It has often been said that Canada's position in world affairs is to a large extent that of an interpreter between the United States and western Europe in particular, as well as between the United States and the countries that make up our commonwealth. There is no denying the fact of that situation, and it is one indeed of great importance. It is our view that at this particular juncture it is extremely important that we try to interpret to the United States, and in particular to the new administration at Washington, what we feel to be a proper understanding with respect to the situation in western Europe and also with respect to the commonwealth of nations to which we belong. In that connection it does seem to us that the new administration, through its secretary of state, Mr. Dulles, is showing a lack of understanding of the situation in western Europe. That lack of understanding, I submit, has been portrayed by some of the statements Mr. Dulles made both before his recent trip to Europe and while he was over there, not to mention some of the statements he has made since he came back.

Hon. members are generally familiar with the statement that Mr. Dulles made late in January over television, the full text of which was printed in the New York Times of Wednesday, January 28, 1953. I refer in particular to this paragraph:

> The United States has made a big investment in western Europe on the theory that there could be unity there. Of the $40 billion which we have sent abroad since the end of the second world war, almost $30 billion have gone into western Europe. If however, there were no chance, and that I just refuse to believe, but if it appeared there were no chance of getting effective unity, and if in particular France, Germany and England—

Perhaps I might be permitted to pause here and say, along with others who have quoted this, that I suppose Mr. Dulles meant the United Kingdom.

> —should go their separate ways then certainly it would be necessary to give a little rethinking to America's own foreign policy in relation to western Europe.

We have assumed for the last number of years that the United States was in with the countries of western Europe in the terms of a partnership. We have recognized that the role of the United States has had to be that of one with greater wealth to share in such a way as to assist some of the other members of that partnership. Still, we have thought of it as a partnership, and it seems to me that we owe a considerable debt of gratitude to people like Roosevelt and Truman for their part in helping to bring an end to the isolationist sentiment that was common in the United States for so long.

Having mentioned the names of those two former presidents of the United States, I must say that I was shocked yesterday and deeply disappointed to hear the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) refer to the late Franklin Roosevelt and to Mr. Harry Truman, now of Independence, Missouri, as the betrayers of humanity, or the betrayers of mankind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I take it, from the approval with which my remarks in that connection are now greeted, that this house generally does not share that view at all.

I was on the point of saying that it was through what those two men did, along with their other contributions to the good of mankind, that the United States did seem to get pulled out of its isolationist approach, and its people in our view seemed to become partners in the common effort to find a means to get away from war, in the hope that we might yet build a world of peace and human accord.

When one member of that partnership, even if it is the member that has had to shell out dollars—and do not forget that some of the other members shelled out something more precious than dollars—starts to threaten other members, threatening to withdraw its dollars and its support unless other members follow a course dictated by that partner, then the situation is, I would suggest, fraught with real difficulty.

My feeling about this matter is not that we should fly off the handle and holler about it; nevertheless we should speak pretty plainly out of the role we occupy as an interpreter between the United States on the one hand, and Britain and the commonwealth on the other. As we play that role of interpreter we should try to get our friends in Washington to see the difficulties that will flow from their following that sort of course.

As hon. members know, after making this statement on television which I have just quoted, Mr. Dulles went over to Europe and travelled around. He visited a number of the countries there and it appears from quite a few press reports that he gave what amounted to an ultimatum, namely that the countries of western Europe should get together and achieve unity along the pattern in the mind of the United States within seventy-five days, or else. For example, here is a story as it appeared in a dispatch by Raymond Daniell, dated February 4, to the New York Times which appeared in that paper on February 5:

> According to foreign diplomats the line that Mr. Dulles has taken everywhere on his European trip is that Congress has reached the limit of its patience and wants action . . .

Later on he said:

> Unless there is action on the part of European legislators or a definite promise of it within 75 days he will find it very difficult to convince Congress that further appropriations should be made for Europe's defence.

As I say, there are a number of news dispatches on that point but they are all in the same vein and it appears that since Mr. Dulles returned to this continent, even in a speech made last night, he is still expressing the view of the United States that Europe must unite, or else. He put a little different twist on it last night because, if my memory serves me correctly from a reading of the papers this morning, he said that unless Europe were to unite soon nothing the United States could do could save that part of the world.

Now, when you hear things like that, with the background of the opposition that was expressed by some of the leading Republicans to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and when you remember the statement of Senator Robert Taft that this would be a case of rearming western Europe at American expense, one sees in the statements of Mr. Dulles what may well be an attempt to condition the American people to the idea of lessening the responsibility of the United States for the defence of freedom in the western part of Europe.

On the one hand we have this great neighbour of ours doing things in the Far East which we think are provocative, unnecessarily provocative, and in danger of bringing on a third world war. On the other hand in Europe you have this neutralist attitude, this pulling out, this saying to the countries of western Europe that unless you get together and do things the way we say they should be done, well, we just cannot sell the idea to the American people any longer.

Mr. Speaker, all of this beclouds the question as to what are the purposes and interests of the United States in western Europe. I believe that it will be far better if western Europe can unite and federate. There is no question but that a good deal of the trouble we have had across the years has been because of the division of that relatively small continent into so many different units. But for the United States to say to those countries that they must achieve unity in the European defence community or unity on whatever pattern the United States lays down, or be denied United States help is, I submit, the wrong way to go about it.

Several members in the debate have already referred to the significance of that train that crossed the boundary from Germany to France at one o'clock the other morning without having to stop for any customs inspection. Surely that six-nation Schuman plan is a step in the right direction, something for which we are all extremely grateful. It holds great promise for the future. But is not the situation this, that it is far better to encourage these countries to go on with this kind of thing rather than submit them to the kind of threat that Mr. Dulles has been handing out?

Now, what is our part in all this, Mr. Speaker? I come back again to the statement that is so often made, namely that we are in the position of being the interpreter between these two parts of the world. The United States is closer to us than it is to Europe. As a matter of fact, if I may inject a personal note, I see over there my good friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) both of whom, like myself, were born in the United States. We had the good sense and good fortune to come to this country as soon as we could, and I had the good fortune to be born of Canadian parents. At any rate, there are many of us in this country who have the kind of connection with the United States that makes our relationship that of friends who surely can speak to each other quite clearly and plainly.

I contend that our government's spokesman on foreign policy, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), should talk plainly to the United States, both publicly and privately if he has a chance to see Mr. Dulles, and try to interpret to him the position of these other parts of the world, Britain and western Europe, with which we in this country have such a close connection.

Part of this whole problem as it arises at the present time lies in the age-long suspicion, if I may call it that, that exists between Germany and France. Right now there is a desire in many quarters that the European defence community be completely ratified. Hon. members know that in these countries, particularly in Germany and France, a great many reservations are being made and there are a great many stumbling blocks to the possibility of complete ratification of the protocol between the European defence community and NATO. As a matter of fact, as one looks over the reservations of each of these countries—they are some ten or twelve in number for one and six or seven for the other—one cannot help but sympathize with some of these reservations. I think the position of these countries should be interpreted to the United States. They should be told, in the meantime, not to go around handing out these 75-day threats, and supposing that as a result of that kind of threat immediate action will be taken.

As a matter of fact, the ominous feature of this whole business is that at the present time the picture in regard to western European unity is not as bright as it was before Mr. Dulles started making these television pronouncements and these threats in various parts of the world. It is not my privilege to talk to Mr. Dulles, but it may be the privilege of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Certainly when he speaks in this house on foreign policy he speaks even more than the rest of us for Canada. I think he should speak plainly as a Canadian friend to our United States friends on this whole question.

There is something else in what Mr. Dulles has been saying. I refer to that passage where he mentioned England and where we presumed he meant the United Kingdom. He objected to that country going its own way, rather than doing the bidding of the United States. There is something there that it seems to me Mr. Dulles and others do not fully appreciate, and that is the peculiar relationship between Britain and the countries of the commonwealth. That is one of the problems that Britain faces in tying up with the proposed military set-up on the continent of Europe. The United Kingdom forever has to keep in mind its relations with the commonwealth countries, particularly the Asian members of the commonwealth.

I suggest that even if Britain did not want to remember that connection for her own sake, we want her to remember the connection with the Asian members of the commonwealth for the sake of the peace of the world as a whole. In my view it is one of the fortunate elements in the picture at the present time, in view of the danger of conflict between the east and the west, conflict on a racial or a colour basis, that we have this association of nations, free and voluntary as it is, known as the commonwealth, including the great countries of India, Pakistan and Ceylon, along with the rest of us in this world-wide association. One wonders whether the importance of the commonwealth in holding our world together is fully appreciated by the people in Washington.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I see that it is just about six o'clock. Although I have a few more minutes remaining I shall not use them. I am prepared to conclude my remarks at this time. I hope that, like my colleague the member for Vancouver East, I have made it clear that we believe Canada should stand very clearly on the side of freedom. We believe also that the facts of the situation require that we assess the risks involved in going one way or the other, that we calculate the risks that confront us at the present time. We believe that, having done that, we must do our best to avoid the pursuit of any policy that would lead to the extension rather than the ending of the war in Asia. We feel we must avoid any course that would break down the larger unity that has been built up in the North Atlantic community and in western Europe, within the framework of the United Nations.

Because we take that position we feel that our voice should be one of strong and friendly advice to the United States. In other words, we have no quarrel with what the minister said in terms of foreign policy when you have read his speech closely enough to find it. The trouble is that the important points were buried in the middle of his speech and covered up with words that seemed to be chosen so that they would not be seen by the new administration in the United States. We think it should be said clearly to that country that we recognize the important part they are playing in the leadership of the free world. We recognize the importance of our friendly relations with them. But as my colleague said yesterday, we think we should not just be told what is being done; we should be consulted and in that consultation we should advise the administration at Washington that we believe no steps should be taken at this time that could lead to an extension of the war in Asia. Our immediate aim should be to bring to an end as soon as possible the present conflict in Korea. Having done that we should go on and do our best to pursue a course that will enable us to achieve permanent peace for all mankind.

Mr. Churchill: May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the importance of foreign affairs to Canada is so great that I am venturing to participate in this debate. I think it is only by a full discussion that we can arrive at the desired unified policy.

We are engaged in what appears to be a very serious struggle with the forces of communism. So far that struggle has not become one of global war with the navies, armies and air fleets of the world locked in mortal combat. It is possible that it will not be extended to a world-wide war. The strategy of the communist powers appears to take the form of a long-term process of erosion, with force applied here and there on the perimeter and psychological warfare increasingly pressed throughout the world.

Russia, unified and controlled by a military oligarchy, in some respects has an advantage over the freedom-loving democracies whose military alliances are subject to all the stresses and strains that must be expected if freedom to express opinions and to disagree is to be maintained; and without that freedom democracy would have no meaning.

With those thoughts in mind I suggest—and I am merely restating what others have already put forward—that we base our policy upon the premise that communism constitutes an external and internal threat to the democratic nations of the world, that that threat may well continue for a very long time, and that it can be met only by preparedness and eternal vigilance.

We should recognize the fact that a serious and perhaps decisive war for freedom is being waged in Asia; that the democracies must be fully prepared to resist any communist threats in Europe and the Middle East, and that an all-out effort must be made to perfect our military defences so that neither surprise nor superior forces will achieve success against us.

In my opinion the first thing to do is to create a proper climate of opinion. We should drop the terms "cold war" and "police action". We should avoid being misled in the future by insincere suggestions of an armistice in Korea. We should recognize that there is no immediate possibility of terminating the Korean war. We should generally settle down to a determined long pull against the communist menace.

We are faced by a crafty and implacable enemy who now controls one-third of the earth surface and 800 million people; an enemy who is practically self-sufficient in all materials necessary for war except oil; an enemy who appears to be planning or plotting the destruction of the western democracies, and who desires domination of the world. In his speech of January 27, as printed in U.S. News and World Report of February 6, Mr. Dulles used these words:

> —the threat is a deadly serious one. President Eisenhower recently said this nation stands in greater peril than at any time in our history. Any American who isn't awake to that fact is like a soldier who's asleep at his post. We must be awake, all of us awake, to that danger.

If the United States is in greater peril than at any time in its history, so is Canada; for our fortunes are inextricably linked with those of our neighbour to the south upon whose shoulders rests now the grievous weight of world leadership. Canadians must be just as awake to the peril as Americans; but if we continue to talk about the "cold war" and "police action", and use the term "cold peace" recently foisted upon a quiet, peaceful and unsuspecting public by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) if press reports are accurate, we shall certainly obscure the issue and run the risk of adopting an attitude of complacency.

External Affairs

Hon. members will recall the period in 1939, after the fall of Poland, to May 1940. That period was dubbed by careless observers "the phony war", and a go-slow and complacent attitude was adopted. It was not until the cataclysm struck in May 1940, and again in December, 1941, that the world was awakened to the gravity of the situation. Let us not make the same mistake again.

We are obviously engaged in a major war in Asia. It is unfortunate that the war is not viewed in the proper light as a war on three fronts, Korea with the threat to Japan, Indo-China and Malaya with the threat to southeast Asia, the rice bowl of the Far East. The forces on both sides comprise at least three million armed men. Casualties have reached a large total. It is war on a very considerable scale, and far from being limited in scope, it shows every sign of increasing in intensity and of becoming spread more widely as the nationalist forces of Chiang Kai-shek once again enter the conflict.

During the past year and a half we have been misled by the armistice negotiations in Korea into thinking that that particular phase of the warfare in Asia could be brought to an end. Surely it is obvious now that the communist powers never had any sincere desire to bring to a conclusion the war in Korea. The armistice talks were used as a cover for an intensive build-up of the Chinese army and for an intensive program of fortification and consolidation. At the same time the psychological effect of the negotiations served the purpose of lulling the United Nations into a mood of complacency.

There is now a widespread feeling that a full-scale effort on the part of the United Nations might bring the war in Korea to an end. I might point out that there is some difference of opinion among experts with regard to that. Nevertheless there has been considerable talk about bringing to an end the war in Korea, as if that would end the struggle against communism.

I notice in the Citizen of February 10 an article commenting on the fact that General Van Fleet, recently retired as the commander of the army in Korea, says that a big drive now would meet with success. Another general, an acknowledged military expert, Lieutenant General Robert Eichelberger, writing in a magazine, I am not sure whether it is Time or U.S. News and World Report, suggests that the course in Korea cannot be settled by an all-out offensive, but that we have to settle down to a long struggle there and replace in so far as possible some of the United Nations forces with trained and experienced South Korean troops. He suggests that simply driving to the waist of Korea is not going to be an easy operation, nor will it necessarily end the conflict. Those who have suggested making a drive to the waist of Korea have indicated that that would shorten the line by about half, from 150 odd miles to 70. They think it might be accomplished by suffering a casualty toll of about 50,000 men, but that would be better than to have the thing go on indefinitely, with casualties mounting month by month. But whether anyone is prepared at this stage to advocate such an all-out offensive is something open to question.

Canadian advice and counsel will be needed under these circumstances, and I hope that our people who have the opportunity to make their voices heard will point out some of the difficulties involved in any suggestion of a quick way to end the war in Korea. There is not only the question of the tremendous build-up of material required; there is the question of the training of the troops to take part, and there would be to some extent a frontal attack in addition to any airborne landing or any end runs by naval forces on the flanks; and the rotation system that is being followed by the United States army and by the Canadian brigade rather militates against building up quickly the forces capable of offensive action.

Even if an attempt were made to end the war in Korea, it does not follow that the war in Asia would be completed; for although our forces might be released from Korea, so also would the Chinese armies, unless they were destroyed. They would perhaps then be free to direct greater attention to Indo-China. Perhaps the pinning down of one million Chinese soldiers in Korea has saved southeast Asia from falling into the hands of the communists. If southeast Asia becomes a communist stronghold the whole Far Eastern and south Pacific area will be menaced.

During the past two and a half years the emphasis in our news reports has been on Korea. Malaya has been considered the concern only of the British and Indo-China as a colonial difficulty of the French. Well, consider in that connection the viewpoint of Geoffrey Crowther, editor of the London Economist. I should like to quote from an article that appeared in Look of December 16, 1952, in which he has this to say:

> When it comes to comparing relative efforts, Americans tend to overlook what is happening in Malaya, and the French complain even more bitterly that they are given little credit for what they are doing in Indo-China. The British in Malaya and the French in Indo-China, equally with the Americans in Korea, are fighting communists of Chinese nationality, who draw their inspiration and their weapons from Peking and Moscow. Korea, it is true, is a United Nations war—but only by the accident that the Russians were boycotting the UN when the fighting started and the security council was able to act. To the British and the French, this is a formal distinction but still not a real difference.

The reality is that all three western nations are fighting communism in the Far East, and if the burdens they are shouldering in doing so are put alongside their relative resources, the result is not as unequal as it can be made to appear by looking at Korea alone. Indeed, there is no doubt that, of the three, the heaviest strain falls on the French, whose contribution in Korea is the smallest.

Let us consider for a moment the effort that has been made in those three areas of conflict and the losses that have been suffered. In Korea it is estimated that United Nations forces number about 500,000, and enemy forces over a million. In Indo-China the French and Viet Namese have 400,000 under arms and their communist opponents about the same. In Malaya, the British and Malayans with 30,000 regular troops and 100,000 auxiliaries are opposed by communist guerrillas numbering about 5,000 and supported by thousands of communist sympathizers.

Casualties in Korea have been heavy; they have also been heavy in these other areas of conflict. United Nations estimates indicate that in Korea casualties on both sides have gone about as high as two million. Our own Canadian brigade in two years of service in Korea had a casualty list on January 31 of this year of 1,335. The cost of the Korean war to the United States is $7 billion a year. A million tons of supplies per month are consumed.

To call this a cold war or a police action is in my opinion to very seriously misuse the English language, and is psychologically unsound. It breeds complacency and indifference, with a resulting slackness in the field of production of military supplies.

Quite a number of examples could be given of apparent slackness in the production of military supplies, and various news reports indicate that munitions of war and military supplies of all kinds have been diverted from Europe to the Far East. That situation is not as good as it might be. The outstanding example, of course, has been the shortage of ammunition in Korea, which has been both acknowledged and denied from various sources.

I give this just as an example of what the attitude toward the Korean war may cause in connection with the vital matter of supplying munitions of war. I noticed that in January of this year Mr. Arthur Blakely, writing in the Winnipeg Tribune, drew attention to certain developments during the Christmas recess in regard to the matter. I quote his words:

But there's been some interesting developments during the Christmas recess. They've occurred in Korea and in Washington. When President-elect Eisenhower visited Korea, he found—and was disturbed to find—that U.N. troops were handicapped by . . . a shortage of ammunition.

He certainly didn't regard the situation which he found as one which could be regarded as perfectly normal under even "static" war conditions.

And then on February 6 the Montreal Star says this:

Canada has been called in to help remedy the shortage of ammunition for United Nations forces in Korea . . .

The shortage of ammunition in Korea, reported and denied repeatedly for months, has been said to have forced rationing among UN troops at the front, particularly in certain types and sizes of shells . . .

President Eisenhower confirmed existence of the general shortage when he returned from his trip to Korea before taking office, promising a speed-up in deliveries.

And in the Montreal Star of February 9 I find this article from Washington:

The army indicated yesterday it is making progress toward solving ammunition shortages in Korea.

And farther down:

However, army sources said the situation is unchanged from last December 19, when army officers at a Pentagon briefing revealed that President Eisenhower was dissatisfied with the amount of ammunition available in Korea.

The situation in so far as our own Canadian troops are concerned may be quite satisfactory. The over-all picture of munitions supplies in Korea, if these reports are accurate, obviously has not been satisfactory. I suggest that that slackening of effort in the supply of munitions is due to complacency which we should get rid of.

I have quoted from some sources in that connection. I should like now to draw the attention of hon. members to the comments of Mr. Willson Woodside, military critic for Saturday Night. For the last two years he has been drawing our attention to the threat posed by communist efforts in Indo-China. In the issue of February 7 he relates that struggle to the European scene and points out that the difficulties in completing the plans for the army of the European defence community extend from France's troubles in Indo-China.

Just a short quotation from Saturday Night of February 7:

For, although the European army crisis exploded in Paris, it originated in Indo-China. There, following Lenin's famous saying that the road to Paris and London lies through Peking and Calcutta, and the late Andre Zhdanov's exhortation, in founding the cominform in 1947, that the communists must take the capitalist states in the rear in Southeast Asia, the Soviets have been bleeding French military power to death.

And he suggests that there we may find communist strategy, and the reason for our difficulties in the formation of the desired European defence army.

Another military commentator whose observations merit close attention is Major General Fuller, one of Great Britain's outstanding authorities on warfare. In an interview with U.S. News and World Report reprinted in Reader's Digest for January he says some things I should like to draw to the attention of the house. He was asked a series of questions, to which he gave the answers indicated in the following:

Q. General Fuller, what is your impression of the present European army?

A. As it stands it is pathetically unreal. It's just a paper army. If Russia should move now, there is no obstacle to her overrunning western Europe except the stubborn geography of the Pyrenees mountain range between France and Spain.

Q. Could the allied forces now in Europe fight an effective withdrawal action if Russia did strike?

A. No. It is anybody's estimate how much they could salvage in men and equipment. But our withdrawal would be disastrous psychologically. We must not wrongly assume that the next war will be like the last—a war of retreat, then liberation and finally unconditional surrender.

Q. Does that mean the military outlook in Europe is hopeless?

A. Not at all. The purpose of rearming is to force the enemy to negotiate on terms favourable to yourself.

And then the following:

Q. Do you look for a shooting war in Europe in the foreseeable future?

A. No. It was Lenin's idea "to postpone operations until the moral disintegration of the enemy renders delivery of the mortal blow easy." In his system, psychological took precedence over military. Today Russia's build-up has two purposes: First, to support her psychological war by a terror barrage, a standing threat to all who oppose it; second, to defend herself should her psychological offensive lead to actual war.

General Fuller has had a reputation for thirty years of competent criticism of military effort and is well worth paying attention to. There is another critic to whom almost every military leader during the last thirty years has paid attention, and that is Liddell Hart. In the February issue of the United Nations World he has an article which anyone who is interested in this problem should read with some care. Liddell Hart needs no words of praise from me because he has been praised by so many in the course of his lifetime. Of him Ivan Maisky, the former Soviet ambassador to London, said:

We regard Liddell Hart as the best military brain in England.

In this article Liddell Hart puts himself in the position of Russia's chief of staff and decides what advice he would give to Stalin if he occupied that position. No man has played a greater part in directing military doctrine than Liddell Hart, and I drew the attention of the house to the credit given him by the German leaders in the last war for the instruction they had gained from his writings on armoured warfare. Putting himself in the position of Russia's chief of staff, he surveys the world scene from the Russian point of view and decides where he would advise Stalin to strike. It is interesting reading indeed, and if world domination is to result he puts the chief emphasis on Great Britain. I should like to quote briefly from what he says:

"In the first place", I would emphasize, "Russia must make sure that she can annihilate Britain quickly—not so much because of Britain's own power but because of her key position, just off the continent of Europe as a base for American counterattack, particularly with atomic bombs. Secondly, we must be able to see a good chance, an effective way, of paralyzing counteraction by the United States for a lengthy period. It will not be enough", I should say, "to overrun Europe and sweep the Americans out of it, unless we can ensure ample time for them to cool down, in a state of impotence, and come to the conclusion that there is more to lose than to gain by a prolonged and destructive effort to recover their hold on Europe."

Of course he elaborates on these two main objectives. It is interesting to note what he would suggest to Stalin with respect to the Far East if he were his chief of staff. He says:

In the Far East, I should use part of our fourth army, which is positioned near the Bering strait, for a raiding stroke against Alaska. That is not a suitable line for a major operation, but even a small stroke there would play on the fears of the Americans and Canadians, and ensure a disproportionate diversion of their forces to guard their own continent.

Finally he concludes with these words:

Nevertheless, I would not care to advise that an attack should be undertaken . . . It would therefore be wiser to pursue our "camouflaged warfare" policy and strategy—what our opponents call "the cold war"—which shows many signs of continued and increasing success. As a Soviet soldier, I am profoundly conscious of the fundamental truth of Lenin's maxim, so masterfully applied by Stalin, that "the soundest strategy in war is to postpone operations until the moral disintegration of the enemy renders the mortal blow both possible and easy.

I suggest that Liddell Hart's appraisal of the military scene throughout the world is worth very careful study.

Summing up, what are the courses open to the western democracies? I think we have to pursue our policy of military preparedness. We have to do what we are doing, provide trained men and munitions. In the actual war zone, I think the proper policy is now being employed of training the Korean people themselves and the people in Malaya and Indo-China for service in the field so they are able to protect their own countries. There is nothing new in that policy because for many years the British and French have trained troops of nations which have been under their control; and if it is pursued the number of United States, British, Canadian and other United Nations forces might reasonably be reduced or might be held in reserve to bolster the homeland forces fighting the enemy. That, plus naval and air support, might be the answer.

In addition, we can supply specialized services from our advanced knowledge of mechanized and scientific warfare. Take the example of South Korea again. It has a population of 20 to 23 million people. They now have 14 divisions trained to operate against the enemy, and could have up to 20. With 20 they might successfully conduct their defensive war against the pressure of the communist forces. In Indo-China similar steps are being taken to train the soldiers of the Viet Nam, and also in Malaya.

In the third place, I think we have to continue our efforts to reach a peaceful settlement. I am not suggesting that such efforts should not be carried on. I have no intention of appearing to be an alarmist. Looking at this problem in an objective manner, I think we are facing the application of force by the communist powers in some parts of the world, and we must attempt to arrive at a peaceful settlement in so far as we can. I hope that a peaceful settlement may be achieved. I hope we will spare no effort to reach a peaceful settlement, but coupled with that I think must go the military preparedness that I have mentioned.

Then, if we follow General Fuller, we must emphasize psychological warfare. General Fuller suggests that that is a part of the communist threat to the world, and he thinks that we have not taken as active a part in that aspect of the conflict as we should. General Fuller was asked this question:

> Is there any strictly military answer to communism?

This is his reply:

> Certainly not. You must answer an idea with a better idea. In the last two wars, the winners came off almost as badly as the losers. In other words, the power to destroy is rapidly becoming the deterrent to war. Since mankind will continue to argue, the people of the world will more and more be restricted to a psychological battleground in order to avoid extermination.

In all of this what is Canada's part? I suggest that once again in the course of our history we have to become the arsenal of democracy. Our productive capacity and our skill are equal to the task. I think that our armed commitments can be kept on a limited basis as at present. I agree with the proposal put forward last year by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) that our emphasis should be on air, and that in addition we should supply naval and army forces, but that we should be careful to keep our air fleets in being and not distribute them throughout the world. As far as our army commitments may be concerned, mobile armoured forces should be the answer in this present era, with airborne troops available for quick and useful service in times of emergency. In addition, if we can assist South Korea, Indo-China and Malaya by military teams to train their men, so much the better; and in conjunction with the people of those countries we can put forth a proper and full effort against the menace which appears to be threatening our very existence.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by quoting from President Eisenhower's message to Congress. These are his words:

> Our country has come through a painful period of trial and disillusionment since the victory of 1945. We anticipated a world of peace and co-operation. The calculated pressures of aggressive communism have forced us, instead, to live in a world of turmoil.
> From this costly experience we have learned one clear lesson. We have learned that the free world cannot indefinitely remain in a posture of paralysed tension, leaving forever to the aggressor the choice of time and place and means to cause greatest hurt to us at least cost to himself.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that some rethinking of the world situation is required at the present time. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has pointed out that it is a global problem, and it is on that global scale that we must look at it. I think if we call the war in Asia what it is—a war—and consider that our troops in Europe and elsewhere are performing functions that were performed centuries ago by the Roman legions on the borders of that empire; and if we meet the menace of communism which tries to subvert democratic governments, and conduct as far as we are able a modern psychological warfare, then some of our problems in connection with the menace of communist tyranny may be lessened.

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I am conscious of the fact that this has turned out to be a long debate, and I can assure you that I will try to shorten my remarks as much as possible or at least to speak as quickly as I can.

It seems evident from what has been said by those who have preceded me in this debate so far that there is very great importance attached by members in this house to the United Nations Organization. Indeed, I believe it is our only hope today for peaceful settlement of the difficulties of the world. I think there is a primary consideration which must be kept in mind at all times, and it is that the existence of the United Nations is mainly dependent on the support of the people themselves in the other democracies of the world. It is of primary importance that the people themselves should fully understand what the United Nations Organization is and fully appreciate what it can do for them, so they will continue to give it their full support.

As we all know, the United Nations Organization is an association of nations and, as such, is an association of governments. In the case of democracies, governments can only go as far as the people in those countries will allow them to go. It follows that the United Nations can only succeed to the extent that the people in the various countries will allow them to go. So, Mr. Speaker, I think it is of primary importance that we all do our utmost to try to explain and give full appreciation to what this United Nations organization is, to the people in our various constituencies. By the same token I think it is our duty and I think it is my duty tonight and it is the reason that I rise in my place tonight, to answer unfounded criticisms, some of which have appeared in my constituency.

A few weeks ago the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) held a political meeting in my constituency. Naturally I do not know what transpired at the meeting, but when he departed to return to Ottawa he left in his wake an article which was published last week in the local newspaper of one community. It is a very damaging article, in my humble opinion. I think it is one so full of inaccuracies that it cannot go unchallenged, and that the record must be put straight. I refer to an article entitled "An honest appraisal of the United Nations Organization by E. G. Hansell, M.P." The article reads in part as follows:

> Truth campaign
> Not so long ago President Truman decided on a campaign of truth to expose the evils of communism and went so far as to set up a government agency for this purpose. But truth is not one-sided. The searchlight of truth should also be turned upon ourselves, for it is we of the free nations of the UN who are in a pickle at the present time.

I might pause, Mr. Speaker, to wonder for a moment exactly what this means. Since there are only two sides in this issue, the democracies on one side and the communist states on the other, apparently it is we who are in the pickle. I would just refer the hon. member to the excellent speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), more particularly at page 1848 of Hansard of February 11 where, in talking about the Korean resolution before the United Nations, he summarized as follows:

> Their summary rejection, and it was a summary rejection by the communists, of this great opportunity for peace exposes the hollowness and hypocrisy of the communist clamour for a cease-fire without an armistice . . .

Then I go on with the newspaper article:

> —truth is still our weapon, but let us have the whole truth.

And here is the first line of his next paragraph:

> The fact of the matter is that this United Nations is largely a socialist-communist organization.

Well, Mr. Speaker, one can only go to the history of the organization itself. As we well know the organization arose principally from the Atlantic charter, and I would like to quote a paragraph of that charter which was drawn up in August of 1941 by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill on a warship on the Atlantic—and there was no socialist-communist there. The paragraph reads:

> —a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

Then on January 1, 1942, representatives of 26 nations signed in Washington the declaration by the United Nations expressing support of the principle of the Atlantic charter and pledging their countries to go on fighting alongside each other until victory. So there is nothing socialist or communist in the first history of the organization.

Then we must look at the present membership of the organization. As all hon. members know there are at present 60 nations which are members of the organization. Of those there are 6 nations that can be termed communist and possibly half a dozen that can be termed socialist. So there are now some 48 nations out of 60 which can by no stretch of the imagination be called socialist-communist nations.

It is difficult to understand the ignorance of a member who could make a statement of that nature, that the United Nations Organization is a socialist and communist organization. Even if the implication there was that the U.S.S.R. wanted to tailor the United Nations to their own political pattern, certainly they have not had much success so far. One need but look at the pattern of the voting that has taken place from day to day in the United Nations assembly to see that the pattern is always the same. Take the vote on the Korean issue, 54 nations for and 5 against with one abstention. There was a majority of 49 nations against the 5 nations of the communist-socialist world. I know from personal experience when I was there that that is the pattern all through; inevitably that was the way the vote was recorded. It is, therefore, absolutely unexplainable to me how a member in this house could make a statement of that nature.

Then he goes on in the next sentence:

It is applauded by the internationalists, most of whom are socialists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly to whom the hon. member refers as "internationalists". I do know this, that the United Nations Organization—we have had an excellent demonstration in this house—is applauded by people of good will throughout the world who are seeking an international basis for justice, harmony and freedom. It is simply ridiculous, for instance, to call the government of Canada socialist, or the government of the United Kingdom. The most important nation in the United Nations and the one that is carrying the biggest load of all is the United States of America, and it is not socialist. It is difficult to understand how anyone could say that the association of these nations is applauded by internationalists. Then the next sentence is as follows:

It was conceived and brought into existence by those who visualized a world government and whose desire, in the process, was to bury national sovereignty—

I must pause on the first part of that sentence, "It was conceived". Possibly the hon. member can do some mind-reading, and is the only one who can tell us the secret aims of the founding fathers. But we do have the nature and purposes of the organization well set out in the charter itself. Anyone, particularly the hon. member who stated that this was supposed to be an honest appraisal of the United Nations, should have taken the trouble to read the preamble of the charter before judging the organization he was going to appraise. We find the following in a paragraph of the preamble:

—to reaffirm faith in fundamental rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small—

World government, Mr. Speaker; that is exactly what the United Nations is not. It never was intended to be a world government, and that is clearly stated in the charter. All you have to do is turn to article 1, subsection 2, to find the following purpose set out:

To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples—

Then, turning to article 2, subsection 1, we find that the organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members. In article 2 of the constitution we find set forth the manner in which sovereign rights shall be officially interpreted. We find there that "sovereign equality" was officially defined as meaning that states are juridically equal; that each state enjoys the right inherent in full sovereignty; that the personality of the state is respected as well as its territorial integrity and political independence; that the state should, under international order, comply faithfully with its international duties and obligations.

One turns to section 7 to find the following:

Nothing contained in the present charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present charter—

It is made quite clear in the charter to anyone who cares to read it even in cursory manner that the organization was never intended to be a world government.

Under the heading "Moscow conference" this press report runs something like this:

In 1943 Moscow was the setting for a conference of dignitaries, some of the big men of the earth, none other than the foreign ministers of those nations arrayed against Hitler.

It is not clear if the writer has commendation or condemnation for those who were against Hitler. I continue to quote:

At this conference the setting up of the United Nations Organization was initiated. "The old league of nations had failed. We must have something stronger", seemed to be their theme. It was recognized that in order to have power centralized in a world organization it would be necessary to solidify the already centralized international power of finance, and this would have to be made to synchronize if possible with the proposed United Nations Organization.

It is not quite clear what is meant by the international power of finance. It would seem to indicate that the member sees a dark plot by big bankers to centralize the financial powers of the world. Here again I should like to direct the attention of the house to this organization, the international monetary fund and the bank. The purpose of this organization is just the opposite. It is not a matter of centralizing, because again it is an association of nations and not of individuals. It takes power away from individuals and places it in the hands of nations and governments.

The purposes of the international monetary fund are clearly set forth in the charter of that organization as well. It is to promote international monetary co-operation through a permanent institution which provides machinery for consultation and collaboration on international monetary problems; to facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy; to promote exchange stability; to assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade; to give confidence to members by making the fund's resources available to them under adequate safeguards, and so on. So, instead of centralizing power, the purpose of this association of nations is to help the less favoured nations.

Then we go on to the next phrase in this report:

> The next items on the agenda of the world socio-commio planners were the Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks conferences which resulted in setting up the international monetary fund and the world bank.

This is a new word which was coined, I presume, for the occasion: "socio-commio" planners. I imagine it means something like socialist communist planners. Here again it is not quite clear who are those planners, but we know that this was planned by the four big nations of the world.

Who were present when these arrangements were made? I am sure we will not find any socialists or communists outside of the one delegation. Representing China was Wellington Koo, who brought China into the league of nations, and Victor Hoo. Representing the United Kingdom was Lord Halifax and Sir Alexander Cadogan. Representing the United States was Edward Stettinius, James Dunn and Joseph Clark Agnew, the latter being a member of the board of review, atomic energy, of the United States. There again there is no indication or at least no substance to the allegation that these were socio-commio planners. It then goes on to say:

> These aforementioned agreements were ratified by the parliaments of the signatory nations of the world. But let us pause for a moment and meditate on the startling fact that the executive secretary of the aforementioned conferences and a key figure in shaping this centralized and powerful world financial machinery was none other than Alger Hiss, since convicted by the Supreme Court of the United States as a communist agent. Is it conceivable that such a brain whose first loyalty was to Moscow would advise such machinery as would be contrary to the wishes of the Kremlin?

Reference is made there to a key figure. As all members well know, the bank and the fund were planned at the Bretton Woods conference. There is no record that Hiss ever attended that conference, either as a member of the United States delegation or on the secretariat. The secretary general of that conference was Mr. Warren Kelchner, chief of the division of international conferences of the state department. There is no evidence whatsoever to indicate that Alger Hiss attended that conference in any capacity whatsoever. He then goes on to say:

> Some of Hiss's advisers were men who were already powerful figures in world finance. Among them was Henry Morgenthau, Jr., whose plan to restrict and demoralize the German economy for the benefit of American financiers has back-fired. There was also James P. Warburg who is an ardent advocate of world government. His friend, Eugene Meyer, another powerful banker, became the first head of the International Bank. His successor was John J. McCloy, who sat under the teaching of the marxist Felix Frankfurter of Harvard Law School.

For an hon. member to suggest seriously that Henry Morgenthau, Jr., secretary of the United States treasury and chairman of the United States delegation to Bretton Woods, the elected president of that conference, was an adviser to a middle-ranking civil servant at the conference is beyond all imagination. It is obvious that the writer has indulged in a little indirect anti-semitism. He refers to McCloy, and was attempting to link him up with what he termed was the marxist, Felix Frankfurter. It is quite obvious that this was an unadulterated smear on a very notable person, a justice of the United States supreme court. I cannot say the word I would like to use. Then he goes on:

> The same traitor Alger Hiss was also executive secretary of the San Francisco conference and one of the brains behind the charter which moderately advocates a world police force which would whip into line such nations who dared to refuse to toe the line, which line would be determined by the world government boys.

The same traitor, Alger Hiss, is indicated as one of the brains behind the charter. As we all know, the executive secretary of the San Francisco charter was responsible for the administrative arrangements for the conference. There is no evidence whatsoever to substantiate the statement that he was in any way the brains of the conference. I can imagine that his time must have been pretty well occupied in arranging the administrative details of such a large conference. Delegations from fifty nations attended that conference and drafted the charter.

From Canada there were Mr. Mackenzie King and the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Then there were Mr. Wellington Koo; Mr. Bidault and Mr. Pleven from France; Mr. Fraser from New Zealand;

Field Marshal Smuts from South Africa; Mr. Eden, Mr. Attlee and Lord Halifax from the United Kingdom, and Mr. Stettinius, Mr. Hull and Senators Connally and Vandenberg from the United States. To suggest that all those men were simply hoodwinked by a member of the secretariat is just fantastic, to say the least. Then he goes on to say:

> Oh, yes! And we mustn't forget another choice morsel. Mr. Stettinius was secretary of state of the United States at the time and played a big part in the San Francisco conference. His speeches at this conference were written by one Dalton Trumbo, who has since been exposed as a communist by the congressional committee on un-American activities.

The fact that a few United States civil servants in that department have been found unreliable does not justify a statement of that kind as applied to Mr. Stettinius. Frankly this type of slur is most dangerous. Then later on he says:

> Why should it be necessary to make surrender of national sovereignty a condition of co-operation?

It is not necessary to surrender national sovereignty to make international co-operation possible. This is not required by the United Nations charter. However, there are instances where freely negotiated and accepted agreements contain terms that limit certain aspects of national sovereignty in the interest of obtaining effective co-operation. Almost any international treaty or agreement involves the voluntary limitation of the exercise of certain rights. The agreement or convention for the suppression of the slave trade or control of the international movement of narcotic drugs required each signatory to agree to a limitation in the exercise of certain rights of sovereignty. There is nobody in this house who would object to such conditions.

I see the clock is moving on, and I do not intend to go any farther with this argument. I think I have quoted enough to show how unreliable and dangerous literature of that nature can be when circulated among the people who go to these meetings, unaware of what is to happen and expecting the truth to be presented to them. I deplore the fact that any hon. member of this house should take advantage of the confidence that was shown in him to spread such propaganda. I repeat that the effectiveness of this vital organization depends in a most essential way on the support which it will receive from the people at large in the democracies.

Mr. Hansell: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member while he was speaking, but perhaps I may ask him a question now. He has been quoting an article which I wrote some time ago, and in asking my question I am not denying that I wrote the article. I should like to know the name of the newspaper in which it was reprinted, because I did not leave the article there.

Mr. Jutras: The article was published in the local newspaper in the town of Provencher where the hon. member for Macleod held a meeting.

Mr. Hansell: What is the name of the paper and of the town?

Mr. Jutras: I will send the hon. member the name.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this is a motion to refer the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to a select committee, and it is the only opportunity hon. members have of speaking on the subject. I therefore wish to take advantage of the occasion to make a few remarks.

A very important event took place last year when the Democratic regime in the United States finished 20 years in office and General Eisenhower, who had been commander in chief of the allied forces in world war II and then had organized the forces in Europe under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, resigned his position, stood as a candidate and was elected.

It seemed to me that as soon as he announced he was going to run as a candidate, he was going to be elected. There was something about General Eisenhower that impressed the whole world as a man of destiny, a man of the hour. Like Washington, he was first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

Although we give credit to General Eisenhower for what he has accomplished up to the present time, I think it would be hard to agree with the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) in his condemnation of the two previous presidents. On reflection perhaps he will admit that these men made great contributions to the life of the United States and the life of the world, and must not be condemned because they made mistakes. Sometimes they made them because they received bad advice. It seems to me that the people of the United States and the people of the world owed a great deal to President Roosevelt in those early years when he came to the assistance of Great Britain.

Now that a new regime has taken office at Washington it is only to be expected that there will be some change in their policy. They have been criticizing the Democrats for many years for doing the wrong things, and it is therefore only natural that they should try out their own policy. But in regard to foreign affairs President Truman and President Roosevelt before him said that they were following a bipartisan policy. An example of that was Mr. Dulles negotiating the treaty with Japan, and he is now secretary of state for General Eisenhower.

As a matter of fact there is very little change in the attitude of the present government towards the countries of Europe and the European defence community and that of the administration that preceded General Eisenhower. I hold in my hand several references which prove that there is very little change at all. President Eisenhower himself said that his policy towards our European allies, if it was not to be exactly new, was also going to be more positive. He said that maximum security against communist aggression required closer co-operation among the nations of western Europe, and that this unity could only be created from within. He bluntly warned:

> Our allies would get help in the measure that they strive earnestly to do their full share of the common task.

That was General Eisenhower. But here is a statement by Senator Connally, leader of the Democratic party in the United States, which was made in July, 1952. He said, and I am quoting from a summary of the congressional proceedings in the United States for June and July, 1952:

> The defence of Germany of course benefits the Germans themselves more directly than any other nation. The U.S.A. was willing to help any free people defend themselves against totalitarian aggression, but it was not willing or able to carry the whole burden of defending those who were not interested in their own self-defence. The Germans had pledged their best efforts; they had undertaken very heavy commitments and they deserved support.

I hold in my hand the Saturday Review of May 31, 1952. In it is a review of a book by Drew Middleton, the correspondent of the New York Times, called the "Defence of Europe". The review by Frank Altschul is headed: "Diplomacy vs. Resources", and he says:

> As another example, Mr. Middleton echoes what we hear from many Europeans, that American impatience with the slow progress toward European integration is, to say the least, not well received. When this is expressed in the form of a threat that, unless the process is speeded up, we may discontinue economic and military assistance altogether, positive resentment is aroused.

I quote that, Mr. Speaker, to show that Mr. Dulles is not saying anything new; he is not announcing or pronouncing any new policy. That was said by the Truman government, and there was no great outcry from my friends to the left at that time.

In regard to Formosa, in the same volume of the congressional proceedings there is a speech by Mr. J. C. Stennis, a Democratic member of the armed services committee, who said:

> They should immediately intensify and extend to the division level the training of Chinese nationalist troops on Formosa, and give the highest priority to fully equipping them as early as possible for use on Formosa and in Korea. If communism was to be stopped in Asia, they must develop Asiatic manpower to do the job, and Formosa was the place to begin. First consideration should be given to the eventual use in Korea of the Chinese nationalist troops now on Formosa.

In Time for February 9, however, they say that a great change has taken place in the Formosan policy. The Truman doctrine contained the Chinese nationalists and kept them on Formosa and the United States had sent only a very small amount of equipment there. That is to be changed, and the present administration believe that greater assistance should be given to the armies of Chiang Kai-shek.

Before the hon. members to my left, the members of the C.C.F. party, spoke in this debate I knew what their attitude was going to be. They have frequently laid down the law in this house, especially in regard to China, and particularly in regard to Chiang Kai-shek. They are undoubtedly opposed to Chiang Kai-shek. They lose no opportunity to criticize him. They see no good in the man or in anybody who has been associated with him. But they do not condemn the Chinese communists. To any fair-minded man looking over the record of China for as long as he can look back, say for the past 25 years, it is obvious that during the regime of Chiang Kai-shek China was a very much healthier place for the majority of the people who were living there than it is at the present time.

Take the missionaries who have been persecuted, who have been arrested and imprisoned and punished for no crimes at all, and sometimes have suffered martyrdom. Some of them have been driven out of the country, and they have partially told the story of what went on. Is there anyone who will deny the truth of the statement that instead of bringing freedom, "the communist liberation army brought abject slavery, utter misery and terrifying fear".

I am referring to an article by Father Craig Strang of the St. Francis Xavier mission, Scarboro Bluffs, a Newfoundlander who was a prisoner in communist China for several years, and who has only recently been released and returned to his home. He has written an article entitled "Journey Into Freedom." He is not the only one who has come back from there telling terrible tales of the cruelty that has taken place since the communist regime assumed power in China.

It was amusing to listen to the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) today making the statement that the Chinese are great lovers of the land, and how they are going to outlast all the peoples of the earth—that is, they and the French Canadians. Well, I can believe that about the French Canadians, whom I very much admire. I could believe it, too, about the Chinese under a peaceful regime, but not under anything that has taken place since the communists took over. True, the Chinese are lovers of the land. They are peasants, and like peasants everywhere they love the land. But the communists are going to do in China what they did in Russia. They will take the land from the Chinese and divide it into big plots, and in that event the Chinese will just be labourers with no interest in that land. The produce from the land will go principally to the state. So really my hon. friend has not appreciated what has taken place in China.

But to refer back to the article by Father Strang, he tells how the communist army came into Lishui, where he was stationed. They borrowed the furniture and vehicles, although they never returned them. They borrowed the churches for meeting halls, and the priests were never allowed to return to those churches again. The saying of mass was forbidden, and all church services were prohibited. Priests and nuns were kept as prisoners for years, and had to live on very small rations.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), acting leader of the C.C.F., is not here at the moment to hear what I have to say. Certainly my friends to my left overlook the policy of the communists. It was not the intention of the communists merely to win the war in Korea. That is only a trifling thing, so far as they are concerned, only a means to an end. Out beyond Korea there is a place called Japan, with 80 million people. That is the prize the Russians have in their minds, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) knows it. That is what they are aiming at. And if they once got hold of Japan it is worth all the rest of Asia to them, because of its tremendous industrial potential and the high intelligence and ability of the Japanese.

If they had control of Japan, as the Americans had, we would see a very different story today. The Americans went in there as peace-loving people to help Japan reorganize on a democratic basis, and to let her be free and independent so that she might take a new place in the democratic world. If Russia had gone in there it would have been for only one purpose, to foster the idea of speedy world domination.

My hon. friends to my left are neglecting that fact. The communists in China are part of that scheme. Father Strang says that while he was waiting for his train in Hangchow there was a peace delegation going to Tibet. They were waving flags and Russian banners, and singing Chinese and Russian communist songs. And at every demonstration where pictures have been taken we see pictures of Stalin side by side with those of Mao Tse-tung. That man was trained in Moscow; Stalin was his best friend. He would not be where he is today but for Stalin. Chiang Kai-shek had driven him out of China, up into Sinkiang, a small corner of China, where he had only a few thousand troops. The Russians helped him. They armed him with Japanese equipment and ammunition. They built up his people's army into an army of two million men, and helped him and backed him in every way to defeat Chiang Kai-shek.

Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made reference to the assistance the Americans had given to Chiang Kai-shek. That is very questionable. I do not want to debate the subject now, but I have talked about it before. However, it is not true that Chiang Kai-shek had every assistance from the United States government. That government did not know where it was at the time, because it had so many spies in its midst, such men as Alger Hiss, to whom the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) referred. There were men of that kind in the state department, and discord in the United States government in regard to the aid that should be given to Chiang Kai-shek. But if some people in the United States government had had their way the communists would have gone to Formosa, and United States, United Kingdom and commonwealth interests would have been in greater jeopardy than they are today, because Chiang Kai-shek is still on Formosa. After all, his ideas are similar to ours.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes. You cannot condemn all the things Chiang Kai-shek has done, because he has done some good things. As I was about to say, he permitted Christian churches to function there; but they cannot function today in China. Perhaps my hon. friend does not think that is good. He permitted missionaries to go through the country, and I think they did some good.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to whom I enjoy listening very much, because he is a fine speaker and forthright in his opinions, said today that we should speak plainly. Well, are we the only ones who are going to be allowed to speak plainly? Can Mr. Dulles speak plainly? Can he say what is in his mind? Is he to be extended the same privilege in that respect that is extended to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? Perhaps the hon. member was referring to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because he was at great pains to say that the minister was not speaking plainly yesterday, or as plainly as he spoke a week ago when he referred to the deneutralization of Formosa.

Why should not Mr. Dulles speak out plainly? Consider the contribution the United States government has made to world peace and the rehabilitation of Europe. When we hear that Germany's production today is higher than it was in 1939, and when we hear that France's production is higher than it was in 1939, and that Italy is coming along, and that all those other countries are making headway, we must not forget that it was done through funds supplied by the United States. It was for that reason the increase in production was made possible.

It is very fortunate indeed for Europe that there was in the United States a government interested in the rehabilitation of those countries. And what was it done for? The workingman in the United States, the teacher, the professional man—everybody is making a contribution. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) reminds us here frequently that they pay higher income taxes over there because the exemptions are lower than they are in Canada. The people in that country are paying those heavy taxes to save the world.

I know, and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must know, the valuable contributions we in Canada are getting from the United States. We can talk so boldly here in the House of Commons, but we would not talk half as boldly if we did not have the United States at our back. They are building big air bases in Newfoundland, at Goose Bay and in Greenland to protect us as well as themselves. We are getting the benefit of that. It is a wonderful thing that we are allies with them.

I should like the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to say who should decide in a coalition. President Eisenhower is elected and has to make an inaugural speech. What is he going to do? Is he going to come over here to consult the Secretary of State for External Affairs about what his policy should be? What would the people who returned him to office say if anything of that kind happened?

That is not enough, mark you. Should he go to all the countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and ask each one what he should do? Should he go to all the countries of the commonwealth to learn what he should do? No. He has laid down the policy his government is going to follow, and I think it is a good thing that we have a man with such experience in military matters, at the head of affairs in the United States today.

I know my friends on the left do not approve of military men in important positions, and I feel quite sure they do not approve of General Eisenhower. We have to remember that the government of Russia is following ideas for world domination developed by Lenin and Marx. This is a revolution which they want to spread over the whole world. They feel they have a messianic work to do. They want to conquer the whole wide world. Nobody else can live on the earth and have an idea except the Russians. Nobody is allowed to have any other ideas in countries dominated by Russia today. You cannot go and preach social credit in Poland or Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Wright: Is my hon. friend trying to say that any member of this group agrees with Stalin or his internationalist policy? If so, I think he has not listened to the speeches we have made.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have not heard you say much against them.

Mr. Wright: I do not know how anybody could say any more against them than the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) did.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not agree altogether with what the hon. member is saying now. I know he has said a lot more against Chiang Kai-shek than he has against Mao Tse-tung.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. When he means the C.C.F. would he mind saying the C.C.F., because the Social Crediters are on his left, too. We certainly do not want to be put in the same category as the C.C.F.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not think anyone would associate the two parties.

Mr. Blackmore: People reading Hansard do not know whom the hon. member means when he refers to his friends on the left.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I shall remember that in future.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you very much.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): We had a beautiful speech from the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) about his trip. I am delighted to see that so many members on the government side of the house are getting these trips to foreign countries and are improving their knowledge as they are doing. It was a very interesting account. I was not here when he spoke, but I read his speech and it was very interesting. I am glad to know he is so optimistic about conditions in the Middle East, but I wonder what he has to say about the news in the press today that Soviet Russia has broken off diplomatic relations with Israel. What is his opinion on that? I am sorry he cannot give us the answer at this time.

However, I think we can point out that there is a feud between the Arab states and Israel. Which side are we on? Are we with the Arab states or are we with Israel? During the past month or so Soviet Russia has left no doubt where it stands because of its persecution of the Jews, even to the extent of arresting nine Jewish doctors in Russia and accusing them of having poisoned leaders of the Soviet government. Then there is the persecution of Jews in the satellite countries, and now we have the breaking of diplomatic relations. There is a feud between the Arab nations and Israel and Russia hopes to profit thereby and gain the support of the Moslem world.

I do not know where we are going to get support in the Moslem world. From the accounts I get the English do not seem to be popular there. They have to get out, and the Americans do not seem to be popular although they are there with the best of intentions. Spain, which has been despised as a nation, seems to get along very much better with them than anybody else, because a Spanish mission has just completed a tour of the Arab countries and has made agreements with them. I wish we could do the same.

Then there is the story of the persecution in China to which I referred, and of course in the remarks I was making I could not give anything like a full representation of what has been going on over there. But I am sure we have all read the accounts of the terrible trials of our missionaries, the sisters and the priests who have gone from this country. That has been repeated in those countries of Europe that have become Soviet satellites, in Poland, in Czechoslovakia, in Hungary, with Cardinal Mindszenty in jail. I suppose everybody received a copy of the Ensign today in which reference is made to a speech that the ambassador from Yugoslavia made in Vancouver, wherein he said there is perfect freedom of worship and religion in Yugoslavia. He was taken to task for this by Archbishop Duke of Vancouver. He replied to Archbishop Duke and said that the government of Yugoslavia was giving money to theological colleges in that country. I have here the Tablet, which is a Catholic paper published in London. The issues of January 24 and January 31 contain a letter which the bishops of Yugoslavia addressed to Tito, the president of that country, in September. In it they said amongst other things:

> The freedom of conscience and religion to which the constitution . . . refers is in practice reduced to partial freedom of worship or . . . the freedom of religious rites. We say partial, because the freedom of worship is in some respects limited to such an extent as de facto means the negation of genuine religious freedom.
> The churches are, it is true, still open, although some of them . . . have been used as storehouses for wheat or agricultural machinery. The monumental church of St. Joseph at Ljubljana has been transformed into a film studio, while the ancient Church of the Crusaders, also at Ljubljana, a real gem of ecclesiastical art, was taken from the Catholics and simply, without consultation, given to the Old-Catholic sect—which, incidentally, at Ljubljana, lacks almost any adherents.
> Very many roadside crosses and paintings have been destroyed . . . The large and beautiful church of the Holy Redeemer at Rijeka was mined overnight and destroyed at the beginning of November 1949, although it stood in the very centre of the town. The Church of the Carmelite Sisters at Selo at Ljubljana was destroyed, and without any reason the beautiful chapel Salita al Calvario, on the island of Krk, was demolished. . . . Many public oratories . . . have been closed down by force.
> The record books of the born, dead and married were taken away from the church authorities even in 1946 . . . Processions are . . . forbidden . . . The freedom of preaching is also endangered . . . Priests are not allowed to give religious instruction in schools, presbyteries and other ecclesiastical premises. . . . Many churches are not allowed in any way to collect ecclesiastical alms . . . The arrest of the priests goes on. . . . There are still in Yugoslav state prisons more than 200 priests . . .
> Physical attacks on the priest are not rare. During the last seven years about 80 priests have been killed by ambush . . . The state authorities . . . ignore the church . . .

—wherever they can.

> There is, finally, the very painful question of the official atheistic course in the schools and in the whole public life of . . .

—the state.

> Atheism is the religion of the regime . . . These proofs of lack of religious freedom . . . must be added the old ones, already stated in the memoranda of the hierarchy from former years. Among them is to be mentioned the liquidation of the whole of the Catholic schools in the territory of the . . .

—state. Now, that is Yugoslavia. And its ambassador has been going around in Vancouver stating that there is full and complete freedom of religion and worship in that country. The Ensign in its editorial draws attention to this and also to the fact that the Polish diplomatic mission here in Ottawa has been circulating an attack upon a priest.

The Yugoslav ambassador is reported as having passed disparaging reports about Archbishop Stepinac. In this country where almost 50 per cent of the population is Catholic I think that sort of thing is very offensive, and that these gentlemen in the diplomatic fraternity should not be using language of that kind. Only tonight I read in the paper that the Polish government has decreed that no appointments or changes in posts of the hierarchy can be made without the consent of the state. The state's consent is necessary for the establishment, transformation or abolition of posts in the hierarchy as well as for any changes in the scope of their activities. Now, these men coming from satellite states of Russia where atheism is the official religion of the state—

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member suggesting that Yugoslavia is a Russian satellite state?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, it would be incorrect to say that. I know that Yugoslavia is no longer a satellite state but Poland is. Yugoslavia still has the same ideas about atheistic communism that Russia has, and I think representations ought to be made by someone in the Department of External Affairs to those gentlemen to the effect that such conduct on their part is not desirable and should cease. Personally I want to protest against the actions of these men in using language such as they do and casting reflections upon men whom we honour so highly.

Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion of the remarks I had to make, but I wish to make one reference to the fine speech we heard this evening from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). He drew attention once again to a recommendation which has been frequently made, and on which Canada should have something to say. It is the idea of training South Koreans. I do not see why we should not invite some of the South Koreans to come to Canada for training in some direction or other in order to take their position in the line. They want to do so, they say. They have the men. The population of South Korea is greater than that of Canada, being some 20 million people. The United States government believes that in a year or two they can train sufficient men to take over the whole line. I believe that the bulk of the fighting at the present time is begin borne by the South Koreans, and I think the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said that very same thing. I believe that, together with the United States, Canada should have something to do with the training of those men.

There has been a stalemate until now, and there was need for a new attitude toward the Korean war. I believe that what has been done by the United States government up to the present will have a good effect, and not the evil one which our nearest neighbours on the left feel it will have.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I was one who had the privilege of attending the United Nations general assembly as a parliamentary observer, and I feel I should say a few words at this time.

It is a common practice at the present time to have parliamentary delegates from all parties attending and observing the proceedings of the United Nations. I believe that is a good and democratic practice. The British North America Act, drawn up as it was during the nineteenth century, did not anticipate such a world organization or parliament and therefore made no provision for Canadian representatives at such a forum. I am sure that if it had, it would have set out in its terms a provision that our system of responsible government should be maintained and that the delegates represented on the various committees would be members of parliament of the party in power, directly responsible to the existing government.

It was the practice in the first few years of the United Nations to have representatives of the official opposition, I believe, act as representatives with a voice and a vote in the various committees. It is self-evident that this practice is contrary to our system and could lead to some difficulties by having our delegation perhaps committed to a course that would not be in conformity with the policy of the government. The more realistic practice of sending parliamentary observers to take part and assist in forming policy in the Canadian caucus is a correct one, I feel, and it should be continued. While not actually dictating policy, Her Majesty's loyal opposition is thereby given its rightful opportunity to present its views on foreign policy and to report to the House of Commons upon their return.

I am somewhat at a loss to understand why, with my limited capabilities, more particularly in the field of foreign relations, I was chosen to attend the United Nations. I suspect that it was because the Prime Minister knows of my early associations and public life prior to coming here, when I was associated almost entirely with the cause of labour. The government, I am sure, realizes the important position which organized labour holds today in our democracy and in our foreign relations. As a group they far outnumber any other class. Labour stands to suffer most in the event of a third world war, with all its horrors and the possible destruction of our entire civilization.

I wish to confine my remarks, however, to a few general observations, and in particular perhaps to my impression of the department as gained by my close association with the personnel during my stay in New York. I feel that the personnel serving the department have been excellent. It is my candid opinion that there is no better diplomatic representation anywhere; and when one considers the weight of its influence and reflects that it comes from a nation of less than 15 million people, I feel that is something of which we may be justly proud. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was raised to the high and honourable position of president of the general assembly, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) succeeded him as leader of the Canadian delegation. His voice was heard with respect and admiration in all debates of importance. Indeed the Indian resolution designed to bring about a cease-fire in Korea was patterned on his statement in the general debate in the ad hoc committee on this particular question.

Further proof of the expertness of Canadian diplomacy can be gained, perhaps, by reading a quotation from the London Economist which sets out in clear terms the way I personally feel about our diplomatic staff and its leadership. The article reads:

> If it is permissible to generalize about the diplomatic service of any country, it is probably true to say that the representatives of Canada exercise an influence and enjoy a prestige out of all reasonable proportion to the size of their country or the power which it can wield. One reason lies no doubt, in Canada's economic strength and future promise. Another lies in its peculiarly favourable position as a neighbour of the United States, sharing some of the influence yet exempt from all the suspicions which inevitably gather round the leader of a large alliance. But, when all this is said, a more important reason lies in the personal quality of the men themselves.

I have noted with no little satisfaction that recent press statements have suggested that the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs may be offered the post of secretary general of the United Nations to replace Trygve Lie, whose resignation is now pending. Should the security council reach such a decision, the United Nations would be taking a rather giant stride towards bringing about universal co-operation. The loss of such a statesman to the Canadian people would mean a considerable sacrifice, yet it would not be too high a price to pay in furthering the cause of world peace.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would be inclined to feel that the criticism of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) last evening was not entirely justified. While we are now enjoying great prestige among world powers, I think it is somewhat unfair to say that if the rank and file of Canadian people feel that they should criticize some of the policies of the United States they are "yapping dogs continuously barking at everything the United States does". It is not quite fair, in my opinion, to go so far in our condemnation of the United States as did the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in his address on February 12. On page 1881 of Hansard for that date we find the following:

> But, Mr. Speaker, when the full history of these times is written, when all the facts have been brought to light, there will be many people who will say that the past two presidents of the United States have been the great betrayers of humanity.

Mr. Low: Just read the rest of it.

Mr. Byrne: Yes, I shall read the rest of it:

> To be charitable, as I ought to be, I will say that some of those decisions made at Yalta and Potsdam, some of the secret understandings and agreements that were had with Stalin . . .

I should like to remind the house that Right Hon. Winston Churchill was present at Yalta and Potsdam. Are these men, who led us to victory during the last great war, now to be called the betrayers of humanity? I think, Mr. Speaker, that is going far beyond—

Mr. Low: I did not say that.

Mr. Byrne: —what should be expected from a Canadian representative in this House of Commons. I took the trouble of looking up in the dictionary the meaning of "betray". It means to deliver into the hands of the enemy by treachery or fraud; to seduce.

In the past this debate has been conducted on a very high plane, and I had hoped that it would continue on that high plane. I am sure that was the wish of everyone in the house, but when people go about delivering these veiled criticisms of great men, and when we hear them go out in the country and make speeches and write articles such as the one by the member for Macleod read in the house tonight by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), then I am sure we can no longer expect this debate to remain on such a high plane.

Business of the House

I have made considerable preparation for this speech, and there are a number of other things with which I wish to deal, such as the policy Canada should follow today and some of the issues that are before the United Nations. Since it is now ten o'clock, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Byrne the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall move to set up the special committee to examine into the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy; then the resolution of the Minister of Resources and Development respecting the amendment of the Yukon Act; Bill No. 48, respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and so forth; Bill No. 110, establishing the historic sites and monuments board of Canada; Bill No. 109, to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources; Bill No. 46, to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. We may have time to consider Bills Nos. 38 and 39.

Mr. Graydon: Has the government any idea when we will go on with the debate on the motion to refer the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to the committee?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would have to consult with my colleagues, because the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be absent for some time. I suppose he would like to listen to the interesting speeches of the other members of the house.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 16, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RETURN OF HON. MEMBER FOR ROSETOWN-BIGGAR

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, I am sure you yourself and all hon. members of the house, no matter where they sit, are delighted to welcome back to the house the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). We all hope that his recovery makes him as well as he looks at this time and that he will long continue to be as well as he looks.

CONGRATULATIONS TO HON. MEMBER FOR FORT WILLIAM ON BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it has been called to my attention that I omitted to mention that our venerable valentine, the dean in age of the House of Commons, celebrated his birthday on Saturday, St. Valentine's day. I am sure we all desire to express to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) our wish that he may be the recipient of many more happy returns of St. Valentine's day and his birthday.

FLOODS

REPORT ON ORGANIZATION OF COMMITTEE ON EUROPEAN RELIEF

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it might be of interest to hon. members of the house to inform them—they have no doubt learned of it through the newspapers—that the organization meeting of the Canadian national European flood relief committee was held at Government House on Friday afternoon under the chairmanship of His Excellency the Governor General. As hon. members know, that committee comprises the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, four other members of this house and the two lady members of the other house of parliament. Every one of the ten provincial premiers has welcomed the opportunity of serving on the committee, and the campaign has their warm support. It is being started today in all ten Canadian provinces but the national committee does not intend to organize the campaigns locally. It is counting upon the welfare or service clubs in the various localities to set up their local organizations. But in handling a matter of that character, it is very important that there be co-ordination and that only the supplies that are really needed are sent forward and that they are sent to the places where they are most urgently needed. The Red Cross has its officials in Europe now, and the offices of the high commissioner in London and the embassies at The Hague and at Brussels are in close touch with the government relief agencies of these three countries, as well as in close touch with the officials of the Canadian Red Cross. Miss Margaret Wilson, executive secretary, is at present in London and Colonel Walter Reynolds, national director of disaster services, is still at The Hague. These officials are keeping in very close touch with what the local relief organizations are doing.

The high commissioner's office and the two embassies are making cable facilities available to these representatives of the Red Cross so that they can make daily reports to the central organization here in Canada to be sure that the right kind of supplies will be provided, to the extent to which that can be done from Canada, and that they will be provided in the places where they are most urgently required. It would seem that the immediate urgent requirements for food or medical supplies or even for large amounts of clothing have been met, and that the big problem will be the permanent or semi-permanent rehabilitation of the very large numbers who have suffered so severely from this flood disaster.

I think that through the activities of the Red Cross, and the assistance they are thus getting overseas, we will be kept well informed as to what will comply with that resolution adopted unanimously by the House of Commons the other day to give concrete examples of our sympathy in the most helpful way possible.

EDUCATION

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING SCHOLARSHIPS

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps this would be the appropriate place in the proceedings to raise a matter that came to my attention through a report in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, February 14. In that issue of the Citizen there is a report of a visit the previous day by representatives of the national executive of the National Federation of University Students. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is reported as informing them, and I quote:

> The Prime Minister said he had been attempting since last fall to set up a Canadian committee to administer such scholarships, but had failed in the attempt.

The reference is to a request that was made that the government implement certain recommendations of the Massey report in regard to scholarships. The reply given to the student representatives indicates that the government has reached some decision. Since this is a subject in regard to which hon. members in every part of the house are interested and upon which they have been receiving representations, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he could tell the house what the decision is that the government has reached, and also indicate the nature of the difficulties to which he has referred.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am afraid that that report in the Citizen is rather more than second hand; it must be third or fourth hand, because it is not an accurate report of what transpired. I assured these young people that I had always had a great interest in university work, and that though for something over eleven years now my active connection with universities had not been as intimate as it was before, I was still very much interested. I said that personally I felt we had had an illustration, in the success of the veterans who got university training after the last war, that anything that was expended in that way was a national investment and brought returns even to the Canadian treasury.

I informed them that I had been concerned about this part of the Massey report, and I have been endeavouring to make such inquiries as would have enabled me to make a recommendation to my colleagues about the set-up of a Canadian council. Unfortunately, those I had approached for that purpose had found that they could not at the present time fall in with our plans, and I have not yet been able to co-ordinate in my own mind the kind of thing I could recommend to my colleagues. I felt that that was something that would necessarily have to precede the establishment of a system of scholarships, because I thought a system of scholarships would have to be administered by the kind of organization that would be quite divorced from any suggestion of political patronage.

I told them that I realized that their generation of students was advancing, and that they were very anxious to have it done at the earliest possible moment. I had found, however, it had not been possible for me to co-ordinate anything that I could put before my colleagues for implementation during this session of parliament.

Mr. Drew: In view of the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has made, might I suggest that there are meetings of representatives of the universities before which a suggestion of this kind could be placed and doubtless recommendations made that would be acceptable to those universities, without any of the difficulties to which the Prime Minister has referred.

Mr. St. Laurent: I had some experience last year, Mr. Speaker, with the recommendations made by the university council about the grants to universities. A solution was found for last year, but we were informed that it was only for one year that that solution was being accepted. It has not been possible as yet to find a solution acceptable for this year. These are matters in which the hon. gentleman and I, and every other hon. member in the house, are deeply concerned. But we are also deeply concerned with avoiding the doing of anything to countenance this suggestion that we are trying to inject ourselves into the domain of education. No one wants to do that. Everyone wants to leave that responsibility of the provincial administration as the fathers of confederation intended it should be.

It is not easy to do anything at all that does have a bearing upon the educational problem without there being misgivings in many quarters. I hope that will not always be so, and I hope that as it was possible to find a solution last year it will be possible to find a solution this year and that those solutions, one after the other, may establish a precedent that will allow these desirable things to be done without there being additional misgivings about interference by the central government with matters of provincial jurisdiction and responsibility.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to extend this matter beyond this point, but I want to make the observation that the granting of scholarships is, of course, different from the granting of financial assistance direct to the universities. There are scholarships now being awarded in certain connections by agencies of the dominion government. I understood the recommendation was that these should be extended, and that does not bring the government in direct contact with the administration of any university.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Might I ask a supplementary question?

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Knight: I too have my rights in asking questions. In view of the question asked by myself as reported at page 1729 of Hansard and the answer given at that time by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), that the government is continuing to study the recommendation on scholarships, I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) whether consideration has been given by the government to this matter as a whole as well as the consideration which he himself says he has given to it.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker I have not found it possible to bring to my colleagues for decision a recommendation on the subject.

QUESTIONS

KOREA—AMMUNITION—CASUALTIES

Mr. Churchill:

1. What is the total number of rounds of ammunition expended by the 25th brigade while in Korea to 30th November, 1952, under the headings (a) high explosive shells; (b) mortar shells; (c) small arms?

2. What have been the casualties of each unit that has served or is now serving with the 25th brigade in Korea to 30th November, 1952, expressed in the categories (a) killed; (b) wounded; (c) missing; (d) injured in action; (e) captured?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, for reasons which I have given to the hon. member who asked the question, I would ask if he would consent to drop it.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

KOREA—CENSORSHIP OF PRESS DISPATCHES

Mr. Churchill:

1. Are press dispatches from Korea subject to censorship? If so, by whom?

2. Do security regulations permit press dispatches to name the units being sent to or brought from Korea prior to sailing or arrival dates?

3. Do security regulations permit press dispatches to designate the months in which rotation of units in Korea will take place?

Mr. Campney:

1. Yes. All press dispatches from Korea are passed through the joint press censorship group of the United Nations and Far Eastern commands.

2 and 3. Generally no release is approved until after a move has taken place in order to avoid publication of information which might aid the enemy. However, if a projected move is to take place some time in the future and exact dates are not mentioned, the censorship group may permit such reference if operational headquarters in Korea are of the opinion that there is no risk to security involved.

2. If so, who is to design and produce this new aircraft?
3. What is estimated to be the cost of design and production?
4. If no firm estimate can be given, what is the maximum amount which the government considers it may be necessary to make provision for before the program is complete?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has on the order paper four questions which actually consist of 22 separate queries and which refer to the A.V. Roe program. This program has also been recently referred to in the house by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). I believe that I can make one statement which will answer these and any similar questions, and at the same time clarify the situation which exists at A.V. Roe.

After A.V. Roe established in Canada on December 1, 1945, the company was given the primary task of developing a long-range, all-weather interceptor and turbo-jet engine for the R.C.A.F. They were also asked to develop a jet transport plane, overhaul and modify world war II Lancasters, and in addition were given a number of lesser projects.

Gas Turbine Development

In November, 1945, Turbo Research Limited, a crown company, was authorized to proceed with the design and construction of the TR-3 Chinook. Detail design of this power plant was under way when the assets of Turbo Research Limited were transferred to A.V. Roe Canada Limited in 1946. The Chinook was originally intended as the power plant for a R.C.A.F. fighter. Changed requirements produced the specification for the Orenda.

The Chinook, a 2,900 pound thrust machine, was completed to provide experience in design, development and manufacturing problems. The Orenda specification called for an engine of 6,500 pound thrust, equal to that of the largest engines then in design in the United States and the United Kingdom.

The Orenda first ran in February, 1949, thirty months from commencement of design. The gas turbine staff was then about 800, and expenditures on the Orenda project to the end of March, 1949, amounted to $3,917,-900. With the running of the first engine, the development phase commenced. This has extended over four years, and five distinguishable versions of the engine have now passed the development phase. These are:

Series 1—Original design.

Series 2—Modification to permit three point suspension system, to increase strength, reduce weight, and make fuselage installations easier.

Series 8—Modified compressor to improve acceleration characteristics.

Series 9—Version for CF-100 Mark 4.

Series 10—Version for F-86.

All of these engines are in the 6,000-6,500 pound thrust category. In addition, the series 11 engine (7,500 pound thrust) has run in lash-up form, and the basic scheming on the series 12 engine, with a further increase in thrust is complete.

The $30,274,199 spent on the Orenda over the last four years is described as a development expense. In fact, however, all engineering expenses, some of which would have been charged to production, have been carried on this contract. The expenditures have supported an engineering department large enough to carry out the production activities, produce the variants of the basic engine described above, and work on certain more advanced developments. Finally, engineering expenses include the operation of the experimental or model shop, and also the Nobel facility, a laboratory which carries out research and development of turbines, compressors, and combustion systems.

The Orenda engine series 11 will be superior to the present production versions of engines designed for similar purposes in other countries. We are satisfied that the Orenda series 12 engine will meet our requirements for some years, and be competitive with foreign engines.

Gas Turbine Production

The prototype Orenda first ran in February, 1949. At December 31, 1952, expenditures on tooling were $15,029,350. This figure covers preproduction and production tooling for all series of the engine.

Total expenditures on production have now reached $38,785,500, with $17,839,300 representing the value of engines delivered, $20,946,300 the value of engines in final assembly, parts completed and in process, progress payments to suppliers, materials inventory and mill supplies. For this expenditure, 96 engines were delivered at December 31, 1952.

The first twelve Orendas were produced in the development shop, on limited tooling, to supply urgently needed engines for early aircraft. In addition, the two changes of engine production location, first from the experimental shop to the pilot line in the aircraft plant and then to the new engine plant, have had an adverse effect on costs.

The construction of the engine plant was authorized in October, 1950. An eight-month delay in completion of the plant proper resulted from the shortage of steel at that time. In March, 1952, only 10 per cent of the machine tools were installed. The plant can scarcely be considered to have begun operations before June, 1952, when 60 per cent of the machine tools were installed, while the assembly shops were not moved until July, 1952, and heat treating facilities until November of last year. Under these circumstances, and considering the problems of setting up subcontractors' facilities, the performance has been good.

The Orenda series 2 was the first production engine. This passed its type test in February, 1952, and is now out of production. The series 8 and series 10 passed their type tests in January of this year and these are the engines presently in production. The series 9 is to be introduced during the summer of 1953.

Airframe Development

In October, 1946, a contract was executed with A. V. Roe for the design and construction of two prototypes of the CF-100, plus one static test airframe. In January, 1950, the first prototype flew. This was a Mark 1 aeroplane, fitted with Rolls-Royce Avons. Cumulative expenditures to March 31, 1950, were $5,131,754.68.

To the present, cumulative expenditures on development of the airframe have amounted to $11,784,400, an increase of $6,652,646 since March, 1950. Variants of the aeroplane obtained for this expenditure are:

(1) CF-100 Mark 2—powered by Orenda series 1; no armament.

(2) CF-100 Mark 3—powered by the Orenda series 2 and series 8, and armed with eight 50 calibre machine guns and APG 33 radar.

Questions

(3) CF-100 Mark 4—powered by the Orenda series 9 and armed with 50 calibre machine guns, air to air rockets, and APG 40 radar.

The development of the Mark 4 control system for firing the armament is not yet completed.

I have already mentioned two of the differences between these four marks of the CF-100. One is the different series of engines and the other is the different weapon systems. Externally, all Marks are similar. The structure has undergone considerable development, beginning with the first static test in March, 1950. It is expected that the final proving of the structure to Mark 4 loads will be complete in March, 1953. This long time results from the growth of all-up weight (about 50 per cent), as well as from deficiencies in the original design. In addition, systems have been altered: for example, the control system has been changed to obtain improved flying qualities; hydraulic and electrical systems were altered as a result of increased demands and a desire to clean up the original design.

I have mentioned the deficiency in the original design, a subject that has been given a great deal of publicity. The facts were that in November, 1951, during R.C.A.F. proving flights, a failure developed in the ring connecting the fuselage to the front spar. This necessitated a redesign of this structure which has now been successfully accomplished. Vigorous rectification commenced with the reorganization of the engineering department, and progress since then has been good. No time has been lost on the delivery schedule of the Mark 4 (rocket firing) aircraft, as the delivery date of this aircraft is determined by the weapons system, which is being produced in the United States. The delay in the Mark 3 program amounted to 4 - 6 months. It is not possible to separate out the costs of this element of the CF-100 development program. The only other two seat fighters in the same class as the CF-100 have also suffered structural deficiencies which have caused serious delays.

Summarizing the CF-100 development, this aircraft appears to be superior to its only immediate competitor, although it is inevitable that in time it will be made obsolete by the introduction of improved jet bombers.

Airframe Production

In May, 1949, seven months before the flight of the first development prototype, a contract was issued for ten preproduction fighter aircraft. In June, 1951, the first of these aircraft flew, the last in October, 1952.

The first five of the aircraft were Mark 2, the next four were Mark 3, and the tenth was the Mark 4 weapons system prototype.

The first production order for the CF-100 was given in October, 1950. The first production aeroplane was delivered in November, 1952, 25 months from the placing of the contract. This length of time resulted primarily from the difficulties encountered with the structure of the aeroplane, to which I have already made reference. The Mark 3 aeroplane is now in production and 70 fighters of this mark, fitted with 50 calibre guns, will be produced. Volume production of the CF-100 Mark 4 will begin late this summer.

Tooling expenditures to the present have amounted to $15,882,450. Total production cost of the 16 aircraft delivered up to December 31, 1952, against the preproduction and production program, is divided as follows:

(1) Aircraft manufactured, $27,248,300.

(2) Mill supply inventory, raw material inventory, work in process, $25,788,800.

(3) Payments to subcontractors and supplies, $4,183,500.

(4) Ground handling equipment, maintenance tools, publications, etc., $2,582,400.

At the present time, there are approximately 14,000 persons employed at A.V. Roe, and it is not expected that this number will increase significantly during the course of the present program. Last summer there was some concern that there were more people on the A.V. Roe payroll than production warranted. I think probably that, to some extent, this was true. I am satisfied that this condition no longer exists. The under-utilization of the Avro labour force was the result of a number of factors:

(a) Hiring was done in advance of the work to be performed because many of the new employees required training on the job to fit them for full production work. At the same time, production in some cases did not get underway according to schedule, and, correctly anticipating a tight labour market, Avro was hesitant about letting these workers go.

(b) The very magnitude of the build-up in employment, required to meet production schedules, made it almost inevitable that some labour inefficiency would result. In 1952, for example, Avro hired some 9,000 new employees during a period when total employment showed a net increase of just over 6,000 workers. Now that intake can be slowed down substantially, greater emphasis can be placed on improved selection of workers, with a resulting increase in labour efficiency.

[Mr. Howe.]

(c) The physical problem involved in bringing a large amount of new plant into operation, and in transferring and rearranging machines and workers, caused some reduction in the efficiency of the labour force.

(d) The difficulties encountered in getting the CF-100 centre section redesigned and cleared for production resulted in less than optimum utilization of the labour force. This is no longer a problem.

In considering the A. V. Roe program, comparisons are often made with the F-86 program at Canadair. In making such comparisons, however, there are several factors that must be kept in mind.

1. The CF-100 is one of the biggest and heaviest fighter aircraft being produced today. It weighs approximately 17 tons. That is heavier than the 21 passenger DC-3 transport, and about two and a half times as heavy as a standard fighter such as the Sabre. If comparisons are to be made, this additional weight and the increased complexity must be kept in mind.

2. A. V. Roe has designed, developed, and is now producing both the airframe and engine. It is true that development costs have been heavy, but it must be remembered that in manufacturing a plane developed in another country, as we are doing at Canadair, we are faced with heavy licence fees that are in reality a payment which we are making to support the development staff of an aircraft company in another country.

3. We were able to give Canadair a sufficiently large order to permit them to set up an economic production line, which they have done with great efficiency and which will enable Canada to fill its NATO commitments in the time allotted. On the other hand, the CF-100 will be the basis of our home defence and we are most concerned that it does not become obsolescent too rapidly. Consequently, it has been our policy not to load the air force with the earlier marks of the CF-100, and to place a minimum order for the Mark 3 in order to await the Mark 4. We will place a heavier order for this aeroplane, thus permitting more efficient production at A. V. Roe.

There has been some recent speculation concerning fighters of advanced designs. This is a subject on which I can say very little without compromising military security. I can assure hon. members, however, that we are constantly studying new concepts and new designs. In doing so, we are anxious to examine designs which are available to us from other countries. However, we have what I consider a good design and development organization at A. V. Roe and, naturally, we will not overlook their talents.

During the period of "cold war" such as we are experiencing at the present time, it is a matter of serious concern to the R.C.A.F. to keep its equipment modern without retiring serviceable but obsolete aircraft. In war, this problem does not generally exist as the aircraft are consumed in service before they become obsolete. In peacetime, however, it is very difficult to keep the force modern without making frequent changes in the production line and producing relatively small numbers of different marks of aircraft. When the R.C.A.F. is up to strength in aircraft, it is our intention to then provide new aircraft at the attrition rate of those that are in the service. This will mean a small yearly volume of production, but obviously they must be of the latest possible types.

In conclusion, I am satisfied that our program at A. V. Roe is now in good shape. As a country inexperienced in aircraft design and development, it was natural that we should experience difficulties and delays which are, in fact, characteristic of the aeroplane business. It might have been expected that, in our case, delays would have been more protracted than those experienced in countries such as the United Kingdom and the United States, where they have not only a well established aircraft industry, but also the supporting industry which is so essential. Considering the Orenda program, A. V. Roe's record in getting into production compares well with that of other companies. This is a particularly outstanding achievement when one considers that, not only did we have to build the new plant at A. V. Roe, but also had to bring into being more than a dozen new industries that are producing in Canada, for the first time, technical components which will not only serve our aircraft industry but also our general economy. A. V. Roe's record on the CF-100, which is our first all-Canadian fighter, has been a credit to the company.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, since it is unlikely that we will reach the orders of the day today, may I ask the minister two questions based upon the statement he has just given with respect to certain other questions I had asked. The first point is, that while the minister has given an answer to four questions, there were two other questions dealing with the same subject, but asking for additional information, and these were passed as orders for returns on January 28. I would express the hope that the minister will not regard this as a reply to those questions.

My second point is that the minister said that 70 Mark 3 CF-100's would be produced, but I did not hear any production target date for those 70. Can the minister say when those 70 will be produced?

Mr. Howe: The important date is the date upon which we will have the remaining information on the Mark 4. It is the intention to schedule the 70 Mark 3 aircraft so that there will be no interruption in manufacturing before going into Mark 4 aircraft. I cannot say what that date will be. There has been some delay. One American firm is designing the firing apparatus for all the rocket-firing aircraft. At the present time we are waiting for final approval of the mechanism before we can set a date for the production of the Mark 4. The result is that there is no hurry about finishing the Mark 3, because we do not want to have to shut the plant down until we get a chance to undertake the Mark 4.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not understand the minister's apology that—

Mr. Howe: The minister never apologizes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I may have misunderstood, then. I thought he had made an apology. Can the minister give any indication as to the time for those 70 fighters of the Mark 3 type, or are they just going to mark time?

Mr. Howe: I just answered that question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, the minister did not give any suggested time.

Mr. Howe: I am sure if my hon. friend will read Hansard he will find that I answered it fully.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask a further question? Did the figure the minister gave include any of the capital assistance which has been accorded this company and, if so, what is the amount of that capital assistance?

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend will put that question on the order paper I will endeavour to get the information.

Mr. Speaker: Questions numbers 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 answered.

Mr. Fulton: Not 15. The minister referred to number 14 only.

Mr. Speaker: Questions 11, 12, 13 and 14 answered by the minister's statement. Question number 15?

Mr. Howe: I think that is answered, also.

Mr. Fulton: Then number 11 should not be counted. Perhaps the minister counted numbers 12, 13, 14 and 15, but not question 11. Surely it should be either questions 12, 13, 14 and 15 or questions 11, 12, 13 and 14.

Mr. Howe: In the first place, I gave all the information there is about the production of the Mark 4. I cannot answer the question as to whether the Royal Canadian Air Force will be equipped with CF-100 aircraft. That depends upon whether they are satisfied to adopt the Mark 3, or whether they wish to wait for the Mark 4.

Some hon. Members: Answered.

Mr. Fulton: No, it should stand.

Some hon. Members: Answered.

Mr. Speaker: Question number 11?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Some hon. Members: Answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to know whether question 11 has or has not been answered.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, I answered that question. I gave all the information that there is available.

Mr. Speaker: Questions 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 answered by the minister.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, may I point out that question number 11 deals with plans respecting the R.C.A.F. If the minister will look at parts 2, 3 and 4 he will see that they do not deal with problems of production of aircraft, but rather with the organizational plan. This was not answered.

Mr. Howe: Oh, let it stand.

Mr. Speaker: Question number 11 stands; questions 12, 13, 14 and 15 answered by the minister's statement.

PRINTING BUREAU—FIVE-DAY WEEK

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has consideration been given at any time since January 1, 1952, to the establishing of a five-day forty-hour week in the government printing bureau?

2. If so, on what dates was such consideration given?

3. What is the result of such consideration?

4. When will the five-day forty-hour week be established at the government printing bureau?

Mr. Lesage:

1. Yes.

2. September 16, 1952, when the Minister of Finance met with representatives of the printing trades council and on several occasions thereafter before the issue of the letter of November 25, 1952 from the Minister of Finance to the national joint council of the public service concerning the five-day week.

3. The minister advised the representatives of the printing trades council that continuing consideration was being given by the government to the application of the five-day week in various cities in Canada but that there was not evidence at that time which would justify a decision that the five-day week should be applied in Ottawa. The letter from the Minister of Finance to the national joint council of the public service of November 25, 1952 on the government's policy in regard to the five-day week generally was tabled in the House of Commons on November 25, 1952.

Mr. MacNaught:

1. The Department of Fisheries understand a process has been invented in the United States whereby live lobsters are packed in sealed containers and remain alive for a limited period of time. Its further information is that patent rights on the process are pending and, consequently, it is impossible to obtain further information regarding the process.

BUTTER

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the next order of business, in view of the number of questions that have been asked on the matter previously I should like to read to the house a statement I intend to give to the press with regard to butter. It is as follows:

Commenting on the butter situation the Minister of Agriculture stated today that the government still owned more than 29,000,000 pounds of butter and that this supply was regarded as being sufficient to meet all needs until the new production season opens up. He also stated that the government butter would be sold at a basic price of 62 cents per pound for solids in Quebec and Ontario.

And at comparable prices elsewhere.

The only condition attached to sales would be that the buyer would make immediate delivery to retailers and that the mark-up for cutting, wrapping and distributing would be fair and reasonable. The minister pointed out that due to the wide variety of conditions governing retail trade it was very difficult to name a mark-up that would govern all situations. He did say that in many of the larger centres a price of 62 cents for solids in the past had enabled a large section of the retail trade to sell at retail prices of 65 cents and 66 cents, but he recognized that these prices could not be made to govern cases where special services were required. Nevertheless it is expected that there will be full co-operation from the trade and that fair prices will prevail.

The minister also observed that butter production at the present time is somewhat higher than it was last year at the same date. In addition, the point of low production for the year has already been passed and fresh supplies will increase from week to week. For this reason and because of the availability of government stocks of stored butter consumers can be assured of ample supplies at 62 cents wholesale for solids for the remainder of this year.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INFECTIOUS ANIMAL DISEASES

Mr. Charlton:

For a copy of all memoranda, directives, orders in council, regulations and other documents, issued by any department of the government, since January 1, 1952, relative to preventive measures against the possible entry into Canada of infectious animal diseases.

CUBAN REFINED SUGAR—REQUESTS TO STOP IMPORTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters and other communications received by the Minister or the Department of Trade and Commerce, since October 1, 1952, and to date, asking for action to stop the import of Cuban refined sugar.

CUBAN REFINED SUGAR—ACTION BY CANADIAN SUGAR INDUSTRY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams or other communications received by the Minister or the Department of Trade and Commerce, or memoranda of telephone conversations, wherein the minister was advised by "the rest of the industry" other than the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, that they or any of them would have nothing to do with the alleged complaint to bring about legislation to stop the import of Cuban refined sugar, and replies to any such communications, since October 1, 1952.

Mr. Howe: I have no objection to the motion being agreed to, but it will of course be understood that it will be subject to the usual rule with regard to communications marked "private", "confidential", or "personal", or all three, and that such papers will not be tabled. I may say that it is not my practice to make memoranda of telephone conversations for that particular type of conversation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That will be the usual qualification, but if those letters are marked "personal" or "private" they should not have been referred to or summarized in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the statement made by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask permission to move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the adverse effects on employment in and the economy of the province of British Columbia caused by the successful application of the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company to the board of transport commissioners to export to the United States for refining, by one or more direct pipe lines, huge quantities of crude oil from the Alberta oil fields.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a motion under standing order 31 for the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance. This motion must be made after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day have been entered upon. The motion would appear to have been made at the proper time. The hon. member has handed me a copy of the motion which he proposes to move.

The matter which he proposes to discuss is one relating to the adverse effects on employment in and the economy of the province of British Columbia caused by the successful application of the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company. I must decide whether the motion is in order and whether it is a matter of urgency in accordance with the rules of the house. The matter must be one of national importance. No doubt this is an important matter to the province of British Columbia, but whether I can conclude from that that it is one of national importance is something about which I have considerable doubt.

It must also be within the administrative responsibility of the government. I doubt if that is so. Apart from that, it must be a matter of such urgency that the business of the house arranged for today should be interrupted and set aside so that it can be discussed.

Mr. Fulton: Anything affecting British Columbia meets that qualification.

Mr. Speaker: It appears to me that there will be opportunities in the near future to discuss this matter and therefore I cannot permit the business which has been arranged for for today to be set aside. Accordingly, I cannot accept the motion.

WATER POWER

SURVEY OF POTENTIAL OF SOUTHERN YUKON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development whether a permit has been granted to Frobisher Limited to survey the water power potential in the Yukon and, if so, would the minister make a statement thereon?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. On December 29, 1952, a survey permit was granted to Quebec Metallurgical Industries, Limited, which is a subsidiary of Frobisher Limited. The survey permit authorizes Quebec Metallurgical Industries to conduct surveys of the water power potential in the southern part of the Yukon and, more especially, the drainage basins of the Alsek river, the Yukon river and the Donjek river and their tributaries.

There is nothing exclusive about this permit, which was granted under the dominion water power regulations. There are large-scale water resources in this general area and it is believed that information already on hand, together with that which should be forthcoming from these surveys, will indicate that this potential can result in water power developments in the Yukon Territory which will stimulate the development of the mineral resources and the general growth of this potentially rich area.

[Later:]

Mr. Adamson: With respect to the question just asked the minister concerning the Frobisher company, may I ask whether any of the intentions of this company in any way means the diversion of the headwaters of the Yukon into United States territory?

Mr. Winters: If there are any such intentions, they have not been communicated to me.

Mr. Adamson: The policy of the government is still against the diversion of the headwaters of the river?

Mr. Winters: The policy of the government remains the same as I expressed in the house earlier in reply to a question by the hon. member on December 17, 1952.

SUGAR

MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF REFINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the meeting of the representatives of the sugar refiners of Canada and the minister was held on Friday, February 13, as scheduled and, if so, has the minister a report for the house?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did meet representatives of the sugar industry on Friday. I reported to them my findings arising out of discussions with individual exporters in Cuba and also with the sugar institute of Cuba, and I made suggestions that I thought would improve the situation. It was decided that a representative of the refiners would go to Cuba immediately and follow up my report with the industry there in the hope that all we expected to accomplish would definitely be accomplished.

INCOME TAX

REMOVAL OF FLOOR UNDER MEDICAL EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister remembering the promise he made on January 12 to give consideration this year to the removal of the 4 per cent floor under medical expenses in relation to income tax?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The minister never forgets a promise, Mr. Speaker.

LIVESTOCK

LIFTING OF UNITED STATES EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he any further information to give the house regarding the lifting on the 1st of March of the embargo on livestock entering the United States?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): There is no further information other than what has already been given to the house. Our understanding still is that it is the intention of the United States government to admit livestock on the 1st of March.

Mr. Bryce: Will the minister tell the house why he advises producers to hold back their livestock?

Mr. Gardiner: We have always advised them to do that ever since foot-and-mouth disease afflicted the country and the embargo was imposed by the United States, the main reason of course being that the number of cattle which would naturally come on the Canadian market in a year could not possibly be consumed in this country. The great majority of farmers have held back their cattle. I do not think it would be fair to those who have done so for others to rush them on the market now in the last two weeks and put the government or anyone else in the position where they would have to market these cattle in the first two or three weeks after the United States border is opened in competition with cattle held back by farmers. In other words, we simply suggest that now in the last two weeks farmers carry out the same program that has been carried out by the great majority of farmers right through the whole period of the foot-and-mouth disease difficulty.

Mr. Bryce: With the present prices on United States markets, is it not likely that cattle will be coming to this country instead of going there?

Mr. Gardiner: I would not say there will be, but at the same time I can say very definitely that if the government were to take delivery of cattle within the next two weeks and thereby pay a subsidy on the cattle we would not be permitted to market those cattle in the United States. They would have to be slaughtered in this country, and that would put them in direct competition with the cattle that are delivered to the market in the weeks immediately following the opening of the United States market. We do not think it would be fair to farmers who have held back their cattle for the government to take delivery of the cattle of a few farmers who put their cattle on the market at this time.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—MEETING WITH CABINET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Have officers of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project communicated with the Prime Minister or the government suggesting that they might send a delegation to meet the government and the cabinet? If they do send a delegation, will they be received by the Prime Minister and the cabinet?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Did I understand the hon. gentleman's question to refer to engineers of the South Saskatchewan association—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, these are representatives of the association and the rural and urban municipalities of Saskatchewan.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have received a telegram from a gentleman who signs as representing the South Saskatchewan association. I have also received a letter from the premier of Saskatchewan stating that his government is preparing a brief indicating their disagreement with some of the recommendations of the commission and the reasons for that disagreement. I am not sure whether the answer has gone to the official of the South Saskatchewan association—if it has not gone it is going—and I felt that it might be more advantageous if we had the brief from the government before we met the delegation from the province. I have given the premier of Saskatchewan the assurance that any representations made will receive very careful consideration. I sent him at the same time, as expressing the present viewpoint of the Minister of Agriculture and myself, a copy of Hansard containing the minister's speech and my intervention when the hon. member for Lake Centre was himself speaking.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

KOREA—INQUIRY AS TO STATE OF WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence, and I apologize for not advising him of it. It arises out of something I saw in a newspaper I was reading yesterday. Can he tell me whether or not we are at war? The decision of a judge of a court in the United States, as contained in yesterday's paper, was that we are not at war and that as a result thereof the personal life insurance policies of two men who were killed in Korea were affected. I feel that this might have a serious effect on some of our troops overseas and I believe the matter should be investigated.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rooney: That is the reason I asked the question.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The question of whether or not we are at war should properly be directed to the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I am sure they will agree with the answer I am going to give, namely, that we have never declared or proclaimed a state of war. We are fighting in Korea and the fighting there certainly is tough. I will be glad to look into the remaining part of the hon. member's question concerning the effect on the insurance of soldiers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Friday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 85 to 104 inclusive of the main estimates, 1953-54, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, just before I adjourned the debate on Friday evening I was drawing to the attention of the house the desirability of unanimity in the face of a common enemy so far as Canadian foreign affairs are concerned. I pointed out that because of statements, however veiled, that had been made in the house by the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) and statements that had been made throughout the country by another member of that party, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), this no longer is a fact. It may be a fact in the house, yet it is unfair to the Canadian people that they be given the impression that the House of Commons is not in any way divided on the question of participation in the United Nations and in world affairs.

