I should like to revert to the general subject the hon. member for York West has discussed. In addition to offering my congratulations, I should like to give him support. For the benefit of those who live in parts of Canada remote from areas most affected by this resolution, I would point out that we have in the three prairie provinces an enormous area known as the Palliser triangle, to which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has already referred this evening. I, too, made reference to it in my remarks a year ago in support of the South Saskatchewan dam.

This Palliser triangle is a potential source of very great wealth, if it is properly managed. It can be a source of great calamity to this nation if it is not wisely managed. Somehow or another we must make provision for wise management of the Palliser triangle. True, we have great crops, sometimes year after year, in that area. But there is hardly a year in which there are not numbers of farmers in that region who lose their crops because of drought. There have been years when that whole country has been threatened with dust-bowl conditions.

Those times can come again. What should we be prepared to do to implement this resolution? In the first place, as has been pointed out several times during the session, we have a watershed on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains. Much has been done already by the provinces and the federal government through wise co-operation by way of making provision for the adequate protection of the forests on the watershed. I know, however, that the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) realizes that much more must be done.

There are great stretches on those mountain slopes where the forests have been denuded. Each of those slopes from which forests have been removed is a threat to the water supply of the Palliser triangle. We have to look forward to a time when we shall reforest our mountain slopes that have been denuded by settlers and by fires. That would cost a lot of money but it is one of the things that must be looked after, perhaps under the provisions contemplated by this resolution. Far too little water is falling in Alberta and Saskatchewan to meet the needs of the Palliser triangle in respect of irrigation alone. In addition to irrigation we have the needs of the cities—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should not refer to the irrigation project about which he is now speaking. As he knows, under the ruling given earlier he would be out of order.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, after your experiences tonight I do not wonder that you are meticulous in the application of the rules. But I was not going to discuss irrigation; I was simply referring to the need of water for irrigation. In addition to those needs there must be water for the settlements. That need is increasing. Cities like Regina, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Lethbridge, Medicine Hat and others across these plains will require more and more water, and provision must be made for them to have more water. That provision must be made before we go too far. I am not sure that enough care has been taken to look forward to the increasing needs of our cities and settlers as far as water for domestic and industrial uses is concerned. I take it that one of the objects of this resolution is to have all such matters looked into and to take the necessary measures while still there is time.

A good deal of the area in the Palliser triangle at least will have to be regrassed. This will have to be done on a large scale. Wind erosion has been very notable in many parts, and water erosion has been great. As a means of protecting the soil against erosive elements we shall have either to regrass or cover with some other vegetation. This will cost money. I would imagine that such measures will be covered by this resolution.

In addition we need more forest fire control. There are nowhere near adequate means for protection against fire, although much progress has been made in the last fifteen years. We are still terrified when a forest fire breaks out because we are never sure it will be brought under control. We should spend enough money to enable us to check an ordinary forest fire in a reasonably short time. The devastation wrought in British Columbia and Alberta by forest fires during my memory is something we cannot afford to allow to continue. Otherwise we shall just not have the means of conserving water or providing ourselves with the wood we need.

Then there is the matter of dams and reservoirs, not for irrigation but for conservation. There are many places in the mountains where, by the building of dams, we could reservoir a great deal of water. There are many lakes which could be filled. I am sure the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) will be mentioning one of these, Sullivan lake, in connection with the Red Deer diversion area which is so dear to his heart. There are many lakes like that throughout the country which could be filled with water which now runs to waste in the spring or in times of wet weather during the summer. A great deal of this water could be conserved by the strategic building of dams.

I have mentioned only two or three matters in a rambling sort of way. I did not expect to participate in this debate. I have meant what I have said as in the nature of support for the resolution. As I remarked at the beginning, I commend the minister for introducing the resolution. It is a progressive resolution; I propose to support it. I intend to back any additional provisions such as this as long as I am permitted to remain in this house.

On motion of Mr. Herridge the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will consider the following measures: Bill No. 103, to amend the National Defence Act; Bill No. 7, to amend the Loan Companies Act; Bill No. 8, to amend the Trust Companies Act; Bill No. 38, respecting the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company; Bill No. 39, to amend the Canadian Overseas

Telecommunication Corporation Act; Bill No. 19, to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act; and Bill No. 40, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

We hope to have time to take up the three resolutions standing in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development that were announced yesterday. One is with respect to the conservation of water resources; the other is with respect to the establishment of a historic sites and monuments board of Canada, and then there is the resolution to revise and consolidate the Yukon Act.

Mr. Knowles: Are we going into supply as well?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not on Monday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

FLOODS

DAMAGE IN THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE NETHERLANDS AND BELGIUM—MOTION OFFERING SYMPATHY AND HELP

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as you know, we have all been deeply moved by the news of the disasters both on sea and on land that have taken place as a result of the terrible storms raging about the United Kingdom, and the channel between the United Kingdom and continental Europe.

We do not know as yet just the extent of the disaster, but we do know that very many lives have been lost, that many, many families have been forced to evacuate their homes, and that there has been a great destruction of property. I think I can assume that I would have the consent of every hon. member if I were to put a motion at this time in connection with this disaster. We all remember what great comfort our people got out of the sympathy of the peoples of those lands when disasters overtook some of our fellow citizens in the Fraser valley, in Manitoba, in Rimouski and Cabano in my native province of Quebec. We all know how much good it does to people who are in the throes of such disaster to realize that they have the active and concrete sympathy of those they regard as their friends.

If I may have unanimous consent to move the motion, without the usual notice, I do move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew):

That His Honour the Speaker be asked to convey to Her Majesty the Queen, to Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands and to His Majesty the King of the Belgians the deep sympathy of the Commons of Canada to the people of the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Belgium who have been so sorely stricken by the appalling disaster which has befallen them and the earnest desire of the Canadian people to manifest their sympathy to the sufferers in such concrete form as, after more accurate information is available about the actual needs, will prove to be the most helpful to them in their great distress.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be permitted to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in seconding the motion that has been placed before the house. I know all hon. members will regard this as an opportunity to express their own sympathy with those who are suffering so severely in Britain, in Holland and in Belgium at this time. As many hon. members will have heard in the news broadcast within the last hour, the floods are increasing on an even greater scale and those who have suffered so greatly already would appear to be facing even worse trials than those they faced before.

While the terms of suffering cannot be measured in the loss of life as given in numbers alone, nevertheless it must have impressed all hon. members who heard the latest reports that since this morning the figures have risen to 397 known dead in Britain, 464 in Holland and 27 in Belgium, with the accompanying statement that this probably represents only a part of what the loss will actually be.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has pointed out that at a time when we felt something of the damage and sorrow that can come from floods here in our own country we were greatly heartened by the evidence of sympathy that came to us from across the ocean. I happened to be in Winnipeg on the day when a large air transport arrived from Great Britain carrying goods and supplies which had been sent from there to assist the sufferers in that area. I know something of what the effect was on the minds of those who were suffering at that time and who realized that with the privations under which the people of Great Britain had been living they had gone to the extent they had in sending these things for their assistance.

We also received succour and assistance from the people of Holland and Belgium. I know that this cannot be reduced to the terms of a return for what was done, but nevertheless we know, from what they did, what our evidence of sympathy at this time may mean. I heard this latest report just before I came into the chamber and I did not have an opportunity to speak to the Prime Minister, but I would place before him the suggestion that with the extent of the disaster being as it is it might perhaps be desirable to consider the possibility of taking initial steps to set up a committee of some kind so that in every community something may be under way, and when the type of assistance that is to be given can be determined by the governments of Great Britain, the Netherlands and Belgium it will then be possible to proceed with the utmost speed.

I think that that might be worth while, considering the encouragement that would come from the knowledge that positive action had been taken along that line. It might well be that a non-partisan committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker could proceed to lay down general plans and indicate to mayors and reeves throughout Canada that preliminary arrangements might be undertaken to meet whatever situation does arise as a result of the decisions of these governments.

This storm and the floods accompanying it are stated to be the worst in 500 years and I do feel that our attitude in regard to it might well be measured by the extent of the tragedy which has visited the countries which have been named by the Prime Minister in this motion.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this group would like to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in supporting the motion which has just been made. We appreciate the prompt action taken by the Prime Minister because we realize the many disturbing and perplexing problems that must come to his desk in these strenuous days. Yet he finds time to take this most humane and friendly action.

This motion this afternoon is just another indication of how small the western world is becoming. We think of extending aid to countries on the other side of the Atlantic as we would of extending aid to a neighbouring province or a nearby country. I am glad indeed that the Prime Minister mentioned material aid because after all that is what will be of the greatest assistance to the people concerned as soon as help of that kind can be properly measured and extended.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we have no hesitation in giving our unanimous support to the motion which has been moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). We think it is only right that we in Canada, who have been the recipients of assistance from the various countries that are now stricken, should do everything we can to help these people in return. Even if they had not helped us I am sure the Prime Minister would have brought forward a motion of this kind. In addition to sending our expressions of sympathy and all the moral support we can at this time, we feel that out of the blessings we have received from Providence we should be prepared to assist these people in a material way. We will back the Prime Minister and the government in whatever they want to do.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, representing as I do the area in the Red River valley which suffered perhaps the major loss in the recent flood, I should like to say that having returned from there only yesterday I have had communications from that area expressing the hope and desire of those who benefited so materially from the kindliness of those who are now afflicted that they be associated completely with any attempts that might be made to make a return for the sympathy and the material assistance given, and to show their appreciation at such a time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Unanimously.

Motion agreed to unanimously.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRESENTATION ON THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, subject to the usual reservations as to unforeseen contingencies, I want to announce that I intend to bring down the budget on Thursday, February 19, at the usual hour of eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): In compliance with the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) on Friday, January 23, I move:

That the following members form the special committee on the criminal law: Messrs. Brown (Essex West), Browne (St. John's West), Cameron, Cannon, Carroll, Churchill, Diefenbaker, Garson, Henderson, Laing, MacInnis, MacNaught, Macnaughton, Noseworthy, Pinard, Robichaud, and Shaw.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

TELEVISION SETS—SALES AND TAXES

Mr. Hellyer:

What revenue has the government received from sales and excise taxes on television receiving sets, each month for the last five years?

Mr. McCann:

No segregation of sales tax revenue is made according to commodities.

The Excise Tax Act applies the excise tax to "phonographs, record playing devices, radio broadcast or telecast receiving sets and tubes therefor and apparatus for receiving radio broadcast and music". The tax received from manufacturers under this heading is in total and the amount paid on any one item is not known.

"NATION'S BUSINESS" BROADCAST—MR. DREW

Mr. Harrison:

1. Was the broadcast delivered by the Hon. George Drew, M.P., Leader of the Opposition, on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation program of political broadcasts "Nation's Business" on Tuesday, January 13, 1953, a live broadcast or a recording?

2. If the broadcast was a recording, was it recorded before the session of the house beginning at 2.30 p.m. on Monday, January 12, when the Prime Minister answered a question and explained that there had been no horses on the army payroll?

Mr. McCann:

1. Live broadcast.

2. See answer to No. 1.

POSTMASTERS—PAYMENT FOR OVERTIME

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Were any postmasters or any assistants to postmasters, in post offices with revenue over $3,000 per annum paid for their extra overtime, during the Christmas rush?

2. If not, is it the intention of the Post Office Department to pay them for their extra overtime worked during the Christmas rush?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. The regulations governing overtime in the postal service authorized by the governor in council on the recommendation of the civil service commission do not grant payment for overtime to senior supervisory personnel which include postmasters.

Compensation for overtime during the Christmas period falls in two classes—

(a) staff offices;

(b) semi-staff offices.

In staff offices compensation is given for overtime worked during the Christmas period to employees up to and including the class postal supervisor grade 2 when engaged in manipulative duties.

In semi-staff offices compensation is given to assistants to postmasters for overtime performed during the Christmas season by granting equivalent time off or by payment in cash.

2. See answer to No. 1.

DORVAL AIRPORT—ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Macnaughton:

1. Has the Department of Transport received any complaints with respect to inadequate and outmoded facilities provided at the domestic and transatlantic terminal buildings at Dorval airport, Montreal, for (a) air travel passengers; (b) the public generally?

2. Has the Department of Transport received any complaints to this effect from the different airline companies, both domestic and foreign?

3. Has any survey of the situation been made?

4. Are any plans for improvements under active consideration? If so, when will a start be made to improve this situation?

MALTON AIRPORT—TERMINAL FACILITIES

Mr. Macnaughton:

1. Has any recent survey been made of the terminal facilities at Malton airport, near Toronto?

2. If so, what improvements are projected and when will they be started?

GANDER AIRPORT—PASSENGER FACILITIES

Mr. Macnaughton:

1. Has any recent survey been made of the passenger terminal facilities at Gander airport, Newfoundland?

2. If so, what improvements are projected and when will they be started?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal orally with these three questions. I have for some time been fully aware that terminal building facilities at the major airports operated by my department are inadequate to meet the rapidly growing needs of civil aviation. Many representations to this effect have been received both from the public generally and from commercial air lines. Concentration on the defence program has, however, meant that expansion of terminal facilities, along with many other desirable projects, has had to be deferred. I am glad to be able to report that I have instructed my officials to proceed as rapidly as possible with the preparation of the necessary architectural plans for expansion of airport terminal facilities so that construction may begin just as soon as funds can be made available.

We have already completed small new terminals at the lakehead and at Moncton during the past year. Blueprints for a new building at Saskatoon, made necessary by national defence use of buildings previously employed for civil purposes, are almost completed, and this building will be constructed during 1953. At Gander we are improving the interior of the existing terminal through the provision of Canadian films and the installation of Canadian literature, exhibits, maps and murals. In addition, the preparation of blueprints for expansion of the Gander terminal facilities is now under way, and it is expected that these plans will be ready in time to allow construction to begin later this year.

My officials are also studying how best the present facilities can be expanded at Malton, and I have asked that plans be ready by the end of 1953 or early in 1954, if possible, so that if funds can be made available a contract for the expansion can be let promptly. At Dorval we are fully aware of the need for a major change to combine both domestic and international terminal facilities in a much enlarged terminal building. I have directed my officials to reach an early decision as to whether a completely new terminal should be constructed in a new location or whether the existing domestic terminal can be used as the core of a new terminal. As soon as this decision has been reached, instructions will be issued for the preparation of plans and specifications.

In addition, my officials are well advanced with the preparation of specifications for a new terminal building of a size and type which would be suitable for use either in Ottawa or in Winnipeg. New buildings are required and will be provided in both places as funds become available. It is my hope to see construction initiated over the next two or three years for the necessary new terminal facilities at all our major airports to keep abreast of the growth of civil aviation.

CANADA MEDAL

Mr. Fraser:

1. Have any awards of the Canada Medal been made, since May, 1951?
2. If so, when were the awards made and to whom?

Mr. Bradley:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—ALTERATIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many paragraphs in the 1952 report of the Auditor General were altered after August 25, 1952, following discussions with officers of the departments concerned?
2. What are the numbers of any paragraphs that were so altered?
3. Did any of these alterations involve deletions from paragraphs still in the final draft of the report? If so, what are the numbers of such paragraphs?
4. Were any paragraphs which were in the draft of the above report which was put in circulation on August 25, 1952, deleted from the report following discussions with officers of the departments concerned?
5. If so, how many paragraphs were deleted and to what departments did they refer?

Mr. Lesage:

1. 4.
2. Paragraphs 49, 53, 61 and 87.
3. No.
4. No.
5. Answered by No. 4.

CITIZENSHIP CONFERENCE

Mrs. Fairclough:

1. Is a citizenship conference being planned by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

2. If so, where is it being held?
3. When will it convene?
4. Who has been invited?

Mr. Harris:

1, 2, 3 and 4. It is proposed to hold a seminar on citizenship next spring or summer for the discussion of the respective roles of governmental and voluntary organizations, but arrangements have not yet been completed and invitations have not been sent out.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LAWYERS AND NOTARIES, CARLETON AND VICTORIA COUNTIES, N.B.—GOVERNMENT AGENTS

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. What lawyers or notaries public, residing in the counties of Carleton and Victoria, New Brunswick, have acted as agents on behalf of any department or board of the dominion government, during the fiscal years 1948-49, 1949-50, 1950-51, 1951-52, and from April 1 to December 31, 1952?
2. What amounts have been paid to each and in connection with what services?

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the total expenditure to date in connection with the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project for (a) commissioners; (b) counsel; (c) staff?
2. Are there any accounts above referred to that are unpaid? If so, how much?
3. How many hours were spent by each of the commissioners in drafting the report?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the third paragraph of this question, "How many hours were spent by each of the commissioners in drafting the report", that information is not available. So far as the other two paragraphs are concerned, I would ask that they be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

BERTHIERVILLE, QUE.—WHARF

Mr. Balcer:

1. Has the government sold the old Berthierville wharf in the county of Berthier-Maskinonge?
2. If so, to whom was it sold, on what date and for what amount?
3. Has the government contributed to the raising of the cement walls and to the filling up of the approaches to the said wharf?
4. If so, to whom were such contracts awarded and for what amounts?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORMOSA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO CANADIAN POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs but as he is not here I should like to direct it to the Prime Minister. Was the Canadian government informed or consulted as to changes in United States foreign policy with respect to Formosa, as stated by President Eisenhower in his speech at noon today? Will the minister make a statement on what stand the government took, or what stand it now takes on this important question, which it is considered in many quarters might have serious consequences for the peace of the world?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and anticipating that such a question might be asked from some quarter of the house, I got a note from the officials of the department.

It will be appreciated that the government have not had an opportunity to study the text of President Eisenhower's announcement regarding the modification of the order to the seventh fleet, as this announcement was made only about an hour ago. I may say, however, that the presidential order to the seventh fleet, issued on June 27, 1950, was made on the sole responsibility of the United States government. The modification of the order announced today by President Eisenhower is also made on the sole responsibility of the United States government. Late Friday last, the Canadian embassy was informed about the forthcoming statement to be made by President Eisenhower, but it was not suggested that we should express our views about it. The Canadian ambassador, Mr. Wrong, arrived in Ottawa this morning. He is here on a visit which had been arranged before this incident occurred. Advantage will be taken of his presence to discuss this matter and its background more fully.

Mr. Drew: I would ask that we might have a statement at an early date with respect to another and, in my opinion, a much more important point raised in the speech by President Eisenhower today. That is his statement that the United States government is no longer going to regard itself as bound by any secret treaties with nations which have not observed their part of such undertakings. It is not necessary to point out what those treaties are. We all know what they are. It would seem to me that the consequences of that action are so far-reaching that we should have a statement in the house at the earliest possible date as to what this means in terms of Canadian policy with relation to the same subject.

Mr. St. Laurent: I feel quite satisfied that there are no secret undertakings with Canada that will be affected by the policy announced by President Eisenhower. The whole matter will be given careful consideration because, though they may be matters of entirely domestic concern to the people of the United States, all of us are so close together that what is of domestic concern to any one of us is apt to have the kind of repercussions upon the fate of others that makes it very desirable for us to give most definitive consideration to those matters.

Mr. Drew: Without extending the discussion I wish to indicate the point I had in mind. The statement by President Eisenhower does not relate to secret undertakings with other nations. It obviously referred to those secret agreements out of which grow certain divisions of authority which today have a very profound effect on the whole world situation. It is in relation to these matters, and particularly as they relate to Europe, on which I would hope we would have a definite statement as soon as possible.

[Later:]

REQUEST FOR EARLY DEBATE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct to the Prime Minister a supplementary question with respect to United States foreign policy. Will the government give consideration to arranging for an early debate in the house on foreign affairs?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I understand that my colleague, the leader of the house, intends to move some time tomorrow to go into supply. That will be an opportunity for there being at least some preliminary discussion of matters of that kind. I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is very anxious that the house do go into committee of supply so that his estimates may be called and so that he may make a statement on external affairs before he is required to return to New York for the continuation of the sessions of the United Nations.

COINAGE

INQUIRY AS TO CORONATION ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) of which I have already given him notice. In view of the many inquiries by coin collectors, will the minister advise the house whether the Royal Canadian Mint intends to issue special coins to commemorate the coronation of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II.

If so, what will be the denominations of the special coins so issued?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of Canada to issue special coins to commemorate the coronation. As the house is aware, new coins bearing the effigy of Her Majesty have just appeared within the last two or three weeks. There are no plans for a further special commemorative issue.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF HERRING SEASON, PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): May I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacNaught) to whom I have sent notice.

Will the minister extend the herring season in the lower east coast area of Vancouver island beyond the closure date of February 5, so that new orders from Formosa for salted herring may be filled? I understand that the orders cannot be filled without extension of the season?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I wish to thank the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. Since discussing the matter with him on Saturday morning many telegrams have arrived in the department regarding extension of the herring season.

The scientists attached to the Pacific biological staff of the fisheries research board of Canada have been asked to carry out an investigation to ascertain whether the conservation of herring will in any way be affected by extension of the closing date beyond February 5. When their report is received a decision will be made and announced.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF EAST GERMAN REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) a question based on a C.B.C. news dispatch and a dispatch in the press to which I referred the minister in telephone conversation this morning. I should like to ask if the minister is able to say whether any conversations have taken place between the West German government and Canadian representatives regarding the admission to Canada of refugees from East Germany. If so, what is the position taken by the Canadian government?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we are accepting immigrants from Germany in accordance with the policy which has been explained to the house on many occasions. I have no doubt that for that purpose conversations are going on at all times or at various times between the government of West Germany and our offices abroad. However, I noticed the comment in the press to which he referred me and all I can say about it is that we have had no communication of that kind in Ottawa, although there may have been a particular approach by the government of West Germany about which we will hear in due course. When we receive word about it, we will study it, having in mind the policy laid down, and having in mind the needs of the Canadian people for immigration.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO IDENTITY OF "MR. M.P." IN BROADCAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) of which I have not been able to give him notice.

Was the character called "Mr. M.P." on last night's broadcast on the city of Ottawa in which the mayor of the city of Ottawa took part actually a member of this house? If so, was he advised of the ridicule he was to be subjected to by the other speakers on the panel?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the incident but I will take the hon. gentleman's question as notice.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chevrier) in connection with the meeting in Washington of the international wheat agreement council and to ask what attitude the Canadian representative is taking regarding the increase of minimum and maximum prices; and whether Canada is joining with the United States in asking for an increase in both minimum and maximum prices?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is a question which is of some importance and which would, I think, normally require some notice. I would say off-hand that I should think it rather improbable that I or anyone should give an opinion on what is taking place in Washington now during the conference. It seems to me that until the conference is completed I should not, as Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, make a statement on the position which a representative of the government is taking there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I presume, on a question of privilege, that I should point out that the representative of Canada, Mr. Sharp, at the opening session of the international wheat council said that he was not there to try to force unreasonable terms—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He went on to discuss the attitude that Canada is to take. I suggest that parliament should know, and that is the reason I asked the question, what the general attitude is going to be in reference to this matter before it becomes a decided fact.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I should at least have the opportunity of seeing what is stated in the press release to which my hon. friend has just referred. When I have seen it perhaps I can give the house a statement.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—MINISTERIAL COMMENT ON ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Can the minister inform the house whether his colleagues in the cabinet agree with his published statement in western Canada that the royal commission report on the South Saskatchewan dam was the silliest blank, blank thing?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if I made that statement I was not making it under circumstances where I thought it would be reported in the press. All I have to say with regard to the question itself is that the government has not yet discussed the report and I can say nothing about it.

GRAIN

INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1952 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): I would like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith). Can he indicate when prairie farmers may expect interim payments on the 1952 crop?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would like to take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Just before the next election.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

"BACKGROUND MATERIAL"—ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would ask that certain questions of mine, which were purportedly answered in Hansard of January 29, 1953 at pages 1432 and 1433, be looked at again. My questions were eight in number, and my point of privilege relates in particular to the last five questions, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8. They ask for very specific information with reference to background material put out by the Department of National Defence. The one answer to these five questions, to say the least, is evasive. My point of privilege is that those questions should be answered in detail.

EGGS

QUESTION AS TO INCREASE IN FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister say whether the floor price for eggs will be increased and enforced, or other action taken, since the farm women on the prairies are now receiving as little as—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I just returned from the west yesterday, and there has been no council meeting since my return. I am not in a position to report on the matter.

WHEAT

CANADIAN CRACKED WHEAT CONTENT IN U.S. FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): On Friday last, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) asked a question which appears on page 1476 of Hansard, and reads as follows:

I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has any protest been made by the government to the United States authorities with regard to the bad effect on Canadian wheat sales caused by recent actions of certain United States importers who are reported as having used Canadian cracked wheat in flour for human consumption in that country?

I should like to point out, of course, that the reference to cracked wheat in these newspaper articles is a wrong reference. The wheat referred to would be wheat that had been down-graded by reason of frost or other damage.

In connection with the sale of low-grade Canadian wheat to the United States, the United States government has certain obligations which are set forth in the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The Canadian government has drawn the attention of the United States government to these obligations, and it has also made clear to the United States government the concern which is felt about this matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF ASSOCIATE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 103, to amend the National Defence Act.

He said: The government has, as might well have been expected, Mr. Speaker, given careful consideration to the various points raised in the debate on the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), and several other hon. members, argued that if an emergency existed that justified the present emergency powers legislation, it was not necessary to have any amendment to the National Defence Act since the power already existed to appoint one or more associate ministers of national defence during an emergency and for six months thereafter.

It seems to me that hon. members who advanced that argument did not take into account the distinction between the international emergency that parliament declared did exist when it enacted the emergency powers legislation and the emergency defined in the National Defence Act and contemplated in the War Measures Act. The Emergency Powers Act states categorically that an international emergency exists which threatens the security of Canada, and that certain emergency powers might, therefore, be required by the government. On the other hand, the National Defence Act, in section 20, defines emergency as the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) pointed out during the course of his argument, as war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended. One finds the same definition in the War Measures Act, which empowers the governor in council to exercise the powers conferred upon him only when the governor in council has taken the responsibility of declaring, by proclamation, that by reason of the existence of a real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection, such measures are required.

We do feel that the present conditions are not normal conditions. We do agree with the hon. members that, in fact, war is being waged in Korea. We do agree that if war were not being waged in Korea, a war which might have serious consequences for the free world at large, young Canadians would not be voluntarily offering up their services and risking their lives for something of the character of an ordinary police action. It was because there was a realization by the Canadian people that it was desirable, in the interests of freedom in the world, that a stand be taken in Korea that would make it apparent that aggression was not going to be allowed to pay. This has resulted in very serious, active, and unfortunately destructive warfare, which has cost many lives and the destruction of a great deal of property. I believe it is nevertheless fortunate for the world that the United Nations did have the resolute determination that they were going to demonstrate that aggression did not pay. If that had not been done, no one can be sure what the consequences might have been.

Fortunately, the consequences have not been the kind of war that the hon. gentleman's generation and mine have twice known in our lifetime. The government felt that the emergency contemplated by the War Measures Act, and the emergency contemplated by the National Defence Act, were the kind of emergencies that we had been through from 1914 to 1918 and from 1939 to 1945 and not this twilight period which cannot be said to be peace but is fortunately not world war. I, therefore, felt that if that twilight situation required something to be done now, that would have to be done too under the other kind of emergency, it would be proper to come to parliament and tell parliament what our intentions were and to get parliament to express its views on the propriety of the action being proposed.

Hon. gentlemen will also have noticed that when the Emergency Powers Act was framed it was circumscribed in many ways. We do not complain about that, and I think it was wisely circumscribed. It was provided that nothing in that Emergency Powers Act would apply in this twilight period that would affect the liberty of persons and that there should be no expenditure of money that was not appropriated by parliament itself. Human nature is such that to provide for an associate minister of national defence there has to be some money provided as well to compensate for the services that the associate minister will be expected to render. It was felt, therefore, that there had to be parliamentary action before any decision of that kind could be implemented, and that as there had to be parliamentary action it would be proper to have that parliamentary action cover both the policy decision and the appropriation necessary to implement the policy.

I would hope, as I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) would hope, that there would be as few occasions as possible when the executive would have to dispense with the decision of parliament in any matter of importance, and that hon. gentlemen will not think it was wrong to come to parliament for this action if in fact the decision to be made and to be implemented is the right kind of decision.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister allow a question? Since he has mentioned the matter, what is the difference between an emergency under the National Defence Act and an emergency under the transitional powers act as interpreted in the Nolan case? What is the distinction? I cannot quite follow it and I just wonder whether the Prime Minister would elucidate it.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think it is more a distinction in degree than in substance. When there is an emergency sufficiently grave that a government in office feels it will have the support of the Canadian people in taking to itself the broad powers that the War Measures Act comprises, it means there is a grave situation. There are situations of the same nature which can be much less grave. A cold war is a grave situation but it is not as grave a one as are the kind of wars the country had to fight when, on two previous occasions, the government of the day—one a government of my hon. friend's party, the other a government of the party to which I belong—felt that they would have the support of the Canadian people in taking to themselves those wide powers.

I hope that while I have any responsibility there will never arise the kind of situation where I would feel I would have the support of the Canadian public in taking for the government such wide powers. I therefore think the matter of procedure is much less important than are the merits of the proposal itself to provide for an associate minister of national defence. If it is something that could have been done without coming to parliament and would have been a good thing to do, I think it still remains a good thing when we come to parliament and ask parliament to express its views upon it. I think that our diverging opinions should be on the merits of the proposal rather than on the procedure to implement it.

I tried to follow closely the arguments made by all hon. members when the resolution was before the house; and if I understood them correctly, there seems to be no difference of view on the need for having more than one minister to share the responsibilities for national defence under present circumstances. By several hon. members opposite—particularly by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes)—it was argued that the government was not proposing the right division of functions between the minister and the proposed associate minister of national defence. The hon. member for Nanaimo further suggested—and in this suggestion he received support from several other hon. members—that it would be preferable to have a separate minister of national defence for air because of the great importance of Canada's air effort during the last war and now in the build-up of strength that is being prepared by NATO forces.

I should like to deal first with that second aspect. A separate minister of national defence for air might be either the minister of an entirely separate department or an associate minister having a special responsibility for the Royal Canadian Air Force. I believe there are strong objections to both those possible courses. The real purpose of the government in placing the national defence department under one minister was to try to bring about unification in the civilian administration of the services and to avoid duplication. We thought it would be better to have one minister with adequate powers to recommend the proper allocation of the funds appropriated by parliament and the manpower available to the department in the most effective way possible between the three services. All hon. members know that the top officials responsible for organization of the national defence of any country always feel—and quite rightly—that they should have everything that would increase the defensive powers of their forces. I think it is their business to look forward, to appraise and to determine what would increase the defensive and the offensive powers of their forces because frequently offence is the best form of defence.

But the theoretical or ideal development of the forces of a country is always circumscribed by the financial and manpower resources of that country. We or the government have to decide what portion of the annual production of the country it is desirable to set aside for defence purposes in any given year. That portion has to be the best kind of balance we can make between the defence requirements and the other requirements of the nation as a whole, and it necessarily varies according to the degree of danger for which the defence forces have to be ready. When a determination has been made as to what proportion of the gross national product of the nation it is proper for the nation to expend as an insurance policy for its safety and continued existence, that is the cloth that can be cut.

It was felt that it would be preferable to have one minister receiving the representations of the various services, co-ordinating them and determining between them what allocation could be made to each service. It would seem to us to be inevitable that if there were three ministers, one for each of these three services, each would naturally feel more keenly the importance of his service than that of the other services, and that there would be a competitive spirit. As honest, unprejudiced and unbiased as it would be possible for the head of one service to be and still be fair to his service, it seemed to us that he would naturally want as large a slice as he could get of the total amount appropriated for defence. It was felt that that competitive spirit had been the cause of duplication that was unnecessary and that it made for additional expense during the last war.

I remember many anxious moments during the discussions of the last war about the proper set-up of the hospital facilities for the services, and finding it difficult for me, a civilian, to appreciate that it was so necessary that there be no common hospital services for the treatment of the men of the three services. After all, they were Canadian men or Canadian women, serving the Canadian cause, and the health of each one was not so very different in character from the health of the other. But those who had military experience felt that it was necessary to retain the identity of these services, and that even in the hospital and medical branches the line of division had to be kept quite clear, distinct and apart.

Well, after the war, rightly or wrongly we decided that there would be a serious attempt to cut out some of the duplication, and not do it under the stress of fighting action going on at the same time, and we placed the department under one minister and one civilian departmental set-up. And we have not yet had reason to backstep, or reason to admit that that was not a good policy.

We, therefore, when approaching this matter of providing additional responsibility and additional service for the Department of National Defence, thought that the best way was to retain the one over-all civilian set-up, with an associate minister rather than a separate minister. Under the bill proposed, this co-ordination of the services will be preserved. Both the minister and the associate minister of national defence will be charged with the apportionment of the available public money, men and military supplies among the three services.

As I said a minute ago, we do realize, and we did realize after the war, that under wartime conditions, which we did not want to interfere with during wartime, when there were almost three separate departments of national defence, under three ministers, there had been quite a good deal of duplication of the civilian services; and we expected that considerable saving of the taxpayers' money could be made by having this unified civilian structure of the armed services, thus assisting in the closer co-ordination of all three.

I am inclined to think that, if we set up an entirely separate department of national defence for air, with a separate minister and separate deputy minister, inevitably there would be developed once again all this amount of duplication and overlapping which it was our policy to eliminate to the extent to which it could be eliminated.

Now, perhaps what the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) meant was that we should have an associate minister of national defence who would have special responsibility for the Royal Canadian Air Force and its supporting services. Well, I would admit this, that the argument against that course is not as strong as the argument against an entirely separate department. But I do not think such an arrangement would go any greater distance towards meeting the objection raised by the hon. member that there was not a clear and precise division of functions between the minister and the associate minister.

If there is to be co-ordination—and everyone agrees that there should be—the minister would have to continue to have responsibility for that co-ordination, and therefore for over-all policy in respect of the three services. The associate minister would, therefore, be limited in fact to the oversight and supervision of administration of the air force and perhaps an indefinite fraction of the existing civilian side of the department which supports the three services.

It seems to me that this would not be a very tidy arrangement, and that it would not be very long before there would have to be an associate deputy minister for air, and that would immediately start a duplication of the civilian side, again, which we have endeavoured to eliminate.

I think that the field of activity of the associate minister would, under such an arrangement, be more restricted than what is contemplated by our proposal, under which proposal the associate minister will, in effect, have ordinary supervision over all the administrative activities which come under the deputy minister, for supply, for procurement, for accounting and auditing, and what might be described in general terms as the housekeeping activities of national defence.

That was what I was trying to indicate when I said on January 22, as reported at page 1240 of Hansard:

> The associate minister, in addition to carrying on the work of the minister when the minister is away, will keep more closely in touch with matters of administration relating to the services. If I may repeat it is expected that the associate minister would act for and exercise the powers of the minister when the minister is away and deal with matters of administration relating to the three services, including requisitions for construction, equipment and supplies, submissions on similar matters to the governor in council and to the treasury board, control of the establishment, appointment and supervision of the civil employees and service personnel, approval of expenditures, orders, instructions and plans within the lines of agreed policy.

I doubt if it is possible to define the functions any more precisely and at the same time accomplish what the government really has in mind. We are not trying to divide up the department, or create something like two departments, or trying to create a department and a sub-department. What we are trying to do is to make it possible, as I said last Thursday, for responsibility to be shared between ministers. I believe, as I said then, that what is proposed will be satisfactory only if the minister and the associate minister work closely together in all matters, so that each will be really familiar, not with all the details, but with the general lines of the operation of the whole department, and of all three services.

This is really important, so that when, as so frequently happens, one minister has to be absent from Ottawa, the other will be sufficiently familiar with the whole department to act effectively in the whole field of its operations.

I do not believe that an arrangement like this can work unless there is an exceptional degree of harmony between the minister and the associate minister, and an even greater degree of frankness and understanding than is necessary between two ministers of the government having quite separate departments. That was one reason why there was some hesitation before proposing sharing of the responsibility for this portfolio. As hon. members know, it is intended, if this legislation is approved, that the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) shall become associate minister.

For some time before he became a member of the government, the Solicitor General had been parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Their relationship had proved to be very satisfactory to themselves, to us and to the personnel of the department. As a result of that experience, both the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Solicitor General were convinced that they could make an arrangement like this one work. I may say to the house that when I first suggested it to the minister he welcomed its acceptance, and indicated to me that for some time he himself had been thinking of suggesting precisely the same arrangement.

What we are proposing is not a new departure. If hon. members will look up the legislation adopted in 1940, which was 4 George VI, chapter 21, they will see that in addition to providing for a minister of national defence for air and a minister of national defence for naval services the legislation provided also that the minister of national defence should have co-ordinating functions in respect of all three services and that there should be an associate minister of national defence who should act for the minister whenever he was absent from Ottawa and who at all times should be entitled to exercise the powers of the minister over the whole range of his responsibility unless the governor in council otherwise directed. The governor in council never otherwise directed.

The only hon. gentleman who ever occupied the post of associate minister of national defence is the present dean of the house. I am sure it is his view that the success of this kind of arrangement—and it was a success—did depend upon a very high degree of mutual confidence, mutual respect and harmony such as existed throughout all those war years between the associate minister and the minister of national defence with whom he was associated.

What is more, I do believe that Canadians generally would agree that Canada was exceptionally well served by that partnership between the late regretted hon. gentleman who was minister of national defence and the associate minister, who fortunately is still with us in this House of Commons. Of course the parallel is not absolutely complete, as hon. gentlemen opposite will no doubt point out. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) was also minister of national defence for air and that was his principal responsibility. But he did serve actively as associate minister. He was able to serve successfully in that capacity because he was at all times familiar, and kept himself at all times familiar, with the general trend of departmental activity in connection with the three services.

As hon. gentlemen will remember, there was also, in the person of the present premier of Nova Scotia, a minister of national defence for naval services. The minister of national defence for naval services under the act of 1940 could also exercise all the powers of the minister of national defence in his absence and in the absence of the associate minister of national defence. It did quite often happen that he had to exercise those powers.

During all that period I do not recall a single occasion on which anyone in this house suggested that there was any difficulty about establishing where ministerial responsibility lay for the administration of national defence. When any question arose in this house it seemed to me, and I think by the way it was acquiesced in by all members of the house, that it was appropriate that the one of the three who did get up to answer the question should be dealing with the problem.

It is intended, if this legislation is approved, to vest in the associate minister precisely the same powers the associate minister enjoyed during the war years. The minister of course will have the immediate responsibility for defence policy. As all hon. members know, that is a responsibility which is shared constitutionally by all his colleagues and in a special degree, under our system, by the prime minister. Apart from the general constitutional responsibility, the responsibility for specific acts which require ministerial approval will of course rest with whichever minister gives that approval. In each case that will be a matter of record and the degree of responsibility would be precisely the same if there was no associate minister but merely an acting minister when the minister was absent.

I might say that the course which has been recommended to the house was proposed only after long and careful consideration of all the alternatives. We came to the conclusion that it was a course which it was hoped would achieve a realistic sharing of the heavy responsibilities for our defence services and the degree of ministerial control required for the very large operations which are involved.

I think hon. members will agree that it is appropriate that a fair trial should be made of any modification and will also share our hope that if there is a fair trial made of it it will prove to work as satisfactorily this time as we know it did in fact work through the co-operation, collaboration and mutual respect which the late minister of national defence and his associate minister had for each other during those other years of also very heavy responsibility.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the amendment now before us is of much greater importance than might appear at first glance. What is proposed by this bill is that parliament enact a measure which will add another section to the National Defence Act. This would leave in its present form section 6 which permits the appointment of three additional ministers of national defence and would provide for the appointment of an associate minister of national defence without including in that section any definition of his authority.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in arguing against the suggestion that there be an associate minister of national defence for air, has contended that this might create confusion and division of authority. Yet, having said that, he has also made the statement that he does not recall a single occasion when any difficulty arose between the ministers who previously occupied the different positions under the measure passed in 1940. If under the stress of a world war it was possible for the ministers to carry out their responsibilities in respect of the different services without any difficulty in determining the boundaries of their authority, then it would seem that the Prime Minister has placed before us a most effective argument as to why there should now be an associate minister of national defence for air. He has assured us that in the experience of this government that could be done without creating any difficulty as to the measure of authority exercised by any single minister.

However, there is one aspect of the opinions placed before us by the Prime Minister which it seems overlooks the situation with which we are actually dealing.

The Prime Minister has said that the appointment of this minister will assist in the administration of the Department of National Defence. What has not been pointed out is that this subject has become one of immense importance to the members of the house because of the demonstrated fact that there has been a breakdown in the administration of the Department of National Defence. To appoint another minister with similar powers, no better defined than those already being exercised by the minister who occupies that office, will not solve the difficulties that have already been demonstrated to the members of the house.

The Prime Minister has said that there is a distinction between the emergency we now face and the emergency contemplated by section 6 of the National Defence Act which would permit the appointment by the government of three additional ministers of national defence. He points out that the National Defence Act defines the emergency which would be the basis for action under that act as war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended. The Prime Minister did go on to say that there is a real war in Korea. Consequently there is no question about the fact that in accordance with the words of the Prime Minister today the type of emergency contemplated by this act is in existence. If that is so, then the government could act under the present legislation if it saw fit to do so.

I agree that it would be desirable that such action should not be taken because the kind of emergency undoubtedly does not exist which should deny to us in this house a full opportunity to debate the authority that any minister will have. I submit that the only justification for emergency legislation of any kind is that the emergency is of a nature which requires a more expeditious procedure than would ordinarily be afforded by bringing legislative measures before the house and having them fully debated. I do not think that anyone will contend that there is not ample opportunity to discuss this legislation at this time. The very fact that the bill is brought before us demonstrates that there is time to discuss it. That being the case, I suggest that we should not only have the proposal for an additional minister but we should have the details as to what the authority and responsibility of that minister will be, to be incorporated in the measure before us, thus leaving no doubt as to what his responsibilities are going to be if he is appointed.

The fact that this subject is now before us in this way and that the Prime Minister has supported his presentation of the measure by arguments that it has worked well in the past should not divert from the mind of any hon. member in the house the fact that there is a situation with which we should be dealing and that this is the time to deal with that situation. The Prime Minister has said that we should have co-ordination of all activities related to national defence under a single minister. We should. Whatever is placed before us should make it possible for us to be able to assure ourselves that there is going to be effective co-ordination. That co-ordination has not existed, not only as between the department and the government but within the department itself. No single incident could better demonstrate the need for some effective change at this time in the whole operation of the Department of National Defence than the information which we have been given by the minister himself that not a single one of the 1,200 recommendations made by the auditors dealing with the methods of supervising the affairs of the department had reached the minister. If that is co-ordination, then it is certainly not the kind of co-ordination we want to perpetuate by a measure adopted by this house.

Granted that the minister might not have the time to read every recommendation that is made in detail or to communicate the effect of these recommendations to the department, but, Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with the admission that not one of these extremely important recommendations was read by the minister or communicated by him to the government. If that is the situation which we are going to perpetuate by the measure now before us, then I suggest that members of the house are not accepting their responsibility to the people of Canada and the members of the armed forces at this time. The words that are before us are clear enough. It has been demonstrated beyond question that there has been a breakdown of administration. It is not any single incident of that breakdown with which we are dealing. We are dealing with a breakdown of administration in the Department of National Defence for which the government as a whole is responsible.

Nothing less than new legislation which will deal with that breakdown is adequate to deal with the extremely serious situation before us. The situation will not be solved by appointing another minister to carry on the same unsatisfactory methods. That is exactly what we are being asked to support. The Prime Minister has said that he hopes we will deal with the merits of the proposal before us and not with procedure. The merits of the proposal before us rest on the adequacy of that proposal and not merely on the appointment of a minister. The merits of what is before us will be determined by the extent to which the measure before us does or does not deal with the breakdown which has been so abundantly demonstrated.

It is also clear from what has been placed before us that many of the difficulties which have been disclosed have been the result of a failure to define the responsibility of different officials within the department. We are asked to appoint a minister without defining his responsibilities. We are simply told that he will have the general responsibility of carrying on the system that already exists. What I should say is that he is to be appointed to carry on the complete lack of system that has been demonstrated. That is what we are really being asked to do. The Prime Minister has said that if there were an associate minister of national defence for air it would lead to a competitive interest on the part of that minister which would create confusion. If that argument is to be accepted, then how is it to be rationalized with the statement of the Prime Minister that he does not recall any case where that competitive spirit caused any difficulty when there was a minister of defence for air, a minister of defence for the navy, and in addition an associate minister with powers similar to those of the minister that the government now seeks to appoint?

The two statements do not go hand in hand. The fact is that, whatever details might be open to debate in regard to the general administration of the defence activities of this country during the war, it will be generally agreed that the Prime Minister was correct in saying that each of these ministers was able to deal with the particular responsibility he had, without any difficulty in defining what the measure of those responsibilities really was. That being so, we simply say: Accept the statement of the Prime Minister—that is the last statement—that there was no difficulty even under all the pressure of war in defining the limits of responsibility. Accept that statement and then appoint an associate minister of defence for air and define his responsibilities under the measure that this house will be called upon to adopt.

Now, we have been told that so complete was the breakdown of supervision that it will never be possible to tell what the losses were. I know that some attempt has been made to tell the members of this house in dollars and cents what the losses were. But we have the statement of one of the outstanding chartered accountants in Canada to the effect that so confused and so ineffective was the system that it will never be possible to tell what was actually lost. What more can be placed before the members of this house to demonstrate the need of some new system than that statement by a man whose word should be accepted by all members of this house in that respect?

I am not arguing that any human being who is called upon to perform a service such as that which was performed in the consideration of certain limited aspects of the administration of the Department of National Defence should be regarded as infallible. Nevertheless, I would point out that whatever argument may be made about the interpretation to be placed on certain words, there has been a finding by an outstanding chartered accountant that the methods of accounting were so utterly ineffective as to make it impossible to say what the losses actually were. That man is a man who is called upon to report on the affairs of great corporations. Thousands of shareholders rely upon his statements. Those who are administrating estates relay on his statements. His statements are accepted as the basis of extremely important transactions in connection with the securities of those corporations. Is it to be, then, that his statements would be accepted with such finality in regard to methods of accounting in the ordinary case and be completely disregarded in a report of this kind, made to the government which appointed him and which stated that he was the best man in Canada for the job? I hope not.

I hope that, even with the willingness there has been to permit some doubt to creep in about the complete accuracy of his statements, at least there will be no attempt to create any impression that his statements in regard to methods of accounting and matters of that kind are challengeable at this time.

We have only seen through one window; and we were only allowed to look into one room. The room was so hopelessly untidy that we should know that the rest of the house must be just as untidy. Our job is to make sure there is a cleaning up of that house. Our job is to make sure that something will be done so that we can see in the other windows. If we cannot have more housecleaning by trained housecleaners then at least let us make sure some system is adopted which will assure housecleaning in the most important section of the whole operation; and the most important section of that operation is the operation of the air services.

We are not just dealing with air services because they are air services. We are not just dealing with the suggestion that there should be an associate minister of defence for air because that challenges the imagination. We are dealing with it because it has been agreed on both sides of this house that Canada's primary contribution to the defence of our land, and to the common defence of freedom, is in the building up of our air forces. That is also before us in the extent to which allocation of funds is being directed to that department.

In the estimates tabled this week we find that for the year ending March 31, 1954, $332 million is to be spent for the navy, $533 million for the army, and $936 million for air defences. The latter figure is more than half of the total amount to be spent for all our defences. I would point out that this, of course, does not include the supplementary estimates which will add substantially to the figures.

The figures before us show that air defence calls for 52·5 per cent of our total expenditure for defence. The figure for army is 29·1 per cent, and for the navy it is 18·4 per cent.

Therefore, air defences are of primary importance both from the point of view of their recognized importance as part of our combined defence activities and also from the point of view of the amount of money to be spent on them. That is the reason why we strongly urge the government to consider, even at this stage, its declared decision not to appoint a minister with definite authority to deal with air defence but rather simply to appoint a minister with general and undefined authority under the Minister of National Defence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing that we should bear in mind at the time we deal with this subject on this occasion it is that we are not just dealing with an ordinary legislative measure. We are dealing with the defence of our country. We are dealing with the enlistment, training, equipment, supply and direction of those young men and women in uniform who take the highest responsibility for the defence of Canada. Anything that has come to our attention which should be dealt with in regard to this subject should be dealt with on this occasion. We should not disregard these important matters when we are asked to amend the National Defence Act.

Instead of anything positive now before us we simply have a repetition of statements such as have been made on earlier occasions. As we deal with this subject at this time we must remember that instead of some positive declaration that radical changes are going to take place we simply have the assurance that we are going to continue the same methods we have used in the past. I cannot help but recall statements made in the House of Commons of Great Britain on May 25, 1938. They show how similar these problems are from time to time. They show how necessary it is for the mere civilian, elected as a member of parliament in this house, to deal with the problems of national defence and not leave them to the officers in charge, no matter how competent they may be. I would recall these statements by the present Prime Minister in Britain in the debate on the possibility of strengthening Britain's air defences at that time. He said then that in the House of Commons over there they had been reassured time and time again that everything was being done that should be done for the defence of Britain in the face of the German threat. He said that any suggestion of this kind is met with this sort of reply, and I quote:

> That is being considered. We have given our attention to this. We are fully alive to that. The other matter is engaging our interested attention. We are exploring that.

I simply read those words to remind the members of this house that if there is one subject which, over and over again, has called for the attention of civilians in parliament it is the reorganization of the Department of National Defence and the abandonment of the old methods which have been carried over from the war before, whatever that war might be.

Every hon. member in this house will recall the statement that war is too serious a business to be left to staff officers. Now, that statement is not a reflection on staff officers. It is simply a statement of something that everyone knows who has had any dealing with this subject. The most efficient officers in war naturally regard the methods under which they were able to work satisfactorily as very useful and desirable methods. Naturally, those officers are inclined to perpetuate those methods and carry forward the same system. The more efficient they have been, the more certain they are that these methods are quite satisfactory.

There is not one occasion when reform in the system of administering our Department of National Defence, either in this country or in Great Britain, has come from staff officers. On every occasion it has come from consideration of the problem by parliament, with the advice of those who examined the matter from an objective and independent point of view. We even had the situation after the Napoleonic wars when Wellington himself was prime minister of Great Britain, yet he was not able to bring about those reforms which would give Britain an efficient army. Years later, when the Crimean war came, Britain still did not have an efficient army. It was not as a result of the recommendations of any staff officers following that war that reforms were brought about. In fact, they were not brought about, and many of the unsatisfactory conditions continued until a royal commission was appointed to inquire into the whole administration of the Ministry of Defence in Great Britain.

The Prime Minister, the members of the government, and most members in this house will recall the famous Esher commission which was the basis of a reorganization of the British army, and became the basis of our own reorganization of our defence forces in this country. The same thing happened after the great war. The reorganization which was obviously necessary was not brought about as a result of recommendations from members of the general staff. It was civilian organizations which pressed for reforms and were able to bring them into force. The reason for this has nothing to do with any intractability of mind on the part of the professional soldier. The professional soldier is answerable to the government. The professional soldier must take his direction from the government; he must carry out policies established by the government. It is not for him to tell the government what it will do; it is for the government to say what the staff officers will do and what the armed forces under those staff officers will do. That has been the policy of the supervision of our defence forces ever since we have had defence forces. The time has now come, therefore, when we should be considering this problem as civilian members of this parliament, and in the light of information which has come to us.

If there is one thing to which we should not agree, it is allowing habits of the past to stand in the way of reorganization which will be sound and effective in the light of the experience we have had in this house. In addition to the evidence of the breakdown in administration of the department, we also have before us the statement of the Auditor General that in spite of recommendations that something be done there are still eight different methods of accounting in that department. Those are the kind of things that should be tackled at this time. They are the kind of things we should be assured will be dealt with by any steps we now take. Instead of indicating to us how these problems are going to be solved, how this great expenditure of money is going to be managed in a way that will assure a higher measure of efficiency, we are asked to support a measure that simply says we will have another minister who will have the same duties as the minister already appointed.

Mr. Ferguson: There will be two of them, so it will be twice as bad.

Mr. St. Laurent: How wise.

Mr. Drew: What the government is asking us to do is to pass a bill which permits the appointment of an associate minister and then say, in effect, to the members of parliament: You trust us to use our judgment as to how this can best be done. I submit that this government should be prepared to accept the fact that the evidence before us demonstrates that it has not justified that responsibility. What is before us demonstrates the need for a measure containing the power not only to appoint a minister but to define in the most exact terms what his responsibility will be. We suggest that the responsibility should be defined, in any event, whether it is to be an associate minister of national defence for air or simply to provide the authority to appoint an associate minister.

There is, moreover, the fact that the Prime Minister has emphasized to us that it is not desirable that undefined powers should be granted. I do not profess to quote his exact words, but I am sure that this was the effect of what he said. I would hope that there would be as few occasions as possible when the executive would dispense with the authority of parliament in any matter of major importance. There are some of us who do regard the definition of the authority of this new minister as a matter of importance. That being so, I urge the Prime Minister to follow the very line that he has put before us, and to agree that it is not wise to dispense with the authority of parliament in a matter of such importance. We say there should be another minister. We say also that there should be another minister with definite powers. We say there should be an associate minister of defence for air. If the government is not prepared to go that far, the minister they appoint should have clear and definite responsibilities. Parliament has a responsibility for what is done on this occasion. I hope every member of parliament will keep in mind the facts that have been placed before us, the facts that are contained in the Currie report, and the facts that are contained in the report of the Auditor General, and the knowledge that we have obtained from the minister himself that the present system is such that he did not even see any of the large number of reports that came forward recommending a better system of accounting in the particular part of the army that was under consideration at that time.

It is difficult to follow the Prime Minister's argument that it would create a lack of co-ordination if there were appointed an associate minister of defence for air when he told us that no problem arose in that connection previously. I would certainly be among the first to argue that we should not follow any other legislative body in the course they adopt simply because of the size or the importance of that body. Nevertheless I think we may well bear in mind the fact that the head of the government of the United States today is not only a man of demonstrated administrative ability but is one of the outstanding soldiers of our generation.

In his speech to congress just over two hours ago that man emphasized the importance of the allocation of responsibilities to associate officials for air, navy and other defence activities. This man who not only led the combined forces of the western world in Europe in the days of victory but also did so much to co-ordinate the defence forces of western Europe within the past few years believes it is wise to place the administration of air defence under an official who will be fully responsible for that matter to the minister of national defence. I submit that in this case it constitutes a strong argument.

However, we do not need to go to Washington for an argument. I think most of us will agree that Winston Churchill has demonstrated a fairly satisfactory knowledge of the administration of defence forces. He did so during the war. I should think that experience is useful today. He believes it is wise to have a separate minister responsible for air defence; and that man, with experience which contributed so greatly to the freedom that we possess today, has continued the administration of air defence under a separate minister of defence for air. Whether under our own system as in the United Kingdom or under the different system of the United States, at least it can be said that the two major powers in the western community of nations have decided that it is most efficient to have a minister of defence for air.

With this evidence before us; with the evidence of the need for a clear definition of responsibility; and with the clear evidence of the need to relieve the present minister of a substantial measure of responsibility if the confusion in and ineffectiveness of that department are to be overcome, I submit that we should be dealing with an act which will appoint not only a minister but one with defined authority.

On second reading I do not believe it would be necessary for us to attempt to define that authority; it will be possible for us to do so when this measure goes into committee. However, on second reading it is possible to ask for a reconsideration of this measure and, in the light of what has been said, in the light of the statements of the Prime Minister himself, who has told us that no difficulty arose, even under the pressure of war, in defining the limits of responsibility of associate ministers and separate ministers appointed in this way, to ask the government to reconsider and bring before us a bill that will provide for the appointment of a minister of defence for air with clearly defined authority approved by this parliament.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes):

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introducing of legislation to amend the National Defence Act which will provide for one or more associate ministers with duties defined by statute.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, there are two or three things on which I think both the government and the members of the opposition are agreed. I would say that the first is that there is need for a reorganization of the Department of National Defence. It is quite evident that the government agree in view of the fact that they bring in this amendment. They agree that there has been lack of proper supervision—not altogether because of the Minister of National Defence but because of the multiple duties which have been placed on him during the last few years—and that some assistance is necessary.

In the second place, there is need for more detailed examination by the civil authorities of the expenditures which take place in the Department of National Defence. That fact is perfectly evident from the Currie report and from letters which almost every member of parliament gets from day to day with regard to the detailed operations of the Department of National Defence. The point on which we seem to disagree is how this assistance shall be given to the department and how we can get a more efficient administration of the department to supervise these tremendous expenditures which the Department of National Defence is making today.

I think that the Prime Minister probably gave the best arguments that could be given to the house for a minister or an associate minister with defined responsibilities. He stated that during the war we had two associate ministers of national defence and that they found no difficulty in administering their departments through a minister in that department. The reason they found so few difficulties was simply that they had clearly-defined responsibilities. The minister for air had the responsibility for air, the minister for the navy had responsibility for the navy, and so on. They had clearly defined responsibilities and they were therefore able to carry on in an efficient and effective way.

In any large business today, those in authority must have clearly-defined responsibility if the business is to be a success. How we can expect to operate the Department of National Defence—which is the largest spending department of the government—with an associate minister without any clearly-defined responsibilities is beyond my comprehension. It does not make common business sense.

In any large business where you are spending hundreds of millions of dollars someone must be responsible for that spending. Here we have an associate minister being appointed without any defined responsibility. To me that does not make sense, and I do not think it will make sense to many people across the country.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that if he appointed an associate minister for air, this inevitably would mean that we would have to appoint an associate deputy minister for air. Well, why not?

Just what will be the position of the deputy minister of national defence when he has two bosses. He has a difficult enough time now with one boss. He has not been able to report to that boss all the things that are happening in the department. I do not see how it will help to appoint another associate minister to whom the deputy would have to report, unless he is given some assistance as well. The deputy minister of national defence has terrific responsibilities, almost equalling those of the minister. By appointing an associate minister, and failing to appoint a deputy under him, I just cannot see how it will solve the difficulty with which we are faced.

I agree that any minister of the crown should have clearly defined responsibilities. I know of no occasion in the Canadian parliament when we have appointed ministers and have not clearly defined their responsibilities. When during the war we appointed associate ministers of national defence they were made responsible for particular departments. The minister for air was responsible for air; the minister for the navy was responsible for the navy, and the then minister of national defence was responsible for the army. Naturally the senior associate minister became responsible for the whole department, in the absence of the minister when he had to go abroad or to be absent from parliament on other business.

That seems a natural division. It is a workable division of responsibility. But if we have an associate minister with no defined responsibility, and no deputy minister under him, it seems to me we are just going to add to the confusion we already have in the Department of National Defence, as evidenced by the Currie report and the report of the Auditor General.

Surely the government is anxious to see that that situation is cleared up. I think the most effective way of doing it would be to appoint an associate minister for air, with defined responsibility, and a deputy minister under him who could carry out the supervision of the tremendous air expenditures we are making today. Not only are we making these expenditures on behalf of the Canadian people, but we are bringing to Canada young airmen from other NATO countries, training them here, and supplying them with some of the equipment they will have to use when they go back to their own countries, and operate in connection with the common defence problem with which the world is faced today. Surely that problem is important enough that we in Canada should have an associate minister for air, with defined responsibility, and a deputy minister under him who could carry out his orders, and thus have the proper supervision we should have in the department.

I am not going to labour the matter; but I do think if the government were wise, if it were anxious to have the best possible administration, this can be done only when we have an associate minister with clearly defined responsibilities. No business organization in Canada could operate successfully under two bosses, one of whom had no clearly defined responsibilities.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word about this bill. I listened to what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had to say this afternoon, and it seemed to me he found it pretty difficult to justify the proposal he put forward. I wondered at the time if the provisions in the bill were what had been recommended to him by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). That may account for the difficulty he had in justifying his position. It seemed to me at one stage particularly that the Prime Minister was arguing against himself.

If we pass this bill and proceed to appoint an associate minister of national defence, with no definite powers and responsibilities, then in case something arises again as has already arisen in the army works services, we would never be able to pin anyone down. We would have put these ministers in a position where they could blame each other. And if that occurs, then what chance have we to pin them down and place responsibility where it should be placed?

If we proceeded to do what has already been suggested, that is appoint an associate minister for air and define his powers carefully in the legislation, then we would have something specific and could hold someone responsible if things went wrong.

I have not been able to understand the amendment very well. The one that was handed to me makes reference to estimates for the year ending March 31, 1954, and then it proceeds to outline what the army, navy and air force is supposed to get by way of appropriations. I take it for granted this is not what was supposed to be amended. Under the circumstances I have to rely upon my memory. But I think it is reasonable to suggest that the government should withdraw the bill as it is now, and bring back a bill which would provide for the appointment of an associate minister for air. That is what we favour.

Speaking when the resolution was before the house, our spokesman suggested that we should accept the proposal of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) that there be such a minister with defined powers. I join the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in making that suggestion today.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, when this measure was being discussed in the resolution stage I think there was general agreement on all sides of the house that the time had arrived, if indeed it was not actually overdue, when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) should be given some additional help in the execution of his many and great responsibilities.

I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether this procedure, as indicated in the bill, is actually necessary or not. It was stated clearly earlier this afternoon that a state of urgency does actually exist. However, in seconding the amendment offered by the leader of this party I do wish to review the request I made during the debate at the resolution stage that there should be a clearer definition of the duties of the associate minister.

Speaking at the resolution stage the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated that the associate minister would be responsible for the administrative details relative to the three services. He gave, as he did this afternoon, some details as to what those administrative duties would be. They would be rather vague responsibilities connected with the general administration of the three services.

I suggest that the duties of the associate minister as we have them at present will be those of a super-parliamentary assistant. He has already been occupying the position of a parliamentary assistant, and to a certain extent will be carrying out those general administrative supervisions. That is not really what is required. Even though you give a man a different title you cannot expect him to give greater assistance than he has been able to give in the past unless you him some additional and clearly defined responsibility.

As an alternative to the vague duties that he is to perform in regard to the administration of the three services, I suggested during the resolution stage that there should be appointed an associate minister for air. I do not mind whether you refer to him as the minister for air or the associate minister for air, because there is no appreciable difference to my way of thinking. The associate minister for air or the minister for air must be associated with the Minister of National Defence, whose responsibility quite obviously would be to co-ordinate the activities of the minister or associate minister for air.

When speaking on January 22 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) offered as a reason why it might be difficult for a separate minister for air or an associate minister for air to carry out his duties apart from those of the Minister of National Defence that it was necessary for arrangements to be made for the establishment of airfields and barracks in France for the R.C.A.F., and that the arrangements so made would have a bearing on the discussions going on in Germany and Belgium in connection with our army units now stationed in those countries. He then went on to say that those arrangements would have to be negotiated by one minister.

Of course they would have to be negotiated by one minister. The Prime Minister also pointed out on January 22 that the Minister of National Defence would have to attend to matters having to do with defence relationships with the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The Minister of National Defence would be performing the very same duties he has had to perform heretofore, but he would have more time to devote to those international defence relationships, be they with the United Kingdom or with NATO. He would co-ordinate the activities of the three defence services. He would have to co-ordinate the negotiations for these airfields and barracks, be they required for the army or the navy.

I cannot see any difficulty about that. That is what he is going to do in any case. After all, these matters have been discussed at length at the various conferences which the Minister of National Defence has been attending recently and they are all summed up in a rather difficult word, "infrastructure". It is the infrastructure of NATO in Europe which takes care of these housekeeping details for the troops of the various nations, including Canada, which are at present serving in Europe for the defence of western ideals. Therefore I see nothing out of the way as far as that suggestion is concerned.

The Minister of National Defence would co-ordinate the activities of the minister or associate minister for air. Since we made those recommendations on January 22 I think the attention of this nation has been directed toward the importance of the air services in a most pronounced way. The services of the chief of the air staff, Air Marshal W. A. Curtis, terminated at the end of last week. In an impressive ceremony in his farewell to the force which he had done so much to build up he called attention to the pre-eminent position of the R.C.A.F. in the general defence structure of this nation. He went so far as to say that the Canadian people and even parliament did not realize the revolution which had been taking place in this country's military structure.

I wonder whether the government has realized the tremendous changes which have been taking place over the past few years in so far as the relationship of the air services to the other forces of this country are concerned. I cannot help recalling that in 1949 I made the statement in this house that for every dollar spent on the army three dollars should be spent on the air force. I was told that I had gone too far, that the suggestion I had made was quite impracticable.

I based my recommendation at that time on the fact that in 1947-48 the amount spent on the air force was $55 million out of a total defence expenditure of $195 million, and that in 1948-49, $90 million was being allocated to the air force out of a total of $268 million. I appealed to the minister to face with immediate determination the problem which was before him and if necessary to act ruthlessly in the reorganization of the forces, only to be met, as I have said already, with the statement that my suggestion was impracticable. I was told that if my suggestion were brought into effect a sum of $600 million would have to be allocated for the air force alone.

Today we have gone far beyond that amount. Today the sum of approximately $1 billion is being allocated to the air force. If the amount I suggested, $600 million, had been allocated at that time it would have meant, according to the minister, an expenditure of $3 on the air force for every $1 spent on the army. Well, we have exceeded that. I wonder whether we have really realized the extent of the evolution that has been taking place. The retiring air marshal uses these words, as found in a report of his speech in the Montreal Gazette:

> The fact we have sent large expeditionary forces overseas in two wars to fight on the ground has left its mark on Canadian thinking. It has tended to obscure the fact that both our human and industrial resources, or small but skilled population and our complex industry, fit us for concentration on air power. It has also obscured the fact that we are already tending in that direction to a marked degree. Other countries have the manpower for massed ground warfare. We haven't. But we do have the technical skills, the high level of education and the industrial establishment to support a relatively large air force because its manpower demands are much less and are of the type we can meet admirably.

He went on to say:

> This by no means indicates a lessening of our contribution to joint defence.

Then he gives as an example the fact that in the near future we will have some 7,000 airmen in Europe and that that will be approximately the same number as there are in the army units in Europe. Then he made this very pertinent statement:

> The airmen will have at their command roughly ten times the striking power of the soldiers.

I think that is an indication of the important role which the Royal Canadian Air Force is now playing not only in the defence of Canada but in the carrying out of the obligations that Canada has assumed in other parts of the world. If more than half of this year's total defence estimates are to be spent on air services, surely it indicates that the spending of that large amount of money on that most important service requires a minister who can concentrate upon the development and construction of the new types of aircraft which the retiring air marshal indicated have already been started in this country, even though they have not yet got beyond the planning stage.

As he pointed out, we must have a new type of fighter ready and available by 1960 at which time he indicated that the CF-100, which is not yet fully in service, would be obsolete. Therefore I feel that with all these important developments that are taking place in this field we must be quite certain that we are developing our air services and air equipment along the right lines. There is the vast field of guided missiles, be they ground to air or air to air, which must be explored and developed.

I believe the air services constitute a tremendous field which will require the full attention of a cabinet minister who will devote practically all his time to looking after the interests of that service. I do not care whether that minister is called a minister or an associate minister. That is immaterial; but let us avoid this duplication, the continuance of this confusion that has existed in the past few years and which will continue if we merely appoint an associate minister who will carry on general duties of administration in such an ill-defined manner as has been described today.

It has been suggested that a minister is required to recommend the allocation of funds and of manpower among the three services, and that if there were three separate ministers there would be competition between them for whatever funds were available. We have seen that competition in past years. Certainly we saw it in pre-war days when there were three chiefs of staff, each of them competing for such funds as were available. But I am not suggesting that. No suggestion has ever been made that there should be three separate ministers all of equal rank. We have emphasized the importance—and I repeat it—of there being a co-ordinating authority, a minister who is responsible for co-ordinating the activities of the three services, for co-ordinating the purchases of airfields in Europe or the allocation of funds among the various services in Canada. That would be a general supervisory minister, who would be responsible for the supervision of the services.

I believe that situation exists in the United Kingdom at the present time. It certainly has in the past. There is a minister of defence, but under that minister there can be other ministers definitely responsible for certain particular duties in connection with the services. I am suggesting that there should be someone with definite responsibility for developing our air services which today are pre-eminent and are taking up more than 50 per cent of the funds allocated for defence. It is not fair to suggest that senior staff officers of the various services would be able to make their representations in such a way that they could be properly weighed by the government.

It has already been pointed out that the senior staff officers of the various services are the servants of the government. They must carry out the policy of the government. In the past, as I said earlier, there has been competition between the three services. Today I think there are three chiefs of staff and I presume there is a certain amount of competition between them; but a chairman of the chiefs of staff committee has been appointed and I presume that it is partly his duty to co-ordinate requests which are made by the different chiefs of staff.

So in seconding this motion I do stress the desirability of giving and placing on the statute books clearly defined instructions to this associate minister of national defence whom we all agree is necessary in order to assist the present minister in the fulfilment of his duties.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, there are a few observations I would like to make with regard to the subject which is now before the house for discussion. Over the last few years defence spending has increased to such an extent that the Department of National Defence is spending nearly half of the national budget. There is increasing evidence to indicate that concurrently with this great increase in spending and great increase in responsibility the ministry of defence is becoming so large and unwieldy as to be unmanageable.

I think the problem is generally recognized, and it is also recognized that the responsibilities are too great to rest on the shoulders of only one minister. I think it is obviously unreasonable to have one minister in the government spending almost as much as all other ministers put together. Therefore it seems obvious that something in the way of appointing another minister to share this great load of responsibility is a necessary step, and one that we have to face.

Before plunging off in any particular direction on the problem and how it should be solved or met, it might be well to look briefly at what has been done in other countries; because they too have met these very problems. We find in the United Kingdom that for many years they have had three ministers responsible for the three services. This is also the case in the commonwealth of Australia. There at the present time there is a defence minister responsible for the co-ordination of defence generally, and they also have a minister for the army and another minister responsible for the air force and the navy.

In the United Kingdom, as I have already said, there are three ministers who are responsible for the services. There it has been recognized that by dividing responsibility between various ministers you may lose a certain amount of co-ordination. That is a problem that must be faced, and I think we all recognize that problem. In the United Kingdom an attempt has been made to solve it by appointing a minister of defence who is responsible for the co-ordination of defence generally. This procedure takes from the Prime Minister in a general way the load of responsibility for defence.

I would like to quote briefly from a white paper published by the United Kingdom government in 1946 with regard to the central organization for defence on the occasion when it was considered necessary to appoint a defence minister. It says:

> Outline of new organization proposed
> After reviewing the development of our defence organization over the last forty years and its practical performance under the test of two major wars, His Majesty's government are satisfied that there are no grounds for any drastic recasting of the main structure of the organization as it exists today. Some changes are, however, required in order to consolidate the advances which have been made in recent years under the compulsion of war or of the threat of war. Above all, experience during these years has shown the need of a minister who has both the time and the authority to formulate and apply a unified defence policy for the three services; and it is proposed that this need should be met by the creation of a minister of defence.

That is the position in the United Kingdom. They have a minister of defence responsible for defence and for the co-ordination of the various defence departments; but in addition they have ministers directly responsible to parliament who have clearly defined fields of responsibility, and their fields of responsibility coincide with the various services in the United Kingdom. The paper goes on to say:

> The service ministers will continue to be responsible to parliament for the administration of their services in accordance with the general policy approved by the cabinet and within the resources allotted to them.

That is what I would consider a reasonable solution to the problem and it would seem to me that here in Canada we should go very carefully before we start branching off on some new and unproven idea. I think we should try to retain the principle where each minister has clearly defined responsibilities. In Australia, as I have said, that is accomplished by having a defence minister and separate ministers, one responsible for the army, and one for the air force and navy. Of course, it does not necessarily follow that we should completely follow either one of those systems, but I think we can learn a good deal from them.

If we look at the expenditures of the Department of National Defence we find that more than one-fifth of our total budget is now spent by the air force, and almost one-half of our budget is spent by the Department of National Defence. It would seem, on that basis, to be reasonable to have a minister responsible for the co-ordination of defence generally and also responsible for the army and navy, with another minister responsible for the air force who might be called the associate minister of defence for air, or something of that sort.

The Prime Minister in his remarks pointed out that if such a system were introduced you would have the problem of requiring to create some new positions such as another deputy minister. He pointed out that this would necessitate further expenditures, and that economy is a very important thing. I agree with the Prime Minister and I think his sentiments along that line are most commendable, but I think that at the same time we might easily fall into the danger of being penny wise and pound foolish. After all, why should one deputy minister be considered capable of supervising and carefully vetting expenditures representing half our national budget when it takes perhaps twenty other deputy ministers to look after the remainder.

I think this is a case where perhaps money could be saved by the appointment of another deputy minister. In any case I think it should be very important to have a clear line drawn between the responsibilities of the minister of defence and those of the associate minister of defence or whatever you may wish to call him. The important thing is that each one should have a watertight compartment of responsibility so far as parliament is concerned.

Although I do not think it is vitally important that the responsibility should be divided in precisely that way, I think there is a good argument for it. In addition to our air force spending about one-fifth of our national budget, the Department of National Defence, if its existence is justified at all, exists to deal with any war or threat of war which may come our way in the future. If there is a real threat of war or if there is another war, the defence of this country will be, for the most part, air defence. Any other activities in which we might engage with our armed forces will be more or less military mutual aid. So far as the defence of this continent is concerned it will be primarily a case of air defence. So far as the actual defence of Canada is concerned, that responsibility will rest to a great degree upon the air force. I believe that is another reason why the appointment of an associate minister responsible for the air defence of our country, as well as other activities of the Department of National Defence, is reasonable.

I believe that at this time the government proposes we should create the position of associate minister of defence without defining precisely what his responsibilities are going to be. In other words, we are going to have one Department of National Defence and two ministers. We will have one body with two heads. Before we create a monstrosity of that sort we should give the matter careful consideration. After all, you are going to have one servant and two masters, a department of defence and two ministers. I believe it is generally recognized that it is impossible to serve two masters. You are going to create a sort of two-headed hydra. I think we should be very careful before we put such a monster on the payroll.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): It seems to be the general opinion that the proposal before the house this afternoon is long overdue. All hon. members who have taken part in the debate thus far agree with the general principle that some further administrative assistance is necessary in the Department of National Defence.

There is no need for me to labour what has already been said during the discussion this afternoon, and the other discussions that have taken place here in recent weeks. In rising to take part in this debate I should like to emphasize a point that has been raised by the amendment put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), to the effect that the solution of the difficulty is not in establishing a vague assistanceship but rather that the duties of the assistant minister be clearly defined under the heading of associate minister for air.

We realize that the responsibility of the Department of National Defence has been accentuated by the Korean crisis, and the position is extremely difficult mainly because we are in a twilight war period which makes it hard indeed to stir up the response of the public to the demands and responsibilities that are created by such a situation. We acknowledge and recognize that the problem of administering matters pertaining to the army and the navy are extremely difficult. However, I feel it is obvious that Canada has a peculiar natural situation so far as air force matters are concerned, and that the present situation confronting the western powers necessitates that Canada carry forward with the greatest possible speed and efficiency the program of air defence upon which she has embarked. During world war II it became firmly established in the minds of military authorities that air power was absolutely indispensable to the successful conclusion of any military campaign. In fact some authorities, I recall, went out on the limb a considerable distance by recommending that the only way to achieve victory in modern warfare was through air power. We had such presentations appearing under such titles as "Victory through air power". Whether or not that be true, I am not going to discuss this afternoon.

We do know that, because of the geographic position in which Canada finds herself, because of the nature of the country, it is essential that she make a major effort toward solving the very difficult problems confronting her at the present time in regard to the build-up of air power. It has been pointed out that today almost $1 billion is being expended in air force expansion, and that represents almost one-half our total expenditure for defence. In that factor alone we have emphasized the necessity for giving special attention to the appointment of some individual who would be particularly responsible for the administration of the expenditure of this huge sum of money.

In addition to the peculiar situation of Canada, as is recognized in the amount of money that is being granted for air force matters, we have the record that was established by the R.C.A.F. during world war II. This record speaks for itself, but I believe that the success that was achieved by our air force was second to none, commencing almost from scratch in 1939. That achievement was largely due to the fact that there was one minister who had the burden of carrying through the very extensive and difficult program of expansion.

There is another matter related to the problem of air defence. Actually I suppose it comes under the heading of defence production. In connection with the tremendous build-up that is facing our Canadian air force, there has been some discussion in the house concerning the lack of success in the industrial part of the program. For example, there have been discussions concerning the progress made in the production of Canada's CF-100, the much heralded all-weather fighter which is now, according to reports, in the production stage. I feel that some of the discussion has arisen from lack of information, or it might be from undue optimism expressed in the reports we have had in the chamber. Some of this discussion has been unfortunate, because if we had actually realized the problems connected with the development of an original aircraft type from the drawing board stage to actual production, some of the criticism would not have been brought forward in the house. The same thing applies, of course, to the Orenda engine.

I was thumbing through the pages of the magazine Aircraft for March, 1952, and the writer makes much the same point as I have just made. In reference to the CF-100 he says that admittedly the production of the CF-100 is behind schedule at A. V. Roe (Canada) Limited . . . there is much to indicate that in the eagerness to promise that the R.C.A.F. would build up strength in a remarkably short time, the government was prone to an overly-optimistic view of how soon the CF-100 could be made available.

Optimistic prognostications of that kind have led to unnecessary criticism. With a responsible minister in charge of air force matters—and the need is becoming increasingly obvious—who was able to find the time to keep closely in touch with the production aspects of the building up of our air force, statements of that kind could be avoided; because overly-optimistic statements tend to arise from a lack of detailed information on the inevitable problems that must be faced when we are in the process of establishing our own aircraft industry. As another example—and others could be mentioned—we have the experience with the jet liner on which some $6 million was expended in the production of an original prototype of Canadian manufacture. Then suddenly the project was dropped in the interests of more pressing demands for aircraft of military type. If there had been proper co-ordination and planning, and if there had been one minister responsible for the handling of the complex matters pertaining to the air force, no doubt this expenditure could have been avoided.

It is most interesting to note that recently Canada has placed an order for two of the British Comets as soon as they become available. Whether this action is the result of careful forethought as to what use these Comet air liners might be put to in the air force, or whether again it is a case of jumping off into the dark and hoping they might be useful, still remains to be seen. We have not heard any discussion on that point.

So far as the air force is concerned, the crux of the matter is that we are in what you might call almost a revolutionary period in air power development. During world war II Canada established an enviable record. As I have indicated, she developed a tremendously effective and powerful air force in a relatively short space of time. But looking back now on the experience of world war II and the types of aircraft then used, we find that even the best types have today become completely obsolescent. We find ourselves in a major period of change, a transitional period, that is demanding not only the development of new aircraft types but also new techniques in the handling of the new aircraft, and an entirely new approach to the problem of air offensive and air defence.

With the tremendous multiple tasks involved in proceeding successfully without a repetition of some of the costly errors into which we have fallen, it seems to me it is essential that as we move to tighten up defence department administration we should give special attention to the air force department by the appointment of an associate minister who will have complete responsibility for the successful carrying out of the transitional period developments.

I could have mentioned another example of misunderstanding caused by lack of information. For a long time in this house we were pursuing the question of the use of ·5 calibre armament that was almost obsolescent in world war II. Of course the difficulty there was that it was merely stopgap armament, and that we were moving forward into guided missiles and other armament developments which are still on the highly secret list. This being so I repeat that there is an urgent necessity that some specialized attention be given to air force matters if we, as a Canadian air force, are going to maintain the record that we established in world war II and if we are going to play the role that is demanded of this country as we participate in NATO defence and in the defence of western Christian civilization generally.

There is one more point I should like to raise while I have the opportunity to do so. In addition to the need to have highly competent guidance in this transitional period, I think there are many indications that point to the necessity for a more judicious and economical use of manpower. As we have been endeavouring to build up the air force potential again—I think we had declined in total numerical strength to something like 14,000 in 1947, and since that time we have come back to almost 50,000—the emphasis in recruiting has been to establish a core of qualified personnel to carry on the necessary training operations. As I have endeavoured to get information on this matter of recruiting, it has seemed to me that it has been a difficult and painful process to get candidates of the right kind to link up with our air force. We have resorted to the use of "retreads" as they are popularly known, or men with world war II experience retrained and brought back into the service in order to meet the immediate demands of the extended activity. Not only in the active force but in connection with the reserves we find a good deal of uncertainty in this regard. It seems no one has sat down and considered how reserve skills and experience could be used most expeditiously and efficiently.

I happen to be associated with an air force association. This is a voluntary group of air force veterans banded together to assist the air force in every way possible in maintaining its high standards and also in meeting the challenge of the present emergency period. The association to which I belong in the city of Brandon happens to be recognized as the banner association because of the excellent work it has done in the last year. However, constantly we feel frustrated because we have a feeling that we are not tying directly into the demands of the present emergency situation. The numerical strength of the wing is high, but there is no concrete program, other than that of assisting in recruiting. They had thought they might assist as an air observation corps, but there is going to be no need for that particular activity in our area.

Along with a failure to make expeditious and efficient use of reserve skills and experience, we find that some of our air force associations are not up to date in meeting the demands of air force expansion. It seems to me that with a minister responsible for air, more detailed attention could be given to the peculiar problems of recruiting in this country. Where we have a voluntary system, specialized attention must be given to putting the idea across to potential candidates so they will know that the air force requires their services. Instead of inducing volunteers to enter our services by promising them personal security with pensions and the like, we should put it across to them as a direct challenge to assist in the preservation of our way of life.

Actually if the emergency situation is as severe as we think it is, and if the comments we hear respecting the discussions that took place at NATO in the early part of January are true—and it will be recalled that our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) took part in those discussions—then we are facing a real emergency that demands the promptest attention we can possibly give to the problem of establishing our own air force. For example, I believe it was the Ottawa Journal of Monday, January 26, which stated that a responsible officer of high rank in the United States army said that a surprise all-out Russian air attack would knock out western Europe's first line of air defence in one swoop.

If that is so, rather than thinking in terms of a minimum of defence we should be thinking in terms of a maximum. This is particularly true in Canada, which is in the direct line of attack between the potential enemy and the target to the south of us that would have highest priority. This means that almost all of us are in the front line and that in every way possible, by means of information to the press and so on, we should try to impress upon those who are in the reserves and who have had experience in the air force that they are needed to assist in establishing what will become the front line of defence, our air power.

To sum up these remarks, I am glad to see that steps are going to be taken to solve a problem that has become increasingly difficult. In fact, ever since I came to the House of Commons the Department of National Defence has been under attack and criticism for some cause or another. In most cases the criticism has arisen from a genuine feeling that all was not for the best in this particular department. I do not think, however, that the appointment of a glorified parliamentary assistant, as the present proposal seems to suggest, is a solution. I feel there is a special need in Canada to give specific and particular attention to the problems faced by our air force as we move through this difficult transition period.

As for the argument that unification is the prime essential in matters of defence, I cannot agree because in my view this is a day of specialization, diversification and division of labour. In almost every industrial activity we find this diversification and specialization carried out to an extreme degree. Certainly if we can operate successfully with a division of labour to bring about greater efficiency in private business, we can operate just as successfully in government departments, and particularly in the field of national defence. We have the administrative skills; we have the business knowledge required to maintain the channels of communication that would be necessary if there were an appointment of a special minister for air.

As for the argument that additional expense would be involved, let me say that I think there is a very simple answer when one asks the rhetorical question: What could be more expensive than the present set-up in the Department of National Defence? This department has revealed a high degree of inefficiency mainly, I feel, because of the attempt of too few people to cover too much ground. Particularly is this true in the field of air power.

Then finally there is the appeal that the proposed scheme put forward by the government be given a fair trial. I do not think it merits consideration, because certainly during the last three years, through a process of trial and error, we have been attempting to meet the challenge facing us; and that process of trial and error has not worked out too satisfactorily. I would say that today is the time for action, particularly in matters pertaining to this very important part of our defence system, the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to add a few words to the remarks made by those who have spoken before me during the debate on the bill now before the house providing for a most important amendment to the National Defence Act.

Not being a soldier, I must confess immediately my complete ignorance of the whole technical aspect of the various military divisions of national defence, such as the air force, the army and the navy. However, I fully support the remarks that have been made this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) who asked for a clearer definition of the responsibilities, powers, duties, privileges and prerogatives of the associate minister of national defence, whose appointment is provided for in the bill now before the house.

Mr. Speaker, although fully realizing that the new associate minister will be indirectly responsible to the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), I am wondering if we must presume that the new associate minister will also be responsible to this house, that is to the hon. members who sit here as the representatives of the Canadian people; I am wondering also if the new associate minister of national defence would be just as responsible to this house as the present Minister of National Defence—if not more so—because, after all, Mr. Speaker, in my estimation, one of the most important duties of any minister of the crown is to account for his actions to this house.

I am also wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether we will witness, after the appointment of this associate minister of national defence, a repetition of the infringement on the prerogatives and privileges of the members of this house such as we witnessed last week on the part of the Minister of National Defence in this house.

I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of any minister, of the associate minister for national defence whose appointment we are being asked to approve, to communicate to this house every detail, every bit of information that we, as representatives of the people, are entitled to expect from our ministers. Now last week some questions were put to the Minister of National Defence regarding certain radar installations. I had myself put certain questions on the order paper concerning the cost of one of these establishments at St. Margarets, New Brunswick. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of National Defence refused to give this information on the ground that it would have endangered national security.

Are we to expect then that the associate minister of national defence, whose appointment we are now being asked to approve, will subject us to the same kind of treatment we received last week from the Minister of National Defence himself? The very day after he had flatly refused to give any information about the cost of certain radar installations, that is on January 30, the minister, addressing the chamber of commerce in North Bay, is reported by the Globe and Mail for January 31 to have said:

(Text):

> Mr. Claxton gave the most detailed description to date of Canada's system of northern defences which he said were operated in closest co-operation with the U.S.
> All aircraft flying in the north were identified by the radar screens and if they had not registered route plans they were investigated. The system had three phases: Identification by radar, communication of information by wire or microwave; and bases for fighter aircraft, of which the new R.C.A.F. base here was one of the most important.

(Translation):

Are we to expect, Mr. Speaker, that the associate minister of national defence, once appointed by the house, will refuse to give us information on the installation cost of our radar stations and establishments in Canada, when the present Minister of National Defence, the day after having categorically refused to answer our inquiries on the subject, went to North Bay and revealed what I am now going to quote—again from the Globe and Mail:

(Text):

> "A total of $10 million would be expended."

(Translation):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not wish to prevent the hon. member from expressing all his opinions on the amendment and the main motion now under study. However, I listened to what he said from the beginning of his remarks. He has asked himself many questions; he raises a lot of theoretical points and I wonder whether he is complying with the rules by raising these points and by answering them himself. At that rate, there would be no end to the number of theoretical points that he could raise.

We are only dealing now with the appointment of an associate minister of national defence. If the hon. member is of the opinion that the powers of such a minister should be more clearly defined, he may say so, as other speakers did. I have allowed him sufficient latitude and I would now ask him to be kind enough to co-operate with me.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, you will understand that I have limited knowledge of military matters as well as of parliamentary procedure. I thank you for the indulgence you have shown thus far. I shall abide by your suggestion. To what I have already said I only wish to add that I am strongly in favour of defining more clearly the powers, duties, privileges and more particularly the prerogatives to be given to the associate minister of national defence, whose appointment we are now asked to approve.

(Text):

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are several points that have been raised in the course of this debate on which I feel I should touch briefly.

(Translation):

As far as the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) is concerned, does he know that the amount of $10 million that I mentioned at North Bay represents the cost of an airport and not that of a radar station?

(Text):

Some reference was made to the fact that the reports of the chief auditor of the department were not shown to me. There must be a misunderstanding of the functions and position of the chief auditor in the minds of hon. members who have made this assertion. I described that at some length in my remarks on January 13, and no doubt it will be gone into by the defence expenditure committee if that is the desire of the committee.

I would point out that the chief auditor of the Department of National Defence makes an internal audit. He is an officer under the deputy minister, responsible to the deputy minister. He makes his reports to the deputy minister on the conditions which he finds within the service establishments. Until 1946 there was no such officer; such internal audit was not made. This is a new development in the Department of National Defence which has been progressively introduced and worked out.

I said in my remarks before that he had made a total of 1,185 reports to the deputy minister since his appointment. Those reports go to the deputy minister and result in action by the deputy minister. If there is anything in the reports requiring my attention the deputy minister brings that to my attention, but in his own words. In a number of cases the deputy minister discussed with me the organization and the fixing of the establishment for the army works services, the shortages of personnel, the necessity for a follow-up by a team within the armed forces, and other matters. These discussions resulted in numerous changes being made in the organization, as I stated to the house when I was dealing with the recommendations of the Currie report, most of which were in whole or in part anticipated and put into effect before we ever saw the report.

Those changes have been in process ever since the chief auditor started making reports. In particular the deputy minister drew my attention repeatedly to that fact that we were short of civilian personnel to carry out the job of doing the accounting in the way we would have liked, and repeatedly I would give him the support he wanted in making requisitions and requests to the civil service commission both to increase the numbers of staff allowed us and to enable us to pay them salaries and wages which would attract the type of men needed to do the job. The records of that are all there and I do not believe that there was any failure in that respect.

Reference was also made to the "breakdown" in the administration of the department. If that reference is based on the Currie report, then there is nothing in the report to justify it because Mr. Currie was, as he says, investigating the army works services, a branch of the Royal Canadian Engineers, which is a branch of the Canadian army. While from one point of view all those things are operations that are carried on within the department, for which the department, the deputy minister and the minister are responsible, it was the army works services that were the subject of investigation and report. When sweeping assertions of that kind are made I would suggest that hon. members making them should ask themselves if they are probable in face of the record of the Royal Canadian Navy, as demonstrated in the Far East and in reports by officers of other countries under which units of the navy have served; the record of the Canadian army, the 25th Canadian brigade in Korea and the 27th in Germany—

Mr. Ferguson: On a point of order, I do not think it is a proper comparison to compare our fighting men with the mess in the minister's department. It is a disgrace to hold them up as a shield.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has risen to a point of order. Perhaps I might take advantage of this interruption to say that I wonder whether it is appropriate, in discussing the amendment and the motion for second reading of the bill, to go so far into the general administration of national defence and the performance of our armed services. I know that some passing references have been made by hon. members speaking in opposition to second reading or in proposing the amendment, but the minister will find that if he enlarges upon the performance of the services, and other questions which to my mind may not be related to the amendment and the motion for second reading, I may have to allow opposition members to deal with these matters as well.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I had about concluded my reference to this matter. I thought I was being just a little more specific than the hon. members who made these sweeping assertions without any support whatsoever. When I was making my remarks the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) intervened with something that was not a point of order and had no relevance at all to the matter under discussion or to what I was saying.

Mr. Ferguson: It was time the intervention was made.

Mr. Claxton: There is one further point I wish to make. Reference has been made with approval to the statements made by the chief of the air staff who has just retired, Air Marshal W. A. Curtis. I think the hon. members who made these references will also have noticed that the chief of the air staff before his retirement, in both his broadcast and in the release which appeared in the press, described the operations of the Royal Canadian Air Force in terms which are a complete answer to the assertions made by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) and others.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, the minister certainly is broadening the debate and he is going to get a broadened debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot interrupt unless he has the consent of the minister who has the floor.

Mr. Fleming: He is speaking on a point of order.

Mr. Claxton: What is the point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not hear the hon. member say he was rising on a point of order. All he did was stand up and interrupt the minister, and that is not according to the rules. The minister may continue.

Mr. Adamson: May I ask the minister whether he said that Air Marshal Curtis' statement was made with the approval of the government? In other words, what he said on retirement was approved by the government?

Mr. Claxton: I never mentioned that at all, but of course what he said in the broadcast—

Mr. Adamson: The minister said "with approval".

Mr. Claxton: —was said in my presence. His remarks were made during a broadcast in which I participated.

Reference was made, Mr. Speaker, to the Esher royal commission in the United Kingdom, which was appointed in 1903. I have its report here, and if hon. members will look at the report of the commission I think they will see that all its recommendations that are pertinent and relevant to the situation in Canada have long since been carried out in this country.

Reference was also made earlier in the debate to the so-called Hoover commission, the commission appointed by President Truman which made a number of reports to congress. The one dealing with the national security organization was made in February, 1949. The relevance of that report to the Canadian scene has already been dealt with by me in a speech on September 5, 1950, which appears at page 297 of Hansard for that year.

We have in Canada a system of administration of the Department of National Defence which has been worked out as the result of our experience in two world wars and in the period between. It was changed very substantially with my own appointment in 1946, and in consequence of those changes, as I shall indicate very briefly indeed, a considerable number of steps were taken by way of unification and reorganization, steps which I think hon. members who have followed the matter will recognize were far more striking and sweeping in the development of methods of unification and co-ordination than in any of the other countries to which reference has been made.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Claxton: When the house took recess I had just made a brief reference to unification and co-ordination. This has particular relevance to the bill under discussion because it is necessary to consider any further development in the organization of the national defence department and the appointment of an associate minister or other ministers against the background of what has been done. It is also necessary to have in mind the general desirability, I think admitted by all members, of securing the greatest possible unification and co-ordination of the activities of the three armed forces—the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian army and the Royal Canadian Air Force—as well as defence research.

In this connection I think hon. members opposite would agree that, all things being equal, it is a good thing to have the utmost possible unification and co-ordination, not for their own sake but because they produce better planning, better programs and greater economy. The hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) speaking on March 14, 1950, as reported in Hansard at page 753 said:

> I believe it is most important that Canada eliminate this duplication of services, and develop more efficiency, so far as it is possible, in our defence forces.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) said on May 16, 1950, as reported at page 2560 of Hansard:

> It is to be hoped that unification will bring about a lessening of the amount of money which might be required for each of the services if they were to continue to operate separately.

The same hon. member on May 8, 1951, said at page 2809 of Hansard:

> A co-ordinated or unified policy, though the various services may at times have to go through a slimming process, is far more likely to produce economical and effective results than is a system under which each of the services is working on its own.

With all those statements I emphatically agree, and I am sure the hon. members who made them would make them again.

In this connection what we tried to do was arrive at a basis of organization for the department under which plans and programs and the action necessary to carry them out would be taken by the department acting as a single department, having regard to the objects and necessities of the three services, but all within the lines of policy approved by the government. To a very considerable degree we have arrived at that objective. We have a unified system for preparing estimates, for establishing conditions of service, of standards of accommodation and the other items that enter into the production of estimates. I could also enumerate, if hon. members were interested and if time permitted, the ways in which unification has actually been carried out, duplication avoided, and co-ordination effected. However, most of those matters have already been put on Hansard and I will not delay the house with regard to them.

When the program of the Department of National Defence comes to be considered each year by the chiefs of staff committee there are present, in addition to the three chiefs of staff, the chairman of the defence research board, the deputy minister of national defence and, when required, representatives of the departments of external affairs, finance, and defence production. Questions are dealt with having regard to the agreed lines of government policy and within those lines it has usually proved possible, certainly in recent years, for the chiefs of staff and their committee, with representation such as I have described, to agree, and I say agree, on an allocation of the total amount to be provided for defence expenditure.

This is done by them and then the defence program as reflected in these estimates is considered in detail by a screening committee within the department where the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, the deputy minister, and representatives of the Department of Finance—treasury—go over the program in detail with each chief of staff in turn together with his officials responsible for making up the estimates. It is then referred to me and the whole program is put forward for approval by the cabinet defence committee and by the cabinet itself.

So I think you will find that to a very considerable extent we have effected that degree of unification and co-ordination which has been our objective, and which has been the objective of other countries. We have, under the system adopted since 1946, a single department, a single deputy minister, a single set of civil servants, a number of unified operations—all those relating to the civil service and a good many relating to the armed forces themselves. We have established identical conditions of service for all three services; for pay, allowances, pensions, food, clothing in so far as it is common to all services, transportation, leave arrangements, married quarters and the like. Also we have a single National Defence Act and a single disciplinary code. As I say, I think without fear of successful challenge, we have gone farther in the degree of unification, co-ordination and elimination of duplication than any country I know of.

All the time this has been going on we have been observing and studying what has gone on in other countries and, where it has been possible to learn from anything that has happened there, we have taken advantage of those developments.

It seems to me that on the principle of the Prime Minister's bill and the suggestions made by various opposition members, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has covered the question in general terms and I do not propose to go over that at all.

However, if the suggestion were adopted of having a separate minister or associate minister for air, then we would be limiting his activities because he would, under that proposal, act for air only. While I recognize the importance of the air branch, as other members do, I should point out that from the point of view of administration and the time occupied, the problems arising in connection with the air force are certainly no greater and probably less—though not in importance or amount of money spent—than the problems arising in connection with the army. You can appreciate this, because I think the air force has about one-fifth the number of units that the army has. It certainly has far less than one-fifth the number of weapons, and certainly less than one-fifth the number of contracts, due to different functions and operations.

If an order is placed for an aircraft like the CF-100 or the F-86E Sabre and its spare parts, then that order, subject to modification of course, is one operation which adds up to several hundred million dollars. It has to be watched carefully; but to add up to several hundred million dollars in terms of army equipment, construction and personnel requires a much greater number of administrative operations. If the proposed additional minister were to be limited to the air, then you would deprive the navy and army of his services unless the Minister of National Defence happened to be away. I believe that to return to the position where we have a Minister of National Defence and an associate minister earmarked for a special department would be a retrograde step. Indeed, the experience of other countries has shown that the best practice is to have either one minister or four.

If you had four ministers you would have, as in the United States, Britain or Australia, four departments. You not only would have a Department of National Defence but also one for the navy, one for the army and one for the air force. You would have to have all the things that go with a government department. There then would be the necessity of reconciling their programs, allocating funds, conditions of service and the like, all of which problems are avoided if you have a single department. I suggest to hon. members that we have armed forces of the size, and a country of the size, which enables one department to handle the matter successfully. The proposal that we have an associate minister of national defence for air, I suggest, does not meet the needs as they exist today.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has put these things before you. I can assure you that I can say for the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney), or any other minister who might be appointed as associate, that there will not be duplication of effort nor confusion but there will be that kind of co-operation which is necessary to make for teamwork. I believe that the Prime Minister's proposal should be carried through.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My old friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), Mr. Speaker, must permit me to speak plainly by saying that as I listened to him I found my amazement growing steadily. We have heard from the minister what we have heard several times before, a pleasant discourse indicating to us that all is well in the Department of National Defence. As I listened to him I began to rub my eyes and to ask whether there had or had not been a Currie report. Everything the minister said in the last part of his remarks following the dinner recess seemed to me to imply that criticism had never invaded or come near the Department of National Defence.

I had not intended to add more than one or two comments on the Prime Minister's bill with regard to the division of duties, but frankly I have been so surprised—so alarmed; I think that is the right word—to find that the minister, apparently notwithstanding what is in the Currie report, is able to stand up in this house and talk as if nothing had happened, that I must say something. I will be as brief as I can.

Having regard to what the minister said about the audit, I think I must ask the house to listen while I read the words in the Currie report, although they have been read before. I cannot make my argument unless I read what was said in this report with regard to the audit. At page 712 of Hansard for December 15, 1952, I find the following:

> The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. This process is then again repeated.

Now, in the face of that the minister, at the end of his remarks about auditing, says that there was "no failure in that respect". I am quick to add that the minister based that partly on the fact that he had apparently tried to get more adequate personnel for auditing from the civil service commission. Having done that, he appears to think that his duty was done, and therefore he says there was no failure in that respect, notwithstanding these devastating words. If we should get into a real war, it would not be much protection against an enemy to say that the civil service commission did not give us the proper people to keep the books and therefore we are not ready.

Then I come to the recommendations in the Currie report. Some ten days ago or more the minister said in this house, I thought with some pride, that a lot of the recommendations of the Currie report had been put into effect. This afternoon he took a great step forward, when he said that most of the recommendations in the Currie report had been, in part at least, anticipated and put into effect before we ever heard of the report. I believe that is a real advance! I do not think the minister mentioned that the other night when the member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) was talking about these things.

There is one point which I believe is particularly worthy of note, because to me it is a most astonishing line of thought. The minister referred to the fact that the Currie report had spoken of a breakdown of administration in the department. This afternoon the minister said there was nothing that justified his comment because Mr. Currie was only investigating the army works services, and therefore to say that there was a breakdown in the department when he was only investigating a part of the army was not warranted. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the only thing we can deduce from that is that the department is only responsible for whatever is good, if we can find anything. If there is anything wrong, the department is not responsible for it because the burden for that is carried by the subdivision of the army concerned.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I find myself distressed by this because it seems to me that it indicates that in spite of everything the minister does not yet feel there is any real reason for correcting anything in the department. All I can say is if that is his real feeling, then it does not seem to me to make much difference whether we appoint one associate minister or a dozen associate ministers. It seems to me that we will not get anywhere if the minister is satisfied that things are all right in the face of what has been said. There is another thing. If it is assumed that everything is all right in so far as what Mr. Currie investigated is concerned, then of course we have no right to ask that all the rest be investigated. Therefore the whole thing comes to an end if that suggestion is once accepted.

The minister said a good deal about co-ordination and unification. I want to recall to the minister's mind that I think he perhaps did not take us fully into his confidence some time ago when we raised the question of organization, I think it was on May 24, 1951. It was in answer to a question in which I asked the minister what steps he was taking to organize this tremendous job and the minister said that day, as reported at page 3362 of Hansard:

> It is set up—
> That is the department.
> —in accordance with the practice which has obtained in the Department of National Defence over the years. There has not been much change. We have to do a job, and we do it.

That was on May 24, 1951. The minister gave us a good deal of interesting information tonight about changes which had been going on since 1946. I do not propose to follow him into the arguments about co-ordination and unification. I think those are long, mouth-filling words and that they express desirable things; in principle, I imagine we are all in favour of them. The only thing I can say is that if what we have now is co-ordination and unification in the department, then we should try to have something else or should try a different type of co-ordination and unification.

There is one further point I wish to make with regard to that matter, Mr. Speaker. I want to bring back to the attention of the house the words Mr. Currie used indicating the need for the broadest kind of reorganization in the department, not confined to the army works department or confined to anything. These are his words as they appear at page 717 of Hansard:

> What is needed now is the creation—
> Note the word "creation", Mr. Speaker.
> —of a system designed to fit the economic and efficient administration of a large and long-sustained preparedness program inside a national economy . . .

Mr. Speaker, if that indicates anything it indicates the need for building a new structure, the need for a complete overhaul. All I can say is that if those words have gone over the minister's head, or have gone over the minister like water over a duck's back, the situation disturbs me more than I can say.

I now want to say a word or two in particular about the proposal of the Prime Minister. My trouble about it is that just as we often hear it said that we are in a kind of twilight war, so I think this a kind of twilight measure. We recognize—and the Prime Minister was at pains to point it out the other night—that the Minister of National Defence has been carrying a tremendous burden. I repeat what I said the other night, namely that I think the government is greatly to blame for having allowed that situation to continue. Readiness to work hard is not a substitute for organization. If we have had unification, all I can say is that it has landed us in a mess. Incidentally, I should like to point out to the Prime Minister the language used in 1940, when the ministries were set up to carry on the war—of course I admit that the present situation is substantially different—and the clear-cut words that were used to define the duties of the minister. I will read what was said in the statute about the minister of national defence for air:

> The minister of national defence for air shall be entitled to exercise all the powers of the Minister of National Defence in respect of any matter relating exclusively to the air service.

There, I submit, is a clear-cut definition of the powers and responsibilities; and it goes on to say that when a matter affects more than one service, then there is to be consultation with the minister. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that shows the kind of situation we want.

I want to revert for a moment to another matter. There is one other thing the minister said today to which I take great exception and which I wish to mention. That was the attempt that I was amazed to see him make to drag in the navy and the 25th brigade—incidentally as if they were creations of the government instead of belonging to the people of Canada. Really, as far as I could follow him, his suggestion was that in our criticisms we were criticizing the fighting men. I would say to him that is an utterly unfair suggestion, and I am amazed at him for making it, and I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. Claxton: I never made any such suggestion and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No; I do not know it.

Mr. St. Laurent: The minister is telling you now.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister says that, then I withdraw that part of my statement. I could only take that meaning from it.

Mr. Claxton: May I make the words plain? Will the hon. member permit me to do so? What I had endeavoured to suggest, until I was interrupted, was that if we had achieved—and I am talking about the people of Canada—such success with the armed forces in their operational activities, it was not precisely the kind of evidence of a general breakdown of administration of the Department of National Defence that justifies the kind of sweeping statements that are made in attacking the department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister is now talking about the Currie report. I am quite content to let Mr. Currie stand behind his own report.

Mr. Claxton: It has nothing to do with the Currie report. It has to do with the statements of the opposition.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I continue. The reasons given for all these months of delay I found to be disappointing indeed. The Prime Minister said—and bear in mind that this was two and a half years ago—as reported at page 1240 of Hansard:

> Even with the coming of war in Korea and the rapid planned build-up of forces for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, it was not for some time that the pattern of our defence effort came to be worked out.

That is the end of the quotation from the Prime Minister. All I can say is that I do not think the pattern has been worked out yet. In the second place, as reported on the same page of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> While the load of work borne by the Minister of National Defence was very great it was not clear, until the greatly enlarged program got under way, how best to divide the responsibilities of the defence department.

I would point out that now, when things are not so pressing, when we can look at things more calmly, it took two and a half years to do this whereas when the war was on they managed to get around to it and passed the legislation in 1940. In other words they did it in considerably less than a year. I found that part of the argument extremely unconvincing. Finally the Prime Minister, as reported at page 1241 of Hansard, said:

> Having now settled the main lines of our defence effort and having reached the principal decisions on policy, it has been possible to work out a plan for sharing the heavy load of responsibility——and so on. I have pointed out to you, Mr. Speaker, the clear-cut responsibilities that were laid on the ministers and the clear-cut statement of duties contained in the legislation of 1940. Now I want to read what the Prime Minister said as to the division we shall now have. I am reading from page 1240 of Hansard:

> The main line of division—

That is between the minister and the associate minister.

> —will be that the minister will usually attend to matters having to do with defence relationships with the United Nations, with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with countries of the commonwealth and with the United States. He will also usually take the initiative with respect to matters of policy within Canada relating to defence generally or to two or more of the three services.

Then he goes on to say:

> The associate minister, in addition to carrying on the work of the minister when the minister is away, will keep more closely in touch with matters of administration relating to the services.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that they are just going to be like Siamese twins, that there is no clear-cut division, that the whole thing is woolly and that the upshot will be that the Minister of National Defence will not really be relieved of any responsibility at all. It is all resting on his shoulders, and we will have the present situation or perhaps even worse. So I am disappointed—disappointed more than I can say—that the representations made at this time from this side of the house have carried no weight. I can only hope that when the amendment is put tonight there will be some members on the government side who will feel differently.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, when he was speaking just before the dinner recess, and making reference to the treatment of the chief auditor's reports by his department, as reported by Mr. Currie, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said:

> I said in my remarks before that he had made a total of 1,185 reports to the deputy minister since his appointment. Those reports go to the deputy minister and result in action by the deputy minister. If there is anything in the reports requiring my attention the deputy minister brings that to my attention, but in his own words.

Now I am going to repeat the paragraph just read by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), because I believe it is the crux of the situation with which Mr. Currie dealt. I repeat his words:

> The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from Appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

I believe it is obvious from this that if the deputy minister had required the quartermaster general to report back to him on the various occasions when he directed the quartermaster general to investigate the conditions reported to him by the chief auditor, there would have been no need for any investigation by Mr. Currie, because the conditions which made that investigation necessary would have been wiped out several years ago.

The minister has said he is responsible for all actions within his department. Therefore of course he is responsible for this gross negligence on the part of his deputy minister in not requiring the quartermaster general, time and again, to report back on his findings.

Those in charge of this department obviously do not understand the principles upon which business, especially big business, are operated. I refer particularly to the delegation of authority which requires those to whom authority is delegated to report back on those matters concerning which they are told to investigate. In any business of which I am aware, any subordinate who had been given a job to investigate and report back, and who did not report back, would be fired; and any executive who required that subordinate to report back, and did not see that he reported back, would also be fired. Any president and board of directors that tried to justify such negligence to its shareholders would certainly be fired at the next annual meeting.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know it is difficult to relate the discussion of the Currie report to the bill without going into the details of the report. I have not objected to reference being made to the Currie report, but such reference must be in direct relation to the bill, which has for its purpose the amending of the National Defence Act by the appointment of an associate minister of national defence. I would ask hon. members to endeavour to relate any reference to the Currie report to the bill now before the house.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall close my remarks by asking the minister this question. Does the minister consider that the deputy minister took adequate and satisfactory action in requiring the quartermaster general to investigate and report back, and then never, on any occasion whatsoever, checking the quartermaster general because he did not report back?

National Defence Act

Mr. Claxton: I would be happy to answer the question if the facts stated in the question were true. Unfortunately, however, they are not. They are not accurate. I think this had better be left to the committee on defence expenditure.

Mr. Hees: What part of the question is not true? My question was founded on Mr. Currie's report to this parliament. I am asking the minister what part of my question is not true.

Mr. Claxton: I could be very clear about it, that part in which you said that the deputy minister never, on any occasion whatsoever, checked the quartermaster general because he did not report back. As I have said to the house—and if the committee on defence expenditure wishes to see the facts, which I think are interesting, they may see them—every one of the 154 irregularities listed in appendix "B" of the Currie report is dealt with there, indicating what kind of irregularities they were, what report was made by the chief auditor, what action was taken and how the follow-up occurred. That will all be on the record.

Mr. Hees: Then may I ask another question. Does the minister then say that Mr. Currie made an erroneous report?

Mr. Speaker: Order; I am afraid we are getting too far afield. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) should, I suggest, try to relate his remarks to the bill.

Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Associate minister.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, clause 1 is the clause which deals with the amendment of the act envisaged by introducing section 6A, and carries forward the proposal already placed before the house in the statement of the Prime Minister this afternoon. I propose to direct my remarks entirely to the statement made by the Prime Minister because this is a bill presented by him, and I wish to make it quite clear that, in so far as any comments are made about the necessity of amendment, they are directed to him and to the government and not to any particular minister of that government. The government must assume full responsibility for the course that is being followed, and the acceptance of that principle has been indicated by the fact that the bill does stand in the name of the Prime Minister.

Before dealing with the wording of the sections before us I wish to deal very briefly with the suggestion that was made in this house that criticism directed to the administration of the Department of National Defence should be interpreted as criticism of the armed forces. I doubt if there could be any more improper suggestion made by any member of this government than that most improper statement. Having regard to the fact that some measure of courtesy has been extended to the minister by those whose service justifies respect, and particularly by the hon. member for Nanaimo whose service justifies the respect of every member of this house and of every Canadian, I would have thought we would not have found the government remaining silent at a time such an improper suggestion was made, no matter what member of the government made it. There is only one thing that would interfere with the morale of the army, navy or air force.

Mr. Claxton: By the way, the suggestion was never made, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Oh yes, it was.

Mr. Drew: It has been made over and over again. There is only one thing that will impair the morale of the army, navy and air force, and that is if they come to the conclusion that the government are not going to act upon the recommendations made by the man they chose to conduct an inquiry.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: The one thing—

The Chairman: Order. I think it is my duty to remind the Leader of the Opposition that according to standing order No. 58, paragraph (2):

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

It is a pretty wide clause, I understand, but I do not think it is so wide that the Leader of the Opposition can make a speech of the type which could be made on second reading of the bill which has just been carried.

Mr. Adamson: On a point of order. This afternoon when the Leader of the Opposition was not in the house you, in your office as Speaker of this house, had to request the Minister of National Defence to cease and desist from discussing the armed forces in the way he was discussing them. I mention that now, as a point of order, to show that his remark at the present time is entirely in error.

The Chairman: Order. Following what the hon. member for York West has said, I might say that if the Leader of the Opposition wished to correct a remark which had been made in the course of the speech of the Minister of National Defence he could properly have done so when the Speaker was in the chair on the motion for second reading of the bill. A moment ago, before the question was put, I noticed that the Leader of the Opposition was in his seat, and that was the time to make the correction.

That phase of the debate is now over and we are in committee of the whole house. I cannot entertain any correction or any clarification of position or any amendment of what has been said by the Minister of National Defence in reply to remarks made on second reading of the bill by the Leader of the Opposition, while we are in committee of the whole. All I can deal with now is what is being said on this clause and I am governed, as the hon. member understands, by standing order No. 58, paragraph (2), which says speeches must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. I am sorry, but that is the rule I must apply.

Mr. Adamson: My point of order was to correct a statement on second reading, while you were in the chair, which the Leader of the Opposition has not yet been apprised of.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In that connection, Mr. Chairman, while the rule is in effect has it not always been the habit to allow a general discussion in committee on the first section? I suggest that while the rule applies strictly once the sections are taken up individually, on the first section it has been the invariable custom to allow the widest possible discussion.

The Chairman: Hon. members will realize that the general discussion cannot extend beyond the two clauses which are in this amending bill. It cannot be a repetition of the general discussion which took place on the principle of the bill on second reading.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it would appear that there has been some misapprehension about the point to which I was directing my remarks. I propose to move an amendment, and my remarks are directed to the reason why an amendment should be made.

I am suggesting that the amendment that is to be proposed is one that is in keeping with the responsibilities of this house to the members of the armed forces. I would hope that in dealing with that there will be no recurrence of any suggestion that, when we make this proposal that there be a more efficient manner of administering the Department of National Defence, and that the government assume that measure of responsibility indicated by the facts placed before us, this is in any way a reflection on the members of the armed forces.

The members of the armed forces are those who deserve immediate action to improve the situation which now exists. That situation is one which calls for some change in the general procedure and improvement in the handling of national defence. These remarks are not directed to a minister now holding a portfolio. They are directed to the Prime Minister as head of the government in relation to the suggestion that there be a new minister and, presumably, a new minister for the purpose of changing a very unsatisfactory condition which does now exist. Any suggestion that the situation is satisfactory now is simply a denial of all the facts which have been placed before us, and a denial of the known facts in the possession of every member of this house.

We have had assurance after assurance that everything was being done that should be done and then, when an opportunity is presented to obtain the facts, we get the clear and unchallengeable evidence that a great deal does remain to be done. The suggestion was made that the bill go back for reconsideration. That has been disposed of. Now we are in committee, and this is the point at which an amendment may be moved calling for the appointment of an associate minister of national defence for air. In view of the fact that the government has not seen fit to reconsider the measure it will not be possible to define by amendment in a satisfactory way the duties that should be exercised. Nevertheless, if an amendment were accepted which simply called for the appointment of an associate minister of national defence for air, that term in itself would be sufficiently descriptive to indicate the nature of the duties which could be defined for that minister under the section now before us.

The proposal has been made that we should, in this case, follow the practice which has been adopted in other countries of the commonwealth as well as in the United States. Every one of us recognizes that the procedure is different in the United States. Every one of us recognizes that they do not carry on government under the parliamentary system. Nevertheless, from the point of view of administration, it is significant that they have chosen to deal with this extremely important part of the responsibility of government in the very way we are suggesting it should be dealt with here. The difference between their system and our parliamentary system does not in itself render inapplicable the reasons they have adopted that course. Since it is so generally agreed that we depend very largely on the efficiency of their effort for the combined strength of the western nations, I think most of us will hope that their system is efficient. Most of us do believe that the present President of the United States has had that measure of military experience which would give him a very unusual appreciation of the type of administrative organization that would be most effective under circumstances of this kind.

The proposal that there be an associate minister of national defence for air does not create any difficulties from the point of view of administration. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made this clear. He has indicated that no problems arose when an associate minister was appointed before. He has made it clear that at a time when, in addition to an associate minister, there were ministers of defence for air and naval services, no problems arose as to overlapping jurisdiction or competitive efforts to advance the cause of one service or the other.

One of the reasons it does seem particularly appropriate that we should have an associate minister of defence for air is that this country, more than any other country in the world, has demonstrated its special qualifications in the air. This country, more than any other country in the world, has demonstrated the aptitude of our young men for this still comparatively new branch of the service. Moreover our geographical position makes it essential that we develop our air service in a way that will make it easy for us to contribute that form of defence which could be most effective.

Since this matter was discussed this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, I have heard certain comments made over the radio that emphasized that a minister for air services would mean added national defence costs. Actually what might well happen, and what we believe would happen, is that there could be substantially reduced national defence costs and substantially reduced taxes as a result of that, with still greater effectiveness and hitting power if we rationalized our whole defence organization with appreciation of the fact that Canada occupies a peculiarly favoured position from the point of view of developing air defence. By the employment of air transport, by the employment of long-range aircraft of every type, we could develop a mobile force with armoured forces which could be moved rapidly to any point either in our own country or outside, with the highest economy that could be established. In this modern world, with the material resources and human skills we possess, we should be concentrating every effort to give every man in a unit the greatest hitting power that our industrial skill makes possible.

The way to do that is to develop fast, mobile forces which can be moved by air to any part of the world. This proposal has already been made on a number of occasions from this side of the house. The appointment of an associate minister of defence for air would not only make it possible to emphasize the development of our air service, but also to co-ordinate the development of our air services with the development of other forces. It would increase the hitting power per man, and in that way achieve great economy of force and great economy of manpower.

The time for a re-examination of our defence organization is long overdue. One of the ways to achieve it is to appoint a minister particularly responsible for the administration of that part of our defence organization which will be called upon to spend more than half of every tax dollar raised for the purposes of national defence. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes):

That section 1 be amended by adding the words "of air" after the word "defence" in the sixth line thereof, and that section 2 be amended by adding the words "of air" after the word "defence" in the sixth line thereof.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before you deal with that amendment, I would point out that its effect would be to have section 6A read as follows:

The Governor General may at any time by commission under the Great Seal appoint an associate minister of national defence of air who shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be assigned to him by the governor in council or the minister, and shall be paid a salary of $10,000 per annum; during the period that a person holds office as associate minister of national defence—

I should have the words "for air" in there.

—under this section, the number of associate ministers of national defence who may be appointed under section 6 shall be reduced by one.

The same would apply to section 2. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not attempting to deal with the details of the duties of the minister as proposed, because as I pointed out today that would practically mean the rewriting of the section. Nevertheless, if the minister is described as the minister of national defence for air, then it will be natural for the government to define his functions in relation to that title. I feel sure that, with the title adopted, the functions would naturally follow in relation to the activities of the minister in the way that has already been suggested.

I urge consideration of this proposal. I know it has been said, but I repeat, that in the face of what has come before this house it seems difficult for anyone to seriously argue that there is no need for some effective step to be taken to change the present method of handling the general organization of our defence forces. If that is so, this is a positive proposal consistent with the experience of other nations of the commonwealth and the United States with which we are associated in a common effort. If it is convenient for our Minister of National Defence to discuss problems of national defence with the other minister of national defence, it would be equally convenient for a minister of national defence for air from Canada to discuss air problems with the ministers of national defence for air of the other countries with which we are associated. That in itself would seem to be one advantage of a system of this kind. We all know of the primary importance being placed upon the development of air power by every one of the nations with which we are associated at this time.

Without attempting to go back over the various arguments that have been dealt with at other stages of the consideration of this bill, I once again urge favourable consideration of the proposal put forward in this amendment.

The Chairman: I notice that the amendment I have before me contains the words "of air". Does the leader of the opposition wish to have "for air" instead of "of air"?

Mr. Drew: Yes; "for air". I regret that, Mr. Chairman; it should have been "for air"; and also it should be that in lines six and eleven.

The Chairman: Also in lines fourteen and seventeen.

Mr. Drew: That is right.

The Chairman: Therefore the motion is:

Mr. Drew moves, seconded by Mr. Pearkes, that clause 1 be amended by adding the words "for air" after the word "defence" in the sixth line thereof and in the eleventh line thereof.

That would take care of clause 1. Perhaps it might be preferable to wait until we consider the second clause before we put the amendment on that clause, which would be:

That section 2 be amended by adding the words "for air" after the word "defence" in the sixth line, and in the eleventh line thereof.

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to part II, there it will follow as a matter of course. Part II is only a reproduction of part I for the purpose of making the revised statutes conform with whatever may be adopted at this session. Therefore, as a matter of substance, we really have to deal only with part I.

The hon. gentleman proposes that the words "for air" be added in part I after "associate minister of national defence". The effect of that, if it has any effect at all, would be to restrict the authority that would be indicated by parliament as being granted to this minister of national defence. There is something which I find strange about this amendment. I will not say it is illogical. I suppose that the purpose, object and function of the opposition is always to find that even when we are doing the right things, we are doing them in the wrong way. I am not disputing my hon. friend's right to be quite sincere about it. His suggestion was that it was quite wrong to come to parliament, that we had in the National Defence Act the right to do the very thing that we were asking parliament to join us in doing. Had we done it—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Prime Minister who made the suggestion that it was improper to come to parliament?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman himself; the Leader of the Opposition. Every hon. member who spoke against the resolution when we were at the resolution stage suggested that this was quite unnecessary, that we were in the emergency that was provided for in the Emergency Powers Act, and that under the Emergency Powers Act we could have done just exactly what it was proposed to do by this legislation.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that the statement made by the Prime Minister is wholly incorrect. What was recommended was that this matter come before parliament and that we deal in explicit detail with the functions and responsibilities of the minister. That proposition has been argued on every occasion. The point that was raised in regard to the emergency act was that if the government was going to rely on an emergency—

The Chairman: Order. May I point out that now we are in committee hon. members may take part in debate as often as they wish. If the Leader of the Opposition wishes to clarify or correct part of the speech made by the Prime Minister, perhaps it might be advisable for him to wait until the Prime Minister has concluded his remarks.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not going to make any argument about it. The thing is there in writing. It is on the record, and I rely on the record to show whether or not the suggestion was made that it was quite unnecessary to come here with a resolution for the introduction of a bill because the National Defence Act provided in its terms that we could do, during an emergency, what the resolution suggested we wanted to do.

The argument on that matter was as to the character of the emergency. We had some further discussion about that matter this afternoon on the second reading of the bill, and the hon. member for Lake Centre asked what distinction I would make between the kind of emergency described in the National Defence Act and in the War Measures Act and the kind of emergency described in the Emergency Powers Act. I think we both agreed that it was really a matter of degree rather than a matter of substance that distinguished the two. But the suggestion made was: You do not need this at all; you can go ahead and do it under the National Defence Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never made any such suggestion.

Mr. St. Laurent: No; the hon. member for Lake Centre did not make that suggestion. I am just reminding the hon. member for Lake Centre that we had this exchange of views as to what difference there might be between the one emergency and the other.

The defence act provides that in an emergency not only one but three associate ministers can be appointed to do just exactly the same thing that is provided for, and in the same language that is found in section 6. It is exactly the same language in section 6A with respect to the appointment of one associate minister that is found in section 6 for the appointment of——not more than three additional ministers of national defence, each of whom shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be assigned to him by the governor in council or the minister.

Here the language is exactly the same. Instead of saying:

—each of whom shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be assigned to him by the governor in council—

Section 6A provides:

—who shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be assigned to him by the governor in council—

All that is going to be accomplished by this bill is this insertion of section 6A. There is not going to be any amendment of section 4 of the act which comes after section 2, the interpretation clause which determines what is meant by "minister". Section 4 says:

The minister shall have the control and management of the Canadian forces, the defence research board and of all matters relating to national defence including preparation for civil defence against enemy action, and shall be responsible for the construction and maintenance of all defence establishments and works for the defence of Canada.

That is going to stay there. Therefore even if this amendment were accepted and this provision were made for the appointment of an associate minister for air, the overriding powers of the minister under section 4 would still exist and there would still have to be this co-operation, understanding and mutual respect for each other, and mutual help to each other that is going to be required under this bill as it stands. The only effect of the amendment would be to indicate that in the view of parliament the associate minister should not be concerned with anything but that part of the service which is the Royal Canadian Air Force.

We wish the associate minister to have more of the powers of the minister than would be implied in the amendment that is now suggested. We wish him to be the associate minister and to have all the powers, duties and functions of the minister, to be able to exercise them jointly with the minister and to be able to do what was provided in the statutes of 1940, namely that he might replace the minister, act for the minister and exercise all the powers of the minister that were not withheld from him by the governor in council; and none were ever withheld. I do not think it necessary or desirable nor do I think it would make for efficiency to restrict to the Royal Canadian Air Force the powers of the minister that might be exercised by this associate minister. I submit that the associate minister here will have just exactly the same status, position and authority as he would have had, had we found that there was the kind of emergency that made it proper to do it by order in council.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I do not inten to repeat the arguments advanced during th resolution stage and in the debate on secon reading of the bill, upon which occasions w have advocated that the activities of th associate minister be confined, in the main, t dealing with the Royal Canadian Air Forc or the air service.

It seems to me that the restriction of hi authority to certain specific details or, to b precise, to the administration of one servic is a very distinct advantage rather than disadvantage, as was implied by the Prim Minister's remarks. Surely the confusio into which the Department of National De fence has now been thrown, surely all th uncertainty about the administration of tha service, surely the very fact that there no has to be a division of responsibility, is du to the fact that one minister has had suc a wide range of responsibility, and that hi responsibility was not confined to definit limits capable of being handled efficientl by any one person.

Having spread the minister's responsibilit over all branches of the Department c National Defence, it seems to me the govern ment is now committing exactly the sam fault by spreading the responsibility of th associate minister over all the variou branches of the department. Rather tha being a detriment to effective administratio it seems to me the suggestion I make woul be a very definite advantage in the adminis tration of the department, and a step towar efficiency.

There are many other ways in which th Minister of National Defence may receiv assistance in the administration of the othe branches of his department, namely th army and the navy. He may have parlia mentary assistants to help him in that respec But surely if we are going to have efficienc in this department we should take this grea air service away from the general adminis tration or general supervision of the Ministe of National Defence and give it to one defin ite person. The administration of that serv ice would be his responsibility. He woul not be asked to spend his time dealing wit the administration of the navy, the army c any other branches of the department.

A minister for air would confine his atten tion to that branch of the service which no is spending a billion dollars, a branch whic is taking 50 per cent or more of the tota amount to be voted to this departmen Therefore it seems perfectly logical to sug gest that the associate minister should con fine his attention to the air service.

Of course there will be the necessary co operation; of course there must be mutua respect between the Minister of National Defence and an associate minister for air. We cannot see them working in watertight compartments. But what we are trying to do is ensure that one man has a reasonable amount of responsibility, that he has responsibility over a limited field, or a field over which it would be possible for him or for any other man in his position to exercise authority.

As I say, we would expect the same co-operation. We would expect the same mutual respect between the Minister of National Defence and his associate minister for air. I presume there would be the same co-operation and the same mutual respect that must exist among all members of the cabinet. I see no reason why that co-operation and mutual respect should cease just because the responsibilities of an associate minister for air were restricted to the air service.

It is a clean, straightforward division of responsibility. It can be made effective; it can be made efficient. On the other hand, there is still confusion; there is still too wide a distribution of responsibility over too wide a field, and it is beyond the capabilities of a human being to exercise that supervision efficiently over such a wide field. Therefore I support the amendment.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I have only a word to say. If I had not been convinced that a minister for air was desirable, then I most certainly would have been after having read in some detail the remarks of the retiring chief of the air staff, Air Marshal W. A. Curtis, who dealt with the problems of the air arm. He dealt in detail with the problems of the defence of this country from the air. He dealt in detail with the ability, the genius, of the Canadian in the air. He dealt in detail with the logistics of the geographical problems in Canada.

In the house some nights ago I asked these questions, and the Minister of National Defence answered in general terms. But the specific answers were contained in Air Marshal Curtis' speech. Those answers were technical, in some degree. But today, when we are moving at this rate in matters of national defence, it is necessary for all of us to spend some time in the study of these problems.

As the problems grow more complex, it is impossible for any one man dealing with the general problem of land warfare also to deal with the problem of air warfare which, I suggest, constitutes at least half or probably more than half the whole problem of national defence. If any proof is needed that we should have a minister for air, it is contained in the words spoken the other day by the retiring chief of the air staff.

To give one example: Speaking earlier, I mentioned that we would have to reorient our ideas with respect to fighting aircraft, that we would have to produce aircraft that could fly beyond the sound barrier in level flight for sustained periods of time, and that would mean an entirely new development in air thinking. There was a general reply; but Air Marshal Curtis dealt with this matter in detail, because he was capable of giving the answers. There is proof that you have a capable specialist who knows the air as the new theatre of war. We are spending over half our total defence expenditures on air, and this will grow and grow as the years go by. Within a few years it may so predominate our thinking on national defence that we will have a minister for air and the other ministers will be subordinate to him.

I mention these things because I think they are so important that I believe this move should be taken now; therefore I support the amendment.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, as you have pointed out, it is possible to speak again in committee. So that the record may be quite clear I wish to deal with the statement made by the Prime Minister that we had urged a contrary course. The record does speak quite clearly as the Prime Minister has said. For that reason I would refer to what I said on January 22, as reported on page 1242 of Hansard as follows:

> If there is to be an additional minister, then I submit that one of the things which should be before the house is a clear definition of the responsibilities of that minister. If his real duty is to be that of an administrative official with cabinet rank, then I believe that should be before us in some detail when we say that it is expedient to introduce an appropriate amendment for this purpose. If on the other hand it is to deal with a particular service, then I think that should be before us.

Then I went on to deal with the question of the emergency. What I was emphasizing was that if the government was going to rely on emergency powers in one case, it certainly was inconsistent to suggest in another case that it was not going to regard this as an emergency. The Prime Minister pointed out that he did draw a distinction between the nature of the emergency as defined in the National Defence Act and that he did not feel it was proper to proceed under that act.

We were not urging that the government act that way; we were pointing out that if they were going to assert an emergency, then they had the powers already rather than to deal with it in this unsatisfactory manner. That was the emergency I was referring to. Having discussed that, I then went on to say, as recorded later on the same page:

> I submit that if there is no emergency we should follow the normal method, and that a bill should be introduced to deal with the appointment of a new minister in the ordinary way. Otherwise it is open to the government to appoint a new minister by order in council at any time without the matter being submitted to parliament. If there is no emergency, then the ordinary procedure of creating a new ministry and describing its functions by statute should be employed.

Then a little later I said:

> I should think that everything that has taken place in the house ever since we met this session would emphasize the need for the most exact procedure in dealing with all matters connected with the Department of National Defence. I do not think we should further increase the opportunity for informal proceedings and undefined authority.

That is exactly what I have been contending, that we should not increase the opportunity for informal proceedings and undefined authority. I am suggesting now by the amendment put forward that we should specifically name the minister as the minister of national defence for air. While it may not be possible now to draft the details of a satisfactory measure, I feel sure if this were done the government would in the very nature of things define his function in relation to air activities.

It does seem strange that there is absent from the arguments being made by the government in regard to this matter an acceptance of the fact that there is urgent need for radical reforms in the handling of our national defence and that there is urgent need for some steps to be taken to avoid the kind of waste and extravagance and the invitation to theft which have been placed before us.

The government is certainly in position where it should place before us something that will give us assurance of a more effective method of handling our defence problems. No mere addition of a new minister with the same functions the minister already has will meet the situation with which we are faced. We must have a change of system. There is no hint of any change of system now placed before us. Without a change of system the government are going to find themselves in the same confusion, in the same uncertainty, in the same breakdown which has already been described to us.

Surely this is the time the government should rise to the level of events. Surely this is the time the government should act in accordance with the nature of the situation which has been described to us. Surely this is the time the government should be ready to accept a suggestion which would greatly increase the efficiency of our preparations for defence now and in the months ahead.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there is one point about this first section that bothers me and the proposed amendment of the Leader of the Opposition does not settle that point in my mind. I refer to the fact that the wording of the Prime Minister's bill suggests that the powers and functions and responsibilities of the associate minister are to be those to be assigned to him either by the governor in council or by the Minister of National Defence.

The Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I do not know of any other instance where a full-fledged member of the cabinet, with all the powers and responsibilities that go with being such a full-fledged minister, is in the position of having his duties assigned to him by a fellow minister supposedly on the same level. I have checked the act of 1940 when provision was made for an associate minister of national defence and also for a minister for air and a minister for naval services. Certainly there is no wording in that act which corresponds with the wording here, under which the associate minister of national defence shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the Minister of National Defence as may be assigned to him by the governor in council or by the Minister of National Defence.

It is true that in section 6 of this act there is provision for associate ministers to be appointed, three of them in fact, and that their duties could be outlined in one of two ways. Either their duties could be outlined by the governor in council, and that would be the end of it, or they could be outlined by the governor in council or the minister. The Prime Minister knows that as yet no action has been taken under that section so that even though that provision is on the statute books, so far as I know we do not yet have a minister in the cabinet whose position is outlined for him, not by the government as a whole, not by the governor in council, but by another minister.

A great deal has been said about the mutual respect, trust and confidence between the present Minister of National Defence and the Solicitor General, and the fact that they will get along together and so on. But we have to look at this in terms of principle. What would be the situation if other persons were occupying these positions? The question I am asking is this: Will it work for two men to be on the same level, both full-fledged ministers of the government, with all the responsibilities that go with being ministers of the crown, yet one of them to be in fact subservient to the other? I put it that way a strongly as I can, but I should like to have the Prime Minister's comment on that situation.

Mr. St. Laurent: Of course that situation does not affect the amendment that is now before the committee. The amendment before the committee is merely to provide that the associate minister be designated associate minister for air, but that would not change the provisions of the National Defence Act in any way at all. When this act was drawn in that fashion I was concerned, as the hon. gentleman has been concerned, with that form of legislation, and I was told that we had better have it in exactly the same form in which it is already in the National Defence Act. The governor in council will assign to the associate minister equal powers with those of the Minister of National Defence and will have the right at any time to modify that should the situation require. Thus in fact you will have the same situation that existed under the statute of 1940.

Under the statute of 1940 the associate minister was given by parliament unless the governor in council otherwise directed—and he never did otherwise direct—the right to exercise all the powers of the Minister of National Defence including those defined by this act. Had the amendment been to substitute for the language of 6A as it is here the language that was in the statute of 1940 I would have been perfectly prepared to accept it. If that should be the desire of the committee after we have disposed of this amendment, I would be perfectly prepared to accept an amendment in the language of the statute of 1940 instead of as it is in 6A. Section 6A was drafted in this way so that we might not have to make any explanation of why we were not satisfied with the language that we ourselves had recommended to parliament and that parliament had adopted in the defence act of 1950. Therefore when we have disposed of the present amendment, if there are any hon. members who feel that it would be preferable to have this act read as does the act of 1940 I would be quite prepared, as the promoter of this legislation, to accept that kind of amendment.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the Prime Minister's comments. I should like to reply to one point. He said that when section 6A was drafted the government felt it should use the language that was approved by parliament when the National Defence Act was last before us. May I draw to his attention that section 6, subsection 1, of that act contains two alternative ways of dealing with this matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister will find that section in the explanatory notes on the righthand page of the bill now before us. Section 6(1) contains two alternative ways of dealing with this problem, and they are set out as subparagraphs (a) and (b). Subparagraph (a) provided that the powers of any such additional minister would be prescribed by the governor in council. That was as far as subparagraph (a) went. It was subparagraph (b) that imported this idea of these powers being set up either by the governor in council or the minister. In my view section 6(1)(a) is infinitely preferable to section 6(1)(b). It seems to me that it puts ministers on the level they ought to be in the cabinet. I should like to ask this question. If the Prime Minister took for the new section 6A wording that was already in the act, why did he take the wording of 6(1)(b) rather than the preferable wording of 6(1)(a)?

Mr. St. Laurent: Because we were appointing only one, and it seemed to be more convenient to have him described as an associate minister of national defence than to have him described as an additional minister of national defence. As a matter of fact when the speech from the throne was drawn the same careful scrutiny of the language to be used had not been given to the act, and we announced that we would recommend to parliament the appointment of an associate minister.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There was one small point that occurred to me with respect to the wording. It says, "such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be assigned to him by the governor in council or the minister". Is that really intended to be an alternative or is it such duties as may be assigned by the governor in council and the minister? Does it mean "and/or"?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think it is intended to mean that there will be an order in council assigning certain powers and functions, and that there might be additions to that made by the minister.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): "And/or"?

Mr. St. Laurent: And/or. Our law officers do not like the expression "and/or". They seem to feel that "or" means "and/or".

Mr. Ferguson: It seems to me the government is wasting a great deal of the time of the Canadian taxpayer in trying to create Siamese twins which they have great hopes will solve some of their problems. We all know that Siamese twins are greatly handicapped. Thousands of dollars are spent in trying to make even one of them function properly, but here they are trying to make Siamese twins out of two ministers of national defence and the end result will be worse than the results already achieved by one minister. Why do they not make up their minds to answer the public properly, because not only members of the opposition but members of the Liberal party realize in their hearts that they have a duty to the people of Canada and to the people of the world to do their part in defending peace and preparing for war if necessary. We went into one great war short of men and munitions and the people of our country woke up to the realization that their boys and girls were going to war to be slaughtered.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should tell the hon. member that the discussion now should proceed according to the standing order I quoted earlier, and it is further narrowed because of the amendment.

Mr. Ferguson: I will narrow it down to the Siamese twins. Surely the Prime Minister must realize that he is giving nothing to the public of Canada when he offers a dual ministry. If the government's intention is to do what the people want, and if they wish to give the people what they want, surely they should announce to this flabbergasted country what will be the functions of the gentleman who is to be appointed as the new minister of national defence. With the exception of the government, neither members of parliament nor anybody else will know about the duties of the newly appointed minister until some other mess is created and they realize that the welding together of the twins has not been a perfect operation.

The Chairman: Shall I put the question?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Section stands.

FLOODS

DAMAGE IN THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE NETHERLANDS AND BELGIUM—ASSISTANCE TO BE PROVIDED BY CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps hon. members would be interested in the information I have obtained so far about the requirements necessary to aid the victims of the terrible disasters in the United Kingdom, Belgium and The Netherlands. The Canadian Red Cross Society has been in communication with the Red Cross Society of the United Kingdom, with that of Belgium and with that of The Netherlands. It would seem that the situation in the United Kingdom and Belgium is that there is no shortage of any of the supplies required immediately to meet the emergency, but that in The Netherlands there is a shortage of clothing and bedding. Fortunately the Canadian Red Cross Society had 250 cases of such supplies in Geneva which are already on their way to the Dutch Red Cross Society. They also had forty cases of such supplies in Toronto and these are being moved immediately to be delivered to the Dutch Red Cross Society through K.L.M. air lines which had a plane just about ready to leave for The Netherlands. They feel that they will have perhaps forty cases more in the provincial commands of the Canadian Red Cross Society that can be made available almost immediately.

I also understand that the officers of our Canadian 27th brigade have been in touch with the authorities in The Netherlands and are making immediately available such engineering services as they can render which are urgently needed and are inquiring as to what other services might be made immediately available suggesting that they have mechanical transport material that could be used. Of course it would mean some interference with present training but the matter is being examined of making such services available if it will relieve any situation which has arisen there.

It occurred to me that perhaps the most effective and expeditious instrument that we Canadians could use to make our aid avai able and effective would be our ow Canadian Red Cross because of its experienc in handling such situations and its intima connections with the Red Cross societies the United Kingdom, Belgium and Th Netherlands. Perhaps the authorities of th Red Cross Society would like to set up national committee with special membersh to assist them in raising the funds, and feel from the expression of views in th house yesterday that if something of th kind were done it would be agreeable the house to accept a recommendation th the government make a substantial contr bution to the Red Cross for the special pu pose of such aid.

I think I should add that the premier Ontario was in communication with me th morning, and from our conversation I kno he would be glad if that kind of arrang ment could be set up, and that his gover ment would be glad to do its part in wh our people look upon as desirable. I ha no doubt that his good example would al be followed in our other Canadian provinc Fortunately there is no lack of food a no lack of medical supplies anywhere in t stricken areas at the present time, and think that our Red Cross Society, throu its association with the Red Cross societi of the three nations so severely tried in th disaster, will be able to point out ve rapidly what will be the kind of help th is apt to be the most effective for the victi who have suffered from these disasters. thought that members of the house wou be glad to know that no time is being l in giving as concrete an expression of o sympathy as is possible under the circu stances.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of t Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish join in expressing the feeling, which I a sure is shared by every hon. member of t house, that there will be agreement with a approval of the proposal by the governm to contribute to such fund as may required for this purpose. Most certainly t evidence that will be furnished in this w of the sympathy of the people of Cana will be an expression of our own sense sorrow that so many people should be suff ing in these three countries in the way t they are at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

STANDING ORDERS

First report of standing committee on :anding orders.—Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton orth and Victoria).

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO IDENTITY OF "MR. M.P." IN BROADCAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National evenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for ork West asked me yesterday whether the haracter called the member of parliament n the Sunday night broadcast on the city f Ottawa, in which the mayor of Ottawa ook part, was actually a member of this ouse, and if so, was he advised of the dicule he was to be subjected to by other eakers. I am informed by the C.B.C. that ie voice in question was not that of a ember of parliament but what was said was ased on an interview with a member. The ember was informed that other persons in ie course of the program would have the pportunity of expressing views taking issue ith his.

Mr. Adamson: My point in asking the uestion, if I may say so, was that I thought iat the broadcast held members of this ouse up to ridicule. I thought it was most nfair to members of the house and I wished protest against it.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF HERRING SEASON, PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary ssistant to the Minister of Fisheries): esterday the hon. member for Nanaimo ked me if the herring season in the lower st coast area of Vancouver island would extended beyond the closure date of ebruary 5. At that time I told him that n investigation was being carried out and soon as the report was received a cision would be made and announced. his morning the report arrived. From the port it appears that spawning has already mmenced in the southern portion of vanson channel and that the condition of e fish in other parts of the lower east ast area indicates that spawning will soon general. The early spawning is attributed the current unusually mild winter. In ese circumstances it was decided that the tension of the season in this district could t be granted and that the long-standing actice of protecting the fish on the spawn- g areas must be followed. Over the years such action has been of great advantage in maintaining the populations on a stable basis.

The central and northern herring fishing areas are open until the end of February. These areas would serve as a source of supply with which to fill the existing orders. From information on the stocks in previous years it can be assumed that the fish in these other areas will be in better condition and not yet approaching spawning too closely.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have a reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) concerning meetings of the international wheat council which are currently in progress in Washington.

The eighth session of the council convened in London on April 17 of last year to consider the renewal of the present agreement which will expire on July 31 of this year. The meetings adjourned on May 9 with the understanding that discussions would be resumed later. The meetings now taking place in Washington are a resumption of the London talks.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), speaking in the house on May 26 last, advised hon. members of what had transpired in London and outlined, in general terms, the position taken by the Canadian delegation at these meetings. There is nothing further that I can add at this time. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated to the house on May 1 last, answering a question by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), the discussions of the wheat council are being held in camera. Only the opening statement at the plenary session received publicity.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): My question arose out of a statement made by Mr. Sharp, the deputy minister, and I asked whether or not Canada was joining with the United States in asking for an increase in the minimum and maximum prices. I was not asking for details; I was asking whether or not Canada was going to take that attitude.

Mr. Chevrier: My answer is contained in this statement. In effect it is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has already put on the record of this house what the policy of the government was. Furthermore, the statement which appeared in the press and which my hon. friend was good enough to send across to me indicates that the position taken by the Canadian delegate is not at all inconsistent with what the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is pretty hard to get information.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). Can the minister say whether legislation amending the Government Annuities Act, such as the legislation we had in 1951 which was not proceeded with, will be re-introduced at this session?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1952 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) asked me if I could indicate when prairie farmers may expect interim payments on the 1952 crop. I am afraid that I am not able to so indicate. The matter of interim payments is still under active consideration and there can, of course, be no announcement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us know when the next election is taking place.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Is the government withholding stocks of butter from the market for the purpose of bringing about an increase in butter prices?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF ASSOCIATE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house resumed, from Monday, February 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 103, to amend the National Defence Act—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Associate minister.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe that we are not only on clause 1 but there is still before the committee the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. We were also discussing, when we adjourned last night, the question of whether or not the words "or the minister" which appear in lines 11 and 12 of clause 1 should properly be in legislation of this kind. I was trying to make the point that, whether the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition is accepted or not, those words to which I have just referred should be deleted. In other words, if the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition is accepted I would contend that after it has been accepted the words "or the minister" should be deleted. Similarly, if the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition is not accepted by the majority of this house I would take the same position.

I said last night that it seems to me that all full-fledged cabinet ministers should be on the same level and that their duties and responsibilities should either be defined clearly by statute or be established by the governor in council. I cannot see the propriety or fairness to anyone who might take this appointment in saying to one minister of the cabinet that his duties are to be those assigned to him by another minister supposedly on the same level. I submit that it would be possible to offer a subamendment but there seems to me to be no point in complicating it that way. Rather I am just giving notice that after the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition has been dealt with, whichever way the house deals with it, I intend to move a further amendment to the effect that the words "or the minister" be deleted from lines 11 and 12 of clause 1.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be more regular and in better order if before continuing discussion on a possible subsequent amendment we disposed of the amendment that is now before the chair, without prejudice to anyone's rights with respect to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Amendment (Mr. Drew) negatived: Yeas, 47; nays, 89.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman would allow me to do so I would ask the Minister of National Defence to move that the words "or the minister" in lines 11 and 12 of clause 1 be struck out.

Mr. Claxton: I would so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Claxton moves that the words "or the minister" be deleted from lines 11 and 12 of clause 1.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask a question based on this deletion. Will the Prime Minister give us the assurance that the government will, by order in council, clearly define the duties of the associate minister so that parliament itself will have knowledge of what his duties are.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will give the committee the assurance that the governor in council, when the act comes into force, will provide, as was provided in the statute of 1940, that the associate minister be entitled to exercise all the powers of the Minister of National Defence, including those defined by this act, except such as the governor in council otherwise directs—or words to that effect. I am not guaranteeing that the language will be the same. The intention is, however, to make a general order that the associate minister shall be entitled to exercise all the powers of the minister, unless and until otherwise directed by the governor in council.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Before section 1 as amended carries, there are one or two other questions I should like to ask. Perhaps we are on such good terms today that a suggestion I shall make will be accepted by the government.

Mr. St. Laurent: It depends upon the merit of the suggestion and not upon the terms that now exist.

Mr. Knowles: The suggestion which I have to make is one the merit of which the Prime Minister has already endorsed some time ago. The question I have in mind is one which we have raised when we have had other bills before us appointing new ministers to the cabinet, namely, the technical question concerning the authority for paying the tax-free $2,000 car allowance to cabinet ministers. As the Prime Minister and the committee are aware, there is no reference to that item in the section now before us. It provides only for the salary of $10,000 a year. Those who have followed this matter realize that an item in the Appropriation Act of 1931, I believe it was, provided in that year for a car allowance to each cabinet minister in the amount of $2,000.

On previous occasions we have discussed the merits of relying on that item. It still perplexes me, but I know that the authorities have ruled it is proper to rely on that item and to continue paying the $2,000 for this purpose each year. My point is that that was an appropriation act for that particular year which voted a precise sum of money which was spent that year but has since been spent over and over again. It is treated by the financial people, however, as a continuing item. I believe it is fair to say that the Prime Minister agreed with me when I raised the point on an earlier occasion, and said it was one of the things that might well be tidied up. I believe that is the very phrase the Prime Minister used. On subsequent occasions I have asked if this bit of tidying up had been dealt with, and the answer so far has been in the negative.

I would point out that we are about to receive, some time this spring we hope, the new Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. I have not seen them, but it would be my guess that the Appropriation Act of 1931 is not brought forward in the revised statutes of 1952. In general terms the revised statutes of 1952 will be the law of the country from that time forward. In this instance the government will be going back beyond these revised statutes to that old Appropriation Act of 1931 for the purpose of paying this item. It does seem to me that it should be put on a better basis.

I am not arguing now about the question of the amount being paid. I am arguing about the way in which it is being handled. If it is going to be regarded as a statutory item, it seems to me it ought to be put in the Salaries Act or in the acts setting up the various departments and appointing the ministers, rather than relying on that item in the Appropriation Act of 1931. As I say, I have no desire to argue this back and forth. I think it has already been recognized between us that it is being done, and the Auditor General and others do not quarrel with the legality of the manner in which it is done. The Prime Minister has admitted it is a point that should be tidied up. Is it not about time that the tidying up was effected?

Mr. St. Laurent: I said to the hon. gentleman that it would depend upon the merit of the suggestion as to whether or not we could accept it, and not upon the immediate precedent that had been set this afternoon. The government is advised by the law officers of the crown that what is in existence is sufficient to take care of the point. While they so advise, it has not been felt necessary to do any tidying up that might be the occasion of a very untidy debate in the house.

Mr. Knowles: One of my legal advisers here suggests that we move an amendment, but I am afraid any amendment of that kind would be out of order. I suggest, as opposed to the advice from the law officers of the crown upon which the Prime Minister now relies, that the Auditor General has called attention to this matter in the way that he calls attention to matters. He cannot say that things are illegal or poor policy; he just calls attention to them. I believe the very fact that he has called attention to this item as one which has been practised too long is an indication that it might well be tidied up and attention should be paid to that by this government.

In this same vein, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out something else that amazed me. We received this bill only a short time ago. It was given first reading in the house on January 22, and given second reading only yesterday. It still has not passed this house, and it still has not passed the other place. It still has not become law. Yet I find in the estimates that were tabled in this house some time ago, and printed longer ago than that, an item of $12,000 for the salary and motor car allowance of the Associate Minister of National Defence. It appears on page 39 of the estimates. Out in the left-hand column is that capital "S" which indicates it is a statutory item.

I know the Prime Minister does not like it if we make a suggestion that government legislation receives automatically the approval of the majority of this house, but how is it explained that before the statute is passed providing for this salary it appears in the printed book of estimates labelled as a statutory item?

Mr. St. Laurent: Because it is being proposed that it be included in the estimates as a statutory item, and unless it has become so it will have to be struck out. The recommendations have to be made for the maximum amount for which parliament is asked to make appropriations. Parliament can reduce the estimates submitted, but cannot increase them after they have been submitted with the message from the Governor General. If at that time there is no provision that would justify the inclusion of the item as statutory, it will have to be struck out.

Mr. Knowles: The item in question is not included in the estimates that this house is called upon to vote. When we get the Appropriation Act some time before the end of the session or next session, whenever we get it, it will be based on these items and will include only the items that the house is being asked to vote. This item will not be there. It is just furnished here for information. My complaint is that the book of estimates lists the item as though it was an established fact that it is a statutory item before it has become part of the statutes of Canada.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Associate minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to clause 2 Mr. Chairman, I would ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence to move the same amendment as was moved with respect to clause 1. It would be for the deletion of the words "or the minister" in lines 24 and 25.

Mr. Claxton moved:

That the words "or the minister" be deleted from lines 24 and 25 of clause 2.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion to deal further with this section because the wording is precisely the same as that of section 1. In refraining from further comment on this matter, I do so only because the discussion has been directed to wording which is precisely similar. May I say, however, that the adoption of the motion with regard to the earlier section, and which almost makes it essential that this section be similar, in no way disposes of the question that has been before us.

The Prime Minister has spoken about the fact that in attempting to tidy something up we might produce an untidy result. Here in the House of Commons we have had a chance to do something to tidy up an extremely untidy department of government. That opportunity is being missed. We are proceeding in an unsatisfactory way, as a result of the majority vote, to deal with a serious situation. It is now apparent that the government has decided to proceed with that and that further debate on detail will not produce any effective changes. We therefore can only accept the situation from that point of view.

THE ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES ACT

CHANGE IN FORM OF TITLES FOR USE IN CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 102, respecting the royal style and title Motion agreed to, bill read the second time nd the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister nake a statement?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, this is a ill that I consider to be of great importance nd I think that it should receive attentive nd serious consideration by every hon. nember. Section 1 of the bill is to provide hat the assent of this parliament is given o the issue by Her Majesty of a proclamation stablishing for use for Canada the royal tyle and title set out:

> Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God of the nited Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms nd Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, efender of the Faith.

That is the text that was agreed to at ne prime ministers' conference held in ondon last December. There was a general esire to have the royal style and title accord vith the constitutional position of the various nembers of the commonwealth and to have , in so far as might meet the conditions f the various members of the common- vealth, as uniform as possible.

With respect to some members of the ommonwealth there was some difficulty. or instance, with respect to Pakistan it was ound that the form that would be acceptable o the people of the United Kingdom would e apt to create difficulties with the popula- on of Pakistan. It was also found that ich was the case with respect to the popu- ation of the Union of South Africa. With espect to Australia, New Zealand and anada an effort was made to agree upon ne acceptance of a form that would be uni- orm—with the exception of the use of the ame of the country—in each one. That as finally agreed upon and there was agree- ent—I will not say at whose suggestion; think it was almost simultaneously sug- ested by the representatives of the three ountries, Canada, Australia and New Zea- nd—that it would be desirable to retain the style and title as used in our countries omething that would indicate that it was ne sovereign of the United Kingdom who as recognized as the sovereign of our ountries, and that it would be preferable o have that indication appear in the royal yle and title rather than to have it merely ame each one of our respective countries nd to have all the rest of the common- ealth described as the Queen's other realms nd territories.

It seems to me that that is in accord with ne historical development of our constitu- onal relations. Her Majesty is now the ueen of Canada but she is the Queen of Canada because she is the Queen of the United Kingdom and because the people of Canada are happy to recognize as their sovereign the person who is the sovereign of the United Kingdom. It is not a separate office. It is the recognition of the traditional development of our institutions; that our parliament is headed by the sovereign; and that it is the sovereign who is recognized as the sovereign of the United Kingdom who is our sovereign and who is loyally and, I may say, affectionately recognized as the sovereign of our country. We all felt that it was desirable to have that recognition retained in the title as a proclamation of the historical, traditional link between this country and the United Kingdom; and the same feelings were entertained by the other two prime ministers with respect to their countries.

The question then arose whether it would be proper to have in the title we would use the traditional words, "by the grace of God", sovereign. We felt that our people did recognize that the affairs of this world were not determined exclusively by the volition of men and women; that they were determined by men and women as agents for a supreme authority; and that it was by the grace of that supreme authority that we were privileged to have such a person as our sovereign. Then perhaps the rather more delicate question arose about the retention of the words "defender of the faith". In England there is an established church. In our countries there are no established churches but in our countries there are people who have faith in the direction of human affairs by an all-wise Providence; and we felt that it was a good thing that the civil authorities would proclaim that their organization is such that it is a defence of the continued beliefs in a supreme power that orders the affairs of mere men, and that there could be no reasonable objection from anyone who believed in the Supreme Being in having the sovereign, the head of the civil authority, described as a believer in and a defender of the faith in a supreme ruler.

I trust and hope that those views which were shared in this conference will appear as reasonable views to hon. members. The procedure that was discussed was that we would each of us ask our parliaments to acquiesce in the issue of proclamations by Her Majesty herself. It is Her Majesty who will determine, who will announce by proclamation what her royal style and title will be for each one of the several realms of the commonwealth. It is hoped that these proclamations may be issued simultaneously in the various realms of the commonwealth and in the other parts of the commonwealth that recognize Her Majesty not as their Queen but as the head of the commonwealth.

The developments of modern times have been that the sovereign does not exercise the royal prerogative that has come down through the centuries without being sure of the acquiescence of parliament. And it is for the purpose of expressing in advance that our parliament will acquiesce in such a proclamation that this bill is now before the house.

In going over the elements of the royal style and title I made no special reference to the head of the commonwealth. I think it is fortunate that in spite of local situations that appear to make it necessary for the most populous part of the commonwealth no longer to recognize the sovereign of the United Kingdom as the sovereign of its state, but felt that it was necessary for it to adopt a republican form of government with a president as the head of the state, nevertheless it wished to maintain the close relationship with the other members of the commonwealth and remain in the commonwealth.

I think that the real links between the various members of the commonwealth are their common ideals, their memories of association in the past, their intimate conviction that that association in the past has been for the benefit of their people, and their desire to conserve that association in the future for the benefit of their people. I do not think that we are being presumptuous or conceited when we believe, and even when we express the belief, that this commonwealth group not only works for the benefit of its own peoples but is an effective instrument for the good of free mankind throughout the whole world.

I know that my predecessor had an influential part in the decision that was reached that, in spite of the fact that the situation in India required the constitution of a republic for that great country, India would remain a part of the commonwealth. I think that the influence he exercised at that time was in the right direction and that the result was something beneficial to us, beneficial to India and also beneficial to free men throughout the world, and that the conservation and development of that feeling of common ideals, common purposes between the great Republic of India and the other members of the British commonwealth will continue to be of service to free mankind. And it is I think something for which the realistic genius of the British people has reason to be proud, that it can accommodate itself to the requirements of new situations in the lives of men and can conserve the essentials without having to conserve forms that to some appear to hav become so outmoded that they can no longe be accepted. I think it is a magnificent thin that the peoples of India and the people of the Occident can look upon each othe as human beings equal in every respect; an I was not going beyond what the fac requires when I said in Ottawa to Mr. Nehr that we hoped and trusted that in spite o the many more centuries of their socia experience and civilization there would neve be any indication by their own people tha they looked down upon us as their inferiors and that I hoped and trusted that in spit of our rapid development of industrial pro cesses and industrial know-how there woul never be any feeling among the people o India that we thought that because of tha we were human beings in any way superio to the millions who inhabited their country

We all know from our own Canadia experience that unity between us, unit between all the elements of our population is and must be based upon that recognitio by us all that we are all equal to each othe and that all have the same rights to Canadia citizenship, and that Canadian citizenshi gives us equality in every respect with al our fellow citizens, whatever their origin their traditions and their cultures may be It is because our forefathers had the wisdon to recognize that it was not going to be neces sary in this Canadian nation to pour all th elements into the same mould that we nov have a Canadian nation.

We are all proud of being Canadian citi zens because we can be so and can exercis all our rights as such without forgetting ou racial origins, our ancestral traditions, an without there being any effort by any of ou fellow citizens to make us over into any othe kind of Canadian than we happen to b because of our racial origins and with ou ancestral traditions.

That is also something which is now work ing out in this commonwealth of free peoples I think it is a solid foundation upon whic there can develop and rest equal pride of al of us in our allegiance to a common sover eign. There are those of us who recogniz the sovereign of the United Kingdom as ou own sovereign. There is a common loyalt between us and the group of which tha sovereign is the head only as the head of th commonwealth because in their countries th situation that exists does not make it con venient to have a monarchical form of con stitutional set-up.

I believe firmly that what we are doing her today and what others are doing in thei respective parliaments will further that idea of unity of purpose and desire to co-operate that characterizes us at this time and which was so touchingly evident at the meeting of prime ministers which it was my privilege to attend a month and a half ago in the city of London.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, it was a most moving address to which we have just listened. It is evidence of the strength of the parliamentary system that while we may be separated in smaller things, in respect to our system of government and to the unity that is provided by the crown there is no division, there is no diversity of opinion, there is but a common devotion. It is on occasions like this that parliament rises to its greatest heights. As we listened to the Prime Minister without regard to party considerations this parliament became cathedral in devotion to our history, to our heritage and to our common pursuit of freedom.

