we were able to get to the bottom of the issues, something which we will not be able to do here.

The fact of the matter is the minister has nothing but weak defences. He attempts to suggest that somehow these are affidavits which he is not prepared to disclose to this House. He is not prepared to table them. He is not prepared to give evidence under oath. There is only one conclusion that can be drawn when it comes to the question of who is telling the truth. That is that Doris Anderson's version is the correct one. The minister's version is incorrect.

This matter is causing serious concern to many women's organizations in Canada. The question of the credibility of the advisory council is of great concern to members on this side of the House. We want to see the minister produce the affidavit he talks about. We want him to bring it into the House.

● (2040)

Does the minister have the courage to table the affidavit in the House, or will this phantom affidavit be kept in his possession and in secret, undisclosed to anyone? When will the minister gain the courage to table this document in the House and to come before a committee of this House so that witnesses may be called and so that we may get to the bottom of what has exactly transpired. A very crucial issue is involved.

I have been informed that the secretary who took the minutes of this meeting of the executive which is the source of the dispute has been prohibited from speaking to anyone with respect to the taking of those minutes. She has been rendered incommunicado by the council members who remain. The council is disintegrating. Women's issues are suffering because of the serious damage done to the credibility of the council by the actions of this minister.

Miss MacDonald: It is intimidation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: My colleague is quite right when she says that it is intimidation. The whole affair amounts to a scandalous interference into the affairs of an advisory council which represents women's interests in Canada. Why does the government not take the very reasonable suggestion put forward by our party, which is the basis of the recommendations of the royal commission chaired by Senator Florence Bird, who was appointed by the Prime Minister, try to restore some credibility to this group and have the council report directly to Parliament?

Why does the government not take the suggestions of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) and have a wide consultation with women's groups across this country to ensure that it cannot be said that an appointment is political or that appointments are made on the basis of political persuasion. Of what is the government and the minister afraid? Why do we have this situation where the minister, the Joe Btfsplk of this cabinet, is responsible for women's affairs in the course of cabinet deliberations? Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that you did not take out of my time the spurious and specious points of order raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In conclusion, I would like to help the minister do a good job. Unfortunately, we face a majority Liberal government which has been known in the past for its arrogance and for moving ahead without sensitivity. If the minister persists with his present attitude, with attacking the president, as he did on the CBC program at six o'clock this evening, and with his single-minded determination to wheel control over this advisory council, then he has only seen the beginning of a fight. We in the opposition will stand for the interests of women in Canada and we will fight hard for their interests.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you for flattering me when you called me Madam MacInnis this afternoon. It would be very appropriate tonight if Grace MacInnis, a champion of women and disadvantaged people, were here tonight. I know that she would speak eloquently on the subject and probably raise the quality of the debate somewhat. I would like to commend Doris Anderson, the past president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and the staff and members of the council for their work. All of us should recognize that this group has made a considerable contribution, particularly in the areas of research and constitutional reform.

However, as many hon. members have already said, the reality is that the advisory council is a politically appointed council. It is primarily responsible to the government and the minister responsible for the status of women. Therefore, it is very difficult, no matter how well meaning its intentions, for the council to remain independent of the government. It is also difficult for this council to become anything more than a research, fact-finding group or to become involved in issues in a more active and militant way, which is what is needed if the situation for women is to change in Canada.

We know that most of the members of this group were appointed by the government through the minister and are Liberal Party members. This does not mean that they have not worked hard. The members of the council are largely a well-educated group of women who come from middle-class backgrounds. Undoubtedly they have worked hard and have produced valuable reports. In no way will I criticize the members of that council tonight.

However, I will criticize the structure and nature of this organization, which is quite impotent to act on behalf of the women of Canada and to press actively and militantly for much needed government reform. For example, there are certain groups which are noticeably absent from the council. The council is not representative of native women, although in fairness, it has spoken out on native issues. It is not representative of immigrant women who are doubly discriminated against in society today. The council is not representative of housewives, or women on low incomes, including single parents struggling on welfare. Representatives of the minority groups should be on a national advisory council and actively involved in trying to change their situation. My colleague indicated that women trade unionists are not actively represented on the council, with the exception of one Liberal appointee. Yet, a main goal of the council, and a major concern of the minister, is improvement in the situation of women in the work force.

Thousands of lonely, isolated older women, who represent the poorest group in our society, also are not represented on the council. This group has many concerns, and there is much need for assistance.

I shall not review the minister's interference in the affairs of the council because this allegation has been mentioned repeatedly and is well documented. The "haves" and the "have-nots" in society must join forces through a national women's organization, if women wish to bring about the changes which are needed. That is why our party has moved an amendment which would lead to the reorganization or restructuring of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

We believe that such a council should be composed of delegates appointed or elected from women's organizations and trade unions in order to represent the interests of women across Canada. This newly-organized group should be accountable to women rather than to the government. It would work with the government as an agent for change.

Any effective national women's organization should have an advocacy function as well as a research function. There will be times when militant action will be justified. For example, many of us were on the picket lines when the workers of Bell Canada struck last year. Most of those workers were grossly underpaid women. But where were the representatives of the advisory council? Perhaps they were there, but I rather doubt it.

I would mention the women in the steel industry in Hamilton. These women are pressing very hard to have jobs opened up to women. The minister has said that he favours women in non-traditional jobs, yet I do not believe that he or the advisory council was involved in supporting those women's movements. The advisory council has, as I have said, spoken out for Indian women's rights, and particularly in the case of Sandra Lovelace.

I am not aware that the council has taken militant action on behalf of immigrant women but I will come back to that in a minute.

It is important that the advisory council distribute information to women's groups across Canada and provide sound research, and this has been done. But there must also be a direct link with local women's groups. Action must be taken and documentation must be prepared regarding the problems which face women today. If Parliament believes that women's rights must be given higher priority, and I believe speeches made since I have been in the House indicate this is what all parties endorse, we must now act to make up for past discrimination.

If a new, more representative, council were to be formed, independent of government, I would certainly hope that Parliament and the government in power would continue to finance such a group. We must expect there will be criticism of the government if reform is the goal of a future women's organization. Doris Anderson and the advisory council have been critical in a constructive way until recently when, of course, they were deprived of this right.

I want to refer to some of the women's groups which I believe are outside the power circles in Canada. These need the help of an active and well-organized women's movement with a representative national council to speak on their behalf.

First, let us look at women in the labour force and trade unions. The Canadian advisory council last year published an excellent book called "Women and Unions". The progressive steps which have been made in recent years for more involvement of women in trade unions has been well documented. But research is not enough. If more women trade unionists were involved in an advisory council they would be pressing the government to encourage participation of women in the trade union movement and to recognize the efforts being made by bank workers, Bell workers, steel workers and the many other unions working primarily on behalf of women workers. It is not enough to say we want to see more non-traditional job opportunities for women. Women are starting at a different level than men. Their educational background is different. They must have decentralized apprenticeship programs to be able to get into non-traditional jobs.

A second and important group is homemakers, the women who work long hours, in the home, have few holidays, no benefits, and no pay. They are probably the hardest-working group in Canada. It does not matter from which economic group they come, "housewives" lack confidence and feel they are useless. If they are asked in a survey what they do, they say, "I don't work. I am just a housewife." This is a deplorable situation this kind of negative stereotyping which society imposes on women who work in the home. These people do a very important job of raising children and managing homes.

I hope we will bring in day care so that women who want to, can go out to work. We also need pension coverage and some form of pay for parents so that some may choose to remain at home and rear their children.

I would now like to refer the minister and hon. members of the House to an interesting task force on older women conducted by a women's rights committee. This was associated with the NDP in British Columbia and it travelled to the remote areas of the province. It involves local women in a non-partisan way. They were able to speak about their concerns and their desperate conditions. They organized ongoing women's groups in their own communities. This kind of task force should be a function of a national advisory council to reach out to older women from remote communities across Canada. Action must be taken to raise the incomes of older women who are the most poverty-stricken of any group in Canada. Decent housing, adequate pensions and accessible transportation systems must be provided for them.

I talked today with some of the representatives from the Indian Rights for Indian Women movement. They said they felt the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women has been great on research but short on action. The council did not make native women's issues a priority. It was too removed from local groups and issues. In fairness to the council, it cannot be all things to all people. But obviously this indicates there must be more involvement of women in local communities. Native women in particular must be represented if a national women's organization is to be effective.

Next I will speak about immigrant women. Many hon. members probably know, but if they do not know, they should, that immigrant women face double discrimination. They face discrimination as women and discrimination as immigrants. The Immigration Act discriminates against women and should be changed. Settlement services are very limited and unsuited to women's needs. I would be glad to go into this at some time with the minister. Immigrant women who are imported as domestics have no protection and should be able to become landed immigrants after they have put in a certain amount of time in Canada.

Finally I want to mention an important women's issue which has not been dealt with fairly in this House of Commons and which requires action from a national women's organization. We must work for repeal of section 251 of the Criminal Code to allow women who decide to have an abortion to do so legally and safely. I am not saying that we advocate abortion, but women must have a choice. Therefore, abortion must be taken out of the Criminal Code. This is a highly-charged emotional issue. It has been debated twice in this House through private members' bills since I have been a member. However, I am very disappointed that members from other parties, particularly from the Liberal party, who brought in legislation supposedly in support of women, did not speak in favour of even retaining the present provisions for women to have therapeutic abortions. The members who spoke advocating a cutback and a restriction of the present policy, were all men. Reform of abortion law is an issue on which many Canadian women feel strongly. A movement for repeal should have a national voice through a democratically elected and representative national women's council. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I will leave it at that for now.

We in the NDP believe that there is an important role for a reformed Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women or a representative women's organization at the national level which perhaps should be given a new name. We believe it should not be a government appointed body. It should be a group which is truly representative of Canadian women in all walks of life. Therefore we have recommended in our amendment that the membership of a renewed council should be appointed or elected by and from organizations in this country, organizations which are actively involved in women's issues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate with a feeling of sadness that something as important as 51 per cent of our population has been poorly represented by their elected officials in government, which is what prompted the presentation of this motion by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean).

I have listened to this debate today. I have heard different sections of society mentioned. I have heard about women in the labour force, and the underprivileged, who are denied their rights, as we all know. But I would like to address my remarks to a segment of our population that has not been defended to this point in time. I refer to the women in rural Canada, not just the farm wives but the farmers; women who run independent farms, women who farm with their husbands or their sons and, in some instances, with the assistance of their daughters. The National Council on Rural Development did a study on rural women. They discovered that the average farm wife works 29 hours a week in the field, in the barns, doing bookkeeping or carrying out some other function in a very productive part of our country, that of food production. We have a growing number of farm men who are holding full-time or part-time jobs off the farm. When they leave the farm, the balance of the burden of producing food falls to their wives or daughters.

● (2100)

There are still very many farm women who wish to be independent and be recognized as full partners in a farming operation. In 1978, the then spokesman for our party, the Hon. David MacDonald, brought to the attention of this House a letter, which his colleague from Medicine Hat had received from one of his constituents, which I wish to read:

> I work on the farm full-time (this often means 12 or more hours per day) during calving, seeding, summer fallowing and harvesting as well as doing all the bookkeeping and helping whenever necessary during other times. You will find that this is also the case with most of the women in this area, as it is no doubt in every farming community throughout Canada—
> My husband has threatened to divorce me, and then hire me as a farm worker and so claim wages for me as an expense for income tax purposes. I am only joking, but I do think that the fact that this could be a solution, points out the foolishness of the present tax law. Just as silly is the fact that I could do the same work I do on our farm for a neighbour and get paid for it and my husband could hire a neighbour's wife to do the work I am doing here, pay her and deduct her wages as an expense.
> It also hurts to know that women who work at their own job can file their own income tax. I have a teacher's certificate, but when I got married I decided to give up teaching to raise a family and help out on the farm. I feel this has been a good decision as far as the family is concerned and has meant a rewarding way of life to me—

The Hon. David MacDonald had this to say:

> In the face of that reasonable proposition, could not the minister urge his colleague the Minister of Finance to include a provision of the kind suggested in a budgetary announcement? If this debate today does nothing else, I hope it will wake up the minister and the government who seem to be immobilized at the present time in the face of a pressing national issue.

I wish to speak on something which everyone in my part of the country knows and of which most rural communities are aware. Included in the Crosbie budget was a provision for spouses to be paid in unincorporated businesses. The majority of farms in Canada are unincorporated. That was not a new proposal. I have heard members of the government, including the minister responsible for the status of women, say in this House that it would present a great tax relief if women, both farm women and women in small businesses, could be paid as full partners.

Even though this was brought in as part of our budget, we are still waiting for the legislation. We have not yet seen it. As we are approaching income tax time, I daily receive correspondence from my constituents asking what they should do. They point out that they have been paying their wives on the farm a salary since February 18 and so far, they do not know what is going to be done.

I wish to refer to something else that is very important in the farm community, the use of credit. As we know, credit is very important and not just to the man on the farm. It is very important to the woman who is a full partner, or one who is trying to enter the farming enterprise on her own.

The Farm Credit Corporation, a federal organization, despite all the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) when he met with rural women in Ottawa to the effect that he would rectify this wrong, still discriminates against farm women. In fact, when most farm women apply to the Farm Credit Corporation, they do not even get to fill out the application form. The first question is, "What credit rating do you have?" With the present banking system, which is under federal jurisdiction, in most cases women are denied a credit rating of their own.

Women should be able to apply for a farm credit partnership loan. The policy of the Farm Credit Corporation entitles individuals to apply for a loan up to a maximum of $200,000 and partnerships up to a maximum of $400,000. This federal organization, which is under the control of this government that is supposedly so proud of what it has done for the women of Canada, says that if a husband and wife are full partners, it will only lend up to $200,000, not $400,000 as would be the case if the two partners were men.

The Minister of Agriculture had some very encouraging words about how farm women in Canada can assist in taking their rightful place in this country. The minister, whom some of us recognize as tired, becomes very condescending. This is what he said to the rural women of Canada:

> Farm women can help by opening up new lines of communication with urban consumers. Tell them that Canadian food products are of higher quality and nutritional value than almost anything we can import. Tell them why it is better to make cabbage salads in the winter than to waste their money on imported lettuce which is almost all water.

That is as condescending as what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said to the poor people of Canada, "reallocate your spending priorities". The farm women have much more to offer than merely telling the women of Canada to make cabbage salads rather than lettuce salads. The province of Ontario has credit guidelines which reflect equal credit opportunity. The federal government does not have guidelines to ensure that women are not discriminated against when they seek credit to continue in an operation, not just farming, but other enterprises as well.

We heard a representative of this government tell the farm women of Canada that if they want to make their presence felt, they must learn to lobby for the things they want. The reason this debate was brought forward is because the women of Canada were starting to lobby for what they wanted. At that time the minister said, "Don't lobby now because it may be inconvenient, it may embarrass our government and we are having another conference at that time." Is that any way of assisting the women of Canada to stand up and take their place alongside their male counterparts?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we on this side have stood and spoken for the rights of women. We have had spokesmen, spokeswomen, or spokespersons. We in this party do not have a problem. We can say spokesmen, spokeswomen or spokespersons. No member of my party has criticized me for saying that. There is no such problem on this side. I would, however, like to say that we have worked hard and diligently. We will continue to work hard as members of the opposition to ensure that women can take their rightful place among the workers of Canada. We find it very difficult to do this with the present minister. I heard a government member say that the minister is in a pillory. I doubt that very much because I do not think he could get his head through the hole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert on the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, but I think I understand something about fair play. I have known the minister for many years. Quite frankly, this motion strikes me as something of a smear tactic to destroy his reputation and credibility. That is what prompts me to speak. What is the motion we have? The motion accuses the minister of and condemns him for his blatant interference as the minister responsible for the status of women, in the plans of the advisory council to hold a constitutional conference, and demands the resignation of the minister. It refers to "blatant interference". I have been reading the speeches given earlier today and I have listened to all the speeches tonight and I have not seen or heard any evidence of interference. We have heard a great litany about his alleged sins in the discharge of his responsibilities as minister. I am not surprised that the opposition is not impressed with his record. When have members of the opposition ever been impressed with the record of any minister on this side of the House on anything? If that were the criteria for resignation, then why stop at the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy)? Why not ask them all to resign?

● (2110)

An hon. Member: Good idea.

Mr. Smith: What makes members opposite happy about anything they do? It seems to me the only grounds on which they are demanding his resignation is that he blatantly interfered.

Let us have a look at what he did. What is this heinous crime he is alleged to have perpetrated? What was his statement here today? He said that the only time he became involved in their discussions was when they telephoned his office asking if he would meet with them to discuss the matter. He said that contrary to allegations that have been made, never at any time did he deal directly with members of the committee or of the council. He said they approached him and he met with them on a Friday morning. They asked him for his opinion and he gave it to them and he said that was the last contact on that discussion. Is anyone seriously suggesting that a minister of the Tory cabinet did not give his opinion on something when he was asked? I suggest not at all.

An hon. Member: What is the point?

Mr. Smith: The point being that I see no evidence here whatsoever that he blatantly interfered with anything, yet that is the only ground stated in the motion which calls upon him to resign.

The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) says that somebody in his office called somebody or wrote a memo to somebody or somebody said this about that. That is a big deal, but is that interference? Let us get serious.

I would like to say something about Doris Anderson. I have known Doris Anderson for some years. I have a high regard for her and I like her. I supported her when she ran as a candidate in a byelection in 1978. She made a decision to resign. I regret that decision. I think it was a wrong decision and I think it was an unfortunate one. I have nothing else to say about it. She made a decision and that is it. I happen to think the opposition has done her a disservice by fanning the flames of this incident into a great cause célèbre which they have somehow painted as a blood feud between the minister and virtue.

What has really prompted this motion? I happen to think this is another chapter in a clear pattern by the official opposition in particular to destroy the credibility of this minister. When the hon. member for Saskatoon West suggested that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections I could hardly believe it. I am a member of that committee as is that hon. member. I sat through its hearings when we dealt with a previous matter relating to the minister.

Was the minister treated fairly by the opposition at that time? I suggest he was not. There were two issues and I think I have to make reference to them. There were two issues that came up. The first was, he was said to have made a decision concerning the entry into Canada by a person his department approved, which affected the fortunes of a small business in which he had a small interest. Very early in the evidence before the committee it was clear to anybody that the decision was made by officials in his department and he knew nothing about it. That was clear to anybody.

The second issue before the committee was an allegation that by virtue of the fact that the minister had a small interest in what you might call a family business, he was party to a contract entered into to provide employment for a handicapped person. It was quite clear very early in the evidence that he knew nothing about this decision and that he benefited in no way. Did that end the matter? No, that issue dragged on for weeks and weeks and weeks during which there were rumours, innuendos and fishing expeditions by the official opposition. It stretched the credulity of any impartial person to know that this was going on. If any group in that regard could be called impartial I would suggest it was the press, and members of the press who attended whom I spoke to said it was the biggest yawn in years and they simply stopped coming. It was a nothing story. There was simply nothing there; it was a hollow charge, a bum rap and nothing came out of it. That apparently is the route they want to go again. They want to go on another fishing expedition. They want to destroy the reputation and the credibility of the one minister this government has elected from the west.

I have known the minister well for 15 years. We worked together as ministerial assistants back in the 1960 s. He is an honest, decent and sincere man. Some of you are aware of the fact that I am chairman of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped. On several occasions during our hearings we met with the minister, and I can say quite sincerely that he spoke with some passion, fervour and most persuasively about his commitment on issues affecting women. That was the conclusion I believe members of all parties who served on our committee came to.

This brings me to the next point. This motion refers to changing the mandate of the advisory council enabling it to report directly to Parliament. This issue has somehow now been elevated to a great question of principle. Our committee looked at that idea with an open mind. It seems there are two arguments you can make. I do not think they have anything to do with great questions of principle. You can say they should report directly to Parliament, and that is fine, or through a minister. A strong argument can be made for reporting through a minister because it may well function better in that at least you know there is one person in the cabinet who is on the hot seat, on the hook, is responsible, and people look to him to perform his duties. If he does not perform the duties he is assigned, he knows he will be on the hot seat in Parliament.

If the council reports to Parliament in general, no one person is really on the hot seat or on the hook in the same way. Therefore, I think a very strong case can be made that it is preferable to have a minister responsible.

What is wrong with responsible government? We all extol the virtues of that, but suddenly there is something wrong with having a minister responsible for his duties in Parliament. This principle does not bother me at all. I welcome it. In fact, I suggest this is one with which we all agree.

If we look at what is going on we will find five points that I would like to cover. They indicate what this debate is all about and how it strikes me.

First of all, there is no blatant interference. I would suggest there is no interference at all. A request was made for an opinion. The council received the opinion and it then made a decision. As to how much its members were influenced by that opinion, I do not know. They may have been influenced by it greatly or not at all. They asked for it and they received it. That is not interference.

The second point is that hon. members say they do not like his record. What record do they like on this side of the House?

An hon. Member: None of them.

Mr. Smith: It is pretty clear to me that this is another chapter in the attempt to smear this minister. The opposition is clearly trying to destroy the credibility of the present council, and it seems to me they feel that unless the council reflects their views somehow it has gone astray, the members are lost souls, sheep without a shepherd and should be restructured and brought into line.

The clearest point to me of this whole debate is that those who are guilty of blatant interference are those who want to interfere with the decision freely made by that council, and that is the opposition. They want to interfere. It is not members on this side of the House who want to interfere. They made a decision, it is their decision, and we respect that decision. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2120)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have just been treated by the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) to almost as big a pile of that smelly stuff we spread on the fields out west as we got from the minister earlier. The hon. member says he read the speeches and listened to the debate this evening but sees no evidence of interference. He obviously did not read the speeches very carefully. He did not listen to the debate very carefully, so I will put the evidence on the record again. Perhaps the hon. member will appreciate hearing the words I will read in a moment. I understand that he has some legal training. Perhaps he can appreciate facts, and perhaps he will make the logical and rational decision everyone else in the country is making, namely, that there was blatant and overt interference. I have in my hand a chronology of the events preceding the aborted constitutional conference. It starts earlier than January 5, but January 5 is where I will start this sad story of interference. In the interests of saving time I will pick it up on January 5 from a document I have in front of me which reads as follows:

Doris Anderson is away. Hellie Wilson speaks with the minister's office and reports that the minister wants regional conferences instead of a national conference. Hellie Wilson stops the press releases and letters from going out as scheduled. Two press releases—one to CTV and one to The Globe and Mail—have to be recalled by courier.

The following is a chronology of events for January 6:

Doris Anderson returns to the office and reads Hellie Wilson's memo about the minister's wishes. Doris Anderson phones Win Gardner—

I will talk about Win Gardner later.

—who agrees that the minister probably doesn't realize how damaging a postponement or cancellation would be to the Council. She says no former minister interfered with the Council this way.

Win Gardner is a Liberal appointee. She is a devoted and active Liberal and, as we will see in a few minutes from her own testimony, a close friend of the minister. She says, and I quote:

Doris Anderson phones Lucie Pépin but she is on holidays. Doris Anderson phones Nancy Connolly, the minister's assistant and explains that cancelling for a second time would be extremely damaging to the credibility of the Council. Nancy Connolly says the minister seems determined. Doris Anderson asks to meet with him.

Sheila Zimmerman—

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) knows Sheila Zimmerman.

—completes a progress report on the conference at Doris Anderson's request.

The following is the chronology of events of January 7:

Doris Anderson is home ill. She talks several times to Win Gardner and Nancy Connolly. Nancy reports that the minister is determined that the conference must be changed and regional conferences held instead. Win talks to Nancy and Hellie. Win asks that the whole executive meet with the minister. Doris and Hellie agree. The meeting is set for Friday, January 9, at 1 p.m. in the minister's office.

The following is the chronology of events for January 8:

Executive members get together for drinks and later have dinner at Nancy Connolly's. Doris Anderson learns for the first time that Lucie Pepin had not told Quebec participants that the February 13-14 date was firm.

Then we get into the meeting of January 9, of which the minutes are much more detailed. In fact, they were taken verbatim in shorthand, and I have a copy here. The minutes talk about the discussion. The hon. member for Don Valley East said there was no evidence of interference. According to the chronology of events I have here, Win Gardner said no former minister had interfered that way. What does Win Gardner say on January 9 after she has talked to the minister? Win Gardner's statement is as follows:

> My reasons for voting for cancelling the Conference on Women and the Constitution has nothing to do with the fact that the minister is a dear and close personal friend of mine. I am voting for cancelling the conference because we looked like fools the last time and I am not ready to look like one again and put our minister in an embarrassing situation toward his government.

That is a quote from Win Gardner. The hon. member says he was here, paid attention and is not aware of any interference. The hon. member obviously must have about three and a half inches of skull if he does not recognize that for what it is, proof of blatant interference.

Mr. Smith: Opinion.

Mr. Andre: It is not opinion; it is fact. The minister says he has not seen this, but he knows it is not true because somewhere hidden away in the bowels of some lawyer's office is an affidavit. Well, where is this affidavit? Let us see this affidavit. Pleading for his old friend, the hon. member for Don Valley East related the tale of the minister's appearance before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in relation to some questionable dealings in Winnipeg. Perhaps the hon. member remembers that at that point in time the minister volunteered. He was confident of his innocence of any suggestion of wrongdoing and anxious to prove that there was no evidence of wrongdoing.

He himself moved in this House that that matter be referred to committee so that he could prove his innocence. We challenge him to do that now. If the minister is confident that he did not interfere—I do not believe him, and nobody else in the country believes him—let us refer the matter right now to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, just as the minister did on the previous occasion to which the hon. member referred, and let us examine it. Let us bring this affidavit before the committee and find the truth. Let us examine the information and find the truth. If the hon. member is so confident about the minister's side of the story, what is there to fear? It could all be cleared up in a day. Why not have this cleared up?

The hon. member for Don Valley East says that all we have in mind is to destroy the reputation of the minister. The minister is walking from one cow plop to another. He is destroying himself with one inanity after another. It was not us who went through these machinations with regard to the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women which the minister supervises. No one on this side of the House tricked him into trying to postpone this conference in his devious way. He did it all by himself.

Was it Fotheringham who said, "The guy is going downhill faster than Steve Podborski"? He is disappearing. This man came here a few months ago with a tremendous reputation as a world-beater from the west who would revive the Liberal Party in western Canada. He was to be the hero and champion of women in Canada. He was to look after their interests. All we see is a puff of snow down at the bottom of the hill as he disappears down the hill and into deserved oblivion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The minister stood here tonight, and even if one had not been to the same meeting Laura Sabia had been to in Toronto at which the minister talked in his pompous, patronizing manner, one could see from his manner here tonight that Laura Sabia perceived his character exactly. The minister is pompous and patronizing in his view and pompous and patronizing toward this House and toward everyone. I think it would not be parliamentary to put on the record some of the comments I heard in Calgary after his appearance there. Is this pompous minister going to save the Liberal Party in western Canada? The fact is that the minister was caught red-handed abusing his position and failing miserably in the tremendous responsibility he has as minister responsible for the status of women.

Mr. Smith: Is this the best you can do for an opposition day? It is unbelievable.

Mr. Andre: Proof of misuse, interference and abuse of his position is available. It is here in the minutes of the meeting of January 9, and hon. members know it, as do the women of this country.

● (2130)

The minutes of that meeting of the executive council of January 9 are really something. One after another these appointees, these loyal Grits, these loyal Liberals, have said, "The party comes first. Our responsibility to the advisory council and to the women of Canada comes second. We must not embarrass the government, we must not embarrass the minister, we must put them first and foremost, and only then will we look after our responsibilities to the women of this country who count on that." The minister knows darn well he was caught red-handed. So when he stood up in the House this afternoon, what did he do, besides demonstrating his patronizing pomposity? He made some erroneous comparisons between his performance since the election 11 months ago and the performance of our party during our short tenure in office. He said that the Progressive Conservative Party is all talk but no action. He said that while we were in office, no action was taken on behalf of the women of this country, but that in the short few months he has been in office, he has put in all kinds of programs to help the women of Canada, and that he has the proof for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Let us look at the record of what happened during the PC tenure in office and during the equivalent time, the first nine months, when this Liberal government was in office with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who is also in charge of the status of women. He has both jobs as well as being in charge of the status of women. When the Progressive Conservative government was in office, we created 301,000 jobs—these are Statistics Canada figures—of which 218,000 jobs were for women, or 72.5 per cent of the jobs created were for women.

In comparison, this minister who says that he does not talk about these things, he just delivers, he just produced action on behalf of women as the minister responsible for employment and immigration and for the status of women, says that during his first nine months in office the government created 165,000 jobs, a little more than 50 per cent, of which 91,000 were for women, only 65 per cent of the jobs as compared to 72.5 per cent when we were in office. In other words, during his nine months in office he produced 42 per cent fewer jobs for women than did the previous government, and yet he had the gall this afternoon to speak about outperforming the Hon. Ron Atkey. If you do not believe it, ask him. We asked Statistics Canada and we find that, as a matter of fact, if he wants to catch up to the Hon. Ron Atkey, he needs to do two and a half times better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: But when your case is weak, you rely on whatever you have. You grab and you make erroneous statements, in the hope that those in the opposition will not be able to catch up with you, will not have the facts and figures, so you can make these absurd statements.

He was followed, on behalf of the Liberal side, by his seatmate, the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola), who said—this shows her interest in the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and it shows her interest in the important work that that council could and should do—that she was not concerned with the fact that there had been two or three resignations, that she wanted ten resignations, she wanted the resignation of every single person who had the character to vote in support of Doris Anderson, to vote for the continuation of this conference which had been widely advertised, which had been postponed once and which was so important to the women of this country and to the groups which sponsored it. Ten women voted with Doris Anderson and the Minister of State for Mines said she wanted the resignation of them all. She thought it was absolutely intolerable to have even one single person on that council who does not put loyalty to the Liberals first. But there were actually ten people who said that their first responsibility is to the council and to the women of Canada. The minister said she wanted their resignations. That is because the government wants a really tame council; then they will be in good shape. They want a tame council who will know that what is good for the Liberal Party is good for the women of Canada. Yes, sir.

But there are a few women in Canada who do not agree with that. It might surprise members opposite to realize that. These women have been writing. Here are a few letters which they wrote. My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) mentioned that the letter, which just happens to be on the top of the list, is from the president of the Willowdale Association. Perhaps the hon. member for Don Valley East should have a talk with this individual who clearly disagrees with virtually everything he had to say. Perhaps he could get her resignation also. Clearly this woman does not put the Liberal Party first. She thinks the Advisory Council on the Status of Women has important work to do and she supports Doris Anderson. I think you should demand her resignation because one rotten apple will spoil the barrel and you cannot tolerate these people who do not put the Liberal party first.

An hon. Member: What is her name?

Mr. Andre: It is H. D. Wells. Mark that down and get her resignation.

She is not the only one. Here is a telegram from Lynn MacDonald, president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. She writes:

—deeply concerned over possible cancellation of women's conference on the constitution. Representing over 150,000 national and regional women's organizations, we feel it essential to disseminate information prepared for the council and to receive opinion on all areas of concern to women who will be affected by constitutional change. Many of these have yet to be considered. We urge that the conference be held as planned in order that women benefit from the positive initiatives already taken by your council.

There are 150,000 organizations. That is terrible. Imagine that. They do not think that the minister responsible has the last word. How disloyal these people are not to accept that the Liberal Party knows best. For goodness' sake, you would think they would know. They should stay home and leave things in the hands of this brilliant minister because he has their interest at heart. Just believe him, talk to him, he will tell you. It is absurd.

That is not the only letter we have. There is a whole list. There is the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs which writes that they support the request to reschedule the conference on women and the constitution on the dates of February 13 and 14, 1981. The National Association of Women and the Law writes that it:

—wishes to commend your recent efforts to ensure the Canadian women's constitutional conference in February becomes a reality. The association feels this conference is necessary and supports the position you have taken.

This is addressed to Doris Anderson.

Then there is this telegram which reads:

On behalf of the 30,000 members of the Federation of Women's Teachers' Association of Ontario I would like to congratulate you on your stand that the conference on women and the constitution should go forward. It is essential that these issues be discussed in a national public forum. That your executive fails to see the urgency of this matter is deplorable. We applaud your action and hope that your council will reverse the executive decision and show that it really is concerned to carry out its mandate.

They are saying that they are concerned to carry out their mandate and not just concerned for the political welfare of the minister and the party which appointed them. These are the people who write and say they are concerned about the fundamental issue. Surely sensible members over there will recognize that the work of this council is of vital importance. The royal commission of ten years ago established that beyond a doubt. Surely members recognize the wisdom of the recommendation contained therein, that the council must report to Parliament and not to the minister so that it is free of political interference.

● (2140)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised tonight to see the speakers chosen by the opposition party because we always see the same faces, people who are called hit men, people who are needed when the opposition party has no idea what to say or what to do. They call in their strong-voiced frontbenchers who during the famous debate on the question of privilege involving the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) had an opportunity to make speeches in the House for a few days and then sit in committee for nearly two weeks to rehash the same thing.

It was very obvious to members in the House and members in the committee that once again they were wasting the time of the House and of the committee because they are simply frustrated for having spent so little time in office, one in particular who did not make it into the cabinet, who feels quite bitter and now seeks in every way to get rid of his bitterness so he can relax a little.

Even more astonishing, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that every day in the first two weeks of this session we heard people clamouring for an emergency debate on the North-South dialogue, the constitution or the economy. But what is the topic for today, the first allotted day? A topic which we on the government benches recognize as being very important but which has never been one of the priorities of the opposition, if their attitude in recent years and recent months is any indication.

It will be recalled that the Minister of Employment and Immigration responsible for the status of women made himself available to members of the opposition for almost 20 hours during the study of his department's estimates. Out of those 20 hours, Mr. Speaker, we spent perhaps 20 minutes discussing the status of women because hon. members opposite felt that the subject was not that important. And now, here they are brewing a storm in a teacup, making a mountain out of a molehill because of a resignation, because the members of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women could not see eye to eye on one subject.

Of course, this decision may seem surprising, Mr. Speaker, but I believe that it is normal and to be expected on the part of the opposition. I would like to come back to the decision of the Canadian advisory council on the Status of Women to postpone the February meeting, and to refer to an article published last week in Le Devoir, which said that the Fédération des femmes du Québec had indicated to the minister and the members of the advisory council that the mid-February date was definitely unacceptable to Quebec women, and I quote:

> Once again, the Conseil du statut de la femme in Quebec did not receive any official invitation to take part in the conference to be held on February 13 and 14. The president, Mrs. Claire Bonenfant, was to present a paper on women and the Constitution at the fall conference.

As it was decided in the last minute to reschedule this conference which had unfortunately been cancelled in early September, no one had been informed and the Advisory Council had regrettably not yet taken the necessary steps to notify everyone that this meeting would be held. The Quebec participants therefore could not attend the conference, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that a debate on the Constitution without the participation of some rather important members of this federation representing Quebec, namely, the Conseil du statut de la femme du Québec, would not have been very successful. However, I believe that many participants had advised the Council—I have here a telegram from Mrs. Gabrielle Hotte, which was sent to the Fédération des femmes du Québec, and I quote:

> —sorry but cannot attend the conference on women and the Constitution on February 13 and 14, due to our inability to prepare adequately at such short notice and the previous commitments of several participants.

This telegram was sent to the minister on January 19, Mr. Speaker, to advise him that if the conference was held as expected in February, some extremely important participants would unfortunately be unable to attend. There is still an aspect that I do not like to mention, but to which a reference was made in a Le Devoir article which I feel I must read, if you allow me, Mr. Speaker. It says, and I quote:

> All this confusion about the conference points to a latent situation underlying the crisis in the council, namely the type of leadership given by Mrs. Anderson, a woman used to making her own decisions and who seems to find it very difficult to work with a team.
> It is not the first time that the president has met with opposition from the executive and council members.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, when five of the six members of the executive voted against the president at the meeting, the hon. members opposite should have realized that the majority of council members supported those who wanted the conference postponed to achieve success and give the participants an opportunity to examine the amendments introduced by the government.

However, the president insisted she was the president, she was in charge, and she decided on her own to convene the conference against the wishes of most members of the executive. Later on, the invitation was withdrawn, and this week, the assembly of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women decided by a majority of 17 to 10 to postpone the conference. Unfortunately, as was reported in the Le Devoir article, Mrs. Anderson is a woman who is used to making decisions single-handedly and who seems to find it difficult to co-operate with a team. However, Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that an organization such as the advisory council must work as a team and if the president was really unable to abide by the will of most members, she had to resign, even though members of the opposition and some women as well as ourselves deeply regret it; however, such was the will of most members and she did not respect the wishes of the majority.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why hon. members opposite wanted to debate the issue for five hours. Because of the opposition's inability to grasp the core of the matter accusations were made against my minister and allegations of politicalization and partisanship were laid against the Council, but naturally they were totally unfounded. There were rumors, insinuations, but no one has yet put before the House facts that would justify or give weight to suspicions of undue interference on the part of any one in the whole matter.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, let me go on to other aspects of the subject, one of which was brought up earlier by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) with regard to job creation in 1980. Again, Mr. Speaker, allow me to quote figures that do not quite correspond with those of the hon. member for Calgary Centre who was bragging about the fact that his hon. government, in which he unfortunately was not a minister, had created almost 300,000 jobs, nearly 200,000 of which were for women.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, thanks to their outstanding competence, they managed to do many things in nine months but as the first piece of legislation was passed at the end of November, 1979, I doubt very much that their performance was so spectacular in 1979 that it did in fact help create jobs. Naturally, they may have felt the positive effects of the previous Liberal government and 1979 may have been a good year in terms of job creation. But I for one will talk about 1980.

[English]

Employment for adult women was higher by approximately 170,000 jobs in 1980, an impressive increase of 6 per cent, reflecting the strength in the service-producing sector, a sector relatively insensitive to cyclical weaknesses. It was above the annual average growth rate of 5.2 per cent for 1975 to 1979. Adult women accounted for 59 per cent of the over-all increase of 286,000 jobs in 1980. I think those figures speak for themselves as far as what this government and this minister has done in the first nine months of his mandate.

● (2150)

Reflecting the rapid growth of employment among adult women, the declining trend in their unemployment rate, established in 1979, continued in 1980. Their unemployment rate dropped from 7.7 per cent in 1978 to 7 per cent in 1979 and to 6.5 per cent in 1980. I think these figures are proof of the improvements taking place under this minister. Not only did members opposite ask for the minister's resignation as minister responsible for the status of women but the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) went so far as to suggest he should resign all his portfolios. I think these figures illustrate the fact that the minister who is responsible for employment and for the status of women gave his department the tools to be able to act positively on the needs of women in the employment market.

I will go a little further with respect to the performance of this government in the last ten months. Examples of this are the special measures in the employment development program, the employment tax credit, Outreach, non-traditional training under CMITP, advertising campaigns, affirmative action in the public service and the affirmative action in the private sector. Other examples are the eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits for fisherpersons, spouses and teachers and reduction in minimum weekly hours required for unemployment insurance. I will go deeper into each one of these measures, Mr. Speaker, if you will permit.

The first example I cited was the special measures in employment development program. In particular, Canada community development projects and the Canada Community Services Contribution Program include in their contracts a section where a hiring plan must be submitted which will take into consideration the employment problems of women, natives and the handicapped. Any project proposal which does not contain a hiring plan is treated as an incomplete application and is returned to the sponsor. In addition, part of the monitoring process is an examination of the success of the project in meeting its hiring plan. The Canada Community Services Contribution Program will be of particular assistance to women. It aims to help organizations provide needed community services such as day-care, community health care, crisis and information services, and home care services.