I drew the attention of the house to a statement by the member for Peace River (Mr. Low), in which he said, and I quote from page 1881 of Hansard for February 12, 1953:

> But, Mr. Speaker, when the full history of these times is written, when all of the facts have been brought to light, there will be many people who will say that the past two presidents of the United States have been the great betrayers of humanity.

At that time I was asked by the hon. member to read on. I did, Mr. Speaker, and to my great astonishment I found the following on the same page of Hansard:

> To be charitable, as I ought to be, I will say that some of those decisions made at Yalta and Potsdam, some of the secret understandings and agreements that were had with Stalin, may have been made in good faith.

I may say that at both of these conferences the Right Hon. Winston Churchill was present, and in addition at the Potsdam conference there were well known figures in the political life of Britain and the United States. At the Potsdam conference the following were present: Harry S. Truman, J. Stalin, Winston Churchill and the secretaries of the three governments, Mr. James Byrnes, Mr. Molotov and Mr. Anthony Eden. Are these the gentlemen who we are to believe have been treacherous in their decisions? When the history is written, Mr. Speaker, regardless of whether it is written by fascist sympathizers or true historians, as one Canadian citizen I shall refuse to believe that there was any treachery by western representatives during the time these agreements were made. Mistakes may have been made, but to say that they were treacherous mistakes is certainly not a becoming statement.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr Jutras) read into the record an article which the hon. member for Macleod agreed that he had written. In this article, which is supposed to be an honest appraisal of the United Nations, the hon. member said:

—truth is still our weapon, but let us have the whole truth. The fact of the matter is that this United Nations is largely a socialist-communist organization.

The hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Beyerstein), a member of the Social Credit party, was a parliamentary observer at the United Nations, and it would be interesting to hear from him whether, during his visit there, he found that he was associating largely with communist-socialists. I believe that quite the contrary was true. We have a continuous opposition from the Soviet bloc which represents five votes. If that bloc were given the same rights in privileges as the United States, with the large number of states compared with the socialist states, I am sure it would have only one vote and that would leave the communist world with but one vote in the United Nations.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that because of the rules of the house it is impossible for me to move that this house register in the affirmative its decision to carry on its allegiance to the United Nations as a world organization. I believe that in the interest of the Canadian public generally that should be done before this session is prorogued.

On Friday I mentioned that there was one particular matter coming before the United Nations which I believed is of great importance. It was referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in his address which opened this debate. I believe we all appreciate the fact that the minister, now that he is president of the general assembly, cannot speak out in the same terms and with the same force as he did on earlier occasions. However, during his address he stated, and I quote from page 1849 of Hansard for February 11, 1953:

It is probable, however, that there will be further far-reaching discussions at later sessions of the general assembly on the reconciliation of domestic jurisdiction as laid down in the charter with the claim that the United Nations is competent to consider and to intervene in any question which anyone may wish to put on the agenda. There is probably no more important long-range problem facing the United Nations general assembly than this.

In his address during this debate the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) suggested that a committee should be set up to discuss the charter of the United Nations and to make recommendations. Should such a committee be set up, I feel that this is one very important question with which it should deal. The committee which will discuss these estimates should also consider this very important question. Reference is made to this matter in article 1, subsection 7, of the charter, and I quote:

Nothing contained in the present charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under chapter VII.

In an earlier address the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) criticized the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for the position the Canadian delegation took on the question of apartheid in South Africa. I believe that this question is perhaps a basic one with respect to United Nations authority. We should consider the United Nations as united nations rather than a united states. If we are to deal with minority groups in any and every state, then the United Nations would be almost ineffective in that it would be cluttered up with every conceivable jurisdictional question, questions of domestic jurisdiction, which many nations themselves cannot solve. If these questions were brought before the world forum, it would simply confuse the issues instead of settling them. However abhorrent the South African government's decision is to us as individuals, there is perhaps much to be said and much consideration should be given to the various problems of that country.

It may be noted that the Russian delegation were all in favour of this type of intervention. But as to a nation which is reported to have 20 million political prisoners within its boundaries, what can be said of its right to vote condemning a smaller country for its particular political problems respecting minorities?

I also draw to your attention another matter, Mr. Speaker. Even at the time this matter was being voted upon, I read in one of the United States papers an article stating that a white man had been arrested for sitting at the same cafe counter with a negro in one of the southern states. There are laws with respect to racial discrimination in almost every country of the world. Who is to say what country is Simon pure? Which one can cast the first stone? I am sure that many of the countries that spoke out most loudly on the question of race persecution are those which have the least right to cast that first stone.

Mr. Speaker, I know that this debate has been somewhat prolonged. As I pointed out earlier, perhaps it should not have gone into the question of disunity respecting foreign affairs; but I feel that the general public should know what is the position of all parties in this house with respect to our continued all-out support for the United Nations.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate at all because I thought that my leader did an excellent job in propounding to the house the position which Social Crediters take at the present time with respect to foreign policy. But during the debate several attacks have been made upon this group, upon the leader of the Social Credit party and upon myself; and these call for a continuation of the debate. Very often that is what happens in debates.

Since the motion was to refer the estimates to the standing committee on external affairs, I had expected that a pronouncement by each of the leaders might have been sufficient so that the estimates could have gone to the committee and the minister could have been free to go to the United Nations as I understand he desires to do at the earliest possible moment.

At the outset of my speech, however, I wish to say that I too have visited the United Nations—as have many others in this parliament. It was my privilege to go with the delegation, as one of the parliamentary advisers, last year when we met in Paris, France. I must say that I enjoyed my work greatly. I did not have a great deal to say, but as a result of my observations, I would say I was pleased with the way the Canadian delegation took up their task and worked. I was particularly impressed by and pleased with the staff of brilliant young men the minister had at Paris at the time. I have no criticism whatsoever to make of the staff in the Department of External Affairs. I believe they are doing an excellent job in attempting to achieve the policy which is laid down by the government itself. I would say the same thing for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). While at times we may rise and exercise our democratic right of criticism, we want the minister to know that, as far as we are concerned, and as far as our relationship with him goes, we are behind him in his desire to accomplish that which he set out to do. We do not always agree with government policy in respect of foreign affairs.

I might also say this, if it is not premature to do so. Should the minister reach higher levels of responsibility in the United Nations, we want him to know that this group will be behind him in the exercise of those responsibilities. Whether or not he will eventually be in a position of determining policy, I do not know; but as to any responsibility that might come to him in giving guidance to such a vast organization, we want him to know that we will stand with him in his work. However, once again I might say that that fact does not preclude at all the opportunity that is presented in this parliament of speaking freely and of exercising our democratic right in placing our views before the country. In fact, I quite believe that the minister himself and the government would welcome criticisms and observations.

Having said that, I want to deal for a moment with the speech that was made the other night by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras). I do so because, in his speech, mention was made of an article which I wrote some time ago. That was the second time that this article had been mentioned in the house. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) rose this afternoon and referred to the same article. That is the third time that article has been referred to in this house. I will say now that I am not retracting anything that I have said or that I have written unless it is proved that my observations are absolutely incorrect.

I will say this, Mr. Speaker. In the quotation made from this article, one part was omitted. In fact, quite a bit of it was omitted, but I have reference to one particular part. I am not blaming the hon. member for Provencher because, on looking up the local paper that reprinted the article, I find that this particular part was not there. Therefore I would not expect him to quote this part; but in the original printed article which was put out in pamphlet form this was printed as a prominent footnote to the article and with a prominent bold face title which reads: "Please do not misunderstand", and the following notation is made. I am reading this for the purpose of the record:

> We are not opposed to the United Nations as an instrument for the furtherance of international co-operation. We believe that such an organization, recognizing the sovereignty of its member nations, working together, can do much to foster and bring about peace and good will among men. We do feel, however, that there is definite evidence of intrigue in high places which is undermining the sovereignty of the freedom loving nations of the world, and which will ultimately enslave the people through world government over which they will have no control.

Might I say once again to the hon. member for Provencher that I am retracting nothing until such time as I am proven to be wrong by the actual facts of the circumstances, and certainly my friend's argument will not prove me to be wrong. Several times he quotes and remarks, as he is quoting, "I do not understand" or "I do not exactly know", as though he were unable to comprehend something that I was writing about. If that is so, then why does he attempt to disprove my thesis, if he does not understand or does not exactly know? Furthermore, I cannot help it if the hon. member for Provencher does not possess the necessary powers of comprehension. At page 1939 of Hansard the hon. member quoted from my article. I might say that when the hon. member quoted the article he did not quote the title of it. He quoted the subtitle, which was my honest appraisal of the United Nations. The actual title of my article was "Intrigue in high places", and the article must be read in the light of what I am attempting to show, that behind the scenes there has been intrigue in high places.

I wish the United Nations every success, but if there is in high places intrigue that will depreciate and render the work of the United Nations useless, those forces should consequently be exposed.

My hon. friend says on page 1939 of Hansard:

> The most important nation in the United Nations and the one that is carrying the biggest load of all is the United States of America, and it is not socialist.

There seems to be an idea in the minds of many people that in order for a person to be a socialist he must belong to the C.C.F. or to the socialist party of Great Britain. When I talk of socialism or socialists I do not care where they belong. I do not care whether they belong to the C.C.F. or even to my own organization.

An hon. Member: Or the Liberal party.

Mr. Hansell: Or the Liberal party, or the Conservative party. It is not a matter of whether a man has a membership in a socialist organization.

Mr. Knowles: It is a matter of being intelligent.

Mr. Blackmore: Halfway intelligent.

Mr. Hansell: I will say this. Without using the term "intelligent", I will say that it is a mental attitude towards certain things, and we can have a socialist mentality and sometimes not know it. That is the truth, and when my friends talk of nations being socialist we believe, of course, that the United States of America has a free enterprise government. But I am going to tell you that a good deal of what Mr. Truman did was to put in certain socialist legislation. I would say to some of the Liberal party here: there are Liberals here who have a socialist mentality, and particularly when it comes to matters of the wider scope of international relations.

Mr. Decore: What about the big shots of Alberta?

Mr. Hansell: Let me go a step further. On the same page of Hansard the hon. member quotes from the charter of the United Nations as follows:

> —to reaffirm faith in fundamental rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small.

That is very good; we can agree with that. Further down he continues:

> To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples.

Well, that is all right; we believe that.

Mr. Low: A lot of other people do not.

Mr. Hansell: I have quoted from the United Nations charter. These things are all well and they are all good, and we do trust that the United Nations will safeguard these things and live up to them. We are with them when they do so. But the fact of the matter is, history records that the nations of the world have not lived up to them, and the very administrations that my leader referred to the other night, the Roosevelt and Truman administrations, sold those very principles down the river. Let us make no mistake about that.

Mr. Studer: Which river?

Mr. Blackmore: Any river you want to name.

Mr. Hansell: That remark coming from over there is a measure of my hon. friend's intelligence. I am telling you that when we are dealing with matters like these we are not dealing with petty party differences; we are dealing with the destiny of the human race, and my hon. friend pops up and says, "What river?"

The hon. member for Provencher could not help but read a certain part of my article, and then he said:

> It is obvious that the writer has indulged in a little indirect antisemitism.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) did the same thing a week or two ago. Well, I did not answer him; I can let things go by. But when one is annoyed time and again one must make a reply. It is reaching the point where a person cannot use a quotation, and mention the name of the one he is quoting, without someone levelling against him a charge of antisemitism. It is a device to try to silence one.

Well, some of us are not going to be silenced. I have great respect for those who are not of my race or religion, and would be one of the first to defend them if they were ever in trouble. But what was the hon. member really doing? I will tell you what he was doing, because I have analysed one or two of his statements. Now I am going to analyse him. Yes, I am going to practise a little psychiatry and proceed to psychoanalyse him.

The hon. member is getting a bit jittery, because I was out in his constituency. He says that I left a pamphlet there. I did not leave it there; I do not know how it got there. But I am not worrying about the matter. I hope it was there, and I hope it goes farther, although it is out of print now.

I was invited to his constituency and addressed an enthusiastic meeting. That is what is bothering the hon. member and why he levels these charges of antisemitism against us. We see the pattern running true to form. It happened in British Columbia, when they got jittery out there, when they had nothing to propose and saw their popularity waning. This was just a sample of the old smear technique. The same thing happened in British Columbia. Well, they got their answer out there. Now my hon. friend from the province of Manitoba starts the same thing. He had better be careful or Manitoba will get its answer, too.

Not only was I in that community, on invitation—and I do not go anywhere unless I am invited. The hon. member need not get jittery again—but I have been invited to go back again.

Mr. Jutras: Would the hon. member permit one brief word? I just wish to assure him that he is most welcome at any time in my constituency. I have no objection whatsoever to his holding a meeting at any time.

Mr. Hansell: Well now, that was a nice thing to say, and I appreciate it very much. Nevertheless, it is the same old pattern, the same thing we have met before. We are not dunces at this sort of thing.

A large portion of my pamphlet was not quoted, and for that reason I shall read from it the conclusion I reached. The hon. member did not quote this part of it, and perhaps for very good reasons. The subtitle of the paragraph is "Prediction". This is my conviction. I wrote this without consultation with anyone:

> If the United Nations world organization fails and the third world war breaks, it will not cause men to admit their failure. In the re-examination of the process, as the Christian Science Monitor suggests, men will not come to their senses and publicly confess they have been on the wrong track all the time. No! No! They will say the very opposite. They will say we did not go far enough; that the United Nations was weak in that it was not given enough power. This will be meat for the proponents of world government. They will seize the opportunity of a third world war to bring in a world government, with supreme power. The stage will then be set for the coming of the world dictator.

And then this other paragraph:

> And what has all this to do with Social Credit? The Social Credit Association of Canada is organizing Canada for the purpose of eventually forming a government at Ottawa. In this process we will tell the truth. We believe we are among the few who know the truth. When once the people are informed, they will rally to the truth which is the only thing that will make men free.

He did not quote that part of my article.

Then, I should like to deal with what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). When I listened to him on Friday evening, when he commenced the speech he finished today, I must say that he sounded more like a kindergarten boy attempting to instruct his teacher, when he proceeded to level his criticism against my leader. The hon. member picked out one sentence; then he went a little farther today. May I place on record what the leader of the Social Credit party did say on that occasion. Let me add that the hon. member was trying to say the leader of this party had branded President Roosevelt and President Truman as traitors. Let us see what he did say. I will read the entire quotation as it appears in the speech of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) as reported at page 1881 of Hansard:

> Consequently, in so far as Mr. Truman did meet international challenges during the years he occupied the presidential office, I join with the minister in paying tribute. But, Mr. Speaker, when the full history of these times is written, when all of the facts have been brought to light, there will be many people who will say that the past two presidents of the United States have been the great betrayers of humanity. To be charitable, as I ought to be, I will say that some of those decisions made at Yalta and Potsdam, some of the secret understandings and agreements that were had with Stalin, may have been made in good faith; but the very best anyone can say is that they indicated a most serious lack of foresight and judgment on the part of those two presidents. It may have been that they listened too much to unsound advice from men like Alger Hiss, but they will not on that account be able to escape the judgment of history.

I should like to make it clear that in using those words the other day in the house the hon. member for Peace River did not, himself, condemn President Truman and President Roosevelt. He said distinctly that when the full history is written many people will say that the past two presidents have been the great betrayers of humanity. My leader does not make statements that he cannot prove.

I wonder now if I may quote what was said by Congressman B. Carroll Reese of Tennessee when speaking in the House of Representatives on March 19, 1951, as recorded at pages A-1564 to A-1568 of the Congressional Record. He said:

> We could have easily gotten to Berlin first. But our troops were first halted at the Elbe. They were then withdrawn from that river in a wide circle—far enough westward to make Stalin a present of the great Zeiss optical and precision instrument works at Jena, the most important V1 and V2 rocket laboratory and production plant in Nordhausen, and the vital underground jet plant in Kahla. Everywhere we surrendered to the soviets intact, thousands of German planes, including great masses of jet fighters ready for assembly, as well as research centres, rocket developments, scientific personnel, and other military treasures.
> When it was all over, a large part of the formidable Russian militarism of today was clearly marked "made in America" or "donated by America from Germany". But where Roosevelt left off, President Truman resumed.
> At Potsdam, Truman, maintaining intact Roosevelt's iron curtain of secret diplomacy, played fast and loose with American honour and security. He agreed to an enlargement of the boundaries of a Poland already delivered by Roosevelt and Churchill to Russian control through addition of areas that had, for centuries, been occupied by Germans or people of German origin. Some 14 million persons were brutally expelled from their homes with the confiscation of virtually all their property. Only 10 million finally reached the American, French and British zones of Germany. Four million mysteriously disappeared, though the finger points toward Russian atrocities. Thus Truman approved one of the great mass deportations in history, which for sheer cruelty is a dark page in the annals of history.
> At Potsdam, Truman also sanctioned Russian acquisition of Eastern Germany, the food-bin of that nation before the war. It then became impossible for the remaining German economy in British, French, and American hands to feed its people. Germany, like Japan, also went on our bounty rolls.
> Like Roosevelt, Truman did not neglect to build up Russian military strength when his opportunity came at Potsdam. He provided her with more factories, machines and military equipment, though at the time he attended Potsdam, Truman knew that through lend-lease we had already dangerously expanded Russia's military might and that, in addition, we had given the soviets some 15,000 planes—many of them of our latest type—and 7,000 tanks.

That is from a speech by Representative B. Carroll Reese.

Mr. Blackmore: That is what won China for the communists.

Mr. Hansell: I want to ask the hon. member for Kootenay East, or any other hon. member who wants to be critical of what my leader said in the house on February 12: Do you endorse the secret agreements which Roosevelt and Truman made with Stalin at Yalta and Potsdam? That is the question. Do you approve of that? Do you back them in callously turning over Poland, East Germany, Korea and the northern Japanese islands to Russia? Do you approve of the way in which those presidents deliberately contravened the United Nations charter, which stated that the right of self-determination was an inalienable right of all peoples and must be adhered to strictly as part of the new order that was to be ushered in by the United Nations? Think of the millions of people who were given to Stalin by these presidents without their consent and think of the human suffering that has resulted.

Mr. Blackmore: The loss of life too.

Mr. Hansell: When you think of these things, if you are at all fair, I say to the hon. member for Kootenay East and to any other hon. members who pursue the same argument that they must admit that the words of my leader, uttered in this house on February 12, were very restrained and moderate in the light of the circumstances. What he said was like a mild and perfumed lovetap in comparison with what millions of betrayed people are thinking and saying. What is more, during the election campaign in the United States, hundreds of speakers over the air and on the hustings said things that make my leader's words look weak, pale and anaemic. Let me read from the platform of the Republican party concerning these agreements. That is what it said:

> The government of the United States, under Republican leadership, will repudiate all commitments contained in secret understandings such as those at Yalta which aid communist enslavement. It will make clear, on the highest authority of the President and the Congress, that United States policy, as one of its peaceful purposes, looks happily forward to the genuine independence of those captive peoples.

The hon. member for Kootenay East tried to bolster up his case by pointing out that Churchill was at Yalta and Potsdam. I suppose he wanted to convey that if anyone was condemning Presidents Roosevelt and Truman he would also have to condemn Churchill. I should like to point out that Mr. Churchill was very alarmed at President Roosevelt's silly infatuation for Stalin and his reckless serving of the interests of world communism. On October 21, 1942, Mr. Churchill wrote to the British foreign secretary, Anthony Eden, as follows:

> It would be a measureless disaster if Russian barbarism overlaid the culture and independence of the ancient states of Europe.

From all one can gather from the bits and pieces that have dropped from the lips and pen of Churchill, that gentleman did what he could to oppose Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman in their recklessness. I would point out also to hon. members that Churchill felt that an invasion of the Balkans was to be preferred to head-on attempting to invade Germany by way of the northern counties of France. Roosevelt opposed this request, it appears, for no other reason than to please Stalin. In fact, Churchill evidently put up with a great deal of indignity and had to agree to many strategically unsound policies to prevent the clique of betrayers around Roosevelt from prompting the president to injure, even more than he had done, Britain's position in the world.

If any of you will take the trouble to read the book "As He Saw It" by General Elliott Roosevelt, the son of the late president, he will find some very frank statements concerning some of these things. It is apparent that General Elliott Roosevelt was determined to tell the truth so that posterity would have it. He was with his father at Casablanca, evidently as a military adviser. On page 116 he indicates his father's anti-British attitude in a quotation from what his father said, as follows:

> I will work with all my might and main to see to it that the United States is not wheedled into the position of accepting any plan that will aid or abet the British empire in its imperial ambitions.

I remind you that those words were said by Mr. Roosevelt just before he issued his unconditional surrender proclamation on Saturday, January 23, 1943. The next day Mr. Roosevelt again said to his son:

> The British must never get the idea that we're in this war just to help them hang on to the archaic medieval empire ideas.

There are many people who interpreted this attitude toward Britain, along with the great delight that Mr. Roosevelt had in making Churchill squirm, as the reason for the president siding with Stalin on the choice of a strategically insignificant area for the Mediterranean front rather than the corridor up through which Mr. Churchill felt it would be comparatively easy to drive into the very heart of nazi territory. Mr. Roosevelt was condemned by those words of his son far more strongly than by anything ever said by my leader.

What was the position of Churchill at Yalta and Teheran? Just because the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) says Mr. Churchill was there and Mr. Eden was there, that does not mean they could not be wrong. Mr. Churchill can be wrong. There is no living individual who is infallible. The hon. member brings in the name of Churchill as if everybody is going to step up and say "hurrah, hurrah". Mr. Churchill can be wrong. Let us also remember that men can be made and men can be broken. Personally I think Mr. Roosevelt was a much overrated man; congenial of course, but the press and the whole propaganda machine of the United States were behind him as they were behind Truman.

What is more, that same propaganda machine can make men and break them. I am not saying whether Mr. Churchill was right or wrong, but I wonder if the hon. member for Kootenay East has ever studied the position of these three big men of the earth as they sat around the table at Teheran and Yalta. Let us look at them. There was Mr. Roosevelt, the president of the United States of America. He was the man who held the purse. There was Mr. Stalin, the man of steel, with a mind as sharp as a two-edged sword and a heart bent on world conquest. There was Mr. Churchill, with one of the greatest burdens of responsibility upon his shoulders, nothing more nor less than the destiny of one of the greatest of peoples of all times, a nation crowded on a small island whose resources were then well spent.

In this connection I do not think I can do much better than quote the remarks of the well-known columnist, George Sokolsky, which appeared in the New York Sun on March 8, 1945. I gather from the article that he covered the meeting at Teheran. What did he say about Churchill? These are his words:

> One of these men (the big three) is a British aristocrat, Conservative, imperialistic, proud, the most heroic political figure of the war. But he heads an empire that has long been used to the limit. Its principal resource now is the treasury and industry of the United States. His mind is robust, but his purse is bare. At a bargain he sits with empty hands and high hopes.

That is Mr. Churchill at these conferences. One of my colleagues has passed me a note indicating that I have two minutes left. I can finish in that time because I do not think I need to say anything further. If it is thought that we differ at times with government policy respecting foreign affairs, we want it to be understood that we do so not because we sit on the opposition side of the house and not because we oppose any individual with whom we may disagree, but because we have a conscience and a conviction concerning the destinies of the nations of the world.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the argument of the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. Blackmore: You could not do it if you tried.

Mr. Wright: I want to comment, however, on one statement he made. He said that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman had the propaganda machine of the United States behind them, that they had the press behind them, and that is why they were such great national figures. If the rest of his speech is as correct as that statement I would hate to put much credence in it, because everyone who has followed conditions in the United States knows that 85 per cent of the press of that country were opposed to both Mr. Truman and Mr. Roosevelt.

In taking part in this debate I wish to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on the distinction conferred on him by the general assembly of the United Nations in electing him as president. I believe it was a timely recognition of good service rendered, and it brought honour both to himself and to Canada. I enjoyed his speech on Wednesday; and if I have any criticism to offer it is that he has become so steeped in diplomacy in his work at the United Nations that he forgets that when he is at home he could afford to be—and I believe should be—a little more explicit and definite in his statements to parliament on Canada's position with respect to the serious international situation in which we find ourselves at the present time.

In my opinion it is poor policy for Canada not to make her position clear before commitments are made which may involve us at some later date in a serious world situation. I do not think that position is fair to our friends, and I believe in the long run it will only benefit our enemies. When the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) was speaking the other night, he stated that we in this group criticized Mr. Dulles for some of his forthright statements in Europe yet at the same time we criticized the Secretary of State for External Affairs for not being more forthright with members of the house. I believe there is a difference. I believe there is a position between those two extremes that we in this country could follow. I know it is a difficult position. The Secretary of State for External Affairs explained that to us when he spoke to the house, but I am convinced that it is better to speak before than after the event has happened.

I have listened carefully to the speeches of the members of the official opposition during this debate. Formerly they took their lead from the Conservative government of Mr. Churchill in Great Britain—

Mr. Fulton: Oh, no.

Mr. Wright: —but now they are following the Republican government of Mr. Eisenhower in the United States. I do not think I have ever seen a group in Canada that seemed as anxious as my hon. friends to occupy the position of a satellite to some other nation. They seem content to be the tail of any big dog. Pretty soon they will be recommending the Stars and Stripes as our national flag instead of the Union Jack.

Mr. Fulton: I did not know that my hon. friend had such a vivid imagination.

Mr. Wright: I wonder what Sir Robert Borden would think if he had been here and heard the speeches made by my hon. friends in the last two days of this debate.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know what he would think if he heard your speech.

Mr. Wright: I do not imagine my hon. friends would have made such statements under his leadersip. I remember an election that was fought away back in 1911. I was not very big at the time but it seems to me that I recall hearing something about "no truck or trade with the Yankees". At Versailles Sir Robert Borden stood up for an independent Canada, a Canada that would express its own opinions and take a clear position in world affairs. I think we should follow the same policy. I believe Sir Robert Borden was right.

I do not intend to deal with the political aspects of the world situation today. I think the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did that quite well. However, I want to deal with two other aspects of the situation. I am going to confine myself to the necessity for economic aid in Europe as well as military development, and assistance to underdeveloped areas in Asia, the Near East and Africa. I do not intend to deal very fully with the matter of economic aid. I think that can be done later on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). But there are three or four things which it is my opinion we must do if we are to build the economies of Europe to the point where they can carry the military establishments that they are being asked to carry under NATO.

First, I think we are going to have to purchase more goods from Europe. We are going to have to remove some of the barriers that are in the way of the purchase of these goods in Canada and the United States. Then I think we are going to have to take sterling in exchange for some of the goods we wish to sell to Europe. I believe we shall have to invest that sterling in projects in the sterling area or make loans to the governments of the commonwealth to enable them to develop some of their great natural resources. I believe that if we carried out those two or three things, encouraged private investment and had some public investment or made it easier for the old countries to trade with us, we would overcome that situation.

I want particularly to deal with the latter of the two subjects I mentioned, that is the assistance to underdeveloped areas. When Chief Justice William Douglas of the United States supreme court returned from Asia a year or two ago he said the United States had been so busy fighting against communism that it had not tried to fight against the conditions that breed communism. If that is so in the United States, I think some of the figures I have here will point up the fact that it is even more so in Canada. In his speech the other day at page 1851 of Hansard, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said this, when speaking of the recent commonwealth conference:

> The effectiveness of this commonwealth conference cannot, of course, be judged finally until more is known of the measures adopted by individual governments following it, and until further discussions have taken place between its members and other governments, particularly the government of the United States, and with various international organizations, particularly the organization for European economic co-operation. The commonwealth countries have, however, taken a useful initiative. In following it up there will have to be co-operation on the broadest possible basis to ease the necessary but not easy adjustments which may have to be made, especially by some of the members of the commonwealth. In this process the Canadian government will naturally wish to play a full and, I hope, constructive part.

I want to give some figures as to the constructive part the Canadian government has been playing with regard to grants to these areas of the world which need some assistance at this time. I am speaking only of grants, and I shall deal with loans later. During the last four fiscal years, 1949 to 1952, Canada has given in non-military foreign grants a total of $51,765,900, while during the equivalent fiscal years the United States has given $15,817 million in non-military grants. This aid has been given since approximately the beginning of the ECA program in the United States, which started in April, 1948. The Canadian figures, by years, are as follows—I shall not give the odd figures but just the even thousands: In 1949, $5,811,000; 1950, $6,959,000; 1951, $12,313,000; 1952, $26,683,000. In the equivalent years the United States grants have been, 1949, $5,423 million; 1950, $4,620 million; 1951, $3,225 million; 1952, $2,549 million.

Let us take it on a per capita basis; since the United States is a large country and has a much greater population than we have, I think that is the only fair way. On a per capita basis Canada's actual grants during this period were $3.69 while the United States gave, on a per capita basis, $102 or almost 30 times as much as each Canadian. I believe those are rather startling figures. I do not think we in this country have anything of which to be proud in the grants of economic aid which we have made available to other parts of the world. This economic aid has been given through various organizations such as the Colombo plan, the United Nations technical assistance program, and so on. Canada's total grants for four years should have been $1,237,215,000, if we had been giving on the basis of our productive capacity, rather than the meagre $51,765,900 which we did give.

During those years we in Canada were receiving considerable benefits from those grants given by the United States for assistance to Europe and other parts of the world. Many of our agricultural products and manufactured articles were being sold to Europe and paid for out of grants which the United States was making during this period. Canada benefited under ECA through United States offshore purchases from April, 1947 to March 1952 to the extent of $1,136,700,000. During this time we were giving aid to those countries totalling about $51,765,000 and we were benefiting by over $1,136,000,000 in purchases made out of United States funds. During that period we contributed not one cent to direct European aid. Our position is not very strong, therefore, when the minister suggests that the United States must come in with the commonwealth in providing greater sums of money for economic aid to the various parts of the world.

I have a table here showing contributions Canada has made over the past four years. It shows that under I.R.O. we contributed $5,411,000 in 1949; 1950, $5,826,000; 1951, $2,107,000. For Near East relief we contributed in 1949, $73,800; in 1950, $57,400; in 1951, $1,500,000. For post-UNRRA relief we contributed in 1949 about $325,000; under the United Nations expanded program for technical assistance, about $850,000; contribution to United Nations relief and rehabilitation program in Korea, $7,250,000; Colombo plan, $25 million; commonwealth consultative committee on south and southeast Asia, $265,000 in 1952; to provide for purchase and transportation to Yugoslavia of relief supplies in 1952, $43,800; to provide for gifts of wheat or flour as a contribution to famine relief in Greece, some $825,000.

Those are figures for our direct contributions in the way of grants in aid to these countries during the last four years. In view of the amount we are spending and have been spending in Canada on military preparedness, and the budgetary surpluses we have had in those years in this country, I think the amount we have contributed is a miserable figure to try to build up better conditions in the world and to combat communism.

What did we have by way of budgetary surpluses in those years? In 1949 we had a surplus of $595,500,000; in 1950 we had $131,500,000; in 1951 we had $211,300,000; in 1952 we had $249 million, or a total surplus of $1,187,350,000. During a similar period we could contribute in grants only some $51,765,000 to combat communism in other parts of the world.

Let us now see what we did in some other respects, because we did a great deal more than that. In credits, in military relief, including those grants I have mentioned, and NATO mutual aid, we contributed between 1945 and 1952 some $2,410 million. That is a large sum of money. Let us see what the United States did. During a similar period the United States contributed $35,623 million; and in those contributions I have mentioned that we made during that time, the largest single item was the loan we made to Great Britain just after the war amounting to some $1,250 million. In loans and military aid we were somewhere near in proportion to the amounts given by the United States—that is, on a per capita basis—but when it comes to straight grants in aid, we just do not compare with them at all. In other words, the United States have contributed about 30 times as much per capita as have we in Canada.

Let us see what our national defence expenditures were in those years. According to the public accounts, in 1949 we spent $264,820,000; in 1950, $380,948,000; in 1951 $780,204,000; and in 1952, $1,415,473,000. Last year our estimates of expenditure were $2,001 million. This year it is estimated that we will spend approximately the same amount, or another $2 billion. In other words, in the four-year period when we gave $51,765,000 in grants in aid, we spent in military preparedness $2,841 million. I do not think that is a fair proportion or division of the amount of money we in Canada have to spend if we are honest in saying—as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) have said on various occasions—that we shall not be able to accomplish the things we want to accomplish unless we can build up the economies of these backward countries, unless we can assist Europe to establish a sound economy, unless we are prepared to see that these countries have a strong economic background on which to base their military establishments and unless we are prepared to see that in Asia and these other countries some technical assistance is given there, because military preparedness is not enough.

With regard to that matter I should like to quote what the minister said on technical assistance under the Colombo plan. As reported at page 1851 of Hansard he stated:

> Another commonwealth initiative on which I can only touch at this time, but which I am sure will be given consideration later, is the Colombo plan, which likewise was framed in full awareness of the interests of other countries and other organizations, particularly the United Nations. That plan is now nearing the end of its second year and it continues to be one of the most important and constructive elements in our foreign economic policy.

When I looked over a release of the United Kingdom information office of December 11, 1952 in connection with the Colombo plan, I was rather surprised to find that there was a branch set up to give technical assistance to those nations of the commonwealth. In this pamphlet we find this statement:

> The original members of the council were the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan and Ceylon. They were joined as full members in 1951 by Viet Nam and Cambodia, and early in 1952 by Burma and Nepal.

This council is set up for the purpose of giving technical assistance and of organizing in those various countries places of training for personnel who will go out and assist the inhabitants of those countries in building a better economy. It is stated here:

> Co-operation is the key-note of the scheme . . . India has agreed to provide assistance to the value of Rs. 10 million (£750,000) . . .

Pakistan, Ceylon, Indonesia and other countries are putting in similar amounts in order to assist.

> Pakistan has offered a contribution of Rs. 1½ million to cover scholarships, fellowships and the provision of experts and training facilities: it has offered Ceylon four scholarships in sugar agronomy and training facilities relating to a projected vegetable oil mill. Ceylon is to contribute Rs. 1,776,000 for each year of the scheme and is providing training facilities in rural development work and the working of co-operatives.

Here is what I was surprised at, when I came to what had been done by the various countries:

> As on 31st August, 1952, the services of 80 experts and training facilities for 658 persons had been offered and accepted under the scheme. The allocation of experts was as follows: India—15; Pakistan—36; and Ceylon—29.

Then listen to this:

> The supplying countries were the United Kingdom—39; Canada—4; Australia—21; New Zealand—13; and India—3.

When it comes to supplying facilities for training in the field, this is the situation:

> The facilities were provided by the United Kingdom—207; Canada—95; Australia—218; New Zealand—107; India—30 and Pakistan—1.

I do not think we have anything to be proud of in that record; but I want to be fair. I want to point out that Canada, in providing these experts, decided that she would use the technical assistance program of the United Nations in providing the facilities. In Canada and the United Nations, 1951-52, at page 48, we find this statement:

> In an effort to co-ordinate its own participation in the expanded program, Canada sought to obtain the agreement of all the participating organizations to channel their activities in recruiting experts or in placing trainees in Canada through the technical co-operation service which had been set up in the Department of Trade and Commerce. By June 1952 a total of 54 trainees had been sent to Canada by the technical assistance administration for training in fields which included public administration, agriculture, hydroelectric power development and social welfare. These students have come from such countries as India, Pakistan, Cuba, Finland, Brazil, Uruguay, Burma, Venezuela and the British West Indies. By that date 24 experts had been recruited from Canada by the technical assistance administration and the specialized agencies.

If we total up the experts we have placed at the disposal of both these schemes, and if we add the trainees that we have accepted in Canada, some 58 trainees from all of Asia and these other underdeveloped countries, up to June, 1952, it does not seem to me that you get a reasonable contribution on the part of this government to building better technical understanding and better relations with the countries in the Far East and the Near East. It seems to me that, with the facilities we have here in Canada, we should be able to do much more than we have been doing to date in the training of personnel in this country and in the bringing of individuals from these backward countries for training in Canada.

I am convinced that if we are to meet the threat of communism in the world today, the only sensible way to do it is to bring some of the young people from these countries over to Canada, to the United States, to Great Britain and to the other democratic countries and show them what we have here, show them that we have a system that works, that we have a system that provides plenty. If we fail to do it, then make no mistake; Russia is not going to fail to do it. She is not going to fail to take them to her country and give them every opportunity, and try to show them that they have a better system than we have.

In my estimation that is the only way we are going to get value for the amount of money we are spending on military preparedness today. To get value we have to build up the economies of these countries so they can assist themselves. So far I do not think that we in Canada are doing anything like what we can and should do in that regard.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, an ordinary backbencher hesitates to participate in a debate dealing with external affairs.

[Mr. Wright.]

We are aware of the fact that this particular area of interest involves a very complex field indeed.

As I have sat in this house and listened to debates on various topics I have been encouraged as a backbencher to feel that I might be able to make some small contribution to this discussion, because I find that ability or expert knowledge is not necessarily equated with the length of speeches on any particular topic. As a matter of fact, in a little aside that went on just before I rose to my feet, someone near me expressed the thought that he was not taking part in this debate because he had only one idea on the subject and he did not think that was adequate resources. The rejoinder was that very often this particular person had spoken on a subject with more limited resources than even one idea.

I rise to deal with this topic because actually it is the most important problem that faces hon. members. If we do not solve the difficulties of external affairs, obviously of course we will solve nothing. We are blessed today in Canada, as well as the people in other parts of the western world, with the most incredible material progress that mankind has seen. During the past 200 years the west has passed through a state of progress, so far as material and technical civilization are concerned, that is almost beyond the capacity of the mind to grasp.

In 1750, if we go back that far, if we were to look at the conditions of the peasant in either Europe or Asia, we would find that actually there was very little to distinguish between the two. Today there is absolutely no comparison at all. What is most disconcerting is that we have emerged into the post-war atomic era and we find that the speed of technological change has increased rather than diminished. It has brought western nations to a fundamental crisis which I suppose could be called a moral crisis rather than anything else, in that our moral development and social intelligence have failed to keep pace with our material development.

So far as the sphere of political activity is concerned, we have noted, in the internal situation as well as the external, the tendency toward increased concentration on political power. In the field of external relations we find today, if we were to try to sum up the problem in the simplest terms, two great world powers facing one another and not on very amiable terms. We have the U.S.S.R. and its satellites on one hand, the eastern group; and in the other, the western group, we have the United States of America and her associates. I use the term "satellite" and "associates" to distinguish the relationship that exists between the Soviet and those within her sphere of influence, and the United States of America and the countries which come within her orbit of influence.

Actually, either of those world powers—and they are just that, world powers—could exercise world control without any difficulty at all, were it not for the existence of the other. We have the means of communication and transportation, as a result of developments on the scientific and material levels, that would make it possible for either of those powers to achieve in concrete political terms what has been the overwhelming desire of world powers from the beginning of the history of mankind. Therefore when the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) makes reference to the positive attitude of this group toward the United States of America, I do not think he can infer that we have necessarily allowed ourselves to be completely dominated, to come completely under the control of that particular sphere of influence. I think actually the situation is the result of political reality. Whether we like it or not, the United States of America is leading the western nations in the struggle for world domination between communism and the western democracies.

What is most difficult in this problem is the fact that today, in dealing with political matters, we are faced with the threat of atomic warfare. In listening to Mr. Truman give his last statement to Congress before he retired from the presidency of the United States, I was interested in a particular point. He said something like this, and he addressed his remarks directly to Stalin. I do not know whether that gentleman was listening, but Mr. Truman intended the remarks for Stalin's ears. He said:

> You claim belief in Lenin's prophecy that one stage in the development of communist society would be war between your world and ours. But Lenin was a pre-atomic man who viewed society and history with pre-atomic eyes. Something profound has happened since he wrote. War has changed its shape and dimensions. It cannot be a stage in the development of anything save ruin.

I am sure hon. members in this chamber will agree with these words of the former president of the United States that today war can mean only inevitable ruin for civilization. We have within our grasp the power to incinerate fifty million people within a space of five minutes, if it ever happens that the hot war should break out in full intensity.

It is because of this that I feel the present debate is of the utmost importance and, as a backbencher, I am going to make some small contribution to the discussion. The interest aroused from this debate, as the various points are discussed in the chamber and in the press, will create in the minds of the public an awareness of the gravity of the situation.

It seems to me that in Canada we have been more preoccupied with our own material development and prosperity than in acknowledging our obligations, as we are confronted with this extremely grave external situation. I suppose politicians—not necessarily those on the opposition side—have been more at fault than others for having stirred up a false sense of well-being and security, and for having harped constantly on the theme of Canadian prosperity. Our prosperity is meaningless if we do not do something to solve the very difficult problem that, as an autonomous nation within the framework of the British commonwealth, we are forced to face.

My thinking on the matter has been shaped largely outside this chamber. I have not had the opportunity to sit through many debates on external affairs during my membership in the house. Many of the ideas I shall bring forth were formulated in the weird and wonderful period immediately following world war II. Those of us who served in that war were deeply interested in what was then popularly described as the winning of the peace. It was said that a military victory was useless unless we were equally successful in winning the peace. Everyone was heartened as we saw the United Nations take shape to deal with problems affecting international relations.

Unfortunately, as has been indicated by several speakers in this debate, the United Nations got bogged down in fuzzy idealism. After the second world war we believed, as we did after world war I, that the world had been made safe for democracy. The original claim of the United Nations, unfortunately, has not been realized in actuality. I do not believe there was anything sinister in connection with what happened when the United Nations was formed. Actually, as I have already pointed out, the same attitude prevailed at the time of the formation of the league of nations after world war I. I do not think there was any world conspiracy that dominated that organization. Rather it was apathy, lack of interest, lack of understanding and comprehension on the part of those who were responsible for guiding the affairs of the world.

For example I believe it was President Harding who refused even to acknowledge communications from the league of nations, and it was such apathy, lack of interest and isolationism that sabotaged that organization. I do not think there is anything sinister in what occurred in respect of the league of nations. It was a matter of indifference; and perhaps during the twentieth century ideas emerged preventing the real issues from being faced by those who were most responsible for carrying out the early negotiations of that international body.

Today, as the result of failure by the United Nations to grapple successfully with the problem of winning the peace, we find ourselves in a cold war period. In this changed situation the borderline between peace and war has become somewhat blurred. When the house commenced its deliberations this afternoon, for example, an effort was made, through a question asked in the house, to ascertain whether or not we are now actually engaged in war.

While we were indulging in wishful thinking the Russians, true to form—and had we had any knowledge of history we would have expected it—seized the initiative and succeeded in building up a buffer of "friendly" satellites. This was done with very little effort on the part of Russia. At that time the west had neither the power nor the will to resist. Actually, if we had had an understanding of the communist world movement we should have been aware that this condition of affairs would have developed; because communism, as an ideology, must be recognized as a world religion. One of the strong motivating factors in the communist idea is the religious faith it arouses in its devotees. It appears to have great strength in areas where there is a religious vacuum; and we know there are many religious vacuums around the world today.

In addition to the religious aspect of communism it is utterly and absolutely opposed to what is sometimes described as western capitalism. It has as its fundamental objective the extermination in any way possible of the capitalist form of society. Communism has its imperialistic aspect. For example, it is significant that the only countries that have been brought within the scope of soviet influence by internal disorder have been China and Yugoslavia. Yugoslavia is now afflicted with an interesting disease called Titoism, and it is hoped that China, that vast and mysterious country of the east, will become afflicted with the same political illness. It seems inconceivable that China will allow herself to remain indefinitely the puppet of the political manipulators in Moscow. An understanding of the true nature of Russian communism, as well as its religious and imperialistic aspects, should have put us on the alert, so far as the post-war activities of that nation are concerned. Instead of that, both at Yalta and at Potsdam, as has been indicated in this debate, we took the attitude of compromise and conciliation, an attitude similar to that taken toward the nazis before world war II. At that time the slogan was: Let's not be nasty to the nazis. This time it was: Let's not be nasty to the soviets. We indulged in wholesale disarmament while Russia, very easily and without much effort on her part, was gobbling up the countries within her immediate sphere of influence. And it is only recently, since the reorganization of the cominform in 1947, that we have begun to stiffen our attitude toward communist imperialism.

Today we have the soviets at bay in the west since the formation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It is rather an encouraging sign that since NATO was established there has been every evidence of increasing solidarity in western European countries. It is almost possible to conclude that the situation, so far as Europe is concerned, has been stabilized because at long last the western powers have awakened to the reality of Russian intent and they are offering firm resistance to any further encroachment by that world power.

Today Russia has been stopped temporarily in the west. I think the reason she has been stopped is because she realizes that she can make further gains in Europe only at the risk of open conflict. Surely responsible leaders in Russia are no more happy about the prospect of atomic warfare than are we in the west. She came very close to absorbing France and Italy within her sphere of influence. I repeat that we owe much of the relative stability in western Europe today to the wisdom of those who were responsible for promoting the NATO plan.

The question is, can it last? The communist plan is a fluid and mobile one. It was General Eisenhower, when in charge of the European army, who said that Europe cannot be defended unless she unites. Now that General Eisenhower has become president of the United States I imagine he still holds that viewpoint in connection with international affairs and is still of the opinion that we cannot defend Europe against further Russian encroachment unless Europe does unite. I think that could account for the recent statements by the secretary of state, Mr. Dulles, in Europe, when he emphasized the necessity of European union in order to preserve the situation as it stands at the moment.

So much for Europe. I have listened to this discussion with a great deal of interest, and have realized that Europe and NATO have been considerably in the background.

Our attention has been focused upon east Asian matters precipitated by the recent announcement concerning Formosa. I do not think we can call what is taking place in east Asia a cold war. The term "cold war" as I have indicated suggests a blurred understanding of what is actually peace and what is war. The minister of external affairs has referred to Korea as a police action. As I read the reports from that area and try to keep in touch with the situation it seems to me to be a pretty hot police action, almost hot enough to be called a hot war.

Unfortunately the situation in Asia is not turning out as well as it has in western Europe. The situation in Asia as represented by the stalemate in Korea is weighing heavily against the democracies. It is a very delicate situation indeed, because there we have not the background of democratic traditions and type of thinking that we found in the west which made it possible for the western powers to come together once they were made aware of the imperialistic drive of communism.

In Asia it is more than a case of communism versus democracy. In the eastern part of the world we have been witnessing during recent years, ever since the west became interested in the Orient as a matter of fact, the beginning of an industrial revolution with its consequent effects upon nationalism and racialism. What is taking place in Indo-China, Indonesia, Malaya and throughout the east, and also to a certain extent in China, is the result primarily of influences that have come in from the west.

The missionaries who have gone there have preached the fundamental ideas of Christianity, the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Those ideas have had a tremendous impact upon the Asian people. Not only have we sent religious missionaries; we have sent political prophets who have expounded the principles of freedom and liberty to people who have no background of democratic thought or experience. Then our commercial salesmen followed in the wake of the missionaries and introduced the peoples of the east, who I suppose were at a stage of economic development which could be compared to that existing in Europe some four or five hundred years ago, to the material benefits of our western way of life.

It seems to me that the real difficulty in the east arises from nationalistic sentiments. I think it is obvious to those who are familiar with the situation that the events that have been taking place in China over some decades, but more recently since world war II, are interpreted by the people of east Asia as a triumph of Asiatic nationalism over what they call western colonial oppression, and it is very easy for Russia to sell that notion to the Chinese people. The people of the east are very suspicious of the motives of the western nations as they endeavour to stabilize an extremely difficult situation in that part of the world. I suppose they have cause to be suspicious, because it is not so many years ago that the western powers were carrying on what might be termed colonial oppression.