As I listened to the Prime Minister referring to the diversity of the membership within the commonwealth, and in particular to the rather anomalous position of India, I could not help but remember that events of the last few years have established clearly that while India, becoming a member in the circumstances under which she did, seemed in essence to destroy the power of this commonwealth, it has really meant its strengthening and has given to the commonwealth a representation in Asia that may well stand as a rampart against the advance of communism which would destroy the system in which we believe.

The change in the Queen's title is an event of great importance. Parliament assumes the responsibility of approving or disapproving the title suggested by the prime ministers' meeting in London. The reason for this dates back to the imperial conference of 1930 when the various members of the British commonwealth decided that the assent of the parliaments of all the dominions, as well as of the parliament of the United Kingdom, was required in order to change the name.

The royal style and title has been changed through the ages as the concept of government has changed. Parliament walks with history in the changes that have taken place. The title of the first sovereign of the United Kingdom was King of the English, which was established by King Egbert in the ninth century. There was a further change a thousand years ago by King Athelstan when he adopted the title King of Britain. Henry VIII added Defender of the Faith. There were no changes then for several centuries until in 1800, when the act of union with Ireland made necessary a change in the title of the British sovereign.

It is of interest to recall that for more than three hundred years the sovereign bore the title not only of Defender of the Faith but also of King of France. It was not until 152 years ago that the British sovereigns altered their royal style and title in that regard and removed, from the British coat of arms, the arms of France.

The next change, as I remember my history, was in the 1870's when India became an empire within the British empire. In 1901 the royal title was changed in order to include the British dominions beyond the seas. Then in 1927 a further change took place when Ireland withdrew and an alteration was made in the title to cover that situation.

So the changes have taken place. One of the most moving things about these changes is the fact that the title of every British monarch has never been a boastful one, or one of pomp in words. That is one of the abiding things of the title now established, its freedom from anything in the nature of boastful pride. It is simple, moving and direct.

Freedom owes much to the British monarchy. When one indulges in the "ifs" of history it makes one wonder what might have happened to freedom in the world had Cromwell succeeded in forever abolishing the British monarchy. Had he done so there would never have been the British commonwealth or the commonwealth as it is known now, for it would have been impossible to bind together the various races and religions in all parts of the world but for the centralizing mystic influence of the crown. The commonwealth typifies unity in diversity. Was there ever a more anomalous condition of affairs than this crown with its symbolism, the queen of each of the various parts of the commonwealth, indivisible yet divisible? Yet that very anomaly permits of constitutional flexibility permitting of a living, vital organism in constitutional and parliamentary development.

The Prime Minister spoke of the meaning of our citizenship. One of the major reasons that I wanted to come to parliament was that I wanted to do my part to assure within this country a Canadian feeling that would deny a hyphenated citizenship while at the same time maintaining pride in the racial origin of one's father and one's mother. The first speech I made in parliament was to that effect, urging equality of Canadians regardless of race, and I expressed the hope that those who served in two world wars would have the right to be in days of peace what they were in war, namely to be Canadians without any hyphenate consideration whatsoever. Their pride in war was on their shoulder strap—"Canada".

We are building that type of Canada. Year by year we are building in stronger unity. We in Canada represent something that the world must ultimately attain, a realization that it is not one's surname that makes for citizenship, but service and devotion to the public cause. We are building in unity and we are denying discrimination based on race or creed. What we are doing here has within it the elements of what is necessary to be achieved in the world.

Communism, some say, marches on an empty stomach, but communism also marches because all of us have been guilty too often of the practice of the luxury of mental discrimination against those who belong to other races. As communism marches, one of the greatest bulwarks against it is the fact that we within this commonwealth spread all over the world have practised and are practising in ever widening measure our belief in the sacredness of the human personality and the equality of all without regard to race. Asia is in a desperate situation as she faces the forces of communism; but if the concept of the commonwealth, which has now been proven to be the right one, can be grasped by the minds of the coloured races everywhere, the commonwealth shall indeed have greater days in the future than in all its glorious history.

It is not in the name or title of the sovereign, it is not in title that the strength of our country within the commonwealth consists. It is not in constitutions, not in unification under a central authority that the commonwealth is strong and vital, but it is in that relationship of heart and soul to which the Prime Minister referred as having been characteristic of the last meeting of the prime ministers in London.

I want to see the commonwealth strengthened in heart and soul. In the last few days we have shown what our attitude is not only to the people of Britain but also to the people of Holland and Belgium whence many of our citizens have come. The members of the commonwealth are united in their devotion to freedom. Each realizes that each is indeed each other's keeper, each is filled with pride in our heritage in this year of the coronation and the formal dedication of Her Majesty to the service of her peoples everywhere.

I pass this on to the Prime Minister through you, sir, as an idea that I have embraced, and I ask him whether it would not be in accordance with our history and our traditions and the concepts inherent in the recent developments of commonwealth relations that we should make Her Majesty acquainted with the fact that we as her subjects in Canada would like to see her consort, Prince Philip, the Duke of Edinburgh, created a prince of the commonwealth to bind us together ever closer in heart and soul and to have in him as in her a link with all parts of the commonwealth.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, as the Prime Minister has indicated, this bill, though a very short one, is very important. It not only deals with Her Majesty's royal style and titles, but it is a bill which is symbolic in a number of ways. One of the most interesting points of symbolism in it, as I see it, is the fact that we in parliament have the privilege and are called upon to deal with a measure of this kind. The fact that we are dealing with this bill symbolizes the strength of our nation and of the commonwealth of which we are a part. It also symbolizes the strength of our parliamentary institutions, and the capacity of our form of government for growth and development. The hon. member for Lake Centre has already referred to that. I should like to underline what he said and to add something that I think is appropriate on this occasion by saying how grateful I believe most Canadians are that we have the parliamentary form of government which we inherited from the United Kingdom.

To me the most important and significant aspect of the parliamentary form of government is the fact that we have the executive branch of the government here on the floor of parliament with the rest of us who represent the people of the constituencies of this country. Obviously I have in mind the fact that in some countries there are other forms of government where the executive is apart from the elected representatives of the people. We on the floor of parliament have many a quarrel with the executive, and we shall no doubt continue to have these quarrels. Nevertheless, my point is that it is a matter of great satisfaction to us, and it is a matter of great significance to the people of Canada, that we have the executive here on the floor of parliament, where we can get at the heads of the various departments of government and where they must accept their responsibility to parliament.

So, Mr. Chairman, as I say, this bill is one that has symbolism in that it goes beyond the subject matter that is covered in the actual terms of the clauses now before us. We should on occasions such as this remind ourselves of the privilege that is ours of having inherited the parliamentary system of government; and the privilege that is ours of being part of this great commonwealth of nations, the unity of which is symbolized by Her Majesty, for whom our people have such respect and affection.

I am sure the Prime Minister caught the mood of this House of Commons when he spoke as he did in introducing this measure. That applies to what he said as to our relations with the crown; and I am sure, too, that we are all in complete agreement with the way in which the Prime Minister devoted a good part of his remarks to the question of India and of the special place that realm holds in the commonwealth of nations. It is not only a matter of pride to the rest of us in the commonwealth that India is a member of this family, but I think it is very true to say that the way in which the relationships between the United Kingdom and India were handled—and there is particular credit coming to the government that was in power at the time India was given her independence —may have made a real contribution to the peace of the world. Indeed, I am satisfied that in decades yet to come historians will look back and say that that was one of the most important incidents in relations between east and west, namely the way in which arrangements were made so that the countries of India, Pakistan and Ceylon might withdraw from the former arrangement and yet still be members of this family of nations which we know as the commonwealth.

So, Mr. Chairman, as I say, we are not only celebrating on this occasion the strength of the parliamentary institutions which we enjoy; we are celebrating the moral strength of the commonwealth to which we belong, and which we believe may yet play an even greater part in spreading peace and human accord throughout the world.

While I am commenting on the matter there are one or two other thoughts that occur to me which perhaps I might mention in this connection. It so happened that at 2.30 this afternoon when His Honour the Speaker was leading the house in the usual prayer with which the sitting is opened, my thoughts followed exactly the line of those of a colleague of mine who sits near me. We happened to compare notes afterwards and both of us were of the opinion, and it does seem to fit in at this time when changes are being made in the royal style and titles, that there are some phrases in the prayer that is used to open the daily session of the house that might likewise be altered.

I have looked in Beauchesne and I find that there was a committee appointed away back in 1877 to consider and report upon the desirability of using a form of prayer in this chamber. I do not know whether that form has been changed at any time since, except to substitute the names of the new sovereigns. What occurred to us in particular was the continuing use of the phrase "may she vanquish all her enemies".

A few minutes ago the member for Lake Centre said in very appropriate language, I thought, that the title of the sovereign has never been a boastful one. A few other words which I took down earlier were those of the Prime Minister when he said that the commonwealth is in his view an effective instrument for the good of free mankind throughout the whole world.

It seems to me that these words to which I have just referred, and which are still uttered in the prayer every day, are not in keeping with the attitude taken by the United Kingdom, by Canada or by other members of this commonwealth. Our desire today is not to "vanquish enemies"; our desire today is to make friends out of enemies and to build a world of peace and human accord the world around.

I do not propose it as something which needs to be attended to overnight but I would hope that thought might be given to considering the language of that prayer and bringing it more into line with the spirit and aims—in terms of peace and human brotherhood—that characterize the various nations of this commonwealth.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps the hon. member, who I understand is a member of the committee which we have just set up to consider the rules of the house, would ask his colleagues on the committee to consider the matter which he has just been dealing with; and I am sure a recommendation of that committee would also receive very careful consideration from the house.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the Prime Minister. I had it in mind but I am glad he made the suggestion first, for reasons that are obvious.

Another thought that occurred to me, particularly while the member for Lake Centre was speaking, concerns a matter that was raised the other day by the hon. member for Cartier, who I think was paying particular attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre when he referred to equality of our citizenship. I do not wish to interject into this debate any unkind remarks or unduly critical remarks toward any one section or part of our country, so I will just leave it at that. The matter is on the record in the terms used by the hon. member for Cartier the other day, but I will say that, at a time when we are celebrating the strength of our parliamentary set-up and our democratic way, together with the strength of our citizenship being equal throughout the various nations of the commonwealth, we should stand on guard against any moves in our own country that would bring about any discrimination or any difference between one citizen and another. I am glad to note, Mr. Chairman, the support which the Prime Minister gives to me in that plea as well.

There is one other suggestion that I make at this time. It may not meet with the same unanimity that some of my other suggestions have been accorded today, nevertheless I think it would be the view of a great many people if not the majority of the people of this country. This bill arises naturally because we have a new sovereign in the person of Elizabeth II, whose recent visit to this country was enjoyed by all our people, and because of her forthcoming coronation, in which there is great interest throughout this country. So far as I can ascertain, when the various countries of the commonwealth are represented at the coronation ceremonies by the prime ministers and other heads of our various states, all other parts of the commonwealth except Canada will go there with a distinctive flag. It seems to me that it is a bit of a liability that our nation will suffer that lack. I know that to propose at this session of parliament, between now and June 2, that we should decide on a distinctive national flag would mean that there would have to be a committee set up, thousands of designs submitted, and we would have to go all through what we have been through before.

An hon. Member: You would not get anywhere.

Mr. Knowles: I hear one of my Tory friends say we would not get anywhere, but I would ask even those who would not agree with me on this point to consider rather strongly the situation that will obtain in London when Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan, and all the rest, are present each with a distinctive flag—yet there will be no flag that stands specifically for Canada. Even if it is only on a temporary basis I suggest that something should be done about it. There flies from the peace tower of this very building, and has for a number of years, a flag which has in the upper lefthand corner the union jack. It is what is commonly known as the Canadian ensign. I believe it flies there because of an order in council which was passed some years ago designating that flag for that particular purpose. The suggestion I make—is the Prime Minister disagreeing?

Mr. St. Laurent: The order in council designated that flag as the flag to be flown wherever other nations would be flying a distinctive national flag. It is flown not only here on the parliament buildings but on all the public buildings in Canada and all the Canadian embassies or offices abroad.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the point I am making is met. Perhaps that order in council is wide enough to cover the suggestion I am making, namely, that when the Prime Minister and other representatives of Canada go to the coronation, if any flags are being flown there should be a distinctive flag for Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: The order in council is broad enough to have induced the government of the United Kingdom to have this flag flown on the Dorchester hotel in London whenever it is receiving a Canadian delegation as guests of the government in that hotel.

Mr. Knowles: I am very pleased to learn that my request has at least brought out the information the Prime Minister is now giving. I am very glad that some progress has been made in connection with this matter. I hope that it will not be too long until, like other members of this family of nations, we will have our own distinctive flag.

Other thoughts occur to one, Mr. Chairman, but perhaps that is enough for this occasion. On behalf of this group I simply say we are glad that we have the kind of set-up in which it is parliament's right to deal with legislation of this kind. We welcome this opportunity to reaffirm our faith in the democratic way of life which is part and parcel of our association with the commonwealth. We welcome this opportunity to reaffirm our belief in our parliamentary system of government as the one most suited to our needs. We hope that as time goes on the needs of our people will be even better served by that form of government.

Mr. Low: This bill, Mr. Chairman, is indeed one which should be given the most earnest consideration by every member of the committee. At this time I am glad to be able to add just a word to the eloquent addresses delivered here this afternoon in connection with the proposal concerning the royal style and titles. I compliment the Prime Minister upon the very high tone of his address. I enjoyed it. It sets a mood on a high level, and certainly I am going to do nothing to detract from that high level.

It makes little or no difference, it seems, what elements are used to constitute the title of Her Majesty the Queen so long as those elements do indeed portray accurately the present relationship between the sovereign and the different parts of the commonwealth. It seems to me that those that are outlined in section 1 of the bill do just that. As a consequence we are quite content to accept them and to use them in the future.

Our concern, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has so well said, is not so much with the words used as to see that our acts, deeds, thoughts and attitudes would uphold and sustain through the ages the purposes, ideals, character and traditions that have reached such a high level in the commonwealth over the centuries. I hope that those things will remain unchanged, and that nothing we do will at any time mar them or cause them to be less than the superlative heights to which they have risen in the past. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I can say without any doubt or without any successful contradiction that we in this house all love our commonwealth. Many of us have looked upon it as the nation or the company of nations that has been described in various places in the Scriptures. We love the commonwealth not only for what it is but because we believe that it can yet be the greatest force in the world for peace. We believe that, particularly at this time when the world is in such danger from subversive forces like communism.

It seems to me there is one thing we would need to keep in mind if we are going to make the commonwealth the great force that we want it to be, and that is the warning that was uttered by Rudyard Kipling, the one-time poet laureate. It is contained in a verse from the Recessional, and it is a stanza that is not often seen these days. I do not know why, but it is not often seen. In that stanza he said, speaking of the members of the commonwealth:

> If, drunk with sight of power, we loose
> Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe,
> Such boastings as the Gentiles use,
> Or lesser breeds without the Law—
> Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget—lest we forget!

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that our commonwealth has a tremendous destiny yet to fulfil. It will fulfil that destiny, provided we always keep in mind the humility the poet had in mind when he penned those lines. On behalf of the group I represent, Mr. Chairman, I am happy to join with the Prime Minister and those who have spoken in expressing our gratitude for our membership in the commonwealth, for our citizenship in this great land, and for our great and noble sovereign. We agree with the wording of the style and title as set out in this bill.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, we were all emotionally stirred by the doctrines so magnificently enunciated by the Prime Minister. I cannot resist emphasizing most respectfully the remarkable nobility of his language. I should like to paraphrase his thoughts into these three doctrines. We are all equal children of one God. We are all equal and loyal subjects of one beloved sovereign. We are all equal and loyal citizens of one country, and all these are we, Mr. Chairman, irrespective of race, colour and religion, to the glory of this great country.

(Translation):

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a few words. I rejoice at the fact that there are no differences of opinion between us as far as the crown is concerned. The crown is a symbol of the unity which we all desire, without exception. I am confident that the bonds of unity will become stronger and more sincere because of everyone's attachment for such a young, beautiful and gracious Queen.

(Text):

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to extend the discussion of this measure beyond adding one or two thoughts to those which have already been expressed. As has been said already, it is not so much the name or the title as the reality that is of concern to every one of us. We have had deep and convincing evidences of that reality in the uniform expression of affection, regard and loyalty that came from every part of Canada at the time our present Queen came to the throne last year under such tragic circumstances. We have had further evidences of that reality in the manner in which the people of Canada now join in welcoming the coronation of this young lady as the living embodiment of those decencies that are represented in the occupation of that throne. The reality is one of respect for the great traditions which were never greater than they are today. The reality is one of loyalty and affection for an institution that has come to mean so much to us and to the whole free world. It is in institutions of this kind that the hope of people now enslaved depends in a great measure at this hour.

We might differ as to the exact wording that would best express our own thoughts as to this remarkable association, but it is recognized by hon. members of this house that the measure now before us interprets that agreement which the Prime Minister has described as resulting from the discussions which took place in London last December. That agreement having been reached and the new titles having been announced, there would seem to be little advantage to be gained in seeking to redefine what is not so much a matter of definition as rather one of affection, respect and loyalty.

For that reason it is not my thought to deal with any of those discussions which doubtless took place at the time the prime ministers met last December. Undoubtedly the different names and titles that might be in our minds today were before them. Agreement was reached, and to us that agreement is a matter of great importance at this time. I am sure that we all join with the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Lake Centre and the others who have spoken in recalling with real sentiments of satisfaction the fact that the great nation of India, with the second largest population of any nation in the world, has seen fit to continue the association of that great and historic people with the other nations which make up the commonwealth. So also has the nation of Pakistan, with a population more than six times that of Canada, decided to continue that association under these new terms.

Whether we might have felt some measure of satisfaction if other names and titles had been chosen, the reality remains that India and Pakistan as well as all the other nations of the commonwealth have continued as members of this great fellowship of free people; and to every one of us today that is the most important fact before us. If, out of that measure of common agreement which has been reached, the foundation has been laid for a continuing association of a similar type of democracy in Asia, in Europe, in North America and in Australasia, then undoubtedly one of the greatest achievements in all history will have been accomplished. I should think that nothing could offer a better example to the rest of the peoples than to see India, Pakistan and the other nations and territories of Asia joining with us in this ancient fellowship at this time under whatever names and titles may be chosen. For us the reality—the Queen—which is expressed in these terms is the reality we wish to preserve.

There is only one thought I would wish to add to what has already been said. On an earlier occasion, shortly after the present Queen had visited us as Princess Elizabeth, I placed before the Prime Minister and the members of this house the suggestion that consideration be given to introducing the appropriate legislative enactment which would declare that she is a citizen of Canada. Now that she is the Queen of Canada, as has been pointed out by the Prime Minister, I repeat that suggestion. While it would not seem that it would be a part of the measure now before us, I urge that as a symbolism of her special relationship to the Canadian people as the Queen of Canada there be, in the Canadian Citizenship Act or elsewhere, a declaration which will place before our people the fact that, in the acceptance of that title, she is a Canadian citizen enjoying all the rights, privileges and other associations that go with that name.

I should think that to those people of other lands who have come here who have chosen to become Canadians and who accept their citizenship with pride, it would be an added symbolism of the greatness of that citizenship if they knew that they shared that common citizenship with the Queen of Canada, the Queen of the commonwealth.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words to this discussion which if I may say so, has been carried on at such a high level and which evokes in us a sense of history, a sense of constitutional development and indeed a realization of the continuity of our history and the depth of its roots.

The bill before the house deals with the royal style and titles, and I should like to say a few words about it, Mr. Chairman against the background of our constitutional development. It is a long time between the date which the hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned, the date when King Egbert, I think it was, in the ninth century proclaimed himself as king of the English—and 1953 when we are by this bill approving of a royal style and title for Her Majesty as Queen of Canada and head of the commonwealth—head indeed of the peoples of the commonwealth. During that long interval from 828 there have been very many changes in the royal style and titles. In feudal times the personal relation between the monarch and his people tended to give way to the power which he exercised over the land under his domain and his titles changed accordingly. In later years, as the hereditary rights of kings lapsed, there has evolved the practice of defining the title by an amendment of the parliament in London. Still later, when the overseas possessions of the crown began to take on greater importance the ministers of the crown in London adopted the practice of consulting, through the colonial governors, with the ministers of the various colonies, before making changes in the title.

By 1926 the royal style and titles had become one of the subjects for discussion at the periodic commonwealth conferences which were held in London, and the title has changed since then, as has been pointed out this afternoon, as a result of decisions reached at those conferences. After the Statute of Westminster, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre not only were the members of the commonwealth consulted on proposed changes but the subsequent assent of their parliaments was required to make such changes effective.

The bill before the house, which is one of such importance, in a sense fulfils the ambition of Sir John A. Macdonald that Canada should be recognized as a kingdom. Students of Canadian history are familiar with his efforts at the London conference of 1866-67 to persuade the British government of that day to agree that the country, to be formed by the union of the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, should bear the title "Kingdom of Canada." At that time relations between the United States and the United Kingdom were not as solidly based on good understanding and cooperation as they are at the present time. Because of the strong tide of republicanism in the United States, born I suppose of the struggle for independence against a monarchy, the view in London and of the home government was that it would not be wise unnecessarily to offend that feeling by allowing the new Canadian federation to call itself a kingdom, a designation which it was thought, and possibly with some justice, might have stirred up deep antagonism in the United States. Nevertheless, it is interesting to recall that Sir John A. Macdonald, who did not give up easily, continued to press for the adoption of the word "kingdom" right up until the final draft of the British North America Act. The earlier drafts of January and February, 1867, produced at the London conference, do indeed bear witness to his tenacity on this point. There is I understand a draft of the British North America Act in the handwriting of Sir John A. Macdonald which, from internal evidence, appears to be earlier than any of the drafts actually considered at the conference. In this draft, in what I believe is his handwriting, the word "kingdom" is used throughout, and scribbled on the margin of it are the following alternatives—in case there had to be a choice from many: "Province, dependency, colony, dominion, vice-royalty and kingdom." Obviously Sir John had been turning these over in his mind and had concluded that "kingdom" was the word—and he used it throughout the draft—that would be the most fitting appellation for the new state which he and his colleagues were striving to establish in British North America.

In the meantime the law officers of the crown, apparently unaware of the views of Sir John himself, had been at work on their draft of the bill, and on January 23, 1867, they placed that draft before the conference. It provided that the provinces of British North America should be united, and I quote from it now words familiar to all of us: "into one colony with such name as Her Majesty thinks fit." Well, the word "colony" in that draft from the law officers of the crown found no favour with the delegates of British North America and they substituted the word "dominion" for it. Thus the draft of February 2, 1867, provided, and I quote from it: "The said provinces . . . shall form and be one united dominion under the name of the kingdom of Canada." It is interesting to note, Mr. Chairman, that in this draft the word "dominion" was not introduced as an alternative to kingdom. The name of the proposed dominion was to be the kingdom of Canada, and until February 9, 1867, this name was retained in the various drafts; but on that later date Sir John gave up the fight with the home authorities and agreed with the proposal that the provinces should "form and be one dominion under the name of Canada".

It is clear from this record that Sir John A. Macdonald's acceptance of the description "dominion" was by no means intended to exclude the eventual recognition that Canada was to be styled a "kingdom," even though at the time it was considered inappropriate to include this word in the name of the new country—our country.

If this great Canadian patriot and statesman were present in the house today I venture to think that he would welcome with much satisfaction the introduction of this legislation, which places the name of Canada in the royal style and titles as one of Her Majesty's realms alongside that of the United Kingdom.

The idea of designating Canada as a kingdom did not die with Sir John. It is possibly not quite so well known to students of history that when in 1901 a change in the royal style and titles was being contemplated the designation was given careful consideration again.

The exchange of telegrams between the secretary of state for the colonies of that day, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and the colonial governors who were instructed to consult their ministers on the question of the new royal style and titles, reveals that the colonial secretary—and I quote from his dispatch of the day—was "very desirous that the separate and greatly increased importance of the colonies should be recognized if possible."

The suggestion made at that time for revision of the title was that the king who was acceding to the throne, King Edward VII, might be called, "King of Great Britain and Ireland and of Greater Britain beyond the Seas".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who was colonial secretary then?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. This suggestion from London evoked mixed responses from the colonies, as they then were, and alternative proposals were put forward with the result that the words which have become fairly familiar to us were adopted, not by unanimous agreement in the first instance but as a result of messages that passed back and forward between the colonies and London. The title adopted was "King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas".

At that time there was a definite expression of opinion on the part of certain colonies, including Canada, which at that time through the Earl of Minto made certain suggestions with regard to the new title by which the name of Canada would be specifically designated. However, these were not followed then, and the title was adopted which remained in force for many years after 1901. It is interesting to note that in the correspondence of 1901 which led to the acceptance of the word "dominions" that word was almost synonymous, although not so subsequently, with the word "colony".

The change that was made at that time is of some significance because of the distinction which developed between the colonies and the self-governing colonies which became dominions. The extent of this distinction between colony and dominion is emphasized further when we consider that prior to 1901, with the exception of the addition in 1876 of the title "Empress of India", the possessions of the crown outside the British Isles, although included in the settlements of the crown, received no recognition whatever in the royal title. It was recognition of the importance of the overseas territories that led to the passing of the royal titles act in 1901 which authorized the crown to make such additions to the existing title as it saw fit. The title was then proclaimed as we know it, "King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas". So it remained for many years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was Sir Wilfrid Laurier's suggestion in 1901?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think I have that information actually with me. I know that the government of the day did object to the suggestion that the phrase should be "Greater Britain beyond the Seas". The Earl of Minto, replying to that suggestion on February 6, 1901—I think this will answer the question of my hon. friend—said that his ministers appreciated the inquiry from London, and then he continued:

> They entertain some doubt as to the appropriateness of the expression "Greater Britain", which, while convenient colloquially, is perhaps hardly definite or intelligible enough for such a formal purpose. They would therefore suggest for consideration the expediency of retaining the title of King of Great Britain and Ireland and Emperor of India, and adding the words "King of Canada, Australasia, South Africa, and all the British Dominions beyond the Seas";

In other words, the Canadian government of that day suggested the inclusion in the king's title, not only of the specific designation of Canada but the specific designation of Australasia and South Africa. The dispatch from the Earl of Minto continued:

> —if the mention of greater colonies be deemed unfair to remainder of smaller colonies, or otherwise objectionable, the addition to title might be "King of all the British Dominions beyond the Seas".

That was the suggestion put forward to London at that time. We now reach the situation as it was at the time of the London conference of 1926 when the title was found to be out of date because of the changed position of Ireland. A further alteration in the title was found to be required and the word "Ireland" was so interpreted as to distinguish geographically between the Irish Free State and Northern Ireland. Under the geographical umbrella of "British dominions beyond the seas," the independent countries, Australia, Canada, New Zealand and South Africa were lumped together with the colonies and other dependencies of the British crown. In spite of certain misgivings as to the appropriateness of this title, it has remained and was reaffirmed by a United Kingdom statute and proclamation in 1936 at the time of the accession of King George VI.

Following the second world war the need for a further change in the royal style and titles became more apparent and when the prime ministers met, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, last December and on the eve of the coronation of Her Majesty it was decided to make this change. The equality of status of the countries of the commonwealth, if it needed further emphasis was fully revealed by the part played by each in the second world war. The entry into the commonwealth of three fully independent Asian states, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, not only greatly enhanced its membership but widened the basis of commonwealth association. The establishment of the republic of Ireland outside the commonwealth made it clearly necessary to undertake a revision of the geographica content of the title which had been agreed to only a few years earlier. There were other equally cogent reasons for a change, not the least of which was the need for recognition in the title of the sovereign's position as head of the commonwealth, a designation which had been agreed to a year or so before.

Therefore in recent years members of the commonwealth have been considering, by exchanges of correspondence between governments and by meetings in London, ways and means of bringing the title into conformity with the constitutional relations which now exist within the commonwealth. The discussions which took place last December when the prime ministers of the commonwealth assembled in London were the result of long and careful consideration of how changes could be brought about in the royal style and titles which would make them appropriate to and practicable for the current commonwealth relations, while maintaining the tradition and dignity associated with them.

Recognizing that the present title was not in accord with the current constitutional relations within the commonwealth, they concluded, after full consideration, that in the present stage of development of the commonwealth it would be in accord with the established constitutional practice—this represents an important change from any previous consideration of this matter—that each member could subsequent to the conference use for its own purposes a form of title which suited its own particular circumstance but which retained a substantial element which was common to all.

So agreement was reached, in a sense, to disagree. They agreed on the various forms of the title which would be used in various parts of the commonwealth. But they also agreed that each of these titles should have a common element in the description of the sovereign as Queen of her other realms and territories and as head of the commonwealth. I think it is of great significance—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And which is common to all.

Mr. Pearson: Yes. That was our common element of agreement at a time when it was agreed to disagree with respect to other parts of the title. It is of great significance, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the words which are common to all titles in all parts of Her Majesty's realms are the words "head of the commonwealth". It was in 1949 that agreement was reached in London that this phrase, head of the commonwealth, should describe a new relationship of the crown to the commonwealth which was made necessary by the inclusion, in the commonwealth, of a republic. I recall, because I had the great privilege of being present at these discussions, the very earnest effort that was made at that time, in the best traditions of adaptability and flexibility in the commonwealth association, to find an expression—something which would certainly not be possible in strict legality as it would have been conceived by constitutional lawyers twenty years ago—under which we could include in our commonwealth association a country with the largest group of people in that association, India, which had declared itself a republic.

That was done, and the expression "head of the commonwealth" was then used in proclaiming the accession of Queen Elizabeth II in the United Kingdom. This is, as I have said, one of the principal common elements in the varying titles which have now been agreed upon. Our Queen then, Mr. Chairman, is head of a commonwealth whose members include a republic of which she is not Queen and in which she has no constitutional function to perform. That, I suggest, is striking evidence not only of the adaptability of the commonwealth to changing conditions but of the political realism and ingenuity of the peoples and the governments who make up the commonwealth. It is striking evidence of the adaptability of this association to new conditions and of our power to adjust our constitutional practices and our constitutional procedures to these new conditions. It is one more proof, if proof is needed, that membership in the commonwealth imposes no limitation whatever on a nation's control over all its affairs, including its constitutional development as a republic or as a monarchy.

For certain members of the commonwealth —and this certainly includes Canada—the monarchical form is preferable because it symbolizes in a very real way the unbroken continuity in our history and the development of our political institutions from Magna Carta to the session of the House of Commons in Ottawa today. The crown under the monarchical principle also lends, I think, stability and dignity to our national life, and I am sure we all agree that that is important in a democratic system based on the free and active play of party controversies. The crown as head of the state and as represented in our country, standing above all such controversies, commanding and deserving the respect and loyalty and affection of us all, ensures a more solid and secure foundation for national development than might otherwise be the case under some other form of democratic government.

Yet it is good to know that the commonwealth, with its monarchical and its republican membership, is flexible enough to include Asian as well as western members, and a republic as well as monarchies. This becomes an essential feature in the new and important role which the commonwealth now performs, a bridge between the west and Asia at a time when there are too few such bridges and when they are more important to the world's history than ever before. All those who believe in co-operation between states must be heartened by this new opportunity of service which is afforded the members of the commonwealth family, and they must be heartened also by the fact the crown will continue to play a vital part in that association in the future as it has in the past.

At London, as I have said, it was agreed last December to differ, if necessary, in the titles and style of the crown, but we all agreed, without difficulty and without difference, in respect of our determination to pursue within the commonwealth those ideals for which the crown so finely stands—peace, dignity and ordered progress.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

South Saskatchewan River Project

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this motion affords to members of parliament an opportunity to assert their traditional right to bring before the executive any matter that they believe is of interest to the people of their country, the basis being that supply shall not be granted until causes of complaint have been fully discussed. It is in that spirit I intend to deal with a matter of transcendent importance to the people of western Canada, and in particular the peoples of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I bring this matter up on this occasion to give parliament an opportunity of discussing a question pertinent to the prosperity of western Canada. I commence by pointing out that the questions of irrigation and of power in Saskatchewan and in western Canada generally have been matters of constant reference for several generations. I go back to the days of the Palliser expedition and also to the recommendations made as far back as 1856, when even then it was suggested, in the diaries of early explorers, that the area which we now know as the Palliser triangle, extending as well beyond Canada in the general direction of Salt Lake City, might in the future be subject to settlement; but that in order to settle it there would be required the benefits of irrigation for the reason that from generation to generation, periodically, drought has come to that area.

This matter has been before the House of Commons on a number of occasions. It has been discussed throughout the years in the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan. As I say, it has been brought to the House of Commons periodically since 1938 when the late John R. MacNicol dealt at length with the problems of irrigation. It has been before us year by year since that time.

I am not going to go into the references by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) throughout the years, although that could be done later on if necessary. Throughout the years he has been constantly bringing to the attention of the people of Saskatchewan the need for irrigation, the demand for power, and has pictured Saskatchewan and other areas within the Palliser triangle as areas that might well in future be of the type of the Essen area in Germany, power resulting in industrial development and irrigation resulting in areas arid today blooming as the rose.

As far back as 1946 the minister, speaking at a meeting that year, as reported in the Regina Leader-Post of April 27, said:

The dominion government had already mapped out a program, and it was a program involving $110 million. This would be used largely in providing for the storage of water and partly for the distribution of this water where needed.

The dominion government thus did not need the endorsation of the South Saskatchewan river development association to begin work on the South Saskatchewan river. It had already decided to go through with it.

Later in the summer of 1946, again speaking in the province of Saskatchewan, the Minister of Agriculture was reported as saying:

—a decision would be reached on where the dam on the South Saskatchewan should be placed. It would be on one of three sites between the Elbow and Saskatchewan.

As soon as the site had been finally decided upon, contracts would be let and work would proceed immediately.

Throughout the years his advocacy of this project was in keeping with the words that he was reported to have used the other day in Winnipeg on the occasion of an interview with the press, excepting that there were no words that required deletion and the description was "blank, blank".

Mr. Gardiner: I do not use language of that kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I say with respect to that alleged interview. I, at least, have never known the minister to use language that had to be abbreviated in order to make it parliamentary. But his language was always most definite. The dam, the construction, and the irrigation were in immediate prospect, and generally the project was just around the corner.

In the by-election at Rosthern in 1948, on October 18, the minister is reported as having said that the issue of the campaign, the main task would be to push the building of the dam as soon as possible. On that occasion the Minister of Agriculture drew a picture of the development of irrigation and power on the Saskatchewan river that would result in industrial and agricultural development similar to that which I have already referred to in the Essen area of Germany.

On October 20, 1948, Mr. Tucker, speaking in the same by-election said that support had already been received from two federal cabinet ministers both of whom had expressed their favourable attitude towards the project; and he referred to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and to another minister.

On October 23, 1948, the Minister of Agriculture said:

If this part of the country could be turned into an industrial as well as an agricultural area, it would be possible for it to support twice the population that it does now. Cheap power is the "open sesame" to industrial growth. With a dam at its back door almost assured, and with the resultant cheap water power available in the not too distant future, Saskatoon stands at the gateway to new and unprecedented development.

And so on and so on through the years. The dam was the issue in that by-election when my hon. friend from Rosthern (Mr. Boucher) was elected. He was elected, but we did not get the dam. In 1949 it was again an issue.

There were various discussions during the years. The P.F.R.A. people went ahead with an investigation; and there are men in the P.F.R.A. who, with long training, ability and experience, know the needs of Saskatchewan. They know the needs of irrigation and they have periodically made reports to the effect that the building of this dam was not only feasible but was necessary. Moneys have been expended month by month during the last few years to determine whether or not this project should be proceeded with; and the reports by the P.F.R.A. were as clear as they were definite that this project was a proper and a feasible one. The reports so given raised the hopes of people within the province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will take up consideration of public and private bills.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 2. to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): In rising to speak to this bill, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that his introduction of it has served a very useful purpose because it has evoked an interesting debate. I should like to thank all those who took such an active part in that debate.

My hon. friend's outline of the parliamentary history of this legislative proposal since 1948 was a very fair one. I was glad that, although he thought it necessary to state that the language which forms the main part of the bill was drafted by officers of the Department of Labour, he did not try to read any unfounded significance into that fact. As a matter of fact, they did the same thing in polishing up the wording of the bill in its original form.

The hon. member spoke about Liberals standing for union security. He again made much of that fact, and it is a fact. I am one of those about whom he spoke, and I do believe in union security. I see nothing wrong in union security measures, even though I much prefer those that are freely agreed upon by labour and management. I am very pleased indeed when I learn that new collective agreements have been signed providing for union security for the first time, or extending for the second and third time the scope of previous provisions. I am pleased when these agreements have been reached freely by the two parties. My reasons for feeling that way are, first, that I am in favour of collective bargaining; second, I believe in the value of having strong and stable labour unions in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a good many members in this house who sincerely do not want to see employers compelled by legislation to initiate a check-off in their plants, any more than they want to see a prohibition against the union security measures in our legislation here. The question has been asked as to whether it is necessary or desirable that a responsible union should derive its stability from government imposed conditions rather than freely negotiated agreements. That, I think, is the question to which we need to give a great deal of thought and study.

In closing his speech on the motion for second reading of the bill, my hon. friend said he was encouraged by the fact that this principle has now been accepted by the railway companies and by the union representatives of many of their employees. I would say to him that the only principle the railways or the employees accepted was the principle of a negotiated check-off, freely agreed upon in the process of collective bargaining. The principle contained in the provisions of Bill No. 2 is the principle of a legislated check-off, with the word "voluntary" applying only to the individual employee and having no reciprocal connotation for the employer.

Before I leave the subject of the settlement between the railways and their non-operating employees, I wish to express a word of commendation to Mr. Justice Kellock and the other members of the conciliation board, to the officials representing management for the railways, and to the trade union leaders who represented the employees. Those non-operating railway labour organizations sought the adoption of the union shop, but reached agreement with management upon the check-off of union dues.

My information is that the railways have agreed to the compulsory check-off of union dues for all members of the bargaining units for which the non-operating unions hold collective agreements, regardless of whether or not the individuals affected are members of the unions. This formula goes considerably beyond the provisions of Bill No. 2, but the important thing to remember is that it was freely negotiated.

It should not be forgotten that our law dealing with industrial relations already makes pretty secure the position of unions which by their own effectiveness and merit are able to enlist the loyalty of a majority of the workers in any given bargaining unit. The right of employees to joint unions and to carry on their lawful activities is protected, and interference and coercion on the part of employers through unfair labour practices are prohibited under penalty.

Earlier in this debate my parliamentary assistant (Mr. Cote) and also the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) made some pertinent references to the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act which terminated the railway strike of 1950. There was universal agreement that all the elements of compulsion in that bill should disappear, and should constitute no precedent. I am glad to say that the compulsory features of that statute have long since passed into limbo, and the parties are to be commended for having reverted to orderly collective bargaining, with enough good will on both sides to work out a settlement without disturbing industrial peace.

By any fair standard I think it will be agreed that our labour relations act is working out well. From here on I do not think any of us want parliament to impose statutory obligations upon employers and trade unions which might throw out of balance the factors of compromise and co-operation which are essential in collective bargaining. In order that collective agreements may be freely negotiated it is necessary to have a climate of good will, free from any excessive compulsion. It is that climate of good will, of mutual confidence, of willingness to conduct sincere negotiations, that the Department of Labour is ever seeking to encourage.

There are two schools of thought reflecting divergent philosophies on this matter. The views of one group are that the matter of check-off of dues is one which, in common with other conditions of employment, should be dealt with by the processes of free collective bargaining, and that legislative interference with those processes will not operate in the long run to the best interests of the trade unions and their members. The other school of thought, as expressed in the bill, is that the matter of the check-off of union dues is one which should be removed from the collective bargaining field and disposed of by legislative enactment.

My parliamentary assistant, speaking of this bill on January 23 in this house, gave, in my opinion, a very clear analysis of the arguments related to this legislative proposal. For some time now the parliamentary assistant has been taking an active part, with my deputy minister and senior departmental officials, in studying the results of experience so far gained under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

The results of those studies may well lead in the future to proposals for amendments to the act. I do think, however, that any amendments made to this act ought to be most carefully considered and should be brought forward from time to time in groups rather than one by one in a haphazard fashion. It may be that at some future time, when a group of such amendments are brought forward, something along the lines of this bill may find its place amongst them. But we can afford, I think, to go slowly in the knowledge that the degree of industrial accord within our country is not necessarily measured by the number of laws we make on labour relations, but rather is it measured by the good will and determination of the parties concerned to find a fair solution based upon mutual confidence.

In view of the interest in this matter and having regard to the diverging views expressed, I believe that before this house is asked to vote on the principle of Bill No. 2 the bill should receive further and careful study by the competent committee of this house. I would therefore move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier):

That Bill No. 2 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is a sense in which the amendment just moved by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) may be interpreted as a move against my bill, but I do not choose to look upon this amendment in that light. If one analyses the remarks the minister has just made, one could not say that he is favourably disposed to my bill; but at any rate it can be said that in the amendment which he has just moved there is afforded the possibility of further discussion of the subject matter or in other words the principle of this bill.

[Mr. Gregg.]

I think it is obvious to everyone that that course is much to be preferred to the defeat of the bill on the floor of this house, something which I take it might follow again if the government were to give the lead against the second reading of this bill. It is therefore my intention, Mr. Speaker, to indicate my readiness to accept the amendment that has been moved by the Minister of Labour and to express the hope that, rather than the bill being defeated this course might be followed and the subject matter be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

In accepting that suggestion put forward by the minister I dare to hope that at least one precedent that comes to my mind may be followed in this case. For a number of years I introduced on the floor of this house legislation aimed at protecting against loss due to a strike the pension rights of workers governed by federal labour jurisdiction. That proposed bill of mine was talked out or defeated a couple of times. Finally—I believe it was in the year 1947—it was treated in the same way as this bill is now being treated. An amendment to the motion for the second reading was moved by a minister. That amendment had the effect of denying second reading but sending the subject matter of that bill to this same committee, namely the committee on industrial relations. My memory is now confirming the fact that that was definitely in the year 1947. It so happens that in the next year, that is in 1948, the principle that I had been advocating for several years, and which had been studied in this way by the standing committee on industrial relations, was accepted by this house and written into the national labour code. I am referring to the provision that is in the law protecting pension rights against loss due to a strike or lockout.

I recite that precedent in order to express the hope that the same result may follow from what is now taking place. This bill proposing the voluntary revocable check-off has been before the house on a number of occasions, perhaps five or six times. It has been voted on at least three times. On successive occasions the number voting for it has increased but the bill has not yet been passed. The subject matter is now to be referred to this committee. I hope history will repeat itself and that the next time this parliament has a chance to deal with this matter it will follow the course followed previously, which I have already recited, and will write the voluntary revocable check-off into the national labour code.

If the minister's amendment passes I am sure the committee will give serious consideration to the matter. To any who might wish to appear before that committee and to make representations I hope it will afford an opportunity to do so. If that opportunity is afforded, I realize that there may be those who will appear and state their opposition to this resolution. I am also satisfied, however, that the major labour bodies—which, year by year for a long time, have been requesting legislation of this kind—will come before that committee and indicate their support of it.

A moment ago the minister said that he recognizes labour's desires for union security and for the check-off as one form of it. If I understood him aright, I believe he said it was his view that labour preferred the check-off as a subject of collective bargaining rather than as a subject of legislation. If I am misinterpreting what the minister said he can, of course, correct me. I wish to remind him, however, that last year, as in previous years, the major labour congresses of this country, in appearing before the cabinet with their annual briefs, asked for legislation in the national labour code providing for the voluntary revocable check-off. Indeed, I have in my hand the briefs that were presented by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour.

The minister also had something to say today about the opposition of employers to the check-off or at least to a check-off provided for by legislation. What concerns me in the attitude of employers, as the minister stated it today, is the fact that these same employers operate the check-off in respect of a number of other items and do so apparently without complaint. They provide a check-off service in respect of various charities to which workers may wish to contribute. They often provide a check-off in relation to Canada savings bonds and items of that sort. Then there is another check-off they provide because of legislation that requires them to do so. I refer to the check-off of income tax payments at the source. For employers who provide all these other check-off services to rise up on a high principle and object to the check-off of trade union dues is something which it seems to me is not really consistent. It looks as though there is opposition not just to the idea of a check-off but to what in this case the check-off does in that it gives a form of recognition to trade unions and in that it provides some help to trade unions in their organizing work.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although the minister is perfectly correct in saying that there are two sides to this proposition, it seems to me that the weight of the argument is on the side of the claim put forward by organized labour in this country. That claim is that there should be legislative provision for at least a minimum form of union security. As has been pointed out in this house time and again—the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) pointed it out again the other day—we have legislation of this kind on the statute books of a number of our provinces; I believe it is on the statute books of six of them. If it is in order in those provinces that are more progressive than the others in respect of labour relations to provide for the check-off by legislation, I submit that it is not only in order but desirable to have it in the national labour code.

We hear a great deal about the important part that trade unions play in the life of our country; we hear many speeches made about the dignity of labour and the rights of the workers of this country. It seems to me that this is just one small item of recognition for which labour is asking and which labour deserves. I hope that the result of the deliberations of the committee on this matter will be that there will be a report back to the house at this session recommending that this bill be reintroduced and that the voluntary revocable check-off be written in the national labour code. It is of course up to the house what it does with the amendment proposed by the minister; but in view of the fact that it does provide an opportunity for discussion of this measure by the committee I would be pleased if the amendment were accepted by the house.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss this from the point of view of the proposal that is now made to refer the matter before the house to a committee. In explaining why he was introducing the amendment which he moved, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) pointed out that he did so with the idea that this would give an opportunity to consider the matter at the appropriate time. I understood him to say that this might then be dealt with at the time; that a group of amendments could be brought forward on some other occasion. If that is the situation, Mr. Speaker, the acceptance of the amendment as it now stands simply means that this proposal is shelved and that no positive steps are to be taken to have a review of the act, which is long overdue.

It will be recalled that on other occasions we have proposed that there should be a general review of this act. One of the questions that arise in regard to any single amendment of this kind is that the most desirable practice is to have a general examination of the whole act, because patching up the act in one spot or another may not produce the desired results. In the end, as has happened on a number of other occasions, an unwieldy and sometimes incoherent act may result, and clauses introduced into the act by way of amendment from time to time may easily conflict with each other when they subsequently are interpreted by the courts or elsewhere, and they may in fact defeat the very spirit of the act itself. Often a few words introduced without regard to the whole act and the intention of the act have had the effect of defeating the very purpose for which the amendment was introduced.

If the recommendation which the minister now makes is as I understood it from his words, then the proposal before the house is simply to be put in cold storage and at some unannounced date when a general consideration of this act is to take place it might then receive consideration or might not. If there is to be a reference of any kind to a committee to deal with the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, then I suggest that this is the appropriate time to ask once again that there be a general review of the whole act. I think the time is more than ripe for such a general review.

With what the minister has said in regard to labour relations generally I think there will not be general disagreement. What has been said in response to his proposal I think will also meet with general agreement. The time is long past when there is any doubt in anybody's mind that legislation must assure the right of employees in any occupation to associate themselves together in the union of their choice, and that they must have the right to bargain collectively under clearly defined provisions when that association has been established and recognized under the terms of recognition that are placed in statutory form.

I doubt whether there is anyone today who would challenge the basic right of the employees in our different industrial and other activities of this country. One of the things which should constantly be engaging our attention is the improvement of the methods of dealing with those disputes which may arise between employees and employers, facilitating the negotiation of agreements and generally assuring that with the increased understanding of the problems of employees and employers an increasing measure of harmony may constantly be found throughout the whole of the social structure of this country.

All too often the fact that a strike may be causing some inconvenience, or that a threatened strike may actually cause great concern, obscures the extremely important fact that in the overwhelming majority of cases the discussions between employees and employers lead to satisfactory and harmonious agreements without attracting any public attention at all. Certainly the objective of all legislation of this kind should be to increase that ever-widening area within which agreement is being so generally found.

We have advanced a long way. This is something about which there need be no partisan differences of opinion. It should be recognized that those of different political persuasions in parliament and in the other legislative bodies of Canada have year by year advanced with the wider and better understanding of employee and employer relations which has come generally to all our people.

Most Canadians recognize today that an essential feature of the development of our social structure is the pride in work well done which finds its expression in the desire of the representatives of the employees to assure that along with every advantage they may gain from the negotiations they carry on there may also be at all times the acceptance and appreciation of the basic worth of the individual. After all I think there will be no disagreement with the statement that work well done carries with it honourable recognition on the part of every Canadian, and that in the development of this nation of ours and the improvement in the social conditions in this country there is no place where pride in a task that is undertaken can more justifiably be found than in those places where the energy, the skill and the faithful work of the individuals contribute to the general advancement of the whole country.

We are all concerned with the improvement of those conditions; we are all concerned with the general improvement of the relationship which exists. In its simplest terms, a desirable labour relations act should seek to establish, first of all, the basic right of employees to associate themselves in trade unions for the purpose of bargaining with employers and obtaining for themselves adequate wages, fair working conditions and an assurance of advancement in return for work well done. The act should also make it possible for those who represent the worker to carry out their duties on behalf of the employees in an orderly, lawful and constructive manner so that the purpose of that association of employees may be fully recognized.

A good labour relations act should be based on the thought of the mutual respect which can be established between employees and employers whenever occasion comes to carry out collective bargaining. The whole act should follow a constructive and integrated pattern which will from time to time bring into legislative form the advances which have taken place in the relations between the employees and employers. Such an act should also be constantly under review so that from the experience which has been gained under the legislation in existence improvements may be made.

This is a subject which is of great concern not only to the members of this legislature, to employees and employers, but to the people of Canada generally. Their welfare, their daily lives are in substantial measure related to the success of legislation of this kind in producing harmony rather than dispute. It should be remembered also that a larger number of workers in Canada than those affected by legislation passed here are affected directly by legislation passed in the various provincial legislatures. Very often what is done here will offer suggestions to the provincial legislatures. Very often provincial legislatures will not deem it advisable to advance beyond the steps that have been taken by the parliament of Canada because they know there is a recognition that on the national level legislation adopted here is something that is recognized in every part of Canada.

Therefore in seeking improvements in this legislation we also can take it for granted that whatever is done here is likely also to find a response in the provincial legislatures, which most certainly have advanced greatly year by year in the legislation affecting employee and employer relations in the provinces.

I think it demonstrates something of the increasing understanding of this subject by hon. members of this house that the amendment put forward by the minister has been accepted on this occasion. Nevertheless, since reference is to be made under that amendment to the select standing committee on industrial relations, I submit that this is a good time to go beyond that. In presenting his amendment the minister has indicated that he has in mind deferring action on this until such time as a group of amendments might be brought forward. I think this is the time when consideration should be given to amendments generally which will bring the whole act into conformity with modern practices and advance the harmony of relations between employees and employers in every way possible. With that in mind I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough):

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"with instructions that they have power to consider and to recommend amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, with a view to bringing the act into conformity with current practices of employment in industry and of ensuring the greatest possible harmony between employees and employers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not prepared to make any comment at this moment other than to say that it appears to me at first sight that the amendment to the amendment of the Minister of Labour is not in order. The principle of the bill is to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act with respect to introducing the check-off. Second reading of the bill has been moved, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has moved that the subject matter be referred to the committee on industrial relations. The amendment of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) seeks to give instructions to the committee. In any event, I will look up the point and perhaps have something to say later.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the amendment moved by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). Knowing his feelings with respect to the bill, second reading of which has been moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I think the amendment is a constructive proposal on the part of the minister. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already indicated that it is acceptable to him. I am not the sponsor of the bill, but it is acceptable to me because I believe it is a constructive way to deal with a matter of this kind.

I think most hon. members are opposed to compulsion, but we are not so opposed to compulsion as not to pass laws compelling people to do things. As a matter of fact pretty nearly all our laws are laws of compulsion. I think someone told me that under the British system, of which we are a part, what the law does not forbid the law allows, or what the law does not compel the law permits.

I think there is a great demand for the inclusion of the provision contained in the bill before us in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. That employers would oppose it is quite understandable because until very recent years employers have opposed organized labour in any shape or form. In that connection I remember the report made by the royal commission that investigated the textile industry around 1937 under the chairmanship of W. F. A. Turgeon. The report indicated that, with the exception of one, all the textile companies that were under review could see no reason whatsoever why they should deal with organized labour in their plants. I thought

I had conveniently in my file the statements made by the representatives of those companies, but I cannot put my hand on them now. However, I have another statement that is equally authoritative on this point.

In 1943 or 1944—I am not quite sure of the date—a commission was appointed to inquire into the national war labour board. The chairman of the commission was C. P. McTague, who was then a justice of the supreme court of the province of Ontario. The other two members were J. L. Cohen representing labour and the late Senator Bench representing employers. There were majority and minority reports, and I should like to read a quotation from the majority report which was signed by the chairman and the labour representative. It is as follows:

> The recognition of the right—

The reference is to the right to bargain collectively.

> —is far from universal. By far the majority of employers have resisted it over the period. Generally speaking, the great mass of employers, until comparatively recent years, have employed all weapons in their power to resist and discourage the trade union movement.

That was only too painfully recognized by those who were interested in these matters in the early years of the war. At that time almost all labour disputes were concerned with the recognition of the union in the particular employment. In order to overcome that, when the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act was drafted, right in the beginning compulsion was put on employers and employees to bargain collectively in good faith. If there is a general demand to go one step farther, and conditions being what they are, then in my opinion it is not something that should be turned down. However, I must say again that I agree with the attitude taken by the Minister of Labour, and I believe his proposal is a constructive way to deal with the matter.

I hope the industrial relations committee will meet this session, and that this matter can be discussed. If there is any desire to enlarge the scope of the committee I have no objection. It has not occurred to me that there is a general demand for a complete revamping or revision of the act, although there may be. I cannot say because I have not been as close to things in the past year or two as I would wish. I hope that this point at least can be discussed at this session. Then we would know whether sentiment was in favour of or against it. From my point of view the amendment of the minister is a much better solution than that the question should be put to a vote now and defeated as it has been on other occasions.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very long to discuss this matter on this occasion. Since you have raised the question of whether or not the amendment to the amendment is in order, I shall confine my remarks to the amendment.

I do not think anyone in the house was at all surprised when the minister moved his amendment to the motion for second reading in order that the bill might be referred to the committee for discussion.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the question of the check-off is not being opposed as much now as it has been in days gone by. There are, as we all know, several provinces which have the compulsory check-off—Alberta and Saskatchewan, to mention two. Then, too, there are a great many provinces in which the companies themselves and the unions have now included in their contracts the voluntary check-off. So that does not seem to be such a great problem as it used to be.

I think it is wise on this occasion that the bill itself should be referred to the committee for further investigation. I think a lot of benefit can come from a thorough discussion of the matter in committee. Probably a more satisfactory conclusion can be reached in committee than in the house; but I trust that when this subject is returned from the committee back to the house, if the committee's recommendation is to include this provision in the act, the minister of today will not take the same attitude which Mr. Humphrey Mitchell took when he was minister of labour. When the bill came back to the house he took advantage of the occasion to have the decision of the committee rescinded by putting a motion before the house and having it carried. That would be unfortunate. I think it is unfortunate when any minister takes any method to get around decisions of a committee.

Certainly when a committee of this house has gone to great lengths to study a bill such as this and has decided that a certain clause should be included in the act, then I do not think the minister should bring it before the house only to have those decisions rescinded. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) would not do that. I feel quite confident that if the committee recommends, as it did in the past, that this check-off should be included in the legislation he will abide by the decision of the committee in that respect.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to oppose the minister's amendment to have this referred to the committee. We think it is the proper place for it to go, and it will be given consideration there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should deal with the subamendment which was moved by the Leader of the Opposition and say that this subamendment certainly enlarges the scope of the amendment moved by the minister. In the second place I would say that the point which strikes me as most important is that this bill is to amend the act with respect to the check-off. The amendment of the Minister of Labour is relevant to the principle of the bill, in that it moves that the subject matter of that particular bill be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations. The subamendment of the Leader of the Opposition is not relevant to the amendment moved by the minister. It deals generally with the act which the bill before the house tends to amend in one particular only.

I do not have ready before me the various references, but I think one is citation 344. Another, regarding the enlargement of the scope of the amendment is, I think, 364. I do not wish to be unfair in judging this amendment, and were I not persuaded that it was out of order I would give it further study. However, so far as I can see from the study I have made in the short time at my disposal, basing my judgment on the two citations I have mentioned, I am satisfied that this amendment to the amendment is not in order.

Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Gregg: Before the question is put may I just say one word prompted by the remark of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) with whose words, in the main, I agree. He stated, I think, that the Minister of Labour might put this bill in cold storage. That is not the intention at all. In the department we are carrying out a review of the act, in conjunction with representatives of employers and employees in the light of what has been experienced in recent years. There will be recommendations and bills brought forward. I do not think they will be brought forward at this session but perhaps the Minister of Labour, whoever he is, at the next session or the session following will bring them in.

With respect to this Bill No. 2, I presume that if my hon. friend from Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) is chairman of the committee as soon as my fair employment practices bill comes to the committee, he will also consider this one. I hope members of the committee on industrial relations may then have gotten over the most difficult part of their other committee duties and be able to study these two bills at this session and, if necessary, hear evidence from outside so that the subject matter of Bill No. 2 may be fully explored. It might thus become part of the other packet of amendments at such time as it is advisable to bring them in. I wanted to make that clear.

Mr. Drew: Just so I may understand what the minister has in his mind I would direct a question to him having to do with the remark he has just made. He said that when the department was ready with a packet of amendments, then this matter would receive consideration.

I have accepted Your Honour's ruling and I recognize the difficulties of interpretation in these cases. I certainly have no thought of challenging that ruling, but what I have put forward in relation to the amendment does indicate my own belief that this will not widen the scope of the committee.

I would point out that when the committee is set up, unless there are restrictions placed upon its activities, I feel that if it were indicated by the minister that he desired wider examination the committee could carry out the suggestion I have made.

Mr. Gregg: The committee is already set up and we can refer to it anything we desire.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question. Is it clear that if the committee wishes to do so it may make a recommendation back to the house on the subject matter of this bill at this session?

Mr. Gregg: That is within the power of the committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the amendment moved by the Minister of Labour agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that the house go into committee of supply.

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was dealing in general with the history of the South Saskatchewan river dam project, and some of the things that had taken place throughout the years. I had arrived at the point at which the prairie farm rehabilitation organization had determined that the proposition was feasible, and one that deserved consideration. Then there was no immediate action taken. The question arose as to whether or not the water could be secured, and whether Manitoba would be prepared to allow the diversion of the necessary waters that would be required in order to operate the irrigation plant.

The water board was set up, and apparently it arrived at a conclusion sufficiently favourable in any event to enable the project to be proceeded with. Following that, in 1949 a discussion took place in the house with reference to this matter. In order to indicate the united attitude of the opposition on that occasion, on March 29, 1949, I set out the view of the Progressive Conservative party regarding the project in these words, as they appear at page 2122 of Hansard:

> This project—and it is admitted it will have the results that I have referred to—must not be used by any party as an instrument for political preferment. It should have the support of all parties to the end that it will be assured. It will be proceeded with immediately by the Progressive Conservative party when in power. Full consideration has been given to this matter. The leader of this party, having been apprised of the necessities incident to the situation not only in Saskatchewan but also in parts of Alberta and Manitoba, has given his undivided support to the plea that this work be proceeded with at the earliest date that engineering skill and capacity will permit. It should not be delayed four, seven, or ten years, but should be proceeded with now—when this country is apparently entering into a cycle of possible unemployment, and when Saskatchewan is again facing the dangers inherent in drought. Only those who have lived in that province during the trying years of drought can appreciate that this is a work that, if proceeded with now, will give new hope to the people of Saskatchewan and to the people of western Canada as a whole. It will be a national work that will permit the expansion of industrial development, the extension of productivity in the areas affected, and will pay to the nation as a whole profits that can now only be dreamed of.

Then came the election campaign in 1949. I am sure there was no one in Saskatchewan who did not believe that the work was going to be proceeded with, although the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when speaking in Saskatoon said that, while he was in favour of the dam, he viewed with some trepidation the danger of a dam such as was envisaged under the plan being washed out and Saskatoon being flooded.

Following the 1949 election the work proceeded under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and several hundred holes were drilled with a view to determining the proper location for the dam. There were six hundred or thereabouts in all, and everything seemed to be proceeding well to the end that the work would be gone ahead with.

Then on May 31, 1951, for the first time to my knowledge, a suggestion was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that it would be necessary for the province of Saskatchewan to accept the responsibility of providing irrigation facilities. Until that time I had never heard, nor am I able to find any record anywhere, that there was any responsibility to fall upon the province of Saskatchewan. However, the feasibility of the project was admitted by the minister, and in speaking in the house on May 31, 1951, as recorded at page 3601 of Hansard, he said —I am reading the pertinent words—

> —under P.F.R.A., we had Professor Allan appointed again—

That refers to the fact that as early as 1918 Professor Allan had made a report.

> —and then later on in 1947 we had another report on it which has been tabled in the house. Those reports are all favourable. I must say to the committee that all my reports to the government have been favourable, and they will continue to be favourable. I have reported to the government on each occasion we have obtained a report to the effect that in my opinion it would be a good thing to build this dam.
> An hon. Member: This year?
> Mr. Gardiner: Three or four years ago—five years ago, for that matter—every time there has been a report. I think it would be a good thing to build this dam.

The government of Saskatchewan accepted the responsibility imposed upon it and agreed to discharge the financial responsibility incident to supplying the necessary irrigation.

Then a new wrinkle developed. We had had promises throughout the years. The dam was just around the corner at election time. Following that there were water boards set up, responsibility was placed upon the government of Saskatchewan and assumed, and then in the summer of 1951, for the first time, we found that a royal commission of experts was going to be set up to review the reports and decisions of the real experts, those who were members and officials of P.F.R.A.

The setting up of the royal commission was quite a surprise to the people of the province of Saskatchewan. After all, as far as the official opposition were concerned, we promised the minister that we would support him to the limit and without any exception would vote the necessary supply in order to permit the work incidental to the development and building of the dam to be proceeded with. So did the members of the C.C.F. party.

The royal commission was set up and empowered to inquire into the economic and social returns to be derived from the project and to measure them against the cost; and also, in effect, to ascertain whether there was not somewhere else the water could be used to better advantage. At least that is my conclusion as to the meaning of the commission report. Certainly there was nothing that would have indicated that a commission would commence to sit and, even though only intermittently, continue to sit for an extremely long period of time, measured by the months before the report was brought down, in order to determine first, apparently, where the dam should be situated; to review the decision that had been made almost with finality as to the location of the dam; and then as well to determine whether or not the whole project was feasible, and finally, whether in the national interest the social benefits would be commensurate with the expenditure.

The commission finally brought in its report. Everyone knew what was in the report before it was tabled in parliament. For some reason the information became known in December. The general plan in connection with the dam and irrigation project was given in considerable detail. It was designed to provide for the irrigation of 455,000 acres of land in central Saskatchewan and also to provide secondary benefits:

(a) a source of hydroelectric power for a province-wide transmission system;
(b) a source of rural and urban water supply;

That was to supply water directly or indirectly to Regina and Moose Jaw.

(c) stream and flood control; and
(d) recreation facilities.

Throughout the years we who have lived in the province of Saskatchewan have known something of the terrible conditions that prevail in consequence of drought. We remember so well the year 1938. We remember years prior to that. My own memory goes back to the time we first went to Saskatchewan in 1903. Intermittently even in northwestern Saskatchewan there were periods of drought. But those people living in the areas adjacent to the elbow of the South Saskatchewan river experienced recurrent drought throughout the years. They looked forward with hope to something being done to assist them.

Now the report comes down. It is one of the most amazing documents I have ever seen. I presume what the minister said in Winnipeg was—and I am not being profane—that it was a silly damned report, because of the fact that there was a blank in the statement which he made. It is the most surprising piece of work that the ingenuity of man could possible produce, having regard to the evidence which was before them and which was available to them. The engineers and officials of P.F.R.A. had spent years looking into this matter. The minister had given his approval. He had given his benediction to the feasibility of the proposition. Members of the house in all parties were agreed that it was necessary and that it was feasible. However, when the report is brought down it consists of statements in part commendatory and corroborative of the report of P.F.R.A. It speaks of the benefits that could be achieved and at times one almost concludes that the report is going to be favourable. Indeed there never was a report anywhere that could damn a project with fainter praise than did this one.

As one follows the report, one wonders what the decision will be. One can take excerpts from various parts of the report and build up a strong and powerful argument in favour of the proposition. Then after everything has been canvassed the decision finally is that it is not feasible because of the fact that we would not have a market for the garden produce that would have to be grown in order to make the irrigation expenditure worth while; that, in any event, the place chosen is indicated not to be the proper place; and that the social benefits are not commensurate with the expenditure.

The costs given are fabulously higher than those estimated by competent engineers and men in the public service who know conditions in Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, I think it is to be regretted that the commission did not sit during years when drought afflicted our province. I cannot believe that the findings of this commission would have been as they are had the members of that commission had any knowledge of what the people in Saskatchewan suffered and of the terrible terrors of drought during the days of the 1930's until 1938. The highlights of the report are as follows, as summarized by the Canadian press:

The project is rejected as uneconomical under current conditions.

As far as that finding is concerned, it is based in large measure on what appears to be the choice of evidence that was unfavourable to the scheme. After all, when a royal commission is set up you expect it to hear both sides. You expect it to have an open mind. You expect it to face the problem that is before it by weighing the favourable evidence with the unfavourable, instead of weighing the evidence that was negative to the construction of this development. The next finding is this:

The situation might be reviewed when there is a big market for specialty crops, such as potatoes and sugar beets, in the area, or as a relief project in time of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, I think the members of the commission, great and distinguished as they were, did not have—by reason of illness and other difficulties—the opportunity to weigh the measures that had to be considered in connection with this matter. They talk about irrigation for the production of garden stuff. We are not asking for irrigation of that kind. We are asking for irrigation that can be used in a dry farming country and which will have the result of ensuring against recurrent drought and crop failures incident thereto.

It would cost $250 million, likely to be shared $100 million by the Saskatchewan government and $150 million by the federal government and Canadian taxpayers as a whole.

The evidence regarding costs is as prejudiced evidence as one could find anywhere. They chose one contracting firm that for some reason or another in some of its own tenders was twice or three times as high as the lowest tender, and that is decided upon as the company to determine the costs. As far as costs are concerned, the engineers in the Department of Agriculture had gone into that matter with thoroughness and completeness, and no one can convince me that their conclusions were almost 100 per cent wrong. They are men who have been devoted to an examination of this object over a period of eight, nine or ten years. They know more about costs than three commissioners who were brought in and sat in three, four or five centres in Saskatchewan and then wrote a report, numerous as the pages are, without the necessary evidence upon which to determine the costs.

Their next finding is:

More economic use could be made of the money through other projects.

That was not a conclusion they were asked to come to. We realize that the expenditure of money on some other projects —and I have none in mind at the moment— might ensure faster and surer immediate returns; but this proposition is one that would rehabilitate the province of Saskatchewan and give it a boost not only in agriculture but also in industry, without which Saskatchewan would find itself in an unequal position so far as other provinces are concerned.

Although the commission was not asked to do this, they had to find some escape hatches; therefore they say, if you did something else, why you would get returns from that. If you develop a wide program, take a lead in creating a realistic country, use the thousand-mile long Saskatchewan river to the best interests of all Canada, you will get better returns. Then they develop little plans and schemes, some not so little, schemes that the Minister of Agriculture has had under investigation or in contemplation during the years, some of which are under way. They are recommended by the royal commission as something the government can do.

That very fact indicates that while the royal commission sat it was not devoting itself to the securing of dependable information that was available to it under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. As a matter of fact, it is difficult for me to understand the explanation of the Prime Minister the other day that the reason P.F.R.A. employees and engineers were not heard by the commission was that the government did not want to find itself in the position where it would have to weigh the opinions of its own officials. I think they should have been given an opportunity; I think they should have been before that commission. Their reports were there. They themselves could have clarified many of the things which remain obscure in the report of the royal commission, because apparently nothing was done to enlighten the members of this commission whose knowledge of Saskatchewan could not have been as great as their responsibilities were.

The summary goes on:

A smaller chain of irrigation projects should be considered for the prairies, including a 100,000-acre reclamation project near The Pas, Manitoba.

If my memory serves me right, the minister has on other occasions spoken of that plan in Manitoba. He had it before him a year or two ago; yet as an alternative to what the people of Saskatchewan want the royal commission offers something hundreds of miles away as a means by which Saskatchewan and the people in that area may be assured of justice.

Then it goes on:

The value of irrigation in farming, however, was "consistently exaggerated" in Alberta. Green vegetation did not necessarily indicate a high standard of living.

Well, as far as Alberta is concerned I have heard several hon. members telling of the benefits of irrigation, and I have never known one of them to say that those benefits had been exaggerated. As to the finding that green vegetation does not necessarily indicate the highest standard of living, the answer is to be found in the five, six or seven years when there was nothing but arid desert in many parts of Saskatchewan, and when the people felt that if the days would only return when green vegetation would take the place of thistle that hope would be restored to them and a finding such as that would not have been made.

I could go through this report. I have it here; I have read it in detail. And as I read it I asked myself, how can any government place the reliance upon that report that it must in order to turn down a project which throughout the years has been acceptable not only to the minister but to members generally from Saskatchewan without regard to party, and which has been weighed by P.F.R.A. and not found wanting.

Then the report refers to costs. I am not an engineer, but the basis upon which the costs are arrived at indicates a failure on the part of the commission to take account of conditions. There is no realization of the savings that might have been made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and in relief through the years. I believe the figure is $54 million that has been expended in that area over a period of some 22 years. There is nothing to indicate the social and industrial benefits that would flow from the development of power made possible as a result of this project.

Interest is figured over a period of 30, 40 or 50 years in order to arrive at the costs. The report exaggerates the cost as it minimizes and underestimates the economic benefits. I hold in my hand many editorials from Saskatchewan papers dealing with these subjects. I have here the report of Mr. George Spence, a member of the international joint commission for many years, a man who was a minister in our own province and a member of the House of Commons, and who understands this problem as I believe no other layman does. I am going to read a few of the editorials to indicate the attitude of our people, because they do indicate that. The Leader-Post says in an editorial of January 21:

> "Disappointment, resentment and shocked surprise," most aptly describe Saskatchewan's reaction to the royal commission's adverse recommendations . . . Up to now, condemnation of the report has been unanimous, in Saskatchewan at least, although a contrary note has been sounded in Alberta where that government's minister of agriculture expressed gratitude to the commission and declared, in effect, that its recommendations were exactly what the neighbouring province wanted.

Then it goes on to say:

> This has been declared to be impracticable for two reasons.
> It was found there is insufficient land along the river to be irrigated on an appreciable scale.

In general that is the viewpoint of the editorial. It then goes on to say:

> However, properly to interpret Saskatchewan's reaction one must have an understanding of the background which goes back to the acute drought and depression sufferings in 1937 when more than half of all the people of Saskatchewan were in receipt of direct state aid of one kind or another.

Then the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix deals with the economics or pseudo-economics displayed by this commission. In an editorial entitled "Dubious Economics" it sets out the facts, compares costs and says:

> We suggest that the selection of the farm price level from 1921 to 1948 can be challenged on economic grounds.

That was the basis taken by the commission in the determination of economic benefits. The editorial continues:

> The period covers 27 years in Canadian farm history. They include four years of depressed agricultural prices following the first great war boom; 11 years of excessively depressed prices during the black 1930's, and into the first years of the war; and four years when prices were deliberately controlled by the federal government.

It says that if comparisons are to be made, they should be made on a fair and proper basis. I said a moment ago that apparently this commission sought only to hear the things it wanted to hear, namely those that were adverse; or at least not to listen to the favourable things. The Saskatchewan river association gave evidence, but its evidence might just as well have not been given and the hearings might just as well never have taken place. The Regina Leader-Post of January 24 contains an article headed "Accepted the Bad, Rejected the Good". That editorial goes on to set out in detail that as far as costs were concerned and as far as economic facts were concerned apparently the commission sought the things that were unfavourable and accentuated and emphasized them at the expense of the favourable. With regard to the determination that another site for the dam should be surveyed, the Regina Leader-Post in its issue of January 13 states that a proper location has been determined by elimination and scientific examination.

I am going to give my answers to the several points raised in the report. First, in my submission the government should not in any way consider itself bound by the terms of a report which in large measure are contrary to every investigation that has taken place throughout the years, particularly when the royal commission sat for only a short time compared with the years of investigation on the part of the P.F.R.A.

Second, the costs which are indicated for this proposal are overwhelmingly exorbitant. I feel that the government should discharge its responsibility by going ahead with the building of the dam. That would discharge the responsibility that rests upon it and it would not be the costly venture which the exaggerated figures of the commission would indicate.

Third, I believe that the conclusions of the commission as to economic values are based on a false premise. Too much reliance was placed on the extent of farming operations today.

Fourth, the findings of the commission make counterfeit the known facts of history. We know that this area throughout the years since 1854, and by legend and tradition prior to that, has been subject to recurrent droughts. We know the benefits of irrigation. We know what could have been achieved and would be achieved if 450,000 or 500,000 acres could be irrigated for dry farming purposes within the province of Saskatchewan.

Fifth, when the royal commission says that we could not raise vegetables and sugar beets because there is no market available, it again denies the facts of history which show the benefits of irrigation to grain farming in various parts of the United States. I think this whole argument was anwered on August 9, 1951 at Outlook, Saskatchewan when the general manager of the southern Alberta eastern irrigation association, Carl Anderson, of Brooks, said that irrigation was needed in dry land farming areas. He stated also in effect that irrigation could be as beneficial to wheat and other grain farmers in Saskatchewan as it had been to farmers in other parts of North America. It has been indicated in recent years that everywhere in the world irrigation is expanding the opportunity for the production of food. Today Russia has an irrigation plan under way to irrigate some 20 million acres. Today the United States has 7 million acres under irrigation. We in western Canada have some 3 million acres which would be as productive as the best land there is, provided the necessary water was made available.

The other day we heard a speech by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) which indicated the trend of recurring droughts and the need of irrigation and the like to assure the production of all those things. Apparently all that information was lost in so far as this royal commission was concerned. All of that was indeed ignored. One would almost conclude from reading the report that the commissioners had an objective, which was to arrive at point X. While throughout the report they describe the benefits of irrigation and state that sometime in the distant future something along this line might be done, they finally end up by claiming that this project which has been demanded by and promised to the Saskatchewan people for many years should not be built because of the costs.

I believe that we are going to get this project. Without exception we in the province of Saskatchewan are united on this matter. We demand it. We have had far too many excuses, a multiplicity of evasions and a succession of postponements. Today the people are asking for the carrying out of a promise made directly and by implication throughout the years. They are asking that it be not used again as a promise for the future; they are demanding that it be gotten under way now in these days when crop conditions are exceptionally good for this area. They realize that history shows that inevitably periods of rainfall in that area are followed by almost corresponding periods of drought and arid non-production.

It is in order to place this matter before the house and in order to secure the opinion of members of the house that I have endeavoured to arrive at a method. First I thought it might be done through the instrumentality of a private member's motion; but then I found what happened to private members' motions when the new expedient was adopted of moving the adjournment of the debate, thereby ensuring that such motions would wind up in the limbo of forgotten things. So I could not proceed by way of a private member's motion. There used to be a day when private members' motions were just talked out, but now they are voted out by postponement and adjournment. I could not proceed in that way.

Within the rules the only time anything could be done was when a motion for supply came before the house. Then an opportunity is provided, and there is no other opportunity. If there were that is the method I would follow. An opportunity comes to move an amendment to the motion to go into supply. That amendment I intend to move in order to give parliament an opportunity to say what it thinks of this proposition, in order that through discussion Canadians as a whole will have some realization of what this means to us.

We have supported proposals in other parts of the country that have been for the benefit of Canada. Through the years we in Saskatchewan have been denied a fair and reasonable share of defence production because of the fact that we have not power available. Our industrial development might not be as great as that of other provinces, but with power available it would be immeasurably greater than it is. Agriculture itself with assistance would be productive in a large area.

I do not believe that the state should undertake expenditures to go into competition with private enterprise, but I do believe that the state has the responsibility of providing an equal opportunity for Canadians everywhere, and that is all we are asking in the province of Saskatchewan. So far as the report is concerned, a meticulously careful reading of it indicates that it is biased and prejudiced, unjust to our legitimate claims in that province and founded—

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Speaker: Some hon. members are calling "time". I would inform hon. members that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not limited as to time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak beyond my time.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the hon. member that he is not limited as to time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I see. This is one time that I will not overspeak my welcome. I was concluding, Mr. Speaker, because I want to hear the answer of the government. The newspapers say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will speak out here in favour of this project. That is the report, and I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will do the same. We want to hear why this project, justified by experience, reinforced by the evidence of the trained engineers and officials of P.F.R.A., should longer be denied to us. Without exception people in my province are asking parliament to act, not to provide alternative plans, not to start this project or that project, not to picture a vast scheme that is going to cover all Canada. They are demanding that their members from that province present their demands before parliament, demands that are legitimate, fair, reasonable and proper, and which involve in effect the implementation of promises long made and as long unkept. I therefore move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house regrets that in the estimates presented to this house no provision has been made for immediately proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam."

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, so there will be no misunderstanding, I do not want my hon. friends across the way to say that I have accepted the challenge and am proposing to speak for the government. I am speaking as a member from Saskatchewan who is strongly in favour of proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam, as are all other Liberals, and I will even be generous and say all other members from Saskatchewan.

I will not take up your time tonight by trying to give you an outline of the Palliser triangle. I am sure that even if any hon. member here were blindfolded he could take us around the whole area without having seen it because hon. members have heard it described so often.

I will not dwell on the necessity for irrigation—you know it—nor on the economic benefits that will accrue to the country, because Lethbridge is an example of that. When you go into that community, which was once almost poverty-stricken, and see it well settled and prosperous, surrounded by beautiful farming country, you have the answer as to the benefits of irrigation.

No one questions the ability or integrity of the members of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project, nor do we hold their motives in question, but I think as a member of parliament I have a duty to study the report and the soundness of its conclusions.

It seems strange to me that the commission failed to understand and appraise the agricultural, social and economic aspects of the project. The commission failed to take advantage of the wealth of factual information available in the Regina office of the P.F.R.A., information amassed by experts over a period of sixteen years, information concerning low rainfall, soil suitability, temperatures, and effects of irrigation on surrounding communities. It failed to take advantage of the advice and experience, available to it, of the officers of the P.F.R.A., their engineers and consultants, experience gained by the construction and operation of similar projects over a period of years, information on water flow, on foundation conditions, on construction of dams and irrigation canals, information and experience backed by the opinion of the most prominent engineers from the United States.

I refer here to Major General Ferguson, consultant to the United States corps of engineers on water conservation and reclamation; to Professor Casagrande of Harvard, soil expert; and to Mr. Harza of Chicago, construction engineer, who have had wide experience in the construction of such projects. The commission failed to appreciate that this is part of a plan to rehabilitate and settle that dry area of Saskatchewan and Alberta, which is the responsibility of the federal government and which responsibility will not be discharged until this project has been completed. The commission failed to consider and properly appraise the social benefits that would accrue to the people of Saskatchewan, and indeed to the people of Canada as a whole.

Let me refer to some of the statements and conclusions of these men, and offer criticisms. My hon. friend who has just preceded me has gone over this in a general way, and I intend to take some of their conclusions and deal with them in detail. I refer you to page 2, paragraph 5, line 10 of the report which reads:

While the best use of water is an urgent consideration in the Saskatchewan river basin, the problem has not been understood in its broadest aspects. Nor have solutions to it been conceived in terms of the fullest ultimate use of available water.

South Saskatchewan River Project

The scope of the problem is vast so that the selection of projects for water utilization must take into account the general public interest as well as sectional claims.

That is an amazing statement when you consider that the broad problems of water conservation were conceived by the P.F.R.A. sixteen years ago. They have been studying them ever since that time. Surveys and investigations were begun of the South Saskatchewan watershed to serve the public interest. It required ten years to reach the planning and construction stage. The year 1947 saw construction start on the St. Mary project. In 1949 the plans for the development of the Bow river project were completed, and it is now under construction. In 1950 the South Saskatchewan development investigation reached the plan stage.

Now, here is where I think my friend who has just spoken was probably a little unfair to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) because he accused him of not having built this dam in 1946. At that time the plans and studies leading up to a decision as to whether or not it was feasible had not yet been completed, though they thought it was feasible. In any event men today are working on it, planning, sinking shafts and so on, so I do not think my friend is realistic when he reproaches the Minister of Agriculture for not having built the dam years ago. We are just ready now to proceed to build it.

Engineering surveys on the Red Deer river were completed for preliminary planning in 1951, but further soil investigations require two years' work. Other investigations include extension of the Lethbridge northern project, the eastern irrigation district, and many other projects. All these projects and extensions have been studied by P.F.R.A. and by the prairie provinces water board. Water has been allocated. Yet these people come out and say a study or something of that nature should be made. It is ridiculous.

I refer next to page 2, paragraph 7, lines 3 to 7:

The development of large irrigation projects where they are desirable will foreclose other uses, such as hydroelectric power schemes lower down on the same river.

What a ridiculous statement!

The creation of such a tremendous reservoir by a dam will make possible an equal flow of water throughout the winter. The fact that it can be controlled will do nothing but improve projects lower down the river. The South Saskatchewan project would not foreclose other uses downstream. It has been determined that the proposed hydro plants downstream in Saskatchewan would benefit rather than lose inasmuch as the important low winter flows would be increased from 3,000 cubic feet per second to about 5,000 cubic feet per second. In fact, certain of these hydro plants would become much more economical. It is true that the output of proposed hydro plants in Manitoba would be lowered a little. On the Dauphin river the flow would be decreased 3 per cent and on the Nelson river 1 per cent; yet the commission terms these losses "serious".

I will refer next to page 3, paragraph 8, which says:

Moreover, the large scale abstractive use of water for irrigation in eastern Alberta and western Saskatchewan would be at the expense of a serious loss of hydroelectric power at undeveloped sites on the lower Saskatchewan and Nelson rivers.

I maintain that a reduction of power might take place on the lower Saskatchewan if the dam were not there, but on the lower Saskatchewan a dam and big reservoir of water which I mentioned before would do nothing but improve power conditions.

When we are talking about power do not forget that the studies of power output and the design of the power plant have been based on the assumption that 1,700,000 acres of land would be under irrigation in Alberta. That is about three times the acreage under irrigation there now, and this has been approved by Mr. Ben Russell of the Alberta water resources department. It was only after they had made provision for the land available for irrigation that they calculated the water available for power.

On page 4, paragraph 12, it is stated:

From studies of the project the soils are suitable and the amount of water available is adequate for irrigation development. However, the land is situated in a climatic zone that imposes limitations on the crops that can be grown. Furthermore, a readily available market for specialty crops is not apparent at this time.

The reference to climate in the project area is not substantiated by the facts. The climate and the soils are highly suitable for the production of crops in an irrigation economy. The summary report shows this picture quite clearly. The fact is that most of the project lands lie in one of the very driest areas on the prairies. The town of Outlook, which is the centre of the project, receives less rainfall than Medicine Hat, Alberta. It is only the northern extension of the project, comprising 10 to 20 per cent of the area, near Saskatoon, that could be classified as "fringe-y" from a climate standpoint. The commission has seized on this northern tip of the project and has erroneously applied its climatic conditions to the whole project. This it terms "one of the major criticisms".

In paragraph 14, page 4, the commission refers to the risk of failure of sustained irrigation for all parts of the project, such as has occurred in certain irrigation projects in Alberta where over 150,000 acres of irrigated land have reverted to dry farming.

Surely they knew that this project, the western project, was started by the C.P.R. as a colonization venture. Some of that land, true, reverted to dry farming, but the soil conditions there are entirely different from those at Outlook. They have heavy soil, and they have from 18 to 20 inches a year precipitation while at Outlook the precipitation is from 8 to 10 inches. The altitude at Outlook is 1,600 to 1,800 feet, while in the C.P.R. irrigation project it runs around 3,000 to 3,500 feet. The danger of frost is much greater in the higher locations and we do not know but that some day they may decide to revert to irrigation to make better use of that land.

On page 4, paragraph 15, they refer to the Mannix estimate, which states that the project can be completed in six years. Our people, the P.F.R.A., in working it out feel that it would take eight to ten years because climatic conditions dictate this period as the most economical to follow in construction.

In paragraph 16 on page 4 they refer to unfavourable foundation and other conditions in relation to the estimates. That is not borne out by the investigations of leading engineers and consultants from the United States whom I have mentioned. They do not confirm such statements in relation to the estimates. The statement by the commission that the P.F.R.A. has underestimated the cost is not fair. I refer to that particular remark of the commission on page 4, paragraph 16:

> Even where construction is less hazardous, the cost is apt to be underestimated, as in the St. Mary-Milk river project where the anticipated final cost of $45 million compares with an original estimate of $15 million.

Surely the commission knew that was an unfair comparison. Surely they knew that from the time that project was started in 1942 it had been greatly expanded in order that we would get our full share of the water from the St. Mary and Belly rivers. Diversion canals had to be created, storage spaces enlarged and redesigned. It was not any mistake in estimating the cost that caused the increased estimate, it was merely that the project was enlarged. Railways had to be diverted, new roads built, and all these additional costs were added to the original estimate. Construction costs have more than doubled since 1942 when the estimates were made, and still the St. Mary dam itself was built for only a 25 per cent increase in cost; but that was built by Canadian contractors.

Now, dealing with pages 4 to 6, paragraphs 17 to 21C of the report, mention is made o estimating the cost of the project. May point out here that no estimates were give upon which the Mannix company could work The P.F.R.A. engineers were closely associate with the project. They knew the type o construction that was necessary, and in addi tion to that the late Beattie Ramsay an Don MacDonald of Bird Construction, gav estimates that were pretty close together When the Mannix people came in they mad an estimate, probably based on the experienc of their engineers who had worked on th Fort Peck dam, and they estimate that th dam in the Saskatchewan river will cos approximately the same as the Fort Pec dam. This dam is only half as long an has three water flumes as compared wit seven tunnels in the Fort Peck dam, yet the say it will cost the same.

I want to point out to you some of th differences that we find in the bidding o these projects. If you examine the tender which have been received by the P.F.R.A for projects since 1945 you will find a grea variation. You will find a variation of 25 pe cent or more in 66 per cent of these bid 50 per cent or more in 37 per cent of th bids; 75 per cent or more in 26 per cent of th bids; and 100 per cent or more in 9 per cer of the bids. During this period 65 contrac were awarded to a total value of $16,120,00 while the total of the high bids amounte to $23,450,000, an over-all variation of 4 per cent. One can see how easily variatio may take place. I do not want to blam the Mannix company. Perhaps they had i view a different method of construction, more costly one, but I do want to point ou some of the inaccuracies or inequalities i the prices submitted.

The P.F.R.A., with wide knowledge of th type of construction and wide experience i it, is competent, I think, to give an accura estimate of the cost of these works. Here a some works which I propose to discuss detail. They include the Meridian da Elbow crossing, securing riprap, and irrig tion estimates. As I have said both the Mer dian dam and the Elbow crossing are typ of structure with which the P.F.R.A. enginee are familiar. They have built many da of this magnitude in western Canada a are familiar with construction work of th kind. The P.F.R.A. estimate is based current costs and knowledge of dams of sim lar magnitude either under construction recently completed, such as the St. Ma Pothole, Travers, Rose Valley, and so on.

There are no special problems or hazar in connection with either the Meridian da or Elbow crossing. There is no river to handle and no spillways are required, yet these are the comparative estimates. The Meridian dam: Mannix company total cost, including indirect charges, $6,412,000; P.F.R.A. estimate, $4,561,000; a difference of $1,851,000. Then for Elbow crossing we have the Mannix company total cost, including indirect charges, of $7,110,000; P.F.R.A. estimate, $3,609,000; a difference of $3,501,000.

Here is another example, a difference in the cost of securing riprap. The Mannix estimate was based on bringing rock from the Frank slide in Alberta, a distance of 600 miles, at a cost of approximately $14 a cubic yard. The P.F.R.A. estimate is based on harvesting the rock which is available within 40 miles of the dam site, and they received a bid on it of $3.60 per cubic yard. There is a difference in that one item alone of $7 million.

Now, the experience of the P.F.R.A. has shown that they can harvest field stone for the construction of their various projects, and they have been able to get it at an average cost of $4.20 per cubic yard. It is interesting to note that the St. Mary dam is only 100 miles from Frank, and when it was constructed they thought there was not sufficient field stone in that vicinity so they specified stone from Frank for the riprap. The contractor found it more economical to harvest his field stone in the region of the dam rather than bring it from Frank.

I am not an authority on engineering. The P.F.R.A. estimated that their power house would cost $13,800,000. They were basing his estimate on the cost of a similar construction at Pine Falls, except that the waterhead at Pine Falls is only 37 feet while in the Saskatchewan it would be 165 feet. It may be that having this greater weight of water made stronger foundations and stronger generators necessary, and that may account for the difference in cost there.

The P.F.R.A. is presently constructing irrigation distribution systems serving areas of over 400,000 acres in Alberta on the St. Mary-Milk river and the Bow river projects. The P.F.R.A. present estimate for the South Saskatchewan project is $25,500,000 based on their actual current costs, and the present estimate of the cost of the pumping stations based on recent design is $6,500,000, or a total of $32 million for the distribution of water. The estimate made in the commission report is $75 million, a difference of $43 million. In so far as increased costs of labour are concerned, the Mannix estimate provides an item of $10 million for increases in the cost of labour and material. This is only a guess and because of the long period of construction the wage and price trend could reverse. In any event, as costs go up so do benefits, and the ratio can be expected to remain the same. For overhead and profits, the Mannix estimate provides an amount of $15 million for the contractors. I think that is rather high, as it is about 12 per cent of the estimated value of the work. I was under the impression that when contractors tendered on a project of this kind they included their profits.

The commission makes a recommendation upon such projects as have already been completed or are under way. For example in connection with the Qu'Appelle valley project, they recommend that a dam be built at Buffalo Pound lake. Well, that dam was built a couple of years ago. The commission recommends that work be done on the delta of the Saskatchewan river, which has been undertaken along with the Manitoba government. Other soil studies are being made before proceeding further with the project.

In arriving at these astronomical costs, the commission fails to credit the project with the many social and economic benefits which are bound to accrue. I cannot understand how this terrifically accelerated cost was arrived at in view of the estimates based on experience that are put forward by the engineers of the P.F.R.A.

There is one thing that I should like to call to the attention of all hon. members of this house. The construction of the dam is a federal responsibility, and we think it can be built for well under $80 million. The provincial government's responsibility is the construction of the power house and the water distribution system, and I understand that the province is quite willing to accept that responsibility.

I would like to have gone right along with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—I am going to urge the government to build this dam—but the hon. member, while one minute telling us how sure he is that the supporters of the government who are from Saskatchewan will support any move that can be made to have them build this dam, turns around and places before us a motion that puts us in the position of being forced to vote against it. It is a political move to try to put us in the awkward position that if we support his motion we vote want of confidence in the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member mentioned that point, and I rise on a question of privilege because of that fact. There is no reason whatsoever why a minister of the crown should not make it perfectly clear that this vote is a free vote; and that is what I want. I have tried to bring this matter before the house as a private motion.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. The hon. member has asked me a fair question and he has been most reasonable. I am answering him in the same spirit. What I want is to have a declaration by the house freed from any question of want of confidence, and I am all for that.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Speaker, my more experienced advisers—I do not mean more experienced than the hon. member for Lake Centre—or those near me say that on going into supply an amendment like that of the hon. member is a vote of want of confidence and cannot be anything else.

Mr. Knowles: No; not according to the decision on our milk subsidy amendment in 1946.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was held otherwise in 1946.

Mr. McCusker: In view of that fact, Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret not being able to support the amendment. I should like the hon. member to ascertain whether or not he is correct, and to withdraw his motion if he does not want to place us in an awkward position. I am going to tell him frankly that I do not intend to precipitate an election by voting want of confidence in the present government. I am trying to stay here until we get this dam built.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the hon. member should move over to the Senate if he is going to stay here until we get the dam built. I say that on the basis of the promises made in the past and not fulfilled.

However, I do not want to start a political argument. I should like to say this. I do not think a vote for this amendment is a vote of want of confidence, for this reason. I remember that back a few years ago on going into supply we moved an amendment with regard to the subsidy being paid on milk, and this house carried it. One of the ministers, I believe, gave notice that it was not going to be considered as a motion of want of confidence. In this case if the government wishes to place this amendment on the same basis as the amendment that was moved by our group at that time, we can have the opinion of the house on this motion without any vote of want of confidence in the government.

I am sorry that the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), is not here this evening to take part in this debate. This South Saskatchewan river project has been a favourite subject of his in this house ever since he came here in 1935. He has consistently advocated the construction of this project and the irrigation works necessary to bring it to a successful conclusion in the province of Saskatchewan.

We were disappointed when this royal commission was appointed. From the information that had been given to the people of Saskatchewan by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and by P.F.R.A. officials, we had thought that all of the engineering work that was necessary to establish the feasibility and the advisability of this project had already been accomplished and that it was just a matter of waiting until such time as the material and labour were available to go ahead. That has certainly been the suggestion that was given to the people of Saskatchewan. When we found that another commission was to be appointed to go into the whole matter again, it was natural that a great many fears were aroused in the minds of the people of Saskatchewan. When the personnel of that commission was announced, even greater fears were aroused. Inasmuch as this was mainly an irrigation project, we had hoped that there would be two irrigation men and one engineer placed on that commission. We were in hopes that a prominent man on irrigation in the United States would be named as chairman. As a matter of fact, we were given to understand that Mr. Lilienthal, who was the head of the Tennessee valley project in the United States, was being approached to take the chairmanship of this commission. Unfortunately that situation did not develop. We had appointed a commission consisting of Dr. T. H. Hogg, formerly of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario; Mr. G. A. Gaherty from Montreal, who was an engineer and connected with the Calgary Power Company; and Dr. John A. Widtsoe of Salt Lake City, of the agricultural college there and a real expert on irrigation. Then as secretary of the commission we had Mr. B. T. Richardson.

When that personnel was announced we felt that there were two strikes against the favourable consideration of that project; and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar at that time stated that if the government had been desirous of getting a favourable or an unbiased report as far as the irrigation part of the scheme was concerned, it would have been advisable to have two irrigation men on that commission. As a matter of fact the whole handling of this thing, and more particularly the tabling of the report and the advance press notice which was given with regard to it, have inclined some of us at least to believe that the secretary of the commission was prejudiced against the project. I have in my hand the advance copy that was issued to the press by Mr. Richardson, the secretary of this commission. It states:

South Saskatchewan River Report

Unofficial news summary as a convenience to press and radio, available when report is tabled in House of Commons.

I do not know whether this was another leak, but certainly there were people who seemed to know, at least a month before the report was tabled in the house here, what Mr. Richardson's summary was going to be.

Mr. Knowles: There was not any dam to hold it back, anyway.

Mr. Wright: I do not think this is a fair summary of the report.

When one reads it, he cannot help but feel that this summary picks out all of the unfavourable parts in the official report with respect to the whole project. By giving that to the press as the first intimation, the first view they have of it before they have time to review the whole report, it certainly creates an unfavourable opinion in the press right across the country. On the first page they say:

The commission's report, released by the Prime Minister's office today, noted three major arguments against the project:

(1) Its high cost;

(2) The likelihood of more profitable investment in irrigation elsewhere; and

(3) The need for a broader approach to the question of river development.

You find the same tone in the whole report which was issued by Mr. Richardson to the press as an unofficial news summary for their convenience. In the secretary of the commission perhaps we had a person who was not unbiased as far as the project was concerned.

With regard to the report itself, while it is unfavourable as a whole, there are portions of it which indicate the need for this particular project. Many of the various appendices to the report and the presentations made by the various organizations which presented evidence to the commission in Saskatchewan and throughout other parts of western Canada were not unfavourable to the project and gave very cogent reasons why the whole project should be proceeded with at this time; not at some future date; not, as Mr. Richardson says in the summary, when there is—

(2) Demand for farm products in Canada which, if it were more nearly in balance with production, would require more intensive use of land resources;

(3) A change in the relationship of the price of farm products to construction costs;

(4) Need of public works for the relief of unemployment.

I wonder whether we are not to have any development of our natural resources in this country until we go back in a depression again. That would be the impression one would get from reading Mr. Richardson's summary of the findings of this commission. If that is so, this dam should have been built back in the 1930's. We had unlimited amounts of cement in Canada at that time; we had unlimited amounts of labour in Canada at that time. We were giving men ten cents a day to kill time, to carry a piece of stone from one side of the road to the other, when they could have been used in more constructive work such as this South Saskatchewan river dam; and there was certainly need for it at that time.

The need for the construction of this dam becomes more evident as you read the history of agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan over the years. In their presentation to the commission the Saskatchewan government indicated the tremendous fluctuations in agricultural income in that province over the years. In 1937, one of the worst drought years they had in that province, the total sale of farm products in Saskatchewan amounted to some $36 million. That was the cash return to the farmers of Saskatchewan in that year. Last year the return to the farmers of that province was well over $400 million, with approximately the same acreage under cultivation, which goes to show the tremendous fluctuations in production that we have in our province because of atmospheric conditions, weather conditions, over which we have no control. The building of a project such as this in the central part of the drought area in Saskatchewan, which would irrigate some 425,000 to 450,000 acres of land, would provide in the centre of the province where it is needed the fodder which would enable the province to have a more diversified agriculture. I think that is one of the strongest arguments for the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

The Minister of Agriculture over the years, both when he was in the province of Saskatchewan and since coming to Ottawa, has urged that in western Canada, if we are to overcome some of the difficulties with which agriculture is faced there, one of the things we must have is a greater diversification of our agricultural production. I do not agree with some of the methods which the Minister of Agriculture has been endeavouring to use over the last few years to secure that result. As a matter of fact, I think some of the methods that have been adopted have had just the reverse effect, and that is quite evident from the decrease in production of certain of our agricultural products in western Canada. But this project would give stability to our agricultural production.

It was never suggested that this scheme, when it was first put into operation, would pay direct dividends. Practically no irrigation scheme that has ever been built has paid even the interest on the investment necessary to inaugurate the scheme during the first ten or fifteen years, yet very few of these irrigation schemes have not paid dividends in the course of twenty-five or fifty years. They have not only paid dividends in better living conditions for the people who live there, but in actual dollars and cents to the economy of the country that had the foresight, the initiative and the resources to go ahead and develop the irrigation projects and carry them to a successful conclusion.

Almost invariably the irrigation projects that have failed have been those in which the project was undercapitalized, where too great a share of the original cost was passed on immediately to the farmer who was trying to operate a unit in that irrigation district. In every case where that was done, where too large a share of the cost was passed on immediately to the operator of the farm, that scheme failed because the farmer, unable to bear that cost, became discouraged, was unable to get the necessary seed, the necessary equipment and the necessary capital to develop his individual farm and to make a financial success of it.

Where governments have had the foresight to absorb, as the central authority, the major portion of the cost of these developments, then invariably the economy as a whole has been well paid over the years through the better production and the greater consumption in that area of goods and services provided by other parts of the country. That is what would happen in the South Saskatchewan river development. It would be not only a benefit to the immediate area concerned, but to all of Canada. It would be a benefit to eastern Canada through the creation of a market for a greater share of the products of the east, the products of the factories and of the various firms which produce the agricultural implements and the services which would be required in that area. The greater production in that area would be reflected in greater freight shipments to other parts of Canada. It would be reflected in the annual statements of the railroads, of the banks, and of the other organizations which go to make up this country whose head offices are in eastern Canada but who are supplying services to western Canada. This project is not a Saskatchewan project, it is not just a western project, it is a project for Canada as a whole as well as for the people who may be situated in that particular area.

The Saskatchewan government from the beginning have been prepared to assume their fair share of the cost of this project, and that is evident from the report itself. There was a report in the press by some correspondents that would leave some doubt as to whether the Saskatchewan government, in view of the larger costs indicated in the report of the commission, would be prepared to go ahead and assume their share of those costs. I do not know how anyone could have got that impression; certainly they could not have got it if they had read the general submission by the government. Here is what the Saskatchewan government said in their submission to the commission, as appears on page 360 of the report:

> I have attempted to touch on two of the major needs of agriculture in Saskatchewan (apart from market and price considerations). There is great need firstly for assured feed supplies to permit increased diversification of the economy through livestock production and, secondly, for new land on which to resettle insecure farmers.

I shall deal with that later, and I shall also deal at somewhat greater length with the question of cost.

> Neither of these needs can be adequately filled without the central Saskatchewan development. Construction of this project will be a great step forward towards meeting the need for a mature and stable agricultural economy in Saskatchewan. How can we merely calculate in terms of dollars and cents what it might be worth to us. Is it any wonder that the government of this province is anxious and ready to make its investment in the project—that we are so eager to see it started.

When this press report appeared the premier of Saskatchewan wrote a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in which he stated quite definitely the position of the Saskatchewan government with regard to this project. He said:

> In order that there may be no misunderstanding on anyone's part, may I refer you to my letter to the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner of February 10, 1951, copy of which I am enclosing. At that time the Saskatchewan government expressed its faith in the soundness of the South Saskatchewan river project and declared its willingness to meet its share of the cost. Nothing in the findings of the royal commission has altered our opinion in this regard. When the federal government is prepared to proceed with the South Saskatchewan river project, the Saskatchewan government stands ready to enter into an agreement committing itself to pay its share of the cost.

There can be no doubt that as far as the government of Saskatchewan are concerned they are prepared to go ahead with their share of this project whenever the federal government are prepared to build the dam.

South Saskatchewan River Project

The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) dealt with the cost of this dam as indicated by the commission. Mr. B. T. Richardson, in his summary to the press, indicated that the commission estimated the cost of the dam at $250 million. He stated that this would tend to place a great burden upon the land or upon the farmers. He goes on to indicate the various ways in which this might be divided, but he ends up by suggesting that each farm unit, which would be approximately 160 acres, would be saddled with a cost of some $70,000 for the construction of this dam and the delivery of water to the unit.

Of course that is a ridiculous cost as far as a single unit is concerned. I think it is also a ridiculous cost as far as the total project is concerned. The estimate of the engineers of the P.F.R.A. was something over $80 million for the construction of the dam, allowing for the increase in costs since the original estimate was made, and $35 million to $37 million for the cost of the water distribution system.

It is interesting to note that while the commission secured the services of the Mannix company of Edmonton to give them an estimate of the cost and the engineers of that company appeared before the commission, P.F.R.A. officials were not given an opportunity to question those costs. I think it would have been only fair for the commission to call the officials who had made the original estimate. Not only did the commission not call those engineers, apparently the government in Ottawa agreed that those officials should not be called.

On January 28 the Prime Minister answered a question which had been asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) which appears on page 1399 of Hansard and is as follows:

> This commission was established to get information which the government did not already have and to make recommendations to it. As the commissioners had access to all the records and technical advice of the P.F.R.A., it was not necessary for them to have formal appearances by federal officials at public hearings. The government shared this view and gave this opinion to the officials of the P.F.R.A.
> In reaching that conclusion, the government had in mind the fact that it would not be fair to place civil servants in a false position by requiring them to appear publicly and express opinions on matters on which the Minister of Agriculture and the government as a whole had subsequently to reach decisions.

It was not necessary to place the P.F.R.A. officials in that invidious position by calling them before the commission. The engineers might have been called to check the costs submitted by the Mannix company. They had years of experience in the construction of dams—perhaps not of the size of this project—in Alberta and they had figures with regard to the costs of construction which had been obtained from other sources. They knew the cost of moving dirt in the area in which this dam was to be built. They had firsthand knowledge as to what costs in this particular area were likely to be. Surely they should have been called by the commission and allowed to check the figures given by this firm from outside the province of Saskatchewan. I am not saying that firm was not reliable, but I do think that the P.F.R.A. officials who had the knowledge of this subject and who had made previous estimates should have been called and allowed to give their evidence.

There is a reference in the report to the press by Mr. Richardson to the development of an area in the Carrot river valley triangle close to The Pas in Manitoba. He states that there are 100,000 acres there which might be developed. Not only is that project under consideration; work is actually being done there.

Neither Mr. Richardson nor the commissioners make a full recommendation as to the possibilities in that northeasterly part of Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact there are not only 100,000 acres there that can be developed. Reliable estimates have been made of that area, and it is stated that there are between 2·5 and 3 million acres of land there that can be developed by certain diking and drainage projects; not 100,000 acres but 3 million acres. That development is in part at least dependent on the construction of flood controls on other parts of the Saskatchewan river, and the South Saskatchewan river dam would be one of those flood control projects. This area in the northeastern part of the province of Saskatchewan and in the northwestern part of the province of Manitoba and the estuary of the Carrot and Saskatchewan rivers is flooded periodically through overflow from the Saskatchewan river in the peak of the flood of that river which usually occurs late in June when the snows are melting in the mountains.

As a result that area cannot be developed until certain flood controls are placed in the Saskatchewan river either at its headwaters or on the river at Elbow where it is proposed that this dam will be constructed. When that flood control is placed there, then it will make more easily available this 2·5 to 3 million acres of land in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan and in Manitoba. That is some of the most valuable land in the Dominion of Canada. It is the type of land that you see in the Red river valley around the Portage plains, that you see in the Regina plains or in the Red river valley in North Dakota. It is silt land that has accumulated there over thousands of years. It is deep and productive. All that is needed is drainage and the necessary flood control measures in order to bring that land under production.

When this South Saskatchewan river dam is constructed it will make it that much easier to provide the necessary controls and to bring this huge area in the northeastern part of the province under cultivation and production. The area that it is proposed to irrigate from the South Saskatchewan river dam is not in the heart of the real drought area but on the edge of it. That is one of the reasons given by the commissioners and by Mr. Richardson in his unofficial news summary as to why the project should not be proceeded with. Nevertheless this area is so placed that it is adjacent to much of the drought area, and the construction of the dam and the irrigation of the area will enable the provision of feed for stock and feed for ranchers in the drought area itself.

The necessity for these feed banks is most apparent when one goes back and reads the history of what happened in Saskatchewan during the former drought period. In the Saskatchewan submission they say, as found at page 358 of the report of the commission:

> Farmers throughout the prairie parts of Saskatchewan know only too well what a crop failure means when livestock are kept. Our worst experience was in 1937. Between September 1, 1937 and August 31, 1938, more than 450,000 tons of fodder were shipped by governmental agencies—this even after a liquidation of 611,574 cattle for canning purposes at 1-1½ cents per pound had occurred.

The entire livestock population of the huge area in the central part of Saskatchewan, the southern part of Alberta and the southwestern part of Manitoba had to be liquidated in 1937 because even with the shipping of this tremendous amount of fodder into the area there still was not enough feed. They go on to say:

> In that year alone more than $3,500,000 was spent in freight moving hay, feed grain and seed. We hope that this will not happen again—

> —but in each of the years 1945, 1947, 1948 and 1949, it was necessary to ship hay into Saskatchewan to supply areas that had suffered a failure of hay crops. During that period hay was moved from The Pas, Manitoba, to Prince Albert and Saskatoon, from Brock, Alberta to Moose Jaw and Swift Current, even from the interlake country of Manitoba as far as Saskatoon, with freight charges, as far back as 1948 running to $10 per ton.

The construction of this dam would make available right in the centre of that drought area reserves of fodder which would enable farmers there to carry on more diversified agriculture, to keep livestock and to keep them with the knowledge that they were not going to have to sacrifice them for 1½ cents a pound as they did in 1937 and 1938. Until we have some security in the form of additional fodder in the province of Saskatchewan, we can never have the diversified agriculture in that province that I am sure every member of parliament and every business organization in that province would like to see there.

The Saskatchewan government has itself been trying to meet some of the needs for irrigation and some of the needs for the development of better feed reserves in that province. I should like hon. members to note that in 1945-46 the department of agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan had a budget of $826,000, while in 1952-53 their budget was $3,666,000. Much of that money is being spent in the development of feed reserves for livestock in the province. The department of agriculture of Saskatchewan has set up a new conservation and development branch charged with the responsibility of undertaking the physical development of irrigation, drainage and dry land projects. This branch has an appropriation of nearly $1,350,000 for the year 1952-53.

It is well to mention that previous to the inauguration of this branch there were no engineering specialists and no equipment in the department to implement this program. Since the development of this branch engineers have been hired and the scope of the activities of the branch can be gauged by the fact that 45 water users' associations are now organized. Water has been brought to 50,000 acres of land by the province of Saskatchewan over and above the good work done by the P.F.R.A. in this regard in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There have been 145 miles of ditch constructed, 475,000 acres of dry land projects developed, and a million acres of land affected by drainage improvements.

I could go on and give a further review of the efforts that are being made by the province of Saskatchewan to solve some of their own problems with respect to this matter but there is a limit to the resources of a province, and I believe that limit has been reached by the province in the development of the projects under their control. I am not saying they are not going to continue to spend money. They are going to continue to spend it in increasing amounts on these developments.

Their financial resources are not such that they can enter into a project of the size of the South Saskatchewan river dam and ever hope to carry the load of financing.

That is the reason we in the province of Saskatchewan are so anxious that the dominion government go ahead with this project now. We feel that it is essential as far as Saskatchewan is concerned, and that is why I think you will find at least every member from Saskatchewan on his feet expressing his views on this project, urging the federal government not to shelve the thing, not to come in with some half-hearted promise that they are going to set aside a little money to make a further survey or to make a small development with the hope that in the future —twenty years from now—this may be completed.

I hope the government will come through with something that is worth while; and that in spite of some of the unfavourable aspects of this report, the government will recognize its responsibilities. I say "its responsibilities" because it was the federal government of Canada which opened for settlement much of the drought area in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. It was while those lands were under their control that they were homesteaded and put to a use which was not a proper long-term use for those lands.

I hope the government at this session will come down with something definite; that they are accepting their responsibility and that they are going to go ahead with that development. I wish to move an amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). His amendment read:

> This house regrets that in the estimates presented to this house no provision has been made for immediately proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), that the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

> as recommended by the federal government's P.F.R.A. engineers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall I now call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Larson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I move that the house do now adjourn. Tomorrow we will take up the third reading of Bill No. 103, to amend the National Defence Act. Then we will take up Bill No. 7, to amend the Loan Companies Act, and Bill No. 8, to amend the Trust Companies Act. I understand those are very short bills, just amendments to those acts. Then we will revert to this motion to go into supply.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

[Later:]

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I would direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) arising out of the reports that he has just tabled. Are the vessels of the Ming Sung company in the reports which were tabled?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is no. The exemptions for those vessels were withdrawn last year.

Mr. Graydon: Did you ever find those ships?

FLOODS

POSSIBLE IMMIGRATION TO CANADA OF REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) a question. Has the minister made any plans or does he intend to make any plans to make it possible for those left destitute by floods in the old lands to come to Canada? Is the door to Canada wide open to those people?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) telephoned me regarding this subject a short time ago. As everyone would expect of him, he was warm-hearted and concerned about the people who at the moment have been left homeless.

An hon. Member: As we all are.

Mr. Harris: We have given consideration to the problem and while it will be true that a great many of those people will want to continue their lives where they are, there will be some who will find it impossible to do so. There may even be among them some who had before this disaster contemplated emigrating to Canada. We have directed the offices abroad today that the assisted passage scheme, which is now open to the single worker or head of the family, should be broadened to include dependents of the worker as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris: This will make it possible for the head of the family to come to Canada with his dependents without depleting his already depleted resources by the payment of somewhat heavy transportation costs.

If the circumstances as we learn them would indicate that some other step can be taken to aid those who would like to come to Canada at this time, we shall give consideration to it, bearing in mind the fact that people from the United Kingdom, Belgium and the Netherlands have been migrating to Canada since the war in goodly numbers and that they are the best of citizens when they come here.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, that is very good and I say "thanks".

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question there. I notice that the chancellor of West Germany the other day said that he was expecting that some of the refugees from East Germany were likely to go to Canada. Has that been considered?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I presume my hon. friend was not present when the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) raised that matter the other day. My answer at that time was that we had not heard of the proposal, and that is still the answer.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I was going to ask the minister this question yesterday but he is getting so slight I could not see him over there.

Can the minister say when he is going to make the announcement with respect to health insurance which one of his colleagues in the cabinet said recently would be made at this session of parliament?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend knows that whenever an announcement is made it is always made by the government at a time chosen by the government. I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to but I think he will find that my answer is as definite as the question.

Mr. Knowles: See the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair).

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STRATEGIC MATERIALS GOING TO U.S.S.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), arising out of an article in the current issue of Life magazine to the effect that strategic metals and aluminum from Canada are finding their way to the U.S.S.R. Is the minister in a position to say what is being done to prevent such a condition if it exists?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will have to look into the matter but I can say now that there are international arrangements in which Canada participates to ensure that strategic metals do not get to the wrong destination. I think those arrangements are working reasonably well although they are probably not 100 per cent satisfactory. Indeed, during world war II such arrangements were not 100 per cent perfect. I will look into the matter and see if I can make a further report.

EDUCATION

IMPLEMENTATION OF MASSEY COMMISSION REPORT REGARDING UNIVERSITY SCHOLARSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of which I sent him notice. Has the government received a brief from the national federation of Canadian university students asking for action on the Massey commission's report in regard to university scholarships? If so, has it been considered and what action is proposed?

Mr. Speaker: I think that is the type of question which should appear on the order paper.

SUGAR

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY REGARDING IMPORTATION OF REFINED CUBAN SUGAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton [illegible]): I would like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith). In view of a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) yesterday in Havana, Cuba, as reported in today's press, can the parliamentary assistant inform the house what action has been taken with respect to the importation of refined Cuban sugar into Canada?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murphy: I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question of the parliamentary assistant in view of the answer he has given. Is he in a position to say whether the government will take any action respecting the importation of refined sugar into Canada, and take it now?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say whether the government will take any action on that matter. It is quite obvious that I cannot state that. I may say that the minister is in Cuba today and it would be quite improper for me to try to forecast what will be the result of the meetings he is now attending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED MALTREATMENT OF UNION MEMBERS—CANADIAN COPPER REFINERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Has the minister's attention been drawn to reports of maltreatment by the police of union members out on strike against Canadian Copper Refiners, Limited, in Montreal East? Will the minister look into this matter to make sure that the rights of these workers as Canadian citizens are protected and that the principles of justice are not being violated?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn to the newspaper account in question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have seen it in the Montreal Gazette this morning. Other than that I have no knowledge of the matter.

While we are quite willing to look into the matter as he suggested, and shall do so, I would point out to him that, so far as the newspaper account seems to indicate, this is a matter that would clearly come within the administration of justice which, under section 92, paragraph 14, of the British North America Act, is the exclusive responsibility of the province.

National Defence Act

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PENDING PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in connection with the combines report which he just tabled. Are there any pending prosecutions at the present time, and particularly in regard to the alleged combine in the production of fine papers?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question, if he means that an information has been laid and that it is pending in that sense, the answer would be no. If I let the answer remain at that point, however, I think it would mislead the house. We are at the present time considering prosecution in the fine papers case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having counsel's advice?

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF ASSOCIATE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 103, to amend the National Defence Act.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on second reading of this bill it was made abundantly clear by members on this side of the house that they considered that it was necessary to give some assistance to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in order to correct the general breakdown in the administration of his department which had been disclosed; and also to ensure the efficient functioning of that department in the future. Members on this side of the house feel that unless the duties of the assistant minister are clearly defined, and if he is only given loose powers of supervision over the administration of all branches in that department, the Minister of National Defence will not be released from the overburden of responsibility which has led to the breakdown in the department.

In order to correct this situation we have recommended that an associate minister for air, with definite responsibilities, be appointed, thus relieving the present minister from some of his duties.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness):

That the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending section 1 thereof by adding the words "for air" after the word "defence" in the sixth line thereof; and by adding the words "for air" after the word "defence" in the eleventh line thereof; and for the purpose of amending section 2 thereof by adding the words "for air" after the word "defence" in the sixth line thereof; and by adding the words "for air" after the word "defence" in the eleventh line thereof.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I rise to oppose the amendment because it is untimely and meaningless. There are three branches in national defence, the militia, the navy and the air. At the present time, in virtue of this legislation, there are two associate ministers for the whole Department of National Defence which administers the three branches, the militia, the navy and the air. I cannot understand how an hon. gentleman, with the experience of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), does not make the necessary distinction between the land and sea forces as he does for the air. His amendment refers only to the air service. He seems to be satisfied that there will be an associate minister for the militia and for the navy, which are two entirely different units. I do not see why he jumps at once in the air for a third minister of national defence.

This, sir, is my understanding. I do not realize the usefulness of having a third minister of national defence for air services when the two who are actually in office are entitled to look after the administration of the three branches of the armed forces. There is more to it. The idea of the hon. gentleman, and of the members of his party, apparently is to give more responsibility to the minister. Both ministers of national defence will enjoy a limited degree of jurisdiction over the department in virtue of the order in council that will be passed in due course or that has been passed by the government. Therefore, sir, in virtue of the legislation presently before us, the duties conferred upon both ministers are given to them by the government itself.

In his previous speech on the matter, and in the previous speeches of the hon. gentlemen of his party who spoke on this matter, reference was made to the responsibilities of the minister. If I understand the meaning of the amendment before the house, the hon. member who sponsored the amendment had in view the suggestion of limiting the responsibility of each minister. He did not do so for the land and sea services, but he intends to do so for the air service. I cannot conceive why a gentleman and a parliamentarian of his experience has not dealt with the basis of responsibility of the associate ministers of national defence. He knows what I am coming to, and I am sure that when I am through with what I am going to say he will honour me by concurring entirely with me. It appears to be a difficult proposition, but I have enough confidence in the good judgment, the experience and wisdom of the hon. gentleman to be sure that he will agree with me. I say that because of my deep conviction that common sense should be at the basis of all parliamentary debates, in order that the legislation coming before the house and passed by it shall serve its ultimate purpose for the good government of this country.

Well now, sir, that being said, what is the responsibility of the minister? It exists inasmuch as he is the master of his department just the same as the hon. gentleman was master of his divisional unit, the one he was commanding during the war. If there were members of that unit who were coming from different units, as soon as they were put under his command he had full authority over them. Is that true or is it not? Nobody will disagree with that statement. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my conclusion is that the ministers of national defence, —any one of them, any one of the associate ministers; when I say "the ministers of national defence" the term applies to both ministers—in order to have direct responsibility to the House of Commons for the dealings of their department, must have authority over each one of the civil servants or high officials who are within the Department of National Defence. I presume that everybody agrees with me in that statement. How can we say that any minister of national defence has any responsibility to the House of Commons with regard to men who belong to another department? Would it be fair? Would it be just? It would not be. Pure and simple common sense teaches us that it is important that each minister—and I say that not only as to the Department of National Defence but as to the department of any one of the cabinet ministers—should have direct, immediate and complete jurisdiction over all those within the department.

Why do the cabinet ministers bring their estimates before the House of Commons of Canada? They do so in order to render account of the dealings of their department and of the payments made by the department to anyone, not only for salaries and wages but for all kinds of expenditures that are approved by the department.

In any contract what is required? It is the consensus of one about a definite thing, whether it be a thing to buy or a thing to do. An essential part of a contract also is the payment that is made whether it be payment of salaries, of wages, for services or for things that are delivered to the purchaser. In this case the Minister of National Defence has no authority whatever concerning the payment made on behalf of his department. Those payments are not made by officials of his department. Those payments are made by the officials of another department who are intruders within the department. The minister has no authority over the treasury officials in his department who are under the comptroller of the treasury and who are under the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I do not make that statement in order to complain of the Minister of Finance. I do so in order to bring to the attention of my hon. colleagues some facts that I hope will provide them with food for thought.

May I quote an example? Right here within this House of Commons the treasury officials are not civil servants under the authority of Mr. Speaker; they belong to the Department of Finance. They are a branch of the comptroller of the treasury. The cheques that are issued here are issued by the House of Commons branch of the comptroller of the treasury. Here in the House of Commons we have elevator men but they are not under Mr. Speaker; they are under the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). Our speeches are translated but they are not translated by men who are under the direct jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker as they were in days gone by. They are translated by men who belong to the bureau for translations and who are under the Secretary of State Department. I could quote other examples but I content myself with giving only a few in order that the house may understand my contention well enough that they may say I am not out of order when I discuss these matters which are of vital importance to each member of the cabinet and to each member of the house.

Any one of the ministers of national defence cannot buy a soldier's cap or a sailor's cap; he has to make a requisition for it. When the legislation was changed I said that the then minister of national defence, who was transferred to another department some time afterward, had been emasculated as to his political jurisdiction over his own staff. Why can they not order the purchase of one thing for any one of the branches of the department? The answer is that they are not responsible for the payment for that thing; it comes under the Department of Finance.

I also remember that the national defence purchasing board was established in order to supply the Department of National Defence with the things that were requisitioned by the minister. For many years, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence has had no authority whatever with regard to the payments made by his department, and which should be made by his department but are effectively made by the Department of Finance through the office of the comptroller of the treasury.

That change which was made by the late Mr. Bennett had a considerable effect upon the jurisdiction and the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence. In order to give an idea of the growth of the comptroller of the treasury's office, on July 3, 1935, at page 4198 of Hansard, the late Mr. Mackenzie King said:

> The appropriation in the main estimates for this office was $1,576,851, an increase of $7,112 over the vote of the previous year. We are now being asked to vote an additional $80,000—

So the total amount that was voted for the comptroller of the treasury's office in 1935 was $1,586,000. And if I look at the public accounts for 1951-52 I see that the expenditures in 1950-51 were $12,719,000 for the same purpose; in 1951-52 the amount was $14,030,092, and the appropriations in 1951-52 were $14,246,433. These numbers are in italics in the public accounts for 1951-52. The increase has been nearly tenfold in the last seventeen years.

According to a chart of May, 1938, there were 79 employees of the comptroller of the treasury in the Ottawa office of the Department of National Defence and there were 73 in the outside offices, making a total of 152. There must be ten times as many now, because the cost of keeping that office is approximately ten times as much as it was seventeen years ago. Would it be fair to say that neither of the associate ministers of national defence has any responsibility to the House of Commons for dealing with those men who do not come under him in the department? They do not have to listen to any minister of national defence, but they have to listen to the Minister of Finance and they are supposedly independent of all the other ministers, including the head of the government.

They may make concessions, but according to the legislation that has been passed, and the orders in council relating thereto, this is the situation that we have to face now. That is why I ask the hon. gentleman who has proposed the amendment to listen to the words of Mr. Mackenzie King on March 22, 1934, as reported at page 1713 of Hansard:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: I do think it is most important that parliament should retain the power, which it has had for fifty years, of exercising control over public expenditures in the manner in which formerly it did. I submit that at the time the bill was introduced the house was not given to understand that the new appointment of comptroller provided by the act meant any withdrawal from the Auditor General of this particular function, which is the most important of all he formerly had, and placing it in the hands of an officer of one of the departments of government. Had the house so understood, I am sure there would have been strong opposition to such a proposal, and that the house would never have consented thereto. I am not sure that when the government brought in the bill its members appreciated the fact that this would be the consequence.

And there is more to it. If one knows how this legislation operates by statute and by order in council, it is the present Auditor General who was appointed the first comptroller of the treasury in 1931. I remember at the time that the then deputy minister of finance was coming fresh from a banking firm of Chicago, the Strauss firm. He had not the same experience as he had when he died, and he was full of ideas on centralization. He succeeded very easily in convincing the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that his proposal was the best that could be accepted, and he had in his department a gentleman who had very little experience in accounting, and who has acquired more experience since, especially since he has become Auditor General. But this was concocted by two people, by the late W. C. Clark, the deputy minister of finance, and Mr. Sellar, the first comptroller of the treasury who is now Auditor General.

If one appreciates the truth and exactitude of what I have said since I rose this afternoon, how can the Auditor General blame the Minister of National Defence and the Department of National Defence for anything that is done by men who are not under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence? It seems to be clear enough, sir. The only way out is to give full responsibility to both associate ministers of national defence. These are my concluding words. The only way out is to abolish the office of the comptroller of the treasury and restore parliamentary responsibility in each department in order that each minister of any department should be responsible to the house for all that is done within his department, for the payments as well as for the orders. And that, sir, I leave to the meditation of my hon. friend from Nanaimo and to my colleagues in the house. I wonder if they will say publicly that they agree with me. I consider that they are sincere gentlemen, and I know very well that in the bottom of their hearts they will agree with me, even if they do not say so. And, moreover, I am very positive that they will join me—

Mr. Cardiff: You have a great imagination.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not catch the point I made. But he needs to meditate a little more. And if he does he will realize that what I have said is based upon parliamentary practice in England. What has been done has been done according to American expediency. Centralization was an American inspiration, while parliamentary responsibility is British to the core.

And that is all I want. I want to be fair to everyone. I am sure that my friends from all sides of the house, when they think over this matter, will join me in protesting against the system of centralization under the comptroller of the treasury, that they will support my contention that the office of the comptroller of the treasury should be abolished. With their support, in a very short time we will succeed, for the good of the country.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, by some devious form of reasoning the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) seems to have offered the peculiar argument that the deficiencies which have been brought to light recently in the Department of National Defence should be laid at the door of the late Lord Bennett, the late Dr. Clark and the present Auditor General.

It seems to me the hon member, in his complaint with respect to financial control in the Department of National Defence and in other departments, is confusing decisions made in any one department in respect of the spending of money, and matters of administration connected with those expenditures, with accounting methods used in connection with the spending of those moneys.

So far as I know, treasury branch officials in the Department of National Defence have nothing to do with deciding what moneys allotted to defence shall be spent for that purpose. They merely make sure that whatever sums are voted by parliament shall be spent for the particular projects to which they are allocated. The decision as to what will be spent, and the actual handling of expenditures, is not in the hands of treasury branch officials at all.

Without going into the other arguments offered by the hon. member, it seems to me that what happened during the war is sufficient proof that his argument has no validity whatever. In wartime we had a situation such as we now recommend, namely that there should be a minister for air. When I first came to the House of Commons there was a minister of national defence and, in addition, a minister for air. In 1945 the other defence ministry had disappeared, and only two were left.

In other words we had at that time exactly the situation we now recommend. There seemed to be no complaint in those days. I believe therefore that what I say disposes of the other arguments the hon. member has offered. We have suggested that there should be a minister for air. It has been suggested over and over again in the house by members on all sides that our defence effort should be concentrated on the air. If one may judge by the money allocated to this purpose, this is being carried into effect by the government. Almost half the present defence allotment is to be spent on air defence. It is because of this we have recommended that a minister for air be appointed, and that he be given definite responsibilities in respect of the air arm.

I think all hon. members will agree that the situation which has prevailed in the Department of National Defence has not been a satisfactory one. Confusion has existed, and as a result of that confusion inefficiency has manifested itself in various ways. The remedy proposed by the government to end that confusion and inefficiency is to appoint an associate minister having indeterminate powers. It is indicated that, so far as there is anything particular about it, he shall have charge of administrative affairs. But policy and administration are so closely intertwined that it will be extremely difficult for the associate minister to know what his responsibilities are, and what he is supposed to do. The great weakness in the whole thing is that the duties and responsibilities of the new associate minister will not be definitely defined. It seems therefore to a great number of us that the confusion which now exists in the department will be worse confounded by the move now proposed.

I do not think there is any need to repeat the numerous arguments supporting the course we have proposed. There can be no doubt however that, if the government could see fit to adopt it, our proposal would bring about much greater efficiency in the transaction of business in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Amendment (Mr. Pearkes) negatived on division.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Harkness: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

INVESTMENT IN BONDS ISSUED BY INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Loan Companies Act in order to allow companies incorporated thereunder to invest in bonds issued by the international bank for reconstruction and development.

Canada has been a member of this bank from the time of its establishment after the end of the war and has co-operated actively in furthering its objectives. The bank has made a steadily increasing volume of well-considered developmental loans. As a result of these loans as well as by constructive advice which the bank is able to give to the governments of underdeveloped countries in the formulation and the development of appropriate projects for financing, the bank is believed to be making an important contribution to world peace and prosperity.

In addition to the use of its own paid-up capital, the bank obtains funds by the issue of loans from time to time, chiefly in the United States market. It has not been considered desirable that the bank should be wholly limited to the United States market for borrowed funds. In February, 1952, therefore, as an earnest of its desire to give practical co-operation in the furtherance of the bank's objectives, Canada permitted the bank to make a public offering of its bonds in Canada and the bank made a successful issue of $15 million in the Canadian market.

The bonds of the bank are given a high investment rating by the recognized investment services. In 1947 the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act was amended to permit our insurance companies to invest in these bonds. Permitting loan companies, subject to federal jurisdiction, to invest funds in these bonds will help to broaden further the market for them and should assist the bank in connection with further financing which it may be permitted to attempt in Canada.

The international bank for reconstruction and development was established to provide and facilitate international investment for increasing production, raising living standards and helping to bring about a better balance in world trade. The bank began its operations in 1946. At the end of August, 1952, the bank had made seventy-two loans amounting to nearly $1,500 million in twenty-seven of its member countries and two of their overseas territories.

The fifty-four member nations of the bank are its stockholders, and the money which the bank lends is provided partly by them. When a country becomes a member it pays 2 per cent of its stock subscription in gold or dollars and 18 per cent in its own currency. The bank may lend from the 18 per cent funds only with permission of the member concerned. The remaining 80 per cent is not paid to the bank and is subject to call only if the bank should need some part of it to meet its obligations. The Canadian subscription was $325 million of which 20 per cent has been paid, or $65 million.

The bank derives the remainder of its loanable funds from the sale of its own securities in the capital markets of the world. The total amount of the bank's securities now outstanding is about $500 million. Of this amount $450 million has been raised in the United States market, $15 million in Canadian dollars in the Canadian market, $14 million in pounds sterling in the United Kingdom, and the remainder in Swiss francs in Switzerland.

All payments of interest and principal from borrowers have been received as due up to date. In its first year the bank operated at a deficit of almost $1 million. In succeeding years it has had increasing net earnings ranging from $4 million in 1947-48 to over $15·5 million in 1951-52. These earnings have been carried to a general reserve which on June 30, 1952, amounted to $58 million. A special reserve, derived from a 1 per cent commission which the bank's charter requires it to charge on all loans, amounted to $27·7 million. Total reserves therefore amounted to $85·7 million. The bank may lend to governments or to other borrowers. Loans to other borrowers have the guarantee of the member government concerned.

The bank's first loans, amounting to almost $500 million, were made to help in the post-war reconstruction of France, the Netherlands, Denmark and Luxembourg. Subsequent loans in Europe have been made to modernize and improve production and transportation facilities. In 1948 the bank began lending in less developed countries. Most of its loans, and about half the money it has lent, have been used to provide foreign exchange needed for projects in these underdeveloped countries. The loans have been made principally for the creation or improvement of basic facilities such as power, roads, railways and irrigation.

The amounts lent do not measure the magnitude or the total costs of these projects. The bank normally finances only the foreign exchange costs of imported equipment and services needed to complete projects; usually the larger part of the cost of any project is met by the borrower. The total cost of projects completed or going forward with the help of bank financing amounts to more than $3 billion. Canada of course is highly interested in increasing production, raising living standards and especially, as an exporting country, in helping to bring about easier conditions in world trade. That is the reason for the amendment.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very clear statement of the purposes of this measure, and I have no criticism to offer. There are some questions I should like to ask when we get into committee. It seems to me that a prima facie case has been made, and I think it is worth commenting—certainly from my point of view it is satisfactory—that this appears to be one bit of international financial mechanism which has really worked according to plan and which we can only hope will go on increasing its influence and usefulness.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Debentures, bonds, stocks, and securities of Canada, provinces, United Kingdom, United States, etc.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if he can give us some information indicating not merely what loans have been made but whether the demand is completely fulfilled. Have there been other desirable loans which it has not been possible to make? While I am on my feet, let me ask a further question. The parliamentary assistant made it quite clear that the primary guarantee was not merely that of the borrower in the case of a private concern but of the government concerned also. Does the bank in fact take security, like an ordinary commercial bank, on the assets involved or does it rely wholly on the guarantee of the borrower and the government?

Mr. Lesage: According to my information, it relies on the guarantee of the borrower and the government, but most of the loans have been made to governments and for government projects. With respect to the first question of the hon. member for Greenwood, he asked whether there is a large unsatisfied demand for loans in underdeveloped countries. Do I understand that is the question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Or anywhere.

Mr. Lesage: The answer is yes, especially in underdeveloped countries. When I was at the meeting of the economic and social council last summer in New York we discussed the world bank and a proposition was put forward for the establishment of an international finance corporation which would supplement the work of the world bank and lend to individuals, individual corporations or organizations in various countries without any government guarantee. Of course, as my hon. friend is aware, the demand is even greater than that, and the underdeveloped countries, under the guidance of Mr. Santa Cruz from Chile, have asked for the last two years, in the general assembly and the economic and social council, that forthright grants for development be made by the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, France and other countries to all underdeveloped countries.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance may have mentioned the rate of interest charged by the bank but if so I did not catch it. I wonder if he could tell the committee whether the bank charges the same rate of interest in all cases or is it graduated according to risk and security?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the bank does not charge the same rate in all cases. It is according to the risk or the securities offered. The rates, according to a statement contained in the seventh annual report of the bank, from what I can see by a quick reading, would range from 3½ per cent to 4¾ per cent or thereabouts. That includes the 1 per cent commission which is payable to the bank on all loans.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask a question? As a result of the flood conditions at the present time Holland and Belgium could come along and ask for loans from the bank to rebuild their dikes.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, Mr. Chairman, they could. It is a question of arranging it with the authorities of the bank.

Mr. Fraser: What rate would they be charged in that case?

Mr. Lesage: Well, I do not know. That is a matter to be arranged between the governments concerned and the bank. It all depends on the securities offered. The loans are not all direct loans. It very often happens that the borrowing country will issue bonds of its own which will be sold in the public markets of the world either with or without the guarantee of the bank. For instance, when The Netherlands borrowed money to buy ships on July 15, 1948, they paid with obligations of The Netherlands which were sold by the bank on the markets of the world at the rate of $3\frac{9}{16}$ per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Concerning the question I asked a moment ago, let me remind the committee that what we are doing is approving this form of investments as a proper form of investment for those who have the trust moneys of Canadian citizens to invest. Therefore, it is relevant to point out, as the parliamentary assistant has done, that the running of this bank is done on a business basis. He pointed out that something like $1 billion has been loaned, of which some $500 million has been repaid in instalments on loans. That would be a very healthy condition in so far as that test is concerned—a very usual test and which speaks much for the safety of the loan. However, I want to come back and ask this other question. From what I understood the parliamentary assistant to say a few moments ago, the bank has not been able to take all of the business offered. We hear on all sides the statement, which I think we all accept, that one of the best and one of the necessary safeguards against world unrest—I think Mr. Truman called it point four—is that we should try in every way to assist underdeveloped countries to help themselves. I would like to ask how far, if the parliamentary assistant can tell us without a lot of detail, these unsatisfied demands or requests for loans were turned down because they were considered not good risks, and how far they were turned down simply because the bank ran out of funds.

That leads me to ask one other question before I take my seat. What subscriptions from fellow member nations have not yet been paid? If I understand correctly, not a very high percentage of the underwriting of the various nations has been paid. If I am wrong I can be corrected.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to correct the hon. member for Greenwood. All the original members of the bank have paid their 20 per cent except China and Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Twenty per cent?

Mr. Lesage: Twenty per cent: 2 per cent in American currency or gold and 18 per cent in their own currency.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What about the other 80 per cent?

Mr. Lesage: The other 80 per cent is not payable unless there is default on a loan and the bank is unable with its surpluses, its reserves and its cash to pay off the default. It is only if the bank has to go to the members of the bank in those circumstances that the balance is payable.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In effect, does that mean that only 20 per cent is really a subscription to the bank to enable it to carry on business and the other 80 per cent is in the form of reserve or guarantee? That of course operates to strengthen the loan but it seems to me that it also operates to cut down by $\frac{4}{5}$ or 80 per cent the bank's loanable funds—that is not quite right because there are other funds which the bank gets—but it does cut down by 80 per cent the subscriptions from member nations. I am not saying that is not right, but I do want to say it is maybe almost undue caution and I would ask the parliamentary assistant if it is not hampering the operations of the bank; and whether, having regard to the fact that the bank has been in business for several years, and has 50 per cent of its loans repaid—a very high percentage in such a short time—they are not falling over backwards in the matter of conservatism. I rather blush to suggest that could happen, nevertheless we do want this to operate at full efficiency. Perhaps the matter has been considered and perhaps there is a reason that has not become clear yet, but I would like to have his comment.

Mr. Lesage: The conditions requiring 20 per cent to be paid—2 per cent American currency or gold and 18 per cent in the member's currency—and 80 per cent to be called only in case of default, are contained in the articles of agreement which were approved by this house in 1945. They are covered by article II, sections 5 and 7, and article IV, section 7.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, yes, Mr. Chairman, I realize that, but 1945 is eight years ago. There has been a lot of experience since that time. I suppose that eight years ago this project was unprecedented. I would hesitate to say that the world was more unsettled eight years ago than it is today; nevertheless we have had eight years of experience and I would think we have had eight years of talk about the necessity of doing everything of this kind that we can to assist development.

I realize that the government of Canada cannot decide these things but I would suggest to the parliamentary assistant that we might very well ask whether what was done eight years ago was necessarily like the laws of the Medes and the Persians; or whether our government might not consider suggesting that with eight years' experience—and apparently very good experience as lenders with 50 per cent of the loans repaid—they could not launch out a bit. I am basing this on the one statement that they have not been able to accept the amount of business offering. Would I be correct in saying that part of this business has had to be turned down merely for lack of funds?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, no demands for loans have been turned down because of lack of funds. When they were turned down it was because the necessary guarantees were not offered. I explained that quite clearly when I was talking about the international bank making loans on a sound business basis. After all, as the hon. member has said himself, we are going to allow people in Canada who are administering trust funds to lend money to this international bank. Surely we could not do that if that bank was not administered according to sound business practices.

Secondly, if I mentioned the proposed international finance corporation, I did it only to distinguish between loans made to governments or to borrowers guaranteed by governments and others. I was saying that the underdeveloped countries wanted to go further and asked for a finance corporation which would make loans which would not be guaranteed by governments. I said that this is still under study in the economic and social council.

Third, there is this huge demand for outright gifts. I was just making plain the difference between the three, so that it would be very clear that we believe that any investment of money in the bonds of the international bank is sound business because the bank is operated according to sound business practices. Personally, I do not know of demands for loans from the bank that have been refused. It is like going to a bank manager; you have to agree on the terms. It is quite possible that some demands for loans could not be granted because there was no agreement on the terms or on the guarantee; that is possible.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think there is any difference between the parliamentary assistant and myself as to what is desirable. I quite agree that these loans must be safe. In view of what has been said, that loans have not had to be turned down through lack of funds, then I think we merely come back to this question—I shall not dwell on it—as to whether or not the terms are unnecessarily stiff. I do not think there is any point in my adding anything more.

I should like to ask a further question as to the marketing of these securities. I have in my hand the report of the international bank dated December 15, 1952. There is a reference here to the successful marketing in Canada and to the not so successful marketing of the last $100 million in the United States. They say here that the first $100 million United States issue of September, 1951, was an initial success. Then, later it says:

> As matters developed, however, it became apparent that many banks and dealers . . . were interested more in subscribing for the bonds with hopes of an immediate rise in their market price, rather than in stimulating interest in the bonds among the investing community.

That is rather unfortunate. That was in September, 1951, and I wonder if the parliamentary assistant can say anything as to the standing of those bonds, as to the marketing of those bonds in the United States since that time, bearing in mind, as I said a few minutes ago, that it looks as if this part of the international financial mechanism had worked and seems to me highly desirable that every effort should be made to make it work on as large a scale as possible consistent with safety, which obviously we have to have if we are going to permit trust funds to be invested.

Mr. Lesage: What date was that offering in the United States?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It was September 12, 1951.

Mr. Lesage: I have no information about this offering in the United States, except that it was sold. I know that. I know that the offering of $15 million in Canada in 1952 was very successful, and was sold at par.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It has a three-quarters per cent higher rate.

Mr. Lesage: It was offered at par, 4 per cent 10-year bonds. They were dated February, 1952, to mature in February, 1962.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think I need to carry the discussion further. I would hope that what has taken place would at least warrant a review of the situation. After all, it is not a final answer to say that when we were exploring this matter in 1945 certain regulations were laid down. I think eight years later it would be eminently reasonable to say that the matter might be re-explored with a view to taking whatever action seemed reasonable.

Mr. Fraser: Will the parliamentary assistant say whether the bonds that were sold in 1952 are at par on the market today?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know, sir.

Mr. Jones: The hon. member for Greenwood has referred to the conservative attitude of this bank, and I hope that the suggestion that it be reviewed is accepted. I should like to know if any borrowers have defaulted on principal or interest up until now?

Mr. Lesage: No, sir, as I mentioned in my statement on second reading.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have one or two questions I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant. He is fully acquainted with these matters because of his experience in Paris and New York, and I am sure he will be glad to furnish the committee with the information I have in mind. Certainly the assistance of underdeveloped countries, in order to permit them to rehabilitate themselves and thereby defeat the spectre of poverty with which they are faced, is one of the most important activities of the United Nations. Defence has a large place, but moneys devoted to enabling people to face the future without fear may go a long way towards raising those standards which will ultimately afford a bulwark against the advance of communism.

I am wondering whether or not the parliamentary assistant has statistics available to him indicating the degree to which loans to underdeveloped countries are expected to be advanced during the next several years. What are the plans? Is it being found that what has been done is having a beneficial effect in proportion to the amount of moneys that have been advanced by the various nations within the United Nations? Certainly, the world situation today demands action of this kind. Some 150 years ago, when the Malthusian theory of population and food was first advanced, it was regarded as without economic foundation. Now, we find ourselves in the position that the population of the world is increasing at the rate of 25 million a year, and that within a matter of 90 years the population of the world will have doubled. Food production is not keeping pace with the population increase.

The purpose that the United Nations has in mind is to enable these countries to produce for themselves. Is the parliamentary assistant in a position to say what the definite plans are for the next few years? When he is making a reply, would he let the committee know the degree to which Canada has contributed to this by private investment through the purchase of bonds, such as the bond issue to which he referred that was floated in 1952 and prior thereto?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the Canadian contribution to the world bank, as I have said, is a subscription of $325 million of which 20 per cent or $65 million is paid up. The contribution was made up of 2 per cent in United States dollars or gold and the balance of 18 per cent in Canadian dollars. There has been an issue of $15 million on the Canadian market; that was last year, in 1952. Also some Canadian investors bought some bonds of the United States issue. For instance, I know that the insurance companies of Canada bought over $2 million in the last public offering in the United States of which the hon. member for Greenwood was speaking.

The plans for the future are to carry on along the same lines as the bank has been following and to lend money to underdeveloped countries as much as possible under the conditions laid down in the agreement, to further the raising of the standards of living, and to help the backward countries of the world grow more food. As a matter of fact, if the committee will allow me to do so I should like to give only a few examples which I find in the report made by Mr. Eugene R. Black, president of the bank, on June 16, 1952, to the economic and social council of the United Nations, in New York. He says:

> In the fertile fields of Chile, in the tropical valleys and upland plains of Colombia, across the mountainous countryside of Nicaragua, you would see hundreds of new tractors at work, helping the farmers to grow more food.
> In the central plain of India, you would see at work a fleet of 240 much heavier tractors—one of the largest tractor fleets in the world—which has already cleared nearly half a million acres of rich land previously almost useless for cultivation because of the encroachment of a stubborn and vigorous weed.

It is the same in Colombia, in Ethiopia, in Finland and in Yugoslavia. In France, Belgium and Luxembourg the bank has helped the steel industry. In India and in South Africa locomotives and rolling stock have been purchased from Canada with bank funds. As a matter of fact—and this answers more definitely one of the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre—Canadian dollars have been used, for instance, to buy in Canada locomotives and railway equipment for India and electrical equipment for Brazil and Mexico for hydroelectric developments which those countries could undertake.

The bank is certainly doing one of the best jobs that can be done in the world in order to help backward countries raise the standards of living of their people.

Before I sit down I should like to make a correction with regard to one thing said by the hon. member for Greenwood. I believe he misunderstood me when he said half the loans had been repaid or reimbursed to the bank. That is not the fact. Up to date the loans amount to $1,412 million. Of this amount—and that is probably why the hon. member for Greenwood made that error—$102 million of loans are not yet effective. There have been nearly $30 million in cancellations and refundings. Repayments to the bank amount to a little bit over $10 million. The effective loans outstanding held by the bank amount to $1,213 million, of which the principal amount disbursed is $876 million and the undisbursed balance is $403 million.

Mr. Jeffery: I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant. Are the borrowing powers of the bank limited in any way in comparison with their capital or can they go on borrowing to any extent? Before I sit down I should like to express a little bit of surprise at the suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood that the taxpayers' money should be taken and advanced to the bank as long as they are in a position to borrow money from private finance.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, of course the borrowing limit of the bank will be set by the governors of the bank. There is a governor of the bank for each member country.

Mr. Jeffery: In other words there is no safety guarantee as to whether they could borrow three or four times the amount of the responsibility of the people who participate in the bank?

Mr. Lesage: I believe that the voting power, as it is described among the members of the bank, is an extremely safe guarantee that the bank will not go too far.

Mr. Quelch: Will the parliamentary assistant say something about the change in policy with regard to the organizations who will be borrowing under this legislation, or the groups of people? I understand that in some of the backward countries it will be possible for certain organizations to borrow money, but they will actually be paying two or three rates of interest. They will be paying the rate of the interest of the initial investor, the rate of interest of the bank and also the rate of the financial institution in the country that borrows it. I saw in the paper a report to the effect that that rate of interest would probably be about 6 per cent to the ultimate borrower. Would that be about correct?

Mr. Lesage: I do not quite understand the question asked by the hon. member. Does he contend that when somebody borrows from the bank he will have to pay interest to the original investor?

Mr. Quelch: That would be included in it. That would be part of the cost or the rate that he pays.

Mr. Lesage: No. A few moments ago I gave the rates on loans, and that is all there is to be paid. That included the one per cent of commission. I think I gave that in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Peace River. The rate of interest varies from 3½ per cent to 4¾ per cent.

Mr. Quelch: Would that be true under the new policy that is being adopted by the bank?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know of any new policy adopted by the bank. I have the reports of the bank, and there is no new policy as to the rates of interest. The rates of interest are given here in the report; I refer to the seventh annual report. Those rates include everything.

Mr. Quelch: I mentioned the matter because a great deal of publicity was given in the New York Times, I think it was, to the fact that they are widening the scope as to the kind of organizations that would be able to borrow under this legislation, and they pointed out that a proper rate of interest to this group would be over 6 per cent.

Mr. Lesage: My hon. friend must have read about the proposed finance corporation which is still under study. That is probably the answer.

Mr. Low: That is subsidiary?

Mr. Lesage: Exactly.

Mr. Low: That is what I was referring to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

INVESTMENT IN BONDS ISSUED BY INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This bill is on all fours with the other, and what has been said already is entirely relevant and I think covers the situation.

On section 1—Debentures, bonds, stocks and securities of Canada, provinces, United Kingdom, United States, etc.

Mr. Lesage: I was asked a moment ago on the other bill if there was any limitation to the bank's loans. I should like to refer to the articles of agreement which can be found in the second schedule of chapter 11 of the statutes for 1945. Article III, section 3, reads as follows:

> The total amount outstanding of guarantees, participations in loans and direct loans made by the bank shall not be increased at any time, if by such increase the total would exceed one hundred per cent of the unimpaired subscribed capital, reserves and surplus of the bank.

Mr. Knowles: One simple little question. Paragraph (c) of clause 1 contains the words "the United Kingdom", and they are underlined, indicating that a change has been made. I presume it is a matter of terminology. Can the parliamentary assistant say what the wording was before?

Mr. Lesage: Yes; it was "the government of Great Britain and Northern Ireland".

SUPPLY

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Wright.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, in continuing this debate on the South Saskatchewan project there are a few remarks I wish to make. First I should like to say that I am very happy to agree with almost everything the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) had to say about this matter on Tuesday night. I am speaking for myself, but I know that all members of this party on this side of the house, from our province especially, are as much interested in the development of this project as he is. In addition, this government has consistently voted money to carry on the investigations that are required before a project of this magnitude can be brought to fruition. That would certainly indicate a good deal of government interest in it.

I should like to quote the words of the Prime Minister himself, when he spoke in the committee of supply considering agriculture estimates, as reported at page 3945 of Hansard of June 28, 1952. He was referring to the several major projects that were under consideration, among them the St. Lawrence seaway, and he said:

> The third project was the South Saskatchewan river project. This is of particular interest to the central provinces, but it is also of interest to the whole of Canada to have Canada developed in such a manner that there will be no depressed areas in this country.

When the urgency of debating this seemed to be greatest, on Friday night, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was away on government business. The person who has put the most into this project, in its initiation and in the engineering investigation, is the Minister of Agriculture himself. I submit that in all fairness to that minister this debate should be carried on, as it is being carried on at the present time, when he is in his place in the house. I know it would be considered a great thing politically by certain parties in this house if members supporting the government were jockeyed into the position, in voting on the amendment put forward by the opposition, where they would have to choose between appearing to vote for this project and against the government, or vote for the government and against the project. We have had enough political discussions over this thing. We want this project built.

A good deal has been said in Saskatchewan about my position personally. I said in Saskatchewan and I say on the floor of this house that it is necessary to build this irrigation project for the reasons I will enumerate. But I think enough has been said about it politically already, and I believe we should get down to the essential merits of the project.

I should like it clearly understood at this time that while I am completely in favour of this project, and I will speak for it on the floor of the house, I am not going to vote lack of confidence in this government in an appearance of voting for the project. Some members of this house, particularly the hon. member for Lake Centre, are opposed to this government. He feels that if this government were not in power we would get the project quicker. I am in favour of this government, and I submit to the house that this is probably the only government that will ever build this project, and I propose to go along with it on that basis.

Mr. Fraser: It will never be built, then.

Mr. Larson: The house is well aware of the terrible drought conditions that can exist in Saskatchewan. I have made reference to them myself. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) has discussed those conditions and so have others. At this time I do not think there is any reason to recite them to indicate the necessity of carrying on a major irrigation project in Saskatchewan.

Our sister province of Alberta has gone a long way in irrigation. They have well over a million acres of land under irrigation, or with projects under construction at the present time. I submit very strongly that it is Saskatchewan's turn to have her irrigation resources developed. While that development involves this project—I think the P.F.R.A. people have taken this up—I feel that before I sit down I can show that the problems in the way of the project are not nearly as insurmountable as they were recorded, or appear to be recorded, by the royal commission.

My personal feelings in the matter are that appointing this royal commission was sort of threshing away at old straw. The facts, as they stand out, had been covered by the P.F.R.A. long before this commission was appointed, and I do not think the commission ever would have been appointed had it not been for the hiring of an engineer by the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Cass-Beggs, to make a report on the power aspect of the project. He found that power could probably be developed as cheaply through soft coal in the south and natural gas in the north as it could be through the construction of this dam to give the province water power.

That report threw doubt on the usefulness of building this project. It has been said by Saskatchewan that P.F.R.A. paid for part of the report. I do not know; possibly they did. But if they did, it was for the one purpose of getting the original unedited copy of the report.

I say again that had it not been for the throwing of doubt on the power part of the project, I do not think we would have had the present commission report. It would appear to me, in a few words, that the Hogg commission finds no particular reason why the South Saskatchewan project should not be proceeded with, except that it would cost too much for the value received by the people of Canada. And on the basis that it would cost too much they suggested that several smaller projects be proceeded with.

The projects mentioned were gone into by P.F.R.A. years ago. As early as 1947 and 1948 P.F.R.A. realized that the development of the South Saskatchewan was necessary to provide a reservoir large enough to carry on any substantial irrigation. If the flow of the Saskatchewan were not harnessed and put into a reservoir at flood time, the flood would go off to Hudson bay and be of no use in meeting the problem of irrigation.

It has been suggested that water could be pumped to the higher ground. That matter has been gone into, and it has been found that the silt in the river has made impossible the use of pumps. It is possible the weirs could be constructed across the river to control this silt, should this pumping project be considered. But with the flood having gone down the river there would not be enough water to carry on any large irrigation project.

This question has been put to me several times: Why use this particular site at Coteau creek for the construction of the dam? Would it not be more useful to bring it up the river to some other location? Since I was interested in politics, if it were moved up the river it would probably land in my constituency; so I was interested in the problem right from the first. I consulted General H. B. Ferguson, when he was carrying on his work with P.F.R.A. in Regina. His answer was that he could build a dam at any location on that river, but that the foundation characteristics west of Saskatchewan Landing were such that the dam could not be built except at such great expense as to make the project impossible.

To construct a project like this there are three elementary factors which have to be considered. First, to construct the dam and reservoir at the minimum possible cost; second, to have the project situated so that the levels of land are such that the water can run from the lake into the reservoir, or into the canals, and thence on to the land; and third, to have all the soil characteristics such that it would pay to irrigate.

With respect to the first consideration, that of a proper site, it is known that a relatively cheap site is available at Coteau creek. There is a good deal of land that could be irrigated by gravity. The original estimate by P.F.R.A. was 123,000 acres, but I notice the estimate in the report is 180,000. Then, while there is a large area around Dundurn that is too sandy to be considered proper land for irrigation, there are about 500,000 acres on the fringes of that sandy part that are quite satisfactory and could be considered as irrigable land. Consequently these three conditions are satisfied at the site, and this matter should be proceeded with on the basis of the investigations made to date by P.F.R.A.

We must now consider the cost factor of the reservoir itself. There is a good deal of confusion, after reading the commission report, as to the total cost of the project, and the timing necessary for meeting that total cost. Quite frankly, if the federal government makes the same deal with the province of Saskatchewan that it has made with Alberta, it is responsible only for the water storage. It has been generally conceded that, after the experience in Alberta, irrigated land can pay water costs if the main works are provided free and the land does not have to take care of the water rights.

This was also recognized by the experience in Alberta. The federal government has pursued the policy that it will provide free water storage. This includes construction of the dam, construction of the main works and the arrangements for property rights, as well as damming up the coulees and valleys that are necessary to retain water in the main lake.

If this is done it has been proven that the land can carry the cost of the irrigation project. Let us consider for a moment the construction of the dam itself. On May 30, 1947, Gordon L. Mackenzie, chief engineer of the prairie farm rehabilitation branch, issued an interim report in which he estimated the cost of the dam at $66,360,000. This report was concurred in by General H. B. Ferguson, who had a good deal to do with the construction of the Fort Peck dam in Montana, and other similar projects in the United States. As well as making an estimate of the cost at that time, he considered the timing for the construction of the dam itself to be ten years.

After consultation with both General Ferguson and Mr. Mackenzie I received the impression that the number of days in which work could be carried on in the field per year would allow not more than about $6 million a year to be spent in each of seven years. This would bring the total sum to a point somewhere in the neighbourhood of $42 million.

Naturally in the last year or two the concrete would have to be poured for the spillways and the main works of the dam installed. This would mean that another $24 million would probably be spent in those two years. When one takes the cost of $68 million in one lump sum, in one year, it is a formidable amount. However, when it is spread over ten years the amount required in any one year brings the cost down to a point where it is not nearly so formidable.

The investigations in connection with the Hogg report were carried out in 1952. It was felt that a further review of the project should be made. The commission changed the timing to a little over six years, and increased the cost to a figure which is either $139,800,000 or $163,772,000, I am not sure which. Both these figures appear, without details, at page 25 of the report.

The matter of the cost of this scheme has been gone into by several speakers who have preceded me in the debate, and I do not intend to go over the figures again. It has been stated that those figures were based on the estimates furnished by the Mannix construction company. It is very hard to break down these costs, but there is one item here of $3 million for road relocation and bridges. I live in that country, and I am quite familiar with the roads and bridges that exist there. The province of Saskatchewan has one bridge across the Saskatchewan river at Outlook which will not be interfered with at all, nor will the highway that is located there. The other road is No. 4 highway running from Elrose to Swift Current. When the bridge was constructed at Saskatchewan Landing a few years ago the P.F.R.A. suggested that the bridge should be built higher because of the possibility of this dam raising the level of the water some 15 feet. Their advice was not taken. It was considered that if the time should come to raise the bridge, then that would be done. Nature solved that problem. Ice knocked the bridge down last year, and I notice that they are raising the level of it now so I presume that will take care of the situation.

The only other bridge is at Elbow, and it is a combination railroad and highway bridge. That of course will go. It will be at the bottom of the reservoir. That is the shortest way for me to drive to Moose Jaw but I never use the road across that bridge—it is not a highway—because it is in such a condition that I would rather travel a longer distance and use one of the other bridges. Therefore I question whether more than $30,000 in roads is involved, rather than $3 million. Taking the figures at the top of page 25 of the commission's report, they show contractors' general expense and escalation of wages and materials. Wages and materials may have gone down by that time. They also show contractors' general overhead and profit. These items in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of a lot of other people, are the wildest type of guesses. It would appear that the endeavour is to make the cost so high that any contractor who may bid on the job can bid well under the figures set out here and still have a handsome profit.

I would prefer to consider the estimate of the P.F.R.A. officials plus the additions to that estimate as a result of the increases in the cost of materials. It is considered by the P.F.R.A. officials that in the neighbourhood of 12 per cent should be added to the original cost of $68 million, which would make a figure of nearly $80 million for the dam and reservoir and appurtenant works. This was concurred in by the Wells Construction Company, who built the St. Mary project, and also by the Ramsay Construction Company of Regina. The cost would thus be increased by $12 million over the original estimate by Mr. Mackenzie and General Ferguson. On the basis of those estimates I would say we can take it that the cost of this project would be somewhere around $80 million over ten years.

I would not go so far as to say that the Mannix construction company cannot estimate correctly, but I do say that any sensible person looking at the figures set out on page 25 of the report would be inclined to say that they are very much on the high side.

The province of Saskatchewan has stated that it is prepared to enter into the construction of irrigation projects on the same basis that the province of Alberta has entered into such projects with the federal government. Therefore the province of Saskatchewan would be responsible for the construction of the power house. According to the report of the commission, the cost of the power house would be $24 million. The province would also be responsible for the construction of the irrigation part of the project, and in this instance it could be stated that the province of Saskatchewan would not be financially able, if they were so responsible, to assume a cost of $100 million to $150 million. In other words their revenues are not such that they would be able to undertake a project of that kind. If the cost of the dam is $80 million and the complete cost of the whole project is $248 million, the figure set out in the report, then there is a terrific sum in the middle there which would seem to be pretty staggering so far as provincial finances are concerned.