Based on 341 projects approved to date, approximately 75 per cent of the total expected, it is anticipated that 20 per cent of all projects deal with primary and secondary services geared to women. The most frequently recommended and approved activities under CCSP to date are:

—Battered women, rape crisis, distress centres;

—Daycare centres and related activities;

—Transition/halfway houses for women;

—Integration services to immigrant women;

—Women's centres, drop-in information centres.

This summer we will be seeing a job-creation program which was announced today by the minister. We will also have positive action programs. Once again, women, the handicapped and natives will be helped by the government's programs. This is another example where the fact of having a minister responsible for the status of women and employment and immigration has positive effects.

Another measure is the employment tax credit program, which was extended by this government. In addition, under the present employment tax credit program there has been a steady increase in female participation. Under this government women constitute 38.9 per cent of the participants. This represents a real increase of 4.6 per cent over the fiscal year 1979-80.

If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, the Outreach program is another measure. It has proven to be a useful program over the years in assisting women to integrate themselves into the labour market. In July, 1980, the minister directed that the highest priority be given to Outreach projects serving women exclusively.

I had the honour for the last nine months to work as the parliamentary secretary to the minister, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry. I know the time and effort which have been spent in our department to deal with these issues. Members opposite may bicker about it and can understand their frustration with respect to it. They were in power for nine months and were unable to achieve anything. They did not have the courage to come into Parliament for the first seven and a half months they were in government. I know that the actions taken by this government through this minister and his joint portfolios have been positive actions with positive results.

I would like to continue with the next measure, which is the non-traditional training under CMITP. Of major concern to educators, women's organizations and unions is the concentration of women in a relatively small number of occupations and industries. In 1979, over 60 per cent of all women worked in clerical, sales and service jobs. Yet the areas of high demand for workers are ones in which few women are employed.

We had to act on this matter, which is why we entered into the development of a manpower industrial training program. It was oriented toward giving special services to women who were training in non-traditional occupations. We paid 75 per cent, to a maximum of $178, to employers who hired women in these non-traditional occupations. In addition, up to 100 per cent of the training costs and complementary course costs, such as assertiveness training, will be paid. Some 200 occupational groups were identified as non-traditional, based on a 10 per cent participation rate in the occupation nationally.

One other aspect about which we hear criticism from the opposition is the area of the advertising campaign. I think that no matter how much we on the government side, and members opposite as well, feel obligated toward this issue and give it a lot of importance, we still have, as the government, the responsibility to ensure that the general public better understands this issue and better comprehends the fact that we, as the government, must act on it.

An area in which the commission has frequently received complaints is in advertising. Women's organizations, among others, say that women do not know about the services and programs which the commission offers. In light of this, a $1.1 million advertising campaign was developed for television and print. The English television campaign started in December, 1980, and the French campaign has just started. In addition, a brochure entitled "A Women's Guide to Federal Employment Services" is presently being produced and should be available in the Canada Employment Centres by the beginning of April, 1981.

Another program with which the minister dealt, not as minister responsible, but as part of the cabinet, is the affirmative action in the public service program. This government feels strongly that the public service must set an example for the private sector by cleaning its own system of any systemic discrimination. Therefore, an affirmative action program has been launched in the public service. This program will include an assessment of the types of discrimination in hiring and promotion which keep women and other groups from participating fully in the labour market.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, with respect to affirmative action in the private sector. Here we tried to arrange contracts with the private sector to encourage this type of affirmative action. I talked briefly before about unemployment insurance. I mentioned the reduction in the minimum weekly hours required. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women made recommendations about this to the previous Conservative government. They recommended it be changed, but that was rejected. This afternoon the minister quoted in the House a response given by Mr. Atkey, the minister in that government. The Conservative government rejected it because they did not think it was a priority. The reduction in minimum weekly hours required for unemployment insurance allows for 15 hours of work per week or one fifth of the maximum insurable earnings. The existing requirement of 20 hours of work per week had a negative effect in particular categories of workers, especially women. The significance of this change for women is illustrated by the fact that about one in every four women is a part-time worker, whereas only one in 17 men work part time.

These are just a few of the examples, Mr. Speaker. I would like to deal with the constitutional aspect in the minute of time which remains to me. I am sure that everybody recognizes——that the contributions of the advisory council with respect to amendments to the charter to the Constitution have been positive and I would like to quote a statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) before the committee:

[Translation]

> I must admit that the accomplishments of this council have greatly influenced the government.

Such advice from the advisory council has made it possible for the government to amend section 15 on the right to equality. To ensure that the principle of equality be observed in the very implementation of the act, section 15 was amended as follows, and I quote:

> The law makes no exceptions and applies equally to everyone, and everyone has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law without discrimination because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, age or sex.

This is a very important addition, Mr. Speaker, one which is appreciated by all the women of this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58 (11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

CRIMINAL CODE—AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EUTHANASIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on November 7 I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who had stepped out of the House, and in his absence, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Irwin) gave the reply. My question concerned the amendments to the Criminal Code which would permit euthanasia along the lines of the 1969 amendments which permitted therapeutic abortion. The parliamentary secretary in his reply said that the issue of euthanasia was not a major priority but that the government would take cognizance of the issue and deal with it in due course.

Euthanasia is a sensitive issue. When I endeavoured to ask a supplementary question I was cut off by Madam Speaker. I am sure that you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that the supplementary question is really the heart of any question posed in this House. My supplementary would have been phrased in the following words: Because of the tragic toll of 450,000 aborted babies since the Criminal Code was amended in 1969, will the government take action to amend the Criminal Code and to end this violation of the most fundamental of all human rights, the right to life.

The two actions, abortion and euthanasia, are closely related. They both bring about death on the pretext of improving the quality of life. I am sure that hon. members will agree that this is a horrible paradox. When the Criminal Code was amended in 1969, the point was made by the government that it was designed to permit abortions only when the physical and mental health of the mother was in peril. The added argument was made that it would end criminal abortions by human butchers in rooms in back alleys.

Every concerned citizen, I am sure, will agree that the killing of half a million unborn babies goes far beyond the need of therapeutic abortion. In fact, it amounts to the wholesale slaughter of the innocent. The tragic situation is an inevitable byproduct of a permissive age which ignores the Judeo-Christian ethic of the right to life and leads down the slippery slope of moral relativism. It is the medical profession which has had to bear the brunt of this tragedy. All members of the medical profession must take the Hippocratic oath and must swear that they will observe the declaration of Geneva which was adopted by the general assembly of the World Medical Association at Geneva in September, 1948. One of the major points in the declaration states as follows:

> I will maintain the utmost respect for human life, from the time of conception, even under threat. I will not use my medical knowledge contrary to the laws of humanity.

There are many quotations by doctors who, more and more, are reacting against the tragic position in which they are placed by the legislation. Here is one such quote:

> Some time ago—after a tenure of a year and a half—I resigned as director of the Centre for Reproductive and Sexual Health.

That title is really a euphemistic description of an abortion clinic. The doctor went on to say:

> The centre had performed 60,000 abortions with no maternal deaths—an outstanding record of which we are proud. However, I am deeply troubled by my own increasing certainty that I have in fact presided over 60,000 deaths.

● (2205)

Inevitably this has a brutalizing and dehumanizing influence on human beings which is reflected in the growing problem of child abuse and in marital and family breakdown. I believe, and there is evidence to confirm this, that in Canada the pendulum is swinging back again. There is a growing number of concerned citizens. They are represented by many members of the House who are strongly against the abortion bill arising from the Criminal Code amendments in 1969. They come from all sides of the House and their concerns are being made known through private members bills, questions and speeches.

At a time when the government is calling for a charter of human rights enshrined in the Constitution with the right to life as the number one priority, to continue to condone the slaughter of 65,000 babies a year is the height of hypocrisy and moral schizophrenia of the most dangerous kind. I would urge the government that rather than contemplating further amendments to expand the use of euthanasia—which I presume would be in the direction of the aged and the infirm—and rather than doing this in the name of improving the quality of life, because it is justified under the pretence of social purposes and social improvement, to instead introduce amendments to the Criminal Code changes that were made in 1969, which have done untold damage to the integrity of our basic institution of family life in Canada.

I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that this action be taken at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Due to the absence of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Irwin), I will provide the answer to this question tonight.

The hon. member has raised an issue of considerable moral and legal complexity. As a study paper written from the ethical perspective for the Law Reform Commission of Canada as part of its Protection of Life project points out, the term euthanasia is used to mean so many very different things that its use confuses and begs more questions than it clarifies and answers.

The author of that study paper entitled "Sanctity of Life or Quality of Life" points out that some writers continue to use the term to mean what the Greek word literally meant, "a good death", and intends by that what others would now more generally label "allowing to die with care", a form of care which excludes killing. The more common and probably fixed meaning in our times is that of directly killing the dying patient. The author goes on to note that the use of the same words in these two different senses only covers up and blurs the essential distinctions between the two approaches. He cites a study published in the United States in 1976 which reads in part as follows:

Justifies a moratorium on its use . . . Formulation of any public policy dealing with these issues will consciously or unconsciously have to make these distinctions—

In response to the hon. member's question of November 7, no work is being done by the government on the subject of euthanasia. However, the hon. member may be aware that the Law Reform Commission of Canada in its seventh annual report of 1977-1978 listed euthanasia as one area in which working papers were being prepared. The description reads, and I quote:

This paper is an evaluation of how well relevant Canadian law (particularly the homicide laws) and legal theory actually protect and affirm the various rights and values raised by the issue of euthanasia in the medical context . . . If the commission concludes in this paper that present law is inadequate with respect to euthanasia, specific laws or models will be formulated by way of reform proposals.

However, I must add that the latest report of the commission, which was tabled in this House, indicates that the more particular concern of the working paper which is still to be published is the question of cessation of treatment.

I am sure the hon. member knows the Law Reform Commission of Canada regards the views as expressed in its working papers as tentative only. During a period of about one year after publication, the commission consults the views of the general public—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired.

GARRISON DIVERSION—REQUEST PRIME MINISTER DISCUSS PROJECT WITH PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): I rise this evening to expand on my questioning of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) yesterday.

There exists at this moment both a very real danger to Canada that the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota may go ahead full steam, and a real opportunity to make contact with a new administration in Washington, anxious to establish early and good working relations between our two countries. Members on both sides of this House have been encouraged by the interest shown by the new administration in Canadian matters. The fact that the President phoned the Prime Minister yesterday, his first day on the job, is an indication of the priority put on Canadian matters in Washington. Our very real problem is that the new Congress is not informed on the situation with respect to the Garrison diversion project.

It seems to me there is a very real possibility that some of these new congressmen may be asked to make decisions on Garrison from a less than well-informed position. The governor of North Dakota is claiming to have heard "nothing official" from Ottawa. In his reply to me in the House yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that the Canadian government has indeed made numerous official representations to the U.S. government in reference to Garrison.

The newly-elected governor of North Dakota, Mr. Olson, has been making some very disturbing statements in reference to the Garrison diversion project and the effects the project could have on Canadian waters. Governor Olson was formerly attorney general of the state of North Dakota and, in his capacity as attorney general, he filed several lawsuits to force completion of Garrison in spite of Canadian objections. In a press conference held in Jamestown, North Dakota, January 15, Governor Olson threatened to bring an injunction against the Interior Department forcing it to free up the $5 million currently being withheld by the department pending clarification of the situation respecting Canadian waters.

Governor Olson told a joint U.S. lobby group against Garrison that work on Garrison should continue until the threat to Manitoba fishing and agriculture is proven. The very real danger of biota transfer and the resulting disastrous effects in Manitoba have been proven time and time again. Governor Olson has promised to resolve the dispute over Garrison in the first 18 months of his administration. His statements so far have led me to believe he is willing to keep this promise at the expense of the environmental integrity of Canadian waters.

Congressman Mark Andrews of North Dakota is a notorious supporter of Garrison. At a Canada-U.S. interparliamentary group meeting held in Calgary in August, 1979, which I attended, Andrews said that the only objectors to the Garrison project were "environmental zealots". This term would hardly apply to the government of Manitoba, members of this House, the Audubon Society on both sides of the border and top-rated American and Canadian scientists.

In a naive reaction to the freezing of the $5 million by the Interior Department, our Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) said that Canada now held a "veto" on the project. That was quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 20, 1980. It is now clear that we not only have no veto, we have no voice in Washington.

It is absolutely essential that we form a parliamentary delegation to go to Washington immediately to explain our position to the newly-elected U.S. Congress. I wish to restate the need for this delegation so eloquently put by my colleague, the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) on January 13. Governor Olson seems intent on a confrontation with us and we have to get our case before the Congress now.

• (2215)

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government fully intends to pursue the Garrison diversion issue with the new U.S. administration, and will ensure it is raised with President Reagan at the earliest opportunity.

In the past, the government has actively made known to the U.S. administration and Congress the serious nature of Canadian concerns about the Garrison diversion project. We believe this effort has had some positive effect. While it is disappointing that the Congress allocated new funds for the project last summer, it is encouraging that the Department of the Interior subsequently deferred spending of funds associated with parts of the project which might affect Canada until consultations with Canada had been completed. We will be actively pursuing those consultations as a means of obtaining modifications to the project which would protect Canada.

The United States has given some important assurances to Canada over the years under a number of administrations. We fully expect the new U.S. administration to abide by its previous commitments, and its obligations to Canada under the Boundary Waters Treaty.

The government will be taking steps to make clear to the new administration and Congress and the new governor of North Dakota the serious objections which Canada has to any plan which would permit the entry of foreign biota into Canada through the inter-basin transfer of water. Thank you.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF CUTBACK OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise following a question which I asked the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on January 12 of this year. I asked him to reconsider his fiscal policies and the cutback in the Community Services Contribution Program by his government.

In response to my question the minister refused to reconsider either his fiscal policy or his expenditure plans in his budget of last October, yet we all know that his budget is not working. We have high interest rates continuing to plague the economy of the nation, unemployment is rising, the cost of living continues to increase and the number of bankruptcies are up. The budgetary justification for cuts from the Community Services Contribution Program is just not valid. The minister should, therefore, be reconsidering his economic strategy and the cutback in that program.

I suggested to the minister that he consider a new program of investment in communities across this country, replacing the Community Services Contribution Program in order to provide stimulus to the economy and to provide the much-needed services which the Community Services Contribution Program represents. He refused to consider that and simply referred back to his budget and his former expenditure plan. In spite of the economic facts, and we all know, and it is clear to us, that we have an economic slump and continuing difficulties with the cost of living and people being out of work, this government and the Minister of Finance just do not seem to be willing to take a second look, even in view of the harsh realities we are all presently facing.

If the minister and his government are so set upon sticking with their fiscal policies and expenditure plans, they should offer some substitute for the Community Services Contribution Program. If they are solely concerned with not spending more and with the threat of a rising deficit, do they not understand that spending can be an investment and can lead to further economic activity, thus creating wealth and in that way holding the deficit down? Why has the minister not substituted a program of low interest rate loans for municipal programs? If these cannot be direct loans by the federal government, why can they not at least be guaranteed loans which in no way would increase the expenditure of the government? This would involve money from the private sector and from the banks, which could be used to promote local municipal projects.

However, the minister and the government clearly have not been searching for any alternatives to the Community Services Contribution Program. They have simply shown a lack of care and concern about this very fundamental and crucial issue to all the communities of our country.

If the government had some real concern, I am sure it would come up with a substitute program and be willing to say so this evening. One of the clear strategies in the minister's budget, to which he referred when I questioned him in this House, is cutting back on federal expenditures, particularly in areas of provincial jurisdiction. This is simply a shell game, shifting the burden of the federal deficit from the federal government to provincial and local authorities and taxpayers. This game is causing real concern across the country, particularly at the provincial level. Provincial officials are concerned that this is just the first step in cutting back federal contributions to programs for people. For example, established programs financing legislation will soon be renegotiated with the various provincial governments. That program finances medicare, post-secondary education and hospitals and involves very large sums of money.

Provincial governments are concerned that the federal government will take the same attitude in those negotiations as it has taken with respect to the Community Services Contribution Program, which is simply to drop the program without any consideration of need or local authorities. The same attitude has been demonstrated by the federal government in its handling of policing costs under RCMP agreements. This government wishes simply to shift the burden from it to local governments. This does not in any way serve the people of the communities of our country.

The government may doubt that this program is needed or it may attempt to throw doubt on the need for this program, but let me tell the government and its members that I have been receiving letters from right across the country outlining the need for this program. There should be no doubt about the need for it.

I have one letter here, for example, from the town of Ladysmith, British Columbia. The council there passed a resolution calling for the reinstatement of the community services contribution program. The council says in this letter, and I quote:

> The termination of this program will have a serious effect on the finances on the town of Ladysmith. The council is presently faced with a program of improvements to the town sewer system, which is estimated to cost $6.2 million . . . Unless further development within the town is stopped, it is essential that this program be proceeded with.

This refers to the sewer system program. Clearly, without the Community Services Contribution Program, development in the town of Ladysmith will stop. The council went on to say:

> Without the expected contribution from the Community Services Contribution Program, the rates charged to the residents of the Town will be substantially higher than they otherwise would have been.

This is only one example of what is happening all across this country. This program is needed, and there is no way the government can say it is not needed and that through cutbacks in this area it is not hurting people right across the country. I have many other letters here, which are only a sampling. My time is up. I rest my case.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the question the hon. member put to the Minister of Finance in this House on January 12.

As my colleague mentioned, the government decided not to renew the program because of its desire to maintain expenditures in line with revenues. I can assure the hon. member that this decision was not easily arrived at and that this was done only after careful consideration. First, there was the question of whether it was appropriate for the federal government to continue to subsidize services which, as far as jurisdiction is concerned, were in fact the responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities. The question was not whether this was a good program but rather who was going to pay for it. Second, there was the question of accountability, of whether the government's responsibility was at issue; that is, whether the government responsible for collecting funds through taxation should not be the one responsible for the expenditure of its revenues. Third, the effectiveness of the program was considered from the point of view of future job creation and compared to other programs, which seemed to show a better return for the money. Finally, Mr. Speaker, as I have just said, tax cuts were also a factor which influenced the decision. In an effort to achieve greater government efficiency, we studied the advisability of extending the current program with a view to allotting funds to new programs or more pressing priorities. A decision not to renew community service programs would allow more funds to be assigned to more important programs in 1982-83. The challenge lies in determining where the housing priorities of the federal government lie for the 1980s. We shall continue to hold informal discussions with our provincial colleagues and other interested parties. The minister would like to see those consultations help in ensuring continued federal housing assistance, and those programs and priorities lead to a better distribution of funds among them.

Mr. Speaker, under this program, the federal government earmarked $400 million for municipal projects, of which $150 million were assigned to 1979 programs, and $250 million to 1980 programs. Over 3,000 projects in 1,000 communities have already received federal assistance. As the hon. member can see, that is a rather significant amount to provide local services to Canadians in each and every province. The hon. member referred specifically to the number of lost jobs. May I assure him that the number of jobs will remain the same under this program because federal assistance is guaranteed until March 1982.

STATUS OF WOMEN

TABLING OF AFFIDAVIT BY MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the minister responsible for the status of women has stated that an affidavit exists which he tells this House supports his position, and since his parliamentary secretary and the hon. Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola), all of whom participated in yesterday's debate, have failed to produce the hidden affidavit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House direct the minister to produce and table the affidavit, which he says exists and to which he has referred.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CALL FOR CONVENING OF SOLICITORS GENERAL MEETING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, owing to the horrifying 30 per cent increase in house burglaries in Canada, police departments are grossly overworked, the courts are unable to deal with the cases and the jails and penitentiaries are insufficient to hold the offenders. Since this massive increase in crime can be tied directly to the poor economic climate in this country and the resulting high unemployment, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Solicitor General of Canada be called upon to convene a meeting of solicitors general of all the provinces to determine exactly what course of action should be taken, apart from the improvement in the general economic conditions, to help alleviate this problem.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

REFERENCE OF MARKET ASSURANCE PLAN TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the rapidly increasing cost of production in agriculture today, and realizing that farmers have an urgent need for income early in the crop year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the Canadian Wheat Board's proposed market assurance plan, which is very similar to that proposed for wheat by the emergency grain movement task force early in 1979, be immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for refining.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LTD.—APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to raise a very urgent question.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stated in the House that he agrees with Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. to replace the Auditor General with private auditors. Since this would restrict the power of Parliament and do away with integrated auditing principles for Crown corporations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy to reconsider his approval of the order in council appointing private auditors for Eldorado Nuclear Ltd.

SHIPPING

WEST COAST TANKER TRAFFIC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the U.S. plans to bring the 188,000 dead weight ton tanker B.T. San Diego into the Strait of Juan de Fuca contrary to American law, and whereas both the Canadian public and successive Liberal and Conservative governments of Canada have opposed west coast tanker traffic, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the House of Commons go on record as unanimously supporting the positions previously and presently held by the Government of Canada opposing oil tanker traffic on the west coast and the entrance of the B.T. San Diego into the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NATIONAL RESOURCES

REFERENCE OF NATURAL GAS LEGISLATION TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 with respect to a very serious matter involving natural gas. In view of very widespread concern and uncertainty in western Canada concerning the implications of the two natural gas taxes in the national energy policy and the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) recorded in Hansard of January 12 respecting the committee stage of "oil and gas energy legislation where hon. members opposite may call all the witnesses they desire and examine them on the impact which this bill will have on the economy," I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the government take the initiative in seeking the consent of the House for the referral of the two natural gas tax bills to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works after second reading with authority to hear witnesses from natural gas producers and consumers such as the Federation of Alberta Gas Co-ops and the City of Medicine Hat.

LABOUR DISPUTES

B.C. TELEPHONE DISPUTE—CALL FOR EXPRESSION OF CONCERN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That this House express its concern over the public-be-damned attitude of the foreign-owned B.C. Telephone Company monopoly in British Columbia which, in spite of three mediation reports accepted by the union, has turned down every proposed settlement, demonstrating that this U.S. outfit, by locking out an additional 230 customer service workers since Monday, prefers to deny thousands of residential, commercial and industrial users telephone service rather than meeting the reasonable demands of its employees; and, further, that this House urge the CRTC not to grant the requested rate increases to B.C. Tel until that company has settled its dispute with its workers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION

PROCESSING OF VETERANS' APPLICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I too rise on a matter which is both urgent and pressing. It concerns the length of time the Canadian Pension Commission takes to process veterans' applications. Some veterans have had to wait more than a year to get their cases before the medical advisory branch. As these citizens responded immediately to the need of the country during World War II and as it was patently obvious that the resources of the pension commission would be strained as the veterans aged, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House urge the acting minister to have the same consideration for the veterans as the veterans had for Canada and to expedite the processing of pension applications by all possible means.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES ON NATIVE RESERVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, the Canadian government has announced its intention to provide Barbados with a $6.5 million loan to improve its water supply system so that 98 per cent of all households on that island can receive water service by 1985. While most Canadians should be proud of their ability to aid less fortunate countries in this way, they should also be aware that less than 50 per cent of the homes in native communities across Canada are properly serviced, and even where running water is available the quality is often so poor that it contributes significantly to the already appalling health conditions found on most reserves. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That this House condemn the government for its disgraceful lack of priority setting where native people are concerned and direct the government to act immediately to improve and upgrade housing and water services on Canada's native reserves, which are currently trailing well behind national standards.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

MINING

CALL FOR TABLING OF DEVELOPMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put a motion before the House. The prospects of expansion in the Canadian mining industry are favourable if sufficient growth capital can be found and made available. As much of the growth capital is self-generated, the House welcomes the policy statement by the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) in an address to the Alberta chamber of resources recently in which she stated, and I quote: "Further, the government has no plan to increase the tax burden of the mineral sector at this time."

As this appears to be firm government policy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet):

That the government table in this House within the next several weeks an over-all current mining and mineral development policy paper, including a long-term taxation policy, mineral lease policy, transportation policy, safety policy and manpower upgrading and supply policy.

EMPLOYMENT

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAMS FOR THE DISABLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Government of Canada has obviously not been listening to the concerns of disabled Canadians, as witnessed by the wage subsidy program announced yesterday by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Government of Canada immediately bring before this House legislation providing that all employers having contracts with the government make a provision for affirmative action programs to employ disabled Canadians that will provide them with real job opportunities and promote the realization of the full participation of disabled persons in the social life and development of Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR RENEWAL OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH PRODUCING PROVINCES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in the House the minister indicated, in response to a question from the hon. member for Athabasca, some willingness—and accordingly gave a ray of hope on the part of the federal government—to modify the government's rigid position with respect to the oil and gas pricing agreement and to certain provisions of the National Energy Program. At the same time, the colleague of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, was in the province of Alberta escalating further the confrontation and widening the rift by indulging in yet another vicious attack upon the industry in the province of Alberta, which I must say casts a rather bad reflection upon the sincerity of the minister and indeed of this government.

Since the Minister of Finance now seems to have opened the door somewhat, may I ask him, in the interests of all concerned and particularly in the interest of improving the atmosphere, if he would use his good influence in urging his colleague to refrain from using his traditional inflammatory tactics, and to establish a negotiating stance of common sense and practical reasoning so that negotiations can be renewed and an energy agreement concluded.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I have not had a chance, Madam Speaker, to read all of the minister's statements in Alberta, but what I have read indicates that he is attempting to clarify some facts that have been obscured, that have not been fully understood. I do not find anything in his statements that is inflammatory. On the contrary, the minister has repeated the willingness of the Government of Canada to continue negotiations in good faith and has continuously invited the government of Alberta to enter into negotiations with the same outlook and the same attitude. That has always been the attitude of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, there seems to be reluctance on the part of the federal government to initiate any new attempt to negotiate. Could the minister enlighten the House as to what progress has been made in terms of establishing a common set of numbers with respect to revenue sharing and supply projections inasmuch as that seems to be one of the basic and fundamental problems in terms of getting back to the negotiating table. For example, the federal government contends that Ottawa will not require any imports of oil by 1990, while the province of Alberta suggests we will be requiring some 734,000 barrels a day. In the area of revenue sharing, the federal government contends that the province's share is 43 per cent; the province contends it is 28 per cent. Has any progress been made in establishing a common set of numbers upon which the two levels of government can agree?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not think it will be possible to make very much progress in establishing a common data base until there is a readiness to have meetings of officials on a continuing basis at which these numbers could be examined. I agree with the hon. member that it ought to be possible and an effort should be undertaken to reach a common understanding of the facts, and that can be done only by a resumption, on a continuing basis, of discussions between officials of both governments.

Mr. Mazankowski: The point must be made that it is the Government of Canada which has exercised unilateralism, so it should be the federal government which becomes the initiator in terms of getting back to the negotiating table. Canadians are finding it increasingly more difficult to understand the hypocrisy of the government. It is attacking an industry in one part of the country and bailing out industries in other parts of the country. When can we expect the government to act with some equality in terms of equal treatment for industries in all parts of the country?

● (1120)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member raised the question of the negotiations. It is important to point out that after the Government of Canada released its energy plan and after the budget was delivered, the Prime Minister undertook and expressed a willingness to enter into negotiations with the Premier of Alberta. It is my understanding that at that time the premier was of the view discussions should take place initially between officials of both governments and that it was inappropriate to begin discussions between himself and the Prime Minister; that has been the situation up to the present time. I hope the hon. member's question will encourage all participants, especially the government of Alberta, to come forward more readily to have serious discussions on this problem.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, in view of what seems to be a rather conciliatory approach by the Minister of Finance, would he seize upon the opportunity to become more involved in the negotiating process? As long as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is engaged alone in dealing with the province of Alberta, the division will continue and there will be a further inflammation of the current rift. Will the Minister of Finance seize upon this opportunity to become personally involved in the negotiations?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I do not believe the issues involved between the Government of Canada and the producing provinces are matters of personality.

Mr. Mazankowski: I think they are.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not believe that by shifting the negotiators a solution would occur.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister might be surprised.

Mr. MacEachen: In my opinion that is somewhat naive.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING UNITED STATES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Last night in Edmonton the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made the following statement:

> At least they haven't brought in the CIA like they did in certain other countries.

As our relations with the United States are of vital importance to Canada in areas of defence, fishing, trade, and many others too numerous to mention, is the minister's statement a signal of change in the direction of the attitude of the government toward the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would be anxious to help the hon. member. Could he elaborate? They have not brought in the CIA for what? I do not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I hope this is not my supplementary question, but to clarify my question to the Prime Minister, the statement was made with reference to complaints by national oil companies from the United States operating in Canada. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that they always complain, but "at least they haven't brought in the CIA." Is this the signal of a new direction for Canada in foreign affairs?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think one would be stupid to think that.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REPORTED TESTING OF CHEMICAL DEFOLIANTS

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I have a report from the United States army known as the Gagetown report. It shows that in 1966 our forces at CFB Gagetown participated with the American army in the testing of chemical defoliants, among them the carcinogenic agents orange, purple and white destined for use in Vietnam. Would the Prime Minister tell us why the government has steadfastly denied for so many years that Canadian forces ever participated in such testing?

• (1125)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not understand a word of the question. If the hon. member would speak more slowly and hon. members opposite would keep quiet, I will attempt to answer it.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, my question arises out of a report I have from the United States army. It is known as the Gagetown report. It shows that in 1966 our forces at CFB Gagetown, New Brunswick, participated with the American army in the testing of chemical defoliants, among them the agents orange, purple and white, all of which are carcinogens. Would the Prime Minister please tell us why his government for so many years has steadfastly denied that Canadian forces participated in such testing?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, something which happened in 1966 is not fresh in my memory. If the hon. member would permit, I will take the question as notice.

Madam Speaker: One supplementary from the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, my question was: Why has he denied that we participated in anything involved with the Vietnam war? I think that question requires a simple answer, whether he knows the details with regard to 1966 or not. Why does he deny we have ever participated in anything to do with the Vietnam war when I have proof here that we were, indeed, involved?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know in what way the hon. member suggests we were involved in the Vietnam war. If there were some joint experiences between Canadian and American forces, of which I know nothing, until the hon. member gives me time to inquire I have no evidence that they had to do with the Vietnam war. There have been joint NORAD operations. There have been joint NATO operations. I do not think it is sound to conclude that every member of NORAD or NATO was involved in the war in Vietnam, which was a war which involved the United States.

TESTING OF CHEMICAL DEFOLIANTS—MONITORING OF EFFECTS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Was her department informed of the Gagetown testing? Has the ministry monitored any possible health hazards to the general population in the vicinity, as well as Canadian personnel involved in the Gagetown operation?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am not familiar with this case, and I will inquire and get all the details that can be uncovered.

ENERGY

TAXES ON OIL AND NATURAL GAS—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING POSSIBLE REDUCTION

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the statements made yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to Indian bands in Alberta to the effect that he would try to find ways to reduce the 8 per cent wellhead tax on oil and the 30 per cent tax on natural gas, did he have the assurance of the Minister of Finance that in fact he could do that? Is the Minister of Finance now actively pursuing positive policies which will benefit Indians in this area?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not heard the comments of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on that subject. I have no intention of changing those particular legislative proposals, which are already before the House.

LOSS OF REVENUE BY INDIAN BANDS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): My supplementary question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the potential loss of many millions of dollars in income committed by Indian bands have made because of the revenue they have been receiving from natural gas and oil, is the minister actively making representations to the Minister of Finance about the serious nature of this problem? Is he encouraging him to make some changes?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I have met with Indian groups about the whole question of the impact this will have upon their revenues. I intend to meet with them again to explore how serious the impact may or may not be. Certainly some of their concerns were allayed in the sense that they thought certain regulations would be prejudicial when, indeed, they would not be. I intend to meet with them again for further clarification. After those meetings are complete I shall be pleased to report to the hon. member. Their concerns are certainly familiar to the Minister of Finance. As I say, we are going through the process of examining whether, indeed, it is having the type of impact which they envisage.

EDUCATION

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING OF POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Under the federal government's established programs financial scheme, the government funnels some $3 billion to the provinces to help pay the operating costs of post-secondary institutions in the country. In light of the government's budget of October 28, which stated that the federal government intends to reduce substantially transfer payments to the provinces in areas under provincial jurisdiction, will the minister advise the House whether the government is planning to withdraw support for post-secondary education in Canada either by pulling out of established programs financing or reducing significantly the post-secondary education portion of that shared-cost program?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I would just add one element to the hon. member's preamble. While it is true that over $3 billion per year is transferred to the provinces for the purpose of post-secondary education, I would like to add that there is also the transfer of tax points which amount to approximately $1 billion and which bring the total federal contribution to post-secondary education to $4 billion.

Of course, we are quite aware of the importance of federal contributions to post-secondary education in Canada. We are committed to seeing an excellent post-secondary education program continue in Canada, but, as in other areas, we are interested in seeing improvements made in the way federal funds are spent.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State; he did not answer my previous question. Since support for post-secondary education under established programs funding is designed in large part to equalize educational opportunities across the country, does the minister realize that any major withdrawal of that support would devastate the quality of university education, especially in my own region of the Atlantic provinces, that it would cause student fees to skyrocket throughout the country, that it would cripple the economies of university towns and, in fact, would undermine the government's own commitment to increase substantially research and development in the country?

In light of those facts, will the government launch a joint federal-provincial inquiry, review or perhaps even a royal commission to investigate university financing before it makes significant changes to this important area of our public life?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I fully agree with the hon. member that federal involvement in post-secondary education in this country has been essential to the development of our excellent educational system. I also indicated that it was in the best interest of both sides of this House to see that funds be expended as efficiently as possible. Perhaps I could draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that on Tuesday next I shall be meeting with the provincial ministers of education and that we will probably touch upon this subject. Also there is no doubt that this matter is of great interest to the academic as well as the political community throughout Canada. An important seminar is to be held at Simon Fraser University on February 12 and 13 and it will bring together representatives of the academic community. My officials and I intend to be in attendance and we shall of course see that federal funds are spent as wisely as possible and that federal objectives are being met.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN BENEFIT PAYMENTS IN GASPÉ AREA

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration or, in his absence, his parliamentary secretary. On December 8, I informed the minister that unemployment insurance payments were greatly delayed in the Gaspé peninsula offices. This situation has not improved and 200 claimants at the Chandler unemployment insurance office have been waiting for their benefits for eight to ten weeks. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the situation and what action he intends to take so that these claimants may receive their benefits in the very near future.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his question and for having advised the minister's office and the department of this problem. Two specialists from headquarters have been sent to the Chandler office to help local officers solve this problem. We hope that the files of the 200 claimants involved will have been examined and the situation corrected before the end of next week. We shall also be reorganizing the office to ensure that this type of problem does not occur again.

FINANCE

PROFITS OF BANKS—INCREASE IN BANKRUPTCIES—POSSIBLE RELATIONSHIP

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. We are faced with bank interest rates at or near an all-time high and bank profits averaging a 14 per cent increase this year, with the profits of the Royal Bank up 21 per cent and the Bank of Nova Scotia up 22.3 per cent. At the same time bankruptcies in the farming community are up 79 per cent, business bankruptcies have increased by 16.7 per cent and consumer bankruptcies are up by 17.5 per cent. Does the minister see any relationship between high bank interest, high bank profits and high bankruptcies?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there are many interrelationships.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is this. What advice does the Minister of Finance have for the people of Canada—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Pray!

Mr. Deans: —who during this year will be faced with about 12 per cent inflation, food prices rising by 13 per cent to 15 per cent, energy costs increasing by almost 25 per cent and wages falling behind the rising cost of living for the fourth straight year? What advice can the minister give the people of Canada in their efforts to cope with this situation?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the question is too general to be answered on the orders of the day.

BANKRUPTCIES

RE-MOR MANAGEMENT INVESTMENT—C & M FINANCIAL SERVICES—INVESTIGATION CONDUCTED BY COMMITTEE OF ONTARIO LEGISLATURE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister will be aware of a summons being issued to the Superintendent of Insurance in his department directing him to appear before a special committee of the Ontario legislature which is looking into the circumstances surrounding the bankruptcy of Re-Mor Management Investment and the receivership of C & M Financial Services. Would the minister advise the House whether or not he is aware of any other federal officials or appointees who may have been issued a summons, and will he co-operate with the committee of the legislature in its investigation?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I have heard that the Superintendent of Insurance might be called before a standing committee of the Ontario legislature as well as an officer responsible for the trust companies section of the Department of Insurance. I feel, Madam Speaker, that this situation should be fully looked into. First of all, this committee of the Ontario legislature is considering the issue of a licence by a provincial agency to a provincial corporation, the Re-Mor company, and might eventually consider the issue of a provincial licence to a federally incorporated company. I believe that, according to jurisprudence—and this is the opinion of the legal advisers of the Department of Insurance—a provincial body has no jurisdiction to call witnesses to testify in matters of federal jurisdiction.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, inasmuch as Astra Trust, Re-Mor Management Investment and C & M Financial Consultants are interconnected and since the winding down of C & M Financial Consultants was a condition for the granting of the Astra Trust charter, will the minister co-operate with this committee by allowing it to examine the three RCMP reports on Astra Trust which recommended that a trust licence not be issued?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I find the conclusions of the hon. member very strange. I have indicated several times in the House that the incorporation application of the Astra company had been examined closely and exhaustively by the Department of Insurance. As the hon. member indicated at the time, the Superintendent of Insurance had even asked the RCMP to provide some information about the applicants. Following extensive and exhaustive investigations, the Superintendent of Insurance concluded that he could recommend to the Minister of Finance that an incorporation charter be granted.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS OFFICES—PROPOSED MEETING OF PRESIDENT WITH MINISTER

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. During the course of questioning at yesterday's Standing Committee on Transport, CN President Dr. R. A. Bandeen informed committee members that he had proposals for the transport minister regarding the retention of CN Express offices in Charlottetown and other maritime centres. He advised me that he will be requesting a meeting with the Minister of Transport some day next week to present his proposals for the minister's consideration. In view of the urgency of the situation, that being that some CN employees have already received their notices of lay-off, will the minister assure this House that he will do everything possible to allow Dr. Bandeen to meet and present his proposals for the maintenance of CN Express offices in Charlottetown and other maritime centres?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has described the situation very well. Dr. Bandeen is going to tell me the results of his review of that situation next week. Obviously I will react to that. There is something I want to mention which is rather important. A notice of lay-off is a procedural matter which is necessary in order that an employee can take advantage of the relocation, retraining or pre-pensioning system which is part of the retrenchment operations of CN Express. The hon. member should bear that in mind. Something else to bear in mind is that when a person loses his employment with CN Express, and I have proof of this, he often finds his way into working with another company which had rivalled CN Express in the past. Consequently some jobs are moving. They are not being lost to the area as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gass: At the meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport on December 18, a motion was moved, voted on and agreed to that "CN Railways continue the CN Express service at the minimum of the 1979 level". I am sure the minister is aware of this resolution. Did the minister consider this and will it be discussed with Dr. Bandeen next week?

Mr. Pepin: That is part of the present exercise. The recommendation was that a review should be made and a review is now taking place. The results will be announced next week.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE TO DEAL WITH OCCURRENCE OF DISASTERS ON RESERVES

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question concerns natural disasters which might occur on Indian reservations and is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Does the department have a policy whereby, in the event of a catastrophe such as a serious flood on a reservation, departmental members will help the Indians?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker. When there are catastrophes of that nature, the department tries to respond as constructively as possible with financial and other resources.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, what I was getting at was whether the department has a special team. A disaster occurred in my constituency several weeks ago and no one appeared for ten days. Are Indian people able to get funding from the federal-provincial funds allocated for these disasters? As the minister knows, they live in a sort of no man's land situation.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, that is somewhat of a hypothetical question inasmuch as the Indians, to my knowledge, have not chosen to go that route. What they have done is communicate a problem which has all the earmarks of a catastrophe of the nature the hon. member is talking about. They should immediately communicate with our regional director-general. I know of examples where he has endeavoured to respond with financial resources and personnel, though perhaps not personnel direct from the department. They may contract people who have the competence, depending on the nature of the catastrophe, to respond in the most effective way possible.