The crux of the matter, as I see it, in east Asia is what is going to happen to the 800 million people who are still outside the orbit of soviet influence. They are being weighed in the balance at the moment. We do not know whether they are going to move in the direction of the western democracies or be inveigled by the false promises of liberty and economic benefits which Russia and communism can hold out before the eyes of these people. We have found that communism is capable of being all things to all people until it actually takes over and is in political control of the situation. That seems to be the crux of the matter. What happens in regard to the east as negotiations are carried on at the United Nations is going to determine very largely the direction in which the people will turn.

So far as China is concerned, it used to be thought that the social and political revolution that has occurred in that country was merely a continuation of the agrarian reform movement that has been going on for a long time in that country. But today, as we see the participation of the Chinese communists in Korea, we cannot fail to recognize that behind that effort is the subtle manipulation of the Soviets. We are faced with a situation very similar to that which confronted us shortly after world war II. The pressure that was formerly exerted on the satellite countries of Europe is now being exerted in Korea; and as I have indicated, the situation has been exploited very favourably by the Soviets thus far on their own behalf.

If it is true in the east, as it was in the west, that the Soviets only understand a firm voice, I do not think we need become too disturbed and this is an opinion that has already been expressed by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) about the recent United States action with respect to Formosa, because to me it merely seems to indicate that the pressure that was applied in the west is now going to be applied in the east. We must remember, of course, that there is greater danger of open conflict in the Asiatic situation because of the nationalism and racialism and the social and political upheaval I have briefly outlined. However, inasmuch as Russia responded to increased pressure in the west, why should she not react in the same manner to increased pressure in the Asian sphere of influence? A firm voice in the west brought results. If Russia shows the same reluctance to face an outbreak of hostilities that she did in the west, surely she will be reasonable enough to withdraw from a situation that could be made untenable once the western powers indicate their real intent there.

We must always remember, of course—and this is a difficulty no one can resolve—that no one can decide what Russia is going to do. Actually the answer is in her hands, and it might be that with madmen in authority she will precipitate the world into the ruinous war, a war that everyone fervently hopes will never occur, because it is a foregone conclusion in this atomic age that war can only result in ruin for all the peoples of the world.

It has been suggested by this group that a positive contribution toward the stabilization of the situation in Asia might be made by the creation of a pact or organization similar to that which was established in western Europe. The minister has been reluctant to meet the situation head on with a pointblank statement. We have been faced with embarrassing unilateral action on the part of the United States. Much of the discussion that has gone on in the house has been of a speculative variety concerning the true intent of that country, whether they are going to push the struggle in the east right to the limit, which means open warfare, or whether their action merely reflects a stiffening resistance. Apparently we do not know, mainly because we were not consulted.

It seems to me that the success achieved by NATO in stabilizing the European situation might also be realized in the east if we were able to get together in some form of Pacific pact or organization. In order to avoid the possibility of armed conflict, certainly everything in our power must be done. If a Pacific pact can help, it seems to me it would be a logical step in proceeding toward some form of political machinery for resolving by negotiation and agreement the difficulty that exists between the two world powers, these two gigantic spheres of influence, the U.S.S.R. on the one side and the United States on the other. As to the question of who shall join such a Pacific pact, that would resolve itself as the organization took shape, just as it has in the case of NATO which now extends its sphere of influence far beyond the immediate geographic area of the Atlantic.

In the immediate post-war period after world war II we talked about winning the peace, we talked about one world or none. The slogan "one world or none" is just as applicable now as it was in those days. The United Nations must succeed. It is the ultimate hope for carrying on international negotiations by peaceful means. At the moment it is blocked because of the difficulty that has arisen between the eastern and western spheres of influence. We must work toward the establishment of some form of political machinery whereby international affairs can be settled by discussion and agreement and not by participation in a devastating war.

I say again that here is the heart of the matter. It is essentially a moral problem. Because of the rapid rate of scientific and materialistic progress we have been precipitated violently into a world in which we have neither the social intelligence nor the moral integrity to handle the problems that have developed. That gap must be bridged if humanity is to survive.

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate on external affairs until I saw in the press this morning that the debate was to be concluded today. Therefore I thought I should like to make a few observations at this time. It seems to me that this is a great day for the backbenchers, because they are taking part in the debate at the present time.

First of all I want to extend my congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on being chosen president of the seventh session of the general assembly of the United Nations. It is a great tribute to him in his own right and a gesture of good will to Canada as well. I am sure that he will preside at the meetings of the assembly with firmness and efficiency that will bring credit, as has always been the case at external affairs meetings, not only to himself but to the great dominion which he so ably represents.

I am not going to take much time to debate the different problems that confront us in respect to external affairs. I am not going to talk about the great problems confronting NATO, or the problems of the Near East and Middle East, great as they are, because they have already been discussed by members of the house who are much better qualified to do so than I am. I do not profess to be an expert or even an authority on external affairs, because it does seem to me that is a line of study that is available to very few people.

I do want to make some reference to the situation in the Far East and the recent change in policy made by President Eisenhower, which has caused a great deal of consternation throughout the world because of the fear that the government of the United States may take further action in this regard which, without bringing to an end the war in Korea, could easily develop into a third global war.

In referring to that, I should like to quote briefly from an editorial that appeared a few days ago in the Citizen which I felt summarized the matter very well. It reads:

> Reassuring statements in Washington have as yet only partially allayed British and west European alarm at President Eisenhower's decision to end the "neutralization" of Formosa. The disturbing fact is that unilateral action by the United States in the Far East cannot be kept separate from United Nations action in Korea. For Canada, with its American, commonwealth, and U.N. links, the situation is particularly difficult. But now is the time to take a stand, and in parliament on Wednesday the external affairs minister, Mr. Pearson, made plain that Canadian exertions in Korea are for no other cause than that of the United Nations.
> The complicating factor is United States foreign policy, which has been developed at the same time as the Americans have given the U.N. leadership in Korea. Regarding the Chinese communist victory as defeat for that policy, some Americans have continued to hope that the restoration of Chiang Kai-shek's regime, now on Formosa, might be engineered or assisted. So the Truman administration simultaneously rallied the U.N. to defend South Korea and sent a fleet to protect Formosa, lest the mainland Chinese should think the situation ripe for an attempt to conclude the civil war by an attack on Chiang Kai-shek.
> The United States alone preserved and built up Chiang's forces, while not preventing them from making minor raids on the mainland. It has now released them for any larger enterprises that may be considered feasible, and has promised increased aid. The theory is that China may be forced to come to terms in Korea. But this policy plays into the hands of those in the west who want the western nations to try to reverse the Chinese revolution, and indeed to achieve the effective restoration of their former power throughout most of Asia. It would be likely to consolidate communist Asia, Russian and Chinese, since anti-western feeling has contributed powerfully to communist success. It would alienate non-communist Asia, where suspicion of the west is still strong. The spread of fighting might result in a major war.
> Mr. Pearson has very likely foreseen all these dangers. He has reiterated the Canadian government's view that the concern of the United Nations is not to intervene in Chinese affairs, not to spread the hostilities, but only to protect South Korea. This position is likely to commend itself to parliament.

I was in New York early in December, and while not there as an official delegate of Canada I spent several days at the United Nations assembly and attended political committee meetings from time to time. When the Indian plan was presented as a means of ending the Korean conflict I hoped that this would be accepted by the Russian delegates and their satellite nations, who were the spokesmen for the Chinese and North Koreans on that occasion. Since this was an Asian plan and was promoted by a free state, it could not in any sense of the word be considered as an imperialist plot. I felt that it would surely be accepted. But after listening to the spokesman for the Russian delegation, Mr. Vishinsky, in his tirade against this plan, I knew that it would not be accepted.

The plan represented a compromise safeguarding the principle of non-forcible repatriation of war prisoners, while conceding to the Chinese the right to have representatives from two communistic countries on the screening committee. The rejection has made a negotiated peace much more difficult than ever to achieve, and has increased the danger of the Korean conflict spreading. Undoubtedly this change in policy by the United States was designed to relieve the pressure on the Korean front which could, in turn, convince the North Korean and Chinese communists that the stalemate in Korea could not continue much longer, and that peace would be much more desirable. This action on the part of President Eisenhower would seem to eliminate all the provisions of the Cairo agreement that was signed in 1943 by Churchill, Roosevelt and Chiang Kai-shek, the leader of the nationalist government.

Under the terms of that agreement, Formosa was to be returned to the Chinese republic after the cessation of hostilities. The situation is most difficult because the United States still recognizes the nationalist government that operates from Formosa as the government of China, yet Great Britain, whose government is still headed by the same man who signed the Cairo agreement, recognizes the new communist regime. The United States policy can only be interpreted as one that allows the nationalist government to carry on its operations against the mainland, and also assists it with arms, war munitions and material. At the same time the seventh fleet could be used to protect Formosa from any attack from the mainland of China. This could lead to a global or third world war which, if at all possible, we want to avoid.

On former occasions I have spoken in this house regarding the situation in China. I do not think it would serve any useful purpose to thresh old straw. I do not believe it would accomplish much to go over the merits or demerits of the former regime in China, because I believe they have been well established in the world at large. I do believe there are a few basic facts that should be pointed out. In reading Hansard of Friday night, I believe it was, I noticed that the member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), in speaking of the nationalist government of China, said they had the same ideas we have. This afternoon I was amazed to hear some members state that the late Franklin Roosevelt was a much overrated man. Personally I was a great admirer of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt. I recall the occasion upon which he visited this parliament, and one of the things that was a revelation to me was that a man who had such a physical handicap would carry on in the service of his country and make such contributions to his fellow men during his lifetime.

As I said, I was a great admirer of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt. One of the things that impressed me was the statement he issued regarding the four freedoms of our democracy, freedoms of which he was the champion and the director. The first of these was the freedom of speech and assembly. The second was the freedom of worship. I was in China for almost two and a half years, and I would say that freedom of worship was in evidence all over China. In Shanghai there were many, many churches. I remember that in the old French concession, in what we called the Zeg Wai district, the Catholic church had a very large organization. They had schools for boys and for girls; they had a nursery started. We went there many times because we, as a relief and rehabilitation organization, on many occasions had given them relief supplies in the nature of clothing and flour.

I visited the cathedral there. Next to Notre Dame cathedral in Montreal and one in New York, I think it was the greatest cathedral I was ever in. There was freedom of worship in all of the different communities throughout the city. They worshipped there as they cared to. In the community centre, which was part of the old American zone, the community church was there, and I used to attend the community church service. When there one Sunday—and I am sure my friend the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) would be interested in this—I heard the late ambassador to China, Leighton Stuart, make an extremely fine address. I think that was in July, 1947. Today the local temples are, I believe, still open for worship as they were on former occasions; but the missions and the churches that have been conducted by the people of foreign districts or of foreign lands do not enjoy the freedom of worship they had when I was there.

Of course this question about the nationalist government and its merits or demerits is something that was a political question in the United States. As a matter of fact, during the last presidential election the matter was discussed at some length and people took both sides, and did so rather heatedly. There were honest opinions expressed, I have no doubt, on both sides, and that was their right. But when we think about these names that have been prominent in China for so many years: T. V. Soong; Dr. T. F. Tsiang; Dr. H. H. Kung; K. C. Wu and General Claire Chennault, many of them recall old acquaintances that I had when I was in that Far East country. Mr. Wu was at that time mayor of the city of Shanghai. He did a good job. He is now the governor of Formosa. It is unfortunate that he was not there in the first place, because he probably could have avoided that most disastrous massacre of the people which was conducted by the former governor.

As to Major General Chennault, I met him on several occasions, and had the privilege and pleasure of meeting him one night and entertaining him in one of the hotel rooms. He was at that time the president of the civil air transport, CAT. He was doing quite a large commercial business there. They eventually amalgamated with another commercial air line, and they had almost a monopoly on the commercial air lines in China.

When the generalissimo took over the Chinese republic, the first president of the executive council and practically the premier was T. V. Soong. In 1928 he took over, and he held that position until 1933 when H. H. Kung replaced him. Both these men, by the way, were brothers-in-law of the president. He was kept in power until 1944, when Soong was again re-established as president and premier of the Chinese republic.

When I arrived in China in 1945 T. V. Soong was the president of the executive union and also the premier. We distributed a great many relief supplies to the Chinese people. T. V. Soong at that time was the man actually in charge. He tried, to some extent, to control the provisions that were sent over under the United Nations relief and rehabilitation program. I well remember that in 1946, when 550,000 bales of cotton were distributed in China in order to rehabilitate the industry and also to provide relief clothing, 75 per cent of that cotton was distributed among Chinese-owned mills which were actually T. V. Soong and company's mills; because they took over the former Japanese mills in Shanghai and operated them under the name of C.T.I.I. or China Textile Industries Incorporated. They made much of that cotton into uniforms for the armed services. Of course that was completely contrary to the terms of the contract that was made for the distribution of those supplies.

The director of the CNRRA organization which, after all, was under the control of T. V. Soong, was Dr. T. F. Tsiang. I have not my records here so that I can be exact, but during that period a protest was sent to Washington in order to stop the supplies coming into China until there was some clarification of where they were to go. These were held back for some time, but later they were released.

Most people now admit that any amount of aid sent to the Chinese nationalist forces when they were in power could not have saved them. Mr. Acheson said in a press release that from 1945 to 1951, I think it was, some $2 billion or more of aid was authorized to go to the Chinese republic. Those supplies positively, in many cases, were sold. Whole regiments that were equipped with United States equipment went over to the communists of that time, so that the supplies the United States shipped over at that time played as large if not a larger part in the overthrow of the nationalist government than did the supplies they received from Russia, though Russia unquestionably gave them supplies.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing some of the reasons why, in my opinion, we had lost China as an ally. As a matter of fact, during the first year of the Korean war much of the equipment captured by the allies from the North Koreans was of United States manufacture. It is generally agreed by those who look at this in a realistic way that the war in China could never have been won unless the United States had taken an active part in it and had complete control of all the supplies and equipment they sent in there from time to time.

The question is asked, is the situation much better today? Toward the latter part of 1949 Madame Chiang came to the United States. On January 8, 1950 she gave a farewell broadcast from New York, and I was fortunate enough to hear it. That night she was very critical of the position Great Britain had taken. She definitely intimated that the recognition of the communist government was of a mercenary nature; that that was what led Great Britain to recognize the new regime in China. She mentioned the fact that Great Britain had possession of Hong Kong and other places that meant so much to her. But she forgot to mention that many of the Asiatic countries had also recognized the new regime. She forgot to mention that many European countries such as Holland, Denmark, Switzerland and Sweden could hardly be regarded as communist countries, and they had recognized the new regime in China.

In 1950 I went to Lake Success; and when I went to the security council and saw the delegates there in their permanent seats I was actually surprised to find as China's permanent delegate my old friend Dr. T. F. Tsiang whom I knew so well in China and with whom I had quite a few differences in regard to the distribution of materials among the war-devastated and war-ravaged areas of China. According to our contract these supplies were to have been distributed without discrimination as to race, creed or political differences, but of course that is something they just did not do.

If China had been recognized at that time the question is often asked would the situation be any better, would the conditions be any better than they are now. That is a question no one can answer. It is futile even to prophesy as to what would have happened. But I will say this. I do not see how it could have been any worse, at any rate. By recognizing the government of China you would not be approving or disapproving the type of government they had. You would be only acknowledging a fact that already existed. You would be acknowledging that they had restored some order and that they had control of the situation, and that is all that would have been implied in recognition of the government.

I remember sitting in the delegates lounge during 1950 and talking to some of the United States delegates. They said: "Of course we would not recognize a gangster mob. That is something we will not do. How do you expect us to recognize a revolutionary gangster mob?" I remember exactly what they said. They said: "Why these people are in the Al Capone and Frank Costello class." I said: "I quite appreciate that, but don't forget that in 1917 the Russians had probably one of the cruelest revolutions of all time, in which they liquidated their rulers and took their property. It was one of the wickedest in all history; still you have recognized them for the last 17 years; you are in full diplomatic relations with them." The fact is, if you go back into history you will find that Chiang himself came into power in the same way. That was hardly a good enough reason for not recognizing China.

What is the situation today? When I was in New York in December I made some inquiries about my old friends whom I knew in China. They probably would not recognize me. As a matter of fact I never met Dr. Kung, but I did meet T. V. Soong. He was a very charming personality. I made inquiries about where they were and what they were doing. I was told that they were settled down in New York. They are pretty well established there. As a matter of fact they are very wealthy. They told me too that Madame Chiang was still there, although I have no proof for that statement. The two brothers-in-law of Chiang, T. V. Soong and Dr. Kung, have become very wealthy, because for a long time they were not only premier and minister of finance of the country, which is a great combination, but they did have a tremendous amount of money. They are conducting and directing one of the most powerful lobbies that has ever taken place in the United States not only in Washington but at the United Nations as well.

I hold in my hand a magazine that is published in New York called the Reporter. This magazine can be obtained in the reading room. In the issues of April 15, 1952 and April 29, 1952 you will find described the most powerful lobby that has taken place in many, many years. They know that the old regime cannot possibly be reinstated in the Chinese homeland unless there is all-out revolution, unless there is a war. That is the only hope they have of being reinstated in their former status. I noticed that in the political committee, when the final vote came on the Indian proposal for peace in Korea, the Chinese delegate abstained from voting.

There are very few of us who fully appreciate that communism in some of these underprivileged and backward countries has a much greater appeal than it has to the people of Canada. I venture to say there is no one in this chamber this evening who knows very much about the pangs of hunger, who knows the devastating effects that hunger and want and privation have on a people. But those people know. And of course communism has a great appeal to them because it promises them a better way of life. It promises to free them from their economic chains. It promises to give them a better standard of living. Naturally, with nothing to lose, they take a chance on it. They do not appreciate that the first objective of communist doctrine is for the state to get complete control of the individual. The second objective is to obtain complete domination over all the people.

In the final analysis the object of communism is world power, bringing with it concentration camps and slave labour. That is something these underprivileged people have not yet realized. Has that stage yet arrived in China? I do not think so, and I believe that with the help of the United Nations that old land may possibly be reinstated.

So in conclusion I ask this question. Do the peoples of the free world want to win China from Russian domination? The answer obviously is yes, that it must be done. Surely we can find some champion of our way of life, our Christian democracy, among the Chinese people, without trying to reinstate the old regime which, in my opinion, will never bring about that condition. Because, eventually, China will break from Russia.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part in the debate tonight to support what has been said by hon. members of this group who have already spoken. We are interested chiefly in the situation in Korea, in doing everything possible to prevent an extension of the war and in doing everything possible toward bringing it to a speedy end.

I believe the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) made an excellent contribution to the debate when, among other things, he pointed out what Canada could do by way of economic assistance to Asian countries in order to promote good will and democratic principles in those areas.

I was not able to be in the house on the days the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made his survey of international affairs. However, I read his speeches on both days and, in the main, I believe I can agree with what he said. I felt, however, when reading his speeches, that he should have taken a firmer stand in regard to the Eisenhower instruction to remove the seventh fleet shield from the Chinese mainland.

I gained the impression from reading the minister's speech that he was sitting on the fence, but leaning toward the position taken later by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We in this group certainly view with alarm the recent order by President Eisenhower in regard to the seventh fleet. Not only do we feel that it was a mistake but, in common with other members in the house, we have seen statements by other prominent Americans suggesting such things as a naval blockade of the Chinese mainland, air and naval support for Chiang Kai-shek, and the use of new weapons. We are fearful lest this first action by President Eisenhower be followed by actions of the kind I have just mentioned that might, in fact, extend the war to the point where we would be definitely involved in a war on the Asian continent.

We are certainly opposed to any such further steps as might lead to that terrible result. We feel President Eisenhower's order was a mistake, not only because we do not agree with it but because, as we understand it, it was arrived at after very little consultation with the other members of the United Nations involved in the current police action.

I do not think the United States can support United Nations action in Korea and say, on the one hand, that it is the action of the United Nations, and on the other hand feel free in some other way to take unilateral action connected with the Korean conflict. Either the action in Korea is a United Nations action or it is not; and so long as it is a United Nations action we feel that any decision should be taken only after consultation among the nations involved and after general agreement has been achieved.

In the United Kingdom, for example, both the Labour party and the Conservative government are opposed to the recent United States action. I see in a Canadian Press dispatch from London appearing in the Regina Leader-Post of February 3, the following:

> Foreign Secretary Eden said Tuesday Britain feels the United States decision on Formosa will have "unfortunate political repercussions without compensating military advantages".

I have seen press reports of the debate that took place at Westminster. Certainly the Labour party is opposed to the Eisenhower directive and feels that it is fraught with the greatest danger. It has been suggested by prominent people in the United States that there should be a blockade of the Chinese mainland. When the blockade was being discussed in the United Kingdom parliament Mr. Herbert Morrison asked a number of questions of Mr. Eden. He asked what the United Kingdom government would do if Chiang Kai-shek, in a blockade he might undertake, interfered with British ships. And he asked this question:

> Supposing forces of Chiang Kai-shek conducted a blockade against the Chinese mainland and interfered with British merchant shipping peacefully going about its business? I would like to ask the foreign secretary to inform us what Her Majesty's government would do. What does the Royal Navy do?

And again:

> Replying to that part of the speech, Eden later said "Her Majesty's ships on their lawful occasion would always be protected—that is the duty of any government of this country."

We sincerely hope that such protection by the United Kingdom of British merchant ships will not be necessary, but the discussion in the British House of Commons demonstrates how serious is the United States action and the great danger that is involved.

I think it is important for us in the western world to cultivate the friendship of non-communist Asian countries such as India and Pakistan. I think it is particularly important that we co-operate with India, and any action by the western world that is opposed by India should be taken only after the most serious consideration. Here we have United States unilateral action which is opposed by the government of India. The Montreal Gazette of February 12 contained a dispatch from New Delhi, as follows:

> The Indian government views with "grave concern" the recent developments in the Far East following the United States government's withdrawal of the seventh fleet, President Rajendra Prasad said today in an address to a joint session of parliament.

And the concluding sentence in the dispatch reads:

> The address made it clear that Prime Minister Nehru's government totally disapproved of Washington's decision.

I think we are all anxious to have the war in Korea settled. I think we are all anxious that it should not be extended, and I think we should give more regard to the views of the governments of India and the other Asian nations in the free world.

I listened to the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie). Because of his experience he is better qualified than I to comment on the Chiang Kai-shek regime, either as it existed on the Chinese mainland or as it presently exists on Formosa. I noticed that he referred to the China lobby in Washington and the people associated with it as the same old crowd. He went on to say that Chiang Kai-shek and the same old crowd could not be reinstated as the government of China without an all-out global war. That is certainly my view. I feel that anything done to reinstate Chiang Kai-shek in China is not only impractical and probably impossible, but would mean the loss of support and good will among other Asian countries.

I have referred to statements by United States leaders. I should like to quote from a special dispatch to the New York Times, dated Washington, February 8, from Clayton Knowles as follows:

Senator Robert A. Taft of Ohio, Republican leader of the Senate, added fuel today to the major foreign policy debate, now shaping up in Congress, by declaring that the United States already was "at full war" with communist China.

For this reason, he asserted, neither the bombing of Manchurian supply bases north of Korea nor a blockade of the China mainland could be expected to extend the war.

He said he thought a blockade was "desirable" if it could be worked out "without too great international complications with our allies."

There it is. Senator Taft, the Republican leader in the United States Senate, is advocating a blockade of the Chinese mainland and saying that the United States is already at full war with communist China. There is another dispatch in the New York Times of February 8 as follows:

Senator William F. Knowland of California, chairman of the Senate Republican policy committee, said today the United States, alone if necessary, should blockade communist China to increase allied pressure for Korean peace.

And again:

"We should have the co-operation of the British and French in a blockade," Senator Knowland said.

And again:

But if such co-operation is not forthcoming I think we could carry on a unilateral blockade.

I listened to a radio news report last night which said that Senator Knowland had just been on a television broadcast and had reiterated his demand for a blockade of the China coast. We in the C.C.F. are opposed to such blockade because we are afraid it would lead to an extension of the war; we feel that it is impracticable unless shipping could be prevented from reaching the Russian port of Vladivostok because unless that were done commodities would still arrive on the Chinese mainland. Moreover, any such unilateral action by the United States would be disastrous to United Nations action in Korea and would involve us in a global war.

The statement of the minister of external affairs in regard to this matter was certainly very mild, and perhaps because of that we find the following report in the Ottawa Citizen of February 11, in a Reuters news agency item headed "Rely on Canada for Realism" and reading:

The Washington Post says today the United States can usually rely on Canada for realism in foreign affairs as well as plain speaking when the occasion demands it.

It is significant that President Eisenhower's state of the union message, particularly the passage on Formosa, aroused in Canada little of the uneasiness reported from parts of Europe, it adds in a leading article.

[Mr. Argue.]

I think it would have been much better if the minister of external affairs had taken a stronger stand which could not be interpreted in Washington as indicating that Canada, which is said to usually take a realistic stand, is not greatly alarmed at the action taken. I have noticed other references by the minister of external affairs in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway, and I have heard him speak in regard to United States trade barriers. I congratulate the minister upon the statement he made in reference to the St. Lawrence seaway. Certainly he was telling the United States in firm language that Canada wanted the St. Lawrence seaway and did not want any further stalling on that project. For example, he said:

There is one matter, however, in which our American friends have not been able to co-operate with us at the pace we feel the requirements of the situation demand.

And again:

We hope that it will be soon, and we are disappointed that that decision has not already been reached.

And again:

It has been made clear, however, that the discussion of any new proposal for sharing this task must not delay any longer the whole project.

Other members of the government, such as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), have made strong statements from time to time in regard to the desirability of the United States reducing trade barriers. The government are prepared to talk up to the United States when it comes to the St. Lawrence seaway development and international trade, and for that I compliment them. In his speech the other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke with the voice of a lion when dealing with the subject of the St. Lawrence seaway, but when he came to refer to the action that had been taken in connection with Formosa I am afraid that he spoke with the voice of a lamb.

We would like to see him take just as firm a stand with regard to the Formosa action as he has taken with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway. I feel that it is not so easy for the nations in Europe to talk to the United States in the same kind of firm language that Canada could use because these countries have depended, and depend today, on economic assistance from the United States. They are still suffering from the ravages of the recent war, and therefore they need United States economic help.

We in Canada are living in a wealthy country. We do not need to seek economic assistance from the United States. It is true that we are dependent on American good will to a large extent so far as economic and trade matters are concerned, but the same thing can be said about the United States in relation to Canada. The United States is dependent on Canada for a great many natural products for its own prosperity and well-being. Because Canada is less dependent in its relationship to the United States from an economic standpoint, I think Canada is in the best position of any nation in the world to make her views clear to that country. We are of course a member of the commonwealth; since other members of the commonwealth disagree with the United States policy, and since we are a North American nation, I think we are in a particularly good position to help present their viewpoint to the government of the United States.

I understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in Washington over the week end. I have no doubt that he will be reporting to parliament on his discussions, perhaps this evening. He shakes his head to the contrary. I hope that in his discussions in the United States he has made the Canadian position perfectly clear, and I hope that it is a firmer position but along the lines referred to in the statement he made to the house. If his reception in Washington has not been entirely satisfactory, then I think he should consider one further step. The Prime Minister of Great Britain made a trip to Washington earlier this year to present his views to the President of the United States and exchange views with him. According to an article in the Christian Science Monitor, Mr. Anthony Eden will make a trip to Washington soon, as will Premier Mayer of France.

In order to underline the Canadian position, which I understand is that nothing should be done that might extend the conflict in Korea to other areas, and in order to make that position abundantly clear to the United States, the Secretary of State for External Affairs might recommend to the Prime Minister that he go to Washington to interview President Eisenhower, perhaps Senator Taft, certainly Mr. Dulles, and other congressional spokesmen in the hope that further unilateral action by the United States which may extend the conflict will not be embarked upon. I believe that such a trip by the Prime Minister would constitute a mission of peace. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs was not completely satisfied with the conversations he had—I hope he was—then the Prime Minister might consider such a visit because unless such action is taken now, some time later it may be too late.

I believe the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) emphasized very well this afternoon the need for economic assistance to underdeveloped countries. I believe that if we are going to win friends for democracy, if we are going to win friends for the west, we should increase our economic and technical assistance to backward nations. I was really amazed at the figures the hon. member placed on the record, which if I remember correctly, indicated that since 1949 Canada's per capita contribution by way of economic aid and technical assistance has only been some $3.69 per capita, whereas the United States per capita contribution for the same purpose within the same period has been over $100. Canadians are a generous people. I believe they are willing to send surplus agricultural commodities and additional quantities of other goods from Canada. I believe they are willing that parliament should vote additional moneys for technical assistance in order to help those underdeveloped countries that are in a much less fortunate position than Canada. By so doing we would not only strengthen democratic institutions but we would be following good, sound, Christian principles.

From time to time I have read, as other members no doubt have, of the poverty, privation, distress, malnutrition, yes, starvation, rampant in Korea today. I believe we have a special obligation to assist the people of Korea. If they are short of food; if for example their children need larger quantities of milk, as I am sure they must, then certainly Canada is well able to provide the people of Korea with large quantities of foods that are now in surplus supply in this country. We have such a surplus of meat products and such a surplus of grain that farmers do not know how long the market can carry these commodities even at present prices, many of which are depressed. We have a surplus of 100 million pounds of meat that the government is holding. I think that provides us with a real opportunity to make available meat and grain to help prevent starvation and malnutrition in Korea. And the same applies to powdered milk.

As I have already said, we hope that no further steps will be taken that will lead to an extension of the war in Korea and that in the end might lead to an all-out war. I am particularly fearful that a unilateral blockade of China by the United States would be a step leading to all-out war. I would object to Canada's involvement in such a war, and the taking of Canadian youths from their normal peacetime occupations to be thrown into a conflagration on the continent of Asia.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I was not absolutely certain, Mr. Speaker, that I wanted to take part in this debate, although I have not been totally unprepared, until I heard speeches such as that delivered by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) earlier today and the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). If I had any doubts as to whether or not I should take part in this debate, those speeches resolved my doubts.

The doubts I had are those which any amateur must feel when he ventures, for not quite the first time but almost the first time, into a professional league. I have been watching the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) during the course of some of the speeches delivered in the last part of the debate, and I observed that the minister appears to feel somewhat uncomfortable. I could not help observing that. Probably the minister and I feel equally uncomfortable, but for completely opposite reasons.

I imagine the minister feels uncomfortable because he regrets that he was not more outspoken. He probably regrets that he minced so daintily around the field of foreign affairs, and refrained from enunciating more clearly just what is Canada's policy. I feel uncomfortable because I realize that if I were to make a definite statement, then I probably would be attacked as vigorously and from as many different quarters as the minister is now being attacked because he refrained from making a definite statement.

There are, Mr. Speaker, certain things which should be said. I go back in my mind to what the hon. member for Melfort said at the beginning of what was otherwise a fairly good speech. I think it is a shame if we are going to have to interrupt what appears to have been a modus vivendi established between ourselves and the members of the C.C.F. party by taking somewhat sharp issue with them in this field of foreign affairs. I feel that my friends of the C.C.F. party will have the same respect for my views if I feel compelled to express them as I have for theirs, and realize that it is an honest difference of opinion that moves us to say what we have to say in the course of this debate.

Mr. MacInnis: We did not call you yapping dogs as yet, did we?

Mr. Fulton: I have not heard that expression used in the house.

Mr. MacInnis: Look up the speech of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson).

Mr. Fulton: I was not in the house when the expression was used that appears to have somewhat disturbed my friends in the C.C.F. party. If it was used, I can only ask them to put it down to the heat of debate.

Mr. MacInnis: We seem to have disturbed you.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) may be disturbed, but I am equally disturbed by some of the things he has said in the course of this and preceding debates. I do not want to be bitter or to suggest that there has been disloyalty or anything of that kind. I want to discuss this thing on the basis of reality and common sense.

The hon. member for Melfort referred this afternoon to statements which have been made by members of this party in the course of this debate, and said that if Sir Robert Borden had been alive today he would have been disturbed to see the Conservative party apparently following—what he suggested, but what is not a fact—with slavish adulation the policy of President Eisenhower, the new president of the United States. Let me suggest to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party that what we are doing is not following this, that or the other lead from any foreign government, but we are trying to adopt a sane and sensible foreign policy which, if I may suggest to my hon. friends, will not be subject to the same vacillations as theirs.

We are not disturbed if we find that the governments of other countries, changing as they may do from time to time, adopt foreign policies which from time to time differ from that which we think should be the foreign policy of this country. If my hon. friend complains because for the time being there appears to be some difference between ourselves and some expressions used by the government of the United Kingdom in the approach to this problem of foreign policy with respect to the Asiatic sphere—well, I leave him to be concerned about that. I shall ask him, however, if in analysing the situation and accusing us of a shift in policy he would be kind enough to explain to us the complete shift in foreign policy which his own party has made with respect particularly to this Formosan situation.

I recall so vividly, Mr. Speaker, that in 1950, when President Truman announced his policy of controlling Formosa, there were no more bitter critics of that policy than my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party. Today, when President Eisenhower announced his decision to lift the ban, to take off the quarantine on Formosa, there are no more bitter critics of President Eisenhower's policy than my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. MacInnis: He only half lifted it.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Vancouver East objects because he says the quarantine has been only half removed. Imagine how much bitterer his criticism would have been if it had been totally removed.

Mr. MacInnis: Not at all.

Mr. Fulton: What does my hon. friend want?

Mr. MacInnis: I do not want to get involved in a Chinese civil war.

Mr. Fulton: You say you do not want to get involved in a Chinese civil war, and none of us does. What we are discussing here is a shift or what is alleged to be a shift in foreign policy. I am pointing out that when President Truman quarantined Formosa there were no more bitter critics of that policy than my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party. Now President Eisenhower has half lifted that quarantine—I use their own words—and they suggest President Eisenhower is deliberately involving us in the Chinese civil war. When President Truman applied the quarantine their great fear was that this might somehow or other involve us in a Chinese civil war, so I do not know what my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party want. They criticize us for what they allege to be the subservient following of the foreign policy of some other government when we try to pursue a consistent course and suggest that what is being done today by President Eisenhower is not such a great change after all, and that we should not allow ourselves, as they appear to be allowing themselves, to be influenced by a personal dislike of the present regime in the United States. They seem to be influenced by that personal dislike into criticizing a quite logical development in foreign policy.

Mr. MacInnis: You should not attribute motives.

Mr. Knowles: Churchill takes the same position.

Mr. Fulton: If I have attributed motives, then I apologize for doing so. Let me content myself with saying that we should not criticize the present policy of the United States government simply because it happens to be the policy of President Eisenhower and not that of President Truman.

A little earlier I said that the Secretary of State for External Affairs seems to be somewhat uncomfortable as a result of the criticism or speeches which have been made by members of the C.C.F. party who have spoken latterly in this debate.

Mr. Pearson: I am perfectly comfortable.

Mr. Fulton: Then the minister should develop more of a poker face.

Mr. Bradley: Or the hon. member should get a pair of glasses.

Mr. Pearson: I am just exhausted.

Mr. Fulton: I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the minister skated carefully around this subject of Formosa as dealt with by President Eisenhower in his recent state of the union message to Congress, but he contrived to leave the impression that the Canadian government was not too happy about that policy. I am therefore afraid that we must associate him to some extent with the spokesmen for the C.C.F. party who have also criticized President Eisenhower's policy.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has to be right once in a while.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; he has to be right once in a while. But I suggest that he has not been right yet. When this subject was discussed in the house in 1950 and the quarantine of Formosa was applied by President Truman, I recall that the minister expressed himself carefully but in terms which certainly implied that he was not happy about that policy. As reported at page 96 of Hansard of August 31, 1950 starting at page 95, he stated as follows:

> We have, however, been disturbed, as I have no doubt others have been disturbed, by reports of preventive military measures taken by the nationalist government of China against communist concentrations along the mainland coast, as well as by statements reported to have been made by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek concerning United States-Chinese "military co-operation". We have also been disturbed by statements that seem in our minds to confuse the defence of Korea, which has been assumed by the United Nations, with the defence of Formosa, which has not;—

Mr. Pearson: I said that the other night.

Mr. Fulton: To continue:

> —statements that have even implied—somewhat mistakenly I think—that those who wish to draw at this time a distinction between the two operations are defeatists and appeasers. So far as this government is concerned, we are concerned solely with carrying out our United Nations obligations in Korea or elsewhere. These obligations do not, as I understand them at the present time, include anything that can be interpreted as the restoration of the nationalist Chinese government to the mainland of China, or an intervention in Formosa.

With that statement we perhaps could not find too much to disagree. But it is significant, Mr. Speaker, that that statement was made after President Truman had announced his policy of quarantining Formosa. Then President Eisenhower announced his policy of dequarantining Formosa, and we find the Secretary of State for External Affairs making almost the same statement as he made on the previous occasions. He finds fault with both policies. Neither of them suits him. But he does not tell us exactly what it is that he would have this government do, or rather what policy it is that he would have this country follow with respect to that matter.

When you read the debates, Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that at that time, in 1950, the minister's statement was taken as being quite substantially critical of the policy adopted at the moment by the President of the United States; I refer to the policy of quarantining Formosa. In support of that contention I cite statements of members of the C.C.F. as well as statements of members of his own party. For instance, starting at page 173 of Hansard for the same session, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) delivered himself of a speech, in which he strongly criticized the Chiang Kai-shek government and suggested that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was quite right in criticizing the policy then followed by the President of the United States. At page 229 of Hansard the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had much the same thing to say. At page 125 the leader of the C.C.F. party aligned himself fully with what the Secretary of State for External Affairs had said. These were his words:

> May I say before I take my seat how pleased I was yesterday when the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in discussing the Korean situation, made it abundantly clear that Canada was participating in the United Nations action in Korea, and that we were in no way involved in the Formosan situation. I said some time ago, and I now repeat, that the only thing to do—and it should have been done long ago—is to say to Chiang Kai-shek, "Get out of Formosa and stay out of Formosa", so as ultimately to give the Formosan people an opportunity to choose their own form of government—because they were once a free and independent people, and not so many decades ago at that.

He then went on to say:

> I cannot go into that phase of the matter further except to say that the minister has the support at least of this group in the house in the attitude he has expressed from time to time in connection with Formosa, and the difficulties that have arisen in connection with it.

Some of the difficulties which the leader of the C.C.F. party was discussing were difficulties created by the announcement of President Truman with respect to Formosa; and it is difficulties with respect to the same situation which now cause the hon. gentleman to denounce the policy being followed by the United States in dequarantining Formosa. Yet the basis of their other criticism was that the quarantine of Formosa would involve us somehow in the Chinese civil war.

That was a position which, by inference if not by direct statement, was taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that at no time during the course of the debate in 1950 did he dissociate himself from the interpretation placed upon his position by the C.C.F. party. I therefore must assume that the hon. gentleman's position in 1950 was the same as the position expressed by the C.C.F. party at that time. Hence we find that today, in 1953, when Formosa is dequarantined, the Secretary of State for External Affairs expresses himself as being concerned—although not dotting the "i's" or crossing the "t's" as to the extent of his concern—over the possible implications of the President's policy.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: What did he mean by "dequarantine"?

Mr. Fulton: I should think that was reasonably obvious, Mr. Speaker. When you apply a quarantine, you post a notice and say that no one will be allowed to come into this house. When you dequarantine, you take down the notice and say that this house is no longer subject to quarantine.

Mr. Pearson: The notice has not been taken down.

Mr. Fulton: The minister says the notice has not been taken down. I do not know what interpretation he places upon the President's message to the Congress of the United States. Perhaps he will be good enough to explain to us when he closes the debate—as I presume he will—just what interpretation he places on it.

At any rate, whatever interpretation he places on it, the fact is that the message has given him cause for some concern; and I should be greatly interested to know whether or not the cause for concern which it gives him is the same cause for concern, and the same inconsistent cause for concern, as it gives to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party, namely that somehow or other, by some strange transmutation of all the processes of international relations, the very opposite of the act which was alleged in 1950 would involve us in the Chinese civil war, in 1953 is going to have the same result.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has involved himself in other difficulties in connection with this matter. They are difficulties perhaps of a minor nature; nevertheless they are significant when highlighted against the background of the whole government policy.

These difficulties that are referred to at the moment are in connection with the interpretation we place upon the seriousness of this whole war in Korea. I do not want to be overly captious, although the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) accused me of that fault at an earlier stage of this debate, particularly in respect to my criticisms of the government. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to adopt a tone which is offensive, because we have been told that if our tone is not exactly suited to the sensitive ears of the government, then they may not care to sit here and listen to us. Therefore if my tone is offensive I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs and others of his colleagues in the cabinet will let me know, and I shall attempt to modulate the tone to their delicate sensibilities.

What I have in mind is that the other night the Secretary of State for External Affairs objected to a criticism which I advanced against the use of the words "police action" to describe the present war in Korea. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, placing a reliance upon a magazine which, as he himself pointed out, is better known for its humorous qualities than for its biblical authority in the field of international affairs, proceeded to quote from the New Yorker. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs had quoted from the New York Times, which we have always been given to understand is the authorized version of the bible in so far as the formulation of government policy on foreign affairs is concerned, I would have been more impressed, but he chose to quote from the New Yorker in justification of his description of the action in Korea as a police action.

I was interested this afternoon when the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Rooney) addressed a question to the government as to whether or not we are at war. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), giving a very cautious answer, said in the course of his reply that the question might better have been directed either to the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When he said that I could not help but think that he should have said the question should have been directed both to the Prime Minister and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because undoubtedly he would have obtained a different answer from each of the hon. gentlemen.

Although the fact is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs saw fit to disagree with me and criticize me for having taken exception to the description of the war in Korea as a police action, the Prime Minister leaves no doubt that in his opinion that in which we are engaged in Korea is a war. The Secretary of State for External Affairs prefers to describe it in 1953 as a police action; but I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that when he spoke in this house not very long ago the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 1524 of Hansard:

> We do agree that if war were not being waged in Korea, a war which might have serious consequences for the free world at large, young Canadians would not be voluntarily offering up their services and risking their lives for something of the character of an ordinary police action.

I wonder which the Secretary of State for External Affairs is going to take as his authority, the Prime Minister or the New Yorker magazine. On humorous subjects I would be willing to agree with him that the New Yorker might speak with a voice of greater authority, but I should think that in this house a colleague in the cabinet would prefer to accept the authoritative pronouncement of the Prime Minister. But of course if the Secretary of State for External Affairs is implying that the statements of the Prime Minister are humorous in their nature, even dealing with a serious subject of this sort, well, who am I to quarrel with him? I do hope the hon. gentleman will reconcile not only the very marked difference of interpretation between himself and the Prime Minister in these two speeches, but will also reconcile for us the difference in his attitude in 1953 from what he said when he dealt with this subject in 1950.

I might point out to the hon. gentleman and to the hon. gentleman who is sitting with him at the moment, and who I presume is equally interested in this debate, that in 1950 when he dealt with this subject the Secretary of State for External Affairs on no fewer than four occasions referred to what was going on in Korea as a war, and on two occasions as a military challenge and on another occasion as the conflict in Korea. I do not recall that at any time on that occasion he described it as a police action. Here is what he said as reported on page 91 of Hansard of August 31, 1950. After having described the developments which led up to the outbreak of war in Korea he said:

> This is the perspective in which we must view the war in Korea today, though I do not for a moment suggest that these considerations should lessen our anxiety over those events or block our response to them. In Korea, together with the other countries of the free world, we are now faced with a plain and unmistakable military challenge; and we, in common with all the free world, must answer that challenge.

Then further down on the same page he said:

> It was possible in Korea, as it has been possible elsewhere, for the war to be fought by satellites, by Asian troops alone. Therefore, when the United Nations intervened, the war could be misrepresented, as it has been misrepresented, as one of Asian popular forces against those of western imperialist capitalism.

On page 94 the Secretary of State for External Affairs had this to say in referring to the Canadian brigade which was being sent to Korea to take part in a war, not a police action:

> This special force is unique in one way among the offers of military forces which have been made to the United Nations as the result of the war in Korea—

Well now, Mr. Speaker, viewed in the light of the last situation with which we are confronted it is perhaps a fairly small matter as to whether we describe it as a war or a police action; except that I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the consequences of this situation which has resulted in a war in Korea are too grave for us to take casually and in the mincing attitude the Secretary of State for External Affairs has adopted toward them.

After all, the President of the United States has said certain things with regard to United States policy with respect to the communist threat confronting the world today. I think it is truthful to say he indicated that he intends, in so far as his government is concerned, to adopt a certain policy with respect to that question, a policy which reverses the position in which his government has found itself in the past, as he says, of always having to come from behind and deal with a situation provoked by the communists, instead of trying to take the initiative, always within the limit of peaceful means, and within the limits of peaceful means trying instead to keep the communists guessing.

It seems to me, when our troops are engaged in war in Korea, I say as the Prime Minister said a few days ago:

> We do agree that if war were not being waged in Korea, a war which might have serious consequences for the free world at large, young Canadians would not be voluntarily offering up their services and risking their lives for something of the character of an ordinary police action.

I say when we are faced with that situation it is high time for us to stop fiddling around and saying, on the one hand, that what President Truman did in 1950 might have involved us in civil war in China, and then saying that fatal action has been taken by the President of the United States in 1953 that might well involve us in civil war in China.

It is time we stopped fiddling about and wearying—well, I will not say wearying of the foreign policies of other countries, because obviously we have to be concerned with their foreign policies—but it is time we stopped trying to criticize the foreign policies of other countries in order to make political advantage for ourselves here at home. It is time we adopted a policy consistent with our traditional position as a member of the commonwealth.

Goodness knows, from time to time we may find ourselves having differences of opinion with other nations in the commonwealth, but let us not be dismayed when that happens. That simply means that we just have to sit down around a table, as this government has done all too seldom, and iron out those differences. We just have to try to find a common denominator in commonwealth foreign policy, and reconcile that foreign policy with the foreign policy of the United States, always recognizing honest differences but not carping at them simply because they happen to have changed their president.

Let us go forward so that, within the framework of the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization we may have a foreign policy which will prevent our always being on the defence in the cold war. I say again, within the limits of peaceful means at our disposal let us make certain that, for a change, the communists are kept guessing in this cold war instead of, in the company of our allies and our friends, always having to come from behind, with no preconceived idea of what we must do to prevent a further extension of communist success in this sphere.

I have said it is not easy for the inexpert to venture in where the experts themselves are somewhat at a loss. But I said at the outset that I hope my hon. friends, particularly those in the C.C.F., would not take it amiss if I appear to differ somewhat sharply from their views.

Mr. Knowles: We do not object to that; but we do wish you would state your own views.

Mr. Fulton: I have stated them. I have just said that I believe Canada, in concert with other nations of the commonwealth and, in so far as it is possible, with the United States of America, should adopt a foreign policy which would carry not the hot war but the cold war to the communists, and keep them guessing for a change. Let us do that, instead of always having the reverse situation, in which the communists have been carrying the cold war to us and keeping us guessing.

If that statement is not sufficiently definite for my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I hope he will elaborate upon his views so I may have the benefit of knowing just where he stands, and of understanding that the views expressed in this debate by his party are not formulated solely and simply because there has been a change in the presidency of that great nation to the south of us, the United States of America.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I believe the remarks I shall make in this foreign affairs debate will be unique in that they will be the briefest. My only reason for rising is to make it perfectly clear that there are two things in respect of which the people in the Fraser valley stand united. First, we hate war; second, we believe the United Nations is the best hope we have to prevent war.

I am sorry my hon. friends of the Social Credit party apparently do not agree with me in either case. We have had a small influx of their numbers into our province, and I want to impress upon them that, possibly because from personal experience we have a deep appreciation of war and because we hate war, we want to prevent it; and we think the best way of preventing it is through the United Nations.

We in the Fraser valley have not forgotten Great Britain and her allies who are facing a most difficult time. We have not forgotten men like the late President Roosevelt who, under lend-lease, saw to it that we got the destroyers when we needed them most. We have not forgotten that. And as Canadians in the Fraser valley we always regarded President Roosevelt as the greatest friend Canada ever had.

Nor have we forgotten President Truman, and the manner in which he co-operated with us. Let us not forget that long before his country was at war, President Roosevelt was standing behind us and behind Great Britain. The policy of the Social Credit party is that set out at page 1881 of Hansard, where their leader said:

—the past two presidents—

And we do not forget that this would include Mr. Winston Churchill, too.