Let us review the provincial position. They would be given without cost this water reservoir with a total capacity of some 7 million acre feet, of which nearly 3 million acre feet are live usable storage. In other words it can be used for power and irrigation. The power plant would be expensive in its initial outlay, but it would be self-liquidating if it could produce power in competition with other available power, and I think it is generally conceded that if water power is available in this form it could compete. Having in mind the experience gained from what has gone on in Alberta, it has been found that irrigated land can afford to carry the water rights necessary to provide the canals. While the irrigation project might not be self-liquidating, it should be self-supporting. As has happened in Alberta, it will be found that by the time 500,000 acres of land are irrigated probably fifty years will have elapsed.

The cost of $24 million for the power house is set out in the report; and adding that to the P.F.R.A. estimate of $80 million for the dam itself you would have left $144 million if the total figure of $250 million is not as much out of line as the estimate for the dam itself. Naturally the land that would be irrigated first would be land that could be irrigated by gravity. According to the original Gordon Mackenzie report the figure was 123,000 acres, but the Hogg report changes that to nearly 180,000. This would be low-cost irrigation. All that is required is the digging of canals and turning the water into them.

That is all the work that would proceed until such time as the development of the province demanded that water be pumped to higher places. It would not involve the $30 million for a pumping station. It would only involve a part of the $45 million for the irrigation system; and if that course of action were followed, until that other land was irrigated and settled I presume it would not involve a greater outlay by the province of Saskatchewan than the $3 million a year originally estimated. I have no doubt that as the province develops and the need for this type of irrigation increases, the final moves will be made and the water will be pumped to higher levels.

I am afraid that in the consideration of this entire problem we are allowing ourselves as a federal parliament to think that if we proceed with this project we will immediately commit ourselves to an expenditure of $248 million. This is by no means the case. As members of parliament we should take a realistic view of the matter and adjust ourselves to a way of thinking whereby we will consider that we have to spend possibly $6 million, $8 million or $9 million a year until the time of peak expenditure comes with the installation of spillways, when we will probably have to spend $20 million a year for a couple of years. If we go into this project with the province of Saskatchewan, we must realize that this other cost, this figure between $106 million and $248 million, will be spread over the next two generations. How could a number of engineers sit down today and decide what it is going to cost to do something two generations hence? That cannot possibly be realistic.

I have followed this matter very closely with people in Saskatchewan who have attended these commission meetings all through the west. They are vitally interested in the construction and it would appear to those people, from what has gone on, that the only real opponents this project had in the commission hearings were the minister of agriculture for Alberta and I presume his adviser, Mr. Ben Russell, director of water resources for that province.

I am wondering if the Social Credit members in this house take the same view those two officials in Alberta took when the commission hearings were on. I know that the province of Alberta is very keen to get on with the Red Deer project, but Alberta now has 200,000 acres under irrigation, around 600,000 that can be proceeded with on the basis of the present works constructed, and an envisaged 500,000 on the Red Deer river project, making a total of 1,300,000 partly constructed and partly in the future. Since they have this projected, or have it already, it seems to me they should be prepared to assist Saskatchewan in obtaining this very valuable asset for that province.

If we get into interprovincial rows over who has the right to irrigation, over who has the right to use those waters or who has not the right to use them, I feel we are taking a very shortsighted view of the whole thing and we will confuse the people in Ottawa whose approval of these projects is necessary. If we do that we are seriously jeopardizing irrigation in western Canada as a whole.

I have no opposition to the Red Deer project being proceeded with as soon as possible. My own feeling is that if the federal government are prepared to go along with the South Saskatchewan project there is no reason why they should not announce their intention to go along with the Red Deer project. I do feel, with the federal money that has been spent in Alberta on the St. Mary project, the Canada Land and Irrigation project and others, the people in Alberta should be prepared to allow the federal government to proceed with the South Saskatchewan project. The soil surveys are done, the levels are run and the thing is about ready to go. The Red Deer project, on the other hand, requires a good deal of soil survey around Hanna, and my information would indicate that it will be some time before that project can be proceeded with.

Manitoba, of course, is fearful that if the waters of the South Saskatchewan are too greatly committed for irrigation that will seriously hamper power development in Manitoba. I understand Manitoba's fear in this matter but, on consultation with the secretary of the commission, it seems that the commission has taken the view that while power can be produced from other means than water, the development of irrigation is dependent on water and there is absolutely no substitute.

There are plenty of alternatives in the production of power. Possibly in ten years atomic furnaces will be generating power much more cheaply than we envisage today. I agree with the commission secretary on that point; and while there may be some disadvantages to Manitoba I do not think there are disadvantages that cannot be overcome when it is so important that we have this guarantee against drought in the sister province of Saskatchewan.

Another matter brought up by the secretary is that there are apparently untold possibilities of diverting the water up in the mountains, of moving the whole eastern Rocky mountain watershed south so that it would be useful in the centres of population. It would be many years before even the investigations on a project like that could be carried out, and the costs I understand would be tremendous. Some day when the population is there to warrant it possibly we will find that something well worth carrying out.

In the light of the developments which this nation is taking in its stride, with the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, I cannot help but feel and the people of Saskatchewan cannot help but feel that if this project is ruled against there will be a good deal of discrimination against the people of my province. No matter what future development is envisaged—suppose the entire flow of water east of the Rocky mountains is diverted—it seems only reasonable to me that a water reservoir built at this time on the South Saskatchewan could well be incorporated with one of those broader schemes if it is considered proper to do that in the future.

I was considering going into the history of this thing. There is a history behind this reclamation development going on in western Canada now which dates back to the days when these provinces were part of the Northwest Territories. I am not going into that history but I will say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had a good deal to do with the federal government when the negotiations were carried on regarding what share of the natural resources those provinces should have and what restitution there should be for natural resources alienated in the past. I do know that reclamation of the Palliser triangle, which according to Palliser should have never been settled, entered to a large extent into the negotiations which produced the prairie farm rehabilitation administration. Part of this federal expenditure in restitution has been made on major water projects in western Canada. There has already been spent over the years some $60 million.

It was always contended by the Minister of Agriculture that two or three of these major water projects had to be constructed before a complete equilibrium would be found in the dealings on natural resources between the federal government and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. On this basis the South Saskatchewan and the Red Deer can be regarded as the major water resources that we have in western Canada.

Since many surveys still have to be made on the Red Deer project, I would strongly recommend and I would feel that it is necessary that we get started on this South Saskatchewan project. I feel that we should enter into negotiations with the province of Saskatchewan at the earliest possible date to get accurate and true estimates of how cheaply we can build these projects. We should enter into negotiations on a firm basis with the provinces involved; and as the South Saskatchewan project is ready to go now we should make some arrangement so that we know where we stand. It would be impossible for the federal government to go ahead with the project until such time as the arrangements with the province of Saskatchewan were in contractual form. At that time this matter could be proceeded with on a co-operative basis.

I strongly feel that this matter should be taken up now, and that negotiations should be entered into now to put this most valuable and most necessary asset into the province of Saskatchewan. It is an asset which, in the view of many people in western Canada, is owing to that province.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): The members of the Social Credit group have from time to time, Mr. Speaker, made it clear that they support federal action to provide for the construction of major irrigation projects in both Alberta and Saskatchewan. I believe that was made quite clear by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) when they spoke in the house last session on the question of the South Saskatchewan project. However, since that time certain facts have come to light which throw some doubt upon the advisability of proceeding with the South Saskatchewan project in its entirety, at least until alternative methods of providing irrigation—more especially of providing power—have been fully investigated. Apparently that was the attitude of the royal commission that investigated this project.

It seems to me that the important point to keep in mind—the commission stressed this point—is that there are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 15 million acres in the dry areas of Alberta and Saskatchewan which need water supplied to them in order that they may become productive. Yet if the total supply of water in the South Saskatchewan river and all the water that could be diverted from the North Saskatchewan river were utilized, it would be possible to irrigate only somewhere in the neighbourhood of 3 million acres. This illustrates how very important it is that we do everything in our power to make the most economical use of the water within the Saskatchewan river as a whole.

The purpose of the South Saskatchewan project, as outlined in the commission report, is to irrigate 455,000 acres of land, two-thirds of which apparently would have to be irrigated by pumping and one-third by gravity. It is proposed to develop 150,000 horsepower of electricity, and supply water to Moose Jaw and Regina. Apparently the main part of the project is the power development.

Mr. Gardiner: I believe the commission report states that two-fifths would be gravity and three-fifths by pumping, rather than one-third and two-thirds.

Mr. Quelch: Yes, three-fifths by pumping and two-fifths by gravity. Somewhere in the neighbourhood of 125,000 to 180,000 acres are to be irrigated by gravity, and the balance by pumping.

Mr. Gardiner: It is 179,000 acres by gravity.

Mr. Quelch: The estimated cost has been set by the commission at $250 million. This estimate was severely criticized by previous speakers. Any criticism I have to make is not on the question of cost. On the other hand when I hear people lightly dismissing the estimates of the Mannix construction company, I am aware of the fact that that company is held in high esteem and is considered a very sound company. I can quite realize that this company would probably put in a high estimate because on projects of this kind you do not know just what type of construction difficulties you may encounter. The history of all major construction projects of this nature has been that the final cost has been very much greater than the original estimate.

In dealing with the question of the St. Mary dam, the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) said the only reason the final cost was so much greater than the estimated cost was that the project was greatly enlarged. That is only part of the reason. The hon. member should know that construction difficulties were encountered, such as the diversion tunnels and a number of other things, which were largely responsible for increasing the cost of that project.

Mr. McCusker: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, were not those extra costs encountered because the project was expanded?

Mr. Quelch: Not for that reason alone. A rock formation was encountered, and one contractor went broke. The Fort Peck dam is a large earth-filled dam, and its construction cost $100 million. Before the dam was completed the water broke through and washed a lot of it out. This caused a great increase in the cost of that project. The commission warns that contractors will have to be on the lookout for similar dangers in this project. I recall that in my own constituency a small earth-filled dam was completely washed out before it was completed. It had to be rebuilt, and the final cost to the government was double the original cost. Anyone making an estimate of the cost of a project like this has to envisage the possibility of encountering construction difficulties; therefore I would not be over-critical of any company for putting the cost perhaps higher than it actually is.

The commission found that the economic returns envisaged to the people of Canada were not commensurate with the cost of the project, and expressed the opinion that irrigated farms in Saskatchewan could still be supplied with water at less cost from other sources.

The commission make one point that I feel should carry a good deal of weight. They stress the fact that there is no substitute for water for irrigation, while there is a substitute for water in so far as electric power is concerned. The commission claims that the proposal would commit four-fifths of the flow of the South Saskatchewan at that point for hydro power, and it could never be returned to be available for irrigation in the large area above the dam. The hon. member for Regina City pointed out that this water, after it passed this project, would be available for hydro projects lower down. That is not the point. The point is that there is no substitute for water for irrigation, and once the water has gone through this project it will not be available for irrigation purposes in the large area above the dam. I feel that is something that should be given a great deal of consideration.

On the other hand, the commission point out that the cost of providing power at Coteau creek dam is such that Saskatchewan's power needs could be provided almost as cheaply through steam plants. Now, I do not doubt for one minute that that is true, because in the west we have a lot of cheap fuel in the form of coal, gas and oil. For instance, there is a power plant at Drumheller on the Red Deer river which provides electricity within a radius of about 100 miles. All the farms that require electrification are being supplied from that power plant, which is a steam plant burning coal. Since it is located in the Drumheller valley, coal can be secured quite cheaply. The cost of producing that electricity compares very favourably with the cost of electricity supplied by other means.

The commission report has been criticized on the grounds that it conflicts with the findings of P.F.R.A. engineers. Some members have criticized the commission on the ground that they have ignored the P.F.R.A. findings entirely. In reading the report I find that on page after page reference is made to figures and submissions of the P.F.R.A., so it cannot be said that the commission did not consider the findings of the P.F.R.A., although in some cases they did not agree with them. One only has to read the report to see that there is continual reference to the submissions of the P.F.R.A. However, it does appear that the findings of the commission are right in line with the opinions of the former chief consulting engineer of the P.F.R.A., Mr. Ben Russell. I notice that in a report of a meeting of the water resources board in August, 1951, an application for an allocation of water for the South Saskatchewan river project was turned down by the water resources board. The reservation was continued for two years, but the application for allocation of water for that project was turned down by the water resources board chiefly on two grounds. The first was on the ground that they should wait until the findings of the royal commission were available, and then also there was the ground that they should first of all make further investigations into the North Saskatchewan river project as an alternative.

It is interesting to note that when Mr. Ben Russell, who is a member of the water resources board, took that stand he did so without first of all consulting the government of Alberta. He made that point quite clear. He said, "I am doing this on my own account; I have not consulted the province of Alberta". On the other hand, later on when the province of Alberta made a submission they backed up Mr. Russell's contention.

I note that the Saskatchewan brief, and also the remarks of a number of hon. members who have spoken, including the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson), have criticized the North Saskatchewan project as an alternative on three main grounds. First of all it is contended that an investigation has already been made, and that it was found that the South Saskatchewan would provide water for irrigation more economically. Second, it is contended that the North Saskatchewan is not an alternative and that the South Saskatchewan and the North Saskatchewan are two separate rivers. In the third place it is contended that there would be a heavy loss of water owing to the length of the canals needed to take the water from the headwaters of this river into Saskatchewan. I want to comment briefly on those three points.

The answer to the first point, of course, is that a detailed survey of the North Saskatchewan project has never been made, therefore until a detailed survey has been made you cannot say whether the one would be better than the other. Unfortunately a great deal of the original survey made by Mr. William Pearce has been lost or is not available for some reason. Secondly, since the time the comparison between the two was made a number of changes—and quite large ones—have been made in the North Saskatchewan project.

Whilst, as I say, there is no detailed survey, there are two or three general surveys. The main change that was advocated was in that made by Mr. A. B. Cook. He proposed that instead of taking the water northeast from Youngstown to Macklin, it should be taken east and land irrigated at Alsask, Kindersley and a number of points east. The main advantage of that proposal is that you would be keeping water at a higher level—120 feet higher—than if you went the other way; and also that you would greatly shorten the length of the canals.

Another point argued is that there are two separate rivers, the North Saskatchewan and the South Saskatchewan, and that therefore you should not call the North Saskatchewan an alternative because in that case you would not be using the water of the South Saskatchewan. But there is an important point to take note of, and that is that if the greatest use of the waters of the Saskatchewan river as a whole is to be obtained for irrigation, you will have to divert water from the North Saskatchewan to the South Saskatchewan because the North Saskatchewan does not flow through the type of land that is suitable for irrigation. Mind you, if the South Saskatchewan project is constructed, it will still be necessary to divert a certain amount of water from the Clearwater, which is a tributary of the North Saskatchewan in order that sufficient water may be obtained.

Again, owing to the fact that so much of the water will be utilized by the power dam, if we are ever going to use it to irrigate as much as possible of the 15 million acres, it will be necessary to divert water of the North Saskatchewan into the South Saskatchewan in order that that land may be irrigated. Therefore it is nonsense to say that one is not an alternative to the other, because the waters of the North Saskatchewan will have to be utilized in order that the arid land in Saskatchewan and Alberta may be irrigated to the fullest extent possible. Incidentally, the only place at which diversion of water from the North Saskatchewan to the South Saskatchewan can be made is at the headwaters of the river in Alberta. Whilst the North Saskatchewan is over 200 miles away from the South Saskatchewan at Outlook, at the headwaters the North Saskatchewan is only 20 miles away from the tributaries of the South Saskatchewan. So that by placing a dam on the North Saskatchewan it is possible to divert water to the Clearwater, and by placing a dam on the Clearwater it is possible to divert water to Stauffer creek which is a tributary of the Red Deer which is a tributary of the South Saskatchewan. So there is no engineering difficulty in diverting water from the North Saskatchewan river to the South Saskatchewan.

As to the next point, the contention that there would be a heavy loss of water due to the long canals, I should like to say this. The canals would be long, it is true. Some of them would be going through sandy land, so there would be a good deal of seepage. But the mistake, I think, in arguing that water is lost is this. Whilst it is a loss of water in so far as the project to which the water is being diverted is concerned, it is not a loss of water in so far as the land through which it flows is concerned because seepage of water raises the water table, which is a desirable thing in these dry areas. The water table in those areas is steadily going down. You need only look at what happened at Brooks to see how canals raise the water table. The water table at Brooks has been raised considerably as a result of the seepage of water from the canal. If there was seepage from these canals it would also raise the water table of the district through which the water flowed. Nobody could say that was loss of water. It is loss of water only with regard to that irrigation project, which would mean that more water would have to be diverted in order to get it to its final objective.

I want to say a few words now on the North Saskatchewan project and the modified project known as the Red Deer diversion. The North Saskatchewan project was originally surveyed back in 1921 or 1922 by William Pearce. Under that project it was estimated that a total of 1,430,000 acres could be irrigated, 1 million acres in Saskatchewan and 430,000 acres in Alberta, and the cost was estimated at $105 million. No doubt that cost would be much greater today, although it is pointed out that the costs at that time were deliberately set high.

It is also interesting to note that since that time a large percentage of the land that would be irrigated is now owned by the province of Alberta in the special areas. I would say there are about 8 million acres in the special area, so there would not be the cost of taking over that land.

It would be also possible to have a power development on the upper reaches of the Red Deer and the North Saskatchewan. I mention that fact because I have criticized the development of power on the lower regions of the South Saskatchewan. I have often heard people argue—including the late member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith)—that you cannot use the same water for both irrigation and the development of power, but that depends on the location of your power development project. If that project is on the upper reaches of the river, then the water can be used to develop power and after it passes through that power development project it can be used for irrigation, provided, as I say, that your land to be irrigated is below your power project. But on the other hand, when your power project is below the land to be irrigated the water is not available for irrigation once it has passed through that plant. It is argued that four-fifths of the water of the South Saskatchewan will be required for the South Saskatchewan power project, and therefore the amount of water available for irrigation itself will be reduced by that amount; that is, an allocation will have to be made for that amount of water for a power project.

Under the North Saskatchewan project the water, as I say, would have been diverted from the North Saskatchewan into the Red Deer river and by damming the Red Deer river, taken by canal across 100 miles down to Sullivan lake, which has a storage capacity of 1,730,000 acre feet. From there it would be taken by canals through Alberta into Saskatchewan where it could irrigate about 1 million acres. However, for a number of years many people considered the project so immense that we should not even think about it but should consider some project which would not be of such gigantic proportions.

So a demand that a modified project be constructed grew, and finally out of that we got the so-called Red Deer diversion project. Actually with the Red Deer diversion project as formulated at the present time it would not be possible to divert water to Saskatchewan. I notice that the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) kept referring to the Red Deer diversion project as a means of getting water to Saskatchewan; but as it is formulated it would not be possible to get water to Saskatchewan because under the present proposal instead of using Sullivan lake as a reservoir it is proposed to use Hamilton lake, and from Hamilton lake it would not be possible to take water by gravity into Saskatchewan.

The Red Deer diversion project, which would mainly use the water of the Red Deer, would probably use water from Clearwater river as well. It would be possible to irrigate in the neighbourhood of 450,000 acres in Alberta, most of it by gravity, although it is possible that if the whole 450,000 acres were irrigated some of it would be by pumping. It is estimated that at least 300,000 acres could be irrigated by gravity under the project at an estimated cost of only $15 million. I quite agree that that estimate is probably too low. Probably it would be higher than that. It would mean, however, that you would be able to irrigate a large parcel of land at comparatively low cost.

Now, it is generally argued that if you are going to have irrigation you have to grow specialized crops; you cannot afford the high water costs in the raising of feed, particularly if you are going to have to pump the water 60 or 120 feet, as it is proposed in part of the South Saskatchewan river project. It is quite evident that you would never be able to use that water for the growing of feed because of the high cost. The hon. member for Kindersley pointed out that in Alberta it was recognized that farmers could stand the yearly cost of getting the water on the land, but in Alberta the water is placed on the land by gravity, and the cost of getting water on the land is considerably less than it would be under a project such as the South Saskatchewan project where a large percentage of the land would have to be irrigated by pumping.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question? I know my hon. friend is interested in the whole matter of irrigation, and I want to ask him this question. Has he given consideration to what I understand is the fact, that if you follow the Red Deer project and take the water across the prairies by the long ditch, you lose as much water by evaporation and by seepage as would be in the South Saskatchewan river dam?

Mr. Quelch: That would be on the Red Deer river project. It is estimated that you would need a yearly diversion of 1,200-acre feet to provide the actual water needed for 400,000 acres, on account of seepage. But as I say, that is only a loss in so far as the irrigation project is concerned. It is not a loss to the district through which it flows.

A great deal of concern is being caused throughout the whole area over the water table going down. Many of the wells on the farms have gone dry. Therefore if as a result of the water seeping through the canal the water table is raised, you are performing a very valuable service; and so long as water is diverted from the Clearwater to the Red Deer river sufficient water can be provided for that purpose and it will be performing a very useful function in raising the water table.

Under a new proposal I understand Mr. Ben Russell is making this suggestion, that the North Saskatchewan project should be investigated. The new proposal includes the suggestion of Mr. A. B. Cook, and that is this: Instead of taking water by canal northeast to Macklin it should be taken from Sullivan lake and east of Youngstown to Saskatchewan so that a large amount of land could be irrigated at Alsask, at Kindersley and at Kerrobert, and then if necessary the water could be taken down to the very land that would be irrigated under the South Saskatchewan project. Let me say that we think it would be advisable to investigate these proposals. I want to make it clear, however, that we are not suggesting for one minute that the damming of the South Saskatchewan river should be held up until such time as there has been an investigation into the North Saskatchewan project.

As a result of what I have said, I want to summarize briefly the stand this group is taking on this matter at the present time. I will admit that along with a lot of people in my constituency I am feeling somewhat discouraged at the way these large-scale projects in Saskatchewan and Alberta have been held up. They seem to have become a kind of political football. Apparently they are being held up not so much through economic and engineering details as from certain political considerations. But we feel that the government should not attempt to go ahead with the construction of this South Saskatchewan project in its entirety until they have made a thorough investigation of alternative methods of providing power.

Mr. Gardiner: May I just suggest that is the reason it has been held up for the last three years. We were making and proving that survey, and we have made it.

Mr. Quelch: That may be the reason for the South Saskatchewan, but the minister is going to have an awfully hard job to convince me that that is the reason the Red Deer diversion was held up.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the only reason consideration was dropped for the time being.

Mr. Quelch: I will deal with that in a minute. We support immediate action to build the dam on the South Saskatchewan river for the purpose of providing a large reservoir from which I understand by gravity 125,000 acres and perhaps even 180,000 acres could be irrigated; because even if you could irrigate only 180,000 or 150,000 acres by gravity you will still have a tremendous amount of other land that can be irrigated by low-lift pumping.

Mr. Gardiner: The P.F.R.A. decided about three years ago, or a little more, that 400,000 acres of land could be irrigated at Hanna by carrying out what we call the Red Deer project, and there has never been any change in that excepting that there are some people who question the amount of land on the ground that it may not all be suitable.

Mr. Quelch: Coming back to the South Saskatchewan dam, I want to make it clear, as I say, that we support building a dam on the South Saskatchewan river to provide a reservoir from which a certain amount of land could be irrigated by gravity and an additional amount of land by low-cost pumping. In Alberta today a great deal of land is being irrigated by low-lift pumping. Many farms are doing it on their own and are finding it very satisfactory. No doubt if a reservoir of this kind were built it would be possible to irrigate a good deal of land. On the other hand, we are not supporting the idea of a power development because we believe the water of the South Saskatchewan river will be needed for irrigation purposes, and to the extent that it is utilized for power at that point it is not available for irrigation.

In so far as the Red Deer diversion project is concerned, we feel that the government should proceed immediately with its construction. Perhaps all the soil surveys have not been completed, but it would be possible to start work immediately on the dam. Agreement has been reached as to where the dam should be built. If it is thought possible that at some future date that water might be taken from that project into the Saskatchewan, then I would suggest that instead of using Hamilton lake they should utilize Sullivan lake, because if Hamilton lake is used as a reservoir it will not be possible to take water into Saskatchewan. On the other hand, if Sullivan lake is used then it will still be possible to carry water from there into Saskatchewan at a later date. All that would be necessary then would be to divert water from the North Saskatchewan to the South Saskatchewan, but that is no reason to delay the building of a dam on the South Saskatchewan, and it is no reason to delay the construction of the Red Deer diversion project. These projects can be gone ahead with, and so long as they use Sullivan lake as a storage reservoir they will have their water at a sufficiently high altitude to make irrigation possible by gravity.

I can assure the minister that in past years I have tried to excuse the failure of the federal government for not going ahead with the Red Deer diversion project. Three years ago I quoted what the minister himself said in this house. He said in reply to a question put by me just about three years ago that surveys had gone sufficiently far that by the fall he hoped it would be possible to sign agreements with the provinces so they could start work on the Red Deer diversion. That would be two years ago, not three. Now we are told that they have discovered patches of a new type of soil that had not been found anywhere else on the North American continent. The only other place it has been found, they say, is in Australia. We are told that, therefore, they will have to have another two years to investigate soil conditions.

I have been reading in the Hanna Herald reports of meetings held throughout the constituency by members of the east central irrigation association, and it is stated that the farmers are disgusted with the inaction of the federal government. They say they have farmed out there for 40 years, and they know what the soil is. They have the machinery today that will bust that hardpan wide open. So long as the land is cultivated shortly after it begins to dry, there is no difficulty in breaking it open. They are not satisfied to be told today that because patches of hardpan have been found, new soil surveys will have to be made. They know what that land is, and they think it is high time the government began action on the project. It was first investigated in 1921. Now, in 1953, they are told soil surveys will have to be made which will probably take another two years.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) with a great deal of interest. However, nothing he has said detracts from the advantage of going ahead immediately with the South Saskatchewan project. So far as I am concerned the best reply to the statement he has made was given in the house last year by the leader of the Social Credit group when, on June 28, he said:

> There is just one thing I would like to say by way of encouragement to my friends in Saskatchewan. I want to see Saskatchewan get that project on the South Saskatchewan river as quickly as they can because I know what it will do for their province and for the rest of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Quelch: We all agree with that.

Mr. Argue: I hear another one of their members says that they all agree with that.

Mr. Quelch: Would the hon. member permit an interjection? If he would rather not, I shall not insist. However, I thought I made it clear that since that time a lot of facts have come to light which throw doubt on the advisability of proceeding with the power development. But we still strongly support the idea of a dam, a reservoir and irrigation.

Mr. Argue: I am not a member of the Social Credit party, and do not caucus with them. I do not want to say what stand that party has taken and so far as I am concerned I shall wait until I hear from the leader of that group in this debate.

The South Saskatchewan river project has been talked about for a good many years—since 1935, I believe. Surveys have been made year after year by P.F.R.A. engineers. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and other spokesmen for the Liberal party, in one election after another, have gone on record in support of the building of the South Saskatchewan river project. I am pleased to note that the official opposition is supporting this project. Certainly we in the C.C.F. group, members from Saskatchewan in particular, are supporting the project wholeheartedly.

I think in assessing the benefits of a large undertaking such as the South Saskatchewan project members of parliament should look at it from a national point of view. We should attempt to find out whether it will not only help our fellow citizens in a certain part of Canada but whether secondary benefits flowing from the project would improve the standard of living and well-being of all our citizens.

Members of this group have supported the Canso causeway. We have supported the St. Lawrence seaway development. In our view the Canso causeway was needed in the maritime provinces, and for that reason it received our support. We viewed the St. Lawrence seaway development as something advantageous to central Canada. We now look at the proposed South Saskatchewan project as one which will bring to a large area in western Canada benefits that will be available to the people in that region, just as the St. Lawrence seaway and the Canso causeway will benefit other sections of Canada.

As I have said, the Minister of Agriculture and other spokesmen for the government have gone on record favouring this project. So have members representing all the other parties in the house. My question is, then: What are we waiting for? It is time the government made up its mind and announced a project on the basis of repeated recommendations from its own P.F.R.A. engineers. As Dr. George Spence, former P.F.R.A. director, has said, those people have lived with this problem now for almost half a lifetime.

The information contained in the report of the royal commission was pretty well known some months ago. It was officially tabled in the house on January 19, more than two weeks ago. P.F.R.A. engineers in 1951 apparently had completed all their studies and recommended that the project be undertaken. I say to the government now that what we in this group as well as the people in western Canada, particularly those in Saskatchewan, are asking is that the government announce that it is going ahead with the project, and that it do so in such a way as to guarantee its being built.

The amendment before us regrets that the government has not placed an item in the estimates to cover this expenditure, and the amendment most certainly will have my support. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) who set forth some of the main advantages that would flow from the project, said that the amount involved would be only six or seven million dollars a year. Well, we want something more than an item of $6 million in the estimates. Such an item might appear in this year's estimates and again next year and the year after. As happens in connection with some items, it might appear merely as a revote. In other words an item might appear in the estimates without very much being done by way of construction.

In my view the government should place on the statute books of Canada whatever legislation is necessary to guarantee that this project will be proceeded with and completed. We have already waited far too long. We have heard the Minister of Agriculture and others set forth the advantages of this project. In general elections and in by-elections we have heard them make the statement that, in order to have this work done, the thing to do was to send supporters of this government to the House of Commons.

In their wisdom, from time to time the people of Saskatchewan have sent a number of government supporters to the house. We are now very tired of hearing these promises repeated time and again, but not fulfilled. We want action now; we want legislation now. The government of Saskatchewan is prepared to enter into an agreement. The minister of agriculture and the premier of that province have stated that Saskatchewan is prepared now to enter into an agreement with the federal government and is prepared to undertake its share of the cost with respect to the project on the same basis as the costs of other irrigation projects have been shared with the province of Alberta.

I am sure the present royal commission report must be rather embarrassing to some members of the government. In the last few years we have had a royal commission on transportation, the Massey royal commission on arts, letters and sciences, and the now famous Currie report which is comparable to the report of a royal commission. We now have a royal commission report on the South Saskatchewan river dam. Apparently we are getting government by royal commission. I say that when members of parliament on all sides of the house want something, then the government should give the necessary leadership to carry out the wishes of members of parliament and should not set up another inquiry in order to establish whether or not the project is feasible.

In this instance we have had another inquiry and the commissioners have cast grave doubts on the feasibility of the project. Their report is now something that is standing in the road that must be gotten rid of before we can go ahead with the project. Surely the vast majority of members in the house realize that the reports made year after year by the government's own P.F.R.A. engineers are the ones to which attention should be paid. I have been handed a clipping from tonight's Ottawa Journal. It is a Canadian Press dispatch from Regina, and I certainly agree with it. It reads as follows:

> The Saskatchewan Liberal party yesterday said the federal government should ignore the findings of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project.

We think they should ignore these findings, and we in this group are sorry the royal commission was ever appointed. I think the best thing the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) could do with the report would be to gather together all copies of it, throw them in the Saskatchewan river and let them go down to the sea. In my opinion there is nothing valuable in the report that has not already been reported many times, and there are other parts that are of no value, so possibly the whole report might be handled in the way I have suggested.

A lot has been said about the advantages of the South Saskatchewan river project to the people of that province. Naturally two of the main advantages are irrigation and the providing of Saskatchewan with a source of cheap power. We believe that by reason of the large power facilities that could be installed if such a project were undertaken we would have a reasonable chance of attracting industry to our province in the future. Saskatchewan is basically an agricultural province. We are really a one commodity province. We are a wheat province, and while we have had good fortune in the last number of years in growing and selling our wheat, no doubt there will be years in the future when our crops will be low in yield because of drought, and there will in all probability be years in the future when prices will be lower. Certainly anything that can be done to bring industries to our province will be a stabilizing influence on our economy.

Naturally I am interested in the effect of irrigation on our agricultural industry. I have read the statement made by the Saskatchewan government to the royal commission. In that statement the provincial minister of agriculture points out that right now the province really has 10,000 too many farm units, too many because their size is so small that the units are uneconomic. He points out that even with all the irrigation that may be developed and the new land that may be brought under cultivation, the best we can hope for is an additional 5,000 units. Our own Canadian citizens, our own farmers who are farming in the drought area, or who are farming on units uneconomic because of smallness of size, would welcome the opportunity to engage in the irrigation farming that would follow the development of the South Saskatchewan river project.

We did not think it was necessary in the first place to appoint a commission at all, and of course it gave us some concern that on that commission were two hydro engineers and only one irrigation engineer. We feel that if the personnel of the commission by way of qualification had been reversed, it is very likely the report would have been favourable. The report advocates further studies, many of which have already been made, and in so doing it seems to me that some members of the royal commission want to continue their jobs for years to come. I do not blame anyone for attempting to have a good job if he can get it, but when this project is so necessary for the people of Saskatchewan I do not think the wishes of one or more individuals, who hope they may get lucrative employment, should be a sufficiently good reason for accepting a recommendation that a lot more study of this project is needed.

It has already been said that some of the estimates of the royal commission with respect to costs of the project are fantastic. The commissioners have loaded their estimates against the South Saskatchewan project. In addition to actual construction estimates they have included such estimate items as $12,300,000 for general expense, over $6 million for interest during construction, and $4 million for other contingencies after having provided for every conceivable contingency in their estimates. Then they have a figure of $10 million for escalation of wages and materials. That is a kind of cost of living index that can only go up. Here they have suggested an unnecessary $10 million for some construction firm that may undertake this project.

Then they come to another amazing finding, namely that there are no stones in Saskatchewan. I imagine that the municipality in which I live could make a very substantial contribution to the rock necessary for the riprap on the spillway. But the commissioners have a place where they are going to get rock. They are going to go to the Frank slide in the western part of Alberta. They are going to bring rock from the Rocky mountains, and because they are going to go to the Frank slide the cost of the rock will be increased from $4.20 per cubic yard to $11 per cubic yard.

For this reason alone the project will cost another $4¾ million.

After the commission has made these fantastic estimates of the cost, then they decide they are going to assess the advantages that will flow from this project. In one place they state there will be a saving of $10½ million in relief over the next 35 years. Well, the Saskatchewan brief lists some of the costs that have been incurred to date under P.F.A.A. expenditures in time of crop failure, direct relief expenditures and amounts that have been expended through tax and debt cancellation, but the Saskatchewan brief does not arrive at $10½ million. It arrives at a figure of over $400 million.

Well, we would not expect to save all of that even if this project were completed, but certainly a saving of $10½ million over the next 35 years in the way of relief in time of crop failure is just about as nonsensical the opposite way as are the inflated estimates in their report.

Mr. Knowles: One of those silliest blank, blank ideas.

Mr. Argue: The Regina Leader-Post points this out in an editorial of Tuesday, January 20, and has this to say:

> The commission went to the other extreme in estimating the economic returns from the project. It ignored the province's estimate that increased annual agricultural output in the irrigated area would range from $34,151,157 initially to $50,543,237 when maturity had been attained. Instead, the commission in its balance sheet entered on the credit side the equivalent of a niggardly amount of less than $3 million a year for the first 35 years.

So when it comes to assessing the benefits that will flow from this project the commission makes the benefits just as small as it possibly can. Then, of course, it establishes the conclusion that this would not be an economic project, as it wants the investment to pay the government 3½ per cent a year.

That royal commission is looking at this whole project from the standpoint of a businessman who is making an investment and wants to be assured of a fair return on the capital he is providing. I do not think that is the attitude the federal government should take. I hope it is not the attitude it will take. Surely if by investing $60 million or $100 million, or let us call it $250 million over a ten-year period, we can save many thousands of farmers of Saskatchewan from the ravages of drought; if we can provide secondary industry for that province; in other words, if we can lift the living standards of that section of our Canadian population living in Saskatchewan, then surely the results that flow from that investment should warrant the investment even if the federal government never got a dollar as an actual return from the investment. If we do not go ahead with the project the federal treasury in the future as in the past will be called upon from year to year and from time to time to expend millions of dollars in relief. It will spend millions of dollars to provide prairie farm assistance and will wind up, instead of having saved money because it did not go ahead with the project, losing money because it lacked the foresight to see the economic advantages that would flow from the project.

The report contains other criticisms of the project. I think these criticisms have been dealt with very well by Dr. George Spence, who for a number of years was a director of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. He has an article in the Regina Leader-Post of Thursday, January 22, and point by point deals with the objections made by the royal commission. The report says that pumping schemes might be studied and in connection with that suggestion Dr. Spence says:

> Pumping schemes, without specifying where the cheap power is to come from, are among other things suggested. Strange but true, the commission advocates pumping in one breath and questions the efficacy of that system in the next.

He points out that if you are going to attempt to irrigate by pumping from the river without a dam having been built you will need your greatest quantity of water naturally in July and August when the crop is growing and when it is maturing, and in these two months the river is at its lowest point. For that reason pumping is out of the question.

Then he deals with the suggestion in the commission's report that we should do something to take this water where it is needed most, to the more arid regions of Saskatchewan and Alberta. He points out that the soil and topography of that more arid region make that region unsuitable for irrigation. You cannot take water uphill. You cannot irrigate the tops of hills and so, when you get into rolling country, irrigation becomes impractical. He points out too that that soil is not suitable for irrigation because it has a high mineral content. If you bring water on a soil that has a very high mineral content, a substantial alkali content, you bring the mineral salts to the top of the soil and your soil is ruined. Dr. Spence says that the arid area in Saskatchewan is now being used for pasture and that is its proper use, that it is not suitable for irrigation.

He goes on to point out that every conceivable irrigation project has been studied for years by P.F.R.A. engineers. He says that if any alternative to this program existed the P.F.R.A. officials would have found that alternative and would have recommended it; because they have lived with the project, they are qualified persons and they have recommended this project. One of the reasons for recommending it is because it does not interfere with any other project that may be undertaken with advantage.

The position of the Saskatchewan government is crystal clear. The Saskatchewan government has supported this project ever since its election to office in 1944. In their submission to the royal commission they point out that they want an opportunity for an early start on the dam. When the royal commission report was tabled and made public, the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture made the position of the Saskatchewan government very clear. The Regina Leader-Post in an editorial on Thursday, January 15, makes this comment:

> Undoubtedly the most significant part of agriculture minister Nollet's statement of January 12 concerning the "excessively high" estimate of $250 million on the costs of the South Saskatchewan river development project, which the royal commission is reported to have advanced, was the following statement:
> The Saskatchewan government pledged its financial support to the project long ago and reiterates its anxiety to fulfil the commitment for the cost and construction of that part of the project assigned to the province on the basis similar to other major irrigation projects.
> This is capable of only one interpretation; the Saskatchewan government is not alarmed over the patently inflated cost estimate on which the commission reportedly based its findings. It is prepared to go ahead with its part of the undertaking despite the forecasted unfavourable aspects of the commission's findings. It is not doing so blindly, with a wanton disregard of the probable cost. As Mr. Nollet pointed out, the province has checked the much lower cost figure based on "estimates meticulously prepared by the P.F.R.A., which were ignored by the commission in favour of a contractor's estimates". It has shaped its policy on a greater reliance on the more realistic P.F.R.A. estimate than on the fantastic quotation which it is said was prepared for the commission by the contractor.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the commission was at fault in another way. They went to Alberta and asked a contracting firm, the Mannix corporation, to make an estimate. When the estimate was made, the commission would not allow the representatives of the Saskatchewan government to cross-examine the representatives of the Mannix corporation on their estimates. This company sends in an inflated estimate, and the people concerned are not allowed to cross-examine them and find out the basis upon which the estimate was made.

I believe another mistake was made when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave instructions to the royal commission, or more probably to the P.F.R.A., that P.F.R.A. officials were not to appear before the commission. If the commission was to do its work fairly and honestly, and take into account all the factors, surely the P.F.R.A. officials should have been called before that commission at a public hearing. These officials should have been allowed not only to produce the information they had, but to cross-examine the Mannix company on its fantastic estimate.

Shortly after the commission report was made, Dr. L. B. Thomson, the director of the P.F.R.A., spoke at Saskatoon. While he was referring to the report itself, he made it crystal clear in a public statement that the P.F.R.A. still supported the South Saskatchewan project. He should have been invited to make such a public statement before the royal commission when it was sitting.

It is strange the way the government has acted with regard to the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan as compared to its action in connection with the Currie report. Before the Currie report was made public, it had to go to the Department of National Defence to be looked over. If the department did not agree with what was in it, apparently they cut out those parts. When it came to the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan project, the Prime Minister and the government instructed P.F.R.A. officials not to appear before that royal commission. I do not think the royal commission report should have been—

Mr. Gardiner: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend is not representing the position correctly. The officials of P.F.R.A. were available to the commission every day the commission was in existence, right from the time they were appointed until they went out of office.

Mr. Argue: That doesn't alter my statement. I think that rather than having them available in a back room some place, P.F.R.A. officials should have been allowed, as they were not allowed, to go before that commission in a public hearing and state their position concerning this project.

We have before us, Mr. Speaker, an amendment and a subamendment. The amendment, as it appears at page 1591 of Hansard for February 3, 1953, reads as follows:

> This house regrets that in the estimates presented to this house no provision has been made for immediately proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) and the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) have taken this to be a want of confidence motion which threatens the existence of the government. They say, therefore, they are not prepared to vote for that amendment. I feel that they should have taken the same attitude members of their party took back in 1946 when there was a motion before the house asking the government to continue the subsidy on milk. One Liberal member after another got up and said he was supporting the motion. After that support was made known, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) rose in his place and told the members on the government side of the house they were to be allowed a free vote on the motion. I believe there should be a free vote on this motion, and that those members should not be governed by the party whips.

As I pointed out some time ago, we would like to see a better guarantee than merely an item in the estimates. You can put something in the estimates and leave it there for the next ten years, but it may not move a cubic yard of dirt on the South Saskatchewan project. We would like to see concrete legislation, and an agreement in concrete terms with Saskatchewan whereby we will know that within the next ten years we shall have the dam constructed and whatever other works are essential within that period of time. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) moved a subamendment which I seconded. The subamendment, as it appears on page 1600 of Hansard for February 3, 1953, reads as follows:

as recommended by the federal government's P.F.R.A. engineers.

I hope the Liberal members from Saskatchewan, if they are not prepared to support the amendment, will at least support the subamendment. By so doing they will show that they support the recommendations of their own P.F.R.A. engineers. I think all of us from Saskatchewan, irrespective of party, should stand by the P.F.R.A. engineers. If the subamendment carried, it would not defeat the government at all. Then the government could have a second look at the motion as amended, and do what they saw fit with the amended motion. In the meantime, Liberal members would have at least given some support by way of vote to the South Saskatchewan project.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask if the member has had his forty minutes?

Mr. Speaker: A question is asked as to whether the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has taken up all his time. He has two minutes left.

Mr. Argue: I shall relinquish my place, Mr. Speaker. I thought I had five or ten minutes left.

Mr. Gardiner: If the hon. member has exhausted his time, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 5, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FLOODS

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL EUROPEAN FLOOD RELIEF COMMITTEE BY CANADIAN RED CROSS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement I would like to make to the house with respect to the disastrous floods in Europe, and I make it because I am sure all hon. members and all those they represent are actively interested in what is taking place and in what is being done in that respect.

I dispatched this morning to the Hon. Leopold Macaulay, chairman of the central council of the Canadian Red Cross at 95 Wellesley Street East, Toronto, the following telegram:

Pursuant to telephone conversation with national commissioner and in accordance with the suggestion which I made in House of Commons on February 3, I am now formally requesting the Canadian Red Cross Society to assist in the establishment of a national European flood relief committee and to act as the administrative arm of the committee.

It is further suggested that any funds contributed for relief purposes be given to the committee and that the Red Cross would act for it in providing transportation and distributing relief supplies through the league of Red Cross Societies (Geneva) and the National Red Cross Societies of Great Britain, the Netherlands and Belgium.

Louis S. St. Laurent

At the suggestion of the national commissioner I sent to each of the provincial premiers the following message:

My dear Premier:

I have today sent the following telegram to the chairman of the central council of the Canadian Red Cross Society.

Then follows the text of the telegram which I have just read and which I will not repeat at this time. After the quotation I added the following:

I have been asked by the society to inquire if you would be willing to serve on the committee which it is proposed to establish.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): To deal with the points raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the order in which he raised them, Mr. Speaker, I would mention first the information he has given us about the plans being made to facilitate the transmission of assistance from Canada to Great Britain, Holland and Belgium. I feel sure there will be general agreement that the Canadian Red Cross Society is extremely well fitted in every way to assume the responsibility which it is accepting in this case. Happily, that organization continues its activities in peace as in war. Sometimes we are inclined to forget the great services it does perform in times of peace. The regular blood donor services and other activities of that kind have been continuing without interruption throughout the years, so there will be already in existence in every community across Canada local branches of the Red Cross Society which will be able to carry out this work.

As each day goes by, in fact as each hour goes by, the extent of the tragedy becomes more apparent. It is sometimes by a single incident that the nature of the general tragedy may be better understood. I think many hon. members will have had something of the nature of a personal feeling of tragedy when they read today that a mother and children, who had gone back to Holland from Georgetown to visit her parents, had been drowned in the flood.

In the three countries affected the record of the tragedy mounts, and most certainly the members of this house on both sides will welcome the steps that are being taken to make it possible for Canadians to give tangible expression to the deep emotion that has been aroused by these events.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): It is hardly necessary for me to say that we in this group are particularly glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is taking quick steps to mobilize the sympathies of the people of this country in connection with the relief of those who are suffering from this great catastrophe in Europe. In talking to people I find that many would like to contribute individually. In view of what the Prime Minister has said, I believe the arrangements being made will give them an opportunity of doing that. I believe it is a fine thing that it can be done at this time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada will find the same satisfaction that I feel in the Prime Minister's announcement of the fact that the Canadian Red Cross has been designated the agency through which relief shall be forwarded to the unfortunate sufferers in Europe. We want the Prime Minister to know that we are glad steps have been taken quickly, and he is apparently doing an excellent job, in getting relief to these sufferers.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I need not say anything, of course, about this suggestion that was made by the Prime Minister. Everybody is and must be in agreement with the broad-minded, national way in which the government and all people in this country are dealing with that tremendous situation that has arisen in the Netherlands, in Belgium and in England at the present time.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN

PROVISION FOR ERECTION OF MONUMENT ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at a meeting of the cabinet this morning a decision was reached to place in the supplementary estimates to be recommended to parliament for the fiscal year 1953-54 an item to provide for the erection on parliament hill of an appropriate monument in memory of the late Sir Robert Borden.

All hon. members know that 1954 will be the 100th anniversary of Sir Robert Borden's birth, and it was felt that it would be appropriate to recommend commemoration of that centenary by the erection of a permanent memorial to one who was recognized by all Canadians, without any distinction of party affiliation, as one of our great prime ministers. No Canadian who knows anything about the history of the last half century of our country ignores the great part that Sir Robert played during the first great war, and the great part that he always played in the constitutional development of this Canadian nation. It is a fair assumption to make, I think, that every hon. member of the house will be glad to approve of that recommendation. I believe the people of the country as a whole will also be happy if this monument can be unveiled at the time of the centenary celebration of Sir Robert's birth.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Naturally I join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and with other members of the house in expressing gratification that steps are being taken to commemorate in the form of a statue the memory of a very great Canadian.

It is only natural that the members of the Conservative party should have a feeling of particular pride in regard to this great man; but as the words of the Prime Minister have clearly indicated, this is not a matter of the pride of one party or of the people of any part of Canada, but rather an expression on behalf of all the people of Canada in tribute to a man who played a great part in the development of our country. He assumed responsibilities during the first world war that extended beyond the ordinary responsibilities of a man in that high office. All of us will recall that it was his insistence at the meeting of those who gathered at Versailles that first asserted in definite form Canada's position by his demand that Canada sign, as a sovereign nation, the treaty of peace which formally terminated the first world war.

Statues of this kind are not merely for the purpose of giving satisfaction to those who have some personal recollection of the man himself, or for the satisfaction to his relatives. It is a good thing for every country that there be before the minds of our people, and particularly the young people, evidence of the fact that under our democratic system of state, a great contribution is made to the advancement of the state by those of different parties who share a common affection for the country in which we live.

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Coming from Nova Scotia as I do, it is a special satisfaction to hear the announcement of the Prime Minister that a monument is to be erected to a great Canadian and a great Nova Scotian, Sir Robert Borden. I do not want to detract from his position in any way, but coming from the county of Cumberland in Nova Scotia I should like to point out that another great Nova Scotian, who up to now has had no monument erected to him, is worthy of note. He was prime minister of Canada also. There would have been no Canada as it is today; there would have been no west; there would have been no Canadian Pacific Railway; there would have been no industrial development at a time when there was that industrial development in Canada, were it not for Sir Charles Tupper. I should like to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the suggestion that a monument to Sir Charles Tupper has been too long delayed. While I am happy to hear that a monument is to be erected now to that great Nova Scotian, Sir Robert Borden, I ask the government to give consideration to the erection of a monument to that other great Nova Scotian and Canadian.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has referred to the erection of a memorial to the late Sir Robert Borden. This decision of the cabinet will probably receive more unanimous support than cabinet decisions ordinarily receive. I probably had not changed my political affiliation in the early days of Sir Robert Borden's political activities, but even if I have changed them since that time I can still say that he was a great Canadian and made a great contribution to the development of Canada as a nation. If I may be allowed to mention it, I have recently been reading a memorial to another great Canadian. I am referring to the book by Donald Creighton on Sir John A. Macdonald. It really made me feel proud that I had, not in an intimate way but merely as a young lad, known of this very great Canadian. I believe commendation is due Mr. Creighton, not just for the biography he has written but because in my opinion he has written, for the first time, Canadian history that is really readable and interesting.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): With respect to the announcement in connection with the monument to Sir Robert Borden, I think it is a nice gesture that the Liberal party of Canada has made in deciding to have a monument erected. We certainly support the suggestion and we shall be anxious to see the project completed. Perhaps some of us might attend the unveiling of the monument.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, as a humble member from Nova Scotia I want to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government on what they are doing toward putting a statue on parliament hill in commemoration of one of the greatest men this country has ever had, and one of our greatest prime ministers. I had the pleasure and, I should say, the honour of reading law in the office of Sir Robert Borden in Halifax. I did not see too much of him at the time but I think he was the kindliest man I ever met in my life.

Some time ago I said a word about Sir Robert Borden in connection with a matter which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) brought before the house today, namely the signing of the treaty of Versailles. The matter of placing monuments on parliament hill in commemoration of our great men is something worthy of our Canadian people. It is something to indicate that after all we have here a united nation irrespective of politics or anything else.

The story of Sir Robert Borden is one well worth reading. I often think that the government of this country, whether it be Conservative or Liberal—and I presume that is the only kind we shall ever have—should get somebody to write, in accurate and historic form, the history of the great men who have ruled over the destinies of this country.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Matthew MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Huffman), that the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Tuesday, February 3, be now concurred in.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word or two with respect to this motion. I believe that it asks the house to approve a recommendation of the committee on standing orders that certain requirements be dispensed with so far as a particular bill is concerned which it is proposed to introduce.

As hon. members of the house are aware, the bill referred to in this report is with respect to a considerable sum of money that was left over from the contributions that were made at the time of the flood in Manitoba in 1950. I believe the amount of money is of the order of $1,450,000 and that the petitioners in this case are asking from parliament a bill to authorize the setting up of a Canadian disaster relief fund.

I need not go into the details as to how this money came to be left over, but I think it would be appropriate to suggest at this time that those who are behind this petition and this bill might give consideration to the possibility of finding some way to turn that money over to the fund which has been announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today, so that it might be used immediately for relief work in the United Kingdom, in the Netherlands and in Belgium.

The thought that this might be done has already been suggested in an editorial in one of the Winnipeg newspapers, and I have no doubt that the other one will probably express the same viewpoint. I am sure all those in Manitoba will support that view. It seems rather strange that we should think of holding on to a large sum of money if it is needed at all at the present time. As was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) the other day, we in Manitoba are deeply conscious of the way in which people around the world came to our assistance when we were in need in 1950. I think it would meet with the wishes and the desires of the people of Manitoba if some way were found to carry out the suggestion to which I have referred. I hope those who are behind this measure will give some consideration to that proposal.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West) presented the first report of the special committee on Bill No. 93, respecting the criminal law, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Before the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. In view of a certain item in this morning's Gazette concerning the possible progress in consideration of this bill, would the Minister of Justice care to comment at this time?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the position is that some doubt has been raised as to the intention of the government with regard to the completion of the work on this bill during the present session of parliament. A great deal of work has been done on this bill, first of all by the Criminal Code revision commission; then by the law officers of the Department of Justice; by the commissioners on uniformity of legislation, criminal section; by the departments of the attorneys general of the various provinces; by the Nova Scotia bar; by the British Columbia bar and by the other place and its banking and commerce committee, especially by a subcommittee consisting of Senator Hayden, Senator Farris and Senator Roebuck. Having regard to all of this work that has been done there is no reason, in our opinion, why a careful and thorough consideration cannot be given to this Bill 93 by the House of Commons committee and by the house itself before the end of the present session. Certainly it is the intention of the government to proceed vigorously with the consideration of the bill to that end.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY IN RELEASING BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister make a statement to the house as to whether it is the intention of the government to release government-held butter to the trade in the very near future?

Will the minister also comment on the statement made by his parliamentary assistant in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) as to the reason for placing restrictions on the sale of this butter?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to give me a copy of his question. I think I can best answer it by reminding the house that over the last four years we have been following the same general policy, namely that of stabilizing the price to farmers throughout the summer months, and we have been making an attempt also to stabilize the price to consumers throughout the winter months. The first winter we were not so successful in stabilizing the price to the consumers. I am not going to comment any further than to say that. During the second winter we had some difficulties as well. During the last year we have been getting along fairly well with that policy.

During the past summer we took delivery of the butter of farmers at all times when it was found impossible or impracticable for others to pay as much as 58 cents a pound for it. We bought the butter at 58 cents, or at comparable rates across Canada, to an extent which gave us about 40 million pounds of butter by the 1st of November last. At about that time we announced to the public of Canada that a reasonable return for the butter which the government had, in order to cover our costs, would be 62 cents a pound. We therefore said on December 4 last that any time we delivered butter until May 1, 1953, we would deliver it at 62 cents, which placed everyone in the trade in a position to know that there was at that time 40 million pounds of butter which could be delivered to them at 62 cents and when occasion arose to make delivery necessary, we would act so as to keep ourselves in position to carry out our undertakings.

Between then and now we have delivered 10 million pounds. The trade has 15 million pounds, and there is coming on to the market month by month 10 million pounds that we cannot get control of in any way. Those 10 million pounds go to the trade. In other words, for the month of February there are 25 million pounds of butter available in Canada to the trade, and that much butter will not be consumed in Canada in the month of February. All of that butter will be available.

The only objective we have in mind is to see to it that our undertaking that we would be able to deliver butter to the trade right down to May 1 next at 62 cents a pound will be carried out. We will be delivering butter to the trade in order to take care of the situation and in such a manner as to provide that we carry out to the consumers the undertaking we gave that butter would be available to them at a price based on a wholesale price of 62 cents right through to the end of this present dairy year, which is down to the end of April.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORMOSA—STATEMENT AS TO CANADIAN POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) addressed a question to the Prime Minister on that part of President Eisenhower's address to congress on the state of the union which concerned Formosa. In replying at that time the Prime Minister indicated that more information might be available later in the week when it was hoped that a discussion on external affairs would take place. That discussion cannot, I think, now take place until next week, and I would therefore like to give information supplementary to that which was given by the Prime Minister on Monday.

I have had an opportunity, as have hon. members, since Monday of studying the text of the statement by the President of the United States to which I have referred. In that statement, as hon. members know, the President announced the modification of the presidential order to the seventh fleet issued by his predecessor on June 27, 1950. That order, which was given, as the house will recall, shortly after the aggressive attack on South Korea, was in the nature of an instruction to the United States seventh fleet both to prevent any attack upon Formosa from the mainland, and also to ensure that Formosa should not be used as a base of operations against the Chinese communist mainland.

The order was issued, of course, before the large-scale intervention by Chinese communist forces in Korea, and its objective was to neutralize Formosa in order to limit the hostilities arising out of the aggression of June 25, 1950, on the Korean peninsula.

As the Prime Minister indicated Monday, the original order was an action taken on the sole responsibility of the United States government, just as the recent action modifying it with respect to what the President has termed the employment of the seventh fleet to "shield communist China" was taken on the sole responsibility of the United States government. That, however, does not make the matter one of little or merely indirect interest to other countries, including Canada.

With respect to the position of the Canadian government, while we remain resolved to carry out our United Nations obligations in Korea, we do not think that the defence of Formosa, which has not been assumed by the United Nations, should be confused with the defence of Korea, which has. As I have mentioned on several occasions in the house, on May 15, 1951, on May 22, 1951, and on April 1, 1952, our consistent position has been that this island should be neutralized, so far as that is possible, while hostilities continue in Korea. Our view has been that the final disposition of Formosa should be a subject to be discussed at a conference on Far Eastern problems which should be held when the fighting ceases in Korea; and we strongly supported the statement of principles approved by the political committee of the fifth United Nations general assembly which specifically provided for such a conference. In any decision regarding the future of Formosa, the wishes of the people there would naturally be a primary consideration.

In considering the possible effects of this recent action by the United States government, I should emphasize that on Far Eastern issues, as on other questions in which we are both concerned, the fundamental and long-term aims of Canada and the United States are similar, although naturally we may differ on occasions in our approach to specific issues and as to how these long-term aims can best be achieved.

Canadians of course know President Eisenhower well. They feel a deep gratitude for the services he has already rendered the free world and have full confidence, I am sure, in his peaceful and constructive purposes. And I am convinced that one of these purposes—as it is the purpose of this government and this parliament and our country, and the purpose of the other governments who are now engaged in Korea—is to end and not to extend the Korean war.

It should also be noted that in his statement President Eisenhower stated clearly that "this order implies no aggressive intent on our part". Nor should we, I think, assume that because of this order any large scale operations in the near future are likely to be undertaken by Chinese nationalist forces on the mainland. The order does, however, rescind that part of the original order by which the United States seventh fleet would prevent any such operations.

The original order did give, I suppose, to the communist forces in China a feeling of immunity from attack from Formosa. This has become increasingly unacceptable to the people of the United States, as the Chinese communists have continued their aggression in Korea and only recently rejected a resolution, approved by the present United Nations general assembly, which could have ended the war there on acceptable terms. The United States government has, therefore, found it necessary to take action to alter a situation which was considered no longer to have its original justification.

It is no doubt hoped that this change may keep more Chinese communist forces in China and hence have an advantageous effect on United Nations operations in Korea. It would of course be another matter, as hon. members will be aware, if Chinese nationalist raiders or invading forces were escorted or protected in their operations by the armed forces of other United Nations governments. We have no reason to believe, however, on the basis of any information available to us that any such development will take place, the consequences of which would be far-reaching.

We are not of course committed by, though naturally we are concerned with, the action taken in Washington in connection with this matter. The government will follow developments with the closest possible attention and take appropriate action to make our views known if and when the occasion so warrants. Meanwhile I think it would be unwise and premature to jump to dogmatic or critical conclusions concerning the step taken by the United States government, and announced in a statement by President Eisenhower which contained so much that was wise and heartening to us all.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question. First, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the house when a debate on this subject will be undertaken; and second, whether the government was informed of this contemplated action on the part of the United States, and whether the government has been informed of any other action, in addition to this, in the same area?

Mr. Pearson: So far as the first question is concerned, it is hoped that a discussion on external affairs may take place in the early part of next week, perhaps Monday or Tuesday. Replying to the second question, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated last Monday, we were informed as a matter of courtesy about this United States unilateral action before it took place. We were informed on Friday last that this paragraph would be included in the President's message. We have no information about any possibility or likelihood of any subsequent action being taken by the United States government.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with the international wheat conference at Washington. Is the Canadian government taking an attitude similar to that of United States representatives who, as is reported in a Reuters dispatch from Washington, are asking for an increase of approximately 36 per cent in the present ceiling price and approximately 55 per cent in the present minimum price?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Since the international wheat conference is a private meeting, and since they are negotiating the possibility of a renewal of the international wheat agreement, I think it would be improper for me to comment upon or discuss what our position is, or what is being put forward there.

The Reuters dispatch, which the hon. member was good enough to show me, does mention in its text that this meeting is a private conference. It prefaces the story with such expressions as "sources said", "it was learned", and so on. I do not know that it would be proper for me to enter into a discussion as to whether or not the story is accurate.

I think it might be helpful, however, if I were to remind the house that on May 26 last, at the conclusion of the first part of this present conference, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made a statement to the house which contains this paragraph:

> With the unanimous agreement of all the advisers, the Canadian delegation took the position that a substantial increase in prices was justified in a renewed agreement and made proposals along that line. The United States and Australia, the two other principal exporters, also put forward proposals for a substantially higher range of prices.

I do not think I should go further than that in answering the hon. member's question.

Mr. Argue: Would the parliamentary assistant give us some idea when the conference may conclude, and when a statement may be made in the matter?

Mr. McIlraith: No, I cannot tell when the conference would conclude. That would be something quite outside our control.

SAINT JOHN BRIDGE AND RAILWAY EXTENSION COMPANY

PROVISION FOR ACQUISITION BY CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 38, respecting the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company.

Mr. Brooks: Could we have an explanation from the minister?

Mr. Chevrier: May I make it in committee?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Brooks: We would like to have a statement by the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I asked the hon. member if I might be permitted to make it in committee.

Mr. Green: We are proposing to suggest that this bill be sent to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. If that is to be done, discussion in the house would have to take place on the motion for second reading.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have no objection to speaking now. The Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company was incorporated by the statutes of New Brunswick (1881) 44 Victoria, chapter 44, with authority to construct and maintain a line connecting the Saint John and Maine Railway at Fairville, New Brunswick, with that of the Intercolonial Railway at its terminus in Saint John, New Brunswick. It was also authorized to construct a bridge across the Saint John river as part of this undertaking. The company was declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada by chapter 26 of the statutes of Canada, 1883.

By the act last mentioned the federal government was authorized to make a loan to the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company of $433,900 upon the security of a mortgage on the entire assets and property of the company. The loan was made and the mortgage given by the company to the federal government on December 10, 1883.

The loan was repayable in 15 years and in 1898 under authority of chapter 9 of the statutes of 1898, the maturity date was estended for another 15 years. No further extension has been given but interest has been paid annually at 4 per cent.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company acquired a majority of the common stock of the bridge company in 1905 and for many years has owned all outstanding shares and securities. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has advised the government that it is now prepared to repay this loan and wishes to take an assignment of the mortgage. The Canadian Pacific represents that it is necessary, upon repayment, that all title of Her Majesty in the properties mortgaged become vested in the Canadian Pacific and that its right to ownership of the shares and securities be beyond question.

Although the bridge company is a separate corporation, it is by ownership and operation an integral part of the Canadian Pacific system. In view of this it is desirable that the companies be given the powers contemplated by sections 151 to 153 of the Railway Act.

This is the ordinary type of bill which is passed under similar circumstances when a debt or loan is repaid. It consists of the usual assignment, not only of the mortgage security on the property but also the right to sue on the demand covenant as well as the rights under the usual covenants mentioned in the document.

This is a simple bill for the purpose of enabling the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to repay the loan to the government and to have the title of Her Majesty in the properties covered by the mortgage vested in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to oppose this bill as I know it has been considered by another place, but I think perhaps there is a little more interest in it than might be indicated by what the minister has said. I do not intend to go into the history of the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company except to say that in the early days this bridge provided an important link in our Canadian transportation system between the eastern part of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and the western part of the province and the United States.

When this matter first came up I read over the debates in 1883 when this particular bill asking for a charter from the province of New Brunswick to a private company was before the dominion house. The resolution was presented by Sir Leonard Tilley, who was the member for the city of Saint John. It was pointed out at that time how important this railway link was. Sir Edward Blake, who took part in the debate, as did Sir Charles Tupper, objected to a private company getting control of such an important link in our transportation system.

The objection at that time was based on the fact that there were other railways which were interested, and that there was a possibility of the shares of the company being purchased by one railway to the disadvantage of the others. The shares were purchased, as the minister has told us, by the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1905, but there has been no intimation that this has worked to the disadvantage of any other company. Sir Edward Blake referred also to the matter of tolls which he contended should be controlled by the federal government if they did not build the bridge themselves. Sir Leonard Tilley explained that they would be under the control of the federal government.

I think it is only natural that the Canadian Pacific should get control of this bridge and railway. As far as is known I believe they have acted fairly with the other railways. This bridge is used not only by the Canadian Pacific but also by the Canadian National and in the past it has been used by other railroads. Now that the Canadian Pacific virtually will be the owners of this bridge I should like to ask the minister what arrangements have been made for the protection of the Canadian National and other railways which will use it. Is this bridge to be a separate entity or are running rights to be given, not only over the bridge but over that part of the railroad line which is owned by the Canadian Pacific and used by the Canadian National?

There is another point that occurs to me. This act was passed by the federal house 70 years ago, and it is over 70 years since the act was passed by the New Brunswick legislature. In Saint John for the past number of years there has been a feeling that there should be a bridge across the Saint John harbour. I should like to ask the minister whether any representations have been made to his department for assistance in the construction of a bridge across that harbour, which possibly might be joined in by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

These are some questions which I should like to have the minister answer. I would suggest also that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) for introducing into the discussion of this bill a subject which has been uppermost in the minds of all of us in Saint John for some time. This railway bridge is the only bridge across the Saint John river or harbour between Saint John and Fredericton. Along with the highway bridge which is adjacent, it is the only link between Saint John proper and Lancaster and thence the southwestern section of the province.

The question of a new bridge has been under study by the people of Saint John for many years. The need for civil defence has brought this problem more prominently to the fore. I suggest to the minister that he give some thought to the question of a bridge across Saint John harbour. We must remember that practically the only means of transportation now existing between the central and western sections of the city of Saint John and the city of Lancaster which lies adjacent thereto is an antiquated ferry-boat, the operation of which is costing the city of Saint John a considerable amount of money each year, because it operates at a deficit.

I know that before very long stronger representations than ever are going to be made to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in connection with this proposed bridge. I hope that by having this advance notice of the intention of the people of Saint John he will be in a position, and the engineers of his department will also be in a position, to give the question full consideration. Perhaps the engineers might work on the subject and see if there is not some way whereby the people of the city of Saint John can be given more ready access to that part of the city which lies on the western side of the harbour. It should also be taken into account that this railway bridge, together with the adjacent highway bridge, constitute the sole link between the east and west sides of the Saint John river above Fredericton.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: I am grateful to hon. members who have taken part in this debate for the matters they have brought to the attention of the house. However, I would remind hon. members that this is a simple bill which has only two things in mind. The first is whether or not we shall accept payment of a mortgage which is owing by the company in question to the crown for $433,000 odd, and then whether we shall grant title as requested under the terms of the bill. That is all that is before the house. There is no question of tolls, no question of running rights of the Canadian National Railways and no question of building another bridge across the Saint John harbour.

Mr. Brooks: I was simply going to ask whether or not the protection of any other railroad would be of interest in connection with this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: It might be of interest. All these questions are of interest to the house and of interest to hon. members, more particularly, I would think, to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) who has just spoken; but whether they deal with the matter under discussion is another thing. What I am trying to say to the hon. member, as respectfully as I can, is that this is a simple bill to determine the right of acceptance of the moneys owing and, next, to give title under the act to the company paying the money.

For those reasons I do not see the slightest occasion for referring this bill to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines but I am not going to take that position. If my hon. friend feels that he, and those whom he represents, will be more adequately protected by reference of the bill to that committee I am not going to stand in the way. I do not think it is necessary because the matter is so simple. Now, since he has asked some questions perhaps I should deal with them.

He has inquired about the matter of tolls. Well, again I say this bill does not deal with tolls. The board of transport commissioners is the body charged with the responsibility for establishment of tolls upon application by railways and other groups. Also he inquired what subsidiary corporation was operating this bridge. My understanding is that the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company was incorporated in 1881, and in 1883 the company was declared by this parliament to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. In 1885 the bridge and railway were completed and operated by the New Brunswick Railway Company, who took over operation of the bridge. Since then the property in the bridge has been taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway who, in 1905, purchased a controlling interest in the shares of the company. So the parent company, as I understand it, is the Canadian Pacific Railway and the subsidiary is the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company.

With reference to the representations in connection with a bridge across the harbour of Saint John, that with other matters I think might be dealt with at the proper opportunity. We are charged here with one responsibility, and if my hon. friend will allow me, I would like to deal with that particular responsibility now and with the others when the opportunity arises.

If my friend feels, and if the opposition feels, that this bill should go to the committee I will not raise any objection. I therefore move that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Brooks: I was just going to reply to a remark made by the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This cannot be allowed, as the hon. member knows. The minister has closed the debate; this is second reading of the bill.

Mr. Brooks: I just want to ask a question. Under section 3 it says that this is subject to the provisions of sections 151, 152 and 153 of the Railway Act; and also that it is subject to section 6 of chapter 47 of the statutes of 1890. That I think has to do with tolls and the acquiring of running rights by other railways over this bridge and this road.

Mr. Chevrier: I have section 6 of chapter 47 of the statutes of 1890 here and it has nothing to do with tolls. It simply sets out the manner in which transactions shall be carried out and, in so far as clause 3 of the bill is concerned, it should be stipulated in the special act that the company paying off the mortgage may have the right to enter into agreements with another railway company. The Canadian Pacific Railway, which is paying off the mortgage, would, I take it, like to continue or enter into agreements with the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company. It is for that reason that the section is included in the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PAYMENT CERTIFICATES, ANNUAL BUDGET, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 39, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Overseas Telecommunication Act

He said: Mr. Speaker, in 1949 parliament enacted the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act. Under that act the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, commonly referred to as the C.O.T.C., was established as a crown corporation without share capital. The corporation was set up for the purpose of taking over the property and equipment in Canada of the Canadian Marconi Company and Cable and Wireless Limited used in connection with external communication services, and to operate these services as a unit within the commonwealth telecommunications system.

Since this act was passed in 1949 two important measures have been enacted by parliament which relate to financial operations of crown corporations. First, in 1951 the Financial Administration Act was passed, and part VIII of this act applies generally to crown corporations including the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. Part VIII of the Financial Administration Act contains provisions that are designed to regulate the financial operations of crown corporations.

Second, in 1952 the Income Tax Act was amended to apply to crown corporations specified in schedule D of the Financial Administration Act. The Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation is one of these crown corporations which is now subject to the Income Tax Act.

The bill provides for the removal of the mandatory requirement on the corporation to pay annually to the Receiver General an amount equal to its operating profit, and also the provision requiring payment to the corporation of an amount equal to its operating loss, to be paid from moneys appropriated by parliament for that purpose.

The proposed amendment would permit the corporation to accumulate a surplus to be used for capital development and expansion purposes, as well as to provide a surplus for contingencies. As the corporation would be subject to the provisions of part VIII of the Financial Administration Act, its capital budget would have to be approved by the governor in council and the expenditure of any surplus remaining after the payment of income tax would be subject to approval of the government.

Since the corporation commenced business as a unit within the commonwealth telecommunications system on April 1, 1950, its operations have been profitable, as shown in the corporation's annual reports tabled in this house. It is expected that the corporation will pay to the federal government taxes for the year 1952 estimated at $129,768, subject to adjustment.

I think the reports that have been tabled already indicate that for the first year's operation there has been a surplus of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $85,000; for the second year the surplus is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $150,000, both of which amounts have been turned over to the federal treasury.

With the changes contemplated in this bill, the corporation would have some flexibility in its financial arrangements and, subject to the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, would be permitted to set aside a portion of its surplus, after payment of taxes, to be used for capital development and contingencies. Part II of the bill is merely for the purpose of the new revised statutes.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): This is the first time we have heard about the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation since it was set up in 1949. There have been reports, as the minister stated, which were tabled in the house and which appeared in the Auditor General's report a long time after they had been prepared. Hon. members will recall that the purpose of setting up the corporation in 1949 was to take over Cable and Wireless Limited which, as its name implies, was the company which operated cable and radio telegraph communications owned by the British company, in conformity with an agreement with other members of the commonwealth.

At that time hon. members may remember that a large sum of money, some $4·5 million, was appropriated for the purpose of taking over the assets of the company. We have not yet received any statement of how that money was disbursed. Questions asked when the bill was under consideration received answers that the matter had not yet been adjusted. From an examination of the two reports it will be seen that the adjustment had not been made up to the time of the last report dated March 31, 1952. As the minister states, the corporation has been a profitable business venture, having a profit of $89,000 in the first nine months of its operation and about $190,000 in its second year of operation.

An examination of this bill as it stands gives the members of this house very little information. The study I have made of it indicates that the bill is quite complicated. It is of such a nature that it seems to me that, like the previous bill, it should be referred to a committee. I am not sure if the financial statements have been examined in the public accounts committee, but I believe the time is opportune when some consideration should be given to the details which were not available when the former bill was under consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell the hon. member that it is my intention to move to refer this, for the very reasons he has mentioned, to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am glad to hear the minister's statement in that respect. There are, however, one or two things of a general nature which I should like to mention. The corporation operates radiotelephone and has to do with telephone communication with Newfoundland. Hon. members will recall that a reduction was made in the rates between Newfoundland and other parts of Canada a few months ago. At that time I protested that the rates were not sufficiently reduced and we were not given the advantage of special rates after 6 p.m. in the evenings and on Sundays as is done elsewhere in Canada. In the last report of the corporation I noticed that business between Newfoundland and the other provinces of Canada had increased by about 20 per cent, whereas communications across the Atlantic had declined. It seems to me, therefore, that since the corporation has been making so much money on its business with Newfoundland, there is every justification for a greater reduction in rates than we received.

The minister has referred to the purpose for which the excess revenue over expenditures will be used, and stated that it will be for capital expansion. In the Gazette of last Saturday I noticed a picture of one of the officials of this corporation in Montreal explaining to the premier and attorney general of Newfoundland a plan for a new building to be erected in St. John's which was going to cost a quarter of a million dollars. It seems to me that members of this house are entitled to that information before it is given to the public. We do not know anything about this corporation. It seems strange that the government should be conducting so many large businesses, and that plans should be decided upon for large expenditures of money before the legislation authorizing them has been passed in this house.

In studying this simple bill I have been impressed with the lack of information that hon. members have on these corporations that are included in schedule D of the Financial Administration Act. It is true that the business of Canadian National Railways is considered by a special committee, but hon. members should not have to guess at what is going on in a corporation of this kind. It is true that perhaps only $2 million of revenue is involved, but the principle remains. I am, therefore, very glad to know from the minister that this bill will be referred to a committee, and I presume it will be the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

RECOVERY OF INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 19, to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may have permission to deal with this in committee. When the original bill came up for discussion it was referred to committee of the whole and not to a standing committee. I would hope that it would be the feeling of the house that we should do the same with this amendment. It is, in fact, only an amendment to one section of the original bill. If I could have the permission of the house, I should like to make a statement in committee.

Mr. Green: We were not intending to ask that this bill go to any committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Recapture where survey completed.

Mr. Chevrier: Before attempting to explain the present bill it should perhaps be observed that under section 7 of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act shipowners are permitted each year to transfer to reserve account a limited sum of tax-free money. The purpose of that section is to enable an owner to accumulate sufficient funds to meet certain extraordinary expenses which he has to incur periodically in connection with the special surveys or inspections of his ship. The intervals at which special surveys must be held are either every four or every five years depending upon whether the survey is for purposes of insurance under the rules of a classification society or for purposes of safety under the Canada Shipping Act.

It has been found necessary to amend the section in order to guard against the loss of revenue by leaving tax-free reserves in the hands of shipowners for indefinite periods of time. Accordingly the present amendment provides machinery for periodically recapturing or rendering taxable such of these reserves as are not or cannot be used for the purpose for which they were intended as, for instance, in cases where the amounts set aside exceed the costs of survey or where a ship is lost or sold at some time during one of these four or five year cycles.

The amendment now before the committee requires all reserves to be brought into profit and loss account in the year in which the survey was completed or in which the ship was lost or sold. It should be observed that under the amendment the reserve account periodically becomes self-liquidating. If, on the one hand, the ship is lost or sold, the reserve must thereupon be brought into profit and loss account. If, on the other hand, nothing happens to the ship and the survey is held in due course, the reserve is brought into profit and loss account in the form of a credit and the costs of survey are entered in the same account by way of offsetting debit.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act was passed in 1949 with the object, among others, of encouraging shipbuilding in Canada. It contained a provision for accelerated depreciation in the case of the construction of new vessels and also in the case of repairs, as I read the original act. Then there was this help given in the way of allowing a reserve to be set up from which the quadrennial survey and certain other expenses which would occur from time to time could be provided for in the intervening years.

This amendment before the committee today purports to make provision for recovering taxation on these reserves. In effect it is certainly not going to be of any help to the shipbuilding industry. It is the reverse. It is a help to the Department of National Revenue. I can see the reason for making these reserves taxable where the survey has not been held. For example, if the ship has been lost in the meantime, then there would appear to be no reason why that money which has been put in a reserve should not become taxable. But it is not so clear why the money which has actually been spent on the survey should be taxable.

The minister did not explain that point in his opening remarks. But as I read section 1 of the bill, once the survey has been made and has been paid for, taxation is to be levied on the amount actually used in payment for the survey. I do not understand why such payments should not be allowed as an operating expense and thus not be taxable at all. I may not have the correct explanation of the section, but to me it reads in that way.

Mr. Chevrier: They are allowed as an expense.

Mr. Green: I hope that is correct. We can go into that matter in a little more detail in a few minutes.

While one object of the original act was to aid shipbuilding in Canada, another equally important objective was to modernize the Canadian merchant navy. This had become necessary because of the fact that the ships we built during the war were all slow cargo vessels quite unable to compete with the faster ships which were being built by other countries, commencing immediately after the war.

I have here the various reports of our own Canadian maritime commission, all of which substantiate my statement that Canada needed a modern, fast merchant navy. Similar statements have been made from time to time by the minister himself. I doubt whether he or anyone else would question the fact that one of the great needs in Canada since the end of the last war has been to build up a modern merchant navy. If we cannot succeed in doing that it is only a matter of time until we cease to be a maritime nation in so far as deep-sea shipping is concerned.

This plan was therefore brought in to encourage the building of modern cargo vessels. There was also, of course, what was known as the replacement plan under which, if the owner of one of the slow, war-built cargo vessels sold his ship, he had to put the proceeds into an escrow fund managed by the Canadian maritime commission, the idea being that that money would eventually be used in the construction of a modern vessel.

The result of these two plans—the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act and the replacement plan—has been that Canada has built a great many ships for the great lakes trade and also for coastal shipping. For that reason I believe that the plans can be considered as being at least partially successful. Mind you, the bulk of our shipbuilding now is naval shipbuilding. I do not know the percentage—the minister can tell us that—but perhaps 75 or 80 per cent of the value of shipbuilding in the country today is for the Department of National Defence or for some other department of government.

As to naval shipbuilding and building for the great lakes trade and for the coastal trade, the situation seems to be fairly satisfactory. But when we turn to the building of vessels for the deep-sea trade, the picture is entirely different. We have built very very few modern cargo vessels. I believe that two tankers are now being built, but so far as I am able to ascertain from the fifth report of the Canadian maritime commission, which is dated June 30, 1952, no other modern cargo vessels or modern tankers have been built for the ocean-going trade.

If we turn to page 6 of the report we find great jubilation because of the fact that these two tankers are being built. The paragraph in question reads:

> What must also be regarded as an encouraging development took place toward the end of 1951.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I do not want to stop him from discussing the problems of the Canadian maritime commission; neither do I want to interfere with the discussion of the subject which he is now introducing, but I have not come here prepared to deal with that subject. I am here ready to discuss the bill that is before the committee, which is a depreciation measure, and which simply seeks to recapture certain of the funds that shipowners and shipbuilders are claiming as exemptions. Now, if the chair wants to allow the hon. member to go into a full discussion of the shipbuilding problems in Canada, I will not object. I think that I can draw on my memory to deal with them, but it will be in only a very general way, and it certainly will not be in as satisfactory a way as I would like it and I am sure as he would like it to be dealt with. Therefore I raise the point.

Mr. Green: I am going to suggest that further provision should be made in this bill to help meet the situation, and I think I am quite in order in doing so. To lay the groundwork for that I must complete this picture. The paragraph to which I was referring reads as follows:

> What must also be regarded as an encouraging development took place toward the end of 1951. This was the placing of an order for a 28,000 deadweight ton tanker for Canadian registry, the first ocean-going vessel to be constructed under the commission's replacement plan, followed early in the new year by an order from the same owners for a second tanker of similar dimensions. The commission has always been anxious to see the primary purpose of the plan fulfilled through the building of new ocean-going tonnage, and it is to be hoped that the two new tankers will prove to be the forerunners of other ocean-going vessels built in Canadian shipyards.

We are building modern vessels for other countries. I believe some are being built in the Vickers yards in Montreal at the moment. The policies do not seem to be broad enough to result in having these fast vessels built for Canada. The minister was asked about this during the last session, and at that time—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I must ask for a ruling. I think this is wholly out of order on the matter before us. This is a bill which has to do with the recapture of certain moneys exempt from income tax under the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. I think this discussion is going away beyond the subject before the house.

Mr. Green: I am just laying the foundation, sir, for my suggestion that further provision should be made in this bill.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member mind telling us what his suggestions are. We can realize that he is laying a foundation for his argument, but we do not know whether he is leading toward it or not.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I have to interrupt again. In order to lay a foundation the hon. member must have something before the committee either by way of amendment to this section or by way of amendment to the bill. There is nothing before the committee other than section 1. It is true that he can talk on section 1 in general terms, but he certainly cannot go on and deal with the Canadian maritime commission report, which is not a matter that concerns this particular bill. There will be an opportunity on at least two occasions, when the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act are brought before the house and again when the estimates of the Department of Transport are up and we call the item having to do with the Canadian maritime commission, to deal with all the matters which my hon. friend seeks to discuss now, so that he is not being restricted, nor is there any unfairness in view of the fact that he will be perfectly at liberty to deal with this subject at a later date.

Mr. Green: This is legislation to assist shipbuilding in Canada. The minister has brought in an amendment to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act today which in my opinion does the opposite. If anything, it hampers shipbuilding in Canada. Certainly the amendment is not helping to meet the situation that I am disclosing.

Mr. Chevrier: I disagree.

Mr. Green: The minister may disagree; that is his privilege, but any hon. member is entitled to discuss the bill from that point of view. I am going to suggest to the minister that he give consideration to making some further provision in this act which will bring about the construction of modern deep-sea vessels in Canada. I think that is perfectly in order. For example—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: —I hold in my hand the Foreign Trade Journal of January 17 of this year.

The Chairman: Order. I thank the hon. member for having clarified his position and explaining to the committee what his intentions are. Now that he has given us his intentions I am in a better position to say that in my humble view he is not in order.

Mr. Green: May we not discuss shipbuilding?

The Chairman: It is true that this is a bill to amend an act which is designed to bring about some assistance to vessel construction, but it deals only with depreciation that is to enable the shipowners to make certain deductions. What the hon. member has in mind is something to further amend the act in order to make it more appropriate to help the construction of vessels along the lines he has suggested. But right now we must deal with section 1. That is all that is before the committee. If he feels that this is not going to provide to the shipowners the type of help which the minister has suggested, he may speak to that, but not to suggest how further help by way of further amending the act should be given.

All we have before us now is clause 1 which deals with depreciation, certain deductions that shipowners are entitled to make.

Mr. Green: Surely I am not to be put in the position that because I agreed to let this bill receive second reading without discussion, I can only deal with the actual proposals contained in section 1. In the first place, as you know, Mr. Chairman, a practice has developed in this house under which we have a wide discussion on section 1. In the second place, on second reading of this bill amending the act any hon. member would have been entitled to say that this amendment does not go far enough, that there should be other amendments to the act to bring about the purpose which parliament had in mind when the original act was passed, and that is all I am trying to do now.

The Chairman: I do not want to start a long discussion on procedure or on the point of order. I think the hon. member will agree that if this house by practice has authorized a general discussion of the bill on clause 1 of a bill he will agree that that does not entitle him to discuss the whole act. He can discuss generally the amendment provided by the amending bill. In this instance the amending bill is limited to one particular. He can discuss generally that one particular.

Mr. Green: Oh, well—

The Chairman: I know the hon. member and others on both sides of the house have expressed varied opinions on the type of general discussion that is supposed to take place in committee on the first clause of a bill.

I have experienced that many times. But it seems unreasonable for hon. members to believe that, although by practice they are entitled to have a general discussion on the first section of a bill, they can discuss the whole act, and spend most of their time trying to advance arguments supporting another point, or in support of something else they would like to see in the bill.

If the hon. member is laying a foundation for a suggestion he has in mind along that line, then I am afraid he will be out of order most of the time. Perhaps he should be content to make passing references to other things he would like to see in the bill, but to direct his remarks particularly to the depreciation clause authorized by this amending bill.

The hon. member has said that because he agreed to have the bill considered in committee he should not now be prevented from saying what he would have been allowed to say in the debate on second reading. I would point out to him that in the debate on second reading he would have had to address himself to the principle of the amending bill. He could not have discussed the sections of the bill, and his speech in any event would have had to be relevant. See Votes and Proceedings, Monday, 14th November, 1949, page 237.

Now that second reading has been adopted, while I may sympathize with the hon. member's position I cannot allow him in committee to make the type of speech which could have been allowed in the debate on second reading. As I said a moment ago, this difficulty can be resolved easily if hon. members indicate their willingness to make progress. I would ask the hon. member's co-operation in this regard.

Mr. Green: If that is to be the position, then certainly the opposition would be very foolish on any future measure to agree to any minister's suggestion that a bill go to committee without a debate on second reading. I did this today to facilitate the minister's wishes.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not so.

Mr. Green: My speech would have been completed fifteen minutes ago if the minister had not objected. I must point out to Your Honour, with all respect, that there is no rule of procedure which says that when an amendment is up for consideration an hon. member cannot suggest that such amendment does not go far enough, or that there should be further amendments.

For example, some of the points I was going to suggest come within the scope of a measure of this kind. Yet Your Honour makes discussion impossible if a member must deal only with the one amendment placed before us, and cannot suggest any other variations by way of amendments. Your Honour makes debate impossible, if that is the position in which I am placed at the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, I cannot allow the hon. member to make the statement he made a moment ago without making some comments. I am sure upon reflection he will admit that his statement was not fair, when he said that he was prejudiced in his opposition because he allowed second reading and permitted the house to go into committee.

The hon. member knows as well as I do that if the discussion had taken place with Mr. Speaker in the chair the only matters to which he could have referred would be those concerning depreciation. That is the only matter dealt with by this amendment to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. Therefore he could not go on to talk about Canadian vessel construction or replacement plans. He could not, to my way of thinking, discuss naval vessel construction in this country.

This bill refers to one form of assistance which was passed in 1949. The amendment is not sought either to assist or to be detrimental to shipping companies. It is simply to recapture certain amounts of money exempted from taxation but not expended on a quadrennial survey, or moneys unspent because a ship has been lost.

If the hon. member wishes to discuss methods by which we can assist the shipping industry or the shipbuilding industry by way of amendment to this depreciation section, he is perfectly welcome to do so, and I shall be delighted to hear his suggestions. But if he wants to discuss the whole government policy as established by the maritime commission, and other shipping matters related to the Department of Transport, then there will be no end to the discussion. I submit, with all respect, that the discussion should be on the depreciation feature, because that is the point before us now.

Mr. Green: If that is to be Your Honour's ruling, I am bound by it.

Mr. Chevrier: That is all the amendment is.

Mr. Green: I would point out to the minister what has been done recently in Japan, but I cannot do so if the rule is interpreted in this way. What is the use of trying to debate the matter if we cannot bring these points out?

The Chairman: If this were an amendment to the Criminal Code, does the hon. member think he would be entitled to discuss the whole of the Criminal Code? Would he discuss the whole of it just because he thinks a further amendment should be brought in? That was the precise point made not so long ago in the house.

If the hon. member wishes to amend the bill further, we must dispose of one section first. Then he may rise in his place and say, "I should like to propose another clause, which will be known as clause 2, and which I now move." He would say that it reads in a certain way, and then would discuss it. That amendment would then be put and discussed.

Normally bills have more than one section, and when the bill is in committee hon. members have a general discussion on the first section. It so happens that this particular bill is an amending bill with only one section.

Mr. Green: There are three sections in it.

The Chairman: The other sections are merely to bring the new section into accord with the revised statutes about to be published. It is the standard procedure which is followed in almost all the bills which have been brought in, or which are likely to be brought in, until the revised statutes are published.

Therefore the bill has only one section, in effect. I would not want the hon. member to remain under the impression that I wish to curtail discussion. I feel quite sure I am being fair not only to the hon. member, but to hon. members in all parts of the house, and particularly those of the opposition. I would be prepared to hear any other members in the opposition who feel that I am not being fair in this instance.

I feel, however, that I am following what has been done in the past when I interpret the rule to mean that discussion must be strictly relevant to the section. Discussion must always be within the scope of the amending bill. I do not mind passing references to other amendments the hon. member may think should be included, but I do suggest he should not make a speech on such a point, or lay the foundation by quoting what has been done by the maritime commission, or by quoting press reports or questions the minister has been asked in the past.

I want to be as fair as I can. I would not want to make a ruling, but if that is the way I must act I would have to say that I so rule.

Mr. Green: I do not understand what Your Honour has in mind. You say that I can make passing references to ways in which this measure might be improved. What does Your Honour mean by that? That is all I was trying to do. If I can do that, all right; if I cannot do that, there is no use dealing with the measure at all.

The Chairman: I am afraid the hon. member and I do not have the same conception of what is meant by a passing reference.

Mr. Gibson: Reference is made in this section to a taxpayer, and to the moneys which are accumulated in this fund. Should a vessel be lost and the value be all recaptured in the one year I was wondering what the effect would be on an individual taxpayer as compared with a corporation taxpayer. Would an individual taxpayer's income tax not be considerably higher if it were collected all in the one year?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that there would be any difference between an individual and a corporation. As I understand the section, it operates in this way. Assume that in 1949, when the act was passed, an individual or corporation owning a ship wanted to claim depreciation; he or they would set aside over a period of some four or five years say $50,000. Let us take the first alternative. At the end of a five-year period a survey costs him only $40,000. He would then have to put back into his profit and loss account the sum of $10,000. Likewise, under the second alternative, if the ship were lost or destroyed, he would have to put back the full amount.

Mr. Gibson: In the one year?

Mr. Chevrier: At the end of the four or five-year period, or during the year the ship was lost or destroyed.

Mr. Gibson: It would be income for that year, and as an individual taxpayer his rate would naturally be up. If his profits were increased by $40,000 in that one year he would be in a higher bracket.

Mr. Chevrier: The $40,000 would not be put aside in one year, it would be put aside over the four or five-year period at the rate of say $10,000 a year.

Mr. Gibson: That is the whole point. If he lost the ship after four years his income as an individual in that year would be up $40,000 and his bracket would be much higher.

Mr. Chevrier: The act provides for the recapture of that amount in the year in which the ship was lost or in which the survey was completed. I think the answer to my hon. friend's question is yes.

Mr. Gibson: Does the minister think that the individual taxpayer is still protected and is treated equitably as compared to the corporation taxpayer? It does not appear to me that that is so.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot say any more than that. This is an income tax matter which has been given careful consideration by the income tax officials. I take it that their object was to get from the taxpayer the amount that he had been exempted during that period of four or five years. It is true that in the interval the tax may have increased and to that extent there might be some difficulty. I do not know whether that is what my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. Gibson: Assume that an individual taxpayer had a gross profit of $20,000 in one year and he set aside $10,000. He would only pay income tax on the $10,000. But then at the end of four years he has this additional $40,000 added to his income for that year.

Mr. Chevrier: He would not pay income tax on the $10,000.

Mr. Gibson: He makes $20,000 gross profit. He pays income tax on $10,000, which is his normal income, and he sets $10,000 aside. But then he loses his ship. Supposing in that year he made his normal $20,000 gross profit. His income tax for that year would be computed on the basis of $60,000. That appears to me unfair when compared to the treatment given the incorporated company which would pay only 52 per cent on its profits for the year.

Mr. Chevrier: It would depend upon whether the quadrennial or other special survey was completed. If it was completed and he had set aside $50,000 and had disbursed only $40,000, it is natural that he should pay income tax on the $10,000 for which he had got exemption over the period of ten years.

Mr. Gibson: He gets exemption over the five years, but it becomes taxable in one year.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand the point my hon. friend is making. I doubt if the amendment covers that point.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Gibson: I know the minister wants to be fair, and perhaps he would discuss this with the Department of Finance.

Mr. Green: Was it not the original intention when section 7 was written into the act that the money set aside for these surveys should not be taxed?

Mr. Chevrier: The intention was to encourage construction. There was to be this exemption for quadrennial surveys and classification surveys. As is set out in the amendment, it often happens that a ship is lost or destroyed and that section did not apply. Therefore there was no reason why there should not be a tax on that money. The point is that section 7 as it will apply would cover these exceptional cases. This is not the general rule, but once these sums have been set aside and a ship is lost or destroyed or a survey is completed, then taxation applies. I do not know what the proportion is, but I think in the vast majority of cases the amendment would not come into operation. The amendment is devised to cover these exceptional cases.

Mr. Green: Then the minister says that where the money has been spent on a survey it should not be taxed.

Mr. Chevrier: That is correct. Where money has been spent on a survey, that should not be taxable. That is covered by the first part of section 1.

Mr. Green: As I read that provision the money is actually made taxable.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not made taxable; it is recaptured. There is a distinction between the two.

Mr. Green: It is put in the position where it is taxable. The minister has just said that the intention was that money actually spent on a survey would not be taxable. My understanding of the original act was that shipowners were allowed to set aside a reserve for this purpose which would not be taxable.

Mr. Chevrier: That is my understanding.

Mr. Green: As I read this amendment, the whole of that amount is made taxable. It reads:

(2) In any case where

(a) a taxpayer has under subsection one made a deduction in respect of a vessel as a reserve for expenses to be incurred by reason of a quadrennial or other special survey of that vessel, and—

That is the setting aside of a reserve for the purpose of a survey.

(b) the quadrennial or other special survey in respect of which the deduction was made has been completed to the extent that the vessel is permitted to proceed on a voyage, in otner words, that paragraph covers the case where a survey has been completed. Then the amendment goes on:

the aggregate amount of the deductions in respect of the vessel that have not previously been included in computing the taxpayer's income under part I of the Income Tax Act—

That surely describes the money that is in reserve.

—shall be included in computing his income under part I of the Income Tax Act for the taxation year in which the survey was so completed.

So that the net result is that, instead of a man who is having a ship built paying his income tax on the $10,000 he put in reserve in 1948, and then paying on $5,000 that he put in reserve in 1949, all this amendment does is to take the whole of the money set in reserve and tax it all in 1952. The minister has said that the intention of section 7 originally was that this money spent on surveys would not be taxable at all—and that was my understanding too. I believe that was the purpose: in effect, to allow this money put aside for surveys as operating expenses of a shipping company. Now, I believe, and it appears to me, that the Department of National Revenue has come along with this amendment in order to make those sums taxable. It appears to be directly opposite to the original intention of the act.

A person cannot make the same argument where the ship has been lost and the survey has not actually been carried out. In that case the money which is put in reserve is not going to be used for a survey and I think it is quite properly taxable; but the main point, it seems to me, is whether these moneys used for surveys are to be taxable or whether they are not. If they are to be taxable then certainly that is what this amendment achieves. It makes them taxable. If they are not to be taxable the section is wrong and subsection 2 which it proposes to add to section 7 should be deleted.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Chairman, the bill is very simple and I am afraid there is an attempt by my hon. friend to complicate it.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I think I have had enough abuse here today and I object to that. I am not attempting to complicate it at all.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend may object if he likes but I am telling him that he is trying to complicate a simple matter.

Mr. Green: You should understand it—and that is the trouble. I have the floor and the minister has no right to make a statement of that kind. I am trying to make suggestions for the improvement of this measure. The minister seems to be very, very touchy about anyone making suggestions.

The Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to object to the remarks made by the minister he may rise on a question of privilege. If he did, the words used by the minister are not offensive to the point where I should ask the minister to withdraw or apologize.

Mr. Green: No, they are just ridiculous.

The Chairman: If he in turn says that the minister is touchy this afternoon, the minister may perhaps feel that his feelings are hurt and there will be no end to this. Perhaps the minister should give his explanation.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member feels that he has been offended by the words I have used I am happy to withdraw them.

Mr. Green: Oh, no, I do not.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not put on this section the interpretation that my hon. friend puts on it and I hope that he will not misunderstand me when I say that I think he is trying to read into this section something that is really not there.

Section 7 of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act was devised to assist those shipbuilders who intended to be making quadrennial surveys or classification surveys; and it was there set out that they should get an exemption from taxation of the sums of money they would have to set aside over a period of years for the purpose of making those surveys. I understand those surveys cannot be made immediately but that it takes some time. The shipowner or the corporation owning the ship must be able to put some of those moneys aside in order to be ready for the survey when it takes place.

It has happened in the experience of the Department of National Revenue that two things occur. First is that the ship is lost or destroyed or, for some other reason, the survey did not take place at all. That being the case, it is only fair it seems to me that those moneys which were exempted from taxation should be put back into the profit and loss account of the taxpayer.

Mr. Green: I said that.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): But not that way.

Mr. Chevrier: Surely that is simple.

The next point relates to the first part where the survey has been completed and the corporation or shipbuilder has paid for it a lesser amount than has been put aside as reserve. Surely the difference between the two, whether it is $5,000, $10,000 or $20,000, should also be plowed back, recaptured and put into the profit and loss account so that taxation may be claimed on it.

Now, that is the intention of the section and that is what the Department of Justice advises me it means. That is what the legal officers of the Department of Transport say it means, and I have no alternative but to say that is what it is intended to mean. If my hon. friend can read something else in it I am sorry, but I disagree with him because that is all it is meant to do. It is not meant to assist the shipbuilding industry and neither is it meant to hurt it. All it intends to do is to recapture those amounts not used for the survey on which income tax has not yet been paid.

Mr. Green: I agree with the minister that where there is money left over it should be taxable. There is no question of that; but to achieve that result I suggest that there should be written into this section something to the effect, "which had not been spent on such survey", because the way the section reads now it says:

the aggregate amount of the deductions in respect of the vessel that have not previously been included in computing the taxpayer's income under part I of the Income Tax Act—

Now that takes in all of the reserves whether they have been spent or whether they have not been spent. It is not restricted to the surplus over and above what has been spent on the survey. By saying: "the aggregate amount of the deductions in respect of the vessel that have not been previously included in computing the taxpayer's income under part I of the Income Tax Act . . . and have not been spent on such surveys", or words to that effect, then you would achieve the objective the minister has in mind. I believe there is an error in the wording of the clause.

Mr. Chevrier: May I submit to my hon. friend that this amendment must be read in conjunction with section 7, which in turn must be read in conjunction with the Income Tax Act. Section 7 begins:

Notwithstanding paragraph (e) of subsection one of section twelve of the Income Tax Act a taxpayer may—

. . . claim as an exemption . . . And now there is added this amendment; and I take it that the Department of Justice together with our officials have so drafted this act that it will read as an integral part of the Income Tax Act. For that reason I do not see the need to include the words which my hon. friend refers to; because if they were included it might put a different meaning on the act.

That is the answer which I think I should make to my hon. friend now.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Green: There is no provision at all in here explaining about a surplus over and above what has been spent for a survey. There is no provision in subsection 2 to meet a situation of that kind. It merely deals with everything that has been set aside as a reserve. I would suggest that the minister have that point checked by his law officers just to be sure, because I am afraid of it. After all, these statutes are written in English and French and certainly, in this English version, there is nothing to show that the moneys that have been spent for the survey are not to be taxable. I think there has been an error made in the drafting.

Mr. Chevrier: I should tell my hon. friend that not only have counsel for the Department of National Revenue looked at this but counsel in the Department of Transport have, and as my hon. friend knows, the legislative committee in the Department of Justice have looked at it and have given it very careful consideration. I should not like to deal with this kind of statute which has to do with income tax. If it were any other matter, I would have no objection. This is a matter that has to do with national revenue, and for that reason I hope it will be possible for the house and my hon. friend to accept it as it is.

Mr. Knowles: I hope I can say without offence that perhaps the two sea lawyers might let some of the rest of us get into this debate. I do not say that in any derogatory sense, but I thought the remark fitted in view of this discussion. The more this discussion goes on the more the question comes to my mind that I was asking myself when the discussion first started. Why is this legislation being introduced by the Minister of Transport at all? Why is it not income tax legislation and in the Income Tax Act? One of the difficulties the minister gets into, in trying to answer the questions of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, is that it is a matter that comes under national revenue or finance.

I recall that not many years ago an attempt was made to bring the income tax legislation up to date, and put it into consolidated form, so that one could find all the references to income tax in one piece of legislation. Now, we discover that outside of the Income Tax Act is this legislation which deals with an income tax matter. I suppose the minister will say that the lawyers in the Department of Finance, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Transport have all approved, and therefore we are supposed to approve too. It does seem to me that the idea of rationalizing our legislation has been lost, and here we have an income tax matter that should be not under the Minister of Transport at all but in the Income Tax Act itself.

Mr. Green: I would suggest to the minister, Mr. Chairman, that he have this section rechecked by the Department of National Revenue and by his own officials. He has explained that the intention is that these reserves should not be taxed if they are spent for surveys. With all respect to the minister, I am afraid that the way this section is worded the whole thing is taxed, including what has been spent for surveys. There is not such a rush about the bill that it could not be reconsidered by the department with that objection in mind. I would ask that that be done.

Mr. Chevrier: I can see no reason for rechecking the bill, because I gave my assurance to the house that I have gone over it carefully, and that three groups of lawyers have gone over this bill very carefully. They have given it special attention, and I am positive that it means exactly what it says. I cannot read into it the interpretation which my hon. friend reads into it. After all, if the amendment is read in conjunction with section 7 of this act, which in turn is read in conjunction with the relevant sections of the Income Tax Act, there could only be one conclusion, and that is that the aggregate amount of the deductions in respect of the vessels that have not previously been included—that would be, I take it, the difference between those that were exempted and those that are not now exempted. It seems to me that the addition of the words "and had not been spent" would add little or nothing. I am not objecting to the words being put in there, as they simply clarify the intention, but this bill has been given such careful consideration by these three groups that I hesitate to consent to the suggestion.

Mr. Green: In the final analysis it is the responsibility of the house. We cannot simply say that the legal officials in the department have drawn it up this way, and therefore it must be right. There is certainly nothing in that line the minister has quoted to show that the deductions are restricted to what was spent on the survey.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS FOR NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 40, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): I think all members will now be familiar with this bill because it comes before the house annually by reason of the fact that, by statute, the auditors of the Canadian National Railways must be appointed annually by parliament. The bill is in the same form as we are accustomed to, except for the additional clause this year with reference to the revised statutes which are under compilation at the moment.

I might say that the bill also proposes to appoint the same firm of auditors that have been doing the auditing of Canadian National Railways for almost thirty years, with the exception of one year.

Mr. Green: It is exactly the same bill as we have had each year for many years?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport has just said, we are familiar with this bill because it is similar to the one that the government has been introducing every year for quite a long time. The parliamentary assistant indicated that the necessity for an annual bill of this nature is to be found in the statutes. The point I wish to raise may not seem to be of great consequence, but since reference has been made to what is in the statutes I ask why we do not follow precisely the procedure set out in the statute?

I find in section 13 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, as contained in the statutes of 1936, this wording:

> A continuous audit of the accounts of national railways shall be made by independent auditors appointed annually by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons and annually reporting to parliament in respect of their audit. Their annual report shall call attention to any matters which in their opinion require consideration or remedial action. They shall be paid by the national company such amounts as the governor in council shall from time to time approve.

Now, the question as to procedure I think is obvious. This section says that this annual appointment is to be made by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons. I should like to know why it is being done by a bill. The parliamentary assistant may say that the effect is the same, but what is the point, after a precise course has been laid out for us in the statute, in not following it? I hope that the parliamentary assistant at some point—perhaps when we get into committee—can tell us why it is that we do not do what the statute says we should do, namely deal with this matter by means of a joint resolution of the two houses of parliament.

Another question that I should like to raise with the parliamentary assistant is one that is as familiar to him as is this bill to us. I refer to the question whether any further consideration has been given to having this audit of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways performed by the Auditor General. It seems to me that no satisfactory answer has yet been given by the government to the case that has been made repeatedly for this work to be done by the Auditor General. As I have said on previous occasions, I feel that the most effective case that was ever made for such a course was made in the House of Commons some years ago by the hon. member who is now the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). I had thought that once he got into the cabinet, where his voice would be a little bit more effective than it was as a private member, he would have something to say about this point concerning which he spoke so strongly in the house when he was just a private member.

Since we have an Auditor General appointed by this parliament to survey the financial activities of the government and of a number of the agencies of the government, it seems to me that we would be well advised to appoint the Auditor General to do this work that we are required to see is done by virtue of the statute to which I have just referred.

There are one or two questions I wish to ask but perhaps they can wait until we get into committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Auditors.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raises the point as to the reason for not following the procedure that is referred to in section 13 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933, as enacted by section 3 of chapter 25, 1936. The bill states that "notwithstanding the provisions of section 13 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933", it is proposed to make the appointment by a bill in parliament. The reason for that course has been explained on several occasions in the past. As I say, this bill comes to us every year. The reason is simply that a number of years ago that method was found to be too cumbersome. This achieves the same purpose. We have used this practice for a great number of years. As I told the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the bill this year is in form identical with that of other years, with the exception of the reference to the revised statutes.

Mr. Knowles: Before the hon. member leaves that point—and I presume he was leaving it—may I ask him to explain his statement that the other method is more cumbersome. Surely a joint resolution is actually simpler than a bill. The hon. member understands that I fully realize that the final result is the same and that it is only a point of procedure that I raise. However, I should be interested in his comment on the question.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the advice of the legal officers was that making a joint resolution required an approach to the sovereign in a different manner than the one required in this form; and in consequence this procedure was felt to be a much simpler and a more natural one.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I will not pursue the matter further. Since this is such a simple bill perhaps the parliamentary assistant might consent not to ask for third reading today; and if he can get a more detailed explanation, we can have it later.

Mr. Benidickson: As to the other point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, may I say that we are, of course, as familiar with his suggestion as is the committee familiar generally with this bill. Annually, for some years, he has been making the suggestion that the Auditor General should be appointed the auditor for the Canadian National Railways. After study, I think it was indicated in a previous debate that it was considered that the Auditor General was probably eligible for an appointment as auditor; but it was also pointed out that one of the big advantages of having an audit made by the same firm, if satisfactory service has been rendered, is the fact that a continuous audit is being conducted.

The Canadian National Railways is an extremely intricate corporate organization. It is highly desirable that the auditor be familiar at all times with the rather complicated corporate relationships and subsidiaries of this large organization.

In past debates I think even the hon. member agreed that the expense of audit would not likely be less were the Auditor General to be appointed. It is known to the committee that the interests of the Canadian National Railways are international and that portions of the audit must take place not only in the United States but in the United Kingdom and in France, as a result of the audit of Trans-Canada Air Lines. The particular firm which has been appointed by parliament in other years and is proposed now has international branches.

Another reason for appointing the same firm of auditors is that railway accounting is frequently subject to special legislative direction as, say, in the United States, as to the form of accounting that is done there. Hon. members know that even we in Canada have recently passed legislation under which the railways are directed to keep their accounts in a certain way. The present auditors are familiar with that legislation. In addition, there are complications as to the past bylaws of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways which govern accounting procedure. There is a requirement for familiarity with past orders in council and other legislation that applies to the accounting requirements of the railways. En masse these various things are of sufficient consequence that it is felt that a considerable break in experience and familiarity would take place if a change in the audit was made.

It has been estimated that it would take any firm of auditors several years to make an adequate acquaintance with the accounting system of the railway, and those who are familiar with it are of course in a much better position to spot quickly anything that needs attention. In past debates the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out that the Auditor General makes references to certain things in his report to parliament. I want to point out to hon. members that it is parliament that is appointing the auditors in this case. They do so annually, and under the statute the auditor is obligated to report to parliament. A senior representative of the auditors of the Canadian National Railways, and it includes the Trans-Canada Air Lines, as hon. members know, comes to parliament annually and subjects himself on behalf of the firm to examination by the members of the railways and shipping committee.

In addition to that, under the section, he is obligated, just as is the Auditor General, to point out to parliament, through this committee, anything that he thinks requires attention. And certainly, the years that I have been familiar with these reports and through my attendance at the railways and shipping committee, I cannot recall that any members of the committee ever suggested that there was any inadequacy in this method of appearances before a parliamentary committee and the reports that we got from the auditor when he comes to our committee.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the parliamentary assistant one other question? As he knows, we have learned within the past few weeks that in the case of the work of certain other auditors, the persons doing the investigating or auditing showed their work or their preliminary reports to the people being investigated. I refer to the firm of auditors in Montreal that made a report for the Minister of National Defence, but apparently showed that report to the department before it was made public. I refer also to the statement by the Prime Minister the other day on behalf of the Auditor General to the effect that he put draft copies of his recent report to parliament in circulation amongst the various departments last summer. It appears that has been a regular practice for some time, although I think it is fair to say that a number of us were amazed to learn that it has been going on. Can the parliamentary assistant say whether a similar practice is carried on in the relationship between George A. Touche and Company on the one hand and the Canadian National Railways on the other? I realize that one difference in the situation, as the parliamentary assistant pointed out, is that the Auditor General makes a report to parliament, and that report does include fifty or sixty paragraphs of comments on things that he has discovered in the course of his investigation. On the other hand, the report of George A. Touche and Company to parliament on the operation of the Canadian National Railways is usually just a certificate that he has seen everything he wanted to and found everything in order. There are no paragraphs in that report comparable to the paragraphs of comment that the Auditor General makes. As I say, that does make for one difference, but I should like to know whether the relationship between the firm of auditors and the Canadian National Railways is similar to this other relationship which has been revealed, namely, that the auditor seems to work along with the people he is investigating, and lets them know what his findings are before reporting to parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as has been explained in other years, the audit that is referred to in this appointment is a continuous audit. It is not in the nature of a complete check of every transaction of the Canadian National Railways; it is more in the nature of test checking; and certainly it has been reported in the past that one of the functions is to work in close collaboration with the accounting departments of the Canadian National Railways in order to determine from time to time as to the adequacy of the internal audit control. Obviously just as soon as anything was found that was considered open to criticism in that continuous audit it would be pointed out immediately to the accounting section and to the chiefs of the accounting section who are of course responsible to see that there is a control over all the property, assets and revenue of the Canadian National Railways.

Whether or not the nature of that collaboration is similar to that mentioned by the hon. member is, I think, a proper question to be asked when the auditor himself appears before the committee on railways and shipping. Certainly nothing in the nature of subsidiary reports, beyond those which we get in parliament, is submitted to the Department of Transport.

Mr. Follwell: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport has pointed out the advisability of having continuity in regard to the auditors who may be hired to do the auditing of the Canadian National Railways. He has pointed out that that is advisable on account of the difference in set-up in Canada and the United States and of the international arrangements that may exist with respect to large corporations such as the Canadian National Railways. Can the parliamentary assistant inform the committee and perhaps me especially whether there is any reason why this matter has to come before parliament each year? Why could it not be set up on the basis of a five-year period or some such period as that?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, it could, Mr. Chairman. I think this is just indicative of a desire to give parliament the closest possible control over the audit of as large a publicly-owned corporation as the Canadian National Railways. It simply just emphasizes the interest that parliament has in an organization of this kind. It assures the annual attendance of the auditor before the committee, and so forth. It also makes it very simple to make a change, if there are good reasons for making a change, despite the very numerous reasons for continuity that I have outlined.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Auditors.

Mr. Knowles: Before this section carries may I ask the parliamentary assistant whether he can tell us why there is no clause 3 in this bill. That may not seem to be immediately relevant to clause 2, but the point I make is this. In all of these other bills, such as the one we had just a moment ago, where there is a second clause that has the same effect as the first clause, reading—

> This section shall come into force on the day that the revised statutes of Canada, 1952, come into force.

—and so on—there is also a third clause providing that when clause 2 comes into effect clause 1 is repealed. Now, in regard to this bill we do not have a clause 3, as we have had in all of these other bills which amend the revised statutes of Canada for 1952 it the same time as they amend the existing legislation. Can the parliamentary assistant explain the absence of a clause 3 from this bill?

Mr. Benidickson: No. I can simply make the explanation that was given on the bill that we have just dealt with and it is that these bills are very carefully examined by the law officers of not only our department but the Department of Justice and the House of Commons. And so far as the requirements in that respect are concerned, I must confess that I do not yet attempt to be specially critical of the style of bills that come to us for sponsorship. We are responsible for the policy therein and so on, but I am loath to quarrel with the law officers who deal with the drafting before they come into our hands for presentation to the house.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant might obtain the explanation for the absence of a section 3 in this bill, and give it when third reading is called.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

WATER RESOURCES

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES FOR CONSERVATION PURPOSES

The house resumed, from Friday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure, such grants not to exceed thirty-seven and one-half per cent of the projects and to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the above-mentioned purposes; and to provide that all officers, clerks and employees required for carrying out the provisions of the measure shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I make no apology for taking the time of the house to make a few comments on this resolution. I listened to the Lilliputian statement by the minister, on the introduction of the resolution, and after listening to it and later reading it I am not quite sure of the complete purpose or scope of the measure.

So far as I could judge, the government still believes in a piecemeal approach to the problem of water conservation, to such an extent that it has indicated by this measure and by the minister's remarks that the conservation and development of water resources is to be the responsibility of two separate departments of government.

Furthermore the group to which I belong is disappointed to see that this resolution is not part of a national policy dealing with the conservation of soil, forest and water resources, brought about as a result of a dominion-provincial conference and through dominion-provincial co-operation. We are not alone in this respect. Many other voices in Canada have been raised suggesting the need for an over-all national policy, and expressing some disappointment with the government's present piecemeal approach to this most important question.

In support of the argument I am making I should like to read a portion of an editorial appearing in the Country Guide for November of 1952. I have said before in the house that the editor of this paper is well qualified to speak and to write about this most important question. He says this:

> It is, therefore, of particular interest to Canadian agriculture that a delegation of provincial ministers of agriculture met the federal minister of agriculture not long ago, to request that the principles underlying the work of P.F.R.A. be applied across Canada. The delegation is also reported to have voiced grave concern over the fact that provincial governments tend to attach far less importance to the diversion and use of the waters of rivers and streams for agricultural purposes, than to the protection of cities and towns from the danger of flooding.
> The truth seems to be that in most Canadian provinces the problem of adequate soil and water conservation is too serious to be solved entirely by the provinces. We urgently need a national soil and water conservation policy. Since 1935 an excellent beginning has been made within the Palliser triangle, the area to which the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation administration has been restricted. The value of the work already done is beyond calculation, but what Canada really needs is a general purpose, rather than a special purpose, policy and program.

We in this group heartily support the ideas expressed in that editorial. I would point out that it emphasizes two things in particular, the first of which is the need for an over-all national policy for soil, water and forest conservation and, secondly, the necessity for extending the principles of P.F.R.A. to all provinces in Canada.

I trust that even this resolution may be a step in that direction on the part of the government. I must say that those of us in this group are glad of this evidence of growing government recognition of this most serious and important problem. The introduction of this resolution without doubt does provide a basis for some measure of co-operation between and assistance to the provinces.

I listened with keen interest to what has been said by previous speakers in the debate, particularly to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who is well acquainted with prairie problems, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who frequently in the house has shown his concern over water conservation as applied to the Palliser triangle, and particularly to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson).

I might say that while I do not agree with the hon. member for York West when he deals with the symbols of wealth—when he deals with gold—I listen with great enjoyment to his pedestrian eloquence when he speaks upon such subjects as the conservation of our natural resources and deals, shall I say, with problems concerning the conservation of real wealth.

I listened carefully to his speech and read it afterwards and in my view he made a definite contribution to the debate and to our knowledge on this subject. The facts he gave the house are worth rereading and careful study.

The policy of the C.C.F. is based upon the principles of co-operation and conservation. Year after year, session after session and speech after speech we have indicated our support for a policy which would deal with the conservation of human and natural resources. To succeed in that kind of policy there is an urgent necessity for planning.

I would draw to the minister's attention the fact that even in the introduction of this resolution the government is giving effect, perhaps in a limited degree, to policies which have been advocated by this group through the years both in the house and throughout the country. The resolution presents an opportunity for some logical development and planning as a result of dominion-provincial co-operation.

I represent a constituency which abounds in lakes, rivers and streams, a constituency with immense water resources. But even with all those resources the people I represent are very much concerned with certain problems related to the conservation and development of those water resources. They are very concerned about flood control. They are very concerned at the present time about the shortage of water for power. I know that power does not come under this measure and I assure the minister that I will not get out of order. I shall leave the South Saskatchewan river dam entirely alone and I trust my remarks will be strictly in order.

They are concerned about the shortage of water suffered on occasion by certain cities, towns and small communities. They are very concerned about the erosion of the banks of various rivers by waters when in flood. They are concerned about these problems and these problems will continue to exist so long as governments fail to accept their responsibility by co-operating and planning to solve them in the very near future.

At this point I cannot resist taking advantage of the opportunity to bring to the attention of the house the fact that uncontrolled free enterprise must bear a large share of the responsibility for our defaced forests, our vanishing wildlife, our roaring floods, our dried-out ranges and the many gullied parts of this country. Uncontrolled free enterprise has carried on in Canada up to date without biophysical understanding or social responsibility. I think that is a fair statement to make of the conditions that exist at this time in this country.

Uncontrolled and greedy free enterprise has not only produced the physical conditions that exist, but in my opinion it has created a waster psychology that would have appalled our frugal forebears and which is regarded as lunacy by people in other lands who have given serious consideration to this problem for many years. When I say "waster psychology" I mean it because I think many of us in this country are most wasteful. We waste our power; we waste our water; we waste our soil; we waste our forests; we waste our tin cans; we waste our waste paper; we waste our rubber and we waste many other things.

An hon. Member: Horses.

Mr. Herridge: Because we have no over-all policy governing the conservation of natural resources, a policy which realizes that the natural resources of this country will be depleted in time, we have that result. If we spent as much time advertising the value of conservation as we spend in advertising the dangers of B.O. the Canadian people would become conscious of the seriousness of this question.

Free enterprise and industrial society has produced a state of mind on the part of many people who live in the larger centres that simply fails to appreciate the basic facts of our existence. At this point I should like to quote from an interesting article by Christopher Morley in "Streamlines" as follows:

> We hear about the agricultural problem of soil erosion; hillsides denuded of fertile topsoil . . . or great regions of middle western richness scoured off by dust storms. Surely not less serious is the matter of mind erosion; the dust storms of daily excitement and of continual triviality can easily blow away the sensitive topsoil of the spirit. The result is a barren and shallow nervous credulity.

I quote that because I think it indicates the state of mind that prevents people having a full appreciation of the seriousness of certain basic problems such as this one which face the Canadian people at this time. In our opinion only action by governments can repair the damage which has been done to our natural resources during the last fifty years under uncontrolled free enterprise. Therefore, I repeat that we in this group are glad that the minister has introduced this resolution and we offer our support.

The hon. member for York West has said that water shortage is a North American problem. This growing shortage of water affects nearly every community. This shortage of water is occasioned by abnormal run-off, increased industrial use, unnecessary evaporation and lack of forest coverage. These things are increasingly affecting our stores of water from year to year and because of this situation the future of many communities in Canada is threatened.

Surface water has three channels of escape—surface drainage, seepage into the ground and evaporation. I shall not deal with these because I think the hon. member for York West covered that aspect of the matter when he spoke the other evening. But I do want to direct the attention of the house to another cause of increased and abnormal run-off to which possibly some people have not given consideration.

This is due to millions of roof tops, the increasing area of paved street and highways and airports and the tremendous urge today to cover the earth with concrete and asphalt. This has created a great problem in the areas surrounding large centres of population because of the abnormal run-off. Large amounts of water are permitted to escape unnecessarily which could be utilized under an over-all policy of conservation.

The hon. member for York West referred to the lowered water tables, losses through evaporation, increased use of water for industrial purposes and the pollution of our streams. Evidence of this can be found in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I shall not take the time to deal with this in detail, but I should like to quote an authority which does indicate the seriousness of the situation. I should like to quote from "Water Conservation Notes" for September, 1952, by J. L. Van Camp, general manager, Canadian Forestry Association, as follows:

> Professors A. F. Coventry and J. R. Dymond, reporting on "Water, a National Treasure", in the book "Conservation and Nature Activities", give data on a survey which was made in King township in York county, Ontario in the mid 1930's. From that township they report that of the 200 miles of permanent streams which originally ran at all seasons of the year, this total has been reduced to less than 30 miles when the survey was made. At that time also, 17 per cent of the wells in the township went dry each summer.
> A survey made in an adjacent area between Toronto and Dundas showed that 672 of all streams in an area of 13,000 square miles no longer flowed continuously. On some of them, now dry or reduced to a meagre flow in summer, the remains of mills and dams indicated that water was formerly available in sufficient quantity to provide power for grist and sawmills.
> Further data showing the undesirable difference between peak flood and peak drought conditions is given for the west Humber river near Toronto. During a flood in March, 1942, when nearly an inch and a half of rain fell in 48 hours, the west Humber was carrying four thousand cubic feet a second past a given point. Almost half of the entire amount of water which fell was in lake Ontario within 12 hours. The water was opaque with sediment, and from one measurement it was shown that 2,700 tons of soil an hour was being carried into the lake.

I could go on at greater length but I think that that demonstrates the great need for an over-all consideration of this problem by federal, provincial and municipal governments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion it is a complete fallacy that industrial civilization can continue to produce a permanently higher standard of living. None of the industrial nations have maintained high standards of living without access to adequate areas of productive land. As a matter of fact, European industry has been supported for years by food produced in America. In Canada industrial expansion is of recent date but even in that short period there is evidence that we are consuming and abusing our natural resources at an increasingly alarming rate.

At this point I would ask the minister a question and ask him to answer when he replies in closing this debate. I consider, as do the members of this group generally, that our snowfall in Canada is a billion dollar crop, and I have been interested in reading of some studies that have been made with respect to the conservation of snow. I do not know if this resolution will provide for further studies in that direction or whether it will provide for giving application to certain ideas for the conservation of snow. I understand that experiments have been carried on throughout the years in the United States, and I understand by one engineer in Ottawa, which indicate that you can conserve snow and save abnormal run-off.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a great loss of snow or water on the prairies through abnormal run-off occasioned by heat. The water, flowing over frozen surfaces, has not an opportunity to penetrate into the subsoil. Experiments have been conducted, I understand, with a view to creating an icy surface on the snow which will prevent excessive evaporation. Some experiments to date offer almost breath-taking possibilities. By spreading carbon particles on the snow in a mechanical way, either by ground vehicles or by helicopters, it is possible to produce an icy surface and tremendously reduce evaporation so that a much greater quantity of water coming from the snow goes into the soil. I would like the minister to tell the house when he speaks at the conclusion of this debate if anything has been done in that connection in his department.

I do not want to speak at too great length, Mr. Speaker, but before concluding I wish to say a few words about the administration of water conservation policies in Canada. The agricultural institute of Canada, I understand, made a submission to the government last year and at that time made reference to this legislation which was forecast in the speech from the throne. The brief presented by the agricultural institute of Canada contended that any conservation of water that affected the soil should be under the administration of the Department of Agriculture. I have read the brief very carefully, having been interested in this subject for years, and I think the point of view expressed by the agricultural institute of Canada is quite sound. I think that the administration of water resources should be in the hands of people who are close to the farmers, and close to the people who are going to use the water.

Furthermore, I find that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture supports the agricultural institute of Canada and I would like to quote briefly from a letter I received on December 12 from Mr. C. G. Groff, secretary-treasurer. This is what he had to say:

> In view of the fact that there is now a bill before the house with respect to water conservation, we discussed the matter at our executive meeting just after the conference a week ago. Our attitude is that all conservation matters, having as their ultimate objective the conservation of the soil from which the food of the people is produced, should be carried out and administered under the Department of Agriculture, in co-operation with the various provincial departments of agriculture. We had before us a resolution passed by the agricultural institute of Canada and our executive endorsed this resolution.

There you have the scientific body concerned with agriculture expressing an opinion and you have the organization representing the farmers themselves supporting that opinion. I find further evidence to support that opinion in the country and I wish to quote from an editorial appearing in the November issue of the Country Guide entitled "Sensible Conservation Policy". This is what the editorial has to say:

The ministers might well have gone much further in their representations. They could well have urged that in any national or provincial program involving soil and water conservation and development, the responsibility for administration should rest in departments of agriculture, both provincial and federal. We already have too many examples of divided responsibility within provincial governments, including the governments of Manitoba and Alberta, which have led to inefficiency and lack of progress. If we are not to lose valuable time, and money which we cannot afford to squander, it is imperative that all senior governments in this country agree on one important administrative principle. The principle is that whenever conservation policies are applied, either to land or water for the benefit of agriculture, such policies and programs should be planned, administered and developed, by those who are trained and employed to serve agriculture. Too many millions of dollars have been lost, in this and other countries, for us to entrust these primary responsibilities to engineers, indispensable as they are. Similarly, central administrative officers, in departments other than agriculture, are too far away from the soil and its needs, and from the farmer and his problems, to fully realize that these are the really basic factors involved.

The experienced agricultural administrator, agronomist, soil scientist, agricultural economist, and agricultural engineer, as well as the non-agricultural engineer, are each essential to a well-planned and effectively developed program. Surely, simple logic demands that the men and departments designated to carry the heaviest responsibility for the execution of any policy involving agricultural land, or water for such land, should be those specializing in agricultural matters.

Mr. Speaker, I most wholeheartedly support those contentions and those representations. In my opinion, if this legislation is to be effective it must be accompanied by co-operative research and it is imperative that research be extended from the natural sciences to the social sciences; for, if a conservation program of any type is to succeed, they are inseparable. Again, quite as necessary as research is education. To cope with research problems on a national basis we require the education of tens of thousands of Canadians and tens of thousands of Canadian children. However, in my opinion, research and education are futile unless they result in an action program that sinks well within the grass roots of our democracy, and with this program should be associated a program to stop waste of all types in Canada in every field of human activity. If it is to be successful, Mr. Speaker, implementation of this resolution requires that there be co-operative action between Canadians and all levels of government.

We certainly have got to plan if we are going to conserve our great water resources in Canada —by good forest management, grass cover, check dams, and other methods to prevent excess run-off, loss of water and flood damage. Our economy is dependent on water to furnish cheap transportation, heat, power, light, agriculture, forestry, water for our homes, for health and for recreation. There is no question but that it is the duty of this parliament to see that ample and good supplies of water are provided in Canada for this generation and generations to come.

In conclusion I wish to say that we in this group support the principle and the purpose of this measure and will do our best to co-operate with the government in giving it satisfactory effect.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): It is not my intention to take much time of the house this afternoon but I do wish to take a short while to commend the government for bringing forth this resolution to assist in the conservation of water resources. When the minister spoke first on this measure, he mentioned the Shand dam on the Grand river, which happens to be just north of the riding which I represent. He also mentioned construction of the Luther marsh dam, which is also in the Grand river conservation project. I am very glad that he announced a decision had been made by this government to assist in the construction of the Glen Allan dam on the Conestogo river. I want to commend him for it. The Shand dam was started in 1939, and between 1939 and 1950 there was very little done in the way of helping to control the floods in this area. Having lived beside the Grand river, I am alive to the dangers of the Grand river when it is in flood. The Shand dam was not sufficient to control the flood waters of the Grand, and hence the Luther marsh dam was built. It is now found that that is not sufficient and the Conestogo or Glen Allan dam is being built.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we should first try to decide the difference between flood control and water conservation. Dams will control flooding, but more than dams are necessary for water conservation. It would seem that there is, then, a duplication of services here between the Department of Resources and Development and the Department of Agriculture. We have now a number of expert engineers employed in the Department of Agriculture under the P.F.R.A. It seems to me that the services of these expert engineers could be used to help out on this flood control work.

Water conservation should be carried out under the Department of Agriculture. I see nothing in this resolution that would show there was anything actually to be done with regard to water conservation. I should like to quote from the resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure, such grants not to exceed thirty-seven and one-half per cent of the projects and to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the above-mentioned purposes; and to provide that all officers, clerks and employees required for carrying out the provisions of the measure shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

There is no mention there, Mr. Speaker, of co-operation with the provinces in connection with water conservation. In his speech the minister referred to the bill as an authority providing a legislative basis for federal assistance for water conservation projects of a major character across Canada. It would appear, therefore, that the measure which this resolution precedes is a measure more for the control of floods than it is for water conservation. We had hoped it would include some manner of co-operation with provincial governments to go further than just the control of floods.

Mr. Winters: It does.

Mr. Charlton: I am glad to hear the minister say that. As I said before, there is nothing in the resolution that would lead one to believe that it does. As the minister said, it is related to major projects across Canada.

I have tried to practise conservation during the number of years I have been on the farm. Water conservation would call for small dams, probably one on each farm. Conservation of the soil means the cultivation of the soil in a manner to control wastage. It requires reforestation of some slopes to control run-off. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) just mentioned conserving the snow. Well, Mr. Speaker, I know of no better way of conserving snow than planting trees to hold the snow.

As I stated at the outset, I do not intend to take long at this stage. I do want to point out that we must differentiate between flood control and water conservation. I feel that the water conservation part could be handled under the Department of Agriculture, when we have experts now in the P.F.R.A. doing a good job in that line.

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South): I am sure that the members on all sides of the house, Mr. Speaker, join in supporting the minister in moving forward this resolution. As has been pointed out, the resolution is to authorize grants to assist in the conservation of water resources. I believe we all agree that is something that has been long overdue. In many of the provinces, particularly the province of Ontario, several surveys have been made on rivers. The Ganaraska survey has been completed, and steps have been taken to conserve the water and stop the rapid run-off. A survey of the Moira river in the county of Hastings, in my constituency, has been completed and the Moira valley authority has been set up. This authority has jurisdiction over a section of the Moira river that takes in 1,060 square miles of territory.

This Moira valley conservation authority has been very active. Under their jurisdiction a $40,000 dam has been completed at Deloro for the purpose of holding back an amount of water for conservation, and also to stop flooding. I believe the hon. member who just spoke, if he reflected for a moment, would agree that the purpose of a dam is twofold. First, it is for conservation, and second, for flood control. I believe these two purposes go hand in hand. The Moira valley conservation authority has encouraged the construction of what may be termed farm ponds. These have been found quite advantageous, and though a pond may sound like a small body of water, a number of them spread through the length and breadth of a township or a county would account for many millions of gallons of water. The Moira valley authority has issued a circular containing instructions on farm ponds, the method of building them and the vital necessity for them.

Now, as I say, I am sure all members join in supporting this resolution, because without a doubt water is the greatest asset that we have in this bountiful dominion of ours. Water is so common that we sometimes forget the value of it. It is extremely cheap. Actually it is cheaper than dirt. You can purchase water which you obtain by turning on a tap in your residence, for as little as a nickel a ton, sometimes. Those hon. members who have found it necessary to buy soil, particularly topsoil, know that you have to pay up to $10 for dirt.

It is only when we have a shortage that we who seem to have an abundance consider the necessity for preserving and conserving water. It will be recalled that, a year or so ago, New York had a water shortage; and there they went to the extreme of asking the male citizens of the great city of New York to shave only once a day or to forget shaving one day in the week in order to try to conserve water.

Water is continuing to be more and more in demand for the purpose of producing electrical energy. I think the minister has in mind the necessity for the preservation of this great asset of ours, particularly for electrical purposes, when he brings forward this resolution. As has been pointed out, we do not yet know just what is in the bill; but I am sure that what is there will be of great benefit to Canada, as is all the legislation that the minister of this particular department brings to parliament.

By drying up marshes and lakes we have destroyed the homes and breeding grounds of useful waterfowl and fur bearers. Being charged with the responsibility of protecting our resources including fur-bearing animals, I am sure that the minister has this point in mind also when he brings forward this bill for the conservation of water.

It seems that one of the reasons why our water is not benefiting the land in the way it should is that, over the years, we have seen fit to harvest the crop of forest products without any concern as to holding back the water or as to the way in which trees act to conserve in the land the water that should be there. Consequently we have a rapid run-off; and this rapid run-off takes with it the valuable two inches of topsoil and deposits it in the rivers and in the lakes.

We in Canada are well endowed with water resources. We have the great lakes and inland lakes. We have 228,307 square miles of fresh water within our boundaries. Lake Superior forms part of our southern border; it is the largest body of fresh water in the world. We know that we have great rivers; and of these, of course, we should take proper care. We have the Mackenzie, our longest river, which stretches for 2,514 miles from Great Slave lake to the Arctic ocean. We have the St. Lawrence river and the great lakes which provide a shipping waterway 2,338 miles in length from the strait of Belle Isle to the head of lake Superior. Our sea coast is one of the longest of any country in the world, with 14,820 miles of mainland sea frontage and 34,650 miles of island frontage.

One might think that this resource would be sufficient to minister to all our human needs. There is no doubt that it is and will be sufficient for the great population we hope to have here in a few years. But it will only be so if we take proper conservation measures such as those which I am sure the minister is going to propose in his bill.

I just rose, Mr. Speaker, for these few moments in order to commend the minister and to assure him that I believe he has the active support of all the members in the house.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I make no apologies for entering this debate at this time because this measure is one of extreme importance to us all. The time that is taken up to discuss the measure in the house will be well spent, and we shall get from it valuable information which will be of interest to us all.

When we heard the speech from the throne read by His Excellency the Governor General we were pleased to note that the government intended to bring before the house a measure to provide for conservation of water resources. We were doubly pleased when the minister introduced the resolution stating:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources—

On January 30 the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) moved that the house go into committee to discuss the terms of the resolution. We regret that we cannot expand the resolution to include soil conservation, because it is very important to our national life, and particularly as soil and forest conservation are so closely allied to and associated with water conservation in this country.

As the minister pointed out in his opening remarks, the federal government did participate with the province of Ontario in a project of this kind on the Grand river and the Shand dam which was mentioned by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon. In participating with the provinces on this project the federal government worked in close co-operation with the municipalities and this undertaking contributed a great deal toward lessening the danger of flood conditions that had been gradually developing to an increasing extent in that area year by year.

The government also received some valuable information from the experiments carried on there, information which will be of great value to them as this plan progresses. We were happy that this plan was broadened to include further drainage work on the Luther marsh project in the same drainage area, and now the dam on the Conestogo river, which is a tributary of the Grand. That is the third step that will assist materially in overcoming the menace that constantly threatens each spring the life and property of that very densely populated area of southern Ontario. That area is very valuable from an agricultural point of view as well. We in that section all realize the value that has come from this experiment that has been carried on as a co-operative effort in that section of Canada.

The importance of this resolution was brought forcibly to the attention of the house by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), who spoke in this debate on Friday evening last, as reported at page 1512 of Hansard. I should like to read a brief quotation from the hon. member's remarks. He said:

> For instance, the production of a ton of rolled steel requires the consumption of 110,000 gallons of water. The production of a ton of rayon yarn takes 250,000 to 400,000 gallons of water; a barrel of aviation gasoline takes from 1,050 gallons of water, if made from the natural product, to as much as 15,000 gallons of water if made synthetically.

Further on he says:

> Our North American cities use approximately between 150 gallons and 160 gallons per capita per day.

The hon. member for York West is an engineer, and we all know that he is looking at it from the practical point of view. We would all derive great benefit from reading the entire speech that he made at that time.

I feel that this bill is a step in the right direction. I hope it is the beginning of a much wider policy that will embrace soil and forest conservation as well. There is increasing evidence of late that the provinces of this country are beginning to recognize the need for a greatly enlarged conservation project on a national basis. In this regard I was very glad to hear the minister say that it must be undertaken primarily through the provinces with the federal government working in the role of co-ordinating agency with the provinces in their assistance by contributions from the federal treasury. This effort calls for close co-operation and sound planning between the provinces and the Department of Resources and Development. The general and over-all picture from the federal point of view must be closely harmonized with the immediate needs of the various provinces. In this manner we can possibly work out a system by which we can carefully guard those resources which we must pass on to those who are yet unborn, and who in their turn we trust will be true guardians of these great assets that we possess.

Following the first world war there was an attempt made by government agencies to adopt practices similar to what we are discussing today. However, their recommendations were presented and no action was taken. They made a really valuable study and research at that time. But during the last twenty-five years we find that all progressive countries are increasingly concerned about the rapid growth of population which tends to exploit the resources we have, and in many cases unwisely. Our great neighbour to the south, which I think has about one-half of the industrial production of the world, is beginning to be seriously disturbed about the rapidity with which their underground waters are lessening to an incredible degree. European nations for many years past have recognized the wasting assets that nature has provided, and Canada with her yet undeveloped areas is in a much more important position when it comes to legislation of this kind, because of those undeveloped resources. There is a great need for conserving them, and we as a young nation should do it.

Many books have been written, many speeches have been made, many newspaper articles and editorials have been published —and I hope many more will be published— along this very line, so that we should be able to get our people more concerned about the growing need of this important work.

Since the formation of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations these policies have been brought closely to the attention of the people of the civilized world by the emphasis placed on the close relationship that exists between conservation, water management and our economic well-being. The unfortunate part is that we have not been able to translate these factors into effective action whereby nations will work together in the interests of all the people. We in this country unfortunately have not as yet been able to work in close enough co-operation with the provinces on this matter. I think the time is coming, and I trust it will, when we can overlook these petty differences that we have in the interests of the common good of our resources in this country. Fifty years ago Canada had approximately 5 million people. Today we have over 14 million people, an increase of something like 300 per cent in our population, but our potential productivity has remained the same as it was at that time.

Someone has said that there is a lot of ruin in a nation. I think that is very true of our natural resources. Our forest and water conservation methods must be closely interwoven. The simple fact remains that while science and mechanization have increased our industrial production and agricultural production, nevertheless these gains have been made, we must agree, at the expense of lessening our water supply. The responsibility for this situation is largely due to our individual effort, but I feel that action in this regard must definitely be taken by our governments. It is a matter of great interest to us that some time ago the provincial ministers of agriculture met with our federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to discuss some of these problems. They faced the grave concern at that time that the governments of the various provinces were more inclined to attach a greater significance to the dangers of flood conditions to the towns and villages, than to make a careful study of the basic problems and define the difficulties at the source, as well as make a careful study of matters which would give protection at the source of the water supply.

It is quite possible that a large-scale plan of reforestation and a system of diversion of our rivers and streams, similar to projects that have been undertaken by P.F.R.A., could be carried out very effectively in this regard.

In that part of the country in which I have lived in recent years, we have been given ample proof of the devastating results which can be achieved when rampaging waters are uncontrolled. We have in that area a very capable conservation commission, to which reference was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton). Then, too, if the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) were permitted to speak in the house on this measure I believe he would say that the conservation commission has done a very excellent job in the capacity in which it has been working.

Nevertheless their tasks are definitely made more difficult because of the fact that they do not have the financial assistance that would permit them to carry out an extensive conservation plan in that area, such as they would have liked to achieve. As a result of the valuable experience we have had in that section, I would have no hesitation in supporting the policy the minister is now advocating. I would approve any policy which would give similar results to every section in Canada.

It is a matter of great importance however that the administration of this should very definitely remain primarily with the provinces, working in close conjunction with the federal Department of Resources and Development. Then, further, it should also be a policy which would embrace soil, water and forest conservation. No one of these projects can be worked effectively if it is operated separately, because it is necessary that all three be embraced to have an effective conservation program.

It is essential that the handling of this project should be done definitely in co-operation with the provinces, under the direct jurisdiction of capable experts in agricultural matters, as well as capable engineers who understand conservation projects. These should include men who are well skilled in this work both from the federal and provincial points of view.

These suggestions may lay a framework for what would at least be a beginning of something that will need continuous and close study for all time. This is only the beginning. If we are to meet the challenge which faces us increasingly from year to year, we must proceed from this point. Speaking from an agricultural point of view, Canada has today better than three-quarters of a million families engaged in agriculture. These families have a great stake in this country in the form of land and equipment. It is a stake which means a great deal to the people involved.

I trust therefore that this measure dealing with water conservation will meet with the wholehearted approval of all hon. members. I trust parliament will recognize the importance and magnitude, and the necessity for enlarging the terms of reference so as to include forest and soil conservation as well, and that this measure may be merely the beginning of a new era that will recognize these basic and essential facts, that our very existence depends upon the maintenance of an adequate supply of these God-given resources which we, in our time, must conserve and which we in our time must not destroy.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the others who have already spoken in this debate, and to commend the minister upon having introduced this legislation. On other occasions I have had something to say about the conservation of resources, and at this time I want to emphasize some of the points that I think are fundamental and important.

I believe it was Mark Twain who is credited with having said that a lot of people talk about the weather, but nobody does a great deal about it. I think that is true of conservation. There has been considerable talk about it, but there has not been a great deal done. I hope this is the beginning of a program that will have long and far-reaching effects.

Hon. members will know that the paint and varnish industry have a slogan that says: Save the surface and you save all. I think that might well be applied to our conservation program, because if the top six inches of soil are lost we will find ourselves in a desperate situation, indeed. Our food supplies would diminish very rapidly.

In connection with the program being undertaken it is most essential that effective co-ordination among federal, provincial and municipal governments be brought about. I want to point out right here that in 1939 the municipalities were collecting 30 cents from the tax dollar, while today they collect only 10 cents. The owners of real property, both in the city and in the country, are finding themselves taxed beyond capacity. We realize, too, that these very people who own real property are the backbone of the country. They are the producers, the labourers and the workmen. So that no longer can the burden be placed entirely upon the municipalities.

It is commendable that the federal government is going to co-operate with provincial governments to the extent of 37½ per cent each of the cost of these projects. It was only yesterday that we heard a good deal about the difficulties in connection with the South Saskatchewan river project, and the dam proposed in that area. While these dams are spectacular, so far as Ontario is concerned they are not fundamental to a water conservation project. The place to save water is where it falls.

Water is also a forest problem. In old Ontario it is estimated that about 9 per cent of the land is now covered with forest. In other words 91 per cent of the forest has been removed. Those who have given some study to the subject are of the opinion that in Ontario at least 15 per cent of the area should be forested. I think we should go further than that and say that on an average 20 per cent of the area in old Ontario might well be put back to forest.

One of the counties in southwestern Ontario has its forest coverage reduced to 3 per cent, and the problem of water supply for cities and towns, as well as in farm wells, is becoming very acute in those areas. If we continue at the present rate in the Canadian west I am told, by those who know the subject, that 100 years from now we will have 6,000 square miles of desert. The area is expanding instead of decreasing in spite of the efforts of P.F.R.A. and other agencies which are at work there. Today all over the world we hear of food shortages and populations increasing at a fast rate, yet not another acre of workable land is being added.

There is another problem to be considered in connection with land taken out of cultivation and put into forests. The immediate municipality will lose a certain amount of taxes. Also this marginal land may be producing small amounts of food of one kind and another and the farmer whose land is taken out of production will find his income reduced. Care must be exercised in the administration of this to provide income to take the place of that derived from land taken out of agricultural production.

We hear a great deal today about deficiency diseases because of a lack of certain elements in our food. This should be part of any conservation program. In many areas certain elements are missing from the land and they have not been replaced. Consequently we are faced with this problem of deficiency diseases, not only in connection with humans but in connection with animals as well. One of the statesmen of the United States once said: Show me an eroded soil and I will show you an eroded people. That is true today in some parts of the United States.

The minister and many hon. members have received copies of a brief from the agricultural institute of Canada which contains a well-thought-out program which might well be considered. They point out that there is a possibility of overlapping in government departments which would add to the cost but which would add nothing to the net result. We must avoid that at all costs, as the cost of government is far too high as it is.

At some time or other nearly every agricultural paper in the United States has referred to the fact that some of the great dams which have been built in that country are faced with the problem of silting. Many times they just try to find a solution for that problem by building another dam. I am going to suggest to the minister that one of the valleys in old Ontario be brought under this legislation and used as an experiment to demonstrate the good results that can be obtained from conservation practices rather than the building of dams.

Twenty per cent of the area should be forested. Contour farming should be practised when the land lends itself to that type of land use. Steep hillsides should be grassed so that heavy rainfall will not wash the soil into the valleys and rivers. Good farm management should be practised. In order to get good results these practices should be pinpointed on individual farms because a practice that will work on one farm may not work on another a short distance away. No over-all practice can be adopted as a rule of thumb to follow. If all this is linked up with the work being done by the Department of Agriculture, the results should be good.

The construction of farm ponds is good and this practice should be encouraged. I should like to see all this done just as an experiment. I believe this experiment is being made on the Brandywine river near Wilmington, Delaware, in the United States and more information could be obtained on what is happening there from the Country Gentleman of February 1953.

While I am on the subject of conservation I should like to point out that the soils committee of the Middlesex crop improvement association in my own county are carrying out a very worth-while work in connection with individual farms scattered throughout the county. They are demonstrating how soil can be conserved. A good deal of credit is due to the chairman of that committee, Mr. John A. Stewart, and his agricultural assistant, Mr. Ken Pretty. As I say, they are doing a most worth-while work.

People in Ontario welcome this because they realize that money is being raised in the central provinces by means of federal taxes to be spent elsewhere in Canada. They realize that under this legislation at least a certain portion will be spent in the provinces where the money is raised.

It is most essential that good public relations be maintained between the various departments and the farming people. Farmers resent governments at any level coming in and taking their land for any purpose. It is most important that there be good publicity and good public relations maintained if this policy is going to be worked out to the satisfaction of all concerned. We have in my county the Fanshawe dam part of the Thames valley authority program. There is bound to be some dissatisfaction. As far as it is humanly possible the people who own the land should be dealt with rather than to have some construction company come along and say, "We have nothing to do with it, just talk to somebody else." That sort of thing leaves a wrong impression.

The farm people should be assured that, if they enter into some long-term plan to reforest their lands, they will remain in ownership of those lands. We hear a lot today about the state taking over the ownership of all means of production. I point that out because the party to my left apparently think and believe that is the way we should go; but I am unalterably opposed. How can you have incentive to improve and bring into being these conservation practices, which will return their profits to the farmer over a long period of years, if they say: Oh, well, twenty years from now the state is going to take over the whole blessed business so why should I worry about it or why should my children worry about it? There must be some knowledge, on the part of the people who are going to be affected, that they will own the land for a long period of time.

After all, conservation is really what the Conservative party stands for not only in politics and economics, but in agriculture as well. To point out a few of the thoughts of other people on this matter I have before me some clippings from various publications of one kind and another. I am not going to use a lot of the material but I will take a paragraph here and there from some of them. The first one is from a Royal Bank letter of February, 1949:

> In old Ontario, according to the report of the royal commission on forestry, 1947, forest cover has shrunk to 9·7 per cent. Groups which have studied the question estimate that up to 8,000 square miles, or 5,120,000 acres, of waste land should be returned to forests; the commission itself is convinced that at least two and a half million acres of old Ontario might profitably be reforested.

Another extract I have reads:

> Erosion, the washing and blowing away of topsoil still goes on. Poor land management and poor forestry practices are pouring wealth down the drain. Our rivers are choked with silt and soil.
> The world is spotted with cemeteries of agricultural neglect. There is Greece, once the world's cultural and military leader. Twenty centuries have passed, and today Greece is reduced to a barren nation. Only two per cent of her original topsoil is left. Once, six out of every ten acres were forestland; today one out of twenty is forest. Centuries of cutting and burning, careless farming and overgrazing have reduced this country to an importer nation. The land cannot support her people; Greece imports half of its bread, three-fourths of its rice. Greece slipped from the throne of nations in near pace with the slipping away of her productive lands.

It is estimated that it takes anywhere from 300 to 1,000 years to produce one inch of topsoil. The Toronto Globe and Mail of December 19, 1952, comments on the throne speech as follows:

> There is a good deal of merit in this point. Soil, water and forest conservation are almost inseparable. If there is to be conservation at all, it must of necessity integrate all three phases. Agriculture depends on soil and water, and both of these derive protection from woodland. There can be large and spectacular dams, but no conservation of soil or water where it is needed.

And further on:

> But what is important in their protest is that the new program be not confined to building big dams. Unless there is grass roots soil conservation, too, these dams will become mere monuments to folly.

My next quotation is also from a Royal Bank letter, dated August, 1946:

> In one small area in Ontario there are 75 farm buildings classed as fair or poor, while 44 buildings have been abandoned or levelled, every one an unwritten story of hope, toil and disappointment. In some cases the land was good to start with, but it was farmed without foresight. The plow made it ready for carrying away by wind and water. Productivity declined. Income decreased. Sons and daughters went away to cities. A farm which housed, fed and clothed a big family only a few years ago supports no one, and is a menace to its neighbours. Once it deposited money in banks, bought machinery, was the mainstay of local retail business and a customer of the mail order houses. It helped feed cities. Today it buys nothing, pays no taxes, produces nothing to add to the national income or the welfare of the country, feeds no one.
> Look westward. In 1941 there were more than 4 million acres of abandoned farms in the prairie provinces, an acreage which, at the long time average yield of 15·6 bushels per acre, might produce 62,400,000 bushels of wheat a year if the land had been saved.

The London Free Press on January 15, 1953, also commenting on this resolution, states:

> Canada is embarked on a vast program for the development of her natural resources. The picture is bright and attractive. It could easily become dark and disastrous. Now is the time to set about the provision of adequate protective measures for all our natural resources. A long-term conservation policy covering the whole of the dominion is needed.

Now, gentlemen, I want to support the resolution and I hope the minister will take into consideration the many factors that will come before him, and that we will proceed with this measure.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a moment or two in support of this resolution and to commend the minister and his department for the work that has already been done.

In the section of the country which I represent we have possibly the most famous of these conservation schemes. Situated on the edge of my riding we have the Shand dam. This is a three-purpose dam built first as a flood control measure to protect the cities of Galt, London and Brantford, and as a means of conservation because the area surrounding the huge pond that is created by this dam has been almost completely reforested. It supplies water during the summer months to flush out the river and thus greatly assists in the disposal of sewage from those cities which I have mentioned. That dam has worked with the greatest of success. It was so successful that a second dam known as the Luther dam, has been built farther up the Grand river.

This is a different situation than the Shand dam which held back the water in a deep pond in a comparatively small area. The dam that has been constructed on the Luther marsh has at no place a depth of over ten or fifteen feet and I imagine that the average depth would perhaps be three or four feet. Peat bog is the principal soil flooded, and last spring the vegetation began to grow through and out of the water. To look at it you would hardly know that it actually was a pond. This dam was supposed to assist in flushing out the river to the extent of about one-quarter of the effect achieved by the Shand dam. Because of the tremendous area that was exposed to the sun, evaporation took place and most of the water stored in that pond evaporated. The farmers in that district felt that this was the best thing that could have happened, because instead of having hot dry winds blowing over their farms during the summer and drying out their crops they had a moist breeze which encouraged growth on the surrounding farms to a great extent. This is easily understood when we realize that a single deciduous apple tree will give off some tons of water during a hot summer day. Thus it is easy to see that, if we encourage reforestation and the ponding of water, we are going to put tons of moisture into the air which covers the farms; otherwise this moisture would not be there. Through a study of history and geography one can see that deserts have occurred in the areas where the trees have been cut. Knowing the huge quantities of water put into the air by each tree, one can understand why these hot dry winds which result from the cutting down of trees cause desert areas. From the experience we have had at the Luther dam, far different from the experience we had with the Shand dam, we believe that it is a better type of dam and far more useful to the country than the deep Shand dam which was built some twelve years ago.

With this in mind I would recommend to the minister that a great deal more thought be given to encouraging farmers to create ponds of three or four acres in low-lying swampy places on their farms. They should be encouraged to grow trees around these ponds which will distribute the moisture into the air, thus cooling the air and encouraging the crops growing in the surrounding fields. Everyone who has flown in an airplane knows the difference in the air over a forested area as compared with the air over ordinary farm fields. In this country we have to take the necessary steps to see that we have more forests in our farm areas. I am pleased to note that the minister has seen fit to set up an item in his estimates to start the Conestogo dam. I wish to commend him for that. With these three dams in the relatively small area with which I am connected, I think we will have set an example to many other sections of the dominion, and I would invite representatives from all parts of Canada to come and see what has been done by industrious people in that area of this province who have encouraged reforestation and the retention of our natural resources.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I wish to say a very few words concerning this resolution brought forward by the minister, Mr. Speaker. It might be my only opportunity of supporting it. It is a wonderful thing when a minister of the crown introduces a resolution of this kind urging the provinces to take assistance from the federal government for the development and conservation of certain resources. When I listened to this debate at first, I was inclined to believe that the resolution concerned only western Canada because the central theme of the debate was water conservation for that great province in the west which seems to be perishing from the lack of water. However, I was glad to see the interest taken in this subject by the maritime provinces as well as the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

In my opinion this resolution is just the forerunner of a policy which should be introduced by the government, namely, a policy not only for the development and conservation of water resources but for the development of all our natural resources. As some speakers have said during this debate, we have natural resources that are the greatest of any country in the world, yet we have no direct policy from this government for the encouragement and development of those natural resources.

I am going to deal briefly with water conservation for Prince Edward Island. We have no great rivers or great bays in that province. However, we are different from most of the provinces in that we are entirely surrounded by water. Some years ago our province produced wheat, but then western Canada was able to produce the wheat and put flour into the province at a lower price than we could produce it. During the time we were producing wheat, there were many mill ponds and mill dams scattered throughout the length and breadth of the province to operate the various grinding mills. Today these ponds and dams have practically disappeared. There are only a few operating. The provincial government, in co-operation with the fisheries department, has been rebuilding some of these dams and conserving the water in these ponds. I want to bring this to the attention of the minister, because so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned I believe he should seriously consider the restoration of these mill ponds and mill dams, in co-operation with the fisheries department, for fish culture. I might say that this would be one of the best things that could be done, especially in the interest of the tourist trade.

Several of these ponds have already been rebuilt, but some of them have not been built in a manner that would make them useful to the fisheries department for fish culture. I know there are a great many other members who wish to speak on this resolution. As I said at the beginning that I was only to draw one matter to the attention of the minister, namely, the restoration of the mill ponds throughout our province, I shall close by telling him that if he will co-operate with the fisheries department in putting these mill ponds into use as fish culture ponds it will be of great benefit to the province. They will be an asset by giving sport fishing to many of the tourists who visit the island.

Again I say I have great pleasure in supporting this resolution. I hope that the minister will come to see us with reference to securing better conservation and rebuilding our mill ponds.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say a few words in support of this resolution. The Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) is in the happy position, I think, that he has introduced a measure which has the support of every member in this house, and deservedly so; because in my opinion there is in Canada today no question that is more important than is conservation. Our future as a nation depends on it. Over the years we have listened to enthusiastic propagandists in this country who told us that our resources were inexhaustible and all that kind of thing. The fact is that they are not inexhaustible. Not only have we been using them but we have been wasting them at such a rate that, if we are going to conserve and to keep ahead of the wastage, it will be necessary that a great deal of money be spent.

There has come to my notice recently a book entitled "Conservation in Canada" by Professor O. M. McConkey of the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph. I would recommend this book for reading to the members of this house. A moment ago I used a certain phrase and perhaps I unconsciously had it in mind from reading the book. At page 12 of his book Professor McConkey says:

> Our future as a nation depends on a national plan of soil building and conservation to which all governments, rural and urban interests, and each citizen of Canada can work. We have before us the example of the United States where action has been taken; the U.S. soil conservation service, started in 1933, has developed over two thousand conservation districts covering 80 per cent of all the farms in the U.S.A. This service co-operates with farmers and brings a land use and conservation plan to each farm. But it was too late—

That is, too late to prevent the great harm that had been done. To continue:

—it is estimated that over one hundred million acres of farm land had been destroyed before action was taken.

Perhaps the damage has not occurred on that scale in Canada, but there has been a terrific waste of farmland in this country. On the next page of his book the professor says:

Here in North America the exploitation of our natural resources has been savage and rapid. Within an incredibly short time—from one to three hundred years in the east and seventy-five years on the western prairies—we have destroyed more than a hundred million acres of fertile soil.

If we are going to undo the harm that has been done we shall, as I say, have to spend a great deal of money. I think the minister can get that money provided he makes the necessary effort to inform the people of this country. I believe they are now ready to listen to him or to anyone else who will give them the true story of the misuse we have made of our natural resources. If congratulations are in order for bringing in this resolution as a start, I freely give them to the minister. I hope he will lose no time in seeking the co-operation of the provinces to develop in Canada a conservation program that will be really worth while.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I want to speak about this range of land mass between Ottawa and west of lake Simcoe in the province of Ontario. In my opinion there are in this resolution three things that cannot be separated, namely the conservation of our water, the conservation of our land and the conservation of our forests. Each one of them is so dependent on the other that one cannot exist alone without the use of the other.

This range of land area across this country has been a great watershed. It is a great reservoir for such things as the Rideau canal, the Trent canal and the great lakes in the province of Ontario. The height of land divides the northern section of the county of Haliburton; there the height of land is reached in southern Ontario, and the water runs west towards lake Simcoe and Georgian bay, and north into the Ottawa river, and south to lake Ontario, the waters of the great lakes and St. Lawrence river. This area has become a great reservoir. Great concrete dams have been built practically all over this whole area for the conservation of water.

I am glad that the minister has made it possible that what is done will be in co-operation with the province; because in this great area, as to the way the water is controlled now, it is in co-operation with the province. The water is controlled not only for the canals but also for the Ontario hydro.

As to this great range of lakes, there is an area of sixty-six feet around all the commercial lakes, you might say, or the larger ones. That sixty-six feet is mentioned in some agreement made probably one hundred years ago between the province and the Dominion of Canada, or at least probably at the time of confederation. That was more or less called the road allowance although it is never used for that purpose. It is used for the control of water. In other words, when you put in a dam you can raise the water sixty-six feet back on to the land without paying anybody anything. At the same time the land and the timber on the sixty-six feet is owned by the people or the company or whoever it might be that own the land back behind it.

I think that is something that should be adjusted. Some arrangements should be made between the province and the Dominion of Canada to the effect that, where a dam has been put in, this sixty-six feet should no longer exist; because over the years, as they put in a dam, in many places this sixty-six feet is already covered when the water it at high level. Therefore the high-water mark should not measure from the outside edge of this sixty-six feet from the lake but should measure from where the original surveys were taken at low-water level.

On a hot humid day water disappears rather fast. On one of our hottest days in the summer two inches of water will be taken off one of these big lakes by the process of evaporation. Something must be done to bring that water from the soil and from the great watershed back into the lake. Nature takes it up and brings it down in rain, but it does not always come back into the lake; it goes back onto the great range of the watershed.

