The fight against immigration goes merrily on, and the unions are alive to the efforts of the manufacturers to fleed this market. There is no need for more mechanics in this country until positions are found for those already here, and the sooner our English brethren realize this, the better it will be for them. We have been subjected to severe criticism for attempting to stop the growth of for attempting to stop the growth of this country, but what we desire to point out is that men in large numbers may come here if they are going to settle on the land, but that the mechanics and laborers in the centres of population are more than sufficient for all present pur-

Years had rolled by. The child that prattled by his side became the stately girl, but the hand clasp at that grave had never been relinquished. She could not pretend to mourn the death of the marquis, her own father. Had he not ever been dead to her-as dead as the good wife (or bad wife) of that nobleman-as dead as Gross George and all the other honored and dishon-ored figures of that misty past? But Barnes' death was the abrupt severing association, and when his last sumnions came she felt herself truly alone. in an old cemetery, amid the crum-bling bricks. Barnes was buried, his

Query, "Thy Best of Life is Sleep." constance remained in New Orleans, ere the old manager had found his final resting place, and she had no def-finite desire to go elsewhere. Adrift in the darkness of the present, the young girl was too perplexed to plan for the future, so she remained in the house Barnes had rented shortly before his death. An elderly gentlewoman of fail-en fortunes, to whom this semirural establishment belonged, Constance retained as a companion, passing her time quietly, soberly, almost in solinde. This mansion, last remnant of its owner's earthly estate, was roomy and specious, bestling among the or-anges and inviting seclusion, with its pretentions wall surrounding the

The old fashioned gentlewoman, and proud, was a diffing figure in that ancient house, where in former days gay parties had assembled. But now ancient house, where in former days gay parties had assembled. But now the principal callers at the old house were the little fat priest, with a rosy smile, who looked after the aged lady's soul, of which she was most so-licitous in these later days, and the Count de Propriac, who came ostensibly to see the elderly woman and chat about genealogy and extraction, but was obviously not unmindful of the sence of the young girl nor averse seeking to mitigate her sorrow. Culver, the lawyer, too, came occasionally to talk about her affairs, but often her mind turned impatiently from figures and markets to the subtle rhythm of Shakespeare. She regretted having left the stage, feeling the loneliness of this simple existence, yet averse to seeking diversion and shunning either than inviting society. As the lact hours crept by she longed for the forced wakefulness and stir of other days — bappy days of insecurity.

But while she was stricing to solve these new problems of her life they were all being settled for her by fate. that arrogant meddler. Calling one moraing, Culver, nosegay in hand, was obliged to wait longer than usual and employed the interval in casually ex-ng his surroundings and inciden-himself. First, with the vanity of youngish old gentlemen, he gazed into a tall mirror framed in the fanstyle of the early Venetians, a which had belonged to the marlight beauty of his noble spouse. Paus-ing about as long as it would have tak-en a lady to adjust a curl, he peeped into a Dutch cabinet of ebony and ther of pearl and was studying a charming creature painted on ivery, whose head, like that of Bluebeard's wife, was subsequently separated from her lovely shoulders, when a light footstep behind him interrupted

"No, no!" ahe returned hastily, striving to maintain her self possession.

"How-do you know this?"
"Through the marquis bimself," he replied somewhat uneasy ben-ath her steady gaze. "He told me the story in order to protect the estate from any possible pretensions on the part of the traitor. The renegade was reported dead, but the marquis nevertheless remained skeptical. He did not believe in the old saw about the devil being dead. 'Le diable lives always,' he said.'

The visitor observed a perceptible change in the young girl, just what he could not define, but to him it seemed most to lie in her eyes, where some-thing that buffled him looked out and met his glance.

"His brother was an officer in the French army?" size asked, as though forcing herself to speak.

"Yes, ten years older than Ernest Saint-Prosper, he had already made a career for himself. How engerly, then, must the younger brother have looked forward to meeting bim; to serving with one who. In his young eyes, was all that was brare and noble! What a bitter awakening from the dream! It is not those we hate who can injure us most; only those we love can stab us so deeply!

Mechanically she answered the lawthe hand given him a. .
cold as ice.
"Remember." he said admonishingly.
"less closer, more dify!"

Some hours later the old lady, dress ed in her heavy silk and brocade and with snow white hair done up in imposing fashion, rapped on Constance's door, but received no answer. Knock ing again, with like result, she entered the room, discovering the young girl on the bed her cheeks tinted like the rose, her eyes with no gleam of recog-nition in them and her lips moving, uttering snatches of old plays. Taking

"It is about time now," answered the commander in chief, consulting his watch. "You have quite recovered from your wounds?" he added kindly. "Yes. thank you, general."

"I see by the newspapers you were reported dead. If your friends read that it will cause them needless anxiety. You had better see that the matter is corrected."

"It is hardly worth while," returned the young man slowly. The commanding general glanced at him in some surprise. "A strange fel-low!" he thought. "Has he reasons for wishing to be considered dead? However, that is none of my business. At after a moment be continued: "Cerro Gordo was warm work, but there is warmer yet in store for us. Only Providence, not the Mexicans, can stop us. But here are the officers," as General Pillow, Brevet General Twiggs and a number of other officers entered. The commander in chief proceeded to give such information as be had touching the approaches to the city. Many of the officers favored operating tacking Chapultepec. Saint-Prosper when called on stated that the ground before the San Antonio gate was intersected by many irrigating ditches and that much of the approach was under water.

His fellow officers knew him as a fearless soldier, but a man reticent about himself, who made a confident of no one. Liked for his ready, broad military qualities, it was a matter of comment, nevertheless, that no one knew anything about him except that he had served in the French army and was highly esteemed by General Scott as a daring and proficient engineer.

After leaving the commanding general's tent Saint-Prosper retired to rest in that wilderness which had once been a monarch's pleasure grounds.

When daybreak again penetrated the mountain recesses and fell upon the valley he arose to thake off a troubled slumber. An unhealthy mist hung over the earth, like a missing, and the office ing and noxious atmosphere to a little adobe house which the natives had built near the trail that led through the valley. As he approached this but he encountered a dismal but loqua-cious sentinel tramping before the partly opened door.

"This is chilly work, guard?" said the young man, pausing.
"Yis, colonel," replied the soldier, apparently grateful for the interruption:

"It's a bot foight I prefer to this cool dooty." "Whom are you guarding?" contin-