—of the United States have been the great betrayers of humanity.

We cannot understand a party, through its leader, enunciating a policy like that, which attacks men like Roosevelt and Truman after all they have done, and describes them as the great betrayers of humanity.

As I have said, we in the Fraser valley, and I believe the people throughout British Columbia, believe that our great hope to prevent future wars lies in the United Nations. But the second lieutenant of the Social Credit party—or perhaps he is the corporal—said, at page 1938 of Hansard:

The fact of the matter is that this United Nations is largely a socialist-communist organization.

Well, I think that is an insult to the people of Canada and the people of the whole free world. It is an insult when any man tells me that our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is a socialist or a communist, or that the representatives from Great Britain are socialists or communists. There have been suggested changes in the rules of the house. I would hope they might be modified so that I would be permitted to answer in language that should be used.

I said I would be brief, and I shall be. In the Fraser valley we do not want war, and we believe that the best way to prevent it is by supporting, not attacking, the United Nations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: When the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. Pearson: This has been a most interesting debate. A good many points have arisen during it, with some of which at least I am sure the house will expect me to deal. Before doing so, however, I should like sincerely to thank hon. members who were good enough to congratulate me during the course of the debate upon my election to the presidency of the United Nations general assembly. I shall be going back there in a day or two; and during the course of the resumed session I know that I shall listen once again to a great many very long speeches, with all of which I shall certainly not agree. While I am in the chair I shall have the opportunity to speculate, speculation which would certainly be out of place in this house, as to which is the more important, freedom of speech or freedom from speeches.

I should like to follow the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in what I must confess I considered to be his somewhat tortuous reasoning as to the difference between police action and war, and also in his attempt, which so far as I was concerned was not successful—possibly because I was not very bright—to decide when a quarantine is put on and when it is taken off. I suggest to him that if he studies the terms of President Truman's quarantine in 1950 and the terms of President Eisenhower's statement the other day he will realize that only half the quarantine has been lifted. When a quarantine is lifted so that people can leave the quarantined house but nobody can enter, that is not dequarantining as I understand it.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister say—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: You made your speech.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister say whether he agrees with the President's policy, or does he think that President Eisenhower should have gone further?

Mr. Pearson: I will deal with that in a minute if the hon. gentleman will be just half as patient with me as I tried to be with him. One subject came up in the debate which I think was unfortunate, and this was dealt with by other speakers. I refer to the statement made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and to certain observations made this afternoon by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). So far as the reputation of and the verdict on President Roosevelt and President Truman are concerned, I think we can leave that to history. When all the facts are known and the judgment is written I feel quite certain that the verdict will not be that which has been suggested in this house—that he should be considered as being a betrayer of humanity. President Roosevelt was one of the great defenders of humanity. I also like to think that when history is written it will find a more adequate source of material than the memoirs of Mr. Elliott Roosevelt.

I am sure that Mr. Winston Churchill will be most interested in the observations of the hon. member for Macleod this afternoon that at the conferences which were attended by him and President Roosevelt, the latter spent most of his time making Mr. Churchill squirm. Mr. Churchill does not squirm easily.

In the article to which so much attention has been directed in this debate and which was written by the hon. member for Macleod —I think he has authenticated the article— he indicated that he was turning the searchlight on truth on certain things. Therefore he must naturally expect to be judged pretty critically when he himself states that he is turning that searchlight on the United Nations. He also said during the course of his statement that if there were demonstrated inaccuracies in that article he would withdraw them, but not until they were demonstrated to be inaccurate. That is a fair observation on his part.

I shall just point out to him without any further explanation one inaccuracy which has been pointed out in the last few minutes. In that article he described the United Nations as being largely a socialist-communist organization. I am taking just a few of his statements at random. He also said that Mr. Alger Hiss was the executive secretary of the Bretton Woods conference. Third, he said in that article that Mr. Hiss's advisers—Mr. Hiss was a middle-ranking civil servant at that time—were Henry Morgenthau, Jr., the secretary of the treasury; Mr. James P. Warburg, Mr. Eugene Meyer, and a man with a Scotch name, Mr. John J. McCloy, who he said sat under the teaching of the marxist Felix Frankfurter of Harvard Law School, Felix Frankfurter being a very distinguished justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. I would hope that at an appropriate opportunity the hon. member for Macleod will admit that some of those statements are demonstrably inaccurate.

My own contribution to this debate up to the present has been governed, as I meant it to be governed, by the fact that I speak with the responsibility of a member of the government charged with external affairs. When I am criticized, as I was criticized this evening by the hon. member for Kamloops, for my casual and mincing attitude toward this matter, I realize that I do not speak with his freedom from official responsibility. It has also been suggested by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon)—I am sorry he is not in the house tonight—that my earlier statement might be described as tiptoeing among the tulips.

There were at least two members of my hon. friend's group—the leaders of what I have called the dynamic wing of that group, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green)—who were certainly doing no tiptoeing in their statements. I hope I am not doing them an injustice when I suggest that they seemed to have adopted as a principle for the conduct of diplomacy and international affairs what I might call tulip trampling or gatecrashing. If they had had the same limitation of responsibility that I had when I spoke here they might possibly agree that in the delicate situation, such as that in which we find ourselves today in the Far East and Korea and in connection with international relations generally, the behaviour of the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be to tiptoe carefully and not trample the tulips.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in a most interesting contribution to the debate criticized my statement as being too optimistic, or very optimistic, as he described it. I think in that earlier contribution my optimism was indeed most limited, as it was meant to be. The hon. member for Lake Centre contrasted what he called my great optimism with the view of a much greater authority on foreign affairs than I, or any of us possibly—Mr. Winston Churchill. But it was only a few weeks ago that Mr. Winston Churchill when landing in New York stated to the press that in his view the danger of war had receded. If Mr. Churchill saw fit to take a more sombre view of international developments the other day in the House of Commons in London, this merely shows the difficulty of making up one's mind during the ebb and flow of international events.

As a matter of fact we have no cause at this time for either optimism or despair. This afternoon the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) made what I thought was a very interesting and thoughtful contribution to this debate. In referring to the situation in western Europe he said that because of the growing strength of NATO the situation in western Europe had been stabilized and the Soviet union was at bay. I certainly would not go as far as that, and possibly he did not mean to go as far as his words might indicate.

I suggest that we should avoid both excessive optimism and excessive pessimism. We should not get too cheerful when things seem to go well or too panicky when they seem to go badly.

In the course of our discussion the question of our policy toward the United Nations was brought up by more than one speaker, and the very interesting proposal was made by more than one member of the official opposition that it would be a good thing if the standing committee on external affairs set up a group or a subcommittee to discuss, no doubt with the department and its officials, the revision of the United Nations charter which in any event has to be discussed at the United Nations general assembly before the tenth session. I think that is a good idea, and I hope that possibly the standing committee on external affairs will follow it up when it meets.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) thought that in order to relieve the general assembly of the growing pressure of business, which is resulting now in two sessions every year, there should be set up at the United Nations an agenda committee which would screen the subjects for discussion at each general assembly and thereby reduce the number of subjects and I hope the time devoted to them. If he were here I would have pointed out to him that this has been tried more than once at the United Nations general assembly. Proposals have been made for the establishment of such a committee, but they have never met with enough approval to be given a trial. As a matter of fact there are obvious difficulties in a proposal of that kind because in the screening process some subjects might be left out which might be of very great importance to some countries, though not so much to others, and it would be extremely difficult to take away from any national delegation the right to put any subject on the agenda.

Then in our discussion more than one speaker referred to the problems about the United Nations secretariat. In fact the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) devoted most of his speech to that subject. There is an impression being created in some quarters that the United Nations is honeycombed with subversive agents and that the security of the host country is being prejudiced by the secretariat. My own view is that that impression has no basis in reality at all, and I think it is deplorable that it should be spreading so widely over the continent.

The hon. member for Lake Centre also touched on this subject. He underlined the difficulties in dealing with security not only in the United Nations but also at home when he said—and the same comment was made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) —that while we must maintain our freedoms unimpaired, which I think was the expression he used, we must at the same time not allow diplomatic immunity to be used to attack the security of the state. The difficulty of course is to reconcile these two things. We cannot allow freedom to be used to destroy security, but we would surely be making a great mistake if we took unnecessary measures in the name of security which would destroy our freedom. What we have to do in these matters, I suppose, both internationally at the United Nations and domestically at home, is to make a reasonable and wise reconciliation between these two matters.

So far as attacks on the United Nations secretariat are concerned, we must not forget that they are often made by people who are really attacking the United Nations itself. When attacks are made on United States citizens in the United Nations, you will often find behind them attacks on the fact that the United States is in the United Nations at all. It is an important problem. It is on the agenda of the resumed session, when it will be discussed; and I think it would probably not be quite appropriate for me to say anything more about it at this time.

It is in this spirit, however, of attempting to reconcile freedom and security that in the Department of External Affairs we attempt to deal with passport difficulties, a question which was also raised by the hon. member for Peel. In our passport policies—and we have discussed these at great length before the standing committee on external affairs, as I have no doubt we will discuss them again this year—I confess we have followed the British rather than the United States practice. We interfere only on very rare occasions with the right of a Canadian citizen to possess a passport, which is after all merely a certificate of his Canadian citizenship. We have the power, of course, to refuse a passport or to withdraw a passport, and when the danger to the state is immediate and clear we should of course take that action; and it has been taken within recent years. But I suggest that we should interfere just as little as possible with the right of a Canadian to have this certificate of identity.

The hon. member for Peel brought up four or five other questions which he hoped I could deal with in my reply. I think possibly they should be referred to the standing committee, where all information concerning them can be given. He mentioned, for instance, the case of a Canadian citizen of Polish extraction—indeed a Polish national as well because he had dual nationality—who had received what seemed to the Auditor General exorbitant sums for relief in Warsaw in circumstances which appeared to be a little ambiguous. I think that case can be satisfactorily explained to the committee in all its details. I would only say here that this Polish-Canadian citizen served during the war in the Canadian navy, where he had a good record. He went back to Poland after the war in the hope that he could bring his wife and family to Canada. There he was arrested by the Polish authorities. After he was released from jail he was destitute. The Canadian diplomatic mission in Warsaw felt it was its duty to help this man until his case was cleared up. Relief was extended. It might seem to be a large amount, but the amount in dollars was converted at the official diplomatic rate to zlotys which, in terms of real value, would cut it in half. As I say, we can go into this particular question in the standing committee in enough detail, I think, to satisfy hon. members of the committee.

The hon. member for Peel also hoped that I could say something about the C.B.C. international service. He suggested that we call the director of that service before the committee. I think that is a good suggestion. I am quite sure it can be acted on and that we can go into the whole question, as indeed we have done before, of the relationship between the Department of External Affairs and the C.B.C. international service. The hon. member did go a little further than I thought was practical when he expressed the hope that we might listen to recordings of the broadcasts we are making to these countries. He may be more cultivated linguistically than I am, but I think recordings in Ukrainian, Polish, Czechoslovakian and other languages would not be very meaningful, at least so far as I am concerned.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The hon. member for Lake Centre made a very interesting suggestion in connection with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He thought we should take the lead in the extension of the pact from 20 to 50 years. It is now a 20-year pact which can be renewed after the 20-year period indefinitely from year to year. The European defence community treaty is a 50-year pact. It was felt that if we could make the two agreements synchronize that would help to remove some of the uneasiness, particularly in France, over this matter.

As a matter of fact that question is already under discussion. There is a difficulty at this time in extending the North Atlantic treaty to 50 years because it would mean a formal amendment of the pact, which would have to go back to the 14 legislatures. There may be a better way than that of accomplishing the same purpose, but the question is under consideration at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, though all these matters arose during the course of the debate, and many others, the question of most interest to hon. members quite naturally was that of Korea, Formosa and the Far East generally —the question of our Far Eastern policy at the present time.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), in discussing my observations on this question, criticized them as being without substance. He described part of my remarks on President Eisenhower's statement about Formosa as a masterpiece of circumlocution. Well, I listened to his statement very carefully—I am sorry he is not in his seat tonight—and I read his statement in Hansard very carefully. In a friendly vein I should like to return the compliment and suggest that his own statement was a masterpiece of concealment.

The hon. member said that the opposition, in discussing foreign affairs, should put forward alternative suggestions. I certainly agree with that. Then he added—without which a discussion on foreign affairs would be as shadowy as it would be meaningless. I have gone through his speech, as I have stated, and I have gone through several speeches by hon. members on the other side to see if I could get some of these alternative suggestions. I have not been very successful in finding them. It is not easy, therefore, for me to take the constructive advice that I should like to secure from the statements made by members of the opposition on this occasion, except in one or two speeches with which I shall deal later.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) made the same criticism and he, but more particularly the hon. member for Lake Centre, in a very eloquent and rhetorical bit, said that this house and this country had the right to know where we stood on Far Eastern matters. He went on to prove his point by stating that the people of the United States knew where their government stood, as did the people of the United Kingdom through Mr. Eden's statement, and that we in Canada should also know.

I have taken the trouble to read Mr. Eden's statements, the one he made on February 3 and the one he made in the House of Commons on February 9. Dealing with the Formosa decision on February 3, he said that Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom were informed in advance of the decision of the United States government and at once made known their concern at this decision which they feared would have unfortunate political repercussions without compensating military advantages. In his statement a few days later in the House of Commons, Mr. Eden spoke at some length on this Formosa decision. He explained some of the United States preoccupations, difficulties and worries. He deprecated the exaggeration of the implications of this action. He reiterated the British policy on the blockade, and he mentioned the cease-fire proposals; but comparing his statement with the statement of government policy made in this house I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we were as definite and I think went just about as far as Mr. Eden did.

I propose to put on the record again one or two of the things I have said, representing the government, in my last two statements on this subject.

So far as the United States is concerned, I have just come back from Washington. Of course I read the United States papers, the New York Times and even the New Yorker. I am afraid there are a good many people in the United States who do not feel that they know exactly where their government stands on these Far Eastern matters and who might, with charity, consider that the Canadian people are just about as well informed in respect of the policy of their government on this particular question.

On February 5, when I spoke in the house on the Formosan statement I said, as recorded at page 1639 of Hansard—and I refer this to the hon. member for Kamloops because it repeats almost verbatim what I said almost two years ago on the subject—

> —while we remain resolved to carry out our United Nations obligations in Korea, we do not think that the defence of Formosa, which has not been assumed by the United Nations, should be confused with the defence of Korea, which has.

I think that is clear.

Mr. Fulton: You said the same thing on both occasions.

Mr. Pearson: On the same occasion and on the same page I said:

> We are not of course committed by, though naturally we are concerned with, the action taken in Washington in connection with this matter.

We are not committed by it, though naturally we are concerned with it. The words Mr. Eden used in London were "at once made known our concern." I recall that when I used the word "concern" in a diplomatic note not many months ago in connection with a Far Eastern question, that was considered by hon. gentlemen opposite to be a very vigorous protest indeed. It was not a very vigorous protest then, and it is not a protest at all on this occasion, but it is a good word to use in a situation such as this. We are concerned with this matter, and we have made our concern known to the United States.

It has been suggested by hon. members opposite that in my Wednesday statement I was much less definite and more tiptoeing than in my previous one. On that occasion, to make our position as clear as I think it should be at this time, I said, as recorded on page 1852 of Hansard for February 11, 1953:

> The guiding principle of Canadian policy in Korea is to continue to do everything possible to limit the present hostilities to the Korean peninsula, and to take advantage of any opportunity for an early settlement of these hostilities by peaceful negotiation.

Farther down on the same page I said:

> We consider also that the purpose of the United Nations in Korea remains the defeat of aggression there, and does not include intervention in the civil war in China.

On the next page, I said:

> We do not believe, accordingly, that the western powers should press for military or economic measures, at the United Nations or elsewhere, which would certainly not be supported and indeed might be actively opposed by important non-communist Asian states, and which without such support would be less effective in ending the Korean war than in extending it.

Then I added:

> This principle has guided our policy in this matter in the past, and it will continue to guide us in considering any such proposals which may be made in the future.

It seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, that those were fairly definite statements. We expressed our concern with these Formosan declarations; we expressed our anxiety lest anything should be done which would extend the war from Korea to the mainland; and we underlined the contrast between action taken through the United Nations and action taken in other ways. So far as consultation is concerned, immediately this declaration was decided upon by the United States government as a unilateral action—though I confess we had some advance information that some such action was in contemplation—we were informed by that government at once, as other governments were. We took steps at once through our ambassador in Washington to make immediate inquiries as to what it involved, what the implications were, if any, and to discuss the matter with the state department. Immediately after those discussions in Washington the ambassador came to Ottawa and we got a firsthand report from him. I think the consultation on this occasion was not anything that we could complain about, though if it had been possible to announce the step to us a little earlier we would have had more time to intervene, if we had felt that intervention was desirable; something that we did not feel on this occasion.

I only say that we—I mean the government—regret, as I think do most members of the house, that the United States government found it necessary to take this action. We are not condemning them for it, but we regret that they felt it necessary to take this action, the military advantages of which might be neutralized by the political disadvantages.

At the same time I think it is only right to state that the situation in 1953 with respect to the neutralization of Formosa, and the situation generally in that area is very different from that in 1950 when the original action was taken. At that time the Chinese communists had not directly intervened in the Korean struggle. Since then many an effort has been made through the United Nations to settle this conflict, and all of them have been rejected by the communists in China or in North Korea.

I had the privilege of spending the week end in Washington, and yesterday I had an interesting, friendly and frank discussion with the Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, at our embassy there. I told him in an informal but frank way—and we are on those terms in Washington with the new Secretary of State, as we were with the old secretary of state—our views and our preoccupations. I told him quite clearly—something which his officials of course already knew—how we felt about Far Eastern affairs generally, and I think we have also made that clear in the house. I also learned from him about the background of this action, and of the preoccupations and worries which prompted the United States to take it. I think we should do our best to understand the United States position on this matter and to appreciate their anxiety over the stalemate which has developed. I also think they should appreciate, as I think they do, our anxiety over the possibility of this war extending and our desire to prevent that eventuality.

The exchange of views that we had yesterday, I think, without exaggerating their importance, may have been considered helpful in that respect. It was made quite clear to me yesterday by the Secretary of State that some of the far-reaching fears that had been read into this action and other actions are not justified; that they are naturally exceedingly anxious to take advantage of any situation which will give them and the United Nations—because they are acting as a member of the United Nations in this general Korean situation—the initiative, and also to do anything they can to keep the enemies of the United Nations off balance. I feel reasonably assured that there is no intention on the part of the administration in Washington to do anything that is rash, provocative or adventurous, and that on their part they have no desire to extend the war to the continent of Asia.

I also feel that, like their predecessors in Washington, they appreciate the necessity and the desirability of consultation before decisions are taken in Washington which affect the other members of the United Nations who, whether or not they are committed formally by those decisions, cannot escape the consequences of them. Mr. Dulles, the Secretary of State, made a broadcast the other night, to which I am sure a good many hon. members listened, in which he said:

> It is important for us all to remember that we—

And he was talking about the American people.

> —do carry a tremendous responsibility. Any false step could mean disaster not only for us but for our friends. Possibly our friends would suffer even more than we ourselves. Therefore, we must be sober and restrained in our national conduct.

Then in concluding his broadcast he went on to say this:

> That does not mean being timid, and afraid to take the initiative, to speak frankly or to make hard decisions. Indecision, weakness and vacillation are the qualities which most often lead to war. It does mean that in order to win and hold the confidence of those whom we need as friends and allies, we must at all times play the part of a nation which is fully aware of the grave responsibility which it carries.

I am sure that when the Secretary of State uttered those words he was sincere in his own determination to do his best to carry them out. I am reinforced in that feeling by my visit to Washington.

The other day, in his speech in this debate, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said we should let the United States know that they cannot count on support from us in every political adventure into which their political exigencies at home may lead them. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I think they know that. But I also think it would be wrong at this time to assume, on the basis of the decision taken with respect to Formosa, that they are going to engage in such adventures. I do not think it would be wise, in our relations with this new administration, to start on a note of suspicion or controversy, if we can avoid it, any more than I think it would be wise to start by giving them the feeling that they can count on us on all occasions, no matter what they may be impelled to do. In this connection I think we would be well advised to distinguish—if we can, and it is not always as easy as it should be—between official statements on behalf of the administration and newspaper reports of statements by military leaders who seem to do a good deal of talking in one way or another—

Mr. Fulton: In both countries.

Mr. Pearson: —and by civilians who have not the responsibility for their statements that members of the administration have and who recently have been making some statements which I confess are rather alarming. Mr. Dulles himself, in the broadcast to which I referred, had this to say on that point:

The talks which we had with the political leaders of the countries we visited—

He was talking about his visit to Europe.

—went far, I think, to dispel these fears in so far as official quarters are concerned.

He was talking about some fears that had been aroused by what had been going on. He went on to say:

However, the public and the opposition parties seize upon incidents and upon statements made here—

That is in the United States.

—which seem to them to be reckless. Unscrupulous persons use such incidents and statements as reasons why the European nations should not trust us.

I therefore hope that we shall be careful to differentiate between unofficial statements which often get on the front page and more important official statements which are not always on the front page.

On motion of Mr. Pearson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall conclude this debate. Then we shall revert to notices of motion and take up the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to set up a special committee to examine into the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy; then the resolution of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) with respect to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944; Bill No. 48, respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices; Bill No. 44, to protect the coastal fisheries; Bill No. 46, to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act; then the resolution respecting confirmation of the international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, signed by Canada, the United States and Japan.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 17, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACDOUGALL—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT ALLEGING DEATH

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that I am not dead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Prove it.

Mr. MacDougall: Confusion has arisen because of the fact that a man with the same name, but certainly not the same initials as mine, a very good friend of mine and a fine citizen, died a few days ago. I should like to use the words which Mark Twain used to the Associated Press of the United States in the correction of the report of his death. He stated, "The report of my death is greatly exaggerated."

DAIRY PRODUCTS

INQUIRY AS TO EMBARGO BY UNITED STATES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): On Friday, February 13, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) inquired about the nature of representations made by Canada concerning United States import restrictions on dairy products. As indicated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on February 11, the Canadian government has now made official representations to the United States government on three occasions. The United States government replied to the first of these representations that it was seeking the repeal of the legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. St. Laurent: That was the first one indicated in the appendix to Hansard. These restrictions were discussed also during the 1951 and 1952 sessions of the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade. In order to give a detailed explanation of the nature of the Canadian representation, I should like to make the following statement:

The United States import restrictions on dairy products were originally instituted on August 9, 1951, in accordance with an amendment of July 31, 1951, to the Defence Production Act. This amendment, which was written into section 104 of the act, required the imposition of controls over fats and oils, butter, cheese and other dairy products, if the importation would:

(1) Impair or reduce domestic production;

(2) Interfere with orderly domestic storing or marketing;

(3) Result in any unnecessary burden or expenditure under any government price support program.

The Canadian government had followed with deep concern the discussions in the United States congress when this amendment to the Defence Production Act was introduced. These discussions indicated that there was a substantial volume of opinion which was opposed to this amendment and which was aware that its adoption and application would be contrary to United States international obligations. When the amendment was passed, the Canadian government deemed it appropriate to protest officially against this legislation. Accordingly a note was presented to the state department by the Canadian embassy in Washington on August 27, 1951—that is the date the hon. member was inquiring about—which pointed out that these restrictions were contrary to the obligations of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Efforts were made by the United States administration, and by various individual members of the United States congress, to obtain repeal of these restrictions. The president asked congress on August 23, 1951, for prompt repeal of the restrictions. On September 22, 1951, the United States state department replied to our note drawing attention to efforts then being made by the president to obtain repeal of the restrictions and stating that it understood the concern of the Canadian government.

These restrictions were discussed at the September-October 1951 meeting of the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

A resolution adopted on October 26, 1951, which was supported by the Canadian delegation, found the restrictions to be an infringement of the agreement. The resolution took note of the United States government's intention to seek remedial legislation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Subsequently on January 17, 1952, a second note to the United States state department drew the attention of the United States government to the proceedings at the session of the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade and urged the United States government to remove the restrictions without further delay. At that same time there was a bill before the United States senate for repeal of the restrictions. However, this bill failed to pass.

When the United States Defence Production Act was amended in June, 1952, modifications were made to section 104 which permitted some degree of liberalization. The Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to set quotas by types and varieties and to permit additional imports of each type and variety up to 15 per cent of the import limitation. Under authority of this legislation the import controls have been relaxed from time to time.

The contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade again considered these restrictions at their session in September-October, 1952. A resolution was adopted, which was supported by the Canadian delegation, and which noted that the United States had not repealed these restrictions and indicated that the contracting parties should be free, if they deemed it appropriate, to take retaliatory action after prior consultation with other contracting parties.

On December 30, 1952, the United States government, acting under the mandatory provisions of section 104 of the United States Defence Production Act, imposed import quotas on dried whole milk, dried buttermilk, and dried cream. The Canadian government again examined the situation arising from this legislation and took the occasion to present a third note drawing attention to the general effects of these measures on the broad commercial policy interests of both governments and urging the removal of the restrictions as soon as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister for his statement and I should like to ask one question arising out of it. Is there any prospect of these unfairnesses against Canadian dairy products being removed or at least relaxed by the United States government?

Mr. St. Laurent: All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that the administration realize that the restrictions are contrary to international obligations undertaken by their country and, I understand, they are still making efforts to get congress to repeal what congress passed. As to what the action of congress will be, I am not in a position to predict.

FLOODS

THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE NETHERLANDS AND BELGIUM—EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY—REPLIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house, that in accordance with the provisions of the unanimous resolution of Monday, February 2, 1953, I conveyed to Her Majesty the Queen, to Her Majesty the Queen of The Netherlands and to His Majesty the King of Belgium the deep sympathy of the Commons of Canada for the people of the United Kingdom, The Netherlands and Belgium who have been so sorely stricken by the appalling disaster which has befallen them; and that in reply to my messages I have now received several communications which will be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I think there are many more who receive Hansard than there are who see Votes and Proceedings. If such were the feeling of the house, I think perhaps these replies might be printed as an appendix to Hansard as well as in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of replies, see appendix, page 2047.)

STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS, VANCOUVER AND NEW WESTMINSTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. Does he care to make a statement with regard to the strike of the grain handlers in the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster? This work stoppage has wide ramifications.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving notice of this question which has to do with the dispute and strike affecting local 333, International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, Soft Drink and Distillery Workers of America, and various Vancouver grain elevator companies.

The following is a brief review of events leading up to the present situation involving the previously mentioned parties.

The collective agreement between the parties was entered into on May 30, 1952, effective December 1, 1951, until November 30, 1952; and thereafter to remain in effect unless written notice is given by either party to the other at least thirty days prior to November 30, 1952, that revision of the agreement is desired.

Such notice was given on October 28, 1952, by the union to (1) Searle Co. Ltd.; (2) Pacific Elevators Ltd.; (3) United Grain Growers Ltd.; (4) Kerr Gifford and Co. Inc.; and (5) Alberta Wheat Pool, all of Vancouver, B.C.

The main proposals included: (1) the eight-hour five-day week, starting midnight Sunday and ending midnight Friday; (2) a 10 cent premium for employees working on the third or midnight shift; (3) three extra statutory holidays; (4) three weeks' vacation after 10 years' service; (5) that the new agreement contain a list of job classifications; (6) 12 cents per hour increase in present rates; and (7) dust money of 10 cents per hour.

Representatives of both parties held meetings in November, 1952, but could come to no agreement. On November 17, 1952, the situation was discussed by Mr. Edward Sims, Canadian director of the union and Mr. R. H. Tupper, Q.C., representing the companies, with our senior conciliation officer at Vancouver, Mr. George Currie. Both parties expressed the opinion that further negotiations either with or without the assistance of the conciliation officer would be useless and stated the parties desired the establishment of a board of conciliation.

On November 21, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) received a joint request for the establishment of a board of conciliation and investigation to deal with the dispute, and on November 22 a board was established. The companies nominated Mr. Thomas E. H. Ellis, and Mr. James Bury was nominated by the union. In the absence of a joint recommendation by these nominees of the parties the minister on December 18 appointed Dr. Joseph A. Crumb, professor of economics and political science, University of British Columbia, to be the third member and chairman of the board.

On January 23, the minister received the report of the board making the following recommendations: One, the work day and the work week; that the employers undertake to minimize Saturday and Sunday work but that they should not be committed to a standard Monday through Friday schedule for a work week. Two, premium for night shift; for the third shift the majority report recommended a differential of 10 cents per hour. The company nominee felt that existing arrangements were satisfactory. Three, statutory holidays; the majority report recommended that the number of holidays be fixed at eight. The company nominee recommended that the number be left at six. Four, vacations; that this request be set aside. Five, job classifications; the majority report recommended that this request be met but with the proviso that the union respects management's right to establish job classifications and to set rates applicable thereto. The company nominee disagreed. Six, wage rates; the majority report recommended that the present hourly rate of $1.50 should continue during the next contract year. The union nominee recommended that the 12-cent-per-hour increase be granted. Seven, dust premium; the majority report recommended a 10-cent-per-hour premium rate. The company nominee recommended that the existing uniform rate be maintained.

On January 29 the minister was informed that the recommendations of the board were not acceptable to the companies. On February 5, he was informed that the union accepted the majority recommendations signed by Dr. Crumb and Mr. Bury and the minority recommendation respecting wages signed by Mr. Bury.

On February 10, the Department of Labour was informed by the union that unless settlement was reached the employees would strike on February 16. Our information is that work stopped yesterday morning and operations are at a standstill. The total number of men involved is approximately 250. Both parties are aware, through an informal meeting with our conciliation officer on February 6, 1953, that mediation services of the department are available to them, but no request has been made by either party for further mediation. The department is constantly in touch with the situation and hon. members may be assured that everything possible will be done to bring about an early settlement of the strike.

STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO MOVE GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of a report in the Ottawa Journal of February 16 that Canada is losing millions of bushels of wheat sales owing to the grain handlers' strike on the west coast, does the government contemplate taking any immediate action to get this grain moving?

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it can be said that the government is losing millions of bushels of sales. The capacity of the west coast has been practically all sold, or could have been all sold. We have outlets at North Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert on the west coast still in operation, and at Saint John and Halifax on the east coast. It is very unfortunate indeed that this year, when a record has already been made for movement through the west coast, this strike should tie up the movement of grain. It will mean demurrage for the boats; but as far as the Department of Trade and Commerce are concerned we are quite satisfied to leave the settlement of the strike in the hands of the Department of Labour.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with a matter of interest to the western farmer, namely, the international wheat agreement conference in Washington. Will he say what the present position is, and also tell the house what instructions the representatives of Canada have as to the minimum and maximum prices that they expect under the agreement now being negotiated?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can only repeat what I said on an earlier occasion, that the meetings are in camera and are proceeding. As far as I know progress is reasonably satisfactory and discussions are taking the course that one would expect from meetings of this kind. A good deal of harmony is being displayed between the contracting parties.

As far as the instructions from Canada are concerned, the Canadian government representatives are in Washington with advisers from prairie wheat organizations. The instructions are to negotiate the best deal that seems possible and to report the results back for the consideration of the government. I am sure that our representatives will do that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Very uncertain.

UNITED NATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO THE DISCUSSION OF ANTI-SEMITIC PRACTICES IN COUNTRIES UNDER SOVIET INFLUENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister know whether the subject of anti-semitic practices in countries under Soviet influence or control will be brought up at the resumed session of the general assembly of the United Nations? If so, would he care to comment on what position the Canadian delegation will take with respect to these practices?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that subject does not now appear on the agenda of the United Nations general assembly. I understand that certain delegations are giving some consideration to asking that it be put on, but no proposal has yet been made. However, without putting it on the agenda the subject could be discussed, under one or two of the other items that will come before the general assembly at its resumed session.

As far as the Canadian position is concerned, I think I had better wait until we see in what form the subject does appear on the agenda, but our general attitude was, I think, clearly indicated the other day in answer to a question from the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll).

SOUTH KOREA

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE IN RECONSTRUCTION AND REHABILITATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): May I ask the Minister of National Defence a question arising out of a statement he made last night? What assistance is Canada giving in the reconstruction of South Korea and the rehabilitation of its people?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): That is really a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What I said last night, as I recall it, was that we had given assistance and it was provided for in the estimates of last year.

FERRY SERVICE

NORTH SYDNEY-PORT AUX BASQUES—SUGGESTED ALTERATION IN VESSEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I am sorry I did not give him very much notice. If he is not able to answer fully, perhaps he will take it as a notice and answer tomorrow. Has any consideration been given to the alteration of plans of the vessel presently being constructed for service with the Canadian National Railways on the route between North Sydney and Port aux Basques? My reason for asking the question is that I understand the premier of Newfoundland recently stated that the steamer is only half the size required, and he wanted one twice as big or two of that size.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Some time ago at my request a meeting was arranged between the premier of Newfoundland, a delegation from that province, officers of the Canadian National Railways and the Department of Transport in Montreal to deal with representations which the delegation from Newfoundland wanted to make to the Canadian National Railways. These representations are too numerous to mention here, but I do know that the meeting was a satisfactory one. I do know that it was possible to make some of the changes that were asked for, at least in so far as refrigerator cars were concerned; but I am also of the view, if my memory serves me right, that no alterations to the new ferry were decided upon in so far as the railway officials were concerned, because they were of the view that the ferry was designed to meet the requirements of the traffic as it existed. It is true that the delegation represented strongly in favour of additional facilities to handle increased traffic by the ferry, but the view of the C.N.R. officials and our own then was that that situation could be reviewed from time to time.

LIVESTOCK

LIFTING OF UNITED STATES EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture consequent upon the answer he gave to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) yesterday in regard to the lifting of the United States embargo. The minister said, as reported at page 1961 of Hansard:

> Our understanding still is that it is the intention of the United States government to admit livestock on the 1st of March.

Can the minister tell us what that understanding is based on? Has the Canadian government had any undertaking, promise or anything else of that nature from the United States government that the embargo will be lifted on the 1st of March?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Our understanding is based on the announcement which was made some time ago from Washington to the effect that the embargo will in all probability be lifted on the 1st of March. The only condition which was indicated at the time which might interfere with that would be another outbreak of the disease. There has not been any outbreak of the disease, so we presume that it is their intention to open the market March 1st. We have discussions with them from day to day. We have had talks with them today, which do not lead us to any other conclusion. So I think it should be assumed by anyone at present that there is no likelihood that that will not be carried out.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister tell us whether the Canadian government has asked for any definite assurance on this matter from the United States government?

Mr. Bryce: I should like to follow that up. The farmers throughout the country are anxious to know if the embargo is going to be taken off or if it is not going to be taken off. I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) owes that to the farmers of Canada, and he should tell them whether or not this embargo is going to come off.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Harkness: Well, I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture would answer that question. I asked him whether any definite assurance has been asked for.

Mr. Gardiner: I would like to say that if all the persons who seem to have opinions very much similar to those of the two hon. members who have just spoken now would not express any doubts about it at all, there would be no one in Canada who would have any doubts about it. Announcements have been made as definitely as they can be made, and they were not made by this government—they were made by the government of the United States. We are not in the position to make announcements for them. They have made the announcements, and I take it for granted that they will act upon them.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not yet answered my question.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has given an answer. It may not be an answer satisfactory to the hon. member. However, I cannot even require a minister to answer a question. In this instance he has answered the question in the way he thinks it should be answered, and the house must accept his answer.

An hon. Member: Write a letter.

HEALTH INSURANCE

REFERENCE TO SPEECH BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Hansard of yesterday records at page 1951 three questions standing in my name on yesterday's order paper referring to a speech made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) at Nelson, British Columbia, on January 15, 1953.

These questions are answered in the name of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), not in the name of the Minister of Fisheries. My question of privilege relates to the answer given to the second question, which was as follows:

> If so, did the Minister of Fisheries indicate at that time that an announcement respecting national health insurance would be made at this session of parliament, as reported in the said newspaper?

The answer given by the Secretary of State was No. My question of privilege is that that answer conflicts with the report in the Nelson Daily News, which said—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow that as a question of privilege.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of privilege: there is one statement in the press and an opposite statement by the Secretary of State. Can I not find out what the Minister of Fisheries has to say?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, he may ask it. But certainly he cannot rise on a question of privilege and ask it.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he is correctly reported in the three paragraphs which refer to the section of his remarks which dealt with health insurance, as it is reported in the Nelson Daily News—a very fine newspaper—of January 17, 1953.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I am accurately reported in the answer given by the Secretary of State in the reply quoted yesterday.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Monday, February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 85 to 104 inclusive of the main estimates, 1953-54, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I was attempting to deal with points that had been raised in the course of this debate which has now extended over some days. Last night I indicated that, though we had listened to many very interesting speeches, so far as the official opposition was concerned the proposals they had made on external affairs were characterized particularly by their vagueness.

When the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) was speaking last night he was asked what his own views were on these matters, and his reply—as it is reported at page 1988 of Hansard—which I suppose might serve as a guidepost for the views of members of the official opposition on foreign affairs, was as follows:

I have just said that I believe Canada, in concert with other nations of the commonwealth and, in so far as it is possible, with the United States of America, should adopt a foreign policy which would carry not the hot war but the cold war to the communists, and keep them guessing for a change.

That might be considered rather vague as a direction in foreign policy. But there was not very much vagueness about the satisfaction of the official opposition over what was termed by more than one of their members the new policy of the United States in Asia. According to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), that new United States policy was to seize the initiative and, to quote his words, "to call the tune".

The same idea was referred to by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), when he talked about the stiffening of United States policy. And the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) used this expression, "a firm and positive policy", which, he thought, would bring peace. Firmness is of course a desirable attribute of policy. But I know hon. members will agree that firmness should not be confused with rashness, and it should not I suggest go beyond our strength. There is a good deal to be said, in the conduct of international affairs, for using the velvet glove over the iron hand; but there is very little to be said in diplomacy for putting the iron glove over the velvet hand. The hon. member for Peel, when discussing this matter, gave an example of what he considered to be wise firmness in the conduct of foreign affairs. His example, and it was repeated by other speakers, was the Berlin airlift. But I would remind the house that the firmness displayed in the Berlin airlift was a firmness based upon realism, and applied very cautiously.

At the time of the blockade of Berlin there were many advocates of a firmer policy than that of the airlift, which took some time to be put into effect; that kind of firmer policy would have tried to defeat the blockade at once by running trucks across the border and by running trains into Berlin.

The kind of firmness which is based upon caution, and a clear assessment of our strength, is to be desired.

Mr. Graydon: That would be more than firmness, would it not?

Mr. Pearson: The other kind of firmness is probably to be deplored. It is clear from the discussion we have had on foreign policy that members of the official opposition and of the Social Credit group welcome this new policy of firmness, while the members of the C.C.F. group leave no doubt as to where they stand. They view it with suspicion and in some of its manifestations they reject it.

So far as the attitude of the government is concerned, I think our views have been pretty clearly and carefully expressed and possibly can be best understood if I explain the attitude which we take toward some of the particular manifestations of the policy. It is easy to talk in generalities, especially when you are in the opposition; it is not so easy to talk in particularities, especially when you are in the government.

Let us take a few of these concrete matters on which we may have to express our views in the future. I took a few last night, but I shall add one or two this afternoon.

We have felt and we still feel, for instance, that Korea is a matter for the United Nations and that any action in which we participate in Korea or in connection with matters arising out of Korea would have to be as a result of a United Nations decision and not a national decision by any one participant in that action.

Similarly, I think we have made it quite clear that we would be opposed to any decision or to any action which might extend the war in Korea unless there were pretty convincing evidence that that action would also end the war. The extension of the war, to which I have just referred, seems on the other hand to have almost been welcomed by some of the speakers who contributed to this debate, and I am thinking particularly of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson).

Mr. Low: May I just correct the minister on that. I did not at any stage suggest an extension of the war. What I did suggest, and I think the minister will recognize it, was that a definite policy be adopted as quickly as possible by the United Nations for terminating the war.

Mr. Pearson: I do not want to misquote or misrepresent what the hon. member said, but I base my observation on words which I took from Hansard. The hon. member is reported on page 1883 of Hansard of February 12 as having said:

> It was my view then—

He indicated that it was still his view.

> —that the military effort of the United Nations should not be limited to the country in which the aggression takes place.

He then went on to explain what he meant by that. It was on that statement that I based my observation.

Mr. Low: Will the minister yield to a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Low: Wait just a second and I will explain to some of you fellows.

An hon. Member: You talk too much.

Mr. Low: The minister is ready to answer my question. He can take care of himself; he does not need you fellows. I should like to ask him this: Is it necessarily advocating an extension of the war to suggest that when an aggressor has been named by the United Nations every effort should be made to disarm the aggressor so that he cannot hit you any further?

Mr. Pearson: That may be my hon. friend's interpretation of what he said, and of course I accept his interpretation. But my own interpretation, which I think would be the same as that of many people who read that sentence and the remarks following, was that he meant it might be necessary to extend the war beyond Korea into China—and indeed he went further than China—in order to win it. I would suggest to the hon. member that he have another good look at his speech.

Mr. Low: I ask the minister if he can take anything more from what I said than that the only suggestion I made in connection with China was that the United Nations would certainly be justified in blockading the coast of China in order to keep war materials from going in which they would then throw back at our boys.

Mr. Pearson: I have read from the hon. gentleman's speech. If I had the time I would be glad to read the subsequent paragraphs. We must agree to differ on the interpretation of what he said.

Then there is another very practical question, whether a stronger military offensive should be taken within the present strategy in Korea. The government's attitude toward that is that any such military action, even within the present strategy, should certainly be closely related to the political and military results which might follow from that action. I apologize to the hon. gentleman for referring to his speech once again, but I think I am quoting him accurately—in referring to the military situation some time ago, he said that in 1951—I believe he was referring to September—we had the communists on the ropes but the Far Eastern command refused to allow a knockout.

Mr. Low: I was quoting General Van Fleet who said that.

Mr. Pearson: Just to keep the record straight on this, because these are very important matters and what we say in respect of them will go far beyond these four walls, may I say that at that time the Far Eastern command was the Far Eastern command of the United States under generals who were senior to General Van Fleet. The Far Eastern command in turn got its directions from the unified command, which was the chiefs of staff in Washington. So any military action which was taken at that time or not taken at that time was in accordance with the orders of the supreme military direction of that operation, which was in Washington and under General Bradley.

Lest there be any misunderstanding of the influence of civilian authority at that time, either national or international, it should also be made quite clear—because there has certainly been some misunderstanding lately on this matter—that when the decision was taken in 1951 to initiate armistice negotiations with the communists those negotiations were not meant to interfere with and did not necessarily interfere with the military operations which continued.

The hon. gentleman made special mention of General MacArthur's inability to bomb the Manchurian bases and asserted that that prohibition came from United Nations officials. I would be most interested indeed if he could supply any evidence which would support the inportant allegation that United Nations officials would not allow General MacArthur to bomb Manchurian bases at any time since the Korean aggression commenced.

There is another practical question arising out of these Far Eastern discussions, on which government policy has already been indicated but which I shall repeat clearly this afternoon. I refer to the question of the blockade which has been very much in people's minds at the present time. Our attitude is that whether a blockade should or should not be imposed against the aggressor is a matter for United Nations decision. It is of course to be distinguished from action taken to prevent strategic materials going to the aggressor because action of that kind has been taken already on the part of the United Nations.

I would think myself that the only excuse for extending our action and imposing a naval blockade on the coast of China would be that it would be effective in ending the war. There is certainly a strong division of opinion on that subject, especially when it is realized that at least 75 per cent—various figures have been given—of the supplies going to communist China to enable them to participate in this Korean aggression go by land rather than by sea. There would be dangers in the imposition of such a blockade; and before any action is taken they should be weighed very carefully against the effect of that blockade on the ending of the war. I can say that, so far as we are concerned, we would think in default of evidence to the contrary that the dangers and the difficulties would neutralize the beneficial effect which might result from such a blockade.

Then there is another question—and I mention this too to meet the criticism that I have been talking mincingly and in generalities. I am dealing with concrete matters which are not dealt with by some of the members across the aisle.

Mr. Fulton: Because we have not responsibility.

Mr. Pearson: This is the question of whether it would be wise to bomb Chinese communist territory incidentally to the Korean operation. Our policy is that that would be unwise unless such bombing were forced on the United Nations by all-out war from China itself.

I would point out to hon. members that we have not yet in Korea—and I mean by "we" the United Nations—been exposed to that kind of all-out war. Therefore we should be pretty careful, and it is generally agreed by military authorities that we should be careful, in considering whether we should bomb Chinese territory.

There is another question which was dealt with by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie) in his interesting contribution to the house, as to whether or not it would be wise or unwise to take any action which would assist the forces of Chiang Kai-shek to secure a foothold on the mainland. There again, the policy of this government is to be very careful before we intervene to assist the nationalist government on Formosa in returning to China; because from past evidence we believe that—and again I have made some study of this matter as have other hon. members—the government which is now on Formosa did not reach Formosa because of a lack of support from outside or because it was betrayed, but that it reached Formosa because it was driven out of China.

We would probably not be very wise, from the point of view of defeating aggression in Korea, and possibly from other points of view as well if we identified our cause as members of the United Nations with the restoration of the nationalist government on Formosa to the mainland.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I mention these matters because they are problems which we may have to face. I do not, in mentioning them, suggest that we have any reason to assume that the decision which was taken in Washington a short time ago regarding Formosa means that any of these things is likely to be put forward by the United States or any other government. I do not think that these problems necessarily follow on the decision taken on Formosa. I am satisfied that that is not likely to be the case. I indicated last evening that I have had some assurance recently that these consequences of the Formosa decision are not likely to follow, and I hope that they will not.

Now, there is just one other statement from the official opposition with which I should like to deal for a short time because it was a very important one, which I am sure will cause a great deal of comment. That statement was contained in the speech the other evening by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). He was certainly forthright enough in stating his own view. He attacked what has been called the "policy of containment", although I must confess that the word "containment" and the policy that it represents have been very often misunderstood. He attacked that policy very strongly and preferred what I think might fairly be described—although he did not use the words in this way—as "a dynamic liberation policy".

In his statement—and I do not want to do him any injustice—which appears on page 1900 of Hansard, he supported and advocated unlimited war. He said, and I quote from Hansard:

To pretend that we can prepare for and fight a limited war against a major power is nonsense.

He said, in another part of his speech:

It is only in men's minds that we think in terms of a limited war. This is now being changed in the United States.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, with all respect to the hon. member, that that is bad history; and that some of the most successful national wars in history have been successful because they have been limited, and some of the greatest catastrophes and failures in history have happened because leaders of nations who have led those nations into war did not recognize any limit to their objectives in war. If you want an example in terms of one country to explain what I mean, I would have you contrast Bismarck's policy of limited war with Hitler's policy of unlimited war. So, I am not at all prepared to believe that in Korea at this time we have to indulge in unlimited war, irrespective of where that may take us.

The hon. gentleman said it would also be desirable for us to lead from strength, and that there was no such thing as a safe war. He said that one of the things about the Formosa decision which gave him satisfaction was that it represented a step in the right direction. He went even farther than that and on page 1901 of Hansard he suggested that one of the things we might do now would be to destroy the Hong Kong-Shanghai railway. He advocated the imposition of a naval blockade—and he is not alone in that—and he advocated a positive policy of liberation of people behind the iron curtain. There has been a great deal of discussion about that lately, and he went on at page 1902 of Hansard to say that a policy of isolated war would not do that. He followed up that remark by saying:

Are we going to encourage an attack there on the flank?

In answering his own question he said:

Of course we are.

And then:

Why, then, should we not encourage an attack on the other flank in China?

That certainly, Mr. Speaker, is dynamic enough and I would like to say at once that no one on this side of the house could support that kind of dynamic, unlimited aggressive policy under the present circumstances. It will be very interesting for the governments of Greece, Turkey and Yugoslavia to read that a member of our parliament has advocated that kind of action on our part.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot wind up this debate without saying a few words about the Pacific security pact.

Mr. Adamson: Before the minister goes on, I would like to reply to him. I have never advocated military attacks. What I advocated is the same kind of action as the communists are taking now. I may say that my view is that we are not dealing with tulips; we are fighting communism. In destroying poison ivy it is better to wear boots than ballet shoes.