There is another feature about this resolution that I like. The dominion government has seen fit to step into the picture and to do something about it in co-operation with the provinces. To conserve this water you must do something before it gets into the river. You must conserve it in the lake, in the little stream, in the ponds that are spread out throughout the length and breadth of this land. As I said before, great dams have been built, but that is not enough. What happens in the spring every year after our timber has gone or a fire has ravaged the area is that with the first hot sun in March away goes the snow. It is down in the lake in a day or two. Your lake is filled to the top of the dam. The inspectors must open the stop logs, and let that water go down the river, so that the great waste of water takes place in the spring of the year in places where we have not timber conservation and where we have no fire reservoir. It is high time that this problem was solved.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) gave us an illustration of the value of water. He told us how water is used in mining, in industry and in every aspect of our life in this country. If this great area was reforested it would be to the great advantage of us all. The province of Ontario has done considerable work along that line. They have great tree plantations from which any land owner or anybody else who wants to plant trees may obtain them. That system did not work out too successfully because many people obtained trees but did not plant them properly, and great waste was made of them. Now when you obtain trees you must pay a cent each for them. I myself plant 8,000 or 10,000 trees every year. I endeavour to plant as many trees as will in thirty-five years amount to as much timber as I cut, or even more, in a year. This system has been carried on by a considerable number of lumbermen on more or less privately-owned lands. It should be carried on to an even greater extent by this resolution.

The time has come when the government should be doing something along the line of producing trees and cover on these great watersheds and thereby preserve the water so that the cover will hold the snow and the ice in the bush in the spring of the year. I have seen swamps, low places in the timber, which have had ice in the bottom of them, some of it probably under a foot of topsoil, in the month of June. If our country was properly handled that would take place all over the high land mass. We would not have the run-off in the spring; we would not have our wasted water in the spring. We would have that water going into our lakes, creeks and rivers gradually until around the first of July. That is when your dams would come into use to make your reservoirs in the lakes.

Some arrangement should be arrived at between the dominion and the provinces with regard to the trapping of beaver. At one time in our country in this great range we had little beaver meadows a mile long or two miles long which would have four or five feet of water in them. Through our arrangement for trapping beaver, many miles of this area have been trapped out and the last beaver has gone and the dams are rotted out. The beaver meadow, instead of being full of water, has turned out to be a fire hazard in the summertime because it is full of dead grass.

Those ponds full of water served a useful purpose in fire protection because the fire rangers that the province has at the present time could go in there with their hoses and little pumps and that sort of thing and they could get water to put out the fires.

This resolution should go further than it does for this reason. In the Financial Post of five or six months ago this article appeared. They were commenting on the sixth British commonwealth forestry conference which was held here during the past summer, and this is what it says:

> This country doesn't know whether we're cutting down trees too fast. Of eighteen countries represented at the sixth British commonwealth forestry conference now in progress here, Canada and British Guiana alone are unable to give any estimate of the extent to which new forest growth is matching annual utilization and other depletion of forest resources.
> In contrast are the precise and complete set of figures furnished by Great Britain which shows that new growth in 1950 was 130·9 million cubic feet against total depletion of 100·2 m.c.f. In Canada it will be at least three years before even a partial answer can be obtained to the question of whether our forests can continue in perpetuity producing at today's rate. By that time there should be a completed forest inventory in at least eight of the ten provinces.
> Canada's report to the conference says it seems probable that considerable proportions of the Canadian forest are being cut too heavily, and adds that there is "urgent" need for more intensive sustained yield forest management.
> Meanwhile Canada is taking an annual harvest from her forests that in volume is 50 per cent greater than the collective output of all other commonwealth countries. Over-all Canadian forest output in 1950 was 3,322 m.c.f. Output for the rest of the commonwealth was 2,260 m.c.f. with the largest part of it produced in India, Australia and Uganda.

It was not to our government's credit that they did not have any figures to show the conference with respect to what has been done along this line.

The Ontario conservation association held a meeting in the Normal school in Ottawa a few days ago, and I find this report in the Ottawa Journal:

> Federal and provincial governments should assist the townships to control bush fires in the settled townships of Ontario, the executive of zone five, Ontario Conservation Association, decided yesterday at a meeting in the Normal school, Ottawa. Major Angus McDonald, of Alexandria, was chairman for the meeting.
> The reeves believe that some system, corresponding to that which has been developed in the United States, since passage of the Weekes' Act, in 1911, would fit the needs of the rural municipalities.

At the present time there are no provincial employees authorized to take any part in fire fighting, outside of the fire district in northern Ontario, which is protected by the provincial service.

That is something that should be done. There should be more fire protection for this great range of land, and it should be reforested. I have other clippings that I could read but they are practically all the same. I am glad that the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) has seen fit to bring in this resolution. I am also pleased that he has said that this work will be carried on in co-operation with the provinces, because the provinces control the cutting of our timber. That is true of Ontario, at least. We know that the provinces control a certain amount of water conservation, and that they work in conjunction with the dominion government with respect to the use of the canals, and so on; whereas the water in all this great area is controlled by the dominion government. The inspectors are paid by the dominion government. They are the men who put in the logs in the spring and take them out gradually during the summer months to let the water down at a gradual flow. As I said before, this resolution does not go far enough. We have to do something to reforest this great watershed so that it will hold back the snow, ice and moisture in the spring of the year, and not let it away with the first signs of spring.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to some of the schemes already in operation. I have in mind particularly the Mimico-Etobicoke conservation authority which has been in operation, I believe, for two or three years, and which has extensive plans for the prevention of flooding of the Etobicoke river in places like Brampton and Long Branch, and intervening points between the township of Chinguacousy and lake Ontario.

A deputation came to Ottawa about three years ago from that area asking this government to co-operate with the Ontario government in connection with the scheme. As the minister knows, some years ago the Ontario government began this conservation authority plan, and left its legislation in such a way that the muncipalities involved would pay 25 per cent of the cost, with 37½ per cent to be paid by the provincial government, and on the condition that the federal government would pay the balance of 37½ per cent.

This delegation met some of the ministers in Ottawa and put forward the proposal I have described in connection with the Mimico-Etobicoke authority scheme. The matter was brought up in the house by me and by others at that time. The government found many specious and strange reasons why this could not possibly work. I had been here long enough to know that if the government decided to make it work it would work. We now see that it is being worked, despite what was said at that time, because the scheme the minister is now introducing is substantially the same one that the delegation said was feasible, workable and possible.

I have drawn the attention of the minister to an authority, the operations of which are proceeding. The result is that because the dominion government would not come in the provincial government has committed itself to the very large proportion of 75 per cent of the cost, the other 25 per cent to be borne by the municipalities.

This work is in process of completion. Although the diversion of the Etobicoke river, through the town of Brampton, has been completed, or very nearly so, there is other work in progress on the river farther down. I am wondering whether the minister could tell us whether the 37½ per cent denied originally will be available in connection with this scheme, to apply from its beginning. Just where does the scheme fit into the general pattern of an authority such as I have described?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the federal government's participation in projects of the kind outlined by the hon. member is to ensure the development of those projects that are necessary but which would not otherwise be developed if there were not some element of federal assistance. If the project is being developed in any event, then obviously it has not been beyond the capacity of the municipal and provincial governments, in co-operation. I would be very doubtful if the project to which the hon. member referred could expect financial participation by the federal government under the legislation here contemplated.

Mr. Graydon: Is the minister putting the province to a means test?

Mr. Winters: I think it would be a mistake to anticipate the legislation at this stage. But it is a fact that federal participation will be forthcoming only for those projects which would not likely be built without federal participation. I refer to those projects of a magnitude sufficient to render it unlikely that they would be built by the municipalities alone or by the municipalities and provincial governments jointly.

Mr. Graydon: I do not wish to pursue the matter unduly, but it is not a question of the municipality's being able to do it. Because, either under the minister's scheme or under the scheme of the Mimico-Etobicoke authority, the municipality pays exactly the same, namely 25 per cent. But I take it from what the minister has said that the schemes covered by this legislation would be very large ones, rather than those of a local nature. In other words the toe got in the door in connection with the Shand dam of the Grand river. That is where the federal government was first committed to this kind of conservation. Would it have to be a scheme of such grandiose proportions before the federal government would be interested to the extent of making a contribution?

Mr. Winters: It would have to be a scheme of sufficient magnitude to warrant participation by the federal government on behalf of all taxpayers of Canada. It would have to be big enough to have some national significance.

Mr. Graydon: Of course we think, in Brampton, that Etobicoke has some national significance.

Mr. Winters: The answer is that it is built, anyway.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, we have had a most interesting discussion on the resolution, and received a minimum of information from the minister. I suggest we should have a further statement from him as to the general policy underlying this matter.

Mr. Winters: It will come when we have the bill before us. This is only the resolution stage.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister referred to three or four developments in central Canada. I do not know even yet under what authority the federal government makes contributions to those developments.

Mr. Winters: Under a vote of parliament.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Under a special vote for a certain project?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has this policy the minister now suggests been taken up with the provinces? What provinces have indicated that they will be prepared to co-operate with the federal government in putting this conservation measure into effect in those provinces? While there has been reference to some of the provinces, I have heard no reference to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Have overtures been made by Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in respect of the conservation of water and the prevention of flooding? There is flooding at certain times of the year in my county and in Colchester county. I saw a statement a short time ago to the effect that the people in Truro, which is in Colchester county, were alarmed at the prospects of flooding owing to a run-off of water from the mountains in the centre of the county.

I would be interested to know if there are any proposals which have been put forward by the minister, by the provincial government or by the town authorities which would enable a project to be undertaken there. In practically every part of Nova Scotia there is some seasonal menace due to flooding caused by the rapid run-off brought about by denuded forests.

I am sure that communities such as Oxford in my own county, and Truro in the county of Colchester, would be interested in this legislation. I would like to know what provision there will be in this legislation that would be of use to these places and other places in Nova Scotia where there is seasonal flooding, damage to property and continual fear on the part of the residents.

Mr. Winters: I think we will have a better opportunity of dealing with this whole subject when the bill is before the house and after hon. members have had an opportunity to study it. The basic reason underlying this legislation is that we have been doing certain things in co-operation with the government of Ontario which it was thought only right and proper should be extended to the other provinces. We are putting in legislative form what we have been doing by special votes of parliament.

It is the intention to make available to Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and all the other provinces the same approach to these problems as has been available in certain instances to Ontario. We have apprised all provincial governments of what we intend to do and they have all expressed interest in and keenness to see the legislation. When it is brought down I have no doubt they will be able to tell us whether they have projects which they believe could qualify. If that is the case, I have no doubt that they will bring them forward.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will there be sufficient funds available to enable the department to enter into an agreement, say with Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, in connection with conservation projects, or will a specific appropriation have to be made available by parliament before anything can be done?

Mr. Winters: There will be no over-all agreement with a province. Hon. members will see from the bill that there will be a separate agreement with respect to each project which will be considered on its individual merits.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will sufficient funds be provided in this year's estimates to enable the minister to enter into agreements with the provinces?

Mr. Winters: I think we can deal with that point when the bill is before us. I can tell the hon. member for Cumberland that a vote of parliament will be required with respect to each project carried on under this legislation.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Am I right in understanding that that is not now in the estimates?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I did not speak on the resolution stage because I did not want to make a speech. We have heard a good deal about the conservation of our water resources, but in some areas there are times when there is too much water. Can the minister give us any information as to how the proposed legislation will deal with the question of flood control? The minister did mention something of this in the speech he gave previously, but we do not all live in the same parts of Canada and there are certain physiographical features that vary with the different localities.

My constituency runs west right into the Rocky mountains. Volumes of water come down from those mountains in the smaller rivers. This water eventually finds its way into the larger rivers, and then into the great lakes and sometimes into the sea. In the spring tremendous amounts of water come down from the mountains in the smaller rivers, very often flooding some of the towns. I have particular reference to one or two towns in the Crowsnest pass in my county such as Coleman, Blairmore and High River, in the northern part of my riding. These towns have been flooded and great damage has been done.

I do not know what the bill will contain and perhaps the minister will want to leave this until the bill comes down, but I wonder if there cannot be some sort of synchronization with water conservation so that these floods can be controlled. When the Fraser river flooded a few years ago it was regarded as a national catastrophe. When a small town is flooded it is not considered a national catastrophe, but the results are just as serious to the people in that town as to people in larger centres. It is only a matter of number, for the consequences to the individual businessman or home owner are just as serious whether he lives in a small or large community.

A few years ago when one of these towns was flooded I took up the matter with the Minister of Public Works and the dominion government did some flood control work as a relief scheme. At that time they wanted to put men to work so that they could earn their bread and butter. But when floods occurred later on there were no relief schemes available. Of course there was no money from this government to control any floods there and it was a matter of passing the responsibility from one government to another government, and when they both begin to pass it over from one to another you just cannot get anywhere at all.

So, I would like to know if the minister can give us any information that would be valuable in that respect. Perhaps to make my question a little more direct I might ask him this: Are these various or smaller projects going to be the responsibility of the provincial government after these grants have been given to the provinces? Is it going to be left to their discretion to spend the money the way they wish? Are smaller projects going to be brought into the picture or just the larger ones? If the minister can, I would like him to give the house some information along that line.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to leave the details of the answer until the bill is before the house. I can tell my hon. friend that flood control is one of the main features envisaged by the legislation we are now seeking to introduce.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister has just told us that flood control is one of the principal features of this bill. I wonder if he would mind telling us whether, in devising this scheme, the government had all of the provinces in mind or only those which especially suffered from lack of flood control.

Mr. Winters: We had all provinces in mind, Mr. Chairman, and we communicated with all provincial governments.

Mr. Green: There seems to be some fear of overlapping between the Department of Resources and Development and the Department of Agriculture. I wonder if the minister could explain where the dividing line is to be drawn.

This afternoon the hon. member for Kootenay West referred to a brief submitted by the Agricultural Institute of Canada within recent weeks. I also have a copy of that brief. They are very much concerned because this policy is to be under the Department of Resources and Development. I know that in the province of British Columbia the people are very anxious to have the P.F.R.A., which is under the Department of Agriculture, extended to that province to undertake the various projects. Apparently P.F.R.A. has had considerable success in developing projects and the demand is for them to undertake projects which I believe would be of the type envisaged by this resolution.

Can the minister tell us just where the line is to be drawn? I hope this is not to be another case of building up two kingdoms in the government with overlapping functions. There does seem to be some danger of that happening and perhaps the minister could explain where the dividing line could be drawn.

Mr. Winters: It is not intended, of course, that there shall be any overlapping of functions. The approach to the problem has been at all times that the type of work envisaged by this bill is carried out by the water resources division of the department. That division has been in the department ever since it was the department of the interior.

In our dealings with Ontario, that province's operations have been under its department of planning and development. They did not visualize these projects to be of a type that would in any way conflict with their department of agriculture, nor do we in the federal government. There is no intention of having overlapping in the two fields of activity at all. The act under which the Department of Resources and Development was set up makes the two fields of jurisdiction clear and I can assure hon. members that there is no intention to have overlapping.

Mr. Green: One other question. Would this measure enable the Department of Resources and Development to undertake work in connection with such a project as the conservation of water in the Columbia river basin? As the minister knows, the Americans have used that river to almost the maximum possible extent, I take it, in so far as the river is in their territory, but in Canada there is some division of authority between the dominion and the province. I am wondering if the development of the Columbia river basin would come under this measure. I know that the minister's department has for some years been making investigations and surveys and giving help of that kind in the Columbia river basin, but will the whole project come under this measure or could it come under this measure?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Winters: It is difficult to answer that question until we know what the whole project will be. At present there is a survey on the Columbia river basin being carried out under the general jurisdiction of the international joint commission. Certain responsibilities have been assigned to the Canadian section of that commission to conduct surveys; and the water resources division of the Department of Resources and Development has assumed the general responsibility for making the surveys and collecting the data. Once the surveys have been completed and the data compiled it will then be possible to see what the development of the basin should be; but up to that time, not knowing what program of works will commend itself, it is difficult to say who should carry it out.

Mr. Green: Would the development of the basin come under the international joint commission or would it be under either the federal or the provincial government? Surely the international joint commission would not actually do the development work. I can understand why they are making the surveys or directing the surveys but they would not have jurisdiction over the actual development.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member is correct in that.

Mr. Green: Is there any authority which would have the direction of the actual development?

Mr. Winters: The question of the actual development would be largely for the provinces. The resources are within the jurisdiction of the provinces and they have the prime responsibility for their development. It is entirely possible that there will be a private enterprise approach to any development that takes place in that basin, and if it takes place it will be with the full knowledge, consent and under the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

Mr. Green: Would the dominion government not have anything to do with the development? Mind you, the river system is navigable, so the Department of Public Works would have some responsibility. Would the dominion government not come into that picture at all?

Mr. Winters: I am quite sure there would be consultation and each government would work within its own sphere of influence. The development of water resources is, in the first instance, under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. This is a basin which has potentialities of great magnitude and I have no doubt that if it is to be developed to the fullest extent there will be co-operation between all levels of government.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, on the Burnt river at Kinmount, Ontario, there has been a dam built. I do not know how long ago it was built but it was there long before I was there. It is a timber dam, its piers filled with stone. The piers have become very rotten and the dam is apt to go out at any time. I have been after the Department of Transport, and through them the Minister of Public Works, to rebuild that dam but they have refused to do so until now. A small village of 250 people could arrange to put up $5,000 but that is as far as they could possibly go. I believe the province is likely to come in on it from the tourist angle. Would the federal government be in a position to grant money for 37½ per cent of the cost of that project?

Mr. Winters: I cannot say. I am not familiar with the project. I would have to see it and study it.

Mr. Hodgson: We will make you familiar with it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Winters thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 109, to authorize the grant of assistance to a province for the conservation of water resources.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD ON STATUTORY BASIS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for the establishment of the historic sites and monuments board of Canada on a statutory basis; to provide that the board shall consist of twelve members and for its powers and duties; to provide also that the appointed members shall be paid a fee for attending each meeting and travelling and living expenses incurred in connection with the business of the board; to provide also for the appointment and remuneration of a secretary of the board; and to provide further that all expenditures for the purposes of the act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament therefor.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Could we have a statement from the minister now as to the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. Winters: Since the motion is one for the Speaker to leave the chair, and since we have gone through this debate on a number of occasions, I think it would be preferable if the statement were made after we are in the committee of the whole, at which time I shall be pleased to make brief remarks.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Winters: Hon. members will recall, Mr. Chairman, that the historic sites and monuments board was set up by the governor in council in 1919 for the purpose of advising the government in the selection and commemoration of sites and events of national historic importance. With the exception of changes in personnel from time to time, the board has functioned on this more or less informal basis up to the present. Its terms of reference have never been clearly or formally defined.

The bill referred to in the resolution proposes to establish the board on a statutory basis and to define its duties and powers. It is proposed that the board shall be composed of twelve members; ten to be appointed by the governor in council and to represent each of the provinces. The other two members would be the dominion archivist and chief curator of the national museum. Provision is being sought to authorize payment to the appointed members of a fee for attending each meeting and for the payment to all the members of travelling and living expenses incurred by them in connection with the work of the board. Authority is also being sought for the appointment and remuneration of a secretary of the board. The bill will also ask for authority to establish historic museums and to acquire land for such purpose.

I do not think there is anything further I need say at this time. I am sure that all hon. members will agree with the desirability of establishing the board on a more permanent basis, thus giving greater recognition to the importance of the work it will be asked to perform in the years to come.

Mr. Follwell: I believe all hon. members will agree with the minister that we establish this board on a permanent basis. Recently I had the honour of representing the minister at the unveiling of a tablet to commemorate one of the outstanding Canadians of a few years ago. I had the opportunity also of attending with the Prime Minister when, under the direction of this historic sites and monuments board of Canada, there was unveiled in the city of Belleville a memorial to the late Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who was prime minister of Canada from December 21, 1894, until April 27, 1896. Sir Mackenzie Bowell represented the old constituency of Hastings North.

The Chairman: Order. I realize the interest that the hon. member has in all the monuments that he has seen unveiled, but on the other hand I am afraid if I allow him to carry on I shall be opening a door which certainly will not be closed this evening. Therefore, I would ask him not to discuss any matter but that which is relevant to the resolution.

Mr. Follwell: I was only endeavouring to point out to the committee the work that this group of ten representatives, one from each province, has attempted to do and has been doing. I believe that the group has been doing great work and, as the minister says in his resolution, apparently without any remuneration. I believe that a board so important as this particular board should be recognized in legislation, and should be properly compensated for the work it has done and is doing. I am sure that all members of the committee will join with the minister in supporting the legislation that he introduces.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It was fitting that today the government should announce that they would erect a monument on parliament hill to one of the Conservative prime ministers, and that the hon. member for Hastings South should be allowed to refer to another distinguished Conservative prime minister to whom another monument has been erected in Belleville.

Mr. Gibson: It must be a good wicket.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that the minister has not followed the recommendation of the royal commission on arts and sciences. It was not, of course, necessary that he should do so. The royal commission recommended that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec should have two representatives each, and also that the Canadian historical association should have the privilege of nominating two of its members for five years. The recommendation has not been followed, but other recommendations seem to have been followed in the main.

Now, sir, I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to references which have been made in the report of the royal commission to this very important subject. They are found in two sections, part I, chapter 11, and also in part II at page 346. If I may, sir, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to a reference which is contained therein to the province of Newfoundland. The reference is found at page 129 of the report and reads as follows:

> An area rich in historic sites as old and even older than any in the rest of Canada is Newfoundland. We heard of nearly sixty sites of general historic interest awaiting the attention of the historic sites and monuments board. We were told of the traditional landing place of John Cabot (June 24, 1497), of Carbonear, where the early Channel Island settlers produced the "charbon" for heating their homes, of old graves of Basque fishermen, and of the site of Lord Baltimore's castle inhabited by David Kirke and others.

David Kirke is the Sir David Kirke who conquered Quebec when Champlain was first there.

> We were taken back not to the eighteenth century but to the seventeenth and (for a brief moment) to the fifteenth. Canada's newest province proudly and rightly claims her place beside the oldest.

There is no doubt that this board has a great deal of work to do which perhaps could not be easily done by a voluntary organization. The idea of compensating them for the time they spend on their work is no doubt a good one. In St. John's I can think of several places that deserve memorials. It is associated with Sir John Cabot—

The Chairman: Order. Does the hon. member think he should now indicate the business which the board will have to do?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The chairman has asked me a question. Following the precedents which have been followed on other resolutions, I thought that a general discussion might take place, not going too far away from the terms of the resolution itself.

The Chairman: Quite so. But the debate that takes place must always be relevant. I do not want to curtail the discussion, but it seems to me that if all hon. members are allowed on this resolution to indicate to the minister where historic sites should be established all across Canada, so much time would be spent that it would certainly delay considerably the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Knowles: That does not make the debate out of order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I hope not to take up too much time. I was impressed by the recommendations which were made by this royal commission, especially in the latter part of the volume. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) does not think that this has anything to do with the board. It is the origin of it.

Mr. Stick: Not the setting up of each board.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This is where it stems from. It is following the recommendations of the royal commission that the board is to be put on a statutory basis at the present time. If the hon. member thinks otherwise, he can look at page 348 and see the reference there, and the recommendation.

Mr. Stick: I know.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He can read it again with profit.

Mr. Graydon: You do not always get it the first time.

Mr. Stick: Second thoughts are always best.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): At the present time the historic sites come under the national parks branh of the Department of Resources and Development. I presume that this board will continue to be operated under the same department. I notice that there are 388 sites in nine of the provinces and not one in the tenth province of Newfoundland. When the board is established I hope it will see that we get our proportionate share of the sixty that have already been brought to the attention of the royal commission.

Mr. Riley: Mr. Chairman, I shall not go to bed tonight with any kind of inferiority complex after having received that burst of applause.

I want to tell the minister that I am in full accord with this measure, which is designed to set up a board on a statutory basis. I have good reason for being in accord with it, and I shall try to explain it in the space of a minute or two.

Mr. Fleming: Take your time.

Mr. Graydon: There is no rush.

Mr. Riley: Some time ago I suggested to the minister that a monument be set up near Hopewell in Albert county in memory of the late Viscount Bennett, one of our former prime ministers. The minister agreed to do that and I understand that he suggested to his departmental officials that they proceed with the work. For more than a year now I have been awaiting news of the erection of this monument at the birthplace—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member cannot do that in discussing this resolution. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Riley: Mr. Chairman, I am just about through; but I was explaining why I was endorsing this resolution of the minister.

The Chairman: I know that the hon. member, like many others, has a fairly good reason to be out of order. Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Winters thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 110, respecting the establishment of the historic sites and monuments board of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up third reading of Bills Nos. 19 and 40 which passed second reading and committee stage today. Then we shall consider the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) respecting the Emergency Powers Act; then the resolution in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) respecting the revision of the Yukon Act; also the resolution of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944; Bill No. 46, to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. We also hope to have time to consider the resolution concerning the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 6, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay) presented the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION AS TO REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that the Minister of Fisheries is back in his seat, and I wonder if he can tell us when the report of the joint committee on the fisheries of Newfoundland is likely to be brought down.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I was told down there that it would be at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Graydon: They did not tell you much.

NEW PROCESS FOR CANNING LIVE LOBSTERS

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the Department of Fisheries any knowledge of the new process for canning live lobsters and marketing them as such, recently advertised by a Boston firm?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member that he put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Graydon: These are live lobsters.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ASSESSMENT OF INCOME TAX ON PENSION FUND REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Finance received representations for legislation relieving Canadian National Railways employees of the necessity of treating pension fund refunds as income in one year? If such legislation is necessary, will the minister consider including it in his budget proposals of February 19?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The answer to both questions, Mr. Speaker, is in the affirmative.

CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

RECOVERY OF INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS

Hon. Paul Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 19, to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS FOR NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. Paul Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 40, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Yesterday the member for Winnipeg North Centre asked two questions. First he asked why we proceed with this appointment by an act of parliament rather than, as the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act states in section 13, by a joint resolution of the House of Commons and Senate.

I am informed that in 1933, when the basic statute was passed, it stated that the auditors should be appointed by a resolution of parliament. The first appointment of an auditor under that act was in 1934, and the phrase "appointment by resolution of parliament" was considered. The law officers advised the government of that day that the only way the appointment could be made was by an act of parliament.

Without going into an elaborate explanation I draw to the attention of my hon. friend the debate of 1934, which is reported in Hansard. Then in 1936 the change I have outlined was made. Instead of using the phrase "resolution of parliament" it was changed to "joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate". However, by that time parliament had become accustomed to proceeding by way of a bill. This, as hon. members will appreciate, provides added control over legislation beyond what is provided in a resolution because a bill comes to the members of both houses for attention more frequently than would be the case were we to proceed by a joint resolution. Therefore in consequence, despite that change in the statute in 1936, there has never been any change in procedure. We are today suggesting the appointment by way of an act of parliament just as has been done every year since 1934.

Mr. Knowles: There was another point.

Mr. Benidickson: The other question that was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was the question why there was no reference in this bill to a repeal of other legislation after enactment of the revised statutes. I draw his attention to the fact that this is an annual appointment and it refers to a continuous audit. There would be no desire to repeal the legislation of last year which was an appointment of auditors for 1952. This is an appointment for one year, 1953.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary assistant for going to the trouble to get the answers to those two questions which I put to him yesterday. It seems to me that the answer he has given to the second question is not only satisfactory but quite reasonable. I am, however, still interested in the answer given to the first question.

It seems to me that what he has said—if I may paraphrase it—is that the government is following custom rather than the statute. If it can be established that the custom we are following is better than the provision laid down in the statute, it follows that it would be a good idea to amend the statute. Otherwise, does it not make a mockery of the rule of law and the importance of all of these fine details that we write into acts of parliament from year to year?

As the parliamentary assistant has pointed out, the wording that is now in the statute to which I drew his attention yesterday was put there in 1936. He admits that the statute was passed after the custom of doing it by act of parliament each year had been established. In other words, parliament knew what that custom was when it enacted in 1936 that it be done by a resolution of both houses in parliament.

As I indicated yesterday, in the end result there is no difference whatsoever. What we are talking about is not a matter of substance, and it is not even a matter of legality. It is a matter of procedure. In view of the importance that attaches to the laws that are passed by parliament and to the precise terms that are in them if it has been decided to follow the custom rather than the law I suggest that at least the law might be changed to conform with the custom.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question.

Mr. Abbott: We are not in committee.

Mr. McLure: When will the reports and statements of the Canadian National Railways be ready for the committee? Can we receive them at least a week beforehand?

Mr. Benidickson: Customarily the auditors' report is available prior to March. It is usual for the committee on railways and shipping to assemble in March just as soon as the financial statement of the railways for the past year and the budget for the coming year are available.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

PROVISION FOR CONTINUATION OF ACT FROM MAY 31, 1953 TO MAY 31, 1954

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Powers Act to provide for the continuation of the act for a further period of one year, that is from the thirty-first day of May, 1953, to the thirty-first day of May, 1954.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Prime Minister going to make a statement now?

Mr. St. Laurent: I understand that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has a statement to make.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I will make it as soon as the house goes into committee.

Mr. Drew: I hope the statement will be made now, because I think it would be an advantage if the statement were made in advance of other statements that will be made. The question before the house is whether it is expedient that a certain thing be done; and I would hope that we would have an explanation as to why it is expedient.

Mr. Garson: Speaking to the point of order which my hon. friend has just raised, may I say that I understand the motion which is before the house is that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair in order that the resolution might be considered in committee. There is not a great deal that can be said upon the subject of the Speaker leaving the chair. If it met with the approval of hon. members I think it would be much better if, immediately when we get into committee, I would begin with the statement I was going to make. Then there would be opportunity for questions and the like.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: No. I want to indicate to the minister that I propose to speak at this time. If he wishes to let his statement stand over, that procedure is perfectly satisfactory to me. But if on the other hand he would prefer to make a statement, it can be done in that way.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but I would point out that the real issue which is before us is whether it is expedient that a new act of this special nature be introduced. That is the issue much more than is the content of the measure itself. I am therefore suggesting that it would be wise for the minister to place before us an explanation as to why it is expedient that we should consider the introduction of special legislation of this nature.

Mr. Garson: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the motion which is before the house is that the Speaker do now leave the chair so that we can discuss in committee the expediency of the resolution which will then be presented to the committee. I have little to offer with regard to the wisdom of the Speaker leaving the chair. If my hon. friend would like to lead off on that subject, it is all right with me.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would refer you to a decision that you made on June 18, 1952, as reported at page 3375 of Hansard. I read these words:

> After giving this matter my careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that if there is no objection to the consideration of the resolution in committee of the whole, the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair should be put without debate. If any members are opposed to the resolution, and do not think that it should even be considered in the committee of the whole, or if they require additional information before agreeing to the motion, they should be given an opportunity to speak on the motion. The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

It is in relation to that ruling that I propose to speak; and if the minister does not propose to speak, I shall go ahead.

Mr. Garson: Before my hon. friend does so, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be desirable—on the point of order—that the whole of the extract to which he has referred should be put on the record. The paragraph immediately preceding the one which he read is as follows:

> I should point out that the motion is for the Speaker to leave the chair, etc. It is not a motion to adopt the resolution. However, under our present practice members have been debating it as if it were such a motion. The minister makes an affirmative statement, frequently going into details, with the Speaker in the chair, and other members follow. The result is that a full discussion of the resolution takes place at this stage. I am sure that is not the procedure contemplated by standing order No. 60, nor is it in accordance with Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling, in which I concur.

It will therefore be seen that the Speaker's ruling which my hon. friend has invoked for the purpose he has in mind is dead against him.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it is always extremely convenient to read the first part of a ruling and then say that the conclusion is against the position that is taken. I have read your conclusions, which you said had been given to the house after careful consideration, and it is on the basis of that ruling that I am rising now to discuss the matter before the house.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the motion is that you leave the chair for the purpose of considering a certain resolution. In the case of emergency legislation of this kind, which is unusual legislation in this house, I submit that it is appropriate that we immediately decide whether we should take any steps at all to renew extraordinary legislation of the kind that we have had before us. I use the term "extraordinary" with the dictionary meaning of that word in mind. It is out of the ordinary to initiate proceedings designed to delegate to the executive the powers which are ordinarily exercised on behalf of the people of Canada by those who were sent here to do the business of parliament on behalf of those people.

The fact that we have already had an act of this kind in effect does not dispose of any of the objections to proceeding at this time to consider unusual legislation which confers upon the government the power to deal with almost every aspect of the life of the people of this country, subject only to certain reservations of a very limited nature. That surely is extraordinary legislation. Therefore I do submit that before we should even consider asking you to leave the chair for the purpose of having a discussion in regard to this, we should immediately place before the house reasons why no such steps should be contemplated at this time.

We are asked to say that you should leave the chair so that we may consider the desirability of introducing legislation similar to that which has been on the statute books now for nearly two years. That legislation was passed over the objections of hon. members who pointed out that in the event that there should be a threat of general war, or such disturbance as might threaten the peace and security of the country, there was legislation already on the statute books under which the government could act at any time without waiting to convene parliament. Nevertheless this legislation was passed. It has been in force for nearly two years.

I submit that before a single step is taken to consider the reintroduction of legislation of that kind, we should ask ourselves today what evidence has come to us from the experience of the past few years which suggests any reason why we should suspend the ordinary authority of parliament in the way that is suggested by this resolution. It is not enough to say to hon. members that no injury has been done to the rights of parliament. I would contest that statement if it were made. I would concede, however, that the extent to which the wide powers of this act have been invoked is not sufficient to arouse any considerable concern in the minds of the public as to what the real effect of this act could be. We should be considering not what has happened but what could happen. We should consider the fact that while we are told from time to time that this government feels secure in office, conceivably another government may be in office while this act is still in force. That government also would have this act before it.

Legislation we pass must not be passed with the comforting assurance that the individuals who will be immediately entrusted with it can safely be given wide powers. We must see what wide powers are conferred and decide whether it is wise that any government at any time should have those powers. It is in that light that I think we should consider the proposal now before us.

We were told before in the preamble to the act which was adopted that an international emergency existed which threatened the security of Canada. No one can be in any doubt about that fact. One of the things which threaten Canada and every free nation of the world today is the loss of their personal freedom, which in our case is assured by our parliamentary democracy. For that reason we should be asserting the full authority of this parliamentary system of ours by the retention by parliament of its powers over the business of the people, at a time when the system itself is part and parcel of the struggle in which this whole world is engaged.

[Mr. Drew.]

In the preamble to the act which will expire within the next few weeks it was said:

> And whereas it is essential that emergency powers be conferred to enable measures to be taken as urgently required from time to time to carry out adequate defence preparations, to regulate the economy of Canada to meet the needs of defence and to stabilize the economy and to safeguard it from disruption that may result from defence preparation in Canada or from emergency measures taken in other countries, in order that defence preparations may not be impeded;

Then the act went on to say:

> And whereas it is preferable that the necessary emergency powers be exercised under special authority from parliament rather than that the War Measures Act—

—therefore this act should be passed. What parliament was asked to do on that occasion, Mr. Speaker, was to pass an act which gave the government wide powers over the whole Canadian economy. These were the specific subject matters covered by the act:

> (a) control and suppression of maps, plans and photographs;
> (b) control of communications and means of communication;
> (c) control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movements of vessels;
> (d) transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things;
> (e) trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture; and
> (f) imposition and recovery, in connection with any scheme of control, of fees or charges payable to the Receiver General of Canada or into any fund or account established by order or regulation for the purposes of the scheme of control.

Just let us think of what is covered by these words. First of all there is control and suppression of maps, plans and photographs. I am sure it will be said, "But that of course only means a limited type of photographs." The words are "maps, plans and photographs". Under this there is no limitation to the maps, plans and photographs that could be brought under the control of the government.

Indeed, that has already been held in the Nolan case, where the order in council obviously went far beyond anything that was contemplated when these emergency powers were originally conferred. The Nolan case, in fact, is a warning to us, and one of the reasons we should reconsider this matter carefully today. That case says in effect—and it will be kept in mind that it is a judgment of the privy council—that no matter how unrelated to the ordinary purposes of the measure itself the conduct of the government may be, if the government has decided that it will proceed under these emergency powers, that decision stands.

The judgment, in itself, is one reason we should pause today before making a single move to prolong extraordinary machinery which places in the hands of the government the power to deal with broad aspects of the economic and social life of this country, under the words I have just read in these various headings.

Let us think of what the government can control under the "control of communications and means of communication". That means that the ordinary communications between our people, one of the basic rights of a free people, could be stopped at any time. The courts, under the Nolan judgment, would be bound to say that no matter how far the government had gone, that order would stand.

Then we find that the government has "control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movements of vessels." There again, under wide and unrestrained powers the government can control the operation of our harbours, our ports and territorial waters, and the movement of all the ships using them. These are powers so wide as to control the whole export business of this country, because it involves control over the movement of ships.

The next paragraph refers to "transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things". No wider power could be conferred. The whole movement of goods and of people is left completely under government jurisdiction and whim. They may make such decisions as from time to time they may regard as desirable, according to their idea of what is desirable.

Then we have the declaration that the government may control "trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture". Mr. Speaker, this covers the whole economy of Canada. "Production" means production of all kinds. It means production by farmers; it means production by miners; it means production by forest operators. It means production of every kind from which the daily livelihood of our people is gained. And then, in addition to that, there is unlimited control over manufactures, which means the product of all the machines which give to our production in this country such tremendous scope and flexibility.

Then we have the declaration that it has all these wide-open powers, unrestrained by control, to determine how there will be "imposition and recovery, in connection with any scheme of control, of fees or charges payable to the Receiver General of Canada or into any fund or account established by order or regulation for the purposes of the scheme of control".

We were told, when this subject was discussed before, that there were exceptions which did leave the people with some possibility, some assurance, of freedom. That is in section 2 (2) of the act which reads:

> Notwithstanding anything contained therein, the powers conferred on the governor in council by subsection one do not include power to make orders or regulations in relation to
> (a) arrest, except as incidental to proceedings under section three, detention, exclusion or deportation of any person;
> (b) censorship or the control and suppression of publications and writings; or
> (c) expenditure of moneys otherwise than in accordance with an appropriation by parliament except expenditure of moneys from any fund or account established by order or regulation in connection with a scheme of control for the purposes of that scheme of control.

The exemptions and the protection here are almost illusory. "Censorship or the control and suppression of publications and writings" seems to be a wide-open protection. It is a protection that certainly should exist, and that need not be discussed. But when we are told that the government protects the people of this country from arrest, let us see what it is in respect of which this protection is given. It protects the people from arrest, "except as incidental to proceedings under section 3". And section 3 provides that the governor in council may prescribe penalties—> —by way of fine or by way of imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or by way of both fine and such imprisonment, that may be imposed for violation of orders or regulations made under this act and may also prescribe whether, and the circumstances in which, the said penalties shall be imposed upon summary conviction or indictment.

This simply means that, in relation to any of the subjects covered in section 2 (1), where the government makes regulations which must be observed in respect of any of these matters, if there is a breach of these regulations there may be arrest and all that follows arrest, without any restriction or any protection being afforded by section 2 (2) of the act.

I can remember it was pointed out that no such wide powers as these had been exercised at any time. The suggestion was made that we need not be concerned about how wide these powers are because up to this time the government had not exercised such wide powers. In a very substantial measure that is so. Actually we are called upon to ask ourselves, before we take a single step in this matter, just why it is necessary that this should be done. Why are we asked to reintroduce an emergency act of this kind? What has the government found it necessary to do under the act which indicates a need for a continuance of its powers?

If the government is going to rest its case upon what it has done already, then let us see what it has done. These are orders passed under the act from May 1, 1952, to date, so far as I have been able to ascertain. First there is P.C. 2306, which was a consolidation of the previous regulations respecting great lakes seamen's security regulations. These regulations had to do with security on the great lakes and the screening of seamen, with the declared intention of preventing communist activities in these very important operations.

The second order is P.C. 3197, passed on May 30, 1952. This was merely an order pursuant to the addresses of both houses which extended the act for a further year.

The third was P.C. 4116 passed on September 24, 1952. This was a partial revocation of a previous order passed on September 26, 1951, respecting the power of the board of grain commissioners to defer the weighover at any terminal elevator.

Then there was P.C. 4410 passed on October 30, 1952, which was an order in council respecting pilots' licences under the Aeronautics Act and radio proficiency certificates under the Radio Act. These again ostensibly related to security and provided for the opportunity to screen those engaged in certain important activities.

No. 5 was P.C. 4525 passed on November 19, 1952. This was an order revoking previous order in council P.C. 1608, which provided the authorization for minting a new five-cent coin of steel. So far as I have been able to ascertain these are the orders in council that have been passed since May 1 of last year.

Let us see what this means. We may be told that it was not a very momentous order that was passed in regard to the five-cent piece. Let us be quite clear about it. It did not need any Emergency Powers Act to deal with that. Here was a subject that certainly called for no such wide powers. What was there relating to the world-wide tension or what was there relating to the threat from without and danger to our peace and security in the content of the five-cent piece? What was there that threatened the economy of Canada in the fact that there was steel in our five-cent piece at that time?

This does seem humorous, but the fact remains that the very absurdity of the proposition that this should be regarded as an emergency illustrates that this act is being used for matters that have nothing in the world to do with any such emergency as was described in the preamble. This simply was a convenient way of dealing with something that the government decided was not important enough to bring to parliament. If the government really wants to tell parliament, "We do not think you should be bothered with ordinary details of this kind" then let them present a bill to us which will properly describe its real purpose. But do not come to us and say that you need an act based upon the presence of world-wide disturbances in order to deal with the Canadian five-cent piece.

Let us look at some of these other orders. One was simply an order implementing the recommendation of these houses that the act should be extended. However, there were two orders which I suggest should be considered. I believe that these orders are much more important than they appear on the surface. One was an order dealing with great lakes seamen's security regulations, and the other was an order in relation to the issuing of pilots' licences under the Aeronautics Act and radio proficiency certificates under the Radio Act.

The only reason for an emergency act is to have stand-by powers to deal with something that needs to be dealt with when events are crowding around in a way that make it impossible to wait for parliament to be convened in the ordinary way. The only justification for giving the government emergency powers at any time is that the very pressure of events, the demand for immediate action makes it essential that the government should not wait to convene the people's representatives to pass laws that would be required. No such emergency from that point of view arose in this case. In fact there was every reason why this act should not have been invoked for that purpose.

Over and over again the government has said that it was not prepared to deal with communist activities in this country by any law that would deal with those particular activities as such. Let us for the moment disregard the merits or otherwise of that argument. From the government's point of view, let us accept their contention. They say in effect, "You cannot define communism." They say in effect. "We must not under any circumstances exercise anything in the nature of thought control; we must not do anything that will impair the freedom of the individual to think and to express his thoughts." Having said that in the house and having refused to let parliament pass on laws which would define offences of this kind in the way they should be defined, the government then say, "Although we cannot define the offence, we will not let people work because they have offended and are doing things that we cannot define."

Either there is an offence that can be defined, or there is not. If there is, it should be covered by our Criminal Code; if there is not, it should not be in the hands of this or any other government to deny to any Canadian or any other free citizen the right to work and maintain his family by his work.

This is not a case of the degree of confidence in the government. We would indeed be very strange on this side of the house if we expressed too unrestrained confidence in this government after some recent events. Nevertheless if we were in the unusual situation that notwithstanding all the disclosures there have been of the way in which this government has acted behind closed doors, we were prepared to say that this government is so good, this government is so reliable and this government is so efficient that we will delegate to the government all the powers conferred upon us under our constitution by the people of Canada, then I would say that we would be denying our right to sit here in this house of parliament if we said that this government at any time, secretly and without any definition of the offence, was going to be able to say to any individual whether or not he has the right to work. That is exactly what this means. That is exactly what these orders in council provide.

It is not enough to say to us, "You wanted action in regard to communism, and this is one way we can deal with it." If we are going to deal with communism—and I for one believe we should under laws which clearly define the offence, not under that name but under the nature of the offence—then I say that should be done by parliament and should be considered with the utmost care before the freedom of any individual is placed in jeopardy. Certainly there was no emergency of the kind described in the preamble which justified the use of this act in that way.

Then the other order in council was one which partially revoked an emergency powers order dealing with the handling of grain. Events are not yet crowding in around us in a way that denies us time in this parliament to deal with the way in which grain should be handled. Let the government bring before this house such legislation as is required to deal with grain of any kind or with other food products, and let this house determine what powers the government shall have to deal with matters of this kind.

The recital of the orders in council which were passed demonstrates perfectly clearly that during the past year the government did not need this act on a single occasion. It should not have used the act to deal with the subjects which are covered by the orders. Therefore the government themselves have demonstrated that during the past year, with all its international strains and pressures, they really did not need this act. What is there that they see looming ahead within the next few months that calls for the re-enactment of legislation of this kind? That is something that should be before the members of the house before we take a single step along the road of delegating our responsibilities to the executive.

The Emergency Powers Act provides that the government may take such steps as are necessary to stabilize and safeguard the economy as well as to protect this country. These are strong words. On the surface they have an appeal, but let us see what really could happen in a case of this kind. Let us see what the record of the government is under wide-open powers and consider whether we should not say right now, before a single step is taken, that the members of this house do not think this government should have any power whatever which is not clearly defined by law, except from a purely administrative point of view.

Let me give an illustration of the kind of thing this government has done where it had power to act by order in council. Hon. members will recall a man named Kurt Meyer. We are still waiting for some reasonable explanation of why that German general, sentenced to death, was spirited out of the country by order in council which permitted him to get back to his homeland before the members of this house knew that steps of that kind were being taken. Whether Kurt Meyer should have been found guilty and condemned to death or whether he should not is not for us to say at this moment. Nevertheless Kurt Meyer had been found guilty and was in prison in this country. Parliament was sitting. Parliament was capable of dealing with the matter but the government, without consulting parliament, meeting behind closed doors, spirited out of the country a man who had been found guilty of responsibility for the cruel and merciless way in which a number of young Canadian soldiers were killed during the last war.

Let us take another case, perhaps not so tragic in its impact, perhaps not so dramatic in some aspects although more dramatic in others. Let us recall what happened to the ships which were so generously provided for the Ming Sung company to carry contraband up and down the Chinese coast. That has very much to do with whether hon. members should be prepared to extend wide-open powers to a government without any restraint and definition upon those powers. Hon. members will probably recall the first incident connected with the Ming Sung ships and the money which this country will lose as the result of the activities of the government.

It will be recalled that on April 7, 1949, the estimates were before the house, and there was an item in the estimates calling for the payment to certain companies of sums which were due in connection with the construction of those ships. It was the opinion of the law officers of the crown that the right of the government to act in the way it had was open to question. For that reason an item was brought forward in the estimates and not only dealt with as the provision of a sum of money to carry out this obligation but also to provide in this interesting way the statutory power to do what previously the government had no right to do.

It was pointed out that there was no legislation under which the government had any right to undertake an operation of that kind. It was pointed out that the item in question not only provided money but in effect was the first legislation before the house giving the government any authority for this strange and, in the end, disastrous transaction. This was the answer on behalf of the government as recorded at page 2433 of Hansard for April 7, 1949:

> We are coming to parliament and asking it to approve or disapprove. If parliament disapproves, the government is defeated. If parliament approves, the item will be confirmed by parliament. But it will not be permitted to stand. It will be dealt with now.

That, of course, is an example of the moderate and very reasonable way in which the government has dealt with matters of this kind from time to time. "You are going to deal with it no matter whether or not there is any law. This is the law"—and they might have added, "In our opinion we are the law." The item was passed, and that was the authority for the payment at that time in connection with this strange transaction.

Then, as we know, these ships got into western Pacific waters and were being operated by the Ming Sung company. That company had its head office in what is now communist China, and so that the ships might operate conveniently for the communist government a Canadian subsidiary, the Ming Sung Company of Canada Limited, was incorporated and given the authority to operate these ships. Then just in case they should find any trouble in rendering assistance to the communists along the Chinese coast, the government gave the unusual permission to this company to operate the ships without the usual provision that Canadians would be in charge of them. They went further, and just so that every convenience would be provided for these ships trading with communist territory it was provided that the Canadian flag would be used on them; and though we asked over and over again that this authority be withdrawn, it was only recently that we learned that some months ago it was withdrawn at a time when the withdrawal had no earthly effect one way or the other.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if I might interrupt my hon. friend for a moment on a point of order. I am sure we are all very much interested in this description he has given—

An hon. Member: You should be.

Mr. Garson: —but I would point out that the orders in council he is discussing—and I think he will admit this—were not passed pursuant to the Emergency Powers Act at all. Surely, sir, upon a motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair my hon. friend should at least restrict himself to a discussion of the orders in council that have been passed under the act which we are seeking to extend. I would submit that the remarks he has been making for the past ten or fifteen minutes have all been out of order.

Mr. Ferguson: They are hard to take, too.

Mr. Drew: I have made no suggestion that the order in council was passed under the Emergency Powers Act. What I am pointing out is the way in which this government has exercised wide-open powers, and I will go further and say that at a subsequent time the government gave this strange authority without even an order in council. They gave it by an oral direction. That is one reason I feel that hon. members should be particularly careful in extending to this government any such special powers as are provided by an act of this kind.

Mr. Speaker: Order. On the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice, I agree with him that the orders in council which are passed under the provisions of the legislation are the ones, if any, that should be discussed. I do not think I can object to the Leader of the Opposition referring to other orders in council that have been passed, but they should not be referred to in great detail nor become subjects of discussion.

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to refer to them in detail. I was pointing out that in this case the government had acted in relation to this particular transaction, which results in a loss of $12·5 million to the taxpayers of Canada, without any attempt to place before parliament, which was sitting regularly from time to time, the subject matter of this extraordinary transaction. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) even reached the point of failing to comply with existing legislation with regard to the tabling of orders.

Mr. Speaker: Does not the hon. gentleman think he is perhaps getting away from a discussion of the orders which would be allowed under this legislation?

Mr. Drew: I do not say this in any way to dispose of what you have just said, Mr. Speaker, but I have made the point I wished to make. What I am pointing out here is an example where the government, by a contract of this kind, has lost $12·5 million of the taxpayers' money and has greatly assisted the communists in China by handing them these ships in this manner.

Mr. Garson: I am rising to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is no objection in the world to my friend referring to this subject at the proper time. If he raises it in this particular debate, we might desire to go at great length into a discussion of the Ming Sung affair—

Some hon. Members: No fear.

Mr. Garson: —but under those circumstances the debate in this house would get a long way from the point we are discussing. All the discussion would be entirely beside the point, and that is why I feel the hon. member should confine his remarks to the subject before the house.

Mr. Drew: I can assure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) through you, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing I would welcome, and I am inclined to think many hon. members would welcome, more than an extended discussion of this subject by the government. We have been waiting for a long time to find out what does lie behind this utterly tragic transaction.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Of course I could not allow such a discussion at the present time. I think I have made my ruling clear, which is that I cannot object to a reference being made to other orders in council but a discussion of them definitely would not be in order at this time.

Mr. Drew: I have pointed out why I think hon. members in this house should decide now that they are not going to take a single step delegating their responsibilities under our constitution to an executive which does not justify such a delegation of powers, even if under our principles of parliamentary procedure such a delegation could ever be justified, as I submit it could not at a time like this. Let us remember that in war, insurrection or events of that kind, real or apprehended, there is legislation now on the statute books which the government could invoke at any time if it found it necessary to deal with a situation which we cannot anticipate at this time. Anything short of that affords plenty of time for this parliament to be called together. Anything short of that demands that this parliament should be called together to determine what will be done about any matter of major importance before action is taken.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? The legislation to which he refers as being on the statute books at the present time; is that the War Measures Act?

Mr. Drew: Certainly. That is the legislation which the government pointed out could be used in the event of war or insurrection or apprehended disturbances of that kind calling for such action. Not one of us wants to see legislation of that kind invoked unless circumstances justify it. But the circumstances which would make it impossible for the members of this house to come together, circumstances relating to events of that kind which would deny the ordinary opportunity to consider legislation, are circumstances, as the government has pointed out, which would give the government power to act under legislation of that nature. I am not suggesting for one moment—and I do not want any distortion of my words to appear in the record subsequent to my remarks—that the War Measures Act should be invoked at this time or under circumstances similar to those which now exist. On the contrary, I am emphatic that it should not be invoked. I am emphatic that no emergency powers should be invoked or put on the statute books of this country which would delegate to the executive powers which at this time could be handled in the ordinary way by parliament.

This is not something that affects Canada alone. This is not something for our parliament alone. Most of us, I suppose, would have a fairly comfortable feeling of confidence that we had a deeper perception of the principles of parliamentary government than countries which only recently have acquired parliamentary government. I suppose, for example, that all of us in this house would confidently assert that we had a better appreciation of the principles of parliamentary government than members of parliament in Iran. Yet let me recall an incident that took place just a short time ago to point out that this is a subject that has to be dealt with in different countries from time to time. On January 18 of this year the speaker of the Iranian house resigned because he refused to put before the house an emergency measure which would delegate to the executive powers which he claimed had been conferred by the constitution upon members of parliament.

Doubtless there are refinements in the constitution which make a distinction between the position of the speaker in that house and the position of the Speaker in our own. Nevertheless, with those refinements and differences, it is worth while recalling what the speaker of the Iranian house said at the time he resigned because of the demand that he place before the house an emergency act that would delegate the powers of parliament to the executive. I refer to a report in the New York Times of January 19, with the dateline Teheran, January 18. The report reads as follows:

> The speaker said the constitution provided for a separation of powers—that is between executive and legislature—and a violation of that principle would mean submitting to autocracy and despotism and re-establishing dictatorship in Iran. As the plenary powers bill violated that principle (by putting legislative powers in the premier's hands) Mr. Kashani declared it could not be placed on the agenda. The fact that such a bill was approved five months ago, he said, was no excuse for repeating the mistake.

I am simply reading this to point out that in other jurisdictions, and even in a country where democracy is still comparatively new, the principle has been recognized that it is not proper in anything approaching ordinary times for the elected representatives of the people to delegate their responsibilities to the executive, and in that way to deny to the people who elected them the protection that is afforded by keeping the functions of the country under the control of the elected representatives.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, there are no invidious comparisons between this house and that house in respect of any aspect of its function. I am indicating that a very clear principle has been asserted there, as it has been asserted in the British House of Commons, as it has been asserted here on many occasions in the past and as I hope it will be asserted by members of this house at this time.

Without mentioning the debate and without mentioning the subject that was under discussion, may I say that I recall the extremely interesting comment that a certain member would like to oppose a measure but that, although he would like to do so, he could not vote against the government. I am not going to attempt any definition of the state of mind that statement indicates; apparently there has been some objection to that procedure. But I indicate that there has been on the part of some members a reluctance to assert their authority.

May I reassert the proposition that the genius of our parliamentary system lies in the recognition of the principles which guarantee to the people of Canada the truth of the general statement that democracy is government of the people and by the people through their elected representatives in parliament. Government by the executive is not democracy. By this bill we are asked to suspend democracy at a time when throughout the world democracy is challenged as it has seldom been challenged before. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we should not take one single step toward suspending democracy here in Canada, no matter what assurances we may have as to the good intentions of the government.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I believe we should clarify our standing order with regard to debates on resolutions of this kind so we would not have the situation which has developed here today and which has developed on other occasions; that is, a controversy as to whether a debate on the subject matter of the resolution is allowed on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house the fact that the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair is one that may have to be settled by a vote. Surely the members of the house, before having to vote on a matter of that kind, should know for what reason we want the Speaker to leave the chair. As the matter stands today, we want the Speaker to leave the chair in order to consider a motion for the continuation of emergency powers. It seems to me that when the members agree to that motion without a discussion, they are in fact agreeing that it is desirable to have a continuation of these emergency powers.

I see that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) shakes his head. When it comes to a matter of interpreting procedure in this house, may I say that while I have a great regard for his legal training I prefer my own point of view. I believe I can bring to the matter as much logic and experience as he can, if not as much legal training.

Mr. Knowles: Don't be so modest; you can bring a great deal more.

Mr. MacInnis: My wish would be that we clarify our position either by a new standing order or by some other procedure of that kind. Let me point out that when a similar resolution came up for discussion in 1951, without any debate or any hesitation whatsoever the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke for the resolution. He was followed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the C.C.F. group and later by the leader of the Social Credit group. Those proceedings took place on the motion with the Speaker in the chair. That measure was for one year. When the matter came up for consideration in 1952, at the last session, the same procedure was followed, namely discussion with the Speaker in the chair.

Why should there be such great hesitation about the making of a statement by the Prime Minister or, if he would rather have it that way, by the genial Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), in the same way that one was made in other years? We would then know the purpose of the resolution. The reason for continuing the legislation would be outlined. As a matter of fact, if that were done I doubt whether there would be any need for an extended debate after the Speaker had left the chair.

I am pointing these things out—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate what the hon. member has said.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not raising a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I value what the hon. member has said, especially in view of his long experience in the house. I believe there is considerable merit in his remarks. One objection, however, is that the minister who introduces the resolution has no right of reply. He makes his statement. Hon. members then speak and express their opposition to it and ask for further information; but the minister who introduces it can do nothing about it because he has no right of reply. If the procedure suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) were introduced, I would think it might also be advisable to allow the minister to reply. That is merely a thought that occurred to me and I thought I should bring it to the attention of the house.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not think that would be a difficult matter, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, in a debate of this kind, although the rules do not provide that the mover of the resolution should close the debate, I believe he could do so with the consent of the house. I do not believe the house would at any time refuse to give that consent to whichever minister was moving the motion. But then again, that is merely a matter of procedure; and surely we should deal with procedural matters in such a way as to facilitate the business of the house.

I would much prefer to have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) make a statement on this matter because it would help me to make up my mind whether there is reason for continuing this legislation at the present time. I cannot follow the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in his violent objection to continuing it now because that objection was not put forward at the time the emergency powers were adopted in 1951, nor at the time of their extension in 1952. The world situation has not greatly changed since that time. But there is a point on which I agree with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but at the same time I do not want the record to be incorrect. We objected strenuously to this measure both in 1951 and in 1952.

Mr. MacInnis: For the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition, may I say that I was basing my opinion on Hansard. I find that the resolution carried in both sessions without any formal vote, or without even any mention of "on division".

Mr. Drew: No; that is not correct.

Mr. MacInnis: The Leader of the Opposition says that is not the position. But in 1952, at the conclusion of the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who was the last speaker, the record shows that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1951 it was passed on division. The date is March 6, 1951.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not see it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It appears on page 981 as follows:

> Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?
> Some hon. Members: Agreed.
> Mr. Drew: On division.
> Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. MacInnis: We are talking about two different things. The hon. member for Lake Centre is talking about a bill that was based on the resolution; I am talking about the resolution itself. On page 533 of Hansard of 1951 I find the following:

> Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

I do not see that there has been any change in the international situation since that time. If the events of the last few days develop as some people are afraid they may, perhaps the situation is more grave now than it was even in 1951.

Emergency Powers Act

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke to the Emergency Powers Act resolution on February 20, 1951, he referred to a brief that had been presented that morning by the four central labour bodies, namely, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour and the dominion joint legislative committee of the railway transportation brotherhoods. He quoted a paragraph from their brief, which I should like to quote now, as reported at page 497 of Hansard:

> The free world now faces the most ruthless and powerful aggressor in history. The best it can hope for is long years of heavy defence expenditures, a large proportion of its manpower and resources diverted from productive work to a great effort for sheer survival. In this effort Canada must play a major part. We have no choice. The enemy is no longer at a safe distance. He is on our northern doorstep. Our share of the free world's industrial potential is large and important, far larger and more important than at the outbreak of war in 1939. If we fail or falter, our allies may be critically weakened, and disaster may overwhelm us all.

The Prime Minister put that forward as the view of organized labour in this country, and I agree that it was a very clear outline of the situation as it then existed. The Prime Minister said he felt that that was the view of the Canadian people, or a large portion of them. He then went on to say why the government was taking this action instead of invoking the War Measures Act. He said the government took that action because of the psychological effect that the invoking of the War Measures Act might have.

Because of the little use the government has made of this legislation in the last two years, and because of my understanding of how the War Measures Act could be invoked if an emergency arose, I believe the government could act just as quickly by invoking the War Measures Act as they could by exercising their powers under this legislation. Therefore for this reason there is really no necessity of having emergency legislation on the statute books while the War Measures Act regulations are in suspense, as it were. They may be invoked and used as quickly as these regulations.

In other years the members of this group supported the resolution. That was particularly true when it came up first in 1951, because we felt that the legislation could be used in a way in which it was not used. That is, it could have been used for controlling prices which at that time were climbing fairly rapidly and putting a heavy burden on a great many of our people. The government did not use it for that purpose. They let prices rise and permitted those people to suffer.

The point I wish to make now is that so far as we are concerned there is one factor that has been removed, because prices are becoming more stabilized and they are not likely to start rising in the near future the way they have done in the past. In any case, since the government did not use the powers they had to protect the interests of the small people, I do not think there is any reason so far as we are concerned to give them an extension of this legislation. Therefore I am in a quandary with respect to making a definite statement as to whether or not we need these emergency powers at the present time. If the Prime Minister had made a statement I am sure he would have helped me, and I think those behind me, to make up our minds.

Perhaps I can close these few words, that have not been very enlightening, by quoting a short paragraph from the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he concluded his remarks in the session of 1952, as reported at page 2576 of Hansard. I should like the government to know the underlying reason why we supported the emergency powers legislation at that time. The hon. member said:

> It is our contention that in giving these powers to the government parliament is not simply giving the government a convenient way of dealing with ordinary matters; parliament is giving the government power to deal with extraordinary matters. The extraordinary situation, both on the defence front and in terms of economic matters here at home, is the reason for legislation of this kind. We support the legislation, but we call upon the government to make use of it in the interests of the Canadian people.

I said before that the government has demonstrated in the past few years that it is not going to make use of it for the benefit of the Canadian people, and we would hope that they might find some way of dealing with whatever emergency situation exists at the moment other than through an extension of the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced by anything I have heard thus far that the government needs an extension of this act. That does not mean to say that I may not be convinced before the debate is over. However, I would have been in a much better position to judge of the government's need had I been able to hear a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) before I rose to say anything about it. I did listen very attentively to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), and I must say that he impressed me with his reasoning. I will have to hear a pretty good speech from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) before I shall be able to lean his way.

Let me make clear in just a few sentences, if I can, how I feel about this whole situation. The reason a government asks emergency powers at any time is to have stand-by authority to take immediate action to meet an emergency. That is particularly true while parliament is not in session. I am ready to grant those powers to the government at any time, and I think in the past I have taken that position with respect to the government's requests.

On the other hand, when it is possible for the government to call parliament into session to deal with a situation concerning which there is no particular emergency, I am opposed to delegating to the executive powers that members of parliament should exercise, so that the executive can exercise those powers as a convenience.

I think the situation was summed up very well last year by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in the quotation the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) just read. He expressed what I have in mind, and in much better terms than I could express it at this time.

I am opposed to having the executive of this parliament exercise emergency powers as a convenience to do things that are just ordinary, and that do not need to be done in order to meet an emergency. I do not think that is good government; it is a denial of democratic principles. And on our part as representatives of the people, and as legislators, it is a shirking of our responsibility. The people expect us not to do that sort of thing.

In his contribution to the debate the Leader of the Opposition outlined what was done last year under the act. If I am to judge from that, then I would say the government did not have very much use, if any, for the Emergency Powers Act last year. It looks to me as though they used it as a convenience to do ordinary things, and not by any means as a necessity.

If this is so I am tempted to ask this question. Why in the world should we grant the government an extension of a measure to do the same thing next year? On the other hand, in honesty one is bound to say that if the situation last year were such as to make it essential that we grant these emergency powers to the government, then in logic we would have to say that the international situation has not changed sufficiently to warrant our withholding those powers this year. That, of course, is an argument on the other side.

Under the circumstances I think I shall withhold my judgment until I hear what the Minister of Justice has to say. I warn him again that he will have to make a pretty good speech if he wishes to convince me that we should grant the government these powers again this year, particularly in view of the fact that there is now on the statute books the War Measures Act which the government can invoke to meet any emergency which may arise. Therefore I shall withhold my decision until I have heard the minister.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this resolution is of great importance to the parliament of Canada and, more particularly, to the Canadian people. The issue raised by it is perhaps one of the most vital to be faced at this time.

I regret that although the resolution stands in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) he has not seen fit to make any explanation in opening the debate, and apparently is not greatly interested in the discussion. He may have appointments elsewhere, but I am sorry he is not in the house to hear the debate on this resolution which, I repeat, stands in his name.

I say the resolution is of great importance because it involves our whole structure of parliamentary government. As hon. members know, since 1914 we have had on the statute books of Canada a very unusual measure known as the War Measures Act. It became necessary to enact such legislation at that time, upon the outbreak of the first great war. It is not the kind of legislation liked in a country operating under a democratic system of government, because it gives far-reaching powers to the cabinet, as distinct from parliament.

In effect it takes away from parliament the right to consider a wide field of subjects. We all agree that it is the type of legislation which should not be used to any great extent. The act governs not only the eventuality of the actual outbreak of war, invasion or insurrection, but also covers apprehended war, invasion or insurrection. Action is taken under that legislation by the cabinet of the day sitting behind closed doors, with no opportunity for debate and very little opportunity for the public at large to keep in touch with what is enacted, which is one of the very serious objections to governing a country by order in council.

At the end of the war, in 1945, another measure was passed which was supposed to replace the War Measures Act which had been in effect by proclamation from early in September 1939 until this new legislation in the winter of 1945. The new act was known as the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, and came into force on January 1, 1946. It contained practically all the powers of the War Measures Act, and we understood at the time would be in effect for only a short time, until there had been an adjustment of the various problems brought about by the war. However it remained in effect until another act was passed, in 1947, known as the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act which was assented to on May 14 of that year and was to continue in effect until April 30, 1951.

That measure continued as law a group of orders in council which had been passed either under the War Measures Act or the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. When the bill was first introduced there were 57 orders in council listed in the schedule, and for that reason it became known as the Heinz bill. As it went through the house some of the orders in council were dropped but the bill still retained its name. As I said, it stood until 1951.

Then on March 21, 1951, another bill was assented to known as the Emergency Powers Act which has been in effect ever since. This resolution now before the house is asking for legislation which will continue the Emergency Powers Act in effect until May 31, 1954.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has pointed out already the powers given to the cabinet under the Emergency Powers Act, and I do not intend to repeat his statement in that regard. But I do point out that the powers contained in the Emergency Powers Act are nearly as far-reaching as those in the War Measures Act. When one examines carefully the terms one realizes that the Emergency Powers Act contains very far-reaching powers.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, to the house and to the Canadian people that the time has come to restore the supremacy of parliament. Let us put whatever powers are needed by the government on the statute books, rather than letting these powers be exercised by the cabinet sitting in secret behind closed doors and passing orders in council. Let measures be brought down in the ordinary way and be debated in this house. By the time a measure has been debated here most of the merits and failings will have been gone into pretty thoroughly, and each of us will be in position to know whether the legislation is good or bad.

This process of debate has another great value in that it is reported by the press gallery and distributed to all parts of the nation. The people out in the constituencies are able to keep accurate track of what is being said in the house and thereby to judge for themselves the merits or demerits of a measure. I suggest that that is one of the strongest points in a democratic system of government. But you lose all that when you allow legislation to be enacted by order in council.

How many times were Canadians brought up in court and fined or sent to prison for failure to comply with the terms of an order in council about which they knew nothing. Time after time a man would be charged for a breach of some order or some regulation passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act or one of the acts which superseded it after the war. That Canadian in many cases had no chance at all to know whether or not he was breaking the law.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member not agree that there has not been a single instance of that character under the Emergency Powers Act?

Mr. Green: If there has not been an instance of that character under the Emergency Powers Act it is because the government has not used the act. Therefore I cannot understand why we are asked to extend it for another year. I do not believe there was a lawyer in Canada who knew all the various orders in council or regulations which were in effect, and it was impossible to advise a client without a great deal of research. In many cases it was impossible to get the printed material in order to find out what the regulation was.

I believe these drastic powers should be taken out of the hands of the cabinet. This is a club—that is all it is—and it should be taken from the government. Ever since the War Measures Act was put into effect in 1939 we have had government by threat. There has been altogether too much government by threat. I have a very good example of this in a statement made by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). We are always grateful for the statements he makes from time to time, because they usually tell the real story. On September 8, 1950, the minister was being interrogated about some of these powers while the house was in committee, and he replied, as reported on page 460 of Hansard, as follows:

> I suggest to the committee that a word from the government is more effective if there is a law in the background that can be applied in case the response is not all that may be desired.

There you have in the words of the most powerful minister in the government one of the main reasons why we object to legislation of this kind. We have had enough government by threat in Canada.

I had thought that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might argue that it was necessary to extend the Emergency Powers Act for another year in order to further our preparations for defence. However, he did not see fit to argue that or any other point, so I shall have to deal with the subject as though he had made that argument.

I suggest it cannot be argued successfully at the present time. Preparations for defence primarily involve the Department of Defence Production and the Department of National Defence. Two years ago this same Minister of Defence Production was wise enough to have all the powers he required, even in the event of war, placed in a statute known as the Department of Defence Production Act which was passed in the spring of 1951. That act, which is now law and which was debated on the floor of the house, gives the minister in question all the powers he would require even if this country were at war. I questioned the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on that point on March 5, 1951, and the questions and answers will be found at pages 908 and 909 of Hansard for that date. The first one is as follows:

Mr. Green: Then may I ask the Prime Minister whether any further powers would be required to carry out defence production if we were actually in a third world war?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not anticipate there would be.

Then further on I asked another question, and the passage reads as follows:

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister has said that this bill as presented contains all the powers that would be required in the event of a third world war.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not want to promise the house that if we ran up against something where the courts said this was not good enough we would not come back to parliament; if we thought it should be done, we would ask parliament to authorize it; but I think the law officers have drawn this in language that should be sufficient to cover all the enabling powers apt to be required.

It so happened that I was trying to prove to the house that this was a war bill. The Prime Minister had not heard the early part of the discussion, and when I went on to point out that his very words proved that it was a war bill he became very indignant and there was quite a flurry. But there you have the Prime Minister's own admission that this legislation—

Mr. Garson: What is the date of that?

Mr. Green: March 5, 1951. You have the admission of the Prime Minister that the Defence Production Act of 1951 gives all the powers the department would require even in the event of war. The same Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) in his capacity as Minister of Trade and Commerce has also had an act placed on the statute books known as the Export and Import Permits Act. There is this much to be said for him. He has brought these measures to the floor of the house and had them debated, and these measures have given him the powers he required. He has not tried to get these powers by order in council.

Then we have another example in the National Defence Act. Under that legislation the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is given all the powers he could require. Therefore I repeat that there is no excuse on this ground for retaining the Emergency Powers Act for another year. Parliament sits far more frequently now than in earlier years. It is the practice to adjourn rather than prorogue so that members can be summoned here quickly. The requirements should be met by legislation passed in the ordinary way rather than by orders in council passed by the cabinet.

The fact is that this government have not the will to give up these wartime powers. They are addicted to arbitrary powers. Only two members of the present government have ever been in a cabinet at Ottawa which did not have these wartime powers of legislating by order in council. I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). They are the only two cabinet ministers in the present government who have had any responsibility for running the country at a time when these drastic wartime powers were not in effect. The rest, from the Prime Minister down, have only known order in council government.

Seventeen years ago today parliament met for the first time after the 1935 election as a result of which the Liberal party took office. For only three and a half years of the intervening period has parliament been supreme in Canada and free of dictatorial powers resting with the cabinet. Now we are asked to extend this servitude of parliament and of the Canadian people for a further year without a cabinet minister even getting up to explain the justification for any such step.

Mr. Tustin: Shameful.

Mr. Green: Each year they come here and say: Oh well, we need these powers for another year; we cannot get along without these order in council powers. Just trust us for another year. We have been good boys for the last year. Then of course the silent majority of supporters surrounding them in the house whoop and yell, the bill goes through and the cabinet get these powers for one more year. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is time the Canadian people asked when this sort of business is going to stop. I am afraid the answer is, only when the present government is thrown out of office.

Mr. Sinnott: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: Surely.

Mr. Sinnott: How many times were these emergency powers used in the last five years?

Mr. Green: I do not suppose the hon. member who has asked the question would have the faintest idea of what emergency powers are.

Mr. Sinnott: Would you mind answering the question?

Mr. Green: One of our greatest problems has been to find out how and when these emergency powers were being exercised. Quite often we have found many months afterward that a very important power has been exercised by order in council which has been kept secret. I doubt very much whether the government itself knows how many times these powers have been exercised in the last five years. But it is far too often. That is one sure thing.

Mr. Sinnott: It is quite obvious I have not an answer yet.

An hon. Member: Ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, if all those who wish to raise objections have done so, I believe it is my duty to answer the various objections, and I will be glad to endeavour to answer those that have already been made.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, the minister does not presume by what he is saying to close the debate?

Mr. Garson: No. That was the reason I was raising the point. I am really rising on a point of order because I do not wish to put myself in the position that I cannot answer any objection any member of the house may wish to make. If there are any others—

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are still waiting for an explanation.

Mr. Knowles: We have a right to hear from the government as to what they think about this legislation.

Mr. Low: It is not only a right; it is an obligation on their part.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: This is an insult.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a most interesting and revealing performance. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) introduces the resolution and, no doubt for good reason, is not now in the house. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) waits until arguments are advanced against the granting of powers before he will explain why the powers should be given. This is certainly an interesting innovation in this parliament. The government simply asks for blanket powers and gives no explanation as to why these powers are requested. One is in a position, therefore, of finding it most difficult to argue a case. One can only argue that the same reasons actuate the government today as were used by way of explanation in 1951. Certainly some of the conditions that prevailed in 1951 exist today.

At that time, as I read Hansard, the explanation of the Prime Minister as to the reason for these powers being requested was that the War Measures Act could not be used because the Canadian people might fear that was not justified by the facts. Another reason given was that it would be necessary to have these powers in order to fight inflation. No doubt the same arguments apply today, for the cost of living is much the same as it was in 1951, subject of course to the fact that in the last few months a face-lifting operation took place whereby the face of the cost-of-living index has been altered and instead of the cost of living being about 184 on the basis of 1939, the cost-of-living index today is some 115·7.

Mr. Knowles: One index goes down and the other goes up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, it is a most interesting performance. One of the reasons for asking for these extraordinary powers in 1951 was to meet this dread threat of the cost of living. It is merely a coincidence, Mr. Speaker, that this may be an election year, so the cost-of-living index was altered and does not look so bad. That was one of the reasons given, and I am going to deal with that.

Another reason was—I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) by his interruption of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) still has this in mind—that the government wanted the widest possible powers so that no matter what they would like to do, the law officers would have drawn a law sufficiently wide to cover the most extraordinary matters that might arise. The Minister of Justice laughs, but that was the explanation given by the Prime Minister in 1951, that the resolution was drawn in the widest possible terms so as to assure that if the powers ever have to be used the law officers want them wide enough so that they can be used effectively.

On the motion for third reading of a similar measure last May, the Progressive Conservative party stated that the measure passed on division. At that time few members of parliament, if any, had read the judgment of the privy council in the Manitoba barley case, Nolan, Hallet and Carey. That was a most interesting case, Mr. Speaker. Some years ago the Minister of Justice was loud in his praise of our courts in Canada. You will recall that he said we had just as fine judges as there were in Britain.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would be very much interested if my hon. friend could trace any connection between the Nolan case, under a totally different statute, with the single question of whether Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair to consider a resolution dealing with the Emergency Powers Act. I would suggest his remarks are entirely irrelevant and he should not be permitted to continue.

Mr. Ferguson: Talk about demanding power; you grab it on every occasion.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all hon. members want to discuss the reasons why the Speaker should or should not leave the chair, and their remarks must be directly relevant to the resolution. I do not know how the hon. member proposes to relate the Nolan case to this resolution. I would like him either to do so or to discuss some other feature of the resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the interruption from my hon. friend bears all the earmarks of a frivolous one, because the Nolan case deals exclusively with the question of what is an emergency. It dealt with an emergency under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, of which the present act is the direct descendant.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is not the topic now under discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have we arrived at a point where the only difference between the act under which the Nolan case was decided and the present one is a difference of name? It is the same old act with a new name. Surely, sir, we have not arrived at a point where the whole question of emergency cannot be discussed under this resolution, when emergency was defined by the privy council and the emergency is the same kind of emergency that is provided for in the present legislation. Indeed, the privy council referred in detail to the whole history of emergency legislation from the War Measures Act through the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, chapter 25, 1945, and thence into the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, of which the present legislation is heir-at-law with a different name.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, if I may rise to a point of order, I would point out to the hon. member, who does not seem to be aware of the fact, that the emergency which was invoked under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, and which was in question in the Nolan case, was the post-war emergency, and is clearly referred to in the judgment of the privy council as such; whereas it was made quite clear by the Prime Minister in introducing the legislation now under discussion in 1951 that the emergency which we are discussing is the post-Korean emergency.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Garson: That was agreed to by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) during the debate in 1951, and when I have the opportunity of taking part in this debate I shall quote his statement.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, may I ask Your Honour to consider this aspect of the matter? The Nolan case was dealt with under another act because that happened to be the act on the statute books at that time. But supposing—I am not saying whether the government was right or wrong in the Nolan case because I have different views on the substance of the matter—the government had had to deal with the Nolan case when the Emergency Powers Act was on the statute books; would it not have had power to deal with it under that legislation? If that is the case, is it not relevant to the discussion of a measure which proposes to continue the emergency powers under which that type of action might be taken?

Mr. Speaker: I do not happen to have the Nolan case before me. I would have to read it through to determine whether or not the emergency referred to can be discussed under this act. I think it might be simpler, and probably in the interests of the dispatch of business, if the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) were allowed to continue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am very happy to have had the explanation now from the minister that the emergency that we are meeting here is the post-Korean emergency. Well, that is not what the Emergency Powers Act of 1951 says. What it says is:

> Whereas an international emergency exists that threatens the security of Canada;

And whereas it is essential that emergency powers be conferred to enable measures to be taken as urgently required from time to time to carry out adequate defence preparations,—

Nothing to do with a post-Korean emergency.

—to regulate the economy of Canada to meet the needs of defence and to stabilize the economy—

Nothing about post-Korea. This is a new explanation.

—and to safeguard it from disruption that may result from defence preparations in Canada or from emergency measures taken in other countries, in order that defence preparations may not be impeded; . . .

I am glad to have that explanation from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), for it is the first time that we have ever heard that we are in a new kind of emergency. First we were in the post-war emergency of the transitional powers act. Then we were in an emergency that the Prime Minister described as one that needed action in reference to inflation and one or two other matters. Now we are in the post-Korean emergency.

Mr. Graydon: The pre-election emergency.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am now going to refer to the emergency doctrine at the time my hon. friend the Minister of Justice gave the house the benefit of that sage observation as to the nature of the emergency. I was dealing with the question of how this case found its way to the privy council. When the right of appeal to the privy council was abolished, my hon. friend said that our courts in Canada knew conditions in Canada; that these courts were composed of outstanding men—and there was no argument about that fact—and he pointed out that in Britain there was a court that did not understand our conditions.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that my hon. friend has attributed to me remarks which I have not made. If he would just kindly refer to exactly what I did say, I should greatly appreciate it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the moment I have not the reference before me, but I am saying that is what the Minister of Justice said; and I will produce the record.

Mr. Garson: Produce it now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to enter into any argument about the matter. He claimed that if you appealed cases to the privy council, you weakened the prestige of the Supreme Court of Canada. Then the first thing he did—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot see how that matter has any bearing on the resolution before the house at the present time.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, he got there. After creating this final court of appeal in Canada, he appealed the case that his department had lost before the—

Mr. Speaker: Has that matter any bearing on the resolution? I greatly doubt it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will put the matter in this way, Mr. Speaker, and then there can be no objection. The courts in Canada—the trial court in Manitoba, the appeal court of Manitoba, and the Supreme Court of Canada, with the exception of two dissenting judges, Mr. Justice Kerwin and Mr. Justice Estey—generally came to the conclusion that the cabinet was not supreme and that its declaration of an emergency was not of itself sufficient to permit the interference with property and civil rights in the provinces; whereas, as you know, Mr. Speaker, under the doctrine of emergency the dominion government may invade the jurisdiction of the provinces, may interfere with property and civil rights, may destroy the fine balance of the constitution. The courts in Canada held that the courts were still supreme and that if a government were to make a declaration, through the governor in council, that an emergency existed, the courts could still examine—some of the courts so held—the matter in order to ascertain whether there was such an emergency or whether or not the order in council fell within the ambit of the powers granted under the transitional powers act. But when the matter came to the privy council, the privy council—of course, being far removed from Canada—examined the situation, and its judgment is as follows, and it is most interesting. It is recorded in 1952, 6 Western Weekly Reports, new series, part I, at page 23 and following. I want to point out one or two things that the privy council held.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend at what page the report starts? I am following from another manuscript.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Page 31. I do not know how we are going to synchronize our reading, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Garson: Where does that report start?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am at page 31.

Mr. Garson: Where does the report start?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The report starts at page 24.

Mr. Knowles: That is seven pages along.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There may be different sizes of pages.

An hon. Member: This one is more accurate.

Mr. Knowles: One is the first copy and the other is the official copy.

An hon. Member: You have a government copy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we have reached the point where we not only cannot agree on the law but cannot even agree on the location in the law book.

To get back to the point I was making, the privy council, when it referred to the economic power granted under the regulation, held as follows:

> How, then, can a court of law decide that the vesting—

That is the vesting of property.

> —was for another and extraneous purpose or hold that what the governor in council has declared to be necessary is not in fact necessary for the purposes he has stated? There is no warrant at all for presenting this as a case in which powers entrusted for one purpose are deliberately used with the design of achieving another, itself unauthorized or actually forbidden.

Then after finding that the court must accept what the order in council says, namely that there is an emergency, it finally says this at page 36:

> For here the words that invest the governor with power are neither vague nor ambiguous; parliament has chosen to say explicitly that he shall do whatever things he may deem necessary or advisable. That does not allow him to do whatever he may feel inclined, for what he does must be capable of being related to one of the prescribed purposes, and the court is entitled to read the act in this way.

Then it goes on finally to say:

> If rights so historic as a man's right to sell his labour where and at what price he pleases or a man's right to use his own property in his own way are avowedly placed under the governor in council as subjects of control and regulation, what peculiar sanctity can the law give to the ownership of consumable goods, so that this particular form of private right is to be exempted from any action in pursuit of the authorized purposes?

What it says finally is this:

> Yet this is an enactment framed for the purpose of meeting an emergency that imperils the national life; it authorizes action over the whole economic field and extends to purposes outside the territory of Canada herself; it embraces purposes such as the maintenance, control and regulation of supplies, prices, transportation, the use and occupation of property, rentals, employment, salaries and wages, which have no meaning if they do not involve—

And I emphasize these words.

> —a deliberate and consistent interference with private rights, including private rights of property. And the power of the executive to pursue these purposes, while the national emergency continues, is conferred by parliament without express reservation and in the amplest terms that statutory language can employ.

That is exactly the situation in the present legislation. When the present legislation was passed in 1951 the decisions of the courts were against the executive having these powers. The Manitoba case had been decided. When, on May 26, 1952, these powers were renewed in this parliament, the wording of the decision of the privy council was not before parliament and no hon. member had any conception of an interpretation such as that being given to the powers of the government.

This is a serious situation. When a government, power hungry in the days of war, persists in that attitude in the days of peace, the situation becomes serious indeed. The minister says now that the justification is the post-Korean situation. Well, if the post-Korean situation has indeed created an emergency of a state of war, as the Prime Minister said the other day, then the legislation is not necessary. The Prime Minister said the other day that we are at war. If that is so, then the legislation is not necessary and certainly there can be no justification for the government asking for the abdication of parliamentary control and giving to the executive of this country the power to control every type of business in Canada, the power to deny an individual an appeal to the courts, the power to do absolutely that which parliament itself would permit only in the gravest situation and under the most serious conditions.

I am not going to read what the Leader of the Opposition read but I ask you, sir, where is there anything in the present situation that would justify a government interfering with provincial rights in this country to the degree to which the powers under this legislation will permit? What is there today that will countenance a government, by a majority of parliament supporting it, rewriting the constitution year by year and so continuing to invade the field of provincial legislation? That in effect is what is being done. Here are the powers. And before I read them again I point out that the Nolan case says that the courts can no longer look at the question as to whether there is justification for the preamble in which the emergency is declared. What the judgment means, in effect, is this: If we pass this power there is no control in Canada over any business that the government cannot and may not with the authority of parliament do, thereby varying the principles of our constitution.

We shall give them the powers they need. The answer of the Prime Minister last year was that we need the widest possible powers because our law officers want them so wide that they cannot be challenged. That is going a long way. In other words, it is in effect placing parliament in a position of conferring right that will not be challengeable and certainly today under the authority of this case are not challengeable.

Somebody may say that I overstate the case, Mr. Speaker. Let me quote from one who was qualified enough to speak before the Liberal federation. I refer to Professor Corry of Queen's university. This is what he said when he spoke to the Liberal federation last year as quoted at page 2566 of Hansard:

> The discretionary powers exercised by our government nowadays in time of peace are wide enough to cause concern.

These are the words of a friend of the Liberal party. These are the words of a speaker before the federation. He went on to say this:

> The practical certainty of cold war, if not actual shooting war, for an indefinite period means a still further substantial increase in the powers of the dominion government.

He is still using the expression "dominion" although it is ostracized in some circles. I continue:

> What is our answer to Abraham Lincoln's question: Is a government which is strong enough to deal with serious crises not also going to be too strong for the liberties of its citizens?
> If, as seems likely, we are to have a considerable measure of order-in-council government again, we should also be considering seriously the establishment of one or more committees of parliament to examine, not the substance and policy of the orders in council but the effect that the powers and procedures contained in them will have on individual rights and freedoms.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. gentleman spoiled his speech with that quotation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. I like to call as witnesses those who are regarded by my hon. friend as authorities.

Mr. Pouliot: Not at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder sometimes why this government pursues this course. Why does it ask for powers such as these?

> (a) control and suppression of maps, plans and photographs;
> (b) control of communications and means of communication;

Why ask for the power to control harbours, ports and territorial waters? We can understand one or two of these. If we were in a situation of grave danger we could understand these powers being asked for, but we now know that our situation is just post-Korea. Then they ask for the power to control transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things. What more absolute powers have ever been asked for in the days of war than these? Then they ask for the power to control trade, exportation, importation, production and manufacture.

Mr. Ferguson: Exploitation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are we to be placed in a position where parliament will abdicate those powers, where parliament will give away the rights of the provinces and hand to the government powers as though power were a bauble to be played with and the constitution an institution that can be changed by a simple declaration of government? Then they ask for power to control the imposition and recovery in connection with any scheme of control, of fees or charges. We are not going to object to that. These are the powers. They are even wider than that, as the Nolan case pointed out, because it says:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existing international emergency deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

Then finally, in order to widen it as far as possible, it says:

> —and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council shall extend—

And so on, to the matters to which I have made reference.

These are dangerous powers. The minister says: We have not used them. The answer of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was as effective as it was timely. Let me point out what another friend of the government, Mr. Gerald Godsoe, said. He was the co-ordinator of controls during the war. Speaking before the Toronto board of trade last year he said this:

> Probably the most dangerous development of all occurring today is the growth of the state control under our free enterprise governments, dominion, provincial and municipal. I refer to it as the most dangerous as we seem, at least in some measure, to be aware of the evils of communism and the fallacies of socialism, but I do not believe we have yet awakened to a realization of what actually is occurring and just how much it affects us, in the constant and continuous growth of our governments.

That, sir, tells its own story, when powers such as I have already pointed out are given to a government to control every business in this dominion. The minister says nothing in explanation of why such powers are asked for, but the quality of his interruption indicates that he has no realization of the immensity and the all-pervading influence of those powers.

Furthermore, unless we bring this trend to a stop there is going to be nothing in the years ahead to prevent any government, at any time, so long as it has a majority in parliament which will say that all is well, from invading and infringing upon the rights of the provinces. Surely such action, acceptable during days of war, should not be permitted to exist today, particularly as regards two or three of the subsections to which I have referred. I think the time has come to put a stop to this attitude.

May I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Pouliot: Go on; you are in good form.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, under normal circumstances the house should proceed to a consideration of public and private bills. My understanding is, however, that the bills are to stand. I need only say, therefore, that there being no business to be considered in the hour for private and public bills, the house will resume the business interrupted. The hon. member for Lake Centre may proceed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not contending that there is a deliberate intention on the part of the government to secure dictatorial powers. But certainly, in view of the interpretation given to this question by the privy council in the Nolan case, there is a demand on the part of parliament that we should consider the powers here asked for. If the government is not prepared to accept a diminution of those powers, then, so far as parliament can achieve it, a stop should indeed be called.

Let me add this, that the use of powers asked for under this legislation would obviate the necessity of parliament's ever being convened during the period. We do not believe in a dictatorship. A book has just been published by a great British economist and political scientist, Professor Keeton, in which he points out that the elements of dictatorships are as follows:

1. A one-party organization in which, although there is a wide power of criticism within the party, no external opposition is tolerated;

2. An all-powerful executive, which can put into effect the program decided upon by the party, without substantial impediment or modification, especially that which might emanate from an independent parliament, and

3. An economy which is moulded within the framework of a comprehensive plan, and in which all the more significant activities are government monopolies, subservient only to executive control.

All those things, with the exception of the first, are possible under this legislation. The minister says that powers have not been used during the last year. If they have not, and during the last year we have been in the post-Korean emergency to which he referred, what is the justification for their being asked for again, particularly in view of the judgment of the privy council?

These powers permit of rigid dictatorship within the periods between sessions of parliament. These powers constitute a denial of the rights of the individual under the powers of the constitution. These powers invade the rights of the provinces. These powers make the government—and by the government I mean the executive, the cabinet—all-powerful in the country. I feel that we in parliament have a responsibility to end this trend.

Two years ago the Prime Minister said that one of the reasons this legislation was to be introduced was to afford an opportunity to control inflation. There has not been any use of the powers for that purpose of which I am aware. The government has had within its own power the opportunity to do something. It could do it through a reduction of taxation. It could assure, in part, the defeat of inflation by encouraging production.

These are alternatives to the powers the government is asking under this legislation, powers that are available to a government that is prepared to act. I ask the minister to explain in detail why the government today finds it necessary to continue to disregard the constitution, and to destroy the rights of the provinces as effectively during the period this legislation is in effect as though section 92, which grants powers to the provincial legislatures, had no effect whatsoever.

Why these powers? How are they to be used? When are they going to be used? I would ask the minister once again to give consideration to what Professor Corry referred to in the reference I made a while ago in which he dealt with the setting up in parliament of a committee similar to that in the British parliament, whereby members of all political parties have placed before them in that permanent committee all regulations and orders passed that in any way derogate from the rights of the individual.

Surely that is not asking too much. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra pointed out that no lawyer in this country has any idea of the orders in council that have been passed, and that because of this he finds it difficult to advise a client. As a member of the House of Commons endeavouring to follow these orders in council, I can say that I have no conception whatsoever of many of these orders in council, and what they stand for. Those are the orders in council that we know of.

There are also orders in council that can be passed on the instruction or upon the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or the Minister of Defence Production or whatever portfolio he may be described by at the moment. He can have orders in council passed that are secret. Surely there is no justification today for that. He can pass orders in council that place, above the courts of law, those who are favoured under the order in council. He can pass orders in council to preserve, from any liability before the courts, any company or person in Canada who is liable in damages for failure to carry out a contract in connection with defence production, and that covers almost everything.

I sum up. First, let us put an end to this trend. We know now where it leads. We know now that it places the government above the courts because the law officers word the orders in council wide enough to cover any eventuality. We know now that only the government through the governor in council can determine whether there is an emergency, and whether there is or not may not be examined by the courts. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has stated, by that fact parliament abdicates its responsibilities and the courts have become in effect, under orders in council passed under this legislation, merely instruments to determine rights, but are denied the opportunity to investigate whether or not property and civil rights may be invaded or the liberties of the subject interfered with. Keeton has summed up the situation in these words:

> Behind the high sounding generalities of present-day politics, the issue is really a very simple one. It is whether we should accustom ourselves to the ant-like existence of the fully-integrated and planned state, or whether we believe that individual initiative and increased opportunity are more likely to produce more tolerable conditions of life for the bulk of our citizens. In the long run, it is impossible to preserve freedom of the mind when the power to choose has been removed from the citizen in more and more areas of his daily life. In the end, there will have been produced something approximating to the planned stagnation of the Chinese empire. That would be an odd fate for the people who built the common law and who were responsible for the Magna Carta, habeas corpus, and dominion status. Yet the threat is real, and the hour late. Our present predicament presents a challenge which it is impossible to ignore.

Surely parliament will not again in 1953 renew the grant of absolute power to a government now that the courts have determined that that government in the exercise of that power is above examination in so far as the determination of an emergency is concerned. If we adopt that attitude we in fact place the cabinet in the position of being restored to the same powers that cabinets had in the days of Sir Robert Walpole.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister not going to speak?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think possibly I should speak shortly to indicate the reason why in my opinion I should not speak on a motion of this sort. The question as to the method by which a resolution of this sort is introduced into this house was referred to His Honour the Speaker in 1952. After reserving it for consideration for some time he delivered his view concerning it, as reported in Hansard of June 18, 1952, at page 3374, in these terms:

> On May 20 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) requested me to consider standing order No. 60 and to give my opinion as to its proper construction. On June 4 and 16 there were further discussions on this standing order, which reads as follows:

Then Mr. Speaker goes on to quote the standing order which it is not necessary for me to quote at this time. Then Mr. Speaker continued:

> All hon. members who have taken part in the discussions agree that the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider a resolution preceding a money bill is debatable. In my opinion that is the correct view so long as subclause (a) of standing order No. 38 remains in its present form.
> The question on which there is some difference of opinion is the extent to which debate is to be allowed. This question was considered by Mr. Speaker Glen on the 23rd of February, 1942. At that time he ruled that the debate should be directed to the negative of the motion and should be general with no reference to details.
> I should point out that the motion is for the Speaker to leave the chair, etc. It is not a motion to adopt the resolution.

That is what my answer would be to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The adoption of a resolution takes place in the committee after the Speaker has left the chair and the house is in committee. I continue the quotation:

> However, under our present practice members have been debating it as if it were such a motion. The minister makes an affirmative statement, frequently going into details, with the Speaker in the chair, and other members follow. The result is that a full discussion of the resolution takes place at this stage. I am sure that is not the procedure contemplated by standing order No. 60, nor is it in accordance with Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling, in which I concur.
> After giving this matter my careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that if there is no objection to the consideration of the resolution in committee of the whole, the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair should be put without debate. If any members are opposed to the resolution, and do not think that it should even be considered in the committee of the whole, or if they require additional information before agreeing to the motion, they should be given an opportunity to speak on the motion.

As they have done today.

The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

Mr. Green: Why did you not do that?

Mr. Garson: Let me finish the quotation.

Accordingly in my opinion the practice of the minister opening the debate on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to consider in committee of the whole a resolution preceding a money bill should be discontinued.

When the discussion on this subject was before the house the other night a number of members expressed concern over the difficulty which the Speaker would have in keeping the debate within the limits of the above interpretation. I realize the difficulty but all I can do is to ask for the usual co-operation of all hon. members.

That is the rule of the house as it stands and as it has been interpreted at the present time by Mr. Speaker. Still dealing with the point of order, I would point out that the matter which was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East, to the effect that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had followed a different practice when this act which we are considering renewing was introduced as a bill in 1951, would hardly apply because at that time this ruling by Your Honour had not been given. The Prime Minister was following the practice which prevailed at that time.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver East referred to the fact that when this bill was renewed a year ago the Prime Minister, in leading off for the government, got up to speak at once. But I would point out to my hon. friend that on that occasion, as I think all members will recall, the renewal of the legislation which was taking place was under section 4 which authorized its renewal by an address of the House of Commons and the Senate. So that obviously it was not in the nature of the resolution we have before us at the present time.

I want to make these points clear because I think that I can claim to have been one member of the house who has tried at all times to show to my fellow members the proper courtesy that is their due under the rules, and in taking the position that I have I am merely trying to follow the proper rules. It may be said, as I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) interjected a moment ago, why not explain the reasons for this action? May I suggest that we are dealing with a piece of legislation which is already upon the statute books after having been debated at very great length indeed in 1951 and after several suggestions for its amendment had been introduced by members of the opposition, had been received in a most co-operative spirit by the government, and had been incorporated into the legislation in the very terms that they were suggested by members of the opposition.

I remember that on one particular occasion I conferred with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and a wording was adopted. I asked him on the floor of the house if he was satisfied with it and he expressed his complete satisfaction. The fact is that in the consideration of this measure the house was not divided on a single occasion except on the third reading, not on the principle of the bill on second reading but on the third reading, and at that time the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) interjected almost as an afterthought, as it appears in Hansard, the two words "on division". Surely in relation to legislation of that sort it is not asking too much of the members of the house that the rules of the house be followed, and hon. members could at least permit us to get into committee in order that there, in accordance with the rules, I might get up and try to give as full a set of reasons as I can for the extension for another period of one year of a bill in respect to which this house, when it was considered before, did not see fit to vote formally.

It is for that reason that I respectfully submit that I should continue to follow the rules of the house, and in a reasonable way I would ask members to let us have the vote upon this motion. When we get into committee I will give a full explanation of our reasons and submit myself to the answering of any questions which hon. members of the opposition may see fit to ask.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Garson: Surely.

Mr. Green: Does he not think that the question involved here is the wisdom or lack of wisdom in extending the measure for another year? He has completely overlooked that point in his remarks, and if such is the case then His Honour's ruling last year clearly applies when he used these words, as found at page 3375 of Hansard for June 18:

The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend's first question, this is a resolution seeking to introduce a money bill, and the reason we are considering the resolution and are asking the Speaker to leave the chair is that it is leading up to a money bill. Otherwise there would just be an amendment to an act, first reading of which would go through in a perfunctory manner, and we would be discussing it on second reading. We have nothing at all to hide. More than that, with great respect, having listened to many of the reasons that have been brought forward by members of the opposition which in my humble opinion proceed from a misconception of the bill and, in the case of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), of some of the legal principles involved, I think that we can resolve these matters much more readily by following the rules of the house and discussing them in committee. In the exchange that takes place there I think that perhaps I might be able to convince my hon. friend, more rapidly than I could in the house, that he was wrong on some of the points he raised.

Mr. Speaker: Order. So that there will be no misunderstanding, I think I must rule now that the minister has spoken to the resolution—or was he speaking to a point of order?

Mr. Garson: I was speaking to the resolution.

Mr. Speaker: I must declare that the minister has spoken to the resolution and he will not have the right to speak to the resolution again.

Mr. Knowles: I am amazed that the Minister of Justice does not recall that when he got up to speak just now he started out by saying that he wished to speak briefly to explain why in his view he should not speak. I certainly thought it was a question of privilege or a point of order to which he was speaking, and that any speech of substance he might make would be made later in the day.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order now, I bowed a moment ago to your ruling that I had spoken on the resolution. I was certainly of that view for this reason. I cited to the house Your Honour's interpretation of rule 60 and then went on to explain that in answering any objections I could very properly be quite brief because we were dealing here with a bill which had been considered and passed with some measure of approbation upon the part of members of the opposition. I pointed out that it was not at all unreasonable—and in these matters the purpose of the rules and the purpose of the attitudes we take should be reasonable in order to expedite the business of the house—to ask members to bear with the government in order to get the resolution into committee where we could discuss it to greater advantage and in accordance with the rules of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Is it now settled that the minister has spoken?

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules, on a resolution of this type the minister who introduces the resolution, or who speaks for the minister whose name appears on the order paper, has the right to speak once only. He has no right of reply, and I must declare that the Minister of Justice in this instance has already spoken and he will not have another opportunity to speak to the resolution on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention, if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had been speaking on a point of order, to deal with that point of order, but now that his remarks are regarded as a speech of substance or alleged substance I will deal with them on that basis.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, if this is a substantive motion I believe the minister would have the right to close the debate. If it is only one of those motions that are not debatable then I understand, as explained by the Minister of Justice, that he would speak only once. But if the hon. member says that it is a substantive motion—we say it is not, you know—then I think that according to the rules the minister would have the right of reply and of closing the debate. I should like to have a ruling on that point.

Mr. Speaker: I agree that if this were a substantive motion the minister would have the right of reply, but as the Minister of Public Works has said this is not a substantive motion.

Mr. Abbott: Wrong again, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I did not say the motion was a substantive motion. I said that the minister had made remarks which I referred to as alleged substance rather than a point of order. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) misunderstood the point I was trying to make.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that parliament is being insulted here. We have brought before us a very important piece of legislation, legislation which proposes to give to the government certain wide emergency powers. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) says that all that is being asked is an extension of powers that the government already enjoys. Even if that is all it is, an extension of what is now on the statute books, I suggest it is a very important piece of legislation. Yet, despite the importance of this piece of legislation, the government does not explain it nor tell us why it should be passed, but rather sits quiet and allows five members of the opposition to speak before the Minister of Justice goes even so far as to explain why he thinks he should not speak. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the greatest insults that I have seen handed to parliament in a long time.

The question before the house is one on which there is obviously a strong difference of opinion. I take it from the fact that the resolution is introduced—

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does my hon. friend not agree with the interpretation of rule 60 that I just put to the house?

Mr. Knowles: I take it we are back to the point of order now, rather than on substance. If I may get back to the point of order and the minister's frequent claim that he was keeping within the rules of the house, I will submit for his consideration that I think he was not following the decision that he quoted from Your Honour. In that judgment delivered in June, 1952, Your Honour suggested that if there was debate directed to the negative the minister should then reply. There has been debate directed to the negative. There have been several speeches taking strong objection to this measure, and yet the minister, who refused to defend it in the first place, now even refuses to answer the arguments that have been made against it. For him to claim that he is carrying out the rules is, I think, not at all consistent.

As for rule No. 60, and the interpretation thereof which Your Honour gave last June, I would remind the Minister of Justice that today, during the midst of the remarks of the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), Your Honour gave what I thought was an amendment of your own opinion. Your Honour suggested that maybe the difficulty was that this was not regarded as a substantive motion, and the difficulty lay in the fact that the minister moving it does not have the right of reply under the rules of the house. I think there was a general feeling around the house when that discussion took place between Your Honour and the member for Vancouver East, that the simplest solution to this impasse to which we have come would be either for the house to agree by unanimous consent or for the rule to be changed so the minister moving a motion of this kind could have the right of reply. Apparently the Minister of Justice does not want to speak to the motion in the first instance, and he does not want the right of reply.

I still feel that we should be told why the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is not here. The motion is in his name, and not in the name of the Minister of Justice. It is quite properly in the name of the Prime Minister, because the measure has far-reaching implications. It may well be that the Prime Minister has important business which keeps him away from the house this afternoon. If that is the case, I suggest that the leader of the house should have proposed to us that we go on with other business. After all, when this measure was introduced in 1951, it was in the name of the Prime Minister and was moved by him. He made the first speech, without quibbling over questions as to whether or not he should speak at that stage. Similarly in 1952 when the resolution was brought in to provide for the continuance of this measure, the Prime Minister moved it and stayed here throughout that debate. I suggest it is just as important a piece of legislation today as it was in 1951 or 1952. If it is not possible for the Prime Minister to be here and pilot this legislation through this afternoon, we could deal with some other piece of business.

I would point out also, since the Minister of Justice keeps rising on so many points of procedure, that the Prime Minister, in whose name this motion was moved, has not yet spoken. If the Prime Minister came back into the house and asked for the right to speak to this motion, since it is his motion and he has not yet spoken to it, I believe that Your Honour would give him the right to speak. If there were any procedural doubt about it, the house would give unanimous consent to him to speak, because of the obligation we feel the Prime Minister has to tell the house why we are being asked to support the measure. The Minister of Justice keeps making so much out of the desire to have Mr. Speaker leave the chair and for us to get into committee of the whole, as though there were some particular significance as to where Your Honour is at a particular moment. After all, it may be that lawyers like the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) can say that it is a vote on a motion for Your Honour to leave the chair, and nothing more. It is clear in Beauchesne, however, that it is a vote on a motion for Your Honour to leave the chair for the house to go into committee on a certain resolution.

The minister says the vote is not on the substance of the resolution. But supposing the vote taken at the end of this debate were in the negative, would the government say that that was not a defeat of the government, that was not a defeat of the emergency powers measure, but merely a defeat of a motion for Mr. Speaker to walk out of the chair? Oh, no, they would say that an important measure that was mentioned in the speech from the throne, and that the government thought parliament should have passed, had been defeated by parliament, so away we would go to the country on that issue. As a matter of fact, it might be a good issue upon which to go to the country, so as to get the views of the people on this very issue.

Mr. Argue: They would not dare.

Mr. Knowles: No, I do not think they would dare go to the country on the issue of the rights of parliament in relation to the executive branch of the government. So I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there has been from the ministerial benches a great deal of quibbling on a point of order, behind which they are hiding and refusing to deal with the merits of this measure before the first vote is taken. Whether or not it is a recorded vote, it is a decision of the house. When this debate ends and it is decided whether or not Your Honour leaves the chair, the decision then given is not just on the question of whether Your Honour should stay in the chair or get out of it. The decision is on the question as to whether or not we think there should be any further dealing with a resolution calling for the introduction of emergency powers legislation.

Before I go further, Mr. Speaker, may I make it clear, as the member for Vancouver East did, that we in this group supported this legislation in 1951. We supported it again in 1952 when the government asked the house to pass a resolution to the effect that the measure be continued until 1953. As a matter of fact, if I may say so, on looking over the debate of 1952 I think I made a better case for the continuance of the legislation than the government did.

Mr. Abbott: Do not be too modest.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That may not be high praise.

Mr. Garson: Why don't you keep up the good work?

Mr. Knowles: As the member for Vancouver East pointed out, and as I indicated last year, the support of this group for the continuance of this legislation was clearly based on certain conditions. It was on the condition that this legislation be used, not for ordinary matters but only for extraordinary matters that might have to be dealt with. I made it clear also that one of the reasons we were interested in this kind of legislation was because of the need, in the name of the people, for there to be some control over prices, over the economy of the country, so that we might not have runaway inflation, with all the dire consequences that flow from that phenomenon. We pointed out last year that the government had failed to use its powers during the twelve months it had legislation for this purpose, but that we were prepared to give them another twelve months in the hope they would use the powers for the good of the people. No such use has been made of those powers. As a matter of fact, the need for it in terms of materials control, priorities and so on would seem to have lessened, if one can judge from the estimates in the Department of Defence Production and so on. But at any rate the plain fact of the matter is that the powers were not used for the purposes that we had in mind when we agreed to their extension; and it seems to us now that a government which certainly does not enjoy the confidence of a great many of us in this house, nor the confidence of the country, should not be given a further extension of powers of this kind.

I felt particularly proud of my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis)—I am always proud of him but I was particularly so today—for the reasonable speech he made earlier in this debate. From the way he spoke I think it was fairly clear that we were dubious about agreeing to this legislation. But despite that doubt, he left the door open and gave the government a chance to make a case for it if it had one. But despite that reasonable appeal—that reasonable offer—to the government to state its case, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) not only refuses to rise and do so but he rises and makes a speech on a point of order, thereby ruling himself out of court so far as his right to make any further speech on this matter is concerned.

I can tell the government that the slight doubt about this whole matter that we over here in this group had earlier this afternoon is no longer slight. We now feel that the issue is clear. We feel that what we have here is a government that wants wide powers, that does not want to explain why it wants them, that does not want to make a speech about the matter but just wants parliament to agree to the extension of these powers. To say that they were passed last year or the year before is hardly an argument. It might have been a point for the minister to make if he had spoken first.

But after five or six members of the opposition have spoken and have indicated disagreement with this legislation, surely the time has come for the government to make a case for this legislation, if it has one; and I greatly doubt that it has.

As I have already said, even if it had a case, any confidence that any of us ever had in this government is completely gone, and we have no thought of giving them powers of this kind.

An hon. Member: We never had any confidence in the government.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends behind me are reminding me of the fact that we never did have confidence in this government; but even our non-confidence has grown because of some of the things that have been happening within this past year.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member is just carried away with himself.

Mr. Knowles: The members of the government still think they have the confidence of the people of this country. There is one way they can find out, and they will be very surprised when they make that test.

One of the reasons I was hoping we would have a speech from the government side before this—after all, I am the sixth speaker on this side and there has been no word from the government yet—was so that we might have a summary of what has been done, if anything, under the Emergency Powers Act during the last twelve months. A year ago—in May, 1952, it was—when the house was asked to extend this legislation, the Prime Minister gave us a report of the government's stewardship under this legislation. He told us how many orders in council had been passed under the Emergency Powers Act. He described each of them. At least, he described all but one of them, and I will come to that matter in a moment. But at any rate we were given an account of what had happened during those twelve months. I should like to know whether more or fewer orders in council were passed this year than were passed last year under the Emergency Powers Act. Some questioning took place a while ago. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) wanted to know whether the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) knew how many orders in council had been passed under this legislation during the past five years. That was an odd question because this legislation has not been in effect for the last five years; it has been in effect for only two years.

I may say that during the first year there were, in fact, only nineteen orders in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act. I am referring to the year from 1951 to 1952. The Prime Minister detailed those for us last year. As I say, he told us that there were nineteen. Of those nineteen, fourteen were still in effect when the Prime Minister spoke to us on May 26, 1952. Those fourteen were as I shall now indicate.

There were five dealing with great lakes seamen's regulations, three having to do with priorities control, two with respect to control of transport, one that had grown out of the foot-and-mouth disease, one that had to do with the operation by United States government agencies of radio stations within Canada, and one that had to do with the exempting from customs duty of gifts having a value of less than $25 if sent home by troops overseas. I think the figures I have given add up to thirteen. The other one of those fourteen which was still in existence a year ago was P.C. 3486 of July 4, 1951, which, by government decision, had been exempted from publication. In other words, that is a secret order in council, the terms of which parliament does not yet know.

In addition to those fourteen that were still in effect when the Prime Minister spoke on May 26, 1952, there were five others. Obviously some of those fourteen may since have been repealed or rescinded. Incidentally this is the kind of information that I think the house was entitled to have if the government had not followed the insulting course to which we have been subjected today.

With respect to the other five I may say that the Prime Minister a year ago, at the time he spoke, indicated that those five had been replaced by legislation, or by proper statutes. One of them had to do with the Defence Services Pension Act; another had to do with discipline in the armed forces. A third one had something to do with the agricultural products board. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is good at getting things done when he wants them done—except the South Saskatchewan dam. A fourth one had to do with the use of other metals than nickel in the Canadian five-cent piece. It is not worth much any more anyway. The last one had to do with the postponing of the weighing of grain under certain conditions.

I recite those nineteen orders in council, fourteen that were still in existence and five that had been replaced, not just to put a bit of history on the record but to indicate the kind of use that was made of this legislation, in the light of such information as we had been given up to that time. The last five orders in council that I referred to were certainly not emergency matters at all. As a matter of fact they were all just cases of the government's using the Emergency Powers Act as a convenience, as a means of getting something as law before parliament would pass the actual legislation. As to the other fourteen, with respect to some of them—for example, the one having to do with the foot-and-mouth disease—the Prime Minister admitted that there was probably other statutory authority, that they really did not need to use the Emergency Powers Act. So when you add it all up, it looks as though the use of the Emergency Powers Act during its first year was simply a use for convenience, and that there was little done that was in terms of security. One does not know, of course, what was in that secret order in council of July 4, 1951; but in the main it was simply a matter of convenience to the government during that first year to have this legislation on the statute book. I suggest that we should have been told before this what the story has been during the second year. How many orders in council have there been? Were there more than nineteen? Were there fewer than nineteen? Incidentally, hon. members must not get the impression that the government holds itself down to nineteen orders in council a year. Those are just the orders in council under the Emergency Powers Act. That does not include the orders in council that come under the legislation over which the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of Defence Production is in charge, and it does not include orders in council under all the other pieces of legislation, most of which make provision for some form of order in council or other.

As hon. members know, we get a book every once in a while containing orders in council that have been made and tabled in the house, and to keep up with them would require quite a secretariat indeed.

What has happened during the past year? Have there been any that could not have been effected under other legislation? Have there been any in connection with which the purpose could not have been served by legislation of this parliament? After all, we are here most of the year now. There is not ever a very long break between sittings of parliament, and if the government really believed in parliamentary democracy, in parliament being in charge rather than just the executive, I do not think they would have asked for this kind of legislation at all. As the hon. member for Kamloops reminds me, if they believed in responsible government, which is supposed to be the essence of our form of government, our form of democracy, I do not think they would be asking for any further extension of this legislation.

It may be argued that the world situation is still a precarious one, and no one would deny that. Some of us are quite concerned about some of the things that are happening, even happening in the country to the south of us, in terms of changes in foreign policy, and we do not know just what may be ahead; but in that connection may I remind the house that when the Prime Minister introduced this legislation on February 20, 1951—it was the occasion when we were at the same stage that we are at now, only on that occasion the Prime Minister chose to speak—he said, as reported at page 497 of Hansard:

> Moreover, the enactment of an emergency powers bill will not prevent the proclamation of the War Measures Act if the situation should become more critical than it is now.

He went on to say—and I read this because it has a bearing on the sentence I have just read:

> Of course it would not prevent the proclamation of the War Measures Act if we got into a state of actual conflict.

The Prime Minister was saying there what we all know that in a state of actual conflict there is nothing to prevent the government from proclaiming the War Measures Act. The Prime Minister went further than that on February 20, 1951. He said that if conditions became more critical than they were then, but even short of actual conflict, it would be possible for the government to proclaim the War Measures Act. Well, so long as the government has that residual power, that residual right to proclaim the War Measures Act, it could deal with anything that was a real emergency, and therefore I do not see why it should ask for the continuance of this legislation any longer. It is convenient for the government to have this legislation, I know, and they like to get things through in the easiest possible way. To pass an order in council in cabinet meeting over in the east block is much easier than getting a bill through this House of Commons, but surely that should not be the basis on which decisions of this kind are made.

We feel—I think it could be said even of this government—that they would be a bit reluctant to proclaim the War Measures Act in any situation that was short of actual conflict. With respect to the relationship between parliament and the executive I think it is good for that reluctance to be there and for the government to be held in check to that extent. So long as they have not got the War Measures Act they will be careful; they will come to parliament more often. But if they get this Emergency Powers Act before them it is obvious from their record that any time they get into a little jam, any time they want to put something else into the five-cent piece besides nickel, any time the Minister of Agriculture wants a change in one of his pieces of legislation, any time you need to amend legislation that you want changed when parliament is not here, well you just pass an order in council under the Emergency Powers Act and that will do the trick until parliament gets back to pass legislation. Well, that is playing fast and loose with the whole set-up of parliamentary and responsible government, and for my part, though we gave the government these powers two years ago and extended them last year, the plain fact of the matter is they have not used them for the purposes that some of us had in mind when we gave those powers. Rather, they have used them just as a convenience, and I do not think they should have them any more.

I do not know what the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) had in mind when he asked as to the number of orders in council that had been passed under this legislation. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice was prompting him or not, whether he was hoping to get out the information that there had not been very many. That may well be the case. I do not know. It may well be that there were fewer than nineteen in the past year, which was the number the year before. If that is so, if there were very few occasions on which it has been necessary to use this legislation, I would suggest that it should be abandoned because of disuse, because having it there as a convenient piece of machinery that the government can use is bad for democracy and bad for relationships between the executive and parliament. We have had those bad relationships not only in terms of the legislation itself, we have had a terrific example of it today in the way in which the government has dealt with this matter, and in my view parliament should not consent to the passing of the motion for Your Honour to leave that chair.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you would call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks at this stage of the debate I feel the house should be given a picture, in capsule form if possible, of what has happened to date.

There was moved this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a resolution that stands on the order paper in his name. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) asked if there was not going to be a statement from the government at this stage, whereupon the Prime Minister said that he believed the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had a statement to make. The Minister of Justice interjected to say he preferred to make his statement in committee of the whole.

The Leader of the Opposition pressed the point that this was a matter of some importance, and that he felt there should be a statement with Your Honour in the chair. Despite that urging on the part of the Leader of the Opposition the Minister of Justice chose not to speak at that stage, nor did anybody else from the government side of the house offer to speak.

There followed the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and then the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). That made four speeches from the opposition side of the house, all more or less opposing the motion that Your Honour leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole on this particular resolution.

At this point—and I am relying upon my memory, but I am prepared to subject what I am saying to the reading of Hansard when it comes out tomorrow—at that point the Minister of Justice rose and started to speak. He said something like this, "Mr. Speaker, if all those who have any objections to raise have stated them, I feel it is my duty to reply". I place emphasis upon the word "duty" which the Minister of Justice used at that time.

In other words he was at that point prepared to follow up the suggestion made by Your Honour in 1952 that, there having been speeches directed to the negative of the question on a motion of this kind, it was his duty and responsibility as a minister to reply. I rose on a point of order to make sure the Minister of Justice did not presume that he was closing the debate. He replied that he certainly was not closing the debate. He said that he was rising on what really was a point of order to make sure that there were not others who wished to speak in opposition to the motion because, as he said—and I remember this particularly well—"I do not want to be put in the position where I cannot answer objections that are raised against this legislation".

When from this side of the house we made it clear that there were others who did wish to speak, the Minister of Justice took his seat. For a moment it looked as though the question was going to be put. Some of us complained that it would be an insult to this House of Commons if the matter were concluded without a speech from the government side of the house. The Minister of Justice still sat in his seat.

There followed then the speech of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). When he finished, again there was silence from the government side, and Your Honour was about to put the question. At that time I asked if the Minister of Justice was not going to make a statement. He got up and said that he was rising just to speak briefly, to explain why it was his intention not to speak at that stage. Well, his brief remarks were not exactly brief; and at the end of his remarks Your Honour took the position that the length at which he had spoken, and the extent to which he had dealt with the substance of the matter, made his remarks a speech, and that therefore he would not be able to speak again in this debate.

In other words at that point the Minister of Justice did the very thing that earlier he said he did not wish to happen. Earlier he had said, "I do not want to be put in a position where I cannot reply to objections to this measure", and then a little later on he put himself in the very position that he said he did not want to be put into.

So the result is that, not counting the speech made by the Minister of Justice—because he did not deal with the merits or demerits of the proposal before us and therefore it should not be counted—there have been six of us, including myself, who have taken part in the debate, and all of us on the opposition side of the house. All of us have expressed either misgivings or outright opposition to the measure.

I suggest that this is a very strange situation indeed. This afternoon I used words which I thought at the time maybe were strong; but, on thinking it over, I am satisfied those words were quite proper, and suited the situation. It seems to me that the government is insulting parliament by asking us to agree to legislation of this kind without even making any statement as to why parliament should be asked to vote for this measure.

I indicated this afternoon that a year ago the Prime Minister did not hesitate to tell us why he thought parliament should agree to the extension of the Emergency Powers Act for another year. I even gave some of the details that were in that speech—details of a kind to which I think we are entitled on this occasion. So far today we have had no explanation at all, and it simply leaves us on this side of the house with the feeling that we have here a government which is not only seeking wide powers and seeking to have parliament delegate parliamentary authority to the executive, but wants that to be done without even telling parliament why, in the government's opinion, it should be done.

I suggest as strongly as I can that the reference to rules and to points of order is irrelevant. If this debate were out of order Your Honour would not let it carry on. There is no question as to our right to speak, and there is no question as to the right of members on the government side of the house to speak as well. As a matter of fact, since so much has been said about the rules in the book, may I remind hon. members of citation 214 in Beauchesne's third edition which suggests that His Honour the Speaker is supposed to alternate speakers between the two sides of the house. Well, we cannot but sympathize with Your Honour today owing to the fact that nobody on the other side has tried to speak. And so Your Honour has had to see a succession of speakers on the opposition side.

The suggestion has also been made that members on the other side of the house are just following the rules. Well, standing order 38 makes it clear that this is a debatable motion. Standing order No 60, to which reference has been made so often, does not preclude debate at this stage. It says that before a motion of this kind can be dealt with it must be referred by the house to a committee of the whole house, and it is clear from standing order 38 that a motion to refer this matter to a committee of the whole house is a debatable motion. It is that right that we are exercising at this time. As I said this afternoon, the government may argue all it wants that what we have before us now is simply a motion that Your Honour get out of the chair, but everyone knows that if this motion were defeated the government would not treat it as a defeat of a procedural motion; the government would say that what the house had done was to deny any further consideration of a major government proposal.

This is a major proposal; it was included in the speech from the throne. It is before us as a substantial proposal in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and I am satisfied that if the house were to stand on its rights as a free parliament in a democracy that believes in the parliament of Canada being superior to the executive branch, if taking that position this house were to defeat the motion that Your Honour leave the chair, that would be correctly and properly interpreted as a defeat of the proposition that is before us, namely, that the Emergency Powers Act be extended for another year.

Mr. Low: Let us do it.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) says, "Let us do it." I am advising that the house should do it. I realize that the government would not like to face the country on this issue of the relations between the executive and parliament, but I think the people of this country, after some of the things that have been happening during the last few years, would be glad to have a chance to express their opinion on that very issue.

I was saying that if this vote were resolved in the negative it would be treated as a defeat of the proposal for the extension of the Emergency Powers Act. Similarly, I suggest that if this vote is resolved in the affirmative that is not just a motion that Your Honour get out of the chair and sit somewhere else; that would be a vote in support of the proposition that the Emergency Powers Act be extended another year.

I gather that my time is about up, or maybe it has more than gone, so I shall just conclude by saying that in addition to the demerits of the legislation itself, which I emphasized in my remarks before six o'clock, it seems to me that the performance we have had in this debate leaves us no alternative but to express in the strongest terms we can our non-confidence in the government and what we believe to be the non-confidence of the people of this country in this government.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, if I believed that this question was simply one of procedure I would hardly have the heart to stand up and talk on the subject because I believe there are those who are much more familiar with constitutional and procedural matters than I am. But it does not seem to me to be that at all. As I understand it, it is really a question of the cutting down of the rights of the minority in this house. I am not able to see it in any other way.

I understand that we have heard questionings of the practice which has prevailed during the few years I have sat in this house. It has been questioned once or twice. As I see it now, we are having the matter pressed. The minister is refusing to take part except in the procedural sense in this resolution stage. To me this is a shrinking of the rights of the minority and it is because of that that I am on my feet.

I have always been most interested in the ample rights of debate that are given to the minority under our system. It seems to me to be evidence of the great wisdom of our ancestors. I have not been able to find anyone who could enlighten me in detail as to the way it arose. There is one interesting suggestion which was made to me once and which I have always carried in my mind, that perhaps it went back to the time when members of parliament had retainers at home, not in the legal sense, but men-at-arms, and it was considered better to give them ample rights of speech rather than have them go back home and perhaps put the matter to a very different test.

Whatever the rights may be that we have had under our system, the rights of the minority are certainly very amply protected. My own feeling is that that is of vast importance. I have often asked myself why it is that only the countries that share our form of government, and perhaps not all of them, are prepared every few years to have the citizens of the country put pieces of paper in boxes all across the country and at the end of that time obey, because that is what we do, the people who have the largest number of votes.

The results are often very unsatisfactory to us. They have been most unsatisfactory to me for a long time. Nevertheless one obeys the results, and I suggest we do that for two reasons. First, I think we like to think that we are sporting people and when we are defeated we like to take it in good part. But far more important than that, I believe, is the fact that we feel that the rights of the minority will be protected, that there will be ample opportunity for them to be voiced. Therefore I feel that any attempt of any kind to cut them down should be resisted, and that is the reason why I am on my feet.

I have found something that I have looked for for a long time, a short description of minority rights, rationalizing them better than I have ever seen them rationalized, showing why the rights of the minority are as amply protected under our system as they are. Before I read this may I say that although they are amply protected I cannot from my short experience feel that there has been very great trespassing. I cannot feel that time has been lost.

There have been very few cases when we have had what we might call a textbook illustration of the success of the opposition pressed to the point where it actually brought about a change of government policy on the spot, but the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will recall that a year ago last December we did have introduced into this house a measure connected with the Public Works Act. He will remember that we on this side protested against it, perhaps with even more indignation than we usually do.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Do you think that this is relevant to the discussion on this matter?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am hoping that Mr. Speaker will think it is relevant to what I am trying to point out, namely, the rights, the privileges and the effectiveness of the opposition. When I have read the short passage which I propose to read I believe the Minister of Public Works will think it is relevant. At any rate I shall be very brief.

What happened then was that we in the opposition exercised our duty of protesting. We were fortunate in that case in that we attracted the attention of the press and the matter became of public interest. We are not always so fortunate in that way. The minister will remember that within two weeks the government for once saw the light. They saw that we were right and the measure was halted. I mention that because it is the clearest illustration I can think of of one of the reasons for the existence of the opposition.

I propose to read shortly from "The Procedure of the House of Commons" by Redlich, volume I, page 131. It seems to me that this sets out extremely well what an opposition is for. I quote:

> As already pointed out, the distinctive characteristic of the procedure finally developed in the 18th century was the protection of the minority. This principle also can only be understood as one of the consequences of the cohesion which has marked the House of Commons since the revolution.

Note this carefully, Mr. Speaker.

> The opponents who face each other are equally able and willing to undertake and become responsible for the government of the kingdom;—

Of course that is not something which we all agree with, but that is what the text writer says.

> —more than this, they are ready to recognize each other's capacity.

He may be going a little far there.

> The prospect of loss of power awakens in the hearts of the ruling party no fear of destruction for themselves and no fear of an attack upon the constitution for state and country. The battle is one upon an enclosed field. It is, therefore, quite in place that there should be rules of battle to assure fair play to each party. For both are members of a nation, one in fact and feeling. The majority holds the great advantage of being able to realize its wishes in the institutions of government; but, on the other hand, for this very reason the minority ought to have all conceivable rights of expressing its views and aims, and ought to be allowed free use of all permissible weapons of speech and political tactics in its fight against the expression of the wish of parliament which is a consequence of possessing a majority. For it is just as much the interest of the nation to ascertain whether the majority can maintain itself as such against an able and powerful attack and make proper use of the great privilege of conducting the government, as it is to take care that the will of the ultimate majority shall be treated as the will of the nation.

Then there is this final sentence, Mr. Speaker, which reads as follows:

> Protection of the minority is, therefore, in the British parliament no mere privilege of the minority for the time being; it is a vitally important institution developed in the highest interests of a nation ruled by parliament.

I have no doubt that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will say that he endorses all that and that nothing he is doing today contravenes that in any way. All I can say is that there we differ entirely. I feel that this is one of the instances we see so often where a little tenure of power makes power commonplace. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) smiles. He is not hearing this for the first time and its amuses him greatly, but nevertheless I do not hesitate to reiterate it because signs are never wanting that that is what happens, that when people have it for a long time they come to have complete confidence in themselves and they come to be completely convinced that more and more power for them is better and better for the nation. I do not like to say that in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He of course is an authoritarian.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I rather think the hon. member is getting away from the resolution before the house. May I ask him to discuss the resolution, or should I say the reasons why the Speaker should not leave the chair so that the house can consider the resolution in committee. There must be some relation between his remarks and the resolution.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I of course will bow to your ruling, but the relation is this. The point I am trying to make is that what we are now discussing is in fact an attempt to diminish the rights of the minority. It is with that in mind that I am pointing out the general danger that exists in this house to the rights of the minority. It is for that reason that I mentioned the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notwithstanding his undoubted gifts, because I feel that respect for the rights of the minority is not his outstanding characteristic. I do not want to quote that much-quoted and well-known phrase about "getting away with" things but I do feel that perhaps the minister has inoculated the rest of the cabinet and that even in his absence his spirit broods over it. Perhaps that is one of the reasons we have these emanations, shall I call them, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Fulminations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Fulminations, the hon. member says. Coming to the bill itself, I want to say a word or two about the powers set out therein. We of course are deprived of the advantage of knowing what the government is going to do about this measure, and that seems so silly to me. It seems to me that common sense would have suggested that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) should have stood up like a man and told us the arguments that we had to face. But here we are. It is rather like fighting blindly because we still have to hear the reasons why we are being asked to vote for this measure.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, I am as anxious as I can possibly be to stand up in the committee and explain the whole thing but my hon. friend will not give me a chance.

Mr. Green: Why did you not stand up when you had a chance?

Mr. Knowles: You put yourself out of court.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you not give us the reasons for voting for the motion?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have given the minister reasons which are perfectly satisfactory to us and which I think should be to all reasonable men, but I am not going to pursue that further. I merely want to point out the unfair disadvantage, inconvenience and absurdity really of the present position, which is that we on this side are doing all the talking, which we greatly dislike to do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We would have loved to hear people on the other side. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) delivered a most moving appeal to the Prime Minister to speak, and I hope he is going to do so. In the meantime, as you will agree, Mr. Speaker—and I hope I am not irrelevant here—it would be a much more common-sense procedure—perhaps common sense cannot always be followed in this house—if we did know the arguments we had to meet. But we at least do know—at least I think we know—that the measure which is eventually to find its way on the statute books if the government members run true to form is the same as the one that is on them now. It is a continuation. Therefore all that we need to be able to do is to read and we can find out what the provisions are. I shall not go through them. I merely want to refer again to the extraordinary breadth of the one about trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture. That seems to cover a terrific amount of territory.

One other thing which we may not know but which we can more or less infer from the bursts of publicity, the fountain which spouts constantly and which tells us of the great doings of the government, is that they are not going to give the same reason for continuing this measure as they did last year. But that remains to be seen. That is my inference. In any event, I think they will be deprived of that reason. There is no reason that I can see for continuing this measure except, as I say, the feeling that power is a nice thing to have—and when you have it, keep it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who calls a spade a spade, referred once to having power. He said it was useful to have a stick or a club behind your back when you were negotiating with anyone. The Prime Minister would not use such —what shall I say—a rough illustration as that. I think the Prime Minister used words somewhat similar, that it was useful to have it as a stand-by, if I remember correctly.

In any event, as I understand it there is a stand-by, the War Measures Act, which could be proclaimed and which could do the job if it were necessary. It seems to me we have about reached the situation where these emergency measures should only be used in case of a clear emergency and not in the somewhat nebulous condition in which we find ourselves now. If I remember right, the government hesitated to act on grounds of emergency the other day, saying that there was not one, and now we are asked to pass legislation on the ground that there is one.

I do not think I have anything more to add, Mr. Speaker. I am very sorry if I was out of order but you helped me as best you could to get back. I should like to repeat before I sit down that I do believe that this measure is a chiselling at the rights of the minority. If they are too big, if they are too extended, then let us have it out; but let us know what we are doing and not do it by indirection and by chipping a little bit here and a little bit there. It seems to me that we got along very well with the procedure that was used in my early years in this house, and then it suddenly seemed to become unpopular on the other side of the gangway. Today we are witnessing a definite attempt to adopt an attitude of insistence. I still hope that the Prime Minister will speak and that we may have a complete reversion to the system which seems to me to have served us so well.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad my hon. friends on the other side of the house are so pleased to hear me rise to make a few remarks.

An hon. Member: Hear you rise?

Mr. Fulton: It is always encouraging to find that one is so welcome in the house even when one criticizes the government and that no one welcomes criticism more than the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself, who appears to think so little of his own resolution that he is leaving the house at this moment.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Prime Minister has other things to do than to listen to the hon. gentleman, when he is using that tone.

Mr. Drew: Or to listen to parliament.

Mr. Fulton: The Prime Minister has left on a very good note, Mr. Speaker. I am quite sure that the Prime Minister has other things to do than to listen to any particular hon. member in this house, but I would have thought—

Mr. Drew: It is a perfect expression of their contempt of parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Of course it is, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, a perfect expression, a perfect indication, physically as well as verbally, of their contempt of parliament. Although there may be things—

Mr. Lapointe: Are you parliament?

Mr. Fulton: Although there may be things which, from time to time, take the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, too, from the house, I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that there was not such a pressure of business that the Prime Minister, who found it possible to stay in the house without saying a word since eight o'clock—

Mr. Studer: How could he?

Mr. Fulton: Now my hon. friends are asking a question, Mr. Speaker. You will have observed that it was necessary for Your Honour to get up and start to put the question before I rose to my feet. There was an interval of a few—

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Riley: He probably regrets it now.

Mr. Fulton: Who regrets it, my hon. friend? My hon. friend regrets it, I think. My hon. friend always regrets any opportunity being afforded anyone on this side to criticize the government.

I want to take up the suggestion that the poor Prime Minister, the leader of the government, has not had an opportunity to say a word on his own resolution, which is the suggestion being made by my hon. friend. This resolution has been under debate in this house since three o'clock this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and as I read the order paper I see it is a resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Ferrie: Read the resolution before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to read the resolution if the hon. member is unable to read it for himself.

Mr. Ferrie: It is that the Speaker leave the chair, that is the resolution.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has demonstrated his ability to read, and now if he will demonstrate his ability to reason to the same extent that he can read, perhaps he can reach his own conclusions. But in case he cannot, I shall assist him in the process.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have got a life job.

Mr. Riley: That was a sober second thought.

Mr. Lapointe: Even he could not stand that.

Mr. Fulton: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have only forty minutes—

Mr. Sinnott: Keep on going.

Mr. Lapointe: Why don't you attend the caucus?

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend's caucus? I am not invited to them. I attend our caucus, which is worth attending, and we read about my hon. friend's caucus in the newspaper. We understand that a decision was arrived at there not to have an election. I can well understand why they do not want to face the people at the present time.

As I was endeavouring to point out when I was interrupted, this resolution has been moved by the Prime Minister. My hon. friends are endeavouring to suggest that there is somehow or other an unwarranted exercise of power being indulged in by members of the opposition, who have taken advantage of their position to prevent the Prime Minister from speaking to his own resolution. The fact of the matter is, of course, as is obvious to this house and as is becoming increasingly obvious to the people of the country as a whole, that more and more the Prime Minister is becoming impatient with parliament, sharing the impatience of all his colleagues. This practice of putting on the order paper orders in his own name—

Some hon. Members: There he goes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not interrupted the hon. gentleman, but I think he should now discuss the motion that is before the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is about time.

Mr. Fulton: You will recall that the Prime Minister rose on a question of privilege as he left the chamber. He having stated his question of privilege, I rather felt that I should be given an opportunity of replying to it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You want to take the privilege away from him.

Mr. Speaker: I thought I had been rather generous to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: You have, but my hon. friends opposite have not.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he complete his reply as quickly as possible, and then discuss the resolution.

Mr. Fulton: I might just point out to my hon. friends on the other side of the house that they have not shared your generosity, Mr. Speaker, because although you have been prepared to accord me an opportunity of answering, they seem to have been somewhat indisposed to hear the reply. This resolution has been before the house since three o'clock this afternoon. From that time multitudinous opportunities have been afforded the Prime Minister or any other minister on the government side to explain why it is expedient that this resolution be passed, and why it is desirable that the Speaker leave the chair. He and they have all carefully refrained from exposing themselves to the obvious weakness of their own case by attempting to undertake an explanation of the desirability of that move.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when the Emergency Powers Act, which is the subject of the resolution before the house, was introduced in 1951 it was passed, with reservations, but generally speaking with the consent and approval of the house. February 1951, it is well to recall, was only eight months after Korea, and no one knew just what Korea would bring. No one knew whether it would extend to become a world-wide conflagration, whether in fact it would become that national and international emergency which at that time was the fear, whether expressed or not, which was in the minds of all members of this house and the people of all the peace-loving nations. We felt there was some justification for the introduction by the government of a bill, of which the title was the Emergency Powers Act, the act which it is now desired to extend for a further year by a bill to be based on this resolution if this resolution passes.

But I submit to you, sir, and to the whole house, that although there was justification for the qualified support of the resolution and the bill in 1951, there is no such justification for supporting the resolution before the house today. There are various reasons why that is so. The first reason is that the government has not, in any sense whatever, attempted to define either the emergency, by virtue of which it is seeking these powers, or the spheres within which these powers will be exercised. Not only that, but as was pointed out on several occasions this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), they have not used the powers in very many cases, although in many of the cases in which they were used they were used in respects of which it was entirely unnecessary to rely on emergency powers and what they did might far better have been done by ordinary legislative process. But now it is becoming increasingly obvious that the government, finding these emergency powers more and more of a convenience, are simply expecting the House of Commons to extend those powers without the slightest effort on their part to explain to the house why it should continue to surrender its control over legislation—which it is the task and part of parliament to exercise—into the hands of the executive. We are now being asked to pass this bill extending these emergency powers for a further year without one word of explanation.

Your Honour has indicated that it is perhaps not germane to the subject matter of the resolution before us to dwell at any greater length on the fact that the Prime Minister, who introduced it, does not even consider it appropriate to explain to the house why he thinks it is expedient that this legislation should be considered. I will not deal with that matter at any greater length; but I think it should be emphasized and should at all times be within the knowledge of every member of the house, and of every person throughout the length and breadth of this land, that the government which is asking this parliament to surrender for a further year its legislative responsibilities and control of the executive is asking that parliament do so without even the gesture of affording us one word of explanation as to why it is necessary to carry on that system.

Mr. Speaker, the situation which confronts this house and this country today is a vastly different one from that which confronted us when the Emergency Powers Act was first enacted by parliament two years ago. It is true that the situation in Korea is not settled by any means. There exists a state of war in Korea. Incidentally, it has taken considerable prodding and pressing on the part of members on this side of the house to persuade the government to admit that the situation amounts to a state of war. They used to call it "police action", as you will remember, until they found it rather inconvenient to explain it on that basis to the people of Canada whose families were disrupted and whose pockets were plundered by the taxes supposed to be made necessary for this thing. They found it rather hard to justify all those things by the term "police action".

It is true that we have a state of continuing war in Korea. But with regard to that situation the uncertainties which were present in February, 1951, only eight months after the war broke out there, are not now nearly as vague, indefinite or threatening as they were then. A method of dealing with that situation seems to have been contrived on the part of the peace-loving nations of the world. We must remember that not only is the situation far different in all respects from the uncertainties of the one which surrounded the outbreak of the Korean war, but that just recently in this house, in connection with another measure and in a discussion with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) as to the question whether or not an emergency existed, the Prime Minister said: After all, these matters are not so much matters of difference in definition as they are matters of difference in degree.

What, therefore, are we left with as a justification for the continuation of this measure? We are left with nothing more or less than the fact that the government is to say whether or not it thinks the emergency to be of a sufficient degree—not by definition but of a sufficient degree—to warrant parliament's continuing to abdicate all its legislative functions and all its legislative responsibilities. Yet although they say that the decision whether or not parliament should continue to be deprived of its legislative responsibilities and functions depends upon whether or not the emergency is of a sufficient degree to warrant it, they have the supreme effrontery this afternoon to introduce this resolution saying that we should continue to abdicate our responsibilities, without even the gesture of an attempt to explain to us what is the degree of the emergency upon which alone the Prime Minister said, some three days ago, justification for this or similar measures would depend.

First he tells us that the existence or otherwise of an emergency is a matter of degree and that it depends upon the determination of the government as to whether the necessary degree of emergency exists. Now he comes along and says "We are asking you to continue the emergency legislation", and he has the supreme effrontery to ask the Canadian people in their parliament to do that without getting up and saying what is the degree of emergency upon which he bases the request for a continuation of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, never could there have been clearer proof of the fact that this legislation should no longer be continued and that this government should be brought to a realization of its responsibilities not only to this house but to the people of Canada, and its responsibility to explain fully—if indeed it is possible to explain—why the parliament of Canada should continue to be deprived of its legislative authority, of the means by which —and by which alone—that parliament and thus the people whom the members of parliament represent can control the executive branch of the government, namely, the cabinet.

Until that explanation is given I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to every hon. member in this house, that we would be completely lacking in the discharge of our duties as individual members representing our constituents and the people of Canada as a whole if we were to abdicate, without a word of explanation or justification, the very duties which those people sent us down here to discharge, namely the duty of investigating, controlling, checking and, if necessary, denying the measures which the government submits to us. After all, that is the supreme function of parliament and it is the supreme task of every member of parliament to exercise his judgment on behalf of the people whom he was elected to represent. If we simply refuse to allow ourselves for a moment even to be in a position to exercise that judgment, then we betray the confidence which the people who elected us placed in us when they sent us down here.

Hence, not only do I say that this resolution should be defeated because of the complete lack of explanation and the complete lack of justification which has been afforded to us as to why the Emergency Powers Act should be continued; but indeed, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that the words of the Prime Minister himself, when he was speaking to the house in support of the bill in March, 1951, contained—if anything further were needed—an additional reason why the legislation should not be continued. The Prime Minister, when he spoke in support of the legislation in 1951, made it perfectly clear that it went far beyond what the government thought might be necessary. He came before parliament and he said: We are asking you to pass legislation which confers upon the government the power to enact, by order in council, all these things which normally would require the authority of parliament through a statute. Not only that, but also we are asking you to empower the governor in council to do things in fields which would normally be reserved exclusively to the provinces.

He said: We are asking you to give us these powers, but we are not asking you to confine these powers to fields and within limits within which we ourselves are prepared to say in detail that we need those powers; we are also asking you to entrust to us powers which might be far wider than anything which we ourselves can foresee that we shall need. That is what he said to us in March, 1951. I cite in support of that paraphrase of the Prime Minister's remarks this passage from page 807 of Hansard of March 1, 1951:

> These things mean restrictions on some individuals and they are subject to contestation before the courts. It is therefore important to have the language so broad that the courts will not say: "You have gone beyond what parliament authorized you to do." I am sure there is contained here a good deal that goes far beyond what will be done by order in council or by regulation. But the Department of Justice feared—at least, that was the advice we obtained from the permanent officials—that if it was not drawn in the broad language that already had had the scrutiny of the courts and had been upheld by the courts, they would not guarantee that it would stand contestation. We were convinced that we should stay on the safe side and be able to support the legislation.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was saying this: There might be some misguided individual—and I am paraphrasing his words—there might be some misguided individual in Canada who would have the effrontery to challenge in the courts of the land some of the edicts which are passed by this government. Now, this supreme, almighty, all-powerful government cannot run the risk that an equally misguided court might conceivably say that this misguided subject was right in his interpretation of the law and that in fact this all-powerful, this omnipotent and benevolent government had exceeded the authority conferred upon it; because of the revulsion it would create in the minds of the whole people of Canada to see this omnipotent and benevolent government challenged in the courts and turned down by the courts, why, we have to make assurance doubly sure that the courts can never find the government of Canada at fault. And therefore we will take not just the powers we need but we will take twice, nay thrice as many powers as we need and thus we will assure that no citizen who might ever be misguided enough, in his ignorance, to challenge the edict of the government need ever fear that in fact that misguided attempt would be upheld by the courts. And so he says: It is therefore important to have the language so broad that the courts will not say: You have gone beyond what parliament authorized you to do.

Mr. Speaker, what a principle! What a principle for a Prime Minister who says, and says with all the solemnity of his office: I uphold the principles of responsible government. There was never a more dangerous, more vicious principle enunciated, particularly, Mr. Speaker, when the government is asking parliament to hand over to the executive all its responsibilities, and with them all the safeguards which normally protect the citizen, which existed heretofore, and existed only as a result of the fact that parliament can call the executive to account.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: I would much rather the minister made a speech on the subject, but since he appears to have deliberately denied himself that opportunity I will welcome his question.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, so generous!

Mr. Garson: If the hon. gentleman regards this legislation as being as iniquitous as he has just described it, why did he not vote against it when it was before the house?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how the hon. gentleman and all his supporters, when we rise to speak, give every appearance of thinking we should not speak, and then they rise in their places later on and ask questions which show they obviously have not attempted to follow the arguments which are being made but to which they now appear to attach some importance; because when I rose this evening I dealt with that question, and I attempted to explain to the minister why it was in 1951, when the legislation was introduced, we said that although we had reservations, which were defined then and which I indicated again tonight, the situation at that time, namely February, 1951, was so uncertain that there might be some justification for taking emergency powers.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out this afternoon and reminds me again that the Nolan case, to which he referred, had not then been decided, and it is true that we gave approval in principle to the bill on second reading. But the Minister of Justice will remember that we made certain specific suggestions when the bill was in committee as to how some of the undesirable features might be eliminated, every one of which—no, not every one, I want to be fair—but most of which were rejected by my hon. friend and his colleagues; and therefore, having given approval in principle in the hope that we might be able to make some improvements in detail, then when the government's vast majority defeated the suggestions for improvement in detail it was impossible for us to improve the bill and to remove those objections, which I have been pointing out to my hon. friend tonight.

And indeed, I am not one of those who say that they are always right.

Mr. Argue: The government is getting worse every day.

Mr. Fulton: I am willing to admit that I make mistakes, and it may well be that in 1951 we made quite a mistake in entrusting these powers to the government. Indeed I think I am convinced of it, and nothing convinces me more than some of the actions of the government—not only their actions related to this bill, Mr. Speaker, but actions in connection with incidents which have recently been brought to our attention, revealing their shortcomings with respect to accounting in national defence, and with respect to their responsibility to administer carefully and with economy the money that they have screwed out of the people by the excessive rates of taxation which they impose on them.

Mr. Argue: They are going to loosen the screws pretty soon.

Mr. Fulton: All these things and others, as I say, are beginning to convince me that we did make a mistake in entrusting these powers to the government in 1951.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should confine his remarks to any mistakes he made with respect to this measure.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the thing in respect to this measure which above all others convinces me that we were mistaken is the supreme arrogance shown by the government in laying this measure before us this afternoon, and the way in which they have brought before us a measure which is perhaps one of the most important to come before this parliament at this session, asking for the continuation of these emergency powers; and yet they do not bother to give the Canadian people the courtesy of an explanation of why it is necessary that they should be continued.

As I was saying when the minister interrupted, in order to take the pressure off, the Prime Minister said—

An hon. Member: No pressure.

Mr. Fulton: The Prime Minister stated explicitly in 1951 that they were asking for powers far wider than any they might ever have to use. They did not justify them then. They have not justified them since; and they have not tried to justify them this afternoon or this evening.

And, Mr. Speaker, I say now that this parliament will be betraying a trust reposed in it by the people who elected it if they swallow that insult and continue these powers.

Then the Prime Minister in 1952 again favoured us with a speech—somewhat shorter than he made in 1951, but still a speech. There he took the opposite tack to the one he took in 1951. I imagine that the Prime Minister, finding that he said one thing in 1951 and another in 1952 which could not possibly be reconciled, used his discretion this afternoon to keep absolute silence.

Mr. Knowles: So he walks out.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, so he walks out. In 1951 he told us the government was taking powers greater than it would ever need. In 1952 it was quite different. In 1952 the poor government, he says, far from seeking to impose upon parliament and the people powers away beyond what is proper, does just the opposite, and saddles itself with responsibilities far greater than it had before. Here is what the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 2558 of Hansard for May 26, 1952:

> In reality the purpose—

That is, the purpose of the legislation.

> —was to increase the responsibility of the government, subject to the control of parliament, to meet such emergencies as it might suddenly become necessary to deal with in order to preserve the peace, order and good government of the country in the then threatening international situation. It was not that the government wanted greater powers. It was passed because it was deemed to be a wise precaution to make it the responsibility of the government to act quickly if and when prompt action might be necessary, and to be able to take such action without proclaiming the more sweeping War Measures Act unless it became absolutely necessary to put that act into operation.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Fulton: Now I am sure that you, sir, and my hon. friend opposite who interrupts, and all the rest of us, will have great sympathy with the government because, poor creatures that they are, they have saddled themselves with this responsibility far beyond anything that they might ever have believed it was necessary they should assume.

I would be interested, I would be pleased, and my constituents would be pleased, and the constituents of every hon. member in the house would be pleased, to relieve the government of those responsibilities.

Mr. Knowles: And the responsibilities of office, too.

Mr. Fulton: If the government feels that it has assumed these responsibilities far beyond what they should be called upon to assume, and if they are staggering under that burden, as the Prime Minister suggested in May of 1952, then why do they not come before us today and tell us why they must continue? Why do they not come before us now and say, "We do not want to have to continue this burden, and would gladly lay aside the burden which the responsibilities of our office forced us to shoulder in 1951. But for this reason, and that reason, and the other reason it is impossible, and it would be unwise for us to lay aside that burden".

But, no. Here they have parliament, a parliament not anxious to see the government saddled with this heavy burden, a parliament which would be glad to help the government share the burden and to relieve it of that burden. But, sir, we are denied an explanation. We are denied an opportunity. We are denied in the first place the right and opportunity to exercise our own functions and our own responsibilities. The government assumed them. And now we are denied the right to take those responsibilities back, although the government says that it is simply staggering under the load which it has thus reluctantly and unwillingly assumed.

This whole procedure is a farce.

Mr. Pearson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: This whole procedure is a farce—this whole procedure which the government invites parliament to go through is not only a farce but an insult. And the insult will not be redressed—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Fulton: The insult will not be redressed until the Prime Minister, who introduced the resolution and asked parliament to approve it, appears before the House of Commons, of which he is the head and to which he is responsible, and tells us why we should approve this resolution.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, certain developments since three o'clock this afternoon have been, to say the least, most astonishing. During my thirteen years—almost thirteen years—as a member of the house, I have not until this time seen anything like it. It has created suspicion in our minds. It has created doubts in our minds. As the situation stands at the moment we simply cannot lend our support to the motion now before the house.

The performance of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), the house leader, has been strange, to say the least. He has been nervous. He has been touchy. He has been on his feet more frequently than during any comparable period of time at least during the years I have been in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, he is making a sick man out of me.

Mr. Green: That is what you are, too.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must discuss the motion before the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not part of this resolution.

Mr. Shaw: The minister may not be part of the resolution, as he asserts, but certainly his actions have—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is going to discuss my appearance in the house and whatever I think or do, whether I smile or weep or do anything else, I think we should have a special debate on the subject. I may tell you, sir, that I could give the hon. member a true picture of myself in the time I have been listening to speakers from the opposition.

Mr. Adamson: I have never been able to understand why you are not chosen one of the best-dressed men in Canada.

An hon. Member: No bow tie.

Mr. Shaw: I would not want the Minister of Public Works to assume that my references to him give me any great pleasure. I simply made these references in order to indicate why the spectacle of the last several hours has appeared so strange to me.

This afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) engaged in a rather astonishing performance. In his efforts to keep out of the debate he outmanoeuvred himself, and forced himself into the debate in a most peculiar fashion. Sometimes I have wondered whether it was not done by design, deliberately, so that he would not have the opportunity of doing the very thing we hoped he would do in connection with the matter now before us.

This afternoon my leader made a very fair proposition to the house and the government. In effect he asserted that we were not in a position at that time to commit ourselves definitely with respect to the motion before the house. He anticipated that surely the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) or most certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—at least some cabinet minister—would stand in his place and make a statement to the house. In fact I think he even assumed that if there was not a cabinet minister prepared to do it they might be able to push a parliamentary assistant into the procedure and let him take the consequences.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott).

Mr. Shaw: Conceivably the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. Sinnott: That is quite a compliment.

Mr. Shaw: In fact my leader had hoped that even before the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) had spoken, even before the acting leader of the C.C.F. had spoken, even before the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) had spoken, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), if not the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or some other cabinet minister, would have offered or would have fought for the floor in order to indicate two things; first, what has been done under the act during the past year, and second, what are the reasons why the government is asking at the present time for an extension of the act.

It was asked a few minutes ago: Why is it that certain persons voted for it in 1951, again in 1952, and are not prepared to support it at the present time? Conceivably the government has heard of the expression "loss of confidence". I am not going to assert for a moment that we had very much confidence in the government two years ago or a year ago, but I will concede that we may have had some. However, I am quite prepared to assert that we have less at the present time. Less can be very near to that point which could be designated as none. When the resolution was called this afternoon we had hoped that the Prime Minister would be here to indicate to the house those things which we anticipated the government would indicate to us. It was mentioned today that conceivably he was very busy. We will concede that point; we assume that he is very busy at all times. However, we could not understand why the government could not have deferred consideration of this measure until a day when the Prime Minister would find it possible to be here.

When I came into the house at eight o'clock I was delighted to see that the Prime Minister was here. I was amazed when I looked up later and noticed he had gone. He may be very busy tonight and I am prepared to concede that, but once again it should not have been difficult for the Minister of Justice to take the appropriate action so that this measure could be considered again at another time. I noticed recently that he and other ministers did that with respect to certain matters that were before the house.

We consider that this is one of the most important measures, if not the most important, that we shall be called upon to consider during this session. I note that in the preamble to the Emergency Powers Act of 1951 reference is made to the War Measures Act. This is what the preamble says in part:

> —it is not desirable that the wide powers conferred by that act to interfere with the fundamental liberties of the individual should now be brought into operation:

On that basis the Emergency Powers Act would suggest that the powers conferred upon the government were very limited in extent, extremely limited, and in fact would have actually very little effect upon the people of Canada. Yet when I look at section 2 of the act I find subsections (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f). When I look at those I ask myself if there is any aspect of life in Canada today that would not be covered in some way or other by those six subsections of section 2. I shall quote the exact words of the subsections, which are as follows:

> (a) control and suppression of maps, plans and photographs;
> (b) control of communications and means of communication;
> (c) control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movements of vessels;
> (d) transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things;
> (e) trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture; and
> (f) imposition and recovery, in connection with any scheme of control, of fees or charges payable to the Receiver General of Canada or into any fund or account established by order or regulation for the purposes of the scheme of control.

That is just about as all-embracing as anything could be. It becomes extremely significant when you look at section 3 and find this:

> (1) The governor in council may prescribe penalties by way of fine or by way of imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or by way of both fine and such imprisonment, that may be imposed for violation of orders or regulations made under this act—

In the first place the government is asking for authority to exercise complete and supreme control with respect to all those aspects of human life which I have just enunciated, and then to be able to say to the Canadian people, "we demand the right as governor in council to prescribe penalties which may result in Canadian citizens spending up to five years of their lives in prison, probably plus the payment of fines". This is extremely serious. During the last war we gave support to the measure which this measure ultimately replaced, but that was because of the most extraordinary conditions which exist during a war when the very existence of the nation is at stake. After the war we gave support to the granting of extraordinary powers to enable us to pass through the transitional period. In 1951 we gave support. In 1952 we gave support.

But our loss of confidence in the government has been so great since 1952 that we are not prepared to accede to the government's request to give them these blanket powers, particularly when the minister has, should I say, refused to stand on his feet at this—

Mr. Garson: On a point of order.

Mr. Shaw: On a question of privilege, will the Minister of Justice let me finish my sentence before he undertakes to rise to a point of order.

Mr. Garson: Finish the sentence.

Mr. Sinnott: Get some help.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Where is the rest of that sentence?

Mr. Shaw: Let the minister go ahead and bring up his point of order.

Mr. Garson: When my hon. friend suggests that I refused or was guilty of something which was equivalent to refusal, I think he is being very unjust indeed because I have made it as clear as I possibly can that the attitude which we have taken is in compliance with the ruling which Your Honour made concerning standing order 60 of the house. I am extremely anxious that the house pass this resolution and get into committee. Then my hon. friend may be quite bored for I will certainly give the committee plenty of explanation about the terms of the bill.

Mr. Shaw: Had the minister allowed me to finish the statement I had intended to make, he would have heard me say that he had refused to stand on his feet and give us the information we wanted at this time. He did not let me say those three words. In the second place, Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely amazed that Your Honour would permit the Minister of Justice to stand on his feet and imply that we have been out of order since three o'clock this afternoon, and that is exactly what he has done by the statement he has just made.

Mr. Speaker: It is within the right of any hon. member to suggest that any other members are out of order. If it is brought to my attention I will decide whether or not they are in order. Never at any time can an hon. member be prevented from bringing to my attention something that he thinks is not in accordance with the rules.

An hon. Member: Try again.

Mr. Garson: On another question of privilege—

Mr. Argue: This is the thirteenth time.

Mr. Garson: —I am not suggesting for a moment that my hon. friend is out of order or in order. I find it keeps me busy to keep in order myself, and that is what I have tried to do today.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Speaker, so much for the point of order. May I suggest to the Minister of Justice that he might have been able to procure a greater amount of support for this measure if he had agreed to do what he could quite well have done—stand up as soon as the motion was put and indicate to the house that he was prepared at that time to tell us what had transpired under this measure during the past twelve months and list the reasons why the government feels that the house should be asked to give approval to the extension of these powers for one year. I am still trying to determine to my satisfaction why the minister did not do that. He has alienated certain support by not doing so, and certainly he has been responsible for a good deal of the time of the house being occupied in consideration of the matter.

I realize that the minister has asserted that there will be a more appropriate time, but I think that events have established the fact that he has already missed the most appropriate time. It has been pointed out several times today that in 1951, upon the moving of a similar motion concerning this measure, the Prime Minister was here to make a statement. I wonder why the Minister of Justice has not deemed it advisable to do the same thing today. I believe the same thing was done in 1952 when a similar motion on the order paper was called. I say, I wonder why the Minister of Justice was not prepared to follow that course. But even more important than that, Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the Prime Minister himself was not prepared to do it. Certainly I think in fairness to him someone should have indicated the reason for his absence, if it could be given. In fairness to the Prime Minister the Minister of Justice should have done that.

We can only assume that the government does not have a good reason. We cannot accept the reason advanced by the Minister of Justice thus far. We must conclude that there is no good reason. The minister may say: If you allow us to get into committee I shall give you all the information that you may require. But let us not forget that in order to make that move we are being placed in a position where in fact we are giving endorsation of the government's proposal that the house resolve itself into committee for the consideration of a specific measure. I know that the minister is probably going to argue again that it is merely a motion for the Speaker to leave the chair. The minister has argued that, but I think stronger arguments have been advanced from this side of the house. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre drew to the attention of the house the consequences which would attend upon the defeat of this motion.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Shaw: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Will he not agree that it is on the second reading of a bill that a vote is taken on its principle?

Mr. Shaw: That is correct; but by agreeing that Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair and that the house shall resolve itself into committee for the specific purpose of discussing this specific measure it places us in a position where we are agreeing that we will allow the government to take the first step toward the accomplishment of something, the wisdom of which may be highly questionable at this particular time.

Mr. Garson: You can defeat the resolution in committee if you wish to.

Mr. Shaw: Pardon?

Mr. Garson: You can defeat the resolution in committee if you wish to. All that is sought by this motion is that the Speaker leave the chair in order that the chairman of the committee—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Garson: —may put the resolution, and then my hon. friend can vote against it if he wants to do so.

