BY S. L. S.

"My dear," observed Mrs. Martin one morning to her better half, after having been engaged for some few minutes in consulting the family account books, "I am consuming more money than I should. I must have some more money this morning. My purse is almost entirely exhausted, and I must do some shopping to-day."

"Money, Mrs. Martin," exclaimed her frate lord, "and how many times haven't I given you money this past week, I should like to know? What do you suppose I'm made of?"

"The same material that goes to make up other mortals, I suppose, which is dust!" laughed Mrs. Martin, with a little diffidence, "but, perhaps so; but not gold dust, as your frequent demands on my purse would lead one to imagine," retorted Mr. Martin, rather more pleasantly; "but, my dear lady, my dear, what you want money for just now?"

"I want to get the children some winter dresses," replied the lady; "they made finissh of what they had last winter."

"Goodness!" exclaimed Mr. Martin, "and how long before yesterday that you presented that very air to me, which I sung to the tune of fifty dollars or more, and, besides, I was wearing his eyes out of sheer despair; that song won't bear the repetition so many times, my dear."

"In reply for it, but I can't sing," replied Mrs. Martin, with a merry laugh; "and, besides, that day before yesterday that you speak of was two months ago, and I was purchasing the children's fall clothing. Seems to me the weeks and months must be remarkably short in your calendar."

"Yes, it does cost you women the awfullest sight of money to do shopping with, of any creature I ever saw," exclaimed Mr. Martin, with a shrug, "but I'll give anything that I could purchase all that the children need at half the expense," he added, as he tugged at his purse to draw it from his pocket.

"You could!" and Mrs. Martin worked her eyebrows in a most comical manner. "I don't know what you mean," she said confidently. "I am convinced that about twice as much money is expended in these shopping expeditions as is at all necessary, and I am purchasing the children's fall way in this matter for one, I'll save me my belief expressed."

"You can't say," have your own way this time," said his wife, with a quiet smile, while her blue eyes fairly danced with merriment. "I'll agree to let you test the limitation to-day, by your own purchase; and if you give satisfaction, you shall do all my shopping in future."

"I'll agree," said Mr. Martin, with a list of the articles required, and I'll start at once," said Mr. Martin, pushing back his coffee-cup, and rising from his chair.

"I'll go with you," said Mrs. Martin, and, confident of success, he took his hat and cane, and sallied forth on this important errand.

After walking several blocks, he brought himself to see what articles his wife desired; so pulling out the paper he brought with him, he said:

"Merino, eh?" he mused, as his eyes fell upon the first article enumerated. "I wonder what you mean by that name. How? I soon can find out. Hello, here's a dry goods store already. I'll go and make inquiries."

"I'll go with you," said Mrs. Martin, and he entered the store, and advancing to the first counter, asked:

"Yes, you keep Merino here, my good fellow?"

"Yes; last counter," said the clerk.

"Yes; last counter, eh? Which? How many dollars by your own experience?" asked our hero, glancing rather ruefully down the long vista presented to his view. "I'll go to the end of the counter," said the clerk, laughing, and Martin started off.

"I declare they ought to run a car through this establishment for the accommodation of you," said Mrs. Martin, after having gone what seemed to him about three-quarters of a mile, and finding yet no signs of that respectable "counter."

"I'll go on a little further; and then, if I don't reach it, I'll hire a conveyance to take me the rest of the way."

In a few moments, fortunately for his strength and patience, which were decidedly on the wane, he found himself in front of the desired place.

"Can I get some merinos?" he asked.

"Yes, sir; plenty; as many as you want; and I'll give you a bargain. I'll give you some flapping down on the counter, almost making Mr. Martin blind, dead and dumb with the force of his answer. "I'll give you."

"Why—why—my good fellow, I don't want all those?" he stammered, as soon as he could recover his breath. "You don't mean to make me purchase all those, do you?"

"Oh, no, sir," was the assuring reply, "I'll give you a bargain. I'll give you bundles for our hero's inspection. "These are only for you to select from. Just look at this quality, sir! It is excellent; the finest quality I can purchase. All those, do you?"

"Oh, yes, yes! I presume so," replied Mr. Martin, nervously. "And how much will it cost me?"

"I'll give you a bargain. I'll give you the privilege of carrying away about a thimbleful with him?"

"Two dollars a yard, sir. That's the lowest figure I can put it at," replied the clerk.

"Two dollars a yard?" roared the gentleman, with a look of intense indignation. "God gracious! that would swamp me right now! But now here's a good opportunity for me to see if I couldn't get something better. I'll give you a bargain. I'll give you half the price. Hello, my fine fellow!" he added, in a louder tone, "what's that piece of goods?"

"Flannel, sir," and the clerk handed it down.

"And how much is it a yard?" pursued our hero.

"I'll let you have that quality for fifty cents, sir."

"I'll let you have compared the two."

"This is every bit as good as the stuff he calls merino," he said to himself; "it's just the same color, too. To be sure it is a little heavier, but I can't tell. I'll give you more and she can make it up (double and nobody'll know the difference."

"I'll give you a bargain. I'll give you the privilege of carrying away about a thimbleful with him?"

"Splendidly!" replied our hero, with a self-satisfied air. "I saved twenty dollars; and that don't grow anywhere, you know."

"Very true," responded his wife, gravely; then holding out her hand for the list, she said:

"I'll give you a bargain. I'll give you the privilege of carrying away about a thimbleful with him?"

"Well, so—not exactly," rejoined Mr. Martin.

And your letter will take up to ten days to reach the office. It is imperative that you send in time.

Carefully numbered as they arrive, and there cannot be a mistake. If any arrive, and they reach the office three times, you will surely get some reward in addition to the Ladies' Journal, which alone is big value. If you do not send in time, you will miss the chance of winning anything but the paper to suit every lady.

By subscribing to the Ladies' Journal you will secure some considerable advantage—that is, there must be at least thirty of a club, and all who are sent to the office will receive the same. They have their choice of a handsome ring, heavily gold-plated ladies' gold brooch, which retails about $1.50, or a pair of silver-plated butter knives, which retails about $1.50. Either of these you may wish to be sent postage paid. You will thus secure your own copy of the Ladies' Journal for one cent, and in addition will have as good an opportunity of gaining some one of the other large rewards in lists given above.

as well as though you had sent in the answer. It is not a test of memory. We are sure our readers could not do better than to try their skill in hunting up these questions and competing for the prizes. Everything will be carried out exactly as promised.

Prizes in last competition went all over Canada and to many parts of the United States.