Mr. Pearson: I think, in view of what the hon. member has said, I should just quote from Hansard so that there will be no misunderstanding. If I have misrepresented the meaning of his words I shall be glad to withdraw the interpretation that I gave them, but I will just read what he said. This appears at page 1902 of Hansard:

A policy of restricted action, of containment, of an isolated war is something that does not bring them encouragement.

He refers there to the people behind the iron curtain who are looking for liberation. That——policy . . . does not bring them encouragement.

He is talking about an isolated war.

They want to be free; they want to get out from under the yoke of communism. Just as we are fighting communism, so they want to fight communism.

In the next paragraph he discussed the recent political developments in the Balkans which have led to the association of Greece, Turkey and Yugoslavia. He went on to say:

I am sure that the impact of this anti-cominform pact on countries like Bulgaria, Albania and even Roumania is certainly very considerable. Now, are we going to encourage that? Are we going to encourage an attack there on the flank? Of course we are. Why, then, should we not encourage an attack on the other flank in China? There are many ways of beating the communists, and we have to use all of them.

Those were his words, and the house will of course be able to draw its own conclusions from them.

I should like now to make a few comments about a Pacific security pact. In discussing this matter the hon. member for Peel said that I had erected four or five roadblocks in the hope that they would be impassable. Well, he did not try very hard to pass them himself, although he did make an effort to skirt around the end. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) accused me of laughing off the idea of a Pacific security pact. I should like to point out for his benefit that I do not recall at any time in this house ever laughing at the idea of a Pacific security pact. It is nothing to laugh at. I do not think any member on this side has laughed at it. It is a very serious question. The fact that we have had nearly 20,000 Canadian soldiers cross the Pacific in the last two and a half years to fight for security means that it is no laughing matter. I hope the hon. member will exonerate me from that charge which he levelled the other night that I had laughed off the idea.

If I may say it with respect, the hon. member, in his comments on this matter, did not deal with the objections which I raised at this time to a Pacific security pact. He produced one argument, and I think one argument only, in favour of a pact. The argument that he advanced, and it is a good argument, was that a pact was necessary at least for the purpose of consultation. The hon. member for Peel also pointed out the value of a Pacific pact at this time for consultation. But I would suggest to him, and to hon. members, that a security pact, to be a security pact, must mean much more than mere consultation. We have lots of consultations now in Washington and in other places about the Pacific. A security pact, if it is to be effective, goes beyond consultation. If consultation under present circumstances would be its great value, and if a Pacific security pact for consultation only would have saved us from some of the alleged embarrassment of the last few weeks in connection with the Formosa decision, why was it that those members of the Pacific region who belong to that kind of pact now, the Anzus pact, did not, by that fact, get any advantage in consultation over the rest of us who do not belong to that group? So far as consultation is concerned, we heard about this decision as soon as they did.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra suggested that we are lapsing back into a policy of a new kind of isolationism, I think he called it—it may have been some other hon. member who used that expression. I believe I am correct in saying that he said we refused consultation because of the fear of commitments.

Mr. Green: May I correct the minister? I was referring to the stand taken by the late Mr. King in the late thirties with regard to the commonwealth of nations, when he said that we could be informed but not consulted.

Mr. Pearson: That is quite right. Here is what the hon. gentleman said, as recorded at page 1885 of Hansard for February 12, 1953:

> That reminds me of the policy of this government before the war under the leadership of the late Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, when he declared that in so far as the United Kingdom and the other nations of the commonwealth were concerned they could inform Canada of policies but they could not consult us because if Canada were consulted then she might be under some obligation.

Then he went on to say:

> We are now having this same problem in reverse. I hope the Canadian government would prefer to be consulted by the United States rather than just informed, as was the case last week.
> This action has all the earmarks of Canada being dragged along by the United States, and that situation is not good enough. It does not exist in the North Atlantic area because there we find consultation between members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization . . .

Well, to remove any fears that might exist in the hon. member's mind, I can assure him that we do not reject consultations because of any fear of commitments which may result from the consultations. Indeed, there are lots of consultations going on now, and in practically all of them Canada is participating.

Mr. Green: There was not any about Formosa.

Mr. Pearson: He himself mentioned in the course of his speech consultations in regard to the military arrangement for southeast Asia; I think he was quoting from a press dispatch. He asked if Canada was prepared to join the organization referred to in that dispatch. On that subject I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that no such arrangements have been agreed upon. Military talks are going on in regard to an exchange of intelligence and co-operation on military matters in the southeast Asian area. We are informed about those talks, and as they have not been completed as yet they are highly confidential and I cannot say anything more about them at this time.

Mr. Green: Is Canada taking part in them?

Mr. Pearson: We have attended some of the meetings, and some we have not. We have been informed about the meetings we have not attended.

There are one or two other matters with which I suppose I should deal before I sit down. Many members emphasized, and I referred to this last night, that in any dealings with the United States we should speak up. The hon. member for Peace River mentioned that, as did the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). In reply I can say only that we have spoken up. We do speak up when the circumstances seem to require it, and we will in the future. But I hope that we will show a sense of responsibility in doing so, and that we will relate our talk, when we have to talk, to our commitments and that we will relate our commitments to our resources. I should like to ask if any of the hon. members opposite would add to those commitments at this time and under the present circumstances?

One result of the new situation which seems to be in the process of being created is that the psychological side of the cold war will assume a greater importance than it has in the past, both in Europe and in Asia. From what we have been learning, it seems fairly clear that it is being stepped up. If it is meant to hearten free men now in slavery and to strengthen their determination to regain their freedom, that is something that we must all support. The essence of that program is contained in the word "liberation".

But I would suggest also, Mr. Speaker, that there is danger to the people behind the iron curtain who are longing to be free, in the misinterpretation and indeed the mishandling of this kind of psychological warfare embodied in the word "liberation". "Liberation" means more than that to those listening to clandestine broadcasts; it means troops marching in to liberate them. We would not be very responsible if, in our psychological warfare, now an important part of the cold war, we gave the impression at this time that troops are likely to be taking that kind of action overnight to liberate them. The trouble about psychological warfare, especially psychological warfare in a coalition of democracies, is that unless we are very careful we will confuse our friends as much as we confuse our foes. Harold Nicolson, who knows a great deal about the conduct of international affairs and the principles which should guide them, said not long ago that we should stop worrying so much about what is in the minds of our foes and make sure that we know what is in our own minds; then we might be more successful. That may be true but it is also helpful to know what is in the mind of the other man. A United States commentator on the air the other night, in talking about psychological warfare, said something that I thought was interesting when he stated: "If we do not know what we have in our own mind, it is reasonable to assume that the enemy can't know and so this might be just as good psychological warfare as if we planned it that way".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who said that?

Mr. Pearson: That was said by a United States columnist by the name of Lowell Mellett.

[Mr. Pearson.]

There is one final subject, namely, assistance to underdeveloped areas, which was dealt with by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and also by the hon. member for Assiniboia. In the few minutes I have left I cannot do justice to this exceedingly important subject. The hon. member for Melfort has, I think, presented an assortment or—and I hope he will not be offended if I call it this—a selection of statistics designed to show that Canada was not doing its part in providing non-military financial aid and technical assistance to other countries. I do not propose to follow him through his numerous calculations but I cannot agree with the conclusions that he drew from them.

For instance, I am surprised that he made such a hard and fast distinction between grants in aid and loans. His attempt to hold to this distinction led him to state that between April, 1947, and March, 1952, the United States spent over a billion dollars on offshore purchases from Canada whereas—and I quote from him—"we contributed not one cent to direct European aid". The fact is, of course, that during this very same period drawings on post-war loans by the United Kingdom and others were considerably in excess of $800 million, even after allowing for certain repayments. The use of these loans during that time represented a heavy demand on our economy. Unlike the United States, we did not have during those years a large balance of payments surplus; in fact we had a substantial deficit with the United States.

Despite that fact and despite the developing needs of our own economy, our contributions to other countries have, I think, compared favourably with those of the United States; and I do not think we need to blush in making the comparisons. As the hon. member himself observed, we provided over $2,414 million worth of assistance between the end of the war and the end of the last fiscal year, when the United States was providing something over $35 billion. Even if the element of military aid in both these figures were to be removed, it would be apparent that we had done more than one-fifteenth as much as the United States. That is a basis of comparison which I think is more than fair in terms of national income. The scale of financial aid that Canada has provided since the war, combined with relatively liberal import policies, seem to me to represent substantial contributions to the economic health and stability of the whole of the free world.

I think it is also important that we should carefully examine priorities between various competing claims. The first priority is, of course, to provide for our own defence security and the second is the development of our national resources. The countries which we are attempting to assist, and rightly so—the underdeveloped countries—themselves accept that priority. In some of those countries where the standard of living is so low and where the need for assistance is so great, they use up to fifty per cent and sixty per cent of their budget on their own military defence. They accept that priority in spite of their circumstances. I therefore doubt whether we are open to criticism if we have to give our own military defence first priority.

I think it should be remembered also that, with due regard to the importance we attach to economic assistance and technical aid, if war should come the only kind of technical assistance which would be required would be machinery for removing the rubble and the ruin. Yet as the hon. member for Melfort and others have quite rightly emphasized, we must do our part in promoting the welfare of underdeveloped countries. That is why we should continue—and I mentioned this point some days ago—to recognize the Colombo plan and similar activities as being of primary importance in our international economic policy.

This afternoon the question arose as to what we had done for Korean relief. I have not the figures before me but I know that there was a period—and it was not many months ago—when the contribution of Canada to Korean relief was greater than that from any other country, including the United States, and that that United Nations agency at one stage of its existence not so long back depended almost entirely on Canadian funds to keep going. Since that time the United States have made larger contributions than we have; but we have played an active part in that particular field of relief, and I hope we shall continue to do so.

Mr. Wright: Is there anything for it in the estimates this year?

Mr. Pearson: The matter is under consideration as to what contribution we should make this year.

In the course of this discussion which I am now closing we have had disagreements, but more in method than in principle, more in means than in ends. The points that unite us on foreign affairs are far more important than are the comparatively few that divide us. I think we are all agreed on our goals, namely, peace and security with freedom. I think we are all agreed that the threat to us is a global one and that we cannot have any security in the Atlantic without thinking also about security in the Pacific. We are becoming more and more aware of that fact.

Mr. Green: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra the other day said that in the North Atlantic council we have been talking about Pacific security. I think that is a healthy development. I think we are also all agreed that the tension remains great and that to meet that situation the maximum amount of unity in the free world is essential. I think we are also agreed that communist strategy remains constant though communist tactics may shift, and that we should not shift ourselves as their tactics shift but should rather keep our eye on their strategy.

Then finally I think we are all agreed that the policy of building up our strength to be used unprovocatively is working in western Europe, as the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) pointed out last evening; that if there is any easing of the tension there it is because of that fact. We would be well advised to extend to other areas the methods and the principles which we are beginning to find successful in relieving tension in Europe.

In Korea and the Far East, as in other areas where the infection of communist aggression is most virulent, the course we must follow must be dictated by our own strategy and by our own interests, not by the tactics of the aggressor. I think we are all convinced that the fight against the communist infection and its spread cannot be won overnight or be cured by any kind of miracle drug. It can and, I believe, will be won by pursuing a steady and determined policy based on patience, resolution and strength.

Mr. Low: I was wondering whether the minister would permit me one question in connection with the Korean situation. Does the United Nations still adhere to the determined policy, as laid down in a resolution of 1950, to unify Korea? If so, have they a policy or plan by which they think that that can be done?

Mr. Pearson: The military objective in Korea as established by the United Nations' resolution is to defeat aggression and only that. The political objectives that have been included in the United Nations' resolutions provide for the freedom and unity of all Korea on a democratic basis. It is of course, I think, the desire of all members of the United Nations that once aggression has been defeated and peace has been restored we should do our best to realize that objective as well.

Mr. Noseworthy: May I direct a question to the minister? In view of the intense propaganda that communist front organizations are carrying on in favour of a cease-fire in Korea, would the minister care to deal with it at a little greater length than he did in his speech?

Mr. Pearson: I shall be very glad to do so if the house will give me a minute or two, because this is an important subject. It is the core of the communist propaganda at the present moment, and it may be making more headway than it should. The demand now being made—and we shall hear about it at the United Nations general assembly, I am quite sure—is that we should have a cease-fire at once, and that these other subjects, prisoners of war and all the rest of it, should be left for further negotiation by a United Nations committee.

The best answer to that propaganda is that, if the communist states had accepted that resolution accepted by 54 other states last autumn at the United Nations general assembly, we would have had our cease-fire by now within the ambit of an armistice which would have dealt with prisoners of war. Those prisoners of war would have been exchanged by now, and the political conference which we have been talking about might have begun by now. This new propaganda is an effort on the part of the communists to make people forget that they refused to accept a cease-fire last autumn.

What they suggest now is that we accept a cease-fire at once, with other questions remaining to be determined by a commission of eleven members, of which four would be communist states, North Korea, communist China, Czechoslovakia and the U.S.S.R., and that that commission, which would settle these other questions, should proceed by a two-thirds majority which would give the four communists a veto over any action, or indeed over any decision.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE INTO OPERATIONS OF CONTROL BOARD

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to examine into the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy; that the said committee be empowered to sit during the sittings of the house and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and to report from time to time; that the said committee consist of Messrs. Bourget, Brooks, Coldwell, Gibson, Green, Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth), Low, McCusker, McIlraith, Murphy, Murray (Oxford), Pinard, Stuart (Charlotte), Winkler.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution I do so because I believe that it is the desire of the house generally to examine the government's program in the field of atomic energy. The government shares the view that has been expressed by several hon. members that it is desirable to review this program after a period of three years.

Some three years ago a committee was appointed and did make a comprehensive review of the program and reported to the house on its findings. I think it can be said without fear of contradiction that the report of the committee approved the operation as of that day, and I sincerely hope that another comprehensive review of the program will permit a similar report to be made to the house later in this session.

The program is still dominated by military requirements. Three years ago the committee was formed just after the first atomic explosion had occurred in Russia. Since then two other atomic explosions have occurred in Russia. The United Kingdom has exploded an atomic bomb in Australia. The United States have exploded several bombs in the Pacific, all indicating that the military field is very active indeed. As a matter of fact, it is common knowledge that the United States is spending enormous sums of money, running into billions of dollars, to expand the military program in atomic energy at this time. Therefore our own work in atomic energy is still strictly confined within the rules of secrecy.

We in Canada are not engaged in military development, but the work that we are doing at Chalk River is of importance to military developments, and for that reason, and for other reasons, cannot be made a subject of common knowledge. I am sure that the committee will appreciate that fact and will be governed accordingly.

Much has happened at Chalk River in the intervening three years. When the committee last visited the property the small pile, which was completed in 1945, and was known as the Zeep pile, was in operation, and a new pile of larger capacity was also in operation. The second pile has been doing very excellent work. Its operation has been subject to interruptions from time to time. I think the operation has been interrupted eight times by minor explosions, and today the pile is not in operation. At its inception it was estimated that the life of the pile would be four to five years. The pile has been in operation for five and a half years, and when the last explosion occurred it was decided that it would be worth while to decontaminate the calandria—the calandria is the interior of the pile—to withdraw the calandria for examination and build and instal a new calandria which would in effect give us a brand new pile for pile No. 2. That would cause interruption of its use for some months, but everyone interested in atomic energy believes that it is well worth while. For the first time we would be able to determine the life of a pile more accurately. We have also determined the operating steps that will prolong the life of the pile. Had we known a few months ago what we know today, the last explosion would not have occurred, and probably other explosions would not have occurred. Therefore we feel that rather than a calamity, the last explosion was perhaps fortunate in that we are able to rebuild the pile and to determine the effects on the pile of the operation of the past five and a half years.

Hon. members also know, as a result of the report of the earlier committee, that a third pile is now under construction. That work is on schedule. The pile will come into production sometime in 1954, as was planned. We believe that it will be the most efficient pile that has ever been built and will incorporate all the information that has been gained at Chalk River as well as information that has been gained elsewhere. The last should be the best, and I have little doubt that the new pile at Chalk River will be the best that has been built up to that time.

In the field of raw materials there has been a good deal of progress. Canada's sole source of supply, when the committee met last year, was the Eldorado mine at Great Bear lake. Since then mining development has been opened up in the Beaverlodge area of Saskatchewan, and an immense amount of work has been done in that area. A mill is under construction, and it is anticipated that mines in this area will be in production by May of this year. The deposit is very much larger than the Great Bear lake deposit, but of a somewhat lower grade. We are certain however that it will make a very valuable contribution to the supply of raw material for atomic energy.

A further development has been the installation of equipment to recover uranium from the gold tailings in South Africa; another development has been the discovery of deposits of uranium ore in Australia. The other sources of supply are producing at about the rate they were when the committee last met.

In the field of isotopes Canada has made a very valuable contribution in many directions. Perhaps the most spectacular isotope application has been the cobalt bomb; at least that has been the most spectacular application. Six of the cobalt bombs are in operation today in Canada and in the United States, and two more will be in operation within a month or two. The demand for the bombs is greater than Canada can supply in any reasonable time. The Canadian pile happens to be the only one that can turn out cobalt 60 within a reasonably short time. We can do it at Chalk River very much quicker than any other pile. The use of isotopes is expanding rapidly in many fields, and their sale has become an important business. The Chalk River organization is on the point of erecting a special building in Ottawa to manufacture isotopes into various commercial applications.

The government has felt that the work of atomic energy should be concentrated under a management independent of the national research council. When the committee last visited Chalk River the property was being managed by the national research council; today it is being managed by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, a crown company formed some months ago. I think this was a constructive step.

The next problem facing those interested in atomic energy is the application of that energy to the production of power. Much progress has been made to that end; but much more needs to be done before we have an efficient application of this kind. In the United States it is common knowledge that an atomic-driven submarine is being developed. We also know that other applications of atomic energy for power are under construction.

Here in Canada we believe that the time has come to undertake the development of atomic power in this country, and discussions are going on as to ways and means of bringing about that development. We feel that the production of power is the concern of those who distribute power, organizations like the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, or the major privately-owned power companies.

It is hoped that arrangements can be worked out so that the knowledge of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited can be made available to these organizations, and that the organizations themselves can undertake the development work. I am sure the committee will be interested in examining that phase of the subject, and I know the government will be interested in obtaining the views of the committee as to whether that is a sound approach to a very important problem.

We do know that atomic power can be generated at a cost which at present is not as low as hydroelectric power, but which is very interesting, indeed, as applied to remote areas where hydro power is not available. It is my own belief, and that of others who are associated with the problem, that the development of atomic power will lead to lower costs, and a very interesting opportunity to enlarge our national resources in the field of power.

I do not know that I need say more at this time. I might add that all the resources of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and other crown organizations, will be at the disposal of the committee; and I predict that the members of that committee will have a most interesting experience in following its work.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this is one debate in which we can all very well agree on the wisdom of the proposal under discussion. The official opposition heartily support the minister's motion to set up this special committee to examine into the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy, and we are grateful to the minister for the information he has given the house today.

As he knows, when the atomic energy control board was first set up in 1946, we took the stand that there should be some committee of the house, or a joint committee of the House and Senate, whose duty would be to keep in touch with the activities of the atomic energy control board. The government did not see fit to accept that suggestion; it was not until the fall session in 1949 that a committee of any sort was set up in the house. As the minister has indicated, there was then appointed a select committee to examine the activities of the atomic energy control board. The motion was worded somewhat differently from the one now before us, but I would imagine that the scope of the present motion will be about the same as that passed in the fall of 1949.

We had advocated that there should be a committee, partly because of the situation in the United States. I admit at the outset that their legislative process is quite different from ours. But in that country the United States atomic energy commission has, and has had from the start, three watchdog committees. One is known as the general advisory committee, another as the military liaison committee, and the third as the joint committee on atomic energy, this last named being a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The general advisory committee is appointed by the president and consists of nine members, all of whom are outstanding men either in the scientific or in the business world. Their duty is to advise the commission on scientific and technical matters relating to materials, production, research and development. I presume in Canada we can get somewhat the same advice from the advisory body connected with the national research council which consists of leading scientific men from different parts of Canada.

The military liaison committee in the United States has the duty of advising and consulting with the atomic energy commission on all atomic energy matters which it deems to relate to military applications, including the development, manufacture, use and storage of bombs, the allocation of fissionable material for military research, and the control of information relating to the manufacture or utilization of atomic weapons. The first concern there has been the development of the atomic bomb and I suppose there has been far more need for a military liaison committee than would be the case in Canada.

However, there seems to be more reason why Canada should attempt to follow the United States provision for a committee of elected representatives. The purpose of that joint committee, which as I have said is composed of members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, there being nine from each body, is to make continuing studies of the activities of the atomic energy commission and of problems relating to the development, use and control of atomic energy. That is set out in the twelfth semi-annual report of the United States atomic energy commission, at page 53. The report goes on to say:

> The committee is kept fully and currently informed with respect to the commission's activities. Legislation relating primarily to the commission or to atomic energy matters are referred to the committee.

They are supposed to be acting for congress. It is put very well in one of the reports of the United States atomic energy commission in this way:

> The atomic energy act provides for very close relationship between the joint committee—

That is the joint committee of congress.

> —and the atomic energy commission. This close relationship recognizes the somewhat unusual nature of the atomic energy program and appears to afford a continuing and thorough-going opportunity for the congress, through the joint committee, to keep informed of and to bring its ideas to bear upon the atomic energy commission program.

The minister has said that in Canada we have followed the practice of appointing a committee to review the program of our atomic energy control board, apparently once every three years. Of course there is a vast difference between an arrangement of that kind and a plan such as the United States is following. I hope that the government will give some further thought to this question because it does seem vital that the House of Commons, and for that matter the Senate, of Canada should be tied in more closely with atomic energy developments in this country. I put that forward as a suggestion to the minister for consideration as to what the course should be in the future.

I had the privilege of serving on the committee which was set up in 1949. I notice that the same members are to be appointed this year with the exception that the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Murray) replaces the Hon. Louis Breithaupt, who is now the lieutenant-governor of Ontario. I have never served on a committee where the work was more interesting or where there was more co-operation, and I give some credit for that to the chairman, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). We had worth-while sessions and I am sure that all hon. members who are going back on the new committee are delighted that they are to have that opportunity.

I must say also that I was much impressed by the spirit of the young Canadians who are carrying on this atomic energy work for Canada. I have never encountered such high morale or esprit de corps as we found at Chalk River and Deep River except in the Canadian corps during the late years of the first war. As a matter of fact, the attitude of the young men at Chalk River reminded me very much of the attitude of the young Canadians in those war years.

Those young men and women are doing a grand job for Canada. I am sure that many of them could be earning larger salaries in the United States or other countries, but as one of them expressed it to me, "Oh, this is so exciting I would not leave for anything." I presume the spirit is much the same at the present time. We were also greatly impressed with the attitude of the universities of Canada. They have taken a major share in the development of this atomic energy program and deserve great credit from the Canadian people.

As the minister has said, in 1949 the main interest was the development of atomic energy for defence purposes. At that time its use for civilian purposes was considered to be remote, in fact so remote that, as I remember, the committee did not spend much time in considering that side of the problem. However, it now turns out that atomic energy will be available for power purposes much sooner than had been anticipated. I notice in the report of our own atomic energy control board for the fiscal year 1951-52 there is reference to that fact at page 8 in the following words:

> The increasing industrial aspects of this project arising out of the construction of the new reactor and the growing view that large-scale industrial application of atomic energy was closer at hand than had been expected, however, have made it desirable that this project be operated by a separate organization without other responsibilities.

The report then went on to tell of the setting up of a new crown company known as Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. It, by the way, is under the presidency of Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, who was formerly president of the national research council and who certainly deserves a great deal of the credit for the success which Canada has achieved.

I notice, in checking the reports from the United States, that they are now working on a second submarine, and that also they are working on, I think it is called, a "prototype power reactor" for aircraft. I have here the thirteenth semi-annual report of the United States atomic energy commission which was issued just a few days ago. It says:

> A contract was entered into for developing a reactor to supply power for a large naval vessel such as an aircraft carrier.

Also:

> Work began on a testing facility for prototype nuclear power plants for aircraft.

A press dispatch dated January 29 of this year from New York reads as follows:

> Atomic energy to run industrial power plants and light homes is possible within two years—one authority predicts today—if congress and the defence department would permit it.
> A big utility company goes him one better and says it may be ready within one year to build an atomic power plant and feed its juice into existing electric lines in the Detroit area.

Dispatches of about the same time indicate that in the United Kingdom they are also preparing to build or are actually building an atomic power plant to produce power for use in industry.

So, I think, our main interest is now in the potentialities of atomic energy in the civilian field, and primarily as a source of power. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that brings parliament even more directly into the picture. As a parliament we are really very deeply and directly involved in this development. I might give some reasons for that submission.

In the first place, in Canada the state or the government has assumed all the responsibility for purchasing the raw material, uranium. For a time the government had all the responsibility also for discovering uranium; but now, I believe, private industry is encouraged to do the mining but the government, through the Eldorado Refining company, purchases all of the uranium. Also, the state is entirely responsible for the manufacture of any products of this uranium and for the distribution of those products. Some day, and I take it from what the minister has said today that the day has just about arrived in Canada, a decision will have to be made as to the extent to which private industry will participate. I doubt very much whether the government can go on indefinitely assuming the whole and complete responsibility.

I notice that the Americans are having the same problem. They moved, some months ago, to further the participation of industry in the atomic energy program. For example, I find in the twelfth semi-annual report of the atomic energy commission, at page 2:

> The progress of power reactor development and of studies by industrial teams on possible combinations of plutonium and power production, along with the mounting impact of atomic energy progress upon the industrial community of the nation, led to the establishment of an office of industrial development . . . This office . . . maintains a positive, continous link-up between American industry, large and small, and the atomic energy program for purposes of the widest possible participation of industry in the program, and the widest possible service of the atomic energy program to industry.

This twelfth report also indicates that for the first time industry was being permitted to build one of the reactors. All the rest were built by the commission; apparently permission had been given for one privately owned reactor.

Then in the thirteenth report, the latest report, we find that they really have come up against the problem of what part industry is to play, and on page 3 we find this:

> Highly important for the long pull in the nuclear power field, industrial firms and leaders have evinced a solid and a growing interest in power reactor development. This interest was indicated in part by the increasing number of suggestions that the atomic energy act be revised to encourage further industrial activity. These suggestions raise policy issues as atomic energy development enters its second decade.

It is hard for us to realize that it is now over ten years since atomic energy work first began.

> The considerations involved are neither few nor simple. Pages could be filled with the main questions of policy and the smaller questions of detail which follow in their train.

[Mr. Green.]

On page 23 we find a further reference to the same problem as follows:

> The anticipated large-scale participation by industry raises unique policy and contractual problems on such matters as ownership of plants, licensing and use of fissionable materials, secrecy, patent rights, public safety, and liability in case of disaster. Such broad questions require that decisions be reached in collaboration with other government agencies.

Now, Canada will be faced with those same problems and the responsibility, in the long run, will have to rest on the Canadian parliament.

Then another reason why I say we are directly involved is the cost. The country has to finance this program and, as I read the estimates for the coming fiscal year, there will be nearly $20 million required for the atomic energy control board. The minister can correct me if I am wrong in that, but I think the figure is approximately correct.

Mr. Howe: I think it is too high, but I suppose that is one matter the committee can look into.

Mr. Green: Well, the figures are found on page 45 of the estimates, under "National research council and atomic energy control board", and they add up this way: Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, grants for research, current operation and maintenance of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, construction or acquisition of buildings—a total of $12,466,888. Then there is an item on page 75 to provide for advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and so on, $7,111,980, and also $300,000 to provide working capital for the new crown company. The figures taken together total between $19 and $20 million, and for the fiscal year which is expiring on March 31 the figure is about $17·5 million. In any event, a lot of money is involved and it is the responsibility of parliament to pass those votes and, of course, to see that the money is properly expended.

There is a third reason why parliament is directly involved in this program, and that is the tremendously widespread effect that atomic energy is bound to have on our national economy. Parliament must obtain the knowledge necessary to shape wise policies on this question. This cannot be achieved if none of the members of the house know what is being done. We cannot have wise policies adopted here if members of the house do not have information as to what is taking place. For all these reasons, I repeat that parliament is directly involved. I believe that the committee can be a great help, perhaps not only to those who are taking part in the program but also to other members of parliament.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that atomic energy forms one part, and a very important part, of the fascinating picture of the future Canada which is unfolding before our eyes. We are in the front rank in this new development. I believe our production of uranium is the second largest in the world. Perhaps I am wrong in that. I believe that Belgium—

Mr. Howe: It is third at present, but I think it will be second when the Beaverlodge comes into operation.

Mr. Green: It was second at one time, apparently. Is United States second now?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: And Canada is third.

Mr. Brooks: Do we know how much is being developed in Russia?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Green: In addition, we have been connected with this development from the start. The United States, the United Kingdom and Canada have been partners from the beginning in working out the whole atomic energy program. We stand, therefore, in a very favourable position. If we take our position with regard to atomic power, water power, coal, oil and natural gas, I believe that together they make it possible for us to develop Canada into one of the leading nations of the world.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we of the C.C.F. welcome wholeheartedly this motion to establish once again the special committee on atomic energy. When we are dealing with this subject we realize it is a most fascinating field, indeed one that excites the imagination. I think perhaps many of us believe that the day will come when the realities that arise from atomic energy will be even greater than our imaginations might portray.

We are particularly glad to know the extent to which our activities in the field of atomic energy relate to finding ways and means of using its power in peacetime pursuits and in the field of medicine. I suppose the world as a whole will not soon forget that the first inkling we had that atomic energy was with us was in its use for destructive purposes at the end of world war II. We still think of it in terms of the extent to which it might bring wholesale destruction. Yet, Mr. Speaker, there have been other discoveries and other inventions across the years, which men of those days thought would bring the end of the world. Instead, those discoveries and those inventions have led to a higher standard of living and greater productivity for the good of mankind. I am one of those who believe that if we can keep our heads in respect of international affairs, along the lines suggested in another speech earlier today, we might live to see the day when we can forget the extreme dangers involved in atomic energy and enjoy the untold benefits which it holds for mankind.

I am sure that all of us, as Canadians, are particularly proud of the part Canada has played in the development of atomic energy. We hope that very real progress can be made in the next few years, particularly in relation to power for peacetime industry and in relation to the use of this marvellous discovery to aid the health of mankind.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I find myself in sympathy with a good deal of what he said. There is, of course, one point where we part a bit, and that is when it comes to the question of the relationship between public authority and private enterprise so far as atomic energy is concerned. There are those who will see plausibility in the case he was making, but it does seem to me that atomic energy is so important to the people as a whole that a policy of public control is extremely important. In that connection, we support the position that has been taken by the government thus far. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that further discussion might be had in the committee as to the relationship between parliament and the executive in connection with this matter, but I do urge that public control of the development of atomic energy be maintained.

There are other thoughts, Mr. Speaker, that one might develop at this time, but I think it is perhaps unnecessary to do so. I may take this opportunity, particularly because my leader happens to be out of the house having had to go and record a broadcast, to say that we are very pleased that he is not only able to be back with us in the house but that he can take his place again on this special committee on atomic energy. He found it of great interest when he was a member four years ago, and I am sure he was able to make a contribution to the discussions of that committee which will be repeated on this occasion.

Having said that, and since my leader is not here to check me for saying what I am now going to say on behalf of those in this group, I want to say that we were most grateful to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the kind words of welcome he extended to our leader when he was able to return to the house yesterday.

With those few comments, I am happy to indicate our wholehearted support of this motion for the establishment of this committee.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I feel it would be unnecessary for me to launch into a long speech this afternoon in connection with the motion that has been moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). But I think it is wise for me to indicate, on behalf of my colleagues, that we are happy that he has brought forward this resolution and is preparing to set up the committee on atomic energy again this year. I also express to the minister my appreciation for the way in which, in 1949, he facilitated all the arrangements, as far as it was humanly possible to do so, so that we should have the fullest investigation into atomic energy development at that time.

I was a member of the committee in 1949 and I greatly enjoyed my work. In fact, I do not know when I have served on a committee that intrigued me quite so much as did this one. I think I can subscribe fully to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) when he stated that the committee was unified. They went at their work with zest and energy; and I believe we came out of it with a fund of information, at least on our own level, that we could appreciate. As far as we could understand the whole project, I think we came out perfectly satisfied that the government's policy was good, that it was sound and that they were making the right kind of progress.

In the course of our investigation we learned that the major use being made of the plutonium or the fissionable materials that were being manufactured was for defence purposes in case we ever had to use them. Nevertheless, we felt that the project at Chalk River was most important and necessary. I hope nobody will do as the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) did last night; that is, hook on to what I have just now said and claim that because we support the government in its effort to supply a certain amount of fissionable material for atomic bombs, we therefore stand for war. That kind of thing is foolish; it is childish. We stand for the best possible use of what we have at hand to meet situations that now confront us as well as situations that may develop in the years ahead.

I detest the idea and the thought of having to use atomic energy for destructive purposes. When I say that, I think I am expressing the feeling of every member of that committee. I do not believe there was a person on it at any time who felt that it was a good thing for us to be spending our energy and our materials in the development of a substance that could blow into smithereens thousands of people and millions of dollars worth of property. But we must be realistic. As long as we are living in a world that is divided, as is the world today, into two hostile camps, I think it is essential in the interests of humanity that we keep ourselves prepared. I also think that what Canada has been doing in the development of atomic energy may have contributed in no small way to the maintenance of peace up to this time. The very fact that we are in a position to defend ourselves in the free world has, I think, been a source of strength that has prevented aggression.

But what I am most anxious about now is how we shall be able to develop atomic energy for use in peacetime. I welcomed the statement the minister made this afternoon. I think he used some such words as these: The time has now come for the development of power using atomic energy. I think that is an exceedingly encouraging statement. When we were studying atomic energy at Chalk River and in the committee in 1949 I believe we were given the impression that perhaps the development of atomic energy for peacetime purposes, or at least its application for the development of power, might be quite a number of years ahead. I believe one of the things we were told at that time was that the high temperatures required to develop power in sufficient quantity to make it economical and worth while would require a type of material, for containing the little pile itself, that could withstand these terrific temperatures, and that nothing had yet been developed that could do so. I believe we were told at that time that in the field of ceramics certain highly interesting work had been going on and that in that field they might find the answer to the great need for a material that could withstand these terrifically high temperatures.

Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward to learning what progress has been made in that direction since 1949. I am also anxious to see every possible development in the field of atomic energy so that outlying places—those remote areas that need power—will be able to have it without having to pay the terrific costs now involved in carrying it overland for the great distances that it has to be carried. It looks to me as though the development of atomic energy for that purpose is feasible, and opens up great possibilities for the building of fairly large centres in the remoter areas of our country. It will be intensely interesting to see just what has been achieved in the three years since we last studied this matter.

Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I have been interested in following the developments in the field of medicine, particularly with regard to isotopes and cobalt bombs. From what the minister said this afternoon I understand that six of those bombs have now been made available to various universities and medical centres, and that perhaps two more are in process of manufacture. I hope I am right when I say I believe one of those is earmarked for the university in Edmonton, or else they already have one; at least we have been looking for one for some time. Our cancer clinics and research and development bodies in that area have certainly shown the need for a cobalt bomb.

The development of isotopes or the use of activated materials has been of tremendous importance not only in the field of medicine but also in industry. I have been keenly interested in noting how they have been applied to industry for the perfection of the different materials that we have been making here. We in Canada stand in a preferred position in the world by virtue of the fact that we have gone so far in the development of atomic energy.

That fact is a testimony to the foresight of those men of vision who undertook the project in the first place. I believe that to Dr. Mackenzie we owe something of a debt not only of gratitude but of recognition for the great work he has done. Mr. Speaker, without multiplying words at all, let me say that in 1949, when we visited the plant at Chalk River, we were shown every courtesy. Dr. Mackenzie and his splendid group of young scientists gave us every opportunity to see and to learn. They made available every possible facility and, as I said, were extremely courteous in every way. We appreciated that, and I am looking forward to feeling that same exhilaration that I felt in 1949. May I say too that the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), also contributed greatly to the success of the committee's sittings in 1949. I heartily support the resolution this afternoon.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): I should like to say a few words on the motion to set up this atomic energy committee. I think it is a step in the right direction. It will give hon. members some insight into our atomic energy commitments, and just what this country has achieved in the way of leadership in the world in this particular form of energy.

I should like to compliment the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on the position that Canada finds herself in with regard to atomic energy. It is a tribute to his foresight that we are one of the world leaders so far as atomic energy is concerned, and we have attained that position at a very moderate investment as compared with other countries that have invested in atomic energy. Foresight was required to put us in this position. Foresight and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are pretty well synonymous so far as the people of this country are concerned. Most people do not realize just what we owe to that foresight, not only as regards atomic energy but in other matters in which he has led the way in so far as Canada is concerned. Certainly we in the riding of Meadow Lake are indebted to that foresight.

In 1946 a major uranium strike was made when they found the St. Louis fault at Beaverlodge lake. Under the Minister of Trade and Commerce we were not very long in going in there and developing it on a national basis. It was the first actual development of any kind that occurred in that part of Saskatchewan. Since then it has attracted some private companies that have also gone in and done some development work. Previous to that it was a straight prospecting business.

The development of uranium is a very costly affair. But as a national asset we will realize a great deal from the money we have expended in this area. By the time they have their new concentrator running, possibly at the end of May of this year, the Eldorado Mining and Refining company will have spent approximately $17 million in development work at Beaverlodge. During that time they have proved a body of ore 1,000 feet in depth at half a dozen levels. At the various levels where they have projected into the rock face for over some 360 feet they have shown that there is a vein of pitchblende assaying somewhere between $50 and $450 a ton, from 3 feet wide to 16 feet wide, so that an ore body of some considerable magnitude has already been proved.

That is just in one shaft. It is proposed to take out 500 tons a day as soon as the concentrator is ready for operation, and to later increase that to 2,000 tons a day out of the one shaft. In other words it is proposed to run during the first year at about 25 per cent of capacity in that shaft. Altogether there are four of these shafts that the Eldorado company has sunk, and I understand that one of them is even more promising than the one that I have just been discussing.

If you take the minimum value of the ore that has been taken out, which assays $50 a ton, you will find that we will get back more than $9 million at 25 per cent capacity of the first shaft in the first twelve months of operation, so you can see that at the very minimum we will be only two years in getting our money back if we maintain only a 25 per cent production in the first shaft. When all four shafts are at their maximum production it is only a proposition of arithmetic, knowing the ore that has been proven there, to show that this will be a national asset of the magnitude of some $250 million a year as soon as it is brought into full production.

That entails only the government mine. It has been instrumental in bringing in private mines around its outer perimeter. We have such firms as Nesbitt-La Bine who are also spending considerable money in development work. They have a shaft some 350 feet in depth, and are developing levels. When I was talking to some of their experts they told me that they were assured of a very high grade ore which is running at $58 a ton minimum.

The impact of atomic energy is possibly not realized by many people, but it will have a great bearing on our future way of life. As the steam engine changed society, and the advent of the combustion engine also had a very great impact on our way of life, so atomic energy will have an even greater impact as time goes on.

When the atom is discussed as a weapon most people stand somewhat in awe of it. What they think of is the atom bomb wiping out whole cities. Many people do not realize that it has been a great deterrent as far as the expansion of communism is concerned. In effect we have been basking under the umbrella of atomic energy in this country and in all the free world for the last four or five years. I do not think we would be in the peaceful situation in which we now find ourselves if we had not had atomic energy as a weapon. Therefore it is one of the major elements in our society.

Uranium, the component of atomic energy, is the basic material out of which atomic energy is composed. It is the major metal, shall I say, in the world today. Hon. members might be interested in Uranium City. It is something that you see in the press from day to day. When you hear that name you immediately conjure up a fair-sized city. Three years ago it did not exist except on a planning board. It is provincial land in Saskatchewan on the shore of Martin lake, which is about three or four miles from the Eldorado mines, and was laid out by the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will consider private and public bills.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR PAYMENT FOR FARM STORAGE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935 (payment for farm storage).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased again to move second reading of a bill to amend the wheat board act in order that farm storage shall be paid to producers. Before entering upon a discussion of the bill, as this is the first opportunity I have had I should like to welcome the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) back to Canada. I hope his trip met with every success and that it will result in expanding trade for Canada in the future.

This is a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Members of this group believe in the wheat board system of marketing grain. We believe the principle of having the wheat board handle all grains is sound, and we would like to see the act amended so that it might be broadened to cover the marketing of all grains, and not be confined as it now is to wheat, oats and barley.

Recently in this session I have not directed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to the international wheat agreement discussions. But may I express the hope that the negotiations will be successful in providing a new international agreement, with such increases in prices as have been sought by the farmers of western Canada. Certainly I for one would be greatly disappointed if the conference failed and if, as wheat producers, we had to face the future without an adequate international wheat agreement, because I think such an agreement would provide a greater degree of security for farmers in the production of their grain.

If this bill were adopted by parliament it would leave it to the wheat board to decide during what length of time farm storage would be paid, but it would make it mandatory that in each pool period such farm storage should be paid.

For the benefit of hon. members who do not come from the three prairie provinces perhaps I should explain that this bill does not ask for any further expenditure from the federal treasury, but merely asks for a somewhat different distribution of the moneys the wheat board receives from the marketing of grain. I might add that it would not be a substantial redistribution, but one that would, I believe, contain some distinct advantages for prairie producers.

During the last two or three years we have seen the carryover of grain steadily increasing. Recently we had a bumper crop; and because of that crop, following as it did two previous large crops, we have now on hand in Canada a large quantity of grain. In order to deal fairly with that situation I feel two things are needed, one of which is farm storage as suggested by this bill and the other an advance payment on farm-stored grain. I believe if those two measures were adopted it would greatly increase the security of the farmer in the production of grain.

At an earlier point in the session I tried to obtain legislation which would make provision for an advance payment to farmers on farm-stored grain. I can think of no better security for such advance payments than grain in sound storage on Canadian farms. While a number of farmers can go to the banks to obtain loans, the smaller farmers, who very often have a substantial debt, find it difficult to obtain the necessary advances from the banks.

This bill is confined to only one aspect of the matter, and that is the payment of a storage rate for grain stored on the farms. However, along with that I would like to see legislation, which has been of value elsewhere, for an advance payment in respect of that grain so stored. I might point out that in the United States their commodity credit corporation has for many years made provision for loans for farm-stored grain, and I believe such loans have been to the advantage of the farmers in that country. It has not been difficult from the standpoint of administration, and has worked well. I have seen no suggestion in the United States that its legislation should be withdrawn. I would like to see similar legislation in Canada adapted to our particular circumstances. Such legislation would make provision whereby farmers could obtain advances on farm-stored grain.

If this bill were to pass, the wheat board would find its administration quite simple. Similar farm storage payments were made in the early years of the war. These payments were effected through a small increase in the initial payments, based upon the then storage rates. If such a bill were now accepted the wheat board would periodically increase the initial price to the extent of a quarter, a half or one cent per bushel, depending upon the period between increases in the price of wheat.

The mechanics of the legislation therefore would be simple. The wheat board would find no difficulty in matters of administration, and it would not be costly. There are some hundreds of grades of wheat, and for each grade there is a different price. The wheat board, upon being asked to adjust those various prices by an amount equal to the farm storage rate, would add little or no additional administrative costs.

I believe such a storage payment is desirable because it would enable farmers who, through no fault of their own, must keep grain on their farms, to obtain some compensation for the added expense involved. Even in a given community, with a given quota, some farmers find it more difficult than others to market their grain at an early date. The farmer with modern equipment, operating even a large farm, can harvest his crop in a relatively short time and can usually haul out his quota immediately. The smaller farmer, however, cannot do this. He may have to wait on a custom combine and he may not have adequate facilities for hauling his own grain.

Therefore in a given community one farmer has not the same opportunity to dispose of his grain as have others.

Then of course there is inequality as between various marketing points. One reason there is inequality is the fact that country elevator storage space is not and cannot be evenly distributed. Even if it were evenly distributed on the basis of any given formula, the fact that in some areas there are large crops while there are smaller crops in other areas would mean that relative to the crop that was produced the elevator storage space at some points would be inadequate.

One of the main causes of inequality is the fact that the quotas established from time to time, with the exception of the initial quotas, vary from one elevator marketing point to another. When I spoke a year ago on this subject I was able to point out what I considered were grave inequalities and bring them to the attention of the minister. I remember pointing out at one time that at a neighbouring marketing point the quota was 8 bushels per acre but very few farmers had delivered grain. Finally the farmers awoke one morning to find that the quota had been increased from 8 to 12 bushels per acre. Even though the vast majority of them had delivered only a small part of the original 8-bushel quota, that is what happened.

I am happy to say that the wheat board has improved this year on its system of quotas. There is not the same variation or disparity in the quotas as between one area and another which prevailed last year. I believe that one of the main reasons the quotas have been more equitable is the fact that the quota was not taken off this fall for a period of three weeks, as it was the year before, thus enabling certain farmers to market a large part of their crop while other farmers who had been unable to thresh at that time were unable to haul an equivalent amount of grain until months later.

I want to pay this tribute to the wheat board. In my opinion their quota system has been improved substantially over the previous year. I am sure the wheat board cannot establish the quotas it would like to establish because that depends so greatly upon the box car situation. If box cars were distributed evenly to all marketing points, then the wheat board could increase the quota at an even rate all across the three prairie provinces.

A year ago last fall I found that the box car shortage was very critical at many marketing points. There were complaints from farmers at many points that they had had few box cars, in some instances over a period of months. The same situation was brought to my attention this fall, but I must say that it concerned a relatively smaller number of points. I believe that the box car distribution this past fall was improved over the distribution of a year ago.

I might mention one example. I went into the marketing point of Drinkwater during the Christmas recess, and the elevator agents there told me that most farmers, but not all, had the week or two before marketed their 8-bushel quota, but that before all farmers had had an opportunity to market that quota, the 8-bushel quota had been raised to 12 bushels without any request by the elevator agents. I took that up with the transport controller, Mr. R. Milner, and I must say that he took very quick action, because in a short time substantial numbers of box cars were spotted at that marketing point and the farmers were thus enabled to market an increased quantity of grain. I imagine that in the main it helped those farmers who had not at that time marketed their full 8-bushel quota. So I say that there has been an improvement in the general quota distribution.

If the quota were established at the same figure and kept at an even figure throughout the prairie provinces during all the crop year there would be no purpose in my presenting this bill. The fact is that even though the initial quota is established at a given figure, the increase that takes place in the quota is not even. Because that increase is not made in an even manner, you have discrimination between farmers hauling to one point and those who haul to another. Some farmers must wait months in order to have their first quota increased, while others have a 15-bushel quota established at an early date. I feel that those farmers at a point where the quota is kept low have legitimate reason to ask the wheat board to pay farm storage. There is no reason why farmers should not be given more equitable treatment than has been given even during the present year by the established wheat board quotas.

Another matter that might be mentioned in connection with equality is the marketing of barley. I cannot speak as to the situation across all western Canada, but I do know what it was at my own marketing point. The initial quota for wheat was 5 bushels per acre, and the initial quota for barley was 4 bushels per acre. For a long time the elevator companies at that marketing point bought no barley. They told me they were under wheat board orders to fill all box cars being spotted with milling grades of wheat. Therefore the farmer who had grown a substantial acreage of barley was unable to haul any barley for a long time. As a matter of fact it is only in recent weeks that farmers have been able to haul barley to the elevators in any substantial quantities.

Even though wheat quotas had been kept absolutely the same throughout the three prairie provinces, if the barley quota were too low then those men who concentrate on the production of barley would be in a position of inequality as compared to the producer of wheat. That is another reason why the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) should consider allowing this bill to pass so that farm storage payments shall be made.