Mr. Shaw: It is difficult for me to understand why the Minister of Justice persists all the time in only putting half of the proposition. That is not the entire proposition at all. I realize fully that there is a motion for the Speaker to leave the chair; but why put your period, or whatever other punctuation mark you want, at that point? That is not the end of the proposition. It is only part of it. The resolution on the order paper is definitely a part of that motion. May I remind the Minister of Justice again that if he had agreed to make a statement, which undoubtedly need not have been a long one, he could have answered certain of the questions that are troubling us and have been troubling members of the house for a long time. What has been done during the past twelve months under the provisions of the act? What are the reasons for requesting extension for another twelve months? I am not saying he would, but I think the Minister of Justice could have answered those two questions in a few moments, in fact in less time than he took in the house this afternoon when he became almost hopelessly involved in a discussion of rules.

Let me remind the house, Mr. Speaker, that when my leader spoke this afternoon he advanced a very fair proposition as far as we were concerned. He indicated that under the circumstances which existed at that time he would await word from the government before we would make a decision with respect to how we might vote. That word has not been forthcoming. We anticipate that it will not be forthcoming. Therefore we must advise the house that we intend to vote unanimously against the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair and that the house resolve itself into committee for the purpose of considering the resolution which is before the house at the present time.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of this parliament this seems to me to be quite an important question. During the debate several questions were raised which caused me to give some consideration to taking part in it. A short time ago a question was put to an hon. member on this side of the house. He was asked why he did not oppose extension when this matter came up a year ago. I am one of those members who have never supported the Emergency Powers Act or the extension of it. I am also one of those members who feel that it is a debatable question. I deem it my duty, in so far as I am able, to place on the record the feeling of the people of this country whom I have met in relation to these all-embracing powers that the government wishes to take away from parliament. Now, it is just possible that, if the people of this country did not feel the government was taking away too much power from parliament, I might not be here. Therefore, it seems to me that if I were to support this motion that the Speaker leave the chair and this matter be discussed in committee I would be failing in my duty to seek an explanation for the necessity of this act. I may be wrong. I do not know too much about the procedure of this house as yet. I feel that this debate this afternoon has been a good thing. I feel that when an important matter like this is brought up, and the motion is that the Speaker leave the chair to discuss the resolution, there should be some explanation as to why the resolution should be discussed.

As I look back over the events I find that the act was passed in 1951 for one year, with the possibility of an extension. Without going into all the details which previous speakers have touched upon, I find that even when the government requested an extension of the act last year they did give reasons for requesting that extension. I have a notion that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) perhaps feels now that he could have saved a great deal of time, and it would have been a fairer thing, if he had given reasons this afternoon for requesting this extension. If this extension is not necessary, then the matter should not be brought before this house. It is true that the various arguments to which I have listened have been one-sided, and perhaps that is another reason why I should like to get in on a one-sided scrap.

This Emergency Powers Act covers a lot of territory. From what I have been able to learn during the debate this afternoon, these powers have not been used by the government to any great extent. I may be wrong again, and if I am I stand ready to be corrected. In most of the cases in which these powers have been used, the same emergency could have been met by other legislation. I notice that, according to section 4 of the act, if a real emergency arises the government has the power to proclaim the War Measures Act. I feel that if a real emergency does come upon us which requires the use of emergency powers such as those set out in this act, then it will be an emergency very close to actual war. If we ever meet that emergency, it seems to me the government has the power and would proclaim the War Measures Act at once.

The reasons which were given for requesting the last extension of the act do not seem to me to be valid today. At least, nothing has been put forward to convince me that we should be asked to consider a measure such as this. I must, therefore, agree with my leader that before any other step is taken we should have an explanation of the reason for requesting this extension, and an opportunity of deciding whether or not we want to consider this act. Apparently the explanation given when the bill was introduced in 1951, and when it was extended in 1952, was sufficient to satisfy the members of all parties that the house should go into committee to discuss the measure. The motion, therefore, was not debated. Since no explanation has been given today, I believe it is only right and proper that we debate the motion. It is the duty of every hon. member to state his reason for feeling that he cannot support the motion. I have a strong feeling that if I, after having listened to this debate, had remained quietly in my seat, I would have been met by people in my constituency who would ask why I had consented to allow the government to extend this emergency act without any reasonable explanation being given. The government is seeking to take away my rights as well as the rights of all hon. members in this parliament through the passage of this measure. As I understand it, if this legislation is passed it puts certain powers in the hands of the government by which the liberty of the subject could be curtailed, as well as the rights of property affected. Without any explanation given as to the necessity for such a measure, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the motion before the house.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I do not propose to debate this resolution at any length. I do not feel that I am competent to debate it at any length.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knight: My hon. friends on the other side say "hear, hear". I do not know the gentlemen who said "hear hear", but I would not mind taking them on in a little debate, with competent judges, on any particular subject they would mention. I am here to explain my position or, I might say, my changed position since this afternoon. The resolution, as I see it, is:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Powers Act to provide for the continuation of the act for a further period of one year, that is from the thirty-first day of May, 1953, to the thirty-first day of May, 1954.

The terms of that resolution seem strangely familiar. They are familiar because I know that we have dealt with the same type of resolution before. On those occasions I supported the resolution because I thought the continuation of the emergency powers was necessary. Now, I want to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)—I am well aware that no purpose is served by asking him because he will not tell us—what is the reason for extending these emergency powers? Why, and in how many cases, have these emergency powers been used since the last time they were requested? As I said, when I came into the house this afternoon I was resolved in my own mind that, provided we had a proper explanation of the necessity for this legislation, I would be prepared to support it. I expected to support it. I now expect to oppose and I shall leave it to the Minister of Justice to guess for himself the reason why. Before I voted for the resolution I wanted a statement from the Minister of Justice. Now, before I vote against the resolution, I should also like a statement from the minister. By the look of the clock, I imagine that the minister will likely have an opportunity to think about the matter over the week end.

While I am at it, I also want to protest the method employed by the minister this afternoon and this evening in the handling of this resolution. I say that in all sincerity and without any personal animosity. When the minister rose to speak tonight, in view of his previous interjections on certain points of order I think every member in this house—certainly everyone to whom I spoke in regard to the matter—thought that the minister was talking on a point of order. While he did not actually use the phrase "point of order" when he rose to his feet, when he reads tomorrow what he said tonight I think he will say that we have a fairly good case for thinking that he was in fact speaking on a point of order. Then having made a little speech on the point of order, as we thought, he promptly sat down and said, "Now I have made my speech; I can speak only once in this debate"; and he appealed to the Speaker and was sustained. He said: "I have done my talking; I can now talk no more and so I shall give no explanation of the matter."

I would also protest about another matter. I see that this resolution is sponsored by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). When a resolution of this importance is entered upon the order paper in the name of the Prime Minister, I would suggest that it should be introduced by the Prime Minister. In other words, I think that either he should have been here to move his own resolution or, if that were impossible, the bringing in of the legislation should have been postponed until such time as he was here to introduce the resolution.

So far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to vote this government any power. I think it now has too much power. I think that this procedure—and I think it is a sad thing—is just another example of the arbitrary acts of a government which has enjoyed power too long. We are becoming accustomed to it. As I have said, in our opinion this government now has too much power. In my present frame of mind at least, I certainly do not intend to vote them any more power for a year or for any other period.

I could cite examples of the kind of thing to which I have referred. I suppose the most famous example, and the one which will not soon be forgotten by the people of Canada, was the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he said: "If we want to do it, who is going to stop us?" I suppose the Minister of Justice tonight takes the attitude, "If I want to move this resolution instead of the Prime Minister, who is going to stop me? If I am going to get this legislation through the house, who is going to stop me?" May I remind him that in this parliament we at least have one thing. It is a great thing to live in a democratic country. We at least have our right to speak and to express our opinions upon the matter.

I remember when that legislation was introduced in 1951. I think it was introduced to cover a period of one year only. Since that time it has been renewed. I again ask the minister: Why are these emergency powers necessary? Why has no member on the government side spoken in this debate?

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have at least made my own position clear even if I have not contributed too much to the discussion of the subject itself.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that many hon. members must be puzzled by the course which this debate has taken. I think we can all agree that it is unique. I do not think I have ever listened to a debate in which the minister who was supposed to introduce a motion did not make a speech and who, during the course of the debate, made one to show why he should not make one. As I review the situation I find that on the order paper there appears a resolution which reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Powers Act to provide for the continuation of the act for a further period of one year—

In the course of his reasoning as to why he should not make a speech, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) referred to standing order 60. As it appears in Beauchesne's second edition, standing order 60 is as follows:

> If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

In the first place, this resolution stood for at least a day. Today it appears on the order paper and now the motion has been made that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole to consider this resolution. Under standing order 38 the motion is debatable, as I see it, under paragraph (a) or paragraph (i). The standing order reads as follows:

(1) The following motions are debatable: Every motion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member speaking to a point of order?

An hon. Member: He would not know.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If you are asking me a question, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am speaking to the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair, which I understood was argued by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier).

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did not argue it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Perhaps I am more in order than were those who preceded me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member wants to adhere to the ruling which was referred to in this debate and which appears in the Journals of June 18, 1952, and if he wants to be strictly in order, he will direct his remarks to the negative of the question and state his reasons why he believes the Speaker should not leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole to consider that resolution. What I heard the hon. member say was that the minister should have made a speech on the resolution and should have given some explanation.

Mr. Fulton: That would be in the negative, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) expressed his opinion a moment ago. I can well realize what his points of view are. But the ruling which is now invoked is one by which the members of the opposition can indicate their objections to the Speaker's leaving the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole to consider this resolution. The minister who is moving this resolution is adhering to the ruling as well.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister moved it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. He is adhering to the ruling as well by listening to the objections which are raised on the opposition side. Of course the only point which according to this ruling, as I understand it, might be arguable on the part of the opposition as to the attitude of the Minister of Justice has to do with this portion of Mr. Speaker's ruling which reads as follows:

If any members are opposed to the resolution, and do not think that it should even be considered in the committee of the whole, or if they require additional information before agreeing to the motion, they should be given an opportunity to speak on the motion.

That is exactly what the members of the opposition are doing now and have been doing for some time. Then the Speaker went on:

The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

Mr. Green: That is what he has not done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister has explained the position which he was taking, and indicated that as soon as we reached the committee stage he would be very glad to give all the information which was required by hon. members. Members of the opposition still voice their objections and bring into the discussion the attitude taken by the minister, and that has taken much of the time of the discussion which I think should be relevant to the motion and should address itself to the negative of the motion. I suggest that perhaps we have heard enough as to the criticism of the attitude taken by the mover of the resolution. It has been repeated over and over again. It looks as though both sides tried to adhere to the ruling of June 18, 1952, and one reproaches the other for not having adhered to it properly. I think that we ought to direct our remarks to the negative of the motion and leave this procedural question for the time being.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, may I draw attention to the fact that the original mover of the motion was not the Minister of Justice but the Prime Minister. We are still hoping that at some stage of the debate, since the Minister of Justice is not prepared to reply, the Prime Minister may see fit to do so.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As you read that ruling given by His Honour the Speaker in June, 1952, I think you said he considered that the minister, after hearing the objections to the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair, should then give his explanation why the Speaker should leave the chair. The Minister of Justice has declined to do that. His speech consisted of reasons why he should not do it. I know he is prepared to do it when we go into committee but our position is that he should do it before we go into committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are commanding him to do it now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yesterday we had similar resolutions on the order paper and the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), sitting behind the Minister of Justice, gave an explanation of one of the resolutions before we went into committee of the whole.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, I should like to know what we are discussing. Are we discussing a point of order or the resolution. What is this, anyway?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the Minister of Public Works cannot understand my language I cannot do anything to help him.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What are you talking about?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am trying to explain for the benefit of everybody. For the benefit of the minister I will start all over again.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hope the hon. member will not be permitted to repeat what he has said, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Minister of Public Works did not understand it. What am I going to do? I should like everyone to understand it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not try very hard to understand what you have to say.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is a very important point to have settled, and it does not seem to have been settled definitely by the Speaker in his ruling of June, 1952. When I refer back to 1951, at which time a similar resolution was introduced for the first time, I find that we had a debate lasting a day without any controversy on the point at all. On February 20, 1951, the Prime Minister moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to empower the governor in council to do and authorize such acts and things—

This resolution that we are supposed to consider in committee is only an extension of the act that followed as a result of the consideration of that resolution in 1951. I cannot see how the Minister of Justice can be right tonight and the Prime Minister right on February 20, 1951. One of them must be wrong. The procedure is not the same.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

The procedure being followed now is different, and I am inclined to think the Prime Minister was right in 1951, and that this has been the practice that has generally been followed.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, may I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the ruling in question made by His Honour the Speaker was after the Prime Minister had moved his resolution in 1951.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am quite aware of that, but the Speaker did not rule that the Prime Minister, in acting as he did on February 20, was out of order, because the Prime Minister gave an explanation of the matter when he introduced the subject.

There are half a dozen or more similar resolutions on the order paper today.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What happened last night on a similar resolution? Last night we had a resolution similar to this and the Minister of Resources and Development rose in his place and said he would answer questions in committee.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, he did not say that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winters: On a question of privilege, I think the hon. member for St. John's West may be confused. Two resolutions were introduced in my name. The first resolution introduced had to do with the bill on water conservation. The question came up as to whether the debate should take place with the Speaker in the chair, and hon. members will recall the controversy that developed at that time. It arose because some hon. members attempted to discuss the South Saskatchewan river project.

When the second resolution came up last night, having to do with the historic sites and monuments bill, I raised the point that the motion before the house was one that the Speaker should leave the chair and suggested that a debate at that stage might prove equally controversial, and asked permission of hon. members to make my statement in committee of the whole. Hon. members unanimously and very kindly agreed to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to me that we are not going to make further progress this evening, but I hope that, whenever we resume debate on the resolution, perhaps we can leave aside for the time being the controversial point as to when the minister should or should not speak. Because as long as this ruling is there—and it is one which has been adhered to, to a large extent—we shall not make any progress by always invoking arguments against or in favour of the ruling which has been made.

It seems to me that this is a matter which could be considered further by the committee on procedure. Perhaps that committee will eventually bring a solution to what has been a problem for some time. Shall I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since you have raised the point in regard to the practice that is involved, I would point out that there is a very definite reason behind the argument that has been made. It is the opinion of those who have been presenting this argument that the question is very much before the house as to whether the Speaker should leave the chair at all to consider this motion. It is our contention that he should not, and it is our contention that there is nothing in any decision that has been made that precludes the arguments being presented against this course being followed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I agree with the Leader of the Opposition, and probably he may be the only one who spoke to the point and who was in order.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did follow his speech. He tried to discuss the negative of the resolution. He was perhaps at times a little out of order, but he tried to stick to it. But if one were to listen to all the other speeches, especially to the one by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He was far afield.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the leader of the house announces the business for Monday, in view of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) I should like to clear up one point. I hope that nothing in my remarks will be taken to imply that I consider at any time that hon. members are not allowed to speak to the negative of the motion—that is, to explain their objections as to why Mr. Speaker should not leave the chair. I certainly did not wish to imply any such thing.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) has moved the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Browne (St. John's West) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will continue consideration of the motion to go into supply, and call the following departments: external affairs, transport, labour, agriculture and justice. And then the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will move to refer his estimates to the standing committee on external affairs.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The army has just introduced a comprehensive personality test for recruits specifically designed to reveal psychological weaknesses. The success of this test will determine whether it will have a wider application.

ARMED SERVICES—EDUCATIONAL STANDARDS

Mr. Harkness:

1. What are the educational standards at present required for enlistment in the (a) navy; (b) army; (c) air force?
2. On what date were these educational requirements put into effect?

Mr. Campney:

1. Educational standards required for the enrolment of men in the Canadian armed forces as at January 31, 1953.

Navy: The educational standard for the enrolment of men in the Royal Canadian Navy is successful completion of elementary schooling. Educational standards required for the enrolment of tradesmen are higher depending on the particular trade.

Army: The suitability of applicants for enrolment in the Canadian army is tested by aptitude and intelligence tests.

Air Force: The educational standard for the enrolment of men in the Royal Canadian Air Force is successful completion of elementary schooling. Aircrew trainees must have a minimum of junior matriculation to be eligible for enrolment, although a candidate with one year less than junior matriculation will be considered if he has other compensating attributes.

Veterans of the Canadian armed forces and skilled tradesmen are given special consideration for enrolment in the services.

2. Navy: early 1948; Army: since 13 November, 1951; Air Force: enrolment of men, January, 1951; enrolment of aircrew, since 31 May, 1952.

Mr. Robichaud:

Will the dredging operations at Ferguson gully, in the county of Gloucester, New Brunswick, for which an amount of $32,000 was provided in the 1952-53 estimates, be performed during 1953, by a departmentally-owned (P.W.D.) plant?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Dredging is being considered for performance by departmentally-owned plant.

GRAIN PERMITS, 1951-52

Mr. Juras:

1. During the crop year 1951-52, what was the number of grain permits issued in each of the three western provinces?

2. During the same period, what was the farmers' monthly marketing of wheat in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Manitoba	43,227
Saskatchewan	114,459
Alberta	73,342
Total	231,028

2. Official grain marketings as issued by the board of grain commissioners for Canada are compiled on a weekly basis and not by months. Mr. Brooks:

1. How many properties belonging to individuals will it be necessary for the Department of National Defence to purchase in the proposed Gagetown military training area?

2. How many offers for purchase have already been made to date, and how many have been accepted?

3. What factors is the department taking into consideration as a basis for the purchase price of these properties?

Mr. Campney:

1. As a number of transfers and subdivisions have been carried out without formal record being made at the registry offices it is not possible at this time to say how many properties belonging to individuals will be affected. The searching of titles to establish ownership is continuing.

[Mr. Campney.]

2. As of February 1, approximately 125 letters containing offers of settlement have been sent to occupants.

3. In considering the amount of settlement, the following are taken into account:

2. If so, has it been considered and what action is proposed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. The government is continuing to study the recommendation on scholarships and other recommendations of the royal commission on arts, letters and sciences and when decisions are made on these aspects of the report they will be announced by the government in the same manner as were the previous implementations of the recommendations such as those on the national gallery, the national library and financial aid to universities.

R.C.A.F.—CONVERSION OF SQUADRONS FROM CF-100'S TO F-86 SABRES

Mr. Fulton:

1. Have any Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons originally intended to be equipped with CF-100 aircraft been converted to F-86 Sabres instead?
2. If so, how many?

Mr. Campney:

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

Mr. Harkness:

1. In what areas in the United States is vesicular exanthema of hogs now present?

2. The importation of swine, pork and pork products were restricted under the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act by order in council P.C. 1234 of March 3, 1952. However, owing to the existence in several states of the United States of America of vesicular exanthema and in order to prevent the introduction of the disease into Canada, a ministerial order, under authority of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act was issued on August 29, 1952, prohibiting the importation of any swine, uncooked pork, uncooked pork products, pork offal and garbage from the United States. It is not the intention of the department to rescind this order until the disease is under effective control in the United States.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRANS MOUNTAIN OIL PIPE LINE CO.

Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Trans Mountain Oil Company, in connection with construction of an oil pipe line from British Columbia to the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

AGREEMENT RESPECTING SALE OF GRAIN

Mr. Ross (Souris):

For a copy of any agreement since January 1, 1950, between the Canadian wheat board and the Winnipeg grain and produce clearing association, with respect to the sale of wheat or other grains.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, there is no agreement between the Canadian wheat board and the Winnipeg grain and produce clearing association. Therefore, there are no such documents to be produced. I might explain that the wheat board owns membership in the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Exchange Clearance Association Limited, and as with any other member of that association, the relationship of the association and the board is governed by the bylaws of the association. Since there is no agreement there is nothing to be tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

ACCOUNTING METHODS

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

For a copy of all correspondence or recorded communications from the 1st day of April, 1951, to date between the Auditor General and (a) the Department of National Defence; (b) the Department of Finance, respecting methods of accounting.

For a copy of all reports made to the Department of National Defence regarding (a) shortages; (b) waste and extravagant spending, in connection with defence projects and supplies in the prairie command, since the first day of October, 1952, to date.

Mr. Claxton: I think that the hon. member for Lake Centre and the Solicitor General have had some conversation on this motion and have agreed that it should stand.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that is correct. I thought he was going to rise, and I was waiting for him.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda and other documents in connection with the 11½ lb. practice bomb (cartridge type), otherwise known as the Wilson practice bomb, used by the Royal Canadian Air Force, during the second world war.

Mr. Claxton: It has been pointed out to the hon. member for Calgary East that the file of correspondence includes the court record, and it is very voluminous indeed. On the understanding that this is made available to the hon. member and he will indicate what he wants we shall be glad to have the motion carried.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the statement of the Minister of National Defence.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT—RECOVERIES

Mr. Knowles: I do not think you will have any trouble getting it.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PRESS REPORTS OF ALLEGED LOOTING ON PARTRIDGE ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister aware of a news story which appeared in the issue of the Saint John Evening Times-Globe for Saturday, February 7, 1953, dealing with alleged looting of army installations on Partridge island in Saint John harbour? If so, has any investigation been conducted, and with what result?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): During the war a troop of third New Brunswick coast defence regiment occupied Partridge island, manning two guns. Their operational role terminated May 31, 1945, and a detachment was left on the island until all equipment was removed.

The buildings not required by the army were removed or declared surplus to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, who acknowledge our declaration of surplus for: eight buildings to the value of $3,390; plumbing, heating and electrical fixtures, $785.75; and 980 feet of six-inch sewer pipe at $2,450, for a total of $6,625.75.

This surplus declaration included 3,225 feet of underground electric power cable for which no value was shown. The records of the department show that there are still vested in the Department of National Defence a number of buildings which could not be removed or declared surplus, including searchlight emplacements, gun emplacements, a workshop and engine room, a radar building, a regimental aid post, an officers' quarters and mess and a power plant.

The general officer commanding eastern command has given us the information that all equipment and stores of any value to the army were removed by the army from these buildings. We have not been able to get any additional information owing to a breakdown in telephone communications between here and Fredericton, but as soon as I get a full report I shall be glad to give it to the house.

ALLEGED ROBBING OF WOUNDED KOREAN VETERANS AT SEATTLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Has his attention been drawn to the fact that a number of wounded Korean veterans were mercilessly robbed of their belongings at a disembarkation point near Seattle last Thursday? If so, what is being done to have this matter investigated and a repetition prevented?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps I should answer the question, as the Solicitor General is not yet Associate Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I beg your pardon.

Mr. Claxton: Our attention has been drawn to this matter, and a thorough investigation is being made into it. The hon. member and the house will appreciate that since this occurred in the United States our inquiry must be made to the United States service authorities, and any representations would be made to them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there a foundation for the news report?

Mr. Claxton: I have not heard yet.

SUPPLY

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that the house go into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Wright.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to address the house on the South Saskatchewan river project at this time. I had thought that in all probability it would be discussed on my estimates, or at a time when the government was making some report with regard to the commission's report. However, an amendment has been moved to the motion to go into supply, and also an amendment to the amendment.

Some remarks have been made in discussing those amendments which make it necessary for me to make some comment. I would in the first place call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the amendment reads as follows:

I therefore move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew)—

And this was the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house regrets that in the estimates presented to this house no provision has been made for immediately proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam."

Well, there is a provision in the estimates for an expenditure similar to that of last year. There has been no decision reached as to whether the expenditure will be made. But the statement contained in the amendment is not a statement of fact; and therefore if members have no other reasons for voting against it, they certainly would vote against it on the ground that it is not a correct statement of fact.

In addition to that, an amendment to the amendment was moved in these words:

That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"as recommended by the federal government's P.F.R.A. engineers."

Well, the federal government's P.F.R.A. engineers have made no recommendation in connection with this matter whatsoever. It is not their mission. It is not their duty to make recommendations. They are asked for reports on possible projects across western Canada, and any recommendations that are made are made here, by the minister, and not by P.F.R.A. engineers. So again I suggest that the amendment to the amendment is not based upon the facts as they exist, and therefore there could be no good reason for anyone voting either for the amendment or the amendment to the amendment. They are both statements of situations which do not exist.

But in view of the fact that amendments have been moved and that there have been discussions, and in view of the fact that for a long time the views of everyone who has been associated with public affairs in the province of Saskatchewan in particular, and in the western provinces in general, have been pretty well established, perhaps I should make a few comments.

There is no necessity for me, on this occasion, to attempt to indicate to the house what my own views on this question are. I am on record in every session of the Saskatchewan legislature from 1916 until I came to this House of Commons in 1936; and that being the case, there would be no way of my avoiding that record which is known both to the newspapers of western Canada and to individuals concerned about the voting in western Canada. Anyone can look up the sessional papers and find out what position was taken over the years in relation to this particular question. All I am going to say at the moment is that on no occasion, at any time, either while an election was on or while an election was not on, have I stated that the South Saskatchewan river dam was going to be built.

I have on many occasions indicated that investigation is being made into the possibility of building it. I have on certain occasions indicated that, so far as I myself am concerned, I have been convinced that a dam can be built. But at no time has it been stated that the government has entered into any such arrangement or has undertaken to enter into any such arrangement. I intend to give the reasons as to why that is the case, as I go along.

I think in the first place I should perhaps give a very short review of what the history of the question has been. A short review would take me back a long time; but it does not require more than one sentence with regard to each matter in order to remind the house of what is involved historically in the discussion of this question.

Many years ago—as a matter of fact very shortly after confederation—a very definite stand was taken with regard to land and resources in western Canada. The government of Sir John A. Macdonald took the position that we should follow the practice of the United States and make the land available to the railway companies in order to induce the construction of national railway lines across the Dominion of Canada. He followed that policy during all the time he was in office, and made available something in the neighbourhood of 38 million acres, a very great part of which was taken from what is now the province of Saskatchewan—what was then the Northwest Territories—in order to encourage the building of national railways.

During that period of time the Liberal party took the position that this should not be done, that this was a national undertaking and that provision for that kind of thing should be made out of the treasury of Canada. When the Liberal party came into office in 1896 they changed the policy and determined upon a policy of making cash grants instead of land grants.

And so by 1904, as a result of that policy, they established the building of another line of railway from one end of Canada to the other, and in order to secure the building of that line they put up cash grants.

These are the two facts, away back at the beginning of the history, of this development which I think we have to keep in mind at this time. Then, in 1905, one year after the arrangement was made for the construction of this great national railway on the basis of cash grants, the government of the day set up two new provinces, the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. At that time they determined that while they were not going to make any more land grants to railways, and were not involving themselves in anything of that kind, that they were going to utilize the land of the western prairies, administered from Ottawa, for the purpose of encouraging settlement in the Dominion of Canada—the natural argument being that, the railways once having been constructed, and the great undertakings resulting having been developed from one end of Canada to the other, the lands should be retained rather than administered by the provinces. It was maintained at Ottawa that national problems could best be assisted if settlement were based on lands administered from Ottawa.

Well, settlement was carried out based on the previous areas and experiences from the beginning until 1908. It came about in 1908 that the area known as the Palliser triangle which had not been settled prior to that time—homesteading was not allowed in that area, grants were not made to the railways in that area; settlement was discouraged, except for purposes of ranching, and grants of land were leased for ranching purposes over that area. In 1908 they decided to throw open these lands for settlement, not only settlement on the basis of homesteading, but the government of the day decided to sell 160-acre pre-emptions to any person who was homesteading in order to give him twice as much land as he would have under the policy which had been followed up to then.

I recite the details of these policies in order to show that up to that time there had been a very definite difference of opinion as between the two groups on different sides of this house. The Conservative party of that time had taken the position that making grants of land to the railroads was the proper thing to do, but when the new provinces were set up they took the position that the land should not be reserved to be administered from Ottawa, but should be administered by the provinces themselves. There was such wide division of policy on the part of the parties which resulted in the Conservative party in Saskatchewan changing its name to "provincial righters". As provincial righters they maintained that the lands and resources should be returned to the provinces and administered by the provinces.

As I said a moment ago, I have been associated with politics in the province of Saskatchewan ever since it was set up. During the early history of the province I took the position, along with other Liberals, that the proper thing to do was to have lands and resources administered by the provincial government, and more particularly prior to the period when it was decided to open up the Palliser triangle.

In 1912, just after a change of government, additions were made to three provinces in Canada, the province of Manitoba, the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. That suggestion had been made prior to the change in government by the Laurier government of the day, but it was brought into being by the government of Sir Robert Borden. When it was brought into being it was provided that the resources of these areas would be turned over to the provinces.

They did not follow the practice which the government had followed previously of retaining the resources to be administered from Ottawa, but turned them over to those three provinces. From there on all the parties in western Canada took the position that, since the policy had been changed at Ottawa, the government should follow the same policy in connection with resources and lands of the prairie provinces.

Discussions with regard to this went on for some time and it was during the period from 1916 down to the time when I left Regina that I am on record fully with regard to my own position in connection with the whole matter. But in 1929, the then prime minister of Canada, the late Mr. King, made representations to the governments of the three prairie provinces to the effect that they had decided that the natural resources should be returned to the provinces.

I was then the premier of the province of Saskatchewan and I was a supporter of the Liberal party, both provincially and federally. When that offer was made to the government of the province of Saskatchewan I came to Ottawa, along with other members of the Saskatchewan government, and interviewed the government of the Dominion of Canada. They made certain proposals to us under which we were asked to take the control of the natural resources. We refused and we gave our reasons for refusing. We said that during the period when the lands and resources had been administered from Ottawa some 38 million acres of land had been alienated; that large areas of forests had been alienated; that large areas of mining property had been transferred to activities elsewhere and that in asking the provinces to administer the remnant we were being asked to maintain an organization in order to conserve forests which had been alienated and to take care of land which had been settled and much which in all probability would not be settled because it was the least acceptable. We contended that a great deal of expense would be involved.

So we said that the federal government should not only turn over the resources, they should turn over with them certain funds. The reaction of Mr. King to that suggestion was to appoint a royal commission. That royal commission was headed by the Hon. Alphonse Turgeon, then chief justice of the province of Saskatchewan. An election was held a few months later and Mr. King's government was defeated.

Mr. Bennett came into office and decided to continue the commission, but he continued it with a little different personnel. He removed Mr. Justice Turgeon and put in his place another judge, Mr. Justice Bigelow, who functioned on the commission. That commission sat for about four years and a half. By the time it reported we were back in office.

I should have said that while we did not take the natural resources in 1929, the new government in the province of Saskatchewan was offered them on the same terms as we and they accepted the offer in 1930 and 1931. It was in discussing the question of acceptance that we indicated great opposition to the taking over of the resources by the government of the day on that basis. As I said, the commissions were appointed.

That report was not made until we had come back into office. The report provided that, in so far as Alberta was concerned, certain suggestions were accepted by Alberta. In so far as Manitoba was concerned, certain suggestions were made which were accepted. In so far as Saskatchewan was concerned, it was recommended that we take $5 million as payment. Mr. Justice Bigelow, who had been appointed by Mr. Bennett, said that the amount should be approximately $35 million, but the other commissioners agreed on $5 million.

The government of the day refused to accept the $5 million. I may say in passing that that amount was not accepted until 1948. I shall give some reasons as I go along why it might have been accepted then. We had spent a great deal of money in the rehabilitation of the western parts of Canada between 1935 and 1948.

That is the history of what happened down to 1935 excepting that we had one of the worst depressions in Saskatchewan and western Canada from 1931 down to 1939 that had ever been experienced. I think everyone in western Canada, no matter to what party he belonged, and everyone who was associated with government in Canada became convinced by what had happened that there was something wrong with the methods under which that particular section of Canada known as the Palliser triangle had been settled.

I remember coming down to Ottawa after the change of government and suggesting to the prime minister of the day, the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, that the commitments which had been undertaken by the previous government should be met by Ottawa. During the discussions I was asked for an opinion as to whether I thought people would be able to live in that section of the country. Mr. Bennett naturally referred to the position he had taken in 1908 when he said that these lands should remain as lands occupied by ranchers who were producing cattle, that they should not be broken up.

But after we had discussed the matter for two days and called in representatives of the two largest banks, the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank, one because they were the bankers of Canada and the other because they were the bankers of Saskatchewan, it was determined that the federal government ought to pay the bill and they did pay it. Then it was determined that in all probability nothing better could be done than to go along and see that these areas were rehabilitated, and therefore that matter might be discussed. That was 1934. But out of that discussion I think the whole Dominion of Canada came to the conclusion —certainly all members of the house of that day did so because they so determined when we were discussing the matter—that that area had not been settled in the manner in which it should have been settled, and that some of the responsibility for the position in which we found ourselves was a national or federal responsibility and therefore something ought to be done to rehabilitate the area.

When the Conservatives were in office in 1935 they brought in a bill. It was a short bill. It provided for the setting up of a committee. That committee had on it representatives of all the landholding organizations in western Canada and even organizations that had lent money on land—banking organizations, commercial companies, the Hudson's Bay Company, the railways that owned lands, and so on. The bill also provided for the naming to the committee of representatives of the municipal organizations. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) was one of the men who were made members of the committee at the time. It was also suggested that representatives of the three provinces be included on the committee. This board was set up under the act of 1935.

I have a copy of the act here. It is not necessary to read it because I think most members recall it and understand it; but if one reads the act one will find that the boards was entrusted with the task of saying what they thought ought to be done. The government of the day provided three-quarters of a million dollars for the first year and $1 million for each of the next four years following in order to carry on rehabilitation work on the western prairies. During the period when we were battling in the election campaign of 1935 we took certain attitudes with regard to this intention. Those of us who represented the attitude of the provincial government of Saskatchewan of that day took the position that that amount of money was not sufficient to provide for the necessary rehabilitation of western Canada and that five years was too short a period over which to make the expenditure. We so claimed throughout the whole period of the election campaign.

We were somewhat critical of the fact that the bill only covered five years and only provided a small amount of money, approximately $5 million, which was about the same as the commission had recommended. We said that we were not satisfied. When we made that statement our attention was immediately called to the fact that a greater amount had been paid by way of relief on the western prairies during the three or four preceding years than had ever been paid before. The moneys had been paid under the administration of the Anderson government of the day and with the assistance of the Conservative government at Ottawa. It was said to us. What is going to happen to that relief if a Liberal government comes into office? We said that so far as we were concerned when we came to Ottawa we would advocate even greater relief than was being provided by the government of the day.

To make a long story short, we came to Ottawa and as a result of the campaign that had been put on I was invited to Ottawa as minister of agriculture and told that my chief duty would be the administration of the P.F.R.A. as a part of the agricultural policy and that from time to time I would be expected to recommend to the government of Canada policies under which we could proceed in that direction. That was not the simplest thing to do in those days. You know, there is no use of my saying it was a Conservative point of view because I think the Conservatives would be equally justified, and possibly more justified, in saying that the Liberals agreed. In those days most people, when they took a look at an investment that was going to be made either by an individual or by a government, agreed with the suggestion that when money was to be expended on any particular project it should be done on the basis of whether it was going to be economically sound in the sense that it would pay interest upon the money which was invested.

I must say that when I came to Ottawa most people held that point of view. All I am going to say today is that when I came before the house and asked to have the sum of money taken out of the bill it took me about a year and a half to get the consent of the house to do that, and when they did so they did not take out the limitation on time. In 1937 they said: You still have three years to go and at the end of that three years we will have another look at it. At the end of the three years they took out the limitation on time. All I wish to say about it at this moment is that at that particular time it was somewhat difficult to get governments to acknowledge two things which are pretty generally acknowledged today.

One of the undertakings given previously was to the effect that anyone who collected taxes ought to be spending the money, and it was felt that that was a greater safeguard than anything else in connection with the keeping down of taxes and the keeping down of costs. But there is no one in this house that I know of at the present time who contends that is the policy which should be followed. It certainly is not the policy which is being followed, and the opposite policy has been followed for some considerable time. Therefore I think I am justified in saying today that in so far as the parliament of Canada is concerned, and so far as those sitting on both sides of the house are concerned, there has been fairly general recognition of the fact that large sums of money should be spent for national purposes in different parts of Canada.

There is one other project to which I want to refer at the moment because this discussion concerns not only those in the west but everybody in Canada. One of the chief interests that members from the maritime provinces had when I came to this house was in having the dikes reconditioned in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. These dikes were built in the days when the country was occupied either by the French or by the British many years ago. The cost of construction was not charged against the lands at the time they were constructed. Most of the construction was carried out with moneys supplied by France or moneys supplied by Great Britain under differing circumstances, and the dikes were there.

But when the dikes started to disappear some hundred years or more later we were proceeding according to the policy that I spoke of a few moments ago. The provinces, because of the set-up of our constitution at the time of confederation, were made responsible for all such expenditures as those having to do with dikes. All I am going to say about it is that in 1935 we started in to establish a policy under which assistance would be given by Ottawa for the construction of dikes in the maritime provinces, and it was thirteen years before we were able to get an item into the estimates to provide for that kind of expenditure in those provinces. I am not being critical now of some other political party when I say that. We were in power during all that time. As Minister of Agriculture I brought recommendations forward from year to year. I discussed the matter fully. I went down and looked at the projects. I came back and told all that I knew about them. I think I even had the support of my friend, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who supported the project on every occasion when it was being discussed. So far as I know, all other private members of the house from that area were in favour of it. So that finally, after some ten or twelve years of continuous talk with regard to their necessity, ignoring the fact that the building of these dikes would not result in anybody getting enough money to pay for them, the federal government are paying for the dikes. They are being built at the cost of the treasury of this country. In so far as anything being paid by the provinces or by the farmers who live behind the dikes is concerned it is only the activities going on behind the dikes that are being paid for by those people.

Construction of dikes in the maritime provinces was only brought into being because of the experience that we had with P.F.R.A. in western Canada. We were the people who came forward every year and said: This is what we are doing out west. We have already established the fact that some of these larger national projects have to be financed through Ottawa and assisted through Ottawa. Having done that, we would like to do the same thing in connection with the dikes and projects in the maritime provinces.

All I would like to say to members who come from the maritime provinces, with regard to this matter, is that if they do not agree with me regarding what has happened in the maritimes they should, if they have not already done so, go down to Amherst. They should drive east, I think it is—although I am not just too sure in which direction I am driving when I go along the coast line—and they will find that there is a very large diking project that has been undertaken by the government of Canada. Those who live there have carried on the activities behind the ditches and the dikes that have been provided. In order to get some idea of what good has been done, all I want to say is that one should look at the half which has been dealt with and then look at the half which has not yet been dealt with. The two lie side by side. On one side the lands are rehabilitated and in condition where farmers can use them for the production of hay. Right alongside are lands that are still flooded with salt water and will be of no use to anyone until they are diked. I would suggest that if members cannot go out and take a look at Saskatchewan and Alberta they should take a look at that project. I wish to say to them that it is exactly the same kind of thing which is being done in connection with rehabilitation in the west; and the government of Canada has been making payments in relation thereto.

I am quite aware of the fact that you can turn up Hansard of 1937 and find that almost everything I am saying now was said then. But as a result of representations made about 1937, and upon the basis of statements then made to the house and decisions made by the government of that day—and carried out—the policy of federal support has resulted. One of the policies followed was that of giving relief to people. It cost us $186 million in relief to people who had been settled on those lands but could not make a living in the thirties. One hundred and eighty-six million was paid out of the treasury of Canada during the first three or four years of the existence of this government in the late thirties. That money was spent in order to make it possible for people to live there until such time as more rehabilitation projects could be carried out. As I stated a moment ago instead of holding rehabilitation to four years or five years there was no limit put on the time and we have been spending on an average between $2 and $3 million a year ever since. We have now spent something over $39 million not on relief but on P.F.R.A.

Now I wish to say a word about what P.F.R.A. is. P.F.R.A. is not associated with the building of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river, nor is it associated with the building of the St. Mary dam. It is not associated with the Bow river project and it is not associated with the Red Deer project. Those are projects that have been associated with what we call the larger storage and irrigation projects in the western part of Canada. We have spent on P.F.R.A. as such about $34 million, as against $4¾ million that had been authorized by the initial act prior to the election of 1935 and determined upon as to the extent to which the policy should go.

Well, on these larger projects we have now spent some $22 million, making a total of over $60 million which has been spent for rehabilitation purposes. The last $24 million of that has not been spent as prairie farm rehabilitation expenditure but on what we call the larger projects.

I am sure that you would want me to give some explanation of what I mean by that. We set up the P.F.R.A. scheme and without going into details in connection with the report, I wish to say every single thing referred to in the report as something that ought to be done in western Canada has already been explored—100 per cent—and in most cases the suggestions are being carried out. One of the very definite proposals made, that of pumping water out of the South Saskatchewan river and up onto the land, has been turned down by every authority who has looked at it. The reason is that the waters of the South Saskatchewan river are full of silt and there is no way of pumping that water up on top unless you build a dam, allow the silt to settle to the bottom, and pump the waters off afterwards. You would have to build a dam at every point where you wanted any great pumping scheme carried out, and such a project is not practical. Everyone who has had a look at it has said that it is not a practical thing to do.

I looked at schemes in western Canada during the early days and I was carried away for the time being as a result of watching the pumping of water out of the South Saskatchewan river, pumping it up a couple of hundred feet and pouring it on the land. I had never seen any such production from lands in western Canada until then. However, I go back today and look at those same projects and find that the individuals who put pumps in then are not pumping water any more. The reason is that they have found out exactly what our engineers have found out—that it is not a practical thing to do.

So, I say to you again, everything which it is suggested in this report should be done by the P.F.R.A. or by the government of Canada has already been undertaken, completed or fully investigated and action taken accordingly, and I am going to leave my comment on the recommendations of the report at that point.

There is something to be said about these large projects. In the first instance we were determined not to follow the ideas which were followed in the United States until we had carried on the greater part of our planning for P.F.R.A. work, and then, when we had done that, we had determined that we should provide for a number of large storage projects that could be utilized by the provinces after we had ceased to be interested in prairie farm rehabilitation. They could be utilized by the provinces in order to continue to make it possible for people to live to advantage in that particular section of the country. In other words, the work of moving people off submarginal lands, the establishment of community pastures, the putting in of small irrigation projects, all of that work goes on under P.F.R.A. and it is going on. Every single part of what is known as the Palliser triangle, including the hard core of necessary relief, has been dealt with under P.F.R.A. and is being dealt with under P.F.R.A. Everyone who has been associated with this agrees that the most helpful plans that have been carried out are those connected with the projects set up under P.F.R.A.

Coming to the larger projects, we were told, and it has proven to be correct, that if we did not start to utilize the waters out of the St. Mary river, the Waterton river and others that come into this country from the United States, those waters would be utilized on the other side of the line and we would be without them.

The government of the province of Alberta of that day took the position that they could not afford to deal with that situation themselves. I do not know whether or not they would take that position today, with their oil supplies, but I am rather inclined to think that they would; because I do not know that that circumstance has made a great deal of difference. By far the greater part of the wealth they obtain, they get from the soil just as does any other western province. But nevertheless at that time they took the position that they could not go ahead.

They had an experience—and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) knows it better than anyone else because I think he was the minister handling the funds at the time—of having to pay off guaranteed amounts put up in connection with irrigation in the province of Alberta. They therefore came to us and suggested that we ought to do something about it. We were not in a position to deal with the matter then any more than we are at this moment in a position to deal with the South Saskatchewan river dam. Having no set-up here which made it possible for me to go to Alberta and make a deal with the Alberta government based upon policy here, we sent letters to the Alberta government and received letters back from them, under which they agreed that whatever the policy was that was decided on at a later date in connection with those projects—and we always said there would not be more than four of them—they would go ahead and spend money on the part of the project which we had been discussing, on the understanding that whatever the decision was it would be finally applied to any of the undertakings. So we went ahead with the St. Mary river dam. But in so far as the other three projects were concerned—the Bow river, the Red Deer and the South Saskatchewan—there was no definite decision. It is in the order in council. I am not going to read it this afternoon because it would take considerable time to do it; the information can be obtained from the order in council. That order in council—I think it is P.C. 2298, passed in 1947—provides that we must have an agreement with the province in connection with these larger projects, and that under that agreement we are presumed to be following the same policy as is laid down by the Meek commission which reported in 1942 in relation to the St. Mary dam. So when we came to deal with the Bow river project we dealt with it on that basis, although we did some things there that we are not doing in others. We bought the land, for example. But as regards the water supply being provided to the province and to others, the arrangements are similar to those made elsewhere in accordance with the terms of the Meek report.

Then we went up to Edmonton to deal with the Red Deer project. What I want to tell the members from the province of Alberta—and they can get the details from their own government if they desire to do so—is that I went to Alberta and I sat down with the whole government of Alberta and discussed these projects. At the time we discussed them and it was agreed that the first project we would attempt to go ahead with and finish was the St. Mary river dam. Then it was agreed that the second one we would proceed with and complete, if we could persuade the government to undertake it, was the Bow river project; and both of these we are proceeding with. Then it was agreed too that until we have been able to make a more complete examination of the possibilities on the South Saskatchewan river, we would not be proceeding with the Red Deer project. I must admit—and I think the members of the Alberta government would also admit it—that I did not anticipate that we would be quite as long as we are in making the decision. They did not anticipate that we would. I think I can make an appeal to my friend the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) based upon something which I have heard him say in this house previously, namely, that at no time when these discussions were on did we use them in a political sense. He recalled in this house that I was at the convention in Hanna and I may say that I am asked to go back to it this year and I may be there again.

An hon. Member: You know what happened.

Mr. Gardiner: In any event, I was at the convention in Hanna. In answer to a question, I stated that the question as to whether we were prepared to proceed with the Red Deer project was not an issue in connection with the election, that whether they elected one member or another was not a matter which could decide that question, and that it would not be considered from that point of view. My hon. friend nods his head and will agree that is correct.

That is the position which I took from time to time right across western Canada, namely, that these are projects that have to be built for the purpose of rehabilitating that area and putting it back into a position where the people can live there; that I anticipated that no matter what government is in power in Canada from now on, any government that is established in Ottawa would undertake to carry on projects of that kind down to the time when we had performed our duty as a federal government to take care of the responsibilities we had assumed, through the activities of previous governments in not having those areas settled in the manner in which, they now agree, as does everybody, they should have been settled.

May I recall to your minds again that we have spent approximately $40 million on P.F.R.A. We have spent—the greater part of it coming out of the treasury of Canada but some of it from the farmers in western Canada—$141 million on prairie farm assistance. We have spent the amount, which I referred to a few moments ago, of $22 million on those larger projects. We are committed to complete the St. Mary dam; we are committed to complete the Bow river project. We are under obligation to discuss with the government of Alberta as to whether we are prepared to go ahead with the Red Deer project, and we are under obligation to discuss with the government of Saskatchewan whether we are prepared to go ahead with the Saskatchewan river project. But neither one of those governments has any undertaking, either from myself or from the government of Canada, that we are going to go ahead with those projects. We have been discussing the matter from the same point of view as we have always discussed it in connection with the other two projects that are now under way.

What I want to say with regard to the matter is that I greatly regret that the minister of agriculture of Alberta made the statement which he is reported to have made. I have some doubts as to whether he meant what the newspaper says he said. I hope he does not. After all, the question whether you are going to build a dam on the South Saskatchewan river is not a question which concerns the province of Alberta beyond the fact as to whether there is sufficient water that ought to be allowed to cross the boundary line into Saskatchewan, into the South Saskatchewan river, for that purpose. Even then, it is not their task to decide whether or not there is enough water. It is their task to admit or to determine otherwise, through the water board, as to whether a certain amount of water is going to pass into Saskatchewan; but when one does determine that that amount of water ought to be allowed to pass into Saskatchewan, to my mind it is then a question which ought to be determined and be decided upon by the Saskatchewan government as to what use is going to be made of it; that is, in so far as Alberta is concerned. The province of Manitoba still has a right to come in and to say: You are using too much of the water for some particular purpose before you allow some of it to come on to us. But I do not think that Alberta, once having agreed that this amount of water does go into Saskatchewan, should take an interest in whether Saskatchewan uses it in the dam or whether they use it in some other way. Therefore, I repeat, I would hope that the statement which is attributed to the minister of agriculture of Alberta is not just exactly what the press says it is.

Then I want to say another word with regard to the commission itself. You asked me whether the P.F.R.A. engineers did not make recommendations. You asked me: What recommendations did you make? If you read the order in council of 1947 you will find that there is only one recommendation I could make, and that recommendation was that in my opinion we might declare that the South Saskatchewan river project is one which might be determined as feasible under the order in council of 1947, and therefore I might be asked to discuss it with the provincial government of Saskatchewan, with a definite understanding that I could give no undertaking to complete it until I had reported back to council in Ottawa. That is the basis on which they have all been done.

Some hon. members seem to have doubts as to who is supporting this project and who is opposing it. Well, I am going to tell you this: I do not know any more about who is supporting and who is opposing the project in the government of Canada than you do, and I am going to tell you why. It has never yet been discussed before the government of Canada, and I have good reasons for keeping it in the position where it has not yet been discussed. And the good reasons are similar to those that held up the dikes proposition for thirteen years before it was finally agreed to, but I would hope that this one is not going to be thirteen years. Nevertheless, I want to know that I am right, and I want them to know that I am right before I definitely go to them and insist upon this thing being done. Therefore I come back to the point that the building of the dam never was discussed in council before the 30th day of May or since.

On the 30th day of May I brought in a recommendation to the council to the effect that this matter might be submitted to the Saskatchewan government, and I was asked the question as to whether I had any objections to a commission being appointed, and I said no. So they said: "All right, then we will discuss it after the commission has been appointed and reports", and I said: "All right".

Now, on the question as to the kind of commission that we had, I must say again that I personally recommended every one that is on the commission, including the secretary. The personnel is not the group that I recommended first. Nobody else asked me to recommend any of them. The first three that I recommended consisted of two Americans and one Canadian. The one Canadian was Dr. Hogg. One of the Americans accepted; the other one did not find it possible to accept, for which I am very sorry. Since he could not accept we offered it to three other Americans, one after another, and that accounts entirely for the delay in getting the commission set up. One after another gave consideration to it for two or three weeks, or a month, and then they decided, no, they could not give the time to it. They all wanted to do the job; they would all have liked to do the job; but they finally had to say that their activities down in the United States made it impossible for them to come up here and spend the length of time necessary. When we got to that point I recommended Mr. Gaherty to the government and he was added to the other two, and Dr. Hogg was made chairman.

There has been some criticism of the personnel. I want to suggest this to you. Only one thing was being considered by the government. We had considered all the other things that this commission talks about, and we passed in favour of most of them and we are doing most of them. There was only one thing that we were really concerned about when we submitted this matter to the commission, namely, the Saskatchewan river dam and the reservoir that was going to be behind it. I recall to the minds of hon. members, who have been a little critical, my own statement in connection with the matter, and remind them of the fact that it is not so very long ago that they were twitting me with having said that if the dam went out it would take the city of Saskatoon along with it. They said I was trying to scare people. I was not trying to scare people. We had the experience last summer of a dam almost going out above Swift Current, and I had delegations down here wanting the government to pay for the houses that had been flooded, to pay for everything that happened in connection with it. Fortunately we were able to keep the dam in, but it could have gone out, and if it had gone out a very considerable part of Swift Current would have gone along with it. Therefore, I repeat, we are concerned about whether or not we can keep the dam there.

Having said that, I think you realize that I would have certainly been open to a great deal of criticism if I had appointed George Spence as chairman of this commission last year. I knew what George Spence would want to say without putting him on a commission. I know that he is the best P.F.R.A. official that we have had in western Canada. I know that he is a member of the international joint commission. I know what his views are on the question. I do not need to ask it. As a matter of fact, he was the chairman of the board at the time that I was convinced you could build a dam on the South Saskatchewan river and therefore I have no reason to ask him. I knew too that he would make one of the best representations to the commission when it sat that would be made by anyone. I know George Spence well enough to know that he would do that, and he did it without being asked by me. Then I knew that if it was not satisfactory to him at the end he would make the best criticism of it that anyone has made, and he has done that and it is published in the press. If anyone wants to get the views of George Spence they can get them very easily by reading them. I know what his views are. But if I had appointed or recommended to the government that they appoint one or two men like George Spence on the commission, the commission would not have served the purpose which I had in my mind, nor would it have served the purpose that the government had in their minds. I was satisfied myself that a dam could be built there, but I have gone down underground since that time. I have walked through the tunnels that have been there. I have done that along with engineers and I have been told that the dam can be made to stay there. I have been told by three of the best consultants on the North American continent that the dam can be made to stay there, and after reading this report I am quite convinced that if at least two of the members of the commission had reported as they would like to have reported, they would have said that you could not build a dam there at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who were the three?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Casagrande of Harvard, Mr. Harza, I think his name is, of Chicago, and General Ferguson, who has been a consultant in connection with it right along.

Mr. Drew: May I ask the minister what he means by "if they had been free to report as they would have wished to"?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I did not say "if they had been free to report as they wished to", but if they had reported as they probably thought when they were put on the commission they would have probably said no, it is pretty difficult to put it there. I am saying that because when they were appointed, as I said a moment ago, I was very careful in recommending it to the government not to recommend somebody who had preconceived ideas. As a matter of fact, when we were discussing the last man who went on the commission I made an inquiry of the government myself as to whether they were satisfied that the man did not have preconceived ideas with regard to it.

The reason I am pleased with the report of the commission is this: that feeling that having selected people who would have some reasons at least, or some inclination, to find in the opposite direction, they were unable to say after they investigated the whole project that it cannot be built there.

Now, I was reading from a good editorial —I almost feel like reading it to the house— in the Albertan, which was quite critical of this whole project prior to the time the commission was set up, and which has now written an editorial which I think is quite characteristic of the editorials that have been written in western Canada. I think I ought to read part, if not all, of it. They say this:

> Right after the war the federal government started talking about a large irrigation project on the South Saskatchewan river somewhere in Saskatchewan. The government's efficient prairie farm rehabilitation administration staff went to work on the idea, found a suitable site, drew plans and pursued all the other preliminary tasks. The provincial government agreed to assume a good deal of the cost. As this had long been a favourite policy of Mr. Gardiner, what was there to stand in the way?

Then they go on to say this:

> Then something over a year ago Ottawa decided to have a royal commission look into the advisability of the project. This seemed to many people to be just a stall, but, as the Albertan said then, if there is any doubt about the economic feasibility of the project, it's better to find out now than after the thing is built.

The commission, consisting of three competent engineers, made an exhaustive survey and about three months ago completed its report. But well before it was written, one commission member—

I do not know which one this was, but it gives me reason for what I said a moment ago.

—dropped the hint that the report would advise against the project. Shortly after the report was signed, the word leaked out that that was so. Thus, before the official disclosure of the contents, there has been a general controversy on the findings of the commission. Mr. Gardiner, the P.F.R.A. and many other people have been quite critical. Saskatchewan is quite disillusioned. And now, in the midst of this debate, the report is released. For the first time the public knows exactly what is in it.

As for us, we find it a mixture of good and bad. Among the points that needed saying by someone with the authority of this commission, and which cannot be disputed or minimized, are these:

I am not going to read them all. Perhaps I should read the first one, just to indicate what it is about:

1. Markets are a first consideration. Irrigation means very specialized farming, and that means new crops and new crops mean new markets.

All I will say about that is that it will be ten years before the dam is completed, and it will be at least five years after that before enough land is irrigated to make much difference. Fifteen years is a long time to be preparing markets. No one can say at this time what the market will be. But I would not put as much emphasis upon markets as they are putting upon them at the moment. Nevertheless the report did put some emphasis upon the matter, and they make reference to it.

Then the editorial goes on:

2. There ought to be an over-all approach to the question of river development in the three prairie provinces. This is not something for haphazard growth. The various legal and engineering problems ought to be worked out now, with Ottawa taking the lead although the provinces are in actual control of the rivers. Diversion of the North Saskatchewan to the South Saskatchewan, and the Athabasca and Churchill to the North Saskatchewan, are matters which, if investigated now, might put a different light on the whole matter.

All I wish to say is that P.F.R.A., or myself, through Justice, have entered into all the questions which are referred to here; and we are quite satisfied in view of the fact that these are matters which are the responsibility of the provinces, and not the responsibility of the federal government—ever since the natural resources were returned to the provinces, and since we are simply engaged in the task of handing the provinces something which we think they are entitled to, because we did not make as good a job of settling the lands as we should have made while they were under our administration.

We say that we are prepared to give them something. One of the things we have already given Alberta is the St. Mary dam. One we are in process of giving them is the Bow river project. One we are considering whether or not we will give them is the Red Deer project. One we are considering in Saskatchewan, as to whether or not we will pay for it, is the South Saskatchewan river project.

Now, all you need to do is to take the correspondence at the tail end of the report and read it. If you do you will find that this question has been under discussion ever since these larger projects were first considered. The provinces themselves, under Mr. Bracken's leadership, set up a water board. That water board was going to determine what was going to happen in the different provinces, irrespective of what the federal government did. Two years later it was converted into a board on which the federal government had representation, the chief reason being that the federal government indicated that we were not going to get into any controversy with the provinces of western Canada as to what should be done with water in Alberta in order to transfer it into Saskatchewan. We were not going to get into any difficulty, so we joined in setting up the board, and that board is there. They have the power, the authority and the information upon which to base decision on all these questions raised here.

Then the editorial continues:

3. Irrigation ought to go ahead, in different ways if not in this way.

That is their opinion, I know, but I think everyone here agrees with them.

Of great interest to Alberta is the apparent approval given to the Red Deer diversion scheme which would irrigate half a million acres in east-central Alberta and which, the commission suggests, might be taken well into Saskatchewan.

We have never raised any objection to taking water into Saskatchewan out of Alberta. We have never suggested whether it should be or should not be done because, after all, it is a matter to be determined between the provinces. We have said that if Alberta wants to provide water in the Sullivan dam, or somewhere else, that can be utilized across the line in Saskatchewan, that province should make an agreement with the Alberta government—and it should be done without controversy at all. We are not going to step into the picture at all and tell either of them that they should or should not do certain things.

That is something which we say should be determined as between the provinces, before we are brought into the picture at all. And so we have suggested that they ought to take those matters to the water board and have them settled. After they are settled, we will be in a position to go and talk to them about the other features of the South Saskatchewan.

Then they go on to say this:

> And among the points with which we take issue are the following:

That is, they are referring to the points raised in the commission's report. Then the other points are included. It goes on to say that, among others, the first of these is the estimated cost. I am not going to go into that matter at all. I think it would be better to do so at some other time. However, they do deal with the matter and give reasons for believing why the cost should not be anything like the amount mentioned.

Then they make reference to the size of farming units, and show a statement in that connection—that they do not carry out the experience that has been had at the St. Mary dam or the Bow river dam, and I am inclined to agree with them on that.

Then they go on to refer to the rights of the other provinces, and say:

> The commission seems unduly concerned about objections of Alberta and Manitoba, for, after all, it says, the river belongs to them too. But Alberta before long will be watering close to a million acres from the tributaries of the South Saskatchewan, and Manitoba's fears of losing water power potential are hardly well grounded, with so many other sites available and new water diversion from other watersheds distinctly possible.

Then they just ask this question: What about Saskatchewan's rights? I say again that that is a very fair editorial coming from the province of Alberta. The only objections that have come to this proposal have come from Alberta. I have read the report most carefully and I cannot find that a single individual who appeared before that commission, excepting one engineer from Alberta, raised objection. I think those who base their decisions on that objection ought to go back and look up the records. I am not going to recite them to you today because they are all on record. I have no doubt that some of my friends from Alberta know what the record is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has told us of the difficulties in Alberta and a while ago they made the statement, "We are not in position now to go ahead with the South Saskatchewan river dam." He did not use the word "project". Is it because of the attitude of Alberta that the minister made that statement?

Mr. Gardiner: No, if I made that statement—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those are the exact words.

Mr. Gardiner: I can imagine that a great deal was said before and after it if I said that. In any case, if I did, it simply meant that we have not yet made our decision on the question. We have not yet discussed it with the province of Saskatchewan since the report is out, and until it is discussed we are not in position to proceed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or with the cabinet?

Mr. Gardiner: Or with the cabinet. It has not been discussed at either place. I want it distinctly understood that there is not any trouble between myself and any other member of the government. There has never been any trouble about who was going to be on the commission. The government accepted the commission which I recommended. My chief reason for recommending someone that I was not definitely sure was going to say that you could build a dam was that we should be certain before undertaking the construction that the dam would not go out and take Saskatoon with it. When I found a commission, of the kind which was appointed, not in position to say that there was any danger in building the dam, in so far as my own feelings in the matter are concerned I think I was strengthened. My own views are strengthened by the report of the commission rather than otherwise.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You whispered it to other members of the government.

Mr. Gardiner: I not only whispered it, I said it out loud. This is a matter we are trying to reach a reasonable decision about in the hope that if it is done we will be doing something which is in the interests, not only of the area itself but of all Canada, and that the money, if expended, is going to be well expended on a project of that kind.

Mr. Drew: Just with the idea of clarifying the statement the minister has made, I would ask the minister to clarify what he said about this never having been discussed in the cabinet. Was it not discussed in the cabinet before the commission was appointed to make an inquiry into this matter?

Mr. Gardiner: Not the question of whether we were going to do it. As a matter of fact, the only time that this project as such was discussed was on each occasion when we voted money to investigate it. That has been done every year since 1949-50. There have been definite votes. There was a vote of $7,500,000 the first year and $7,890,000 the last year for large projects. Part of that money was set aside for expenditure on the South Saskatchewan. There is still money in the estimates this year for that purpose. Every year that that was brought up I discussed my estimates with the treasury board and with council and I always submitted an argument in favour of going ahead and making this investigation. Every year the government agreed that the money should be spent in that way and it has been spent in that way.

Coming down to May 31, 1951, I think it was—this is indicated in Hansard—I announced the government's position in relation to it, that they were going to appoint a commission. I repeat now that when I brought the recommendation in, that the matter be discussed with the Saskatchewan government, the Prime Minister said to me—I hope you will not consider this a matter as revealing something that happened in council—

Mr. Drew: You mean the Prime Minister of Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: He just said to me, "Have you any objection to the matter being referred to a commissioner or commissioners?" That suggestion was made in the light of some of the reports that had been made to us, and some other things. I was asked if I had any objection to there being a commission, and I said, "No, I have not". That was the discussion. I came into the house that evening and I reported—this is on the record—and two or three days later I recommended a commission. That commission was accepted by the government. They saw the individuals; two of them accepted and one could not. We went on and finally got the commission set up, and the commission reported.

The commission reported, as you know, on January 12. From that time to this there have been no discussions of it. We have not had an opportunity of discussing it and it has not been discussed up to now. That is the present position.

Mr. Wright: Do I understand the minister to say that he never at any time made a recommendation to the cabinet that the South Saskatchewan river project should be given consideration by the government?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that I had never recommended it be given consideration. I said I had never yet been in position to recommend that it be proceeded with. The reason for that is an order in council, I think it is 2298 of 1947, which definitely states the procedure that must be followed in the case of every large project. Large projects are not built by P.F.R.A., they are carried out as individual jobs or projects. When it comes to the matter of building a dam in Saskatchewan, that is an individual project that will have to be brought up under that order in council.

Under that order in council I came to the government on May 30, 1951, and stated that I thought the matter was in a position where it could be discussed with the Saskatchewan government and I recommended that it be discussed. When it reached that stage they appointed a commission, and it is in that stage yet. The recommendation now would be, not that we proceed with the dam immediately but that we proceed with the discussion with the Saskatchewan government. That would be the proper procedure and it is the one that would be followed if the decision was arrived at to proceed with further discussion.

The Saskatchewan government is now in a position where they know everything that has been represented to us. We know everything that has been represented to them. When the government has given consideration to it, it will be with all those facts before them. If I am directed to go to Regina and discuss the matter with the Saskatchewan government it will be with all those facts before us.

Mr. Wright: In other words, you have never yet discussed it with the Saskatchewan government?

Mr. Gardiner: No, not since 1951, which I think was the last discussion we had with them. In 1950 we discussed it with them and they were not too sure at that time just what they wanted to do. But a few months later they were fairly sure that they wanted to proceed; in fact I think they have been sure that they wanted to proceed since that time, after having had a discussion with us.

That is the position in relation to it. I thought it better that hon. members should know the position as we see it. I will just summarize what I have been saying in this way. The South Saskatchewan river project, so far as we are concerned, is the dam.

Mr. Drew: What does the minister mean by "we"?

Mr. Gardiner: I mean the government. We have never considered anything else, doing anything else but building the dam and putting in the reservoir.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not the government because you have not spoken to the cabinet about it.

Mr. Gardiner: From the beginning when we started to talk about the project as such. I would not just come out and say today, "I am going to recommend this." We have been working on this for ten years. All I am saying is that we have had money voted by the government to work on it. At the end of that ten years I am in a position to say that I think this project is on all fours with the St. Mary and Bow river projects with only one difference, namely, that it will cost considerably more money than the other two. I think we ought to discuss it with the Saskatchewan government. It has got to that stage.

Mr. Wright: How did these items get in the estimates without being discussed by the government?

Mr. Gardiner: There are many items put in the estimates without a decision being made that the job is going to be done this year.

An hon. Member: Window-dressing.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to recall to my hon. friend's mind that I believe there was an item put in the estimates to build a post office in one of the Saskatchewan constituencies away back in the time of Mr. Bennett, and I think it was built last year. The fact that these items go into the estimates should not suggest that you are going to do it next week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question?

Mr. Gardiner: I would say that the South Saskatchewan project, as far as we are concerned—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question in connection with the estimates? Is the item that is provided in the estimates this year for the construction of the dam or merely for preliminary work as in the past?

Mr. Gardiner: I must say this because I will probably be saying it when I come to the estimates and I had better say it now. Sometimes mistakes are made in even putting items in the estimates, and in so far as this particular matter is concerned $500,000 is just as good as $1 million; but when that estimate was placed before treasury board—my hon. friend smiles at that. The fact is that there is an estimate there while the amendment says that there is not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It says for construction of the dam.

Mr. Gardiner: So far as the amount of $1 million is concerned, which is the amount that is supposed to be there—and it can be adjusted to put it there—

Mr. Diefenbaker: For construction.

Mr. Gardiner: —if we once decide to construct the dam I doubt very much if you can spend any more than $1 million on construction in the first year.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Argue: Is that what the $1 million is there for, construction?

Mr. Gardiner: If we once decide to do it, it is.

Mr. Argue: That is not what it says.

Mr. Gardiner: It could be utilized for that purpose. In the second place, the dam would be the final act of rehabilitation in Saskatchewan. We started out to rehabilitate the areas that had not been properly settled. We said we would spend a considerable amount of money on it. By the time we get through with this we will have spent from $7.50 to $10 an acre on every acre of land utilized for this purpose, and that is quite a bit of money. What we have suggested is that all activities and expenditures will at some time or other revert to the province. Our position will be that we have rehabilitated the area and have put it in the same position in relation to Ottawa as every other province, and therefore it is the province's job to go ahead and continue from there.

The only four projects in western Canada that have been proposed on that basis are the four I have mentioned. The only other one which is even similar is the one involving the Assiniboine river in the province of Manitoba where we have been making surveys near the boundary line between the two provinces. When rehabilitation is fully planned and finally under way, an act generally applicable to all provinces based upon benefits to agriculture should replace the present P.F.R.A. legislation. I think we have discussed the possibilities of that every year now for the last three years, and I would say again that, in view of the change in attitude toward expenditures, provincially and federally, there will be good reason when we draw toward the end of real rehabilitation work to have an act based upon our experience in that area which can be applied in different parts of Canada to take care of soil surveys and other activities in connection with the improvement of farm lands across Canada.

We feel that if there are differences among the three western provinces with respect to the utilization of the water in the Saskatchewan river basin they should meet under the waters board and remove these objections, whatever they are, before we discuss the matter with them or we will not be able to arrive at very definite conclusions.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question? Can he say whom he refers to in his use of "we" in this prepared part of his statement?

Mr. Martin: He has already answered that.

Mr. Gardiner: I am referring to myself and other members of the government—the government of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister mean the members of the government with whom he has not discussed the matter?

Mr. Gardiner: I think I know them as well as my hon. friend does.

Mr. Knowles: But the minister says he has not discussed the question with them at all.

Mr. Gardiner: I have a pretty good idea what they think about most of the matters I am talking about in spite of the fact we have not discussed them.

Mr. Argue: A one-man cabinet.

Mr. Gardiner: My recommendation has been and my recommendation still is that these two projects, the Red Deer and the South Saskatchewan, be discussed to a final conclusion and that that conclusion be taken up with the two provinces and finally determined upon. That is our intention, and I am not in a position to go any further than that at the moment. I would suggest that I do not see any good point in continuing the amendment to the motion to go into supply in view of the fact that it does not indicate the facts as they are and in view of the fact that I think all members from western Canada will be pretty well agreed on what should be done about the South Saskatchewan river dam. I am not so sure that all members from all parts of Canada would not be agreed. Why put members in the position of having to vote against the amendment just because it contains statements that are not correct or just because, if it should be passed, it would be interpreted by some people at least as a vote of want of confidence in the government? Why should they insist on that? The objective of all of us is to try to set up conditions under which this project will be carried through, and I think the sooner we get down to the estimates and get talking about something when we have decisions made the better it will be for all of us. I would therefore suggest that we drop this discussion and go on to something else. I hope my friends will agree with that for the moment, and then we can finish this discussion at the proper time when we have all the information before us.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the minister's very interesting hour and a half speech on the South Saskatchewan dam project I am afraid I am no more convinced now than I was before he started that the people of Saskatchewan are receiving a fair deal with respect to the project. In fact, I am becoming more and more convinced that they are not.

Mr. Dechene: Who cares what you think?

Mr. Hees: This afternoon the minister discussed practically everything else except the reason why the government has not proceeded long ago with the project which he has been promising the people of Saskatchewan for a long time. This afternoon the minister said that he had not been promising this dam. I should like to read a quotation from the Regina Leader-Post dealing with a speech that the minister made at a luncheon gathering of the Regina board of trade on April 27, 1946. The report reads as follows:

> The dominion government had already mapped out a program, and it was a program involving $110 million. This would be used largely in providing for the storage of water and partly for the distribution of this water where needed. The dominion government thus did not need the endorsation of the South Saskatchewan river development association to begin work on the South Saskatchewan river. It had already decided to go through with it.

The article reports the minister as going on to say:

> —a decision would be reached on where the dam on the South Saskatchewan should be placed. It would be on one of three sites between the Elbow and Saskatoon. As soon as the site had been finally decided upon contracts would be let, and work would proceed immediately.

That is seven years ago. Well, listening to the minister's speech this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I was reminded very much of the speeches we have become used to from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) because we took a cross-country tour and we arrived absolutely nowhere.

We learned only two things: first of all that the matter has never been discussed in the cabinet, and the probability is that it will not be discussed for an indefinite period of time; and the second, a most interesting thing, and these are the minister's own words because I jotted them down as he spoke, "the commissioners were not free to report as they would have desired". That I think is a very interesting thing to have learned.

Mr. Gardiner: Of their own choice.

Mr. Hees: Well, I jotted that down.

Mr. Gardiner: There was an explanation given. I do not think my hon. friend wants to be fair. I was asked about it at the time I made the statement. I explained what I meant and I think that is what should be stated now.

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, it has convinced me that the commissioners were not reporting as, in all probability, they would have liked to report. That is the impression that has been left with me.

Now, the minister told us that the cabinet would like to reach a reasonable decision upon this matter, but I want to ask him how in the world we are ever going to get anybody to reach a reasonable decision on anything if they refuse to discuss it. He told us that this thing is probably not going to be discussed for an indefinite period of time. I would like to know how this thing is ever going to be approved unless the cabinet is going to come to grips with it. From what I can see, they just want to promise it for the next election and then put it off, promise it again and put it off—just to keep the old evergreen tree in the forest ever growing.

An hon. Member: They are going to be here a long time.

Mr. Hees: If these promises are not going to be kept you will not be here after the next election.

An hon. Member: You said so yourself.

Mr. Hees: I said you people could promise them—and you can promise them just as well in opposition. You do not have to be in government to promise them. You can do that in opposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: We will give them four more weeks. Now, Mr. Speaker, after studying this South Saskatchewan project report, I have been left with the very definite impression that the commissioners must have received a directive from this government to bring in a report proving that this dam should not be built. I come to that conclusion because practically no attention has been paid to the great number of benefits that would derive from this project, and all attention seems to have been concentrated on the few drawbacks. So, I am left with that impression, and it is a very disturbing impression to receive when there had been expected a free commission with tremendous experience which could have been expected to bring in a report that one could really rely upon.

Another thing the minister said this afternoon was that the people in Alberta had no concern whether this project was built or not. That is a statement I wish to disagree with very heartily and I want to say that this project is not only of importance to the people of Saskatchewan but it is of prime importance to all of the people of this country.

Mr. Gardiner: Might I just say, as a matter of keeping the record straight, that what I said about Alberta I read from an editorial published by the Calgary Albertan in the city of Calgary. I do not think even that meant just exactly what my friend has indicated.

Mr. Hees: I was not trying to misinterpret the minister's words but I understood the minister to say that he agreed with the editorial, that is all.

Mr. Gardiner: I did, but the editorial does not say that.

Mr. Hees: As a resident of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, I have learned that the prosperity of Ontario depends very largely on the prosperity of all other parts of the country. We, in central Canada, have learned that we cannot be prosperous unless the west and the maritimes are prosperous as well. So, I feel that statement about other provinces not being interested in this project is a completely erroneous one.

Mr. Gardiner: Who made that statement?

Mr. Hees: It was a statement made in the paper and I understand and still believe that the minister agrees with it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member must take the minister's word for what his statement was. The minister stood up a minute ago and explained what he did not agree with and told what he agreed with —and so the hon. member must accept the minister's word for it.

Mr. Hees: I did not understand the minister to say he disagreed. I thought he said they were not his words but that he was reading from an editorial.

In addition to providing much-needed irrigation for the farm lands of Saskatchewan, one of the things that appeal to me, as someone coming from central Canada, is the fact that this project would provide very important sources of hydroelectric power for the people of Saskatchewan, and would make it possible to bring industries to that province to make their economy less dependent on agriculture.

I believe that if we are going to build a stable economy in this country, we must make it possible for industries to move to the prairie provinces and to the maritimes. That cannot be done unless provision is made for hydroelectric power. That is the first step, and I believe that this project is an ideal example of just how that can be done.

I believe that this is the kind of project that can only be undertaken by government, because of its size. I believe that this is the kind of project that government should undertake, and it is for that reason I strongly urge this government to go ahead with the project.

I believe that they will be doing a great service, not only to the people of Saskatchewan, but to all of the people of this country. I believe that it will be a very forward step in making possible diversification of industry right across this nation. That is a most necessary step if we are to arrive at a really stable economy.

I was out in Saskatchewan a year ago and I talked to a great many people who would be affected by this project. I was first of all very much impressed by the stories they told me of conditions that existed in the area during the thirties. I was amazed that conditions could be so bad and last for so long. I was also very much impressed by the fervent hope that had been engendered in these people by what they considered to be the firm promise by this government that this dam would be built. The minister has said that he has not promised that the dam would be built; but he has certainly created an impression in the minds of the people of Saskatchewan that this government would proceed with this project. I appeal to him on grounds of political honesty, if nothing else, because in some way or another the people in that area have been convinced that this government is going ahead with this project. I urge him on that ground, if nothing else, to do everything that he can to persuade his colleagues that it should be undertaken, when they finally get around to discussing this project.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Tell them about it anyway.

Mr. Hees: Yes, tell them about it. Discuss it back and forth. I urge the minister and the other members of the government to go ahead with this project at the very earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): As a speech the minister's was a fine statement. He talked for some hour and a half but I am not sure that he had sufficient time to make himself too clear.

Mr. Gardiner: I might say that if I had not been asked any questions I would have got through in an hour and made it clear.

Mr. Knight: I am not interested in the history of the past. At the moment I am interested in what the forecast is for the future.

The minister did give us, although he did not need to give it to us, his own personal view that he is in favour of the building of the dam. We have known that for many years since he has made it the basis of many election promises and the minister knows that is true.

He said, in the course of his speech, that he had never said the dam would be built. He could not say that without cabinet consent, but he did promise it in the political sense—and the minister need not shake his head at me. I heard him at the technical school in Saskatoon—he promised $110 million of expenditure of federal money on the undertaking, if we may call it that, the next year. I know there was certain mention of Alberta, but I also know that at that time the Saskatchewan project was supposed to cost only $65 million, and I know that in the minds of his listeners and in the press—because I have the clipping—$110 million was promised.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. Reference has been made twice, both by the hon. member who preceded him and by the hon. member who is now speaking, to an expenditure of $110 million. That expenditure which was under discussion for some years was an expenditure that was reported here to the committee of this house in 1943 and it was $110 million covering all four of these projects. We know now that it is much bigger than that.

Mr. Knight: Exactly. It covered those four projects. It included building the South Saskatchewan dam, in those days a project the estimate for which was much less than at present. Certainly we had the conviction that that amount of money at that time would have covered it, whether that was right or wrong.

I took down a note or two of some of the minister's remarks today and I might deal with these first. He expressed his personal view, but at that particular time I had the impression here that he was not expressing the view of the government. He did that later. He was asked about the word "we", and I will come to that matter later. But he did not give us any decision as to action or inaction as the result of this report. I propose to keep to the subject in spite of the smoke screen that was laid down by the minister, as he is so capable of doing. I remember what happened once before when I twitted him—if that is the right word—on this particular matter. The minister has a habit, when you ask him question A, of going to question B; and as the former member for Cariboo said at the time, then we are all at "C". As a matter of fact that has been the situation in so far as the people of Saskatchewan are concerned ever since 1943, when the minister started this campaign—a campaign, may I say, of various kinds.

I believe in taking the minister at his word, but my word is also of some value. I know what I heard him say on the radio and I have seen him quoted by men whom I consider to be good reporters. I know they can make mistakes; they have made some with reference to myself. The minister says this—I was amazed at this statement—and I wrote it down as he said it: "P.F.R.A. is not associated with the building of the dam". We know it is not the job of P.F.R.A. to build the dam, but I should like to have the minister check the figures. I might say to him that when he gives 1946 or 1947 as the date of any survey into this matter, it goes back further than that. In the sessional paper No. 170B of Tuesday, February 3, I asked the question:

> What was the total amount spent by P.F.R.A., since and including 1942 to the present date,—

And then note the words:

> —upon studies or surveys of the South Saskatchewan river project.

The question is clear enough. Then we have the answer. We have a total expenditure, for the years for which I asked, of $2,780,489. I am going to suggest to the minister that that is a great deal of money to spend on a survey for one project and that it must have resulted in the accumulation of a good deal of expert knowledge with regard to that particular project.

Mr. Gardiner: Would my hon. friend allow me to answer the question he raises? This report says that the money was spent out of P.F.R.A. funds down to 1948-49. Some money was spent under P.F.R.A. each year during the period when we were investigating the possibilities of building a dam somewhere in Saskatchewan. When the location was determined, from there on it was $869,000 in 1949-50 and large sums after that, not taken out of P.F.R.A. but out of the major projects vote.

Mr. Knight: I think my question was fairly specific and that I obtained a reasonably specific answer. My interpretation of that answer is that P.F.R.A. spent almost $3 million specifically on surveys into the practicability of building what is known as the South Saskatchewan dam.

The next thing I come to is the part where the minister says the matter has never been discussed in the dominion cabinet. I have always admired the minister as a missionary for this project before the cabinet. I can only say I am disappointed that the matter has never been brought before that body. The situation looks bad. I would suggest that it does not look as though the minister had any particular faith in his colleagues, or else it looks as though his colleagues have no particular faith in him. Yet later he uses the term "we"; and in reply to a question he said that that "we" referred to himself and his colleagues in the cabinet.

I was interested to know that the members of the commission had been appointed by the Minister of Agriculture himself. Then I was astonished at the following statement; I am not sure that I picked it up properly. Apparently he was pleased with this report because, forsooth, it finds in the opposite direction from his own personal favourable opinion.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no.

Mr. Knight: That is as I understood what the minister said.

Mr. Gardiner: If the hon. member wishes to be clear on that point may I say that what I said was the very opposite. I said the fact I was concerned about was whether a dam could be made to stay at that location. They have not said that it could not be made to stay there, a fact which has justified me in thinking it can stay there.

Mr. Knight: I thank the minister. The next statement I come to is the statement that there had not actually been any discussion with the province of Saskatchewan. That also is an amazing thing to me in view of the correspondence, copies of which I have here, between Premier Douglas and, may I say, the minister himself. It is dated 1951. I might quote a line or two from it. This is from Premier Douglas and he is addressing the Minister of Agriculture:

> My colleagues and I are most anxious that the South Saskatchewan river development project shall be proceeded with at the earliest possible date. As soon as the federal government has announced its intention—

If there has been no discussion, I suggest that it would be difficult for them to announce the intention.

> —to proceed with this undertaking we are prepared to negotiate and sign an agreement on the basis of the allocation of costs outlined above.

Just in case we might not be sure that the minister had received that communication, here is the answer to it written by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to Hon. T. C. Douglas:

> I note that as soon as the federal government has announced its intention to proceed with this undertaking your government is prepared to negotiate and sign an agreement on the basis of the above allocation of costs.

Mr. Douglas said in a letter following:

> In view of the foregoing, we cannot see that any further delay is necessary. We would urge again that the government of Canada should recognize its obligations in this matter and undertake the immediate construction of this project which will undoubtedly benefit the nation as a whole and Saskatchewan in particular.

My own idea about this commission being set up was this. I did not see any necessity for a commission at all. I was basing that view on the fact that if $3 million had been spent by competent engineers solely on the study and survey of this particular question, then everything that could be said had been said. I suggest that is the reason the people of Saskatchewan got the idea that this was simply another stall to put the matter off for a year in order to give the minister time to bring the matter before the dominion cabinet for discussion. At any rate the letter continues:

Dr. L. B. Thomson has in fact expressed to us—

Again this is a letter from the premier to the Minister of Agriculture.

—the view that no irrigation project in Canada has ever been so thoroughly and carefully documented as this proposal.

Mr. Douglas says:

We cannot appreciate the need for this further review, but are of course prepared to co-operate with the committee in any way we possibly can expedite their work.

That seems a reasonable position to take. Now that we have finished the discussion with the minister, the main thing is that we have to keep our eye on the ball. If I may use the vernacular, the main thing is, where do we go from here? What is the prospect for the future? Judging by the minister's statement today, I would think it is not very bright. He has been talking of ten years, fifteen years and so on. Of course he has this justification, that we have been ten years or fifteen years in the past and that again can be translated in terms of another ten years or fifteen years in the future.

As I see it, the main thing we have to concern ourselves with is that the report of the commission on this project has been unfavourable. Like other towns in the district, we in the city of Saskatoon are terribly disappointed. We are progressing in that town. Things have been progressing. We will be getting natural gas next year. It would seem that electric power will be cheaper there in the future. We had hoped that this project would have increased the population of the surrounding area, would have increased and made more profitable business in the city, and that we might have had a beginning of heavy industry owing to the fact that power would have been abundant and that more local markets would be available. Therefore I do not think anyone there or in the surrounding territory will accept this decision of the commissioners as final. We think there should be a further investigation before this matter is completely written off.

Previous speakers have opened wide and deep holes in the report itself. I shall not do that. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), among others, took the report paragraph by paragraph and gave it some criticism.

There were two circumstances particularly conducive to an unfavourable report. One of these was the fact that the district, as the minister well knows, has for the last two years enjoyed a much better rainfall than it had throughout the previous years. That is to say, the commission held its sittings after two of the most prosperous years, in the matter of wheat crops owing to extra precipitation, that we have had in our history. If that report had been written by men who were sitting in a hotel room full of dust, with dust all over their tables, dust on their floors and wind howling outside the window, I fancy the report would have had a different complexion. If it had been written in the year 1936 or 1937 it would have been different. The other unfortunate thing is the death of Dr. Widtsoe who, as I see it, was really the only irrigation man on that commission, because I understand the other men can be classified as power engineers. They were interested chiefly in the potential production of power from that project.

Well, we must not allow a red herring to be drawn across the trail. By the term "red herring" I refer to these counter-proposals, most of which I think would favour the province of Alberta. Alberta has already benefited from any irrigation work the dominion government has undertaken. I came across an editorial in the Leader-Post which says:

Up to now, condemnation of the report has been unanimous, in Saskatchewan at least, although a contrary note has been sounded in Alberta where that government's minister of agriculture expressed gratitude to the commission and declared, in effect, that its recommendations were exactly what the neighbouring province wanted.

I do not know whether that is the statement to which the minister referred when he said he could hardly believe that the man meant to say what he was apparently reported as having said, and I share that feeling with him because I do not think Alberta, which has nothing to lose in this particular matter, would give this as their considered opinion about a thing which would so benefit the population of a neighbouring province.

These other things of course are only supplementary. They are not substitutes for the main project. The main objection to the project in the report is the cost. I think the estimated cost was $247 million, and I believe they raised that to $250 million. A great many other people do not accept that figure. It is about twice as great as the estimate of the P.F.R.A. engineers, and I do not believe their estimate was given very much before this one in point of time. We have always wondered why the P.F.R.A. engineers were not given an opportunity to come before the commission to say whatever they had in their minds. We think the government was in some way or other opposed to its own engineers and officials going to the place where they might give opinions favourable to the project.

Mr. Gardiner: May I repeat what I said the other day. These men were available to the commission at all times, and the commission did see them about all these matters.

Mr. Knight: Not in a public hearing.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, that is not necessary; they saw them and had their opinions.

Mr. Knight: That may be so, but they certainly were not called before a public hearing.

As to the talk that this great expenditure is not justified in the national interest, well, it is apparently in the national interest to spend a billion dollars on the St. Lawrence seaway in the east. We in the west are not opposed to that. I am sure none of our western members has opposed it, or I have not heard of any of them opposing it. If it is for the good of Canada, they are for it. If the government is prepared to spend that much money in eastern Canada in the national interest, we also claim some share of the national purse in the national interest, and we do believe that this project would be in the national interest. That the provincial government has guaranteed to do its share has been amply proven. I am not going to read the correspondence; it is all on record. I think it has been put on the record earlier in this debate. I refer to letters from Premier Douglas.

After the 1949 election, when the Minister of Agriculture came back and told us so blandly that we could not do anything without the consent of the province, I think Premier Douglas sent either a letter or a telegram to the minister assuring the minister of that province's co-operation. And in the face of changed circumstances, even if the cost in this report were accepted, there is the record of the correspondence between Premier Douglas and the minister in which the premier again, in spite of the raised estimate, assured the minister of his co-operation in that regard. I think the correspondence was put on the record by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). I am not going to touch on it today.

[Mr. Knight.]

I have said that the P.F.R.A. officials had valuable evidence which they could have submitted had they been asked for it at a public hearing. We do not know what they said privately to these engineers. We are not interested, because this is public business and public business must be a matter of record. I suggest that these are men who know something about the thing they are doing. The minister will agree with that, and furthermore these men have lived with it. I do not mean that metaphorically; I mean it literally. They have lived there in Saskatchewan doing their work. They understand the conditions. A lot of them have lived there during the dry years. They made extensive studies. As I have said, a large amount of money has been spent on these studies. The amount spent on studies and surveys was $2,780,489. I suggest that when the commission was set up, to a great extent the facts were already known. I have already quoted Mr. Thomson's remark in that regard.

Now, I am not going to suggest that these latter surveys, the ones that I do not think were particularly necessary, were made purely for political reasons. But I do say that their outward manifestation certainly did not do any harm to the Liberal party in Saskatchewan throughout those years. People who see these engineers with their cars and bulldozers working along the river bank will say, "This government is really going to do something".

As a matter of fact I have come to be just a little bit political. As I say, I think the whole political history of the thing has been somewhat unsavoury. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has done much to promote this idea and, more than that, to popularize it in the public mind. Presumably this is done in the interests of the nation, but if a little popular favour happens to fall his way or to his side, and he can garner a few votes, that is all to the good, of course.

We do not blame him for that, so long as he fulfils the promises he makes. In 1944 the vast sums to which I have referred were promised; I have heard the minister make reference to them, myself. Then in 1945, before the election, it was exactly the same thing. Then came the by-election in Rosthern. I believe it was in 1948, when the junior member for Rosthern (Mr. Boucher) was elected. We had maps—do you remember the maps in the Star-Phoenix, and in other papers?

Mr. Martin: The by-election was in 1949.

Mr. Knowles: It was 1948; he came here in 1949.

Mr. Martin: I took part in it.

Mr. Knight: With all due respect to the minister, I would just as soon trust the memory of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Martin: All right; but if you want the truth I will give it to you.

Mr. Hees: If you want the truth, go to Paul.

Mr. Knight: I do not know whether the minister perpetrated the material put out by our Liberal friends at that time, but everybody knows that the Rosthern area is for the most part away up north of Saskatoon, and would not be affected by this project. But they have lakes and rivers all over that map.

Mr. Gardiner: It is the same map that is in here.

Mr. Knight: Then on October 20, 1948, the then member for Rosthern, Mr. Tucker, said, "It is up to the people of Rosthern to give their endorsation to Mr. Boucher, the Liberal candidate, if they want the project proceeded with".

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member permit an interruption?

Mr. Knight: Is the minister objecting to what I am saying?

Mr. Martin: No. I want to correct what I said a moment ago. For the first time in many weeks the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was right.

Mr. Hees: And Paul was wrong. Well, what do you know about that?

Mr. Knowles: As the minister knows, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is always right.

Mr. Knight: I am going to suggest that there is a threat in what was said by Mr. Tucker at that time—"if they want the project proceeded with". There were lots of statements. It was a subtle sort of thing, with references to the necessity of a more co-operative government in Saskatchewan. There was a suggestion, for instance, that if we had a government in Saskatchewan of the same political complexion as the federal government, it would be much simpler to get these things done. Then Mr. Boucher came to Ottawa; and I now hear that Mr. Tucker has decreed that Mr. Boucher is to leave Ottawa.

In 1949 we had the same problem, this time just before a federal election. "Send me down 14 Liberal members," said the Minister of Agriculture and Mr. Tucker, "and everything will be fine." Well, the Liberal members came down, but we still have no dam.

Mr. Knowles: Just the members.

Mr. Knight: I remember that in 1949 someone sent me a specimen of the election literature of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) in which he said, "Send me to Ottawa, if you want water in Regina." Well, Regina still wants water.

Mr. McCusker: They are building the pipe line now.

Mr. Knight: My hon. friend reminds me of a bus driver I met in the north of Ireland. I had been travelling for three weeks, almost always in the rain, going east to the Atlantic coast, going across on the boat. For three weeks it rained steadily. I said to the Irish bus driver, "Is it always raining like this? Does the sun never shine?" "Oh," he said, "sir, just give it time." And I presume my hon. friend from Regina will be saying at the next election, "Just give us time and we will get you water, and a lot of other things."

Mr. McCusker: You will have it there.

Mr. Knight: The amazing thing was that when we came back in 1949 the minister was very genial. He had just won and was very pleased. When we said, "Well now, here you are with your Liberal majority; when do we get the dam?" he said, "Well, you cannot do anything without the co-operation of the provinces." Premier Douglas' letter was swift in reply to that.

But still nothing was done. I remember suggestions that the minister had changed his attitude, and he said, "There is no change in attitude. It is our child. Why should we desert it now?" Well, I should go back to my Irish history again. I remember that when certain old ladies went around in the cities wearing their black shawls and begging for money they always borrowed a little child, because it would make a better appeal to the public. It makes me think of the minister whose child, this project, has never grown up. It is just the same size year after year; and between elections he would like to leave it on the provincial doorstep.

Here we are in 1953, with another election in the offing. I can say that we, all of us including the minister and the government have come to the end of the road. The minister told us that he had gone underground. Well, that is a very significant phrase. If he knows anything about English hunting he will know what that phrase means. A better expression would be to say that he had gone to earth; that is the phrase they use.

It has been a long road; I cannot call it a crooked road because that might be unpar liamentary; but I can say it has been a tortuous one. I suggest the minister is now at the end of it. We have now come to the time when there can be no more deviation. Now is the time of decision.

I note that the minister described the report as a silly dam report; I suggest he could have changed the order of the words and still have been right. I am pleased to note that the minister is still in favour of the project.

Mr. Knowles: It is all a matter of how you spell it.

Mr. Knight: But I would like to remind the minister, when he is thinking in these terms, that a negative decision involves him as the responsible minister of the government, whether he is in favour of it or whether he is not in favour of it personally. And I suggest he had better find out as soon as possible. Since he has never discussed the matter with the cabinet, I suggest now would be a good time to start because, as I have said, he will have to shoulder the responsibility for that decision.

There has been some talk of what was said and was not said away back in 1943. There have been references to what was promised and what was not promised. It all looks very confusing. I ran into an interesting thing which goes back to 1944 or 1945, certainly to a time prior to the 1945 election. Then a Liberal candidate speaking at Moose Jaw before the election of 1945 said:

> There is still a lot of detail work to be done—

He can say that again now.

> —but the main lines have been thoroughly gone into and it has been found to be economically sound, and will be commenced immediately the men are available to do the work.

At that time there was a shortage of labour. Then there was a paid advertisement in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald under the sponsorship of the Liberal party of Saskatchewan. This was just before the election, and it read:

> The southern Saskatchewan Thunder creek irrigation project alone will undoubtedly contribute much to the prosperity of both our city and surrounding district, which interests are interlocking. This project will be commenced immediately men and material are available.

Mr. Gardiner: Finished long ago.

Mr. Knight: Then on the last sheet there is a quotation from a broadcast, I presume a political one, made by my hon. friend the attorney general of Saskatchewan. This is back in 1944, previous to the 1945 election. What a prophet he was when he said:

> I am prepared to go out on a limb and predict that in spite of their definite promises and pledges the Liberals will advance the scheme just far enough in the next four or five years to use it again as bait in the next federal election. I realize I can be made to look foolish if the prediction turns out wrong but I know the Liberals well enough to be without fear that the limb I am on will break off under me.

Mr. Knowles: How right he was.

Mr. Knight: How right he was. One can get a certain amount of humour out of this situation, but I should like to say just a word or two to my hon. friends who live in eastern Canada. Their problem is not caused by not having enough water, but by having too much. You have it all around you in your lakes, rivers and streams. I do not think my hon. friends from the eastern part of Canada can get the picture at all, for instance in regard to dry farming. They are not dry farming conscious; they are not drought conscious.

It is true you had a depression here, but we had to face the effects of that world depression plus the ruination of our farm industry by drought. It was a case of depression plus starvation. In the east you had some industry, there was something going on, and you had food. May I say that food was one thing which some of the people in those areas in Saskatchewan, as my hon. friends well know, just did not have.

In thinking of the national interest, let us consider what was spent on relief in those days. I have not the figure, but I believe it was $187 million.

Mr. Knowles: Altogether, over the period.

Mr. Gardiner: $186 million.

Mr. Knight: I know there were two 10-year periods when the amounts spent were practically the same, and my point is that if those amounts were added together you would have enough to build this South Saskatchewan river dam. It would have been more than enough to build it in those days. That money came out of the pockets of the national taxpayer. These things recur; this may happen again and this dam and irrigation project would be insurance against that particular type of misfortune.

My eastern friends have had no experience with drought. They do not know what it is to live through a dust storm, to see the constantly-sifting sand piling up on the road allowances in great mounds by the telephone poles, mounds which are still there today but fortunately now covered with green grass. I noticed one silly line in the report where someone said that after all green grass did not bring about a prosperous economy. I want to say to him that the difference between green and grey is a matter of life and death, the difference between starvation and existence.

Many people in Saskatchewan found that out. Men had to shoot down their stock with the possible exception of one milch cow. A farmer would go to the nearest town to buy a single bale of hay to haul back in his buggy to feed the cow. People in the east have no conception of these things. They have no idea how the Russian thistles piled up against the fences and gates. They do not know how our precious six inches of topsoil, practically our only source of wealth in Saskatchewan, was deposited in the ditches and along the road allowances or at any point where it could be piled up by the wind. That precious topsoil was depleted. Then we had the invasion of grasshoppers which ate the small bit of green grass that had been left.

There was the trek north. Between 1930 and 1937, every morning in Saskatoon we would be awakened at five or six o'clock by the wagons going north. You would look out and see a pitiful hayrack with a team of thin horses, a cook stove, probably a barrel containing most of the household goods, and sometimes a single cow tied behind. There might be three or four children and the mother. They were heading northwest in pursuit of that green grass which the report says is not too important. It was in that way that Loon Lake and Meadow Lake and many other districts were settled by those who are living there today. Since the rains have come many of them have returned to their old homes.

I have tried to tell of these conditions, but the reality was much worse than anything I can describe. We have seen these things and we are conscious of them. Easterners may not believe it, but every Sunday afternoon in the summer three or four hundred cars will drive up to a small dam near my home for one purpose only, just to watch the water go by. Those of us who came through that experience of drought have a realization of what water is worth. That water is going down to the sea, yet it could mean life to parched land, it is water which would provide a livelihood for farmers, increased prosperity for our towns and added industry. In the name of my own city and the constituency of Saskatoon I ask that this project be proceeded with forthwith.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which was placed before the house on the motion to go into supply presents an opportunity for hon. members to express their opinion as to whether there should or should not be definite provision by the government for the construction of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river along with the other works that would go with it.

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) gave his reasons for not supporting the amendment to the motion to go into supply, and also for not supporting the subamendment.

He says the statement in the amendment which has been moved is not correct. He indicates that there is a provision in the estimates for a sum of money, and for that reason he cannot support the amendment. He has made it abundantly clear in his statement to the house this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, that the figure included in the estimates is not for construction. Let that be clearly in the mind of every hon. member who seeks an excuse in the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon for voting against the amendment before the house.

Mr. Gardiner: In order to keep the record straight, may I call attention to the fact that at page 121 of the estimates there are four items: Bow river irrigation project, St. Mary irrigation project, South Saskatchewan river development, and Buffalo Pound lake reservoir, and the others all include construction. They are all under construction, and there is no reason why this amount cannot be used in the same way.

Mr. Drew: The minister has made it abundantly clear this afternoon that this is not for construction. In fact all his earlier statements would have been meaningless if it were for construction, because he told us this afternoon that he has never at any time said that this construction was going ahead. I must confess that came as a surprise after some of the reports that have appeared from time to time in the press. Nevertheless that is his statement. If that is his statement, then it would seem quite obvious that the item included in the estimates is not for construction. Since it is not for construction then it is appropriate that those members who think there should be construction should have the opportunity to express their opinion in the manner provided by the amendment and the subamendment.

The reason the minister has given for not supporting the subamendment is that the P.F.R.A. engineers have not made recommendations. Some members will have difficulty in determining when a recommendation becomes a recommendation if the statement of the minister is correct. Most certainly the engineers who have served with the P.F.R.A.

administration have been very emphatic in publicly making their recommendation on different occasions that this project should be proceeded with. The report on the South Saskatchewan river project, printed by the king's printer with the heading "Department of Agriculture" and carrying the date of April, 1951, gives a long series of benefits which the engineers say would result from proceeding with this development. They put forward the benefits that would result from irrigation, power, municipal water supply and recreation.

Not only have they given their explanation of the extensive benefits that would result from the development, but in public they have indicated quite clearly their belief that it should be proceeded with. The minister this afternoon has made it rather difficult for us to understand exactly what his position is. He has told us that never at any time has he made the statement that the South Saskatchewan river dam was going to be built. Undoubtedly that will be disappointing to many people who thought he had. Undoubtedly they will expect some further explanation of the reports, which he would now appear to regard as erroneous, giving the very opposite impression. The words he used were: "On no occasion at any time have I stated that the South Saskatchewan river dam was going to be built." Those words make it clear that there should be a motion before the house to give some of us a chance to say by a vote, which is the only way we can say it effectively, that this dam should be built and that the project should be proceeded with.

There is one thing in regard to which I think there will be agreement on both sides of the house. The minister has said that this is not a subject of concern only to the people of Saskatchewan. With that I am sure there will be general agreement. The subject is one of interest to every Canadian who believes that we are citizens of one country, and that it is the responsibility of the members of this house, from whatever part of Canada they come and on whichever side of the house they sit, to bear in mind that our responsibility is to the people of Canada as a people living in one country which we all serve.

The Minister of Agriculture left us in some uncertainty as to what his exact meaning was. In spite of some interesting revelations as to discussions in cabinet council, he has told us that this subject has never been discussed by the government of Canada in council. He left some uncertainty as to that positive statement by his reference to the various occasions when items have been entered in the estimates for the necessary preliminary work. Nevertheless, as the Speaker has pointed out on different occasions, we are bound to accept the statement of the minister; and his statement is that this subject has never yet been discussed by the government of Canada in council.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the question as to whether we are going to build the dam.

Mr. Drew: That is what I understood. The minister has now again confirmed the fact that never yet in cabinet council has the question been discussed of whether or not they would proceed with the dam. On the basis of that statement I submit there is every reason why we should be considering an amendment such as we have before us and why hon. members should indicate to the government by their votes that they do want this project proceeded with.

There may be some suggestion that the facts are not yet available. There may be some suggestion that a further inquiry should be conducted. Surely there must be some end to inquiries before action is taken. Of course I do agree that this government has established the practice of conducting inquiries into inquiries, and apparently it is a habit that is catching. But in this particular case there have been so many inquiries, the subject has been under consideration for so long, that one would have thought that by this time the government would be in a position to hear some discussion of this subject. No matter what the outcome of the vote on the amendment may be, I strongly urge the Minister of Agriculture that for the first time he give the cabinet the benefit of his knowledge of this subject, because I think they might be interested in the South Saskatchewan dam and also in whether or not this subject, which is discussed so much in Saskatchewan, might not also be discussed by the cabinet which is the executive body of parliament.

I for one am greatly surprised to hear for the first time this afternoon that it has never been discussed although we have discussed it so frequently in the house. That very fact of course naturally fortifies the opinion of those of us who think that it should be discussed and that it would be helpful for the government to hear views expressed on it, since they have not received the benefit of the views of the minister in cabinet council.

This subject has been under consideration in different ways for a very long time. In fact it was first discussed before confederation, before 1867. It had been pointed out that it would be highly desirable to augment the waters of the South Saskatchewan river by the construction of a dam at an appropriate place. Throughout long years the possibility of using water power in that river has been under consideration. It is now considerably more than forty years since I visited that river for the first time and was told by people living in that area of the wonderful results that would flow from the construction of a dam, and the use of water for irrigation and power. It has been under consideration for a very long time.

During the years since people were convinced that this would be a desirable project hundreds of millions of dollars worth of unused energy has flowed down that river because the decision has not been made. Throughout all these years whatever water power was there in potential form has gone to waste. Throughout all these years whatever water could have been used for irrigation has also been unused.

Granted that there must always be some time of beginning, granted that the reasons for proceeding with this development were not so apparent in those early years as they are today, the fact remains that throughout the last twenty years at least there has been the most convincing evidence of the necessity for the effective use of the water resources that are available in that area, and for the development also of whatever power potential can be harnessed on the South Saskatchewan.

This subject must be of interest to all members of this house who are called upon to consider other ventures at the same time. To many of us it must seem strange that it is only in the case of this particular development that it seems to be so necessary to refer the responsibility to a royal commission. There was no royal commission appointed when it was decided to support the Canadian Pacific Railway which gave us transportation right across Canada. Engineers were employed by the government and upon the advice of those engineers the government acted. At that time the government was not told that there was no population adequate to use the rail services that would cross the prairies. At that time the government acted in the belief that the way to get population there was to provide that facility.

There was no royal commission appointed at the time it was decided by another Conservative government years later to create the Canadian National Railways by the amalgamation of different services across the country. They acted on the advice of engineers, and the decision was made upon the advice of competent engineers at that time.

There was no royal commission appointed to find out whether it was appropriate for the taxpayers of Canada to construct a canal across the Niagara peninsula. Competent engineers were employed and their decisions and recommendations guided the government at that time. There was no royal commission appointed to inquire into the construction and the subsequent expansion and development of the Sault canals, and the power made available from that source. There again competent engineers were relied upon and the decisions taken on their recommendations.

This house has on different occasions been called upon to indicate its views in regard to the St. Lawrence deep waterway, something that will undoubtedly be of benefit to a particular part of Canada. Nevertheless it is to be regarded with satisfaction on the part of Canadians generally that no local consideration has guided the expressions of members of this house in their discussions of this subject. With admirable recognition of the unity of Canada in matters of this kind, members of this house from right across Canada have indicated their belief that although the development of this St. Lawrence deep waterway will undoubtedly most greatly benefit Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba—and undoubtedly Ontario most of all—it is something that meets with the approval of all members because of the increased economic strength that will come to Canada and the increased production which will result from this development.

I submit that hon. members of this house, on both sides of the house, should regard this matter in the same light and should be prepared to accord the same measure of support to this project in Saskatchewan that they have accorded to the St. Lawrence deep waterway and to these other projects which have all been regarded as part of the expanding development of a great nation. It is in that light that we should express our opinions here.

I was interested in the statement by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) that he would like to support this idea but that the motion, in his opinion, constituted a want of confidence motion and, therefore, he would be unable to support it. One might ask when the members on the opposite side would ever be free to support any such motion. In fact, although I must be very cautious not to suggest any lack of independence in their thinking, one might almost wonder just how that independence is to be expressed if they are to be unable to support any recommendation that has not been put before this house by the government itself. Certainly I would think some of them would welcome the opportunity to assert that independence which has been proclaimed so vigorously in this house by supporting a project of this nature, particularly when it has been stated by the hon. member who moved it that he is quite prepared that this should not be regarded as a want of confidence motion, but rather that he wants this considered as a motion that will permit a free expression of the members of this house that we want this important development in Saskatchewan to proceed as part of the development of Canada as a whole.

That course has been followed on other occasions. There have been occasions when ministers of the crown directly concerned with the subject matter of resolutions have said: We ask that this be regarded as a free vote.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), as the minister primarily responsible in this case, to inform the house that he asks that the vote be a free vote; and that although the government have not discussed this subject, nevertheless they have permitted him to indicate that this motion will not be regarded as a want of confidence motion. That would be very helpful to those who, like the hon. member for Regina, would wish to vote for it but feel restrained because, although they are completely independent, they nevertheless feel concerned about the fact that the vote might be misinterpreted if, by any chance, enough of them voted for the amendment to actually carry it on this occasion.

It would be a very healthy thing, Mr. Speaker, and it would bring fresh confidence to the people of Canada in the real independence of thought in this if, first of all, we had a statement by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture that this is a free vote; and then if we had an indication by the members that they are sufficiently free to support an amendment which has as its purpose the declaration of our common interest in Saskatchewan as well as every other part of Canada. Even if the Minister of Agriculture hesitates to give this assurance in view of the fact that he has not discussed the subject with the cabinet, nevertheless I would hope there would be some hon. members from Saskatchewan and other parts of Canada as well who would say—

Mr. Gardiner: If I may be permitted a correction, I have not moved anything in the house at all. It is not my motion that is before the house, and it is not my amendment that is before the house.

An hon. Member: Just your baby.

Mr. Drew: The right hon. Minister of Agriculture surely can be forgiven for thinking that it might be his motion because he has spoken about the subject so often; and because he has spoken about the subject so often, one would have thought he would have welcomed the opportunity to ask for the free support of a motion which interprets the view he has expressed over and over again in this house and outside of it.

This is not his motion, but I am suggesting that it is a motion that is entirely consistent with the view he has expressed, and that if he will only ask the government to listen to him for the first time in regard to this subject and then, after they have heard him, to give him the authority to call for a free vote, then with that encouragement we might actually get from the members of this house an expression of opinion in support of something that I believe the majority of the members of this house want and would like to vote for if they did not find, for one reason or another, that they were not prepared to declare their opinion at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It will be a nice way to send a message to the government.

Mr. Drew: Since the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has never carried this subject to the cabinet, it would be helpful if someone else did so; and this is one chance we will all get. I would hope that some of the hon. members will look at the situation in that light.

Mr. Gardiner: I have not said that I have not carried the subject to the cabinet. I said that the subject has not been discussed by the cabinet.

Mr. Drew: Am I to take it that the minister carried it to the cabinet and that they refused to discuss a subject which he brought there?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Drew: I am discussing this matter in all seriousness. What the Minister of Agriculture has now said is that he did not say that it had not been carried to the cabinet. He only says that they have not discussed it. If those words mean anything at all, they mean that he carried it to the government and they would not listen to him. We have the chance to ask the government to listen to him on this occasion.

Mr. Gardiner: It has not been discussed.

Mr. Drew: The minister again repeats that it has not been discussed. Since he indicates that he has carried it to the government and that it has not been discussed, may I repeat that this is a chance for hon. members, by their vote, to carry this subject to the government and to help the minister to get this subject before the government in spite of their earlier refusal to listen to him.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, that is carrying the matter a little bit beyond what most of us would find easy to accept. Of course we must and do accept the minister's statement that it has not been discussed. But we thought the minister was one who usually insisted upon being heard. I think most of us will regret to learn that a minister who is so vigorous in his statements in this house is so unsuccessful in making himself heard in cabinet council.

Mr. Gardiner: I will be heard at the right time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You will be heard yet.

Mr. Knowles: The silent member of the cabinet.

Mr. Hees: The silent partner.

Mr. Martin: Silence is golden.

Mr. Hees: It is a little bit tarnished in this case, though.

Mr. Drew: The question of course arises as to why it became necessary to have this commission. I hope hon. members will read this Hansard carefully. I also hope that Hansard records the words exactly as they were spoken on this occasion. I hope that we shall see in Hansard exactly what has been said here this afternoon, because some of the hon. members will undoubtedly have difficulty in understanding exactly what it was that the minister was trying to explain to us when he said that he was really satisfied with this report because of his belief that those who had been appointed were predisposed to find against it.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think some of the hon. members of this house who have been interested in this subject for some time will wonder why men who were predisposed against it were chosen. Not that we would expect the government necessarily to poll them in advance as to what kind of finding they were going to make; but the minister's statement in regard to what he thought their views would be in advance raises some question as to whether the government, in supporting the appointment of these gentlemen to the commission—though they had never discussed the subject—were also under the impression that these commissioners were predisposed against this project.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That might explain why the commission was set up.

Mr. Drew: It may explain why the commission was set up. I think we have a great deal more to hear about this matter.

At the time the commission was set up suggestions were made that this was the reason it was appointed, namely that it was expected that the commission would find against it. At that time the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has moved the amendment we are now discussing, objected to the appointment of a commission on that ground, as did other members of this house; they objected because of the fact that they thought the commissioners were predisposed against it. That concern has been borne out by the report of the commission.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has suggested that we ought to be clear on my position. If I am not clear from what is in Hansard—and I am quite sure that I am—may I say that my statement was to this effect. When the matter was referred to the commission my chief concern was whether or not you could build a dam at that location and make it stay there. Whether or not these men were favourable, if in their own opinion they had any preconceived ideas on it they might have been inclined to say: "Well, maybe you do not need a dam there." That would be my inclination, after having read through their report. But in spite of that being their opinion in the report itself, they have not said that a dam cannot be built on that site and made to stay there. As a matter of fact, the inference from the report is that a dam can be built there and can be made to stay there.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite definite that the report is clear on that subject, that the dam can be built there and will stay there. What we are concerned about is that we want to get it there.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Drew: That is the purpose of the amendment now before the house. A great many members say that they want to get the dam there, which the report shows can stay there once it is constructed.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the most important feature.

Mr. Drew: I shall be greatly interested to see what Hansard says. While I do not claim that I can quote his exact words, I will indeed be most surprised if the Hansard record does not show clearly that the Minister of Agriculture said that one of the reasons he was so pleased with the report of the commission was that although they were chosen with knowledge that they were predisposed against this project, they found it could be done. That was the statement to which I was referring in the remarks that I have just made.

This of course is not by any manner of means the first time this matter has been under consideration. The minister has read from an editorial in the Calgary Albertan. I therefore feel sure that he will not object to my referring to an editorial in the Regina Leader-Post which appeared on February 4 under the heading "Can't Swap Horses in Midstream."

Mr. Knowles: Horses again?

Mr. Hees: Horses again.

Mr. Drew: I hope the minister will not think that in this there is any suggestion other than the ordinary colloquial reference to the word "horse" in a statement of this kind.

Mr. Gardiner: They did not change any horses for ducks, anyway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are not on the payroll there yet.

Mr. Hees: It won't be long now.

Mr. Drew: No; the horses referred to in this editorial are not on the payroll. This editorial has this to say. In view of the minister's reference to the other editorial, I think it might be well to put this on the record:

> The Hogg commission is not the first one to investigate irrigation. In 1941, in order to obtain guidance for its rehabilitation program, the federal government established the Meek commission.
> It studied the St. Mary-Milk river project, and declared in its report the following year:
>
> "It has become a generally accepted principle that the total costs of an irrigation project of this magnitude should not be charged to the lands immediately benefited. To insure completion and successful operation of the project there must be governmental assistance. The development of the St. Mary and Milk rivers project would not only be of benefit locally and provincially but would we believe be to the general advantage of Canada."
>
> The Meek commission recommended that the federal government pay the costs of water storage as a non-recoverable contribution to the project. This subsequently became government policy with the passage of an order in council in 1947.
> The Hogg commission virtually brushed aside this finding of the Meek commission. It loaded all the irrigation and most of the water storage costs on the land and on the basis of the outlandish $250 million cost estimate declared each irrigation farm would represent an investment of $70,000. This was one of the grounds on which it rejected the project "for the present."
> Which was right, the Hogg commission or the Meek commission? Experience in every country where irrigation has been adopted on a large scale proves beyond doubt that the Meek commission was correct in declaring that the land alone cannot carry the full burden of costs. In fact, in the United States it is contended that the national benefits from irrigation are sufficiently great to justify the state paying 85 per cent of the costs—a much greater percentage than is envisaged under federal policy based on the Meek findings.
> If the federal government swaps horses in midstream, while its rehabilitation job in the west is only partially completed, by belatedly rejecting the Meek report and refashioning its policy on the Hogg report, it will be dealing most unfairly with Saskatchewan.

Without quoting the remainder of that editorial, I would simply point out that it does go on to urge that the government proceed with this project which has been so long under discussion.

The commission report on the South Saskatchewan river, which was presented to this house, makes a number of recommendations which are to be found on pages 6, 7 and 8, and which must be extremely hard for anyone to accept who has followed the course of these inquiries over the years by the engineers of the P.F.R.A., by the Meek commission and by others who have inquired into this subject.

The first recommendation deals with the question of the economic returns and says that they are not commensurate at present with the cost of the project, although the project would yield social returns which "while they cannot be measured for the purpose of this report, would be of great value to the region in which it is situated."

The second recommendation says that when the time comes that this project should be proceeded with, those who are making the decision should take these matters into account:

> (a) The prospect of adequate markets for the specialty crops such as sugar beets, canning vegetables, potatoes, etc., that would be grown on the area it is proposed to irrigate.
> (b) The Canadian demand for farm products which, when it comes more nearly into balance with production, would require a more intensive use of land resources;
> (c) A significant change in relationship of the price of farm products and construction costs;
> (d) The necessity for the construction of public works for the relief of unemployment.

These are things that are to be considered before this is to be proceeded with. If the government had waited for population on the prairies before it built the Canadian Pacific Railway there would not be a railway across Canada yet. If the great hydroelectric development in Ontario had waited for customers, there would not be the largest publicly-owned project of this kind in the world today in that province. If in the case of railways built through the north lands of this country for development purposes they had waited for population, there would not yet be any population or any development in those areas.

In this country of ours, with all the immense opportunities that lie ahead, it is our duty to visualize what can come from developments of this kind and not expect the population to get there ahead of the project which is essential for their occupation of that land. If there is going to be population in this central Palliser triangle, then those people must be assured that they are going to have irrigation and power for the purposes of their daily lives in that area. The project must be assured. It must be proceeded with before the population will get there. The government certainly is putting the cart before the horse if it accepts those recommendations as the basis of the timing of this development.

The third recommendation of the commission was:

> The commission finds that the available data, which are by no means complete, indicate that the said project does not represent the most profitable and desirable use which can be made of the physical resources involved.

Why is the information not complete? If the information is not complete, why have we the report? Surely it is a subject that could be considered by competent engineers.

The fourth recommendation is:

> The commission recommends, in respect to No. 3 above, that further study be given to the merits of:
>
> (a) Irrigating the area that needs water most;
> (b) Bringing additional land under irrigation in the Saskatchewan river basin by pumping water direct from the river and from existing irrigation canals or extensions thereof;
> (c) The development known as the Red Deer river project, including its possible extension into the province of Saskatchewan.

The fifth recommendation is:

> The commission finds that the future demand for water for irrigation could be such as to exhaust the available flow of the South Saskatchewan river, and recommends, therefore, that without delay a comprehensive, long-range program be developed that would result, over the years, in the most beneficial use being made in the interests of the people of Canada of the waters of the Saskatchewan river from its head waters to the sea.

The sixth recommendation is:

> The commission finds that to implement a basin program, the conflict between the upstream consumptive use of the water for irrigation and its downstream use for generating power will have to be resolved.

The seventh recommendation of the commission is that requisite data be gathered by the appropriate governmental services, federal and provincial.

After all this inquiry and all these recommendations we have boxed the compass and we are back exactly to where we started. This commission, set up and carried forward at considerable expense to the people of Canada, recommends that the government make inquiries in consultation with the provinces, and presumably act on those inquiries.

Mr. Gardiner: That has all been done, as I said this afternoon.

Mr. Drew: That has been done? And the government has not heard about it?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the government has heard about it. We have got it nearly all done.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid the minister misapprehends the recommendation. This recommendation is referring to the South Saskatchewan dam.

Mr. Gardiner: No. That is my criticism. That recommendation is referring to far more than that. All we thought we were referring to was the South Saskatchewan river dam, but they have covered the whole development of the North and South Saskatchewan river basins; and practically all the work that is recommended there, as I said this afternoon, is already under way. Not only have we the set-up, as the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) knows. There has been a set-up ever since he was associated with it in Regina, gathering all this information from the provinces and from the federal authority. It is all on record in Regina.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The commission never got to see the record.

Mr. Gardiner: They could have seen it; I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was concealed from the commission.

Mr. Gardiner: No; it was not concealed from the commission. It was all there before for them to look at if they wanted to look at it; and they went there and visited Regina and I presume they looked at it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, they did not look at it.

Mr. Gardiner: They do not say that.

Mr. Drew: The report is very clearly written. In the eighth recommendation the commission recommends certain consideration in regard to other developments which are set out. Then there is a ninth recommendation and a tenth recommendation which relate to subjects the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) felt, I gather, were really outside the scope of the original matter; and that, I believe, is in accordance with the opinion of many hon. members.

One of the difficulties one faces in connection with this matter is that on the one hand the minister says, "We have done all these things" and on the other hand he says that this has not been discussed with the government.

Mr. Gardiner: No, not those things. Those matters have all been discussed with the government and passed upon, and they are part of government policy. The matter of the building of the dam has not been discussed by the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, that is it.

Mr. Hees: Why is the government not interested?

Mr. Gardiner: They are interested.

Mr. Drew: Well, the reference to this commission was to inquire into the South Saskatchewan river project. The recommendations to which I have been referring are the recommendations of that commission, which had those instructions; and we now have their recommendations before us.

The commission also makes it clear that there are considerable social advantages connected with the plan. Anyone who has visited the area must know the extent of those advantages. He would know about the abandoned homes and the abandoned school houses in the area. He would know also about the experimental developments that have taken place, and of the demonstration near Outlook which is there for anyone to see, which shows what can be done if that soil is properly irrigated. The minister referred to that, in fact, this afternoon. There is no question but that the soil is rich and fertile, if irrigation can be carried to it.

This commission report does not find that the water cannot be carried there. It does present difficulties. It indicates certain considerations that should be kept in mind. Undoubtedly those considerations should be kept in mind by the engineers of the government. But this report does confirm that the dam can be built at the Coteau creek site. It does confirm that the water is available for purposes of power and irrigation. It does confirm that it is a practical engineering project.

The objections are based very considerably upon the estimated cost, more than twice the amount of the estimates set out in the engineering findings under P.F.R.A. who, basing their findings on 1950 costs, estimated that the whole project would cost about $103,700,000. That would be divided between the dominion and provincial governments. The government of Saskatchewan has stated publicly that it is prepared to accept its share of the cost.

When the evidence is clear that this heartland of Saskatchewan can be improved in this way; when the evidence is clear that an area which has suffered so greatly from drought and the social consequences of drought can be returned to a productive condition; when the evidence is clear that the soil can become perhaps more arable than it has ever been before; and when the reports before us demonstrate that profitable crops can be raised in the area if irrigation and power were made available at the site, then I submit that with the findings of the competent engineers of P.F.R.A. and the findings of other engineers available to us, and with the recommendation of the engineers employed by the government on other occasions, it is appropriate that the members of this House of Commons give a clear declaration of their belief that the government should now say that this project will be proceeded with and that the irrigation and electrical developments will be undertaken so they may bring a new vitality, a new prosperity, a new hope and new population to the people living in that central part of the great Palliser triangle.

Not only are there social and economic consequences, but there is also to be considered the very direct effect this will have upon the people of Saskatchewan generally. It is only natural that people who have been encouraged for so long to believe that this project was going to be undertaken are now discouraged and disheartened by the apparent acceptance of the negative findings of this commission, which was set up with the knowledge that those who were being appointed were predisposed against this dam project.

This project is vital to the heart of Saskatchewan. This project is sound from the engineering point of view; it is sound from the social point of view; it is sound from the national point of view. The only question that could be asked is this: Is it economically sound? The P.F.R.A. engineers and other engineers report that it is. Without making adequate inquiry themselves, the recent commission have given figures which are so highly inflated as to be discredited by anyone who has had earlier contact with the subject.

Let us remember that with the unanimous support of hon. members of the House of Commons steps have been taken from time to time to meet situations arising from unsatisfactory conditions in that area. As the minister has pointed out, the area has suffered great hardship. The government has been called upon to spend money to assist the people there. It would be far better if the money were spent on the productive enterprise that is now before us. The amendment before hon. members gives them an opportunity to support an expression of that kind. I would hope that, first of all, after due consideration the minister would inform members of the house, as ministers have on other occasions, that as has been suggested by the opposition, they are free to vote in support of the motion without its being regarded as a want of confidence vote. Then, with that freedom to vote as they wish I would hope that hon. members from every part of Canada, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, would say by their vote: As part of a great national reclamation and conservation project, we want this development proceeded with right away.

Mr. Bater: May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend tonight to take up much of the time of the house in participating in this debate. At the outset I should like to say that my conscience is quite clear in voting against the amendment and the subamendment now before the house. When we come to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and deal with the item having to do with the South Saskatchewan project, I shall support that item.

I have noticed during the debate that hon. members have gone back many years in the course of their speeches. Some went back to the days of confederation in 1867, some went back to 1916, some referred to the thirties. I could say considerable about the thirties, but I think that period has been pretty well covered. I think the people of Canada are fairly familiar with what happened in the western provinces during the thirties, so I shall refrain from going into that again.

Tonight I intend to go back only to 1951, and for this reason. On July 15, 1951, I started out by motor from my farm. I headed south on No. 4 highway and passed through the towns of Biggar and Rosetown. Finally we reached Swift Current, where we turned to journey west on No. 1 highway. That evening we stopped at the town of Taber in the province of Alberta. I mention this because on arriving there I had my first opportunity of seeing just what irrigation could do. I understand that at that time, because of the rainfall they had been having, it had not been found necessary to use the facilities available, but I could see the facilities that were there if required. I saw sugar beets growing and some splendid grain crops. Unfortunately, about two hours before we arrived in Taber a streak of hail had gone through that country and we saw the effect on those beautiful crops.

The following morning we arrived in Lethbridge where we found great commotion because that afternoon the St. Mary river dam was to be officially opened. Lethbridge was buzzing with people and cars. After lunch I journeyed with many thousands of people down to the site of the dam some 40 miles south of Lethbridge, and had a chance to have a good look at the project.

The official opening was under the chairmanship of our great roving reporter, Mr. John Fisher. The proceedings got under way and, if I remember correctly, the first speech we heard as we looked out toward the Rocky mountains was by the master of ceremonies, Mr. Fisher. He was followed by the premier of Alberta. Then at the appropriate moment the one who was to officially open the dam came into the picture. I should like to quote the words of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) at the time he officially opened that dam. When he put his hands on the lever in the control tower of the irrigation works and released the water from the reservoir into the main canal on its way to the land in the area, he said:

> It gives me great pleasure to turn the waters, from the first nationally-constructed large reservoir, upon the fertile lands of southern Alberta. I consider the inauguration of this policy as the outstanding and most helpful achievement of my period as Minister of Agriculture for Canada over fifteen years. I trust it is only the beginning of a development which will multiply Canadian homes in the west.

The next day it was my privilege to sit in at the annual meeting of the western Canada reclamation association being held in Lethbridge. In the afternoon I was called upon by the chairman to say a few words, and I should like to repeat a few of the things I said on that occasion. One thing was quite conspicuous at that meeting; that was the absence of any representatives of one of the western provinces.

I said on that occasion, and I repeat it tonight, that we as members of parliament, when discussing these large projects, should try to look at them and consider them on a high plane. We should look at them from the broad national viewpoint instead of a narrow provincial viewpoint.

On our way back we were discussing the South Saskatchewan project. I think that project should be proceeded with for two reasons. If proceeded with it would create a lake 140 miles long in the centre of the Palliser triangle and would irrigate some 125,000 or 130,000 acres by gravity alone. I think those two reasons are sufficient, as far as I am concerned, for making a start on this project. I should like to read a short passage from the report, and I quote from page 10 as follows:

> The Importance of the Prairies to Canada's Economy
> 7. The commercial attributes of agricultural expansion in western Canada have been defined with great lucidity by Professor Fowke in his historical review of the economic development of the prairie provinces, prepared for the commission. (Part II, chapter 3)
> Western agricultural expansion, (he wrote), led to eastern urbanization, to the growth and prosperity of commercial and industrial centres. To equip and service the agricultural frontier there was necessarily a tremendous increase in the manufacturing, merchandising and transportation facilities of the country. The frontier farmer is typically a trader. He sells much and buys more, financing the difference by the accumulation of debt. Westward over the continental trade routes, over rivers and increasingly over railways, there moved the manufactured products of eastern cities. Eastward in return there moved the products of the expanding agricultural areas, cereals, livestock and livestock products. The national income and the national revenues multiplied, partly as a direct result of increased agricultural production but more particularly because of the commercial and industrial employments which followed inevitably in the wake of agricultural immigration and settlement.

I mentioned that we should try to keep this on a high plane, and that is just what I intend to do myself. However, I am rather concerned about some of the alternative schemes that may be mentioned. Mention has been made of the North Saskatchewan river. It has been brought into the picture of the South Saskatchewan dam. It is quite noticeable that there are two cities in the southern part of Saskatchewan that are not situated on the banks of a river, and they are having, and have had for a long period of time, a great water shortage. I refer to the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw. On the North Saskatchewan river there are three cities that are developing at a great pace at the present time, the cities of Edmonton, North Battleford and Prince Albert.

So far as bringing water from the North Saskatchewan down to the South Saskatchewan is concerned, may I suggest that this might be a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul. I can tell hon. members from actual experience and knowledge that the provincial department of highways has had great trouble in operating ferries across the North Saskatchewan river during the past five or ten years. Many ferries have been abandoned for no other reason than that during many weeks in the summer and fall there is not sufficient water for them to ply back and forth across the river. They are flat-bottomed ferries, but even so many of them have had to be removed from service and abandoned.

That is one of the reasons the people of the Lloydminster district and in the area across the river north of Lloydminster, where rail facilities are sorely needed, are in dire need of a bridge on the meridian line immediately north of Lloydminster. The fact is that on many occasions when you go down to the ferry you will see a sign as you approach reading "No crossing", and you take it for granted that the water is low.

I know there are others who intend to speak in this debate, but there is one other point I should like to mention. It is suggested that the pumping of water for irrigation would be a cost against the project. Water now being wasted would be used to generate electricity for pumping, so it could not be counted a cost. Is the commission's ratio of values fair, based as it is on land values and commodity prices of the past against costs of construction of today? May I suggest that the ratio has remained the same for the reason that as costs have advanced so have commodity prices and land values.

In conclusion, while many figures have been quoted in the report of the commission and by others with respect to the South Saskatchewan project, I understand that figures submitted by engineers and others engaged in the construction of such projects indicate that the estimated cost of the construction of the dam, which is the federal government's responsibility, would be in the neighbourhood of $68 to $84 million. In view of these figures—and even suppose the cost should reach $100 million—I would say that if money can be made available for the St. Lawrence seaway then money can be made available for this project, because both will be beneficial to the Canadian economy. We have the tools. Let us get on with the job.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, this debate may well be more important than many hon. members realize. If the results of the next election are close, the Saskatchewan constituencies which are affected by this project may decide whether the government wins or loses. In my opinion the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon was disappointing. One fact did seem to emerge, that for this session at least the South Saskatchewan river project is a dead issue.

During the debate so far I have been rather surprised at the attitude of my friends from Saskatchewan who are members of the Liberal party. One member after another, including the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), who has just spoken, the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) and others, has stated that he favours building this dam. If that is so, I cannot understand why they are not prepared to let their votes follow their voices.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is very clear. It reads as follows:

> This house regrets that in the estimates presented to this house no provision has been made for immediately proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

No one can take objection to that amendment. It is a simple one, and I challenge members of the Liberal party from my home province to vote as their consciences tell them. On this issue members from Saskatchewan should be just as unanimous as are the people of Saskatchewan. I do not think this is the time for technicalities. I do not think this is the time for fence sitting. Therefore when the vote does come, I appeal to them to support the amendment.

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture made the rather amazing statement that the cabinet had not yet discussed this issue. If that is so, I respectfully suggest that he bring it before them immediately. If they are not prepared to take a sympathetic viewpoint, then I suggest that he should join the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and resign from the cabinet.

I should like to say a few words to eastern and maritime members. I was pleased to notice this afternoon that a Toronto member, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), supported this project as did the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). It is a project which is national in character. I am afraid that some hon. members like the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Gauthier) have an idea that the project is just another handout for Saskatchewan. I think that is what he termed it at dinner time today.

It is anything but another handout. It is not a government expense. This project is a capital investment, and it is self-liquidating. Over the years it will save this country millions of dollars in relief costs. It will result in the production of millions of dollars worth of additional crops and a great deal of revenue from hydro power. Therefore I appeal to hon. members from other parts of the country to recognize that it is a national project. As has been pointed out, we from Saskatchewan have supported such projects for the maritimes as the Canso causeway and dikes for New Brunswick. In central Canada we have supported the St. Lawrence seaway, in Alberta several dam projects, and so on. Today we are asking for the same kind of consideration for Saskatchewan.

It is quite true that in recent years our province has been relatively prosperous. It is quite true that moisture conditions have been good, but the house must be aware of the fact that another drought can come at any time. As a matter of fact we have had so many good years that, if we can judge from history, another dry period could arrive in 1953. I lived through the last such period and I can say that for several years there was not a blade of grass in the whole province. I saw crops wither and die. I saw thousands of cattle slaughtered or moved out of the province. Dust storms in those days were so severe you could not see across the street. I recall driving a car on many occasions and hardly being able to see the end of the engine for dust. I remember that my home city of Moose Jaw had the water turned off twelve hours a day for about six months in order to conserve water supplies. Our local packing plant had to close down because it could not get water. In the year 1937 about one-half of all the people in Saskatchewan were receiving government aid of one kind or another.

These were the conditions not very many years ago. As a matter of fact you can still find empty houses, schools and ghost towns which are a kind of memorial to the exodus of the people who lived in those areas.

Citizens of Saskatchewan fear that another such period may come along. We do not think that is necessary, because one of the mightiest of all Canadian rivers flows unused right through the heart of the dust bowl and on to Hudson bay. If the government would proceed with this dam the economy of the province could be transformed.

I remind hon. members that many of the so-called backward countries, Spain, India, China and Egypt, have already embarked on far larger projects than the one contemplated on the South Saskatchewan river. Surely then a modern nation like Canada can afford to water our burning plains. I remind hon. members too that since I have come to Ottawa I have seen parliament vote millions and millions of dollars to Britain, Belgium, Ceylon, Holland, Pakistan and other countries. I supported those gifts and I think they were needed; but if our country and this parliament can be so generous to other nations surely it can be equally generous with such a much needed project here at home.

I think the Hogg commission found no major weaknesses in this South Saskatchewan proposal. It did contend that the returns would not be commensurate with the cost. It contended that this dam would cost about $250 million; but the P.F.R.A. a year ago estimated that it would cost only $105 million. For myself, I prefer to take the P.F.R.A. figure. I would point out that the commission used cost figures which were prepared by a Calgary contractor who based his data on the findings of a United States firm called the Morrison-Knudsen Company. According to Engineering News Records of last January, this is the same company which recently submitted a bid of $7 million on a South Dakota project. The Morrison-Knudsen Company bid there was the highest of twelve competitive bids, almost twice the $3·7 million of the successful tenderer. If the company is as wrong on this project as it was on the South Dakota one, I think the P.F.R.A. figure is likely to be a lot closer.

Water is so valuable on the prairies that we cannot afford to let it go to waste any longer. I would join with other hon. members in urging the government at this time to override the recommendations of the commission and start building the dam this year.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to say a few words on the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and also to speak to the speech made this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

I am sure we in the house are glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is present, because the Minister of Agriculture told us this afternoon that this question which has been before the people of Saskatchewan and western Canada for many years, and the report that has been made by the royal commission, have not yet been brought to the attention of the cabinet. I feel—

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Mr. Gardiner: I did not go that far.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that it had not been brought to the attention of the government. I said it was not discussed—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Agriculture is spending the evening trying to get himself out of his loose talk.

Mr. Gardiner: I am spending the evening trying to straighten out my hon. friend from Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Fulton: Have you been changing Hansard too?

Mr. Gardiner: I haven't changed a word. It is just the same as I said it this afternoon, but it is not as my friend from Lake Centre says it is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You see, Mr. Speaker, every time one asks a question of the Minister of Agriculture the answer—

Mr. Gardiner: You are not asking questions, you are making a statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked some questions this afternoon and I received some information which I very much appreciate; and I know that the people of Saskatchewan will appreciate it when they learn of the answers. In the past I have found that the Minister of Agriculture could be described in the words once used by Lloyd George when referring to de Valera: It is as hard to pin him down to any answer as it is to pick up mercury with a fork.

This afternoon the minister made the statement—and if he says he did not he can explain it afterwards—that this report had as yet not been brought to the attention of the government.

Mr. McCann: He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Here is a mind reader. He was not here this afternoon.

Mr. McCann: I was here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was not.

Mr. McCann: I was here all afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, he was not.

Mr. McCann: I was here all afternoon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my hon. friend would devote himself to television and not worry about—

Mr. McCann: I would hate to have your picture on it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You see, Mr. Speaker, how difficult it is. The mind reader who is in charge of the C.B.C. was not here this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Yes, he was.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When I say that, I say that he was not here while the Minister of Agriculture was speaking.

Mr. McCann: I was here and I heard his very words.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member must accept the minister's statement and he must not argue. How can hon. members argue about a declaration made by the minister or any member of the house who says that upon his honour he was in the chamber when another minister spoke? The citation I think is citation 240 or 241, which says when a member makes a statement which is peculiarly within his knowledge it must be accepted. Therefore the hon. member must accept the statement made by the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is particularly within my knowledge, having taken down a record of the cabinet ministers who were here.

Mr. Harkness: There was not one cabinet minister here at one time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will have to ask the hon. member not to doubt the word of the minister; because, as he knows, this subject is not new. The statement made by the minister must be accepted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Citation 240, page 103, Beauchesne's third edition, reads:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian commons that a statement by an hon. member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, . . .

Citation 241 is also clear on the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, all I can say in view of your ruling is that I was present here—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to bring it to the attention of the hon. member that this is not a matter for argument. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) did not make a speech this afternoon. It is merely a matter of attesting whether or not he was here. According to the citations I have mentioned, if the Minister of National Revenue says he was present during the time the Minister of Agriculture made his speech, even if the hon. member does not believe the statement he must accept it. The decision I am making is in accordance with the rules, and it is not debatable.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot listen to two members at one time. The Minister of National Revenue wishes to explain his position.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, on my word of honour I was here during all of the time the Minister of Agriculture spoke; here in the chamber.

Mr. Harkness: It must have been done with mirrors.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no question about that, Mr. Speaker. But at the time the questions were asked of the Minister of Agriculture—and that is the time to which I made reference—

An hon. Member: The Minister of National Revenue was not here.

Mr. McCann: I was here; and you won't say that outside.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: A great big prize fighter. Well, well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think hon. members should present the picture that is now being presented in this house.

An hon. Member: It should be on television.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think decorum is one thing all hon. members like to preserve. We are not going to make much progress if we are going to keep on arguing whether or not a certain member was here in the chamber when he has said that he was here. The hon. member may continue, but I would ask him not to refer to this matter.

Mr. Fulton: I rise to a point of order. Your Honour, I concede, is perfectly correct when you say that an hon. member must accept the statement made by another hon. member as to facts within the knowledge of that hon. member. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you are going beyond what is contained in that rule when you say that an hon. member cannot suggest that the facts with reference to which the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) made his statement were not the facts which were in the mind of the hon.

member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he made his statement that the minister was not here. Therefore if Your Honour refuses to allow the hon. member for Lake Centre to state the occasion to which he was referring you are, I submit, doing a great injustice to the hon. member who first spoke, and are going far beyond the rule to which Your Honour has referred.

To anyone listening to his speech, it appears that the hon. member for Lake Centre has made statements with reference to the presence of the Minister of National Revenue at a time when certain questions were directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It also appears obvious that the Minister of National Revenue has made a statement with respect to another occasion.

Mr. McCann: Not at all.

Mr. Fulton: I submit that it is perfectly within the rights of the hon. member for Lake Centre to make clear the occasion to which he was referring and to continue discussion of that matter in an orderly fashion.

An hon. Member: You are all mixed up.

Mr. Fulton: If Your Honour refuses to allow the hon. member for Lake Centre to further refer to the matter at all, then I submit that it is an application of the rules which is not apt under the circumstances.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am quite prepared to listen to the hon. member for Lake Centre —I thought that was what I had done—if he wants to say exactly to what speech of the Minister of Agriculture he is referring, whether it is the speech that was made this afternoon. Apparently that is the one we are concerned about. If the hon. member for Lake Centre is referring to a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture a few days ago it may be a different proposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the reference is to the one made this afternoon, and if the Minister of National Revenue says he was here, it seems to me that the hon. member for Lake Centre must accept the statement.

In reply to an implication which I rather gathered was contained in the remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), may I say that there is nothing at issue as to the references which the hon. member for Lake Centre might make to the understanding of the Minister of National Revenue of the answer of the Minister of Agriculture. He can talk about that. He can criticize the interpretation, or question whether the Minister of National Revenue heard correctly. He can contradict that. But what he cannot contradict or what he must accept is the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue that he was here during the time the Minister of Agriculture spoke this afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is no reason at all for us to be in disagreement about this matter. The Minister of National Revenue says he was in the house when the Minister of Agriculture was making his speech—

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and I have no argument about that. What I am talking about is the occasion when the questioning took place with regard to the Minister of Agriculture, and when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was speaking, in the course of which the minister was not in his seat in the house.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member did not say that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Wait a minute.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member said I was not in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us clear the matter up. Will the minister state where he was?

Mr. McCann: I said I was in the chamber all the time during which the Minister of Agriculture was speaking, that I spent my afternoon in the house. I was here when he started and when he finished; and on one occasion I was behind the curtain. A gentleman wanted to see me. I was here during all of his speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does that not indicate exactly the foundation for the statement I made?

Mr. McCann: Not at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not television and I cannot see my hon. friend when he is behind the curtain while at the same time saying that he is in the house. That is exactly the point.

Mr. Riley: The hon. member backs out gracefully.

Mr. McCann: There is no disagreement; go ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are all in agreement. The minister was here, but he was behind the curtain and I did not know he was there.

Mr. Riley: Don't spoil your retreat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I hope that clears up this situation.

I was dealing particularly with the speech of the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon.

As he reviewed the history of this project throughout the years he said, among other things, that never had he promised to proceed with this project. I have before me the report of a speech made by him on June 23, 1949, as contained in the Regina Leader-Post. In the report of this speech delivered at Lemberg on that date—which Your Honour will remember was a few days before the election—the following appears:

> The South Saskatchewan project would provide power and encourage building of industries in small towns, provide an incentive for young people to stay in this province. "I think we have made a fairly good start now," said Mr. Gardiner; "send us back to complete the job."

Since that promise was given, what has been done to finish the job? In 1948 the question arose in the house as to the need of money for the purpose of proceeding with the investigation into the feasibility of the project. In 1949 the matter came before the house following the election of that year, and at page 772 of Hansard the following appears:

> If the South Saskatchewan river project was built under conditions that existed some three or four years ago it would cost in the neighbourhood of $60 million.

That is the Minister of Agriculture speaking. Then:

> Mr. Wright: What would it cost today?
> Mr. Gardiner: If it had to be built under conditions as they are today that amount would be increased by perhaps $10 million or maybe a little more. But it would be absolutely impossible to construct the South Saskatchewan river project in less than ten years. The total expenditure required would be averaged out over that period of time at somewhere between $6 million and $8 million per year.

Then again, a little later on, at page 773—

Mr. Gardiner: That is at the time my friends over here were accusing me of not going to build it at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; that is correct. As reported at page 773 of Hansard the minister said:

> Members of the committee and of the house asked the same questions then—

That is when the estimates were up for consideration.

> —as are being asked now and tried to force the government to take the position that we were going to proceed with construction. We said that it was necessary to spend another $2 million before we could make a definite decision on the question whether we should proceed with construction.

That promise was unqualified. Parliament voted that money. It was expended. This was in October, 1949. The expenditure was made and the P.F.R.A. engineers determined the feasibility of this project; and from then on every type of roadblock has been thrown in the way of the project.

Then in 1951 the matter came up for consideration again. It came before the house, and at that time there were some references to the promises that had been made and in particular to the promises made in the Rosthern by-election, which goes back to 1948. On October 22, 1948, Mr. Tucker, who is now leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, spoke on this subject and said:

> He added, "You certainly won't get anywhere by sending C.C.F.ers to Ottawa: the election of Makaroff would be tantamount to repudiation of the great scheme."

Mr. Makaroff was a C.C.F. candidate. I continue:

> "We have now reached the stage where public opinion will have to be mobilized behind the project to help obtain the passage through parliament of the necessary funds." Mr. Tucker continued, "it is imperative for the people of Rosthern to send Mr. Boucher to Ottawa to help Mr. Gardiner in his fight for it."

Mr. Harkness: No politics in it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I have heard nothing from Mr. Boucher on that subject lately. He was sent down here for the purpose of showing parliament that this scheme had to be proceeded with. Then came 1951, and in giving his support to this proposition the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said at page 938 of Hansard:

> I was convinced before we started that we ought to find something that would be absolutely satisfactory. I have been trying to find it for the past sixteen years, and personally I am satisfied it has been found. But I am quite sure that every member of this house would agree that when it comes to proposing to spend $68 million out of the treasury of Canada we should at least ask three men who are experts to examine the records upon which I have based my opinion, and upon which others have based theirs, and to say whether or not they agree with it.

When the commission was set up, its purpose was to examine the reports and ascertain whether or not the engineers and the officials of P.F.R.A. had come to a proper decision. Is there any word in the English language, Mr. Speaker, that will describe what actually happened? With a commission set up for the purpose of examining what had or had not been done by the officials of P.F.R.A. over the years, we have something that is almost impossible to understand. As I remember it the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other day the reason we did not have the P.F.R.A. officials appear before the commission was that these men were government officials and they did not want to place them in a position of having to make recommendations to the government as to what should be done.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member would permit me; I am sure he wants to be fair, and that is not all I said. I said that the commissioners had available to them all the information that had been gathered by the P.F.R.A. officials; that what we wanted from the commissioners was further information and not opinions of our own officials and that we did not think it would be proper to have them go and express their opinions when we were asking this commission to give us further information and to give us their opinions so that we might form our own.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has set out what he said on that occasion in summary form. In view of the fact that he is here on this occasion I should like him to answer this question. In view of the fact that we in western Canada and in the province of Saskatchewan are united in regard to the feasibility of this project and the necessity of going ahead with it, may I bring to his attention the demand of the people in western Canada in that regard and ask him now whether or not, having regard to the report which has been before us, he intends through his government and with his government to give us that which we ask for?

Mr. St. Laurent: The house is not in committee, Mr. Speaker, and it is quite irregular to ask questions; but I would not like to have the hon. gentleman go out and say that he had asked me a question and I failed to answer him. If the house will give me unanimous consent to answer I shall be glad to do so.

Some hon. Members: You have it.

Mr. St. Laurent: The government is not prepared to go ahead, without further information, to recommend to parliament the expenditure of the amounts estimated by the commissioners, and will not take it upon itself to do that until it has further information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the further information?

Mr. St. Laurent: The further information is as to whether or not this is the best use to be made of that great national asset. Personally I think that it is a good use to be made of it, and if I can be convinced to the extent where I can honestly say that I believe it to be the best, I will recommend to my colleagues to make the recommendation to parliament. But I want to be sure that if this asset is used in this way it will not be apparent shortly afterward that there was a better use to which it should have been put.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What proof is required for that?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, the commissioners say there has not yet been sufficient investigation to enable them to say that this is the best use. I do not know of any better use. But they suggest—and they are experts, I am not—that that further information is required to reach a positive opinion as to whether or not that is the best use. I think it would be a good use. I am not frightened at the cost. We anticipated that in the years 1952 and 1953 the cost would necessarily be higher than what had been estimated a few years ago. And the part of the cost that would be an expense to the federal treasury is nothing of the order of $250 million. The $250 million is made up of some elements which would not be at the expense of the federal treasury. Nevertheless the project is one of great magnitude, and it is one that will have to be accepted by the whole of Canada as a good, reasonable project to undertake. Had there not been the suggestion in the report that it was quite possible there might be a better use to be made of that great national asset I would have continued in the opinion that the creation of that body of water in the province of Saskatchewan would be a magnificent thing, and that the indirect, not the direct returns—the direct returns you cannot calculate mathematically —would be a permanent addition to the capital value of this great country of ours.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are making advances as we proceed, Mr. Speaker. That is a long way farther than the Prime Minister or anyone connected with the government has gone previously; and before I deal with what he had to say—

Mr. St. Laurent: That, Mr. Speaker, is not quite fair. I made that statement in the province of Saskatchewan in 1949, before the dissolution of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker; the Prime Minister spoke in Saskatoon in 1949, and in every sentence he uttered he gave complete approval to the proposition and left the indication with the people of Saskatchewan that if his party were returned the project would be proceeded with.

Mr. St. Laurent: No; that is quite wrong. I will not at this time, any more than I did at that time, make representations that I do not firmly believe in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say that the Prime Minister in 1949 offered only one veto, and that was the fear that Saskatoon would suffer what happened to Sodom and Gomorrah, the only difference being that in one case it was going to be by water and in the other case by fire. In 1949 the Prime Minister left the impression—and every Liberal candidate in Saskatchewan was pledged and pledged the government—that this proposition would be gone ahead with.

Finally, after the election was over, the procrastination commenced. First they set up the water board. They did not know whether or not the water could be properly allocated as between the provinces. Having set up the water board, the next point raised was that the responsibility for irrigation should rest on the province. The attitude of the government was that as far as irrigation was concerned that responsibility would have to be accepted by the province of Saskatchewan. The province of Saskatchewan accepted that responsibility.

The next escape hatch was to set up a royal commission. When, over and over again, I asked in the house whether, if the royal commission report was favourable, the work would be proceeded with, the answer invariably was the same, that no such binding undertaking would be given. I could quote repetitious cases over and over again of statements in that regard.

And now we come to 1953. After the royal commission has sat for over a year, and we are unable to have any kind of assurance, there is to be some other investigation. First it was going to be proceeded with, we were told, in 1948, provided the feasibility were determined by P.F.R.A. They determined that.

Only a few moments ago the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said I had misquoted what he had said regarding the use of officials of P.F.R.A. I made the statement that the Prime Minister left the impression by his answer and actually said, in effect, that the reason these P.F.R.A. officials were not before the royal commission, and their report examined by the royal commission, was because of the danger that they, being civil servants, would be in the position of advising the government, of which they are the servants.

Well, I was not very far out in my interpretation of the answer given by the Prime Minister as it appears at page 1399 of Hansard for January 28, 1953, where the Prime Minister said:

> This commission was established to get information which the government did not already have and to make recommendations to it. As the commissioners had access to all the records and technical advice of the P.F.R.A., it was not necessary for them to have formal appearances by federal officials at public hearings. The government shared this view and gave this opinion to the officials of the P.F.R.A.
> In reaching that conclusion, the government had in mind the fact that it would not be fair to place civil servants in a false position by requiring them to appear publicly and express opinions on matters on which the Minister of Agriculture and the government as a whole had subsequently to reach decisions.

And that is exactly, in effect, what I said a while ago.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is in effect what the hon. member said. But it is not in effect the whole of what I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have read every part of the discussion relative to civil servants in the answer the Prime Minister gave on that occasion. I, for one, for the life of me cannot understand why, over and over again, as we approach each election—1945, 1949 and 1953—we always find ourselves in the position of having this project just around the corner. Surely there is enough information for the government as to the feasibility. The location of the dam was finally determined in 1949 or 1950. Those of us in the province of Saskatchewan know what great benefits would flow from this development. Throughout the years we have given support to people in other parts of Canada in connection with projects national in scope that, through the years, will shape a prosperity hitherto not known, and will pay dividends in national development the like of which today we can only envisage.

We want this done. We want this work proceeded with. We have been promised it through the years. It has been dangled at each election as a bait, and after each election it has been withdrawn by postponement, by procrastination, by roadblocks and other interference.

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) used words that can only be interpreted to mean that the cabinet has not yet made any decision, as the matter has not been presented to them. I say that surely, after all these years, the cabinet knows and envisages the situation as it is. I think the time has come to take drastic action. In 1949, in order to demand their rights, the farmers of western Canada had to send a delegation to Ottawa. I think the time has come, in the national interest, when representatives from Saskatchewan, not only of the association connected with the project itself but of municipalities and rural areas throughout central Saskatchewan, will have to come in a delegation to parliament. They will have to send here a delegation charged with placing before the cabinet that about which not only the Minister of Agriculture but also members from Saskatchewan supporting the government have not as yet been able to impress the cabinet.

After all this is something that in the years ahead spells the difference between prosperity and something much less than that. It means that we will not revert to the days of the thirties and earlier, when drought struck us as it periodically did on those western plains.

This project will take ten years to build. Surely we should not continue to procrastinate, to advance excuses, and to make political bait out of it at each election. So far as this party is concerned, throughout the years we have supported this project. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) made that clear in the month of March, when he charged me with the responsibility of placing our support behind it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And having that support from the opposition, and realizing the need for it—because we have spoken for it not only outside the house but inside—we are going to vote for it on this occasion.

Again we ask, in order to bring this matter before the cabinet and so there will be a realization of the unity of Saskatchewan behind this, that members from Saskatchewan, whatever their party may be, join us in this effort. Let us show that we have not arrived yet at a condition of affairs in the House of Commons where members who believe in the necessity of the work being done cannot stand and be counted on this, the greatest opportunity that has ever come to members believing the need is great, place ment of the day, "This is what we are asking for and what the people of Saskatchewan are asking for".

Mr. Speaker, parliament only speaks when members, believing the need is great, place aside every other consideration for the public good. I make a special appeal, as I said in the beginning, for a united Saskatchewan, and for the support of Saskatchewan Liberal members at this time to do that which, over the years, they have advocated, and that which they are advocating today in their radio speeches. It is not the voice outside of parliament that counts; it is the vote in parliament that counts.

Mr. Gardiner: In checking my own Hansard I have just come across the statement to which the hon. member has just referred. Hansard records this:

> Mr. Gardiner: I have not said that I have not carried the subject to the cabinet. I said that the subject has not been discussed by the cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was earlier than that.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the occasion the Leader of the Opposition was asking me about.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, go back farther.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend said that was the occasion. I have just read what Hansard records me as having said.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that this South Saskatchewan dam has got into the state it has, as a political issue. We as members from Saskatchewan are just as enthusiastic, I am sure, and have been working just as hard in trying to establish our rights to this dam as has the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He has made certain statements here today and I am sure the people of Saskatchewan will be sorry that he went as far as he did. Even one of his supporters in Saskatoon made a statement that was detrimental to him and us. He said that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot quote the nonsense of some imaginary person; you must make it your own nonsense.

An hon. Member: Is it worrying you a little bit?

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot quote outside people.

Mr. Ferrie: The hon. member for Lake Centre said to one of his supporters, a Mr. Hamilton, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and some of the cabinet were against and opposed to the South Saskatchewan dam. This was not a right and proper thing to do. The same thing is happening to us right now. As far as we are concerned, he wants us to get up and vote. Let him withdraw his amendment and come with us in a body to try to persuade the people of Canada.

You do not need to persuade Saskatchewan that they want the dam. We are trying to persuade the people of eastern Canada. How many homes have you been into? How many offices have you been into? Have you been doing what we have been doing, trying to persuade these people that we need the dam? Has the C.C.F. party been around this parliament trying to persuade members to give us support? Have you done that? No, we are the boys who are doing that.

An hon. Member: How many homes have you been in?

An hon. Member: Have you convinced one man?

An hon. Member: You are just a rubber stamp.

Mr. Fulton: My door is always open and you have not been to see me.

Mr. Hees: Come and call.

Mr. Ferrie: As far as I am concerned and as far as the Tory party is concerned, this is a straight political issue. When the time comes I am sure the people of the province of Saskatchewan will show these gentlemen to my left what they need. When we ask for unity in connection with a proposition we do it because we know it is a good thing and we want to sell it. We have to sell it to the people. Let me tell my hon. friends from down in Toronto—

An hon. Member: They want to irritate before they irrigate.

Mr. Hees: How are you voting?

Mr. Ferrie: As far as I am concerned I am not going to vote for the subamendment and I am not going to vote for the amendment. As most of you have heard, we have a dry belt in Saskatchewan. We have a proposition that we think has been sold over a period of years to people in our part of Canada. We believe the time has come when the dam should be built. We believe that over a period of years it will pay for itself through the revenue that will be returned to the people of Canada.

Any farmer who happens to have land along the 400 miles of the shore line of that lake will be able to irrigate anywhere from 50 to 100 acres. What will they do? They will build up herds of livestock because they will be able to grow feed. In western Canada we are all anxious to have feed, especially those who live in the dried-out areas. When you produce livestock and livestock products they will be marketed throughout Canada. As our population grows we will be able to utilize this irrigated land.

I am not going to go into the details of what the land will produce, but I should like to say a few words with regard to the report of this commission. When the people in eastern Canada look at the report and see that $250 million may have to be spent in central Saskatchewan, they naturally come to the conclusion that that is a lot of money. If a report were to come out that the St. Lawrence development was to cost half a billion dollars, there would be a hubbub and cry all over eastern Canada. But that half billion dollars would not be spent in one year; it might take ten, fifteen or twenty years to spend it.

The same thing is true of the South Saskatchewan water development scheme. We are not asking that all this money be spent on this dam in one year, we are asking that it be spent over a period of years. If it takes six, eight or ten years to spend $100 million that is at the rate of $8 or $10 million a year. That is not asking for too much from the people of Canada in order to develop this area.

You may say that the St. Lawrence waterway will pay for itself. We agree, and we on the prairies will help to pay for it. We are producers in western Canada; we are pioneers. We ask the people of eastern Canada to help us pioneer this great project. As far as we are concerned this project is something that is necessary. This lake in the centre of the province of Saskatchewan is something we need. We need it for irrigation and for power.

As far as my constituency is concerned, the irrigation will do us no good but it will do Canada good. If we can get this power development started it will naturally provide cheaper power, and we in the northeastern part of the province of Saskatchewan are interested in that. Our power costs are very high and we need cheaper power. So far as land is concerned, I want to say that in my constituency more land could be put under cultivation for a quarter of the money that will be spent on that project, but we are willing to go along and support this great scheme as a national project. I want to ask people in eastern Canada and west of the Rockies to give us all the support—

Mr. Hees: We are all for it.

Mr. Ferrie: —they possibly can. You are only a part of Canada. You think you are the whole, but you are not.

Mr. Hees: We are giving you support.

Mr. Ferrie: We want the support of the common people. We want to show members of the house that the project is sound, so they can go home and tell their people that we have introduced a sound project and are trying to sell something that is sound.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whom are you trying to sell?

Mr. Ferrie: We are trying to sell it to the people of Canada, and more especially the people of eastern Canada.

Mr. Hees: How are you going to vote?

An hon. Member: Party politics.

Mr. Hees: We are all for it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ferrie: There are a lot of people in Canada and there are a lot of them in this house, some of them on the Tory side and some on the C.C.F. side, who are not satisfied with this project.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is not one on the Conservative side.

Mr. Hees: Not one on the Conservative side.

Mr. Ferrie: This project is something Saskatchewan needs. This is something—

Mr. Hees: Then vote for it.

Mr. Ferrie: You be quiet.

Mr. Hees: How are you voting?

An hon. Member: It is not going to get you any votes in Broadview.

Mr. Ferrie: Get up and talk.

Mr. Hees: How are you going to vote?

Mr. Ferrie: As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the point I am trying to get over is that we as members from the province of Saskatchewan—

An hon. Member: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. Hees: Are you with us or against us? We are all for it. How about you?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might be opportune for me to say that the member who has the floor must not be interrupted, and I might add that hon. members should not interrupt in this manner.

Mr. Aylesworth: We are just trying to help him.

Mr. Ferrie: We members from Saskatchewan—

Mr. Thatcher: Wear your colours.

Mr. Ferrie: —are doing exactly what we think is the right and proper thing to do, turning down these two amendments.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Ferrie: Because they are not right, they are not proper and they are moved for one purpose and one purpose only, to embarrass the rest of the members from the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told us this afternoon that the South Saskatchewan river project, and particularly the South Saskatchewan dam, had not been discussed in the cabinet, I confess that I could hardly believe it. But tonight, after listening to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which he interjected during the course of the speech made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I am inclined to believe that at least there has not been sufficient discussion of this matter in the cabinet itself. As a matter of fact, if there has been discussion they do not seem to have cleared with each other so as to be able to say the same thing on the floor of the House of Commons.

The Minister of Agriculture tried to suggest this afternoon that the item in the estimates is one which could be used, if the cabinet so decided, to go ahead with the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam. Certainly that was an attempt on the part of the Minister of Agriculture to say that the hope which the people of Saskatchewan have that this dam will be built is one they can count on being fulfilled in the not far distant future. But tonight the Prime Minister stands up and says in clear-cut language that in the light of the figures now before him—I do not know whether or not they are before the cabinet but they are before him—in this latest report he is not now prepared to recommend to the cabinet the vote of the necessary money to go ahead with this project.