As for the particular case the hon. member talks of in his constituency, he has not informed me, at least orally, about the situation. I will be pleased to look into the matter and will in fact do so.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER NEW POLICY WILL BE ANNOUNCED

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

With a view to seconding the support from thousands of Canadians directly involved in international development and co-operation, to maintaining their support for the government initiative in the North-South dialogue, could the Right Hon. Prime Minister tell the House, in light of the two reports which were tabled in the House in July and December by the parliamentary task forces on North-South relations, whether the government is now reviewing its public assistance policies and whether we can expect that in the near future the government will make a statement on the revision of those policies so as to ensure that people will show renewed interest in the Prime Minister's personal endeavour as regards the North-South dialogue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for Gloucester and the task force he chaired for the interest they have generated in this issue. I for one believe it is important that the Canadian public be made aware of the recommendations of the committee. Speaking for the government, we are obviously quite delighted to have that report and we have begun to study it. I leave it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to expound on what action the government might take in future. For the time being, however, I can assure the hon. member that besides increasing the funds earmarked for international aid, as announced by the Minister of Finance, I have had several exchanges with the CIDA president, Mr. Massé, and we are steering a course of action which will closely parallel the over-all recommendations of the hon. member's task force.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY LINE—SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS OF DENE NATION

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Only three years ago Mr. Justice Thomas Berger, who was appointed by the Prime Minister, recommended a ten-year moratorium on any pipeline project in the Mackenzie Valley so that the Dene Nation would have time to settle their land claims with the federal government, and yet the EARP report has recommended that the pipeline may go ahead as early as next year. Will the Prime Minister assure this House that he will respect the recommendations of the Dene Nation, Mr. Justice Berger and the government of the Northwest Territories and that no pipeline will be approved until the settlement of claims has been implemented in the Mackenzie Valley?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I might deal with the hon. member's question, Madam Speaker. It is true the EARP panel did inject some very serious reservations in terms of environmental dangers with respect to the Norman Wells pipeline. Undoubtedly that will be given very serious consideration by the National Energy Board. In terms of the decision whether or not to go ahead, it would be premature at this stage because, as the hon. member may be aware, the National Energy Board is dealing with the question. According to my information, it does not expect to come in with a finding for at least six to eight weeks. At that time a decision can be made by the government as to whether the suggested recommendations be implemented or not. Certainly it is premature to deal with it now; for all we know, the National Energy Board may not approve it.

Mr. Ittinuar: I will direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister commit his government to the settlement of claims before the pipeline is built?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, it is my hope, and I believe this is the feeling of the leadership of the Dene, that the claims question can get under way and progress very rapidly over the course of the next year. Certainly Mr. Erasmus, the head of the Dene, indicated he would be ready for the appointment of a negotiator. I hope to be able to do that very shortly and that some real progress can be made on land claims, irrespective of what happens with respect to Norman Wells.

STATISTICS ACT

DECENNIAL CENSUS—RECRUITMENT OF COMMISSIONERS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services, partly to allow him to pierce the veil of cobwebs that surrounds him during question period. In response to a question by my colleague the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville in respect of the census that is to take place, the minister indicated that traditionally a list of nominations provided by government party MPs and local representatives has been a source for potential census commissioners.

Quite apart from the fact that it is going to be rather difficult for the minister to consult his members from any point west of Winnipeg, I would ask him whether he will now change the policy and take a more impartial view of the appointment of census commissioners? The people of Canada expect impartiality and do not want any tinge of partisanship or the suggestion of partisanship on the part of the people conducting the census. Will the minister now commit himself to change this policy?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): First of all, Madam Speaker, I am very grateful to the hon. gentleman for his consideration in the removal of, as he points out, the cobwebs that surround me. I would point out to him that, in effect, the tradition being followed through in this census is one which definitely was about to be adopted by my predecessor in that position in the former government. I would point out to him as well that the quality of the individuals who are to be hired in this process is established through very objective means indeed.

An hon. Member: Liberal Party membership.

Mr. Blais: Of course, I have received representations from members of all parties in this House and those representations are being taken seriously.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the minister is certainly not in the category of "might have been", he is in the category of "never was" in terms of what his predecessor might or might not have done. Let me say to the minister that it seems to me this policy is a stinging indictment of the operation of Canada Manpower Centres across this country as well as an indictment of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the capacity of that body to find suitable people to carry out the census, particularly at a time of outstanding unemployment in our country. I simply want to ask the minister specifically whether he will reconsider and allow manpower to obtain these people, so we can be in a position where there will be some impartiality in respect of selection based on merit and not political affiliation?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. gentleman that I am very serious when I indicate that the quality of the individuals who are selected is tested through an objective process, including an interview.

An hon. Member: And Liberal party membership.

Mr. Blais: The system the hon. gentleman refers to is a referral system, namely, how the individuals are referred. I pointed out to him that the referral system is the traditional referral system authorized by Parliament under section 5 of the Statistics Act. In terms of the performance of the individuals, I would point out to him that the Canadian census is recognized internationally as being a superior census and we are going to continue to achieve that end by the employment of individuals who are able to carry forward that responsibility after having conducted a very thorough selection process.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR TRANSPORT

LACK OF FACILITIES IN NORTHWEST NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Although I would like once again to draw his attention to the problem of railway services in my riding, this morning my question relates to transport services generally. I would like to ask him whether his department or the Canadian Transport Commission are planning an early review of the full question of regional transportation within the Atlantic area. I ask this while emphasizing particularly the shortcomings in air services in northwestern New Brunswick, the region I represent in the House, of course.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there are two comments I can make on that subject. First, we are making a general review of VIA operations. Two or three years after setting up the corporation the government feels the need for reflection and that will lead to discussions with specialized groups, and with hon. members of course.

Second, several weeks ago I began an exchange of views with the transport ministers of the Atlantic provinces, including Newfoundland, on a concept whereby we would make up an envelope which would enable the provinces, in conjunction with the federal government, to adopt what I feel would be a much more constructive, much more effective and much more intelligent approach to transportation in those provinces. For instance, we might end up by saving money on certain means of transportation and those savings could then be invested in other modes of transportation. It is with that background in mind that some day I would like to reply at length to the hon. member's question.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board who on several occasions has promised the House speedy action on introducing a Crown corporations bill similar to that introduced by the Conservative government in 1979. Where is that bill and why has the minister not kept that commitment?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am keeping that commitment.

An hon. Member: Where is the bill?

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, it is nice to see that the minister has not lost his sense of humour since joining the treasury benches. My supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board is this. He will be aware that Bill C-42, the bill to create a Crown corporation for the post office, includes a provision which would allow the Postmaster General to give secret directives to the new Crown corporation. In view of the fact that these secret directives are directly contrary to one of the central elements of the previous Crown corporations bill, namely, that secret directives would not be allowed, how is that element of the policy being changed by the President of the Treasury Board, or will it be included in his bill?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, great progress has been made in ironing out a number of difficulties of which I am sure the hon. member is aware. Constructive criticism has been received concerning the prior bill. On that specific point, the provisions of the omnibus bill will, of course, override the provisions of any other bill affecting Crown corporations. That was the intent, so the law will have to be made compatible at some point. I am not speaking specifically with respect to the Crown corporation for the post office, but speaking generally right across government. That is the purpose of the omnibus legislation.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—DELAYS IN AIRCRAFT CONTROL

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. When the move was made by the air traffic controllers at Toronto International Airport on January 10 of this year to the new centre, they were faced with all new equipment. Since then the travelling public has had to put up with interminable delays because of the system put in there. Will the minister indicate that in fact it is not the joint enroute terminal system, but rather the integrated communications control system and the operations information display system that are causing the trouble, particularly the communications system since there is no adequate back-up, controllers are afraid of it and are, therefore, slowing down the operation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the knowledge I have of these events corresponds exactly with the question that has now been raised; it is a combination of both. My hon. friend's question is "right on."

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, it may be that I am "right on", but is it not true that in spite of all this fancy radar equipment we do not have an adequate back-up in communications, and is the minister prepared to make some changes to correct that situation?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I do not know how to answer that question. The JETS system has been the subject of criticism, particularly on the part of the president of CATCA recently. Is that the question my hon. friend is raising? On that one there is a running debate, and the views of CATCA's president are well known. They are contradicted by others, who say that the JETS system is quite acceptable. One of the advantages it has is that it can be improved upon all the time, but I am not too sure about the direction of the answer my hon. friend is looking for. Perhaps we could have a gentleman's conversation later and straighten things out so that his next question on that subject will be clearer in my mind.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FULTON—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. MUNRO (HAMILTON EAST)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which arises from the question period yesterday. I note that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) is not in the House at this point, so perhaps I will ask Your Honour not to rule on this until both the minister and I are again present in the House. However, I will outline my question of privilege very briefly so that Your Honour can be aware of it.

Madam Speaker: I have notice of the hon. member's question of privilege. If he wants to delay it until such time as the minister is in the House, I think it would be much easier to deal with. However, if he does not want to delay it, I will hear him now.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I think it is important enough that I place the question of privilege at least briefly on the record. It arises from a statement made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development yesterday.

Mr. Kempling: Here comes the minister.

Mr. Fulton: The statement is recorded at page 6452 of Hansard. It was with respect to Amax, and I quote:

> —a panel of experts has been set up to look into the matter, notice of which has been communicated to the Nishga tribal chief, Mr. Gosnell.

This is an extremely important issue. I have raised it with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) on numerous other occasions in this House.

I have taken the time to check, and in fact no panel has been set up, and no notice has been communicated to Mr. James Gosnell, president and chief of the Nishga Tribal Council. I am sure that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will be able to clarify this. I think there has been an inadvertent misleading of the House, and I would appreciate its being clarified on the record because what the Nishgas have requested and what has been requested on many occasions in this House, and by many church leaders and groups in this country, is a public inquiry.

The media were seriously misled by the statement yesterday, which is recorded in Hansard. I am sure the minister would be prepared to respond to what I am sure was an inadvertent misleading of the House.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's comments. There was no intention on my part to mislead the House. Before I can clarify this matter, I will have to check into it. I will endeavour to make a clarification on Monday.

Subject to checking, it was my information that the scientific panel was constituted. It may be in the process of being constituted, which is apparently at variance with what was said yesterday. I am prepared to check that. I was under the impression that the nature of the panel, its proposed existence and so forth were communicated to Mr. Gosnell. These are the elements I would like to check, and I will clarify on Monday, if that is satisfactory.

Madam Speaker: I do not feel that this is a question of privilege. The hon. member was seeking clarification, and the minister did give some clarification today, but I think the best way to deal with this question is to try to ask a question in question period.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McMILLAN—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. FOX

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I will be very brief. In the oral question period I posed two questions to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) concerning the established programs financing scheme. In reply to my questions I believe the minister might inadvertently have misled the House. He probably would not want that misleading information on the public record.

In my preamble I said that under the established programs financing scheme, $3 billion is funnelled to the provinces to help them pay the operating costs of post-secondary education institutions. In his reply to my questions the Secretary of State said that established programs financing included federal funds to provinces through cash payments and through tax points and that I perhaps had not included the tax points in my own calculation of $3 billion. I might refer the minister and the House to the Government of Canada's own statement of financial operations for the fiscal year 1980-81, of November, 1980.

That statement makes it clear that the $3 billion figure I quoted includes both cash payments, amounting to a total of about $1.6 billion, and tax points, totalling about $1.4 billion. That is for the fiscal year 1980-81. I am sure that the Secretary of State would not want to leave those figures he quoted on the public record because they are clearly wrong. The figure is not $4 billion but, rather, $3 billion.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I would like to verify the exact amounts. I know that they are indeed considerable. If we add to established programs financing post-secondary transfers of funds and tax points the amount of money the federal government puts into the Canada student loans program, the bilingualism in education program and other programs related to education, the amount would remain quite substantial, but I would just like to check the figures and to come up with the exact total amounts transferred to the provinces by the federal government in terms both of tax points and tax transfers.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SHIELDS—STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MR. LALONDE

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I refer to a statement quoted today by me regarding an hon. member who made a statement which I feel demeans every member in this House in the eyes of the free world. It affects every member's relations with the United States of America, and particularly with the new administration. The statement demeans the members of this House who are members of a parliamentary committee which shortly will be visiting the United States and the new administration. The statement I quoted this morning during question period was as follows:

> At least they didn't bring in the CIA like they have in other foreign countries.

I feel that that statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) clearly reflects on every member of this House with respect to relations with the countries of the free world, particularly the United States. I ask you, Madam Speaker, to direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to withdraw that statement immediately so that all members of this House may deal directly with our strongest ally and friend, the United States, in the open and friendly manner we have enjoyed up to this point.

Madam Speaker: I had to listen to the hon. member in order to know what his question of privilege was. To begin with, it is not a question of privilege. Second, he was referring to a statement made outside the House, which certainly does not constitute a question of privilege. I think the hon. member is stretching the rules quite a lot today. I ask him to read the rules so that he can understand what a question of privilege allows him to do. However, he has made a point.

MR. OBERLE—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. TRUDEAU

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, with your indulgence I would just like to add another dimension to the question of privilege of my hon. friend.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry. It is not a question of privilege. I have already dealt with that matter. Unless the hon. member wants to raise a new question of privilege—he did not give me notice, and his question of privilege does not seem to flow from the deliberations of today—I do not see how he can smuggle in a question of privilege at this time. However, he may have a point.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I have a new question of privilege. In response to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that in speaking to a group of native people in Alberta his minister made a stupid statement which does not deserve comment. That is what I took the Prime Minister's answer to my friend, the hon. member for Athabasca, to mean. The Prime Minister, by attributing stupid statements to him, has certainly affected the privilege of a member.

This is not the first statement of this kind that the minister has made. He made a statement in committee a couple of days ago, when he was questioned about the difference between a 25 per cent government ownership in a certain industry and the practice of other countries, in which he said that this was only the beginning, thus implying that the government intends to assume even greater ownership of the industry. That, in the opinion of some members, was another stupid statement. When the Prime Minister says that some of his ministers make stupid statements and he says that in the House, I would say it affects the privileges and concerns of all members.

Madam Speaker: I would say that this might affect the privilege of that hon. member in question, but not of all hon. members. At any rate the word stupid is not unparliamentary. Commenting on the speeches of ministers does not enter into the purview of a question of privilege, so I have to say to the hon. member that he does not have a question of privilege.

1. Was the most recent annual report of the National Harbours Board published in 1978 for the fiscal year 1977 and, if so, for what reason has there been a long delay in producing a report for the fiscal years 1978 and 1979?

2. What steps will the board undertake to ensure that such a delay will not reoccur?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. No. The most recent annual report of the NHB tabled on July 3, 1980, was for fiscal year 1979. The annual report for 1978 has been printed but not yet tabled or distributed. The reasons for the delay are: internal NHB delays were incurred by this problem was resolved prior to the preparation of the 1979 annual report. Delays were incurred in the printing process. The 1978 report was ready for tabling immediately prior to the dissolution of Parliament in December, 1979. Subsequent events created delays which were beyond the control of the NHB.

2. Steps have been taken to ensure that delays in publishing the annual report will not recur as evidenced by the early completion of the 1979 report.

RCMP—CANADIAN PLEASURE BOATS

Question No. 1,518—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many American ports along the Canadian border other than Morristown, N.Y., is the RCMP observing, or being assisted in observing Canadian pleasure boats stopping for dinner at U.S. restaurants and (a) what is the name of each port (b) how many persons have been checked by the RCMP for not reporting back to Canada Customs on returning to Canada?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. None. (a) Not applicable. (b) Only statistics available show approximately 400 boats checked.

2. RCMP does not observe or assist in observing Canadian pleasure boats stopping for dinner at U.S. restaurants.

3. Brockville detachment was not given specific instructions during the 1980 boating season to concentrate on boats visiting Morristown, N.Y. It is within the authority of the member in charge of the Brockville detachment to initiate customs inquiries.

RCMP—DIVISIONAL HEADQUARTERS FOR FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 1,573—Mr. Howie:

1. What is the status of the new RCMP "J" divisional headquarters building planned for Fredericton, New Brunswick?

2. On what date will tenders be called?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The division headquarters building for Fredericton, New Brunswick, is in the early stages of planning. At the present time, RCMP Headquarters have received the division's space requirements and are reviewing their needs to ensure that they conform with force and government policy. Listed below is the tentative planning schedule for the division headquarters building:

Consultant study	1981/82
Plans and specifications	1982/83
Construction start	1983/84

2. Tender call is estimated to take place some time in 1982-83.

BONUS AMOUNTS TO SM AND EX GROUPS

Question No. 1,694—Mr. Herbert:

1. Will the bonus amounts payable effective April-1980-to SM and EX groups be allocated to departments on a proportional basis and will the sums be carried in the departmental estimates?

2. Has a percentage amount been determined?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The design of the bonus system has not been completed and the rules of application set. Therefore, the method of allocation is not known. Presently, increases in salaries are based on the performance level of each employee. The funds for these increases are allocated to each department's estimates and are based on performance distribution guidelines of no more than 30 per cent of the assessed population being rated above the level of fully satisfactory (i.e. superior or outstanding).

2. No. The percentage amount for bonus payments has not yet been determined.

CITIZENSHIP APPLICATIONS—USE OF DISCRETION

Question No. 1,704—Mr. Harquail:

1. Since February 15, 1977, how many applications for citizenship has the citizenship judge decided to recommend an exercise of discretion under section 14 of the Citizenship Act in order to alleviate cases of special and unusual hardship and how many of the recommendations have been carried out by the minister?

2. Since February 15, 1977, how many appeals under section 13 of the act has the court recommended the exercise of discretion under section 14 of the act in order to alleviate cases of special and unusual hardship and how many of the recommendations have been carried out by the minister?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): 1. Since February 15, 1977, Citizenship judges have made 47 recommendations under section 14 of the Citizenship Act for the exercise of discretion in order to alleviate cases of special and unusual hardship. Of these, 19 have been carried out.

2. Since February 15, 1977, the Federal Court has made 14 recommendations for the exercise of discretion in order to alleviate cases of special and unusual hardship. Two have been carried out.

NOTE: In certain cases where discretion was not exercised to grant citizenship because of special and unusual hardship, individuals have subsequently been able to meet the requirements of the act and to become Canadian citizens.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED—PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,811—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past three years, how many persons have been engaged by Defence Construction (1951) Limited for a period of less than (a) two years (b) one year and what are the terms for termination in such cases?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): (a) and (b) Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. only engages persons on an indeterminate basis or for periods of six months or less. The number of persons engaged for terms of six months or less in each of the past three years is as follows:

1978-79	117
1979-80	82

The terms of termination are two weeks' notice.

PUBLIC SERVANTS—INADEQUATE PERFORMANCE—SALARY DEDUCTIONS

Question No. 1,846—Mr. Herbert:

What amount was deducted from the salaries of public servants in (a) 1979-80 (b) 1980 to date in cases where performance and/or productivity were considered to be inadequate?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Federal public service salary administration provides for the payment of salary increases that are related directly to performance. This administration also provides for the retardation or eliminaton of salary increases where employees demonstrate less than satisfactory performance. The penalty, therefore, for inadequate performance is denial of salary increase; salary administration in such circumstances does not provide for the deduction of an amount from salary. Sustained inadequate performance will have a severe impact on an employee's career in the public service and could lead to demotion or release.

CONTENT OF MAIN ESTIMATES

Question No. 1,850—Mr. Herbert:

For each of the past three fiscal years, what was the total amount of the votes which were not included in the government motion referring the main estimates to standing and special committees for consideration?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): The information in the Main Estimates can be divided into two distinct groups, based on the requirement for authorization by Parliament. The breakdown between these two types is provided in the table below. For the past three years, all of the items to be voted and therefore included in an Appropriation Act, have been referred to various standing committees of the House for consideration. However, for information purposes, the main estimates also include the second type of item which do not have vote numbers and do not have to be specifically referred to the standing committees since the authority for these expenditures has already been approved by Parliament through other legislation.

	Main Estimates ($ millions)
	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if questions Nos. 680 and 1,341 could be made orders for returns, those returns would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that questions Nos. 680 and 1,341 be deemed to have been made orders for returns?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Ways and Means

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE ACT

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that a ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act, tabled in the House on Tuesday, October 28, 1980, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TAXATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS NET REVENUES

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that a ways and means motion with respect to the taxation of petroleum and gas revenues, tabled in the House on Tuesday, October 28, 1980, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Lambert: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I want to be assured that the forthcoming bill will comply with the section of the Standing Orders which provides that the bill must be in accordance with the notice of ways and means motion, because this very week an irregularity came up with respect to Bill C-54. This time I want to avoid that by asking the Minister to give us his assurance that there will not be any problem in this regard.

Madam Speaker: I want to remind the hon. member that the part of the bill referred to did comply with the ways and means motion. It was another part of the bill which raised a problem and on which I gave a ruling. But the warning, I suppose, is well taken.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT (1)

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for Minister of Finance) moved that the ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act (1), laid upon the Table on January 22, 1981, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Lambert: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I would have liked to read the notice of ways and means motion in this morning's Votes and Proceedings but there has been no distribution. So, in my opinion we are being asked to play blind man's buff.

[English]

There was no distribution of Votes and Proceedings so we could not see the content of the motion.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hansard also.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is right. Distribution took place but it was delayed somewhat. Since the hon. member is used to receiving those documents at a certain time he may have thought there was no distribution. It did take place but a bit late. I regret that. I offer my apologies to the hon. member, but I must point out to him that the delay was due to the fact that the ways and means motion had to be printed. Hon. members surely appreciate that it is always somewhat more difficult when the House sits at 11 a.m. rather than 2 p.m.

Mr. Lambert: Fair enough, Madam Speaker. Still I must make a reservation. We are being asked to agree to the introduction of a bill and to have it printed, a bill based on a ways and means motion which we did not have an opportunity to read because the notice was tabled only yesterday. It was to appear in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings, but there has been no distribution.

I admit it is more difficult on Friday mornings but the government and the Chair ought to be aware of that. I do not know what time it is but were it left to me I would suggest to the minister that introduction of the bill based on the second motion be postponed until Monday. I do not want to make a fuss but after all we are always asked to give notice. This morning, as it happens, we have not had any notice.

Madam Speaker: I can understand that the hon. member was indeed waiting for the documents which normally are published and available to hon. members some time before the House sits. But I must remind him that the motion was tabled on January 22 and that even though it was not printed at least it was available. I realize that he was expecting the documents to be distributed this morning and they were not. So again I extend my apologies to him but I hope that given the circumstances we will be able to proceed.

Mr. Lambert: Distribution of the Votes and Proceedings enables hon. members to become familiar with the documents. It is their only access because the documents tabled are then—how shall I say—processed routinely and the only way we can have them is to intercept them at that time and have them photocopied. So that is all I am saying. Under the circumstances I think we are proceeding a bit too fast and since I am involved in this I hope we will be given the opportunity to examine the motion published in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings before the minister introduces it this morning to have the bill printed.

Madam Speaker: According to the basic principles underlying our rules, the availability of a document laid on the Table of the House of Commons is not theoretical. The hon. member could in fact consult the document. I know he is wont to do that by looking at the documents we publish and make available to hon. members, but this particular document was available indeed and I think we might proceed.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT (2)

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for Minister of Finance) moved that the ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act (2), laid upon the Table on January 22, 1981, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-50, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, the bill before us on second reading this afternoon—which may be referred to in short as the Customs Tariff Act—proposes a large number of amendments to the Customs Tariff, which the government introduced in three separate notices of ways and means motions. Most amendments in the bill relate to the tariff concessions Canada agreed to in the Tokyo Round trade negotiations which were concluded in Geneva under the auspices of GATT in July, 1979.

In addition, the bill contains provisions to phase out the British preferential tariff on goods imported from Great Britain and Ireland, and to withdraw it on goods from South Africa.

This bill also implements a number of tariff changes which were proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his budget of October 28, as well as certain technical changes which had been proposed by the former government in the December 11, 1979, budget. The bill also transfers the authority for collecting excise tax on imported wines from the Customs Tariff to the Excise Tax Act.

In order to indicate fully the importance of the implementation of the GATT agreements to Canada, I shall if I may, Mr. Speaker, give a brief outline of this institution. We may wonder what is GATT. The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, often known by its English abbreviation of GATT, refers to the multilateral treaty on trade laying down the rules of international trade and the body in Geneva which oversees compliance with the treaty and its promotion worldwide. The main objective of this treaty is to liberalize international trade and put it on a stable basis in order to contribute to the general development, growth and well-being of all the peoples of the world.

The GATT rules, Mr. Speaker, govern trade and trade relations, representing more than 80 per cent of world trade, among the 85 signatory countries. From time to time the signatories agree to undertake a round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations—MTN in short—with the ultimate objective of updating the original treaty. The last round, begun in Tokyo in 1973—and therefore known as the Tokyo Round—and completed in Geneva in June, 1979, was by far the most complex and longest of the seven negotiating rounds held since GATT was established. The general objective of the final agreement was the expansion and greater liberalization of international trade.

I would like to review briefly, Mr. Speaker, the history and background of this institution. GATT has its roots in the post-war reconstruction period. At that time, a number of countries were trying to develop a charter for the International Trade Organization or ITO, which was to have been established as a United Nations specialized agency.

However, because of the slow pace of ITO negotiations, certain countries decided to develop multilateral trade negotiations, given the name of GATT, in order to show in advance what tariff negotiations might be under the charter for the ITO. In January, 1948, nine countries, including Canada, agreed to bring the agreement into force. Since the charter for the ITO was subsequently abandoned, GATT became, by force of circumstance, the only multilateral framework for international trade. As a result, GATT has for over 30 years played the role originally intended for the ITO. After this brief review of the background of GATT, one may wonder about its importance for Canada. Since the vitality of international trade is of the utmost importance for Canada, the agreements governing international trade share in this importance.

We should not lose sight of the fact that, although Canada's domestic market is relatively small, we rank ninth among the world's trading nations. Canada stands alone among the most highly industrialized nations in lacking de facto access to a large domestic market such as is enjoyed by the United States, Japan or many members of the European Economic Community.

We can thus grasp the full importance of an agreement such as GATT which enables Canada to overcome the disadvantages inherent in its relatively small size, or in the relative concentration of its population, by giving it access to foreign markets in accordance with well-established rules. That is why Canada would have suffered a great loss today had we witnessed a strengthening of protectionism and restrictive trade practices at the last multilateral negotiations.

Now, what were Canada's objectives at the Tokyo Round negotiations? Canada, Mr. Speaker had essentially three objectives: first, to promote the development of industry, agriculture and fisheries in Canada and to increase the national income by expanding export opportunities, while ensuring an appropriate level of Canadian tariff protection. The second objective was to avoid a resurgence of protectionism and trade restrictions that adversely affect the interests of an exporting country such as ours. And the third objective, Mr. Speaker, was to improve and strengthen the international trade framework on which we depend heavily.

With these objectives in mind, let us examine the outcome of the Tokyo Round for Canada. The results of the Tokyo Round, from the Canadian point of view, show that significant progress has been made in consolidating Canada's status as a major trading nation. Besides reaching agreement on a broad package of tariff reductions averaging about 30 per cent, the negotiations took an important first step in establishing a number of agreements aimed at dismantling non-tariff barriers to trade.

Canadian tariff reductions for the vast majority of products will be phased in gradually, in such a way as to take into account the competitive position and potential of the various sectors of the Canadian economy. The effect of these reductions will be to lower the cost of the factors of production of Canadian industry, as well as the cost of a wide range of consumer goods. But let us not kid ourselves, these reductions will also challenge Canadian industry to become increasingly competitive on world markets.

The results of the negotiations are therefore of particular importance to Canada. Canada depends upon international trade for its economic well-being to a greater extent than most of its trading partners. The concessions obtained in the multilateral negotiations can, if fully exploited, lead to increased production and employment in Canada. The new, expanded and more certain export opportunities that are being opened up as a result of the negotiations should bring benefits to each region of Canada and to all sectors of the economy.

In short, Mr. Speaker, in so far as trading policy is concerned, the Tokyo Round concessions should establish a solid basis for future growth in a competitive and efficient Canadian economy over the next two decades. Now, let us see how these new measures resulting from the Tokyo Round will apply to Canadian trade. As I have just stated, there are two important aspects to this effort to liberalize world trade, namely, the reduction of tariff measures and the lowering of non-tariff measures. Before discussing the tariff measures we propose to include in the Customs Tariff which are covered in the bill now under study, I would like to explain briefly to the House the second aspect of the GATT agreements, namely, that of non-tariff measures.

Certain of Canada's commitments with respect to the lowering of non-tariff measures were the subject of a discussion paper which I tabled in the House on July 16, 1980, and which was referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for study on October 9 last. This paper deals with the imposition of anti-dumping and countervailing duties and emergency safeguard actions. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am anxious to see the work done on this paper and the standing committee report.

Second, since Canada had undertaken to revise its legislation on customs valuation, on August 29 last I asked the Tariff Board to initiate a review of the draft legislation and to study the impact it would have on customs duties in Canada. Third, there are certain agreements that can be brought into force in Canada without legislative change—most notably those relating to government purchasing practices and technical barriers to trade, which are also part of the non-tariff agreements we signed within the general framework of GATT.

I would like now to deal, perhaps a little longer, with tariff measures. As regards the purely tariff measures, the amendments set out in section 7(1) and schedule II of this bill would implement the tariff concessions Canada agreed to in the Tokyo Round trade negotiations. Canada approved the results of the tariff negotiations in June, 1979, and signed, subject to ratification, two GATT tariff protocols which commit participating countries to the new most favoured nation tariff rates negotiated in the Tokyo Round trade negotiations.

These protocols also set out the rules governing the phase-in of these reduced rates. They require, as a general rule, that participants reduce their tariffs in eight equal annual instalments with the first cut taking effect January 1, 1980. Each country negotiated a number of exceptions to this rule. For example, tariff reductions on steel will not begin until January 1, 1982, in Canada, the United States and the European Community.

Other variations were negotiated for particular products. Canada's tariff reductions are being phased in no more quickly than required by the protocols except in a few cases where there is a clear consensus in the Canadian industry for accelerated reductions. For example, the tariff reduction on computers is being implemented in five annual steps instead of the period provided for in the agreement, and that for brass band instruments is being implemented in one single step. So much so for the cornet players.

The provisions of this bill relating to the outcome of the trade negotiations are the same as those proposed by the former government in a notice of ways and means motion tabled in the House on December 12, 1979. Following the dissolution of Parliament on December 14, an order in council was passed to give interim effect to the first stage of the tariff reductions. The order was revoked when the motion was reintroduced in Parliament on June 2, 1980. In addition to implementing the agreed tariff cuts, the bill provides, in section 5, authority for the government to withdraw concessions in the event other countries should fail to fulfil their obligations under international trade agreements.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal briefly with our proposed amendments to the list of beneficiaries of the British preferential—BP—tariff. This bill also incorporates proposals made by the Conservative government for phasing out the British preferential tariff on goods from Britain and Ireland and withdrawing the British preferential tariff on goods from South Africa. It also revokes three acts of Parliament relating to the preferential trade agreements with these countries. Upon termination of the British preferential tariff treatment, imports from these countries will be subject to most-favoured-nation tariff rates.

At this point I would like to explain a bit further the phase-out schedule for the British preferential tariff. This phase-out schedule for British and Irish goods is as follows:

Where the existing British preferential rate is lower than the final most-favoured-nation concession rate—that is the rate that will apply in 1987 when all stages of the agreement will be completed—the bill proposes that the rate of duty on goods from Britain and Ireland would be increased to the MFN level in not more than three stages commencing on June 3, 1980, and ending on January 1, 1982. The result is that in many cases the rates on British and Irish goods, although higher than at present, will be lower than MFN rates until January 1, 1987, because the MFN rate reductions will be phased in gradually over the period 1980-1987. Where the BP rate is equal to or higher than the final MFN concession rate, the BP rate will remain at its current level until the MFN rate is reduced to that level.

Now, a few words concerning the measures in the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance. The tariff measures proposed in the budget of October 28, 1980, are incorporated in part IV and schedules VI to IX of the bill now under consideration. These provide duty-free entry for a range of antiques, collectables and hobby equipment as recommended by the Tariff Board in its report on reference No. 156. Included are motor vehicles over 25 years of age and parts for restoring such vehicles, amateur radio equipment, mountain-climbing equipment, astronomical telescopes and other things. Free entry will also be provided for sports equipment meeting international standards required by international-calibre amateur athletes.

The bill would also implement a number of tariff changes based on the recommendations of the Tariff Board in its report on the dutiable status of scientific and educational equipment, known as reference No. 155. The Board had recommended that the current duty-free provision for such equipment be restricted to apparatus, utensils and instruments used directly in teaching or research that are not available from Canadian production. These changes will come into effect on July 1, 1981, to give eligible institutions, as well as the importers, distributors and dealers involved as well as customs officials sufficient time to adjust their administrative procedures.

Most laboratory glassware, which schools and research institutions can now import duty free, will become dutiable on July 1, 1981. Duty-free entry is being continued for printed matter, films and recordings used by schools, research organizations, libraries, museums and churches and for diagnostic chemicals not produced in Canada.

Duty-free entry is also proposed for a range of goods, including plant bulbs, television captioning devices used by the deaf—this will certainly please the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) who is greatly interested in these matters—as well as apparatus used to collect oyster eggs and expanded perlite, an industrial filtering agent. An existing duty-free item relating to kits to convert retail scales to the metric system is being extended until December 31, 1983, and a duty-free provision under the general preferential tariff for shop towels is being expanded.

The bill proposes the introduction of a new tariff item to provide a single rate of duty of 15 per cent for shipments containing two or more different chemicals. This item will be used only at the request of importers and should result in reduced paperwork both for importers and the government. The bill, Mr. Speaker, also includes a number of amendments to restore tariff levels which were altered as a result of changes in tariff interpretation. For example, dental prostheses and filling materials are being excluded from a duty-free tariff item and amendments are proposed in the French-language version of several items covering printing plates.

I would like to say a few words about the measures which were included in the December 11, 1979, budget. The miscellaneous tariff proposals which were contained in that budget and which are being proposed in schedule III of this bill include the following: first, the removal of the tariff on certain nursery stock; restoration of a 10 per cent rate of duty on processed nuts; provision of duty-free entry for Bible recordings; and an increase from $15 to $25 in the value limit on gifts which can be sent or brought into Canada duty-free and tax-free.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, also provides for the transfer of authority to levy the excise tax on imported wines. In fact, this amendment is contained in part III of the bill which was introduced in a notice of ways and means motion last April 21. The removal of authority to levy such a tax from the customs tariff means that the excise tax on imported wines will be imposed in the same manner as that on Canadian wines. In this way Canadian and imported wines will be taxed under the same legislation, that is, the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to give a very general picture of the situation without going into the details of this bill which, as may be seen, is a sizeable and relatively technical measure, and I wanted to give the hon. members not only a general outlook but also a rather specific idea of the content of the bill. I am very pleased that the hon. members readily recognized the importance of this bill and co-operated with their parliamentary leaders to have this bill passed promptly this afternoon. I thank the hon. members as well as the House leaders. It is therefore obvious that the passage of this bill is of paramount importance if we are to consolidate Canada's enviable position within the ranks of the world's great trading nations. I trust that the members of the standing committee will give us their support in the same manner as all members of the House were willing to co-operate, so that we may dispose of this bill promptly and efficiently in committee.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to thank the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), who is here today, I am not sure in what capacity, either as acting or assistant minister for his colleagues since this is not his bill—

Mr. Bussières: Yes.

Mr. Lambert: This should not be his bill since under this Liberal administration, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is at the head of the pack. He is the minister who does not speak except when introducing a paper at budget time. For any other legislation, his colleagues have to take over his bills and pilot them in the House. However, I know the minister quite well, and I believe that we shall be able to work together in committee as I support the decision made by the House and our parties to amend our normal procedure concerning a motion and a bill on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the hon. Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say that the bill has been introduced in the name of the Minister of State for Finance and comes within the responsibilities delegated to me by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I am responsible for the review of tariffs. While this might surprise the hon. member, this is probably why the bill is in my name.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will excuse me, but we now have a minister of state who used to be responsible for financial institutions and who is now responsible for finance, which means that we have a Jack-of-all-trades minister in finance. Very well, we can accept him as such. And now, as I was saying, I am happy that we shall be able to sit together in the finance committee because quite frankly a detailed examination of customs tariffs is enough to put angels to sleep. Furthermore we would not even have a quorum in the House, because in years past we were lucky if three or four members were interested in the details of such bills and could even understand the schedules and appendices of such bills. I believe that we shall therefore be better off than in previous years.

I do not want to go into the statement made by the minister as we are nearing the time of adjournment for lunch, and I would simply say that I hope in a few minutes, after the House resumes after lunch I shall have the opportunity to speak about the progress that has been made following the GATT negotiations. We now know the facts and the reasons why we are repealing, in the case of Great Britain, Ireland and South Africa, the provisions concerning the British preferential tariff which have applied in Canada for the past 50 years.

The minister referred to a certain item, No. 605, if my memory serves me right, which concerns scientific equipment and materials for teaching institutions in Canada. This item is very controversial. We have had a whole report from the Tariff Board on this matter. This shows how willing the Department of Finance under the previous administration and this government has been to accept the recommendations of the board concerning the claims of the Canadian Association of University Teachers and the universities themselves, as this can considerably affect the budget of universities.

At this time universities are in a tight squeeze. First of all, they are being pressured by provincial governments anxious to restrict their budget; second, the federal government also wants to restrict its budget for post-secondary education, and finally, in view of the practically uncontrolled inflation tolerated in Canada, universities and learning institutions have seen their cost of operation nearly double in the last five years. How then can they balance their books and also provide acceptable teaching services? On the one hand, the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) has emphasized that the government, industry and learning institutions must upgrade their level of teaching and research, while on the other hand, the government is imposing customs tariffs, which means that an excise tax will follow.

● (1300)

What is the situation of these institutions? Mr. Speaker, I hope that after recess we can deal with this issue a little deeper and I intend to discuss the matter at that time, but I shall be brief and the only spokesman for the official opposition this afternoon as I dearly hope that this bill can be referred to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs before 3.30. May I call it one o'clock?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member for Edmonton West. Pursuant to Standing Order 2(1) I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) had the floor.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I should like now to turn to some consideration of the minister's remarks before the lunch hour recess when he was talking about the effect in Canada of the Tokyo Round under GATT. Some aspects of this matter will be discussed by the finance committee in relation to a different matter, namely, the discussion paper on the question of the imposition of anti-dumping, countervailing duties and emergency safeguard actions.

It was not clear from the minister's remarks, and it is not clear from the bill, whether clause 5 will give the government the power to act effectively when there is need for action. It starts out as though that were to be the case, because clause 5 of Bill C-50 amends or adds to section 8 of the present Customs Tariff Act. It says:

> Where at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council on a report of the Minister of Finance, that any foreign country has imposed or increased duties on goods the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada, or has in any other manner restricted the importation of any such goods, with the result that tariff or other trade concessions previously extended to Canada are impaired, and has not made equivalent new concessions in respect of imports from Canada, the governor in council may, by order—

It goes on. This is precisely something we missed in the armoury of weapons or resources the government should have had to deal with certain countries. The government should have had that when we found ourselves suddenly confronting seemingly arbitrary or capricious actions by certain countries. I am afraid our friends to the south have been guilty of that on a few occasions, and it has come out with retaliatory measures as far as Canada was concerned.