Before leaving this particular aspect may I say there is another reason why I feel farm storage payments would be of advantage. As hon. members from western Canada know, the marketing situation at the present time has in it very little of the basic elements of the free enterprise system which so many members in this house support. It has not in it the basic element of competition because in most instances the farmer is not free to haul his grain to the elevator of his own choice; he is forced through economic circumstances to haul grain to the elevator which has space available. So you find that farmers who would like to haul only to the line company elevator, shall we say, feel that they must of necessity haul part of their crop to the pool elevator system when there is room in the local pool elevator. A very large number of farmers in the past, when there was space in all elevators, were pool men 100 per cent but during the past few years they have distributed their grain amongst the various elevator companies operating at that point on the basis of the storage that was available, and because they required to sell their grain.

If we paid farm storage that would not remedy that situation, but I do believe that it would be of some help to farmers who prefer one type of elevator system more than the other. It would be some compensation and some inducement for them to store their grain and finally haul it out to the elevator of their choice. Certainly we have not the basic elements of the free enterprise system in so far as the farmer selling his grain is concerned. He just goes down, talks to the elevator man and says: "Have you got room for a load of grain?" The first one who says yes usually gets the load of grain within an hour or two. I feel that, in order to better enable farmers to haul their grain to the elevator of their own choice, a farm storage payment should be provided.

We already have, of course, payment of storage now; but that payment is made by the wheat board to the elevator companies, and there is no complaint about that. It is a legitimate charge on the cost of handling grain and the elevator companies are paid what seems to me a reasonable storage rate. Even with an increase in the country elevator storage facilities, as there has been over the last few years, nevertheless for a given period of time most farmers must store on their own farms almost all their grain. So a farmer has to provide his own storage, and then the elevator companies provide storage at the elevator marketing point. In any year, except perhaps when there is a bumper crop, the farmers will have sufficient storage on their own farms to store their own grain, and the elevator companies have a certain amount of storage at the elevator marketing points. So farmers are forced now to provide their own storage facilities and the wheat board of course pays them no storage.

The elevator companies are in a preferred position in that respect. They are paid by the Canadian wheat board a storage rate for all grain they have on hand. I see by the Canadian wheat board report for the crop year ending July 31, 1952, that the carrying charges on wheat stored in country elevators amounted to some $15,300,000. So storage is being paid now by the wheat board, and the purpose of this bill is to extend that payment of storage so that farmers may be placed in the same category.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), speaking in this debate last year, at page 1711 of Hansard had this to say:

> A point has been made of the fact that the farmer pays storage to the elevators. He pays only that storage which is incidental to getting his wheat, oats or barley to market in the shortest possible time. The grain is not purposely held in the country elevators.

I think the farmer today is paying something more than for sufficient storage at country elevator points to get the grain into box cars and moved to the lakehead as quickly as possible.

I cannot remember a time at our local marketing point, that is in the last two or three years, when the elevators did not have substantial quantities of grain on hand and when there was not grain available for loading into box cars. I notice that from 1949 to 1952 there has been a substantial increase in the licensed storage capacity of country elevators. In 1949 the storage capacity of country elevators was 262½ million bushels. That has been increased until in 1952 there was storage for approximately 305 million bushels. There has been in that three-year period an increase in the country elevator storage capacity of 42½ million bushels. Of course farmers are paying the storage on the grain that is stored in that additional storage space; and if that additional 42½ million bushels of storage space were filled with grain it would cost the prairie producers $425,000 a month.

My point is that if the 262½ million bushels of space available in 1949 was sufficient storage space at country elevator points for farmers to market their grain and allow the grain to be moved to the lakehead at a rapid rate, then this increase of 42½ million bushels of storage space is merely gravy for the elevator companies and is not necessary, and is adding very little in the way of improving the farmers' marketing facilities.

I believe the western producers would overwhelmingly support this legislation. I have gone over the records of the three prairie farm unions and last year I placed certain resolutions on Hansard. I see I have not time enough to do so this year; but the Alberta farmers' union, the Saskatchewan farmers' union and the Manitoba farmers' union in convention, by way of resolutions and in presentations to the Canadian wheat board and other departments of the federal government, have advocated payment of farm storage. I must admit that in the correspondence I have had with the farmers' own elevator companies I have found their position in regard to this legislation was, I believe, fairly described last year when I said that they were more or less neutral. I took it from their correspondence that they were not advocating this legislation, but they were also not opposing it.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce in discussing this question last year seemed to have two main points in opposing it. For example, he said at page 1709 of Hansard that it would constitute an impediment in the marketing of grain:

> I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that no impediment should be put in the way of getting saleable wheat delivered to the wheat board and delivered by the board to ocean ships as rapidly as the market will absorb it.

He said on the next page:

> Surely no inducement should be held out to any producer which would induce him to avoid delivering his grain when that grain is needed by the wheat board.

And on the next page:

> I think that the first test that I would apply is this. Is it a good thing for all the farmers of western Canada that certain people should hold back their grain when it is possible to deliver it to the elevators? I say that farm storage does not produce a beneficial result.

Well, I do not think the passage of this bill would induce farmers to hold back their grain to the point where the wheat board would be short of grain and could not get grain to the lakehead. As I said earlier I think our experience in the last three years has been that on almost every occasion when elevators are full of grain, the thing that has held up the delivery of grain has not been the lack of grain but lack of box cars and transportation facilities. I suggest, therefore, that the passage of this legislation would not be an inducement that would result in a large number of farmers keeping vast quantities of grain on the farm, to the point where the board would not have grain available to meet its commitments.

I will admit that there are some farmers who, perhaps, would be encouraged—the minister said some farmers with large farms —to hold their grain. What is the percentage of large farms in western Canada? You might define a large operator as a farmer with more than five quarter-sections of land. From the census I find that in Saskatchewan, out of 112,000 farmers there are less than 8 per cent in that category. According to the income tax statistics in 1950, less than 10 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan paid income tax. They pay income tax when they earn more than $2,000, if married and without dependents. The income tax department is very efficient out there and collects income tax when it is owing. Only 10 per cent of the farmers earned sufficient net income in 1950 to be taxable. I suggest that unless a farmer were in that 10 per cent group, he certainly would not be inclined to hold large quantities of grain on his farm. Unless he is earning more than $2,000 a year, the chances are that he has a lot of obligations to meet and would require to market his grain as rapidly as possible.

The provisions of this bill would permit the wheat board to end the payment of farm storage whenever it saw fit. I would be very much in favour of the wheat board saying, for instance in a year like this, when the total quantity of grain the wheat board could receive is 18 bushels per seeded acre, let us say, that once farmers in western Canada have had the opportunity of marketing 18 bushels per acre, then at that time the payment of farm storage should be discontinued. Until such a point has been reached I feel that, on the basis of equality, farm storage payments should be made.

In dealing with this matter last year the minister made the point that there was already equity in the quota system. He said that if there were real inequity, perhaps legislation like this might be adopted. He said this, as recorded at page 1711 of Hansard for April 29, 1952:

> As to equal opportunity to market grain, I say that opportunity is protected by the quota system. The quota system applies equally everywhere.

Even though the situation has improved this year, the quota system certainly does not apply equitably everywhere. For instance, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on November 24, the minister had this to say as recorded at page 17 of Hansard:

> The Canadian wheat board started out the crop year with a delivery quota for new crop wheat of 5 bushels per acre, and announced that this quota would be increased as circumstances permitted. Today there are only 264 delivery points still on the 5 bushel quota; 913 points are on an 8 bushel quota; 377 on a 10 bushel quota; 178 on a 12 bushel quota; and 349 on a 15 bushel quota.

So there is inequality demonstrated there While 349 delivery points are on a 15 bushel quota, 264 delivery points are on a 5 bushel quota.

A little later on in his statement the minister said:

> After December 1, however, the board and the railways will be able to concentrate on the points which have the lowest delivery quotas and a policy of "equalization" will be followed.

That is a good objective. If the minister would agree with the principle of this bill, then I would say we would be achieving equality in an economic sense, and that could also be brought about if the quotas were the same at all marketing points at all times.

In reply to a question of mine on January 30, the parliamentary assistant to the minister gave us some additional information as to the quotas prevailing at that time. He said that the delivery quotas in the province of Manitoba have been at 15 bushels per seeded acre for all grains since December 9, 1952. As of January 30, the delivery quotas for all grains at all stations in Alberta were raised to 15 bushels per seeded acre. Thus Manitoba had an over-all quota of 15 bushels on December 9, but Alberta producers had to wait until January 30 in order to get equality under the quota system. As of that particular date, January 30, Saskatchewan still had some 929 elevator points out of a total of 1,109 below the 15-bushel quota. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation is desirable in order to provide a greater measure of equality as amongst producers in regard to the marketing of their grain.

If the wheat board found it possible to keep the same quotas prevailing at all prairie points at all times, then I would say such legislation as this would be unnecessary. But as long as certain areas must wait for months after other areas have had their quotas increased, then I feel that on the basis of equality such legislation should be passed.

I am not at all afraid, particularly under a condition of large surpluses of grain such as we have now on our farms in the west, that the payment of the regular storage rate would result in vast quantities of grain being kept on the farms to the point that the wheat board would be short of grain to fulfil its commitments. I just do not think that would be so. I believe the payment of farm storage would make little difference in the quantity of grain that was made available to the wheat board at any time. If the wheat board in the early part of the crop year must get grain from the short-haul areas, then the wheat board should make provision for those farmers who must wait weeks or months in order to have the same opportunity. Some compensation, in the form of storage payments, should be paid in order that in the final analysis all producers of grain in Canada may be placed on a more equitable basis.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I will sum up our stand in a few words. We believe that in the past the wheat board has done a good job. We believe in the continuation of the wheat board as the sole marketing agency. We do not want to do anything that will increase the administrative costs of the wheat board, unless it can be shown that the benefits accruing to the farmer will be commensurate with the increase in cost.

On the face of it, this proposition sounds very good. The proposition, as many farmers see it, is that instead of paying storage only to the elevators we shall be paying storage to the farmers as well, and that there will not be any additional charges against the price of the wheat provided that the amount paid to the elevators is reduced by the amount that is paid to the farmers. Unfortunately it will not work out that way. The reason is that in the past it has always been the custom for many farmers to hold their wheat. They have not received storage payments for holding it. If this bill becomes effective, therefore, in the future those farmers will receive storage payments and that will reduce the price of the wheat to the rest of the farmers who are not getting storage payments.

The reason farmers have made it a practice in the past to hold wheat is, I think, obvious. In the days before the wheat board the farmers used to hold their wheat in order to try to get a better price. It was not necessarily the larger farmer who adopted that practice. I would say it was the farmer who was stronger financially and in a position to hold it for that reason. He was not necessarily a large farmer, but one with good land. Large farmers are not always the best off financially, although from the point of view of economics one might think they should be. However, that is not always the case.

Today there is no benefit to a farmer in holding wheat so far as the price is concerned, because he gets the price paid by the wheat board; that is, he gets the average price for the year. On the other hand there is a benefit in holding wheat in so far as the grade is concerned. In the some forty years that I have been farming, it has always been my experience that if you hold your wheat until spring you will get a better grade. The reason is obvious. It is that, as a rule, there is less competition in the spring than there is in the fall; that is, there are fewer farmers selling wheat in the spring than there are in the fall. The elevators are more anxious to get wheat; therefore they will give a better grade and often less dockage. I have found that by holding wheat I could generally gain a grade.

Then again there is, of course, the question of income tax. It has become quite an established practice in recent years for farmers to try to carry over as much wheat as possible from one year to another in order to get the proceeds in the next year's income tax period, in the hope no doubt that the income tax would be reduced.

An hon. Member: But they get fooled.

Mr. Quelch: Unfortunately I think they have been fooled about that on many occasions. But they have always been very hopeful. Farmers are always optimistic. They hope that by diverting most of the delivery of wheat into another year, they will have a lower income tax to pay.

Mr. Knowles: All eyes are on Thursday night.

Mr. Quelch: I do not think anybody would challenge the statement that it has been the practice of many farmers to hold their wheat; and they have done it without receiving any storage. The small farmer or the weaker farmer—instead of using the words "the small farmer" let me say "the weaker farmer financially"—cannot afford to hold his wheat. He must sell it just as fast as he can in order to meet his expenses. Therefore all storage payments would come out of the price of wheat. The small farmer would get less for his wheat whilst the large farmer or the strong farmer financially who holds his wheat and gets storage would get more. Personally I am not prepared to support a measure which appears to benefit the financially strong farmer at the expense of the weaker farmer.

Then again, you are bound to increase the administrative costs of the wheat board. In so far as the weaker farmer is concerned, he will get a lower price for his wheat. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) pointed out that farm organizations have supported the idea of farm storage. May I say that unfortunately there are many times when farm organizations have been under a delusion and have supported a thing which was not really beneficial to them. It is extremely interesting to note the attitude of the chairman of the wheat board on this question. He addressed the farmers' union of Alberta convention at Edmonton in December and this is what he had to say with regard to the proposal to pay farm storage, as reported in the Western Producer of December 18, 1952:

> Payment of farm storage of grain is "in many ways a snare and a delusion," George McIvor, Winnipeg, chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board told the delegates. In reply to a question, Mr. McIvor made it clear that he was not in a position to speak concerning the federal government's attitude toward farm storage payments. But in his opinion western farmers should "take a good long look" before pressing such payments. Farm storage payment sounded all right, but it had to be paid by the farmers themselves and came out of the farmers' sales price, said Mr. McIvor.
> "It's not pie-in-the-sky and farmers who hold wheat anyway for a variety of reasons will get the storage payments as well as the farmer who has to store grain because it cannot be accepted at the elevator."

Personally I think that was good advice on the part of the chairman of the wheat board. I think the reason farmers bought the idea of farm storage is that they think they are going to get back that amount in addition to their present price, and they appear to think that the government is going to pay the storage. They do not realize that the storage will come out of the price of the wheat, and that therefore they are not going to get any more. The only farmers who will get more are, as I say, the farmers who are financially able to hold their wheat. They will be able to get that storage at the expense of the weaker farmer. The weaker farmer will get less.

I would not call this a socialistic proposal by any means. I am rather surprised that the C.C.F. would be supporting a measure of this kind, because it certainly does not help the weaker farmer.

Mr. Argue: You are talking for the elevator companies.

Mr. Quelch: No. It will not help the elevator companies either way. Therefore, as the proposal will have the effect of increasing the administrative costs of the board—which come out of the price of the farmers' wheat—without giving any material benefits to the farmers who are most in need of them, we are not able to support the bill.

On the other hand, if the bill was for the purpose of providing approved farm storage against which loans could be made, we would certainly give it further consideration and support it. But that is a much different thing from this bill. This bill merely provides for payment of farm storage which, as I say, has to come out of the price of the wheat. If on the other hand you had a system of approved farm storage so that loans could be made against that wheat, the smaller farmer would be in a position to hold his wheat and get the benefit of the storage.

In the past we have advocated approved farm storage. I think it is a good idea. It is an accomplished fact in the United States, where provision is made for loans which can be made against the wheat held on the farm. I have here "Overseas Report on Agricultural Developments" issued by the economics division, marketing service, United States department of agriculture, under date of February, 1953. I find that it states as follows:

> Wheat which has been inspected and held in sealed storage on a producer's farm is eligible for a loan at the full support price level for the particular quality of the wheat and the particular location of the farm.

Therefore when people say that it would be extemely difficult to provide for a system of approved farm storage, the answer of course is that already in the United States that very thing is being done, and I do not think there is any reason why it could not be done in this country. But that is an entirely different proposal from the one that is before us at the present time. For the reasons I have given we are not prepared to support the measure.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in support of this Bill No. 5. I am not able to follow all the arguments advanced by my good friend the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). As I see this bill, it is simply carrying the proposal for pooling somewhat further. As was stated by the proposer of the bill, it will not cost the taxpayer any money.

An hon. Member: But it will cost the wheat growers money.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You might well carry the same line of argument that my hon. friend has just advanced into the matter of the international wheat agreement and point out how much that deal has cost the wheat producers of this country. It is just as logical an argument.

As to the international wheat agreement, I am one of those who have not asked any questions of the minister or of his parliamentary assistant with regard to the negotiations now being carried on in Washington. But I should also like to say that if the agreement is carried through—and I hope it will be—I trust that the prices there provided will be in keeping with those asked for by the organized farmers of the prairies.

As I understand it, when the international wheat agreement was brought into being the initial requirements of each importing country were based on their consumers' requirements. In a report by Reuters from Washington I notice that it has been brought out that those importing countries have been reselling this wheat which they purchased at the international price of grain. I think that action is not in keeping with the original plan of the international wheat agreement. I hope that practice will be rectified, and that if there is a new agreement there will be a proviso to the effect that that sort of thing is not permitted.

I say that because, according to the Canadian wheat board report for the 1951-52 crop year, there is on the average a difference of 48 and a fraction cents a bushel between wheat sold throughout that year under the international wheat agreement, and class II wheat. The average price, according to that wheat board report, month by month, for that year was $1.82 under the international wheat agreement as compared with $2.30 and a fraction under class II wheat. Therefore by that agreement, which is a co-operative agreement, or so we are told, to supply the needs of the people of the world, the wheat producer was taking a direct loss of over 48 cents a bushel.

Mr. Ward: What has that to do with farm storage?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am making a comparison. I am pointing out that farm storage is a co-operative pooling effort and not costing the public anything. It is a matter of one neighbour paying the other fellow's farm storage when he cannot deliver his grain at all. You people who are so keen about this pooling business should be humane enough in your hearts to carry it that much further, because I think my hon. friend will realize that the technique of harvesting on the prairies and the delivery of grain to elevators have changed greatly over the past two years owing to the advent of the self-propelled combines and the rapid delivery of grain by truck in the fall. Therefore the rolling stock of the railways and the elevator systems are not able to take care of this grain which is so rapidly harvested in good weather. In 1952 we harvested by far the greatest crop in the history of this country, and the maximum quota anywhere in the prairie provinces was still 15 bushels to the acre. That has created a real hardship for many of the smaller producers in the country who took off their crop.

In many instances the business people of these communities, who service the communities, are carrying the grain of the farmers. As has been pointed out, our neighbours to the south have had a loan policy for their wheat. They lend 90 per cent of the parity value of grain during harvest, and they are allowed storage on top of that for the next year. If they want to take that as a settlement, O.K. If they want to sell the grain and take the increase, which in the past few years the United States government has been paying, it amounts to a great deal over the international wheat agreement.

Thus their farmers are very much better off on that basis. I am one of those people who would like to see assistance such as that worked out in this country.

Our present storage problem has worked against the efficient grain producers in this country as well. I know several communities where we will say the average wheat grades 3 and 4 northern. One farmer may have an excellent quality of wheat that grades say 2, and because of lack of storage space, if he wishes to deliver the grain and has a quota available, he must take grade 3 or 4 for that wheat despite the fact that it is grade 2 and that is a very great hardship at this time.

Many farmers have not proper storage. I think this bill should be passed in order to assist those people to provide the necessary storage in this country. We just have an hour on private bills at this time of the session, and there are still a great many more things I should like to say on the bill, but I do not want to be accused of talking the matter out. But I want to say that I am in favour of this measure in this very difficult situation that is now prevailing in the prairie provinces.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): This matter of farm storage has a great deal of interest for me. I am not going to say that I complain very much about the idea of paying farm storage. I feel that I would be the recipient of something which as a recipient I feel would not come amiss at all. However, there are a good many difficulties involved in the payment of farm storage. I notice that part of the section reads as follows:

—for such period of storage as the board in its sole discretion shall fix for the purposes of such storage payment.

Well, in a year such as this, when there is a large amount of wheat, it would appear to me they would have to pay the storage for the entire year. You could not break it up into sections and pay storage part of the time and no storage for the rest of the time.

I should like to say that to a large extent I agree with what the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) had to say regarding grain in position. In a year such as this we have a great deal of wheat on hand. There is a lot of grain in position. But in a year when there is not nearly as much wheat around in storage as there is this year we might run into a situation where we would not have enough grain in position, and we would lose some markets as the result.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

To get grain into position it is necessary to get it to the lakehead or seaboard. If farmers wanting to take advantage of farm storage held their grain, there would have to be a requisition system set up. It appears to me it would be a very difficult matter to discriminate between one farmer and another by demanding one farmer's grain and allowing the other to store his grain and benefit from the farm storage.

There is one other point that I should like to discuss for a minute, namely the small farmer who has to sell his grain in the fall to pay his bills. He has to sell his grain even though he would like to hold it. I am speaking of the years in which there is not as much grain on hand as there is now. On the other hand you have the large farmer who sells a certain amount of grain in the fall, and for considerations, possibly taxes, and so on he desires to hold his grain. He is going to be allowed to hold as much grain as he wishes, and the poor farmer who has to sell his grain to pay his bills is going to have to help pay the storage to the big farmer.

This matter is much more serious in a low crop area such as the southern part of Saskatchewan than in a higher yield area such as you find farther north. The farmer in the normally low yield area is going to find himself continually paying farm storage to the man in the higher yield area who has more grain. This is about the first time I have ever seen a measure introduced where they make the poor farmer help to pay something to the rich farmer.

I see it is six o'clock; therefore I should like to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Larson the debate was adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): At eight o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ATOMIC ENERGY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE INTO OPERATIONS OF CONTROL BOARD

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe:

That a special committee be appointed to examine into the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy; that the said committee be empowered to sit during the sittings of the house and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and to report from time to time; that the said committee consist of Messrs. Bourget, Brooks, Coldwell, Gibson, Green, Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth), Low, McCusker, McIlraith, Murphy, Murray (Oxford), Pinard, Stuart (Charlotte), Winkler.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Speaker, when the debate on this motion was interrupted at five o'clock to discuss private and public bills I was making reference to Uranium City, and had said that until recently it was a town only on paper, having been surveyed three years ago by the lands department of the provincial government. The purpose was to provide a residential area for the mines at Beaverlodge lake some four miles east.

There has been some little difficulty in establishing the town. The uranium companies in the area and the provincial government have not been able to see eye to eye as to who should pay all the costs. The provincial government has made the proposal that the uranium companies should put in the power and water systems, as well as sewage disposal works, and that the lots should then be leased. Apparently they did not believe in selling them. This has somewhat retarded the development of the town.

Some of the heads of the uranium companies to whom I talked last year were apparently under the misapprehension that I was a provincial representative, and proceeded to take me to task for this policy. One of them said he had been in the mining business all his life, that he had been in practically every province of Canada, and that Saskatchewan was the only place in which he had met a policy of this kind that would have the effect of retarding the program.

Mr. Wright: Is that not the policy of the dominion government in the national parks?

Mr. Harrison: That might be, but this gentleman took exception to it. It is the same policy that has been followed by the provincial governments in connection with veterans. They are asked to go on the land, and to have it assessed at a value to be determined ten years later. In this instance the period of time was three years, with the result that many of those people who wished to establish businesses in Uranium City were confronted with a situation whereby, if in that time they wished to purchase the property, they might have to pay for their own improvements. However, these questions will no doubt be ironed out in the course of time. In spite of this, the town is going ahead and long-term leases are being taken out. Hotels and banks are coming in.

All this is beside the point; the main fact is that had it not been for the far-sightedness of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) I do not believe we would have had any production of uranium in Saskatchewan for some time to come. We are now just on the doorstep, and it will not be long before we are in full operation. Certainly that part of the country knows that it owes a great deal to the minister.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member who has just taken his seat upon being so fortunate as to represent a constituency in which uranium has been discovered. The fact that it has been discovered at Beaverlodge in the constituency of Meadow Lake means a great deal to the economy of that section of Saskatchewan, just as Eldorado means so much to the economy of the northern part of this country.

I am pleased indeed that the minister has seen fit to reappoint the committee on atomic energy this year. He says it is to review the government's program. I had the honour and privilege of serving on the previous committee, and I must say that I enjoyed our meetings very much, an enjoyment which I believe was shared by the other members of the committee. Not only were our deliberations informative; they were also instructive.

It was a good committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), and I know the members of the committee gained a good deal of information. I do not feel the members themselves contributed anything from a scientific standpoint; indeed, they were not expected to. We got a smattering of what was going on. It was amusing to note that we were warned by different scientists when we attended lectures and visited Chalk River that we were not to divulge any of the secrets of atomic energy. I am sure the learned doctors must have had their tongues in their cheeks when they told us that, because I am sure no one learned enough to disclose anything of a scientific nature. But we did learn something of the objectives and possibilities of atomic energy. We learned what was being done and what it was proposed to do.

Another great benefit from the setting up of that committee was that its members spoke at clubs and other gatherings throughout the country. The information which we gave out was widely disseminated. From my own experience I know the interest that was taken by people all over the country.

Speaking this afternoon the minister said that the program was dominated by the military requirements. He also emphasized the fact that Canada had not done anything as far as producing an atomic bomb was concerned, but we all know that we produced in Canada the plutonium which was used in the United States in the production of the atomic bomb. Isotopes are a by-product in the development of plutonium about which we hear a great deal.

In thinking of atomic energy people think of it mainly in terms of war. We all know its terrible possibilities in that regard, and those possibilities for destruction are increasing every year. One of the sad features is that to date no effective defence against the atomic bomb has been discovered. It is doubtful if any effective defence can be developed. When other instruments of war have been invented there has always been something else developed to counteract them, but that is not the case with the atomic bomb.

In the United States they speak about the decentralization of population as a means of defence; but they estimated the cost of decentralizing the population of some of the large cities and breaking them down into cities of around 50,000 to 100,000, and the total was around $300 billion, so it was considered to be entirely out of the question.

However, there is another phase of decentralization which it occurs to me might be undertaken, and which I believe is being undertaken in some countries, particularly Sweden. I refer to the decentralization of industry. We never know what may happen should war break out, and it would be a good idea in this country if some of the industry now centralized in our larger cities was decentralized.

Another means of defence considered in the United States was the evacuation of cities in the event of war. That is a civil defence matter and one to which we in Canada should give great attention. Until we knew Russia had the bomb herself we felt more or less safe. Now that there is no doubt that Russia has the bomb it places her on the same footing as ourselves. When it was felt that Russia did not have the bomb the defence of western Europe was not considered to be too difficult, but now we are faced with the necessity of having large forces to combat the great Russian forces.

The great advantage which all of us see in the development of atomic energy is in its contribution to peace. I was looking over the reports of the national research council on atomic energy projects and the industrial use of isotopes, and I was amazed at the use that is being made of these isotopes in agriculture, medicine, industry and in many other ways. I shall not quote the uses referred to in this book, but I am sure anyone reading it will be surprised at the uses that have been developed.

I should like to quote what Mr. Vishinsky said at Lake Success as far back as November, 1949. I intend to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor; and while it intimated that Mr. Vishinsky was doing a lot of boasting, it quoted his words for what they were worth as follows:

> Right now we are utilizing atomic energy for our economic needs in our own economic interests. We are razing mountains; we are irrigating deserts; we are cutting through the jungle and the tundra; we are spreading life, happiness, prosperity, and welfare in places where the human footstep has not been seen for a thousand years.

The editorial goes on to say that that statement was a great exaggeration, but while agreeing that it might be for propaganda purposes, it continues:

> Granted that it has a propagandistic purpose, there is merit in his emphasis on the possible peaceful engineering and industrial uses of atomic power opposed to preoccupation with the atomic bomb.

That indicates what can be done in the future with this great source of energy. It is quite amazing to realize, as we were told at our lectures, that the fissioning of uranium yields only one one-thousandth of the energy available. Only that very small portion of the energy in the uranium is being used at the present time. They went on to tell us that if only 11 per cent efficiency was obtained in connection with the conversion of power through the fissioning of uranium, one hundred tons of uranium metal would supply the power requirements of the United States for one year. A householder could replace ten tons of coal with one one-fortieth of a pound of uranium metal. An automobile owner whose car used 15 miles per gallon of gasoline could run it for over four million miles on one pound of uranium. This gives us some idea of the tremendous possibilities in the development of this source of energy.

The minister told us this afternoon that it was not possible to control this energy in such a way as to displace water and coal in the production of power, but I have no doubt the time will come when that can be done.

It is not my intention to speak any further on this subject, but I do want to congratulate the minister upon having set up this committee again. I believe it will prove to be a valuable asset and I am sure that valuable information will be obtained.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say one brief word. This committee should be set up as soon as possible and get to work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIvor: At the lakehead we will soon know some of the benefits of the work of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) along this line, when we shall have a cobalt bomb. It is an outstanding benefit to Canada and a splendid tribute to the minister and the scientific experts who support him.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I think it is only reasonable that a fairly detailed debate should take place on a question so important as that of setting up a committee to investigate the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy.

Atomic energy, after all, and man's discovery of how to control it, is probably the greatest advancement mankind has made since discovering how to control fire. It is a most revolutionary development, much greater than any isolated discovery of any kind. It has come about as the result of a long period of scientific research by the best brains of very many countries of the world. We talk about atomic energy in our everyday conversation and, in many cases, probably without realizing exactly what we are talking about. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, in order to bring to our attention the present situation, I think it might be worth while to review very briefly the history of the scientific study of atomic energy and the history of the atom.

Originally, in a superficial way, man supposed that matter was a continuous thing, but as long ago as 400 B.C. Greek philosophers began to realize that the characteristics of matter could not be explained by assuming that it was a continuous thing, and an atomic theory of a primitive sort came into being. This came about as a result of very obvious observations. The early Greeks, especially a philosopher called Democritus, observed different things. He noted that when salt was put in water the salt disappeared and diffused in the water; and more strangely still, he noticed that if a bit of dye was put in water the colour diffused throughout the whole liquid. The only way that sort of thing could be explained was that the liquid and all other matter was made up not of a continuous thing but of various very small particles—and the particles of one matter dispersed among the spaces or atoms of the other one.

Later on in the Middle Ages men noticed other phenomena that lent strength to the atomic theory. One was that men noticed that when two liquids were mixed together—an equal measure of one liquid and an equal measure of another liquid—the resultant volume was not necessarily twice as great. They noticed that if a measure of water was mixed with a measure of alcohol the resulting measure was less than the two measures. That was a fairly astute observation for those medieval people to make when you consider the shortage of cocktail lounges in those days.

Anyway, as science progressed it became evident that all material could be broken down into certain elementary substances, and the theory of elements came into being. As far back as 1780 a French chemist named Lavoisier was able to identify 50 elements. It was thought that those elements were the elemental matter from which all things were composed, and that theory existed for a very great length of time.

The modern atomic theory, as we know it, came into being when John Dalton, the English chemist, propounded it about 1808. Then more elements were discovered, and they were studied in great detail. Their atomic weights were arrived at and, as a result of further study, the great Russian chemist Mendeleyev arranged elements according to their atomic weights and their characteristics, this arrangement becoming known as the atomic table, which made it possible for scientists to forecast the nature of elements which were not yet discovered and to advance the science of chemistry in many, many ways.

Following the discovery of this theory of Mendeleyev there was a great deal of very marvellous and fascinating research into the structure of the atom which took place for a great number of years, up until about the turn of the present century. This study, for this period of the nineteenth century, was conducted mostly from a chemical point of view, from a chemist's point of view, and man's knowledge of the atom and the composition of all material things was greatly advanced. In that period the theory that all matter was composed of atoms which could not be divided further was accepted. As a matter of fact the word "atom" is taken from the Greek and means something that is indivisible.

About the turn of the present century physical scientists began to make new and marvellous discoveries. Some of the most remarkable of them were made by Lord Rutherford at McGill university in Montreal. Then there was also the discovery of radioactive elements by the French chemist Becquerel, followed by the discovery of radium by the Curies. Then too from a different approach entirely, about the same time there were other remarkable advances in the field of philosophical mathematics by such men as Max Planck and Albert Einstein. Max Planck in 1905 or 1906 enunciated the quantum theory which produced a challenge for the mathematician Einstein, who tried to work out a system which would explain the known facts which had come to light up to that time with regard to the structure of matter. As a result of this pure science wonderful advances were made, and I think it illustrates to us that what is the pure science today is an applied science tomorrow; and what seems to be a very impractical searching for useless knowledge one day will be found very useful and applicable to our everyday life within a very few years.

As a result of Einstein's theory of relativity certain advances were made in the study of the atom. I am not pretending that I understand the theory of relativity. Even if I did, there would not be too many people within the sound of my voice who would understand what I was talking about. There are advanced scientists in the world, however, to whom this theory makes sense. There are scientists who can talk about time as the fourth dimension and who can talk about energy and matter as the same thing; they can talk about space being curved and that sort of business, and it makes sense to them. The ordinary layman getting into that field of science quickly gets beyond his depth. The fact that he does is very neatly expressed in a little limerick that someone has written with regard to relativity. It reads as follows:

> There was a young lady named Bright
> Whose speed was greater than light
> She left home one day
> In a relative way
> And returned the previous night.

It is very difficult for the ordinary man to understand what this is all about. Nevertheless, this pure science does result in practical benefits after a period of time.

As a result of Einstein's work in the field of mathematics, certain things became evident. One was that it was a certainty that matter and energy were two forms of the same thing. When we talk about the production of atomic energy, the unique thing about atomic energy is that it is produced from matter itself. It is a process of transforming matter into energy. Einstein even worked out a formula. He predicted the amount of energy that could be produced by the destruction of a given amount of matter. As a result of his calculations, he forecast the terrific amount of energy that could be produced from the atomic bomb.

At the time that he propounded his theories he was laughed at by the ordinary man in the street who said, "Well, how is this going to affect me?" He little realized that within his lifetime atomic bombs would be relatively common things and would have been the means of ending the last great war and probably the means of preventing, up until this date at least, a third world war.

The scorn with which Einstein's theory of relativity was treated at one time is also illustrated by a little limerick about this great scientist and two other people, the authoress Gertrude Stein and the sculptor Epstein. The little limerick runs as follows:

> There's a marvellous family called Stein
> There's Ep, and there's Gert and there's Ein > Gert's writings are bunk
> Ep's sculpture is junk
> And nobody understands Ein.

Although nobody understood him in those days, his scientific work made possible the present developments in the field of atomic energy. As I said before, he was even able to predict the amount of energy that could be produced in the destruction of a given amount of matter. Einstein showed that the translating constant for converting mass measured in grams into energy measured in ergs is equal to the square of the velocity of light measured in centimeters per second. This standard equation made the present advances in atomic science possible. The velocity of light is 30 billion centimeters per second, so the result is that a very great amount of energy is produced from a very small amount of matter.

Einstein took this figure of 30 billion centimeters per second, the speed of light, as a constant to arrive at the result. I suppose if he had wanted to he could have taken twice the national debt and he would have arrived at the same figure. In any event, Einstein calculated that one gram of matter is the equivalent of 200,000 kilowatt hours of energy. This is enough energy to run 200,000 one hundred watt bulbs for 10 hours. One gram of matter is the amount you could hold on the tip of your finger.

Many people seem to have the opinion that atomic energy was some sudden discovery that was made during the last war by United States scientists. As a matter of fact our present knowledge of atomic energy is something that has been built up over the years. The term "atomic energy", has been used since about 1906. Contributions to the total pool of knowledge of the atom have been made by scientists of almost every nationality. It is folly for us, therefore, to think that the western world has a secret which we can preserve. It is not the case, Mr. Speaker. During the war we were a little more advanced than the other nations so far as atomic research was concerned. Most of the things concerning atomic research are common knowledge to all the scientists of the world, and have been for many many years. It is only reasonable, therefore, to conclude that any nation that worked at it could produce an atomic bomb, and could produce atomic energy for other purposes within a period of a very few years.

In that connection I should like to quote briefly from a book entitled "Explaining the Atom" by Selig Hecht, who is a United States professor. On page 190, he says:

Can another country make an atomic bomb? Of course it can. If we can think of several ways of doing each step from uranium fission to atomic bomb, so can another group of scientists. In fact, the British were ahead of us in 1941, and they may possibly have given us a good run if Britain were not so near Germany that its plants and cities were steadily bombed and blasted. We were far away from the scene of the war and the British sent their best people to work with us. So did the Canadians. Even Niels Bohr from Denmark came here to help. Moreover, we had on our side some of the best brains in the refugees from Germany, Austria, Hungary and Italy.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the state of affairs, and it should be realized. There is no such thing as the atomic secret that can be kept for any length of time, because any secret we have is only a secret that would be arrived at independently by scientists in other parts of the world in a very short time.

So far as the first development of the atomic bomb is concerned, there is a very enlightening quotation from a lecture by Sir John Cockcroft, who is a British scientist. In this connection, he said:

In April 1940 a memorandum was sent to Sir Henry Tizard, then scientific adviser to the air ministry, by Professor Peierls and Dr. Frisch who were working in Birmingham university. They pointed out that under suitable circumstances a chain reaction in uranium might be explosive and that the effect might be equivalent to a very large quantity of ordinary explosive.

You can see from this that the idea of the atomic bomb was conceived in England. Then he goes on to say:

A similar conclusion was reached by Professor James Chadwick, and Professor Geoffrey Taylor worked out in some detail the disastrous effects such an explosive might produce. On receiving these reports the Ministry of Aircraft Production appointed a subcommittee of the committee for the scientific survey of air warfare under the chairmanship of Professor George Thomson, and I remember meeting first with four other members in April, 1940, a French officer who came to warn us that the Germans were working on this problem and were trying to obtain from Norway the world's largest stock of heavy water to investigate the possibilities of the chain reaction in uranium and heavy water.

This news brought a realization of the disasters which might befall us if the Germans were to produce an atomic bomb. We appreciated the great dangers from radioactivity which might be produced in such a bomb, and took some first steps in preparing instruments for civil defence work.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that this was in 1940, in the United Kingdom.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to whether scientists should have undertaken the work on the development of the atomic bomb. Looking back to the dark months of 1940 when this work was started, I do not think we had any doubts on the matter. The Germans had over-run Holland, Belgium, France, Denmark and Norway, and freedom was fast disappearing from the world. Armed first with the atom bomb, Hitler could have conquered the world. We had serious doubts as to whether the project would succeed, but no doubts about the need to go on with the work.

After the fall of France in June, 1940, the university physicists were reinforced by Dr. Halban and Dr. Kowarski, who were sent to us by Professor Joliot, bringing with them the 180 litres of heavy water which the French had succeeded in bearing away from Norway before the invasion.

There you have an exceedingly interesting reference to the type of development that went on in England at that time. Then owing to the vulnerable position of the United Kingdom it was decided to transfer atomic research to the North American continent; and we are all familiar with the story from there on.

We have been concerned chiefly with atomic energy as a military weapon up to the present time, and from that point of view it is still an extremely important thing. After all, it is a fact that our only potential enemies, the Russians, have the atomic bomb and they probably have other atomic weapons. The destruction which they can bring about is terrible to contemplate. If an atomic bomb explodes half a mile above a city, the people walking on the sidewalk evaporate into thin air owing to the extreme heat produced, just the same as little droplets of fat dropped on a red hot stove will evaporate. All buildings within nine miles of the point of detonation of a modern hydrogen bomb are destroyed. A whole city can be wiped out in the twinkling of an eye.

There are many other examples that could be given of the destructive powers of this weapon. When we think of these things we must realize the terrible responsibility that is ours in the field of civil defence and in planning our economy so that our population is not gathered in a few large cities like Montreal and Toronto in such a way that a large percentage of our people and an even larger percentage of our productive capacity could be wiped out by less than a dozen atomic bombs.

Apart from the explosive atomic bomb, other types of weapons can be used, such as radioactive dust which might be dropped over our city and which would have a slow but extremely decisive effect on the health of the inhabitants. The detrimental effect of radioactivity on living organism is a most subtle sort of thing. It is something that in many cases is not recognized for a long period of time, and it is something that is cumulative in its effect. It builds up over a period of time and at a later date the results begin to be noticed.

Then too, of course, in a military sense atomic energy can be used for powering submarines; and probably before long it will be used to provide the power needed for aeroplanes and so forth. If that dream is realized, it will be possible for heavy bombers to fly around the world probably three or four times without refuelling, or something of that sort, so that any spot in the world will be within range of atomic-powered bombers if they are developed.

But we should not get the idea that in the field of destruction alone atomic energy is of importance. Atomic energy has great importance in other fields, as has atomic research. One of the most important is its use in science. Many radioactive isotopes of the elements can be made which can be used as tracers in the study of life, metabolism, and for many uses in science. Then there is the isotope of cobalt which is used in the cobalt bomb for the treatment of cancer; and there are other substitutes for radium in the treatment of cancer.

Then there are many applications of radioactive elements in industry as well; but perhaps the most important potential use for atomic energy is in the field of industry for the generation of power. There are many reasons to believe that atomic energy can be produced at approximately the same cost as hydroelectric power. If that is a fact, when it is developed it will have a profound effect on our economy.

For instance, in the reduction of aluminum, it will no longer be necessary to bring the raw material from South America to Canada where there is a cheap supply of electric power in order to have it reduced. Electric generating plants can be built at the source of supply and powered by atomic energy for the reduction of aluminum in South America. That is one possible example of what might happen.

Then there are a great many industries which use a vast amount of power and in which the power consumed is one of the major costs involved, where atomic energy can probably be used to advantage. Along with the reduction of aluminum, there is the chlorine and caustic soda industry, the phosphate fertilizer industry, the cement industry, the glass industry and the steel industry.

In some of these cases, of course, new methods of production would have to be evolved. In the case of the reduction of iron ore, for instance, coal is used both as a source of energy and as a chemical because iron ore is reduced by carbon monoxide and heat; therefore in that case, if you were to use atomic energy you would have to reduce iron ore by some other means, probably by hydrogen and the application of heat in the form of electric power.

Then again, if cheap electric power could be produced from atomic energy it could be used to advantage for the electrification of our railway system where traffic is heavy and the population is dense. In addition to that, it is predicted that atomic energy can be used economically for the heating of homes on a central heating basis, where one large plant is built to heat a section of a city.

The characteristics of atomic energy are such that the pattern of our economic life may be changed very considerably. And if atomic energy is used to the best advantage we can have a levelling effect, an evening up effect on the economy of the world in general and above all on the economy of any given country. For instance, in a country like Canada cheap electric power is available in the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. It might not be feasible or advisable to try to make atomic energy compete with it, but atomic energy is easily transported, and it could be used to produce cheap electric power in the parts of this country where hydroelectric power is not available, such as the maritime provinces and the prairie provinces.

Mr. Stick: Especially Saskatchewan.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Especially Saskatchewan. After all, the problem of transportation of fuel is almost non-existent in the case of producing energy from atomic sources, because the amount of fuel required in the form of uranium for atomic power is very small indeed. As a matter of fact, a pound of atomic fuel, even under present-day processes, is equal to 1,250 tons of coal. In other words, in the form of atomic fuel a carrier pigeon could carry almost as much energy as a freight train can carry in the form of coal. Hence the question of transportation is almost non-existent.

Of course the question arises as to whether there are sufficient supplies of the fuel for atomic energy, namely uranium. Uranium is a relatively common element. As a matter of fact, uranium is about twenty times as prevalent as silver, and is about one-twelfth as common as lead. There are very large amounts of uranium in the earth's crust, and the energy which it will provide is much greater than the energy which might be provided from the known store of all other forms of energy-producing minerals, coal, oil, natural gas and everything else put together. Therefore it is not inconceivable that a time might come when our present sources of energy, coal, oil and natural gas will begin to become exhausted, and if for no other reason than that our economy will have to turn to atomic energy for its support.

When atomic energy is brought into everyday use in this country I hope the benefits which it can bring will be realized. I hope it will be used as a source of cheap power in the areas of this country which need it most. It may be said that a remark of that kind is premature, but it should be realized that with the rapid advances in the scientific field today, atomic energy for ordinary uses may be brought into existence within a very few years.

That being so, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased indeed to see that this committee to study and examine the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy is being set up. I think it is very necessary, and I believe that it is faced with a greater responsibility than possibly any other committee that ever has or ever will be created in this House of Commons.

Motion agreed to.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

PROVISION TO EXTEND OPERATION FOR A FURTHER PERIOD, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, to extend its operation for a further period by closing out on March 31, 1953, in lieu of February 28, 1954, the present three year pool of loans guaranteed by the government under the act and by providing for a new three year pool commencing April 1, 1953, and ending March 31, 1956; to provide further that the maximum amount of bank loans made in the new period and guaranteed under the act shall be three hundred million dollars.

Mr. Speaker: It was suggested that when a motion similar to this was called I should hear representations from hon. members with respect to standing order No. 60. I might say that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) informed me that he could not be in the house this evening after nine o'clock, and it is nine o'clock now. I should like to have his views on the standing order. Also I have recently understood that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be away for the next few days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure hon. members will regret it when they realize that the reason is that there is sickness in his family. Probably someone else in the C.C.F. party could express the views of that party or would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre express his views this evening and members of other parties at a later time?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not speaking to the resolution.

Mr. Knowles: No; I am speaking to the point of order which Your Honour has suggested might be dealt with on this occasion. The point of order arose in connection with another debate, namely one on the resolution preceding the emergency powers bill; and I believe it is understood that whatever ruling is made now, that debate, when resumed, will be permitted to go on its weary way.

This question as to whether or not there should be a debate, and if so to what extent, on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair and for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the resolution preceding a money bill, is one that has been before us a number of times in 1952 and 1953. I think it is only fair to say, however, that there was practically no discussion on the point, none that I can dig up at any rate, between 1942 and 1952.

Furthermore, if one reads the debate on the point of order which took place in 1942 he will find that Mr. Hanson, who was then leader of the opposition, said that to his knowledge it had not been raised for twenty years prior to that time. However, despite the fact that the number of occasions this matter has been before us is very few, it has become a quite important issue.

Let me say at the outset that I do not think it is necessary for me, or for any others who take part in the debate, to cover again the ground we have covered in previous debates on the point of order. I can imagine some hon. members in the house saying, "Why do you not apply that rule on other occasions?". There is a difference, and it is that in debates on issues of substance we do hope that we can make some impression upon the minds of other hon. members in the house, and perhaps some impression upon those outside the house who follow the debates.

But in this particular instance, if I may so put it, in a sense we are in court, and it is Your Honour who must make the decision. I think therefore it would be wrong for us to try to cover ground we have covered before, because we know Your Honour has heard our previous representations. In addition, I have no doubt you have reread those debates, and are well aware of all the points we have made.

If I may, then, just by way of summary of the previous arguments I have made, make a brief statement, I would then go on to new material I should like to add. May I say it seems to me quite clear from standing order 60 and from standing order 38 that a motion for Your Honour to leave the chair at this stage of debate is debatable. This is clear not only from standing order 60 and standing order 38, but also clear from Your Honour's own ruling in June of 1952, and from Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling in 1942. Both Mr. Speaker Glen on that occasion, and yourself, when you have dealt with this matter, have said—and there is no question about it—that the motion is debatable. The question you had to face was this: To what extent is the motion debatable?

In 1942 Mr. Speaker Glen made a ruling that the debate should be directed to the negative of the question. I shall have something to say about that in a moment; but may I jump ahead ten years in the story by saying that Your Honour made the same ruling in 1952. However, you admitted a few days ago that you had found it difficult if not impossible to enforce that ruling. From what Your Honour said a few days ago I gathered you felt there would have to be a new ruling on this question.

Following what Your Honour has said, it seems to me the point to which we must address ourselves is not the question as to whether the motion is debatable, but rather we have to address ourselves to the question of the extent to which it is debatable.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is what I said in 1952. I am not so sure now that I was right at that time. I still have to be convinced that I was right at that time. In other words, I am doubtful whether the motion on the second day is debatable.

Mr. Knowles: Well, in the light of those remarks it becomes necessary for me to traverse again some of the ground I thought we had covered. Surely from standing order 60 it is clear that the motion is debatable, if one reads the relevant part, which says:

—and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house—

I have picked that out, because that is the point we have reached now—the proposal to refer the motion to the whole house. That act of referring the motion to the committee must be construed with standing order 38 which says that every motion standing on the order of proceedings for the day, except government notices of motions for the house to go into committee at a later date, is debatable.

That exception, of course, refers to the day a minister stands up and announces the Governor General's approval of a motion placed before the house. That is the only item standing on the orders of the day which is not debatable, according to standing order 38. This motion is not that one that is excluded from the right of debate; therefore I submit that it is included among motions which are debatable.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member suggest that if a purely procedural motion stood on the orders of the day it would be debatable?

Mr. Knowles: I would suggest that any procedural motion, if it is the kind of motion that calls for the usual 48 hours' notice and therefore has to appear on the order paper under notices of motions or under government orders, would have to be regarded as debatable. I do not think we can draw that kind of line and use the word "procedural" to exclude from debate any motion that is really a motion of substance.