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of privilege, I should like to say that I have never said any such thing as my hon. friend has just tried to indicate. I have never said any such thing at all. I have never said anything different from what the Prime Minister said. The matter has not yet been discussed with the government; therefore I am not in a position to say that it is going to be done, and I have not made any suggestion that it is going to be done, either.

Mr. Knowles: We are agreed on one thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is that apparently the matter has not been discussed in the cabinet. As I say, this afternoon I could hardly believe it, but tonight I do. The Minister of Agriculture has completely missed the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Gardiner: I have not missed it.

Mr. McIlraith: No, he did not miss it.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister said tonight that in the light of the figures as to cost that have been laid before us in the royal commission report he, the Prime Minister, is not prepared to recommend the vote of the necessary moneys to go ahead with the building of the dam. But this afternoon—does someone object? Is that not what the Prime Minister said?

Mr. Gardiner: I object, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister was talking about this present moment. I was talking about this present moment too, this afternoon, but neither one of us has said what the final decision is going to be.

Mr. Knowles: I think somebody should adjourn this debate so the cabinet can go out and hold a meeting. The Minister of Agriculture was discussing this matter this afternoon, and at one point he was talking about Nova Scotia. He said when he is down in Nova Scotia he is not sure which way he is going. It is not only in Nova Scotia that he finds himself in that predicament.

Mr. Gardiner: There are some people who do not admit that.

Mr. Knowles: This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture tried to say that the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre is not properly drawn because it says there is no item in the estimates for the South Saskatchewan river project. When the hon. member for Lake Centre, quite properly in my view, supported his position by saying that the item in the estimates is not for the building of the dam the Minister of Agriculture came back and said that the amount of money that is there does not matter. We can do it, he said—

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that.

Mr. Knowles: —just as well on $500,000 as we can on a larger amount if we decide to do it. I submit to the judgment of the house that if that was not an attempt to suggest to the house that in the view of the Minister of Agriculture there was hope that the dam would be built, then no one knows what it was.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a clear difference of viewpoint, from that of the Prime Minister, expressed with regard to this matter by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. Out of his concern across the years for the dam he still wants to be on its side as something that is to be done soon. On the other hand we have the Prime Minister tonight saying that in the light of present cost figures he, the Prime Minister, is not prepared at the present time to recommend that that much money be voted.

Now, growing out of that difference between the statements of the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister there arises another difference, namely as to the reason Liberal members are putting forward to explain why they plan to vote against the amendment and the subamendment which we now have before the house.

An hon. Member: Anybody would vote against you.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister's reason for opposing the amendment and the subamendment is quite clear, and he made it very clear tonight. I want to be fair to him. He says that it would be for the good of Canada as a whole to have this project but, in the light of the information and figures contained in the report of the royal commission, he feels that he cannot make the recommendation for the building of the dam at the present time. That seems to imply that there will have to be more investigations and more inquiries to decide which of the inquiries is the correct one. There is no telling how long this will go on, but it is quite clear that at the present moment the Prime Minister says that he is not prepared to vote for immediate construction of the South Saskatchewan dam. So I suggest that if the Prime Minister, as I assume he will, votes against the subamendment and the amendment, he is doing so for a clear-cut reason. It is because he at this moment is not in favour of going ahead with the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam.

The Minister of Agriculture is not so clear-cut. He is not so forthright, and he does not tell us that that is the reason for his anticipated negative vote on the amendment and the subamendment. Rather, he finds other reasons. For one, he suggests that the amendment is not properly drawn because it refers to nothing being in the estimates for the construction of the dam. I think that objection has already been disposed of, because it is pretty clear that there is not enough money in the estimates for the construction of the dam; and even if the Minister of Agriculture wants to contend that it is possible to start the dam on the basis of that $500,000 vote he has been vetoed on it tonight by the Prime Minister, who says that in the light of the latest South Saskatchewan river report he is not prepared to recommend voting the necessary money at the present time.

Another argument which the Minister of Agriculture uses is that this is a want of confidence motion as far as the government is concerned. I wish to deal with that question in a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, but before I do so it seems to me that every time a Saskatchewan Liberal gets up and uses that excuse for not voting for the amendment or the subamendment he is merely saying, and he is shouting it from the housetops, that a vote of confidence in this Liberal government is more important to him than getting the dam for the people of Saskatchewan. That is the issue as far as they are concerned and because that is the issue the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) said a moment ago that to him and to his fellow Saskatchewan Liberals the whole purpose of the amendment and subamendment seemed to be just to embarrass them.

Well, that may be imputing motives that are not correct but at least they are admitting how they feel about it, namely that they are embarrassed by the fact that they are called upon to choose between voting confidence in their precious Liberal government and voting for the dam which they say they want, and which they know the people of Saskatchewan want, and which the rest of us feel would be for the good of all Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals from Saskatchewan must not expect all of us in this house to fall for the idea that there is a dilemma and that they have to choose between one course and the other—either to vote for the dam or to vote for the government—and one must be careful not to get that word mixed and use it as an adjective instead of as a noun in that particular context. May I remind hon. members again of what happened in the House of Commons on August 27, 1946. I believe I hear the voice of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott).

Mr. Sinnott: No, you don't.

Mr. McCann: He never opened his mouth.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I thought I did and I hear it now. At any rate, the same hon. member for Springfield played an important part in the incident on August 27, 1946, to which I now refer. That was an occasion when from this group we moved an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply. Procedurally we were in exactly the same position we are in now. It was a motion to go into supply and an amendment was moved. That amendment had to do with the continuing of one of the subsidies on milk. What happened on that occasion? I think the first Liberal member to stand up and express support for that proposition was the hon. member for Springfield. Other Liberal members, such as the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) also indicated their support. Others who had not yet spoken also let it be known that they too were going to speak in favour of the amendment to the motion to go into supply which was moved from this group.

Mr. Sinnott: I rise on a question of personal privilege. At least when I stand up and vote I mean what I say.

Mr. Argue: You talk with your vote. Sinnott for Senate.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to know that is the way the member for Springfield feels with regard to the incident in 1946, and I accept his word on it without question. The point is that on that occasion he spoke for our amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply and he voted for it when the time came to record the opinion of the members of this house.

As a result of that considerable body of opinion being expressed on the government side, led in this instance by the member for Springfield and supported by the member for Fraser Valley and by the only private member from Saskatchewan at that time, Mr. Walter Tucker, the government took quite a different stand from that which is being taken in this debate. On that occasion the present Prime Minister, who was then acting prime minister in the absence of Mr. King, did his best to persuade the house to allow the amendment to be withdrawn on the assurance that the government would give consideration to the matter. We were not prepared to withdraw the amendment, so a little later the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who was then the minister of reconstruction and supply, got up and said as recorded on page 5431 of Hansard:

> Nevertheless the government has no objection to an expression of opinion from the members of the house. I suggest that the vote should be a free expression regardless of party.

He went on to say:

> The difficulty of obtaining the expression arises from the form of the amendment, which in itself denies the right of the house to move into committee of supply at this time. However, Mr. Speaker, I would call to your attention article 489 of Beauchesne, which reads as follows:
> When an amendment has been adopted to the motion for the house to go into committee of supply or of ways and means, it may be forthwith moved that the house resolve itself into such committee immediately or on a future day.

Immediately after quoting that rule from Beauchesne the then minister of reconstruction and supply said:

> Therefore I should like to serve notice that if this vote carries the government will immediately move that the house go into committee of supply this day. I believe that that procedure is consistent with the rules, and if there can be general agreement on that point the work of the house can be facilitated and the objective of hon. members attained.

Well, the result was that not only courageous members, like the hon. member for Springfield and the hon. member for Fraser Valley and others who had already indicated their support, voted for our amendment, but when the vote was called at least twenty Liberal members joined with most of those on the opposition side of the house. The result was that the amendment to the motion to go into supply was carried by a vote of 69 to 41.

Was it a vote of non-confidence in the government? No. That had already been made clear by the announcement of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. As a result of his announcement, and as a result of the notice he had given, immediately after that amendment had been carried and had thus became an expression of opinion of the house, the present Prime Minister got up and moved "that the house do now go into committee of supply". About half a column down in Hansard that motion was agreed to and the house went into committee of supply and went on with its business.

In other words, the government was not defeated. There was no suggestion of non-confidence having been recorded by the house. Rather the house was given an opportunity to express its opinion on the question of continuing the milk subsidy, without defeating the government. But why was it given that opportunity? Because Liberal members had made it clear that they wanted that opportunity. What has happened this time? Not a single Liberal member has asked for a free vote on the question. I hope the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) may do so. I understand that he has been trying to get the floor.

Mr. Cruickshank: Give him a chance.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe the hon. member for Fraser Valley will do so. They gave a courageous lead to their fellow Liberals back in 1946. I hope they will give a courageous lead this time if it is not too late, because a number of Liberals have stood up and said they are going to vote against the amendment.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask if the hon gentleman now wants the same results that occurred then?

An hon. Member: That is a good question.

Mr. Knowles: I am amazed that the Minister of Agriculture goes out of his way to draw attention to the fact that after the house expressed its opinion as to what should be done, the cabinet did not give effect to that opinion. It is not the first time the government has done that. I could remind him of several other instances. I hope the Minister of Agriculture is not now suggesting—of all things to come from him—that if the house were to pass, by a majority vote, its expression of opinion that the dam should be built, the government would treat that expression of opinion in the way it treated the milk subsidy motion, my motion for the removal of the 4 per cent floor on medical expenses in relation to income tax, and other such items across the years.

Despite the fact that I have been amazed a number of times today at things the Minister of Agriculture has said, I am more than startled that he would make this interjection at this point. Since he says he is for the dam, I suggest that he is the minister who should be exceedingly glad to have a vote of that kind so he could go to the cabinet and not only carry to them the question of the South Saskatchewan dam, but say: "Here, I have behind me the vote of a majority of the members of the House of Commons; it is time that you fellows in the cabinet paid some attention to this proposition".

Mr. Gardiner: I am only suggesting that my hon. friend is talking now in the very opposite direction to that in which he talked on every previous occasion he brought this matter before the house.

Mr. Knowles: I do not know what the Minister of Agriculture is talking about. Is he talking about the subject matter of the dam or is he talking about a procedural point?

An hon. Member: What are you talking about?

Mr. Knowles: Or does he know what he is talking about?

An hon. Member: Do you know what you are talking about?

Mr. Knowles: It is clear from precedent and from the rules that if the members of this house on the government side want a free vote on this question, they can have it. All they have to do is make the fact known with sufficient clarity that the government will be in the same position as in 1946, so that a responsible minister can make the same announcement and give the same notice to Your Honour. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that not only are the Liberal members from Saskatchewan using this excuse for voting against the motion but that they are not even asking for the right to have, on this dam, a free vote which they asked for with respect to the milk subsidy in 1946.

I would think that to the Saskatchewan Liberal members this question of the dam would be more important than was the milk subsidy question in 1946, even as I should think it would be more important to them than voting confidence in the government at the present time.

As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, many amazing things have come out today. It was rather startling that the Minister of Agriculture told us so much about what goes on in cabinet, or about what does not go on. I really thought that things that happen within the meetings of the cabinet council were supposed to be secret. Yet we now know that it was a great many years before that other proposition was brought to a head in cabinet. We now know that although the minister may have taken this question to cabinet—we do not know how many times—it still has not been discussed.

That is hard to believe when one realizes that some decision must have been made with respect to the setting up of the royal commission. It is hard to believe also when you realize that there must have been approval of the items that have been put in the estimates from time to time. But apparently, judging from what has been said, the matter has not been discussed. If that is the case, it is all the more reason why this house should record a strong vote in favour of this proposition so the cabinet will realize that it is time to discuss this matter.

I am prepared to leave it at that and to express the hope that the hon. member for Springfield, who gave such a strong lead—and it was a really courageous lead—to the members of his party in 1946, will do it again this time and that there will yet be a request to the government, which I hope the government will answer, for a free vote on this question. It is not "either/or". It is not "either vote for the dam or vote for the government". It is perfectly possible, by rule and by precedent, to have both votes. It is possible to have in the first place a vote on the question of the dam. Let us have an affirmative vote on that question. Then after that is out of the way there can be a vote on the question of going into supply. That vote too can be in the affirmative, the house can get on with its business, and the Minister of Agriculture can have real backing to take with him to the next meeting of the cabinet, which I suggest should be tonight.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—or is it off centre?—may I say that when this matter comes before the house for a vote, the hon. member for Springfield will use his own conscience and vote accordingly; he will not be dictated to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Nor will he vote as did the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), who was almost read out of his party.

I am glad to take advantage of this opportunity to speak so soon after the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who worked himself up into a frenzy of hysteria in order to attain his particular political ambition. His theme was more or less political irritation rather than land irrigation. I am going to read, from the South Saskatchewan river report, the findings and recommendations on page 6. I am going to read just one paragraph which will substantiate what the government has been doing:

1. The commission finds that at present the economic returns to the Canadian people on the investment in the proposed South Saskatchewan river project (central Saskatchewan development) are not commensurate with the cost thereof; though the project would yield social returns which, while they cannot be measured for the purpose of this report, would be of great value to the region in which it is situated.

2. The commission recommends that, when the time comes that the project represents the then best use of water for irrigation, the present finding should be reviewed in the light of changing conditions.

I think the government in its wisdom has taken great precautions in going ahead with this land irrigation scheme which is estimated to cost anywhere from $100 million to $350 million. If they did not have the backing of every party in this house they would be accused later on of making a terrible mistake. Therefore I think the government are wise in taking these steps to make sure that every hon. member is behind this huge proposition before that large amount of money is spent.

At present there are large surpluses of wheat in Canada, and there is no shortage of food. There is no great hurry for such a project at this time. However, like any forward-looking Canadian, I certainly would not oppose a project which would be beneficial to Saskatchewan and therefore be of help to the rest of Canada. I do not pretend to be—

Mr. Hees: A candidate at the next election.

Mr. Sinnott: I do not pretend to be a member of the legal profession; neither do I pretend to have a monopoly of brains, as some other people in this house do, but I know that if we intend to spend a large amount of money—as I have said, anywhere from $100 million to $350 million—before that is done it should receive the careful consideration of any government regardless of its political faith.

I am sure Canadians as a whole will realize that it is the duty of the official opposition to guard the safety of the Canadian public's dollar. But as we have listened to the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and several other members of the Conservative party we gather that it is politically expedient to do this work in order that one or two members of the Conservative party may be returned from Saskatchewan. I take the same attitude that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has taken, namely that this should not be made a political football. It should be gone ahead with on its merits, and if a little more time is considered necessary, in the words of the commission, I do not think it is going to hurt it. I do not think a little time will hurt us because time is the essence of everything.

Mr. Knowles: That is the motto of the Liberal party.

Mr. Sinnott: If the opposition wish to see this project go through then the less they say at the present time the better. If they leave it in the hands of the good government we have now I think they will be farther ahead.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the discussion I have listened to this afternoon and this evening from the opposition side of the house indicates to me that the South Saskatchewan project, as far as they are concerned, has been relegated to the position of a political football. The two amendments to the motion to go into supply that are now before the house are indicative of that. The movers of those motions propose that we should support their amendments and thereby, as Liberals from Saskatchewan, show our faith in the dam on the South Saskatchewan river. As anyone knows, notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), a motion to go into supply is made for the purpose of voting money to Her Majesty's government to carry on the work of the government. If the government is defeated on that motion it ceases to be in power and we must have an immediate election.

Some hon. Members: Are you afraid of that?

Mr. Harrison: Just a minute; I see in these amendments a double-barrelled gun, as it were. In one case it is supposed to put the Liberal members from Saskatchewan on their mettle and at a disadvantage. On the other hand, if the amendment is adopted it puts the government out of office. If history tells us anything, it tells us that all major projects in this country have been dealt with and put into effect by this government. I am not much interested in a project that would put this government out of office and would put some other one in that we would have to depend on to put the South Saskatchewan river project into effect.

In all the speeches so far from the other side of the house I have not heard anything to bolster the argument for a South Saskatchewan dam. We have a report here, which fortunately has not been stolen, that casts a lot of doubt on the advisability of the South Saskatchewan project as an economic proposition. I would think hon. members opposite could make better use of their talents, if they are honestly in favour of this dam and not in embarrassing Liberals—which I can assure them they are not doing—by trying to balance up some of the criticism that is to be found in this report.

I gathered from the minister's remarks this afternoon and from some other information I have obtained that it would be appropriate to sell this project to the people of Canada. When the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) dealt with that angle of the proposition my hon. friends laughed, but they know as well as anybody that we have to sell this proposition to the people of Canada on an economic basis. This is one possible way of doing it. If you take the figures the minister gave this afternoon you will find that we have paid out a lot of money in Saskatchewan by way of rehabilitation in the dried-out period, that bad economic time we went through, on account of the dry years. We are pouring a lot of money into a pail that perhaps has a hole in the bottom.

Just what have we spent in rehabilitating the west that could be used to put this proposition on an economic basis, a proposition that is going to pay for itself? We have to do that or show the people of Canada that they are going to save some money by putting in the dam. I think we can show them that we are going to save some money. We have spent $135 million in prairie farm assistance payments, of which the farmer has paid some $52 million, leaving $83 million that the federal government has put out in prairie farm assistance. We have spent $168 million in direct relief in the west in the dried-out period. We have spent another $39 million on prairie farm rehabilitation in small projects; we have spent a further $22 million on large projects such as the St. Mary dam and the Bow river project, the last mostly in Alberta. In all that is $312 million that we have spent on rehabilitation. You would not have to dig very far to find out that we have spent more than that. If we are to spend $312 million every fifteen or twenty years in rehabilitation would it not be better to put a lake in that dry area and irrigate, as this South Saskatchewan project calls for?

I do not know why I should be talking for the province of Saskatchewan, particularly as I happen to be in a section where we are not lacking water. I just happened to bring down a few maps of some parts of my riding. These are air maps. As hon. members can see, there is just about as much water in this area as there is land. Each one of these areas is a small portion of the riding. As you go through this country you see that there is plenty of water. In fact there is more water in my riding than will fill this particular project a thousand times; therefore we are not exactly dry in some parts of Saskatchewan.

This particular project will have no impact upon the riding of Meadow Lake, except that we may get some power from it. It is odd that these amendments should have been moved by members of opposition groups from Saskatchewan, and it is worthy of note that there has not been any opposition shown by the group from Alberta. They are not interested in playing politics with this issue, because they have had some irrigation in their province and they know the value of it. We are thankful to them for the way they have approached this matter.

I think there is some difference of opinion between the people of Saskatchewan and those of Alberta as to who should have most of the water. That is only natural. It is natural to suppose that they want to keep in Alberta as much of the water as they possibly can. They know the value of it, just as we do. But, Mr. Speaker, in the southern part of the province—from which I do not come—they definitely do need this dam. In view of the water we have in my constituency, I am in the same position as someone in the eastern part of Canada who is not directly connected with this project at all.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) has said that he has been disappointed in the stand taken by Liberals from Saskatchewan. I can reciprocate his feelings entirely and say that I am disappointed in the action his group are taking in this matter. They are making the South Saskatchewan dam a political football. If that is what they want to do, well and good; but it will not get us a dam. We had better say to the people of Canada that this is an economically sound proposition, and sell it to them on that basis. If it is an economically sound proposition, then it will save that amount of money in the next twenty or thirty years, and we will not have to pour so many millions of dollars into the province.

We will not have to do it all at one time, either. As the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) has pointed out, it will be carried out on a ten-year or twelve-year basis, and would cost about $10 million a year. As members of the house representing the people of Canada we have to show that this is an economically sound proposition. We realize that while hon. members in the opposition were shouting only a short time ago that they are all in favour of this project, the fact is that they still have to go back home and sell it to their constituents. There is no reason why that cannot be done.

[Mr. Harrison.]

I just wish to indicate my position. So far as I am concerned, when my friends opposite move amendments which, if carried, would put the government out of office, I must definitely oppose them. I would not mind if we had an election tomorrow, but I most definitely am opposed to going out in that manner, bowing to a minority which I am sure will still be a minority after the next election.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I will have great pleasure in voting against the amendments, especially in the light of the spirit in which they are put forward. If they would accomplish anything toward getting the dam, I would be very pleased to support them. But they are not going to accomplish anything. Hon. members know that, and they knew it when the amendments were moved. I will have great pleasure in voting against the amendments on these grounds.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words tonight before ten o'clock.

An hon. Member: Move the adjournment. It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I will do that when I get ready. I think I should say a few words before the vote is taken on the amendment and the subamendment. The debate started out as a discussion of the dam, and now it has developed into a discussion of the vote.

I want to assure my hon. friends to my left that if I thought for one moment that voting for the amendment or the subamendment would get the dam, there would be no question about how I would vote.

Mr. Argue: It might help.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): You say it might help. Well, we can take a look at that, too. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has indicated that a decision has not been made, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said the same thing.

I think the government would be as seriously criticized by the opposition—I have said "I think"; I shall correct that by saying "I am sure"—if a decision were reached at this moment by the cabinet, without giving further consideration to the report. I have not much use for commissions because I feel—and I am becoming more convinced all the time—that they are used only for political advantage. That has been my impression since I have come here.

Mr. Cardiff: Who appointed the commission?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Those of us who are not in favour of the wording of the commission's report are condemning it. However, it was mentioned tonight—I believe it was the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) who made the suggestion—that members in the opposition, including the hon member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), might very well discuss this matter with the various ministers.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said that this has not been discussed in cabinet. I take his word for that. But privately I have discussed this matter with each cabinet minister, and tried to suggest the importance of it to our province. As you know, caucus is something that is secret; at the same time I do not think I would be breaking any rule if I were to say that this project was definitely discussed in government caucus. I myself brought it up. What was said I am not privileged to repeat. However, speaking on this subject with the Prime Minister himself, privately, I tried to suggest that, so far as the federal government was concerned, we would be responsible for only part of the dam. The Prime Minister reminded me that although the federal government would be responsible for only part, the government would still be responsible for taxes even in the province of Saskatchewan. If a dam is built, two-thirds of the cost being provided by the federal government and one-third by other means, the fact remains that it must be paid for out of taxes.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue consideration of the motion to go into supply, and call the following departments: external affairs, transport, labour, agriculture and justice. Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs will move to refer his estimates to the standing committee on external affairs. If we dispose of that motion we will take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) respecting the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, and then Bill No. 46, to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FULTON—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF THE PRIME MINISTER ON FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On Friday night, in the course of the debate, I made a remark which was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister who replied as follows, as reported at page 1712 of Hansard:

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Prime Minister has other things to do than to listen to the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am not rising on a point of personal privilege with reference to that remark, because that is the Prime Minister's privilege, although I might say that what I had to say was related to the business of parliament rather than that of listening to an individual member. We all heard the Prime Minister say that, sir, and the Hansard reporter as well as the gallery heard the Prime Minister make that remark.

Mr. Speaker, I do want to raise a point of privilege affecting all hon. members, and it is this: While all hon. members, myself included, have the right to see our text of Hansard and make alterations therein, alterations which make more clear the sense of that which we have to say, that rule does not extend to permit an hon. member to make alterations which alter the sense of what he has said. The point in this connection, Mr. Speaker, is that the Hansard report contains words which were not heard either by the Hansard reporter, by hon. members of the house or by the gallery, so that—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Speak for yourself.

Mr. Fulton: —the report now reads, with the Prime Minister saying this:

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Prime Minister has other things to do than to listen to the hon. gentleman, when he is using that tone.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is that that addition changes the sense of what the Prime Minister said. I dealt with what the Prime Minister had said, what I had heard him say and what is all that he had said on the basis of what he had said; but the sense of his remarks is now altered. I know we are all exposed to temptations to make alterations in the sense of what we have said. The Prime Minister, like others, is exposed to those temptations and has yielded to those temptations.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I should allow the hon. gentleman to continue further. If the Prime Minister wishes to make a statement he should be permitted to do so.

Mr. Fulton: If I might complete the point of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I think it is in order for me to say this, Mr. Speaker. With respect to any inconsequential alteration I would not be raising the point, but when the experience is repeated and we recall the occasion when "kicked out" was changed to "left out" I think matters have gone to the point where it should be brought to the attention of the house that on another occasion the Prime Minister altered the sense of what he said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has brought his point to the attention of the house. If the Prime Minister wishes to remark on it I have no objection.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. gentleman felt that it was his duty to bring before the house what he has said this afternoon I must first of all tell him that I appreciate his courtesy in not doing it yesterday when other duties prevented me from being in the house at this hour. But when the hon. gentleman says that I added to the report something that I had not said in the house he is quite wrong. It is quite possible, and no doubt true, that the Hansard reporter and the hon. gentleman did not hear that remark. The hon. gentleman will recall that while I was speaking applause broke out in several parts of the house, and it may be that that is what prevented my additional words from being heard by him; but I got the transcript a very few minutes after leaving the house and I remembered—and I remember now—quite distinctly having used the words that I inserted in the report, or possibly—I would not want to be positive about that—it may have been "when he is speaking in that tone", though I rather think that it was "when he is using that tone". But in any event the sense was exactly the same, and I added to the report the words that I clearly remembered having used in the house.

Now, this contretemps is perhaps another illustration of the reason for remarks that have been made to me on several occasions, that when applause breaks out I should cease speaking. But when I am speaking I am more concerned with what I have to say than with any applause that greets it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE BY MR. SPEAKER TO PREVIOUS RULING RESPECTING MOTION TO GO INTO COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTION

Mr. Speaker: A matter has arisen as to what was said in the house on Friday. May I refer briefly to the debate which took place on that day. I have no hesitation in saying that, in view of that debate, I am quite concerned about the ruling I made in 1952 with respect to standing order 60.

Hon. members will recall that at that time, after consideration, I gave my views on standing order 60, which reads as follows:

> If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

From time to time there have been discussions in the house as to whether Mr. Speaker should leave the chair without question put when the motion is called on the second day. A ruling was given by Mr. Speaker Glen a number of years ago, to which I referred in my ruling. Mr. Speaker Glen said, in part, that the debate should be directed to the negative of the motion, and should be general, with no reference to details. I made a similar ruling, in which I concurred in Mr. Speaker Glen's findings, and also ruled that the debate at that time should be directed to the negative of the motion, and should be general.

During the course of the argument, when I intimated that that might be my decision, a number of members reminded me that I would have great difficulty in enforcing it. In fact some hon. members took the attitude: "Either have a full debate or do not have a debate, because otherwise you will not be able to enforce the rules."

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Well, I felt I would be able to enforce my ruling and said, at the close of my reasons, that I would ask the co-operation of all hon. members in enabling me to enforce it. I have had the co-operation of all hon. members. But frankly, I must admit that I do not think the decision is workable; I doubt very much if I can enforce that ruling.

On several occasions during the debate on Friday I endeavoured to direct the debate in accordance with what I thought was the proper interpretation of my ruling. However, when I did so I realized that an hon. member could say, "Yes, but I feel this is one reason why Mr. Speaker should not leave the chair", and the hon. member could say, "Therefore I am directing my remarks to the negative."

Also during the debate on Friday the act, which it is proposed by the resolution to continue, was read almost fully into the record. It would have been very difficult for me to have prevented that. If I had said it was an unnecessary detail the answer would have been, "Oh, yes, but that is one reason I think you should not leave the chair; therefore I am directing my remarks to the negative."

There was a very wide debate that day. If hon. members will read Hansard for Friday they will see it was a complete debate on the whole subject of the resolution. Added to that, there was a very long debate on the interpretation of my ruling—and I have no reason to believe that, with a similar resolution, there would not be a similar debate on the interpretation of my ruling.

I think probably we all agreed at that time that the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair was debatable. I now am not sure that we were correct—although we all agreed. The motion, when it is first put, is that at the next sitting of the house Mr. Speaker will leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the resolution. That is a decision of the house—that Mr. Speaker will leave the chair at the next sitting.

If the house has reached that decision, then how can the resolution be debatable with the Speaker in the chair when that second day arrives? The house has reached that decision. I think that was a point which was not brought up on previous occasions when this matter was being considered; and it is certainly a point which was not raised on the last occasion.

I am satisfied that the ruling I made in June of 1952 should be revised. When I cannot put it into effect, I do not think I should be asked to let it stand as it is. I do not think a Speaker should be put in that position. It seems to me it would make for more orderly procedure in the house if, when the motion is called on the second day—that is, the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair—the resolution at that stage were not debated. I am not making a ruling at the present time; I am just expressing a view. It seems to me that no member's rights would be injured in any way. If the Speaker left the chair the resolution would then be before the committee and hon. members could discuss it from every angle with the minister in charge in his seat ready to answer questions and to give necessary information.

I would appreciate it if hon. members would give this matter some consideration. Probably in a few days you will be good enough to give me your views. My only reason for bringing this matter to your attention at the present time is to point out that I have come to the conclusion that I cannot enforce my ruling, that it is not workable or practicable. I think it would be in the interests of the dispatch of business in this house if the Speaker did leave the chair on the second day without question put.

Hon. members may suggest to me that it might be left to the rules committee. I have given that some consideration. This matter has been before three committees at least and no unanimous decision has been arrived at. As Speaker of the House I feel it is my duty to interpret the rules as they are at the present time. If hon. members want to change the rules, then that should be done by the committee; but my task at the present time is to interpret the rules as I see them.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, do I understand that you propose to set time aside to consider this further and to hear argument in regard to the point, since I understood you to say that you were not giving a ruling at this time?

Mr. Speaker: I hardly think it would be fair for me to make a ruling without hearing the views of experienced members of the house. I feel that this is an important matter. I was hoping that I could sustain the ruling that I gave in June, 1952, but I am satisfied that I cannot do that. So I agree with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that I should hear the views of other hon. members before I make a ruling.

Mr. Drew: Would it be appropriate if this matter were discussed at the time that the subject matter is again before you and when we return to the motion which was under discussion on Friday?

Mr. Speaker: That would be agreeable so far as I am concerned. Even if I did come to the conclusion that debate on the resolution should not be allowed on the second day, I do not think I would interfere with the debate on the present resolution now that it has gone as far as it has.

Mr. St. Laurent: There are several other resolutions on the order paper and perhaps on the first occasion when a fresh resolution is called it would be appropriate to discuss the matter and then Your Honour could make a ruling that would apply to that resolution.

Mr. Knowles: That is better.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO RESTRAIN ACTIVITIES IN RACIAL, RELIGIOUS OR CLASS HATREDS

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 112, to amend the Criminal Code (racial, religious or class hatreds).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to restrain the activities of individuals and organizations, such as political parties with communistic ideologies, or other groups, which use prejudice in an attempt to set class against class, religious group against religious group, and race against race to further their own ends.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STRATEGIC MATERIALS GOING TO U.S.S.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is now in a position to say that Canadian strategic metals are finding their way surreptitiously into the U.S.S.R. and what is being done to prevent it?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is not much I can add to the previous reply that I gave to my hon. friend on February 4. It is known of course that metals and other materials and equipment of a strategic nature are under export permit control here and have been for a considerable time.

A number of governments are in continuing close association in this work of controlling the movement of such strategic material. These governments agree on the materials to be controlled and the degree of control to be exercised. They have established a system of exchange of documents between importing and exporting countries for assurance to export licensing authorities that goods will reach the destinations indicated. There is a continuing exchange of information on many aspects of the whole problem.

Generally speaking, Canada does not license the export of strategic materials to European destinations unless applications for licences are accompanied by an import certificate issued by the government of the recipient country. This assures that the government of the importing country assumes responsibility for the shipment reaching the declared destination. Further, a verification of delivery is subsequently required in these cases. The greatest care possible, then, is taken with all destinations in assuring that consignees named in export permit applications are acceptable.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

NEW TYPE BOMBER—ALLEGED LEAKAGE OF SECRET INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if the detailed account of the proposed production of the new type of bomber contained in this morning's Globe and Mail, a copy of which I sent to the minister, represents a leakage of secret information that may be of interest to the enemy, and, if so, what action is being taken?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The answer is no and none.

SUPPLY

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM

The house resumed, from Monday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that the house go into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Wright.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, last evening just before the house adjourned I was dealing with the subject of the South Saskatchewan dam and was discussing a private conversation I had had with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) having to do with the dam. I indicated at that time that I tried to suggest to the Prime Minister that all we were interested in as members of parliament was the actual money that it would cost to build the dam. I think I said, but will repeat now, that he reminded me that after all funds would have to be raised for the cost of irrigation and that we must give that matter some consideration. I appreciate that point. I shall be a taxpayer for this project to both the federal and provincial governments, as will most, if not all, the people in my constituency.

I realize that the provincial government of Saskatchewan has said that they are prepared to pay their share of the cost of irrigation under the project. Well, I presume that is the case. But at the same time, even if the dam is built, as I hope it will be, there will be no irrigation in the province for some ten years. At that time the present government may still be in office. We will not debate that at the moment. However, whether it is that government or another, if the province of Saskatchewan finds that the load is too heavy for it to carry out its obligation, then whatever government may be in power provincially may say to the federal government that the load is too heavy for them to carry and that the federal government will have to carry it. I am not saying that will be the case but it could happen.

I do not want to get too far away from the subject, but there are certain projects that have been carried on in Saskatchewan with the help of the federal government, and I should like to refer briefly to our hospitalization scheme. The load is getting very heavy. While the baby was small we in the province of Saskatchewan carried it quite easily, but now that the baby is growing up and getting heavier we in Saskatchewan would like the federal government to assume that responsibility. I hope that that will not be the case when the irrigation project is built.

That is all I am going to say on that point, and I am not going to go into the details of the report of the commission except to say, as I said last night, that reports of commissions do not impress me too greatly. Having said that, however, may I say that I am one of those from Saskatchewan who cannot agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) when he says that the government should gather together all copies of the report of the commission and throw them in the Saskatchewan river. I would agree that when we start to build the dam we should put them at the bottom of it.

An hon. Member: It will be a long time before the dam is built.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): That may be, but that remains to be seen. In any event, what I am interested in at the moment is not so much what is contained in the various reports. What I am interested in is where we are going from here. If I might be allowed to make a suggestion, I hope it will not be necessary to have any more royal commissions or commissions. When the Prime Minister spoke last night he put his position before the house. I appreciate his position and I believe most people in the Dominion of Canada and in the house, including members of the opposition, although of course they may not admit it, also appreciate it. Coming to the house on the bus this morning I noticed an item in one corner of the morning Citizen—I did not have one—referring to the South Saskatchewan dam. The reference was to "this big project" and suggesting more study was needed. I am all in favour of more study. In the other corner of the Citizen it said "more investigation".

If more investigation means another commission, then I am absolutely opposed to it, and I want to go on record as saying so. I am going to make a suggestion as to what might be done. Surely we have enough data now as a result of the investigations of the commission and other reports; and let me say that I think their report should be given a good deal of consideration. Some of us do not like the wording of it in certain parts, and in that respect it is like another report with which we were dealing not too long ago. A proper examination and explanation of it indicates that there is some very valuable information provided we use it in a non-political way. Instead of another commission I suggest that we might well have some kind of committee or referee. I would suggest a non-political committee representing all parties in the house.

Mr. Ross (Souris): How do you do that?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): The hon. member for Souris says "how do you do that"? It has been done before, and I might add that it has been my experience since coming to the House of Commons that there is much more work done in committees, and in a far less political way, than in this chamber.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Which committee?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Any committees of which I have been a member. I think such a committee could well take a look at the evidence we have. In my opinion there are three things that must be done. The Prime Minister indicated last night that he was not too greatly worried about the cost of the project. I was glad to hear him say that. I am sure he has given that matter some consideration, as all of us must. We must know what kind of soil there is in the area that is to be irrigated. Surely we do not need to send a commission to Saskatchewan to investigate the soil. We must know the elevation of the land, and we do not need to send a commission to Saskatchewan to ascertain that. We must also know the rainfall. I am sure that no one would suggest that we should send someone to Saskatchewan to stand outside with a measuring cup for two or three years to find out what the rainfall is. That information is all available in Ottawa. I made it my business to find out from the different departments this morning if this information was available and could be obtained quickly. I was informed that could be done. The committee that I am suggesting might be a small one or a large one. It would have the privilege of calling government officials from the different departments to supply the necessary data. I do not see why we should spend any more money on commissions when we have government officials already on the payroll who can give the information required.

It may also be necessary to obtain the views of the premiers or the ministers of agriculture of the governments of the three prairie provinces. Then let us decide on this matter. I want to say in all sincerity that I hope that another election will not roll around before a decision is made. If it is favourable to us in Saskatchewan, that will be fine. If it is not and if we are going to have to sink, then let us sink with the ship. There is one thing about it. We can only get trimmed once on the issue if a decision is arrived at.

An hon. Member: You have been trimmed for years by your government.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): That is what you may think. Speaking yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, if I heard him correctly, that all candidates in the last federal election pledged themselves to the building of the South Saskatchewan dam, or had indicated that in their campaigns. Well, if the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was never wrong before, he was certainly wrong that time. I was in that last federal campaign and never on any political platform in my constituency was the South Saskatchewan dam mentioned. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke at my convention and it was not mentioned. Another senior minister of cabinet, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), spoke in Estevan and the matter was not mentioned. In all of the campaign carried on in my constituency, and I was at all of the meetings, it was never mentioned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what will happen in the next campaign I do not know.

Mr. Ferguson: You will be running on the Conservative ticket.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I am not too sure that there will be enough Conservatives in my constituency to elect me and I do not think I could take that chance. However, if this becomes a political football we will have to deal with it then; but I am interested to see that we do not make it a political football at the present time. I wish to say to the government: Let us have a decision on this quickly—just as soon as possible. I said last night that I did not think the government could give us a decision right away after the report had become available, but at the same time I would hope that before this house adjourns we will have a decision one way or the other.

I am going to make a plea to the mover of this amendment which may be useless.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are giving you a chance.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I will answer that if you will give me a minute.

The hon. member who moved the amendment to the motion rose in his place and said that he was taking that opportunity to bring this very important subject before the house. He said that it was very dear to his heart and very dear to the hearts of all the people in Saskatchewan. Well, with that there is no dispute. He went on and made what I thought was a very good speech. I pay him the compliment of saying that he made a very good speech and, as a matter of fact, I compliment him on bringing this subject before the house—although the Minister of Agriculture says it could have been brought up in the discussion on his estimates. However, I am with the member for Lake Centre in thinking that we should have had a discussion on this subject as soon as possible—and we have had it. He did not say why he moved his amendment but I presume, and if I am wrong he can correct me, that it was to give other members who were anxious to speak on it, like myself, a chance to speak. Had he not moved the amendment we might have got off on fish, or wheat, or something else and possibly I would not have had an opportunity to speak at this time.

The hon. member went on to say that he was anxious to keep politics out of this, and I am trying to convince myself that was so. I want to say to him: If he wants to make it a political issue, what is the hurry; because as far as I know there is no election in the offing at the moment. Why get started on it now? Why play it out now rather than wait? I suggest, as far as timing is concerned, that it might be better to wait. From a political viewpoint it will have more effect.

From his remarks and actions I take it that the hon. member has no notion of withdrawing his amendment. Before the vote is taken, and while the hon. member has raised a grievance, I will say that I think that moving the amendment has served a good purpose. I am sincere when I say that, but I cannot see any good purpose pressing a vote at this time.

The hon. member and other members have called on the Saskatchewan members to get up and give an independent vote. Someone has suggested that we should press the government for that. I am going to be honest and say that I have not pressed the government for an independent vote on this and I will tell you why. I am satisfied in my own mind at the moment, although I suppose my friends to the left of me will not agree, that if we had an independent vote on this at the present time, regardless of parties to which we belong, the majority of members would not be in favour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There would be some Liberal members against it.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): If my hon. friend would not be so political at the moment we would be able to get somewhere.

Mr. Gardiner: Tell us where you are going to run.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): There is no difference between the members in the province of Alberta and the province of Manitoba with—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us have the vote and find out.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): All right, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member is more interested in the vote than he is in the dam. As soon as this report was received some people suggested: Throw it in the scrap; burn it; throw it in the South Saskatchewan river. Well, that cannot be done. If we had an independent vote, in my opinion, whether the hon. member for Lake Centre agrees with me or not—and I have a right to state my opinion—I do not believe this vote would carry. I have been talking to other members as I have been interested in knowing how some of the Liberals are thinking. I spoke to many of them this morning—they were not from Saskatchewan but from other parts of eastern and western Canada—and they would not like to be called upon at the present time to get up and make a decision about whether this project should be gone ahead with.

Now, they indicate they are in favour of it. I do not think that a vote serves any good purpose. There is only one good purpose it could serve and that is to bring in politics, which the hon. member from Lake Centre says he is trying to keep out. I am therefore trying to convince myself that is a fact.

My final plea is to ask what good a vote is going to do. Some of the C.C.F. members from Saskatchewan have indicated, for some reason or other, that we are only using this as an excuse for not voting for the amendment or the subamendment. If the hon. member for Lake Centre would take the lead I do not know but I think the other boys would go along and withdraw the subamendment.

A moment ago I think I heard the hon. member for Lake Centre say: Well, we gave you a chance. Let us take a look at that chance. I am not going to admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am any rubber stamp although we have been accused of being rubber stamps and having no independence. I am not going to admit that, but if we just assume it for the moment I would like to say to the hon. member for Lake Centre that two wrongs do not make a right. His amendment serves no purpose other than having a vote at the present time for political purposes. Well, if he wants a vote there will be lots of chance to get a vote and find out just exactly where all members stand later on. I think that he would be doing a great service to the Conservatives left in Saskatchewan if he withdrew the amendment.

The other evening the hon. member said: We want this dam. I will go along with the hon. member for Lake Centre there. We want this dam, but I beg him to keep politics out of it at the present time. If he would do that he would probably make some history in this country. He raised a matter that was very important to himself and all the rest of us in Saskatchewan, and he says that he is trying to keep politics out of it. I do not know whether he would agree with what I have suggested as far as a committee is concerned, but I think he would agree with me that it would be better for us not to have a vote at the present time. I say, and I repeat, that I think that is important at the present time. As far as a vote is concerned, whether it would hurt Liberal members from Saskatchewan or not is, I think, incidental because we either get the dam or we don't and that will be the issue, not how we voted here. If he would follow my suggestion I would be very grateful, and I think it would be helpful.

If I may be allowed to speak for the Conservatives in my constituency, and there were 2,500 in the last federal election, they are very interested in this project for Saskatchewan, and I think they would be very grateful to the only hon. member of their party coming from the province of Saskatchewan if he followed my suggestion. If he does not do so, I am going to have a hard time to convince them, if I should wish to try, that he is not stooping to political manoeuvres. Now, I think that is important.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could even suggest that.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Pardon?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that an hon. member should suggest that another hon. member is stooping to political manoeuvres.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Possibly I should not have said that, but what I was saying was that I was going to have a hard time convincing people in my constituency that it was not the case.

Now, this is the end of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, and I do not know but what the hon. member, who has spoken twice on the amendment and on the subamendment, might like to take part of my time, since I have a few minutes left, and tell us why he will not do that. I am prepared to give him part of my time, but if he does not wish to have it then we can take the vote.

Mr. Hodgson: Will you tell us why you won't vote as a member, rather than for party?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): That is not a very intelligent question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Perhaps I should not speak on this subject, being the representative of an Ontario constituency, but I have had the great pleasure and honour of travelling up and down this great country over a period of years and observing the lack of development of the natural resources. I have associated with the people from Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. I lived out west for a number of years. Out there the feeling was always present that the effete east was a handicap to the west. When I came to this house I felt in my heart that I represented the whole of Canada, and that Canada could not really be great unless all the cogs in that wheel were functioning. No person would dare to say that the province of Saskatchewan was not a necessary cog in the wheel of Canada, for to do so would be absurd.

For almost as long as I can remember I have heard irrigation problems and drought discussed. I have seen with my own eyes the effects of these conditions in Saskatchewan. I am fed up with the lack of vision indicated by the present government, and this lack of vision is not something that is limited to this particular subject. It is a continuation of the desire, for some reason or other, of not wishing to give the facts and figures regarding this project, and an inability to make up its mind as to whether or not we should proceed with the project. In part of his address the member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith) advocated the building of this dam, thus giving to the province what I believe in my heart it is absolutely entitled to. In this way the whole Dominion of Canada would be benefited. In speaking thus, the hon. member spoke as a Conservative would speak on this subject, and as all Conservatives in this party will vote if permitted to vote on the question of whether or not the people of Saskatchewan should get their just deserts.

In the latter part of his speech, the hon. member for Moose Mountain was excusing himself for not wanting to vote as his people would want him to vote or as his conscience dictated. He dragged more herrings across his trail—

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Than you are?

Mr. Ferguson: Well, I do not mind a remark of that kind, because I just accept that as a remark from a gentleman who is trying to excuse himself for not doing his duty towards his constituents. From a man like that, you could expect almost any kind of remark.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): From you.

Mr. Ferguson: You have had your opportunity, and there were times—

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): You did not seem to like it.

Mr. Ferguson: —when there were spots of intelligence. Now, you have sat down and if you will just keep your remarks for some other time when you want to amuse parliament, that will be all right. When your constituents read your address, and read how you beat about the bush on this subject, they will certainly not even want you on the Conservative ticket.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): That is mutual; I do not want to be there.

Mr. Ferguson: I am afraid there will be lots of them trying to scramble onto this ticket at the next election after the shemozzle this party has made of things.

[Mr. Ferguson.]

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Talk about the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Ferguson: I know more about it than you know about your proposition out there. The hon. member for Moose Mountain said he was sick and tired of repeated commissions. He said he had gone to a lot of trouble, and I am sure he has, in proving conclusively that this project should be proceeded with immediately.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I said no such thing.

Mr. Ferguson: I do not doubt that his information was accurate and came from the best sources in his government.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I said no such thing.

Mr. Ferguson: You are going to make this house believe you did not say anything, and I am going to make this house agree that surely you have said nothing.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): If you are going to quote me, quote me correctly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be better if both hon. members addressed the Chair.

Mr. Ferguson: As I said before, whether or not the hon. member for Moose Mountain agrees with me, I am still firmly convinced that the people of Saskatchewan need this project. I should like to see this country get its just deserts through an increased population, an increased development of the natural resources. We have the iron development in Labrador and Quebec; we have the oil in Alberta. We still have tagging along the province of Saskatchewan, which undoubtedly is a great asset to the people of Canada. With all the facts my friend could bring us from the sources in his own government, there seems to be no doubt that this project is worth while. I am a Conservative from the province of Ontario—

Some hon. Members: Shame. Do not brag about it.

Mr. Ferguson: I do realize that we must develop this country as a whole, and that one or two provinces cannot go along alone. Saskatchewan is an integral part of this country and we need it. The taxpayers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec can do little but contribute willingly and wholeheartedly large sums of money to the development of the other provinces which are not as fortunate. Surely this government has had ample time to make up its mind and say to the people of Canada, "We have now sufficient information to permit us to declare that we are going to start this project, and that completion is expected within a certain time". I, as a member from Ontario, am one hundred per cent in favour of this project being undertaken immediately. I am sick and tired of the procrastination of this government day after day in delaying something the people of Saskatchewan need. The hon. member for Moose Mountain cannot mistake my attitude in the matter.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in this debate that has to do with the association of water and the land, and the production thereof as a result, those of us who have been only too familiar with a situation that has been otherwise over a great number of years, would like to associate ourselves with those who have spoken on behalf of the South Saskatchewan river development. We do so in order that we will not be placed in a position, as we have in the past, of having to learn by dire experience the things that we should do in advance to prevent certain conditions recurring. History has shown us that things that have happened in the past will, over a period of years, happen again. History has an unfortunate way of repeating itself.

In order to eliminate that situation, and place ourselves in a position where the people of Saskatchewan and the other parts of Canada can look forward to the future with a greater degree of confidence, I should like to lend my assistance to the government and to the people of the Dominion of Canada so that an effort will be made to initiate in the province of Saskatchewan the only method that I know of that can prevent similar conditions occurring in that province. One of the fundamental problems since mankind has been on this earth has been that of dealing with famine. We read in Genesis that at the time of Joseph the land was covered with famine, and that famine was caused by nothing less than a drought. In the year 1516 before Christ it was a problem of the people, and it has been associated with them ever since. In order to eliminate the conditions that existed at that time—they were unaware of what irrigation could do for the people of the world—they used one method, namely, providing in good years for the bad years. In good years they stored up corn for the bad years. The Lord instructed Joseph and they did that during the good years. During the seven good years they stored up sufficient for the seven bad years that were going to be inflicted upon the people, because, as I mentioned before, they had no other solution for their trouble. It is written in Genesis that famine was all over the face of the earth during that period of time. We in this House of Commons must do what lies within our power so that not again in the future at any time, irrespective of what anyone may say about overproduction in this day and age throughout the length and breadth of the land, with the population increasing in the world, shall it be written of us that we contributed to famine in the world.

I should like to say in as few words as possible what I think about this subject of irrigation. It is our hope that we may eliminate what has been a problem over such a long period of years. We read that in the early days the Nile river was used for irrigation purposes so that food could be supplied to the people of that time. During the time of the Roman empire Egypt was the granary of the world. They tried to devise ways and means so that the water would co-operate with the soil to provide the essential of life, which is food. This came to be a continuing problem in the world. We should consider it from that angle if from no other.

Canada is great in the eyes of the world. It has not been too great in its ambition to make provision for the future in connection with irrigation. Last week I checked up on some figures on irrigation in the world and I found that Canada has approximately a million acres under irrigation. The United States, another supposedly advanced country, has 2,200,000 acres under irrigation; Mexico has 5,700,000 acres; Cuba, 50,000 acres; Dominican Republic, 24,000; British Guiana, 100,000; Colombia, 30,000; Peru, 2,400,000; Brazil, 2,200,000; Chile, 3 million; Argentine, 2 million; Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, 8 million; France, 5,700,000; Italy, 4,920,000; Spain, 3,740,000; Morocco, 1,500,000; Algeria, 400,000; Greece, 600,000; Syria, 620,000; Hungary, 40,000; Lebanon, 74,000; Pakistan, 30 million. It was only a few years ago that we had its Prime Minister in our country. China has 47,500,000 acres under irrigation; Japan, 7,600,000; Thailand, 1,800,000; the Philippines, 1,120,000; India, 35 million; Ceylon, 400,000; Indo-China, 1 million; Java, 8 million; Australia, 2,700,000; New Zealand, 250,000, making a total of approximately 180 million acres of land of the world under irrigation. Without these 180 million acres of land under irrigation famine would stalk the face of the earth. Therefore I submit, Mr. Speaker, that irrigation is a good prospect. Wherever irrigation has been instituted it has neither been abandoned on any large scale nor reduced to any great extent in any country of the world. In any country where there is water and suitable land, if they are not brought together it is wastage of the soil and it is wastage of lives, because production on that soil results in giving people the opportunity to live somewhere in the world.

South Saskatchewan River Project

I have lived in the constituency of Maple Creek for 35 years, and most of those years have been spent in hoping for rain, in hoping and searching the sky for the clouds which might bring rain, and in only 6 of those 35 years have I in my particular area had a crop that was a paying crop. Most of my life, along with the other people in that area, I have spent in searching for rain. The first thing I did on awakening in the morning was to scan the heavens to see if there might be the prospect of a cloud in the sky, and the last thing at night was to look at the reddish horizon and the way the sun would set to see whether there was any hope for rain the following day. Too often have we suffered for lack of water, the result of the non-application of water to the soil. Just imagine what water would have brought to the people who were suffering and in despair during the thirties, those people who were the salt of the earth. Just imagine what they went through during that period of time, and yet we hear people in this country say that we should let the water flow as nature intended it, water that could be utilized to save lives in the world, and to save not only their lives but their spirit and their morale. Just think of the contribution that they could make to the country that we are trying to build in this Dominion of Canada, to make it even greater?

We had mothers gazing at their children in that period of years to which the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) made reference yesterday in a nice way when he was speaking on this subject. It is not often that I agree with him, but he explained to us yesterday what happened to those people during those years. Their plight has also come to the attention of people right here in the city of Ottawa, because the mayor of that city was out through the constituency of Maple Creek in 1932 and 1933 when a committee was set up by the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett to investigate conditions out in Saskatchewan and particularly in the southwest corner of that province. That is part of the Palliser triangle that reaches down to Mexico, and comprises all the boundary east of the Rocky mountains. That has always been dry and always will be dry. Let us do something about that so that people may live there in the future.

The last record I have shows that there are 2,800 people there who have an application in to the P.F.R.A. people to move to another area somewhere in the province to establish themselves in connection with their farming operations. Twenty-eight hundred people have applications in that are unfilled because there is no room for them elsewhere. There is no room in the irrigation districts in Alberta; there is no room in any part of western Canada. We want to establish those people because the southwestern part of Saskatchewan was settled in the beginning by people with unlimited hope in that country. They could not bring those hopes to fruition because it was a dry country, and it took us a generation to learn that. Since we have learned it let us adapt ourselves to it and unite our experience with the experience of people throughout the whole world, and utilize the waters that flow that were given to us for that purpose as well as for other purposes. Water has been utilized since the beginning of time for that purpose and will be utilized for that purpose until the end of time. Let it not be said of Saskatchewan that for some reason, or from some motive, we are not utilizing the water that is there. The first essential is to impound the water. Without that nothing can be accomplished. It is the duty of the federal government to impound the water. After the water has been impounded, then the province can take it and utilize it to the best advantage of all the people who may benefit from it.

Many people ask me, why do you not move away? Well, we are not moving away. We came to that country with the idea in our minds that we could carve a home for ourselves in that country, and we are going to make a home for ourselves in that country. Under certain conditions we can create enough wealth there for the people of Canada, because of production in that area, to just overwhelm them and the people of the world. That can be done under ideal conditions and we refuse to abandon homes and land that hold that promise. But it takes us a while to learn, and it takes the government a while to associate itself with what is happening in this country, and to learn what the needs are. After they have learned about those needs, I hope they will be doing something about it.

Our only solution in the southwest area is water. There is no other solution. The practice of summer fallowing was initiated and has been continued over the years. The cost of summer fallowing in this country would have built a dozen South Saskatchewan river developments. The cost of summer fallowing over the years, where you let the land lie idle and hope that it may accumulate water from rainfall, so that you can seed it in another year, has cost a great deal of money. The cost, year after year, of letting all that land remain idle has been so great that, as I have said, it would build a dozen South Saskatchewan river projects.

That is what P.F.R.A. was initiated to do—to have that land brought into operation, and to eliminate the conditions which made it impossible to bring the area to a point where it could make its contribution to the national life of the country. That is why it was initiated; that is why it was introduced; and if it cannot complete that purpose or complete those efforts for which it was intended, then it is of no further use to us.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) placed a considerable amount of history on record. He put on Hansard all the facts surrounding the establishment of P.F.R.A. When hon. members understand that one acre of irrigated land will stabilize forty acres, then they can begin to visualize what a million acres of irrigated land would do. It would stabilize about forty million acres of agricultural land in the province of Saskatchewan. That would continue on, year after year. There would be production in that area, irrespective of rainfall; and the area affected could thus make its contribution to the national wealth.

Take the national wealth created by the production of wheat and other grains out of western Canada, and what do hon. members think would happen to the economy of the whole country? Anything that you have of any value is directly affected by the economy of western Canada; and so I say it is in the interests of all Canada to make the west productive.

What is going to be the position ten years from now? I would ask hon. members what would happen if history repeats itself in western Canada. And does anyone think that we will not have periods of drought again? Does anyone think we can stand idly by after suffering from drought over the years, without giving the people of the southwest any evidence that preparations are being made on the part of the government in respect of what it will do in years to come? I would not be a party to any policy or support any government that takes the position that it will not utilize what has been shown necessary by evidence through the years, or that will not accord the people their rights. Because the people have a right to live. They have a right to produce, and they shall not be restrained therefrom by an inoperative government.

So I am wondering what is going to be the position ten years from now. We know that P.F.R.A. was brought into existence to assist in these areas. It was brought into existence by a leader of the Conservative party—one who took a much different attitude from some Conservatives who have been talking in the House of Commons in the last few days. They should follow the example of one of their earlier leaders.

Another thing P.F.R.A. was supposed to do was to eliminate the necessity for P.F.A.A. The Minister of Agriculture told us yesterday that $140 million has been spent on P.F.A.A. from our national wealth and economy throughout the years it has been in operation—and I believe that is about twelve years.

Incidentally, let me say that in the constituency of Maple Creek we have a greater number of small projects than are to be found in any other constituency in Canada; so I know what these irrigation projects will do. I know, of course, that at various times they involve some cost—not the projects themselves, but what happens when the water overflows and thus handicaps effective efforts.

However P.F.R.A. was brought into existence, one of its purposes being to eliminate P.F.A.A.—the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. From that act farmers received a certain amount each year when they suffered from crop failures. It was just to keep them alive, to eliminate relief, so that they could continue in succeeding years, in the hope that they might reap crops at some later time.

Are we going to have P.F.A.A. for the rest of our lives, or is something going to be done to eliminate that condition? I am speaking about the southwest corner. Incidentally, I receive no benefit from the proposed South Saskatchewan river project, because the elevation of my land is too high. We are too far away. I am not too hopeful about the power prospects. We can get along without that power if we have to, but we cannot get along and produce the necessities of life with a land that is dried out.

So we wish to augment P.F.R.A. and eliminate as much as possible of P.F.A.A. How are we going to do it if we adopt the attitude where we are going to wait another ten years, or perhaps longer, until someone completes the South Saskatchewan river project?

I am not one who looks to other governments to do things. I would like to see them done by this government. I would ask the people of Canada to give consideration to what has happened out in Saskatchewan. I would ask them to give consideration to what is contained in the report that has recently been presented to parliament. If there is one thing in that report that has been eliminated and that, in my opinion, has not been considered, it is the fact that there has not been sufficient distinction between dominion-provincial cost, consideration of what the province would have to pay and what the dominion would pay.

I do not think there would be any question in the minds of any of us as to the attitude we should take when P.F.R.A. representatives, engineers who have been associated therewith, and others, have stipulated that at the very outside it would cost the Dominion of Canada no more than $84 million, over a period of ten years. That $84 million is spread over a ten-year period—and that is what we are asking the people of Canada to consider, so that we can establish ourselves out in that country and thus eliminate relief costs and relief measures over the years.

That is what we want the government and the people of this country to do. I would associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith). I would say sufficient commissions have been appointed. However, I would disagree with the hon. member in one respect, because I think there should be one more commission, and it should consist of only one member of the former Meek commission, one member of the Cass-Beggs commission and one member of the Hogg commission, as well as one member from among officials of P.F.R.A., who know more about this subject than anybody else. They could determine what would be the best policy for Canada to follow.

They would not need to make any further investigation at all, because they have their reports. Let us have this committee appointed to investigate committees—commissions to investigate commissions. They could do it all in a month. And if those four people were not enough, then let us add a few farmers. Because the farmers of western Canada, with the dominion Minister of Agriculture, could make a decision on this matter within thirty days. It would be a valuable decision and one that the Dominion of Canada could support.

I would offer one word of caution, however: Do not put any lawyers on that commission, because if they act as some opposition lawyers are acting in the House of Commons that commission would continue until the crack of doom.

Do you know what there should be in connection with this House of Commons? In addition to the house, and the other place, there should be an intermediate place where we could put all these lawyers, these people who make their living by their mouths. In that way they could talk the year round, and it would permit us farmers to go back home and do something for the national well-being of the country.

[Mr. Studer.]

Put them all in that intermediate place, a place that has been described in the Bible as the limbo. Put them in there, but do not overlook the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because, he being the sixty-sixth edition of Beauchesne, he could keep them all in order. So the opposition come before the House of Commons with what they know is a ridiculous situation. In the first place they are asking us to vote for subamendments and amendments to convince the government that the dam should be built. Whom are we going to convince with any vote? They cannot even convince themselves. The originator of that amendment, if he has been convincing people in Saskatchewan with votes over these last fifteen years, has certainly done a good job of it because only two per cent of the population in Saskatchewan have voted for his party. So if he is convincing people, he is convincing the Tory party right out of existence by voting.

You do not convince anyone by voting. You can vote for something the rest of your life but you do not convince a soul. You convince people by logical, common horse-sense argument. I do not know anyone who is better at that kind of argument than the farmers of western Canada and all over Canada.

Let them have a little chance to operate here in this House of Commons without having to apply for admission within the ranks and only be accepted on the terms "we will listen to you but we are wasting our time by doing so". All the time that has ever been wasted in this country has been wasted by lawyers talking. All the difficulty that people get into is caused by some lawyer getting them into it or by some other lawyer trying to get them out. So I suggest that the farmers could settle this with much less discussion. If the opposition think we can convince anyone by voting, they do not do that in the province of Ontario through their legislation or they do not do it in the province of Saskatchewan. In order to persuade people you have to convince them that something should be done.

They are telling us to do in this House of Commons exactly what they refuse to do in their own provincial governments. They definitely will not vote against their budgets. They definitely will not vote against their speech from the throne because it would be considered a non-confidence vote. They definitely will not vote against the bringing in of supply because that is a vote of non-confidence. They will never do that, yet they ask us to do it in order to convince the government. The government does not need to be convinced. Convince the rest of the people of Canada by sound, logical argument, convince also the western farmer and that is all you need to do because the government will not go against the wishes of the people as a whole. I was not sent here by the people of Maple Creek to vote non-confidence in this government because, when things are done, they will be done by this government, not by somebody voting this way or that way in a political sense. This government does the right thing because it is the right thing to do, and for no other reason. When we convince this government and all the people of Canada who have to be convinced that it is the right thing to do to build this dam, then it will be done. No political discussion will ever change that because you would be in the same position if you ever were the government, which God forbid.

So I would like to conclude by again bringing to the people of Canada the necessity of giving consideration to this South Saskatchewan river project. I hope that we can look forward to an early favourable decision on the part of the people of Canada represented by the government for the building of this dam. In that way we can do our part in this world to prevent a recurrence of what has only too often happened in the past, drought conditions which make it impossible for people to live in the various areas and put forth their full productive effort, which would prevent the wastage of land and the wastage of public moneys that are used as an alternative means of supporting the people in these areas during such years.

I claim and repeat along with other members that we should go forward in this young and virile country, which boasts of being one of the leading countries in the world, and make the greatest possible use of our productive efforts to provide a greater utilization of our resources and create a condition in this country which our children, when they replace us, will look back at and realize that in this day and age we provided, not only for themselves in plenty, but for many other peoples throughout the world.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I did not intend to take any part in this debate because it does not practically concern the part of the country from which I come, but certain statements have been made during the debate to which I have listened carefully with which I must take issue. Several members of the opposition who have spoken have said that they would like to see a free vote on this issue. I have sat here for two days wondering what is a free vote.

An hon. Member: There ain't no such animal.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): During the eight years that I have been in Ottawa I have never been asked to vote in a particular way. I can say in all sincerity that I have never been asked to vote on any issue in any particular way. I have used my own judgment. I recognize the fact that I was sent here as a Liberal member of parliament. No doubt it is pretty well taken for granted that I will support Liberal policy. I will admit that to a great extent I have done that, but I have not been driven, I have not received any suggestions. I feel that I am as free as any member in the House of Commons. I do not like this suggestion of a free vote because I will vote on any issue the way I feel I should vote.

Other statements have been made with which I take issue. When the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking yesterday he suggested that the project under discussion had been supported by the leader of his party inside and outside the chamber at all times. To me that seems to be a most irresponsible statement, to say that a man should be prepared to support a thing before he knows it is economically sound. I could not sell that in the maritime provinces. The people who know me and who have been with me eight years know that I have never voted against anything that would be for the benefit of the general public in this country. I have always supported them.

I should like to put on the record what was said yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he was asked a question by the hon. member for Lake Centre. This is what the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 1770 of Hansard:

> The government is not prepared to go ahead, without further information, to recommend to parliament the expenditure of the amounts estimated by the commissioners, and will not take it upon itself to do that until it has further information.

I could not support this type of thing when I am convinced in my own mind that there is not sufficient evidence so far to prove that it is economically sound. There is one more thing I should like to mention at this particular point which has been very noticeable to me. Another report was brought into this chamber recently and it was suggested that the investigator did not need to be investigated. It went before a committee and the people who are talking here today did not ask one single question in the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow a discussion of that matter at this time.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am finished with that matter, Mr. Speaker. This report came in, but this report is all wrong. We are prepared to accept one without any discussion, but the other one is all wrong. There is no foundation for the information that is in this report that is being discussed here now. I fail to understand why those two attitudes should prevail. I cannot understand how you can take one for granted and condemn the other one when so far as I can understand from the discussion that has taken place everyone is convinced that the men responsible for these reports were the most reliable men to be found in that particular type of work. But one is condemned completely.

It has been suggested that some of the members of the cabinet and the Prime Minister might have been playing politics with this issue. If I have ever seen politics played with any issue, it has been played by those who have spoken in the last two days when men stand up and say that they will support this wholeheartedly when they do not know it is economically sound. They are prepared to support it anyway because it might mean votes for them. I want to tell these gentlemen something. There is an old story about the dog that reached for the shadow and lost the bone completely. Be careful that that very thing does not happen and that this does not boomerang on you. You may gain a few votes somewhere but in other places you may lose a whole lot more than you gain. I am sure that the discussion that has gone on here in the last two days would not appeal to the people of the maritime provinces. If I am convinced that the project is feasible and economically sound, I can stand up and vote for it and explain it to the people of my constituency; but on the basis of the report that has been made and the information contained in it it is impossible to do so.

I should like to bring one matter to light in that connection and then I will sit down. In the section of the country from where I come there is a project that has been under discussion for twenty-five years, the Passamaquoddy tidal power project. It would mean much to that particular part of the country because we are very short of electrical energy. It would mean everything to us. It has been under study for a long time. We all get impatient. I am impatient at the present time. I should like to know what is to be done. Engineers of great experience tell us that it is feasible so far as the building is concerned but they are not convinced that it is economically sound. In other words, they are not convinced that power could not be produced more cheaply from other sources than by the construction of this project.

I am sure that the people of Ontario, Quebec and the western provinces would not want to pour money into such a project if electrical energy can be generated more cheaply by steam. The same considerations exactly apply to the South Saskatchewan project. If I can be assured that it is economically sound after it has been investigated, then I am prepared to support it, but I do feel that it is playing politics to the fullest extent for men to stand up in this chamber and say they are prepared to support it regardless of whether or not it is economically sound.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nobody ever said that.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I wanted to place the views of a maritimer on the record. That is the position I am in and that is the attitude I will take. When it comes time to vote there is no one on that side of the house and no one in this group who will tell me how to vote. I will decide for myself how I will vote just as I have for the last eight years.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Certainly.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member mentioned the fact that he had never known anything else but a free vote in this house. How would he interpret the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at the time the milk subsidy was under debate when he said, as found at page 5431 of Hansard for August 27, 1946:

> Nevertheless the government has no objection to an expression of opinion from the members of the house. I suggest that the vote should be a free expression regardless of party.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am pleased to answer that question. I have no knowledge of what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said at that time. I have no knowledge of what he had in mind, but so far as that particular vote is concerned I can say again that it was not suggested to me by any member of the cabinet or anyone else as to how I should vote. I voted to suit myself and it is so recorded in Hansard. As I stated before, never in the eight years that I have been here have I been asked to vote on any issue in any particular way.

Mr. Ferguson: The party is so well trained that they follow. They do not have to be told.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Speak for yourself.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Speak for yourself.

An hon. Member: Fergie, old chap, don't say that.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate with some timidity, being primarily an urban type representing an urban riding and also representing an Ontario riding. Since the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) has spoken, I am even more timid because I am a member of the legal profession. However, he did mention that sometimes we are able to get people out of trouble, and perhaps I can suggest something that may be of some use to the people from western Canada. It has been my observation generally that property and civil rights, such as are involved in this case, are always under the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces, and in my own province of Ontario these matters are usually looked after by the province. I should like to suggest that so far as Saskatchewan is concerned the province has a legitimate claim. First of all, when the province was formed, which as I remember was some time around 1905, the resources were reserved to the federal government and were not returned to the province until many years later.

During that period much of the immigration to and settlement of the now arid area of southern Saskatchewan took place, and the federal government, both parties at one time or another, had the control of it. Therefore I suggest that the federal government, having been in a sense responsible for that settlement, owes a duty to Saskatchewan by reason of the improper, inefficient or unknowledgeable administration during that period. I would suggest that their duty is to try to remedy the defect, to try to remedy what took place. One obvious remedy would be to remove these people and place them elsewhere, but such a remedy is never simple of accomplishment. If another remedy is to provide irrigation to permit the land on which these people were settled to become properly arable, then I would suggest that is a suitable solution.

The report of the commission has been made and it indicates to a certain extent anyway that the project may not be economically sound. In that event, since I believe that the federal government has a duty to the province of Saskatchewan, I would suggest that the government study earnestly what can be done in the way of irrigation. It may be that the P.F.R.A. engineers have a proper solution or it may be that they have not. Nevertheless I suggest that in fairness to the province of Saskatchewan—and I think this feeling is held generally by those in Ontario—a proper study should be made reasonably quickly. The information is now available, and a decision should be made as to what should be done so far as irrigation is concerned.

I do not think any person from Ontario feels, as some of the Saskatchewan members sometimes suggest, that Saskatchewan is something that is outside the pale. Nor do we ever feel that we do not need Saskatchewan. We regard it as a most valuable part of our national economy, and obviously it is only by the complete integration of all natural resources in the total economy of Canada that we can achieve the greatness which is necessary to this country. When people from Saskatchewan make comments about the rather indifferent attitude of those from the east I think they are sometimes expressing opinions in which they do not really believe. It would be silly for any hon. member of this house to try to write off Saskatchewan or any other province and suggest that when something is due to them they should not receive it. Therefore, acknowledging that we possibly owe a debt to Saskatchewan, my only suggestion is that a study be made of the problem as soon as possible using the large amount of information available, and that a solution be reached and action be taken.

Mr. John M. James (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks following what has been said by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter). First of all I am not a lawyer, and that may be of some help to me here. But I do want the people of Saskatchewan to know, and especially members of this house from Saskatchewan, that we in Ontario are right behind them as far as we can go. I do not think there is any doubt about that. That feeling is not the monopoly of a couple of Conservative members. It is held equally by every Liberal member of the house from eastern Canada. We are most sympathetic to their cause.

At this point I should like to pay a tribute to the wonderful sales effort put on by Liberal members from Saskatchewan in connection with this project. They have visited our offices, they have talked to us on every and all occasions on which we have come in contact with them. They have tried to explain the difficulties they have had and the necessity of something being done. I pay tribute to their work and I want to let their constituents know what wonderful work they have done and are doing on their behalf. There is no monopoly there as far as the Conservatives are concerned—or the other parties. The Liberals from Saskatchewan have done a wonderful job.

Going further, I must say I admired the attitude the Prime Minister has taken about this, in comparison with the attitude of the other parties concerned. It was one of responsibility—responsibility that has been evident in his actions since he has been our Prime Minister. I say to the people of Canada and of this house in particular, Mr. Speaker, thank God we have a Prime Minister and a cabinet who must be convinced of the right way before they will go ahead and spend $2 million, $84 million, $350 million or whatever it may be. They must be convinced they have the answer before they will go ahead on any project, be it this one or be it any other. They will not be pressured into building the South Saskatchewan dam or anything else until they are convinced it is right to go ahead, to take the taxpayers' money and go ahead with that or any other project. Thank heaven we have that cabinet and that Prime Minister with us.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): I just want a minute of the time of the house because I too have been visited by the Liberal members from Saskatchewan who have taken my time and their time to explain and re-explain to me the South Saskatchewan project and its benefits. Perhaps the views of a member who is not elder but who has grey hairs would be useful.

We should let the people of western Canada know that we in eastern Canada want to be helpful. We have long ago realized, if we have not expressed the view, that we in eastern Canada can be neither healthy nor prosperous without western Canada; that we appreciate that the metropolis of Winnipeg, and Regina in the heart of the wheat belt, and the great city of Vancouver, which has a twelve-months port, are dependent on the wheat belt.

As I understand it, and as simply as I can put it, we are trying to build a lake in the centre of the prairie provinces. In eastern Canada we have much water. We have too much water at times but you in western Canada lack water. We cannot bring you our water; there is no way of doing that; there is no way of our sharing it with you. But we can share our wealth with you in order that wealth may provide water for you.

We in eastern Canada look upon the South Saskatchewan project as being in the interests of all the people of Canada and not of any particular part of it. As for myself, I was very disappointed that some doubt was cast upon this scheme, but it has been; and that is something that you people from Saskatchewan will have to overcome in some way. Remove the doubt; that is your immediate task.

Much more progress can be made if all of us in this house would devote ourselves to removing as quickly as possible that doubt which has been cast upon the project by the report. I assure the members from western Canada that we shall support the project willingly and anxiously.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking on this matter but after hearing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), whom we heard a while ago, I thought I might add my contribution.

We know that these gentlemen who are from Saskatchewan are very anxious to have this dam built and we also know that, as a member said a moment ago, Canada can only be prosperous provided the whole country is prosperous. If all of the provinces are not prosperous Canada cannot be prosperous.

I am sure that we have great admiration for the people of the west who have done a wonderful job in building that part of this country. We have great admiration for those men who have fought the battle to have this dam built. But if we stop to think for a moment, we will all agree that up to now Almighty God seems to have been pretty good to the people of Saskatchewan. The farmers seem to be getting their fair share of prosperity and we are glad they are getting that fair share of prosperity because they deserve it. We hope they will continue to be prosperous for many years so that we may enjoy that prosperity with them.

The government, however, has a duty to perform which cannot be limited to any one section of this vast country, nor to any one province. It is the duty of the government to find out and investigate closely just where and how money received from the taxpayers can be spent most judiciously. It may be all right for the members from Saskatchewan to concentrate all their efforts on forcing the government to act immediately on this dam. I have already said before that I admire them for that, because if they can get this dam for their province it will no doubt add to the great prosperity of Saskatchewan and, eventually, of Canada. We would all benefit from that. But, Mr. Speaker, the government must, before spending the taxpayers' money, look forward and see what the best results can be for the country as a whole. Until it has investigated every means of irrigation I think it would be foolish at the present time for the government to endeavour to build this dam until it has further information. I base my views on the report of the commission. Some people have said—

An hon. Member: That is not the Currie report you have, is it?

Mr. Bourque: —that the commission should not have gone into all these things. To me, however, the commission was a commission duly appointed by this government and I am sure that its members endeavoured to do their duty as they saw fit. They have had expert advice and they are looking to the prosperity of Canada as much as we are.

I would refer to page 6, "Findings and Recommendations":

1. The commission finds that at present the economic returns to the Canadian people on the investment in the proposed South Saskatchewan river project (central Saskatchewan development) are not commensurate with the cost thereof; though the project would yield social returns which, while they cannot be measured for the purpose of this report, would be of great value to the region in which it is situated.

2. The commission recommends that, when the time comes that the project represents the then best use of water for irrigation, the present finding should be reviewed in the light of changing conditions . . .

3. The commission finds that the available data, which are by no means complete, indicate that the said project does not represent the most profitable and desirable use which can be made of the physical resources involved . . .

5. The commission finds that the future demand for water for irrigation could be such as to exhaust the available flow of the South Saskatchewan river, and recommends, therefore, that without delay a comprehensive, long-range program be developed that would result, over the years, in the most beneficial use being made in the interests of the people of Canada of the waters of the Saskatchewan river from its head waters to the sea.

I therefore concur entirely with the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on Monday evening when he said, as reported on page 1770 of Hansard:

The government is not prepared to go ahead, without further information, to recommend to parliament the expenditure of the amounts estimated by the commissioners, and will not take it upon itself to do that until it has further information . . .

The further information is as to whether or not this is the best use to be made of that great national asset. Personally I think that it is a good use to be made of it, and if I can be convinced to the extent where I can honestly say that I believe it to be the best I will recommend to my colleagues to make the recommendation to parliament. But I want to be sure that if this asset is used in this way it will not be apparent shortly afterward that there was a better use to which it should have been put.

As a businessman, Mr. Speaker, I say this is not the proper time to go ahead with this project because the commission has stated that there might be other plans in the future that would be cheaper. Since we have to spend the taxpayers' money judiciously, I think it would be a good idea to have further investigation. If we find at a later date that this is a bona fide project, then we could go ahead with it. I would then be entirely in favour of that project.

I heard an hon. member state a few minutes ago that he had never been asked to vote in any particular way. I can say that since I have been in this house—it is only a short time—no one has ever asked me to vote in any particular way or told me to do anything I did not want to do. I should like to tell the gentlemen who have spoken, and who have told us that we have to vote in a certain way, that I shall vote with the government because I am convinced that the government is right. I am proud of the words used by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the other night. Like a good father with a family of ten children, he wants to see that the money the government is spending is spent fairly and for the good of the whole of Canada. It is for that reason that I shall vote with the government, because I am convinced that the Prime Minister has the welfare of Canada at heart and it is for that reason he is delaying this project. He is not sure that it is the best way to spend the taxpayers' money.

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): I did not intend to take part in this debate, but after hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), I believe I would be remiss in my duty as a member of the New Brunswick bar if, at this stage, I did not take up the cudgels and say a few good words on behalf of the lawyer members of the government and the House of Commons. The hon. member suggested, when speaking on this amendment, that the house should be divided into three sections, and that the lawyers should occupy the limbo section. If we were to follow the pattern set out by the hon. member and had one section which was not very interesting, then a heavenly section, a purgatory section and then limbo, in what section would the hon. member for Maple Creek like to see himself?

There have been many things, mostly bad, said about lawyers throughout the ages. One definition which has always struck me as being very much to the point, Mr. Speaker, was coined by a great British jurist when he said that lawyers were comparable to a pair of shears in that they cut everything that comes between them but they never nick one another. May I remind the hon. member that all these unfriendly, uncharitable, sometimes witty but often "corny"—to use a modern expression—darts which have been thrown at us have always been blunted on the Canadian lawyers' armour of professional solidarity and dignity. We are strengthened in the realization that most of those who criticize us most severely deserve nothing but the divinely inspired words:

"Father forgive them; they know not what they do."

Before resuming my seat, may I ask the hon. member for Maple Creek where he would find a cabinet in his government today were it not for the thirteen able lawyers who make a good part of the 20-member cabinet of the present government?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): They are good lawyers.

Mr. Robichaud: I said that.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to say a few words on this subject because the real roots of my very existence stretch down into the dry, droughty soil of Saskatchewan. I recollect quite vividly what the lack of rainfall meant to many people in Saskatchewan. I should like to say also that, coming from the province of British Columbia, no tirade of abuse has ever been levelled at me because I voted in support of additional payments to the people of Saskatchewan for grain. Further than that, I should like to say that we are representatives of Canada, and not just representatives of one constituency in the dominion. I feel, therefore, that on this occasion it is necessary to speak about unity in Canada. I am not going to devote one instant while I am on my feet to speaking about the merits or demerits of the South Saskatchewan development. The whole carcass, if I may use that expression, of the subject has been gnawed over in this house for a couple of days. I do not think anything I could say with respect to that carcass would be edifying to any member of the house.

I should like hon. members to allow their minds to go back to the days of Upper and Lower Canada to see what great advancement the Canadian nation has made in unity, not provincial unity, not parochial unity, but in national unity for the general welfare of the Canadian people. It is that point about which I am most concerned. In that connection, sir, may I say that some of our great prime ministers of the past, the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the late Right Hon. R. L. Borden, the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, and our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) have added tremendously to the national unity of Canada, compared to what it was at the turn of this century. Therefore, sir, rather than delay the house unduly in connection with what I consider to be a proper appraisal of national unity, I should like to quote a citation from the life of Lord Rosebery as written by Lord Crewe. Before I do that may I say that there are certain phrases in the quotation I shall read that deal with Scottish union as they apply to the United Kingdom and also unity within the United Kingdom, and wherever the phrase occurs in what I am about to quote we can substitute the word "confederation" or "confederacy" as it applies to the Dominion of Canada. I should like to put on record the words of Lord Rosebery with respect to unity as they appear on page 49 of this volume. As this quotation was applicable in his day, so also is it applicable today in Canada:

> Our ancestors put their hands to a mighty work, and it prospered. They welded two great nations into one great empire, and moulded local jealousies into a common patriotism. On such an achievement we must gaze with awe and astonishment, the means were so adverse and the result so surprising. But we should look on it also with emulous eyes. Great as that union was, a greater still remains. We have in our generation, if we would remain a generation, to effect that union of classes without which power is a phantom and freedom a farce. In these days the rich man and the poor gaze at each other across no impassable gulf; for neither is there in this world an Abraham's bosom of calm beatitude. A powerless monarchy, an isolated aristocracy, an intelligent and aspiring people, do not together form the conditions of constitutional stability. We have to restore a common pulse, a healthy beat to the heart of the commonwealth. It is a great work, the work of individuals as much as of statesmen, . . .

I should like hon. members to pay particular attention to this phrase. I continue:

> . . . alien from none of us, rather pertinent to us all; each in his place can further it. Each one of us—merchant and clerk, master and servant, landlord and tenant, capitalist and artisan, minister and parishioner—we are all privileged to have a hand in this most sublime work of all; to restore or create harmony betwixt man and man; to look, not for the differences which chance or necessity has placed between class and class, but for the common sympathies which underlie and connect all humanity. It is not monarchs, or even statesmen, that give to a country prosperity and power. France in 1789 had a virtuous monarch and able statesmen. But the different classes of the community had then become completely estranged, and the upper crust of society was shivered to dust by the volcano beneath. In this country the artificial barriers which separate class from class are high enough, but, thank God, they are not insuperable. Let us one and all prevent their becoming so. A great page records the bloodless and prosperous history of the Scottish union. A greater page lies vacant before us on which to inscribe a fairer union still."

That is the crux of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. As Canadians, let us determine to continue the great work of bringing about a greater national harmony in the Dominion of Canada. That has been exemplified by other members here this afternoon, one from the maritimes and also from Ontario and Quebec. Let us agree that if the economics of this project are such that they warrant the expenditure of the amount of money called for either by the commission report or in the estimates of the cost by the federal government, we shall see to it that through our voice in this parliament we shall bring about, as the closing words of the quotation I have just given say, a greater and more lasting harmony and unity than we have had.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Wright) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the subamendment.

Mr. Cruickshank: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the main amendment?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if you could call it five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the main amendment has been lost?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Graydon: The main amendment has been carried.

Mr. Argue: I want to speak at this stage of the debate, but I see it is five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. gentleman spoke on the subamendment and I think it is the practice in the house on the motion to go into supply that hon. members shall speak just once.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Otherwise an hon. member could speak three times on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Graydon: If he has something to say let him speak.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that the hon. member for Lake Centre—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: I think he did it quite properly, but the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has already spoken twice in the debate. He spoke to the main motion, moved an amendment and then was permitted to speak to the subamendment. I submit that in the same manner the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who spoke on the subamendment, has the right to speak on the main amendment, and on the main motion as well, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I recall that the hon. member for Lake Centre did speak twice. However, it is five o'clock and I shall consider the matter between now and eight o'clock. It being five o'clock the house will consider private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILL

MERCANTILE BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 111, to incorporate the Mercantile Bank of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill not going to speak to it at this time?

Mr. Macnaughton: It will be a pleasure to say a few words on this bill to incorporate the Mercantile Bank of Canada. The incorporators are five well-known gentlemen, three of whom are extremely well known to Canadians. The first is Mr. J. B. Carswell of Vancouver, who during the war was director general of the department of munitions and supplies in Washington. He of course is a well known consulting engineer and at the present time has considerable to do with the Kitimat construction and other big projects in British Columbia. Mr. Arthur Cross is also one of the Canadian incorporators, and he was a senior partner of P. S. Ross and Sons of Montreal, chartered accountants. He is a past president of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation and a past director of the Royal Bank of Canada. Senator Bouffard is of course well known to most of us. Aside from being a lawyer, he is president of La Banque d'Economie de Quebec, Quebec city.

Then we have the last two directors, C. J. Endert and H. E. Moquette, both of whom are managing directors of the Dutch bank, Nationale Handelsbank N.V. of Amsterdam, Holland. The capital is $3 million divided into 300,000 shares of the value of $10 per share. I understand $1,500,000 will be subscribed if the House of Commons allows this bill to go through. The head office is proposed for the city of Montreal, and as soon as possible thereafter a branch will be opened in the city of Vancouver because one of the purposes of this incorporation is to supplement the international trading services of the existing banking system of Canada. This charter, as hon. members will see from section 5 of the bill, if passed and accepted by the house will continue in force, as will the charters of all other banks of Canada, until the decennial revision, namely July 1, 1954.

I am prepared to give further details but the bill has been considered in the other place, has been given third reading and passed. I suggest that it should be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce where we are prepared to give any and all explanations, to call any witnesses that the members may desire, to expose the plans and the necessity, purpose and reasons for the passing of the bill and the application in further detail.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Speaker: The business under the heading "private and public bills" having been completed, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that the house go into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Speaker: Just before five o'clock the hon. member for Assiniboia rose to speak on the main amendment to the motion to go into supply and I raised the question whether a member, having spoken on the subamendment, could speak on the main amendment. It has been brought to my attention that the hon. member for Lake Centre has spoken on the main amendment and the subamendment. It would therefore appear that a member who has spoken on the subamendment may speak on the amendment. I would be glad to hear the views of any hon. members with respect to that point.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, as one of those who has done a lot of listening, I was thinking that enough has been said.

Mr. Speaker: That may be the opinion of the hon. member, but I am only concerned with the rules. On giving the matter further consideration, it seems to me that an hon. member can speak on the subamendment and on the amendment. Of course he could then speak on the main motion. I will not make that a firm ruling, but will allow it to stand for the present.

Mr. Graydon: You had better make it permanent. I think you are right.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the vote taken just before five o'clock constitutes a very severe blow indeed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow that. There has been a vote and the house has come to a conclusion on the subamendment. That vote must stand. I think I should be firm and require the hon. member to speak to the main amendment.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the main amendment was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the following terms:

> This house regrets that in the estimates presented to this house no provision has been made for immediately proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) began his speech yesterday he attempted to convince hon. members that the very small item now in the estimates for further surveys in relation to this project is an item that in fact could be used for the construction of the project. The minister went to great lengths to attempt to show the house that this vote could be used for construction. He even went so far as to say that somebody had made a mistake, that the vote should have been $1 million instead of $500,000 as appears in the estimates.

I have seen the government make a lot of mistakes during this session, but I do not imagine the treasury board let half a million dollars go by without realizing it. I noticed that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did not say that the item of $500,000 in the estimates should have been $1 million. It is a case once again of the Minister of Agriculture attempting to say in another way that the people of Saskatchewan can still expect that the project will be completed.

A lot has been said in this debate about members of parliament having a free vote. We have heard the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) and the hon. member for Durham (Mr. James) get up and say that votes are always free, that there is never any pressure put on Liberal members—

Mr. James: On a point of order, I do not believe that the hon. member for Durham ever said any such thing.

Mr. Argue: Oh, I am sorry; that is correct.

Mr. James: Although I would agree with it heartily.

Mr. Argue: It was the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). The hon. member for Durham agrees, so we have three of them saying the same thing. That being the case, I suggest that members on the government side of the house from the province of Saskatchewan have no choice, if they really want the South Saskatchewan dam built, and should say not only by voice, which is important, but by vote, which in my opinion is of equal importance, that the project should be gone ahead with. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) said: Well, in this place it does not matter how you vote; it only matters how you talk. I wonder how the member for Maple Creek got his seat in the House of Commons. Was it by the way the people in his constituency talked or was it by the way they voted?

Speaking in the House of Commons is important in that we can bring issues to the attention of members, and we can plead that members should support certain issues. The vote is of extreme importance and any vote which has been taken against the amendment asking that the dam should be built is, in my opinion, a very distinct disservice to the people of Saskatchewan who are anxious that this project be gone ahead with.

I have been saying that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is attempting to dangle a carrot on a stick before the people of Saskatchewan in the coming election. He is trying to keep the door open and to say that perhaps that small item in the estimates may be sufficient to start construction of the project. Well, it is a carrot on a stick, but the carrot is getting smaller as the years go by. I notice that the estimates for this project for the year 1949-50, in other words the 1949 election year, were $2 million. The estimates for 1950-51 were divided into two categories. Both estimates that might have been used for this project and were used no doubt for certain surveys on the project totalled $1,775,000. The next year's estimates were again reduced, to $1,545,000. The 1952-53 estimates for this project were once again reduced, being down to $1,245,000. The 1953-54 estimates that were recently tabled for this project total only $636,438.

We had a $2 million estimate in 1949-50, the last federal election year, and this year, another federal election year, the estimate is one-third of that $2 million. That estimate, taken in conjunction with the royal commission's adverse report, together with the stand taken by our own Saskatchewan Liberal members, suggests to me that the chance of getting the dam now is just about one-third the chance we had in 1949-50.

Well, the Minister of Agriculture was attempting to keep the door open, attempting to say there is a little item in the estimates and that there might be a little hope yet for the project. I notice that he said there was no division in the cabinet—there should not be, either—and so when the Prime Minister stated the cabinet's position we got the record straight. The Prime Minister said at page 1770 of Hansard:

> The government is not prepared to go ahead, without further information, to recommend to parliament the expenditure of the amounts estimated by the commissioners, and will not take it upon itself to do that until it has further information.

The Minister of Agriculture says the door may still be open. The Prime Minister says the government is not prepared to go ahead. We have had members from Saskatchewan saying they could not vote in favour of the dam at this time, in favour of the amendment or the subamendment, because such a vote might defeat the government. They would not want to do anything that would defeat the government. Apparently if they have a choice between supporting this government, with its colossal majority, adding one more vote to a very large and unessential majority in any given vote, they prefer to do that rather than to vote for a project that is essential to their constituents and to the people of Saskatchewan.

We were not asking any of them to do anything that would vote the government out of office; though mind you, I imagine we will be leaving here in a few weeks and will be out fighting a federal election. It does not matter at all to me; in fact it would be just fine if the election were called now and we could get out a little bit sooner. That has nothing to do with their proposition. They would not vote for it because it might defeat the government and they would not want to do that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not entirely convinced that the hon. member has the right to speak again at this time. Citation 293 of Beauchesne's third edition reads as follows:

> After an amendment has been moved and seconded, the question on the amendment is proposed, and any member who speaks after that question has been proposed speaks to it and not to the main question. When the amendment has been disposed of and the main question is again proposed, any member can speak who has not already spoken on the main question, whether he spoke on the amendment or not.

I would ask hon. members to notice carefully the following words:

> The mover and seconder of the amendment having spoken to the main question cannot speak again to it. The same rule applies, of course, to the case of an amendment to an amendment.

The original amendment to the main motion was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). The subamendment was moved by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). Is not then the hon. member for Assiniboia prevented from speaking to the main amendment? Unless any hon. members have arguments to the contrary I am afraid that I shall have to rule accordingly.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to try to argue to the contrary but I would like to point out two things. The first is that the citation you have just read from is not from any standing order. It is one of those many citations and precedents which I sometimes think cause us more trouble than they do us good. The other point I would draw to Your Honour's attention is that although those words have been there in that paragraph for all these years I have never known them to be applied. Time and again seconders of amendments and seconders of subamendments have been permitted to speak at the succeeding stage of the debate.

I would suggest that we should hardly be changing a practice that has been followed down through the years, particularly when the suggestion to do so is on the basis not of a standing order but of a paragraph known as a citation tucked away in the book.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, there are many citations in Beauchesne—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: —to the effect that if an hon. member moves an amendment or, having seconded an amendment, speaks to the amendment he is then prevented from speaking on the main motion. I think I would have to apply the same ruling to a subamendment. I am afraid I will have to rule that the hon. member for Assiniboia has not the right to speak at this time.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is it on a point of order?

Mr. Graydon: On a point of order. I am not an expert on the rules but in that respect I find myself very much at home with the great percentage of members in the house. However, I do think that there must be some common sense applied to a matter of this kind. If I may, I should like to bring what I believe is an element of common sense to this decision. It seems to me that when there is a main motion before the house, then the house membership has a right, while that motion is before the house, to speak. There is no doubt about that, and no one will deny that position. When an amendment is introduced I should think no one would object to anyone in the house speaking whether or not he has spoken before, because when an amendment is introduced a new subject is injected into the debate. For this reason the membership of the house has a right to discuss it and state their point of view.

Then when a subamendment is introduced, surely the same thing applies. Another new subject has been injected into the debate, and surely no one will suggest that the house membership has not the right to speak on that subamendment. Those three divisions having been properly established, then surely the reverse applies. After all, because a member does not speak at one of these stages surely he is not denied the right to speak when that stage is again reached by the house. I am not referring to a question of rules or anything technical, but I believe if you think this over, Mr. Speaker, you will see there is some injustice done if that common sense approach is denied to the membership of the house. I leave that to you, because your acknowledged fairness in matters of this kind will take that point into consideration. If a member has a right to speak at some stage of the debate, surely he has not denied himself that right by not having participated at that time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Just to complete the picture, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I was most interested in the argument of the hon. gentleman. What is the main motion before the house? It is that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply. That is one stage where any member can speak, move an amendment or a subamendment. No one ever discusses the main motion that Mr. Speaker do or do not leave the chair. Usually they add some regret or ask some redress.

When the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke, he spoke about the South Saskatchewan matter. In his amendment he blamed the government for not proceeding immediately with these works. His amendment was seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). Later on the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) moved the subamendment, and if I recall correctly the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) seconded the subamendment. In his speech he covered the whole amendment and the subamendment, and to my knowledge he did not forget anything.

Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that this citation has some good foundation? If you want to follow the other citation that says speeches should not be repetitious, I am sure all this will be a repetition of things that have been said many times. In the interests of orderly discussion in the house, once we have said everything we have to say, repetition cannot help our case. You say that this does not come under a standing order, but it is a consequence of standing order No. 43 which reads:

> No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech . . .

Mr. Knowles: This is another question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Which one, the South Saskatchewan?

Mr. Knowles: This is now the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre. In connection with the subamendment of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), the Speaker raised a different point. That is not being argued now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought we were discussing the South Saskatchewan project or development. Perhaps I am mistaken and do not know enough about it. That is what has been discussed for two days. The hon. gentleman is now repeating himself because Mr. Speaker let him go on a second time and speak on the amendment. I would not apply the rule too strictly, but in the name of common sense I think we have discussed this at length and repetition would not enlighten the members of parliament or the public.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not an authority on the rules. In my experience in this house, I have never seen Your Honour rule a member out of order because he may have spoken on the subamendment and then wished to speak on the main amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in that statement, but the difficulty in which I find myself is that the hon. member for Assiniboia seconded the subamendment. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has raised a very interesting question, and I am inclined to agree with his viewpoint. I gather from what he said that hon. members who had not spoken on the main amendment should now have the opportunity of doing so. I agree with him. That is in accordance with the rules of the house, as he has stated.

However, the rule also is to the effect that an hon. member who moves or seconds a subamendment and speaks, not only speaks to the subamendment but also speaks to the amendment.

In the latter part of citation 293, I find these words:

> The mover and seconder of the amendment having spoken to the main question cannot speak again to it. The same rule applies, of course, to the case of an amendment to an amendment.

My ruling is that the hon. member for Assiniboia, having seconded the subamendment and having spoken to the subamendment, is prevented from speaking to the amendment. This does not, however, prevent other hon. members who have not spoken to the amendment from speaking to the amendment at this time. The hon. members who moved and seconded the subamendment along with the hon. member who moved the main amendment cannot speak at this time.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I would ordinarily hesitate a long time, Mr. Speaker, before entering a debate which might more properly be had on the occasion of the budget or at some other time. However, I think possibly I can make some slight contribution to this debate, and that is why I rise at this time.

I come from our most westerly province, and I think I will be understood when I say that we and the three western provinces enjoy something of a community of interest. I should like to think that all the people in British Columbia would be as anxious to see this project go ahead as are the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan. This is one of the great national projects upon which this government has embarked; and I think the great national projects upon which we have embarked constitute probably the finest contribution of this twenty-first parliament. It would be a fortunate circumstance if these projects could be by climatic and economic necessity spread equally all across this country, because a project of this size, or a project of the size of the St. Lawrence seaway, must be of benefit to all Canada as well as to the area in which they stand.

In connection with this amendment I am deeply concerned about the reported remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) when he was recently in the west, and I am equally concerned about statements made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). As far as I can see they take the stand: costs be hanged; let us build it anyway.

We have had members on the other side of the house endeavour to embarrass the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) by suggesting that he is now tarrying over a thing which his people want immediately.

Mr. Cardiff: You cannot embarrass him.

Mr. Laing: Well, probably it is a good thing for Canada that he cannot be embarrassed. I would say this, that if he is embarrassed in his own province of Saskatchewan—and I do not think he is, very much—I should like to think that the taxpayers in the other provinces of Canada would thank him and the government for having the moral courage to take the position they did.

Irrigation farming, I have learned after considerable study, is the most hazardous of all types of farming. I know some of the history of irrigation in the areas represented by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). It is a type of agriculture that, after the water is available, involves a very great cost in preparing the land for the irrigation. I have seen in that area those big land planes, as they call them, in which the land has to be shaved down to make a gradual slope so the water can be economically used. When the water is put in this particular area of Saskatchewan, as undoubtedly it will be some day, you are going to revolutionize Saskatchewan to this extent, that you are going to cease having the monoculture that is at present practised there. I am of the opinion that as soon as the water is put on the land, that land will have a value of $150 to $200 an acre. Farm production is dependent upon soil resources, sunshine and water. On the prairies today two of these essentials are under control. The third is not under control. The proposal to bring irrigation to that area is to bring the third essential under control.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that Saskatchewan was a grain-growing province. I do not believe grain would continue to be the primary product grown on that irrigated land. I do not for a minute believe that. They would immediately have to get into, on account of the cost value of the land, the specialized crops for which Alberta is making a great name for itself today.

In our province of British Columbia we have a situation not dissimilar to that projected in the South Saskatchewan scheme. We have areas where the water has to be raised to the benchlands in our Okanagan for the production of fruit. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) will bear me out when I say that in that area the gross production from some of that land—I mean gross production to the farmer—is of the nature of $2,000 an acre; yet they find that the maximum limit to which they can raise water effectively is something under 200 feet. That is something that should induce us not to cast aside advice but to use all the advice that we can possibly obtain.

The P.F.R.A. engineers in Saskatchewan, and indeed in all the prairie provinces, have in recent years done a magnificent job on soil and water conservation on relatively smaller projects. This is a very large project. I have no doubt that for years the P.F.R.A. engineers had been thinking in terms of this larger project; but I am equally convinced that they have not given the thorough study and inspection to the costs which would warrant the approval of the government of the scheme as a whole.

The government employed a commission. Two of these men I do not know, but I remember reading the late Dr. Widtsoe's writings fifteen years ago. I am informed that he was the best irrigation engineer on this continent, which might make him one of the better irrigation engineers of the world. The commission made a suggestion that the cost was excessively high. When I go to a doctor and he tells me something I do not like to hear I do not say, "Off with his head." They are doing that in Russia today, but I hope we will not do it in Canada. I think we have arrived at a position where we need additional information. Surely this project is of sufficient size to warrant all the information we can collect.

We are not an overly cautious people, and I would not be too cautious in this regard, but I do not want to be like the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Lake Centre or the hon. member for Assiniboia, and throw all caution to the winds; because the effect of this amendment is that regardless of cost we shall build it anyway.

As a taxpayer in another province I have said that we in British Columbia are just as interested in the building of that dam and the bringing of irrigation to the province of Saskatchewan as the people of that province, and we want to see it. We were as cruelly disappointed by the findings in this report as were the people of Saskatchewan, but at the same time to take the stand that regardless of cost we must proceed at once is to take a stand that I do not think should be shared by the people of any of the provinces, including Saskatchewan, and that is why I propose to vote against the amendment.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): I do not pose as an authority on the constitution, but to my knowledge there are three qualities a government must have to stay in office. It must be able to carry the speech from the throne; it must be able to carry its budget, and it must be able to go into supply in order to vote money. At page 1591 of Hansard the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved:

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets that in the estimates presented to this house no provision has been made for immediately proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam."

When the suggestion was made as to its being a vote of want of confidence in the government the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) rose in his place and said this should be a free vote. Now, possibly Liberal members from Saskatchewan could vote with the opposition in this matter, and it is possible that the amendment might not carry. But if the house had divided evenly and ten or twelve members had voted in that way, I can imagine the hon. member for Lake Centre and the Leader of the Opposition pointing the finger of scorn at the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), demanding his resignation and that we go to the country, because the house could not go into committee of supply.

The principle is the same. The house, composed as it is now, is probably different from what it would be if it were evenly divided. But I repeat that the principle is exactly the same; and I respectfully suggest that this would be a vote of want of confidence in the government.

There is only one other matter I should like to discuss. The report on the project was made and concurred in by P.F.R.A. authorities and by their consultants. In November of 1949, in a private conversation I had with the premier of Saskatchewan, he told me that the power possibilities of the South Saskatchewan were not nearly what had been anticipated when the previous estimates were made. At that time he was foreshadowing the appointment of Mr. Cass-Beggs so that he could bring in a report; and subsequently that report came in. The first doubt was then cast on the feasibility of the proposition as set out by P.F.R.A.

We now come to the next step. Since the federal government had a great deal of responsibility in the matter, and taking into consideration the doubts expressed by the premier of Saskatchewan, in view of the fact that there was some division of opinion it was considered necessary to arrive at a proper conclusion in the matter.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he know that the premier of Saskatchewan is prepared immediately to sign an agreement that the dam be proceeded with?

Mr. Larson: I am speaking of what happened in 1949, in private conversation with the premier of that province. As a result the Hogg commission was appointed and produced a report in which it did not negate the benefits of the project. Its main point was that the costs were so high as not to be economically sound.

A second point of confusion has been introduced into this matter. At the present time the people of Canada do not know whom to believe, and many members in the House of Commons are in the same position. During the debate many members from other parts of Canada have risen and said that while in principle they support the project, they do not know exactly what the present position is in respect of these varying and conflicting reports.

On top of this it is suggested that we should have a free vote. While I am not well versed in constitutional law, I do not see how the Prime Minister could have a free vote in the matter. The amendment is a vote of lack of confidence, and one either votes for or against the government. I feel this government is the only one that will ever build the project, if it is built; so I do not see why one should vote against it on this occasion.

I do not see what the advantage of a free vote would be, other than that a certain segment of members would vote to build the dam while another segment would vote against it. In my opinion the expression of opinion in the house this afternoon would indicate that such a motion could be lost, and if it were lost it would drive another spike into any possibility of success in the venture, so far as building the dam is concerned, and thus negate the whole proposal.

I do not see anything to be gained by the kind of vote suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I think this afternoon we have done that which was absolutely necessary. As was pointed out by the Minister of Agriculture, the confusion that now exists has not had time to be cleared up. In my view this whole discussion is premature, and the investigation suggested this afternoon should have taken place before this debate. The confusion that has developed in respect of figures, and other matters now beclouding the issue, should be resolved.

After the investigation has been made—and I hope it does not take too long—we will have arrived at the proper time to carry on our discussions and make decisions in the matter.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the house for only a moment or two, but I am bound to say a few words in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing).

I have listened with interest throughout the debate, and feel it has been a most unusual one. We have heard lectures on Canadian unity; we have heard the suggestion by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) that thirteen members of the cabinet should be placed in limbo, and we have had other Liberal members from Saskatchewan stating that this subject is being treated as a political football. I have noticed, however, that they have been kicking the football around very gingerly.

I have risen particularly to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), I am sorry he is not now in his seat. I am always interested in listening to what he says because usually his observations are valuable. I believe he is a sincere member of the House of Commons. However, on occasions when he gets going under the full sail of his enthusiasm he goes a bit off course, especially when he deals with subjects such as smuggling and free votes in the House of Commons.

When the hon. member was speaking I asked him a question, when he had observed that so far as he was concerned he knew of nothing but free votes in the house. I drew his attention to the fact that in August of 1946 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said, as reported at page 5431 of Hansard:

> Nevertheless the government has no objection to an expression of opinion from the members of the house. I suggest that the vote should be a free expression regardless of party.

That statement was made in the debate on the milk subsidy. I questioned the hon. member because I thought the statement made at that time by the minister indicated clearly that there are votes which are not free expressions of opinions of members in the house.

The hon. member replied to my question with some ambiguity and, if I heard him correctly, stated, "I never heard of anything but a free vote. I voted"—and he was referring to this milk subsidy—"as I saw fit". Let me draw the attention of the house to the fact that, according to Hansard of that date, August 27, 1946, the hon. member did not vote at all. I suppose he showed this usual independence and freedom of expression in not being present when the vote was called because even with a free vote there might have been some irritation on the government benches.

I am not personally acquainted with the area under discussion, with its physical features and the problems which must be solved. When it comes to a vote on this amendment I must base my decision upon what I have heard during this debate. I have heard all members from Saskatchewan in all parties suggest that this project should be proceeded with. I think if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) really told the house what he thought he would say that the government should proceed with this project.

That does not necessarily mean the government is restricted to proceeding in this way or that way. I think the whole tenor of the debate has been that the people of Saskatchewan throughout the years have been led to believe that some action was going to be taken in this respect by the government. In speaking in favour of the amendment I am not going into details or suggesting that it should be done exactly in this way or in that way. We want to see the government satisfy the people of Saskatchewan by taking some action in this respect. Even though that action is limited action, it should be indicated by an item in the estimates.

This amendment simply states that there is no provision in the estimates for the building or the commencing of the South Saskatchewan river dam. Surely that is a most reasonable proposal. If all hon. members from Saskatchewan voted in favour of the amendment there would be no danger of the government being defeated. Therefore I shall support the amendment, because I believe the people of Saskatchewan have this action coming to them.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said he was going to reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing).

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me, on a point of order; as usual, the hon. member for Springfield has misunderstood what is being said in the house. I said that I was moved to speak by the hon. member for Vancouver South speaking previously.

Mr. Sinnott: I accept the humble apology of the hon. member. It is quite evident that he has retracted what he indicated was his intention when he got up.

Mr. Knowles: How far off can a member get?

Mr. Sinnott: You should know. I do not intend to take very long speaking on this matter as I know hon. members are anxious to have a vote on the main amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). It comes to my mind that a serious attempt is being made by the Conservative and C.C.F. parties to force the government to say that they are going to go ahead with the building of this South Saskatchewan dam regardless of whether it is feasible. There are good reasons behind their attitude which I shall divulge in a minute or two.

We all know that only a few days ago a terrible disaster struck in Holland. Dikes which had been constructed for centuries were torn down by a terrific storm and people by the thousands were drowned. I believe the government of today is much concerned about a similar thing happening to the city of Saskatoon. I am not an engineer myself, but I think I can rely on the experience of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). If you are going to have a wall of water 190 feet high you must have a very good base to hold back that water. Every precaution must be taken before a project of this kind is taken on.

I imagine that in Holland they had the services of the best engineers in the country; nevertheless disaster overtook them. We must see that everything possible is done before this undertaking is started. I suggest that a committee of this house be set up with power to call engineers from different countries who have had experience in the building of similar dams. This afternoon the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) told us of what had been accomplished in different countries by irrigation projects. It seems to me that before $100 million or $150 million, whatever the amount is, is spent, another few hundred dollars should be spent to bring engineers to this country who have had experience in this sort of thing.

There was a whisper on the wind some months ago that the Conservative party was looking for a new leader.

Mr. Herridge: Why don't you apply?

Mr. Sinnott: I am more concerned that the rumour or the whisper on the wind that was going around seems to be true, because over the waves of the radio today we heard that this great member for Lake Centre is going to abandon Saskatchewan and seek a seat in Toronto. It is quite evident that his motive in moving the amendment in connection with the South Saskatchewan dam—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Where are you going to run?

An hon. Member: You are out of a job.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The remarks of the hon. member are not relevant to the amendment now before the house.

Mr. Sinnott: Thank you. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner adjournment I made the statement that the official opposition and the C.C.F. party were making a determined attempt to force the government to construct a dam on the South Saskatchewan river. I should like to read a short paragraph to be found at page 23 of the commission's report in the section dealing with recommendations and general considerations. It shows the magnitude of the construction that is required. Paragraph 52 reads as follows:

> The four large earth structures—the main dam, the Coteau creek dam, the third meridian dam and the railway crossing—would require a total of 57,500,000 cubic yards of material, most of which can be obtained in the vicinity. The dam would be 205 feet high with a crest length of more than 8,000 feet from bank to bank. It would impound about 8 million acre-feet of water, of which 2,650,000 acre-feet would be live, or useful storage. The reservoir would extend 140 miles upstream on the South Saskatchewan river and thirty miles down the Qu'Appelle river valley to the third meridian. The reservoir would have a surface area of 116,000 acres and a shoreline of almost 500 miles. It would inundate about 70,000 acres of land of which 11 per cent is under cultivation.

To say the least, Mr. Speaker, that is a considerable undertaking. I hear the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) laughing. To him it is a laughing matter—

Mr. Argue: I was laughing at you.

Mr. Sinnott: To him it is a laughing matter if he can get the government of the country to spend $150 million which would not serve a useful purpose.

Mr. Argue: As long as it was on the dam it would be all right.

Mr. Sinnott: So far as I am able to gather, the dam would not be of very much value to the hon. member for Assiniboia. The only value he is getting out of it is a little bit of political value. It would not make any difference whether the country spent three or four billion dollars as long as he was elected in his constituency. That is all he is worried about. I am going to ask him a sincere question. From his own standpoint as the operator of a farm, does he take the advice of men with practical experience or does he just throw their advice to the winds in the same way that he wanted to throw all copies of the report of the commission into the South Saskatchewan river? It does not make a particle of difference to him whether or not the project is economically sound.

I hope the government will consider seriously a suggestion I should like to put forward. I suggest that a committee of this house be set up to hear further recommendations and to call for persons who have had experience in building such dams in other countries. I am sure that the experience of men who have built such projects in other countries cannot help but be of value to us and at the same time, if it is at all possible to build the dam, it would pave the way toward doing that at an early date. We would also be sure of what we were doing.

As I said before dinner, not very long ago there was a terrific storm which smashed dikes in several places in the countries of Holland and England. I am told these dikes were not more than 40 feet high, but in the paragraph of the report which I quoted it is pointed out that in one place the dam will be 205 feet high. It will certainly require a solid structure and much engineering work to hold back that amount of water. I suggest to the hon. member for Assiniboia that if he has any respect for the dollars of the people of Canada, if he has any respect for the people who reside in Saskatoon, he will agree with me when I say that if the dam is built every possible step must be taken to make sure that the same conditions will not be created that were brought about in Europe a little while ago, which resulted in the drowning of several hundred people.

I am given to understand that the proposed dam will be about 60 miles almost directly south of Saskatoon. If that wall of water should be let loose we all know what would happen to the people of that city. Therefore the government or whoever builds the dam will have to be very careful that the dam is sound in structure, and make sure before starting that it is economically possible.

Mr. Argue: What did the P.F.R.A. engineers say?

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I listened with interest to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) discussing this project. He mentioned that as the member for Yale I could tell the house something about irrigation. However, I am afraid from the statements he made that he arrived at the wrong conclusion. As the member for Yale, which is an area possibly more advanced in irrigation than any other part of North America, I can say from my own experience that I think the South Saskatchewan river project should be proceeded with regardless of the cost. I say that because my memory goes back 30 years to the time we faced a similar problem of whether or not to go ahead with an irrigation scheme. I remember well that some papers opposed the scheme. They said it was impractical and that the cost would be too great. They said that a cost of up to $30 an acre for irrigation would break the farmers.

Looking back over those 30 years I well remember the type of land that was involved, covered with sagebrush and in some cases not even capable of sustaining that sagebrush. It was being sold or offered for sale for $5 an acre. A lot of it was bought at that price and some at $10 or $15 an acre. Last summer I was in that same district. It has been irrigated now for about 20 or 25 years. Orchards with young trees on land that was formerly worth only $5 or $10 an acre are selling at $2,000 an acre. That has all been brought about by the application of natural water to good land.

The same condition prevails in the area of the Palliser triangle. I believe that if good water can be applied to that land at a reasonable figure the same success can be achieved. I know that in some cases our irrigation cost ran from $15 to $25 an acre, which may be considered high. But as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) pointed out, the average income per acre on our land is $1,000, so we could well pay that cost. However, if the crops on the prairie are not so lucrative or do not return such a high figure, I claim that alfalfa, beets and crops of that type could very well bear the cost of the figures stated here today, $6 or $7 an acre.

I am satisfied that this scheme would well repay the government in five, ten or twenty years. As it is that life-giving water, that wonderful stream is emptying itself into the ocean and is of no value. You cannot recover next year or in twenty years what you miss this year. It is a matter of taking steps immediately to apply that water to the land to make the central part of Saskatchewan a prosperous area, giving those farmers who are now applying to leave the district an opportunity to make a livelihood.

I am speaking now from real experience because I have seen worse land, covered with sagebrush, brought into production and bearing crops second to none on the North American continent. I heartily approve of the scheme, and I would like to point out that practically every member from British Columbia, knowing the experience we have had, would give full support to any steps the government care to take to implement this scheme.

I realize that the cost is great and that the government hesitates on that account, possibly because of the fear of repercussions from the rest of Canada; but I can assure them that as far as British Columbia is concerned we will give full support to any scheme the government may deem fit and proper, and that it would be prepared to undertake.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only a very few minutes—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: I don't believe it.

Mr. Knowles: I have found that is one way of getting applause, by making that announcement.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: My purpose in rising at this time is to make one more appeal to the government to follow the course which would make it unnecessary to divide the house on this amendment. It is not my amendment; it was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), but I believe it should be passed. During the course of the discussion it has been made clear that there is support for the substance of this amendment in all parts of the house and in all parts of Canada. I feel that the government would be well advised, despite the wrangling debate we have had during the two or three days this matter has been under discussion, to decide now to accept the amendment, let it pass, and then move again that we go into committee of supply and get on with the business of the house.

Several of us, Mr. Speaker, have made reference during the course of this debate to the incident of August, 1946, when a free vote was permitted on an amendment to a motion to go into supply.

Mr. George: What is a free vote?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. George) wants to know what a free vote is. I ask him to consult the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who, on that occasion, announced to the house that it was the wish of the government that the vote on that occasion be a free vote. I may tell him, since he was not here on that occasion, that the result of that announcement that it was a free vote was that some Liberals voted one way and some voted the other, and the final result was that the amendment carried. Nevertheless the government was not defeated. It was not a vote of confidence or of non-confidence because the minister, speaking on behalf of the government, had stated that it would not be so treated.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to review again the circumstances surrounding what happened in 1946 but for the interjection that came a moment ago. Rather I rose to remind the house of what happened more recently, namely on June 12, 1951. On that occasion when the motion that the house go into committee of supply was made, as is so often the case, by our genial friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) moved an amendment. It was an amendment which had to do with a proposal that a select committee be set up to consider the rules of this house. It was an amendment preceded by the usual preamble:

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

Immediately after the Leader of the Opposition spoke to that amendment, a speech that occupied about four pages of Hansard, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) rose and said, as reported at page 3966 of Hansard of June 12, 1951:

> Mr. Speaker, the government, and I am sure most members, if not all members of the house, welcome at least the substance of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Before declaring expressly that we should be glad to accept it, I should like to see the exact language that is used.

Then about a page further on the Prime Minister said:

> I have now had an opportunity of reading the language of the motion submitted by the Leader of the Opposition. I take it that the Leader of the Opposition does not intend this motion as one of no confidence in the government.

Then Hansard records this line:

> Mr. Drew: Oh, no.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it having been made clear on that occasion that it was not intended by the Leader of the Opposition that that motion was to be regarded as one of non-confidence in the government, the Prime Minister in the name of the government accepted the motion. So, after a few more members had spoken, we find on page 3971 of Hansard of that same date this notation:

> Amendment (Mr. Drew) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker, the government did not fall. It had already been made clear on both sides that this was not a motion of non-confidence, that this was something concerning which there was general agreement throughout the house. Instead of the government falling, Hansard goes on to say:

> Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I move that this house do immediately resolve itself into committee of supply.
>
> Motion agreed to.
> Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply.

After a bit of debate that motion was carried. We went into supply and went on with the business of the house.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that although there is one difference between that situation and this, there is also an element of great similarity. The difference is that on that occasion the debate was quite harmonious and on this occasion there has been a fair amount of acrimony. But the similarity is also there, namely on that occasion it was pointed out from both sides that there was general agreement on what was asked for in the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition.

The same thing holds true now. There is agreement in all parts of the house. There is agreement on the part of members representing all parts of Canada that we want this project gone ahead with, that we want the dam on the South Saskatchewan river to be built. It has also been made clear by the hon. member for Lake Centre, who moved the amendment, that he does not desire it to be regarded as a motion of non-confidence in the government. He desires rather that it should be treated as an amendment dealing with the subject matter of that amendment itself, and that the question of confidence in the government and the right of the government to go into supply be dealt with immediately thereafter.

So, Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising is to express the hope that the Prime Minister will at this stage catch the mood of the house, as it were, and realize that there is support in all parts of the house for—and I quote his words of June 12, 1951—

> —at least the substance of the amendment moved by——the opposition. If he would be prepared to do that, obviously the house need not be divided. The amendment can be accepted and it can be, thereby, an expression of opinion by the house in favour of the substance of the amendment, in favour of going ahead with the South Saskatchewan project. Immediately after that has been dealt with in that way the Minister of Public Works can get up again, as he did on June 12, 1951, and move that we then go into committee of supply.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that members and supporters of the government cannot have it both ways. On June 12, 1951, they claimed that if there was something upon which they were all agreed, it could be treated as a motion that was not a want of confidence motion. But today, in February, 1953, they try to claim that a similar motion must be regarded as a want of confidence motion. If the government insists, Mr. Speaker, in regarding this as a motion of non-confidence, in the light of that precedent of June 12, 1951, it simply means the government is really against the immediate construction of the dam as requested in the amendment that is now before the house.

I submit that any attempt on the part of Liberals, such as we have had during the course of this debate, to find an excuse for voting against this amendment on the ground it has something to do with confidence, is put out of court by the precedent to which I have referred on June 12, 1951. I made an appeal yesterday to the backbenchers on the Liberal side to ask for a free vote such as we had in August, 1946. They have not seen fit to do that, so the possibility of such a free vote being announced is, I take it, rather slim.

Therefore, since that course has not been followed, I now make this appeal to the government, that they treat this subject in the same way as they treated the question of a committee on the rules in 1951. It is a different matter, I know. The scope of this motion may be much greater; but there is this similarity, that on that occasion we were all agreed and so the motion was allowed to pass. On this occasion we are all agreed, so the amendment should be allowed to pass so the house can express its general support of this proposition and get on with the business of going into supply.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division:

(Text):

SUGAR—AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND CUBA

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I rise because of the emergency now facing the sugar beet growers not only in Ontario but in the three provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec. Another reason for my rising tonight is the recent announcement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at Havana, Cuba, within the last few days, as reported in the press. I shall quote briefly from the press report, as follows:

> Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Canada's trade minister, said yesterday that Canada and Cuba may be able to work out a new sugar agreement when the current one expires soon, but it would have to be one based on an understanding of "our respective problems and difficulties."

The main point there is the fact that this sugar agreement between Canada and Cuba does not expire until the end of this year, and unless an agreement is arranged between these two countries on a satisfactory basis now there will be no sugar beets grown in any province of Canada, nor will there be any refinery operating in Canada this year.

That is the reason for the urgent endeavour to again present this matter which concerns so many people in Canada, not only the sugar beet growers but also the people in the cities, towns and villages, as well as new immigrants who have come to this country and got their start in the sugar beet fields with a hope of continuing in that line of work in the future.

In order that we might bring this matter up to date, without going into too long a review I would say that in May of 1951 Canada and Cuba entered into an agreement whereby Canada was to take 75,000 tons of raw sugar a year for the years 1951, 1952 and 1953, and in return Cuba was to take more seed potatoes, wheat flour and codfish. I think it is fair to say that every member in the House of Commons desires to promote trade with other countries; but I do not think it would be the wish of anyone in the house that we should enter into an arrangement of this nature which would prejudice people in our country, or in the country with whom we are dealing.

The month of February is now one-third over, and we know that farmers across Canada who plan producing sugar beets in the coming season are wondering whether they should buy fertilizer and sugar beet seed, and whether they should sign contracts with the processors for the production of sugar beets. I have been in several sugar beet producing areas and they are very much upset, particularly in the last few days, as a result of this announcement; because since the agreement was entered into between this country and Cuba we find that, for the first time since 1931 or 1932, Cuba delivered to the Canadian market in the first eleven months of last year slightly more than 31 million pounds of refined sugar.

I wish to be fair by stating that I do not think it was the intention of this government or of officials in the Department of Trade and Commerce, when they entered into an agreement with Cuba to take 75,000 tons of raw sugar, that we would be subjected to importations of such enormous amounts of refined sugar. True enough, as I pointed out when I spoke a few days after the opening of the session in November, the department had been warned by the growers' association in 1948 and 1949 that as soon as the sugar control was over the growers might be subjected to pressure from Cuba, especially if, by chance, there was overproduction in that country.

It is a matter of record that in 1952 Cuba had a record crop of about 8 million tons of sugar. As we know, she is the greatest sugar-producing country in the world, and her record crop in that year placed her in a position where she wanted to get rid of her surplus. While for the current year her quota has been set back to some 5,500,000 tons, nevertheless there is enough held over from 1952 to stand as a threat to this country by reason of the fact that at the moment there is nothing to prevent her shipping refined sugar into Canada.

I think we must regard the agreement as one that was entered into in good faith. True enough there have been people throughout Canada who have said that our government blundered and that the sugar beet growers were sold down the river. Let me say here that the sugar beet growers of this country, in an industry now 52 or 53 years old, have not had the tariff changed on sugar since about 1922 or 1923. Since that time the two old parties have been in power, and seven parliaments have come and gone without any change in that tariff. So there may be some reasonable excuse in the minds of those who negotiated the agreement with Cuba for overlooking the possibility that Cuba, facing a crisis in her country because of that overproduction, would endeavour to find an outlet for that production in Canada.

The situation we find today is that Cuba finds in Canada a potential market for refined sugar. Let there be no mistake about that. I still say that when the agreement was entered into I think it was done in good faith. It was a contract between two countries. In order to stimulate trade we agreed to take 75,000 tons of raw sugar, and that was a new market for Cuba. She was very anxious indeed to obtain an outlet in Canada for her crop, and we were in the position that we wanted to expand our trade not only with Cuba but with other countries.

We must look at the problem in true perspective. I am not one who advocates tariffs, or high trade walls. I think hon. members will agree with me that in these days it is necessary for governments in different countries to negotiate trade agreements around the conference table. We have seen the United States avail herself of provisions which to our minds are not fair and which, as a matter of fact, have been unfair to Canada. I say one way to come to a satisfactory agreement with Cuba or with any other country is by the officials of Canada and that country sitting around a conference table and entering into a contract that will not prejudice the farmers and producers of either country.

Here we find an industry that has stood on its feet for 52 years. It has faced two crises and is now facing a third. The first was in the thirties when Cuba was shipping into Canada about 40 million pounds of sugar a year. The next crisis was when we were at war. Because of the small production of sugar beets in Ontario at that time the leader of this party, who was then premier of Ontario, gave the sugar beet growers in that province three-quarters of a million dollars in order that Canadians might have a little larger sugar ration. During that time boats loaded with sugar were sunk off our shores, but the sugar beet industry overcame that particular crisis and made a terrific contribution during that war.

I contend that we should never put ourselves in the position, whether we are in a cold or hot war, where we must depend upon any foreign country for our supplies of a necessity such as sugar. It should never be the policy of any government to crucify or sell any industry down the river. I said in November, and I say it again, that when you crucify any segment of our primary producers it affects the economy of the whole country.

This industry has meant a great deal to this country in many ways. It has established many new Canadians and has room for more. I do not want any member in this house to say that we are at the limit of our production. Our refineries are efficient and are capable of refining more sugar than is grown in Canada today. Just offhand I would say that the modern refineries in this country—one of the most modern in the world is in Alberta; the ones in Chatham are older but are quite efficient—have a capacity of about one-third more than is now being produced.

This is the crucial time for sugar beet growers in every province throughout Canada because they must plan ahead. They cannot wait until the end of this agreement, until the end of 1953; they cannot wait until March. If they are going to put in sugar beets this year in any province they must make their contracts now. They have not made those contracts with the processors. I say tonight that because of the agreement with Cuba, as far as these contracts are concerned there will not be any sugar beets grown in Canada nor will there be a refinery operating in this country.

Last fall just before navigation closed some 30 million pounds of refined sugar came into Canada. Between January 19 and January 26 some million and a quarter pounds entered London and Toronto, the markets usually supplied by the processors in Chatham and Wallaceburg.

I do not want to be provincial in this matter, but I am concerned about the people in Ontario. There are nine counties representing some 12 or 14 ridings in Ontario where sugar beets are produced. The farmers have a huge investment. They have equipment and machinery which is good for nothing else but sugar beet growing. If they cannot be assured of some reasonable market for their product they will not grow sugar beets and then we might well be dependent upon some foreign country for our requirements.

I want to make it plain that we in this country over the years have taken raw sugar from empire countries, and a certain amount from other countries as well. We entered into a contract with Cuba in good faith and then we find Cuba selling not only the quota provided for, but unloading on the Ontario market some 30 million pounds. Just as soon as navigation opens Cuba will make more sugar available and ships will be going to the head of the lakes and the western market will be flooded.

We know that today enough sugar beets are produced in Manitoba and Alberta to nearly take care of the requirements of Canada west of the great lakes. There will not be a sugar beet grown west of the great lakes unless we come to an agreement now. We cannot wait until March or April, much less until next year, as that disturbing article seems to indicate to the people of this country.

Cuba was quite aware of what she was doing. She is not averse to protecting her own economy. I saw an article which appeared in a Cuban newspaper commenting upon the speech I made in November. The important part of the whole speech as far as I was concerned was the determination by that country to consolidate her gain. I said in November that Cuba's refining capacity was sufficient to supply Canada's needs twice over.

We want to be fair with Cuba. We are ready to tell Cuba tomorrow that we will take her raw sugar in any quantity that is fair and reasonable, but if her refined sugar is sent in our primary producers will be crucified and sold down the river. I think Cuba entered into the agreement in good faith, but found a way out. She found a vulnerable market in Canada. Most of her production goes to the United States.

Let me say here that we have increased our exports to Cuba of some articles in short supply, including copper. We must remember that today the United States has a huge rearmament program. She has an entrée into Cuba that no other country in the world has because of her preference duty. Cuba supplies the United States with about half of her production of sugar. She also supplies some refined sugar, but both the refined and the raw are on a quota basis. There is no misunderstanding about the arrangement between the United States and Cuba. She ships in her refined and she ships in her raw sugar, but the growers and processors in the United States know how much is going to come in from Cuba each year.

Let us emphasize the fact that last year Cuba had a record crop. We must recognize also that she wanted to get rid of that crop. She wanted to sell it for dollars; she did not want to sell it for sterling. Canada was the vulnerable market, and she got in here. I do not for one minute suggest that we should avail ourselves of tariff protection. I want to emphasize and I want hon. members to understand that I think the way to increase trade between nations today is for the responsible people in various governments to sit around the conference table and negotiate trade agreements. Let it be done in no other way.

We want to expand our trade. I am happy the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is making a trip to South America. We want to expand our trade with those countries. They have many products that we need. In our great industrial development we can use many tropical and semi-tropical products. It is quite apparent that our trade with many of these countries has increased a great deal. We are on the eve of a great industrial development in this country, greater perhaps than we have ever dreamed of. We will require many of the products of these tropical and semi-tropical countries.

There is no reason in the world why Cuba should not sit down at the conference table, because she did turn over 75,000 tons of sugar a year for three years. We did not take it all in 1951, but what we did not take in that year we took in 1952. In addition we took in refined sugar in 1952. As I see it, the picture that is developing is most dangerous. The minute navigation opens there will be boatloads of Cuban sugar coming into Montreal and great lakes ports, and the refineries in the maritimes, Montreal, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta, will not open their doors this fall.

I think it is time there should be some understanding and some assurance given by the government rather than Liberal members going around the country and saying "What is 2 per cent? The amount we get from Cuba is only 2 per cent of our requirements." It is true enough that the amount of refined sugar that came into Canada from Cuba is 2 per cent of our requirements. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie), the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Huffman) and the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) have all said in speaking to various growers in the different areas that it is only a small detail, that it is only 2 per cent of our requirements.

It is only 2 per cent per capita, but that 2 per cent comes into the Ontario market where we have been shipping our own product from the refineries in Wallaceburg and Chatham. We know today for a fact that the big buyers of these products from these two refineries have told the processors that they will not want their product again unless there is a strike or a war. That is the situation in which we find ourselves, and that is the situation that is going to be found all across Canada. It is not enough for private members to go around making statements. This is a matter for government deliberation, and now.

By the end of this month these farmers will want to know whether or not they should prepare their soil and make contracts for sugar beets. The people with whom I have come in contact are determined that they are not going to grow sugar beets until there is some assurance that there will be a reasonable market. They have competed over all these years. They have competed with sugar at $3 and some odd cents a hundred f.o.b. Montreal. They have competed when it was $10.50 f.o.b. Montreal. They have competed against raw sugar from any country in the world, but they are not in a position to compete with refined sugar. When it means crucifying that industry why should that be expected?

We can make a fair contract with Cuba by taking raw sugar. Cuba says it does not want our flour, that it will take our wheat and refine it. We say to Cuba: All right, we too have the capacity to refine sugar. You keep your refined sugar and send us the raw. It has been suggested that if necessary we should take an extra 15,000 or 20,000 tons of raw sugar. All well and good. Let the agreement be signed, but signed now. We cannot afford to wait. What is disturbing to some of the growers are the statements that have been made by some members who have been belittling their efforts and who probably do not realize the situation in which the growers find themselves. Some have said that all this protest is promoted by someone else.

After I spoke the last time I think it was the hon. member for Lambton-Kent who was kind enough to say that Cuba surely had lots of sugar and had such a tremendous crop that it tried to unload a few boatloads in Canada. The few boatloads that were unloaded in Canada disturbed the sugar beet growers in these areas in western Ontario.

A great deal can be said on this subject. In the main I do not intend to repeat what I said last November because that speech was followed by several others that dealt quite effectively with the serious situation facing the primary producers of sugar. What disturbs the growers today is the uncertainty. They are more or less disappointed, and are on the brink of bankruptcy because they do not know what the policy of the government is. We have government spokesmen going around saying that the government is going to take care of them. That statement applies to the members to whom I referred a few moments ago. I should like to refer to an article that appeared in the Windsor Daily Star of February 6 dealing with certain remarks made by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent when speaking in the city of Sarnia. The hon. member is reported as saying:

> I know the present situation is unfortunate for the growers, but I don't know what the future holds.

The article continues as follows:

> If nothing can be accomplished, Mr. MacKenzie said, "I think we should try to tide the industry over, for we want to save the beet industry and we won't let it be thrown to the wolves."

The hon. member objected to my statement in November when I said that the industry was being sold down the river, but he does not mind saying that the industry is being thrown to the wolves. The article continues as follows:

> He pointed out that duty charged on the importation of refined sugar is $1.89 a hundredweight, plus, if such is the case, a dumping duty of 75 cents a hundredweight.

There is no dumping of Cuban sugar into Canada; let that be understood. I hope the press of this country will not again say that when the representatives of the industry were here in October to see government officials, they suggested there was dumping by Cuba. When the hon. member for Kent, Ont., spoke last fall he was dismayed at my reference to this statement, but I should like to refer him now to the Montreal Gazette of October 24. As a matter of fact, I think the report was in practically all papers in Canada as well as in the New York Times of that date and the day after. In fact it was in the New York paper before the deputation even arrived home. I want it understood without any doubt now that when the delegation came to Ottawa not one delegate referred to the dumping of Cuban sugar into Canada.

As we know, dumping means that Cuba would sell to Canada at a lesser price than she was selling for home consumption. Cuba today sells all her refined sugar through one single administrator, a quasi-government official, and there are three prices. Cuba sells in New York at 2 cents a pound or $2 a hundred more than the price at which they sell to Canada, and they have a lower price for their domestic consumption, which only amounts to about 2 or 3 per cent of their total production. Therefore we would never be in a position to impose any dumping duty.

But I say that is not the solution to the problem in any case. Many responsible people of the area of western Ontario about which I have been speaking have been members of the association for years. I can refer, for instance, to Eugene King of Kent county. I think he was president of the sugar beet growers' association. I can refer to Cameron McTaggart, who is a director of the association. They say that the situation is alarming. These are responsible men. One is in the county of Kent and the other is in the county of Middlesex. Some of these people have grown sugar beets for 35 or 40 years. They say they have never faced such a crisis before.

They are hoping they will not lose their huge investments, and that their routine of producing sugar will be carried on without any interruption through government action or inaction. I have great respect for men like King, McTaggart and others who have followed the progress of this industry for the past 35 or 40 years. They are greatly disturbed.

I should like to refer now to an editorial in the Detroit Free Press of Monday, February 2. I think I expressed this idea in a different form a few months ago, but it sums it up. The editorial is on page 8 and carries the heading "National interest should determine tariff action". It reads in part as follows:

> At the same time this country—

The reference is to the United States.

> —would not be the gainer if industries vital to its security were sacrificed and we again became wholly dependent on foreign sources for critical goods.

Mr. Speaker, if I did not say anything else tonight and quoted only that paragraph it would be, after all is said and done, the gist of my argument here. Let us not sacrifice an industry that is so important to our economy, that may mean so much to us in the future as it does today. It may mean more in the event of a shooting war. We are in a position today where we can supply at least part of our requirements.

That being the case, Mr. Speaker, with the gradual development of our country, with the hope these people have for making a livelihood and making their contribution to Canada, let us not at this time through action or inaction, intentionally or otherwise, sacrifice an industry which has meant so much to the economy of this country.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret the fact that this discussion has been brought on by my hon. friend from Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). The agreement to which he has made reference is the only agreement I know of that has been made in the last few years under which we in the maritime provinces could look forward to any beneficial results. I believe that the New Brunswick members will agree with that statement, as will other maritime members.

This agreement was made by the minister and the government in the belief that it would provide some markets for salt fish. The hon. member for Lambton West mentioned that. It was to cover not only salt fish but included canned fish, potatoes, smoked fish and many other products of the maritimes. At that time we found it very difficult to obtain markets in other parts of the world. This scheme was arranged, and it has been of great benefit to our fishermen. In the northern part of the province, in that part which my hon. friend for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) comes from, there are a great many producers of salt cod. The same applies to Newfoundland, the same applies to Nova Scotia, and the same applies to Prince Edward Island. This scheme has been a great help.

Only a few months ago the hon. member who has spoken, and many of his colleagues who sit with him, were condemning this government for its lack of interest in so far as the cost of living was concerned. They said the government was not doing anything at all to try to stop the rise in the cost of living. I believe these same members must agree that the price of sugar today has dropped. Surely they are not advocating at this time that the consumers should pay $1.50 or $2 a hundred more in order to protect these few sugar beet growers. In other words, the hon. member for Lambton West has suggested that 2 per cent of the sugar consumed in Canada is all that is involved in this agreement.

Mr. Murphy: No, no, not in the agreement.

An hon. Member: The consumption.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is what I said, 2 per cent of the consumption of sugar in Canada. If 2 per cent of the sugar consumption in Canada is responsible for prosperity or otherwise in the maritime provinces, surely we should expect to receive some consideration. This agreement has been helpful to each and every maritime province. It has been an encouragement to the producers down there.

Mr. Murphy: On a point of order, I know the hon. member would not want the record to be left as he is giving it. I want to make it clear that we have never complained about the agreement for the 75,000 tons of raw sugar. What is disturbing the market today is refined sugar coming on it, and the likelihood of that sugar taking care of all of our requirements, which would thereby sacrifice and crucify our industry. The price of sugar is determined by the world sugar price in New York.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I might add to that a suggestion of my own. If they can send refined sugar in here at prices lower than we can refine it in Canada, then there is something wrong with our refineries at home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I believe, if you look into the situation, that a great deal of the difficulty lies with the refineries we have in the Dominion of Canada. They could sell a lot cheaper, and they will get the price down when they are forced to it; but so long as they get the protection which the hon. member for Lambton West would like to see they will take advantage of that protection and the consumers of this country will pay the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am one who takes a pretty strong stand on this particular question, as members of the house know. I will make one other statement. During the last ten years this continent has pumped billions and billions of dollars into other countries to try to rehabilitate them, to put them into a position where they can stand on their own feet and live the way we believe people should live. Already there is the idea in this country of sticking up tariff walls. In other words, you give with one hand and take away with the other.

Well, I cannot subscribe to that kind of doctrine and I hope members of this government cannot be convinced that it is a proper course to follow. What we need in this country and in every democratic country in the world is a freer movement of goods back and forth between those countries. I want to suggest that if we ever hope or expect to have world peace in this world it will never be brought about by tariff walls. When you set one part of the world against another, and when one country says that its country must have protection, then it will hang itself.

I think we have to make it clear that if a business cannot stand on its own feet it should not exist. That might be a pretty broad statement, but if an industry cannot survive without subsidies, then there is something wrong. I realize that people in this sugar industry are very much concerned, and that they are very much interested in their own livelihood; but I wonder whether, if it were gone into carefully, we might not find that the answer to this problem does not lie with the sugar beet producers but rather with the manufacturers in our factories. I believe we are in a position in this country to refine sugar as cheaply as they can do it in Cuba. If that is not so, I would like to have some explanation why it costs more to refine sugar in this country than it does down there.

Again, I want to say that all the maritime provinces—and I will include Newfoundland because now we have four maritime provinces—as I have said on many occasions in this chamber, are most dependent on these American markets. Take them away from us and our economy is completely wrecked. The hon. member who just spoke used these words, and I jotted them down: "sold down the river"; "thrown to the wolves" and "crucified". We would be all three if these markets were taken from us.

Mr. Murphy: Your own member said "thrown to the wolves".

Mr. MacKenzie: On a question of privilege, I said this government did not want to see the beet industry thrown to the wolves.

Mr. Murphy: That is what I said.

Mr. MacKenzie: No, the hon. member for Lambton West said the sugar beet growers had been sold down the river, quite a different thing.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I do not know just what description would fit but, as I said before, if this agreement were interfered with in any way it would certainly mean selling those in the maritime provinces down the river. We do not get very many subsidies down there, and we do not get very much financial assistance. We are quite an understanding people, and we try to stand on our own feet. We are willing to produce what we have to produce in competition with any part of the world. If we cannot produce fish as cheaply as someone else, then let us eat someone else's fish. If we cannot produce sugar as cheaply as we can buy it somewhere else, then let us give the consumer the advantage of cheaper living.

We have heard right in this chamber, and I have sat and listened to it day after day, that the government was inactive as far as the cost of living was concerned; but the very first time the consumer is able to buy a little cheaper there are hon. members on their feet wanting protection.

I had not intended saying very much when I got up tonight, but I could not refrain from saying what I have said and I hope that my friends from New Brunswick will do likewise. I see the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) and the hon. member for Gloucester are both in their seats. Those counties are producers of potatoes which are sold to Cuba and other countries to the south of us. I do not believe those hon. members will get on their feet and support the suggestion made tonight by the hon. member for Lambton West. They talk about putting government members on the spot, and we were supposed to have been put on the spot this afternoon; but I should like to see some of the New Brunswick members, who are in the same situation I am, get up and honestly express their feelings with regard to the agreement we have with Cuba.

Mr. Murphy: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Certainly.

Mr. Murphy: Are you aware that two of your own members, the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Huffman) and the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie) asked for quotas when they spoke?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is not a question, that is a statement, Mr. Speaker. So far as quotas are concerned—

Mr. Murphy: We would like to know what government policy is.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): —if we can buy sugar cheaper in Cuba than we can buy it somewhere else, why not give the Canadian consumer the advantage?

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I rise tonight, Mr. Speaker, because I am a producer and always have been. I am getting rather fed up with members getting up in this house and requesting that the primary producer bear the brunt of the burden in reducing the cost of living.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Can it be done any other way?

Mr. Cardiff: That is all very well, but if you take profitable production away from the primary producer what are you going to have left? As soon as the primary producer cannot produce at a profit, then of course the manufacturer gets tied up. He cannot sell his goods and his labouring staff is cut. These employees are then sent back to the country, where a lot of them should have remained in the first place.

Mr. Laing: Let us hear you bring it down.

Mr. Cardiff: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), following a speech by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) last fall, got up in this house and said that the cost of living was coming down. At whose expense did it come down?

Mr. Gibson: He did a good job.

Mr. Cardiff: Who bore the brunt of that reduction in the cost of living? It was the primary producer who bore every cent of it. You believe that the burden of reducing the cost of living should be borne by the primary producer in this country.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Gibson: Lumber and fish are cheap.

Mr. Cardiff: I got my first training in a county council, and I am going to read you a resolution passed by the council of the county of Huron, of which I was a member. The resolution reads:

Resolution passed by the Huron county council in January session, January 23, 1953

The council of Huron county wishes to point out to the Canadian government that growers' returns for sugar beets and other payments made by the processors to factory and weigh station workmen, railways, truckers, etc., are a valuable source of revenue in the integrated economy of our community. In the last three years this industry has contributed, on the average, $11 million per year in southwestern Ontario.

Our urban and farmer citizens understand that the Ontario beet sugar industry which has thrived for half a century, will probably not operate next year unless some measures are adopted to stop the flood of foreign refined sugar which has deprived the Ontario made product of its traditional home markets of Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor.

Without the menace of foreign refined sugar, the domestic beet sugar industry heretofore has had a surge market within its own country. In these days of international instability this is the only market we can control. There has never been a surplus of beet sugar, and until now growers have been assured of a cash return for every ton of their crop harvested.

Besides the stability of this domestic industry, the part it played during food-short war years will never be forgotten. Ontario grown beet sugar was badly needed by Canadian consumers when submarines effectively stopped inbound boats carrying cane sugar from the tropics. The war emergency need for this domestic source of supply may occur again.

For these reasons, which are a few of many, we the council of Huron county unanimously beseech the government to take whatever steps are necessary in stopping foreign refined sugar produced by cheap native labour from ruining Ontario's beet sugar industry.

There is a resolution which comes from the county of Huron, one of the best counties in Ontario or the Dominion of Canada. I have another resolution which comes from the town of Exeter, so you can see that all the representations are not from the primary producers. These people realize that if the flow of money to the primary producer is cut off, then of course they suffer. There is no man, woman or child, I do not care where they live, who is not dependent entirely on the primary producer. Anyone who gets up in this house and says that the primary producer should bear the brunt of the reduction in the cost of living is just crazy.

Mr. Laing: You want 2 cents protection on sugar?

Mr. Cardiff: No, I just want a fair deal on sugar.

Mr. Laing: Tell us what it is; how much protection?

Mr. Cardiff: I shall tell you in a minute if you will keep quiet long enough. If the importation of Cuban refined sugar were stopped, Canada still would have excellent trade relations with Cuba on the basis of her raw sugar imports of 75,000 tons a year, without buying a single pound of refined sugar from Cuba. The current raw sugar concession to Cuba is a valuable one, as Cuba could not have sold one pound of raw sugar to Canadian refiners if the government, this government you are talking about, had not arranged to rebate to the refiners, at a cost to the public, a sufficient amount to equalize the laid-down cost of Cuban raw sugar with that of empire raw sugar which comes into Canada under preferential tariff rates. So it follows that our trade relations with Cuba could have been maintained on the basis of the 75,000 tons of raw sugar annually. Not one single pound of refined sugar from Cuba need enter Canada.

I have only about 300 growers in my section of the country, but I am sure the rest of the population in that section would not want those 300 growers to absorb the shock of the difference in the price the consumer would have to pay for sugar. There is no other industry that is in competition with the sugar beet industry. It does not interfere with anybody else. We only produce about 20 per cent or less than 25 per cent of the country's requirements. Sugar beets do not interfere with any other crop. Why penalize an industry that has flourished for the last 50 years for the sake of allowing Cuban refined sugar to enter this market? It will put these fellows out of business. I think it is ridiculous. I do not know whether anything can be done about it.

I introduce this subject now, but I hope it will not get into the same position as the Saskatchewan dam did during the last few days. The only reason I have spoken tonight was to help our friends on the government side of the house. I am trying to present a case in their favour.

Mr. Laing: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that Lethbridge, Alberta, which is the sugar centre of the west, pays the highest per capita income tax in the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. Cardiff: Why?

Mr. Laing: If I may be permitted to answer, Mr. Speaker, I think it may be because sugar is a very productive crop and a very profitable crop.

Mr. Cardiff: Did you ever grow sugar beets?

Mr. Laing: No; they do not grow in my area.

Mr. Cardiff: If you had to grow and take care of one-half acre of them, there would not be very many sugar beets grown. I have grown sugar beets. I know how much work is involved. It is for that reason I want to read you part of another resolution, a copy of which I received from some of our new Canadians. It reads as follows:

> We, the new Dutch and Belgian immigrant farmers who soon will become Canadian citizens of the parish of Parkhill, wish to tender our support to your government and particularly to the Hon. C. D. Howe, whom we hope and pray will intercede on our behalf when on his mission to the Cuban government, in order to give us some protection from the influx of Cuban refined white sugar which has been so detrimental to the beet sugar industry of Ontario, with a resultant drop in the price of beets to the producer.

These fellows came from Europe. They are hard workers. They are about the only labourers you can get to go into the sugar beet fields. Those of you who know anything about growing sugar beets know what a strenuous job it is. The job does not last for only a week or two. It starts as soon as the beets are ready to be thinned out. You have to get down almost on your hands and knees to thin them out, because they will not thrive if there are two in the one place. They have to be thinned out so that there is only one in the one spot. Then you have to keep the weeds out. It is a strenuous job all summer. Then you come to the fall, and if you happen to get a dry fall and good weather you do not have too much difficulty, but very often they have to take the sugar beets right out of the mud; they have to take them out of the snow, and under adverse conditions.

The growers of sugar beets are not interfering with anybody else, and the beets do not interfere with any other crop. Why the government would not protect the primary producer in this regard is something I cannot understand. It is typical of this government, of course. Perhaps I should not condemn them yet because the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has not returned. He may come back with a very favourable solution to the whole problem. I should not say that the Cubans have been sending in this sugar thoughtlessly. It has been coming in legitimately. They have paid the tariff on it, and we cannot very well stop it coming in. But surely there is some way of stopping it. I know that not so very long ago when shirts were dumped in this country by Japan that was quickly stopped. If the primary producers wanted a few of those shirts they could not buy them. It is terrible when the sugar producers want some protection for their commodity.

I do not intend to go over the ground that was covered by my good friend the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). Perhaps I have said enough about sugar. The fact remains that the sugar beet growers are not the only primary producers of this country who are being affected at the present time. There are the dairymen; they are primary producers, too. They have been having a tough time, due in part at least to the fact that cheap oils were allowed to come into Canada. Something should have been done about that before we lost all our markets. Last year our cheese men were almost put out of business because they could not sell any cheese, and we imported more cheese than we exported. We had tons of it here that we could not sell. I do not know what kind of policy that is.

I turn from there to the hog policy that we have had to work under for the last four or five years. We have not had a hog policy at all. If it was the policy of the government to put the hog producers out of business, they certainly made a good job of it.

Mr. Gardiner: Don't get too far afield from what you are talking about.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to tell the minister a few of the things that are happening.

Mr. Gardiner: You are wrong in all of them.

Mr. Cardiff: I am not wrong in all of them. I am going to quote a few.

Mr. Gardiner: Pigs are 25 cents higher now than they were before Christmas.

Mr. Cardiff: Keep quiet and you might learn something. A year ago a primary producer of hogs in Ontario had 34 brood sows; today he has 12.

Mr. Gardiner: The way the price is going now he will wish he had them all back again.

Mr. Cardiff: If the price had gone the way you wanted it to go it would have been down to 23 cents.

Mr. Gardiner: No; I kept faith.

Mr. Cardiff: Then we have another hog grower out in Alberta who a year ago had 67 hogs. Today he has none. That is typical of what is happening all over the country. Let me take an example a little nearer home. Down in Quebec there are three parishes that took a survey a year ago, and I can name them.

Mr. Gardiner: I thought you were talking about sugar.

Mr. Cardiff: That is all right; I am talking about primary producers now. They had 364 sows in those parishes a year ago. They took a survey the other day and they had only 34 sows left. If you can tell me how we can get pork by acting in that way I shall be happy. Right now the shelves in the dealers' stores are almost empty of bacon. They cannot get enough bacon to supply the ordinary trade. They are having great difficulty. It will not be very long until we will be importing corn-fed hogs from the United States to satisfy our domestic market. If you call that a good hog policy, I do not. I do not think we have had a hog policy at all. As I said before, if it was a policy to put the producer out of business it certainly succeeded.

There are a few other things I wanted to say, but I do not think there is any necessity for me to carry on. I may tell the Minister of Agriculture something else. He was supposed to have put a floor under beef. He put a floor under beef at 26 cents.

Mr. Gardiner: What is the debate on, anyway?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member. A moment ago he was talking about hogs. I must tell him that he must speak to the subject under discussion, because if he changes the subject, then some other hon. member might be prevented from discussing the sugar beet industry, which is the subject being discussed.

Mr. Blackmore: What about the hon. member for Charlotte?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: What he said related to the sugar beet agreements that were referred to by the hon. member who first introduced the subject. That is all the hon. member for Charlotte discussed. As long as the hon. member for Huron North was discussing the situation of the primary producer with reference to the sugar beet industry and related other matters, he was quite in order. I should like to suggest to him that if he gets further away from the subject he may find himself out of order.

Mr. Cardiff: If Your Honour decides that I cannot talk about the primary producer in any other industry than sugar beets, then I shall quit. I should like to tell the Minister of Agriculture just what effect his 26-cent floor under beef has had.

Mr. Gardiner: Do that on my estimates. Let us get into supply.

Mr. Cardiff: In the first place we lost 10 cents a pound directly on the beef. I asked the minister a question in the house one day as to what the floor constituted; was it on red brand beef or what was it on. He said it was on a good steer, but a good steer would vary three or four cents a pound for that matter. But that is not what I started out to tell him. His floor under beef actually turned out to be a ceiling for the packers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. For the information of hon. members generally who may take part in the debate perhaps I should quote citation 345, which has reference to the debate that may take place on the motion to go into supply. It is the citation which says that a subject once introduced is the one that has to be debated until that matter is disposed of. If any hon. member introduces a new subject, then others who follow are prevented from discussing the one that was originally introduced. The last four or five lines of the citation read:

> Members may discuss various matters on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair without any amendment being proposed; but once debate is stopped on one matter and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former.

Of course the hon. member for Huron North—and perhaps others—will say that he was discussing the former matter. I suppose he will have to submit himself to my interpretation and agree that the subject that was introduced was not the whole agricultural policy of the government, but the beet sugar situation at the moment. The hon. member may now continue.

Mr. Cardiff: All right; I will not refer to the Minister of Agriculture's floor on beef any more, because it was not a floor anyway. I should like to quote a few figures to show the money paid out annually to the farmers for sugar beets. It amounts to $5,500,000 a year.

Mr. Murphy: That is in Ontario.

Mr. Cardiff: Yes, and almost an equal amount for labour, material and supplies. The sugar beet industry is worth at least $11 million a year to the people of Ontario. Annually the farmers buy $220,000 worth of fertilizers and $100,000 worth of sugar beet machinery. If these men are put out of business all that machinery will be useless for anything else on those farms. It is entirely different from any other kind of farm equipment. Then, 32,000 acres of sugar beets are grown in Ontario each year. We have here an industry that has no worries from the standpoint of competition because, no matter how much they produce, we can absorb it.

It will be recalled by hon. members that during the war years sugar was rationed. If it had not been for the fact that we had some sugar refineries in Canada we would have had no sugar at all, because our supplies went to the bottom of the ocean. We were rationed because we had not sufficient in this country to go around. That condition could come again, and very soon, if this shooting war should ever develop. We know it could develop, and if it did we would be in the same position we were before. Our sugar industry would be lost, and we would have no sugar whatsoever.

For that reason I claim something should be done for the industry, if it is at all possible, to keep these sugar beet growers in business. They do not affect any other industry in this country; they are doing a good job for Canada, and we need their sugar.

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should make a few remarks in connection with the sugar beet situation, because the subject was introduced tonight by my good friend from Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). He made reference to the fact that while in Sarnia I had made some comments about sugar. I went up there the other night to make it a little easier for him politically, and I did make a brief reference to sugar.

The newspapers do not always quote one correctly, because I did not have notes to hand to the press. I was speaking more or less off the cuff, because I have always felt that I know something about sugar beets and the problems of sugar beet growers in this country. However, I feel more or less an amateur here tonight in listening to so many professionals who have spoken on the subject.

I did say in Sarnia that I was sure this government did not want to put any primary industry out of business. I said I was sure that the government did not want to see the sugar beet industry in Ontario thrown to the wolves. My good friend from Lambton West has said that I had said they were being thrown to the wolves. Well, I did not say that at all. The hon. member said in his speech that the sugar beet growers had been sold down the river; and when he refers to being sold down the river I assume he means through the trade agreement that was made with Cuba. I have said before and I say again—

Mr. Murphy: On a point of order, I am sure the hon. member would not want to leave a wrong impression on Hansard. I did not say they were sold down the river because of the agreement. I think I emphasized that it was because of the importation of refined sugar that they were being sold down the river.

Mr. MacKenzie: I would have to read the speech again to be sure, and I want to be fair to the hon. member. However, I understood him to say that the agreement we had made with Cuba, whereby we take raw sugar, was the cause of our difficulty, through getting refined sugar. If I am wrong, then I am sorry.

The hon. member also made reference to the fact that at the conference which was held here last October between the growers, the refiners and officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance, the question of dumping was not discussed. He said that dumping was never mentioned at all. Well, the question of dumping was mentioned. No one said they were dumping sugar. All I said in Sarnia, and all I had said previously, was that the dumping duty is a potential protection, and that is all a dumping duty is for at any time. In some cases, if an article is selling in this country at a reasonable price and is not underselling the home market product, it is of course difficult to apply a dumping duty.

Again, reference has been made by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) —who I am sure is as interested as I am in the sugar beet industry—to the fact that the government paid out of the consolidated revenue fund enough money to make up the difference between the cost of Cuban sugar, with duty, so that it would be the same as British empire sugar. Well, the fact of the matter is that British empire raw sugar or, to be more exact, United Kingdom sugar, comes in at a rate of approximately 29 or 30 cents a hundredweight. The duty on raw sugar coming in from Cuba is approximately $1 more per hundredweight. The British government, or British traders, are pretty shrewd dealers, and they take advantage of that extra protection from Cuba. The result is that they absorb 85 cents out of every dollar in the price of sugar bought from empire countries.

So what happens in connection with bringing in Cuban raw sugar is that the refiners bring the raw sugar in and pay $1 per hundredweight extra duty into the consolidated revenue fund, and the government has only to pay about 15 cents in order to have it cost the same as British empire sugar. So actually it does not cost the consolidated revenue fund anything. As a matter of fact a question in this connection was asked on the order paper, and the answer indicated that under the three-year agreement there was almost $6 million in revenue that had accrued as a result of this Cuban agreement.

World prices of raw sugar have dropped. On December 12 I said that from 1951 the price of raw sugar had dropped by approximately $1.85 a hundredweight. According to deliveries now being offered from Cuba, that quotation has now dropped another 70 cents a hundredweight. So that actually there has been a drop from 1951 to the present time in the world price of raw sugar—and I do not care whether it is British empire or Cuban sugar—of almost $2.50 a hundredweight. So it is pretty difficult to know just what the answer is in regard to the importation of refined sugar.

Let me say that I did not say at any time, as some hon. members have said, that 2 per cent was only a trivial thing. I never said that at all. On December 12 I did say that it was a trifle over 2 per cent of our annual consumption and that, in itself, I said was not disastrous. I pointed out, however, that if it continued it could lead to a great deal of trouble. However, I never said it was a trifling thing or a small thing at any time. It means a lot to bring that much sugar into any area that produces sugar, and has always had the home market. I am not too sure that if importations of refined sugar from Cuba are stopped you are going to eliminate completely importations of refined sugar from the Philippines, from Santo Domingo and from Haiti. I am not sure about that, because refined sugar costs must be lower in those countries. I should like to have the figures on that in order to be sure.

There was one thing I was rather amazed at tonight when the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) brought this up. He mentioned that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had made a statement to the press. When the delegation met him in October the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he would be making a trip to South America and would make a point of going to Cuba early in February to discuss with trade officials there the sugar agreement and the whole Cuban treaty, and see if some amicable agreement could not be reached.

On January 20 the hon. member for Lambton West made his speech in St. Thomas. He dealt with sugar beets, and he advertised that pretty extensively. I was pleased to note that in some of the advertisements he said to come early to get a seat, as there would be no admission. I was glad of that because I was sure that would be a good inducement.

In his speech the hon. member suggested to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he make a trip to Cuba to discuss with the trade officials this very agreement we are discussing tonight. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has not been in his place here to make a statement. Why should we not wait until he gets back before saying anything further on the sugar beet industry? After all, all we have is a press statement. We have nothing direct from him. Why not wait until he comes back, when he will probably have a statement to make regarding the Cuban situation and the Cuban treaty, regarding refined and raw sugar.

Mr. McIlraith: The press statement was made two days before the meeting with the Cuban authorities.

Mr. MacKenzie: Knowing that the minister will be here tomorrow or the next day and be prepared to make his statement, why not wait until he makes that statement before we condemn the policy as a whole?

I was quite interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). The sugar beet industry has played a most important part in the economy of this country. When you run into a condition where you have depressed selling of sugar, where there is a surplus of that commodity, I do not think it is fair that one industry should bear the brunt of that situation. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce understands that quite well, and I feel satisfied that we will reach a solution of this in the near future.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I agree entirely with the previous speaker that we should necessarily wait for the return of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I say this because the sugar beet industry in Canada has more ramifications to it than could be covered in an interview by the minister with Cuban authorities in respect of the importation of Cuban sugar. Because the sugar beet industry of Canada has those many ramifications I think it appropriate that we should discuss it at this time.

I have many notes here and I cannot conclude what I have to say in three minutes, so may I ask you to call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —that I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hansell: All right; I can fiddle around here for three minutes.

An hon. Member: How do you spell that?

Mr. Hansell: It is obvious to me that hon. members opposite would like to close the debate on this particular subject.

An hon. Member: Why should you close it?

Mr. Hansell: I was not going to close it. We still live in a free country and we still operate in a free parliament, we hope. Members are sent down here to represent their constituents and to voice their grievances. It happens that some of us live in areas where they grow sugar beets and refine sugar. Because we believe that industry has a grievance, we are going to debate that matter here.

On motion of Mr. Hansell the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the business for tomorrow I do not think I need repeat what I said last night; it will be the same program tomorrow as we had today.