Even the threat of those retaliatory actions has oftentimes given pause to the actions of one of our trading partners, and I know that in so far as Canada is concerned both government and industry, particularly government, have been very reluctant to act in certain fields in anticipation that the American treasury would take compensatory action in other fields. To that extent the Americans have had a considerable advantage over us. I have always felt that it was unfortunate that we did not have the same kind of legislative equipment available to our government. It is not that I want to invite tit for tat or a retaliatory battle because, gracious me, I think it would be the height of folly for Canada to begin a campaign of retaliatory action against the United States. I think sanity should return to the bargaining table.

Such campaigns would be self-destroying because the size of the armoury in the United States is much greater than ours. We might fight a good fight for ten minutes, but in the eleventh minute we would sustain a knockout blow and lose the fight. We will be able to examine this at much greater length in the committee, but I think this is a step in the right direction.

In these matters I do not think anything of a particularly partisan nature will be said. I have not detected any great partisan proposals from one party or the other in this particular field, although I think there might be a tendency in the opposition, particularly in the field of horticulture, to wish for speedier action with respect to special duties when fruits and vegetables, particularly from the United States, arrive here, due to the advantages of climate, and thoroughly ruin the market for Canadian goods coming onto the market, which should have the benefit of a good, active market, but the market is so saturated by American produce that the buying public is satiated and no longer interested. I am thinking of some of the soft fruits such as apricots, peaches, strawberries—

Mr. Lewis: Avocados.

Mr. Lambert: —and a number of other things, but I leave that for the people from the Niagara area and British Columbia, because I know that over the years they have been making very serious representations here. They have not been able to get very far in getting the machinery set up in the Department of National Revenue so that it can move almost as quickly as can the produce involved. Usually the machinery of government takes about three weeks to get cranked into action. Then, of course, it is far too late.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We were just getting started at that.

Mr. Lambert: I am glad to hear that when he was minister, my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), was able to look at this and get it started. I hope his successor has continued, although there seems to have been a curtain of inaction over certain changes in the Department of National Revenue. I once had a fairly intimate knowledge of where things stood in that department. There are now great gaps between talk and action. I do not know whether that is because the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) cannot get his cabinet colleagues to agree with him, or whether the machinery is structured in such a way that an idea or proposal takes an eon getting the final approval of cabinet. It is not necessarily the fault of the minister. It is often the fault of the structure of the cabinet machinery and the operations of the Privy Council.

The other matter to which I want to refer is the nature of the implementations of the staged changes in tariff which come under the Tokyo Round. I am all too conscious of the absolutely nefarious effects of actions of one former minister of finance, Mr. Benson, following the Kennedy Round. We had a five-year period rather than an eight-year period under the Tokyo Round. There was also an ineffectual measure taken by the then Trudeau administration in about 1970 to combat inflation. This was the time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was running up and down the country talking about having wrestled inflation to the ground.

Following his 1969 television address in mid-July and then other things, with a stroke of a pen Mr. Benson proposed that the remaining three-year cuts in a number of Canadian industries be telescoped into one. The industries themselves were hurting for having been picked out by Canada as those to suffer cuts in tariff protection. I am talking about heavy chemical manufacturers, fine paper producers, and a number of others. They suddenly found one day that what they had looked at as a five-year program had been cut to something like two and a half years. There certainly was "no joy in anybody's-ville" when it came to the effect of capricious changes by government. Those changes were not thought out. The program was an unmitigated disaster.

Canadian manufacturers had to sharpen their pencils and cut their prices in order to meet foreign competition. The program had nothing to do with competition. Foreign competition was coming in, in any event. All the program did was give a leg up to foreign competitors so that they could really clean out the Canadian market in competition with people who were already struggling hard. This points up one of the difficulties with which we are faced at the present time. Canadian producers and manufacturers are helped by unnaturally low fuel costs or energy costs. They enjoy an advantage of almost 60 per cent because at the field the rate for Canadian fuel is from $16.75 to $19.75, while the world price can reach well over $35.

It is said by those in central Canada, and I will repeat it, that, somehow or other, if they go to 75 per cent or 85 per cent of the North American price, that is the Chicago price which is a factor of the world price, they will suffer disadvantages and Canadian industry will be driven further behind. I have never heard such arrant poppycock. The difficulties with Canadian industry lie in other sectors, that is in lack of productivity, lack of management skills, and management unit costs that are too high. Also, one of the difficulties is the scale of the market. But who says we cannot compete with people in the external markets?

In the United States they are paying considerably more than we are for their petroleum products. The Europeans are paying three times as much as we are, and then we turn around and say that we cannot compete. There has never been such a cry-baby argument for insisting that other Canadians make an unnaturally heavy contribution to this so-called inefficient fight against foreign competition, and all we are doing now, of course, is to drive Canadian industry into the ground by cutting back heavily on the one industry which is showing some promise of real activity in this country, and which provides a real market for Canadian manufacturers on the domestic scene. All we are doing is hitting it on the head. One of these days the members on the Treasury benches are going to wake up and see where their bungling stupidity has taken them in so far as their energy policy is concerned.

There is something about which I want to talk a great deal more in committee, and that is that we adhere as much as possible to the timetable laid down in this agreement. There is no virtue in taking unilateral speedier action than that which our neighbours are going to take.

Of course, by the very nature of the events, one has to re-examine the agreement now, and we are doing it in a legislative way. It has been in the works for two or three years ever since Great Britain and Ireland joined the Common Market, and we know just how tough a situation we may face getting into the Common Market because no longer do they trade with us on the basis of the British preferential tariff but they have to deal with us on their own terms. The Common Market does very well inside those high tariff walls maintained by that group of nations. When we consider the amount of trade we have with certain of the members, we find that it is rather restricted. We can export certain raw materials to them, but not that many.

We cannot put wheat into the Common Market to any extent because the French have always been very progressive producers of wheat on the export market, so it goes to the bigger European market within the tariff walls. When it comes to our better skills in the production of food and in the production of grains, meat, dairy products, those are well known. The Common Market was created for the preservation and expansion of the French agricultural market. It is a market for French agricultural products, and the French will tell you that quite candidly. They have been highly successful, except for the fact that there has been an artificial stimulation in the production of certain goods. We have seen wars going on in France between the producers and the French government where vegetables are dumped on the sides of roads, milk is spilled into the ditches on the sides of country roads, and other action is taken by the very militant farmers who find themselves in a cost squeeze. They have been on to a good thing, but they went too far.

There is the matter of production in other countries in the Common Market. Britain and Germany are quite efficient agricultural producers in their own specialties. One of the worst things we have seen happening in the Common Market is the campaign by the continental members of that trading block against New Zealand lamb and also the availability of English mutton and lamb. I can see quite well why the British farmers and the government are quite concerned about the actions of their trading partners in that particular field. Ireland has a small market, but they are now in the Common Market.

With regard to South Africa, a political decision was taken, and that country is no longer a member of the Commonwealth. This is another action by this government which is, I think, a highly hypocritical attitude toward South Africa. I have always taken the attitude that while we may not like apartheid, we should not point the finger at South Africa until we have cleaned up our own act and reconsidered our treatment of our own native people. To my mind, our conduct toward our native peoples is as insidious and as effective, but all the more hypocritical and, therefore, more to be criticized than that of the South Africans. The South Africans have done a great deal for their native peoples. Remember that you cannot accomplish these miracles of bringing people forward from their original way of life to the level which so-called liberals in North America would like to see, in one day. I think that the attitude which the United States and Canada have maintained to middle and South Africa has been a disaster because all we have done is to open the field to the Soviet Union, and they have certainly capitalized on it.

I am straying some distance away from the subject, but here is part and parcel of the application of what you might call the anti-apartheid attitude demonstrated by taking South Africa out of the British preferential tariff and putting that country into the most favoured nation and the general tariff classification. In my view this should never have been done, and I will speak about it a lot more before the committee.

I suppose there is the matter of administrative convenience and there might be some logic in it—we might get an explanation of it—in the transfer of authority for collecting excise tax on imported wines from the Customs Tariff to the Excise Tax Act. Apparently it is to do something which is in conformity with taxing Canadian wines; we will see.

I think we tax both Canadian and foreign wines far too much. We should not impose higher duties, without the consent of legislatures, on foreign and Canadian wines through the arbitrary actions of provincial liquor control boards which engage in one of the most blatant forms of interprovincial tariff protection of Canadian-produced and foreign wines. It is a totally illogical position, but governments do not care how they get there as long as they get there.

In fact provincial attorneys general have always reacted in the same manner regarding the taxation of wine and alcohol—it is a ready source of revenue. People with puritanical ideas seem to think it is all right to tax those products, but they do not realize that in this practice they give carte blanche to attorneys general at the request of provincial treasurers who say, "I need a few more million dollars. How about upping the price of alcohol by 50 cents? You can always justify it by higher costs." I think a public deception is being perpetrated.

I have friends in various liquor control boards and they indicate that there is no justification for raising the prices except the desire for more revenue. It seems that governments believe the end justifies any means; I suppose it is the order of the day.

In conclusion, I should like to indicate that the Canadian Association of University Teachers has made some strong representations against the negative effects of Tariff Board recommendation No. 155 which deals with exemptions from duty on goods for certain institutions. This chiefly concerns items Nos. 69605-1 and 69610-1. It is a question of whether the items in No. 69605-1 will continue to enter Canada duty free. These items are used for research and teaching throughout our entire schooling system. The proposition is that they shall not enter duty free if they are made or otherwise available in Canada. This brings to mind two considerations. First, who will find out where they are made? There are thousands of items. Are they comparable? Is sulphuric acid really sulphuric acid? There are different levels of purity in these various chemicals and products. Who will determine whether the goods are actually or might be available in Canada? Will it be the Department of National Revenue? How long will it take?

Second, if they are deemed to be subject to duty, then the costs to educational institutions will rise tremendously because not only will the goods attract the duty, they will attract sales tax. These goods must be unavailable from production or potential production in Canada, and they must be used directly in teaching and research.

Let me refer to the example of a computer which is not manufactured in Canada. A university will use the computer for 50 to 60 per cent of the time as a teaching aid; for the balance of the time it will be used for administrative purposes. Because of the recommendation of the Tariff Board, if the computer is not used 100 per cent of the time in teaching and research, it will attract customs duty and sales tax.

Who will monitor the use of computers? Will the Department of National Revenue send out snoops to various teaching institutions? What about computers being used in commercial research? I think these difficulties will surface in the administration and the implementation of the recommendations contained in the bill.

In any event, this will be looked at much more closely in committee. There are hundreds of pages in the annexes by the very nature of the tabular print, which will be examined in committee. I invite hon. members to search these matters out. Perhaps they could draw to the attention of committee members some unforeseen effects of these proposed changes in their various parts of the country. After all, it is only with the input of industries and businesses that we will be able to learn about the effect of these various changes and to enter caveats, if necessary.

This is not an area in which one discusses the behaviour of Canadian customs officials greeting returning Canadians at international airports. This does not come under the customs tariff; it will have to be discussed under the Customs Act at another date.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House proposes a large number of amendments to the customs tariff arising from the concessions to which Canada agreed in the last round of negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in Geneva. As the minister pointed out, the general objective of the final agreement was the expansion and greater liberalization of international trade.

Economic developments in Canada since the last round of negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, that is, the Kennedy Round, which was concluded in 1967, must lead any thinking person to conclude that Canada has very little to gain from a more liberalized trade policy.

Canada's unemployment rate has risen from 3.8 per cent in 1967 to 7.5 per cent in 1980. The inflation rate was 3.5 per cent in 1967 compared with 10.1 per cent in 1980. Real growth in the total output of our economy averaged over 5 per cent in the last half of the 1960s, while the real rate of growth in 1980 was .2 per cent.

In 1967 the Canadian dollar was exchanged at an 8 per cent premium over the U.S. dollar. Recently, our dollar has been discounted by over 19 per cent relative to the U.S. dollar. Canada's deficit on current account was $500 million in 1967 compared with a deficit of $137 million in 1980. These figures may lead some people to reject completely the suggestion of any further move toward a more liberalized trading agreement.

However, in my view the experience resulting from the Kennedy Round of GATT negotiations is a poor test of the potential benefits which could be derived from free trade agreements. I say this for two fundamental reasons. First, I question to what extent trade was liberalized after the Kennedy Round of negotiations. The Kennedy Round did not directly address the question of non-tariff barriers. To a large extent the lowering of tariff barriers following the Kennedy Round was counterbalanced by increases in non-tariff barriers, or what has to be called the "new protectionism". Second, even if there had been a significant degree of trade liberalization following the Kennedy Round, a country could only reap the benefits of that liberalization if the country had also undertaken a process of industrial planning geared toward a full employment strategy.

Indeed, a full employment economy is the best adjustment program conceivable in the context of approaching liberalized trade. In my view it is essential that the issue of employment must be the paramount issue in trade negotiations. I venture to say the time has come to change some of the traditional ways of looking at international trading agreements. In Canada's traditional trade structure our imports are considerably more labour intensive than our exports. Canada has been exporting our natural resources, a large part of which are non-renewable resources.

If trade balances were calculated in job terms rather than in dollar terms it would be shown clearly that our performance in international trade negotiations has been less than effective on behalf of Canada's work force. I am concerned that the dimension of jobs in international negotiations is not given the consideration it should be given by our negotiators, or by those who advise them in those trade negotiations. This government in particular has shown itself to be oblivious to the problems of unemployment and the effects it has on Canadians. I believe most Canadians would support policies or initiatives to establish national trade agreements to liberalize trade through the process of multilateral trade negotiations, such as GATT.

Having said that, Canadians want fair trade in the true sense of the word. They want to know that in the process of trading with other countries they will not end up holding the short end of the stick at every turn. Canadians are a fair-minded and realistic people who know and understand that in any set of negotiations there is a certain give and take, that you win some and you lose some. We know that and accept it, but we will not accept being on the losing end at every turn. Internationally, we have gained the reputation of being patsies in those negotiations. The relaxation of tariff barriers has been the objective of all GATT countries for decades. We know that. This government knew at the outset, when discussions began in Tokyo back in 1973, that there would be considerable pressures to reduce tariffs on a whole host of products. The government knew this and it had a fairly good idea of what it was prepared to give away in these negotiations, but it did nothing to prepare Canadian industry for what was coming.

Many of those industries, which are existing on the sole basis that their products are protected by tariffs, may now expect to suffer severe hardships and perhaps even collapse, as a result of the government's performance in these negotiations. Since then I have seen no evidence of any government measures to assist either those companies which are affected by the outcome of those negotiations, or the people who rely on the continued operation of those companies in order to earn a livelihood.

Mr. Speaker, I see no evidence that the government even recognized the effects its performance is having on the economic life of our country. I see no evidence that the government remotely recognizes that embarking on a free trade policy now will no doubt hasten the transition of our branch plant economy into that of a warehouse economy, where we will simply be a storer of goods for distribution to our domestic markets, rather than manufacturing those goods ourselves for our own security. As effective negotiators, this government fails on every count. As economic managers, this government fails on every count. As a government responsible to those it claims to govern, this government is a failure.

To bring before this House measures such as this, without also bringing forward an industrial strategy to develop an independent Canadian manufacturing base, is a sure way, at least in my view, of guaranteeing that Canada will continue to sell off our raw materials and import the finished goods we require in our country.

Perhaps I may have been a wee bit too harsh in my criticism of the government. Perhaps there is still hope. Perhaps the government has something up its sleeve which it will produce soon and not wait for the next election. Perhaps the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) was sincere and meant every word when he spoke on GATT in the House on November 5, 1979, as reported in Hansard. He said:

> The process of parliamentary consideration of these changes should begin as soon as possible. As part of this process, it is absolutely essential that this government presents to the House, at the same time as it presents the measures to adopt the changes arising out of the GATT tariff negotiations, measures of adjustment assistance, measures to assist not just the industry affected by tariff changes but also the workers in that industry to cope with the effects of these changes.

Perhaps in the course of this debate the government will introduce the other measures promised and will table them in the House, perhaps by Monday next. My mind boggles at the thought.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Wednesday, January 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned several days ago I was in the middle of debate on Bill C-54. I would like to pick up the debate today with a brief reference to some of the things that I had an opportunity to mention, and then to bring into the discussion additional comments which I would like to make.

Perhaps the most significant issue which we were considering several days ago related to the Small Business Development Bond. I would like to emphasize at this time some of the points I made with regard to that bond and the confusion which arose because of the way the bond was not introduced after initially being brought forward in our budget of December, 1979. Then in April, 1980, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) through a ways and means motion, put the bond into effect. There was a great deal of confusion, particularly at the local branches of the banks which did not have specific instructions, or perhaps there were limitations on the way in which funds were to be provided to small businessmen and farmers in the rural areas. As a result of this confusion, people who would normally have been able to take advantage of this bond did not take advantage of it. On that basis the government should extend the March 31 deadline into the coming year.

● (1450)

Reference was made to the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and the fact that it was submitting a brief to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), and the Minister of Finance in the hope that the ministers would look at the issue of farmers who are not incorporated. The size of a farm really has nothing to do with whether or not a farmer is incorporated.

There was also the question of whether or not this funding should be available for investments which are not new capital requirement, and whether or not the inventories or the equity which a farmer has in his property could provide the basis for a loan. I would like the government to look at these important issues with regard to the small businessmen and farmers throughout the country.

Another topic which was mentioned several days ago dealt with spouses. I find that the area of allowances paid to spouses of small business operators or farmers is surrounded by a lack of information at the local level, and the financial people involved at that level really do not know what should be done. The question arises of whether or not there is a retroactive capacity within the law for the small businessmen or farmers, who would normally have taken advantage of this program but who did not because they did not have access to the information.

I also made mention of the fact that I was pleased to be among the many members on this side of the House who supported the previous minister of finance in his efforts to extend the deductions which are allowable to firemen. I am pleased to see that this matter was dealt with in the present legislation. Finally, we mentioned the grants for conversion from oil to other forms of home heating. The question arose at that time as well as to whether or not the taxable nature of these grants would inhibit the full utilization of the program. The taxable nature of the grant would determine the incentive for people to get into the government's off-oil program. We would like to have this matter reconsidered with the idea of making the grant non-taxable.

I would now like to deal with areas which were not included in the legislation. There is the question of tax credits for energy. I raise this matter, not because we as a government were looking at the issue but because there is a social need which is increasing daily as energy prices rise. If the government had been successful in maintaining significantly lower energy prices, there would be a justifiable argument for not introducing a tax credit. But with gasoline having risen by approximately 30 cents per gallon to date, which is roughly the rise proposed under my government's energy package, the need grows day by day for some action for people who are on low incomes and fixed incomes to have some relief from higher energy prices.

Another exclusion from the legislation is capital gains tax provisions. The government suggested in its elective campaign promises that it would introduce provisions for capital gains tax relief, particularly on behalf of farmers. A white paper on this particular issue was brought forward, but it did not even mention farmers. Indeed, farmers were almost totally neglected in the budget. This matter must be addressed quickly because of its economic impact on farmers today. This situation is having a great effect on the young people who are trying to take up farming and are finding it increasingly difficult and, as a result, they are abandoning their efforts. Consequently, we end up with very large corporate farms or a low productivity level on the farm land which is currently available.

The Minister of Agriculture has been questioned in the House on several occasions as to whether or not relief would be provided to farmers, for example through lower interest rates or increased funding to the Farm Credit Corporation. The minister has suggested that such programs would not be equitable to provide relief to the farm community, because the farm community is not that badly off now, and that it would be inequitable to propose such a program for the farmers and not for other segments of our economy. This indicates a lack of understanding by the minister of the real point. The point is that farmers in different provinces who are receiving assistance from the provincial governments through a number of federal subsidization programs are being assisted in an inequitable way. There is no co-ordination of these programs. While the farmers are receiving assistance, it is not at the level which will allow them to survive.

The Ontario government recently carried out a study into the future of the family farm in Ontario, which was released several days ago. I would like to quote from the London Free Press an article which describes that study.

> It found that while the low rate of return on investment and low net earnings are considered by many to be the main deterrents to young persons wanting to farm, more young people than ever before are beginning to farm and there is a general feeling of optimism about the future.

What I have just quoted brings us to the point which I wanted to make through the article, which reads:

> And, it says, a tax credit similar to the home ownership credit program to help them should be contemplated.

This is the kind of assistance these young farmers need in order to survive. It costs in the neighbourhood of $300,000 for a young farmer to establish himself today.

One topic which often comes up in such a debate is the question of the assistance the provinces are providing to the different segments of the economy. The established program funding and the co-operation and co-ordination of the programs of the federal government and of the provincial governments are very much in the limelight today and seem to be gaining increasingly in importance. The question also arises of the level at which the federal government will maintain its funding to such programs, and whether or not there will be continued assistance to all provinces, particularly the so-called have-not provinces. This question has arisen with regard to the areas of health funding and university funding.

An hon. member earlier today pointed out that if the government continues with its current plan, it is very likely that university funding will be cut to the point where some of the universities in his area of Atlantic Canada would be forced to close their doors. The same situation holds true in the area of funding for health care. The provinces are caught in a situation where they are not able to provide the necessary funding to maintain the services because of the cutbacks in government funding. Clearly, the provinces that are able to provide this funding should assist where possible, but the federal government should not avoid its responsibilities to programs which it was responsible for instituting in the first place.

● (1500)

I would like to speak about the way the government is looking at its priorities, not only in this bill but in many other bills. I shall quote briefly from a letter written by the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien) dated October 15, 1980. It says:

Dear Colleague,

Please find enclosed a list of surveys sponsored by the Canadian United Information Office.

Results of the three surveys made since May 20th, 1980, will be made public at a later date. For the time being, we cannot disclose the details of those three surveys as disclosure could be injurious to the conduct of federal-provincial affairs.

I do not know exactly what was in those final three surveys. However, I would anticipate that what was included was a question on priorities and what people in the country at large felt about the way the government was approaching not only the question of the constitution and government priorities but whether or not it was addressing things in which Canadians themselves were interested. It is my impression, and polls have shown this, that people in Canada are interested in jobs and in employment. If I may, I will refer to the comments made by the minister at the opening of his statement in the debate on this bill. Approximately $350 million is to be dedicated to employment and to an industrial strategy. The minister mentioned a larger figure, but I do not believe we have the dedication of a larger figure anywhere. What we have is support of some industries and a job-retraining program.

In the last nine months of this government there has been a decrease of approximately 43,000 manufacturing jobs. That is in the manufacturing sector alone. While there has been an increase in total jobs, these have been in a non-productive area, namely, the service sector. They have not been in the manufacturing sector. Over the long term there is no doubt this creates tremendous problems for Canada.

It would be interesting to find out what the results of those other surveys were, not just on the basis of the constitutional discussions, but also to find out what the people at large are thinking about the priorities which the government has set for its legislation and where it is putting its energies.

The second part of the priority discussion would have to deal with research and development. Of interest to everyone was the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made on New Year's Day about the dedication which this government will have to research and development and the many opportunities it can provide to this country. I found it passing strange that it should be the Prime Minister on New Year's Day who would make a statement like that when during his tenure the dedication of finances from this government decreased from 1.25 per cent of the gross national product in 1969 to less than 0.9 per cent at the present time. I know that some additional efforts have been made lately, but efforts have been feeble in comparison to the real requirement to get back on a sound economic basis and be competitive with countries around the world. We should not build our economy on the basis of cheap natural resources. We should not take our cheap natural resources and channel them into non-productive and inequitable systems. Rather, we should build on the basis of providing efficiency, on the basis of providing world-scale products through research and development. Through good management we should bring our products into line with what is economic for the rest of the world.

In conclusion, I think members on this side of the House are optimistic about the opportunities we have in Canada. However, we do not see priorities being taken by the government now to take advantage of these tremendous opportunities. The real needs of this country are not being taken care of; namely, energy, social development and, on the broadest scale, on the unity questions which are important to all of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to participate in this debate to deal with the amendments to the Income Tax Act arising out of the budget of last October. I must say the document is quite large and weighty. You would think from the size of it that it promised a great deal. It certainly promises a great deal, but I do not think it delivers much at all.

Because of the experience over the last several months since the budget was brought down, it is clear to everyone by now that the budgetary policy of the government is not working. Our economic experience since last October has been negative, disruptive to communities and to people. Present forecasts are gloomy and negative as well. Hon. members do not have to take my word for those forecasts, they come also from objective and reputable sources. For example, forecasts from the Conference Board of Canada for economic activity in 1981 indicate that we will have poor growth, high inflation, high unemployment, and low housing starts. Obviously, we will have a continued increase in the number of bankruptcies as well. This is not a picture of an economy that is well managed. It is not the result of the actions of a compassionate or an effective government. The actions which have been undertaken so far are clearly inadequate. That is why I make reference to this weighty document which promises so much, but is delivering so little.

Not only are these policies not working in general as economic policies, they are not working specifically in terms of the programs or the specific areas of the economy they are suppose to be helping. In other words, they are not working at the general level of policy, nor at any specific level.

Although the Small Business Development Bond has been extended for a period of time through amendments to the Income Tax Act, the reason for this extension is not a newfound interest in economic activities on the part of the government, but is a result of the government's slipshod administration. When the government originally announced the introduction of Small Business Development Bonds, which were meant to help small business with the extremely high interest rates we now have, it was very slow to make the information about them available to small business people and to the banking community. At the beginning the government simply did not get the program off the ground and now it is extending the program because of its own administrative mess. Clearly that program is not doing the job. What we really need to do is to convince the government to put its heart into this matter and to re-examine its monetary policies. This country cannot continue to throw oil on the fires of inflation. Goodness knows we are giving away all the oil we have, so why throw oil on the fire of inflation?

The Small Business Development Bond program should continue, and where it can help it will be appreciated, but it is totally inadequate as an economic policy and as a small business policy.

There are other areas which substantiate what I am saying about these policies not being effective economic policies or being effective specific programs for different sectors of the economy. For example, the amendments to the Income Tax Act contain MURBs which are really the tax write-offs and giveaways that enable large corporations to build more bachelor apartments in our cities.

What we need are measures which would lead to affordable family housing. But tax write-offs continue to allow income tax to be inequitable. In other words, people who earn high incomes are able to claim write-offs and so avoid paying their fair share. There is no guarantee MURBs will meet the housing needs which exist in the community. In fact, the program does very little for the real housing need in this country, the need of families to be well housed at affordable prices. This government's monetary policies continue to make that impossible. They do nothing about it.

• (1510)

Those are two simple and straightforward examples of the ineffective policies of this government. That is not the end of it; only the beginning. For example, there is the investment tax credit program with its system of write-offs and giveaways to corporations. It is another version of a previous tax write-off program for designated areas. Not only is it expensive for the public treasury, but it does not achieve the objective of assisting regional economic development in the poorer areas and creating the jobs and wealth to which we are all entitled. It is a giveaway to large corporations which can add it to their profits. They invest that money elsewhere, however, rather than in the region, which makes this program very expensive and ineffective. A new approach is needed in this area.

I want to give an example of how expensive this is. The program which this one replaces, the graduated tax credit program which graduated taxes from 7 to 20 per cent for regional development, in 1980 in the manufacturing sector cost us $170 million, and $125 million in the resource area.

Mr. Gurbin: What did it produce?

Mr. Keeper: That is the question, what does it produce? It certainly costs a lot. Transportation and equipment cost another $40 million and research and development, $45 million. It has done very little to encourage Canadian-owned business.

This is not a new policy. Even though it is ineffective and is clearly a giveaway, as far back as 1963, Walter Gordon, then Liberal finance minister, was acting in the very same fashion. He introduced an identical write-off measure for designated areas which cost the taxpayers great amounts of money and produced very little. Even though such policies have been followed since 1963, there are still regions of great disparities in this country. Nothing has changed. Inequities continue under the policies being pursued by the Liberal government in a non-thinking manner.

The story goes on. Again, that is not the end. The government continues with similar inequitable and ineffective policies. I want briefly to touch on some of them. In the area of corporate taxation, the level of corporate taxes which companies should pay in this country, the nominal corporate tax rate, is 46 per cent. However, the real tax rate is much lower because of various forms of write-offs.

I wish to put on record some facts and figures which come from a finance department study, and are not something I dreamed up. Compared with the official corporate taxation rate in this country of 46 per cent in 1977, the manufacturing sector paid 20 per cent, and oil and gas 11 per cent. I am sure it is even less than that now. According to the 1977 study, the mining sector paid 10 per cent and the banks 9 to 13 per cent. We should all own a bank. The average was 18 per cent compared with the official rate of 40 per cent.

The government has moved to extend the 5 per cent federal corporate surtax introduced last April in an attempt to rectify the situation created by a declining rate of corporate taxation. It has acknowledged the problem created by the write-offs, deductions and other forms of incentives it created, including the investment tax credit which I have already mentioned.

The government recognized the problem and took a hesitant step forward, but has not gone far enough. A 5 per cent level of taxation is not enough. We as individuals would certainly like the government to give us that kind of deal, but it is not about to do so.

I want to refer briefly to the taxation of chartered banks. This bill gives another break to the banks, which now pay a tax rate of 9 to 13 per cent. In future banks will be able to deduct from taxes, bad or doubtful debts; if a bank makes a bad business deal, it may deduct the amount involved from its taxes. This can now be done during the year it appears on their books. However, with the change, they can defer this deduction, carrying it over from year to year. This is an additional benefit to them. In addition to increasing their profits, they may now profit from business failures. Imagine the possibility of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce profiting from the failure of Massey-Ferguson. That is economic insanity and stupidity which boggles the mind.

I come back to the question of regional development and the need for economic development in the less-developed areas.

Earlier I referred to the ineffectiveness of the investment tax credit and the fact that it does not do anything for the poorer areas of this country. With the set of amendments in this heavy document, the government is doing something about regional disparities and regional economic activity. I come now to the provisions with regard to marginal manufacturing. The 9 per cent federal sales tax on marginal manufacturing is being expanded and will include assembling, mixing, cutting to size or packaging when done other than in a retail store for sale to customers. This is supposedly being done to overcome inequities. The real impact of this measure is that it extends the federal sales tax to a sector of small business which has a high bankruptcy rate and, therefore, can least afford it.

I received a letter from a firm in Manitoba detailing the inequities and injustices of the extension of this tax. It points out that this measure will call for additional record-keeping by small businessmen. If there is one message that small business people across this nation have consistently been delivering to governments over the years, it is to cut out all unnecessary red tape and paperwork imposed on small business. As I said, this measure will increase it.

This tends to put small businesses in a non-competitive position with companies which import prepackaged products. In other words, it makes things more difficult for the company which packages materials, in this case in Winnipeg, Manitoba, than for the company which imports materials already packaged. That is a clear injustice which will increase unemployment and encourage us to export jobs. It also tends to centralize packaging within our own domestic market in Canada. In other words, it would tend to be advantageous to do packaging in industrial Canada, in Ontario and Quebec, and it would be disadvantageous to do packaging in a region like Winnipeg which has slow economic activity at this point. I think that is directly contrary to the government's policies of sound regional economic equity.

Clearly we should not be introducing a measure that is going to export jobs and shift jobs from slow-growth regions to the industrial heartland. I have a concern about industry in Ontario and Quebec. My party has long and well spoken of the need for an industrial strategy in our country. That is the way to keep Ontario healthy and keep jobs here. But let us not rob Manitoba of jobs for Ontario. That clearly is injustice carried to the extreme. I am glad businessmen from Manitoba took the trouble to write me.

What we are dealing with today are amendments to the Income Tax Act arising out of a budget. One of the things about the Income Tax Act is that it is progressive, at least that is what we have always been led to believe. It is a means to promote equity and justice in the country in terms of the distribution of income. I want to talk a bit about the distribution of income and the impact of these amendments on that distribution. Clearly, from what I have said up until now, the impact of these measures is to promote inequity, to give gifts to the rich and to destroy the progressiveness of our taxation system. In other words, those who have the most will pay their fair share—will pay the most—and those who have the least will pay what they can afford—pay the least. I want to talk a little bit about income distribution.

Let me draw to your mind and attention to the book "The Canadian Fact Book On Income Distribution". This is a book I find very enlightening and one which I have been careful to read, particularly after hearing about the concern in this House for the incomes and pensions of such people as judges and others in that category.

This book gives the picture of income distribution in this country. We have the bottom fifth of the population earning roughly 4 per cent of the wealth with the top fifth earning something like 40 per cent of the wealth. Can you imagine that the poorest people in this country earn one tenth of what those with the top incomes earn, while those at the top of the heap earn ten times as much as those at the bottom? What kind of income distribution is that and why should we continue to promote that kind of distribution through the Income Tax Act, and in fact make it worse? That is what concerns me.

The level of distribution of income in this country has been steady since 1951 according to this study, which appears to me to be a sound and good study. Clearly, after the world depression and the years of the 1930s we took a step forward. We introduced social welfare measures and we introduced an income floor.

I am not challenging the idea or the notion that we have redistribution of income in this country. We do. We have a floor and this study demonstrates that the people earning the least do benefit from the transfer of payments we make in this country. That is well and good. What I am pointing out now is that the disparities of the distribution of income in this country have not changed significantly since 1951 and this shows we have not moved toward a more just and equitable society since 1951. That is sad when you consider that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came in on a wave of hope that we could have a just society. He has failed dismally to fulfil that hope and he continues today to play Liberal politics by introducing, in effect, unjust taxation measures.

Let me quote from this study with regard to taxes as paid by the rich and the poor in this country. At page 52 in a statement relating to the distribution of income after all taxes, it states that in a study for the Royal Commission on Taxation in the 1960s it was first demonstrated that the over-all tax system is not progressive, and in fact it taxes the poor very heavily.

A little further down the page it is stated:

—the bottom income class still pays the highest rate of taxation.

An hon. Member: They still do.

Mr. Keeper: They still do and that is shocking. It is not necessary in a country such as ours. It certainly should not be allowed to continue and we should not be promoting it. That is what is being done with these measures, I suggest, and it is being done in the name of income management, an income management which has been demonstrated by our own personal experience in this country since last October to be ineffective. It really has no final justification.

Let me touch briefly on the energy program. In my view the energy program of the government is a sham. I do not want to go into detail about it because I know my colleague, our energy critic, has dealt with the program adequately. I mention it because there are measures in this bill in relation to the program. It is a sham. They call it Canadianization, but in fact it is continued control by multinational corporations. Our energy critic labelled it "Lalondization". I take him to mean by that a Liberal trick, rhetoric without action, sleight of hand without substance.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A shell game.

Mr. Keeper: Indeed, a shell game.

Mr. Rose: And a Gulf game and a Texaco game.

Mr. Keeper: It certainly is not a program which meets the needs of our country nor one that will work.

Let me touch upon pricing of oil as outlined in this program. The Liberal government, like the Tory government when it was in office, is moving toward a price equal to 85 per cent of the world price. That is clear from both budgetary documents. This is the fact on the Tory side in spite of its proposed tax credit on oil, even taking that into account the pricing policy remains similar, by and large. The approach to the pricing of the product is the same. I must say I feel we need an energy policy on pricing that will result in justifiable prices. We need an oil price review commission. We need some public body which will examine price increases so that the public can see clearly that any increase in price is necessary and not just for the good of the multinational corporations. Price increases must be reviewed in public.

I would make the same suggestion with respect to oil. The base of our activity must be a public corporation. The simplest way I can illustrate that for you, Mr. Speaker, is to use the example of Autopac in Manitoba. It is a public corporation that offers auto insurance at a price related to the cost of delivering the service.

• (1530)

The people of Manitoba clearly understand this because they have experience with Autopac, and I suggest that the same rationale for a public corporation exists in the energy sector as exists in the car insurance sector. One of the things such a corporation would do is keep the energy dollars each of us pays every day for heating our homes and driving our cars, in an energy account. It would not let any government siphon off those dollars for any other purpose, and it would not allow multinational corporations to siphon them off for their own profit or investment in land deals or any other investment in which they might be interested. I know that the energy program illustrated in these amendments is inadequate and a sham and allows continued control by multinational corporations. It is "Lalondization". Let us have an end of Lalondization.

Mr. Smith: On Canada "londs"?

Mr. Rose: He looked that up in a dictionary.

Mr. Keeper: I looked it up in a west coast dictionary. I am learning a great deal from my west coast colleagues.

I want to move back again to the budgetary policies which are illustrated and reflected in this document and which came out with the budget. I will mention some things which I think are missing.

It is clear now that we have a recession in this country. The only distinction about this recession is that we also have a very high rate of inflation with it. That is the only distinctive achievement of the economic policy of the government across the way. With the recessionary situation we are in now we really need public investment to stimulate and get the economy moving again, to provide jobs and to create wealth. By creating wealth we create a source for taxes in order to get the deficit down.

Mr. Evans: Where will you get the money?

Mr. Keeper: Let me illustrate the need for investment. I suggest that a good place to invest would be in the area of urban transit. We clearly must do something about energy conservation. The government has an energy program. Let us invest adequately in mass urban transit. This would create jobs. If we develop transit systems in this country, we can sell them not only to our own cities but also to American and European cities.

We can create high technology jobs in this country through investment in mass transit. We could conserve energy by doing that. We could promote a better living environment in the cities, where most of our citizens now live. We could provide a convenient method for people to go to work in cities. I think that is important. We need public investment now which, as it works its way through the economy, would create wealth, and that investment should be in urban transit.

I mention this specifically today because toward the need of next week there will be a national conference in Winnipeg which representatives from cities across the country will attend. The theme of that conference will be energy and urban transit. Let us send a signal from here that this government is concerned about energy, about urban transit and about the economy. This should be in the budgetary policy of the government, but it is not.

Since we are dealing with an income tax bill, I point out that action is needed in other areas as well. For example, there should be changes in the Income Tax Act to promote the rehabilitation and preservation of heritage buildings. I am very familiar with this subject because I have served on the city council in Winnipeg and worked in the designation of heritage buildings. This is a subject which is close to my heart. Present income tax laws encourage the demolition of heritage buildings rather than their rehabilitation. There must be changes in the Income Tax Act soon so that we can promote a positive effect on the shape and nature of our cities. We do not want to live in cities made up simply of steel structures which do not reflect the history and experience of our people. We must promote the rehabilitation of our heritage buildings so that when we live, walk, play and work in our cities we can have a sense of the experience of our people and a sense of our history.

However, changes in the Income Tax Act in this respect would achieve not just those goals only, but would also promote employment. Rehabilitation is job intensive. Rehabilitation would create a whole new industry.

This is not just another airy-fairy idea. It is not pie in the sky. It is not impossible. I have with me today a number of studies. I also have specific proposals for amendments to the Income Tax Act. These proposals are from Heritage Winnipeg, and I will be raising them again in this House at the earliest opportunity. These studies examined the American experience and demonstrated that what I am calling for has been done. It has not been done in some far-away nation upon whose approach we might cast some doubt but by our closest neighbour, the United States.

These studies of federal tax changes in the United States show that a system of saving heritage structures can work. Employment, wealth and economic activity can be generated by this kind of activity. The tax laws we presently have encourage demolition and leave our cities as dead places where there is nothing of value from the past. We are a young country, and it is a good time now to start to preserve our history for today's generation as well as tomorrow's. I will be raising this issue again in this House. I just want to flag it now to let the government know that I will be pursuing it and urging the government to act on it in a positive way.