Mr. Fleming: When is the government going to afford the house an opportunity to resume consideration of the motion to set up the special committee on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? It is two weeks since that was up for discussion, and the committee should be working now. The days are slipping by.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No one is more anxious than I to see that debate resumed, but we cannot have two debates going on in the house at the same time. We are dealing with sugar beets right now, and I think we should conclude this debate. Hon. members have a grievance and they are entitled to debate this matter. What am I to say to these hon. members?

Mr. Fleming: The minister had a quite different excuse when I asked about this two weeks ago. He said there was another debate that was going to take one day.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have no excuses; I am trying to follow the rules of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister state when we will have the debate on external affairs?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member does not know how anxious the minister is to proceed.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

TABLING OF NOTE PRESENTED TO UNITED STATES

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and French of a note presented today by the Canadian embassy at Washington to the state department concerning the continuation and extension of United States restrictions on the importation of dairy products.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask that this document, containing the submission handed today to the state department at Washington by the Canadian ambassador and relating to restrictions on the importation of Canadian dairy products, be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable to the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of note, see appendix, page 1860.)

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO INTERNATIONAL WHEAT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I am sure the house will have no objection to my saying that we are glad that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is back from his successful trip. I have a question I should like to ask him which it may be difficult to answer at this time. Perhaps he could take this by way of notice. Is the situation at the international wheat conference today such as would lead one to believe that a continuation of the agreement is not going to be achieved?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been in close touch with the Canadian delegation at the conference. I must point out that the sessions are in private and no information is being given out in any form. My hon. friend will appreciate that I cannot give out any information from proceedings being held in camera. Meetings between importers and exporters are taking place each day. I know of nothing that has happened that would lead to the conclusion that there is any breakdown in the discussions. Bargaining is going on and I am most hopeful, and I think most of those present at the conference are hopeful, that an agreement can be reached.

SUPPLY

SUGAR—AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND CUBA

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I had risen to speak at three minutes to ten but of course I had not got very far in what I was prepared to say. I rose at that time and I rise now to support the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) and the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) in their pleas on behalf of the sugar beet industry and the sugar refining industry in Canada. I was particularly interested in what they had to say, and I was also interested in the reply given by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I should like to read a few extracts from the hon. member's speech and comment upon them as I go along. At the top of page 1819 of yesterday's Hansard the hon. member for Charlotte was explaining the economy of the maritime provinces in respect to the agreements that were made some time ago regarding the importation of Cuban sugar and the exportation of maritime fish. He said:

> Again, I want to say that all the maritime provinces—and I will include Newfoundland because now we have four maritime provinces—as I have said on many occasions in this chamber, are most dependent on these American markets. Take them away from us and our economy is completely wrecked.

I believe I can understand the mentality of the hon. member when he says: "Take them away from us and our economy is completely wrecked." In other words, the economy of the maritimes is completely dependent upon exports and imports, upon foreign trade. Might I ask the hon. member, and this is not the first time I have asked this question in this house: What is the purpose of an economic system? That question has never been answered by any member of the government. I would ask the government, I would ask the finance minister who is in charge of monetary policy, what is the purpose of an economic system? Until that is answered we are not going to solve our financial problems internally or externally.

Mr. Riley: You mean not until they are "Hanselled".

Mr. Hansell: We are not going to solve the problem of foreign markets either. I am going to give hon. members my definition of the purpose of an economic system. I would suggest it is to produce and deliver for the welfare of man. I suggest that the monetary policy of any country should be designed to distribute the abundance that it is able to produce. That is the purpose of an economic system. The present government—in fact I would say all ox-cart economists—never admit that there is anything basically wrong with our present financial policy. They will never admit it. In fact everything that is done in the realm of finance is done for the purpose of bolstering, fortifying or solidifying, if you wish, the present financial policy, which is basically wrong. Everything that is done is done with that one purpose in mind regardless of how it affects the welfare of mankind.

In his speech the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) had a good deal to say with respect to free trade. When he mentioned free trade in the manner in which he did there was considerable applause from the Liberal side of the house. Let me say that I think we are all in favour of as much free trade as possible. I believe we are all in favour of freer trade. But let me say that in the final analysis there is no such thing as free trade and there never will be. We may as well get ourselves straight on that. In spite of all the applauding that some members may do, there is no such thing as free trade. When I was a boy my father used to say that he was a Liberal. I do not know whether or not he was, but I know that I used to hear him talk about the Liberal party as being a free trade party. I heard a speaker in the house some year or two ago—I cannot recall who it was but what he said was not denied—who stated that during Liberal administration tariffs had on the average been higher than during Conservative administration.

Mr. Fulton: Perfectly true, too.

Mr. Hansell: That may or may not be so, but with all the talk and applause that has come from the Liberal benches in respect of free trade—

Mr. Blackmore: Pure lip service.

Mr. Hansell: —may I point out that they are in the driver's seat. The country is being administered by a Liberal administration, a so-called free-trade administration. Let them put some of their policies into action. I say that free trade is an absolute impossibility, and I would challenge any of them to name one thing that we can produce more cheaply in Canada than it can be produced in some other country. Let them name one thing that we can produce in Canada and sell in open competition with the world.

Mr. Low: It would be a nice exercise.

Mr. Hansell: That is a challenge. Let them tell us.

An hon. Member: What about nickel?

Mr. Hansell: I was interested in reading an editorial in the Ottawa Journal the other day which is headed, "Wise Words from a Banker". It is not very often that Social Crediters quote bankers but bankers are at least authorities on banking. The president of such a well established bank as the Bank of Montreal certainly should know what he is talking about when he is dealing with economics. Of course even the president of the Bank of Montreal would not admit that there is something basically wrong with the present financial policy, and he is speaking of course as an orthodox banker and is analysing the present situation. Mr. B. C. Gardner, the able president of the Bank of Montreal, made a speech, and the Ottawa Journal refers to it. This is what Mr. Gardner said:

> Trade is in its nature competitive. Canada can ill afford, therefore, to come under the competitive disadvantage that we would suffer if our domestic level of prices should in future years rise more rapidly than corresponding prices in the United States. In a highly competitive world we cannot proceed on the assumption that domestic cost levels will be a matter of small moment as far as our export trade is concerned.

Further on there is the following:

> Mr. Gardner concluded by pointing to other dangers—

Listen to this.

> —a corporate tax rate which takes more than half of every dollar of profit, denying industry provision for necessary expansion; high taxation leading to compensatory wage demands and inviting inflation; public demands for government services which must be paid for out of the pockets of private citizens; a tendency to run to the government for protection against the ordinary hazards of day to day business. "There is great need for public education in these fields . . . for legislators and electorate alike."

That would include the hon. member for Charlotte. The fact of the matter is that, with our particular financial policy in Canada and its effect upon Canadian price levels, we cannot compete on world markets in the sale of practically anything. We cannot produce as cheaply as some other country in the world can produce. I want to read another extract from the speech of the hon. member for Charlotte. This is what he said, as found on the same page, page 1819 of Hansard of yesterday:

> We do not get very many subsidies down there, and we do not get very much financial assistance. We are quite an understanding people, and we try to stand on our own feet. We are willing to produce what we have to produce in competition with any part of the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want hon. members to note that, because the actual truth is far, far beyond that statement.

> We are willing to produce what we have to produce in competition with any part of the world. If we cannot produce fish as cheaply as someone else, then let us eat someone else's fish. If we cannot produce sugar as cheaply as we can buy it somewhere else then let us give the consumer the advantage of cheaper living.

That sounds all right, but let us analyse that statement and let me ask the hon. gentleman a question. He says:

> We are willing to produce what we have to produce in competition with any part of the world. If we cannot produce fish as cheaply as someone else, then let us eat someone else's fish.

Will he then explain please why this government permits a 33 per cent tariff protection on codfish? Would he be willing to have that tariff taken off? Does he want it removed? Since he referred in another part of his speech to the fact that potatoes are produced in the maritimes, does he believe that potatoes should not be protected—when at the present time there is a tariff of 75 cents per hundred pounds? We all recall what happened not so long ago when there was no market for potatoes grown in the maritimes. The dominion government bought the crop. What did they buy the crop for? They bought it to keep prices up. Is that not protection?

Now, the hon. member had better answer some of those very simple questions.

He says in another passage which I will quote from Hansard of yesterday:

> I think we have to make it clear that if a business cannot stand on its own feet it should not exist. That might be a pretty broad statement, but if an industry cannot survive without subsidies, then there is something wrong.

Well, there certainly is something wrong, and it is not that there is something wrong with business. As a matter of fact business in Canada is run pretty efficiently. What is wrong can be found in some of the basic principles of our financial policies in Canada, and business must groove itself according to the financial policies which are determined by the present government.

Let us get back to the subject of free trade and foreign markets to which my hon. friend referred, and we bring in the sugar beet industry. For a number of years now, particularly since the war, the nations—the United States, Canada and other countries —have been doing all they could—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Hansell: Since I have been referring to the hon. gentleman's speech, yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Has the hon. member ever produced sugar beets, fish or anything else in his lifetime?

Mr. Hansell: I did not get the first part of the question.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Has the hon. member ever produced sugar beets, agricultural products or fisheries products?

Mr. Riley: No, but he read a book.

An hon. Member: "It's in the book".

Mr. Hansell: I have not produced sugar beets except in my own backyard and I have never produced any fish except those I have caught with a hook, line and sinker.

Mr. Riley: Were they voters?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): You want to try it because you might change your mind.

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, in order for one to familiarize oneself with fish or sugar beets, it is not necessary for one to have grown them. I might ask my friend if he has ever preached a sermon in his life.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I think perhaps I have.

Mr. Hansell: Well, that is very good.

Mr. Riley: His sermon has some sense to it.

Mr. Knowles: Was it on smuggling?

An hon. Member: It was not stolen anyway.

Mr. Hansell: I am glad to know that my hon. friend has preached a sermon, but even if he had not I would say that he had a perfect right to criticize a preacher.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is what I am doing.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that we have done all we could during and since the war to rehabilitate war-torn countries. We have contributed to foreign aid. There is the Marshall plan, which has poured millions and millions of dollars into European countries. We have UNESCO, which was designed to educate people—to give them a scientific knowledge of production and other matters. We have the Colombo plan and we have had one thing after another.

An hon. Member: Are you against them?

Mr. Hansell: No, sir, I am not against them. My hon. friend asks if I am against them. No, we are not; and I am making a point of why we do these things. Well, they were all designed to restore the productive capacities of war-torn countries. What for? You might say that is a foolish question; but the answer is: So that they can produce; so that they can become self-sufficient. That is the answer.

An hon. Member: It is a simple answer.

Mr. Hansell: Just as simple as that. But let us remember that the more that nations become self-sufficient the less they become dependent on foreign trade.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No, no.

Mr. Hansell: Well, unless we are going to manufacture wheelbarrows and exchange them for wheelbarrows from some other country—and surely we do not adjust our economies to do that.

Let me read a little excerpt from the Pakistan News and Views of February 2. It is a very interesting item regarding a speech that was given by Mr. Nurul Amin, chief minister of East Pakistan. I will read it:

> Land which formerly produced jute is now going to be used to grow more food for the populous area of East Pakistan. The chief minister of East Pakistan, Mr. Nurul Amin, has expressed the hope that this will enable East Pakistan to wipe out its food deficit in two years.

They are going to become self-sufficient in respect of their production of foods in two years. I will not take time to read the whole article but the final paragraph reads:

> In conclusion, the chief minister stated that self-sufficiency in food was the first objective of every country. "But", he added, "it is more so in the case of East Pakistan which has an enormous population."

Now, Mr. Speaker, one might say that to take such an attitude is to lean toward nationalism. Well, if that is so in contradistinction to the position of the internationalists, then I do not mind being called a nationalist. Furthermore, if we are to be accused of attempting to safeguard our sovereignty, I do not mind being accused of that either. To add it up and conclude, all you are accusing one of is simply being a Canadian. You can accuse us of that if you wish. You can say that we are ultra-Canadian if you wish. I say that we believe in foreign trade. We believe also in using our productive capacity to produce Canadian goods for Canadian people. What we say is simply this. We can produce sugar in Canada, and there is no reason why we should not produce sugar for Canadian consumption.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a brief that has been published by the Alberta sugar beet growers. I am not going to read the entire brief, but I am going to read that part of it which sums up one or two of the reasons for the continuation and expansion of the sugar industry in Canada for Canadians. I read this from the brief:

> Several policies of the Canadian government are directly affected by the potential influx of foreign refined sugars into Canada.

Then, the brief gives some of the reasons for the necessity of sugar production in this country. The first one in the brief, numbered "A", is as follows:

> The defence policy—which makes it vital to Canada, that a reasonable proportion of this country's sugar supply be produced at home. The lesson of sugar rationing and shortages during the last war should be remembered. During that period of stringency—due to submarine sinking of sugar ships—it was required that Alberta sugar be shipped to Ontario and Quebec.

We do not have to comment on that. We all know that sugar is a vital food product in Canada. The nation could not live without sugar, and yet as soon as the last war broke out one of the first things to be rationed was sugar. I am quite certain in my own mind that the reason for that was the lack of foresight on the part of the administration here to ensure that there were ample supplies of sugar in Canada. The sugar industry should have been encouraged to produce more for Canadian consumption. We were running around with saccharine tablets in our pockets to put in our tea and coffee. When the fruit season came along and the housewives desired to preserve fruit, what happened? They were allowed a few extra coupons in order to put by some preserves for the winter. This state of affairs really should not have occurred in Canada, yet it did. I say once again that this portion of the brief represents one reason why we should pay attention to the sugar industry of Canada, if for no other reason, because it ties in with an adequate defence policy.

Another reason given in the brief is that the industry helps in our immigration policy. I will read from the brief:

> The immigration policy, which calls for the establishment of agricultural people on the Canadian farm lands—as these people from Europe come to a sugar beet area, they are able to establish themselves first as beet labourers, then as tenant farmers, then owners of farms themselves. This process has gone on continually in southern Alberta and many of our best irrigation farmers are those who entered the sugar beet industry as hand labourers.

I am told that about 10,000 people have been brought into these areas. Well, I shall read that portion of the brief.

> Since the opening of immigration—post-war, we estimate over 1,000 people each year have been so employed. In seven years, this immigration has amounted to around 10,000 people who are building up Canada. The present population of 100,000 people in the area surrounding Lethbridge, our market town centre, is very largely composed of immigrants attracted by the sugar beet industry.

Then, another reason for supporting the sugar industry in Canada is the irrigation policy. I shall read this short paragraph from the brief:

> The irrigation policy. Millions of dollars from governments in Canada have been and are being spent to place water on arid and semi-arid lands. We state, without fear of challenge, that sugar beets as a cash crop, are the foundation for the successful farming, which must follow irrigation in western Canada. The introduction of rotation, use of beet by-products, for supplementing grasses and legumes, the establishment of livestock farming, all rely upon sugar beets.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I could read more from that brief and comment further upon it but I do not wish to detain the house. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has given a great deal of study during the past twenty years to the sugar industry of Canada, and he will have something to say upon this matter. I am going to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that on the subject of the sugar industry the member for Lethbridge is an expert. It would pay this house to listen to what he has to say in this connection. It is of vital importance to Canada. We are not simply making claims for the industry itself, we are making claims on behalf of the Canadian nation. We believe that the policy of producing Canadian goods for Canadian people is the right policy. Since sugar is a vital food product, we believe in the production of Canadian sugar for Canadian consumption.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate the warmth of the welcome that I have received upon returning to the House of Commons. Last evening I returned from a trip that covered 20,000 miles of travel by air, and which included visits to eleven different countries. I hope in due course to be able to give a report to the house of some of the highlights of the trip, perhaps on the estimates of the department. At the moment, I should like to speak about sugar. I was not able to do so earlier. Perhaps hon. members would be interested in my contact with this problem.

Some time early in last October I had a call from Mr. McGregor of the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, pointing out that imports of Cuban refined sugar were coming into western Ontario and disturbing the market for beet sugar. At that time he asked that a quota be placed on imports of refined sugar into Canada. I pointed out that quantitative restrictions were one of the menaces to world trade today and that Canada was vigorously protesting quantitative restrictions against the importation of Canadian cheese into the United States market and against other similar violations of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. He was not satisfied with that, but he departed. A few days later I was asked to meet a group of beet sugar growers and refiners, which I did. Quite a large group came to Ottawa. Representatives of the industry in Alberta, in Manitoba, in western Ontario and in Quebec came here. We had a frank discussion. Several facts emerged from it. One fact that was stated repeatedly was that the agreement with Cuba covering the import of raw sugar had no bearing on the problem whatever. That was stated several times by several members of the delegation and I thought it was accepted as a fact by all those present. Of course, it is a fact because the source of the raw sugar is immaterial if the laid-down price in Canada is the same from any country of origin as it is in this case. The meeting was in agreement—I must say that the representative of the Quebec industry did not agree—that the whole difficulty was caused by the importation of refined sugar from Cuba. The representative from Quebec said that there were several things wrong with the industry, but the rest agreed absolutely that if the import of the refined sugar from Cuba could be stopped, the beet industry could carry on.

I promised the meeting that I would visit Cuba early in February—I had already planned to do that as part of my itinerary—and that I would take up with Cuban exporters the matter of stopping the import of Cuban refined sugar into the beet-growing areas. That was an undertaking, and both they and I understood that it was a binding agreement that I would do just that.

A short time after that the beet-growing industry was circularized by Mr. McGregor of the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, Limited and was asked to take part in a pressure campaign on the government to bring about legislation to stop the import of Cuban refined sugar. I am happy to say that the rest of the industry, being men of integrity, refused to have anything to do with that campaign and I was advised by them to that effect. However, the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company then started the most aggressive pressure campaign that I have ever known of in my seventeen years as a member of this House of Commons. I have here cables that I received while on the trip; they include cables to Bogota, to Havana, to Rio and to other stopping places. They are all in the same language though not in the same words. It happens that Mr. McGregor is a man with a limited vocabulary and he repeats certain phrases. Those phrases are in all the cables. In the meantime the office received telegrams and letters obviously all written by Mr. McGregor or his staff and signed by parish priests, by organizations of growers, by individuals and by various other people, if there are any others.

The hon. member for Lambton West (Mr Murphy) undertook to take up the subject in the House of Commons and he did so. I presume that the hon. member for Lambton West prepared his own speech but I notice that the same old phrases that appeared in these letters and telegrams turned up frequently in his speech. It may be asked: Why did I not answer on this matter before I left? Would it not seem logical that I should do so when members from this side of the house spoke on this subject? I did not do so. The reason I did not was the commitment I had made to go to Cuba and to take this matter up on the ground. I know from experience—as I think most other people do—that anything that is written on the subject of sugar in Canada or any speech made in the House of Commons on sugar is reprinted in full in Spanish in the Cuban newspapers. If I was going to talk to the Cuban industry, obviously I should not talk in Canada in this House of Commons; I should talk to them in Cuba. Therefore I made no reply to the speeches.

When I met with our beet growers at the end of October, I stated that I was reasonably sure that, if our position was laid before the Cuban authorities, the import of refined sugar would stop. I pointed out that the interest of Cuba was centred more on shipping raw sugar to Canada than on shipping refined sugar. I stated that I would find out how that refined sugar was coming in and would arrange to stop the import.

I arrived in Cuba. I found the industry greatly disturbed. They had been reading the speeches of the hon. member for Lambton West and they wanted to know whether Canada wanted to break trade relations with Cuba. I explained that the hon. member for Lambton West was simply a politician looking for the votes of the sugar growers and that they were not to take his remarks seriously.

However, we had thorough discussions. At a meeting attended by the principal exporters of the island I explained that we were glad to have their raw sugar but that their refined sugar was presenting a serious economic problem in Canada. They agreed at once that they had no desire to upset the Canadian economy and that if refined sugar was doing that, they would stop exporting it to the beet areas.

I then met the sugar institute, the body that controls all matters affecting sugar in the island of Cuba. I explained the situation to them. They very reasonably said: "You have a duty on refined sugar of $1.89 per 100 lbs., which is a duty of more than 25 per cent at present prices; if our sugar can come in over that duty, your refiners are getting too much profit." I said: "I know that; but nevertheless I am talking for the beet-sugar industry. Even though our cane refiners are taking too much profit, I want you to stop the shipment of refined sugar into the beet-growing areas." They pointed out some exceedingly bad buying practices on the part of our trade—practices which should be corrected. I am meeting our refiners at the end of the week and I hope that those buying practices can be corrected.

Mr. Fulton: Is Mr. McGregor coming up?

Mr. Howe: I will be glad to talk to Mr. McGregor.

Mr. Knowles: Talk to him in Spanish.

Mr. Howe: Assuming that remedial action is taken with regard to these buying practices which have discriminated definitely against the Cuban exporters, I think I can assure hon. members that no Cuban refined sugar will be shipped from Cuba into western Ontario or into the three prairie provinces. It may be that if the refiners are still considered to be taking too wide a margin, refined sugar will go to Newfoundland, which was always a market for Cuban refined sugar; it may go into the maritime provinces. All I am saying is that refined sugar will not be shipped directly from Cuba into the beet-growing markets.

I should like to say a little bit about Mr. McGregor's company. While we are going into this matter I think perhaps we had just better see what the real situation is. We must examine separately the interests of the refining company in question and those of the beet-sugar growers themselves; for, although some of the growers have allowed themselves to be persuaded to join in the representations of the refiners, it does not necessarily follow that their interests are identical.

First, let me say a few words about the position of this refining company. While I shall have to speak frankly in this connection, I should not like anyone to feel that this is being done in an unfriendly or critical spirit. The company in question is a reputable concern of many years' standing, highly respected in the community. Its affairs, so far as I know, are efficiently conducted, and if its recommendations are designed to benefit primarily the company itself this is not surprising nor anything with which one should necessarily find fault. The Canada and Dominion Sugar Company is the owner of three large refineries, two in western Ontario and one in Montreal. These refineries, according to figures recently published—and I quote from the Financial Post corporation service—have been doing approximately one-third of all the sugar refining business in Canada.

While the company processes beets in western Ontario, its principal activity is the refining of imported raw cane sugar. In the latest year for which I have seen statistics, for every pound of beet sugar produced by this company it was refining approximately four pounds of imported cane sugar.

During a number of years past, the company has been enjoying a period of quite profitable operations. Between 1945 and 1951 its net profits, after taxes, steadily rose from $940,638 in 1945 to $2,238,888 in 1950, an exceptionally good year—

An hon. Member: The poor fellows!

Mr. Howe: —followed by a profit of $1,779,337 in 1951. Although I have not seen it authenticated, I am told that the gross profits of the company before write-off in 1952 were the highest in the history of the company. I would point out however that that prosperity in 1952 was not shared by the beet growers, who took a cut in their returns. I am afraid this refining company has not learned about equality of sacrifice.

Good dividends have been regularly paid for many years, and since the war the company has also managed to double its earned surplus which, at the end of 1951, amounted to more than $5 million. It is obvious that the main financial interest of this company lies in the refining of cane sugar, constituting about 80 per cent of its total output, with beet sugar as a profitable sideline.

The year 1950 was a record year for the sugar beet industry in Canada. In that year, from figures reported by the company itself, the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company produced about 494 million pounds of refined sugar, of which 104 million pounds were from beets and 390 million pounds from cane. To express the implications of these facts in more definite terms, if parliament should see fit to take some action which would have the effect of increasing the price of refined sugar in Canada by one cent a pound, this company would be placed in a position to collect from Canadian consumers, in round figures, an extra $5 million a year. Of this amount, about $1 million would go for beet sugar. And under the sliding scale of prices provided in the company's contracts, I understand that the beet growers would get about one-half of this sum, the company retaining the balance. Also, the whole of the $4 million arising from the increase in the price of refined cane sugar would be available to increase the profits of the company. I think I can understand why this company might have come to the conclusion that it would be a good thing to keep up the price of refined sugar in Canada, and to prevent the importation of competitive products or, what amounts to much the same thing, to restrict the imports to something less than 1 per cent of total Canadian consumption.

But I cannot quite see why the beet growers should be prepared to support this easy solution to their problems. Relatively speaking, they would get a very small share of the proceeds. In total, out of every additional dollar contributed by Canadian sugar consumers, the beet growers would apparently stand to gain about 10 cents; the remainder would go to the refiners.

At this point it would be helpful to look at the magnitude of this problem. For the past four years our total imports of all raw and refined sugar into Canada averaged 600,000 short tons per year. Most imports of sugar into Canada are made by the refiners themselves. However, for many years we have been importing modest quantities of refined and other sugar for direct industrial use. Total imports of these sugars in several recent years, as shown in official statistics, have been as follows:

	short tons
1935	2,583
1936	2,266
1937	2,678
1938	4,998
1939	3,995
1940	8,911
1947	9,036
1948	8,088
1949	4,247
1950	6,325
1951	13,069
1952 (11 months)	23,085

Total imports of refined sugar for direct industrial use since the end of world war II have ranged from 4 to 13 thousand tons a year, and for 1952 may have reached 25,000 tons—less than 4 per cent of the total consumption of refined sugar in Canada. The solution proposed by the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company Limited and the beet sugar growers who are supporting them is a maximum import quota of 5,000 tons of refined sugar per year.

Once we adopted the policy of using import quotas as a permanent protective device for the benefit of the sugar refiners, does anybody imagine that other interests would be slow to appeal for a similar kind of protection? And how would the farmers of Canada like it if this parliament were to place virtually prohibitive import quotas on the things that they have to buy, wherever these articles happen to compete with goods produced in Canada? How would the exporters of Canada like it if their customers in other countries, not content with tariffs, were likewise to adopt import quotas to keep out Canadian products whenever these Canadian products showed signs of competing with their own industry? In instances where other governments have resorted to such policies, we have made vigorous protests. We should not expect our protests to be very effective, however, if we ourselves accepted the principle of virtually prohibitive import quotas as a part of the regular commercial policy of this country. There are very few countries which depend as much as Canada on two-way international trade, and it would not be logical for us, of all people, to set a bad example by adopting that kind of import restriction.

And now let me say a few words about the beet growing industry. This industry over the years has also grown and prospered. After the first great war the area under sugar beets in Canada ranged from 15 to 25 thousand acres. The value of the beets grown in Canada at that time was less than $2 million a year, and in 1922 beet sugar accounted for only 2·6 per cent of the total production of refined sugar in Canada. Since then, the beet growers have come a long way under our present sugar tariff structure. The number of acres in sugar beet has steadily increased to an all-time high of 101,650 acres in 1950, and nearly as much, 93,138 acres, in 1951. The total value of sugar beets grown in Canada reached an all-time high of $18,459,000 in 1950, as a result of good weather and abnormal raw cane sugar prices. The value of $14,364,000 in 1951 was the second highest in history. Beet sugar represented 19·6 per cent of the total Canadian production of refined sugar in 1950 and 18·9 per cent of the total in 1951. Hon. members will find an inspiring story of this industry in an article by George A. Yackulic in Saturday Night of February 7. In this article, headed "Hope and Fortune Found in Sugar Beets", the writer described the beet sugar industry in Alberta as having been a steppingstone to farm ownership for many hundreds of new Canadians. The writer reports that, by the time they finish collecting for their 1952 crop next fall, many of Alberta's farmers will count their profits from beets at over $100 per acre.

There is, of course, a difference between growing beets in Alberta and growing them in Ontario. The irrigated land of Alberta which is suitable for beet culture is far away from Canadian ocean ports. The beet growers of Alberta and to a lesser extent those of Manitoba, therefore, enjoy a natural freight protection against the competition of imported sugar. This may be illustrated by the following table of relative retail prices of refined sugar in eight Canadian cities on September 2 last:

	Cents per lb.
Halifax	9·8
Saint John	10·1
Montreal	9·6
Toronto	9·9
Winnipeg	13·1
Saskatoon	14·2
Edmonton	12·2
Vancouver	10·5

Tariff protection sufficient to safeguard the production of sugar beets in Ontario is, therefore, more than sufficient to protect the production in western Canada, which benefits by freight protection in addition. In Ontario, recent figures indicate that the production of beet sugar is running at approximately 47,000 tons a year, about 7 per cent of the total production of refined sugar in Canada. In Ontario there are competitive demands for labour, notably in Windsor and Chatham; there are also competitive uses for land such as the production of soya beans and corn; but it is remarkable to see the way in which the sugar beet farmers of Ontario have continued to find it profitable in recent years to grow this crop.

We have heard a great deal in this house about the 6,000 sugar beet farmers in Ontario. According to the census of 1951, sugar beets were being grown during that year on 3,087 farms in Ontario on an area of 30,068 acres, being an average of 9.07 acres per farm. In Alberta and Manitoba, the operations were on a larger scale, the average area under sugar beets per farm in Alberta being 26.8 acres and in Manitoba 20.2 acres. In the province of Quebec, on the other hand, sugar beets were being grown on 2,494 farms on an area of 10,741 acres, being an average of 4.3 acres per farm.

The cause of the present complaints lies in the recent fall in world raw sugar prices, not in this small importation of Cuban refined sugar. What has brought this about? There is no mystery about it. During and after the second world war there was a temporary shortage of sugar, and prices went up. By the spring of 1950 production had increased and the price of raw sugar had fallen to about $4 per 100 lbs., f.a.s. Cuba.

The panic buying following the outbreak of hostilities in Korea pushed this price up to a high of better than $8 per 100 lbs., in July, 1951. Since that date production has been overtaking consumption, and within the last few months the supply of sugar available has increased to such a level that producing countries are holding substantial tonnages of raw sugar and the price has fallen as low as $3.50 per 100 lbs., f.a.s. Cuba, Neither the beet growers, for whom I have the greatest respect and sympathy, nor any other class of producers can hope to continue to receive at all times the full benefit of scarcity prices. For many years they enjoyed an extensive and profitable business at normal prices. During the last few years they have done even better. At the present time world sugar prices have returned to more normal levels.

There may be farmers who will find it more profitable to shift a part of their production into some other crop. Such shifts happen every year. On the other hand, I have no doubt that even without any extraordinary measures to promote the growing of this crop, sugar beets will continue to be profitably grown in Canada as they have been throughout the past fifty years.

I appreciate the fact that the Canadian refiners have special problems of their own. Because of the seasonal nature of Canadian navigation they have to stock up for the winter and hold a considerable inventory which may rise or fall in value while they are holding it. In recent years raw sugar prices have been rising and I presume that refiners have taken a corresponding benefit. More recently, prices have been falling and it is evident that the refiners have naturally been postponing as long as possible the moment for making corresponding reductions in the prices of refined sugar. This is why industrial users of refined sugar in Canada have found it worth their while to import refined sugar from Cuba, even over a duty of nearly two cents a pound.

There is no doubt in my mind that it would be possible, if we thought it to Canada's advantage, to devise some kind of restrictions which would curtail or entirely prevent the importation of refined sugar from any source, though naturally the people of Canada would have to pay for it in higher prices, the loss of export markets, and retaliation in other countries.

In Cuba our export interests include fish, potatoes, wheat, and a very wide variety of manufactured products which the Cubans themselves would like to buy from us in larger quantities. A good many of these products come from Ontario and western Canada, the very provinces where sugar beets are grown.

It would surely be irrational to endanger our export markets for fish, potatoes and wheat and manufactured products and at the same time to increase the cost of living and the cost of production throughout Canada in order to safeguard one industry against all possible competition.

It is not the policy of this government or of the party to which I belong to respond to pressure organized and generated by a single company, even if it is the producer of one-third of all the refined sugar consumed in Canada.

A good deal has been said in this debate, particularly by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy), who told us a very sad tale about the low wages paid in Cuba. I took particular pains to find out about wages in Cuba. The sugar producers have a contract with the workers which is supervised by the government. I was able to get a document from the government in Spanish which gave the full particulars. I think Canadian sugar growers, who have been doing so well according to Mr. McGregor and the hon. member for Lambton West, might want to know what similar labour in Cuba is getting. They might revise their whole idea about returns for growing of sugar beets in western Ontario.

During my visit to Cuba a few days ago I obtained a substantial file of information with regard to wage rates paid to workers in the sugar industry and applicable to the 1953 sugar crop. I also obtained comparable information with regard to the 1950 crop. These wages are not by any means low.

Out of scores of occupations listed, I may quote a few typical ones. The lowest unskilled wage listed in the entire contract is the one for collectors of sugar samples, warehousemen, et cetera, who are getting $4.43 a day. Generally speaking, the wages for unskilled workers in the sugar mills range between $5 and $6 a day; the wages for more skilled workers range from $6 to $9 per day; and when we get into the classes of tradesmen the wages run from $9 to $15 a day. Foremen are getting $15 to $22 a day. It should be noted that all workers in Cuban sugar factories receive compulsory vacation pay as well as a number of extra benefits for retirement, maternity, et cetera. They operate on a 44-hour week. That is the answer to the sad story about the depressed wages paid to the poor coloured workers in the Cuban sugar industry.

I should like to quote from the Chatham Daily News of November 7, 1952, as follows:

> For the second time within a quarter of a century the sugar beet industry in Ontario faces possible extinction as the Liberal government at Ottawa allows refined Cuban sugar to flood the domestic market. Noting that the price of beet sugar has dropped $10.80 to $8.60 within a sixteen month period and $1.30 since Cuba started flooding the market last February, beet processors admitted today that they are "stymied" in the face of government apathy.

I can tell you how beet sugar can be compensated if the price of refined sugar has only dropped to the extent indicated there while the price of raw cane sugar has dropped by $4.40. The beet sugar growers might ask the refiners for a little share of the extra gravy that is being withheld at the expense of the Canadian consumer.

I have some additional notes here. I had planned to really do a job on my friend, Mr. McGregor, in return for the loss of sleep he caused me on my trip, but I do not think I will say much more. One threat he made did not cause me very much concern. I have heard it made before. It was a threat that unless Cuban refined sugar was shut out of Canada he would close the refineries. I would assume that Mr. McGregor has shareholders and a board of directors, and that just about the time he would start closing the refineries the board of directors would decide to get themselves a new head boy.

This has been a difficult negotiation. Our balance of trade with Cuba is very much in our favour, and Cuba is a very important market to the maritime provinces. It always has been and it always will be. The Cuban agreement on raw sugar was made as a means of stimulating that market and of protecting the market we have had. It has had that effect. There has been a very sharp growth in imports from the maritime provinces, and in talking to the people of Cuba I may say that they in Cuba believe that market can be stimulated a great deal more.

It was necessary to conduct these negotiations with that thought in mind. Certainly I have no intention at any cost of disturbing that market for products of the maritime provinces. However, it has been my experience that international traders are reasonable people and that they particularly value the good will of governments. I did not have much doubt when I went to Cuba that if this situation was explained to the exporters they would be prepared to co-operate. I found that to be the case, and I sincerely hope that nothing will be said in this house or outside of it that will further disturb the happy relations that exist between Canada and Cuba in the matter of raw and refined sugar and in the matter of interchange of products generally between our two countries.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to ask the minister a question. I would be interested to know whether, if the importation of refined sugar from Cuba was prohibited. that would increase the cost of refined sugar to the Canadian people.

Mr. Howe: All I can say is, it would put the refineries in the position of being able to charge anything they like for refined sugar, and while I have great respect for the industry as a whole I have no respect at all for the president of the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company. I shudder to think what he would do to our consumer.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a question? Can he explain why it is that the retail price of sugar at Winnipeg is so high, the second highest in the country of the list that he gave, in view of the fact that we have a refinery right at our back door?

Mr. Howe: The prices of all products are based on competition. I presume it costs more to grow sugar beets in Manitoba than it does in Ontario. I do not believe that the beet sugar growers on the prairies could live on the price at which raw sugar can be landed at Canadian ports and refined there. The protection of course is the rail rate from the coast to the interior. I think the prices are just what one would expect, having in mind the cost of transporting imported sugar to the prairies.

Mr. Knowles: Who is getting the benefit of that freight rate protection, the growers or the company?

Mr. Howe: I think we can say that the industry on the prairies supplies the demands of the prairies, and it therefore has a self-contained market for that product. In the circumstances I think the prices are reasonable.

An hon. Member: We have no Mr. McGregor.

Mr. Howe: I have not met him anyway.

Mr. Bryce: May I ask the minister a question? How is it that in the minister's home town of Port Arthur Manitoba sugar is 50 cents a hundred cheaper than at Winnipeg?

Mr. Howe: I suggest, if I know the division of markets among the refineries, that the head of the lakes is supplied from eastern Canada.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, we are all glad, I know, to have the report of the minister. We are very glad to have him back.

Mr. Riley: Are you going to change your speech?

Mr. Blackmore: Why not let a fellow get started?

Mr. Riley: I thought I had better ask now.

Mr. Blackmore: You will soon find out.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: We are very glad that the minister has given us his report. I am not sure of all the details concerning the profits that are being made by other corporations in Canada. Before a person could be sure that the sugar refining industry is making inordinate profits I think one would need to probe into the affairs of probably twenty other corporations in Canada to find out whether or not they are making relatively more. Of course the figures that the minister gave sound very attractive and startling. I wonder what the profits of the International Nickel Company would look like or the Aluminum Company of Canada or General Motors! Possibly if we knew all these things we might not have quite such a strong opinion as we may be tempted to have now. However, I am very glad to have the minister's report.

May I say that I greatly respect the minister and everything he has done. I appreciate very much that he was able to get the Cuban people to agree not to send into Canada any more refined sugar. Notwithstanding all that, however, I rise to voice a grievance. In my constituency, and in other beet sugar producing areas of Canada, there is definite injury by reason of the importation of Cuban refined. There is no objection to the importation of Cuban raw sugar, but when Cuban refined comes in we begin to remember the years 1930, 1931, 1929, 1928 and 1927, that period right up to 1932 when the Conservative government had to impose a minimum price of $2.30 a hundred at point of origin in order to save the beet sugar industry at all. We remember the fact that for some unaccountable reason the Liberal government at Ottawa abolished that provision in 1939, a provision which was the sole protection the beet sugar industry of Canada had against the importation of refined sugar from cane producing areas. They never told the country they did that. They did not get permission from parliament to do it. They did not even announce it. They just did it. Thereby the beet sugar growers were left completely at the mercy of cane producing areas where they could refine the raw cane into refined. That is the thing that is worrying us.

We can remember all the abominations committed against the beet sugar industry by the sugar controller during world war II. One of these days I will talk about them, and I believe they will be quite astounding to our maritime friends, for whom I have nothing but the very greatest sympathy.

Mr. Riley: You are always astounding.

Mr. Blackmore: I hope I always will be. I think it would do my hon. friend a lot of good to be astounded occasionally.

So, Mr. Speaker, we still think we have been injured and are in danger of being much more severely injured by the importation of Cuban refined sugar. We look upon the federal government's neglect to limit the importation of this Cuban refined sugar into Canada as a neglect of duty.

I propose to show the vital importance of the beet sugar industry in the Canadian economy with respect to several considerations.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Any nation that intends ever to be strong and enduring must have constantly in mind five essentials respecting its economy. The first is to keep enough of its youth and its immigrants at home to provide amply for its people—producers, consumers and defenders. The second is to keep enough of its money at home to avoid falling into debt abroad. The third is to keep farmers and other primary producers within its borders able to buy the output of the cities. The fourth is to keep its national plant from running down, in other words to husband its resources, managing as far as possible always to improve them and not to deplete them. The fifth is to keep its production stable by avoiding lopsidedness or development in one or two or a few crops, an economy resembling that of Cuba. To attain those five imperative national objectives, the beet sugar industry is the best means available to Canada—this is a matter of exceedingly serious importance, a thing altogether too much neglected.

The beet sugar industry is no longer an experiment. It has been long tried, long proven and long trusted. Germany and Russia and other continental European countries have proved it. Britain has proved, and so has the United States. Canada has proved it abundantly and beyond all possibility of doubt. By that I mean to say that the sugar beet industry is not on trial. The only ones on trial in this country are people who do not know about it. Canada has proved the beet sugar industry in respect of each of the five considerations I have mentioned.

Back in 1932, in the darkest of the depression years, it was estimated in the United States that a beet sugar factory of 1,200 tons slicing capacity would give a living directly and indirectly to 10,000 people. The factory at Raymond, Alberta, in my constituency, is of 1,200 tons slicing capacity and produces yearly about 45 million pounds of refined sugar. It employed 350 people in the factory, 2,200 workers in the fields and 700 growers. That factory used coal to the value of $55,000; lime rock to the value of $20,000; coke to the value of $9,000; boxes, supplies and maintenance to the value of $105,000; bags to the value of $100,000; freight rates to the value of $330,000. The factory payroll was $175,000, and it paid the growers $940,000.

From the standpoint of providing work and markets I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is not an industry in the Dominion of Canada or on the North American continent that can begin to compare with the beet sugar industry. Let it be borne in mind that if troubles come upon this nation tending toward depression the first thing we shall be wanting will be jobs and markets. If we destroy this means of providing markets we will rue the day. Let us be wise enough not to be foolish in respect of the beet sugar industry.

This factory helped to keep busy the railwaymen, miners, labourers, truckers and others. The proof of these figures will be found in "Why Canada needs sugar beets", pages 14 to 16.

In the Lethbridge area now there are three fine sugar factories at Raymond, Picture Butte and Taber. That will indicate the reason Lethbridge had a higher per capita income in 1952 than any other city or community in Canada. The Lethbridge district receives very little income from oil. There are hardly any oil wells there. All the prosperity which prevails in Alberta generally in respect of oil is not shared directly by Lethbridge.

Turning back to the Raymond factory, certainly from 1932 until now it has kept a good many Alberta youths at home who otherwise would have gone to the United States. It thereby complies with the first national requirement. It has kept in Canada money that would otherwise have gone to Cuba or other dollar countries to pay for scores of millions of pounds of sugar. It has kept many farmers and others in a position where they have been able to buy manufactured goods from Ontario, Quebec and other parts of Canada. By reason of the manure from stockfeeding, of the fibers and nitrogen restored to the soil, through crop rotation it has helped to keep the soil in southern Alberta from running down. Finally, it has greatly diversified Alberta and Canadian farming, which is a matter of extreme importance. Every acre of properly managed Alberta sugar beet land takes ten acres out of production of wheat in Alberta. That results from the fact that one of a considerable number of crop rotations is used in making the land ready for each beet crop.

The Canadian farming industry is now specializing far too much in wheat growing. Through raising wheat and other grains we are mining our soil. May I repeat that we are mining the soil of Canada. The amount of nitrogen taken out of the soil in raising one bushel of wheat is 1·3 pounds. For oats the figure is ·65 pounds; for barley ·9 pounds. Now, imagine how much of the actual substance of Canadian soil we are sending out of this country when we ship 100 million bushels of wheat. That goes on every year, not just 100 million but 300 million and 350 million bushels.

An hon. Member: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. Blackmore: We have to do something about it rather than sit around here and see it happen. What I am suggesting is that if we were increasing our sugar supply through the beet sugar industry we would remove a vast amount of that wheat land from the production of wheat, and we would produce our own sugar.

I know that does not mean very much to people who do not know this subject of sugar beets, but please understand that I know it. If you do not quite agree with me I will give you plenty of documents in which you can find proof for what I am saying. Call up the experimental farm any time and they will tell you exactly what I am telling you.

A carload of two-year-old fat steers does not contain as much phosphorus as 400 bushels of wheat. The figures I have just given are shown by publication No. 883 of the experimental farm service, called "Irrigation in Southern Alberta" published by Dr. K. W. Hill, senior agronomist at the central experimental farm. I have talked with Dr. Hill, and I have in my possession a letter containing the facts I have given you. It reached me only this morning, so you can be sure the figures I am giving you are right up to date.

Mr. Studer: What about the land belonging to the provinces?

Mr. Blackmore: My hon. friend can read his question tomorrow to see if he thinks it is really sensible.

For the purpose of elaborating these remarks, may I refer to my House of Commons speeches of December 6 and December 17, 1952. May I now read an excerpt from a periodical called British Farming bearing on the general theme I am developing here today. This issue of British Farming appeared in 1951, and I quote:

> British Farming—an illustrated account of all branches of agriculture in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. A story of progress in providing food from Britain's fields:
>
> The sugar beet industry was called into being by deliberate act of the state in 1924.

This is in Britain, of course.

> It has throughout been subsidized and since 1936 it has been developed under the control of a statutory corporation. It was intended to provide a new source of income for farmers in the shape of a crop which could replace turnips and mangolds. It offered a means of raising, or at least maintaining, soil fertility of farms, for it was a foregone conclusion that success in cultivation would be achieved only when farmers were willing to apply liberal doses of fertilizers. It provided by-products in the shape of leafy tops of high feeding value and pulp returned after extraction of sugar from the factories. It provided also a means to maintain human skill in cultivation and an additional outlet for casual labour. Finally, it provided an incentive to the development of new machinery—

Note these words.

All these objectives have, in fact, been realized.

This quotation backs up everything I have said so far, and practically everything I shall say in the remainder of this speech.

The beet sugar industry is particularly important in managing our Palliser triangle. Recently we in this house have been talking about two main subjects. One of them was the conservation of our water resources. Many hon. members said things during that debate which were quite alarming, even to me, and which showed the extremely serious deterioration of soils in various parts of Canada. Then we discussed the Palliser triangle under the heading of the South Saskatchewan dam. Much was said during that debate.

May I point out that in the light of those two discussions which we have had, the beet sugar industry is exceedingly important. The reason is this: It is extremely difficult to make irrigated land pay in the prairie provinces without a cash cleaning crop.

There are several reasons why that is so. I do not wish to go into too much detail, because I have many other things to say. Irrigated land is constantly having water poured over it. This water is likely to be full of weed seeds, and the result is that such weeds as the Canada thistle, the perennial sow thistle and even more dangerous ones are constantly being borne in upon the soil. The need for cleaning the soil is, therefore, much more urgent than it is on ordinary farm lands. The irrigation farmer has costs which he would not have if he were on dry land. Instead of summer fallowing the land it is necessary for the irrigation farmer to be able to raise a crop which he can hoe, and thus clean the land. This crop must be one which will repay him for the effort he puts forth in cleaning the land adequately.

The sugar beet crop is the only one that will do that. It is a cash cleaning crop. Sugar beets constitute the only thoroughly satisfactory cash cleaning crop for those three provinces. Potatoes, corn and sunflowers will grow there, but there is no adequate market for these products if grown extensively. Vegetables for canning need clean land for planting. Soya beans do not appear to be hardy enough for most sections of the Palliser triangle. There is, therefore, no thoroughly suitable cash cleaning crop available to the farmers in the Palliser triangle, having irrigation on their lands, except the sugar beet crop. If we are going to deny them the privilege of developing the beet sugar industry, which is the logical thing for them to do, we are going to be in danger of losing the money we are spending out there in the development of irrigation.

Many of those who oppose, or adopt a lukewarm attitude to, the beet sugar industry argue that Canada should work for less restrictive trade, and toward free trade. For a moment may we examine this matter of freer trade, currently called the principle of non-discrimination in trade. Samuel Crowther, whose work showed him to be a man of wide knowledge, experience and understanding, copyrighted in 1933 a book entitled "America Self-Contained". Chapter 9 of this book has the title "The free-trade myth." The chapter opens with a sentence which has the same meaning as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) gave a few minutes ago; it is this:

One of the most curious of the several classical economic delusions is that trade ever has been or ever can be free.

I say to hon. members, can you name any great nation of our time that became great through free trade? Has not every nation which became great used protection high enough to protect its industries until those industries became strong enough to compete with any industries in the world? Take Great Britain as an example. Britain is supposed to be a country that proves the soundness of free trade. I am not saying anything against free trade. I am putting some facts forward so that hon. members can read those facts and realize what almost fanatical delusions we see manifested by a great many inexperienced and uninformed Liberals who come into this house.

In Crowther's "America Self-Contained" there appear several statements bearing upon Britain and free trade. At page 165 we read:

The regulation of international trade by tariffs and other restrictions is now, and always has been, an affair of expediency, and what is today accepted as classical free-trade doctrine is only a record of what British industrialists considered best for Great Britain at a certain period of history.

You see that just simply shoots a hole right into the balloon of the free trade idealists. Speaking of Adam Smith, who is said to be the high priest of the free traders, Mr. Crowther says at page 165 of his book:

He did not advocate the repeal of protective duties in cases where an industry would be destroyed—

We can see how that applies to our beet sugar industry. Again, the author says:

—he put national defence above all other considerations.

Again, it is said:

He held that the navigation acts, which practically confined British trade to British ships, were necessary. . .

Again:

—he did not favour wiping out the British farmers by letting in free the products of virgin lands.

Let our free trade idealists weigh these facts. On page 166 we read this from Samuel Crowther:

Adam Smith did not bring free trade to England. It so happens that he wrote at a time when British industry was coming to the stage where it did not need protection from foreign industry so much as it needed entry into foreign markets.

In other words, British industries had become so strong that they could compete successfully with any other industries on the face of the earth. Mr. Crowther himself makes the following significant statement at page 169:

One might imagine that British trade had from the beginning been based on the free exchange of commodities. Nothing could be further from the facts. Up to the thirteenth century, England was a crude agricultural country supplying raw materials to the Hansards, who were known as the Easterlings, and since theirs was the only money in England, the name for their money, corrupted into "sterling", has survived. Edward III saw that the British wool might as well be woven at home, so he attracted a number of Flemish weavers and, as soon as they were well under way, prohibited the wearing of any articles made of foreign cloth. Some years later, foreign merchants were compelled by edict to lay out in British goods the proceeds realized on any articles they imported.

What do you think about that for free trade? Free trade was not the policy that Britain applied when she was becoming great. Then at page 170 we read from Samuel Crowther again:

The navigation act was the rock on which British trade was built.

That is significant, is it not? In other words the free trade policy of Great Britain, without the navigation act, even when Britain was using "free trade", would certainly not have sustained Britain in the great role which she played.

From page 177 in Samuel Crowther's book we read this passage:

There was really no freedom about British free trade. It was an entirely one-sided arrangement, for no country could sell manufactured goods in Britain at a price to compete with home-made articles, while of course England had no need to raise a barrier against the incoming of raw materials for her factories. So free trade really meant that every country would admit British goods instead of attempting to make its own.

There is a catch there. There are a number of people in the house who have indicated absolutely fantastic and fanatical addiction to the idea of free trade.

Let me draw these additional facts to the attention of all those who think too strongly about free trade. Britain was at that time the world's banker. Britain was also the world's insurance headquarters. Foreign competition with British goods had not grown up from Germany, the United States and from home industries such as we now find in Canada. Trade unionism had not yet developed in Britain. It was therefore possible for employers in Britain to force down labour to almost starvation levels.

These were the elements in Britain which enabled so-called free trade to work. Does anyone, even in the wildest nightmare, imagine that Canada could possibly get into a position similar to the one Britain occupied in those days? If Canada cannot get into the position in which Britain was at that time, how in the world can anyone sanely suggest that free trade for Canada would be sound?

I hope that my good friend the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), who is not in the chamber at the present moment, will give careful thought to these facts. Yet I sympathize with the statements he makes here concerning ultra high prices which result from too much tariff protection. We can go too far in the matter of tariff protection, and in many cases we have done so in Canada.

What about Germany? Did Germany become great because of free trade? Nothing of the sort. Friedrich List, a great thinker in the days of Bismarck, was invited by Bismarck to advise him as to how to build a great and powerful Germany, that Germany which we today dread in production and international competition. What did List advise? The most careful, elaborate and effective system of protection of German industries until they became powerful enough to compete successfully with industry anywhere on the face of the earth; and Germany was labouring under the disadvantage that the resources which she possessed were relatively exceedingly meagre for the population she had. She had to build herself out of woefully inadequate materials, but look what she did.

Now let us consider the United States. Upon what policies has she become great? Free trade? Not at all. Everybody knows how rigidly the United States has excluded goods from abroad. She was advised by this same Friedrich List who by the way was driven from Germany by certain people who did not like his ideas. He took refuge in the United States and taught the United States people the secrets of building their nation. So they built themselves into a nation which today, like a Colossus, bestrides the world. On free trade? No, not on free trade. We had therefore better be careful. I am not saying a word against free trade. I am merely putting on the record some facts to which I hope the people in the country, particularly those in this house, will give a great deal of attention.

Then what about Canada? Canada has grown great relatively. What has she done it on? The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) gave several items which are protected quite generously by tariffs in Canada. I will just read a few of those for the benefit of people like the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), who seem to imagine that any kind of protection is pernicious. We have asparagus protected by a tariff of 10 per cent; beans, green, 10 per cent; cabbage, 10 per cent; carrots and beets, 30 per cent; celery, 10 per cent; apples, 20 per cent—some of that has been removed; that was in 1947—sugar beets, 30 per cent; potatoes, 75 cents a hundred pounds; onions, 30 per cent; oats, 16 cents a bushel; rye, 15 cents a bushel; wheat, 30 cents a bushel; seeds, garden, 35 per cent.

Mr. Laing: How much of it is seasonal?

Mr. Blackmore: A good deal of it is seasonal and a good deal of it is not. For example, as to potatoes, it is not seasonal trade.

Mr. Laing: Oh, yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Potatoes? I will go right to the record with my hon. friend. I have it right here. Possibly he realizes that I know something about what is in that record. I have here on my desk the Canada Customs Tariff with amendments to June 1, 1950, so it is up to date; I think my hon. friend will agree with that. I can give him the pages on which those things are listed. For example, he will find potatoes on page 119, 75 cents a hundred pounds. I proceed with my list: whisky, $10 a gallon; soya beans, free; eggs, 10 cents a dozen; butter, 14 cents; horses, $25; canned beef, 35 per cent; and so on down a long list that I do not think I will go through. But we have coal, including screenings and coal dust, protected by 75 cents. Let no one run away with the idea that Canada is a free trade country or has attained through free trade policies the degree of industrial development which she has attained. Let us not apply the doctrine, the dogma and the myth of free trade against the beet sugar industry because its advocates are seeking enough protection to enable it to grow as it should.

Others who are unsympathetic with the beet sugar industry contend that it is not efficient. I dare venture the opinion that if we could find an adequate score card by which to judge efficiency, it would be found that the beet sugar industry is probably one of the most efficient industries in the Dominion of Canada. What do these people mean by "efficient" when they talk about "efficient"? As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) said, I challenge any hon. member in the house or any person in the country to show that Canada is able to produce any commodity more cheaply than that commodity is being produced and sold somewhere else in the world. In other words, if we were to take away all protection from Canada, we soon would be using food and goods coming from everywhere on the face of the earth and we would not have anything produced with which to pay for them. That is precisely what we would face.

Now may I read a statement which I believe has a tremendous bearing on this whole matter of protection for the beet sugar industry. Here is a statement from a little publication called "Sugar Facts" dated February 3, 1953. It is headed "Cuba Sets Wage Rates". It states:

> The government of Cuba, following meetings over the week-end, between the minister of labour and workers' representatives had announced its intention of fixing wages and salaries in the sugar industry at levels geared to a raw sugar price of $4.70 per 100 pounds f.o.b., 26 cents below the 1952 level of $4.96.

I ask you, what industry on the face of the earth could compete successfully with a country that is in a position to work together like that, so they can reduce their costs of production to the point where they can come in and compete successfully in the market of any country to which they desire to go. I am afraid that is exactly what we are facing in Cuba.

I greatly appreciate what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said to us today about the co-operative attitude of Cuba. If they decide to enter the Canadian market, they are able to do it. We do not have protection adequate to keep them out. I think the quota, possibly, is the best means of shielding our beet sugar industry. That is the means used in the United States. Some of these days perhaps I shall discuss the sugar quota as it is being employed in the sugar industry in the United States.

The beet sugar industry is of top-flight importance in respect of every one of the basic principles on which a nation is built enduring and strong. Without the beet sugar industry Canada cannot possibly attain self-sufficiency. Let me draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that today the United States is almost self-sufficient, and it is because of the fact that it is almost impossible to get United States dollars. If we want to be strong like the United States, what should our national aim be? Naturally, using the United States as a model to govern ourselves by, it should be national self-sufficiency. And we cannot attain that without the Canadian beet sugar industry.

Without the beet sugar industry a genuinely balanced economy would be almost impossible to develop, if not utterly impossible. I am referring to an economy in which the primary producers, the farmers, could buy the products of the nation's industries. Without the beet sugar industry it will be extremely impracticable to maintain or to restore the richness of Canadian soils. No other industry I know of in Canada can be put to work and improve the soil while it produces a crop. Without the beet sugar industry it will be far more difficult to give employment to many Canadians, thus holding them in Canada where we want them, not down in the United States, after we have paid money to educate them.

Without the beet sugar industry it will be far more likely that we shall run into adverse trade balances, especially with the United States, from whom, in the last analysis, we buy a great deal of our sugar which we do not produce in Canada.

Considering the importance of the beet sugar industry to the Canadian economy, and considering only that, we must conclude that the admission of Cuban refined sugar into the Canadian market was highly regrettable.

It may be argued that the Canadian refiners are getting too much. I do not know about that; but I would say this, that before the government took the risky procedure of permitting Cuban refined sugar to come into this country, they ought to have found out what the situation was. They should not have let the Cuban refined sugar come in first, and then found out afterwards. That is a pretty reckless way of governing.

I maintain that the sooner we shut out Cuban refined sugar entirely, by a device similar to the one used in 1932, or by devices such as those suggested by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie), the better off we shall be, because this country is capable of producing in the Palliser triangle probably twice the amount of sugar we require, thus making the Palliser triangle a steppingstone to greatness rather than, possibly, a millstone around our necks.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That items Nos. 85 to 104 inclusive of the main estimates, 1953-54, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution following a practice which has become fairly normal, and I think very useful in the House of Commons, and which gives the standing committee on external affairs an opportunity not only to go over the estimates but also to discuss external affairs generally and report back to the house. This resolution gives me an opportunity, which is also becoming normal, to make a statement on external affairs generally.

The last occasion upon which I was able to do this was December 8, when I gave an interim report to the house on the work of the seventh session of the general assembly of the United Nations. At that time I dealt at some length with two questions which were uppermost in our minds in New York, the Korean and South African questions, which were on the agenda of the general assembly. As the house knows, the United Nations general assembly is to reconvene on February 24 and will then have before it some additional difficult and I should think controversial items. Before the general assembly resumes in New York to discuss these items I should like to make a short estimate of the work so far accomplished, and to survey briefly the task which still lies before the United Nations. I should then like to discuss some other questions of international interest which will not be before the United Nations at this time.

I should say first that the seventh session of the United Nations general assembly, which is proving to be a momentous assembly indeed, has already given us cause for some encouragement and for some anxiety. The main subject, of course, as I have indicated, is Korea. The Korean resolution, which I discussed more fully in my statement of last December, has since that time, as hon. members know, been rejected by communist China and by North Korea and, therefore, unfortunately has not led to an armistice in the unhappy Korean peninsula. Nevertheless I think that this effort, and the resolution which reflects this effort, were of very great significance and importance as a demonstration of unity and solidarity—unity which included all the Asian members of the United Nations. In fact the effort was led by one of the Asian members, India.

Although this resolution has not brought an end to the fighting in Korea, it has become the starting point, the basis for any future action. Finally I believe that it is important that this resolution showed very clearly where the will to peace now lies by exposing the insincerity of communist declarations that they wish to end the war in Korea.

If the United Nations proposal on Korea, which was a fair compromise, had been accepted by the communists who talk so much about a cease-fire we would have been able long since to enjoy a cease-fire—a cease-fire on the basis of an armistice agreed upon, with prisoners of war already exchanged; and we would now be well on the way to a political conference on outstanding Korean and other Far Eastern questions.

Their summary rejection, and it was a summary rejection by the communists, of this great opportunity for peace exposes the hollowness and hypocrisy of the communist clamour for a cease-fire without an armistice and without an exchange of prisoners—matters which, along with others in the Soviet proposals, echoed recently by Peking, are to be left for later disposition to a commission which would be set up after the cease-fire and on whose decisions the communist members would have had a veto.

On that important question and other important questions, the general assembly has already shown that even when faced with matters potentially very explosive it is capable of reaching decisions which bear a relation to the present facts and to the possibilities of constructive international action.

It is probable, however, that there will be further far-reaching discussions at later sessions of the general assembly on the reconciliation of domestic jurisdiction as laid down in the charter with the claim that the United Nations is competent to consider and to intervene in any question which anyone may wish to put on the agenda. There is probably no more important long-range problem facing the United Nations general assembly than this.

In the economic, social and legal fields the general assembly did not strike out on any new paths, but it reviewed and developed the work of its various technical agencies. It is possibly worth special mention that there was a decision to recommend a $25 million grant for the expanded program of technical assistance which the economic and social council had already proposed.

Such achievements as the general assembly has been able to make are I think the more commendable in that they were made under the handicap of the uncertainty attendant upon the presidential election in the United States. The general assembly was also faced with serious problems posed for the organization itself by the resignation of the secretary general and by certain difficulties which arose over personnel problems in the secretariat. I shall say no more about these matters now, as they will undoubtedly be discussed at the resumed session.

However, there are some additional subjects on the agenda which promise to give rise to discussion and indeed to opportunities for propaganda. These include, for example, germ warfare, the Polish resolution on "peace" and the Czechoslovak resolution referring to the alleged interference of the United States in the internal affairs of other states. We are now more than half-way through the session of the general assembly, I hope; and while I do not wish to indulge in any idle or unrealistic praise of what it has done or to minimize the difficulties which lie ahead, I think we can take some encouragement from the spirit in which the general assembly tackled the great issues which faced it last October and from the constructive way in which so many delegations sought for solutions to those issues.

At the United Nations the relations of our delegation were particularly close, as they always have been, with the delegations from the other commonwealth countries and from the United States, and I should like to say a few words at this point about our relations with the United States.

For the past months we in Canada, and indeed the people of the whole world, have followed with mounting interest the constitutional and democratic processes of the United States in connection with the choice of a federal administration by the people of the United States. In Canada, and elsewhere, I think people were struck by the way in which, once the elections were over, the tumult had ceased, and the television had faded away, the people of the United States closed ranks behind their new administration and took up once again the gigantic task to which destiny has called them at this time.

To Mr. Truman of Independence, Missouri, Canadians owe much and I think will acknowledge a great debt. He met international challenges during the years he sat in the most important office in the most important state in the world with courage and conviction, and he played an indispensable part in laying the foundations which made collective resistance to aggression a reality and in strengthening the sinews of the free world. Now President Eisenhower is taking up this herculean burden. We all know the towering contribution he made to victory in war. It is encouraging today to know that his qualities of statesmanship, and his strength of character, his wisdom and experience will be placed at the service not only of the United States, but of all the free world in our search for peace and security.

The inaugural speech of the new President breathed, I think, both humility and strength. It was an inspiration to all those who were able to hear or read it.

There are no two countries in the world, Mr. Speaker, whose relations are closer and more intimate than those of Canada and the United States. We have our problems and our differences and will continue to have them, problems which arise not only from strictly bilateral questions but also from the position of the United States as the leader of the free world coalition of which Canada is a part. Naturally, as the United States possesses so much the greatest power in that coalition and as its influence is correspondingly, and rightly, greater than others', we others are preoccupied—and at times intensely so—as to how that power will be used and how that leadership will be exercised.

One problem for any Canadian government in its relations with the United States as the leader of our coalition—and it is sometimes a difficult problem to solve—is to know when we should give up our own particular view in the interests of general agreement and when we should persist in our own policy even if it means disagreement of the kind which gives so much aid and comfort to the communists.

In seeking for the right answer to this question, on the occasions when it is presented to us, there are various factors which I suggest we should always take into consideration. The first is our responsibility to our own people which means, when necessary, stating our own views to our friends frankly but responsibly. Second, it means an understanding of the desirability, indeed the necessity, in the face of the menace that confronts us, of maintaining the maximum degree of unity that is possible. Third, it means a recognition of the special responsibility that the United States is bearing in the effort for peace. All this, I suggest, makes it desirable not only that the Canadian voice in international affairs should be frank and clear and in a recognizable Canadian accent, and also that there should be the greatest possible harmony between that voice and the other members of the chorus, especially the leader.

So far as our strictly bilateral relations with the United States are concerned, if it is possible to separate them from the collective problems which we share with others, they are closer, more complex and more varied than ever before. Take trade, for instance. The currents of trade now criss-cross our boundary with the United States until trade between our two countries has become greater than that between any two countries in the world and, indeed, I believe is greater than trade between the United States and the whole of South America. Every state in the United States and every province in Canada has a part in that trade which reaches farther into Canada as our northern frontiers assume greater importance in the industrial development of both countries.

So, Mr. Speaker, we were glad to hear President Eisenhower, in his state of the union message, urge upon the United States Congress the need for basing foreign trade securely on fair and equitable arrangements, and in particular to hear his recommendation regarding the reciprocal trade agreements act and the revision of customs regulations aimed at reducing obstacles to trade. We hope that this will soon result in enhancing the economic strength of the whole free world by securing its foundation in rational trading policies which will benefit us all. Political co-operation and economic conflict are difficult at times to reconcile.

In joint defence, if I may turn to another field, our partnership with the United States is also becoming closer and more complex. Today our common defence requirements are greater than ever before, so great, for instance, that it has been necessary for Canadians and Americans to take their places side by side at lonely northern outposts in Canada as protection against possible aggression which, if it occurred, would not be aggression against a nation but aggression against a continent. It must be expected, Mr. Speaker, that as the advances of modern science and technology increase the speed with which an enemy could strike, so it will be necessary to push our continental defences and our continental development farther and farther north.

In this increasing preoccupation with common defence there is ground for satisfaction on two counts. First, Canadians know that the United States government respects our rights and our natural desire to retain in our own hands the responsibility for administration over all our territory, subject of course to the requirements of collective security. Second, the increasing need for northern defence arrangements in turn requires a further development of transportation, communications and other facilities which are making a material contribution to opening up the wealth and resources of our last remaining frontier, the north.

There is one matter, however, in which our American friends have not been able to co-operate with us at the pace we feel the requirements of the situation demand. I am speaking of the St. Lawrence seaway. We have made great progress during the last few months toward the completion of arrangements for the joint development of the power works in the international section of the river, which are essential before we can proceed with the development of the navigation works, either alone or in co-operation with the United States. All arrangements in Canada have now long since been completed. It remains only for the federal power commission of the United States to issue a licence to an appropriate agency to construct the United States share of the power works for this whole project to get under way. We are waiting for the federal power commission to reach a decision on this matter. We hope that it will be soon, and we are disappointed that that decision has not already been reached.

As arrangements for this Canadian project approach completion, there has been renewed interest in the United States in participating in the construction, the operation and the control of the waterway. Our position, which has already been made public, is simply that we must get on with the entire development just as quickly as we can. The need for power has long been urgent. It must be met, and the St. Lawrence river is the last important source of low cost hydroelectric power available to serve this particular area. Once the arrangements for the development of this power have been completed, and only then, we can discuss whatever new proposal the United States may wish to make for participating in the seaway. It has been made clear, however, that the discussion of any new proposal for sharing this task must not delay any longer the whole project.

Canada and the United States have solved many problems together in a spirit of good will and good neighbourliness, with faith in each other's intentions and purposes. Surely they will be able to solve this one, and soon.

I should like to turn for a moment, Mr. Speaker, if I may, to our relations with Latin America, which are growing in importance, both politically and commercially. It has been the policy of this government to do everything it can to foster that growth and to strengthen our relations with this increasingly important part of the world. The importance and influence of the Latin American countries is evidenced not only by their growing trade but also by their growing influence in the world's councils, especially at the United Nations.

So far as trade is concerned, Latin America has become the third largest trading area for Canada, our total trade with it having risen from $33 million in 1938 to well over $500 million in 1952, almost equally divided between imports and exports. Although our trade with Latin America averages only about 6 per cent of our commerce with the world in general, it accounts for about one-quarter of our trade with all countries other than the United States and the United Kingdom. So one of the principal aims of Latin America and Canada in recent years in particular has been to increase trade in both directions.

We were especially glad, as I think all members of the house will agree, to welcome back to the house our colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who has recently made such a distinguished contribution toward strengthening our political and our commercial relationships with Latin America. From all accounts we have received, his mission was greeted with quite exceptional cordiality in the countries which it visited, and this gives real hope of fruitful results of the kind we are accustomed to securing from the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Graydon: We cannot see him blushing for the tan.

Mr. Pearson: Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about our relations with the commonwealth. It is not easy, of course, to bring the commonwealth neatly into any geographical tour since it is as scattered on the map as it is varied in its peoples. It remains one of the most important associations through which Canadian foreign policy is worked out collectively with our friends. It is an association deep-rooted in our history but sensitive to political evolution, as was pointed out so eloquently in this house the other day. Unlike the United Nations and unlike NATO, it has no formal treaty between its members, no formal machinery or firm commitments of any kind; but it is a source of political, economic and moral strength to all of its members and it is of value indeed to the free world which not so long ago it saved from disaster and defeat. Its tried methods of consultation have survived many perils and are always followed by decisions taken by the respective member governments and by agreement on the part of its respective member governments, if only agreement to disagree, which occasionally happens.

The relations, for instance, between the commonwealth delegations at the United Nations are very close and important and it is significant, I think, to realize that at the recent general assembly of the United Nations there were members of the commonwealth who were in what might be termed almost violent disagreement in their approach to certain items on the agenda; but that that never at any time prevented those members of the commonwealth in such disagreement from meeting around the table at a commonwealth meeting to try to iron out their difficulties in private before they were expressed in public.

May I, while I am on commonwealth relationships, mention one other recent consultation, the conference of commonwealth prime ministers held in London last November. It will be recalled that this conference concluded that—and I quote from its communiqué—> —a more positive policy can now be adopted both by the commonwealth countries themselves, and in concert with other friendly countries, to promote the expansion of world production and trade.

And it emphasized that commonwealth countries—and again I quote—

> —have no intention of seeking the creation of a discriminatory economic bloc; rather their object is by strengthening themselves to benefit the world economy generally . . . the commonwealth countries look outward to . . . co-operation with others, not inward to a closed association . . .

That is from the communiqué at the end of that conference. This conference was no narrow group aiming to improve its position at the expense of or without consideration for others. It was a widely representative meeting seeking to find some basis on which beneficial national action could be taken and from which international co-operation could proceed, but fully aware that such co-operation, to be effective, must have a broader basis than even the commonwealth association.

The effectiveness of this commonwealth conference cannot, of course, be judged finally until more is known of the measures adopted by individual governments following it, and until further discussions have taken place between its members and other governments, particularly the government of the United States, and with various international organizations, particularly the organization for European economic co-operation. The commonwealth countries have, however, taken a useful initiative. In following it up there will have to be co-operation on the broadest possible basis to ease the necessary but not easy adjustments which may have to be made, especially by some of the members of the commonwealth. In this process the Canadian government will naturally wish to play a full and, I hope, constructive part.

Another commonwealth initiative on which I can only touch at this time, but which I am sure will be given consideration later, is the Colombo plan, which likewise was framed in full awareness of the interests of other countries and other organizations, particularly the United Nations. That plan is now nearing the end of its second year and it continues to be one of the most important and constructive elements in our foreign economic policy.

The significance of the commonwealth, however, rests on more than trade and economic development factors. In today's world the effort to bring the condition of men a little closer to the ideal of brotherhood, though an aim which we share with many others outside the commonwealth, can be felt and understood within the commonwealth as something with a special and I think a deeper meaning.

Today the commonwealth, including its Asian nation members, is able to do much in promoting this understanding and co-operation, especially between the west and Asia. The presence at Her Majesty's coronation next June of representatives of all nations of the commonwealth, whether monarchy or republic, from east and west, will be a striking demonstration of this free world-wide association of which our young Queen is the gracious symbol. Furthermore, since the commonwealth embraces territories which, though not yet qualified for membership, are nevertheless advancing toward self-government, it may before long be faced with proposals for the inclusion of new members. The old empire gave way to the new commonwealth, and that new commonwealth in its turn is developing and changing and gathering, I hope, new opportunities of service and usefulness in the process.

This influence of the commonwealth with its Asian members is one reason why Canadians think more about Asia and the Far East than they did a few years ago. Today the Far East is also close to our interest because fighting is actually going on there in Korea, in Indo-China and in Malaya, and it threatens in other places. We continue to do what we can to end this fighting, especially in Korea, as a prelude to a general settlement in that area.

As I said a few moments ago the most recent attempt at the United Nations general assembly to end the war in Korea has failed. But the effort to that end must not stop, and I am sure it will not stop. The guiding principle of Canadian policy in Korea is to continue to do everything possible to limit the present hostilities to the Korean peninsula, and to take advantage of any opportunity for an early settlement of these hostilities by peaceful negotiation. It follows from this that our general attitude in the United Nations general assembly, as elsewhere, is to support proposals designed to facilitate an armistice agreement, and to oppose proposals which, in our judgment, would impede such an armistice.

On the specific question, for instance, of the disposition of prisoners of war, the Canadian position has been quite clear and consistent. We do not believe that any prisoner should be compelled by force to return to what was once his homeland or should be prevented, through any kind of moral or physical force, from so returning.

We consider also that the purpose of the United Nations in Korea remains the defeat of aggression there, and does not include intervention in the civil war in China. So long as Chinese troops act as aggressors in Korea they must be opposed and that aggression, if possible, defeated. This does not mean that we who oppose them, by so doing, are committed to the overthrow by force of the government now in effective control of the mainland of China. As we see it we are engaged not in a national war against communist China or in intervening in a Chinese civil war, but as a member of the United Nations in a police action against aggression.

Such action may be, and in this case is, just as bloody and dangerous and as hard to bear for those who are engaged in it, as any war of old. But it does embody a new and heartening concept of arms used to defend international order and law rather than to defend national interests alone. As such the words "police action" do not I think deserve the somewhat captious and disparaging criticism levelled at them the other night by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

On this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a few words from a magazine which will be familiar to hon. members, though possibly not on account of its comment on international affairs so much as its humour. I refer to the New Yorker. In an editorial in its issue of November 8, 1952, I find these words:

> Korea was undertaken, and stands at this date, as an attempt to honour a prior commitment among nations; that is, the United Nations charter agreement about armed aggression. This fact, without making Korea less bloody, makes Korea unique, and distinguishes it from wars this nation—

The editorial is referring to the United States.

> —has known and fought in the past. When a policeman chases a thief, he does so because of a prior decision of the community regarding felony—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. So far as I can make out there have been half a dozen photographic flashes in this chamber in the last fifteen or twenty minutes. I want to know by whose authority that is done. So far as I know, the Sergeant-at-Arms knows nothing about it. If it is on your authority, that is one thing, and I should like to know if that is so. I should like to know if this is a serious debate or if this is a photographic studio?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): I shall have to make inquiries and advise the hon. member later.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to assure the hon. member who has just spoken that I had nothing to do with these photographic activities that have been taking place.

If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, with my reading of this very pertinent paragraph from the New Yorker magazine, I believe I had reached this point:

> When a policeman chases a thief, he does so because of a prior decision of the community regarding felony. The community of the United Nations, new and shaky and divided against itself, made a decision about aggression, and a bloc of non-communist armies, egged on principally by us Americans, rushed in to enforce the global ordinance in the name of collective security. It may be a mess, and the events leading up to it may lack clarity, but nobody need apologize for police action in support of world belief, and nobody should belittle the word "police". It is a good word, and cannot be dissociated from justice and peace.

Mr. Fleming: What was that magazine?

Mr. Pearson: The New Yorker of November 8, 1952.

Mr. Fulton: Not to be confused with the New York Times.

Mr. Pearson: No, and not to be confused with the observations made by my hon. friend the other night about police action.

Mr. Fulton: In another debate.

Mr. Pearson: Another point of importance in the policy Canada holds towards Korea and the Far East generally is our belief that it is essential that western and Asian democracies should maintain in this matter the highest possible degree of unity of purpose and action. We do not believe, accordingly, that the western powers should press for military or economic measures, at the United Nations or elsewhere, which would certainly not be supported and indeed might be actively opposed by important non-communist Asian states, and which without such support would be less effective in ending the Korean war than in extending it.

This principle has guided our policy in this matter in the past, and it will continue to guide us in considering any such proposals which may be made in the future. We think that such proposals should be considered, not emotionally or from the standpoint of our feelings about the communist regime in Peking, which we detest, but in the light of our United Nations obligation to stop aggression in Korea, and from the point of view of whether their value in that respect is more than offset by the risk of precipitating a war on the mainland of China which, it is clear, would not stop there. It is, of course, very natural indeed to desire to hit the aggressor in new places and with new weapons, but it is also wise to realize that in consequence he may also hit us somewhere else and with new weapons. There are, for instance, about two million people on the very small and rocky island of Hong Kong.

When I talk about Korea my mind naturally goes to a subject which will be of particular interest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), a Pacific security pact. He will recall, as I recall, that when I spoke last December I was not able to deal with this subject. I promised him then I would do so at the first opportunity, and this is the opportunity. I should like to say a few words about the concept of a security arrangement in the Pacific along the lines of the Atlantic pact—a concept which we usually embody in the words Pacific security pact.

I have told the house on a number of occasions that, in my view, the time was not yet ripe for a Pacific pact along those lines. I believe that that is still the case. On June 20, 1952, when I last mentioned the subject in this house, I said we were in agreement with the views of Mr. John Foster Dulles, who had said that he did not think it feasible on any quick timetable to associate the countries of Asia in a security pact in the same way as the countries of the Atlantic were associated. Mr. Dulles is, of course, now the United States Secretary of State. We continue to agree with these views which he then expressed and which I believe he still holds. I hope those who hold other views on this subject will produce concrete and impressive evidence in support of them, so we may be given an opportunity, on the basis of that evidence, to consider whether we should change our minds, and will not merely reiterate that we should have a Pacific pact and that we should do more in that respect in the Pacific.

As I see it, there are three fundamental difficulties which remain—and I have mentioned them before—in the way of the early realization of a Pacific pact on a multilateral basis. The first difficulty—and it is a basic one—is which Pacific states should be included and which should be left out; the second is how to get the various countries which might participate to agree to team up with other potential members; and finally there is the lack of community of interest and purpose and policy among some of the potential members.

Until these problems are solved, and they are certainly not solved yet, a Pacific pact which attempted to be the counterpart of the North Atlantic pact would, I think, inevitably be an artificial creation and might well do more harm than good.

The Pacific, however, is by no means a security vacuum. The United States has security arrangements with Canada, of course, but also with Japan, with the Philippines, with Australia and with New Zealand.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether Canada has shown any interest in the ANZUS pact between the United States, Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. Pearson: I was coming to that. I shall be glad to gratify my hon. friend's legitimate curiosity on that particular subject in a moment. Except for the last two countries which I mentioned, these arrangements have taken the form of bilateral agreements, none of which constitutes anything like a Pacific pact.

It has been suggested by some—and it has been suggested in the last few seconds—that Canada might adhere to the tripartite security treaty, now known as the ANZUS pact, between the United States, Australia and New Zealand. On April 1, 1952, I expressed in this house the opinion that the objections to broadening this arrangement at this time into a general Pacific pact, or indeed the objections to including any additional states in this arrangement, were accepted as overriding by certain countries whose support for such broadening would be essential; and that certainly means first of all the United States. That opinion has subsequently been reinforced by the communiqué issued on August 7, 1952, by the ANZUS council itself, at the conclusion of its first meeting. That communiqué reads in part as follows:

> It would be premature at this early stage in its own development—
> That is the development of ANZUS.
> —to establish relationships with other states . . .

As the ANZUS council itself has taken that attitude not particularly or especially in relation to Canada but in relation to other countries as well, including countries which have a deep and abiding interest in such a pact, I do not think it would be appropriate for us to press for membership at this time.

Mr. Green: Has Canada ever asked to join?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, when the council of an organization issues a communiqué which indicates that it considers it inappropriate to broaden its membership, I think it would not be good diplomacy to inquire about the possibility of joining the council at that particular time.

Mr. Green: Did we ask to join before that?

Mr. Pearson: We made inquiries before that communiqué as to the nature of the proposed group and also whether or not it would comprise more than three countries.

Mr. Green: Yes; but did we ask to join?

An hon. Member: Who is making the speech?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: We obtained, I think, quite adequate information on which to base the policy which we have followed. So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that while we are not members of a Pacific security pact along the lines of the North Atlantic pact, and while we are not now members of the ANZUS association, we are just as much concerned with security in the Pacific as we are with security in the Atlantic; because security, like peace itself, is indivisible. But that does not mean, as I see it, that the expression of this concern must be through the same type of collective security machinery everywhere.

When talking about a Pacific pact it is natural, I think, to say a few words about our relations with Japan which would have to play an important part in any collective security arrangement in the Pacific, and this indicates one of the reasons why it is not easy at this time to broaden the more limited association into a wider one.

Earlier last month our colleague, the former minister of fisheries, Mr. Mayhew, took up his new duties as first Canadian ambassador to post-war Japan; and I am sure that in that new post he has the good wishes of all members of this house. He has got down to work at once, as one would expect of him. His arrival in Japan and indeed the exchange of ambassadors with that country not only reflects the developing significance of Canada as a Pacific power, but it also points up the increased importance which both countries, Japan and Canada, attach to their relations with each other.

Canadian interests in Japan are important and varied. In trade, for instance, Japan has again become one of our best customers. The question of our trading relations with her is a difficult one; and some of us may find it hard to approach the problem entirely dispassionately. But I suggest that we cannot afford to ignore it, for Japan is at present our fourth largest market. Last year we sold Japan $102 million worth of goods, about eight times as much as we bought from her.

Political considerations reinforce these economic reasons for reasonable trading relations with Japan. If she is to be retained as a healthy and reliable friend and ally in that critical part of the world, we and the other free countries must be prepared to join with her in working out satisfactory arrangements for maintaining and expanding the trade on which we are both so dependent, and on which she is especially dependent, as she sees her markets on the mainland of Asia being curtailed or possibly being lost because of political difficulties.

As an associate in the free world community, we look to Japan to adhere to her new-found democratic way of life, and we expect her to make a constructive contribution to collective security in the Pacific. On the other hand, I suppose Japan has the right to look to us to do our part—and by "our" I mean the nations of the western world, including Canada—to show that her choice of friendly association with us is wise from the point of view of enlightened self-interest.

May I say a word now about another part of Asia which has great strategic and political significance at the present time. I refer to southeast Asia, where the situation in some places has taken a turn for the better during the past year. Burma, for instance, has made considerable strides towards the restoration of internal order, and in Malaya the tide of communist terrorism has receded. But in Indo-China which, in some ways, is the most important part of this southeast Asian area, bitter fighting is still going on to keep this territory under nationalist but out of communist control.

In a resolution adopted on December 17, 1952, the North Atlantic council expressed its wholehearted admiration for these efforts and acknowledged that the resistance of the free nations of southeast Asia was in fullest harmony with the aims and ideals of the Atlantic community, and agreed that the campaign waged by French union forces in Indo-China merited support from NATO members. Indeed there is a close strategic relationship not only between events in Korea and Indo-China, but also between events in Indo-China and in western Europe, because events in Indo-China have a very important bearing on France's contribution to the defence of western Europe.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask a question, and may I say I am sorry to interrupt. Does the minister know offhand how many French troops are in Indo-China?

Mr. Pearson: I have not the figures to hand at the moment, but the policy of the French government in Indo-China is to build up the Viet Nam army; the proportion of French to Viet Nam forces is continually being changed in the direction of more national forces. But what that proportion is I cannot say. I suggest also that there is a relationship which we should not forget between possible action from Formosa and possible increased action against Indo-China.

In this tour I have reached southeast Asia, and it is interesting to note that there is now only a relatively small geographical gap between southeast Asia and the area covered by the North Atlantic treaty, which goes to the eastern boundaries of Turkey. And so in a debate of this kind it is possibly not as inappropriate as it might seem to jump from southeast Asia to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Green: Before the minister leaves southeast Asia may I ask him to explain to the house the proposal to set up a co-ordinating committee to co-ordinate defence activities in southeast Asia. I believe press dispatches indicated that the members would be the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Australia and New Zealand, with headquarters at Singapore.

Mr. Pearson: There have been discussions for the purposes indicated by my hon. friend, to set up a sort of strategic co-ordinating committee with headquarters at Singapore, as he has indicated, and including the countries he has mentioned; but I cannot say anything more about that matter at this time. I would not like to run the risk of saying something about it which is still confidential. However, I shall look into it and see what can be said when I wind up this discussion. I shall see if there is additional information I can give my hon. friend.

Mr. Pearkes: Before we leave southeast Asia, may I ask if we have recognized Viet Nam, or have our relations with Viet Nam changed since Christmas?

Mr. Pearson: Yes; an announcement was made I believe last month to the effect that we had recognized the states of Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia as states within the French union. It was not a full-fledged recognition, but rather the kind of recognition which had already been given to them by some 35 other states. I had the pleasure today of receiving the ambassador of Viet Nam to Washington, who came to Ottawa and thanked the government here for this recognition, and pointed out the encouragement that it has given his country and government.

All members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and all members of the commonwealth, I think, except Asian members have recognized Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia.

So far as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is concerned, the feeling has recently developed that the high hopes which we placed in NATO not so long ago are not being realized. The claim is being put forward on the one hand that NATO defence plans are inadequate and are being implemented too slowly to meet the threat which soviet military strength still poses in Europe. On the other hand, some people feel that the effort to achieve the military targets agreed to at Lisbon is resulting in economic weakness and social and political division, and that economic and political co-operation is being subordinated to excessive military planning.

Well, I think myself that both these criticisms are somewhat exaggerated. If NATO has lost some of the momentum of its earliest days and some of the appeal of those days—and I am not denying that that might be the case—it is due, I suggest, to a certain recent tendency, which is a natural one in the circumstances, to mark time during the longish period while the leader of the coalition was changing the guard, and the period between the changing and the mounting of that guard. There was a certain hesitation in NATO activity which extended over some months.

It might also be due to a feeling of lessening tension, as the years go by without attack, and with growing strength on our side which, of course, means heavy defence burdens. That feeling can be dangerous by lulling us into a false sense of security and, indeed, complacency. On the other hand I suggest that it should not be permitted to obscure the fact that the founding and building up of this NATO coalition of 14 nations is, itself, one of the greatest achievements of history in our time. People already tend to take for granted this really revolutionary development which has taken place in less than four years. And so it should be a source of sober satisfaction, though certainly not of complacency, that by the end of 1952 in western Europe, largely because of NATO, the temptation to easy and victorious aggression has been removed, that temptation which is the greatest threat to peace when totalitarian governments are around.

Canada's contribution to NATO forces remains in accordance with the commitments which we accepted at Lisbon. They include 24 warships being made available by the Royal Canadian Navy for antisubmarine and coastal service as part of the Atlantic force, the 27th Canadian infantry brigade which is stationed in Germany as part of General Ridgway's forces, and the two F-86 jet fighter wings already overseas, which will be part of the R.C.A.F. division to be stationed in France and Germany when airfields become available. Canada has also provided, during the past year, considerable help to other member countries by means of our mutual aid program, under which substantial quantities of arms and ancillary equipment have been supplied.

A ministerial meeting of the council was held in Paris in December, not to make momentous decisions but rather to review the progress made since Lisbon on both the civilian and military sides. And there will be another meeting of the North Atlantic council, under present plans, toward the end of April. At that meeting we will consider the 1952 annual review, which was not completed in December. We will also consider steps to be recommended for the rest of 1953.

On the civilian side, the secretary general's report last December described the work, constructive but still in its initial stages, which has been done in the non-military fields of co-operation, although it has not proceeded as far as some of us had hoped when we signed the North Atlantic pact. Work has proceeded in the field of political consultation through the council, which is now in permanent session, work dealing with population problems, civil defence in wartime, food plans and ship production and supply.

In this connection I think it possibly appropriate for me to refer to the problem posed by the floods which have devastated three of the member states of NATO. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization is the formal expression of the North Atlantic community. A community is a group of people who act together in a crisis, and it is in moments of emergency and crisis that each of us is made aware of the reality of the community which links the peoples which compose it.

The flood disasters which have recently struck at Britain, The Netherlands and Belgium aroused throughout Canada and the whole community instant sympathy and concern, coupled with a desire to speed aid to the victims. I think this disaster might well be a matter for consideration by our North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Graydon: Has anybody moved in that direction?

Mr. Pearson: It has been brought to the attention of the council by several members. I should like to say a word on the military side before I sit down. The progress report of the military committee in December showed that great advances had been made in training and increasing the effectiveness of the various national forces assigned to the supreme commander, and in the co-operation between national units and staffs. Substantial advances have also been made in the standardization of international military procedures, notably in signals and in the provision of airfields. At their December meeting the ministers were able to complete the European command structure by approving the military committee's proposal for the establishment of a Mediterranean command. So on the whole there has been a steady advance.

It seems to me rather unfortunate therefore that the tone of the publicity which came out of the ministerial meeting in Paris in December seemed to reinforce this talk of loss of momentum and indeed defeatism. The picture painted in some of the press dispatches emanating from Paris was that of reluctant member countries falling short of the minimum effort required to guard against aggression in spite of dire warnings from various quarters of the consequences of such aggression. If NATO has not done everything that everyone expects of it we should remember that, as in national affairs, an international undertaking of this sort has constantly to fit its plans not only to the capabilities but to the policies and wills of its member states.

It has also to deal first with the most urgent tasks. It was in recognition of this that the ministerial meeting in December directed that more emphasis should be given to increasing the quality of the strength and effectiveness of the NATO forces and the units necessary for their support rather than to the provision of greater numbers of troops at this time.

It has also been recognized that the impact of a collective undertaking of this kind and of this magnitude is bound to have important and sometimes unforeseen results on the economies of member countries, and that political and economic stability must co-exist with defensive strength or else the strongest military force would be but an illusion of security, weakening the very substance which society itself intended to protect.

This does not mean that the governments of NATO countries should forget for a moment that the danger posed by Soviet imperialism to their common heritage of freedom still remains. As I have said, if the threatening cloud of aggression seems now to be less dark in certain parts of the sky over Europe, it is due to the efforts which its members have made to increase their collective strength and unity since the inception of this NATO alliance. The maintenance of the unity and strength of its members and the extension of their joint action into other fields depends, as I see it, in large part on the preservation of our peace and security.

Mr. Speaker, I was going on to discuss other European questions but I gather that the debate should be suspended while other business is transacted.

Mr. Speaker: According to the notice which I received and indicated to the house, it is expected that the Black Rod will arrive shortly.

On motion of Mr. Pearson the debate was adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN DURING SESSION OF HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: While I was out of the chair a few minutes ago the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) brought to the attention of the house the fact that some photographs were being taken from one of the galleries. I should like to say that during the afternoon I was requested by a photographer to allow him to take a few pictures of the press gallery. I told him that I had no objection provided the press gallery wanted the pictures taken. It was also my understanding that the pictures would be taken either at six o'clock, at the close of the sitting today, or at six o'clock tomorrow night or before the opening of the eight o'clock sitting tomorrow. I am sorry there was a misunderstanding, and I hope hon. members were not disturbed when they saw the flashes. May I assure the house that I shall never allow photographs to be taken of hon. members or of the house in session without advising the house and obtaining its approval of the taking of the photographs.

Mr. Graydon: I suppose we will get pictures of the press gallery eventually.

Mr. Speaker: The press gallery are most generous I am sure.

Mr. Weir: I was wondering if the hon. member for Greenwood would care to modify his reference to the pictures being taken when the Secretary of State for External Affairs was making his speech.

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the house that there were no photographs taken of the Secretary of State for External Affairs while he was speaking. There was no photograph taken of any hon. member.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In the light of what has just been said I think I should make it clear that I made no such suggestion. Before I raised any question at all I sought to find out if permission had been given. I actually inquired of a member of the press gallery, who incidentally seemed not to have been advised of this, and I inquired of the Sergeant-at-Arms. It was only when the photographs were being taken that I raised the question. I am grateful for your reply. I cannot in the least understand what the chief whip meant by saying what he did, because I made no suggestion that it was connected with the minister who was speaking.

APPENDIX

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FEBRUARY 11, 1953

Text of note presented by the Canadian Embassy in Washington to the State Department concerning the continuation and extension of United States restrictions on the import of dairy products.

The Canadian ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the Canadian embassy's notes of August 27, 1951, and of January 17, 1952, regarding the restrictions imposed upon imports of fats, oils and dairy products under section 104 of the defence production act of 1951.

The Secretary of State will be aware that these import restrictions were considered at the sixth and seventh sessions of the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade and that resolutions were adopted recognizing these measures to be contrary to the provisions of the agreement.

On the occasion of the announcement on December 30, 1952, of further import restrictions, relating to dried milk products, the Canadian government re-examined the situation resulting from these restrictions. On the basis of this review the Canadian government would again express its serious concern at this infringement of international agreements to which the governments of the United States and of Canada are parties. The government of Canada wishes to call the attention of the government of the United States to the effects of these measures not only on trade between the United States and Canada but also on the broad commercial policy interests of the two governments.

The government of Canada considers that such departures from accepted principles of commercial policy by the leading trading nation can hardly fail to weaken the force of those principles and to damage seriously the development of world trade on a constructive basis.

Both Canada and the United States, recognizing the weakening effect of continued reliance on import restrictions on economies of friendly countries, have frequently encouraged them to seek solutions to their balance of payment difficulties through increasing exports rather than curtailing imports. Actions by the United States government such as that represented by these import restrictions tend to undermine the confidence of overseas deficit countries in their ability to approach a balance by increasing their dollar earnings. These measures may in consequence have the effect of discouraging attempts which might be made by such countries, in the face of great difficulties, to change the general direction of national policies away from reliance on discriminatory import restrictions as methods of achieving international balance.

The government of Canada, accordingly, takes this opportunity to urge once more that the import restrictions imposed under section 104 of the defence production act of 1951 be removed as soon as possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 85 to 104 inclusive of the main estimates, 1953-54, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned yesterday I had almost completed my review of international developments. It had become almost a review of the development of collective security arrangements around the globe. In any such review—and I ended it yesterday with consideration of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—I think it is clear that there is one important area of the world where collective security arrangements are most conspicuous by their absence. I am referring to the Middle East. That is a gap, and an important one, in our efforts to defend ourselves and the free world collectively.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

It is, I think, clear that that gap is not likely to be closed by Middle East defence and security arrangements until the political relationships between some of the countries in the Middle East are happier than they are, unfortunately, at the present. That is only one reason why I think the house will have welcomed the announcement today that an arrangement has been concluded between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Egypt covering the future of the Sudan, which should be a step forward in stabilizing that whole area. It will also have been made clear, I hope, that all these separate collective security arrangements really hang together. They are in a sense interdependent.

Yesterday I finished my discussion by dealing with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. That organization, as we know, is a limited association of fourteen states whose responsibilities under the treaty extend only to a clearly defined area. Meanwhile it is becoming increasingly clear that it is communist world strategy to attempt to drain away the strength of the western democracies by military and quasi-military action in the Far East and other places and by fomenting disturbances in the Middle East and in Africa. The communist threat then is on a global scale, and no exclusively regional approach to that threat will be sufficient. The policies required to meet it must be world-wide too. Asian problems are linked with European problems, as has been so clearly demonstrated in the case of Indo-China.

Therefore, while each of the NATO partners has its own particular and necessarily limited commitments, it is essential, I think, that in the formulation of their plans—and this is becoming increasingly recognized in NATO—they should take account of their implications in the global setting. Before that can be done by NATO, I think it is fair to say that the strength and the progress of the NATO effort will have to be linked in some satisfactory fashion with the move towards greater European unity.

Last June when I reviewed the European scene I spoke in some detail of the treaty constituting a European defence community which had been signed at Paris on May 27 by representatives of the governments of France, the federal republic of Germany, Italy and the Benelux countries. At that time there were reasonable grounds for hoping that the treaty would be ratified and in force by the end of 1952. Unfortunately that hope has not been fulfilled. In both France and Germany hesitations and doubts have emerged and persisted, arising perhaps out of the conflict between hopes for the future and memories of the past. These have resulted in disappointments and delays which have possibly caused more surprise and impatience in some quarters than they should have. After all, the decisions to be made in this matter are not easy ones and they involve renunciations of sovereignty that would have been unthinkable even fifteen or twenty years ago.

Those of us who criticize Europeans for being so slow to come together, and who sometimes are tempted to draw what may be misleading historical analogies in urging them to do so, should ask ourselves how readily we would welcome similar renunciations of sovereignty on our own part. Yet while we should understand the hesitations and the difficulties, we should also, I think, clearly realize the desirability, indeed possibly the necessity, for the right decisions to be made soon so that Europe can combine its strength with ours for security and progress. In the darkly menacing picture of our world today, the ancient quarrels of Europe are not important enough to occupy the foreground. The picture must be looked at, I suggest, from a new perspective.

It is unwise to underestimate the depth and sincerity of the national feelings involved, but what alternative is there to European unity of some kind for defence and, indeed, for Europe's very existence? The question that Europeans and ourselves will have to answer is: Is there any solution more acceptable to the parties concerned than the European defence community which is now before them for consideration?

The concept of a European army is a bold and original one which will not be easy of quick realization. But I think it is the best and safest proposal yet made to bring Germany into the western defence system, without which there cannot really be an effective collective defence of western Europe. That it involves risks I would be the last to deny. Recent evidence of pro-nazi activities in West Germany points up one aspect of this risk. But there is no course in this matter without risk. We live in times which are not calculated to bring comfort to the timid, and a new world cannot be built in Europe on a foundation of ancient wrongs.

Between now and the eventual ratification of the treaties, I am confident that the statesmen of the free world will find solutions to the difficulties which the European defence community faces, particularly in relation to such problems as the Saar and Indo-China.

The latter problem of Indo-China, which we touched on yesterday and which is so important to the free world, was publicly recognized as such at the December meeting of the North Atlantic council; and I think it is at the root of French fears and hesitations in Europe at the present time. Incidentally, yesterday the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked me if I could secure information about the number of French forces in Indo-China at the present time. The figures which I have been able to obtain show that there are 164,500 troops of the French union in Indo-China now, a decrease of some 20,000 in the last few months. That excludes, of course, forces raised locally in that area. In our understandable preoccupation with Korea we may sometimes forget the magnitude of the French effort in this part of the world. We may not even be aware that French casualties during operations in Indo-China have been approximately 90,000 wounded, killed and missing—and of that figure 40,000 have been killed. It is understandable, then, that in the plans for closer European defence unity, in which Germany will participate, the French still have very much in mind the diversion of their defence effort necessitated by the situation in Indo-China.

The additional protocols which the present French government has said it intends to negotiate before it accepts the European defence treaty are meant, in part, to take into account France's overseas commitments and to allay the fears of the French people arising out of these overseas commitments and their relationship in turn to the new commitments that they are being asked to assume in Europe. The strong and expressed desire of the French government to see the United Kingdom associate itself more closely with the European defence community is also, I think, to some extent a reflection of France's feeling that she cannot safely put her whole endeavour into the European army so long as she is committed in Indo-China.

It will be recalled here that the United Kingdom, which is already making such a big contribution to European defence and, indeed, to the defence of freedom generally, has already taken a number of steps in the direction of a closer association with the European defence community. I am sure that we hope that she may find it possible to take even further steps to that end which will not prejudice, of course, her commonwealth and overseas interests and responsibilities.

We, in Canada, have given evidence of our strong concern, I think, with the defence of Europe—which is our own defence—both by the pledge and by the presence of our forces in Europe and by our program of mutual aid. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, by signing and giving parliamentary approval to the NATO-EDC protocol, we have recognized the direct importance to us of the European defence community arrangements themselves. By that protocol, we in Canada assume, as members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, reciprocal obligations for defence along with the European defence community. When we talk about the community and express our opinions on it we are talking about something with which we are already connected by our actions here. There is provision in this protocol for mutual consultations between the councils of the two organizations; provision for joint sessions whenever one or the other deems that desirable; and arrangements for the closest co-ordination on the technical level. In that sense, if these European defence arrangements become operative they will bring Germany not merely into association with the European defence army but into association with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

So, the unity and the defence of Europe are not matters to which we give an Olympian blessing from a distant shore. In whatever final form the European army becomes a reality, its officers and men will have Canadians as comrades-in-arms since we share a common aim, which is the defence of freedom. We shall all be united, I hope, behind the shield of NATO.

Although the European army, then, has not come into being, European integration is making encouraging progress in other respects. In fact, the day before yesterday an event of very real symbolic and practical importance in the development of European integration took place; and I am referring to the proclamation establishing the common market in western Europe for coal under the terms of the Schuman plan, to be followed in April by the common market for steel. By these arrangements a start has been made in eliminating customs barriers and price discrimination in these vital materials over a vast area inhabited by millions of people. Today the European coal and steel community begins what should develop into close and fruitful European collaboration in the economic field.

In the conception and in the working out of this new supranational body, because that is what it is, Europe owes a great deal to the brilliance and energy of M. Jean Monnet, the first head of the high authority of the Schuman plan, and also to the courage and initiative of M. Robert Schuman himself. M. Schuman has shown a remarkable capacity for reaching out to new concepts and bold designs. There are still many obstacles to overcome in the development of European integration, but the very fact that we can speak of the possibility of such integration at all is due in large part to M. Schuman's unsparing efforts to reach an understanding with the neighbours of France beyond the Rhine. I have every confidence that his distinguished successor as foreign minister of France, M. Bidault, will continue this task with equal success.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the picture very roughly and inadequately sketched, and with many omissions, some of which I have no doubt will be pointed out in the course of this debate.

The picture continues to give cause for concern, but in some respects it is, I think, a shade brighter than when I spoke last June. Uncertainty and anxiety still darken the general design. We still live in a world which is groping for unity and peace. It is true, and we have been reminded of it with increasing vehemence recently, that the leaders of Soviet communism are prepared to offer the world "unity" and "peace", but what unity, what peace and at what price? If it is simply the acceptance of Soviet domination, and the relinquishing of our liberty, that price is too high and there can be no bargaining on that basis. For us, and for all people who value freedom at its true worth, that is a price which we shall not pay. But there is no reason for despair. We must, and I am sure we can, with patience and perseverance and the right use of our growing strength, discover another and a better way of finding a durable peace within the framework of freedom.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): This motion is made for the purpose of referring the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to the standing committee bearing that same name. At the outset of my remarks this afternoon I want to deal with one or two matters which I feel ought to be the subject of discussion, deliberation and decision by that committee when it is convened. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the standing committee on external affairs is unique in our parliamentary institution, because it is one of the few committees which are privileged to deal with the estimates of a department. It has, of course, taken on a unique characteristic in that the estimates are largely discussed in that committee rather than in the committee of the whole house.

I want to point out to the house, if I may, one of the things which I feel the standing committee on external affairs ought to deal with at this session or the session immediately succeeding. It is a matter which arises all too soon, and concerns the revision of the United Nations charter itself. When the San Francisco conference brought in its recommendations, which were later embodied in the charter of the United Nations, there was a section which called for review, change and amendment of the charter itself.

If we turn to article 109, section 3, we find these words:

> If such a conference has not been held before the tenth annual session of the general assembly following the coming into force of the present charter, the proposal to call such a conference shall be placed on the agenda of that session of the general assembly, and the conference shall be held if so decided by a majority vote of the members of the general assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the security council.

During the San Francisco conference discussions, there were a number of proposals made with respect to the length of time the charter should be in force before it came up for review. In the first draft of the conference decision, I believe the time was set at fifteen years and later changed to ten. Of course, there is another proviso which gives the general assembly the right, at any time prior to the ten-year period having expired, to call a conference for this purpose if a two-thirds majority of the members say so. I believe that public attention will be riveted upon the expiration of the ten-year period because there is in Canada, as there is in many parts of the world, a great desire to have the United Nations charter reviewed and brought up to date. I believe that if there ever was an organization that ought to keep abreast of the times, both as to its deliberations and as to its structure, the United Nations is that organization.

I know that much water has gone under the bridge since 1945. When the charter was set up it was designed to work in a one-world structure. Instead, it has been compelled to work in a two-world structure, split right down the middle. This fact has brought many ramifications in its trail, including the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as well as other branches which one need not mention at this stage. I believe it must have become evident to all that there is a great need now for the whole charter to be reviewed in the light of the circumstances in which we find ourselves today. For that reason, I am going to make this suggestion, and I make it because Canada gave the lead before and Canada should give the lead again.

There was before the San Francisco conference the Dumbarton Oaks proposals relating to the organs of that United Nations Organization. In the recommendations of the Dumbarton Oaks committee, which were the basis of discussion for the San Francisco conference itself, there was a tiny chapter concerning economic and social co-operation. When the Canadian delegation got to San Francisco they began to work upon the enlargement of those proposals, and upon what they thought was an important part of the work of any world organization, the economic and social aspect. Within a few weeks of the summoning of that conference, the Canadian delegation brought forward a rather enlarged draft proposal which was then submitted to the conference itself. The basis, of course, of the conference deliberations was the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and it was necessary to have a good number of nations support the Canadian contention that these proposals ought to be considered along with the Dumbarton Oaks proposals themselves. That was done, and the bases of the discussion of economic and social co-operation in that conference were not only the Dumbarton Oaks proposals but the Canadian draft as well. The Canadian draft was much more extensive, more practical and certainly much more effective.

It finally came to pass that the San Francisco conference voted to include very largely the Canadian proposals rather than the draft Dumbarton Oaks proposals in the United Nations charter. In other words, there were more words, more expressions and more clauses in that section of the United Nations charter put there by Canadians than by any other nation in the world. Those of us who were delegates felt very proud at the time. It gave us some pride in having given a lead to the world in connection with that matter. I believe the time has come for this Canadian parliament to give a lead again, a lead which I feel is very appropriate from the standpoint of Canada herself.

First, I should like to see the standing committee on external affairs deal with this matter, and if it is felt that there should be a special committee set up, drawn from the membership of the standing committee, that is all right, because I have no particular ideas about the structure of the committee. I think no time should be lost in having the committee go over the entire charter of the United Nations, review it thoroughly, and have full discussions and deliberations with respect to it so that well before the expiration of the ten-year period the Canadian delegation at the United Nations Organization meetings will be able to come before the world and to say: We have given study to the revision of this charter; these are the results of our deliberations and our careful consideration of it; and we as a delegation present it to the United Nations for approval, rejection or amendment.

I am going to make that suggestion as a help to our Canadian delegation. I do so with one thought especially in mind. If the United Nations Organization is worth preserving—and with every bit of conviction at my command I say that it is—then it ought to be worth the time of the members of this house who are interested to give study to it so that it would be an improved and modernized version of the charter that would be presented by the Canadian delegation, at the appropriate time, to the general assembly of the United Nations Organization. I leave that thought with the house in the hope that it will be regarded as a constructive suggestion aimed at improving not only the United Nations Organization itself but also as a step towards permanent peace.

I also want to deal, if I may, with another matter which came before the standing committee on external affairs on previous occasions. I refer to the passport situation. I am sure that matter will be dealt with again during the present sittings of that committee. I think it was in 1950 that the question of passports to those who wanted to leave this country for purposes that, to say the least, were rather suspicious, came before that committee for consideration. There were a number of members on all sides of the house who took an active interest, and the committee itself showed keen concern with respect to the deliberations that ensued. For instance, in the report of the 1950 standing committee on external affairs one finds these words:

> Your committee recommends that the Department of External Affairs actively re-examine at once the question of the issuance and revocation of passports granted to Canadian citizens whose loyalty to alien systems of government take priority over loyalty to ours.

That was a matter that was debated in the committee. Later on in the report of the 1952 committee on external affairs, a follow-up of that question was made:

> That ways and means for dealing more effectively with Canadians whose sympathies appear to lie with countries behind the iron curtain and who travel freely between Canada and those countries should be kept continually in review.

I want to bring that matter to the attention of the house at the moment because I think it is one which is engaging the attention and the concern of a good many Canadian citizens today. I was interested in hearing what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said or is reported to have said at Guelph in connection with the matter of witch-hunting. I think all members of this house who are possessed of good common sense will agree that witch-hunting is not a thing that is part of the character of our own Canadian people. It is not the kind of thing that Canadians are in favour of. Moreover, it is a thing that I think Canadians will revolt from at every opportunity. But I want to say this. While emphasizing the statement that there must be no witch-hunting, we must be careful that we do not lean backwards in the other direction. I think there should be a close vigilance with respect to those who have been, during these years, deliberately blurring the loyalty line between Canadians and other nationalities abroad who have a different way of life from ours. I think it would be unfortunate if we encouraged that kind of blurring of Canadian loyalty in the days that lie ahead by any statement that would indicate that we are not in any way fully vigilant with regard to the problem in that connection.

In the United States, of course, there are something like six stages which must be gone through before a passport is issued. Perhaps those stages would not be applicable to our own nation and I am not suggesting that they should be. But there has been a tightening up of the regulations across the line, and perhaps this committee ought to consider how far we in Canada can go to meet the situation and at the same time preserve all those elements of freedom to which we have from time to time declared, and will continue to declare, our adherence.

I must say that I have nothing but contempt for Canadian citizens who are prepared at any time to sell out their own team for another. I think that a Canadian citizen has a right either to play ball with his own land or to go to some other land where he thinks he can play ball better. In the United States not so long ago—and I am sure it could apply to many other countries as well—in the realm of sport—in basketball, I think it was—a national furore arose over the fact that men had sold out their own team. Still I think it is important that we bring to the attention of the Canadian people that there are in Canada those who are selling out their own team. In all fairness to those others who play on the team and to whom we owe a greater responsibility than we owe to those who would sell us out, I think we ought to consider carefully just how far we allow passports and the great privilege of Canadian citizenship to go to those who admit, in some instances, or who have admitted that they owe a higher loyalty to another government and another philosophy of life than they owe to our own.

I think that those are matters which ought to come before the standing committee on external affairs. It seems to me that the time has come when we must give careful consideration to how far we can go in connection with this matter. When I make those suggestions I want to make it perfectly clear—and I think everybody in this house would want to have it made perfectly clear—that our elementary desire is to see that the freedom of the individual is a thing that always must come first; but I want to point out that there comes a time when we perhaps have to consider whether or not the freedom to destroy freedom itself has to be curbed to the extent required.

I just want to pass on, if I may, to another point which I think has been dealt with by the external affairs committee in previous years and which I think deserves attention again on this occasion. In previous years, during the sittings of that committee, the question of the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation came up for review. In one of the reports of that committee it was indicated that some closer liaison should be effected between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's international service, which beams their programs to other countries, as you know, the external affairs department, and the minister responsible for the policy which is beamed to those other places.

I know one of the steps the government took in connection with that was to take the Hon. Jean Désy, who is one of the very able diplomats in the foreign service, and to put him on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's international service. When the external affairs committee is set up, Mr. Désy ought to be brought before that committee. We ought to know what is going on in connection with our international service. There are certain questions that come to my mind which ought to be made clear to the Canadian people. First of all, what is the over-all policy and purpose of the international radio service? Second, how closely is it tied in with the minister and the Department of External Affairs? Third, to what minister are Mr. Désy and his staff responsible, and what department determines the policy so pursued? Fourth, if he is serving two masters in connection with this matter, then the committee ought to know. Fifth, does our policy mesh, for instance, with the "Voice of America" program and the British Broadcasting Corporation's international service? In that connection we ought to be told whether those services are being duplicated and where the duplication arises. More than that, if the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's international service is attempting to follow both of them, it will have to be a masterpiece, because they do not always follow each other. It is important because this country may have to give the lead in seeing that there is a synchronization of the type of beaming of programs that goes on to other countries behind the iron curtain. It would be unfortunate if there was a babel of voices reaching to those very vulnerable areas to which we are trying to direct our attention today.

In addition to that, what do we hold out to Europe? In these international broadcasts do we hold out the lure of containment or liberation, or what is our exact line of policy which we hold out to them from time to time? What steps has the government taken in line with our NATO policy of unification to get closer to the single voice idea? For instance, I should like to see the committee have the opportunity of hearing the recordings of these international broadcasts that are beamed to certain countries. We should have some samples of the programs so recorded because, it seems to me, in all our domestic work we watch the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation very closely. But I do not think anybody in the house has the slightest idea what is beamed by our international service to other countries of the world. I think that is important. It is something that ought to be opened up. The public ought to know exactly what the facts are. We can then decide whether the policy which is being pursued is an effective and apt one for Canada to pursue at this time.

I come to another point that I think will have to be considered by the standing committee on external affairs. This is a matter which has arisen by virtue of the Auditor General's report. On page 21 of the Auditor General's report the Department of External Affairs comes in for some comment. I wish to take the time of the house to read the paragraph which deals with an alleged irregularity. It is No. 49 in the Auditor General's report on the page I have just mentioned. This is what Mr. Watson Sellar says:

> Who is a Canadian citizen within the ambit of vote 90? That is the question which causes attention to be drawn to an unusual case which resulted in a $3,620 charge to that vote, which reads: "To provide for relief of distressed Canadian citizens abroad". Annually, parliament provides a sum ($20,000 in 1951-52) for the relief of Canadians who, for one reason or another, are destitute in foreign lands and are regarded by Canadian representatives abroad as persons who, in the interests of Canada's international repute, . . .

I emphasize that:

—who, in the interests of Canada's international repute, should be assisted or brought back to Canada. No person may, as a right, demand financial assistance, and ordinarily advances take the form of loans, though recovery is not invariably effected.

Among those assisted in 1951-52 was a naturalized Canadian of Polish origin who returned to Poland in 1949 at the expense of the Polish government. Subsequently he applied to the Canadian legation in Warsaw for financial assistance in order that he might return to Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A good citizen now.

Mr. Graydon: I continue:

He undertook, in writing, to repay any money advanced, after his return to Canada. Pending the obtaining of an exit visa, the legation made advances for hotel accommodation and meals. On October 27, 1951, the Polish government informed the legation that no exit visa would be issued, and on November 16 further advised that prior to leaving Canada the man had applied at the Polish legation in Ottawa for admission into Poland as a repatriate. This statement was confirmed by the man himself on November 23. Nevertheless, advances continued to be made to cover expenses until January 19, 1952. In all, the man's expenses were paid during the period from July 1, 1951, to January 19, 1952, but it is the propriety of the payments after November 23 which is of concern.

Perhaps the amount for all his hotel accommodation and meals ought to be in question as well, but the Auditor General does not mention that at this time. Certain questions come to one's mind, and they will of course have to be answered by someone in authority in connection with this. First, what definition does the department use as to who is a Canadian citizen when relief is extended to Canadian citizens abroad, because this seems to be an unusual situation for the ordinary Canadian citizen to find himself in? Second, the committee should be told who is the man that received this aid in that year and how much he obtained. In addition to that, what is the state of collections generally in connection with this account that is from time to time utilized for Canadian citizens abroad? When the government is answering that question I should like to know why this particular person who got this money wanted to go to Poland in the first place and what reasons he gave to the government here for wanting to go. If I may say so, it ties in with what I have said before, that we must not allow a lot of looseness in people running all over the world under the cloak of Canadian citizenship and then finding themselves hard up and the Canadian government having to put up money. That does not sound sensible to me. But on the other hand I am only asking a question so that the government will have time eventually to answer it.

In addition to that I should like to know why the Poles were anxious to get him behind the iron curtain. They paid his fare to get him there; that is what they did. We did not pay his fare for him to go there, we just looked after him once he got there. The next thing I should like to know is, why were his expenses paid from November 23 to January 19, 1952, after he and the Polish government had said that he had applied at the Polish legation in Ottawa, not as a Canadian going over on a trip but as a Canadian who wanted to go back to his own country and stay there as a repatriate.

I would think that, having looked at that situation and having in mind what the Auditor General has said, it would seem that whoever that party is—I hope we shall not be denied too long being told who he is—he has perfect justification to laugh up his sleeve at the government here for being able to extract so much money, so easily for so little. I think it is important that this matter be investigated at once. After all, if I may be permitted to interject something facetious in the middle of a most serious comment, if horses on the payroll by proxy is bad, I do not think we want any Warsaw sympathizers to get on the gravy train as well. I think that is something we had better be careful about. I want to leave that with the minister for his rumination and consideration. I think I may say that, as far as the committee is concerned, these are four matters which I fancy will take up some time when it finally convenes.

I want to come, if I may, to the question of our position in Canada with respect to the change of government in the United States of America. I am afraid I cannot congratulate the minister upon his exhaustive review of United States policy in the Far East, but I do congratulate him upon his dexterity in tiptoeing through the tulips on some of these things. I think he did that very well. I want to deal with these matters, perhaps not very exhaustively, but because I think it is important that some reference be made in our Canadian parliament to the situation brought about by the change in the United States government.

Along with others in the house I was in the United States during the presidential election campaign. I think those of us who were there gained an indelible impression of what happened and of the factors and features of that campaign, things which did not always reach beyond the borders of the United States. United States policy seems to me to have stiffened rather materially as has been indicated by President Eisenhower in his state of the union address, and I think it may properly be said that this is a direct result after all of the feelings of the United States people as one found them expressed during the election campaign.

At that time some newspapers said that there were three main things concerning the United States people prior to and during the election itself—Korea, corruption and communism. I am not going to attempt to deal with domestic matters in the United States because it is none of my business, nor perhaps are some of the foreign policy decisions that may be made from time to time; nevertheless, I think there is some indirect interest and sometimes a very direct interest in Canada in what is going on, particularly in the minds of those who are legislating with respect to the leadership of the world, as the United States is now doing.

One could see during that election campaign that the patience of the United States people was wearing pretty thin. After all, that is a nation which does not take too well to stalemates. More than that, I think one can say that its national emblem will never be a snail. Against that background I think we have to assess the position in which we find ourselves now in connection with the stiffening of United States policy, both in Europe and in the Far East. After all, we must not forget that the United States people have been pretty well provoked, pretty well annoyed and pretty well exasperated by the stealthy under-the-table aggression of the Soviet republic down through these years.

I think one can very readily understand the position that they took. After all, General Eisenhower as President of the United States is not just entirely responsible to the British nor is he entirely responsible to Canadians, nor is he entirely responsible to other countries. He is partly responsible to his own people as well, if I may put it in that way. As you know, his own people demanded something more firm and positive in the way of policy in the interests of peace itself. I think we can connect the ending of Formosan isolation with that desire for positive action which was indicated so far as the state of the union speech was concerned.

I think most of us in this parliament, in looking at the situation from the commonsense point of view, will say that a firm and positive policy, rather than a policy of hesitation and appeasement, brings peace rather than war. I think there are two good illustrations of that to be found without going very far back into history. One of the first is the Berlin blockade when there was no hesitancy and no appeasement. A strong and firm stand was taken at that time. In addition there is the NATO alliance, which the minister endorsed again this afternoon, and which of course we all endorse. That is another example of what I mean. The NATO alliance was a pretty positive action to take. It was a stiffening of our position right across the board. There were many people who thought it was dangerous, that it might provoke war; but instead of that I think most of the apostles of peace today will say that NATO has had a very great stabilizing effect and has been responsible largely for the advance we have made toward a peaceful world.

One hears from time to time about the provocation caused by United States moves in the Far East and the like; but we should not forget that if we want to find real examples of provocation all we need do is to follow the sordid story from the absorption of Poland at the close of this war down through the peace in the Balkans, to Hungary, Czechoslovakia, China and then to Korea. We find there a period in which provocation reached its highest level in the world's history.

While there may be criticism from time to time of the position which the Americans take on matters of such a delicate nature as this, nevertheless I think it is important that we realize that Canadians had better not be too thin-skinned about the whole question of our relationships in the free power community. I think that at no time should we be hesitant about putting our best foot forward and raising our voice in consultations with respect to the formulation of policies. But after the state of the union message was delivered by President Eisenhower I was not one of those who thought that there was anything in that speech for the Canadian people or the Canadian government to be worked up about. I think what the minister has said in his speech rather indicates that perhaps we are not alone in holding that view. It seems to me that so far as Canada is concerned we have some responsibility in connection with the question of consultation, if you like, because there will be many Canadians who will say that we were not consulted about the deneutralization of the straits between Formosa and the Chinese mainland.

There may be perfectly good reasons why we should have been consulted; but on the other hand let us not forget that, despite the fact that the minister never seems to have entirely agreed with us, we on this side of the house have been calling for a Pacific pact for a long time. When speaking yesterday the minister said that he would like to have somebody point out to him a good reason why we should enter into such a pact at this time. Then he went on to raise four very large roadblocks which I suppose he figured nobody would get over. I want to say to the minister, however, that, so far as a Pacific pact is concerned, if there ever was a good argument in favour of having a pact so that nations with an interest in the Pacific theatre could have a chance to put their feet under the table, consult each other and talk things over, it can be found in the very fact that there are Canadians who think we ought to be consulted on matters such as Formosa and other places, and I believe the opportunity to do that would come best through having a Pacific pact so that the opportunity would be there. It would be agreed upon and it would be a right.

In the light of the present situation, with a stiffening of United States policy in the Far East and elsewhere, I think it is essential for Canada, despite the denials of the minister, to have a voice, to be consulted and to sit in on policy decisions in the Pacific in the same way as we sit in on policy decisions on the North Atlantic area. I should like to point out something else in passing, and this is one thing that does sadden me a little so far as the question of division in approach and policy is concerned. Since the change in Russian policy last summer—at least it was an announced change—as the result of which they emphasized the need of dividing the free world and conquering it, there is one thing that we have to be very careful about in this parliament and elsewhere. We must be careful not to play any part in dividing the free world. I think we in this chamber have a responsibility to make sure that we do not play any part or contribute in any way to a repetition of the Tower of Babel performance of biblical times.

There are enough people trying to divide the free powers without our helping them. I think that Canada has a very important role to play in bringing together the divergent views—and there are divergent views—among those who are numbered as our most valuable allies and friends. I hope that as time goes on we shall play our full part in bringing these friends together and that statements will not be made in this house which will only give comfort to a prospective enemy in the days that lie ahead. I have read the remarks made in the British House of Commons by one who would like to be the leader of the Labour party in that country. I must say that I cannot see how Mr. Aneurin Bevan can be regarded as a man who is bringing great international statesmanship to the consideration of these matters. From what I can gather his statements mean rather the introduction of international mischief amongst the free powers of the world rather than constructive international statesmanship. I would hope that as time goes on we in Canada will make sure that our criticism is at least constructive and designed, so far as it is possible for us to do so, to bring our friends together instead of making it more difficult for them to work with each other.

I come now to the European defence community which the minister mentioned yesterday and again at the end of his speech this afternoon. I know that when Mr. Dulles made his off-the-cuff speech with respect to the European defence community there were those who rushed on the platform, on the radio and to the press with violent denunciations of the ultimatum that the secretary of state of the United States had delivered to the European powers. I would think that today an ultimatum is distinctly out of place among friends, and if I thought that Mr. Dulles had given an ultimatum I would be the first one to criticize his position.

I think in all fairness, however, we have to consider that when General Eisenhower was a candidate for the presidential post in the election campaign of last October in the United States he made this statement:

> If at the end of seven years after world war II and $33 billion of foreign aid the central problem is as far from solution as it is today, I think something has been wrong in our thinking. Certainly we must find a substitute for the purely temporary business of bolstering the free nations through annual handouts. This gets neither permanent results nor real friends.

What Mr. Dulles said in his off-the-cuff speech, as it is often referred to, was in my opinion designed to give some encouragement and impetus to the advancement towards unity of the free nations of Europe. It may have been that some of the words he used were not the type of words that would be used by experienced diplomats, but nevertheless they were designed as a reminder that the 1947 Marshall plan had as its original purpose the helping of the European countries to get their own houses in order.

I must confess that I was very interested in what the minister said and most encouraged that he took such an optimistic view of what had been done in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, because I think that kind of news will be most welcome to everyone in the house. Nevertheless one of the things that I think we have to recognize is that there has been a new upsurge of nationalism in certain countries committed to the European defence community, and in addition a restatement of United States principles and policies towards the European defence community was perhaps felt to be in order. It seems to me that after the visit of Mr. Dulles and after his speech there has been a quickening of the movement towards unity in Europe. I hope that will be the sole result of the speech he delivered and the visit he made to Europe after delivering his speech.

I think one of the things we shall have to recognize in connection with the European defence community, something which I imagine is at the root of the difficulties, and which Mr. Dulles no doubt found out in his visit, is that the United States cannot be isolationists in trade matters and international in defence matters at the same time. I think that is a fair statement to make. It seems to me that those things do not go hand in hand. As the President, then the Republican candidate, said in October, certainly we must find a substitute for the purely temporary business of bolstering up free nations through annual handouts. After free nations have been put on their feet or at least after they have been given an opportunity to proceed, then of course there must not be roadblocks put in their way to further advances. They have the problem of trying to find markets for the things which they manufacture and have to sell. The result is that some people in the United States say that Europe drags her feet in defence; but some in Europe could say that the United States drags her feet as far as trade is concerned.

I was very pleased indeed, and I know that the minister was because he mentioned it in his speech, that in his state of the union address President Eisenhower indicated a desire, and a movement which he was then initiating, to free some of the channels of trade from some of the annoying barriers that have existed. The difficulties relate not only to tariff barriers but to administration obstacles as well. Those of us who have had some experience with administrative obstacles in so far as trade with the United States is concerned will relish and welcome that approach and the legislation which the President has in mind.

While we said at one time that the military was the prior consideration in connection with the European defence community, and it still must have top priority, nevertheless—and we have discussed a number of other things as well—we have to add trade as part and parcel of the building up of our North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It is now assuming a position of vast importance, as is indicated by the various conferences on trade which have taken place.

In concluding what I have to say in respect of the European defence community, I think we are very much indebted to various statesmen from the countries in Europe and the United States who have borne so much of the burden in the heat of the day while welding out something which most people thought could never be done. But it is being done; and in the preliminary steps, because after all I suppose these are only preliminary steps, the free world has made progress. I hope that Canada will continue to give every possible attention to having it progress and progress further. There are only three nations—our own, the United States and the United Kingdom—who have given legislative approval to the protocol for admission of the European defence community into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I hope that it will not be long before the remaining nations do likewise. I can understand, as I am sure the government can understand, the feelings of the United States government when, after we had rushed in, endorsed, and given legislative approval to that protocol last July, in the belief that we would not have time to wait for another session of the house as it was urgent, we find that in February of this year the protocol has not been endorsed. We should have a frank discussion on both sides about what must be contributed and what must be done, and Canada must proceed, as she has done before, to give every possible support to this growing and healthy international child which we hope will become a man of peace in the days that lie ahead.

I now wish to deal with a matter which is close to the hearts of all Canadians, since it has to do with our own international family. In June the coronation will take place. There will be a family reunion of a very unique character, a family reunion that has no parallel in the world's history. I was looking over the statistics in connection with the British commonwealth and empire itself and I was very interested in the figures concerning those who compose that commonwealth and empire and who will be represented at that great coronation ceremony in London in June. I was interested to learn that out of 613 million, the total number of people in the British commonwealth and empire, there are 454 million in Asia. In Europe there are about 51 million, in Africa 79 million, in Australasia 11½ million, in Oceania 511,000, and in our own hemisphere a matter of something like 16 million people. I think those figures tell us a story all their own. As far as I can gather, we have three-quarters of the commonwealth and empire living on the continent of Asia where perhaps some of our greatest hopes and some of our greatest fears in connection with the future lie. I think it is important to consider that situation now, when the coronation is about to take place. There lies perhaps the germ of hope which in the future may bring a co-operative world peace which some of us have been dreaming of for so long.

In addition, when we are speaking of the problem of colour, and it is spoken of sometimes in connection with these matters, only one out of every five members of the British commonwealth and empire has a face of the colour we find in this parliament here. I think that indicates too the breadth of the association and, more than that, the great strength and power for the future which rests in the commonwealth and empire itself. I am sure that everyone will agree that the coronation is a revitalizing force for peace and stability, not only in our part of the world but in other parts as well.

I come now to a matter in connection with our relations with the motherland and with other parts of the commonwealth itself. I have not discussed it with anybody so nobody has to take any responsibility for what I say in connection with it—if they ever do anyway. I want to put this idea forward because it is a matter which affects parliament and it is a matter which will, of course, affect the next government of Canada perhaps more than it will affect this government. That is the reason I do not want to direct my remarks to the present government—because you never can tell—

An hon. Member: You do not need to prophesy.

Mr. Graydon: I want to mention the matter because it has been very close to my heart and because I think it may commend itself, and I hope it will commend itself, to the house membership at large. I presume that the twenty-second parliament of Canada will open in 1954. When it does open, it will be a new parliament. I fancy there will be a lot of changes in that parliament, but regardless of that I think it is a good time to make a start on what I suggest. I know that there will be a mass of constitutional thickets, brambles and underbrush to be cleaned out before this can be done, but where there is a will there is a way. I would hope that in this case there would be both a will and a way. I know that officialdom will look askance at the suggestion I am going to make, and perhaps that will go farther than officialdom. In any event, I believe that, at the opening of the first session of the twenty-second parliament of Canada, this country should arrange for Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret to come here and open our parliament at Ottawa. This suggestion is not made, as the Governor General himself will know, with any reflection upon him because he has every opportunity to open and close parliament on other occasions.

I feel there is something worth while in the suggestion of having a member of the Royal Family come here and open our proceedings once in a while. I know that we cannot always have Her Majesty come here because she has other duties to perform. At that time she will have gone to the antipodes and other parts of the empire. I am sure that in Canada there is a great desire, particularly amongst the young people, to have Princess Margaret come here. I should like parliament to take that suggestion into consideration, and when the time comes to extend an invitation to that very popular, charming and talented member of the Royal Family to initiate our legislative proceedings.

I am going to close my remarks, if I may, by simply quoting from the last paragraph of a broadcast I made only a few weeks ago. It reads as follows:

> In the midst of this uneasy peace the coronation of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second stands out as a significantly peaceful event. It is a family affair and the commonwealth and empire family will present, as it gathers together on that historic occasion, a unique picture against the blurred and tense background of international relations. In this family circle will be men and women of good will drawn from every continent of the world, for the commonwealth and empire girdles the globe. Because it is a voluntary international family embracing in its membership peoples of diverse colour, nationality, race and creed and with a vast majority of its members who are Asiatics, it may well turn out to be the most powerful link in bringing permanent understanding and harmony between the Occident and the Orient of any comparable organization in the whole of the world's history. The crown that will be placed upon the head of the charming and talented Elizabeth next June may be the focal point of a new and successful approach towards a bridging of the gap between the east and west, which badly needs to be bridged if stability is to be the keynote of world relations in the days of tomorrow. We live in dangerous and challenging times but the clouds about us are not without their silver linings. The prize of lasting peace is a precious trophy and Canadians will continue to strive with all their might and main to possess it.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): As my time is limited, Mr. Speaker, and the time of the two preceding speakers was not, I shall have to deal more directly with the various matters with which I shall try to deal. I shall only deal with one or two points arising out of the speeches of the minister and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon).

I should like to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) upon his election as president of the seventh session of the United Nations general assembly. It is some time since he was elected, but this is the first opportunity I have had in speaking across the floor to extend my congratulations to him. I am one of the fortunate few members of the house who have had the opportunity of being at the general assembly with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I know how well he is liked and apparently how well he is appreciated by the other delegates there. He has, if he does not mind my saying so, many of the qualities that make for a good presiding officer. He has that pleasant appearance and disarming smile, and yet enough iron in his make-up to be tough when such a policy is required.

The house listened to the minister yesterday with keen interest. Perhaps they had hoped he would refer to some of the things to which he did not refer. I should like to comment on many of his statements, but as I have already said I have not the time. I shall, however, refer to one or two. I do agree with him when he says that political co-operation and economic conflict are difficult at times to reconcile. I believe that is a definite understatement. I believe that co-operation on the military and political levels will ultimately prove impossible unless we have co-operation at the economic level. In recent times we have seen that our efforts at co-operation on the political and military levels could be retarded by the economic actions of one member in the co-operating group.

During the course of his remarks the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to Japan. He said something which, because of a personal association, I am going to refer to. At page 1854 of Hansard for February 11, 1953, he said:

> Political considerations reinforce these economic reasons for reasonable trading relations with Japan. If she is to be retained as a healthy and reliable friend and ally in that critical part of the world, we and the other free countries must be prepared to join with her in working out satisfactory arrangements for maintaining and expanding the trade on which we are both so dependent, and on which she is especially dependent, as she sees her markets on the mainland of Asia being curtailed or possibly being lost because of political difficulties.

I am in complete agreement with the minister when he makes that statement. The reason I am referring to it now is that for years during world war II I tried to get the government of this country to deal more democratically and with greater justice with persons of Japanese origin who were unfortunate enough to be residents of Canada at that time. I did not have any great success. In speaking in this house on May 14, 1946, I said:

> They fought in the last war when Japan was our ally.

That is the Canadian Japanese.

> Let us not forget that there may be another war, and when the wheel of fate stops at the next war, the Japanese may again be our allies—who knows? If so, these little brown devils of today will be the little brown heroes of twenty-five years hence.

It really has happened much quicker than I expected. I refer to the fact that I said Japan would again be our ally.

It is only seven years and while it is not yet war—well, it is a cold war—they are our friends and allies. To the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), under whose department matters concerning these people come, I would suggest that the time is not yet too far past when justice should be done to some of these people whom we despoiled during the last war.

Mr. Speaker, most of what I shall have to say at this time will be concerned with President Eisenhower's announcement in his state of the union speech to congress; and in that regard it will differ from the speeches of the two hon. members who preceded me in this debate. I refer to the announcement that the seventh fleet would no longer be used to prevent attacks on the Chinese mainland by the forces of Chiang Kai-shek operating from Formosa. I was rather amazed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), by a certain amount of dexterous footwork, avoided reference to this question altogether. I was equally amazed when the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) took the minister's silence as meaning that the government agreed with the attitude of the official opposition in regard to this matter. If I heard him right he said that in Canada it was not really accepted as a question of very great importance. All I will say to that statement is that the hon. gentleman cannot have been reading the editorials in Canada's newspapers since February 2 when President Eisenhower made his statement.

Mr. Graydon: I did not say that, if the hon. member is quoting me.

Mr. MacInnis: I did not quote verbatim; I said "if I heard the hon. member right". If the hon. member wishes to repeat what he actually said, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. Graydon: I should be glad to do that. I perhaps could not repeat what I said word for word, but as I recall it what I said was that I did not think it was something that Canadians ought to get all worked up about. Those were the words I used.

Mr. MacInnis: Canadians get worked up only about things over which they are concerned deeply. In my opinion no statement by the head of a government in recent times has caused so much consternation throughout the democratic world as has the statement made on February 2 by President Eisenhower. It caused consternation throughout the world because there is great fear that this move by the government of the United States may be merely the prelude to further action that can have no other end but the extension of the war in Korea and ultimately, we all fear, war on a world-wide scale.

It will be remembered that the Truman order with regard to Formosa issued on June 27, 1950, operated in two ways. The first sentence of that order was not the protection of the Chinese mainland from the nationalist forces. The first sentence in that order was:

> I have ordered the seventh fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa. As a corollary to this action, I am calling upon the Chinese government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland.

So the seventh fleet was instructed, first of all, to prevent any attack on Formosa and second, the nationalist government of China was instructed to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland of China. The new United States policy is to allow the nationalist government of China to carry on operations against the mainland. It is reversing the first part of the Truman order, but I think it goes further than that. I think it encourages the nationalist government of China to carry on operations against the mainland. The seventh fleet is still to be used to prevent attack by communist China on Formosa.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Eisenhower did not say that.

Mr. MacInnis: He did not say that it would not do it, and he did not rescind that part of the Truman order. He only rescinded the first part of the order. If he did not rescind it, it is still in effect. I do not see how that sort of policy can be carried out by the United States without becoming involved in the Chinese civil war. Last Thursday—that is a week ago today—the Secretary of State for External Affairs, elaborated on a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the previous Monday in reply to a question asked by me. I am only quoting part of the sentence but it does not misconstrue what the minister said. As reported at page 1639 of Hansard he said:

> . . we do not think that the defence of Formosa, which has not been assumed by the United Nations, should be confused with the defence of Korea, which has.

[Mr. Graydon.]

I agree absolutely with the minister. But neither should the civil war in China be confused with the war in Korea. The Canadian government and the Canadian people have assumed obligations in connection with operations in Korea, but neither the Canadian government nor the Canadian people have assumed any obligations in connection with the civil war in China, and we should not allow ourselves to become involved in any way in that war.

I am drawing attention to this matter because in my opinion there is danger that the recent action of the United States government may involve us in that struggle. I therefore say that now is the time to tell the United States government that we do not intend to become involved in the Chinese civil war.

In this connection I wish to quote some statements on the Korean war made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and gathered together with some other statements and papers by the Department of External Affairs in a booklet entitled "Documents on the Korean Crisis". Speaking in Windsor on November 15, 1950, the secretary of state drew attention to a statement made by him in the house on August 31 of that year. I shall read that statement into the record:

> I would like to emphasize also that it is not the purpose of this government to support any course of policy which will extend the scope of the present conflict in Korea, a conflict which should be confined and localized if it is in our power to do that; and, if not, a policy which should avoid giving anyone else an excuse for extending it.

That is the end of the quotation taken from Hansard. The speech continues:

> That has been the policy of the Canadian government from the outset of the war in Korea. It is still our policy today.

That was in November, 1950, and I would hope that that is still our policy in February, 1953. If it is not our policy we have not heard of any change. I continue to quote the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the Windsor meeting as they appear in the same document:

> The same desire to localize the conflict and prevent it from spreading has dictated the policy which we have followed and will continue to follow over Formosa. We appreciated the necessity for action which President Truman took on the 27th of June in ordering the United States seventh fleet to defend Formosa, because it seemed to provide a way of neutralizing that island during the course of the fighting in Korea.

If we are going to accept without protest the new policy of the United States in this matter, then we should be ready to change our former policy, because it is likely that a change will have to be made.

For the benefit of my friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who does not think that this is a matter of great concern to the people of Canada, may I be permitted to quote excerpts from a few editorials. The first one is from an editorial appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 2. It had to do with reports of the new Eisenhower policy, and was written before the statement itself was made in congress. It is entitled: "A new Formosa policy" and reads:

> Clearly, then, the suggested new Formosan policy carries the danger of a third world war; and it is not surprising that the nations allied to the United States have shown some alarm at the Washington report. It may be that President Eisenhower has convincing evidence that the Mao government would topple quickly and would get no substantial aid from the Soviet union. If so, however, no inkling of this important knowledge has reached either the general public or the governments of the western world. They will wait with some anxiety for a clarification of the news.

The Globe and Mail is not a paper that is given to editorializing on questions like these, without having some real foundation for what it says. The Globe and Mail thinks President Eisenhower believes that with a little help from the outside the communist government in China would fall. If anyone has such ideas in his mind he should get rid of them at once because they are merely wishful thinking. Dictators do not get control of governments to let go of them that easily, and assistance or interference, as happened in the Soviet union, will merely make the communist regime in China more secure, rather than less.

We have another forthright editorial in the Financial Post of February 7, pretty nearly a week after the event. Some mention was made by the member for Peel of Bevan or Bevanites. I do not think the Financial Post can be accused of Bevanite leanings, at least I have not noticed any tendency in that direction up to the present. But the Financial Post is no less outright in dealing with the new Eisenhower policy than was the Globe and Mail. The editorial is entitled: "Easy, Mr. President, Please", and it goes on:

> We foreigners didn't feel very comforted by the recent foreign policy pronunciamentos of Mr. Dulles. But President Eisenhower's first foreign policy move is disturbing. It is to unleash Chiang Kai-shek's Formosan forces and let them "raid" the Chinese mainland. At least one unhappy thing about this decision is that it widens the rift between the United States and its allies.
> Its military advantages will be insignificant compared with its political disadvantages. It can only strengthen Asian suspicions of the United States and the west.

And any policy that does that—if it does only that—is a policy to be avoided. I continue:

> Chiang Kai-shek's forces on Formosa, however they may appear to the American "China lobby," are widely regarded as American puppets. They are certainly so regarded by the people of Asia far outside communist Chinese ranks. If they have any military value they owe it to the Americans.
> The price we must pay in order to inflict trifling pinpricks is to give the communists a perfect pitch for new talk about American aggression.

There again I say that even that, if it could be avoided, should be avoided. The editorial continues:

> Political pressures at home have driven Mr. Eisenhower into a policy move whose unfortunate consequences will be felt abroad. Canada cannot be expected to applaud or approve, though we have nothing for it but to acquiesce.

I do not believe we should accept any policy formulated by the United States, or by any other member with whom we are associated in Korea, without protest if we do not agree with that policy. I continue:

> The weakness which has bedevilled the Korean operation has been impatience. For this it is not fair to blame only United States leaders. They are under great pressure from a people who are naturally impatient. The Russian and Chinese leaders have the double advantage of followers whose patience has been proverbial and whose likes and dislikes don't matter anyway since they may not be expressed. Dealing with such people, the crying need is for western patience.

When a paper of the standing and political leanings of the Financial Post writes an editorial such as the one I have just read it indicates that the concern in Canada is very great indeed. I now come to my last quotation, and it is taken from the Calgary Herald of February 3. I am quoting only an excerpt from the editorial:

> We hope the Canadian government will remind President Eisenhower of these things, and more important, tell him that Canada wants no part in any "incidents" out of Formosa. Canada should warn the United States that this nation will not have itself involved in any fights started by or resulting from action by Chiang Kai-shek. And it should make its position clear immediately as undoubtedly other friends will be doing. For the new President seems determined to chart a course on a potentially stormy sea.

Despite what the hon. member for Peel says, I am firmly convinced that the sentiments expressed in these editorials are the prevailing view in Canada of the new United States policy. My interpretation of the news from the United Kingdom is that the newspapers there, after allowing for time to study the implications of the new Eisenhower policy have been even more forthright in condemning it than have the Canadian papers.

I think the danger most people see in this new policy is not just the fact that it allows the nationalist forces on Formosa to invade he mainland of China; it is very doubtful f they can do that, anyway, without assistnce from the United States. The danger people see is in the probability that this particular decision will extend the war, and also the fear that it is only the first in a eries of decisions that will involve the world n world war III. I think there is plenty of evidence of this already, such as the proposed blockade of China. In yesterday's Evening Citizen there was an Associated Press dispatch from Washington that General Omar N. Bradley was reported to have told congress Tuesday that arms shipments to Formosa are being stepped up.

That is merely an indication not only of what is likely to happen but of what is really happening. The government of the United States seems to take the position that because of its wealth and power it can make decisions involving the other nations associated with it n fighting for freedom merely by informing hem of intended action.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke in reply to my question in regard to he new Eisenhower policy on February 2 ne said that the Truman policy in regard to Formosa was undertaken by the United States without consultation with other countries, and therefore President Eisenhower was merely following that precedent in applying his new policy to Formosa without consulting other countries. I do not deny hat the United States undertook the Truman policy without consultation with other countries, but I will say that the nations fighting n Korea at that time were not as closely ntegrated as they are now. I doubt if any nation had troops there at that time except he United States.

I must insist that a united, integrated foreign policy cannot be carried out if one of the countries concerned insists on its right to take separate action whenever it feels like it. Such a policy, if persisted in, can lead only to mistrust and bitterness and ultimately to utter confusion. It can benefit no one but the common enemy, in this case he communists. Because of that, Canada should state in firm words that cannot be mistaken that it will not be bound by this or any other action which is taken without consulting it. That is the only way in which Canada can act as an independent nation.

As one views this new United States policy ne is driven to the conclusion that it is a new kind of isolationism. After world war I he United States withdrew from the efforts hen being made to put an end to war. It went into isolation. After the second world war—this was referred to by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) when he was dealing with the action taken at San Francisco to form the United Nations—the democratic world was heartened when it saw that the United States was taking a leading part in building a system of united action. Under the policy announced by President Eisenhower a week ago there would seem to be indicated a new form of isolationism. The United States government is making decisions in isolation, decisions which involve other countries, on policies which they have no share in framing.

So far I have dealt only with the military possibilities resulting from the change in United States policy. I do not think the danger of this can be overemphasized. But there is another angle, the political effect on the nations of Asia resulting from any aid given to the forces of Chiang Kai-shek. By the people of Indo-China, Malaya, Indonesia, Burma, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, Chiang Kai-shek—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the hon. member have any objection to Russia giving aid to communist China?

Mr. MacInnis: My answer to that is that we are not associated with Russia. What Russia does in that regard is no concern of ours. It is something we cannot help. We may object to it, but that is all. But we are associated with the United States in carrying out a policy which we hope will free the world from communism. Because we are associated with the United States we have a special interest in what the United States does.

As I said, by the people of Indo-China, Malaya, Indonesia, Burma, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, Chiang Kai-shek is considered a reactionary, corrupt remnant of the old regime in China. They will have none of him. I am sure that if it becomes a matter of joining forces either with Chiang Kai-shek or Mao Tse-tung, they will go with the Chinese communists. That has been demonstrated already in China. If aid would have saved China from the communists, then it would have been saved by the aid which the United States poured into that country. But the aid that was poured in so lavishly went to the communists in China because the people of China had lost faith in the corrupt government of Chiang Kai-shek.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have they faith in the communists?

Mr. MacInnis: Evidently they have.

Mr. Graydon: The missionaries have not.

Mr. MacInnis: Neither have I, but we are not dealing with that subject. If we are going to deal with these matters we must deal with them realistically, on the basis of what has happened, and not on some preconceived ideas that we may have in our own minds.

Most of these countries I have mentioned are on our side. If we associate ourselves with Chiang Kai-shek we are most likely to lose their support, and in the struggle going on today their support is important. These people will not believe that the Chinese nationalist leader has any interest in liberating enslaved peoples. They know that he was undemocratic, reactionary and corrupt when at the head of the government of China, and they know that he is still undemocratic, reactionary and corrupt.

It must be remembered that the struggle against communism is not mainly a military struggle, it is essentially a battle of ideas. The crucial battlegrounds of Asia are not China and other communist-held territories. Those territories have already been lost. The important battlegrounds in the field of ideas are the countries of Asia which I have mentioned already. We must be careful that we do not lose their support in trying to gain or use the support of Chiang Kai-shek who has demonstrated already beyond the possibility of a doubt that he has no following among the masses of the people of Asia.

It is said that the government of the United States is under great pressure from its people to take quick and decisive action to end the struggle in Korea. We understand that this is so. We can also appreciate their feelings because the United States has borne the brunt of the fighting in Korea up until now. But it should not be forgotten that some of the other allied nations fighting in Korea are also fighting communism in other fields. My fear is that the policies proposed at the present time in the United States will not shorten the casualty lists of United States forces but will rather lengthen them.

There are moves on foot to have the people of South Korea accept a greater share of the fighting there; and if we are mentioning people who have borne the brunt of the fighting in Korea I think we should remember the South Korean forces, because these are the people above all people who have fought and suffered in this war, and I doubt if they have any say in it at all. It is my opinion that we shall never get out of Korea, even if we win a military decision there, unless we are able to build a stronger South Korean government. I mean a government that will have more spontaneous support from the people of South Korea than I think the Syngman Rhee government can get. In doing that the allies will have to do more in rebuilding the economy and the political life of South Korea than they have done to date. Rebuilding of the political, economic and moral forces of South Korea in my opinion is not secondary to our military efforts but should be put on an equal basis.

May I try to sum up what I have just said in a more definite form. If these or other changes in United States foreign policy result in the expansion of the Korean war or the beginning of a general war, Canada will be involved regardless of what we may do. It is no use taking a lofty attitude and saying that this country is not committed. It might have been possible to take such a detached attitude 50 or even 25 years ago, but not today. Precipitous action by any of the major powers, the United States, Britain or Russia, could, in the explosive world in which we live, involve us all in an atomic war.

This group believes that Canada has a major responsibility to make its views known and to exert the strongest pressure it can bring to bear to prevent the United States from taking any step which will bring us any degree closer to a general war. The minister in his statement on Thursday and in his speech of yesterday and today has not made it clear that that has been done either in respect of the new policy already announced with regard to Formosa or in respect of the new policies which are being actively considered by the leadership of the Republican administration. I referred to them before the blockading of the China coast, the active support of the Chiang Kai-shek forces in an effort to invade the mainland. These and other policies were openly and strongly advocated by President Eisenhower and his supporters during the presidential election campaign.

I say that in all these matters it is not sufficient for Canada to make its views known after the event. Once bombs have been dropped it is too late to make representations. Once a war has started it is too late to lodge protests. Canada must not accept the type of treatment which the minister indicated was accorded in connection with the changes in policy on Formosa. It is not good enough that Canada should be informed. Canada must be consulted, and if she is not consulted then strong protests must be made. The United States government must be told ahead of time what policies we will support and what policies we will not.

That brings me to the representation which should now be made to Washington. Canada, with the unanimous consent of every shade of political opinion represented in this house, has taken its stand in the cold war on the side of freedom. But we should also nake it clear to the United States govern-nent that they cannot trade on the funda-nental unity which exists in the free world y counting on support from us in every dventure into which their political exigencies t home may lead them.

In particular it should be made very clear o the United States administration now that they are contemplating policies which will ead to a reopening of the Chinese civil war, r which may lead to an extension of the Korean war, they will enter any such adven-ure alone as far as Canada is concerned. We should most strongly urge them not to do nything which would make it difficult for s to continue our close association with nem in the various collective security neasures to which we are both committed. n the fight for freedom Canada is prepared o take her full part, but only on a basis f being consulted at every step. Being told not good enough.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. peaker, I have always felt that the reference f the external affairs estimates to the stand-ng committee on external affairs prior to neir study in the house is a good arrange-ent. I think the results over the years have roved that it has been a time saver for arliament and that it also gives the members the committee an opportunity of sum-oning witnesses to give testimony, with the esult that far more real facts are brought it than otherwise would be the case. Con-equently it is a pleasure for me to support ne motion moved by the Secretary of State r External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) yesterday.

I also believe that the practice of using ne motion to launch a full-dress debate on xternal affairs is an excellent one. Each me the minister leads off with a statement nat provides us with considerable back-round for a successful debate. His speech yesterday and today was no exception in is respect. I wish to compliment the inister on his desire each time he leads off give the house a comprehensive picture of orld affairs and of the position which anada takes on major issues around the orld. However, I believe the speech he egan yesterday and finished today lacked mething of the comprehensiveness and etail that has characterized his efforts on rmer occasions. There were many things ne minister did not mention, things that I ersonally would have liked to hear.

I realize, of course—and I want to be bsolutely fair in anything critical I say of ne minister—that he is in a little different osition this year from the position he has een in other years, in that he is not only ecretary of State for External Affairs in Canada but he is also president of the United Nations general assembly. Naturally he cannot speak in this house merely as the minister of a department of the Canadian government. The general assembly has not finished its work this year. From what the minister told us yesterday it appears there are still quite a number of important and perhaps contentious matters to come before that body. So I suppose we could hardly have expected from the minister at this time a speech that carried his usual vigorous and straightforward statements.

At this point I should like to say that I did not have an opportunity of speaking on external affairs in December. That was the last occasion, I think, on which external affairs were discussed by this house. Consequently I would like to take this opportunity of congratulating the minister on his election as president of the general assembly. It is not only recognition of the minister's great ability; it is also a compliment to him and to the country which he represents. I have followed his work in New York about as closely as I could at this range, and I want to compliment him on the patience, restraint and skill he has exercised in the very difficult position which he accepted. I know something of what is entailed in the presidency of that body, having attended on two different occasions; and I can understand how easy it would be to lose one's sense of restraint and perhaps patience.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having performed what I consider to be a very pleasant task, I would like to pay particular attention to some of the matters which were mentioned by the minister yesterday and today, and maybe some matters he did not mention. I am not going to criticize the minister for not having gone into the new United States policy any farther than he did; not at all. But it might have been useful to the house to have heard something from him about the raising of the protection of the island of Formosa by the United States fleet. Perhaps at the end of this debate, when the minister replies, he may say something about it.

The minister said that in spite of the rejection by communist China and North Korea of the Korean armistice resolution, nevertheless he thinks the effort which was made in the assembly was of great significance and importance as a demonstration of unity and solidarity. I think, myself, that it was a tragedy that the Indian resolution did not receive unanimous endorsation. India's efforts to get that endorsation should be lauded, and those who have given their support to the Indian resolution have demonstrated that they do in reality want peace in the world. I suppose, too, that after all these years of experience with Russia and her satellites we should know by this time that those countries will sabotage anything that the peace-loving nations try to do to establish peace in the world. I thoroughly agree with the minister when he said that the Indian resolution had the effect of showing very clearly where the will for peace now lies, by exposing the insincerity of communist declarations that they wish to end the war in Korea. I suppose that we must keep on trying very patiently although it does get somewhat discouraging to try to deal with thugs when we are wearing only kid gloves.

Now I would like to mention briefly the decision of the economic and social committee to recommend a $25 million grant for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries. We think that is a very worthwhile contribution. While it may be looked on as too little in the light of present circumstances, I would like to emphasize my belief that the best help we can possibly render to the underdeveloped countries and underprivileged people of the world is that kind of help which will make it possible for them to help themselves. When we are inclined to criticize smaller contributions for, let us say, technical assistance, we should keep that feature in mind. I did take considerable satisfaction out of the fact that the economic and social council had proposed that $25 million grant and that the committee had decided to pass on the recommendation to the general assembly. I am hoping that when we next hear from the minister he will be able to tell us that the assembly has considered the recommendation favourably and arranged to make the grant. Technical assistance, let me repeat, is one of the best ways of helping underdeveloped nations.

At one point in his speech the minister said, and I quote from page 1849 of Hansard of February 11:

> For the past months we in Canada, and indeed the people of the whole world, have followed with mounting interest the constitutional and democratic processes of the United States in connection with the choice of a federal administration by the people of the United States.

That is the end of the quotation I wish to use. It is only natural that all the people whom the minister speaks about, in this country and elsewhere, would be keenly interested in the United States elections; but I did think that at different times during the campaign there were altogether too many Canadians in rather high positions who were quite outspoken in their support of the Democratic administration as against the Republican party and its bid for office. It occurred to me at the time, when I read some of the statements that were being made, that we certainly were not laying a very good foundation for happy relationships with the new government in the United States if it happened to be a Republican government. I think we have to be careful of some things especially when, as the minister emphasized later on in his speech, we are so closely associated with our neighbours to the south and will have to do business in pretty close association with them for many years to come.

The minister paid tribute to Mr. Truman, the former president of the United States, stating that Canadians owe him much. I believe that every man should be given his just measure of credit for the things he has done and for the efforts he has made on behalf of humanity. Consequently, in so far as Mr. Truman did meet international challenges during the years he occupied the presidential office, I join with the minister in paying tribute. But, Mr. Speaker, when the full history of these times is written, when all of the facts have been brought to light, there will be many people who will say that the past two presidents of the United States have been the great betrayers of humanity. To be charitable, as I ought to be, I will say that some of those decisions made at Yalta and Potsdam, some of the secret understandings and agreements that were had with Stalin, may have been made in good faith; but the very best anyone can say is that they indicated a most serious lack of foresight and judgment on the part of those two presidents. It may have been that they listened too much to unsound advice from men like Alger Hiss, but they will not on that account be able to escape the judgment of history.

President Eisenhower found it necessary to tell the United States people and the world in his inaugural address that his administration would not be bound by certain secret agreements reached between the Democratic administration and Russia. It is true, of course, that the President did not indicate specifically what those agreements were, but it would not be very difficult for us to guess what he had in his mind.

This brings to my mind the fact that when I returned from Europe in 1948 I was invited to speak at various places across the dominion, and I told some of my audiences then about strange things which I had seen and which I had learned had arisen out of the Yalta or Potsdam agreements. I expressed then my conviction that there had been perfidy in high places, and that those who held in their hands the destinies of millions of people in the world must have allowed themselves to be unduly influenced by perfidious men who had infiltrated into high official positions where they could make their influence felt quickly.

At that time I was ridiculed by certain sections of the Canadian press for having the temerity to say such a thing. Perhaps my stand then, Mr. Speaker, was to some extent vindicated by what the President said about secret agreements in his inaugural address on January 20. He said that there have been altogether too many secret agreements over the years. To some of these doubtless can be attributed the state of chaos we have today. President Eisenhower, while he was president of Columbia university, is reported on one occasion to have said he hoped no future president of the United States would hold in his hand the power of bringing on wars.

In his speech yesterday the minister said something about our relationship with the United States. He declared in forceful terms that it is desirable that the Canadian voice in international affairs should be frank and clear, and in a recognizable Canadian accent. He said also that there should be the greatest harmony among that voice and the other members of the chorus, especially the leader —the leader being the United States. I look upon this as a sound and sensible statement. But let me say to the minister that I hope in our desire that our voice be in harmony with that of the leader, we do not yield too much in the effort. The United States recognizes in Canadians a quality that they admire very much, because all too often they have not got it. I was very pleased to see in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen a short dispatch from Washington by the Reuters news agency headed "Rely on Canada for Realism". I should like to put this little dispatch on the record because it illustrates what I started out to say:

> The Washington Post says today the United States can usually rely on Canada for realism in foreign affairs as well as plain speaking when the occasion demands it.
> "It is significant that President Eisenhower's state of the union message, particularly the passage on Formosa, aroused in Canada little of the uneasiness reported from parts of Europe," it adds in a leading article.
>
> This does not mean Canada would support a unilateral blockade of China by the United States, but it does mean she would be sympathetic with a carefully thought-out plan to break the Korean deadlock, the newspaper says.
> "It is important for the United States to cultivate a close understanding (with Canada), not only through consultation on foreign affairs, but also through expediting such other matters of common concern as customs simplification and the St. Lawrence seaway bill."

I again express the view that in all our relations with our good friends in the United States we should be realistic and vigorous, and not be afraid to talk up to them when we feel we ought to do so. Let us continue to be realistic, I say, and let us always have the courage to stand up to the United States for what we believe to be right, even if we might be a little out of harmony with the general chorus; always realizing, of course, that the people of the United States are our friends and we have great admiration for them and for their wonderful country.

In the United States there is a great need for realism in trading relations. I do not believe the average citizen of the United States, let alone Canada, fully realizes what has been happening in that country over the past 30 years. There has been a conscious and persistent effort to make the United States economy self-sufficient. Some years ago the United States took over the leadership from Germany in the field of substitutes for such things as jute, mica, camphor, cryolite and many other things one could name. In so doing they have thrown a monkey wrench into the gears of the economies of other nations. I do not mean to say they have done so consciously at all. We are not blaming the people of the United States for the marvellous things they have done in their economy. I think the important thing is to understand what has been done, and then adjust our own thinking to these facts.

We do believe, though, that it is essential that the United States realize how important it is to make every effort to balance her trade with the rest of the world. We feel that way because in no other way could the other nations hope to get the dollars with which to buy what they need from the United States. I support the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in their timely reminders of the past few days to our friends in the United States about their trade practices. Just here I feel that I should like to voice one warning. In the development of our future trade relations with the United States, I believe we have to be especially careful about the conservation of our own resources. We have not paid nearly enough attention to this phase of our relationship in the past.