This government has some good policies. One of these policies is followed by the Department of Public Works. Parks Canada has a responsibility for heritage in this country. It is my understanding that there is a policy which encourages Parks Canada to locate heritage buildings in cities across the country. That is a good, positive policy. However, in Winnipeg today this policy is being administered poorly. The Department of Public Works and Parks Canada propose to move into a marginally historic structure in Winnipeg rather than into a first-rate, top-notch historic building.

If Parks Canada were to move into that first-rate, top-notch historic building, it could be preserved for generations to come. Instead, just because the government presently owns a marginally historic building, it will not move into the first-class building and preserve something which is of real value. That is poor administration. When a government goes so far as to establish a good policy, it should follow it up with good administration.

I will conclude. I just want to say I am glad I had this opportunity to participate in this debate. I think that we must conclude that the changes to the Income Tax Act are just not good enough and go in the wrong direction. We need an economic program, an economic policy, economic management in this country. We need a tax policy which works toward the specific objectives for which it is intended; one which promotes economic activity, which is equitable and just, which promotes a fair distribution of income in the country, and which also deals with the problem that is on the minds of people in Canada today, a policy which deals effectively in the area of energy. So let members on the other side of the House wake up, face up to the real problems of this country and get moving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to let the last remarks go by without saying anything on the subject. I find it passing strange that every time we have problems in the country, the NDP comes up with a solution which involves public investment, as if it were the only way to solve them. Someone has to pay the taxes. We have found in the past that it is the private sector which is always paying the taxes for this public investment which attempts to solve the problems which we would not be encountering had we not had to contribute to that public investment.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) also spoke about the energy program and called it "Lalondization". In Alberta we call it nationalization. He spoke about rhetoric without action. I wonder if the action of all the Canadians who are being put out of business, of all the people who have lost their jobs in the oil industry, is what the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James calls rhetoric without action. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get carried away on the subject of the oil industry for the moment. Perhaps I will speak about it later if I have the time.

We are dealing now with the income tax measures in Bill C-54. It is a large bill. I suspect it is large because we have not dealt with any income tax measures for some time now. A number of budgets have been brought down since 1979 when we last dealt with those measures. That was the budget which was defeated. Many of the proposals in that budget have found their way into the budget which was brought down last fall, and we welcome their return.

This country needs economic leadership by this government now more than ever before. As I mentioned in my introduction, people are worrying about their jobs. It is astonishing to discover, as the Gallup poll has shown us, that 60 per cent of the principal wage earners in the families across this nation are now afraid for their jobs. This is obvious as you read the papers and find that various companies are no longer able to compete or are driven out by the policies of this government. So we need economic leadership badly.

The most substantial elements in this budget were delivered in the spring mini-budget, as it was called, but basically they were a reintroduction of elements in the budget which was brought down by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) some time ago, because this government had to admit that these were excellent proposals which should have been considered at the time. However, many others were left out. We did not find them in the mini-budget or in the last budget, nor do we find them in the bill before us. Some of those are important elements in the new energy plan for this nation which raised the price of fuel. I know it was considered terrible that we had intended to raise the price of fuel by 18 cents per gallon, but if you look at the increase in the price of fuel since the defeat of the Conservative government, you find that it adds up to much more than 18 cents per gallon. In fact, many people are saying that it adds up to an increase of 26 cents or 30 cents per gallon. Any time that you perpetrate upon the people of this nation a large increase in the price of something as essential as energy, which everyone needs to heat their homes, run their cars, to manufacture fertilizer or chemicals needed by farmers to produce food, it has a tremendous impact. We all budget our incomes and we decide how much we must set aside from our salary to make certain expenditures, and when we find that one item in that ledger increases more rapidly than we anticipated, then we find it very difficult to economize in other areas. Some of us are fortunate enough to be able to do that, but many people are not.

There is nothing in these tax bills or in the budget which would assist people whose incomes have been drastically reduced as a result of having to provide for the necessities of life, to meet the increased cost of driving to work, heating their homes or growing food. We find that the energy tax credit proposal, which economists in this country are calling the most advanced proposal in the decade, is missing in this budget. What would that energy tax credit have offered? It would have offered relief in home heating costs, the cost of gasoline for driving a car up to 20,000 miles, and assistance to farmers in meeting the costs which they incur in producing food.

The difference between taxing gasoline and taxing the total volume of oil and natural gas is quite obvious. When the price of gasoline goes up, an individual has an option. He can buy a smaller car, he can take advantage of the tax credit up to 20,000 miles, if it is available, he can use public transit, he can use car pools—there are many choices available to him. But there is no choice when it comes to heating his home. Perhaps if we had foreseen this problem, we would have put renewable energy programs in place, but we have not done so. So people either have to use natural gas or heating oil.

When the government puts a tax on a barrel of oil or a cubic foot of natural gas, this does not give an option to individuals who have to heat their homes—they have no alternative but to pay for the heating oil or natural gas. As we all know, the cost of heating homes is high. I filled my propane tank and found it cost me $135 more than last time. I realize that somebody who has no money left over at the end of the month is placed in a terrible position when his bill is increased by that amount. So our tax credit proposal was a significant proposal, and I simply cannot understand why it has been constantly rejected by this government.

The other issue on which I should like to comment is relief from capital gains tax. As a farmer representing a farming community in the riding of Wetaskiwin, I am fully aware of the significance of relief from the capital gains tax. I was lucky. My grandfather decided to pass the farm on to me and the Canadian government decided that that was allowed and the transfer would not be taxable. But what about the problem of farmers whose sons and daughters are not interested in farming and want to pursue other goals in life? A farmer may work his entire life building up his equity, his land and his machinery, and then when he decides to retire, he wants another person to take over the farm so he sells it, but the government comes along and grabs 26 per cent or more of the wealth he has built up. Very often such farmers have deprived themselves of many things in order to buy the necessary machinery to make their farm productive or to increase their land base just to make a living, but then when the time comes to retire, the government grabs a large percentage. We know that land prices are going up, but so is the cost of housing, and now that life expectancy in Canada is longer, the rising costs of essentials pose greater and greater problems to these people.

This leads me to another item which I believe was so important in the budget presented by the hon. member for St. John's West. It would have provided Canadians with an opportunity to invest in companies. One might say they have such an opportunity now, but in most instances the people taking advantage of that so-called opportunity are using it in the United States or some other country. Our citizens are not being encouraged to invest their savings in Canadian corporations and companies. The plan which my party proposed would have allowed Canadians to invest in Imperial Oil, Shell Canada and Gulf Canada. It would have allowed them to purchase more of the interests of those companies so that Canadians would own and control them. Most of the people working for those companies and comprising the management of those companies at the present time are Canadians. So, in a sense they are controlled in this country, but the principal ownership still lies in other countries.

Since we are striving for self-sufficiency it would make more sense to ask Canadians to invest in Canadian companies. Also, they could be asked to invest in foreign companies in order to make them Canadian. They could then be taxed and the money could be used for the purposes of finding more oil, rather than having Petro-Canada which does not find a single barrel of oil with the money used to buy them out.

The government simply takes the cash capacity of the country and puts it into a non-productive base. I agree with the plan to Canadianize the industry, but I question whether the method being proposed is the right one; I say it is not.

The Small Business Development Bond could have assisted small Canadian businessmen and entrepreneurs to become established. When I travelled my riding during the election campaign and proposed the Small Business Development Bond, it met with the approval of every citizen who found himself in the position of needing more capital to revitalize his small business or to start a new business which he thought would be productive and would provide him and his family with a means to live. The details of the bond were set out in the budget which was never passed; then in the mini-budget which was not passed either. The numerous small businessmen who are in dire need of relief from astronomically high interest rates do not know the regulations surrounding the Small Business Development Bond. As a result, the bond has not been used by the majority of citizens who should be using it. The bill should be passed by the House and the regulations established so that citizens can take advantage of it.

I should like to refer to one problem with legislation before the House. We receive the basis of the legislation which we put before the people of the nation, many of whom are pleased that we are trying to assist them. But, when the legislation is passed by the House and the regulations are in place, we find many of the suggestions that even we thought were contained in the bill, are not, in the final analysis. This is why many banks have been reluctant to use this bond program. Many members have suggested that it should be extended, that it should not be in place for only a specific period of time but rather until interest rates have dropped to a level acceptable to small businesses and farms. Members have also suggested that it be used not only for new capital requirements but for the maintenance of inventories. If a farmer goes into a large business establishment for the purpose of purchasing a new part for his combine, because the weather is holding and the old one has broken down, and finds that the firm is not capable of keeping an inventory because of high interest rates, he realizes how important it is for a program to be in effect which assists businesses in times of difficulty.

Now I should like to turn to the area of energy conversion grants. Many of us are concerned about the direction in which Canada is going, as far as conversion to renewable forms of energy or abundant sources of energy are concerned. I would like very much to make a speech on oil and gas although, of course, I realize that soon there will be other energy bills to provide that form. An $800 grant is contained in the budget if one converts one's furnace to a renewable form of energy or natural gas. That is desirable; we want to encourage Canadians to take advantage of the many forms of available energy. But, there are two ways of doing it. The first is the grant, but the regulations are not available. There is something about a 50 per cent reduction in the amount of oil being consumed in one's home before one can apply for or receive the grant. So, there are difficulties until the regulations are defined. The second is a tax credit. Which is the better way to encourage Canadians to convert their furnaces? Is it through the grant system or through the tax credit system?

I have had many occasions to talk to the members of renewable energy committees across the country in the last number of years. In fact, my party suggested a tax credit to encourage individuals to convert their furnaces to the use of renewable forms of energy; we suggested a $3,400 tax credit for this purpose.

Instead of paying taxes on that portion of their income, Canadians could have used it to put in place solar water heaters, wood stoves or perhaps windmills to generate electricity or to heat their homes; also, it would have applied if one wanted to convert from oil to natural gas. There is a lot more incentive when an individual can take his own money, on which he may not have to pay taxes, to put a system that he understands fully into his building or house. He does not merely hire someone to instal a system which he does not know how to operate or is helpless if it should break down. Some people do not know the many requirements of installing and operating wood stoves. I have read stories about individuals who purchased and installed wood stoves, threw in some wood and wondered from where all the smoke came; they did not even realize that they needed stacks! Perhaps it is funny, but it happens. One must know how to utilize an alternative form of energy or the effort will just fail.

If the government is convinced that it must go the tax grant route, we in the opposition do not have the numbers to stop it. Surely an educational program should be put in place to assist Canadian citizens in learning about the various types of energy and their use. If there is no tax benefit, there is no encouragement for citizens to take advantage of it.

I think it would be a good thing to look at a tax credit system. It is a revolutionary system which was first introduced in the child tax credit which has worked very well. The Crosbie budget proposed a tax credit in order to allow citizens to better handle the increased costs of energy. It should be used as it is being used in many parts of the world, particularly in the United States, to encourage people to change to renewable forms of energy.

I realize my time has run out. There is a lot more about this bill which I would like to say, but I must save it for another time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 4 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867

MEASURE RESPECTING TENURE OF SENATORS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved that Bill C-303, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (tenure of Senators), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I say, first of all, that I was somewhat surprised to find myself called upon to speak this afternoon, mine being low on the list of public bills to be debated. This goes to emphasize that a great many bills which are presently on the Order Paper and which are not printed would indicate that the member is not particularly interested in proceeding with the subject or that there is some problem in putting the bill into printable form.

Be that as it may, I am very pleased to take this opportunity to discuss Bill C-303, an act to amend the British North America Act, 1867. It concerns the tenure of senators. I am pleased to be able to discuss it for two reasons. First, I have my own ideas on reform of the Senate. Second, I think it is particularly appropriate at this time, when discussions are taking place amongst senators about their particular responsibilities and about the part they will play in the passage of the constitutional proposals, to bring it forward for discussion at this time. Later in my speech I will discuss the problems of clause 44 in the constitutional proposal, as the senators see it.

I would like to start with the bill itself. Bill C-303 states:

1. Section 29 of the British North America Act, 1867 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"29. (1) A senator shall hold his place in the Senate until the day of the general election next following his completion of ten years as senator.

(2) Where the application of subsection (1) would result at any time in a greater number of vacancies than thirty-four, the senators beyond that number who have the least seniority shall not vacate their seats but shall be deemed, for the purposes of this section, to have been summoned to the senate exactly ten years prior to the day of the general election."

I shall read from the explanatory note, if I may, for the record:

The purpose of this change in the British North America Act is to limit the tenure of senators to a period not exceeding 15 years.

The purpose in bringing this bill forward for discussion is to allow everyone an opportunity to discuss not only the reform of the Senate but the responsibilities of the Senate and senators. I looked at the list of bills which are on the Order Paper and was surprised to find there are only five other bills which deal with the Senate, apart from my own. There are the standard two in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), one dealing, as he has in past sessions, with the elimination of the Senate entirely, and the other dealing with financial interests. I notice that another member of his party has two bills on the order paper which, by their titles, are probably intended to accomplish the same purpose.

Apart from those four bills there is one other bill on the Order Paper, No. C-304, put forward by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby). It deals with the elimination of sittings on Mondays, both for the House of Commons and the Senate. I suspect his motivation is directed more toward the House of Commons. So, there has not been any great interest—at least there does not appear to be from the business on the Order Paper—amongst members of Parliament about doing very much about the Senate. This means, I think, that they are probably relatively satisfied with what is done—or it might be contended what is not done—in the Senate.

Over the years, an enormous amount has been written on the subject of the place of the Senate in our parliamentary system. I have been reviewing some of this material. I note, for example, in a report to the Senate of Canada on certain aspects of the Canadian constitution made in November, 1980, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Q.C., in that report says:

—a second chamber is needed—

This, of course, is the opinion of senators themselves.

—a second chamber is needed not as a mere replica of the House of Commons but as a complement to provide "sober, second thought", and to do what the House of Commons cannot do efficiently . . . the Senate's role should be to revise legislation, to conduct investigations on specific matters of public interest, to reflect regional aspirations and to protect linguistic, minority and individual rights.

—it is preferable to have an appointed rather than an elected Senate.

The report goes on:

—an appointed Senate would be in a better position to accomplish the complementary and largely advisory roles it should have in our democratic and parliamentary system where the House of Commons should be the supreme legislative authority.

I think there is some significance to that last passage. The senators themselves recognize the House of Commons as the supreme legislative authority. The report goes on:

It would be less partisan and more independent; it would have greater continuity and more expertise—

That is, of course, on the basis of appointments.

It is argued that an appointed Senate lacks credibility and legitimacy. We submit that a Senate elected by proportional representation, with the complementary roles and the limited powers that a second chamber should have, would suffer from the same defects and would accomplish its specific mission less efficiently.

The report goes on to suggest appointments for a ten-year term and that the legislative power of the Senate should be limited to that of a suspensive veto.

I was happy to read that into the record. I would like to add that the Hon. Carl Goldenberg is my own senator. He is the senator who represents that region of Quebec which can loosely be described as the west island of Montreal and west to the border of Ontario. I say this very sincerely, I am very proud that a man of the character, competence and calibre of Mr. Goldenberg is in our Senate. Quite honestly, I believe we have several senators of that standing and this is not intended to be any sort of criticism of the rest of the senators. There have often been suggestions that a relatively small percentage of our senators carry the load. Be that as it may, I do not think that suggestion changes very much, since one can make the same comment about the House of Commons.

I would like to comment on a couple of remarks which have been made in connection with the Senate. There was a very interesting article written by a Mr. Edward McWhinney from which I would like to quote:

If the present Canadian federal Senate is to be reformed, let it be a bona fide reform, and this excludes . . . a provincial patronage-appointed Senate. If we are to retain a federal Senate, then let its members be directly elected, possibly on a proportional representation basis within provincial boundaries, and for a specified and limited term of years.

A duration of two successive terms of the House of Commons—which could be as long as eight years or else very much shorter if the House of Commons should be dissolved prematurely—seems reasonable—

Gordon Robertson, who is well known for the part he has played in the administrative aspects of government over the past few years, comments in an article in the June-July issue of Policy Options:

The Senate has been a favourite target of proposals for reform as well as for abolition.

Here is the statement which I have underlined in the article:

If the Senate were to be abolished and the House of Commons were to become the only chamber of the Canadian Parliament, Canada would become unique among federations.

The Canadian Intergovernmental Conference Secretariat put together a document entitled "Proposals on the Constitution 1971-1978". I believe it is apropos to this debate that I put on the record a couple of paragraphs for the benefit of many who may read Hansard although I am not sure how many people in the country do. Section 17 of the BNA Act reads:

There shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House, styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

The act then goes on to describe in section 18 the privileges, immunities and powers to be held by the Senate and the House of Commons. Section 22 reads:

In relation to the constitution of the Senate Canada shall be deemed to consist of Four Divisions:

1. Ontario;
2. Quebec;
3. The maritime provinces . . .
4. The western provinces . . . which four divisions shall . . . be equally represented in the Senate—

The Special Joint Committee on the Constitution (1972) recorded that the present full veto power of the senate over legislation should be reduced to a suspensive veto for six months. I shall be talking about the six-month time-period later in connection with article 44 in the constitutional proposal. The Special Joint Committee on the Constitution (1972) also said:

The investigative role of the Senate, which has gained more importance in recent years, should be continued and expanded at the initiative of the Senate itself, and the Government should also make more use of the Senate in this way.

One of the characteristics which I appreciate about the Senate is that it has power to continue the discussion of a subject, which we in the House of Commons do not have. I have lobbied for some time for the government to bring in changes which would enable the members of the House of Commons to discuss in committee, subjects which we consider important enough to be worthy of committee study. In that regard and without wanting to digress too much, I should refer to three reports which I have mentioned frequently in this House, which have been tabled, upon which all members are awaiting some action from the government and which we would like to discuss further in committee in an effort to speed the passage of further legislation. These reports are, and I will use their popular names, the Finkelman report, the D'Avignon report and the Lambert commission report.

The point is that senators have the opportunity to decide on subjects for discussion and thereby to produce invaluable reports. In fact, while I am on the subject, I have been looking at some of the Senate works of the recent past. Although they will not appear in Hansard, I have in front of me quite a stack of books composed of works which I commend to any member of the public as being worth while studying.

These books cover a tremendous range of topics. There is the very recent report called "Child At Risk", which is a report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. There is also the report of the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies entitled "Retirement without Tears" and there is an excellent report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada. There is a report by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on growth, employment and price stability and a report, which obviously had an effect on the government, by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Information Canada. Of course, Information Canada no longer exists in the form in which it existed when the study was made.

There is the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Canada Manpower which resulted in some reorganization. Here is a report by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture which is entitled "Recognizing the Realities of Beef Import Policy for Canada". Here in an excellent four volume work entitled "A Science Policy for Canada", which is a report by the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, the chairman of which is the Hon. Maurice Lamontagne.

Here is a report in which I have taken a special interest. It is presently two volumes, but undoubtedly there will be more volumes. It is entitled "Canada-United States Relations" and it deals with trade relations with the United States. It is an excellent work. Whether one disagrees or agrees with the content of these works, they provide much food for thought, and they set down their subjects in excellent fashion. I laud the senators for the work they do in this regard.

I do not believe that we give enough publicity to the work performed by the Senate. On looking at the order paper of the Senate and the business proposed for next week, aside from the senators who will be working on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution which sits all day, every day, and which is doing an incredible job there is much activity. Whether we agree or disagree with the subject under discussion, no one can deny that the members of this committee, both those from the House and from the Senate, are doing a standup job in continuing, day after day, with this rather difficult discussion under the scrutiny of the media.

But also in the following week I notice that there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on National Defence, the committee dealing with standing rules and orders which is examining the procedure to be followed upon the presentation of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. Obviously they are preparing themselves for the time when they will have to study this most important resolution. There will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to study the subject matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act and of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for a review of statutory instruments. Finally, there will be a meeting of the internal economy, budgets and administration committee. All these meetings will take place next week. In other words, apart from the regular meetings of the Senate, there is considerable activity in the committees.

In the one or two minutes I have remaining, I would like to refer to section 44 because it will be a contentious area. As the opposition leader in the Senate, the Hon. Jacques Flynn, said concerning the constitutional proposal:

—if this address goes to Westminster and becomes law, thereafter any amendment to our constitution, including the abolition of the Senate, could be made without the Senate having a word to say about it.

Of course, this is a concern of the senators. I believe that we should think sincerely about their complaint as to whether or not this is the objective. I have looked at comments made to the special joint committee by the different groups. I have found only two groups which are frightened at the thought of the abolition of the Senate, the Canada West Foundation, because it believes that westerners see the Senate as the best means of representing all the regions in the central government and the Inuit Committee on National Issues, which is concerned because of its desire for representation in both Houses of Parliament. The amendments to the Constitution which were proposed recently lengthen from 90 days to 180 days the time which is contained in paragraph 44. The 180 days corresponds roughly to the six-month period to which I referred earlier.

● (1620)

In my opinion we have a group of hardworking senators. We receive from the Senate a tremendous amount of important material. Excellent studies are done by the Senate which are invaluable to the country. This indicates to me that there should be no contemplation of abolition of the Senate. But if there is to be continuing discussion of representation—and I know this is a very difficult thing to say—then Canadians from across the country should be able to sit down and decide on the way that body can be composed so that everyone is satisfied not only on a regional representation basis but on the basis that the Senate is exercising the function for which it was intended, that of a good regionally representative body of sober and second thought.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on the complimentary nature of his address and on the tribute he has paid to much of the work which comes from the other House, the Senate. He has given us a list of papers and studies which we will find valuable. I agree with him that the structure of the Senate is such that similar armament in terms of expertise and in the strengthening of committees of this House would go a long way toward resolving many of the problems we leave on the table and do not get time to finish.

I do not mean to be unkind with my next remark but any private member's bill is a vehicle to draw attention to an essential and important issue concerning many of us. He has outlined the concern that other members have for the Senate, either complete abolition, restructuring or changing the membership thereof.

I would like to take a few minutes to point out that the bill itself is something like a shingle nail trying to hold Canada together, and I do not mean this unkindly. If we have one major problem that we are failing to resolve as a parliament, it is the problem of regionalism. By regionalism, I mean not only western Canada, Upper Canada or Ontario, Lower Canada or Quebec and the Atlantic union, but I mean you can have regionalism in Metropolitan Toronto, and out in British Columbia. There is an article in The Globe and Mail about Labrador. In reading that article one can see the extent of regionalism which exists in Labrador. Even many of the people in the high north do not want to talk with one another or get into regional frictions. It seems to me that regionalism is a subject matter on which we should be spending a great deal of time if we are to design a federalism which gives the nation the strength that we all talk about but do not get down to addressing.

I am speaking in a rather impromptu manner to this bill because I am deeply concerned about this one issue: What are we going to do to address the regionalism, other than to improve the vehicle of communicating with each other? We are not a melting pot as is the United States. We call ourselves multicultural. We have people who used to call themselves Canadians but who are now more proud of their ethnic origins than they were say, five or ten years ago of being Canadian. I had a charming lady tell me at lunch that she was extremely proud of her father's ancestry. She is a well-educated person from this province, but the strong feeling about her ancestry has happened to her recently.

This trouble exists in the minds of many of us, indeed, altogether too many of us. It is easy to attack the ruptures which arise in our society. For example, look at the people who want to separate from the central part of Canada. It is easy to attack the West-Feds and the Western Canadian Foundation. It is easy to attack those who want to join the United States. It is easy to attack and put down those who feel aggrieved, but that grievance is still there. We still have not addressed or used this vehicle of government or given it a structure that will allow us to communicate and talk this situation out.

If we are talking about doing anything to the Senate we have to strengthen it in its armament to represent the regions and to address regionalism in Canada.

The trouble with the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker—that heritage which has come down to us from the British parliamentary system—is that it represents population centres. It gives power to the population centres. In our form of government, whoever has the greatest number of seats in this chamber becomes the government, and the government is the power and the decision-making base. The decision-making base we have seen in the last two parliaments does not represent the regions of the country.

The question comes back to the structure of federalism—how we are going to bring about a structure which strengthens the regions and allows more bottom-up input into the federal structure instead of talk-down direction. As long as we have this strengthening of talk-down direction, or this strengthening of centralism, we will have more and more ruptures.

This is a massive land. Canada is the envy of the world in terms of its land, its resources, its people, its educational system and its health services' system. We are the envy of the world.

We have a good working spirit. I would like to see us put legislation in place which would enhance that working spirit rather than dampen it. But I think we will have to talk about an upper house with an elected senate having incentives strong enough to attract the very best minds which the regions can deliver. We will have to think about giving rewards to those people who are prepared to dedicate their intellectual talents to the betterment of the country and, somehow or other, allow them some tenure upon election to the Senate. If we are to have regionalism, we must get the Senate away from political appointments. The Canadian Senate is letting the nation down because it is overloaded politically. It does not have a political balance. The Leader of the Senate has expressed that as a genuine concern to me and to others. If it is an elected Senate, then it truly represents the regions and the rewards and qualifications of running for the Senate should set a very high standard so that the regions are represented well.

But we have regionalism within regions as well. We have to address that if we are to be a happy, strong land and if the people in the faraway places of Canada are to feel that they and their interests are truly represented here.

My colleague, the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway) spoke during question period today about one of the largest Indian reserves in Canada which suffered massive damage as a result of a flood. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which has a horrendous budget of something like $.7 million and a large staff, has not even sent anyone out to look after the Indians who are in real dire trouble. This causes alienation and antagonism and the centre is not serving the whole. If we had a stronger upper house which represented the regions, we would have had somebody out there immediately. I acknowledge that the leader in the Senate, Senator Perrault, went out to that flood area, but the Indian reserve was totally overlooked. The department at the centre did not telegraph a concern into that region.

All of us want this country to stay together. We want to be proud of it, and we want it to be strong. However, that will not come about with top-down direction from the centre. We have to gather in the parts and make it look as if it is bottom-up in terms of creation of a federal structure here. The Senate is essential to it.

I do not agree with those who say that the Senate should just be a vehicle for a second look. If the Senate is truly going to represent the regions of this country, it will have to be a strong organization. It will require muscle in terms of western resources and will need to have fingers out to the multicultural and racial groups in this country so that we can keep the dialogue going and resolve the pockets of friction. It will not serve this country if it is just a vehicle for a second look, to be overruled in six months and have its work returned here.

If the Senate is going to be strong, it should have the full power of veto over legislation which passes through this House. If you want to continue the growth of alienation in this country, just have the population blocks at the centre of this country continue to tell the outbacks how to live, work and manage and control their resources. That will cause nothing but resentment.

I sit here as a very frustrated person because I like to be positive. Sitting in the opposition, I do not get a chance to be as positive as I was born to be. This kind of frustration should be addressed because all of us are here to serve, and we are here as a result of our love for this country.

When Bill C-303 comes forward to amend the British North America Act for the Senate, we should be talking about strengthening the upper house so that we can really address regionalism, which is the anchor of dissent that exists in this country. We should consider facts such as the fact that I come from a region where there are 11 federal boards upon which there are no citizens of British Columbia. I make an appeal in these few minutes to try to bring about an awareness of the anxieties which exist and the challenge that we as elected members of Parliament have to address this problem.

It is hard for those at the centre of Canada to get the gut feeling that exists across the prairies, in the north and in British Columbia. We pay 130 to 165 per cent of world prices for our consumer and capital goods for the benefit of payrolls and industries at the centre of this country. We are a customs union and we accept that. However, we want at least 75 per cent or better of world prices for the delivery of resources from the outback.

If you think that central Canada can keep this country together by imposing what is considered to be a plunder of our heritage, it is not going to happen. The country will disintegrate. It is in this federal structure we can talk this out. I think it is beyond politics now. We have to talk it out as Canadians representing our regions, getting our concerns out on a full-time basis. There is nothing more important than talking about a resolution on regionalism, a way in which western Canada can sit as an equal at the table, with Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic region.

We should have a full input into the departmental decision-making process. When talking about immigration, western Canada should have its representative for immigration sitting with the immigration minister at the council table so that the problems of that region as a result of immigration can be considered.

Even my own colleague, when he was minister of finance, forgot all about the housing problem on the west coast in the MURB decision contained in his budget of December, 1979. Had that region had an input, that item, which caused unbelievable dissension out there, would not have been in that budget. The vacancy rate was below one per cent and it needed a government stimulus. There should have been regional input.

The four regions I mentioned should have input at the decision-making tables when definitions are made with regard to bioscience as it applies to resources, to fiscal policies, monetary policies and so on. Only then will we start to resolve the intense alienation which exists in this country. I plead with those who represent the population centres of this land to give this suggestion serious thought.

Do not label people like me non-Canadian. You will not get away with that. My life and my record is the other way. However, I am prepared to fight for my region in an attempt to build a stronger federation, a bottom-up federation, a federation which represents the regions of this great land.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I could begin by saying to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) that his bill goes in the right direction. At the present time, apart from the few older senators who are there for life, those who are appointed to the Senate stay there until age 75. Under Bill C-303, their term would be cut to a period of anywhere from ten to 15 years, but no longer.

I say that goes in the right direction. I would go further. I would cut their tenure to five years, then one year, six months, and then cut them out altogether. In case I seem to be putting my tongue in my cheek when I speak of the bill going in the right direction, let me make it clear that I do not think the bill touches the problem of the Senate as part of our democracy at all. I do not think it is an answer to the view that many of us hold, that there is no place in our parliamentary democracy for a body that is not elected, not responsible to anyone and that as the Senate now stands it should be abolished.

I was greatly interested in the speech made by my hon. friend. I kept waiting for him to give the reason for the proposal in his bill. Indeed, I kept waiting for him to refer to it. He did read the clause about the tenure. My friend and colleague, the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) had the same feeling of expectation. I thought he summed up the hon. member's speech very well when he said that even with all the fine things he is telling us about the Senate and how good it is, its members are good for only ten years.

As I say, I do not think it gets to the heart of the problem at all. I might say to my good friend the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), who always makes his point very clear, that we appreciate the problems he has discussed again today. We appreciate his deep concern over regionalism. By the same token, I do not think the Senate is any answer to that set of problems.

Before I get a little more directly into the question itself, may I say I welcome the fact that once again we are discussing in the House of Commons of Canada a bill to amend an act which is not in this country at all, the British North America Act. Of course, my hon. friend is doing that, as I have tried on a number of occasions with amendments to the British North America Act, under the provisions of section 9(1) which says that the Parliament of Canada may make amendments to the British North America Act in respect of matters that are exclusively federal. We have exercised that right on a number of occasions, and the rationale usually is that our statutes are enacted by the Crown, and since the British North America Act was enacted by the Crown in the person of Queen Victoria it is being amended by the Crown in the person of Queen Elizabeth on the advice of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada.

Referring to that amendment to the British North America Act which was passed in 1949 I am disposed to make a comment all of us often make, namely that the accidents of history can be very strange and can have long-lasting effects. I had sufficient conversation with Mr. St. Laurent, who was Prime Minister at that time, to know he was very anxious to complete the process of the Canadianization of our Constitution. Section 91(1) was the first step to bring to Canada the right to amend the Constitution in respect of matters exclusively federal. That was done in 1949. I knew Mr. St. Laurent well enough to be able to stand here and say that his hope was that before his term of office as Prime Minister finished he would be able to get the agreement of the provinces and to take the necessary steps to bring the amending of the rest of the Constitution to this country.

Unfortunately the Korean war broke out and other things followed and the well-laid plans of Mr. St. Laurent got set aside. I think it is really quite an unfortunate bit of our history. We might have been able to do all of that in the 1950s with a lot less of the contention, ill will and all the rest of it we are having at the present time. However, that is the way history goes and we have to take it as it comes, doing the best with the situations with which we are confronted.

What we have before us now is this proposal to sweeten the Senate a little bit so we can keep it. We have heard today the usual litany, especially from the hon. member for Vaudreuil, about the fine people over there. They are fine people and I know many of them. They are good Canadians and they work hard, or some of them do, as the hon. member says. Just as in this House there are some one sees around on the job all the time, and there are others one does not know who they are when they turn up.

I recognize the difficulty one gets into by naming anyone at all, but I should like to support what the hon. member said about Carl Goldenberg, a great Canadian who has made a tremendous contribution in a number of fields. I say the same thing for David Croll. I think his contribution in the Senate has been great as was his contribution when he was a member of this House. I should like to add names such as Renaude

Lapointe, Florence Bird, Jacques Flynn and Duff Roblin, all of whom I regard as friends. I am sure others would like to add other names, but at least I want to get it on the record that there are persons in that other place whom I like very much and who in my view are sincere and earnest in what they are trying to do.

However, Mr. Speaker, even though one can assert that there are fine persons over in that other place, and they never speak of us as the other place, they speak of us as "down in the House of Commons", even though they have produced a number of excellent reports, and even though some of them work hard, as is the case with those who are now on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, the fundamental fact of the Senate is that its members are not elected. They do not fit into the idea of democracy and they are not responsible to anyone. They get their appointments on the recommendation of the prime minister of the day and after they have been appointed by the prime minister they are not even responsible back to him, or back to her, if the picture changes.

Mr. Herbert: Neither are we.

Mr. Knowles: We are responsible to the people who elected us and we have to go back every five years, four years, three, two or one to find out whether we have carried out our responsibilities. Senators have no responsibility to anyone and I submit, though that may have seemed a reasonable way to set things up back in 1867 when the public believed in democracy, but not all the way, in the 114 years that have gone by since then surely we have come to the point that we really do believe in democracy.

I was interested in the quotation from Gordon Robertson that if we had a one-House Parliament we would be unique as a federation. I do not see anything wrong about being unique. There are lots of other ways I would like Canada to be unique and there are ways in which I think we are unique. I have not had time since I heard the quotation to go somewhere to check on the facts of the situation, but, as a matter of fact, I suspect we are unique in this area already, certainly among federations in the western world, in that we have a second chamber which is appointed rather than elected. It is that which is wrong about the whole situation.

The reports my hon. friend referred to are good reports. The senators have done a lot of work. I remember a debate I had on radio some time ago with then Senator Eugene Forsey. We got into these usual arguments, and at one point I suggested to him that only about 25 members of the other place carried the load, did the work. He not only accepted my figure of 25, he said perhaps it was a bit high.

We have 20 or 25 people doing good work making reports but we keep on full pay, good pay with pensions and all the rest of it, 104 or 106 individuals who get the nod from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Of course, every time there is a vacancy there are lots of others looking for the nod, and not only political persons. I am interested in the number of times I find columnists in newspapers taking advantage of the fact they can get in print that they do not want to see the Senate abolished, they want to get into it.

If we want 25 people on staff to do good work such as the 25 active senators do, okay, let us set up such a body, but to have 106 on full pay, giving that group of 106 the same legal power over legislation that elected representatives have, I think is for the birds. I think it is completely out of the picture.

Let me say to the hon. member for Vaudreuil that he renders a service when he asks this House to consider the Senate and what ought to be done about it, but surely it requires more than just what the hon. member for Capilano calls this one little shingle nail in the present structure.

● (1650)

One of the comments I will make about the hon. member's bill is that if it did go into effect, it would immediately cost us more money. At the present time senators stay over there until they are 75, but under this bill they would be retiring at whatever age they might be when the tide ran out. They would retire at 40, 45 or 50 and go onto pensions, whereas now we have to pay only the senators who are there. The ones over 75 do not live very long. We not only would have to pay the ones there but we would also have to pay those with 10, 12, 14 or 15 years' service who earned fairly good pensions.

My hon. friend's motive in producing a discussion of the Senate is good but his suggestion really does not touch the basic problem, and that is that we need a Parliament which is fully democratic and responsible to the people out there who elect us.

My hon. friend, the hon. member for Capilano, is quite right in expressing the problems of regionalism we have, but his theory of increasing the strength of the Senate we have now no more meets those problems than my friend's bill meets the problem of a representative or elected Senate. I think we have to find ways to solve the problem of regionalism.

We have to find a way to work a measure of proportional representation into this House of Commons so that a government will represent all of the regions. I think we will have to work hard politically for the kind of government that is concerned for the people in all parts of the country. I think we have to strengthen the committee structure. We do not need just to strengthen it; we have to scrap it and build a new one which gives members from all parts of the country a chance to have an input into the solving of the problems which affect them in the various areas. I say with great respect that neither this 10 to 15-year limit nor the stronger upper House about which the hon. member for Capilano talks will solve the problem.

I should sit down. The last word I want to say is that I wonder how much longer we will let people talk about needing the Senate for sober second thought. That is a real insult to this House of Commons. My experience here is that in this House we are sober.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this debate, if only for the final eight or ten minutes left this afternoon. I commend the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for bringing this bill forward. As has been said, there are perhaps not so many private members' bills on the Senate at the present time as there have been in past years, but I think this is still a very important subject. It was one of the 12 major subjects discussed all summer by federal and provincial representatives before the first ministers' conference last fall. It was in the same category as changes to the Supreme Court of Canada, resource ownership, offshore resources, equalization, a charter of rights and all the other of the 12 subjects which the provincial and federal people were trying to negotiate last summer and which were discussed at the first ministers' conference in September.

The Senate, or second chamber of some sort, is not just an anachronism that is just dying away slowly. I suggest it is right here and part of current political thought, and the question in the next few years will be what really can be done with the second chamber. The bill in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil gives us a chance—in a small way, perhaps—to discuss some of the aspects of this question.

I was interested in the comments of the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). His comments were with respect to the problems of regionalism not just within the four regions of the country but also in the regions within the regions. In Ontario, from where I come, traditionally there have always been problems in northern Ontario. I see that the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) is here. The people of northern Ontario consider theirs to be a region unto itself, and in many ways for very good reason. The people there feel that they are disadvantaged. We in southern Ontario, and particularly the Toronto area, hear about this all the time either in a political party sense, in a financial or economic sense or whatever.

The hon. member for Capilano mentioned the problems within his own province of British Columbia. The problems of the interior are different from those on the lower mainland. The people of the different parts of the Northwest Territories have a difficult time getting to know each other better because of great distances.

While a new second chamber may not be the only answer to the problem of regionalism, considering the way discussions are going and the way political thought in this country is going, it will be a significant factor in giving the regions better representation in the future.

While the regions are very important, while they certainly must get more representation and while they must also be seen to get more representation and a fair chance, we still have the other side of the coin, which is the one person, one vote principle. Some of us from central Canada perhaps have a difficult time with that. While acknowledging the problems of the regions, we still have difficulty giving away the one man, one vote principle. If three quarters of the people—or whatever the percentage is—live in central Canada, the question is whether central Canada should have just half the votes rather than somewhat more or some other percentage. However, in spite of everything there is no question that with all the discussions going on in Canada in recent years, the regions in one way or another will be getting much more representation.

It is interesting to be back in the House with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As hon. members know, I was here between 1968 and 1972. During those years I think at least once a year the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, for whom I have a great amount of respect, would get up on at least one occasion and give a speech somewhat similar to the one he gave this afternoon. He has been here in this House almost continuously since, I believe, 1942, and over those nearly 40 years he has made his points on this subject very clear. He has made good arguments.

Arguments on proportional representation and other things will be discussed in the future, but I think the argument of the hon. member for Vaudreuil regarding the fact that almost all federations have two chambers is quite a telling argument. The hon. member for Vaudreuil also mentioned the excellent work, which is acknowledged on all sides of the House, of members of the Senate in preparing reports of various kinds. There have been reports on poverty, retirement, science policy, a policy on the media and others, all of which are well known and acknowledged to be excellent.

As always happens, I am in the unfortunate position this afternoon of having two prepared speeches. One was prepared with the help of my excellent researcher, and one is from the Department of Justice. Two minutes really is not enough time in which to give either of them. However, in the years to come I think we will see that the subject of a second chamber will come up on more than one occasion. I hope it will come up not just in private members' hours such as this—which is a good chance to air some of these questions—but I presume we will also be discussing government proposed bills respecting new constitutional reforms in the future. Some of us will, in any event. We will talk about a second chamber because, despite the opinions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and many members of his party—opinions which are shared by some in other parts of the House—as I mentioned before, I think the realization is coming to more and more of us, including those of us from central Canada, that a second chamber, whether it is the Senate or whatever it will be called in the future, can have a significant role to play in the future of our parliamentary life.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being 5 p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE ECONOMY

ALLEGED RESPONSIBILITY OF MINISTER FOR DETERIORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas in his first visit to Alberta since the infamous budget of October 28, 1980, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) criticized the media for fomenting hostility between the east and the west, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources cease and desist from blaming others, Premier Lougheed when in the east and the media when in the west, and accept full responsibility for the deteriorating economic conditions in Canada, including unemployment and shutdowns caused largely by his refusal to accept Premier Lougheed's offer of an oil agreement last July 25 and by his insistence on the levying of an export tax on natural gas.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

ISSUANCE OF HERRING ROE LICENCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I too rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) has announced new regulations affecting the herring roe fishery on the west coast which were developed without benefit of consultation with the herring advisory committee, and whereas these regulations propose that herring fishing privileges will be granted to a limited number of applicants on a draw-straw basis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House rejects the cruel use of a lottery draw for issuing herring roe licences, as such a scheme will create hardships for those fishermen and their families who lose out on the luck of the draw.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPPING

SUPERTANKER TEST RUNS IN STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, in view of supertanker test runs in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, which are nothing more than public relations attempts to persuade people that oil tankers pose no threat to our coast, and in view of the heroic attempts of members of Greenpeace to expose the public relations aspect of these tests and to stop them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House express its appreciation to Greenpeace and urge the government to make available legal aid to help those members of Greenpeace who were arrested for attempting to protect our coast and the representatives of British Columbia Television who were arrested for carrying out their responsibility of reporting this story to the Canadian public.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

POSITION TAKEN BY PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the comments of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), who last Thursday, as recorded at page 6445 of Hansard, expressed his support for the "broad elements" of the National Energy Program, and given the comments of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in Windsor on the weekend that his policy on Petro-Canada was a mistake, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith):

S.O. 43

That this House urges the Leader of the Opposition to listen to his energy critic and not make another mistake in fighting the National Energy Program, for which his own critic states there is unanimous agreement throughout the country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

POSITION TAKEN ON PROPOSED RESOLUTION ON CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the legitimacy of political institutions is important to the maintenance of a free and democratic society, and in view of the fact that the Diefenbaker bill of rights asserts that our Canadian society is rooted in principles which acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person, the position of the family and respect for moral and spiritual values, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House respectfully request the New Democratic Party caucus to pause to reflect upon the erosion of the legitimacy of political institutions which results from its practice of using one member to argue against these values and a different member to vote for them in the constitutional committee.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

REPORTED SUPPORT OF PETRO-CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering the statement by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), reported over the weekend, that if he had the opportunity again he would keep Petro-Canada as constituted and ensure that it stays strong, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House congratulates the Leader of the Opposition for his recent support of Petro-Canada and calls upon the president of Petro-Canada to send forthwith to the Leader of the Opposition a Petro-Canada credit card.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

CONSTITUTION COMMITTEE—POSITION TAKEN ON OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, in an interview on Sunday, the Leader of the New Democratic Party said there is no way his party will accept the Conservative amendment to the constitution resolution calling for the right of individual Canadians to own property, as is the case in all other free nations. This very basic right to the ownership of property goes to the very heart of our Canadian way of life and that of all free nations. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House condemns the action of the New Democratic Party and its leader for their callous disregard of the right of Canadians to own property and that the Leader of the NDP be urged by the House to abandon his support of the Communist manifesto's call to nationalize and confiscate private property, and direct his efforts to the right of every citizen to own his little chunk of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFORM OF HOUSE RULES—CALL FOR TABLING OF PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in light of the deteriorating atmosphere in the House and the need to make the House a more effective democratic and parliamentary institution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the government House leader be instructed to table without further delay the government's proposals on reform of the House rules.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

ALLEGED EFFECTS ON OIL INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, whereas on Monday of last week the number of oil industry vehicles at Coutts, Alberta, leaving Canada were backed up over one mile, whereas on Wednesday of last week 45 oil industry vehicles of one company and 15 oil industry vehicles of another company left Canada, and whereas such an exodus is not in the national interest and will particularly harm the people of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government be condemned by this House for its sheer ignorance of the effects of the national energy policy when written, and for its bull-headed retention of a dogmatic, doctrinaire policy which is so harmful to the national interest.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

OPTING OUT PRIVILEGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, the metric test centres of Peterborough and Kamloops have been permitted to opt out of metric in retail food stores. Should any of the 36 test centres slated to convert in January, 1982, in the retail food sector not wish to proceed at that time, they should be given a choice. Therefore I move under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That they be given the same opting-out privilege as Peterborough and Kamloops in 1982.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARKS CANADA

HOUSING OF OFFICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, the government has a policy of housing Parks Canada offices in heritage structures across this country, and this is a good policy. However, in Winnipeg the government, in the administration of its policy, is threatening to scuttle its own policy by housing the Parks Canada office in a marginally historic building simply because it owns that building. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government reconsider that foolish action and house the Parks Canada offices all across this country in first-class historical buildings.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to focus the attention of this assembly on a saga of economic crises of the first magnitude. The Minister of Finance is quoted in the January 24 issue of the Financial Post as saying he has three options, fiscal restraint, monetary restraint or wage and price controls, to combat stagflation. The minister asked anyone with better ideas to come forward. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

● (1415)

That there is a fourth option and that the Prime Minister exercise it by calling on the Governor General and offering his resignation and the resignations of the rest of the gang who could not shoot straight.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

EFFECT OF TAXES ON INDUSTRY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, last week I asked the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance why the taxes in the National Energy Program hit the Canadian-owned segment of the industry much harder than the multinationals. At that time the minister said that he disagreed with my statement. I am sure he is aware of the survey of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency which indicated that large foreign-owned, integrated companies earned about half of their income from the production end of the business, the other half from marketing and refining, while Canadian-owned companies earned about three quarters of their income from the production end.

Why did the minister place the total impact of his taxes on the production side of the business, clearly to the detriment of Canadian-owned companies, when there was the obvious option of spreading the load farther afield, on the multinationals?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, again the hon. member returns to the theme he followed last week to the effect that the National Energy Program will adversely affect cash flow to Canadian companies—

Mr. Wilson: That is not what I said; the minister should listen.

Mr. MacEachen: —through the various elements of the program. I want to assure the House that whatever analysis has been conducted over the past, projecting into the future shows clearly that Canadian companies will benefit very considerably. They will have a very substantial cash flow in order to help them conduct their exploration activities. The hon. member has consistently failed to notice the benefits which will accrue to small and medium-size Canadian companies from the petroleum incentives program.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I wish the minister would listen to my question; clearly that is not the question I asked. My question concerned the relative impact of the National Energy Program on Canadian companies compared to the multinationals.

I should like to quote another figure from the same monitoring survey. It shows that the integrated foreign-owned companies earned 16.7 per cent on their capital compared to the 7.7 per cent earned by Canadian producers, so it is clear the foreign-owned companies are twice as profitable as the Canadian ones. If two of the objectives of the National Energy Program are to encourage Canadianization and to be fair regarding impact of taxes, would the minister explain why the main impact of the taxes is being felt by the largest part of the Canadian-owned segment of the industry, the production side, while the multinationals can spread it over a much broader base?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member must examine the over-all impact of the program on the Canadian sector of the industry. It is pointless to relate it to a single tax without relating it to the over-all benefits which will accrue, especially from the petroleum incentives program. I am satisfied that under the NEP a typical small or medium-size oil and gas company will be in a considerably improved financial position in the period from 1981 to 1983 as a result of the petroleum incentives program. I am satisfied of that, and that is the main consideration the hon. member must take into account as he evaluates the over-all impact of all elements of the program. If he undertakes that evaluation carefully, it will lead precisely to the conclusion I have stated.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, possibly the minister would enlighten the people of this country, as well as many of his backbenchers who are asking the same questions I am asking. The fact is that Canadian-owned companies are proposing to spend much larger portions of their budgets outside this country in direct response to the National Energy Program.

I would like to return to my first question, Madam Speaker. I said the main impact of the new taxes under the National Energy Program is totally on the production end of the business with no new taxes on the downstream, that is, the marketing and refining side of the business. Clearly, if the government was striving for self-sufficiency it would be emphasizing production by having the least amount of taxes at that end of the business and putting more on the downstream side. My question to the minister is this. In view of the fact that he has not answered any of my questions relating to fairness, self-sufficiency or Canadianization, would he make a statement during the debate on Bill C-54 explaining to Canadians why it is that in each of these three objectives of the National Energy Program the tax policies he has set out are totally contrary to the objectives of the National Energy Program?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member and I obviously disagree very definitely on the impact of the National Energy Program. There will be an opportunity to debate these taxes in detail when they are considered by the House in Committee of the Whole. I hope I will be able to convince the hon. member at that time that he is mistaken in his totally unjustified conclusion.

The fact of the matter is that an analysis of the cash flow of a typical Canadian gas and oil producer demonstrates clearly that as a result of the National Energy Program the over-all cash position of these Canadian companies, of medium and small size, not heretofore eligible for depletion allowances or super depletion, will have their situation improved considerably. In my judgment that is fair. It will assist in the achievement of energy security and will accomplish one of the objectives of the National Energy Program, namely, to enhance the Canadianization of the industry.

REQUEST BY INDEPENDENT PETROLEUM ASSOCIATION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROGRAM

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. This morning the Prime Minister had delivered to him by hand a letter from the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, which represents the Canadian-owned sector of the business. The first paragraph of the letter reads:

> After three months of careful study, we the members of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada have concluded that the National Energy Program will have disastrous consequences not only for our industry but for Canada's national goal of energy self-sufficiency and, indeed, the over-all economy.

This is in direct contradiction to everything the minister has just finished flim-flamming the House with. In its letter the IPA goes on to make a very reasonable request, namely, that a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be established to study the National Energy Program and its ramifications with regard to Canada's energy self-sufficiency and the Canadian-owned oil and gas industry.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: Will he accept this very reasonable request of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada to establish this special committee so that all the facts—the government's facts, the industry's facts and our facts—can be put on the table and the people of Canada can be given a chance to judge?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe the request of the association to which the hon. member refers but with which I disagree is certainly reasonable, in so far as a request for an opportunity to have all the aspects of the program examined is concerned. That will be possible through the bill which has already been referred to committee by the House under the name of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It will also be possible through the bills which I hope will be given first reading today and which will be considered in the House of Commons and in the Senate. So it is possible for every point of view to be heard. It would be my wish that the fullest opportunity be given to have the facts laid out and the situation judged on the basis of fact rather than by what I consider to be, at times, ill-considered statements.

● (1425)

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, this so-called ill-considered statement was written by the association which represents about 325 Canadian owned oil and gas companies. These are not the multinationals. Would the Deputy Prime Minister reconsider his quick, off-the-cuff decision in view of the fact that he is talking about four or five bills to cover a variety of areas and that no one bill covers all the aspects of this particular program? Would it not speed up House business to have this program considered in toto by a special committee? With that kind of understanding, I am quite certain that the specific pieces of legislation would receive quicker passage through the House if, after the facts are out, the government would still want to sponsor the bills.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, it is a fact that there are, as the hon. member has acknowledged, a number of bills containing components of the National Energy Program. The necessity for a number of bills, of course, arises from the rules of the House. If the government House leader can make arrangements with his counterparts in the opposition parties to find a better way to deal with these bills and to achieve, as the hon. member states, speedier passage and a more complete examination, I would be the first to support any such examination. However, we are proceeding according to the rules of the House, and these rules will provide ample opportunity for the consideration of every aspect of these bills. If a better method can be suggested, then it would receive my support.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REPORTED TESTING OF CHEMICAL DEFOLIANTS

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and it arises out of the question I directed to the Prime Minister on Friday morning. Is the minister now able to tell us why the government has repeatedly denied any involvement in product testing for Vietnam when this clearly was not so, particularly in light of the very disturbing comments which were made this weekend by Mr. Paul Hellyer, the minister of national defence at the time, that such tests were routine?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I read very carefully the question asked of the Prime Minister by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake last Friday, and I listened to his question today. I will give his question all the importance and concern which it merits. Over the weekend I read many of the reports in the media, and I hope that the hon. member did not over-dramatize the issue merely to get press coverage, because I refuse to play politics with the nerves of the people. This report is not secret; it was unclassified and available to everyone.

Mr. Lawrence: You did not know anything about it.

Mr. Lamontagne: I knew of the matter last September when it first came out and I am aware of the situation.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The Prime Minister did not know.

Mr. Lamontagne: It is true that DND collaborated with the United States in 1966-1967 to test the various formulations of different herbicides. I can assure hon. members that Canada's only interest in the tests was to obtain technical advice and assistance in range clearance and bush control. It has been alleged by some people that Agent Orange could be health hazardous, but there is no confirmation as yet. I do not believe that we should play with this question until we are sure that—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, I would point out that this paper was not available through Canadian sources, that I had to obtain it through American sources by taking advantage of their freedom of information act. The minister has often said in the past year or so that chemical warfare testing in Canada was only of a defensive nature and was conducted only in the open air using harmless simulants. Will the minister kindly explain to the House how he defines the Gagetown tests as defensive, how he defines Agent Orange as a harmless simulant, and can he tell us if there were any other such tests?

● (1430)

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think I have been very clear about this. I said the only interest of DND in this was to get technical advice and assistance on range clearing and bush control. If the hon. member wants proof that there was never any question about Vietnam or anything like that, we can take the main estimates in SCND of June 29, 1966, where Mr. MacLean asked about tenders. To his thinking, it was much too expensive to clear the bush on the Gagetown base and he asked for new tenders to see what kind of clearance we could get more cheaply.

I can assure the House that this hon. member is trying to make it appear as though we were involved in the Vietnam war. We were never mixed up in that. I listened to the answer of the Minister of National Health and Welfare on Friday.

My department is ready to collaborate in any kind of investigation to see whether this test involves any health hazard in the region of Oromocto, New Brunswick.

INQUIRY WHETHER ADDITIONAL TESTS CONDUCTED

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): My supplementary is also directed to the Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. Since he knew about the tests last September, according to his statement just now in the House, did he at that time inform the ministry of health? If not, why not?

As a follow-up to my hon. colleague's question, if there were any further tests conducted in this country, would he please disclose what they were? Also, would he please contact the ministry of health so that they may monitor the health of the personnel as well as of people living in the immediate vicinity where the tests might have taken place?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, that series of questions could be placed on the Order Paper, if the hon. member wishes. In the meantime I can assure him that the number of personnel involved in this testing was very small, 11 military and two civilians. The area was the Gagetown base. I heard and read about this spraying over New Brunswick, and I can advise the hon. member that the spray was tested over a small area of Gagetown. Possibly the hon. member does not know that the Gagetown base is 45 miles long north-south and 30 miles wide east-west. A small portion was used for these tests, which does not mean the spray was tested over the whole of New Brunswick.

RAILWAYS

DELAYS AND DERAILMENTS IN EASTERN QUEBEC—DATE OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns the decision made by the minister on January 14 to hold an investigation into the problems that plagued VIA Rail and more especially the population of eastern Quebec and eastern Canada during the holidays. Has the minister decided who will undertake this investigation; that is, either the Canadian Transport Commission or the Department of Transport, when it will get under way and how long it will last?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the investigation will be undertaken by the Canadian Transport Commission. I cannot give the hon. member the exact date when this investigation will be launched, but I shall inquire and provide him with the information.

PETRO-CANADA

CONTINUATION OF EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT ACTIVITY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. It is with regard to energy policy. As the minister knows, the energy policy requires PetroCan to muster all of its resources in an effort to either back in, bully in, nose in or butt in with the activities now going on on federal lands. By so doing, of course, the Crown corporation has no resources left to continue activities in the conventional producing areas of this country. This causes all kinds of disruption in communities and the loss of jobs and technology.

Has the minister reviewed the energy policy in that context? Could direction go to the Crown corporation, asking it at least to continue last year's program in the areas of northeastern British Columbia and Alberta with regard to exploration and development?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the National Energy Program does indeed provide a more active role for Petro-Canada in the development of frontier lands. That activity, however, is not such as to preclude continued participation in the search for conventional oil and gas resources on provincial lands. That activity on the part of Petro-Canada will be continuing. That is not to say that in certain parts of the country where wells may not have been discovered the emphasis has not been shifted elsewhere in the normal procedures of the exploration industry. However, participation in provincial lands and conventional sources will continue.

Mr. Oberle: Despite what the parliamentary secretary says, Petro-Canada rigs are crowding the highways, leaving the conventional producing and exploration areas in northeastern British Columbia. There is no PetroCan activity now, even though that is the only area in which they have any presence. It is the only refinery there. Will the government undertake to table before the House or the energy committee a program which Petro-Canada will be committed to in this and the following season in the conventional producing areas in order to restore some semblance of confidence in the energy economy throughout the country?

Mr. MacLaren: In answering a somewhat similar question from the hon. member in committee the other day, the minister stated that he would provide as far as possible the details the hon. member seeks. I shall be glad to see that that is done.

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

COMPOSITION OF COUNCIL—REQUEST COUNCIL REPORT TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for the status of women. Having practically destroyed the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, the minister is now forced to turn—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Miss MacDonald: I see hon. members are waiting for the question. I will be glad to put the question. I am sure a lot of women would like to put questions to the minister. The minister is now forced to turn to women's organizations across the country to try to put the council back together again. He is becoming like the original Humpty-Dumpty. I would like to ask how he has gone about selecting these women's organizations with which he is asked to meet or, rather, why he has left our certain key women's organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women, women representatives from the Canadian Union of Public Employees or the National Association of Women and the Law, all of whom strongly condemned the minister's actions in recent weeks. Will he tell us exactly why he has been so selective and left out representatives of the groups that I have named?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is a matter of some dispute as to who really is responsible for whatever damage has been done to the council. I ask the hon. member to examine her own conscience in that area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: That is like blaming the police for the crime rate.

Mr. Axworthy: I would simply point out that the selection of groups was done on the advice of the council's office. They represent national organizations. If there are other groups which would like to be consulted, I would certainly be open to having discussions with them as well.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, all of these groups that I mentioned would have been at the original conference in February had the minister not interfered with it. Therefore, they are surely owed the courtesy of an invitation to any subsequent meeting. All of these groups in recent days have stated very strongly that they want to see the Advisory Council on the Status of Women report directly to Parliament and not to a minister. Even Win Gardner, the interim president of the advisory council, who has described the minister as a close and personal dear friend, over the weekend said that the council as it is now constituted could be open to political manipulation.

In view of all these representations, will the minister now agree, before the meeting takes place with these women's organizations, that the council will in future report directly to Parliament and not to a minister, such as the current one responsible for the status of women?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, unlike the hon. member, I am not apt to judge pre-conceived solutions to problems. I am prepared to sit down with the groups we have invited to listen to their recommendations and advice. Once we have received those recommendations and advice, we will be prepared to act. I would like to give them the courtesy of hearing them first, unlike the hon. member who has already made up her mind, as she does in most cases, without benefit of the facts.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INVESTMENT IN URBAN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I would draw to the minister's attention that the 2nd Cities Energy Conference is being held in Winnipeg this week. Their primary concern is to find alternatives to fossil fuels for urban transportation. In light of the fact that the federal government invests so little in urban transportation and that bus fares continue to rise all across the country, as evidenced here in Ottawa, does the minister not agree that now is the time to make a serious public investment in urban transportation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would debate the premise that the federal government does not do much for urban transportation. There are programs, such as those for line relocation, grade separation, crossings, branch lines and so on, and therefore this topic would have to be debated. But I want to agree that the needs are unlimited. There was a time when having the main line in the centre of the city was a status symbol in Canada. The situation has now changed. Consequently there is a need for more money to be spent on urban transportation, and we do our best in that regard.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, the minister says he would like to debate whether the federal government invests much in urban transportation, but I point out to him that only one half of 1 per cent of the $1.85 billion federal financing for transportation goes for urban transportation. Three quarters of the funds under UTAP go into grade crossings to traverse rail lines and not into mass public transport.

Would the minister reconsider his first response and assure people from cities across Canada who will be in attendance at this conference that this government will now make a major investment in urban transportation?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, inasmuch as grade separation and rail line relocations are in cities, they are a contribution to urban transportation. That is the way the reasoning goes. Again, I agree with my hon. friend's proposition that more money could be spent. I hereby declare solemnly that I will devote much of my effort to that objective.

FEDERAL LANDS

YUKON—DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN LOTS WITHOUT TENDER

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indians Affairs and Northern Development, if his parliamentary secretary has finished briefing him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Before doing so, may I welcome the Minister of Justice back from hospital to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I hope he withstands the pressures of his constitutional responsibilities.

My question has to do with the disposition of federal lands in the Yukon. As the minister will know by now, a number of lots have been disposed of or are in the process of being disposed of in the Cowley Lake and Carcross road area to some rather prominent citizens, including the chief administrator of Yukon lands in the Yukon. This is being done without any public notification, without any public advertisement or without any call for public tenders. Is the minister aware of the circumstances, and what criteria were used in the exercise of discretion in accepting the applications? Does the minister know whether any public advertisement was made or whether any call for public tenders was made in the disposition of these several parcels of federal lands?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I did make note of some of the charges made in connection with this whole subject matter which the hon. member for Yukon is raising. I asked my department for a complete report, which I hoped to receive before question period. I have not received it as yet, but I do expect it this afternoon. I will endeavour to reply to the hon. member in considerably more detail tomorrow.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, since the right to acquire and own lands, as the minister knows and as the Minister of Justice knows having held that portfolio for a number of years, is the single and most important matter in the minds of Yukoners and the single greatest irritant to the population of the Yukon, will the minister give me his assurance today that he will instruct his officials to freeze any disposition of those several parcels of federal lands until he has conducted a thorough investigation with respect to the manner and method adopted in their disposition, primarily the question of public advertisement and public tender? Included in that full investigation, would the minister determine whether or not any conflicts exist with respect to the acquisition of public lands by public servants, and whether or not all laws have been complied with respecting applications made by those public servants for the acquisition of federal lands?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that prior to coming into the House I was advised in general terms that no favouritism was displayed. As I have indicated to the hon. member, I have not received the details with respect to the subject matter which the hon. member is talking about. When I do receive them, as I hope to do this afternoon or tomorrow morning, if there is any suggestion on the face of the material before me of any impropriety whatsoever, of course I will take action, if not identical with what the hon. member is talking about, certainly to correct any impropriety.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOUTH KOREA—COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE ON KIM DAE-JUNG

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. All members will be thankful that President Chun has used his considerable powers and has commuted the death sentence of Kim Dae-Jung, former leader of the non-communist forces in South Korea. Considering that originally Kim was sentenced to death for activities similar to those of Canada's present Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition in Canada's Thirty-first Parliament, and since Canada's past protest was really only a token one, I ask the minister whether Canada will join in the international campaign for Kim, perhaps by following the lead of 3.5 million Japanese who have signed a petition demanding that Mr. Kim be set free, not just spared from death.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would like to express the pleasure that I am sure we all feel at the commutation of Mr. Kim's death sentence which was taken following a motion by this House and following representations by this government. The international protest to which my hon. friend refers is not that of governments at the present time but that of citizens. The Government of Canada has no plans to join in such citizens' protests at this time.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—AMENDMENT TO PROPOSED RESOLUTION RESPECTING PROPERTY RIGHTS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice whom I also welcome back to the House. Canadian Press reports this afternoon say that the Liberal Party is considering reneging on a commitment given by the Solicitor General on behalf of the Minister of Justice last week to include property rights in the Canadian Constitution, a commitment which was supported by many Liberal Members of Parliament. Would the Minister of Justice assure the House and the millions of Canadians whose rights are at stake that those rights will not be sacrificed by the government in response to pressures applied by the NDP?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, first I would like to thank all members for their good wishes. I was not that sick; I had what you would call constitutional indigestion!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: The doctor told me that the best remedy is to finish the job as quickly as possible!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It is making us all sick.

Mr. Chrétien: Of course, Madam Speaker, I will be delighted to answer the hon. member's question in front of the committee, should he put it tonight.

Mr. Nielsen: It has already been answered there.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the commitment was given last week before the committee by the Acting Minister of Justice.

My question for the minister deals with government policy, which the House of Commons is entitled to know. Does the government put a higher priority upon the wishes of the NDP in their opposition to government policy than it puts upon the wishes of 64 per cent of Canadians who have expressed their opposition to the course followed by the government? Is the government going to buckle from this pressure applied by the NDP and sacrifice the interests of millions of Canadians who want to see property rights included in the Constitution?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I will deal with the problem tonight, but I would like to tell the hon. member that during the summer, in the long negotiations that we had with the provinces, the main opposition to that clause was from provinces, from Conservative governments which form many provincial governments.

INCOME TAX

IMPACT ON FINANCING OF VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State who is responsible within the government for the study of the voluntary sector. The Secretary of State is no doubt aware of the objectives and concerns of the coalition of national voluntary organizations in respect of the impact of federal income tax laws on the financing of voluntary organizations. What is he doing about this responsibility within government?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, we have initiated a number of decisions within government regarding the national voluntary organizations over the past few months. We have organized a number of meetings with officials of the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Finance. We are looking at the matter very closely indeed.

I should also like to point out to the hon. member that there is this upcoming consultation on Friday and Saturday with government, organized by the national voluntary organizations, and this will be one of the subjects of discussion.

INQUIRY WHETHER SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON TASK FORCE CONSIDERED

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the government House leader. Has he given the studies we have now been informed are being carried on by the Secretary of State and other organizations within the government and outside the government some consideration, and specifically has he considered the formation of a special or select parliamentary committee or parliamentary task force in order that all of the propositions which may be forthcoming from the bureaucratic side, on the one hand, and from the public side, on the other, relating to voluntary matters may be brought to the attention of Parliament? In this way there could be a sounding board for those concerns, much as there was in a very positive way in respect of the handicapped and others, utilizing the offices of this Parliament?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Indeed, Madam Speaker, we have been able to see how effective this type of special committees of the House can be. Some of them reported on current matters in December and others have had their terms of reference extended and should report very shortly. The suggestion of my hon. colleague concerning the voluntary sector is interesting and I intend to discuss it with the Secretary of State and to consult my colleagues, the House leaders to see whether we could come to an agreement and establish such a special committee to examine this particular subject.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RADIO-CANADA DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. As the minister knows, Radio-Canada's dispute with its journalists has denied the people of Quebec news in both our official languages for almost three months now. The minister knows also that the union, through three mediation attempts by the Department of Labour principally, has made substantial concessions, and that the latest mediator appointed by the Minister of Labour quit last Monday, blaming the government and indicating that management was not serious. Is it now the minister's intention to urge his colleague, the Minister of Labour, to appoint a mediator with special powers to initiate real and serious negotiations so that this matter can come to a positive conclusion for both sides, plus the people of Quebec?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, we have indicated our interest on this side of the House in seeing the type of service the hon. member refers to resumed as soon as possible in the province of Quebec. The mediator referred to was, of course, appointed by my colleague the Minister of Labour. I have not seen the exact report to which the hon. member refers, but it would be up to the Minister of Labour, upon consideration of this report, to decide what action he wants to take. On my side, I am continuing my discussions with the Minister of Labour in the hope that we may find some way of settling this strike as soon as possible.

REQUEST FOR ACTION BY MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): I think perhaps, Madam Speaker, what is now needed is an outside, independent mediator. Failing that, will the Deputy Prime Minister undertake to this House that, failing the efforts of an independent or outside mediator, if one is appointed and fails in his duties—and hopefully that will not happen—he will consult with the Minister of Labour urging him, telling him if necessary, to assume his responsibilities and have this matter settled, even if it means calling both parties into his office and keeping them there until it is settled?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have every confidence that the Minister of Labour will discharge his responsibilities in a very acceptable way.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF DUTY ON BODY ARMOUR

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. Many individual policemen are investigating the purchase of body armour in order to protect themselves against serious acts of violence. The cost of this protection is very high but many individual policemen would like to purchase it on their own. Good quality body armour is presently imported under Canada Customs No. 56300 at a duty of 25 per cent, while police riot helmets, firemen's helmets and safety helmets are imported under Canada Customs No. 569401 tax-free.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please come to his question.

Mr. Hopkins: Will the minister take an in-depth look at this tariff item with a view to removing the 25 per cent duty on body armour if it is being purchased individually or departmentally by law enforcement agencies across Canada?

Mr. Nielsen: It is also made in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke has made numerous representations on that subject. I would like to point out to him that as a result of his efforts the department officials responsible for enforcing tariffs made a thorough inquiry into the importation of bullet-proof vests. I remind him that we cannot accept duty-free imports of bullet-proof vests produced in the United States because we do have Canadian manufacturers who market that product, and they are making every effort to improve it since it is used by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other law enforcement agencies throughout Canada. By affording protection to those Canadian manufacturers who continue working with the RCMP and other police forces to sell a better product we may be able to extend the market for such products to all police forces in Canada and even in the United States.

KREVER ROYAL COMMISSION

REPRESENTATION MADE BY COUNSEL FOR RCMP

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General who I know has now had time to study the provincial report of Mr. Justice Horace Krever who was sitting as a province of Ontario royal commissioner taking a look at the whole question of disclosure of medical records. During the course of those hearings counsel for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police assured the royal commissioner it had made complete disclosure to him and the force had not used any medical information, however obtained, for disruptive purposes. One of the main conclusions of the royal commission was, and I quote: "The RCMP . . . must have known that this representation was untrue." They must have known it was untrue, of course, because the matter had come before the McDonald commission.

I would ask the Solicitor General from whom, how and why would counsel for the RCMP have received instructions to make a representation that was blatantly untrue to the royal commissioner?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have indeed studied the report of the Krever commission. I do not accept the version the hon. member has given of the statements made by counsel for the RCMP before that commission. However, there is no doubt that the commission did find fault with the RCMP in the provision of evidence to that commission.

I would prefer, however, not to comment on matters that took place in the past because of the fact, as the hon. member noted, the McDonald commission is studying these very matters and will be delivering a report on them. As I have not commented on matters coming out of the evidence before the McDonald commission, I do not think I should report or comment on matters which have come out before other commissions at this time. There will be a time for comment on such matters and I will be very forthcoming with the House when that time comes.

● (1500)

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I am sure the Solicitor General understood that I was not talking about matters before the McDonald commission. I was talking about a very serious charge by a provincial royal commission concerning the credibility and the trustworthiness of the force as a whole and about the representations made to that provincial royal commission. Obviously the McDonald commission has not dealt with this matter because the solicitor general of the day was not brought before that commission.

Has the Solicitor General not caused some investigation into how patently untrue instructions were given to a counsel before a royal commission? Those patently untrue instructions resulted in a very serious element of misrepresentation not only by the counsel for the RCMP but also by the counsel for the commission.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, anyone can read the Krever report. It is publicly available. When people do read it, they will see that the hon. member has misrepresented the observations made by that commission about the representations made before the commission.

When I looked into the matter, I did so to satisfy myself that the RCMP had, in one way or another and at one time or another, made all relevant information available to the Krever commission. I am satisfied from the information I have that they did that and that they eventually carried out the responsibility of all good citizens to bring information forward to royal commissions.

The comments which may be made or ought to be made about the conduct and forthrightness of the RCMP are general comments which the public will want to review and about which the public ought to be commenting, but for my part I will reserve my comments on that until the McDonald commission—which, after all, has all these matters before it—reports in due course later this year.

Oral Questions

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

STATEMENT OF MINISTER ON INACCURACY OF MINUTES OF MEETING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women. On Friday Ms. Shelley-Ann Clark, the secretary of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, said that the minister lied to the House when he stated that the minutes of the January 9 meeting of the council were inaccurate. Does the minister stand by the statement he made to the House?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member for Oshawa had been a little more careful, he would have checked my statements in the House. I indicated solely that there was an affidavit which attested to misrepresentations.

Mr. Nielsen: Where is it? Produce it.

Mr. Axworthy: I simply referred to the affidavit. I did not comment on that because I have not seen those minutes. I do not know whether they are accurate or not, but I did say there was an affidavit which had been deposed by five members of the executive committee so attesting.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the credibility of the minister, who is the person responsible for the status of women in this country, is undermined every time he answers a question in the House of Commons. Has he just indicated to the House that he has not seen the affidavit and, if not, in the interests of honesty and truth on this whole subject why has he not seen it? Will he assure the House that he will have a look at it and then come back to the House, produce it and make a statement in the House as to whether he has been conveying the right information or whether the secretary of the body in question is telling the truth?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, as I have said many times in the House, this was a matter which should really have been resolved by the parties to that dispute. Those parties are the members of the executive committee who have publicly stated that they have signed an affidavit. I gather that the secretary says that what she recorded is accurate. If there is a problem, I suggest that the two parties to that disagreement resolve it between themselves or take the proper action. All I reported to this House was that there was an affidavit signed by executive members. If the hon. member wants me to obtain a copy of that affidavit, I would be prepared to ask the members of the executive committee to produce one. I would be glad to do that, but what I said was that I had not seen a copy of the minutes. I therefore have never commented on the accuracy of the statements, only that there was an affidavit.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,613, 1,783, 1,809, 1,810, 1,816 and 1,835.

[Text]

FEDERAL IDENTITY PROGRAM

Question No. 1,613—Mr. Forrestall:

What was the total amount spent by each department and agency under the Federal Identity Program for interior and exterior signs during the fiscal year (a) 1978-79 (b) 1979-80 (c) 1980-81 (estimate) and, in each case, how many signs were purchased?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): The Federal Identity Program sets out the policy and the design standards which must apply to signs installed by all federal government organizations. Government-wide data has not been maintained to date on the number of signs employed by the government or on the costs of all signs installed by government organizations. Signage costs are normally included in over-all relocation costs. However, an inventory of signs used at buildings owned or managed by Public Works is now being conducted. The following data is now available with respect to costs: bilingual signage conversion program. In January, 1975, a signage conversion program estimated at $21.4 million over four fiscal years (FY 1975/76 to FY 1978/79) was approved for the purpose of ensuring conformity to the Official Languages Act of all signage owned or managed by the Department of Public Works. The Federal Identity Program sets out the standards under which government signage conforms to the Official Languages Act and policies pursuant to it. The actual cost of procuring the signs for this program, however, was $11.4 million over five fiscal years. Costs and numbers of signs procured for the last three fiscal years have been as follows:

		Costs	Numbers of signs
FY	78-79	$2,912,520	3,142
	79-80	$ 267,434	1,098
	80-81	$ 377,169	858

Addition of the "Canada" wordmark. In September, 1980, a new Federal Identity Program policy was approved by Treasury Board calling for the addition of the "Canada" wordmark to government signage. The purpose of the policy is to provide clear and consistent identification of all government facilities and services. The cost of implementing the policy, including the upgrading and improved maintenance of government signage in general, is estimated at $1.6 million in fiscal year 1980-81.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,783—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of Teleglobe Canada for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by Teleglobe Canada that the reply to the above question is as follows:

(a) Advertising: $930,000.

(b) Free or subsidized publications—$90,000. This includes a number of brochures distributed free of charge to the public; i.e. annual reports, folders, postcards on the corporation's satellite and cable stations, maps of Teleglobe's worldwide cable and satellite network.

(c) Other information conveyed to the public—$80,000. Teleglobe Canada has a public information program consisting of guided tours of its satellite stations, participation at exhibitions open to the public, issuance of press releases on newsworthy developments, speeches to school groups and professional associations.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED

Question No. 1,809—Mr. Herbert:

Is all documentation issued by Defence Construction (1951) Limited in both official languages and, if not, for what reason?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The tender and contract documents issued by Defence Construction (1951) Limited are available in both official languages as are any other publications that may be issued by the company for public consumption. Plans and specifications are prepared in both official languages by the Department of National Defence for those projects that are located in bilingual areas. (Bilingual areas are detailed in Annex B of the "Official Languages in the Public Service—Statement of Policies" prepared jointly by the Treasury Board and Public Service Commission, September, 1977). In addition, all directives, circulars, etc. of an administrative nature issued to the personnel of the company are prepared in both official languages.

Question No. 1,810—Mr. Herbert:

To which departments and agencies has Defence Construction (1951) Limited provided technical and administrative assistance in each of the past three years?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

1977-78 Department of National Defence.

1978-79 Department of National Defence.

1979-80 Department of National Defence, Treasury Board, Canadian International Development Agency.

Question No. 1,816—Mr. Herbert:

Are all employee salary costs of Defence Construction (1951) Limited charged to administrative costs and, if not, what amount has been charged in each of the past ten years to contract costs?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes.

GREENLAND—CONSULAR OFFICE

Question No. 1,835—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government have an embassy or consular office in Greenland and, if not, is it considering establishing such an office?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canada maintains no embassy or consulate in Greenland. The Canadian Embassy in Copenhagen is accredited to Greenland as part of the Kingdom of Denmark. Establishment of a consulate in Greenland is not under active consideration at this time.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate for a few minutes in this debate this afternoon because I want to put on the record a few facts and figures with regard to this bill, and to demonstrate to our friends in this House and to the country just how the Canadian tax system has affected different tax-paying citizens throughout our country.

As we all know, the idea of collecting income tax in our country was not conceived at confederation. It came along after the First World War because we had to pay off some of our war debts. Later on the idea came along that the Income Tax Act could be used to redistribute wealth, equalize opportunities, adequately bring about a degree of equity and fairness to the country, and redistribute the benefits of the achievements of our industrial society.

• (1510)

I assume that the war debts have been paid off, in fact I know they have, certainly those that were accumulated after the First World War. But in the other area, namely, the concept of redistributing wealth, successive governments since that time have wrestled with the question of how it should be done on a more just and equitable basis. In doing so, this government in particular has been too preoccupied with the redistribution of wealth to remember how wealth is created in the first place. Soon we might be in the position of having nothing left and no new wealth to distribute. However, we can rest assured that at least if we keep this government in power, everyone will have an equal share of nothing.

Will Rogers once said that the crime of taxation is not in the taking of it but rather in the way it is spent. If I were to recount in the House the horror stories to which we are being treated every year when the Auditor General publishes his report on how our tax dollars are being spent, it would be much more interesting, but instead this afternoon I want to talk a little about the manner in which our taxes are being collected in the first place.

Despite the government's assiduous attempts to redistribute our wealth, the poor in our country have become noticeably poorer and the rich have become noticeably richer in the ten years of the just society, which is entering its final phase now. Statistics tell us that the people who live in the lowest 20 per cent of the economic scale share only 4.4 per cent of the money earned in our country, and that the real income of that group has decreased by 7 per cent over the last ten years. So much for the just society. The rich have been getting richer and the poor have been getting poorer. There is a sort of inner circle, and the just society has been just for Liberals.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the tax system operates on a graduating scale, which means that those who earn more pay a higher rate, and one's ability to pay is the guiding principle of the tax collector when he assesses our contribution. The Fraser Institute published an interesting set of statistics recently which take into account the fact that income tax is not the only form of taxation, that there are all kinds of other taxes to which individuals in our society are subjected. There is the profit tax, the income tax, and the sales tax. The sales tax includes tax on liquor, amusement, tobacco. There are excise taxes, the fuel tax, social security taxes, the pension contributions, all of which are taxes in disguise. There are property taxes, natural resources taxes, import duties, and all kinds of other taxes.