Now I should like to say a few words about Korea. The minister has said that the most recent attempt in the United Nations assembly to end the war in Korea has failed, but efforts to that end must not stop. He declared also that the guiding principle of Canadian policy in Korea is to continue to do everything possible to limit the present hostilities to the Korean peninsula, and to take advantage of any opportunity for an early settlement of the hostilities by peaceful negotiation. He said that it follows from this that our general attitude in the United Nations general assembly and elsewhere is to support proposals designed to facilitate an armistice agreement, and to oppose proposals which in our judgment would impede such an armistice.

On the specific question of the prisoner-of-war exchange, I believe Canada and the United Nations took the only reasonable stand that could possibly be taken. I agree entirely with the minister on that point; but I should like to say just a word now on the general situation in Korea and the United Nations policy in connection with the whole tragic episode. When I spoke on the same subject, I think it was on October 22, 1951, I said that we believed every effort should be made to work out an armistice in Korea, and that nothing should be left undone to bring about the cessation of hostilities in that country. At the same time I indicated that the United Nations should lose no time in laying down a policy which would make possible the early termination of the war in Korea by military or other action if armistice negotiations did fail.

It was my view then that the military effort of the United Nations should not be limited to the country in which the aggression takes place. I stated further that when the United Nations decided to take action against an aggressor nation the area of their activity should be limited to nothing less than the area used by the aggressor nation or nations for the concentration of troops and supplies and as a jumping off place for the continuation of aggression. I agree with General MacArthur in that regard. The general was later relieved of his command, if you recall, by President Truman. Moreover, I took the stand then that when we had the communists on the ropes, we should knock them out.

Well, almost a year and a half of further see-saw fighting and armistice negotiations have taken place since then. The situation for us—I am speaking of United Nations—has deteriorated. Our enemies are in a much stronger position in Korea now than ever they were. Many of our people have become discouraged under the UN's hopeless policy of a limited war for an unlimited time. What is worse, a good many Canadians have been led by some periodicals to believe that the policy of a limited war for an unlimited time is being used as a safety valve against unemployment and depression in the western countries. On one occasion I quoted such a statement from U.S. News and World Report. While it may be an unfair statement that the policy is being followed as a safety valv against unemployment and possible depres sion, it is something that is being said; an of course the people are always affected b those things that are printed in the periodicals How long can we hold the people stead under the kind of policy which the UN i following in Korea?

By resolution, may I remind you, th United Nations declared that China is a aggressor. When I say that I should lik gently to remind the hon. member for Van couver East (Mr. MacInnis) that a blockad of the Chinese coast would be perfectly justi fied under those circumstances; I refer to th situation under which she has been declare an aggressor. I ask this question: Wh should we or any other country allow wa materials to be moved and shipped to Chines ports, to be thrown at our troops in Korea That is something the hon. member for Van couver East did not consider. Let me jus say one thing further. When he quotes th Financial Post to support his stand, may say that I should imagine the Financial Po might be in favour of limited war for a unlimited time. Perhaps that thought did nc occur to him.

However, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that b resolution the United Nations declared tha China is an aggressor. But at the same tim UN officials would not let MacArthur bom Manchurian bases because they said entailed too much risk. I should think tha the time to think about risk would hav been before the United States led the Unite Nations into Korea in the first place. should like to ask a question for the cor sideration of all hon. members. What woul we Canadians think if Russia should attac Canada and the rest of the world said th war against the Russians should be fought i Canada? I say that the war against th Russian aggressors in that case should b fought in Russia or wherever it would b possible to get at and destroy the source c their aggressive military strength. But s many today in top UN positions are sayin that the Korean war must be fought sole in Korea, the very country we say we ar trying to liberate. I mention these thing because I maintain that we must change ou policy and get one that will make it possib to terminate the Korean debacle and then rehabilitate that most unfortunate wa shredded country.

I was criticized in 1951 when I said agreed with some of MacArthur's views c Korean policy. Since then I remind ho members that there have been two Unite Nations commanders who have led th United Nations armies there, and both them have been retired. On the occasio

f the retirement of General Van Fleet just ne other day, he is reported to have made ome rather startling statements to the press. hat was on the eve of his farewell to his oops. I should just like to quote briefly om what General Van Fleet said as eported in the Christian Science Monitor nder date of February 10:

Van Fleet said the allies lost two chances for ctory in Korea, disclosed his own most heart-aking decisions as commanding general, and gave hat he feels are the two greatest achievements of ie eighth army under his leadership.

A little bit later in the article, in answer o a question that was put to him by some ewspapermen, this is what the report states:

Q—If there have been lost opportunities in Korea, hat do you feel was the most serious?
A—When the communists over extended them-lves in May, 1951. When we broke communist efence in fall of 1951.

Van Fleet revealed that he feels that the nited Nations had the communists on the opes twice during 1951, but failed to deliver ie knock-out blow. The reason appears to e that the Far East command refused to onsent to delivering that blow. In this eport that came from Seoul, dated February), from which I just read a moment ago, should also like to quote this paragraph:

Authoritative sources say that for more than a ear Van Fleet has not been able to launch a single attalion attack without consent from the Far ast command in Tokyo—and that Van Fleet him-lf was heartsick when UN and U.S. decisions ice held him back from closing with the reds r decisive battles in 1951.

Mr. Speaker, a general of Van Fleet's ature would not make such statements and nplications without good reason nor without thorough on-the-spot knowledge of the facts the situation. Added significance is given Van Fleet's views, in my judgment, by eir close similarity to General MacArthur's vn views.

I mention these things to underscore what said previously, namely that the United ations must quickly adopt policies for uccessfully terminating the Korean struggle that country can then be rehabilitated as on as possible. A limited war for an nlimited period of time is not the kind of ing people can remain united under for ery long.

We must remember that almost three years ve passed since the first act of aggression. ie minister himself this very day told us at communist world strategy is to drain vay the strength of the free nations by very means they can. A policy of limited ar for an unlimited time is the very best ay of letting them do it. Just take a look the over-all casualty figures and the costs the Korean war to date, and I think you ill get a revealing picture of how the United Nations are being weakened as a consequence of these nearly three years of half-hearted conflict on our part and of cunning attrition on the part of the communists. The signs of a stiffening of United States foreign policy since the change in administration gives the best hope of the adoption of a realistic policy in Korea.

The minister gave us today—and I am thankful for it—a report on NATO and the European defence community. I was glad that he indicated some of the real problems which the European nations are facing in their efforts to build defensive strength against the great dangers that are hovering over them. We ought to know all that we can learn about those problems. The more we know, the less inclined I think we would be to criticize.

I think we must be especially sympathetic with France. She finds herself torn, as the minister said, between present threats and dangers on the one hand, and hopes for the future and memories of the past on the other. It is only natural, I suggest, that France would have many misgivings about seeing Germany rearmed. It is only reasonable that France would consider long and carefully the risks she runs by throwing her whole strength into the European defence effort. Much of her strength has been sapped through the fighting in Indo-China. The minister pointed out that 90,000 casualties had been suffered by the French in that continent, 40,000 of whom were dead. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is no mean loss to any country.

France has plenty of trouble. I wonder sometimes whether the United Nations have given that country the help and the encouragement she deserves. I recall that when the conflict first broke out in Indo-China there was not very much encouragement to France from any source, and particularly from the United Nations. I am very happy to see that the sympathy is rising.

I cannot think of any possible alternative to the European defence community, if Europe is to be saved. As a consequence I think Canada should do everything possible to help the countries of Europe achieve their goal. It should stand shoulder to shoulder with them in building a united defence for freedom. I do not think any one of us would want to see Canada not shoulder her responsibilities. I am satisfied too that if the people of our country know the facts they will be prepared to make the right decisions and stand behind the government in any position it takes to bring about peace in this world.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I intend to direct practically all my remarks to the situation in the Pacific. No doubt the minister will not be surprised by that decision. However I am sure he will forgive it in the case of a member who is lucky enough to live on the Pacific slope, even though in that part of Canada we are closer to this very serious situation in Asia than our fellow Canadians in the other provinces.

Mr. Knowles: You live there, but you spend most of your time here.

Mr. Green: Unfortunately. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the most important fact in world affairs today is that the United States has adopted a new Asian policy. Some ten days ago President Eisenhower announced this policy which is designed to put the communists, both Chinese and Russian, in a position where they and not the people of the free nations are the ones who will be worried about what the next move will be in world affairs.

In other words this new policy is an attempt to seize the initiative from the communists, and from now on the United States apparently proposes to call the tune in Asia. This new policy seems to be extremely popular in the United States. One can understand that, because it is in line with the character of the United States people. In any event we can take it for granted that the policy will be pursued in the days that lie ahead.

How does Canada fit into this picture? What stand will she take? In the first place, may I point out that it seems obvious to me that the Canadian government is floundering, not knowing whether to approve or disapprove of this new Asian policy. The minister gives every indication that he is still thinking in terms of the former United States policy, which was one of merely holding the line in Korea. If he will recall, he pointed out yesterday in the course of his remarks that aggression should be fought on the ground where it was committed. That raises the question in one's mind whether the United Nations can only fight an aggressor on the ground he chooses, because after all the aggressor is the one who chooses where the fighting is to begin.

The minister also said that while it may be tempting to hit an aggressor in new places, we must always remember that he might hit us back. Well of course that is perfectly true; but I do not believe that is the new policy as announced by the United States government; rightly or wrongly, such a policy has now gone by the boards. In any event, yesterday the minister gave us no clear-cut statement of where the government stands on this new Asian policy. I believe that the Canadian people, as well as the members of the house, are entitled to such a statement.

Perhaps there is a responsibility on hon. members to indicate their own views and in so far as it is possible the views of the people whom they represent.

Of course I am not in a position to be able to indicate with great accuracy what the people of Vancouver-Quadra think of this new United States Asian policy, but I believe Canadians on the west coast approve of the policy so far as it has developed to date. They might not approve of further steps, but there appears to have been very little opposition to the policy as it has been announced by President Eisenhower.

Some weight should be given to the fact that the two great evening newspapers in Vancouver have approved of the President's stand. Certainly there has been no indication by them that they believe he has made a mistake, and I noticed that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), in his excellent speech, with much of which I did not agree, did not quote from the press of our home province of British Columbia.

Then I believe it should be pointed out also that the Canadian government in this instance was informed but not consulted by the United States. It was informed, quite late in the day at that. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made the first reference to this new policy in the house on February 2, the day it was announced, and his remarks will be found at page 1521 of Hansard. He said:

> Late Friday last,—
> The announcement was made on Monday
> —the Canadian embassy was informed about the forthcoming statement to be made by President Eisenhower, but it was not suggested that we should express our views about it.

That reminds me of the policy of this government before the war under the leadership of the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, when he declared that in so far as the United Kingdom and the other nations of the commonwealth were concerned they could inform Canada of policies but they could not consult us because if Canada were consulted then she might be under some obligation. We are now having this same problem in reverse. I hope the Canadian government would prefer to be consulted by the United States rather than just informed as was the case last week.

This action has all the earmarks of Canada being dragged along by the United States and that situation is not good enough. I does not exist in the North Atlantic area because there we find consultation between members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which seems to be working out very well. Surely our aim as Canadians should be to bring about a similar situation in the Pacific; to insist on some arrangement so that we will be consulted and not merely informed concerning decisions made for that area.

Canada is a Pacific nation just as much as she is an Atlantic nation. The Pacific area is the most dangerous in the world today. War has actually broken out in Korea, Indo-China and the Malay peninsula. Obviously the Pacific is the weak spot of the free nations. Some way must be found for them to work together in that area.

The present government of Canada has done very little to bring about such a system of consultation. The ministers, from the Prime Minister down, seem to be very little interested in working out any such plan. The minister of external affairs yesterday laughed it off, laughed about a Pacific security pact and said something facetious about the member for Vancouver-Quadra being glad to have some kind of a statement. Then the minister went on to repeat all the bogeys he has been raising for several years.

I was amazed at the statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to the Pacific when he returned from the commonwealth conference in London. He appeared in the house for the first time on December 15. On that day I asked him the following question, to be found on page 646 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. A news dispatch over the week end indicates that the United Kingdom is now being given a voice in Pacific defence, presumably by becoming a party to the Australian-New Zealand-United States treaty. What steps, if any, has the Canadian government taken to gain the same position for Canada?

The Prime Minister replied as follows:

> I did not have an opportunity to discuss the Pacific pact, in any way, with anyone whatsoever, while I was away.

There were discussions between other members of the commonwealth with regard to the situation in the Pacific, because in the press of December 15 there was published a statement from the office of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom reading as follows:

> The prime ministers of the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand took the opportunity, provided by the commonwealth economic conference, to discuss the situation in the Pacific and the problems of southeast Asia. They reached complete understanding with regard to certain fundamental propositions which will, in due course, be the subject of friendly discussions with their allies, the United States.

[Mr. Green.]

Apparently the Prime Minister of Canada was not sufficiently interested in the Pacific to take part in any discussions on that subject during the commonwealth conference of last fall.

Another example of this lack of interest by the government is the attitude of the minister of external affairs toward the Australia-New Zealand-United States treaty, known as the ANZUS treaty. As he pointed out yesterday, there are bilateral and trilateral pacts in the Pacific. There is one between the United States and Japan; another between the United States and the Philippines, and a third between the United States, Australia and New Zealand. He said also that there was a treaty between Canada and the United States, and I propose to deal with that in a few minutes. There is a difference there, because I suggest that it is not in the same category as the three other treaties.

I interjected a question and asked whether Canada had asked to join the ANZUS treaty, to become a party to that treaty; the minister answered that they had had a meeting on August 7, 1952 and at that time it had been intimated that no one else was wanted. I then asked him whether we had asked to join before that date and in reply he got pretty far off the beam when he said that we had obtained quite adequate information on which to base the policy which we have followed. It seems to me perfectly clear that Canada has not made a very energetic attempt to crash the gate of this ANZUS treaty.

Mr. Pearson: I can deal with that point if the hon. member is not satisfied with my statement of yesterday. I can tell him at once that it was made quite clear to us before the meeting last August that the extension of that pact to include any other country, including Canada, would not be welcomed at that time.

Mr. Green: The minister has never yet given any indication that Canada had tried very hard to become a party to that treaty.

Mr. Pearson: Gate crashing is not good diplomacy.

Mr. Green: Well, there has never been any indication that the present government even wishes to crash the gate. This is a very serious question on the west coast because we have always had the closest relations with our sister nations, Australia and New Zealand. Before the war Australia was our third best customer, and now she is away down the list. We on the Pacific coast want to work just as closely as we possibly can with the Australians and the New Zealanders.

It may be that the ANZUS treaty is not the proper kind of treaty upon which to build up some scheme whereby Canada will be consulted about these decisions in the Pacific, but the minister suggests no alternative. Perhaps the best plan would be this new strategic co-ordinating committee.

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. member would like me to do so, I will suggest immediately an alternative which is being followed, although it may not be one that he would consider quite satisfactory. All the countries that are engaged in the Korean war meet at least every week in Washington to exchange views and to hear from each other what our policies are in that region.

Mr. Green: It is a strange thing that when it came to a drastic revision of policy such as that regarding Formosa, this committee in Washington appears to have known nothing about it. The first thing that happened was that the Canadian embassy was informed three days before the announcement was made as to what was to be done by the United States, and was not asked for any suggestions.

There is the strategic co-ordinating committee to be set up with headquarters in Singapore. I asked the minister about it yesterday and he said he would give further details at a later date. The first time that plan came to my attention was in a press dispatch from Paris to be found in the Vancouver Province of the 2nd of January of this year. The dispatch indicated that a permanent allied military planning staff would be established in Singapore early this year to co-ordinate plans for the security of southeast Asia. The dispatch went on to say:

> These sources said the United States government has finally agreed in principle to the establishment of a joint southeast Asian defence planning body composed of American, British, French, Australian and New Zealand military experts.

On January 10, 1953 another press dispatch appeared in the Vancouver Province which confirmed that a decision had been made to set up a council to co-ordinate anti-communist operations in the Far East. The dispatch went on to say:

> Britain, as the commonwealth power, will invite Australia and New Zealand to join the council, whose headquarters will probably be in Singapore.

What I should like the minister to explain is whether Canada has asked to be a member of that council and, if not, why not? Such a council may be the means of bringing about a situation whereby Canada will be consulted on decisions made for the Pacific area. We must remember that in Asia the communists are working from within a circle. The free nations are working from without, and it must be obvious to everyone that there should be co-ordination of anti-communist operations. Canada, as the nation with the fourth largest number of troops in Korea should certainly be a member of that council.

The minister suggested yesterday that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has some responsibility for helping the French because of the war going on in Indo-China. His remarks are found at page 1855 of Hansard for yesterday. He said:

> In a resolution adopted December 17, 1952, the North Atlantic council expressed its wholehearted admiration for these efforts and acknowledged that the resistance of the free nations of southeast Asia was in fullest harmony with the aims and ideals of the Atlantic community, and agreed that the campaign waged by French union forces in Indo-China merited support from NATO members. Indeed there is a close strategic relationship not only between events in Korea and Indo-China, but also between events in Indo-China and in western Europe, because events in Indo-China have a very important bearing on France's contribution to the defence of western Europe.

That would appear to indicate an extension of the responsibility of NATO to include what is going on in Indo-China. It is hard to visualize that as having been intended in the original plans when NATO was first set up, but I am not quarrelling with the decision. That may be a way out of our difficulty in the Pacific.

Mr. Pearson: I should point out at once that there was no such decision made as a result of the resolution which the hon. member has read. There was no such decision to extend the obligations of the NATO pact. Such a decision could only be made by amendment of the pact.

Mr. Green: Well, it seems to be out of line with the terms of the NATO pact. There certainly has been the undertaking of some responsibility to help the French in their efforts in Indo-China. Mind you, I do not see how, if NATO is to be extended in that way, it can be considered any longer as a regional pact, but I am not quarrelling with the policy. I merely point out that this may be one way of getting Canada on the right track in so far as the Pacific is concerned, namely by having the obligations of NATO extended to that area.

Then I should like to say a word about the United States-Canada treaty which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) seems to put in the same class as the United States-Japan treaty, the ANZUS treaty and the United States-Philippine treaty. As I understand the treaty, it is for the defence of this continent and is of no help whatever in so far as policies for Asia are concerned. Obviously it does not call for consultation between Canada and the United States on Asiatic questions because there was no such consultation with regard to the new Asian policy adopted by the United States. As a matter of fact I doubt whether the Canada-United States treaty goes much further than the NATO treaty itself which provides that if there is an attack on any one of the member nations, either in Europe or North America, all the rest are obligated to come to its protection.

To my mind the minister seems to have made one excuse after another as to why there should not be a pact of some sort in the Pacific. He bubbles over with enthusiasm over NATO, but he is full of doubts about any such plan for the Pacific. Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, Canada is being informed but not consulted about decisions concerning the Pacific area.

There is grave concern on the west coast of Canada about the Pacific because what happens there may be a matter of life and death for Canadians living on that coast. This is no theoretical matter. We believe that a policy is needed in Asia and that Canada should be in a position to exert her full influence. I have here an editorial from the Vancouver Province of February 3, entitled "A Policy is needed in Asia". I will quote one paragraph which I think sums up our views:

> The time is, in fact, past due for the west to adopt a more realistic policy in Asia. The need for a co-ordinated policy, in face of the long organized, centrally directed communist strategy has long been self-evident. The piecemeal effort to date has left the considerable anti-communist elements on the Asiatic mainland sitting ducks for the communists.

I suggest in conclusion that it is high time the Canadian government demanded a full voice in Pacific affairs.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): It is always a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to welcome the motion introduced annually by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to refer the estimates of his department to the standing committee on external affairs. I have always regarded that as a very healthy procedure, and one that has led to a wider measure of participation in the discussion of external affairs as well as, I think, a broader understanding of the problems of external affairs on the part of members of this house than would otherwise be possible. The committee, under the able and benevolent chairmanship of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), is one to which all members regard it as a pleasure to belong, and to participate in its discussions.

The extent of the review of Canada's external relations by the minister yesterday and today, as well as the breadth and scope of the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), stressed and underlined the extent to which Canada is interested in virtually all that takes place in all parts of the globe. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in some speeches last summer that today it is virtually impossible for Canada not to become involved in a major war, should one break out. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the course of Canada's interest in world affairs and the extent of her commitments in various theatres of the world have led to the result that when we debate external affairs in this house we range virtually over the entire globe.

The world situation today seems to be, at least through the eyes of the west, a matter of balancing strength against dangers, of pitting the resources of the free western world against the needs. The resources are still not adequate to meet the needs. As Mr. Churchill said several years ago, to attempt to be strong everywhere is to be strong nowhere. We hope we are moving in the direction of increasing our strength so that in time the strength of the free western world may be reasonably adequate to meet the challenge of our needs. As yet we are far from having reached the point where our strength is adequate to meet that challenge.

It is important, in the first place, that we should recognize the nature and source of the danger. Literally there is one primary source and only one, and that, of course, is the Kremlin with its policies of world domination. We ought to recognize that danger for what it is, naked, unabashed aggression; a cold, calculating, ruthless attempt to subvert freedom the whole world over. The Kremlin is deaf to all appeals to honour and to humane considerations. I do not think we are going to come very much closer to a satisfactory solution in Korea or in any of the other troubled parts of the world today by thinking we can discuss this matter in terms of appeals to humane considerations or honour on the part of those against whom we are pitted in this cold war. Wishful thinking is going to do us no good in influencing those against whose aggressive intent we are in process of becoming arrayed. They just do not think our way. Their thought processes are entirely different from ours.

We should recognize also that what we see unfolding today is a world plan. Lightning may be striking in different parts of the world, but when the lightning of communism strikes today it is part of a world-wide plan, whether it be armed aggression in Korea; armed aggression in Indo-China, Burma, Malaya; the cold war in other parts of the world; persecution of Jewish leaders in the European countries behind the iron curtain, or the severing of diplomatic relations with the state of Israel with a view to stirring up trouble in the Arab world. These are all facets of the unfolding world plan of aggression directed from the Kremlin.

Of course the advantage of a single direction of a world plan lies with the communists, as well as the advantage of the initiative. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I think we will have accomplished something in the western world if we do recognize the nature and source of this danger and then gird ourselves to meet it.

Beneficent international institutions seem to develop slowly. That seems to be one of the characteristics of such institutions. The United Nations, NATO, the point four plan, the Marshall plan, the Schuman plan, the policy of containment—these all have been characterized by slow growth. That is not to say that their growth has lacked strength because it was slow; nevertheless it seems to be a characteristic of international institutions of the beneficent type.

What may be said to be the focal points of danger today? What is the need of the western world where the pressure of communist aggression is strongest? It seems to me, sir, that whether you look at Europe or whether you look at Asia, the danger is extremely grave today. I suppose in Asia our answer to the threat and the present dangers there will lie in our hope of resisting armed aggression in Korea and in the countries of southeast Asia, in strengthening a friendly Japan, and in our hope that India, great country that she is, will see her way clear in the days that lie before us to take a clearer and stronger line in recognizing and confronting the communist menace in Asia.

In Europe the need for unity of the western nations is extremely urgent. It is because of the importance of strength in western Europe, and in particular the need for a stronger measure of unity between France and Germany, that I should like to share with the house some impressions that it was my privilege to form during a visit to western Europe last October. This offered an opportunity to measure the developments in western Europe in the four years since one had had a previous opportunity, along with certain members of this house, to visit th principal countries of western Europe.

Western Europe is making a strong come back. Let no one underestimate the exten of the economic comeback of western Europe Western Germany today has a greater pro duction than the entire pre-war Hitler Ger many. France today has a greater productio than pre-war France. Britain today has greater production than pre-war Britain These are all factors of high importance i balancing the scales against the threat o Soviet aggression. Our economic resources ar in pawn, Mr. Speaker, in this world struggl just as much as is our military migh expressed in terms of rearmament.

Germany today presents a fascinating pic ture, because the recovery of Germany toda is almost entirely due to one factor, and on factor alone, namely hard work on the par of the German people. Today in the Ruh you can see the extent of the industria comeback of Germany. Travelling througl the country you have an opportunity o gauging the strength of the recovery of agri cultural Germany. We would do well t recognize that the recovery of Western Ger many is a fact of world significance today Whether we like it or not, Germany is today and is going to be in the future to an increas ing degree, a factor in world politics. Ther are many who do not realize the extent o the re-emergence of Western Germany o the international scene. I think such peopl are going to have to change their manne of thinking before long.

Recognition of the importance of German so far as the United States is concerned ma perhaps be measured in this fact alone Before the recent change of administratio at Washington the United States establish ment at Bonn, the capital of Western Ger many, included 4,000 civilians housed in hug buildings in that old university city.

Berlin has again come to the fore in th news dispatches within the past day or two We are told that there is a Russian threa of the renewal of the land blockade whic some of us remember from our visit in 1948 when Great Britain and the United States, i one of the great answers of free and cour ageous peoples to a challenge, devised th airlift, a marvel of organization, to mee that attempt of the communists to drive them out of Berlin. In Berlin I had the oppor tunity of going behind the iron curtain and seeing something of the eastern sector of tha city once again.

In the western sectors, Berlin has made great strides of progress in the past fou years. The city is brighter. The people look better fed. They are more cheerful looking

They are calmer and, I think, more vigorous looking than they were then. There is still a picture of ruin on almost every hand in Berlin. The effects of the aerial and land bombardment are to be seen yet throughout the entire city, but substantial strides have been made in the rebuilding of the German capital on the western side.

There are not many pockets of unemployment in northwestern Europe today but, Mr. Speaker, West Berlin is one of them. In that population of less than 2,500,000 people there are 300,000 unemployed. The reason there are unemployed in Western Berlin is that it has been the policy of the Russians—who, after all, control the land access to the city—to prevent the free exchange of commerce between the West Berliners and the other Germans. Only 19 trains a day are permitted by the Russians to enter West Berlin. You can see today, in lying over that part of the city, two shiny railway tracks while the other tracks in the railway yards are covered with rust.

The horrors of Russian occupation in Western Berlin have not been forgotten. Eastern Berlin behind the iron curtain presents an interesting contrast. When we of the western world put up flags on buildings we usually put one flag on a flagpole or mast. Not so these communists. When they go about hanging flags they literally cover a building with them. In Eastern Berlin today you can see block after block with the great buildings covered with the red flags with the hammer and the sickle, great red streamers and red bunting. In almost every block as you pass through the eastern sector you can see the picture of one Josef Stalin either grinning or glowering at you, depending on your point of view. There are also pictures of the communist leaders from the other communist countries, such as Mao Tse-tung of China, Gottwald of Czechoslovakia and the others.

There is no doubt at all about the efforts of the Russians and of such Germans of East Berlin as have made themselves tools of the Russians, to communize the eastern part of the city. They have introduced communist shops, the Handelsorganization, commonly known as HO shops. They have done one thing that I think is worth mentioning today because I think it is going to be used before long in the western world as a means of communist propaganda. There is in course of construction on a famous street that has been renamed Stalinstrasse in East Berlin what will become one of the largest housing projects in the world. It is in various stages of construction. There are some finished blocks, and others ranging all the way from that state to blocks in which the rubble left from the air blitz is still lying around. I suppose the communists will attempt to picture to the world that this housing project is typical of what goes on behind the iron curtain.

We will know better, Mr. Speaker, than to believe that this one isolated project, which will be used as a communist showpiece for propaganda purposes, is typical. It is interesting to note how that kind of building can be erected. Apart from people who would labour normally upon it there is, of course, a great deal of "invited" labour spent on it. Artisans and people of that kind are invited to come and donate a holiday's work or a Sunday's work, and if there is any demurring they are asked to consider whether it is a good thing for them or their families for it to be known that they withheld their labour from this government project. "Thou are not Caesar's friend" has been used to good advantage as a threat from the days of Pontius Pilate to this very day.

I think it is worth mentioning also, Mr. Speaker, one's impression of the police in East Berlin. We hear a great deal of them. I saw a number of them. I saw them on traffic duty; I saw a truckload of them going by. I do not think there was one of them who could have been over 18 years of age. And if we hear reports of shooting incidents along the boundary that divides the Russian sector from the western sectors, I think we might ascribe it to the fact that firearms are placed in the hands of immature youths. And even in the case of those, Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that an average of about 45 to 50 of these police from the eastern side of Berlin are escaping every day over to the western sector, quite apart from that stream of escapees that is going on all the time, and now in increasing volume, from eastern Berlin and eastern Germany into the western sector of Berlin as the communist persecution of the Jewish population becomes daily more acute. When they reach western Berlin of course their only means of escaping further to western Germany—for after all Berlin is a hundred miles or more from the nearest point of the western zones of occupation in Germany—is by air.

Sir, may I say something of France. Whatever else may be said, no one who knows Europe, or makes any attempt to study the situation in western Europe today, can think for one minute that western Europe can be strong unless France is strong. It would be well for the western world to bear in mind something of the sufferings of France, something of her losses in two great wars: a million and a half of her finest men killed in the first great war; 600,000 in the second great war; four years and more of the horrors of nazi occupation in the second world war. These have left behind them privation, disturbance and in many cases weakness. But, Mr. Speaker, there are those today who insist on making of France demands that do not take account of this record of suffering to which the French people have been submitted.

In the course of his review yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) referred to Indo-China. The western world should understand what a drain that war in Indo-China has been upon French resources, both human and material. Mention was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon of France's losses in men in that war. Well, that has been a severe drain in these recent years on all of the resources of France. That portion of the French army which has been engaged in the warfare in Indo-China has indeed been the best part, the better half at times, of the French army. And if France has not been able to contribute to the garrisoning of central Europe as many men, as experienced an army, as the western world sometimes expects, it would be well to take account of the extent to which French armed might has been committed to the struggle in Indo-China.

And when we are talking about the demands we make upon France, sir, let us have this in mind also; that Dean Acheson himself, in testifying at Washington before a congressional committee something over a year ago, said that France's expenditure on the war in Indo-China up to that time had exceeded the help that she had received through Marshall aid. That was a statement he made in Washington something over a year ago.

What of the strength of communism in France? That is a matter that has given many people in the west much concern. I remember that in 1948 when the communists were rioting in France there was bloodshed, there were strikes, they were openly challenging authority. Well, it is a pleasure indeed, Mr. Speaker, to see satisfying evidence that the strength of communism in France is on the wane. There are many evidences of it. I mention but a few. The fact that 26 per cent of the French electorate in the general elections to the French assembly a year and a half ago voted for communist candidates should not be treated as evidence that 26 per cent of the French people are communists; far from it. The number of communist candidates elected to the French assembly in that election dropped from 180 to 100.

There has been a very great change also in the communist strength in French organized labour. It will be remembered that La Confédération Générale du Travail, the principal French labour organization, was under communist domination until a very great French labour leader, who incidentally paid a visit to this country a year ago, Monsieur Leon Jouhaux, led the non-communists out of La Confédération Générale du Travail into a new organization.

There are internal divisions among communists in France. Of course when internal divisions arise among communists in countries behind the iron curtain they do not last very long, because they have a way of disposing of those whom they call deviationists; but in a free country like France those internal divisions can arise.

This next fact struck me as one of great importance. At this time, outside of a handful of able and popular leaders the communists do not have any men of first-class ability in the French assembly. Perhaps this is a more striking evidence, Mr. Speaker. The circulation of L'Humanité, the communist daily, has fallen from a high mark of 500,000 copies per day to a circulation of something under 200,000 copies a day.

In Paris it was my privilege to talk to Lord Ismay, the secretary-general of NATO. He had some things to say about NATO that struck me as being of interest to Canadians. He drew attention to the fact that NATO after all is young; it has had the full glare of publicity directed upon it and, as he put it, there are so many people who keep stirring up the seed all the time to see if the plant is really growing, and keep pouring in water and stirring it up, looking all the time underneath the surface for evidence of growth. Well, as he indicated to me, all free nations in NATO will contribute greatly to the strength of NATO if leaders in public life in all these countries will try to create on the part of the people of their countries a broad base of support for and good understanding of NATO, its objects, its aims and its tasks.

Just in passing, Mr. Speaker, participation by the United States in NATO can I think be illustrated by the fact that, as I was told, the United States delegation and staff to NATO number 1,100, including three ambassadors. The total staff of NATO when I was there was some 250. Canada has a staff of 21 headed by a distinguished Canadian with ambassadorial rank.

I should like at this time to pay tribute to Mr. Arnold Heeney, formerly under-secretary of state for external affairs, who assumed ıe appointment as head of the Canadian dele-ation to NATO about a year ago. I think Mr. Teeney is deserving of recognition, not only ɔr his ability as a Canadian diplomat but for ıe sense of public service which he carries ıto his duties. I think Canada can be very roud of such a representative.

It was my great privilege to visit the 27th anadian infantry brigade at Hanover and to ave extended conversations there with Briga-ier Walsh, and also to see two of the units ı training the following day. The Canadian 7th infantry brigade is filling a role quite ifferent from that filled by any other Cana-ian military force in history. This is a time f peace as far as we and Germany are con-erned. The brigade is not an occupation ɔrce; it is not part of the occupation forces ı Germany. It was very difficult for the anoverians to understand the unprecedented ɔle being filled by the Canadian armed forces ı their midst, and there were some mis-nderstandings. Efforts have been made, and ɔme success has attended those efforts, to ıake the German people understand the role f the Canadians. That role is that of a arrison force located in central Europe to uard against the possibility of aggression ɔm behind the iron curtain. This brigade ; fully operational, and is located only 45 ıiles from the iron curtain straight down itler's excellent autobahn. The appearance f these troops is impressive. One could not ail to be proud of the Canadian troops as ne saw them at Hanover.

I just missed by a couple of hours being resent at the arrival of the R.C.A.F. squad-ons at Metz, but I had the opportunity of alking to those who were there. Those 67 abres arriving in perfect formation were iven a warm and enthusiastic reception by ıe French authorities, the NATO forces and ıe press.

Of course when new airfields are built it oes mean dispossessing French peasants. 'he love of the French peasant for his soil ; very deep indeed, and under those condi-ions it perhaps would not be a matter of urprise if there arose some local resent-ıent at land being taken over for the con-truction of Canadian airfields. However, was assured that the reception given to he Canadians serving in the R.C.A.F. has een very warm and friendly.

I should like to mention one incident which think illustrates something that we in this avoured part of the globe, far removed from he ravages of two world wars, fail adequately ɔ appreciate. We are so accustomed to hinking of the arrival of Canadians as a ymbol of liberation and the occasion for tumultuous expressions of joy that the incident related to me by Madame Vanier, the gifted wife of our distinguished Canadian ambassador at Paris, may be something of an eye-opener. She was speaking to a very intelligent French woman and told her of the arrival of the R.C.A.F. squadrons. Naturally, with no little pride, she expected her to react in a similar way and express thanksgiving and joy at the result. But the woman's eyes filled with tears and she said nothing. Such is the fear of war that grips France today.

After all, France has known the horror of nazi occupation, and she knew that horror for over four years. The spectre of Russian occupation haunts France. We have little appreciation in this country of what that means in the light of French experience.

I should like to say a word about the vexed question of German rearmament, based upon discussions which it was my privilege to have with some of the leading political figures in Britain, as well as in Paris and Germany.

I suppose if the Russians had not behaved as they have since the war no one would feel happy about the prospect of German rearmament. The experience we have had with an armed Germany led by the German general staff has not been such as to create in us any feeling of confidence or satisfaction over the prospect of German rearmament. Nevertheless some hard facts have emerged which it is no longer possible to overlook.

The load the British taxpayer is carrying and the drain upon British manpower, not only in the army of the Rhine but in the discharge of Britain's obligations all over the world, is so great that when the Britisher looks at Germany and sees British forces garrisoning Western Germany, sees that Germany has not yet been called upon to bear her share of the burden and responsibility of rearming, is it any wonder that he says, "Why is not Germany carrying her share of this load?"

France is weighed down with her struggles and her burdens. There is a continual drain on her resources because of the war in Indo-China. But she looks at Germany with a different feeling because the recollection of three German invasions in the last 80 years is still very fresh in the minds of her people.

It is easy enough for us at this safe distance to make plans for western Europe, but it is not going to be an easy matter to fuse German, French and forces of other countries in western Europe into a European army. If it comes about, as we may well hope that in some form it will, it will be indeed a triumph of statesmanship and abundant evidence that we have entered upon a new era of co-operation and understanding.

The nationalist tradition is still very strong in the French army. Nationalism is still strong in France. The distrust of Germany in the light of the experience of the last 80 years is still strong.

It was the United States that first put forward the proposal for German rearmament because today Western Germany with a population of fifty million has the greatest available pool of manpower in western Europe. Mr. Schuman brought forward the idea of a European army with smaller German units fitted into it, as a compromise plan. That became the Schuman plan in regard to a European army. But a European army built upon the fusion of smaller units drawn from various countries is very different from a force built up of component national armies of various countries and serving under a supreme commander, such as we had in the latter part of the first great war and throughout most of the second world war.

Therefore we should not underestimate the difficulties that the nations of western Europe are facing in relation to this matter of German rearmament as part of the formation of a European army. It is to be hoped that something of that kind will come about, because except from a greater measure of unity in western Europe we may look in vain for that revival of strength in Europe, drawn from European sources, which is so necessary today in the face of the strength that Russia is mustering behind the iron curtain and in face of the political difficulties that exist at Washington in connection with the maintenance and continuance of United States aid.

Back of all this, Mr. Speaker, stands Britain—Britain which has carried such a burden, Britain which has undergone such privations not simply for her survival but for the peace and deliverance of all mankind. I hope that when people call upon Britain to carry a greater share of the load of the world's problems they will not forget what that land suffered during the war, the burden that land carried during the war and since. They are still bearing privations that are matched by few of the countries that enjoy today that measure of freedom and deliverance which Britain made such sacrifices to help win for them. Make no mistake about it, people have been writing Britain off for generations as though her best days were behind her. I am here, Mr. Speaker, to bear testimony to my belief that the best days of Britain lie before her, that no nation that has been called upon to fulfil the beneficent destiny for all mankind and for the freedom of mankind that Britain has been called upon to fulfil could fail in days like these.

If I had fear of the position of Britain now and of her coming back after all her difficulties I would indeed be pessimistic for the whole outlook of mankind, for the whole outlook of our free western way of life. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, that British leadership in the world today, being needed as much as ever it was before, will be forthcoming, and that with the continuance of leadership of that kind and with the recognition by Washington, of which there is abundant proof, of the great responsibility that the United States carries in the world today, while the dangers are great, while there are many clouds upon the international horizon, free mankind, which values its freedom more than life, need not fear to meet this challenge of black, ruthless communism with determination, with courage and with confidence.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with the main part of my remarks I want to thank the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) for the kind words he had to say about my activities as chairman of the external affairs committee. It is very easy for me to extend those kind words to every member of our committee, to every official of the department and to the minister of the Department of External Affairs in view of the co-operation they have always given in our work.

Before I proceed further, I also want to extend my congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) for the magnificent work he has done at the United Nations and for the honour he received last fall in being appointed president of the general assembly. It was an honour that was highly deserved indeed. We also know that any of the higher positions, even that of secretary general of the United Nations, are within the reach of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I believe it would be in order for me to say that I believe the Canadian people would want him to remain in public life in Canada because we need his talents and statesmanship here and I say that very sincerely indeed.

I should like to say a few words about the United Nations. Since the inception of the organization the glaring lights of publicity have always been focused on that great international body, but more so than ever during the last four or five months because of a certain situation that has existed among the personnel of the United Nations, and the praise and criticism that are heard from many parts of the world.

It is hard to tell whether there is more argument at the United Nations or about the United Nations. Whichever it may be here is plenty to provide a share for any ınd all who may want to join in the exchange ›f views. Some of the views exchanged ately have resembled blunt instruments. They ıave come from people who are either very ıngry with the United Nations or very angry vith the people who criticize the United Nations. It is not a bad situation; it is even he proper thing for democracy to discuss an nstitution of world-wide importance and vhose decisions have world-wide importance n that manner, because in such a discussion he good and the bad come to light. But no ›ne will deny the accomplishments and the great work that has been done by the United Nations since its creation, and the necessity or its maintenance.

I know that my constituents and myself vere surprised when a subcommittee of the Jnited States senate wanted to make an nquiry into the communistic affiliations of ome of the officials of the United Nations. Some of those officials wanted to hide behind he United States fifth amendment. Some ections of the press throughout the world alled it a smearing of the holders of impor- ant positions in the United Nations Organiza- ion. The sooner these communists are smoked ›ut and dismissed the better for the United Nations, which in the nature of things will ılways have enough troubles without being dentified as a hide-out for traitors or sus- ›ected traitors.

I know that my constituents have very trong feelings about this matter. We realize hat there are two worlds, the lines of demar- ation of which are very well defined, between vhich there is no possibility of brotherhood ıs far as the two ideologies are concerned. Those worlds are outside of the iron curtain ınd inside of the iron curtain. There is langer to a democratic state if some of its fficials in the United Nations are communistic, or the simple reason that the communist, no natter whether he lives inside the iron curtain ›r in the democratic world, gives his first ıllegiance to communism and to Moscow. Therefore I say that the United States senate committee has done a marvellous job in erreting out any communists who were among he personnel of the United Nations.

Much of the wrangling in the United Nations s born of our very great eagerness for peace ınd order in this war-weary world. People ıre impatient and edgy; they look for definite results. Sharp criticism of the United Nations or failure to produce great and immediate ›enefits brings equally sharp rejoinders. This s only natural after having two wars in ılmost one generation. In world war I we vere saying it would be the war to end all wars. Yet a little more than 20 years later we were in a horrible war which brought with it all the miseries and destruction that a world war brings in its train. The guns of the second world war were hardly silent when we were forced into the cold war which is as destructive emotionally and spiritually as a real war, and if carried on indefinitely may bring an irreparable cataclysm.

Many are unable to see any real hope for a worth-while United Nations Organization as long as the Soviet union is a part of it. Others adopt the view stated by a writer in the magazine Columbia. I read these words seven years ago and they are just as true today as they were then. In an analysis of the United Nations charter the writer said:

> Even in relation to the great enigma of our time, the Soviet union, the present charter is better than nothing. We have to deal with Russia because Russia is a part of our world.

We have to realize we cannot ignore Russia even if she has erected an iron curtain through which it is absolutely impossible to see. We must realize that she belongs to this planet, to this world.

> "In dealing with her, what is better: to have contact by remote control from Washington to Moscow or London to Moscow, or to belong to the same organization, which can be improved, and force the Soviet representatives to speak out to the world? It is infinitely better to have them present, face to face, because we may be able to work out an understanding. If they prove obdurate, unbending and impossibly dogmatic, then it is better that this occur where everyone can evaluate the reaction, see the results and recognize the reasons."
> The gangster government of the Soviet union is, indeed, part of our world; while the idea of tossing it out of the UN is understandably tempting, such action would pay off in momentary pleasure rather than in the solution of our difficulties.

The writer just quoted concluded his comment with this sentence:

> "Just as the United States began its independent existence in the midst of regional strife, torn by state jealousies and misunderstandings, to evolve a well-knit system that has endured these many years, so, too, the new international order may be equally susceptible to modification and improvement provided that the will is there to make it work."

And the will is there. There is criticism against some of the activities of the United Nations in Canada—sometimes in this parliament—but constructive criticism of organizations of that nature is expected and is needed. At the same time one must not expect miracles. Even if the United Nations was able to have an international army today it would not be possible to implement in the United Nations all the things that it might be desired to implement.

We can be watchful and critical of the United Nations without being blindly hostile.

Critics of the United Nations in trying to analyse the work of that body, if they wish to do so, can recognize what has been accomplished. The time at my disposal will not allow me to cover them but it has a magnificent record; not a perfect one, but a good one. It would be helpful if some of the United Nations enthusiasts would remove "smear" and "isolationist" from their vocabularies. These worn-out terms do not win friends and influence people. They have been tossed around rather too freely, of late, even in circles where better sense and better taste would be expected. Some very vocal rooters for the UN are doing it more harm that its critics.

I just wish to say a few words about the new administration in Washington. I am speaking with all diffidence and humility and I listened with a great deal of interest to the fine comment made about this matter by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) this afternoon. I believe, generally speaking, that the Canadian people do not worry too much over presidential elections in the United States, although to an outsider, and I suppose even to people living inside the iron curtain, they would not believe that people could express their sentiments as they do in the United States and in all democratic countries of the world.

I have some relatives who were in the United States when the general election came on. They came back afterwards and said to me: "Will it be possible to knit the whole thing together after the election is over?" I told them not to worry. One of the great assets of democracies is their ability to express different opinions and then work together for the welfare of the country and also of the world.

As Canadians we do not need to fear. We are fortunate indeed to be a neighbour of that great republic to the south. Moreover, we call them cousins, and they certainly are cousins by blood and by feeling. In the past we have had and no doubt in the future we will have some problems to discuss and solve with them, but we have given and will continue to give an example to the whole world by solving those problems without friction, and we do not need to resort to arms or even deep division. As an example I have mentioned in my speeches in the past we have the so-called panhandle in British Columbia, something which is really a geographic monstrosity. However, we accepted it. We are not going to stir up and foster animosity over it as far as our American friends are concerned. I could mention several other matters on which we could have dissension, but we want bygones to remain so.

Some well deserved tributes were paid thi afternoon to the past president of the Unite States, Mr. Truman. He was a great states man and a great American. We had the goo fortune to have him visit us here, and anyon who saw him at close range was able t detect his personality and ability and recog nize that democracies are pretty fair in thei judgment when choosing their leaders.

As far as President Eisenhower is con cerned, some people called the election popularity contest. It was much more tha that. The man had marvellous qualification although I believe if he had run on th Democratic ticket he would have achieve the same result as he did running on th Republican ticket. I say that because th vote would so indicate as far as members o congress and members of the United State Senate are concerned. The sterling qualitie of the man were recognized. Not only wa he a great military leader; but he was als a man who knew the problems of the worl and the problems of the United States in military, statesmanlike way.

One can think of his marvellous accom plishments as commander in chief of th allied armies, how great his accomplishment were. He had under his command man brilliant men. I was going to call one of ther a providential man, Viscount Montgomery who in my view was one of the best strate gists of the last war. He also had under hi command capable and brilliant Viscoun Alexander who has shown on so many occa sions that not only is he a military man bu a statesman as well, the latter shown s naturally while he was here as governo general of Canada. Mr. Eisenhower wa able to effectively bring together those di ferent generals and armies. It was a marve lous accomplishment that no doubt bode very well for the democratic world in th years of office which he will have; becaus his training, his way of getting co-operatio will be a great asset as the leader of th strongest nation in the world today.

An American told me only two days ag that they had hoped against hope that th new president would be able to stop the wa in Korea. To fulfil his promise Presider Eisenhower went to Korea. He came bac and showed reality because he gave no hop that the war would be over in a fe days, months or even a year. I think in tha case he did show great realism. That is wh I say that the Canadian people, who do n participate directly, at least, need not wor much about presidential elections in th United States. It has always been the ca that to a great extent we live in a harmonious and friendly spirit with our neighbours to the south, and that real amity and understanding always predominate in all our dealings with her.

There is one other matter that I wish to mention briefly, a matter which sometimes puzzles me. It is apparent that there is an oversensitiveness between friendly nations. If there is some little thing on which we do not entirely agree—within our own ranks—it is greatly publicized and bitterly criticized. That sort of thing I believe plays into the hands of Joe Stalin; because he hopes deeply that the allies, the members of the democratic world, will fight one another before long. That idea results from the verbal fighting that sometimes goes on between our friends when they do not entirely agree with one another. It is possible within nations to have diversity of opinions.

We see in the press in this country now some of the ideas that were expressed 60 years ago, and which should be conducive to our good relations. Surely charity and comprehension should be displayed in international dealings. We should realize and appreciate what the United States has done. We should be aware that up to the present she has had a casualty list of nearly 150,000 men in Korea, and she has given nearly $35 billion to Europe and various democracies in order to assist in their defence and rehabilitation after the last war.

As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) so very well said a few moments ago, there are the sacrifices which have been made by my old motherland France, in Indo-China, the sacrifices made by Britain in the last war when she was for nearly a year the only rampart against the barbarism which would have flooded the world if England had gone down. All these things we must remember in our contacts with one another, and keep as the greatest incentives to be strongly united, even if we have some differences. I do not mean to say that we should not express our sentiments clearly and strongly, but at the same time we should always keep in our minds that such expressions should be so framed as to not offend our friends. It might be possible to offend our enemies, but never let us go so far as to offend our friends. They are too much of a treasure, of a necessity, to lose.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the travelogue delivered by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). It would not surprise you to know that when you mention you are a Canadian, everything is wide open for you; you immediately become persona grata. Why is that so? It is because the people know that during world war I and world war II and following those wars, Canada was not at the peace table to obtain her pound of flesh, or for glory or terrestrial or maritime aggrandizement. They knew that Canada, in those two great wars, had helped to maintain the principles of christianity, freedom and democracy. That is the kind of spirit that must prevail amongst us under all conditions. Otherwise, I repeat, there may be some cause of deep friction which may hurt us badly indeed, and stultify our efforts for peace.

I might repeat something that I have mentioned for the last three years. Only 25 years ago in this parliament we used to say that the surest way to bring about an international war would be through the erection of tariff walls between nations. We do not seem to have learned very much from those bitter lessons of the past, because even today we are erecting tariff walls that are hurting not only other nations in the world but also ourselves. In this connection I want to say that I sincerely hope the day may come when we will see a united nations of Europe, and of the world as far as tariffs are concerned. We must be realists on this score. I believe that the treaty of peace between Japan and the allies, for which Mr. Dulles was mostly responsible, is a masterpiece. It is a christian treaty of peace; but what are we going to do with Japan? Are we going to allow her the means of survival? Are we going to raise a holler if a few little dolls or small toys come from Japan, or a few little artificial flowers? Are we going to ask for high tariffs against that production? If we do that against Japan, if we do that against India, Pakistan and against the Middle East, or any other country, then it is real war. Those people will resent it the same way the European nations and our country have resented the action taken by the United States against some of their production. Surely we know the bitterness of war and have learned that we should do everything in our power to avoid it. There should be enough statesmanship within the democratic nations to find a way to end dumping and prevent the destruction of our own economy. We should find a way of having freer trade than we have at the present time and more comprehension in economic matters.

I should like to say a few words about a Pacific pact. In my section of the country we have always been in favour of the Atlantic pact. As you know, we who live in northern Ontario are in the geographical centre of Canada. Our viewpoint is national in scope. I believe we are the only section of Canada having knowledge of municipal administration in the east and municipal administration in the west. We generally take a broad point of view on all matters coming before the House of Commons. We have no quarrel with the wheat producers in the west; we have no quarrel with the fishermen in the east or west; in a word, we have no quarrel with anyone. We always try to find the national viewpoint on all problems that come before us.

To be sure of the sentiments of my own people on the Pacific pact, I attended a number of study groups in my constituency during the last few months. They were strongly against it. The primary reason was that, as Canadians, in the past we have shown that we do not need to mention our idealism or our generosity. Our young people shed their blood for some principle we thought worthy of defending, and we will do it again if needed. Today we are only a nation of 14 million people, large in area, under a healthy but harsh climate, and sparsely populated.

I do not mean to say that we should keep away from anything pertaining to the Pacific. We must help, but not through a pact. If we have a Pacific pact in the same sense that we have an Atlantic pact—and it should be in that sense—the expenditure that will be necessary will be very great. Let us remember this. Marx said in his writings that one of the best ways of destroying democracy would be by high taxation. No doubt Stalin knows what an influence that will have on a democracy, and the effect and costs of the cold war. Taxation in Canada, although it is lower than in some countries, is still high. We have, therefore, to be realists.

During the last war, Mr. Speaker, I was deputy speaker in this house. We sat for many months every session considering the war appropriations bills. I remember many, many occasions upon which crises arose because of the shortage of manpower in Europe. At that time we had about 12·5 million people. We must think in terms of our own population in connection with the effort we are able to make. If we had 50 million or 75 million people, then it would be a different thing; but we must be realists on this matter of military pacts. Supposing we had a Pacific pact as well as an Atlantic pact. It would cost us a total of from $4 billion to $5 billion, and would mean that we would not be able to properly support both of them. That is the reaction I received from my people. We belong to the whole world, and we must be realists. I believe the minister expressed the sentiments of the people of Canada generally in connection with a Pacific pact. We are interested in the east and we are interested in the Pacific. The Colombo plan has shown that, as wel as the help we have given and will continu to give to the people of Asia and the Middl East.

I repeat that I believe I am voicing th sentiments of a great majority of my ow people. I believe it will be impossible fo us to be part and parcel of a Pacific pact o a large scale, and at the same time give th necessary assistance to the Atlantic pact.

I wanted to say a few words about trip I made last summer to the mid-Orient an Europe, but I will have other opportunities t speak about it this session. I want to mak my situation very clear. I was honoured b the Canadian Katznelson Institute of Montrea by being included in a group that spent si weeks in the new nation of Israel. This grou was composed of 36 people from New Yor university in the United States, includin students, professors and professional men o the Jewish nationality. I was invited, with out knowing about it in advance, no doub due to the good offices of my friend the hon member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) in connectio with some work I had done for the zionis movement in Canada. I was not representin Canada in any official capacity. I was no going as chairman of the external affair committee. I was not going as a politicia but as a citizen of Canada. I preface m remarks with that statement in order to mak my position clear.

Since my return at the end of last Septem ber I have given a series of lectures in differ ent parts of Ontario and Quebec. I will likel go west later in the spring. In this connec tion I have received some very biased letter what we call anti-semitic letters. It is no worthy of a christian to be anti-semitic. I is not charitable because the divine victim o the cross, just before He drew His last breath asked His Father to forget what had happene on Calvary. Surely that should be sufficien for any christian, for any civilized people, t keep them from practising anti-semitism. also received quite a number of very critica letters from Arab citizens.

Now, these letters hurt me quite a b because I went to Israel with an open min I wanted to be objective in my thinkin towards Israel as well as towards the othe countries that I visited. I asked for an obtained a visa to go to Trans-Jordan, to go t Lebanon and to Egypt. I could not go to Syri because I could not obtain a visa from Ottaw Washington or even when I was in the east t go to that country. Again, in every sectio of the Arab world into which I went I ha an open mind. I was well received indee because they knew that the Canadian peopl want peace in the Middle East. We want th

Arabs and the new nation of Israel to get together in close co-operation, and we Canadians respect their opinions and aspirations.

I must tell you very sincerely indeed that Israel is doing a magnificent job under very difficult circumstances, and that given peace she will surmount her difficulties.

In that group consisting of 37 Jewish people, I was the only Christian. They accepted me as one of their own. They and the government of Israel kept nothing from me. I visited every part; the slums of Israel and the deserts of Israel, and I also saw some of its development. Again I repeat that absolutely nothing was kept from me.

I make this prophecy. If that young nation is given 15 years of peace it will astonish the rest of the world. It has also had a very beneficial effect on the whole of the Arabic world, because they are planting in the Middle East the seeds of democracy. The Israeli government is a real democracy. They have freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of thought, freedom of politics, and freedom of the press. They have all the freedoms it is possible for them to have, and it is a welfare state. Again I repeat that if any country invited me to make such a visit, personally I would accept the invitation because it is a great pleasure and also a great education to travel under those circumstances and conditions.

I repeat that there is an evolution going on in the Arabic states that no one will be able to stop because the people there know, not just some of their leaders—and I refer to the people in Egypt, in Trans-Jordan, in Saudi Arabia and all over the Arabic states—that there is a better life because the democracies have told them that; the United Nations have told them that; and the communists have told them that.

They are not satisfied with their present situation. You can see the eruptions that are taking place. I was in Egypt two days before the abdication of King Farouk. There were no signs of revolution at the time, but from the poverty of the people it was easy to see that they were not satisfied with their lot. There were agitators in those crowds. You could see that the people were not satisfied when poverty and squalor existed, lack of medical attention and so on.

I visited some of the Arabic states. I was friendly to them and they were friendly to me. They are fine people. These people also know there is a better life than the one they are living at the present time, and they want the opportunity to enjoy it. In those states there is the same evolution. There are the same political eruptions, because the people are not satisfied with their lot. The aspirations of these people, if they are not listened to, will result in a situation which will perhaps explode and hurt the peace of the whole world.

I just want to say one word about the Arab refugee problem. It is a terrific one. I did not visit these camps, as I did not have time to do so. The situation cannot be ignored when in Trans-Jordan there are 850,000 Arab refugees, having practically no work and living under conditions that are most deplorable.

In our workshop at Beth Berl in Israel I put that question to a lecturer. I said that I would like to visit the internment camps of the Arabs in Israel. He said "We have no Arabs in internment camps in Israel." He said that after the war of liberation there were 175,000 Arabs who stayed on, some of whom fought for them; also some Druses fought with them and remained. Some 125,000 of these are fruitfully employed in agriculture, and they are good farmers. I saw some of their co-operative farms. They are doing a magnificent job as farmers in Israel. He said the other 50,000 Arabs are fruitfully employed in different trades in that nation and belong to labour unions.

That is the situation as far as Israel is concerned. What happened with respect to the 850,000 that went into Trans-Jordan? To understand that you must study the history of Israel. Immediately after the war of liberation hundreds of thousands of people—I believe it was 750,000 Jewish people from Yemen, from Iraq and Iran—were thrown into that nation which was Israel within a short period of seven or eight months. Can you visualize the situation if in this country in the year 1954 we had to absorb 22 million new immigrants? That was the ratio to her population that Israel had to absorb when Yemen and other nations threw so many of their people into Israel; and most of them absolutely denuded of everything.

There is a problem. I am not here to say that everything done by Israel is absolutely perfect. But again I repeat that it is impossible at the present time and it will be impossible for all time to come to absorb the whole of the 850,000 immigrants. It is a great problem which the United Nations has been and is still trying to solve. Israel is ready, in fact is eager, for an over-all settlement, since armament expenditures weigh heavily on its struggling economy. Since they have the present armed armistice there, that little nation has financial and bloody border incidents and difficulties. The third week I was there, I woke up one morning to learn that three officials at the copper mines at the Dead sea had been killed in a frontier episode at that time. These things happen nearly every day. That sort of thing cannot exist indefinitely.

I want to assure you of this, however. Israel will never work for a war of aggrandizement, but she will defend Israel to her last man and her last woman. There is no doubt about that. That spirit has grown out of the past. It is historical; it is biblical. It has been with them for all time in all the centuries of dispersal. Now that the United Nations have given that nation the right of existence, they are going to remain there no matter what happens.

No doubt there will be some problems. For instance, there is the problem of the holy places. Israel and the United Nations want internationalization of the holy places, and the United Nations want internationalization of Jerusalem. There are two Jerusalems. There is the old Jerusalem that belongs almost wholly to Trans-Jordan. On the other hand Israel is building a magnificent new Jerusalem and it is a marvellous sight to see, gleaming in the sun, that white city which is perched over 3,000 feet in the sky.

I am not going to speak any more of that problem because it is away above me; but through the good offices of the United Nations and the understanding of the Arabic states and the Jewish state I hope they will find it possible eventually to rectify and solve the problem. Time will be a vital factor. But I hope the leaders of the Arabic states as well as the leaders of Israel will always keep in their minds the thought that co-operation and understanding are better than division and armed conflict. I have hope and belief that eventually great good will come there, because there are portents and signs. When speaking to individual Arabs, many of them told me: We have no animosity against the Jewish people because, historically speaking, we belong to the same race, and that is a fact. We see what they are accomplishing and we want to emulate these accomplishments. I must say that if tomorrow there is peace between all the Arabic states and Israel, you will have prosperity immediately that will create a stimulating situation from which the whole world will benefit.

That is all I want to say about this matter, but I thought it was my duty to mention it. Again I repeat that I went there as an individual, as a Canadian going there open-mindedly, in order to see on the ground for myself what that fine little nation was doing. I came back filled with admiration for the great work they are doing in this difficult situation. For years to come that nation will need the help of the United Nations and that of not only the Jewry of the world but also of all free citizens of the world, and this should also apply to the Arab states.

In closing I just want to say a few words about our committee. I must thank the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) for accepting again this year the vice-chairmanship. I thank him for the co-operation he has shown in all instances. We all know that the committee is wide open for the expression of any criticism and that the fullest opportunity is given to see everything the members want to see and to learn everything they want to find out from the Department of External Affairs. We always have the greatest possible freedom of discussion.

This afternoon the hon. member for Peel mentioned four different problems or subjects that may be brought to the attention of that committee. No doubt it will be possible for three of them to be brought before the committee without any new measure being introduced into parliament. But early in our activities I believe we should find out if it would be possible either for a subcommittee or the whole committee to start working on the amendment of the United Nations charter, or if we will need a special order of reference. I just leave that thought with parliament and with members of our committee.

In conclusion I want to make the same wish that I have made in the past. I want to thank the members for all they have done for me and for all the kind wishes they expressed to me before I left for Israel and Europe last summer. No doubt their wishes were heard by heaven because I had a marvellous trip and a most instructive one. All my days I shall cherish the memory of the new friends I made, and keep in mind the most ardent wishes and prayers for peace in our time.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, several sessions ago we had a long and somewhat fruitless debate on the subject of a national flag for Canada. Despite the monumental number of designs put before the committee, no decision was made and we are still flying the old flag, for which I have some considerable affection, even though it is criticized because of its alleged lack of a distinctive Canadian emblem.

In the matter of international dress, however, we have had little difficulty in choosing a distinctive national garment. We have almost unanimously adopted the hair shirt. The pained bleats of the socialist party and of the press, particularly that part of it which is supporting the government, as well as the anguished roars from the commentators on the C.B.C. criticizing Eisenhower and Dulles, deflated my pride in my country and has a tendency to fill me with shame. We have through this attitude of synthetic holiness become the Brahmins of the Occident. It is not a role which fits the character of the Canadian people, a great nation. It makes us look rather ridiculous to the people of the United States, which we cannot afford.

Let us look at this thing about Formosa. The Americans gave an order for the seventh fleet to patrol the Formosan straits, a neutralizing action. We set up a holler. They have now rescinded that order, and we set up a holler. Are we going to join the chorus of yapping dogs and continuously holler at everything the United States does? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. It is not in our keeping and I regret that part of the House of Commons and of the Canadian press has joined in this clamour.

What does the Formosan policy really mean? It is nothing but the beginning of the end of the policy of containment, the policy that was outlined in an anonymous article in 1947 in the periodical Foreign Affairs, the author of which has since become known. It was the belief that you could contain communism, that you could fight a limited war against a major power. Unpleasant as that may seem, the facts of history, the facts of war, have shown that that has always been impossible, and unless we are prepared to take a realistic attitude with regard to this situation we are going to destroy ourselves by wishful thinking.

I came across an article which I think sets the situation out extremely clearly, at least it does to me. The article is contained in the American Political Science Review for last month by Professor J. Morgenthau of the University of Chicago. I will read just two paragraphs of his summation of the situation. He says this:

> The Truman administration could not bring itself to taking resolutely the utopian or the realist position. It resolved to intervene in good measure on utopian grounds and in spite of military advice to the contrary; it allowed the military commander to advance to the Yalu river in disregard of the risk of the intervention of a great power against which collective security could be carried out only by means of a general war, and then refused to pursue the war with full effectiveness on the realist grounds of the risk of a third world war. Thus Mr. Truman in 1952 is caught in the same dilemma from which Mr. Baldwin could extricate himself in 1936 on the occasion of the league of nations sanctions against Italy's attack upon Ethiopia only at an enormous loss to British prestige. Collective security as a defence of the status quo short of a general war can be effective only against second-rate powers. Applied against a major power, it is a contradiction in terms, for it means necessarily a major war. Of this self-defeating contradiction Mr. Baldwin was as unaware in the thirties as Mr. Truman seems to be in 1952. Mr. Churchill put Mr. Baldwin's dilemma in these cogent terms: "First, the Prime Minister had declared that sanctions meant war; secondly, he was resolved that there must be no war; and thirdly, he decided upon sanctions. It was evidently impossible to comply with these three conditions." Similarly Mr. Truman had declared that the effective prosecution of the Korean war meant the possibility of a third world war; he resolved that there must be no third world war; and he decided upon intervention in the Korean war. Here, too, it is impossible to comply with these three conditions.
> Similar contradictions are inherent in the proposals which would substitute for the current policy of containment one of the liberation of the nations presently the captives of Russian communism. This objective can be compatible with the utopian or realist position, but the policies designed to secure it will be fundamentally different according to whether they are based upon one or the other position. The clearest case to date for the utopian justification of such policies has been made by Representative Charles J. Kersten of Wisconsin who pointed to those four "basic defects" of the "negative policy of containment and negotiated coexistence":
> It would be immoral and unchristian to negotiate a permanent agreement with forces which by every religious creed and moral precept are evil. It abandons nearly one-half of humanity and the once free nations of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Lithuania, Latvia, Esthonia and China to enslavement of the communist police state.
>
> It is un-American because it violates the principle of the American declaration of independence, which proclaims the rights of all people to freedom and their right and duty to throw off tyranny.
>
> It will lead to all-out world war III because it aligns all the forces of the non-communist world in military opposition to and against all the forces of the communist world, including 800 million peoples behind the iron curtain.
> The policy of mere containment is uneconomic and will lead to national bankruptcy.

If that be warmongering, make the best of it. Those are the unpleasant facts which we have to face. To pretend that we can prepare for and fight a limited war against a major power is nonsense. We are doing that only in our minds. Our military preparations are not to fight a limited war. What are the use of interceptor fighters unless to stop bombing of this country? Who is likely to bomb us if we are going to fight merely a limited war? What is our whole anti-submarine work in the navy for unless it is to prevent attrition on the high seas in an unlimited war? What are the full physical preparations of arms in this country for, and I submit in every other country which is fighting communism, if it is not for an unlimited war? It is only in men's minds that we think in terms of a limited war. This is now being changed in the United States.

I had the privilege of attending the meetings of the United Nations and listening for two complete days to almost the entire debate when the Indian proposals for a cease-fire in Korea were being considered by the ad hoc committee. I listened to the spokesman of one communist nation after another get up and say "no" in about sixty different ways. There was absolutely no hope of the slightest possibility in any statement I heard, and I listened most carefully, that there was a loophole in communist thinking so that they would adopt or even go part way toward accepting not only the Indian proposition, which I think was a fair compromise, but any proposition which was not wholly their own; and their own was wholly unacceptable.

The press of the free world tried to find loopholes, tried to find some shading of words, some shading of opinion to indicate that there was a change in the communist attitude. There was no change in the communist attitude, and there is no change in the communist attitude. We are fooling no one except ourselves if we believe there is. Talking of communists reminds me of the years when I was in South America. There was a large type of parrot known as the macaw which was quite common. This was a very interesting bird with a large beak, and if you spoke to it, it would reply with a squawk. To me that is similar to talking to the Russians; there is a great deal of noise but very little real conversation. The more you see of their attitude, the more you see of the impossible impracticability of communist thinking, the more you realize that the only thing they understand is leading from strength.

The Formosan move is a step in that direction. As hon. members know, Formosa is a key island off the China coast. It is close to the United States naval base at Okinawa and only 70 miles from the Philippines. It came rather as a surprise to me to find out how extensive were the operations that have been carried on from Formosa in the past year or so. Raids are almost continuous from the island. One raid that took place quite recently had a strength of 4,000 effectives and they captured over 800 prisoners.

There are said to be some 21 divisions of comparatively battle-worthy troops on Formosa at the present time, which is the equivalent of 10 United States divisions. These men are fit, but they lack weapons. There is a potential of some 2,000 pilots, of whom 700 are said to be capable of carrying on combat missions. Some 50 to 100 are training in the United States at the present time on the most modern type of jet fighter. There is a potential of man power, of air power and also of sea power.

What sort of game are we playing if we try to neutralize a potential friendly force as large as this? It seems to me that we are still trying to fight a war in Asia with foreign troops. In other words, we are trying to fight an Asian war with troops from Europe, from the United States, from Canada and the United Kingdom. Ever since the days of Jenghiz Khan, the days of Alexander, the days of the East India Company, the days of the Indian mutiny, it has been obvious that you cannot fight a successful war in Asia without Asian troops to fight it. With the manpower potential in China it is quite obviously ridiculous to try to send European or American forces to that country. They would become lost. The manpower potential against them would be not a hundred to one but a thousand to one, and it would be the most arrant and shocking waste. Yet it would also be unrealistic to say that China is lost to the free world and that we will do nothing to assist in her liberation. Far from the Formosan incident extending the war, surely even if it brings out only a few raids we will be able to pin down more communist troops which could be employed against us in Korea if they were not so occupied.

Then there is the question of the Hong Kong-Shanghai railway, the one north and south railway in China and extremely vulnerable artery. Surely the severance of this railway from time to time or the complete destruction of it would strike a blow against the Chinese communist government which would be of major importance.

It seems that whenever our side takes positive action we get nothing but criticism. What are we going to do? Are we going to stand aside and bankrupt ourselves, or are we going to fight this war on the same terms as the communists? For my money, I believe we have to fight it on the same terms as theirs.

Let us come to the next question, the horrible suggestion that there might be a blockade of the China coast. Today 75 per cent of the Chinese communist supplies come from Russia, chiefly along the trans-Siberian railway from Vladivostok or from the Sakhalin islands, skirting Japan and getting into China that way, thus avoiding the Korean war zone. About 25 per cent of it comes from across the sea directly into China. Theoretically that is not a war potential, but just yesterday the French union forces fighting in Indo-China came across in what they call area D, which I understand is completely jungle, machine tools of the very largest type capable of boring artillery rifles, capable of manufacturing ordnance and weapons of very considerable size and numbers.

The French say: How did these machine tools get into the jungle? Certainly they were not made in the jungle. Certainly they were not made at Saigon. There is only one way in which these machine tools got there. They were shipped in. Is it so unrealistic, when they and we are fighting a war, to do something about stopping the enemy's potential supply of arms? It seems to me that it is comparatively elemental; yet when the suggestion of blockading the China coast is made you would think the end of the world had come.

I want to mention briefly the situation in Indo-China. We have discussed the Korean situation at some length. Let me say that there is a very real and very large war going on in Indo-China, and I think some slight recapitulation of the casualties of the French union forces would be of interest. Since 1945 there have been 90,000 men killed, missing or wounded. Of this number 1,452 were officers, and the number actually dead is extremely high, being close to 40,000. Compare that with the losses of the United Nations forces in Korea as of October, 1952. Since the beginning of the war there have been 21,471 killed, 9,403 missing and 89,000 wounded. Here you have a major war going on in Indo-China. Naturally, as has been said in the house, one cannot expect that France, being occupied in such a major war, can also put forward an all-out effort in the European theatre. I think it is unwise for people to be critical of the failure of France to fulfil her NATO commitments. Practically no other country has been able to do it, and France has been fighting an all-out war with casualties in the numbers I have mentioned.

I come now to Malaya and Hong Kong. In Malaya the United Kingdom has no less than 40,000 troops. I should not say the United Kingdom, because many of them are Malayans, there are some Africans, and a Fiji battalion; but they are British troops. There are 20,000 in Hong Kong and a further 20,000 in Korea. That means that the economy of the United Kingdom is supporting 80,000 troops in that part of Asia. Surely this all adds up to the fact that a major war is going on at the present time.

The policy of containment, the policy of neutralizing the war or attempting to isolate the war, has certainly failed. We are now adopting, or the United States is adopting, a more realistic attitude toward the situation.

I want to mention briefly the situation in Europe. I was privileged to spend about a month behind the iron curtain, not only in East Germany and in Austria, but in two of the satellite countries. The feeling in the satellite countries is such that there are literally millions of people in Europe hoping for war because by war they stand their only chance of liberation from their Russian masters.

There is no question about it; when the German troops went into the Ukraine they were met with garlands as deliverers. That feeling still exists. When we say that we are fighting a purely limited war, what encouragement does that give to these people behind the iron curtain? What encouragement does it give to the people of the Ukraine, who have the dream that some day there will be a free Ukrainian state? What encouragement does it give to the people of Poland, of Czechoslovakia or of Hungary, who have the dream that again they will be free? It gives them no encouragement.

I saw enough to know that one of the reasons Russia did not attack when she was prepared in 1947 was that she was not sure of her people. Well, Mr. Speaker, she was not sure then and she is very much less sure of them now. We have to encourage those people, and we have to encourage them by our policy. A policy of restricted action, of containment, of an isolated war is something that does not bring them encouragement. They want to be free; they want to get out from under the yoke of communism. Just as we are fighting communism, so they want to fight communism.

If there is proof needed of that, look at the purges that are now going on. There is not any satellite country today that has had a continuing communist hierarchy which has lasted for over a year. Surely that shows the conditions of unrest which exist. I think there is a very direct connection between the alliance or the joint action taken by Greece, Turkey and Yugoslavia in the Balkans. I am sure that the impact of this anti-cominform pact on countries like Bulgaria, Albania and even Roumania is certainly very considerable. Now, are we going to encourage that? Are we going to encourage an attack there on the flank? Of course we are. Why, then, should we not encourage an attack on the other flank in China? There are many ways of beating the communists, and we have to use all of them.

Let us not try to play a safe war. There is no such thing as a safe war, and to attempt to play it that way is the surest way to national suicide. We have to be prepared in our minds to realize that there is no such thing as a safe war.

One last problem we have to meet is the problem of German refugees. Today there are about 1,000 refugees fleeing East Germany every day. They get over the frontier and come into Berlin in different ways, and they impose a tremendous problem of housing and overcrowding, not only in Berlin but in the whole West German state. This overcrowding and this apparent lack of interest on our part in these refugees is in my opinion—and I spent some time in Germany—one of the contributing causes of the rise of neo-nazism. I heard it said over and over again: America and Canada are not interested in us because they won't do anything about this overcrowding.

I feel that one of the things that must be done if we are going to have stability in the West German government and if we are going to prevent the rise of neo-nazism is to see that something is done about the problem of the German refugee fleeing from the communists in East Germany.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) terminated his speech?

Mr. Adamson: No, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Adamson the debate was adjourned.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Second report of standing committee on marine and fisheries.—Mr. Ashbourne.

PRIVATE BILL

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved:

That the petition for a private bill to incorporate the Merit Plan Insurance Company presented on Thursday, February 12, 1953, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on Friday, February 13, 1953, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as they may deem advisable.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION AS TO REPORTED SHORTAGE IN FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the report which has appeared in the press referring to government intervention in the matter, has the Prime Minister any information to give the house with respect to the news report today as to a shortage in the funds of the Civil Service Co-operative Credit Society Limited and what steps have been taken by the government to deal with it?

Mr. St. Laurent: The Minister of Finance can perhaps answer that.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I saw the news report this morning. The Civil Service Co-operative Credit Society Limited is a credit society incorporated under the province of Ontario Credit Unions Act. It has been in existence for some forty years, I believe, and has some 9,000 members all of whom are federal civil servants. A short time ago it was discovered that there appeared to be shortages in the funds of the society amounting to some $120,000 or $130,000. The government, of course, is not in any way concerned, directly or indirectly, with the management of the society which is operated under the act to which I have referred; but it has an interest in the affairs of the society because all of the employees are government employees. When the matter was reported to me it was indicated that the society proposed to take steps to investigate the management, auditing system and so on in order to ascertain what had caused the shortage; and as will have been seen from the press report this morning, a strong committee of senior civil servants has been set up to that end.

It is not clear yet what has caused the shortage but I think there is a pretty fair assumption that it has been inadequate bookkeeping methods over a considerable number of years; and it may well have been due to an improper setting up of profits which had not in fact been earned.

In any event, when the situation was reported to the government it was decided that, on the condition that the society take steps to see that its affairs were properly handled, the government would recommend to parliament the making of a loan to the society of up to $100,000 at an interest rate of 4 per cent, repayable in instalments out of profits. That is the position at the moment.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF HEADQUARTERS TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters). Can the minister say if the decision has been made to move the national film board to Montreal? If so, where is the new site to be, and when will the move be made?

Mr. Fulton: If he can answer that, why can he not answer my question?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker probably it will be recalled that J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited, management consultants, in their report on the national film board in March of 1950, and the special committee on the national film board which was set up to study the board's annual report last year, both reported the present accommodation to be unsuited to the purposes of the board. Both recommended that more adequate accommodation be provided and that the operations be assembled under one roof.

In the light of these recommendations as well as those of the board itself, it has been decided to move the operating sections of the national film board to the Montreal area, and a site has been acquired by the Department of Public Works in Ville St. Laurent. Plans are presently being completed and it is proposed that construction of the building will start later this year. It will be at least two years before the move can be made.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask a question of the Minister of Resources and Development in the light of the fact that he has just given an answer to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton). Would the minister say when I may expect an answer to a question passed as an order for return by this house in connection with the same subject and asking for much the same information as the hon. member for Mount Royal asked for. The question was passed as an order for return on February 4, 1953.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Public Works is compiling the information and I understand that he will have a return which will be tabled very shortly.

FISHERIES

EXTENSION OF SMELT FISHING SEASON— PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacNaught). I have had requests from the smelt fishermen on the East river in Prince Edward Island—and no doubt the department has had requests from them also—asking for an extension for ten days of the smelt fishing season. Will the department give consideration to this matter as it is of immense importance to the smelt fishermen.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I wish to thank the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. I also received inquiries from the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Leger), the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. McWilliam) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) relative to the extension of the smelt fishing season in their respective constituencies.

A complete investigation has been carried out by the departmental officials and, as a result of that investigation, and from the experience gained last year when the closing dated was extended, it has been decided that it is not in the interests of the proper conservation of those species of fish to extend the season.

CIVIL SERVICE

HOURS OF WORK AND RATES OF PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to make any statement as to the outcome of the conference that he was to have had at noon today with representatives of the civil service regarding rates of pay and hours of work?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I can report to the house that there were compliments exchanged on both sides.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

INQUIRY AS TO EMBARGO BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the messages that passed between the Canadian government and the United States government in connection with the embargo by the United States government against certain Canadian farm products. What was the nature of the representations made by Canada with reference to this question, and what was the reply of the United States as to the removal of these embargoes?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am not in a position to give any precise information beyond that which would appear in the note to the United States government which was printed as an appendix to Hansard of Wednesday, February 11, in which representations are made and previous representations are referred to.

The hon. gentleman's question is in pretty broad terms—I would imagine that the terms would apply even to livestock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not speaking of livestock but of certain agricultural products.

Mr. St. Laurent: Field, vegetable or dairy products?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Dairy products.

Mr. St. Laurent: Dairy products. Well, I will have the records looked up and get the precise information. For the moment the only precisions I can give are those which are already on Hansard in this appendix to the report for Wednesday, February 11.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) a question of which I have given him notice. Is the minister able to confirm a report that negotiations for the purchase by the British Columbia Telephone Company of the government telephone system in that province have been broken off or have been concluded?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am not aware that the negotiations have broken down or have been broken off. As a matter of fact I do not know that it can be said that the negotiations have started. I indicated to the house some time ago that representatives of the British Columbia Telephone Company came to me following a report which our officers had made on the facilities in British Columbia. They simply asked that matters be held over for some time so that they could be allowed to study the report and come back. They have not yet come back and that is why I say I do not think that it can be said that negotiations have even started. I am informed, however, that they intend to come to Ottawa in the not too distant future.

Mr. Graydon: Another exchange of compliments.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 85 to 104 inclusive of the main estimates, 1953-54, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I had finished my remarks last night and only asked for the adjournment of the debate in order to protest against those members who shout "time" to you and who now have delegated themselves to be the keeper not only of your conscience but of your clock as well.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, when he introduced the motion under discussion, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made a thorough and comprehensive report on the international situation and dealt particularly with our relations with the United States, South America and the commonwealth, outlining the government's policy in its relationships to those countries. He gave also detailed information as to the government's attitude on Korea, the situation in the Far East, and in southeast Asia, and he wound up his report with the problems facing NATO and the Canadian attitude with reference to them.

I think the house and the country will agree with most of what the minister said and, by and large, we all can rejoice that Canada's policies are dictated by good judgment and by a cautious approach to every new development in world affairs; and also with courage and vision, assuming a firm attitude when required.

We are all in agreement, I think, that our over-all role should be the maintenance of peace in the world so that our country may continue to develop harmoniously and with the gigantic strides it has taken in the last ten years. But we are also determined to do our share to see that peace is secured by taking all the steps judged necessary to deter any nation from attempting to dominate the world. The minister has earned our approval and appreciation for the share he has played in drafting Canadian policies in international affairs, and for the role he has played on the international scene, as well as for the lustre that is reflected on Canada through his well deserved popularity and authority in the councils of the United Nations.

I have pleasure also at this stage in saying a word of appreciation of the part played by the member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) in his capacity as chairman of the external affairs committee. His career should stand out as an example to many young men who aspire to enter politics, as well as many new members in this house. Over the years the hon. gentleman has literally made himself into a worthy parliamentarian, and he deserves the highest consideration from his constituents, from his province and from this house.

Before entering upon the main body of my remarks, I should like to sound a note of caution as I did last year about the danger of accepting too readily the leadership of our neighbours to the south in international affairs. For too long a period of her existence has Canada been bound by British policies when this country was under the tutelage of that great power. For far too long have Canada's policies been based on British policies or influenced by British interests since we have become of age. For far too long, in my opinion of course, this state of affairs has been more of a burden than an advantage to our country. Knowing how serious the consequences of being tied to the policies of a great power may be, no matter how friendly that power might be, we should be more than cautious today not to put ourselves in the same relationship to another great power. Surely we have not disentangled ourselves from the cobwebs of British international interests to tie our fate to policies that are made in Washington and about which we are not even consulted.

Of course Canadians realize that, in a world split into two spheres of influence, their own interest lies with those with whom they have the most in common and with the country whose economy has most impact upon theirs. Most Canadians have sympathy and understanding for their powerful neighbour but they would not relish the idea of playing the role of a satellite any more than the people in the satellite countries of the Soviet must like the role their country is called upon to play. It is hoped that the new administration in Washington will not overlook the advisability of dealing with our country with all due care and attention. In this way they may be certain that they will gain more friendship from a partner frequently consulted than from a reluctant or hesitant follower.

Canadian policies, Mr. Speaker, should be made in Ottawa, having in view Canadian interests and the commitments made by us in the interests of the preservation of world peace. I, for one, was favourably impressed by the cautious way in which the minister touched on the situation in Korea and the Far East during his speech. It is to be noted, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is committed to its share of the policing activities of the United Nations in Korea, and that is as far as this parliament has authorized the government to go. The statement by the minister that the guiding principle of Canadian policy in Korea is to do everything possible to restrict the present hostilities to the Korean peninsula was a renewed assurance of Canada's position that will meet with wholehearted approval in the country.

I should like also to call attention to another statement the minister made which has the approval of most Canadians. He said, as recorded at page 1853 of Hansard for February 11, 1953:

> We do not believe, accordingly, that the western powers should press for military or economic measures, at the United Nations or elsewhere, which would certainly not be supported and indeed might be actively opposed by important non-communist Asian states, and which without such support would be less effective in ending the Korean war than in extending it.

And later on the same page he said:

> It is, of course, very natural indeed to desire to hit the aggressor in new places and with new weapons, but it is also wise to realize that in consequence he may also hit us somewhere else and with new weapons.

The path, Mr. Speaker, between the desire for peace at all costs and the desire to see our cause triumph at all costs is narrow and full of dangers. In the first instance, we would agree to some bargaining, and in the second instance we might contribute to the doom of tomorrow, because no victor can emerge from the next conflict and enjoy his victory.

However, my object in rising today was not so much to expand on what the minister had said as to make a few remarks on the conditions that prevail in other parts of the world, and which may have a bearing on the maintenance of peace. In a situation such as that which has prevailed in the world since the end of world war II, one cannot overlook any of the events or problems which may, in one way or another, worsen the chances of preventing a new world conflict. Nor should we forget that the events in the world may depend on the outcome of other moves that may be made from time to time on the chessboard of the world.

One of the spots where problems may be less acute at this moment, but no less important than those prevailing elsewhere in the world, is the Middle East. When the politburo chose Korea as the testing ground of American resiliency, shall I say, there is no doubt that many spots were considered, and that the Middle East, particularly Iran, was one of the possibilities. The fact that they chose Korea should be a cause of satisfaction for us but not of reassurance. Our satisfaction must come from the fact that the Middle East is much more vitally important to us, and that the situation there may still be saved. But we should not be reassured until the proper and necessary steps have been taken to improve and consolidate our position in that area. These steps will demand more understanding and more determination to co-operate and help than has been shown in recent years by Britain, and more positive, friendly action than has already been taken by the United States.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the awkward and delicate position, in order to substantiate the views I have reached, of giving the house an account of a trip I undertook in the Middle East last fall. In the course of this trip I had the privilege of meeting most of the outstanding statesmen in that region of the world. If the house will bear with me for a moment,

I shall give a few highlights of my journey, and mention some of the people I interviewed, before I come to the conclusions I have reached.

I might say, first, that all but one of the interviews I had I arranged myself upon reaching a capital by calling directly the secretary of the official I intended to see or in some instances the protocol section of the foreign affairs department. On such occasions I stated that my trip was purely personal, but that as a member of this house I would eventually report to it or to the external affairs committee. In each case I was received with the utmost courtesy, and I would say cordiality. Everywhere I found that Canada enjoys the highest consideration in that part of the world, and this may be explained best by using the words of one of these statesmen, who said:

> Canada entered two world wars without being threatened in its territory; it did its share nobly without any other motive than that of sharing in collective security measures; it helped others in time of stress; it reaped no material gains in return. It hurt nobody because it had no expansionists aims, whether territorial or commercial. It is not surprising therefore that it still enjoys the consideration it well earned by its conduct.

Be that as it may, I must say it gave me great pride in our country to experience the warm hospitality and the greeting I received everywhere.

Before proceeding to the Middle East I spent about three weeks in Greece and Turkey where I had long interviews in Athens with Mr. Venizelos, the then minister of foreign affairs, and in Ankara with the foreign minister, Mr. Koprulu. In Teheran I met Mr. Navab, the then foreign minister, and Mr. Mabil the permanent under-secretary, as well as members of parliament and generals of the army. Unfortunately my appointment with Premier Mossadegh was fixed for a date on which it was not possible for me to return to Teheran. In Baghdad I met the acting minister of foreign affairs, the permanent deputy head of that department and the British ambassador. In Beirut I was received by President Chamoun, and also had an interview with Mr. Hamid Frangye who was twice a delegate of Lebanon to the United Nations. In Damascus I had a long talk with Colonel Shishakly, who led the coup of 1948 and is the recognized leader of the country. In Amman I was received by the prime minister, Tewfik Pasha Abuluda, and in Israel I had luncheon with the foreign minister Mr. Sharett. In Cairo I spent over an hour and a quarter with the prime minister, General Mohammed Naguib.

I apologize for this long reference to the personal contacts I established in the Middle East but considered it better to do it that way so as not to refer later to any of the personal and sometimes candid and open statements made by some of these statesmen and leaders.

The first and consoling conclusion is that none of these leaders favour the advent of communism in their part of the world and that none would like to see Soviet expansion be the result of the actions of their governments. Most of them favour a form of mid-eastern entente connected with or related to a Mediterranean defence pact, but none would favour his country entering it unless it be on terms of absolute equality of status, and in the case of Egypt only when any form of external influence in the shape of occupational troops or otherwise has ceased.

None of them thought that the U.S.S.R. would attempt any violation of any territory in the Middle East unless a general war developed in the world. Some of them recognized the danger of communist uprisings or communist-inspired parties gaining power, but significantly enough none admitted this danger to exist in his own country.

As to the Israeli-Arab feud, both sides profess that they observed the armistice terms and that the other side did not. All expressed the conviction that the conflict will not flare up anew, but while Israel professes that it would be ready to sign a peace treaty along the lines of the armistice terms with minor modifications of frontiers, the Arab states do not appear to be ready to go that far at this moment.

There is a strong trend towards nationalism and a distinct suspicion of, and antagonism to, outside pressure or influence throughout the Middle East.

The result is that if there is distrust of the Soviets, there is not on the other side any particular sympathy for Britain, France or the United States. Britain is decidedly most unpopular in Iran, Israel and Egypt. France has lost popularity in Lebanon and Syria on account of the happenings in Tunisia and Morocco. As to the United States, they dominate the whole area commercially but they have gained yet no true sympathy.

Statesmen expect much from United States leadership but seem to think that the United States lacks understanding of their problems and of the mentality of their peoples. There is a great opportunity for United States diplomacy in the Middle East but much will depend on the personnel sent there by the new administration and by their approach to local situations.

Of all this area, Lebanon, a small country, is the one where modernization in our western sense has made the most rapid steps. The country professes to have no grudge against anybody; it has apparently joined the fight against Israel more out of solidarity with the neighbouring Arab states than out of any real antagonism. There is no sign of xenophobia, and foreign investors are welcome.

The recent overthrow of the former president was more in the way of purifying the atmosphere of alleged graft and corruption, and the main reform in sight is that dealing with granting of more liberal and democratic election laws so that parliament be more fully representative of the population. There is no serious threat of communist gains from the inside. The economic situation is fair and the recent agreements with Syria should greatly benefit both countries.

Syria, or at least Damascus and the neighbouring villages, does not give evidence to an outsider of living under a military dictatorship. There are no troops or state police in sight and the man in the street does not complain. People expect agrarian and electoral reforms, both greatly needed; in the first instance, to break up large domains and give ownership of the land to those who work it and, in the second, to enlarge the electorate and take parliament away from the control of the privileged few.

There is no strong manifestation of communist gains but the masses are poor and if it was not for the hope in reforms, which some claim to be overdue after four years of the present regime and for the confidence still enjoyed by Shishakly, the ground would be fertile as everywhere in the Middle East for communist gains.

When I visited Iraq it was apparently calm but it is undeniable that the communists were active and that the social and economic situations are far from sane and would easily lead to mass uprisings unless reforms are instituted or a strong regime implanted, which seems to be what happened after the November riots.

The Hashemite kingdom of the Jordan was a one-man show, that of the late King Abdullah, and it is kept in existence by the Arab legion of Glubb Pasha under the guiding hand of Tewfik Pasha, who was Abdullah's trusted friend and executive assistant. The country has inside problems of adjustment between its old and new populations. It is poor but it has the best trained army in the Middle East and the largest of any country in proportion to its population.

Israel, given twenty years of peace, can, even within the boundaries fixed by the armistice, become a great country. It is a land of experimentation in sociology and genetics, as well as in agriculture and industry. Its population is dedicated to a cause and full of zeal. Providing it gets from the outside assistance in the form of capital investments and donations, and providing it can straighten out its relations with its neighbours, it is bound to become a constructive factor in the stabilization of the Middle East.

I may say that I owe much of my better understanding of Israel to a distinguished Canadian, Mr. A. H. Friedgut, Q.C., formerly of Winnipeg and now representative of the Canadian zionist movement in Jerusalem, who spared no time and energy to have me, in the week I spent in that country, become acquainted with its leaders, its people and its problems.

In relation to the Palestinian question, I must add that the fate of the Arabs from Palestine who sought refuge in neighbouring countries must remain the object of special consideration by the United Nations and other organizations and their resettlement hastened if a cause of friction is to be minimized, if not entirely eradicated.

Excepting Lebanon and Israel, all the Middle East countries are underdeveloped, their populations are poor and illiterate, and were it not for the fatalism of Islam would be the most fertile ground for communism. Help under point four and under United Nations organizations could greatly improve the situation, provided the necessary reforms were undertaken to lessen the gap between the privileged few and the needy masses.

Under the present circumstances there is no incentive for them to join one side more than another, and they might prove to be passive and fatalistic onlookers in the event of an encounter on their territories.

Iran has been one of the trouble spots of the world since the end of the war. It is significant that Russia did not make it its proving ground, and accepted the rebuff made to its puppet government of Azerbaijan in 1946. Things move so quickly that most people have forgotten those events, and the oil dispute now overshadows in our minds all other problems. The Iranian problem cannot be considered only as a fight between an obstinate and theatrical old man and an arrogant world power. One must look more deeply into all those angles to understand fully the situation. I was given access both at the Iranian embassy in Paris and at the foreign ministry in Teheran to all the documentation supplied to Mr. Averell Harriman when he went there as President Truman's personal representative.

From this point on I must apologize for my remarks as I did not have a chance to make notes of what I want to say.

The Iranian problem is one that has to be considered from two different angles. First of all, you have the legal point on which I am personally positive that the British case stands up well. So far as the legal position of the British is concerned, I am quite sure that the stand taken by Britain is one that would be upheld in any court.

An agreement was entered into in 1902 with gentlemen who later organized a company, which company eventually became the property of the British government to the extent of 53 per cent. The terms were specific. They were revised and extended in 1933, after strong pressure from Britain, and all of a sudden the agreement was disregarded by the Iranian government. In a court of justice it would be considered as a contract that had not been fulfilled, and Britain would eventually win the case. But we have to look further into the Iranian case. There is also the question of equity, the question of opportunity as well as the relation the problem has to world peace and especially to peace in the Middle East. The agreement with the British government was such—I have not the figures with me, nor the documentation—that in one year the British government, owning 53 per cent of the shares, collected in taxes as well as in dividends on their shares about £53 million; while in the same year the Iranian government got for the oil that came out of the country £16 million. That was legal, but was it fair and equitable in the circumstances? Was it possible, with the nationalist feeling that existed in the Middle East, that that state of affairs could go on for interminable periods? Could that continue without provoking a demand for the nationalization of the oil industry?

I contend that had Britain gone to the former prime minister, Ali Razmara, who was assassinated, and offered to him the terms that they have since offered to Mossadegh, the former prime minister might not have been murdered and the oil industry might not have been nationalized. But the forward steps that were taken were so hesitant and they came so late that the nation was incited to demand more and more by fanatics or extremist politicians, to the point that within the last few years we have seen Mossadegh gain power after having all his life claimed that the British had abused his country, and so on.

Although Britain's case was sound legally, it would have been good international politics to accept better terms on time and not too late, and we might not have been faced with the situation that confronts us now. As it is, the country is in such a position that i any prime minister or any man wanted t go back on the stand taken by Mossadegh o demand less he would be either overthrow or murdered. I would go so far as to sa that there might be very few serious publi men in Iran today who would be willing t take the old man's place should he die fro natural or other causes, or should he b defeated. The conditions in the country ar such, with religious extremist influences pre dominant on one side and the Tudeh com munist party agitating on the other side, tha there is no telling what might happen. W have seen lately that in the fight betwee Mossadegh and Mullah Kashani, Mossadeg got the best of it. I think the country i behind him at this moment as it was a yea or so ago. Of course one must understand th difficulty of a great power withdrawing o receding from its previous position but think the only solution is, if we do no want the government there to go bankrup any more than it is now, if we do not wan them to be forced into the position wher they will have no money to pay their arm or their civil servants, if we do not wan conditions to get worse, to have an agree ment reached under which an internationa company, let us say, or a United State company, but preferably an internationa company, manned by about 500 experts o the different nations of the world, would b set up to operate the oil industry. Right no the reserves at present in Abadan should b gradually liquidated, and instead of th British trying to stop every ship that passe Aden or elsewhere, they could protest to th international court of justice or otherwis but let the oil go through so that more mone would come into the country to finance i and at least stabilize it so that we would no get a worse condition than we have now.

We have seen Kashani flirting with th Tudeh elements, and opposed to that is rather theatrical, weeping old man who i the only force at the moment that stand in the way of worse conditions. At th moment we do not have an ideal man t deal with. The moment may come whe we might have nobody to deal with, and th conditions might be much worse. It is on of the sore spots of the world. It demand brilliant diplomacy on the part of othe nations whose representatives are keepin in touch at all times with Teheran and th situation there and try to induce the Britis to relent, because nothing can be done fro within unless oil is sold and money come in, and the oil refineries start working again

It is all very well to stand on lega grounds, but we must not be like the ma who was on the highway and said: "I am in my rights in staying on the right hand side of the road", even though he sees a bulldozer right in front of him. We should not ruin the chance that we have of keeping this nation in stability instead of being influenced from within by communism.

I have met statesmen who have said that Russia will never invade any of these countries. Why should they? One by one many of them might fall prey to inside communist influences. The only one where the danger is actually present is Iran, and I think it is high time that the situation was taken in hand and something was done about it.

I will now consider Egypt where, as I said before, I had the privilege of having a long interview with the prime minister. I arrived there on the day after the agreement had been signed with the Sudanese representatives and on the day also that Naguib was presiding over a meeting of the Arab League. If I might interject another personal word, I was supposed to see him at five-thirty, and at six-fifteen I saw coming out of an adjoining room all the members of the Arab League headed by the son of Ibn Saud, the crown prince of Saudi Arabia, who was followed by delegates of the other Arab states.

I thought my interview would be very short at that time, since the hour was getting late. I had been told that the German ambassador was supposed to see the general right after me. In spite of that, however, I was brought in and told that there was no hurry.

The general showed considerable interest in Canada, and a better knowledge of this country than one would expect. He has a better knowledge of Canada than I found in many other places, and knows about conditions in our country. I might say, in passing, that he complains that we have not reciprocated by sending a diplomatic mission here, when one has been established in Canada. I might also add that the same has been said in Lebanon and Israel. Evidently there are reasons for this about which no doubt the minister knows more than I do. My only answer was that we hoped that we might reciprocate in the not-too-distant future.

I might add that I was favourably impressed by the general's unassuming, sincere and unselfish attitude. Despite all that may have been said as to his dispensing with the constitution for three years, I have become convinced that he is devoid of personal motives, and that his intentions were really to give his country a more democratic form of government, after the purification of the present parties.

[Mr. Picard.]

The situation in Egypt, I need not remind hon. members, is such that out of a population of 20 million about half a million live decently, while the rest are on the verge of poverty. Without any wish to insult the relatives of any former ministers in that country, it was generally understood that to enter the cabinet ensured the fortune not only of the minister but of his friends and relatives.

The present prime minister said, himself, that one of the main endeavours in his work was to make sure that the same condition would not prevail in respect of the new group taking office. He pointed out that a reform of the civil service would take considerable time, and that we could not expect any radical change in a short time.

I was in the country to a point as far removed as the border of Sudan, and talked to many civil servants including judges and crown attorneys in rural districts. They all expect that within five years' time we will see a great change brought about by Naguib and his government. None seemed to think that the propaganda spread by the Wafdists and other enemies of Naguib proved that Naguib is a puppet in the hands of a few who run the country.

It is true that the movement came first from a group of young men in the army, many of whom were disgusted with conditions in the Egyptian army during the Palestinian war, and many others who just had army training and felt that they could do some good by helping to bring about a reform in the government of the day.

Those men at one time chose Naguib as the one most likely to gain popular favour, and the one whose advent at the moment would best bind the group together and strengthen it.

I must assure the house that the general opinion throughout the country, certainly among those people in different classes to whom I have spoken, is that the man himself is no fool, and that he is not the puppet of anyone. I came to the same conclusion after talking with him. The reform in Egypt came first in the agrarian laws, which I have read entirely, but the explanation of which would take too long. These reforms are earmarked to bring about better conditions throughout the rural classes, while not depriving the agricultural industry of the machinery already existing.

Personal holdings, for instance, are limited to 200 acres. Formerly holdings were as high as 50,000, 100,000 or 150,000 acres. Of course some will say that the breaking up of these vast domains which were operated in some instances with modern machinery would work against the progress of agriculture in the country. The law provides however that in such territories as were administered as a unit the machinery shall be co-operative, as obtains in the great co-operative organizations in our own country, so that the people may share it.

Loans are to be given to these people. Owners are supposed to be repaid within a period of twenty years out of the rents the farmers will pay for their farms.

At the time I was there the two great events were the agrarian reforms and the agreement on the Sudan question. I saw yesterday that an agreement has been made with the British government concerning Sudan, an agreement more or less along the same line as the one that had been reached with the Sudanese themselves, except that in the first agreement they had the opportunity of choosing between complete independence and union with Egypt.

In the first one they were supposed to take that decision within three years in a plebiscite. In the new agreement there is added the possibility, according to British news agencies, of their joining the crown or staying with Great Britain through having some form of government under the British crown. But that is a minor point, in the end.

The important point was to let the people of the country determine the future of their own country: they were the ones to decide. I might say this, that the reaching of that agreement, the unification of the people of the Nile, the throwing out, if I may use that word, of the outsiders, was the scheme claimed to be one of the great achievements of the general at the time.

During conversations the general said, "I am not anti-British. I recognize what they have done. I also recognize that over the last seventy years they have said from year to year that they were going out. They have not started to go out yet. I do not necessarily demand that they go tomorrow, but I would like to be sure that within a period of five years the country will be entirely free of outside troops. The reaching of that end can be studied and considered peacefully by the two countries."

Far from being an extremist or decidedly anti-British, I found the general to be very broadminded on all such questions. I found him to be well informed on all international affairs. I am one who thinks—and there are many others who are of the same opinion—that the present conditions in Egypt are for the good, and would bring about a betterment in the administration of the country, as well as of conditions throughout the country generally.

However, as was pointed out to me by some more democratically inspired statesmen during that trip, it is to be deplored that because of the lack of timely reforms the pattern developed in some of these countries in terms of a strong army leadership and undemocratic government. But, at this stage, to many this seems to be one of the necessary evils to counteract communist influence.

The leaders I met all professed and proclaimed that their aim was to promote an efficient restoration of democratic institutions, and they believed this to be possible only after a general purification of the former habits of autocratic governments which were democratic only in appearance, and in the hands of a few privileged leaders who ran the country only for their own selfish interests and those of their friends and families.

I had intended to talk about certain matters concerning the internal administration of the department. I think however that at this stage I shall leave the discussion of those matters until the committee on external affairs sits. There is one thing though that I should like to say, before I take my seat, by way of a suggestion to the minister. Wherever I have entered a Canadian embassy abroad I have never seen a picture of the Governor General or the Prime Minister of this country. In some places they have a picture of the former King and Queen, probably the new Queen now, but after all we are a country that has institutions of its own and I do not think it would be considered political propaganda to display a picture of the Prime Minister and one of the Governor General, because with our institutions—let us hope it will take a long time to come—prime ministers may change and parties may change. Therefore there is no political aspect involved in the suggestion. When foreigners enter our embassies I think it would be good for them to know that we have a representative of the Queen and that we have a Prime Minister. So far as suggestions are concerned that is as far as I will go at the moment with respect to the internal affairs of the department.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in this debate the temptation is great to range the world over but I intend to discipline myself and speak on only one particular aspect of the United Nations, the position today of the secretariat. Before I proceed to do that I think I should express the feeling of pride with which Canadians saw a fellow Canadian, in the person of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), preside over the assembly of the nations of the world. It was a great tribute to my hon.

friend and one which was richly deserved. It was a tribute to Canada too, but since the minister has had no small part in the formulation of Canadian policy perhaps it can be construed indeed as a double tribute.

In his absence the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) made what I considered to be an admirable chairman. My appreciation stems partly from the fact that never at any time was I refused information which I wanted, and in large part because of his insistence on my right to object when I considered that the delegation needed some other and contrary point of view. It is, of course, rather lamentable that I should have to say these things in an election year, but since I consider them to be true that must be my justification. As for the members of the department who were at the UN in an advisory or other capacity, I found them always helpful, invariably willing to consider a proposition, frequently overworked, and never ready to say yes when they thought the answer should be no.

Now the whole problem of the secretariat is going to come before the meeting of the United Nations which will start next week. One can only hope that an acceptable solution will be found but as far as acceptability goes I must let the government know that our standards are going to be high. The United Nations is built on twin pillars, one of them being the loyalty of the member states, the other the efficiency, integrity and competence of the men and women who make up the secretariat. We harm the one and we hurt the whole structure; we destroy the one and we bring the structure down around our ears. Yet an attempt is being made today, in some quarters innocently, in other quarters with the most deadly malice, to destroy the secretariat and the value of the secretariat of the United Nations.

What is Canada's view about the secretariat? We find it expressed in a phrase in this year's copy of "Canada and the United Nations" where it is stated that "a secretariat of very high calibre has been built up". The Secretary of State for External Affairs quite understandably said little about this problem when he spoke, but I think it would not be amiss to quote what he said on the 12nd of December on the adjournment of the seventh session of the assembly. He said:

> I should like also to take this opportunity of saying a very well deserved tribute to the secretariat and to its distinguished leader, the secretary general. The continuity and effectiveness of the general assembly's work must depend very largely on the integrity and efficiency of our international civil servants. The secretariat have once again served us loyally and well, and I should like to express the assembly's appreciation for their extremely hard work and devotion to what is often a thankless and difficult task; and to what is often a misunderstood ideal, that of international service.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Yet if one reads many of the magazines, periodicals and newspapers which come out of the United States one would believe that this organization is riddled with communists, and we are entitled to ask: Who is right? I do not profess to know everything about the secretariat; far from it. But I do know sufficient to say with firm conviction that the belief of Canada in this matter is impeccably right. The secretariat over the last number of months has been the victim of persecution which one can only describe as outrageous. Yet we have to consider it in the light of the whole social scene of the United States. We have to appreciate the intense desire of American parents to bring their own sons home from Korea. We have to appreciate the feeling that perhaps in this United Nations struggle in Korea they are fighting too much alone. It is a position which we in Canada can appreciate, for we remember only too vividly the days of 1939 and of course 1914.

Their anger and their wrath against the communists, when one considers the United States casualties, is understandable, but unhappily it has too often been diverted against the guiltless and innocent. The secretariat of the United Nations has been used as a stick with which to belabour the last administration, and it was so used for many months. There are certain types of politicians in the United States who have found that by crying "communist" loudly enough and often enough they will secure headlines and will be able to bask in publicity. Therefore they have been indiscriminate in their charges and one of the organizations which has suffered most has been the United Nations.

We have of course had the McCarran committee, a group which the Manchester Guardian has described as a grotesque body. We have the grand jury of New York which stated in December that there was infiltration into the United Nations of an overwhelmingly large group of disloyal United States citizens. Is it any wonder then that the people of the United States are afraid and doubtful as to what the United Nations really is doing in that country? Fear and doubt have been spread until the value of the secretariat has substantially diminished. When I was in New York I happened to read a dramatic criticism by Brooks Atkinson of the New York Times. There has been a revival of an old play, The Children's Hour, and Mr. Atkinson quotes Burns Mantle as having this to say about it in 1934:

> The true theme is the curse of scandalmongering and the whispering campaign, the kind of vicious lying that may easily wreck the lives of innocent people.

Mr. Atkinson goes on to say:

> We are more keenly aware of the implications of the play today because slander is now a common factor in the life of the nation, accepted by many reputable people as an evil necessary to a search for genuine traitors.

I think Mr. Atkinson was unduly harsh on his own countrymen, for I feel that there are certain hopeful features about the situation, although not in the immediate future. I have a certainty that eventually the Americans will deal faithfully with the calumniators, the traducers of the reputations of men and women working in the secretariat. Yet the problem is an urgent one. I believe that Mr. Atkinson wrote more in anger than in sorrow. That is how I speak. I speak in anger towards a friend who is doing something unworthy and which thereby detracts from the lustre of his own good name.

When the secretariat was formed some years ago it attracted men and women from all countries—men and women who had a sense of devotion and who regarded it as an honour and privilege to work with the organization. They embarked upon their tasks with high hopes and perhaps even higher aspirations. Today those hopes are undermined and those aspirations expiring. The morale of the secretariat is being wantonly destroyed. We permit this to continue at our peril. Permit it to continue and we shall destroy the United Nations. As far as this group is concerned, and I hope other groups in this house, none of us is prepared to be a partner in that project.

Now, what are the duties of the secretariat? Here I quote from the United Nations charter, article 100, subsection 1, which reads in part:

> In the performance of their duties the secretary general and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any government or from any other authority external to the organization.

Subsection 2 reads:

> Each member of the United Nations undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the secretary general and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities.

And in article 101, paragraph 3:

> The paramount consideration in the employment of the staff and in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence, and integrity.

To go further I have here the rules and regulations of the United Nations secretariat which were published on December 1 of last year. Regulation 1.1 states that:

> Members of the secretariat are international civil servants. Their responsibilities are not national but exclusively international. By accepting appointment, they pledge themselves to discharge their functions and to regulate their conduct with the interests of the United Nations only in view.

Regulation 1, paragraph 3:

> In the performance of their duties members of the secretariat shall neither seek nor accept instructions from any government or from any other authority external to the organization.

The position I take is that where a member of the secretariat of the United Nations is loyally fulfilling what is required of him, either through the charter or through the staff regulations, then there can be no grounds whatsoever for dismissal, no matter how importunate individual nations may be. Today in the United Nations itself many of the ordinarily accepted democratic rights of people have disappeared.

I have in my hand the universal declaration of human rights as adopted by the general assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948. Article 12 states:

> No one shall be subjected . . . to attacks upon his honour and reputation.

That is what is happening today.

> Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

That is not happening today. That protection has never been accorded them either by member states or the secretary general whom one would have thought would have gone to the defence of his own staff.

Then one can read also article 19 of this same declaration of human rights:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Today the degree of fear which prevails in the United Nations is so great that the right to freedom of opinion has disappeared in the sacred name of conformity.

Let me quote again from the grand jury which made its presentment on December 2 of last year—and if one cares to go further one can read the recent report given by the secretary general on January 30, 1953:

> This presentment contained no indictments and mentioned no names. It set forth certain conclusions and made certain recommendations. Among the conclusions were statements that there was "infiltration into the United Nations of an overwhelmingly large group of disloyal United States citizens", and that this situation constituted a menace to the security of the United States.

There is the flat assertion that there has been "infiltration into the United Nations of an overwhelmingly large group of disloyal" people; and yet when one reads this report of the secretary general does one not come appreciably nearer to the facts?

Paragraph 45 of the secretary general's report states:

> It should be noted that with a single exception no staff member has ever been indicted or charged in any court with espionage or any other subversive activity. In one case a staff member—not of United States nationality—was convicted of espionage in the United States and left the country. The espionage in no way related to the staff member's functions as a United Nations official. In a further case a staff member—also not of United States nationality—was terminated while on home leave after the United States government said he had attempted espionage.

What then are we to believe, the unsupported testimony of the grand jury which has been accepted as truth by so many or the facts which are given to us by the secretary general himself? Lest there be a feeling that this attack does not affect us as Canadians I may say that feeling is not shared in other quarters and in other nations. The London Times on December 2, 1952, in commenting upon the jurists' report which I shall deal with later, in part said:

> It may well not be intended now to pass every international civil servant through the familiar searching sieve of motives, thoughts and associations, as well as deeds, but the menace is there.

As far as I am concerned and as a Canadian, I see this menace in some of these alleged loyalty investigations and I shall be very interested in knowing what stand our government will take if by any unhappy chance a Canadian is ever accused of subversive activity in the United Nations. As far as loyalty tests go, let me quote from a book "The Fear of Freedom", by Francis Biddle, one-time United States attorney general. Mr. Biddle states:

> The vice of the federal loyalty program inheres in its departure from a basic concept of our laws and constitution that persons should be penalized for their conduct, not for their beliefs, and not for the acts of those with whom they associate.

We in Canada unanimously reject that vice in determining guilt, for thought control is no part of our democratic process. Yet, individuals today are being dismissed because the United States government, without submitting proof, considers them to be subversive. I have here a list of some eleven people and this is the headline in the Winnipeg Free Press "Eleven Communists in UN Pay, U.S. Charges". The article states in part:

> The eleven were named in a memorandum made public Thursday over objections of John Hickerson, assistant secretary of state, who cautioned that the state department could have erred by wrongfully naming some persons or by failing to name some who should be named. He emphasized that none of the adverse reports was based on sworn testimony, and that those named had been given no hearings.

So, because of unsupported testimony, without giving people a chance to defend themselves, we immediately destroy what they depend upon most in this world, their reputation. I am not prepared, because of hearsay, to condemn someone; nor am I prepared to condemn without proof. I think all of us believe that that will not be the standard of our own government, but the unhappy fact is that today the United States is insisting that its national standards shall be carried into the United Nations. There can be no greater danger than to approve of this concept that national standards will decide the fitness of the employees of this organization. I reject that concept completely out of hand, and for a good reason. It was Mr. Justice Black who said that individual freedom and governmental thought probing cannot live together. To us, individual freedom is paramount and that is why we reject these standards.

It is conceivable however that the secretary general, himself under the heaviest influence and pressure, may have accepted them. On several occasions the secretary general has complained that the information which has been given him by the state department is too slight or too scanty to merit the dismissal of an employee. Yet employees have been dismissed. The secretary general states that the only words he has been given are these cryptic words by the state department such as "reject"; "questionable"; and "incomplete". On the basis of these words he has to make up his mind whether or not he defers to the wishes of the United States government. Time after time the secretary general has dismissed employees. The unhappy thing is that when these dismissals were appealed to the administrative tribunal, the highest body of appeal within the United Nations, time after time the tribunal has disagreed with the secretary general and said that there was not sufficient information to warrant the dismissal. However, the secretary general is supreme when it comes to the staff, and he has insisted on his right to dismiss the employee.

The secretary general has had to pay the employees large sums in indemnity for wrongful dismissal. It would be interesting indeed to find out how much has been paid in the way of indemnity for such dismissals. I am not unduly surprised to find that Mr. Lie would like to see the administrative tribunal abolished. A new advisory group has been set up and this may be the precursor to the abolition of the tribunal. But it also is only advisory. I do not know what its terms of reference are, and I doubt if anybody does. I know that there are two members of this advisory board who are well known to Canadians. The first one is Ralph Bunche and the other is L. W. Brockington. Men such as these, nurtured in our democratic processes, are going to insist that there be evidence before the secretary general dismisses anybody. But if history is a criterion, and I hope in this case it is not, that evidence will not be forthcoming. This advisory group headed by Mr. Brockington, therefore, will be faced with complete stultification. If so, in the near future one can foretell the resignation of the chairman.

The board is going to be faced not only with that problem but with what is called the problem of the host country. Let me say here and now that I am not prepared to concede rights to a host country which are not applicable to every other member nation of the United Nations. Take our own position, for instance. We are a host country to one international organization, the international civil aviation organization in Montreal. Not only are we the hosts, but to some substantial extent we subsidize it. Therefore we could say that, as host country, we ought to have some substantial say in the matter of personnel. On the assumption that the employees are doing their duty as we expect them to do, I wonder what this house would say if it knew that the government had attempted to secure the dismissal of employees in ICAO because the government did not like what they were thinking. I am certain that the row in this house would go beyond all the bounds of propriety.

Yet we are presented with the same argument in the United States. The United States now foots the greatest part of the UN bill, and it is said that we should therefore accede to their desires. That is not an argument which I, for one, am prepared to accept. I have read that a United States senator demanded that what he considered to be subversive elements in the United Nations should be dismissed immediately or the United States would have to consider very carefully whether or not it would continue its large financial appropriation for the purposes of that organization. That, Mr. Speaker, was something too close to blackmail, and I do not like that sort of blackmail. What is going to happen in the United States if the government of that country decides a certain employee is subversive and the government is not prepared to submit evidence to the secretary general, who then states that the employee will not be dismissed?

Here we are faced with the problem as it exists today. I do not know the answer. Possibly the UN could create some new sort of committee to act as intermediary between the secretary general and the state department, a committee which would be supreme and which would finally make the decision on whatever case is presented. Yet I insist that such a decision must be within the terms of the charter, and must be such that no one nation can have the right to interfere with the secretariat itself.

Now, I said earlier that employees had been wrongfully dismissed and their co-workers on the United Nations staff knew that they had been wrongfully dismissed. The latter, therefore, decided to contribute toward a fund for the legal defence of their colleagues. The house might be interested in knowing how this fund was raised, because it was done anonymously. The secretariat of the United Nations did not dare publish a list of contributors, and I doubt if anybody knows who the contributors are. An envelope, with a mimeographed enclosure, was given to every member of the staff. They were asked to contribute, without signing their names and certainly not by cheque, a certain sum of money for the defence of their colleagues. To make sure that none could be accused in this activity all the envelopes had to be returned. When such a situation occurs, I state there is a reign of fear in the secretariat of the United Nations. It is a situation which has to be rectified.

Now, in the midst of this disturbance and conflict, the secretary general decided to appoint three lawyers to answer certain questions. These three lawyers were popularly known as jurists. Again, if I can refer to the London Times, I notice that it scrupulously eschews the use of the word "jurist", and refers to them as lawyers. Nevertheless, I shall defer to the common usage. But, these jurists did this job in about two weeks. In that brief time they resolved questions which had been perplexing other people for months. Their haste, of course, may have been their undoing, because while undoubtedly much of what they say is laudable and there is much with which I can agree, nevertheless, there are some parts of this report which are not acceptable under any circumstances whatever.

The secretary general asked these jurists to deal with the position of United States nationals in the United Nations secretariat. On page 5 of the report the jurists state:

> Although your questions relate in terms specifically to United States nationals who are also members of your staff, we have found it impracticable to deal with that subject without taking into account also the position of members of your staff of other nationalities who are resident in the United States . . .

This report, then, covers all members of the secretariat in the United States. On page 19 of their report the jurists proceed to give some advice. I am going to read some of the worst of it, but perhaps in some ways the most important. They say:

> In exercising his responsibility for the selection and retention of staff the secretary general should regard it as of the first importance to refrain from engaging or to remove from the staff any person whom he has reasonable grounds for believing to be engaged or to have been engaged, or to be likely to be engaged in any activities regarded as disloyal by the host country.

Let us consider those last words, and I am reading the original report, "activities regarded as disloyal by the host country." In what sort of position would that place a Canadian as far as the United States is concerned? What about a Frenchman or a Belgian or a Norwegian? Surely their loyalties are to their own countries. But we are told that this document deals with all members. If they were loyal to their own countries, automatically they had to be disloyal to the host country. This was nonsense and the phrase was corrected by the three jurists in a corrigendum which was issued later and which read:

> Replace the words "any activities regarded as disloyal by the host country" by the words: "any subversive activities against the host country."

Here was the penalty of haste. Let us consider another aspect of this matter. We have men alleged to be international jurists who are setting out terms which govern members of the secretariat of the United Nations. They ask for the dismissal of a person likely to be engaged in subversive activities. But how can Mr. Lie forecast the future? The secretary general is supposed to be a sort of soothsayer; he is supposed to know what is going to happen a couple of years from now. What sort of absurdity is that in terms of law?

Then the jurists go on to suggest that the secretary general should automatically dismiss any employee of the United Nations who pleads the fifth amendment before a United States committee. The fifth amendment to the United States constitution was designed by its framers to be a lamp post to guide the innocent, but today it is a lamp post on which to hang the innocent. That is what the jurists suggest we do.

An individual pleading the fifth amendment before a United States committee such as I have described may do so because of the fear that he may condemn himself out of his own mouth and be subjected to some further criminal action. I believe that there are members of the secretariat who have pleaded the fifth amendment before these committees for the good reason that they felt that as they were under oath they would be guilty of perjury if they made an error. The questions which were asked are very searching. They went back a long time, even a decade. I doubt if there is any hon. member here who can say what he was doing on June 5, 1942, or with whom he had lunch on that day. Yet if the witness makes a mistake and does not through error, tell the truth, he is guilty of perjury and subject to the full penalties of the law.

There is another aspect to this matter. Some employees found that no matter how guiltless they have been, they were being asked questions, not concerning themselves but concerning their friends, their acquaintances and their colleagues. They had to answer those questions and before they knew what was happening they had woven a web of circumstantial evidence around their own friends. The situation became intolerable. One of the results of such wretched investigations was the death of a distinguished servant of the United Nations, Mr. Abraham Feller. As far as we are concerned, this report cannot and must not be accepted without the most drastic amendment.

There was a letter in the December issue of the Canadian Bar Review signed by W. Friedmann, J. B. Milner and F. E. LaBrie, who are on the teaching staff of the school of law of the University of Toronto, and also by F. R. Scott, of the faculty of law of McGill university. I should like to quote the closing part of this letter which is headed "Loyalty Tests and the United Nations Secretariat." It reads:

> The recommendations of the commission, particularly because of the proposed dismissal from employment on grounds of refusal to testify before investigating bodies, have increased the sense of insecurity in the United Nations secretariat. At a time when the United Nations and other international institutions are undergoing severe political testing, the commission's opinion must in all fairness be considered a surprisingly unsatisfactory treatment of the complex problems presented to it. The statute of the International Court of Justice describes as a source of law the "general principles of law recognized among civilized nations". A similar test should determine United Nations standards, of substance as well as procedure. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, approved by the General Assembly in December 1948 by a vote of 48 (including the United States) to 0, with 8 abstentions, also lays down standards which ought at least to be applied to the United Nations itself. The United Nations must work out its own code. Conviction by a national court for such major and generally recognized offences as treason, sedition or the betrayal of official secrets should justify dismissal from the United Nations, but the adoption, in any one country, of special offences, and investigation procedures that fall short of established standards of fairness, cannot be regarded as part of generally recognized principles, and therefore as a proper standard for the United Nations. Such national practices should not therefore by themselves establish good cause for dismissal.

Within a few days our delegation is going back to the United Nations charged with the high responsibility of maintaining intact the charter of that organization and the inviolable right of the individual in a democracy. We shall watch it with anxiety and also with the hope that it will fulfil these objectives.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow my hon. friend in detail, although I realize some of the difficulties incident to the problem that he has brought before the house. I am a believer in the preservation of those things which constitute our freedom. I think all are agreed that we should not allow the United Nations to be weakened by those who would by innuendo and slander destroy the reputation of innocent persons within the secretariat. On the other hand there is the issue to be faced that the security of the state must be assured at all times.

I for one believe that a host country should not adopt measures that would destroy fundamental freedoms; nonetheless, while maintaining the freedoms unimpaired the democracies have the right to demand that diplomatic immunities shall not be utilized as a means to undermine the host state and to provide, for those who practise treason, protection that ought not to be assured to them. Freedom with security must be maintained. I know that we of the British tradition will follow the lead given in the House of Commons in the United Kingdom in the last few days by Sir Douglas Maxwell Fyfe, who, in the course of an address dealing with the serious situation that exists by reason of the changed conditions of modern times and the use by the communists of propaganda to undermine from within the states in which they are living, took his stand for freedom and the preservation of fundamental freedom without which democracy cannot exist.

We have to guard against a very dangerous perversity of human nature, which is that mankind often imitates the thing it hates in order to defeat the subject of its hatred. I shall say no more at this time than that in these days there are tremendous responsibilities on the state to preserve the state from the termites who would destroy it, while at the same time preserving the fundamental freedoms without which democracy cannot survive.

On this occasion I intend to make some general observations in connection with the United Nations assembly, which I had the honour to attend, and to place before the house some suggestions that have come to me as a result of that privilege and opportunity. It is a privilege, because one sees and hears at first hand what is going on internationally; and it also gives members of the opposition the right and firsthand knowledge to criticize and to offer alternative suggestions without which a discussion on foreign affairs would be as shadowy as it would be meaningless.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has said, the international situation is a worrying one. Toynbee has described the age in which we live as "a time of troubles." The minister was very optimistic in his word picture of the world situation, and went a long way farther along the road of optimism than did Mr. Churchill a few short days ago upon his return from the United States. The Soviet pendulum seems to swing. Occasionally it looks like impending war, but when resistance and unity are revealed among the democratic nations, the pendulum seems to swing back, and for a time peace seems imminent. At such time for the benefit of the syndicated press Stalin gives an interview indicative of a desire and wish for world peace. But as Tito has said—and he knows the mind of the Soviet—whatever the changed processes may be, the Soviet purpose is still world domination. To use his warning words, "there may be a change in tactics but there is never a basic change in substance."

The reading of history provides lessons for today. Within the last year there was uncovered by the archaeologists of Princeton university in Athens a marble slab which had been carved in 336 B.C., upon which there was an inscription forbidding the establishment of a dictatorship in Athens, and prescribing heavy penalties for anyone who aided or assisted the dictator. And yet within two years after that, Alexander the Great had destroyed the democratic and independent existence of the Athenian republic and the other Greek republics because they had not learned the lesson of unity. They divided into separate units, each of them going its own way and as a result individually fell a prey to dictatorship. That message is a message for today. The free states of 1953 will survive if they stand together and, in uniting for collective security, to use the modern expression, resist the advance of communist dictatorship.

There will always be some who will proclaim the gospel of fear. Whatever stand is taken, dire destruction will follow. We heard the fearful when a stand was taken in Korea originally in 1950. We hear the fearful again in the situation created by the deneutralization policy of the United States respecting Formosa. We had it when the nations decided to rearm western Germany, or were contemplating steps in that regard. We had it when NATO was set up. On every occasion when the United Nations or the democratic nations have taken a stand, we have been faced with the fear of some that the stand being taken would be provocative to the U.S.S.R. and would lead to war.

Subsequent events have not established the truth of the prophecies that were made by those who fear. That does not mean that I advocate, or that anyone else within the democratic nations advocates, provocative measures; but it does mean that the events of the last few years have clearly established that in strength and in unity there is the only hope for mankind.

An event of the last few days in Europe has been a particularly hopeful one. At ten o'clock in the morning of February 10 an engine pulling 27 cars of German coke crossed the boundary into France without stopping for customs inspection. It was not an operation of smugglers; it was the beginning of a new era in trade in coal, iron and steel in six nations in Europe, some of them hereditary enemies, joined together in a common unity brought about through the dangers incident to the presence of the spectre of communism. That step, Mr. Speaker, no one would have looked forward to in 1945, a step that may ultimately lead to the federation of Europe which was dreamed of during the days of the Council of Vienna. It reveals an unheard of unity in Europe.

These periodic debates on external affairs are very helpful. They clarify the atmosphere. These debates have their value when we find taking part in them men such as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who has been engaged for years in international affairs; men of the reputation, capacity and experience of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), whose training in international affairs goes back to 1945; men like the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), who has spoken with calm authority on this and on other occasions; men like the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who, following his recent visit to Europe, brings vividly to parliament what he learned there; and I could continue the list.

Now a word on this debate. I was somewhat disappointed not with the quality of language used by the minister in his review, but that in his remarks on this occasion and those of a few days ago, on February 5, there was no direct information concerning Canada's stand on the question of the deneutralization of Formosa.

A reading of his speech of February 5 reveals qualified acceptance of the new policy of the United States with a veto in the background. There is in his remarks nothing to indicate the stand being taken by the government of Canada on this problem. That is not enough in these days when international problems, with their widespread repercussions, are before us. The uncertainty of the stand to be taken by Canada, and being taken at this time, is not in keeping with Canada's responsibility.

Yesterday the hon. member for Peel made reference in allegorical form to the speech of the minister. I refer to it directly and say that I think it lacked substance when it dealt with the problem of a deneutralized Formosa. In Canada, situated as we are as interpreters between the United States of America and members of the commonwealth, we have to be careful in what we say. We have to refrain from thoughtless criticism of the United States, whose sacrifices and service in Korea for the preservation of the principles for which the United Nations stand are immeasurably greater than the combined activities of the other members of the United Nations. But surely we have a right to more information than that found at page 1639 of Hansard, where the minister said:

> The government will follow developments with the closest possible attention and take appropriate action to make our views known if and when the occasion so warrants.

That, I thought, was a weakness in the minister's speech. Great Britain has taken her stand. I am not advocating that stand; but at least we know what the stand is. Canada is in a dual position in that not only are we adjacent to the United States, but the minister now occupies the position of president of the United Nations, a position incidentally equivalent to that occupied by Mr. Dandurand in 1925 in the league of nations.

Then the minister added these words:

> Meanwhile I think it would be unwise and premature to jump to dogmatic or critical conclusions concerning the step taken by the United States government, and announced in a statement by President Eisenhower which contained so much that was wise and heartening to us all.

That statement is a masterpiece of circumlocution. It starts off by saying that we are not going to jump to any dogmatic or critical conclusions regarding the policy as to Formosa, but we are heartened by some of the other statements made by the president. I think we deserve a clearer announcement of policy than that.

The situation is a difficult one, and I realize it. All the United Nations are in Korea. All accepted responsibilities when President Truman gave the lead. What is to be done there? What attitude is to be taken? It has been said that there are only three possible attitudes: Fight it out; stick it out; or get out. Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) added another alternative to that group.

Fight it out? No, because that is what we are endeavouring to avoid. Stick it out? There is no other course consistent with the preservation of the United Nations for world peace. Get out? That is something beyond the thought of any responsible person in the United Nations. But I do think those three alternatives place the problem before parliament. I realize the tremendous responsibilities resting upon the minister; but I do contend we have a right to know what Canada's position is. Why should not we in Canada know, when people in the United States and in Great Britain know the stand of their governments on this problem? We cannot adopt a mere middle course.

It is of interest that hon. members of the C.C.F. criticize the stand now being taken by the United States. As I recall it, three years ago they criticized the stand taken when Formosa was neutralized. The minister has a responsibility to place this matter before the House of Commons in clear outline. Shall it be a policy that will be merely one of stalemate as the years roll by and the casualties increase? That is one side of the coin. The other is the fearful possibility that any action we take or that is taken by any of the nations within the United Nations may have the result of spreading war not only throughout Asia but throughout the world.

I agree with the minister that this is no time for loose talk; it is no time for cavilling criticism of the United Nations. It is time for unity within the United Nations. In order to have strongly built the foundations upon which the United Nations stand, the world needs a foundation in the hearts and souls of people everywhere. We can have this only when democratic peoples have some conception of the basis for the policies to be taken.

In order to maintain the foundations of the United Nations, and to secure that support, democratic statesmen must place before their people in clear and unequivocal outline something of the stand that the governments of their respective nations intend to take. The great danger, as communism moves across the world, is that our people shall become wearied in well-doing, believing that all is well and that the shadow of communism will never become a spectre of world destruction.

Last evening in an address over United States radio systems the secretary of state of the United States, Mr. Dulles, drew a dark and fearful picture. His claim was that unless the European nations move promptly toward unity they will risk peril from which it will be beyond American power or world power to save them. He pointed out the need of unity between France and West Germany on the problem of laying the foundations for a continental army. He stated that the only hope for Europe is the European defence community plan which requires the unification of the military forces of France, West Germany, Italy, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg, and he indicated that unless this unity is achieved the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will have the shadow of power but not the substance to meet the threat.

How terrible the problem is. France, realizing that twice in one generation she has been attacked, naturally fears the restoration of a strong German national army. On the other hand, without that army Europe faces communist domination too awful to contemplate. I think Canada could give a lead in this regard by asking the nations who are signatories of this agreement to give France the assurance that Canada will join with Britain in supporting the extension of the NATO charter from 20 years to 50 years so that it will coincide with the period of the European defence treaty. Building hope in Europe is a contribution all in America can make. Show France that we believe in the extension of NATO to the end that if an army, composed in greater or lesser measure of West German forces, is mobilized as part of the European defence army, the principles of NATO will be maintained during the entire period of the European defence period.

I want to come now to the question of the United Nations. In 1945 I had the privilege of being in San Francisco and seeing laid there the foundations of the United Nations, represented as they are today by the doors to the new assembly building which were presented by Canada and depicting truth and brotherhood, justice and peace. In 1945 the minister was one of the architects of that charter, as was the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). They could not contemplate then the days that lay ahead with communism, operating through its cultists of confusion, endeavouring to undermine and destroy many of the purposes for which the United Nations was constituted.

In those days the delegation was composed of representatives of the various parties in the house. Opposition members now are in the position of observers. I think the change was a good and necessary one. I think Canada has given a lead to the members of the United Nations in sending outstanding representatives of the cabinet to the meetings of the general assembly. As everyone knows, Canada has as two of its representatives the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and in the present assembly the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). Most of the nations, however, are represented by delegates who have not the authority that ministerial rank would give them. Britain has representatives of ministerial rank, as has Canada. I think it would be a great advantage for the United Nations if other nations within the organization would follow the lead given by these two countries.

I am going to review some of the changes that have taken place since the charter was drawn up in 1945 because, as was said yesterday by the hon. member for Peel, with the time coming shortly when the charter is to be subject to review, consideration should be given to recommendations for changes in the charter by the external affairs committee of this house. There is one thing Canada should do, which I think is long overdue, and that is to realize, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare does, the abiding need of the preservation of our fundamental freedoms. Long since there should have been a submission to parliament of the international declaration of human freedoms for approval by parliament and adoption by Canada.

I want to say a personal word about the two ministers. As one who occupied a very ordinary position, I can say that as a result of their kindness and consideration we co-operated in a manner that I will never forget. There was no concealment of information. The observers were allowed to know what was going on. Every possible consideration was shown, thereby assuring an amicable spirit in keeping with the best traditions of Canadian parliamentary life. The Minister of National Health and Welfare made a speech with respect to human rights on the 17th of December in which he said this:

> I do not believe it necessary for me to stress here that the question of human rights has become one of primary interest for the United Nations.

He went on to say:

> The question of human rights, after all, is the cornerstone of our charter and has been proclaimed all over the world through the universal declaration of human rights.

I would suggest to him that he have the government submit that declaration, now four years overdue, to the parliament of Canada. There can be no justification for the failure of the government to do that. Some might argue that some of the provisions have to do with property and civil rights, but the declaration has no juridical value. It is in effect an embodiment of principles and ideals and it ought to be brought before parliament, for Canada is one of the few nations that, while accepting, proclaiming and practising human freedoms, have failed to show the members of the United Nations that its parliament supports them.

May I here interpolate and say that one of the most interesting events that occurred while I was there was to hear Vishinsky making one of his harangues. I was there as a visitor two years ago when Dr. Vladimir Clementis made his speech and in towering language described the wonders of communism. I was there the day two years later when Vishinsky delivered almost the same speech, and on that very day Clementis was dying on the gallows because he was believed to harbour improper thoughts on the subject of Soviet domination. I will never forget that speech by Vishinsky. I have never known anyone who gave his own autobiography so accurately as he did on that occasion when he was describing, with malicious deviation from the truth, the cruelties which he alleged were perpetrated on the communist prisoners by the United Nations. He said this:

> I can hear them shooting down the communists as mad dogs. I see the beating and I hear the shouting. I see the tattooing and I hear that shooting. I hear the rattle of the machine guns and the groans of the dying under their hangmen guards. I see the searchlights, and then I see the end. With their spirits entirely broken they will come quaking with the fear that will have been implanted in them in the course of that procedure; they will be utterly incapable either of asking any questions or . . .

—answering any.

It was a portrait of Vishinsky himself, the author, the perpetrator of the purge of 1938. It was indeed the epitome, those sordid and untruthful words, of all of the tragedy, horror and fearful intensity of communism in practice. That very day the foreign minister of Czechoslovakia went to the gallows, and if I may paraphrase the immortal words of Grey:

> The paths of communist glory lead but to the hangman's noose.

Yes, we saw communism that day as it was, from one who knew.

Mr. Speaker, you may ask me what changes in the revision I might suggest? I believe the United Nations assembly is facing its greatest test today, undermined by those who are its critics. It will meet that challenge if the representatives to the United Nations from its various members give their people a picture of its usefulness. The security council has been emasculated by 55 Soviet vetoes since 1945, but I doubt if the veto power will be changed in any revision that will take place. But the events of the last few years have established and added another veto, not under the charter but a veto of practice and procedure. That veto is in the assembly which, under section 18 of the charter, requires a majority of the members to bring matters before the assembly, and a two-thirds majority in the case of serious matters advanced. In the last few years the assembly is being weakened by small nations joining together and thereby forcing action in placing on the agenda, for consideration by the assembly, matters that have no place on the agenda and are not deserving of consideration, such as those in which the processes of diplomacy have not been exhausted or in respect of which the peace of the world has not been threatened.

I would suggest that it might be possible—and I realize the conditions inherent in the attitude of opposition to change taken by the U.S.S.R. and puppet states that are members—that some tribunal should be set up to determine whether or not any question that is brought up for consideration should be placed on the agenda of the assembly. Unless that is done more and more the assembly will sit for longer and longer periods dealing with matters which have no place on the agenda; matters that were not contemplated by the charter and which have the effect of weakening the power, authority and prestige of the institution upon which the peace of the world depends.

Nations are beginning to take a definite attitude about these matters that are brought before the assembly by the force of the unity of these small nations. They are contending that they are not bound by assembly decisions.

France refused to attend meetings of the assembly when the Tunisian matter was before it. South Africa has declared that under no circumstances will she in any way be bound by the decision of the assembly in connection with apartheid, nor will she recognize any commission set up by the United Nations to be sent to investigate the problem.

Mr. Speaker, whenever the nations within the United Nations refuse to recognize the authority of the acts or decisions of the assembly, a destructive influence follows that will literally weaken the institution itself.

There is another effect. The bringing up of these problems of colonialism and nationalism have the effect of providing the U.S.S.R. and its puppets with a trumpet stand for world-wide propaganda designed to separate, designed to unnerve the determination of the members of the United Nations, to arouse antagonism and create sores of hatred all over the world. When the question of revision of the charter is discussed, these are some of the matters that deserve consideration.

I could go on and refer to various other matters but on this occasion I am not going to do so. What I have in mind is simply that in the revision if it is at all possible these influences and tendencies that are causing fissures to appear in the structure of the United Nations must be removed; otherwise the United Nations, with a very proud record to date in the settlement of international disputes by bringing together nations that are in disagreement and by affording opportunity for negotiation, will be weakened in its power for good and will lose much of the prestige it now possesses.

As I listened to the delegates of these various members of the United Nations I thought of the changed world that we are passing through. Colonialism is over; nationalism is on the march everywhere in the world. Above everything else members of the coloured races are demanding that we of the democratic nations no longer practise discrimination against them. How few realize that in the commonwealth five out of every six are of a coloured race. The commonwealth permits of this because of justice and the practice of non-discrimination. The United Nations with its great crusade on behalf of the preservation of peace will succeed if communism is denied its mission of aggression everywhere in the world.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying this. The United Nations must be supported as never before. Undermining it by criticism that is unfounded will destroy that only agency that can preserve peace. Human freedoms everywhere must be upheld and maintained. Discrimination against colour or race, wherever it exists, must be ended, and the great agencies of the United Nations that would help the unfortunate everywhere in the world must be supported. Poverty, if not banished, is a fertile field for the incubation of communism.

While these ideals are being achieved we must, at all costs, regardless of where we sit in this house, uphold whatever government is in power in maintaining our defences and in assuring unity between the various nations within the United Nations, without which the future of mankind will be dark and fearful.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): It is a matter of pride to all Canadians that our representation at the United Nations has been of such an able and outstanding character. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is a model of patience, and I think that in dealing with the philosophers from Asia and Europe he has been able to remain calm and not lose patience when interpreting the wish of the Canadian people for peace in the world—not at any cost, but that certainly is our great objective. The world will long remember the work of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of this country and his able minister of external affairs in dealing with international problems at a critical time in the history of the world.

It is fitting that I should have a few words to say here this afternoon, because the riding which I represent is closer in air miles to the scene of conflict than possibly any other riding in Canada. We see airplanes leaving Fort Nelson and other airports daily. We realize we are only a matter of hours from the shores of Asia. In British Columbia we realize that we are in a great era of Pacific development. The Pacific ocean means more to us than it does to Canadians who are farther inland. We are more deeply touched by the news which comes to us from time to time from across the Pacific.

I am one of those who believe that in international affairs we must do a good job of the work at home. I feel there are certain things that we can do in the northwest which would be of great military advantage, and would also be of advantage to the civilan population of this dominion. I believe that the extension of highways and railways into these fertile valleys is one such thing. I believe that the placing of new populations in these valleys on the northwestern frontier of this Canada of ours would make a contribution to the military defence of this continent.

North of Edmonton at the present time there is a sort of Maginot line because of the lack of adequate transportation. In the event of an attack upon this continent we would be sadly handicapped because of the lack of railway communication with the territory of Alaska, which is the great defence perimeter on this North American continent. In saying that I am only repeating what I have said before in this house, and repeating the words of outstanding military men, particularly in the United States. I believe that if the record were examined you would find that General Eisenhower himself, prior to taking over his political responsibilities in the United States, was one of those who advocated the construction of a railway to Alaska for the defence of this continent.

I say, therefore, that one way, and not too expensive a way, of helping out today would be to move people into these valleys. We have heard of the catastrophe in Holland. It is unfortunate that a disaster of that kind should occur before we become impressed with our opportunity and also the need of putting people from these congested countries into the vacant valleys in the northwestern part of this land.

So far as the Korean situation is concerned, I may say that I have listened carefully to the speeches and the various opinions that have been expressed. I was bound to look up a little verse written by James Russell Lowell about a hundred years ago in the Bigelow Papers, which pretty well sums up what a lot of statesmen and public men are saying today about Korea. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall quote this verse:

> Ez for war, I go agin it,—
> I mean to say, I kind o' du,
> Thet is, I mean, that bein' in it,
> The best way was to see it thru;
> Not but whut abstract war is horrid
> I sign to that with all my heart,—
> But cilyzation does get forrid,—
> Sometimes upon a powder cart.

Korea has been a school for the training of warriors. There is no doubt about that. I often wonder if some of our Chinese friends are not obtaining education in the arts of modern war at the expense of some of the western nations. I am afraid that the nationalist army, when it is released and allowed to leave Formosa for the mainland of China, will simply melt into the great Chinese army.

I do not set myself up as an expert on these matters, but having had dealings with the Chinese, I see a danger in the acceptance of the opinion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) that we should blockade the Chinese coast. I think the proposition of blockading the Chinese coast is something that we should not consider at this time. I believe that the containment of the war in Korea has been a tremendous achievement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. It being five o'clock, the house must proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILL

MERCANTILE BANK OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 111, to incorporate the Mercantile Bank of Canada—Mr. Macnaughton—Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think it is on the record, but I believe this bill has been reported by the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

The Deputy Chairman: This bill has been reported by the committee on banking and commerce.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Macnaughton moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the first new bank charter which has been granted for some time by parliament, and perhaps it is appropriate that as the minister responsible for the supervision of the Canadian banking system I should say just a word before third reading is given.

We have a banking system in Canada of which I think all Canadians can be justifiably proud. I feel sure that I am voicing the views of most if not all members of the house when I say that the granting of a charter to this new bank does not imply any criticism of our existing banking facilities. The granting of bank charters is the particular responsibility of parliament. I am satisfied that the other place and the committee of the Commons have considered fully the purposes for which this bank is to be created and are satisfied that it will add to rather than subtract from the banking services of Canada.

I am now voicing my personal views, but I think parliament should consider each case in which application is made for a charter for a new bank on its merits, and should decide whether or not the proposed institution is one which will serve the interests of the Canadian public. I take it for granted that in this case parliament is satisfied that this new institution will serve such interests. While this is a private bill and the government as such should not take a position one way or the other, I think most of us will be gratified that the new institution being created is sponsored by citizens of a country with which Canada has had long and most friendly relations.

Mercantile Bank of Canada

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the point with which the minister has dealt, namely, the basis on which the incorporation of new banks should be considered, was discussed in the committee. I think those who were present there will welcome what the minister has said on that point.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): The business under private and public bills having been concluded, the house will revert to the business under consideration at five o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 85 to 104 inclusive of the main estimates, 1953-54, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, we Canadians have the opportunity to establish ourselves in the hearts of the countries of Asia, and this is well illustrated by the Colombo plan. We are a young country and our hands are clean so far as international politics are concerned. We have done nothing in China other than help the Chinese, and so it is in all the countries of Asia.

The efforts of the Christian missions of Canada in Asia makes the brightest chapter in the history of that ancient continent. In Formosa, of which we have heard so much today, the pioneer missionary during the last century was a Canadian from the county of Oxford, Dr. G. L. MacKay. He built and equipped a college there, which he called Oxford College after the county of Oxford, to train medical men, nurses and others to minister to the health and welfare of those people. He was one of the many Canadians who have operated in the mission field in the Far East.

I suggest to men who are wealthier than I that they consider endowing universities in Canada so that studies by Asiatic pupils in Canada may be extended. Funds might also be set aside to make it possible for Canadian young men and women to visit Asiatic lands and study at first hand the languages and customs, conditions and cultures of those peoples. It is not to the credit of Canada that we had to leave the task of visiting Asia and going about among the people there in 1952 to such men as a certain communist leader from Toronto. I feel that those who have a positive contribution to make, such as students, leaders, political personalities and others, might well forgo the field of Europe for a while and make a close study of conditions on the other side of the Pacific.

What has happened in the Far East is that the native people have learned too quickly from the white man. China has her broadcasting systems today and television is operating in Japan. Radio broadcasting has been operating in continental China for the last 30 years. China has a network of airfields. Her civilian aviation was growing when world war II interfered. Chinese aviators are keen flyers, as many of you know. In the world of aviation they have proved their great ability.

China has been steadily developing her industries and is increasing her manufactures of iron and steel products, textiles, chemicals and ships. Japan planned to be her manufacturing centre and to exploit her, but the Chinese are rapidly becoming skilled in all lines of manufacture. That country uses Russian machine guns, but makes a lot of her own. China needs mineral development, better roads, more docks and wharves, hydroelectric services and railways. It is said that there are 10,000 cities in China today that need public utilities, including hydroelectric service. She needs grain elevators, ships and locomotives.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): She got some ships.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): And she needs the friendly help of the nations of the rest of the world. Her position with regard to Russia is that of a nation in great extremity, and she is compelled to call upon Russia. If we were to blockade the ports of China we would weld that country into the structure of the Soviet empire. She would be compelled to do that because by shutting her out from ocean trading we would force her to trade within her own country, which has 3,000 miles or more of frontier with Soviet Russia, just as we have a very large boundary line with the United States. If Canada were blockaded on the Atlantic and Pacific we would be compelled to turn to the nearest nation to make purchases and carry on our activities. Therefore if we were so rash as to blockade the ports of China we would undoubtedly contribute to an international situation which would not be cleared up in our time.

History itself shows the futility of trying to do anything about blockading the ports of China. Since 1842 Britain and her associates have had control of certain ports in China. They had extraterritorial rights in all the great cities. They had virtual control of all the trade that went into China from the Pacific ocean; yet at the end of it all we had the humiliating experience of being drummed out of Shanghai, Canton, Hanoi and other great ports and were forced to give way so that any effort at coercion or to rule by force along the coast of China I am afraid will not meet with any greater success in this century than it did in the last.

You who know the Chinese people realize that they are a people with a history reaching back 40 centuries or more. I have read a translation of a book on farming which referred to records of 40 centuries of farming in China. Arnold Toynbee, the historian, says that they will survive any war, any shock. He say that they are a spiritual people, and that if he could return to this earth a good many generations hence he would expect to find the Chinese still placidly going about their affairs. He also mentions one other nation that would probably survive over the next five hundred years, namely Canadians, and particularly the Canadians of the province of Quebec. But he is not so hopeful of other groups. He says the Chinese and the Canadians have their roots deep in the soil and they love their land. They have spiritual values which they have always placed far above mere material things.

I do not propose to go into a long digression upon that ancient empire, with its 500 million and more people, but I would like to take this opportunity to refer to the great work of William Lyon Mackenzie King, who as a young man was sent to Asia by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It was wise Sir Wilfrid Laurier who dispatched Mr. King to Asia at the turn of the century and instructed him to do all he could to work with delegates of other countries towards the suppression of the international opium traffic. It was a mission crowned with success. The delegates met at Shanghai, Peking and Tokyo, and began an international movement to outlaw opium and the traffic in narcotic drugs of all kinds. In those days Mr. King, almost a beardless boy, who had a talent for observation and inquiry, was exposed, as I say, to the impact of the Far East. I should say his journey was of historic importance, because through the long years of his career we find him appearing and reappearing at the council tables of the nations where the affairs of Asia were seriously discussed.

The United States of America was never a member of the league of nations, but the records show that the U.S.A. supplied almost unlimited funds to assist the league of nations in stamping out the opium traffic, and here again we had Mr. King counselling the leaders of the world. It might well be said that the league of nations justified its existence by the work it carried out with respect to outlawing narcotic drugs, a work in which Russia, China, Japan and India co-operated to the full.

I was going to pay some attention to the trade opportunities which exist on the coast of British Columbia with respect to the development of the Chinese and other Pacific markets, but time does not permit. I would take this opportunity to pay a compliment to the new minister who has been appointed to Japan, an industrialist from the city of Victoria, a former minister of fisheries in this government. I am sure that in his position over there he will do a great deal toward the development of further trade relations between the countries of Asia, despite war and rumours of war, and the west coast of Canada.

The work of the United Nations in saving us from a world-wide conflagration is something we cannot praise too highly. When we think of that country over there with its vast population and its huge armies, we realize that the cost of the revolution which took place within the last ten or fifteen years, the cost of the operation in Korea today, is astounding. The cost of a day's operations there would build great modern hospitals, in half a dozen towns in China. The cost of our own United Nations troops would build an equal number of hospitals. The costs of a single day would clear away slums in that great country where millions of natives live in filth and squalor. It would irrigate thousands of acres of land in Asia, not now being cultivated, to feed their starving populations. It would build dams for hydroelectric development, the development of natural resources. The money used for war would, if turned to peaceful purposes, change the whole face of Asia.

I repeat that some of us feel that we are competent to advise on these new international things. Certainly when one judges by some of the speeches he has heard we have here certain men who have very radical ideas on what should be done. An old philosopher said that China is a rug, the rest of the world but a fringe of the rug. I remind you that China is bigger than Europe; that it has, as I have said, more than 3,000 miles of coast line.

If we were to blockade the ports of China we would also have to blockade the ports of Siberia. What would be the point in blockading the ports of China if the great port of Vladivostok and other places in the north which lead into Soviet Russia were left open? It would take the United States, the Canadian and the British navies combined to enforce the blockade. As I say, we would back Chinese trade into the interior and force them to get in deeper with Russia, in closer harmony with Russia, whose boundary for more than 3,000 miles is common with that of China. A blockade would mean all-out war, and I would object to sending boys from the Peace river to travel over to China to engage in such a war, to take them from peaceful occupations and throw them into the holocaust of an all-out war on the continent of Asia.

There must be some other way, Mr. Speaker, and I think that way is being found by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, by the Prime Minister of this country and by the various leaders who have spoken in this debate, so that somehow, somewhere, we shall appeal to the hearts of these people and win them to the paths of peace.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we of the C.C.F. group agree with those who have said that at this juncture in world affairs the views of the various groups in this house should be stated quite clearly. Hon. members will recognize that that was most certainly done on our behalf yesterday by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

Meantime, however, there have been expressions of views by other members and other groups in the house which make it seem necessary to us to give at least some restatement of the definite position taken on our behalf yesterday. In that connection let me say that we find ourselves in agreement with a good deal of what has just been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I shall come in a moment or two to a discussion of some of the points on which he has spoken.

We feel that our fundamental aim in Canadian foreign policy at this time should be to end and not to extend the war in Asia. It is because of that fundamental conviction that we have taken our stand with respect to a number of specific matters.

In our view there is no point in trying to oversimplify the case as some hon. members have done during the course of this debate. From a debating standpoint it may be easy to say, as some members have said, that the west should deal with this situation in the same way the communists are dealing with it. It is very easy to say, as some members are saying, that if we do not blockade the China coast, that means we are permitting materials of war to reach that country to be used against our troops fighting in Korea. It is very easy to say that because the other side is doing so-and-so it is perfectly logical and justifiable for us to follow the same course.

As I have already indicated, you cannot oversimplify the international situation in that way. There are risks either way. One has to weigh the risks. One has to determine what is the basic aim. And in our view—and we believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) agrees with us in this—the basic aim at the present time should be to end and not to extend the war in Asia. Through all of this we must make sure that our stand is firmly on the side of freedom; but let us not go along with the kind of mistakes that might involve us in the holocaust of a third world war, and the end of freedom itself.

It is because of that basic belief that it should be our aim at the present time to see the end rather than the extension of the war in Korea, that we are critical of the stand taken by the new administration in the United States. We refer in particular to the order given by President Eisenhower to change the order with respect to the operations of the seventh fleet between Formosa and the mainland of China. And, as I shall show in a few moments, we feel that we should be deeply concerned, lest that first item in the new United States foreign policy in the Far East be followed by other items which could lead us down the path to a third world war.

As I have already said, we believe that the government, indeed the Secretary of State for External Affairs, shares our views in this connection, despite some of the things said in this debate and despite editorials such as the one that appeared a day or so ago in the Ottawa Journal. But our quarrel with the minister is that, though you can find in his speech of Wednesday and in his statement of a week ago yesterday the position we believe he takes, you have to hunt for it with a fine-tooth comb. We think he should take a lesson from the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), who has just taken his seat, and express his views as well as the views of the government much more clearly than he has done thus far.

A week ago yesterday, as recorded at page 1639 of Hansard the minister did say—and he put it a little more strongly then than he did in his speech on Wednesday—

> With respect to the position of the Canadian government, while we remain resolved to carry out our United Nations obligations in Korea, we do not think that the defence of Formosa, which has not been assumed by the United Nations, should be confused with the defence of Korea, which has.

That, we suggest, is an implied criticism of the action of President Eisenhower, for that action in our view does confuse the defence of Formosa—indeed it confuses the whole question of the Chinese civil war—with the defence of South Korea, which is our chief concern in that part of the Far East at the present time.

Despite that statement on February 5 which some of us thought might be a prelude to a stronger statement when he made his more extended remarks in the course of this debate, when that time arrived the minister used even more cryptic language. Nevertheless, while I am critical of the minister for not making his statement clearer and more definite, at the same time I give him credit for having said what he did say, and for holding the views which these sentences imply. So I should like to put them on the record again, as they appear in Hansard of February 11 at page 1852. This is what was said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on that occasion:

> As I said a few moments ago the most recent attempt at the United Nations general assembly to end the war in Korea has failed. But the effort to that end must not stop, and I am sure it will not stop. The guiding principle of Canadian policy in Korea is to continue to do everything possible to limit the present hostilities to the Korean peninsula, and to take advantage of any opportunity for an early settlement of these hostilities by peaceful negotiation. It follows from this that our general attitude in the United Nations general assembly, as elsewhere, is to support proposals designed to facilitate an armistice agreement, and to oppose proposals which, in our judgment, would impede such an armistice.

As I have already said, we agree with that statement. We agree with what is implied; but we feel—and in a moment or so I shall develop our reasons for feeling this way—that the minister should have said it much more openly, and that he should have put it in the forefront of his speech, rather than bury it in the middle, as he did.

Then after another paragraph he said this:

> We consider also that the purpose of the United Nations in Korea remains the defeat of aggression there, and does not include intervention in the civil war in China. So long as Chinese troops act as aggressors in Korea they must be opposed and that aggression, if possible, defeated. This does not mean that we who oppose them, by so doing, are committed to the overthrow by force of the government now in effective control of the mainland of China. As we see it we are engaged not in a national war against communist China or in intervening in a Chinese civil war, but as a member of the United Nations in a police action against aggression.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that we agree with those sentiments. We feel that they should be made to stand out, that the minister should have put them in more clear-cut language, and that his remarks on behalf of the Canadian people, for whom he speaks in matters of foreign policy, should have been directed clearly to our friend and neighbour, our ally, the great country to the south of us. The reason we are anxious that that be done, despite all the rules and practices of diplomacy, is that we very much fear that if this government, in the name of the Canadian people, offers no strong criticism of this first step that the new United States administration has taken, it will be that much more difficult to offer criticism of a second step. So we will go on down the line until we find ourselves involved in a succession of agreements to successive steps, the fourth or fifth one of which may be the step that leads us into the catastrophe of a third world war.

There is no doubt in my mind from what the minister has said that he disagrees with a policy the apparent aim of which is to take action with respect to something other than the Korean war, in this case the Chinese civil war. But despite the obvious opposition that the minister feels to what President Eisenhower has done, he covers that opposition by saying, as he did on an earlier occasion, that he trusts President Eisenhower's non-aggressive intentions. Well, I suggest that that is giving to President Eisenhower, and perhaps what is more important and more ominous, to those around him who help to shape United States foreign policy, the notion that if they take another step, a step such as the hon. member for Cariboo has just been objecting to—the proposal to blockade the China coast—or if they decide to bomb communist bases in Manchuria, somehow or other Canadians will still trust President Eisenhower's non-aggressive intentions. That will not be so, and therefore it seems to me that the time to speak out and say to our friends in the United States in friendly but firm terms that we disagree with the course upon which they are embarking is now, at the time of the very first step.

The positions of the various parties in the house on this question now seem to have been made clear. There have been doubts in the minds of some members as to where the government stood. I thought the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was trying yesterday to pull the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) into bed with him, but I hope I have got him out of that bed by putting on Hansard the quotations I have just read from the minister's previous statements. It is clear—and the members of these groups are here to correct me if I misinterpret them—that both the Progressive Conservative and the Social Credit parties support and go along with what they call the stiffening policy being adopted by the new administration at Washington. At least they are stating clearly where they stand, and that is the duty of each group in this house.

Mr. Graydon: I suppose Hansard will really show our position exactly, will it not?

Mr. Knowles: I think it will, and I think even the hon. member will admit that I am not misinterpreting his position when I say that he felt Canadians should not be alarmed at what had taken place in Washington, and that his general view was to go along with the new policy at Washington.

Mr. Graydon: I said I did not think you should get too worked up about it.

Mr. Knowles: At any rate the hon. member for Peel is admitting that he is not worked up about it, that he is not going to lodge any protest. I suggest if the people at Washington hear too much of that sort of thing and get the notion that in Canada there is any considerable body of opinion that is not worked up about what they are doing, it will be an encouragement to those around President Eisenhower helping him to shape foreign policy to suggest further steps which could be dangerous and a real menace to the peace of the world.

Mr. Graydon: The red Chinese may be listening to you, too.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is Washington's view?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend from Peel is, I think, indulging in something that I referred to in the early part of my remarks, when I said that it is quite easy to over-simplify this whole business and say that because the other side is doing such and such we are justified in doing the same thing. But do we not have to calculate the risks both ways and reach a decision as to what is best for the world, what is best for mankind at this time? We feel very strongly—I have said it four or five times but I will say it again—that at the present time our aim should be to work for the end and not the extension of the war in Asia. We feel very strongly about what Washington has done with respect to Formosa, and about the wild statements that are being made by many of those in political life and many of those in the military services in the United States who are suggesting further steps which are designed to interfere in the Chinese civil war and which in our view cannot but have the effect of extending the war in Asia.

I agree with the hon. member for Cariboo that if that happens there is no telling where it may go, and it is my view that we should express our opposition to moves in that direction not when it is too late, but now, at the very beginning of this change of policy.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the hon. member think the President has made any of these wild statements or has expressed the wild views to which he refers?

Mr. Knowles: No. I think I made it clear that the only statement or change of policy that I have attributed directly to President Eisenhower himself, in my remarks today, is the change with respect to the seventh fleet. I said that the other statements that were being made, suggesting the blockading of the China coast or the bombing of the bases in Manchuria, were coming from others in congress and from military leaders in various parts of the United States. Of necessity President Eisenhower must get advice, must have people around him to help formulate policy, and my fear is that if unchecked by the voice of people on this North American continent who are friendly to the United States they might go on down the path that can lead to the third world war that we all hope can be prevented.

I want to say that in our view it is not only in the Far East that we feel the new administration is making certain mistakes. We feel that this is also happening in respect of the situation in Europe. Consequently we believe that there too the voice of Canada should be heard, in friendly but firm terms, in order to help the United States administration get on a more hopeful and helpful pathway.