I would recommend that hon. members make themselves familiar with this set of statistics, which show that there is an obsession with taking from the rich and giving to the poor, the Robin Hood principle. A fellow asked me the other day if I could tell him of one person who has ever been helped by Robin Hood. It challenges your imagination to figure that out. These statistics are related to the 1978 tax year. A person earning $15,000 a year and paying all these additional taxes to which I have made reference, would have a net after tax income of $9,472 a year. A person earning $25,000, or $10,000 more, would have a net after tax income, or a disposable income, of $12,031 a year. But if you earn $40,000 a year, or $25,000 more than a person on the lowest rungs of the income scale, all you would have left after paying taxes along the way is $11,191. In other words, compared to people in the $15,000 income bracket, people in the $40,000 bracket would only have $2,000 more after all the other taxes, licences, fees, and so on have been paid.

It can be argued reasonably that a person earning $40,000 a year would purchase more consumer goods and so would pay a higher sales tax. It can be argued also that he has a larger home so his property taxes are higher, and really he should not complain. He does not complain, but the fact remains that of the $25,000 additional income, people in the higher income brackets pay $23,000 to some form of government, be it municipal, provincial, regional or federal. These are very important statistics.

One could reasonably argue that there is a large gap between the rich and the poor in this country which has nothing to do with taxation, but instead has to do with our credit economy, credit society. The fact is that people in the higher income brackets own their home, their car, their fridge and their television set, but people in the lower-income brackets buy these commodities on credit. There is an unwritten law that everybody must have certain basic things. The government seems to encourage people to have them and to believe they are entitled to certain basic things, whether it is their home, their car—and in this country it is pretty well an essential commodity—a fridge, and a television set to plug you into the mainstream of cultural life and activity. The fact is that people in the lower-income brackets purchase these things on credit and, in so doing, as you know, pay not once or twice but three times the price of their television sets, their cars or their refrigerators. That is really why the gap between the rich and the poor occurs. In other words, people who can least afford to do so, pay three times the price of their purchases to the banks and the financial institutions, to the social planners and social engineers who sit on the other side of the House and who take their pound of flesh in the form of taxes and fees. Those people who buy on credit get no relief from income tax, sales tax, or from any of the other taxes I mentioned.

I should like to speak now about equity and fairness and about the foundation on which our tax system is predicated, namely, that you should be assessed taxes in accordance with your ability to pay. As you know, one's ability to pay in this country varies dramatically according to where one lives. Incomes are higher in Vancouver, for example, than they are in St. John's, Newfoundland. Even in that part of our country which is known as the cultural and economic corridor, which runs along the U.S. border, there are large discrepancies.

But more specifically I should like to talk a little this afternoon about the incredible cost of living gap—cost of living being the factor which affects your ability to pay more than anything else—which exists between the area which I have identified as the economic corridor running along the border, and the remote, isolated frontier areas in our country, particularly the area north of the 60th parallel where less than 1 per cent of our population lives, an area which embraces more than two thirds of our total geography, and, to a lesser extent, of course, the area which is sometimes referred to as the mid-Canada corridor, embracing the remote and isolated areas in our provinces.

I have tabled a report before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is the subject of an ongoing study by three departments, the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance, and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have assembled a number of statistics which demonstrate in very graphic terms the seriousness of the income gap and how it affects the ability of people in northern regions to pay not only their taxes but for the so-called niceties of life which other Canadians take for granted.

In some of the remote native villages north of sixty, and in the northern portions of the provinces, people pay $5 and $6 for a gallon of gasoline. One can argue: what is the difference—there are no roads anyway? But the fact remains that people in some of those areas rely on river transportation or boats which run on gasoline. Certainly in the wintertime their only mode of travel is by ski-doo and snow machines which require gasoline. Can one imagine what it would be like if people owning automobiles in Ottawa had to pay $5 or $6 per gallon of gasoline?

There are areas of the country which have no other access to the markets of the country than by air; their perishables are flown in by aircraft. We base our standard of living and the consumer price index on the cost of a shopping basket. The cost of shopping baskets in northern communities is two and three times that of the cost in city supermarkets. Is it any wonder that we remind the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when he travels around the world in his new-found endeavour concerning the North-South relation, of the serious discrepancies which exist in Canada? There are actually people in the north who are starving. Some of them live off the land; some of the inhabitants of native villages fry and cook porcupine because they cannot afford to buy beef, veal, pork, eggs or butter. But when their income tax is charged at the end of February, it does not take account of their inability to pay.

The tax rate which applies in the north is the same as in any other part of the country. It is for that reason I have wrestled with the problem for a couple of years, but I have been unable to get my views across to the majority of members who represent city ridings. They do not readily understand how serious is the problem. It is not only the consumer price index and the cost of essential commodities; it is the cost associated with children who require special care at hospitals or medical institutions. People in northern communities should be so lucky that their young persons complete high school education. If they want to continue their education by attending learning institutions in large cities, an incredible burden is placed on the average northern family. They are faced with transportation costs and costs associated with young people living away from home. Every time one picks up a telephone, one is placing a long distance call.

People in cities have the benefit of a postman delivering mail at their doors five days per week, and they do not even say "thank you". In the north, residents must start up their cars when it is 40 below zero and drive to post offices. They rent post office boxes for $6 per year, and they say "thank you" three or four times a year to the postmaster.

There are many discrepancies and inequities which seriously affect the ability of the people to pay and their commitment to the country. We are seeing people throughout Canada today who no longer feel that they are part of the nation as a whole; they feel left out. These people then begin to associate with another community of thought and to pursue actively and aggressively other and sometimes more radical alternatives.

I have made some proposals about which I want to speak this afternoon. It is not adequate to catalogue the problems and list the statistics. As Members of Parliament we should make constructive suggestions, which I have done in my report. Again I recommend it to my friends in the House. It is a non-partisan document, except on the first page in the introduction it refers to the Diefenbaker vision of the north. I think even the most partisan mind on the other side would know today that we were not really building roads from igloo to igloo, that the Dempster highway is now a very important transportation link to the storehouse of resources in the north and the Arctic ocean, and that we are really on the way to discovering the reality of the potential in store for us in the north.

The document is easy reading. It points out what other countries such as Australia and Denmark have done. For instance, in their treatment of taxpayers in Greenland, they have established precisely what I am proposing, namely, different tax zones. These tax zones are established in accordance with existing problems and along the principle of one's ability to pay, as I mentioned before. I have used the Australian model, as well as the criteria which the government uses in compensating its employees. This is what makes the document credible. I have used the example of people who are working for the federal government and are posted in isolated communities in the north, be it in the northern part of the provinces, north of sixty or in the Territories.

I have used the same criteria and have applied them to all Canadians living in the north. I used nothing other than the compensation which bureaucrats receive in the form of housing, travel allowances and northern living allowances and I came up with the staggering figure that Canadians living in the mid-Canada corridor north of sixty pay $470 million too much in personal income taxes every year. I applied nothing but the basic principles of equity, fairness, and ability to pay.

This is a somewhat staggering statistic, particularly when one considers that I am talking about no more than 5 per cent of our population. Less than one per cent lives north of 60, but a total of 5 per cent of our population live in the northern areas remote from what I have described as the mid-Canada corridor. The document includes a map which readily identifies the different areas. Public servants posted in the north receive between $1,000 to $12,000 per year in the form of northern living allowances. It is a straight cash payment because it is costly, difficult and inequitable for federal public servants to cope with the harsh realities of northern living. If it is difficult for federal public servants, obviously it must be equally difficult for the small entrepreneur such as the baker, plumber, shoemaker, and their employees to cope with the same realities. Is it not reasonable to say that the only way to establish any degree of equity and fairness would be through the Income Tax Act, rather than the way the government has been doing it?

● (1530)

For instance, I contend that if we applied the most basic principles in the territories, about which I have spoken, only the owners of the mines, people who earn in excess of $80,000 or $100,000 a year should be paying income tax. Everyone else who lives on low or medium wages should not have to pay any income tax. This would apply to those who live north of the 60th parallel.

My report suggests the establishment of three tax zones. For the record I would like to establish the perimeters of the zones by identifying northern Canada, which are the two zones I talk about. I say that northern Canada is that area north of the 55th parallel in British Columbia and Alberta, north of the 54th parallel in Saskatchewan, north of the 52nd parallel in Manitoba, and north of the 50th parallel in the other provinces. Naturally, the Queen Charlotte Islands and other small islands off the coast of northern Canada and the provinces would also have to receive special consideration, as would some of the maritime provinces which suffer identifiable and serious regional and economic problems.

If you want to be fair and equitable to all Canadians, to equalize opportunity and charge taxes in accordance with one's ability to pay, there is only one tool which the government has, and that is the Income Tax Act. I cannot sit idly by and watch how this government is treating northerners just because there is no political power there. The attitude is: you can just dump on them.

There are some serious problems in the north. I have said in the House that there is starvation in the north, and I am not exaggerating. Certainly, there is an incredibly poor standard of housing in most northern communities, unless you are a member of middle management or a senior bureaucrat posted to Yellowknife. If you are one of these fortunate people you may have the key to the penthouse in Yellowknife Place, or whatever it is called, where there is a quarter million dollars worth of Eskimo carvings, and all the amenities of large city living. But that is not the standard. The standard is incredibly poor housing, particularly in the small northern communities. In some of the native communities there is no housing at all. There are certainly no opportunities for the younger citizens in this area to grow up and integrate, assimilate into the mainstream of Canada life, and to participate in the immense promise which this country holds out to its citizens.

I have assembled statistics which deal with the way in which Canadians communicate with one another. I have talked about the number of telephones, television sets, and the number of electrical appliances found in an average northern home as compared with an average home in a large city. I have assembled the daily temperatures, since inclement weather has a great deal to do with one's ability to pay.

If you are building a home in the north it costs thousands of dollars more to put in additional insulation. Invariably you build in a more sophisticated and expensive heating system. Your fuel costs are three times greater than they are in more populated areas. It is true some of our larger cities are not located in the temperate zone along the American border, and heating is much more critical in the north. You get one third of the mileage and one third of the lifespan out of a car than you would get in the city. There is no public transit in the north. You are left to your own devices. Every time you travel a long distance you must do so on a chartered carrier at great expense and, quite often, the facilities are not available to you. As I have said, you use much more gasoline in the north. You need to buy more clothing. Your children must have new boots every year. All these things add up to a monstrous bill.

There exists a myth about the north, which I hear from some of my friends who are critical of my report. They say that all northerners are making big wages. Indeed, I had a call from a member of the Steelworkers Union in Tungsten. He is a shop steward there and he is very much concerned that if my proposal were accepted Tungsten Mines would immediately say to their employees, "We do not have to pay you a northern living allowance. Since you do not have to pay any income tax, we are no longer entitled to deduct from our profits that portion which we pay to you in northern living allowance." The steelworker who called me said that all he would benefit by as a result of my proposal would be $15,000, since that is what he pays in tax. He is obviously one of those people who the average person thinks of as being so well-off in the north. He does make a good wage, and so he should. In addition to the wage, which requires him to pay $15,000 in income tax, he receives from his company $24,000 a year in a northern living allowance. The companies have no other choice. If they want people to work up there in that harsh environment they must pay out the necessary incentives in order to entice people to go there.

The steelworker says that all he would save is $15,000, the net result being that he would be out to the tune of $9,000. I sympathize with that particular situation, but it is not the rule. In fact there are a great many people working in Yellowknife, Inuvik, Tuktoyaktuk and in many other small communities who are working for less than the minimum wage which prevails in Canada as a whole, and in the provinces. People do not earn excessive wages in the north. That is simply a myth which must be dispelled. We must come to grips with the reality of northern living before we can look realistically at the proposals I have made.

I must say in fairness to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that, as a result of the May election and the actions of the Minister of National Revenue, I discovered that even though persons in the north were not charged income tax for the money they had earned by way of northern living allowances, travel allowances and so on, there was no provision for it in the Income Tax Act. No one has ever pursued that and charged those people. I suppose when the Conservative government was elected that was a good way to get at the government, if you were a bureaucrat who obtained your job from the Liberal government. So they moved in and said, "From now on everybody must pay income tax on their northern living allowances."

Let us not forget that we are only talking about people working for large corporations, which can afford to pass the cost of all the benefits they are paying to their employees on to the consumer, since they are operating outside the sphere of the guidelines and the realities of the free enterprise system. Or we are talking about people who work for federal or provincial agencies. As a result, up went the cry of "No Way!"

Then we were into an election and the liberal minister, campaigning to the north, had to make a commitment that he would bring in some remission orders which would allow northern employees to earn those benefits free of income tax. Indeed, the remission order was issued just in time to convince those people who had faith in the former Liberal administration to restore their faith in the new Liberal administration. The remission order was issued and it was extended for a year.

At the present time the government has committees dealing with finance, revenue, and northern affairs studying what should be done in the future about these northern benefits. I am told by all the ministers that my report is receiving very serious and earnest consideration, particularly in light of the fact that it proposes a solution which has served quite efficiently, with equity and fairness, in Australia. With your permission, sir, I will read into the record a certain section of the Australian tax act which deals with this matter.

Section 79A of the Australian income tax act contains a map breaking down the tax zones of the country into zone A and zone B and, with regard to these zones, section 79A(1) reads:

> For the purpose of granting to residents of the prescribed area an income tax concession in recognition of the disadvantages to which they are subject because of the uncongenial climatic conditions, isolation and high cost of living in Zone A and, to a lesser extent, in Zone B, in comparison with parts of Australia not included in the prescribed area, a taxpayer who is a resident of the prescribed area in the year of income is entitled, in his assessment in respect of income in that year of income, to a rebate of tax ascertained in accordance with this section.

In other words, if one lives in zone A where the cost of living is higher, one pays less income tax. Accordingly, the personal exemptions are higher and adjustments are made in accordance with the cost of living and the consumer price index. Given the fact that there are some discrepancies with respect to one's ability to pay their taxes, a country as rich in geography as Canada can do nothing else but follow the examples of Australia and Denmark.

There are even incentives for people in the Soviet Union who make a commitment to live in Siberia or the harsher climates of that country. I do not suggest that those incentives be compared with anything which we are discussing, but certainly the young Soviet who goes to university receives certain advantages if he or she makes a commitment to spend the first few years of their productive lives in parts of that country which are less congenial to live in than other parts of the country.

I realize that the bill before us includes a section which deals with remission orders, but it only deals with a small part of the problem, namely, the employees of provincial governments, the federal government and of large multinational corporations which can afford to pay living allowances in order to entice employees to isolated areas. This government has a responsibility to all Canadians, not just to those who are protected by the federal government itself or by large unions.

The government should take as examples these other countries and remove this obvious discrepancy which plagues the people of the north. As I have said, I have assurances from all the ministers that this report will receive serious consideration. I was terribly disappointed that this bill did not include an indication, at least, that the government is planning its tax regime or its tax strategy into the twenty-first century to accommodate for these obvious discrepancies. Nevertheless, I am hopeful, and certainly it is an achievement that the report is even being studied in the first place because it is a private member's effort. I see that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue are sitting together. They are probably plotting the strategy on which my proposals will be accepted.

Mr. Evans: It is the Minister of State for Finance. The Minister of National Revenue sits over here.

Mr. Oberle: Even the economic wizard who comes from the centre of the nation's capital is being aroused by the compelling argument which I am making on behalf of northerners.

Mr. Evans: The Minister of National Revenue sits over here. That is the Minister of State for Finance.

Mr. Oberle: I see. I am being lectured on the various titles of the ministers, none of whom have given any indication so far that they understand the reality of this country. I do not care who eventually brings in or proposes a bill to champion such a cause, whether it is the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue, or the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières). Until there are such provisions, we will face the feelings of alienation and even of separation of the people of the north who look upon themselves as colonial subjects oppressed by an insensitive colonial regime which is in no way interested in being equitable and fair to all its citizens, but, rather, more interested in catering to political realities and securing its political fortunes, which lie, of course, in the concrete jungles or the large cities of this country.

Instead of planning effectively toward northern development to realize the legitimate aspirations and concerns of the people who live there, the government seems to be planning for even larger cities in this country. It is strange as one travels through the more densely populated areas of Europe, as in Germany, for example, that there is not a city there which is as large as Toronto or Montreal, or as large as Winnipeg or Vancouver would like to be. There are 66 million people in Germany in an area as large as the constituency of Prince George-Peace River, which covers roughly one third of the province of British Columbia.

Why do we want to place all our people in these areas, which I call "breeding grounds for human misery" or have people live in our concrete jungles, one on top of the other when Canada is so rich in opportunity, economy and in geography in its hinterlands? There is no way in which this country will ever achieve its potential unless we encourage more people to leave the herd. I suppose we can call it the herd instinct, where everybody wants to be a part of the masses which seem to gather in the large concrete jungles of this country.

Until the government holds out some very real incentives for people to move north to develop our frontier, this country will not and cannot achieve the potential of which it is capable, that of being one of the truly great nations in the universe. It is a matter which lends itself to deliberate public policy, but the direction of the development in the north has been downhill. For example, in 1930 there were more farmers in the Northwest Territories than there are today. It is a deliberate policy of this government to stifle growth in the north and to force people to leave there, because it wants the area for some kind of great national park which is forever the domain of nature.

Canada cannot afford this kind of development. I am not saying that Canadians should rush up north and build massive infrastructures to rape the north of its resources. I am saying that with today's technology and knowledge about the way in which such areas can be developed in harmony with the legitimate concerns of environment and ecology, for example, we can develop our north in a way which will offer a much better future for the people who live there, a future in which they are treated equitably in terms of taxation and which will be beneficial to our country as a whole.

The factories and economies of the large cities of the south are totally dependent on the resources of the north. It is not fair or right that the only reason for going north is to rape that part of the country of its resources for the benefit of those who have a certain romanticism for living in the north but who are in no way interested in developing and populating that part of the country.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, on entering into the debate on Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, this afternoon, I want to deal with the portion of the bill which affects the petroleum industry, the devastating effects of the energy bill and the contents of this bill, and the serious delays these bills will cause to Canada becoming self-sufficient in energy.

● (1550)

The budget, energy bill and this bill have been studied in great detail by many experts in all fields across Canada. I have yet to find a report favouring the contents of these bills, especially the energy package. I want to quote from a report out of Montreal last week which includes some comments by the new president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I quote:

> The federal budget and the National Energy Program have crushed the guarded optimism expressed by Canada's economists a year ago, says Stanley Roberts, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.
> 'We've been pushed back into an economic slump and I don't expect we'll begin to climb out until the last half of 1981,' Roberts said at a seminar Thursday on government action and its effect on business. It was Roberts' first appearance in Quebec since he was named to head the national group.
> 'The energy program was designed to achieve certain goals', he said. 'However, something serious happened between the time the objectives were written and the time the details were put behind them because they just don't go together.'

The main reason the Liberals continually push this energy package is they feel it will catch the imagination of the Canadian people who have very strong feelings against oil companies and multinationals. The Liberals thought that if they introduced a program to nationalize the industry, it would do great things for them politically. This has completely backfired. It caught the imagination of Canadians all right. However, they are concerned because the government is not backtracking and is not prepared to make changes in its energy package and this tax bill. It is strictly for political motivation that all of this is being done. They think it is best for the Liberal party. It has nothing to do with what is best for Canada.

Mr. Roberts went on to say:

> 'The program is ill-conceived. No one—not a columnist, an economist or a political observer who has studied (it) and its implications—favors it. Even the people it purports to help have said 'no thanks.' It therefore must be stopped.'
>
> Roberts, speaking to members of the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, also said Canadian 'oil prices must rise much more quickly if we hope to be effective in conserving our resources . . . '
>
> In a question period later, however, he stressed that Canadian prices did not necessarily have to rise to world levels. 'What we want is a Canadian price that will keep the Canadian developer, the Canadian exploration program, up to level and will encourage the tar sands and heavy oil programs to go ahead.'

That, of course, is not happening. They are all grinding to a halt.

> The brunt of his criticism, however, bore on the over-all energy policy proposed by the Trudeau government—'this mistaken plan,' as Roberts called it later.
> Many drilling rigs are already idle because of it, he reiterated, and some have fled to the United States.

I will be going into those figures in more detail in a minute.

> As for Canadianizing the oil and gas industry, the program 'fails miserably.'

It certainly has failed miserably. Just before the beginning of question period today, we heard some excellent statistics quoted by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker). He introduced a motion calling for condemnation of the government, pointing out that on Monday of last week oil trucks at Coutts, Alberta, leaving Canada were backed up for one mile. That does not have anything to do with an attack on multinationals or the big oil barons. That is Canadian workers leaving the country with their equipment. The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills also pointed out that on Wednesday of last week 45 oil trucks of one company and 15 of another left Canada. That will have a devastating effect on Canada's economy. It will affect everybody, not just the oil barons and multinational companies. Imagine, trucks lined up for one mile leaving this country. What are the Liberals going to do about it? Absolutely nothing.

The budget, energy policy and this tax bill are certainly good for the economy—the economy of the United States. The Liberal government is the best friend the United States has ever had. It assists their economy with the exodus of our capital.

A couple of weeks ago we heard some interesting statistics with regard to the amount of money which is going into the state of New York. With one chunk of Canadian capital going there, 3,700 new jobs were created in the state of New York. That is as a result of the Liberal policy driving investment, truckers, oil companies, and everybody else out of this country.

I want to point out what it costs daily to import oil. With this policy, we have to import more and more of our oil. Approximately a year ago it cost the Canadian taxpayers $5.1 million per day for imported oil. That is not per week or per month, but per day. Today it costs Canadians $10.8 million daily for imported oil. This will be increased because we will not be becoming self-sufficient. We will have to rely almost totally on the OPEC countries for oil, at the rate we are going.

Just today I received a letter from a small Canadian oil company. I had never heard of it before. Perhaps most Canadians have not heard of it. I refer to Dynamar Energy Limited, a small struggling firm which is 95 per cent Canadian owned. It is not a multinational. There is not some baron in a foreign country controlling it and gouging the Canadian people, as the Liberals try to make the Canadian public believe.

Dynamar is a junior oil and gas producer, four years old, over 95 per cent Canadian owned, with assets of approximately $45 million. Its shares are publicly traded on the stock exchange. In the documentation I received today, they point out the effects that the new tax laws and energy package of the Liberal party will have on their company. I quote from a letter to their shareholders and to Members of Parliament:

> We believe that Dynamar is representative of a rapidly expanding sector of the oil and gas industry—that is, the Canadian owned independents. The National Energy Program, as presently drafted, will reduce our ability to sustain our rate of growth and thereby seriously endanger the critical search for Canadian oil and gas self-sufficiency.
> We earnestly urge you, as one of the leaders of Canada, to re-examine the energy program and to readdress the methods and priorities identified therein.

I hope government members will read this documentation when it comes to their offices and make representations to the stubborn Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the very stubborn Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), who have given no indication they will bring in corrective measures to this legislation which is having such a devastating effect on Canada's situation.

In the Dynamar documentation, they point out how the contents of this bill and the energy package are affecting them. They go into some detail. I quote:

> The 8 per cent Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax to be applied against all operating income (including royalty production) will reduce our 1981 cash flow by about $470,000. This represents an 11.2 per cent reduction in net income before income tax. On an after tax basis the reduction would be about 22 per cent.

These firms cannot operate without a proper cash flow. This struggling Canadian company is trying to make a go of it, but cannot handle the additional burden of the Liberal Party on its back.

They also point out:

> The Petroleum Incentives Program, which should be maximized for Dynamar since we are over 95 per cent Canadian owned, will have an uncertain effect on our capital planning—

● (1600)

Capital planning means job losses. They will not be buying goods and services from Ontario which are used for oil companies to operate in the west.

The letter to shareholders continues:

> Early indications suggest that the federal government plans to adopt very restrictive definitions relative to these incentives such that their real value will be relatively modest.

Yes, it is a high cost which Canadians will have to pay for these nationalization problems. It is unbelievable that this government is continuing with such a policy when it is evident what a devastating effect it had on Great Britain which nationalized industry, bringing that great country to its knees.

The letter to shareholders continues:

> For the interim we will continue work in Canada to the extent of that in progress or meeting specific commitments. Final policy decisions on expanding exploration programs will be taken after the National Energy Program is fully clarified.

That means there will be a slowdown.

The letter continues:

> Expansion of our activities principally in the United States is proceeding as a major priority.

It is a major priority to send rigs and to do exploration in the United States. With the ridiculous policy introduced by the Liberal Party there will be a slowdown in Dynamar's operations in Canada. I say three cheers for socialism and nationalization.

This letter continues:

> The federal government has apparently decided that new oil and gas resources can be most effectively found through large Crown corporations in combination with full state intrusion into all phases of the industry. Such a position indicates a remarkable lack of comprehension of the nature of the practical aspects of oil and gas exploration and development.

The government is doing this because the Liberal Party is strictly politically motivated. The letter continues:

> The delivery of a 25.0 per cent carried interest in federal lands, at no cost, to the Crown corporation is simply a form of expropriation. The rationale that the federal government "earned" this interest through tax incentives is indefensible. This aspect of the program should be distressing to every Canadian.

The letter concludes:

> It is apparent that if this federal policy as presently stated continues there will be a very substantial reduction in opportunities for investors in the Canadian oil and gas industry. We urge each shareholder to individually address this matter at every opportunity.

A lot of the shareholders are the little guys who have shares. They are the ones who will be suffering, not the big guys.

There are approximately 700 small oil companies in Canada which belong to the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada. This association has put out an excellent document. It has been distributed around the country in an effort to get the message to the federal government and to the people. In this handout, in large lettering it says:

Mr. Lalonde Your Energy Policy Will Harm Canadians.

This has nothing to do with multinationals or oil barons.

This handout contains five paragraphs. The first one reads:

It will make Canadians more dependent on expensive, insecure foreign oil.

I have already pointed out the cost of that to the Canadian taxpayer. The amount is something like $11.8 million a day.

The second paragraph reads:

It will cost Canadians more for gasoline and heating oil in the long run.

Of course, in the last election the Liberals promised the Canadian people cheap gas. This promise has not materialized. In parts of Canada, gas has gone up 40 cents to 42 cents per gallon and the cost is increasing on a regular basis. So much for Liberal promises, and so much for cheap gas.

The third paragraph reads:

It will delay essential frontier exploration, oil sands plants and heavy oil development.

The trucks, rigs, equipment and companies which are leaving Canada do not go back and forth every other week. It does not matter whether things improve here in a few weeks, they do not come back. They go down for months and years. We will never see many of them again.

The fourth paragraph reads:

It will cost thousands of jobs that could be created by the oil industry across Canada.

We have one million unemployed and the government is introducing policies like this which is driving investment, industry, trucking companies and everything out of the country. The Liberals' alternative to all of this is the short-term Canada Works program, including Flip and Flop and all the rest. There is no way those programs will make up for this devastating policy of driving business and money out of the country.

The last paragraph reads:

Canada must achieve oil self-sufficiency.

When we were the government, that was our aim. We had a program to make ourselves self-sufficient. We did not introduce a program to drive industry and business out of the country and make ghost towns out of places such as Cold Lake, etc.

The last paragraph continues:

We are the companies your program was supposed to help—the independent Canadian companies. It doesn't help us—it has stopped us in our tracks.

These stubborn Liberals are just going to leave them stopped in their tracks because they do not care.

The last sentence reads:

We urge you to reconsider this program for the good of all Canadians.

Let us hope and pray the Liberals will reconsider.

An hon. Member: They do not care.

Mr. McKenzie: Let us hope the stubborn and politically motivated Liberals will reconsider.

Mr. Paproski: All Collenette can do is laugh.

Mr. McKenzie: That is fitting.

There are other effects on the consumer regarding home heating in this bill. By 1983 Canadians using natural gas to heat their homes will be paying almost $70 per year as an excise tax to their government. This is a Liberal tax. By 1983, oil heating will cost between $400 and $512 more a year. Up to $350 of this amount will be as a result of new Liberal taxes. There is absolutely nothing contained in the budget or this bill to protect the low-income earner. We introduced a tax credit plan for low and middle-income people so as to assist them with high energy costs. But there is absolutely no provision to assist the poor, the low-income and the middle-income people with the devastating effects of the Liberal policy.

Regarding transportation, by the end of 1983 gasoline prices will have risen by 15.2 cents per litre. That is 70 cents per gallon. So much for cheap gas. The average driver will pay $400 more per year, $272 of which is in new federal government taxes. The government has not missed an angle in finding ways of taxing Canadians.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) will be going into another aspect later on this week concerning a new sales tax which the government has brought in affecting small businesses, in that it will not be economic for small business to hire the handicapped or have different handicapped workshops do work for industry. It will be cheaper to have the work done out of the country. The government then introduces another program to assist the handicapped. Last week we heard about a program to assist industry to hire handicapped. There are programs to assist them and there are other programs which do not make it advantageous to hire the handicapped. The government simply does not know what it is doing.

As I have pointed out, there is no compensation at all for low-income users of energy. I want to read from another recent article. This came from the Canadian Council on Social Development. This group studied the budget and the energy package in detail. They have pointed out the devastating impact they are having on low-income Canadians. There is absolutely no assistance in any way to assist these people with their higher energy costs. A spokesman for the Canadian Council on Social Development pointed out:

—that the new tax increases announced in the budget will add $14.3 billion to the federal treasury over the next three years, but only $345 million per year in new funds have been devoted to increasing the incomes of Canada's poorest pensioners.

We will be in for some rough times in Canada with the budget, the National Energy Program, and Bill C-54.

● (1610)

The present Minister of Finance probably got the shock of his life when he took over this portfolio and found the mess we are in in this country. I do not think he fully realized the situation, as most of his time here in Ottawa has been spent in dealing with political manipulations. I think he is getting his eyes opened. Perhaps he is a concerned man, but apparently he is not going to back down, for whatever reasons, and we are going to have to suffer the consequences.

In addition the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada has further criticism of the energy policy. That organization represents the very group the budget is supposed to help, small Canadian oil companies.

The association claims the tax regime and the national energy policy will cut cash flow by 22 per cent to 33 per cent, and that could certainly hurt small and medium-sized Canadian firms. There is no question about that; they just cannot stand those reductions. The 8 per cent tax on gross revenues is not deductible and this translates into a deduction from corporate profits of 25 per cent. There is no way small firms can stand a 25 per cent reduction in profits.

The Liberal government, through its budget and energy package, has made no allowance for inflation accounting. The government does not realize today that companies have to make exceedingly large profits to survive because of inflation, yet I have never heard any Liberal cabinet minister, a finance minister or any of the rest, talk about inflation accounting to make allowance for inflation when dealing with profits of oil firms or any other firms.

The IPAC says the national energy policy works against two of its major objectives, Canadianization of the industry, and security of supply. The new system is reducing investment in Canada, shifting it to the United States. The national energy policy is seen to delay energy self-sufficiency. Dow Chemical and the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada have said the Liberal energy policy will delay energy self-sufficiency, and one big reason for this view is that private investment is being reduced.

What the Liberal Party is working toward is having this country at the mercy of multinationals. That party is the best friend the multinationals and the OPEC countries have ever had. We are doing more to create work and jobs in OPEC countries than in Canada.

The Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors reported that 11,360 rig workers have lost their jobs since the October 28 budget, and the effects of this Bill C-54 will be driving more out. As my colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) says, the government has the full backing of the NDP. Another 28,000 workers in oil-related industries throughout Canada will lose their jobs by March. In total, 40,000 Canadians in oil-related jobs will be out of work by spring. They can apply for the Canada Works program, and that is the Liberal Party's alternative to all these people who are going to be losing their jobs.

The association has also said 43 drilling and 15 servicing rigs have now gone to the United States. This figure has probably increased since the latest figure quoted by the hon. member from Lethbridge today, and I am sure the figure is increasing daily. A record 174 drilling rigs have gone out of service and remain in Canada gathering dust.

The National Energy Program and the lack of an agreement with Alberta are causing delays in virtually every tar sands project in Alberta. Without the development of the tar sands there will be no hope of reaching energy self-sufficiency.

Additional devastating facts were revealed to me today during a conversation with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). He informs me there are 800 trucks in his area related to the oil industry sitting idle, doing nothing. Three cheers for the Liberals and the NDP! I am sure they are proud of this record.

Let me quote from statistics the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) used in a speech delivered to the Scarborough Rotary Club on January 20. He was talking about the dangers of this Liberal policy, and he pointed out:

> I emphasize, all of Canada, because it would be a serious mistake for anyone in Ontario to believe that the current dispute over energy is simply an issue between the federal government and the people in governments of western Canada or of Atlantic Canada. Certainly, the west has a vital stake in the questions that are now before the House. Without question, current federal policies—whether they have to do with transportation, energy or anything else—are threatening the economic well-being of western Canada and, far more dangerously, they are threatening the strength of the commitment of that region to our common country. So does Atlantic Canada have a direct and a vital stake. As you may well know, Mobil has pulled back from its participation and the development of the important Hibernia field, at least until the question of offshore jurisdiction is settled.

We are coming to a grinding halt in respect of self-sufficiency in this country.

The Leader of the Opposition also pointed out to the attendance:

> Your stake in the energy issue, as a resident of Scarborough and of Ontario, doesn't stop with the question of the ability of the country to hold together. Your energy security, and the energy security of your children is involved directly, and so is the economic development of this province. The energy policies of Marc Lalonde put the province and the people of Ontario in double jeopardy. They mean that you may well not have the energy you need three or four years from now. They mean you may well lose the energy contracts and the energy jobs that can get the economy of Ontario and of Canada moving again.

I guess we do not have to worry too much. The Liberals are working on policies of gas rationing. I suppose that will be the next thing they will be introducing.

The Leader of the Opposition went on to say:

> Let me tell you exactly how those policies threaten your energy security and threaten your economic prospects. Up until now, the people and the industries of Ontario have been able to get all the energy they need from Canadian sources. We have, as a nation, put in place production and distribution systems which ensure that all of Ontario's oil and gas needs are met from Canadian sources. That has put this province in a far more secure position than the five more easterly provinces, Quebec and the four Atlantic provinces, who have to depend today for up to 60 per cent of their petroleum supplies on imported oil—oil whose supply we can't control, oil whose price we can't control.
> We are one nation, and a serious disruption in oil imports to eastern Canada—to the five provinces that have a 60 per cent reliance on OPEC—would trigger a rationing system, which is in place under Canadian law—

Just let me go into a little bit of the history of the shortage of oil. This problem was recognized in the 1950s and when the Diefenbaker government was formed in the early 1960s it recognized the problem and introduced the Roads to Resources program. That government wanted to put that plan into effect to develop the north, but it was highly ridiculed by the Liberal Party at the time. There were some roads built and some long-range plans put into effect, but when the Liberals were returned in 1963 they dropped the Roads to Resources program. They had other priorities, such as language and culture, and higher taxes. The devastating situation today is directly the fault of the Liberal Party going back to 1963. Members of that party have great difficulty recognizing the issues involved in running a country. They have other priorities.

The Leader of the Opposition went on to state:

—that would cause all Canadians to share the shortage—Canadians in Ontario, in Alberta, in British Columbia—as well as those in the five provinces directly affected. So, Ontario already sits under the shadow of rationing if some new surprise in OPEC cuts off the supply of imported oil to Quebec and to the four Atlantic provinces. That, in my submission, is only the beginning of the danger. Federal Liberal policies are increasing our dependency upon imported OPEC oil. If present trends continue over the next five years, there will not be just five provinces that rely upon OPEC for their energy needs, there will be a sixth, and the sixth will be the province of Ontario.

Ontario is our largest province and our largest industrial base. The people of Ontario will suffer along with the rest.

If trends that are now in place continue for the next five years, Ontario will be depending for part of its oil and gas requirements upon the nations of OPEC instead of relying as you now do upon Canadian sources.

The problem we face is simple. Our demand for oil continues to go up while our supplies of oil from existing conventional Canadian wells are going down. Even Marc Lalonde admits that Canada will be importing at least 260,000 barrels of oil a day by 1985.

This is all because the energy crisis which was identified back in the fifties was not recognized by the Liberals. They could have been heroes today if they had carried on with the Diefenbaker Roads to Resources Program instead of ridiculing it and dropping it. So, we are suffering today and paying through the nose.

● (1620)

The Leader of the Opposition went on to say the following:

We spoke earlier of the hostage situation in Iran, and we know that before the hostage situation arose there was a revolution there—

My leader was pointing out how we cannot rely on these OPEC countries. They could cut us off next week, and we would be left high and dry while the Liberal government tries to nationalize the industry in this country and drive business and investment money out. We used to import 40,000 barrels of oil a day from Iran. Of course that is cut off now, and we have seen the events in Iraq, a country from which we used to get 8,000 barrels of oil a day.

My leader went on to say:

You have seen reports of those OPEC meetings where prices are increased and supplies are reduced without any consideration of the impact on Canada—

The Liberals have us at the absolute mercy of the OPEC countries today.

You saw too, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, which was not simply a neighbourhood war, but which was a deliberate move by the Soviet Union to place itself strategically in a position of access to the rich oil fields of the Middle East.

You probably know some of the details of Petro-Canada's contract with Mexico, which was supposed to yield this country 100,000 barrels a day of a fairly high quality crude, and which today is actually delivering only 20,000 barrels a day of a very inferior quality crude.

So much for importing oil. The Liberal policy is to make things as awkward and difficult as possible for everyone in this country. The Leader of the Opposition also referred to the billions of dollars which are being driven out of this country. I will go into that in more detail in future debates in the House.

There are 35 states which are benefiting from Canadian money leaving Canada. Some of those states have mottoes such as "Come to Kentucky", or "Come to Missouri, a state where 'profit' is not a dirty word". No doubt the NDP will be chastising those states because they invite businesses to go there and to invest there so that they can make fair profits.

The Leader of the Opposition also said the following:

You know that the Alsands plant in the tar sands is on hold, so is the Cold Lake heavy oil development. Syncrude has dropped a $2 billion plan to increase its production by 77,000 barrels a day.

The benefits of spending $2 billion go right across the country. This has nothing to do with putting money into the pocket of some multinationals or some oil baron. It has to do with buying Canadian goods and services and putting people to work.

My leader went on:

The first major tertiary recovery operation at Judy Creek in Alberta, all set to go, is now cancelled—

Thousands of jobs are being cancelled. Trucks are sitting idle in Red Deer. They are lined up for a mile at the border. They are going down into the United States.

Literally dozens of smaller projects have either been cancelled or postponed.

What on earth is wrong with the Liberal party? Why do the Liberals continue this ridiculous harebrained policy?

In all, since the federal government announced its energy proposal in October, more than $20 billion in Canadian energy investment has either been withdrawn or postponed. Twenty billion dollars of investment in jobs and security and growth for this country!

That is a devastating figure. It will have a devastating effect on the whole nation. A policy like this is not reversed overnight.

The Leader of the Opposition also said the following:

Let me stress that we are not talking here about the multinationals only. Indeed, it is simple deception to suggest that the present Liberal policy helps Canadian ownership, because the companies that are being driven away are the Canadian companies, particularly the smaller entrepreneurial, innovative Canadian companies. The multinationals have a wide variety of other rich holdings that can help them cushion the blow. The small Canadian companies don't. Those small Canadian companies are forced to go broke or go south.

Both are happening.

When they go south, they buy south.

They are not buying Canadian goods or hiring Canadian people down there. They are taking some of their staff with them as well as rigs, trucks and other associated equipment.

Building rigs buy trucks.

They are not buying Canadian trucks. They are buying United States trucks from United States truck dealers.

When a Canadian-based drilling rig is forced to move from Canada and operate in Texas it buys its trucks from Michigan, not from Ontario. That means that jobs that could be provided here in this province are being drained away and provided in the United States, because we are driving Canadian investment out of Canada.

Of course, there is always the fear of an NDP government coming into power in this country. That would be a nightmare. This country would be absolutely finished because it would be NDP policy to nationalize all 700 oil companies in Canada. Hon. members can imagine what a mess that would be.

My leader went on:

The special victims of the present Liberal policy are Canadian companies and Canadian workers, and because these Canadian energy companies have been so successful and so innovative, when Mr. Lalonde drives them out, he drives out the best performers in the Canadian energy industry. It's a sort of reverse reward for Canadian excellence; if you prove you are good, Marc Lalonde makes you leave.

There has been no indication from the Minister of Finance or from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that they will reverse any of this policy which is having such a devastating effect. Perhaps they are just holding us in abeyance. I certainly hope they will reconsider the provisions in the budget, Bill C-54 and the energy policy because this country is being absolutely devastated.

Let us hope and pray that there will be a reversal in the very near future.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, there are a few points I would like to bring to the attention of the House at this time. I am glad to see that the government House leader is here to hear what I have to say.

First, the government should recognize that it is leading us on a disastrous course. It is unfortunate that this is happening because the eighties could have belonged to Canada. Instead, as we go into this new decade it seems that Canada will become a slave to the eighties. That is not necessary, but it will happen because of the direction in which the government is leading us.

I notice that there are 224 pages in Bill C-54. I wonder if the government recognizes what it means when it has accountants making out income tax forms for all those people who have to pay income tax. This is costing Canadian taxpayers more and more as time goes on. This is something to which nobody seems to give any thought, but there is no doubt that when Bill C-54 is passed, as I suppose it will be by the government majority, officials from the department will have to go out to all parts of Canada and meet with accountants in different offices across the country where income tax forms are filled for Canadians. I wonder if anyone has ever assessed what the cost involved will be, first of all, of sending out officials to instruct accountants as to the meaning of Bill C-54. I am sure that there are many accountants in Canada who would agree with me when I say that on occasions the officials who go out from the department are not very cognizant of what is meant or stipulated in the legislation.

● (1630)

A further difficulty is encountered with complications having to do with arm's length deals. As you know, Mr. Speaker, these situations are controversial, sometimes it is hard to establish what is right, what is wrong, and what is expected. This creates problems for the accountants, and it certainly creates problems for the Canadian people who are caught in this situation. I would rather see a simpler system adopted.

Surely ways and means could be developed to establish a simplified form of taxation which would not require fairly large companies to use one member of their personnel to do nothing else but keep up with the changes in the tax structure established by the government. I am sure that this is what will happen when Bill C-54 is passed. You must take into consideration the cost borne by individuals who have to rely on advice given to them by officials of the department with regard to the tax they have to pay.

I have to warn the government that in the past tax systems have destroyed countries. All one has to do is to look at world history to see what happened to countries overburdened by their taxation systems. I think that this is what is happening in Canada today. I hope that the minister is aware of the fact that Canadians are now reaching the point at which they will start rebelling if an increasing tax load is placed on them. We see it happening all around us when bankruptcies take place at an increasing rate and when people are put out of work, as is the case now.

We are experiencing now the highest unemployment rate in Canadian history. What does this mean? It means that in the year 1982 the crunch will come. Certainly people will pay their income tax this year because 1980 has been a fairly good year, but 1981 will not be such a good year and therefore there will be many refunds at the end of that year. That is when the crunch will come. At about that time we will have to face up to the reality that our oil production will be going down and we will have to use more and more of our taxation dollars to pay for the subsidy. Goodness only knows it is too high now, but under this administration it will go up even higher.

There are people in our community who phone me quite regularly, such as a welder's company, which had employed 40 welders. How many do they have working for them now? There are only 11 there now. This means that 29 welders will not be paying income tax or, if they are, they will be paying very little of it in 1982. It is the same story throughout. Those welders will not be buying cars, trucks or clothing which they would ordinarily buy. This will snowball right back into central Canada. As has been pointed out by my colleagues, of the $7 billion spent on the oil sands in Alberta, $4 billion or $5 billion will come back to Ontario. We have not felt the crunch yet, but we are starting to feel it in Alberta. As I said, people are not working as they should be. The crunch will come several months down the road.

It breaks my heart to see a minister of this cabinet, a Canadian, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), mislead the House—I will not say he does so deliberately because I know this is not parliamentary—on what is happening in Canada today. When he tells us that the number of wells being drilled now is comparable to that of last year, does he not realize that those corporations, those servicing units, are still operating on last year's contracts and last year's budget? What happens when there are no new contracts and the succeeding years' budgets are cut back? Surely to goodness a Canadian who is a member of the cabinet of the government of our country should accept a little more responsibility than that. There has never been a time in history when a government, perhaps unintentionally, unwillingly or unwittingly, has led our country into such a disaster which this group of people is doing at present.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said after the last election, when his party got little representation from western Canada, that he would listen to the elected representatives from that area. However, he is not doing that, Mr. Speaker. He is not paying attention to what we are trying to tell the government. He is allowing his ministers to continue on the disastrous course which they have chartered. It is a great misfortune that he will not listen to us and take heed. Why will he not go west himself and meet people there, instead of sending a minister who will not change the course he has taken? This means that down the road there will be no return on income tax for the Canadian government which there should have been in order to keep the country operating. We have tremendous opportunities. There is a deficit of $17 billion on our manufactured products. We could correct that. We have one million unemployed who are not paying income tax simply because there is no job for them. I believe this tax structure is wrong.

There are errors in another area which I think should be brought to the minister's attention, errors of omission. I think that sometimes wrongs are created by omission as well as commission. The omission to which I want to bring the minister's attention is the fact that there is nothing in Bill C-54, which is 224 pages long, about the capital gains tax on family farms. It was discussed in the House today; it has been in the press.

● (1640)

Some members, particularly some in the NDP, do not care about ownership of property, but we in western Canada take pride in owning property. Everyone should realize that the strength of western Canada is in private ownership. One of the most dangerous things which can happen to any country is to allow the taxation structure to take property away from the individual.

I suppose the best example I could give, although it is deviating just a little, would be in the province of Saskatchewan where we find young farmers selling their property to the government in order to pay off debts on machinery, and then in turn renting the land back from the government.

One of the most dangerous things which can happen in any society is to allow the state to own the land upon which food is produced. We must realize that. We can look at any other country around the world. The state may own a building and another one can be put up like it; people can move in and out of it as they wish. But, when we allow the state to start to accumulate the property we are getting into a dangerous situation. This is the course the government is leading us on.

When I say that there is an omission, I am referring to the fact that there is no mention of a capital gains deletion on farm lands being transferred from one farmer to another. Over a period of years we have succeeded in gaining a few advantages in this regard, in trying to maintain the family farm because it is the strength of our community, but we must go a long way yet. There is still the case of many farmers caught in corporations. When a corporation was set up by individuals—whether it was the father, mother, daughter or son—and land was left outside that corporation, they did not realize there is absolutely no way under present legislation for that land to be transferred without the payment of capital gains.

What about those people who are retiring and probably put their entire life's earnings into a parcel of land? When the time comes for them to retire and they either sell it or transfer it to a member of the family who is not a farmer, then someone has to pay capital gains on it. What about the situation where a couple has purchased a house, preparing for the time when they will retire, and in the interim they rent the house in order to have a little income from it? When the time comes for them to move off their parcel of land and into that house in an urban centre, not only do they have to pay capital gains on the farm, they will have to pay capital gains on the house into which they are moving. I do not think it is fair.

I hope the minister will do something about it because it is irritating and causing problems for people in western Canada who have devoted a full lifetime to the betterment of the country. They have really received precious little in return, because the dollars they made in their earlier years are not worth very much today. When one considers that they must pay capital gains on the property they sell and then in turn buy homes at inflated prices, caused by the inflationary factor, one realizes that real hardships are being created for those people. There is a lot of animosity and dissatisfaction in the minds of many Canadians. There are many things we should be doing that we are not doing. I urge the minister to be cognizant of these things. No doubt we will ask for answers as to what the government intends to do in this regard.

I hope we get a little further away from what the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said in the speech from the throne, that we would have a white paper and another study. We do not need another white paper or study. We know what is required. All we want is some action from the government to correct these anomalies which are causing problems for the people out there. The Prime Minister said that he would listen. I hope the minister carries this message to him. Let us get the country moving again. There are many opportunities for us to progress and to develop the country. There is much work to do.

The other day I noticed that employment on farms across Canada is going down. The reason for this is that farmers are feeling a pinch and the first place they cut is their employment. It is very obvious that they will start sliding over the jobs. With the 350,000 farms in Canada today, I would wager that every one of them could use one of those people who are unemployed, if the system allowed a means of paying for that help. We would have a better country as a result of it, but as long as the government is sucking tax dollars out of the system the way it is, and not putting anything back into it—not even developing programs which will lay a strong base, but rather weakening the system—then it will become worse and worse.

I think the government should be looking at some of these things. I make these suggestions to the government so that our country will be better. But allowing the bureaucracy to pour out reams and reams of paper so that it costs us more and more to pay our taxes is not the way we should be going. We should be going the other route. It is not only out there that we require extra man-hours; it is right within the department. Therefore, I think it would be in the best interests of all of us if the government were cognizant of these things and realized that in the direction in which we are going there will be disaster in another two, three or four years.

We still have time to turn it around, but time is running out. I trust the minister will take this message to the Prime Minister and remind him that he promised after the election that he would listen to what we had to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to the matter before the House. I say that somewhat with tongue in cheek because it is never really a pleasure to talk on a taxation bill. I suppose it is a sure thing, but it is also a disappointment that we must talk about the kind of bill before us. It really does not display any clearcut government policy, unless the policy is makeshift, patch up, or retrench, without any guidance to the economic forces in our country. There really is no pattern in this legislation by which the industrial sector, the business community, can chart its course for the next few years.

● (1650)

I see the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) is here and I gratefully watched him take notes when the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) was speaking. I hope having made those notes he will show us later on that he will answer some of the questions which have arisen during the course of this debate. There have been serious questions asked regarding the economy in our country and the direction, or lack of it, which the government is giving to our economic forces. It is a sad commentary on our country when only two provinces out of ten show any kind of economic growth. I am fortunate to represent a riding in one of those provinces.

I am glad the people in my province do not face the kind of financial pressures which many of the people in eastern Canada face, at least to the same degree. While we have unemployment in Surrey, which is a matter of distress for those who are unemployed, it does not reach the magnitude of many other areas in the country. Nevertheless, those people who face unemployment because of the financial policies of the government, are experiencing no comfort from knowing that it does not hurt quite so much in British Columbia as it does in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and the other provinces. That is of small comfort to them.

One of the things which disturbs me is the subtle directions in which we are headed, not stated, but nevertheless directions in which the government is taking us. I recall reading about a month ago an economic analyst's report in the Vancouver Province in which one of the federal government's financial statements was being examined. Apart from the details in the report, what disturbed me most was the direction of the language of the report, the direction in which the government is taking us. It was very clear in the analysis of that statement that the mentality of the government is one that it could have taxed more but that it chose not to exercise all of its taxing powers. It was as though the government was doing the taxpayer a favour.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when the citizens of Canada thought that all of their possessions really belonged to them, except for those which they gave to the government to enable it to continue the essential services. But it was clear from this report that we had now turned around the other way, the government now assumed that all the possessions belonged to it except those which it chose to leave to the people to dispose of as they thought fit. Mr. Speaker, that is nothing short of stateism.

Whereas it is only the subtle turn of language which seems now to indicate the direction of the government, as the hon. member for Red Deer just pointed out more and more the drift of the government is in that direction. It is a direction in which the awesome powers of the government can expropriate willy nilly what was once privately owned by an individual or by a corporation standing in the place of an individual. We saw this in Bill C-42. It used to be that the government's taxing policies were determined by the taxes available, or the spending was determined by the taxes available. Now it is the other way around, the taxes are now determined by the spending. At this point that may be a subtle shift, but every month come pay day every taxpayer in Canada knows that the shift has taken place.

Since the spending powers of the government seem to be totally unrestrained, this means that the taxing powers of the central government are more and more unrestrained. The government's policy now is to try to find more places from where it can obtain revenue to satisfy its gargantuan appetite for spending. That is wrong. It violates the principle of ownership in our country. At one time in our land it was thought that a man's home was his castle. The policy which the government is now developing seems to be that a man's home is his castle until the government wants a piece of it.

I recall listening to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) at the outset of this debate harking to the Carter commission report of the late 1960s, which ultimately ended up in the 1972 tax legislation. The hon. member for Red Deer was absolutely correct when he said that what that new tax measure did in 1972 was to create a whole new industry in Canada—the accounting industry. There was a time when the individual taxpayer was quite qualified to file his own income tax returns, whether he was a day labourer on hourly wages or whether he was a small farmer. He was competent to file his income tax returns. Now he does not trust himself to do it.

As the minister knows, the job of an accountant is to look for all of those opportunities which the taxpayer might miss to gain the benefit of deductions. A good accountant makes money for the taxpayer since he knows all the intricacies of the Income Tax Act. Therefore he can take advantage of what are generally called loopholes, thereby saving the taxpayer some money. Because the tax legislation is so intricate, you need an army of tax accountants to defend yourself from the government. That is not the way it should be. I remember the member for Broadview-Greenwood talking about a buck is a buck is a buck. I do not think that has ever been true, but it has never been more untrue than today. If there was a shadow of truth to it in 1972, when inflation was within reasonable bounds, then it is totally untrue today with the kind of inflationary spiral which we are facing.

If you are to consider the Carter commission report seriously, a house should also be subject to capital gains tax, the way it is in the United States. In 1972 a house which would have sold for, let us say, $25,000 in my constituency, now sells for $125,000. With those inflated dollars in the picture can the government tell me that a buck is a buck is a buck? Perish the thought. Even on that score a dollar is only worth 25 cents now.

I would call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—Air Transport—Proposed service between Ottawa and New York City; the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid)—Bankruptcies—Call for increase in guaranteed insurance coverage; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong)—Canadian Armed Forces—Testing of chemical defoliants—Monitoring of effects.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rose last week to draw to the attention of the House the fact that motion No. 14, in the name of the hon. member for Levis, who resigned his seat some months ago, is still on the order paper. I also notice that Bill C-329, also in the name of the hon. member for Levis, is still on the order paper. Hon. members may have noticed that there was an unfortunate reference in The Globe and Mail this morning to the procedures of the House concerning the fact that this motion was still on the order paper. I believe that an unfair reflection was cast upon the Chair through ignorance of knowledge of the procedures of this House.

Therefore I would propose, if the House agrees, that notice of motion No. 14 be removed from the order paper and that the order for second reading of Bill C-329, an act to amend the Criminal Code, be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette). Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED ASSESSMENT OF TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of assessing training and development programs for public service employees with a view to establishing a general policy.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to debate this subject once again in the House. Over the past eight years I have had three or four opportunities to raise this issue, either in the form of motions or in public bills and I am anxious to review this file which has made rapid progress indeed in the past year and which again recently, two or three days ago, was the subject of releases from Treasury Board.

It will be recalled that I have been an ardent supporter of the creation of a government administration school. To my mind, it was a concept which first encompassed the development and training of public servants, and the main objective was to try to get hon. members, the House and governments to give serious consideration to the major problem of training and development in our public service.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might take a few minutes to review the background of this enduring and very important question. Indeed the problem became acute at the close of World War II when most people who had come to work for the government went back home. Thus we lost many talented people whose duties here were to second our war effort.

In addition, the requirements dictated by new management techniques resulting mostly from the new role which the federal government was called upon to play, combined with the expansion of services, particularly social services, all that commanded a highly-trained administrative and professional technical staff. Therefore the government had to analyse thoroughly its hiring policies, conditions related to advancement within the public service, administrative classifications, salaries, ways to attract and keep the required staff. You will recall that the Gordon commission was asked to study the personnel management system. The Public Service Commission of Canada published a book entitled "History of an Institution" which covers the period from 1908 to 1968. Here is what it says on page 228 about the Gordon commission:

When members of the Gordon commission undertook to review the situation in the wider perspective they enjoyed through their terms of reference as independent investigators, they were dumbfounded.

Again I quote, from page 229:

—there is no effective mechanism to train, discover, relocate and promote promising men and women among younger employees and public servants who hold intermediary positions.

Having pinpointed the insufficiency of administrative mechanisms, the Gordon commission recommended, and I quote:

—the appointment in each department of a seasoned and competent personnel officer with the necessary title and authority.

One of the roles of this personnel director was to train the staff at the departmental level. Having thus decentralized training responsibilities, the Civil Service Commission continued to give special information to the departments and took charge of the co-ordination and management of training as it applied to departments as a whole.

In 1954, under the government of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, a commission of inquiry was appointed to study the possibility of reviewing the Public Service Act and especially to consider the sensitive issue of the relationship between the Public Service Commission and Treasury Board. I will not spend too much time on that very important issue today, Mr. Speaker, and will deal with it at a more appropriate time. I would certainly not want to rekindle old feelings of animosity between the Public Service Commission and Treasury Board. Those of you who are interested in this issue can read the Heeney report which deals with it.

The Glassco report containing the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Government Organization, published in 1962, confirms the deplorable state of personnel management in the public service. As it states in one of its recommendations, the royal commission——had to conclude that in general for many years training and development have not received the attention they deserve in the public service.

That opinion is also expressed on page 317 of a book entitled "History of an Institution".

The Glassco commission suggested that the Public Service Commission should relinquish several management functions. Treasury Board and the various departments were therefore given the responsibility for evaluating the performance of employees, promoting career development and organizing interdepartmental training programs. All these functions were carried out under program directives established by Treasury Board. The management of centralized training programs in effect belonged to the Public Service Commission while Treasury Board was the policymaker.

Naturally, there were many problems with the implementation of the Glassco report. The government set up a government organization office to study the recommendations. We have therefore not invented anything new since the Progressive Conservative government in 1979 and the Liberal government in 1980 only imitated their predecessor of 20 years ago. We also have within the Privy Council and the Treasury Board special committees to study the Lambert and D'Avignon reports on accountability and efficiency in the public service.

In 1965, the Public Service Commission set up the Training and Development Branch to have on hand a pool of specialists able to guide staffing managers and departmental personnel counsellors. It was in 1967 that this House passed an amendment to the Financial Administration Act which made Treasury Board responsible for determining the training and development needs of the public service in general and for establishing the conditions under which such training and development could occur.

Of course, there was some reluctance concerning this new policy. Some people questioned the effectiveness of dividing the function consisting in the determination of training needs and conditions, which would come under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board, and the implementation of the centralized training and development programs, which come under the Public Service Commission. There is indeed much confusion between the terms training and development. The Glassco report tried to provide a better definition of these two important elements of a good personnel management policy. On page 474 of "History of an Institution", the Glassco report is quoted as follows:

Training is the process of teaching skills to an individual so that he may improve his performance on a particular job.

Development is the process whereby an individual acquires new knowledge, habits, attitudes, self-awareness, and values or maturity.

Training courses and development programs, therefore, entail different methods.

Mr. Speaker, it would be well to understand the difference between these two terms. To simplify, we could say that training has an immediate application and that it is related to needs or requirements, to particular jobs that have to be done.

Very often, training is the responsibility of the employer. It could therefore be said that it is institutional in nature.

On the other hand, development is a much more complex process which requires long-term planning. It is much closer to ongoing education. The individual is urged to acquire new knowledge to become better qualified and better equipped for a more difficult and therefore more senior position. Development is more individual than institutional and is supplementary to already acquired training.

I would like to deal now with some recent reports and changes as they apply to training and development.

The necessity of development, as well as of training, was recognized by the D'Avignon committee. The D'Avignon committee pointed out that if the reality of a "representative public service" is to be achieved, adequate programs of both training and development would have to be made available to such groups as French-speaking Canadians, women, native people, and handicapped people. The D'Avignon committee stated that programs which help candidates improve themselves, such as the Northern Career Program, were needed to attain government objectives. The D'Avignon committee spoke against the divorce of training from development in these terms:

It is beyond understanding how governments and treasury boards have failed to recognize not just the power of training but the fundamental requirement for the continuous training and development of staff, in the interests of economy and effectiveness.

The committee pointed out that the greatest part of the funds now allocated to training is spent by a small number of large training schools.

It is one of my major concerns, which I share with the D'Avignon committee, that without a policy which covers both training and development, government objectives pertaining to a fully representative public service will not be realized in the years ahead. The needs of French-speaking Canadians, women, native people and the handicapped must be adequately addressed.

French-speaking Canadians continue to be underrepresented in the upper levels of the public service and in the scientific and technical categories.

While the proportion of French-speaking Canadians in the public service is now representative of their proportion of the Canadian population, due to the accelerated recruitment programs over the past few years, recruitment cannot be relied on to solve the problem of underrepresentation at upper levels of federal departments and agencies. Part of the solution must be a properly conceived program of training and development if this situation is to be remedied in the medium term.

The situation of women in the public service remains disadvantaged. In recent years the proportion of women public servants is gradually approaching their rate of participation in the labour force as a whole. Women public servants remain concentrated in administrative support categories and continue to be underrepresented in the officer categories. Even in those occupational categories which are predominantly female, women are concentrated at the lower levels.

The occupational categories in which women public servants are now concentrated—those which involve clerical and information handling activities—are those which are most likely to be transformed by the impact of microelectronic technologies. Research under way at the Institute for Research on Public Policy indicates that some existing jobs in these categories will be downgraded as machines take over functions previously performed manually and that the new jobs created will require greater skill and different aptitudes. Unless such changes are anticipated and planned for, women will not obtain their share of the new employment generated and may bear the brunt of the negative effects of the introduction of new technologies in the workplace.

Despite the attention that has been given to the representation of the native peoples in the public service, these groups continue to be underrepresented. While opportunities for the handicapped are gradually being developed, as a civilized society we must do much more. Adequate programs of training and development must be an important part of this process.

As for the public service as a whole, the rapidly shortening life of knowledge acquired at specific moments in the life cycle has prompted both the OECD and UNESCO to urge governments to view learning as a lifelong process and to build in the necessary opportunities for updating and new learning into the work experience itself. It is imperative that those occupational categories in which knowledge acquired early in the life cycle is particularly shortlived be identified, and that appropriate training and development strategies be devised to maintain the original investment Canadians have made in their public servants.

A most important report, that of the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability, tabled in March, 1979, identified some of the major difficulties facing the federal administration in the area of personnel management. The commission recommended that personnel management responsibilities should be centralized under a secretary for personnel management in Treasury Board. It was recommended that the Public Service Commission be relieved of its role in the staffing, and training and development process, and that training services be provided through a separate revenue-dependent organization under a secretary for personnel management.

As recently as January 22 of this year it was announced by Treasury Board that the position of assistant secretary of developmental personnel policies and activities has been created. Treasury Board views the creation of this position as an indication of the government's commitment to innovative human resources policies within the public service. The new assistant secretary, Miss Denise Moncion, will be responsible for developing and leading activities in such areas as affirmative action and the quality of working life. I was glad to hear this because I directed a question to the minister some weeks ago about this situation. I was therefore very satisfied with the recent announcement by Treasury Board.

I warmly welcome both the latest initiative of Treasury Board and the announcement, by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) of a new staff training policy, in June of 1980, two months after this motion was tabled in the House.

The new staff training policy recognizes, as I have emphasized on numerous occasions in this House, that human resources are as criticial as financial and capital resources, and that training is both "an essential component of human resources planning and an accepted cost of doing business". The major thrust of the new policy, however, is to link employee training to specific operational requirements identified by management in individual departments and agencies. The new policy requires managers to identify and decide on professional and technical training needs and makes it the responsibility of the employee to develop himself or herself for future career opportunities.

A distinction is therefore made in the new staff training policy between training and development. The new policy assigns responsibility for training primarily to managers and their departments, and responsibility for development to employees themselves. The new policy states:

> —employees are responsible . . . for preparing for future career opportunities and for acquiring on their own time, and at their own expense, any additional training and/or education required to meet their personal development goals.

Though I welcome the new staff training policy, particularly the recognition it accords to the fact that human resources are as critical as financial and capital resources to the efficient and effective functioning of the federal administration, the new policy raises two major issues.

First, the new policy washes its hands of any involvement with employee development—employees are left to develop themselves on their own time, at their own expense, and without any form of policy or guidance to steer them. Second, how well does a policy which divorces training from development address the major issues raised by the D'Avignon committee, the Lambert Commission, the Professional Institute of the Public Service, the Public Service Alliance, civil servants themselves, and concerned members of this House?

The Public Service Alliance has expressed concern that the new staff training policy does little to guarantee the future availability of training and development courses to support staff. Since the new training policy has been put into effect, entire listings of service-wide courses offered by the Public Service Commission are no longer scheduled for delivery. The courses affected are developmental in character and their suspension affects the learning opportunities of support staff generally, and of women civil servants in particular.

● (1720)

The Public Service Alliance has also expressed the view that training budgets are the first to be slashed in times of restraint, a practice warned against by the D'Avignon committee, and that training opportunities have not always been dispensed on the basis of need and merit. These are points we have raised many times in the House, and which I still think need to be answered. The PIPS group has expressed considerable concern over the lack of recycling facilities for those public servants who find themselves declared "surplus". While the Treasury Board has issued a directive in this regard, the feeling is still that not nearly enough is being done.

As for public servants themselves, a decisive majority of both Anglophone and Francophone public servants want more and better information on opportunities for improving their knowledge and skills according to studies previously conducted by the Treasury Board. Complaints are heard that opportunities available to middle and senior managers for both training and development are much greater than those available to other categories of employees.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I believe it essential that the government consider the advisability of assessing both training and development needs for public servants with a view to establishing a general policy, a well-organized and comprehensive one, which would cover not only training but development as well.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on this matter. Unlike the previous speaker, I am not happy with the direction in which the government is going at this time. I feel the government does have a policy but, unfortunately, what that policy is, is not to assist its staff in developing the skills they need. The hon. member who spoke before me and who introduced this motion did mention some of the programs that exist. In addition, quite wisely, he raised some of the problems which exist.

Government direction, as stated in its training policy, does not really provide for an effective efficient program of staff development. It also ignores the opportunity to have an affirmative action program within the government. Although the government has sent up some trial balloons in affirmative action, if you look at the staff training policy which has been developed and some of the courses which have been cut out as a result of this staff training policy, you will see that women, the handicapped, and others who wish to rise within the public service, will find it difficult to do so.

I looked through a handout which was prepared by the Public Service Commission on October 27, 1980. The courses to be deleted by the Public Service Commission are basically deleted on the orders of the staff training council. As I look through that list of courses, I find the people who will suffer most will be those who have the greatest need for training. Some of the courses to be deleted refer to women's places in the work place, how to write your own resumé and to various training techniques and skills which you would need if you are ever to develop within the public service. I was concerned when I saw that that responsibility has been taken from the Public Service Commission and given to a line department.

As the previous speaker pointed out, the D'Avignon report warned us against that. Up to the present time, there has been real neglect of training by the line departments. The staff training policy of the Treasury Board quite clearly spells out that most of the training done by departments will have to come out of the budgetary allotments to departments. If that is left strictly to the departments, then the money will not be there for training. The people least influential in making sure there is adequate training are those on the bottom rungs.

We all know at the present time, as the hon. member who preceded me pointed out, that women are underrepresented in the middle and senior management categories. We recognize that at the present time women, native people and the handicapped are concentrated at the bottom levels of the federal civil service. Those people do not have much political clout. Those people, as a whole, do not have much clout within their departments. Those are the people who could use the kinds of courses which the Public Service Commission was offering in the past, which are now the responsibility of the departments.

I am concerned about the policy which actually exists. The policy which the government came up with last summer is taking away rather than giving to those individuals. Day after day in this House we talk about affirmative action. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has had a few problems with the Advisory Council on the Status on Women. Last year that group made some good recommendations. It pointed out some of the problems which exist in the public service. It is unfortunate that the Advisory Council on the Status of Women is under a cloud of suspicion at the present time.

There are a few other things in the D'Avignon report which I shall bring to hon. members' attention. At page 210 of that report we find "except at the level of organization where program plans are executed at the working level, training and development is often viewed as a necessary evil." That is an unfortunate characterization of what is happening within departments, but it is an understandable thought within departments. Departments which are out there to provide services to the general public, whether it be Indian Affairs, Employment and Immigration, or Health and Welfare, are not really in the training business. It is quite natural that the people who are hired to provide a service in Thompson, Manitoba, or Ottawa, Ontario, are not going to have expertise in the training area. They are not equipped with an economic background or any experience that will make them look at training as a natural goal for their department. In addition to that, they may not have any knowledge of how to go about training. It is fine to tell them to go over to the Public Service Commission to get some ideas, but that is not the same thing as having a group within government, such as the Public Service Commission, providing courses.

Upward mobility cannot be left to the individual within the public service otherwise we will always have the elitist system that we have at the present time. The previous speaker quoted a line from the staff training policy which referred to the fact that individuals will have the responsibility to do their own training as far as their own personal goals are concerned. That very line may recognize the fact that individuals may have personal goals and have a right to go out and take university or community college training if they want, but it is also saying there is no responsibility, or very limited responsibility, on the part of government to do so. On the basis of past experience I am afraid that that one line from the training policy will not be just one line, it will be one of the paramount lines in the policy. It will be used every time somebody working in some office, factory, or what have you in the public service, wants to take training. They will refer to that and say to the individual "You can do that. You can go out to your community college or whatever you have in your community and do that on your own time, with your own money." Basically what is said in the report is that it is up to you to be responsible for your own personal goals.

Almost all the training people take, whether it is to be a lawyer, to be a teacher, to be a nurse, or to work within the government or within the private sector does relate to personal goals.

I think the government does have a leadership role. The government, above and beyond any other employer, has a leadership role to play in trying to help those individuals who need help, and also in making sure the people who are working for the Government of Canada and the people of Canada have the expertise to do a good job. If we take that role away from the Public Service Commission and give it to the line departments, this help will not be forthcoming.

● (1730)

I have already referred to the comments in the D'Avignon report and the fact that this is not considered top priority in most departments. D'Avignon had other things to say. He referred, of course, as I mentioned earlier, to the fact that women, the handicapped and natives have not received their fair share of training in the past. Referring to native people, the report says there is a cost to be borne for training that is clearly essential and is recognized as essential by the employer. That will not be the case with the new staff training policy of the Treasury Board.

When it comes to safety within the workplace, again D'Avignon touched on that topic, and again this is something very important. It is important for the federal government especially, to provide leadership in this field. I spent Saturday and Sunday of this weekend at a NUPGE conference, that is the National Union of Provincial Government Employees. It spent three and a half days dealing specifically with the topic of workplace safety. I was amazed as I listened to these provincial government employees list all the hazards and dangers that exist in public service jobs. Many of the jobs that provincial government employees do are the same as jobs carried out by our federal government employees. Too often the public views public servants as people who work in offices, and they do not recognize there are a lot of people in the public service who work in the same conditions that exist at any other industrial site and that the dangers faced by public servants are very similar to those faced by blue collar workers in private enterprises. It is my feeling that if we leave it to the line departments to make sure we have adequate training within government, we are going to fall behind.

I know this is just a minor point, but one of the courses which has been taken out of the Public Service Commission's list of courses is driver training and driver safety. This may seem like a small point but I wonder how many people within the federal system at this present time are driving for a living? I suspect we have thousands of people who are driving on a full-time basis and more who are driving on a part-time basis. Defensive driving is a course which may not seem important to a lot of people, but as a high school teacher I remember reading all sorts of statistics about how valuable such a course is to drivers among the general public. If we have people driving for us for part of their living or for their entire living, I think we have an obligation to provide them with that type of course. This is why I am concerned about the present policy. It will take away those types of courses, and, indeed, it already has in the examples I have listed.

I have another concern about the staff training policy as approved in June, 1980. I looked at the composition of the Staff Training Council and found basically the same senior mandarins who are running everything else in the government. I feel they tend to have a conflict of interest because they are running four or five different operations within our system. The membership of the council will consist of the secretary of the Treasury Board, the chairman of the Public Service Commission, the Clerk of the Privy Council, or his nominee, the Comptroller General, four departmental deputy ministers and/or four assistant deputy ministers, one or more training experts, and that is only one or two mentioned in the list so far, the Director General of the Staff Development Branch and the Deputy Secretary of the Personnel Policy Branch. As I looked at that list I was surprised to see how few people are really in the business of training. Most of them are in the business of management.

If we want a training policy and a training council, the majority of people on that council should have some knowledge of training, rather than having management as their main function. Certainly we recognize the need for efficient management just as we recognize the need for efficient government, but I would like to see that training council restructured so that it actually can provide an efficient overview of training in the public service.

In addition, there should be some union representation on that council. If you look through the D'Avignon report and all the other submissions which have been made in the past on staff development, you will notice that PSAC and PIPS and others have been making presentations. They have a lot of expertise in training their members and they are concerned about how their members are educated for their present and future roles within government. They have a legitimate interest in protecting the rights of their members. I think such an addition should be made to this council at this time.

Let me sum up with just a few remarks. We disagree with the previous speaker. The government has a policy but, unfortunately, that policy is very similar to its policy of creating another large senior management group. In recent days it seems to have been attacking the public service rather than trying to work with its members. The policy of the government with regard to staff training completely ignores affirmative action. For that matter, it works directly against any affirmative action program. It ignores women and those people who are in need of training. It ignores native people and the handicapped and it puts the priority for the training of those people on the departments. Departments are basically set up to provide services to the public and when they are hit with funding cuts, which they will be hit with in the next couple of years if we believe the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), training programs will be the first to go. This will have little impact on the public but it will have a great impact on public service employees.

I would encourage members on the government and the opposition sides who are concerned about making sure we provide adequate and fair leadership within our public service to get this government to recognize that the direction it is going in is completely opposite to the direction we are asking private enterprise to take, and directly opposite to the direction we are asking the community as a whole to take. We are talking about more fair communities; communities which are more open to women, to the handicapped and native people, yet this staff training policy and the whole treatment of employees by government is going in exactly the opposite direction.

I have risen on a number of occasions in this House to complain about the fact that the government has been dragged to the Human Rights Commission over its treatment of women workers. As far as I know, the government has lost every case that has been taken there. I would argue that as an employing agency, especially when it is the same agency that is making the laws, it should not have to be taken to the Human Rights Commission. There should be a voluntary compliance by the Treasury Board and by departments and agencies of the government. It should not be necessary for the government to be forced by its employees and their unions to abide by its own statutes. The President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and other people in charge of government departments should make sure they are complying. It should not be fighting initiatives which would allow for equality and equal treatment. Unfortunately, there is no government leadership, just as there is no government leadership in the affirmative action field. Instead, the government is fighting progress. The same thing is happening with respect to staff training.

● (1740)

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak about this motion but, in view of what I am hearing, I feel I should say a word or two. The motion of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of assessing training and development programs for public service employees with a view to establishing a general policy.

I take it from that that the government has no general policy at the present time. The hon. member who proposed this motion supports the government. I suppose it is possible that this might have been considered by his caucus or by the cabinet ministers involved; therefore, I have to assume that there is no general policy for training public services employees, in spite of the fact that the member of the New Democratic Party who just spoke said that there is a government policy.

Whether there is a government policy or not, the point of this motion is that the government should be assessing training and development programs for public service employees. I find this difficult to understand. The smallest businesses in the country periodically assess each program they have to find out whether they are getting results.

Is the public to understand from this motion that each department just carries out training and development programs at its whim and at the wish of the minister or deputy minister? If that is the way this is being done, it is not a great way to run a business. Is there a hodge-podge of programs which are different in each department? Are people being trained at public expense and then paid additional salaries because of the training? What public servant will be foolish enough not to accept training when he is told his salary will be increased if he undergoes training?

I cannot understand this type of motion. Surely to goodness the Government of Canada assesses all its programs periodically, throws out those which are not any good, amends others and adopts others that are good. That is just ordinary business.

I know hon. members on the government side do not like me to refer to Alberta but in the Alberta government every minister is required to assess every program periodically and report to the cabinet. There is no hodge-podge program whereby every minister acts according to his own whims. Public money is being spent, and ministers are responsible. If public money is being spent to train an employee, there has to be very definite justification.

I agree that there should be special training if the public is to be the beneficiary, but I do not necessarily agree with paying higher salaries to people who take training. I do not believe in training if trained people are already available for particular positions. Why should the public service use public money to compete with those who have educated or trained themselves? I just cannot follow that. It is not fair. I have heard people say that if they could get into the public service they would receive many benefits and they would get this, this and that at public expense. We should realize that we are spending public money, and somebody should be accountable for it.

I assume from reading this motion that there is no accountability and that there are just hodge-podge programs operated by the Government of Canada to train certain people. I wonder who these people are. That is a condemnation of the government. Surely to goodness the government does not need to have a resolution passed in the House of Commons asking it to assess its various programs; nor should it be necessary to have a motion asking that a general policy be established. That is just ordinary, everyday, elementary business, and I cannot understand the purpose of the motion.

I believe in special training if the result is a contribution to the development of this country. Our native people have had many difficulties because their culture is not oriented to the white culture and white standards. However, the University of Calgary has undertaken programs, with the assistance of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to provide training for native people because the training of our Indian people is a public responsibility. We have undertaken in treaties to do that. Even so, native training has been very skimpy. If my memory serves me correctly, 32 Indian people have graduated from the University of Calgary with degrees and are now out serving the people of Canada.

I also believe in training those who are disabled. When Syncrude started its work in the Fort McMurray oil sands, there were not enough people to do the various jobs, so Syncrude made sure that the people who were going to do jobs there knew what they were doing. On-the-job training was provided to many native people and to some white people as well. Those people became valuable employees. With that assistance they were able to do work. However, the need was there.

I should think that the Government of Canada would provide training where the need is evident, particularly to disabled people, native people and others. I do not support any hodge-podge training for the sake of training. I do not think every department should carry out different programs simply to give certain employees higher salaries. That is not my idea of carrying out a sensible program at all.

If this motion is serious in asking the government to assess training and development programs with a view to establishing a general policy, that is a terrible condemnation of the present government and its policies.

Mr. John Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to comment on the hon. member's motion regarding the provision of training and development programs for public service employees.

It is unfortunate that I will not have time to mention all the programs in the departments, but I will try to provide as much information as possible.

The subject of training and development in the public service is one to which the government has given much attention during the past few years. The government clearly recognizes the importance of effective human resource management, of which employee training and development are essential components. In this regard, we should not lose sight of the fact that the Canadian public service has earned and maintained an international reputation for its high standards of performance and competence. This is due in no small measure to the way in which human resources management and the training and development of employees take place in the federal public service.

It is also worth remembering that the public service has developed a high degree of expertise in the management of human resources as the result of practical experience over the years in a rapidly changing and developing environment. It must be recognized as well that human resource management and training and development in the federal public service take place within a framework of established policies and procedures which have proven their effectiveness.

● (1750)

These policies not only contain statements of general policy orientation but also provide specific guidance on particular matters, such as the assessment of training and development programs for public service employees. They are contained in the personnel management manual produced by Treasury Board Canada. Members might wish to acquaint themselves with these policies which I believe are available in the Parliamentary Library.

Naturally, the policies are reviewed periodically, are evaluated and changed as appropriate in order to make them consistent with and appropriate to ever-changing circumstances. I want, Mr. Speaker, to mention several of them at this time. They demonstrate the government's determination to ensure that there is always in place a sound framework of policy and guidelines for managers in matters of training and development.