I was also going to remind Your Honour of what appears at page 164 of Beauchesne's third edition, where Dr. Beauchesne has set out in specific detail the procedure to be followed on money bills. This information comes under citation 435, and it tells in detail how such matters are dealt with. He gives the first day's proceedings, and then the second day's proceedings in connection with legislation of this nature, and he says under item 6:

6. Minister moves that Speaker leave the chair for house to go into committee of the whole on the resolution.

And then No. 7:

Speaker puts question on motion. Debate allowed.

That is surely a very clear statement by the author of the latest book under which we operate in the house. It does seem to me that the authorities make it clear that the motion itself is debatable.

The question is raised sometimes as to whether it is a motion dealing with the substance of the resolution behind the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair, or whether it is just a motion for that one event to take place, namely for Mr. Speaker to get out of the chair he is in, and sit somewhere else.

I submit that we have a number of types of debate that take place during the course of a session which are in a sense in the same category, in that we do not direct the debate simply to the technical language of the motion itself. For instance, the session begins with what is known as the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The motion put to the house on that occasion is that a message of thanks be sent to His Excellency the Governor General. Once that motion is read I do not suppose any hon. member ever debates whether or not a message of thanks should be sent to His Excellency the Governor General. We recognize in that debate a vehicle for discussion of what is in the address and also for discussion of what is not in the address that hon. members think should be there.

Mr. MacInnis: It is the custom.

Mr. Knowles: As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) points out, that is our custom and our practice in that regard. Similarly I would point out that there are occasions, not very often I admit, when we have a motion to adjourn the house under standing order 31. But no one stands up and argues that the house should or should not be adjourned. A debate takes place on the substance of the proposal behind the idea of adjourning the house, a matter of urgent public importance.

Similarly, when we debate the motion to go into supply and hon. members raise grievances or move amendments, or even if they do not move amendments—

Mr. Speaker: The motion to go into supply is that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee, but on that motion it is not permitted to discuss anything which it is proposed to consider in committee. The custom in connection with so-called money resolutions is that we discuss with the Speaker in the chair what the house has decided to discuss in committee.

Mr. Knowles: The point as to what we discuss on the motion to go into supply constitutes another point of order that I would rather not argue at this moment.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member follows me to the extent that on the motion to go into supply an hon. member is not permitted to discuss what the house proposes to discuss in committee of supply.

Mr. Knowles: I will accept that for the purposes of this debate at any rate, but I would point out to you that what hon. members are permitted to discuss on that occasion is not just the question as to whether or not Mr. Speaker should leave the chair. They are permitted to discuss any grievances which Your Honour allows as in order which they care to raise on that occasion.

Similarly I would point out that on Thursday night of this week the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will make what is known as the budget speech. Then other hon. members will follow. What will they speak to? They will speak to the motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means. Hon. members will not be required to confine themselves to the question as to whether or not the Speaker should get out of the chair; they will be permitted to discuss the whole matter of government fiscal policy, indeed they will be permitted to discuss almost anything under the terms of that debate.

The point I am making is simply that it is hardly correct to say that because the motion before the house is that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole we must direct ourselves just to that specific language. As I say, we have these other debates which through custom, if for no other reason, have become vehicles for recognized debates. I accept Your Honour's suggestion that there are certain limitations, but certainly they go far beyond the question of just whether or not Mr. Speaker should get out of the chair.

I want to come now to the problem which it seems to me was created by Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling in 1942. I should like to say a word about the circumstances that led up to that ruling, and then I want to ask the house to consider very carefully just how the house of that day considered Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling. I shall give what I think is most conclusive evidence as to what was the view of the house of that day with respect to that ruling.

The ruling was given on February 23, 1942. The house was then discussing a very contentious issue, namely the proposal for a plebiscite on the question of conscription. Mr. McLarty had moved the motion, Mr. Hanson, then leader of the opposition, Mr. Walter Tucker, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and others had spoken. They did not speak in that order, because the speaker whose action produced the issue was the hon. member for Bow River, who moved an amendment to the motion.

At that point the then prime minister, Mr. King, raised two points of order. One was as to whether or not an amendment of any kind to that motion was in order, because after all it was a motion the terms of which had been agreed to by His Excellency the Governor General, and the other point of order was as to whether any debate was allowed at that point. The then prime minister did not attempt to restrict the extent of the debate, he simply argued that there should be no debate at all despite the fact that it had gone on for some considerable time.

Discussion followed in which Mr. Hanson, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and one or two others took place. As a result of that discussion Mr. Speaker Glen considered the matter during the recess between six and eight o'clock, and then gave his ruling after coming back at eight o'clock.

It seems to me that that incident is far enough back in history for us to be able to say with great respect that it was a considerable problem with which Mr. Speaker Glen was faced on that occasion. Here was a most contentious issue, and feeling in the house was quite high over this question. The then prime minister had raised those two points of order and presented the Speaker of that day with a real problem.

Mr. Speaker Glen was able to agree without question with the prime minister on the point that the motion was not amendable. I am inclined to agree with that aspect of the ruling that was made on that occasion. But on the other point, Mr. Speaker Glen brought forth a compromise. Let us be fair with ourselves. It is now eleven years later, and surely we can look back at this in the perspective of history, and realize that it was a compromise.

Mr. King had argued that there should be no debate. Mr. Speaker Glen had said, "I cannot go that far; I have to rule that the motion is debatable." He quoted standing order 60 and he quoted standing order 38. He pointed out that if there was any doubt, if there was any conflict between them, standing order 38 was passed in its present form after standing order 60 and would govern. So he ruled that the motion was debatable.

Mr. Speaker: He went further than that; he ruled that the resolution was debatable.

Mr. Knowles: He ruled that the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair was debatable.

Mr. Speaker: I think his ruling was that the resolution itself was debatable. I am not sure that I am in accord with that part of the ruling.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker Glen, according to page 800 of Hansard of February 23, 1942, after quoting standing order 60 and standing order 38 said:

> The resolution is on the order of proceedings for the day. I would point out that standing order 60 was passed in 1867, while standing order 38 was passed on March 22, 1927. In other words, standing order 38 is remedial to standing order 60, and I must conclude that standing order 38 must rule, and decide that the resolution before the house is debatable.

What was before the house? The house was not in committee. What was before the house was the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the resolution that was on the order paper. I submit that as one-half of his compromise he ruled that the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair was debatable.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should call it a compromise.

Mr. Knowles: The reason I suggested it was a compromise is that having said it was debatable, he added a limitation that in his view the debate should be directed to the negative of the question.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member thinks the ruling was a compromise, I do not think we should feel required to follow it too closely.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I agree, Mr. Speaker; and I suggest that we are making headway. The point I now wish to draw to your attention—and this is not going to be as long as it might sound from the detailed way in which I am going into it—is what happened in the House of Commons in 1942 following that ruling made by Mr. Speaker Glen.

The ruling was made on February 23, 1942. As a matter of fact immediately afterward, just over on the next page, there was another resolution for the Speaker to leave the chair on another proposition of the same kind and no questions were asked. It passed and the Speaker left the chair without a word of debate. During the next few days there were a couple more such motions on the order paper which were disposed of in the same way. The Speaker left the chair without any debate, no one questioning it from either side.

However, I would ask hon. members to turn now to the 18th March, 1942. If you look there, about three weeks later, and only 17 sitting days later, and look at pages 1416 and 1417, you will find that the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, moved a rather lengthy resolution. Let me read it or at least let me read the parts of it that are by way of preamble. It appears on page 1416 of Hansard of March 18, 1942:

> Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:
> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:

Then there are four paragraphs. The Speaker was in the chair and Mr. Ilsley, the minister of finance in Mr. Mackenzie King's government, stood up and said:

> Mr. Speaker, I propose to make a statement to the house on this resolution while Your Honour is in the chair.

Seventeen days after Mr. Speaker Glen had ruled that the debate on that occasion should be directed to the negative—and you can bet your boots that Mr. Ilsley did not speak to the negative of his resolution—he spoke to the affirmative with great vigour and at considerable length.

Mr. Speaker: Probably Mr. Speaker Glen had as much difficulty in enforcing his rulings as I have had in trying to enforce mine.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the point, and I submit that Mr. Speaker Glen never again tried to enforce his ruling. This particular debate—and I have checked it, Mr. Speaker—was carried on over three days. It took 78 pages of Hansard to record the debate that took place with the Speaker in the chair on Mr. Ilsley's resolution of March 18, 1942, and that must have been eight or ten hours of debate.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members must at least agree that I have faced the issue sooner than Mr. Speaker Glen did.

Mr. Knowles: I would go further, Mr. Speaker, and say that you have not only faced the issue but you have probably indicated the difficulty of carrying out the ruling Mr. Speaker Glen gave and, as a result of taking that stand, we are trying to help you to arrive at a better ruling than the one Mr. Speaker Glen made.

Without giving all the history, may I say that I have taken the trouble to go through Hansard from that date down to the present time and, if there were time, I could give in every year examples of major debates of this kind that took place with the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker: I hardly think that is necessary for my purposes. I have gone through Hansard also, and that will not help me greatly in coming to a conclusion.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure you have gone through Hansard, Mr. Speaker, and I readily agree it is not necessary. I am sure the house can take our word for it that the debates are there in every year from 1942—17 days after the ruling was made—right through to as late as the fall session of 1951 when the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was moving that very important piece of legislation, the Old Age Security Act. Without any question he made an eight-page speech with the Speaker in the chair, and his speech was followed by a four-page speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and followed by forty-minute speeches by a number of us who were keenly interested in that question. No question was raised as to the propriety of the debate at that stage.

So I submit there was a period of ten years from the time Mr. Speaker Glen made the ruling until we got to the National Library Act last year, when this question was raised. True, there were many occasions when ministers indicated their preference for dealing with the matter in committee of the whole rather than with the Speaker in the chair. Sometimes they won their point, sometimes they did not. But, as a point of order, it was not raised until the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) raised it on the library bill in the session of 1952. It was not settled conclusively at that point, but on June 4, I believe, the issue came up on another measure and was resumed on June 16; and that was the occasion when Your Honour made the ruling along the lines made by Mr. Speaker Glen in 1942.

If I may say so, I for one deeply appreciate the position you have since taken as a result of the debate a week or so ago on the emergency powers bill, and I think the ruling is difficult to enforce even by one like Your Honour who has faced up to it as you have. I submit that the idea of a debate that is directed to the negative should be forgotten. I think it is an interesting ruling that is back there in the books in 1942, but I think we should not regard it in terms of stare decisis—if that is the right use of that Latin phrase—but we should improve on it at this stage. I think we should decide, on the basis of standing order 60 and standing order 38, and of the practice across the years, that the motion is debatable.

I think, too, that we should recognize, with these other motions that seem just to resolve that the Speaker leave the chair, that what is really before us is the question of why the Speaker should leave the chair. Your Honour said the other day, even when you tried to limit debate to the negative, that you had to permit members who were opposed to the motion to state why they were opposed to it; and when they went so far as to deal with the terms of a resolution to the substance of which they were opposed, you had to allow it because that had to be recognized as a reason for opposition to Your Honour leaving the chair.

I think we are reaching a point where if you are going to have debate it should be allowed pro and con, and I would say similarly that those speaking for Your Honour to leave the chair should be able to speak to the merits and the good points for our going into committee of the whole. In other words, it seems to me that the real difficulty in practice, and the great difficulty we have had because Your Honour has had to enforce Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling of 1942, makes it clear that we should now decide upon a different course.

I would like to say something now, Mr. Speaker, that seems to me not so much procedural as being in terms of practice. I am sure, speaking as a member on the opposition side of the house, that we do not want to have a debate with the Speaker in the chair on every one of those resolutions preceding money bills which come along.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I hear some of my Tory friends applaud that sentiment. Many of those resolutions are not of such consequence as to require a lengthy debate at that stage. If I may say so, quite frankly I think the reason we have asked for it perhaps more often than we really wanted it has been because of resistance from the other side of the house to have debate at that stage. I would hope that out of this discussion which Your Honour has been good enough to invite we might not only reach a decision in terms of procedure, a decision as to the debate that is allowed, but we might also reach some better understanding between the two sides of the house.

I think we on the opposition side are prepared to be parties to such an understanding. To let it be clear I am saying here in the open that we do not want to debate every one of these motions with the Speaker in the chair. There are many of them in connection with which it is more satisfactory to go straight into committee. The government can know that and quote it back at us. There are, however, occasions such as the emergency powers resolution, and the resolution concerning housing which is coming up soon, when the matter is of such importance that we feel we should not be asked to surrender a right that has obtained in this House of Commons across the years.

As everyone knows, there is a lot more one could say, but there is really no need to multiply words or repeat arguments. I simply press the point that the circumstances that led to the ruling in 1942 should be understood, and I won't be impolite if I say we should recognize that 17 days later that same House of Commons which had heard the ruling chucked it out the window. On that occasion the chief chucker-outer was none other than Mr. Ilsley, and the house readily joined in his suggestion that there should be that 78-page debate on that occasion with the Speaker in the chair.

I may point out again that during those years when these debates took place, two or three each year, there were many resolutions on which there was no debate with the Speaker in the chair. I think we should return to that sort of understanding, that sort of modus operandi, under which it is clear that we have the right to debate the motions that are important. That is what we ask from the government side and that is what we ask from the Chair. I think the Chair and the government side have the right to expect from us, if that is the case, that we will not exercise that right on every occasion. I thank you, sir, and I thank the house for listening to this argument at length. I certainly hope our point will be given consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Does Your Honour wish to have further discussion on this point now or is it your intention to adjourn this discussion until a later date?

Mr. Speaker: I am in the hands of the house. If the house would like to have further discussion at this time or at a later time, that can be done. I am doubtful if the debate could be concluded tonight, but we could hear the views of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) if the house is agreeable.

Mr. Fulton: I am not at all anxious to do that. If, rather than break up the debate into two or three parts, it would be more convenient for the government to leave it until the whole matter can be concluded, that would suit me.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is not a matter for the convenience of the government, it is for the convenience of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) who is not here this evening. I am quite prepared to reserve what I have to say until it will be possible to conclude the debate on the point.

Mr. Fulton: My only point in referring to the convenience of the government was to ascertain whether they would prefer to go on with other business now rather than go on with this. I was not making any invidious suggestion thereby. I merely thought it would be more convenient to leave the discussion until the whole matter could be concluded.

Mr. Speaker: Naturally I am anxious to dispose of the matter as soon as possible. There are twenty-five minutes left before ten o'clock, unless the house would prefer to dispose of the resolution which is before the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think it might be more convenient if we postponed the continuation of the debate on the point of order until the time we could expect to complete it and ask Your Honour then to consider the arguments and give your decision. We might, perhaps, proceed with this resolution. It is probably not of a controversial nature.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; give us a chance to prove our point.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the resolution, I wish to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the manner in which he has presented his arguments. I can assure him they will receive my careful consideration. Other members of the house will have had the benefit of hearing his argument before presenting their arguments. I can assure him that I will read Hansard, and will give full consideration to the points he has raised.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Lesage: As hon. members know, a system of encouraging intermediate credit for farm improvements was approved by parliament in the Farm Improvement Loans Act of 1944. The primary purpose of the act was to fill a gap in the credit system which has been developed in Canada to meet the needs of agriculture. That gap related chiefly to the provision of intermediate credit and certain types of short-term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms and for the improvement of living conditions thereon. The act aims at assisting, particularly, the average farmer who in the past has frequently not been able to secure bank credit for these purposes. It aims, moreover, at providing credit in a form and under terms and conditions which are convenient and suited to the needs and conditions of the particular farm borrower.

The principle of the act is that the government undertakes to reimburse the chartered banks for losses incurred on loans they make under the terms of the act up to a maximum of 10 per cent of the aggregate principal amount of loans made by each bank.

The original act established a limit on the total amount of loans that may be made from time to time under the act. The practice has been to set this over-all limit by three-year periods. The first period was the three years ended February 29, 1948, and the limit was set at $250 million. During that period the total loans made were of the order of $35 million. At September 30, 1952, the amount outstanding for that period was $258,282.18.

The second three-year period ended February 28, 1951 and had a limit of $150 million. In that period a further amount of $135 million was lent and at September 30, 1952, the outstanding amount for that period was $23,025,609.62. In March 1951, parliament set up a third three-year period ending February 28, 1954, with a limit of $200 million. At September 30, 1952 a total of nearly $170 million had been lent out of the $200 million and the amount outstanding was $122,454,211.34.

Up to the end of December, 1952, loans totalling nearly $350 million have been made under the act. Total losses paid to the banks from the inception of the act to the end of December, 1952, have amounted to $38,383.93 for 80 claims, and of this amount $2,010 has been subsequently recovered from borrowers.

The total number of loans from the inception of the act to December 31, 1952 has been 331,965, and at that date the total number of loans in default was 28,916. The trend of lending has been accelerated to such an extent that for the first 22 months of the current three-year period, loans under this act have reached a figure of over $183 million and it is clear that the $200 million limit presently in force would be reached some time in April or May. It therefore becomes necessary to amend the period and the limit if farm improvement loans are to continue to be available after April or May of this year.

The bill which will follow the resolution contains three things. First, it shortens the present three-year period ending February 28, 1954, to an approximately two-year period ending March 31, 1953, March 31 being a more convenient terminal date than February 28. Second, it creates a new three-year period ending March 31, 1956. Third, it sets a limit of $300 million for this new three-year period.

I do not wish to take too much time to elaborate upon the value and usefulness of this act. In the past it has received unanimous support and the commendation of all sections of the House of Commons. However, it might interest hon. members to have some details on the operations under the act since the last report made by my predecessor in the house in February, 1951.

All hon. members know that in recent years economic conditions have made it both possible and desirable to improve and extend the mechanization of farm operations. The history of the act in that field, as well as in the general field of farm improvement, is one of constantly growing and increasing usefulness. Farmers have been using more and more the facilities of the banks under this act to obtain intermediate and short-term credit.

In the first year of operation—that is to say in 1945—the total amount of loans was roughly $4 million. In 1951 the total was $85 million and in 1952—that was last year—an amount of over $98 million was reached. There was an increase of 15 per cent.

With the permission of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to place on Hansard at this point a table showing the number and amounts of loans made in each year from 1945 to September 30, 1952. This table also shows the number and amounts of loans in each province for each year.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lesage: The table is as follows:

From this table it will be noticed that in the first years of operation of the act its facilities were used mostly in the western provinces. However, the farmers of the eastern provinces in recent years have been using them to a greater and greater extent, especially for the mechanization of their farms. They have been doing so to such a point that from the table it will be seen that the increase in the amount of loans in 1951 over 1950 in the maritime provinces was a little over 100 per cent; in the province of Quebec, 97·7 per cent; and in Ontario, 51·4 per cent.

I have with me another table which I believe would be highly interesting to members of this committee. It gives the number of farmers for each province according to the 1951 census, with the number of loans made in each province for the period January 1, 1951, to September 30, 1952. The percentage relationship is indicated for each province and for the whole of Canada. Is it agreed that I may put this table on Hansard?

The Chairman: Is it agreed that this table go on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lesage: The table is as follows:

The Farm Improvement Loans Act

Percentage Relationship between the Number of Loans and the Number of Farmers for the period—Jan. 1, 1951 to Sept. 30, 1952

	Number of Loans	Number of Farmers	Per cent
British Columbia	3,636	26,406	14
Alberta	38,713	84,315	46
Saskatchewan	47,246	112,018	42
Manitoba	18,382	52,383	35
Ontario	20,516	149,920	13
Quebec	10,001	134,336	7
New Brunswick	1,324	26,431	5
Nova Scotia	1,399	23,515	6
Prince Edward Island	2,552	10,137	25
Newfoundland	33	3,626	1
Total	143,802	623,087	23

From that table it will be seen that while the figure for the whole of Canada is 23 per cent, the figure for Alberta is 46 per cent; for Saskatchewan, 42 per cent; for Manitoba, 35 per cent; then it drops to 25 per cent for Prince Edward Island; 14 per cent for British Columbia; 13 per cent for Ontario; and 7 per cent, 5 per cent and 6 per cent respectively for Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and only 1 per cent for Newfoundland.

If the western farmers have been using the facilities of this act to a greater extent than have their eastern friends, it is mainly owing to the fact that in the west the farms are much larger and also relatively new, so that the total cost of implements to the western farmer is usually much higher. In the east the farms are smaller. As an easterner I can say that we have principally mixed farming. Most of our farms are old establishments of one, two or even three centuries.

The number of loans made under the act in the last full calendar year for which we have complete data—that is 1951—was 75,063, an increase of 27 per cent over 1950. In that year loans for agricultural implements, including farm trucks, again constituted by far the largest percentage, namely 92 per cent. The purchase of livestock accounted for 4 per cent. Loans for the construction, repair or alteration of farm buildings accounted for 3 per cent; and all other loans, 1 per cent.

A table giving a statement on loans, classified by purposes, for the years 1950 and 1951, and also giving the total from the inception of the act up to December 31, 1951, can be found on page 12 of the annual report of the Farm Improvement Loans Act for the calendar year 1951. I have with me a table giving the number of loans and the total amount of such loans, classified by purposes, up to September 30, 1952. With the permission of the committee I should like to have it printed in Hansard at this point.

The Chairman: Is that request agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lesage: The table is as follows:

The Farm Improvement Loans Act
Loans Classified by Purposes to September 30, 1952

	No.	Amount
1. For purchase of agricultural implements	279,453	$306,611,040.41
2. For purchase of livestock	10,357	8,440,187.66
3. For purchase or installation of agricultural equipment or a farm electric system	1,923	908,139.44
4. For alteration or improvement of farm electric system	53	51,336.43
5. For erection or construction of fencing or works for drainage on a farm	407	252,434.50
6. For construction, repair or alteration of, or making additions to, any building or structure on a farm	14,798	16,166,259.11
7. For any other work for the improvement or development of a farm designated in the regulations	10,373	4,833,116.66
Total	317,364	$337,232,514.21

In the year 1951 farm implement loans amounting to $78,302,384 were made. This represents an actual sales volume of farm implements and trucks of $136,798,751. Loans for the purchase of trucks showed a sharp increase over the preceding year, namely by 61 per cent. Combine loans also increased substantially, namely by 47 per cent. For tractor loans the increase was 13 per cent. It is estimated that approximately 45 per cent of new tractors and 60 per cent of new combines sold in Canada in 1951 were financed under the act.

The act was used considerably to assist the farmers of Canada to finance the building of new homes, new barns and other buildings, and the repair or renovation of their present buildings. Since the commencement of the act, $14,798,000 has been provided for these purposes.

Livestock loans have marked the largest increase in any classification since 1950. The total of loans for that purpose, which amounted to $3,815,000 at the end of 1950 had reached a total of $8,440,187 at September 30, 1952. The amount has more than doubled in those 22 months of operation.

Improvements to and developments in connection with Canadian farms, valued at $1,010,109, were financed under the act in 1951. The loans for this purpose were $694,460 and were made for a variety of purposes, the most important of which is the clearing and breaking of new land. The extent to which the act has been used for this purpose is such that to the end of 1951, 373,641 acres had been brought under cultivation with 7,764 direct loans for this purpose. In addition, loans under the act have been made for a considerable amount of machinery and equipment for this same purpose. No record of the acreage brought under cultivation as a result of the purchase of this machinery is maintained, but it must be substantial.

In conclusion, I believe hon. members will agree that this legislation has done very much to improve the economic status of the Canadian farmer. Anything that helps the farmer contributes to the economic welfare of all Canadians. In addition, the expanded mechanization and electrification of Canadian farms and improvements to farm homes have added much to the farm family's way of life.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I should like to say a word in reference to this proposed legislation. As the parliamentary assistant has pointed out, this has meant a great deal to the agricultural areas of this country. He pointed out the great amount of credit that had been issued in western Canada as a result of this legislation. I know some communities in western Canada where a great deal of the farm implement business has been financed through this Farm Improvement Loans Act. I remember a discussion back in February, 1951, to which he referred, when we had had some six years of the operation of this legislation. I think the amount of money and the percentage used for the purchase of farm implements were comparable to the figures he has given for the period since that date. The same applies to livestock. It is rather surprising that such a small percentage has been used for the construction or the repair of farm buildings under this set-up.

Since the act was first brought into being in 1944 there has been a great increase in inflation in this country. The maximum individual loan provided under the act is $3,000. I do not think that is adequate under present-day conditions, especially when one takes into consideration the price of the big farm implements themselves. The parliamentary assistant dealt with the matter of tractors and combines; but the self-propelled combine, for instance, which is in very great use in western Canada today, costs almost twice as much as it did at the time this legislation was enacted. Likewise the diesel tractor is at least 80 per cent higher today than the retail price of the machine at the time this legislation was enacted.

I am wondering whether the government has given any consideration to increasing the individual maximum loan limit to more than $3,000. I should think they might well increase it to at least $5,000 at this time. As proof of that necessity the parliamentary assistant will realize that at the last session of parliament an amendment was made to the Canadian Farm Loan Act, which is a different form of legislation for financing the purchase of land for farming purposes. If my memory serves me right—I have not checked on this—I think the original maximum individual loan was increased from $5,000 to $10,000; in other words the amount was doubled. If that was necessary at that time, I think it is equally necessary that the individual maximum provided under this act should be increased to some extent, and I would suggest at least from $3,000 to $5,000. Can the parliamentary assistant say whether consideration has been given to that matter? I shall have some other questions later on.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, consideration has been given to that matter. In considering the possibility of increasing the ceiling of $3,000 on individual loans, the government has taken into account the amount of pressure from farmers to obtain maximum loans of $3,000. I hold in my hand a table showing all loans in the amount of $3,000 which have been made since the inception of the act, to September 30, 1952. With the permission of the committee I should like to have this table printed in Hansard at this point.

Mr. Jutras: Is that for all provinces?

Mr. Lesage: It is by provinces and by banks.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that this table be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lesage: May I finish my answer. The total is 6,343 loans of $3,000 each, and of a total number of loans of over 300,000 it is less than 2 per cent.

Mr. Argue: Does that take into account this kind of a situation? A farmer may have obtained two $1,500 loans, shall we say, six months apart. Are these actually single loans that are not over $3,000?

Mr. Lesage: It is two minutes to ten. The officials of the department who were supposed to be here this evening have not yet arrived. They will be here when this matter comes up again and I shall be in a position to answer my hon. friend's question at that time. Perhaps the chairman would call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In the meantime, is the hon. member going to put the table on Hansard?

The Chairman: I understand that has been agreed to.

Mr. Lesage: The table follows:

APPENDIX

FLOODS—REPLIES TO EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
Ottawa 2.

Office of the Secretary to the Governor General

February 6th, 1953.

Dear Mr. Speaker:

Immediately upon receipt of your letter of the 4th February, the text of the resolution passed by the House of Commons on Monday, the 2nd February, was forwarded to the private secretary to the Queen to be laid before Her Majesty.

Word has now been received from the private secretary to the Queen stating that Her Majesty greatly appreciates this resolution and that he was commanded to convey to the Governor General the Queen's sincere gratitude for the sympathy and generous offer of help to which this resolution gives expression.

Yours sincerely,
LIONEL MASSEY,
Secretary to the Governor General.

The Hon. W. Ross Macdonald, Q.C.,
Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

ROYAL NETHERLANDS EMBASSY

February 12th, 1953.

Dear Mr. Speaker,

You were so extremely kind to send me with your letter of February 4th copies of the House of Commons debates of February 2nd and 3rd in which reference was made to the dreadful disaster which has befallen my country, as well as a copy of your letter to the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, in respect to the resolution referred to in the Debates.

I need not emphasize how grateful my government and people are for the sympathy and help from other friendly nations, last but not least from Canada.

On Sunday last Her Majesty Queen Juliana spoke to her people on the occasion of our national day of mourning and the Queen said:—

"The greater the misery caused by the losses we have sustained, the more deeply do we feel the fraternity of mankind which has found an echo in the breasts of men and women far beyond the confines of our country. Men of the free world have responded to the fierce tides with a mighty tide of Christian charity".

Yesterday a motion in parliament was proposed, unanimously carried, and worded as follows:—

"The Second Chamber of the States General deeply touched by the tide of compassion and love for his neighbour, as well as feelings of unity, which has been so strikingly demonstrated not only by the people of The Netherlands but which has also come to us across our borders as a demonstration of the unity of peoples, express to all friendly governments and peoples their gratefulness which they hope they will be able to prove themselves worthy of for the benefit of the world".

Very sincerely yours,
A. H. J. LOVINK

The Honourable W. Ross Macdonald,
Speaker of the House of Commons,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

The following is a translation of the communication received:

DEPARTMENT OF THE GRAND MARSHAL OF THE COURT

February 9th, 1953

Sir:

I have had the honour of placing before the King the letter in which Your Excellency has been pleased to acquaint me of the resolution voted on February 2nd last, by the Canadian House of Commons.

His Majesty is deeply touched by the sympathy which the House of Commons has expressed for the Belgian people, so sorely tried by the recent floods. The King would be most grateful to Your Excellency if you would be so kind as to request the honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons to convey to that exalted body his most heartfelt gratitude for the sympathy it has so cordially expressed to the Belgian people as well as for the very kind intentions it has voiced with regard to the victims.

I avail myself of this opportunity, sir, to renew the assurances of my highest consideration.

CARTON de WIART
Grand Marshal of the Court BN

The Canadian Ambassador,

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 18, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 FOR SITTING OF THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the announcement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that he proposed to bring down his budget tomorrow night at eight o'clock, it has been pointed out that for the regularity of the record it would be preferable to have an order that standing order 28 in relation to the Speaker leaving the chair without question put be suspended for tomorrow. If I had the unanimous consent of the house, I should like so to move.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent moved:

That the provisions of standing order 28 in relation to Mr. Speaker leaving the chair without question put for the house to go into committee of ways and means be suspended for the sitting of Thursday, February 19, 1953.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN

MARKETING OF WESTERN WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY—INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE OF WHEAT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement to the house with regard to the marketing of western wheat, oats and barley. As hon. members of the house know, phenomenal grain crops were produced in the prairie provinces last year: a record wheat crop of 664 million bushels, a record barley crop of 281 million bushels and a large oats crop of 346 million bushels. The marketing of grain production of this magnitude has of course presented many difficulties and it was realized early in the crop year that these problems could be met only through aggressive selling on the part of the Canadian wheat board and the provision of maximum transportation for the movement of grain.

I am happy to report that good progress is being made with the receiving and the merchandising of western grains. In spite of elevator congestion, which must be expected in the face of the size of the 1952 grain crops, producers had delivered a total of 461 million bushels of grain up to February 5, 1953—a quantity of grain not exceeded during the corresponding period in any of the past ten years. As grain is moved forward from country elevators, producers will continue to add to their deliveries of grain throughout the crop year.

The bumper crops of 1952 have been accompanied by an excellent demand particularly for wheat and barley. Exports of grain are running well ahead of the corresponding period a year ago when new records were established. I have every reason to believe that the record exports of 1951-52 will be exceeded by a substantial margin by exports in 1952-53. The Canadian wheat board has made very large sales so far in the crop year and has large sales on its books for delivery during the balance of the crop year.

Having regard to the present sales position, the government has approved an increase in the initial price of all grades of wheat, excepting durums, from $1.40 per bushel to $1.60 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. The increase will become effective on March 2, 1953. This means that an adjustment payment of 20 cents per bushel will be made to producers covering their deliveries of all grades of wheat other than durums to the board between August 1, 1952, and February 28, 1953.

In the case of durum wheat, there has been an exceptionally strong demand during the present crop year and actually the production of durum wheat is not now sufficient to meet the demand for this type of grain. Therefore, the initial prices of all grades of durum wheat will be increased by 25 cents per bushel and an adjustment payment in this amount will be made to all producers delivering durum wheat to the board between August 1, 1952, and February 28, 1953. This will bring the initial prices of durum grades from their present level of $1.40 per bushel for No. 1 amber durum in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver to $1.65 per bushel effective on March 2, 1953. There appears to be a growing market for durum varieties of wheat and it is my hope that this increase in the initial payment for this variety of wheat will serve to encourage additional durum production in 1953.

Grain

In regard to coarse grains, we must recognize that 1952 production and estimated marketings of oats and barley during the crop year 1952-53 involve extraordinary quantities. From the 1952 production, it is estimated that producers will have surpluses of about 175 million bushels of each grain. The position in respect to barley is satisfactory in respect to both marketing and sales and accordingly the government is increasing the initial price of all grades of barley by 15 cents per bushel effective March 2, 1953. The new initial price of barley will be $1.11 per bushel basis No. 3 CW 6 row barley in store Fort William or Port Arthur as compared with the present initial price of 96 cents per bushel. This will involve an adjustment payment of 15 cents per bushel on all grades of barley delivered to the board between August 1, 1952, and February 28, 1953.

I now wish to deal with the oats position. Up to the present time only about one-third of possible deliveries of oats for the crop year have been delivered by producers and while sales have been satisfactory, the Canadian wheat board do not feel in a position to make a definite recommendation at this time in regard to an increase in the initial price for oats. You will recall that a similar position was taken a year ago in regard to oats. Accordingly, it is the policy of the government to leave the initial price of oats at its present level for the balance of the crop year.

The adjustment payments which I have mentioned are, of course, subject to the one per cent levy under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

The wheat adjustment payment will commence on April 1 and will be followed immediately by the barley adjustment payment. If the present rate of producers' deliveries continues until the end of February, the adjustment payments on wheat and barley will amount to about $80 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister a question. Will that 20-cent adjustment payment for wheat be paid out of moneys held to the credit of the farmer, or will it be borrowed as happened in 1949 when a similar payment was made?

Mr. Howe: I cannot say as to that. I presume that the wheat board will have sufficient funds, but if not its credit is good and I am sure it will borrow the money to make the payment which usually is made to farmers at this time.

[Mr. Howe.]

INQUIRY AS TO 15-BUSHEL QUOTA THROUGHOUT WESTERN CANADA

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I am sure hon. members from western Canada are pleased with the minister's announcement. The question I should like to ask is this. When does he expect that the 15-bushel quota may be general throughout western Canada, and to what extent does he think that 15-bushel quota may be raised before the end of the crop year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am happy that my hon. friend asked that question today because I asked the same question of the chairman of the wheat board yesterday. He told me he is hopeful that the 15-bushel quota will be made uniform across the prairies before the end of February.

THE BUDGET

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I desire to table copies in English and in French of the white paper in connection with the budget 1953-54. This procedure of tabling the white paper the day before the budget was adopted last year and has, I believe, proved useful to hon. members. I would suggest, if it meets the approval of the house, and I so move, that it be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings so that hon. members will have an opportunity to study it before I deliver the budget speech tomorrow evening.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CITIZENSHIP

PROVISION IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES WITH RESPECT TO EDUCATION OF NEWCOMERS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Hon. members will be interested to know that it is the intention of the government to provide in the supplementary estimates for a sum from which grants may be made to provincial governments with respect to the education of our newcomers in citizenship. It is a well recognized fact that the sooner the newcomers are made familiar with the English or the French language, the habits and customs of the Canadian people, our history, our form of government, and our democratic processes, the sooner they will become useful and productive citizens. There are at the moment approximately 45,000 adult newcomers attending citizenship classes in the various provinces and we hope that these classes will be continued and increased in number.

The grant to each provincial government would be one-half the amount contributed by the provincial government for these citizenship classes. Letters are going forward to each provincial premier advising him of this and inviting his government to join in making a suitable agreement.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister with reference to the answer he has just given whether the federal financial assistance is being confined simply to the instruction in citizenship, or whether it will extend to relieve the local school authorities of some of the burden they are now carrying in the instruction of those newcomers in the English or the French language.

Mr Harris: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear the precise wording of the final paragraph, which reads:

The grant to each provincial government would be one-half the amount contributed by the provincial government for these citizenship classes.

Mr. Fleming: Apparently I have not made my question clear to my hon. friend. This is a question that is to be regarded as training in citizenship. Is it going to extend to include the type of education that is now being afforded to the newcomers by the local school authorities, and which takes the form in many municipalities of instruction in language?

Mr. Harris: If these schools qualify for provincial grants, then the federal government will make a grant to the province accordingly.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask a supplementary question? Are special schools to be set up for this instruction?

Mr. Harris: I have no idea what the various provinces call their schools. The schools that I am referring to are in the main conducted by the local boards of education, mainly, almost exclusively, at night, and usually in the school building. There are, however, some other schools maintained by voluntary organizations which are doing good work as well.

Mr. Simmons: May I ask the minister whether this provision will apply to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories? The minister just mentioned the provinces.

Mr. Harris: I agree that in the announcement I made no mention of the Yukon, but we never forget the Yukon; it is part of the Dominion of Canada.

QUESTIONS

DELAYED INCOME TAX RETURNS—VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. Green:

1. Was any person, firm or company fined in Victoria, British Columbia, during the month of December, 1952, for delay in filing income tax returns?

2. If so, what amount of fine was levied in each case, and how long after the due date was the return filed in each case?

Mr. McCann:

1. One individual and one corporation.

2. The individual was fined $50 for failure to file a T4 information return in respect of the year 1950 on the due date of 28th February, 1951. As of 7th February, 1953, the return had not been filed.

The corporation was fined $25 for failure to file a T4 information return in respect of the year 1950 on the due date of 28th February, 1951. The corporation filed such a return on 21st November, 1952.

PRINCE ALBERT AIRPORT RUNWAYS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the government given consideration to providing the city of Prince Albert with all-weather runways at the airport?

2. If so, has a favourable decision been arrived at?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Following a recent visit from a delegation from the city of Prince Albert to the Minister of Transport, arranged by the hon. member for Prince Albert, further consideration is being given to questions related to the improvement of the airport at Prince Albert. Decision as to the time at which further work can be initiated has not yet been taken.

2. Answered by No. 1 above.

R.C.A.F.—FIRST CF-100 SQUADRON

Mr. Fulton:

1. When is it expected that the first Royal Canadian Air Force squadron will be fully equipped with CF-100 aircraft?

2. How many CF-100's will this squadron have?

3. Where will it be stationed?

4. How far behind original schedule will the final deliveries to this squadron be?

Mr. Campney:

1, 2 and 3. An R.C.A.F. squadron stationed at North Bay will be equipped for operations with CF-100 aircraft in the near future. It is contrary to the public interest to disclose the numbers of aircraft in a squadron intended for the defence of Canada or to give the exact date when it will become operational.

Questions

4. The Minister of Defence Production at page 1952 of Hansard in answer to a number of questions has dealt with the production program for the CF-100. The schedule of deliveries to squadrons is directly related to the rate at which the aircraft are produced.

CANADIAN FORCES, KOREA—BOOTS

Mr. Harkness:

1. Is the ordinary type of army boot, generally designated "boots, ankle" equipped with steel cleats on toe and heel, the type of boot on issue to troops in Korea?

2. If so, has this type of boot been found suitable in Korea?

3. If a change was made in the type of boot issued, what was the date of this change, what was the new type of boot issued, and what proportion of the personnel in the Korean brigade was issued with a different type?

Mr. Campney:

1. Boots generally issued to the 25th Canadian infantry brigade in Korea are the regular type of boot known as "boots ankle" issued to Canadian forces in Canada and Europe. These boots are about 7¼ inches high; they have steel plates on the toes and heels and are hobnailed as necessary. Tank crews are issued with "boots ankle CAC", which are similar to the regular "boots ankle" except that the soles and heels are rubber and not equipped with steel plates or hob nails. Both knee and hip length rubber boots are issued for special purposes. During 1951-52 about 50 per cent of the brigade were issued with "boots rubber soles leather uppers" similar to the shoepacs used by lumbermen, being about 12½ inches high. On balance this boot was not found to be generally satisfactory for use in Korea because of the conditions of climate and terrain found there. A number of British boots "cold-wet-weather" were purchased and issued. Also, some 1,500 pairs of boots "X-49-C" made in Canada were issued for trial purposes in 1951-52. These boots are similar to the "boots ankle" except that composition soles and heels were used in the design. The results of these trials are now being evaluated. A further 500 pair of boots were issued for trials in Korea in June, 1952. These boots are similar to the X-49-C boots, but with a leather extension 3¾ inches high, making the total height of the boot about 11 inches. Other user trials have been made of other boots of Canadian, British and United States design and these trials are continuing.

2. So far the Canadian ankle boot, as modified with the leather extension, has been found a most satisfactory boot for general use in Korea. A substantial number of the regular boots ankle have been modified in a similar way in the theatre. As stated in answer to question 1, other types of footwear have been, and are being given user trials.

3. See answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

2. Each having been given three weeks notice, 17 civilian cooks were released from 27 January to 6 February.

3. Eight.

4. At present 15 naval cooks do the work done by the 17 civilian cooks; not more than 17 naval cooks will eventually replace the 17 civilian cooks.

5 and 6. It is the policy of the Royal Canadian Navy to fill sufficient positions in shore establishments with service personnel to enable an adequate rotation scheme to function. If this were not done, naval personnel would be required to serve continuously at sea. Because of a shortage of naval cooks, civilian cooks were hired on a temporary basis in a number of shore establishments until trained service personnel became available.

CANADIAN FORCES, EUROPE—FOOD PURCHASES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many pounds of (a) eggs; (b) bacon; (c) cheese, have been purchased from countries in Europe, during the last six months for the use of the Canadian forces in Europe?

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Campney: In order to avoid the setting up of separate supply lines at considerable expense, rations for the 27th Canadian infantry brigade and the R.C.A.F. air division are obtained through British and American, European supply lines. The Department of National Defence therefore has no record of the countries from which the rations referred to are purchased.

If so, what was the date and what were the terms of any such contract, including the price per pound to be paid for such cobalt?

3. Did the Canadian government approve of any such contract? If so, by what means was such approval granted? Was there any consultation between United States and Canadian authorities concerning this contract?

Mr. Winters:

1. (a) There are 27 officers and officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation receiving salaries in excess of $7,000 per year.

(b) It is not the policy of the government to ask Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to disclose the names of this group, because of the quasi-commercial nature of the corporation and its competitive position in securing and retaining staff in the mortgage and construction fields.

2. (a) Yes.

(b) see 1(b).

RADIO PROGRAM—"THE DOCTORS' VIEWPOINT"

1. Has an application been received by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from the British Columbia division of the Canadian Medical Association for the presentation of a radio program entitled, "The Doctors' Viewpoint", so that the listening public might be informed on health affairs?

2. If so, was the application approved? If not, for what reason?

Mr. McCann:

1. A request was received by the C.B.C. from the British Columbia division of the Canadian Medical Association for the presentation of its radio program entitled "The Doctors' Viewpoint" on the Prince Rupert station.

2. The request has been approved for the carrying of the program on this station.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is the total amount of money now in the unemployment insurance fund?

2. What was the total amount in the fund one year ago; two years ago; five years ago; ten years ago?

3. Has consideration been given by the government or by the unemployment insurance commission to the size of the fund, as to whether it is overfunded, or too large? If so, what is the result of such consideration?

4. Has consideration been given to increasing the benefits available to those insured under the fund? If so, what is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. January 31, 1953: $862,371,504.10.

2. (a) January 31, 1952: $776,134,110.49; (b) January 31, 1951: $654,051,465.58; (c) January 31, 1948: $435,682,436.15; (d) January 31, 1943: $101,471,458.29.

3. Annually, in accordance with the statute, the unemployment insurance advisory committee has reported on the status of the unemployment insurance fund. Extracts from the last three reports of the committee are as follows:

1950. While a great deal of valuable information has been accumulated over the past nine years, the period of the war and the ensuing years of very high employment do not appear to the committee a period likely to be sufficiently representative to yield dependable results on which to judge the future workings of the fund.

1951. The fact that so large a proportion of the contributions was required to meet the benefit payments in a year of high employment shows that there may not be an unduly large margin for bad years. It is reassuring, therefore, that as a result of the sustained high level of employment ever since the act came into effect the fund provides a substantial reserve against adverse conditions.

1952. The committee reports that the unemployment insurance fund, in its judgment, is in a sound position.

4. When the act came into force in 1940, the maximum weekly benefit was $14.40. On the recommendation of the unemployment insurance commission and the advisory committee, the rates have been increased by amendments to the act in 1948, 1950 and 1952, and the maximum weekly benefit is now $24. Supplementary benefits were introduced in 1950 and a number of other amendments have been made from time to time, such as the reduction in the waiting period, which have tended to increase the benefits available.

3. What was the cost of maintenance and supervision of the said artillery range, in each and every year, from and including the year of its inception, to and including the year 1952?
4. What are the names and addresses of suppliers, caretakers and other employees of the said artillery range, appearing on the payrolls or accounts, in each and every year, since the erection of the said artillery range, to and including the year 1952?

7. Has the said artillery range been utilized to its full extent since 1945?
8. Was the said artillery range and surrounding vast area of available land considered by the Department of National Defence, as an appropriate and suitable location for the proposed military training camp to be set up in the province of New Brunswick?
9. If so, what reasons have determined the Department of National Defence to select Gagetown, New Brunswick, as the site for the said camp in preference to the already established artillery range at Tracadie?
10. If not, what are the reasons why the said artillery range was never considered as a possible site?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, not only does the answer to this question entail a vast amount of research and compilation, but a good deal of the information in the earlier years covered by the question is not available. If the hon. member would limit the time back to which his question goes, to 1948, I would move that it be made an order for return with that amendment.

Mr. Robichaud: I am quite satisfied to do that.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return, in accordance with the remarks of the Associate Minister of National Defence.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL DEFENCE, PRAIRIE COMMAND—SHORTAGES, ETC.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all reports made to the Department of National Defence regarding (a) shortages; (b) waste and extravagant spending, in connection with defence projects and supplies in the prairie command, since the 1st day of October, 1952, to date.

Mr. Claxton: We would be glad to have this passed, subject to the usual qualifications regarding privileged communications.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think that should be clarified, as to what privileged communications are in connection with this matter. I told the associate minister what I had in mind. I was not asking for a police report. I am asking for a report of investigations that took place in November and December in connection with the project to which I made reference.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member says he is not asking for a police report, but also there are reports made by service police and other service personnel having the same position as police reports.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, subject to the statement of the Minister of National Defence.

LOWER CARAQUET, N.B.—PUBLIC WHARF

Mr. Robichaud:

For a copy of all correspondence, from the 1st of January, 1945 to date, between the district engineer's office of the department of public works, Saint John, New Brunswick, the Department of Public Works, Ottawa, and any person or persons whatsoever, with reference to any addition, protection work or repair to the public wharf at Lower Caraquet, New Brunswick, also for a copy of all reports, investigations and/or surveys, if any, made by any member of the Saint John, New Brunswick, district engineer's office or of the Department of Public Works at Ottawa, in any way concerning or relating to the said wharf, from 1945, to date.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the first part of the motion up to the seventh line, the words "New Brunswick" being the last words. But we cannot agree to the words—

—also for a copy of all reports, investigations and/or surveys, if any, made by any member of the Saint John, New Brunswick, district engineer's office or of the Department of Public Works at Ottawa, in any way concerning or relating to the said wharf, from 1945, to date.

Those reports are prepared for the information of the minister, so that he may make his decision. He becomes responsible for that decision, and never shirks that responsibility. But we never bring in those officials who advise the minister in these matters.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. I. Hetland (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. Would he make a further statement at this time regarding the grain handlers' strike at Vancouver?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. In reply I must say that unfortunately there is nothing I can add at this time to the statement I made yesterday. I could say that the deputy minister of labour had his latest contact with the situation through telephone conversations with Vancouver this morning at nine o'clock Pacific time.

Before concluding I should like to assure hon. members that no effort will be spared within the scope of the potentialities of the department to hasten a satisfactory settlement of this dispute.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

CF-100 AIRCRAFT—ORENDA JET ENGINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the Minister of Defence Production or his parliamentary assistant as to the progress being made in connection with two questions passed as orders for returns on January 28, 1953, dealing with the CF-100 and the Orenda jet engine. When may I expect to have the returns tabled?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Surely the information the hon. member has asked for was given in my statement made in the house on Monday last. I do not think we can break the situation down piecemeal. I have given all the pertinent facts, and I am prepared to give any more overriding facts. I do not know what information the questions specifically asked for, but I would assume that they were answered.

Mr. Fulton: The orders were passed on January 28, and were not covered by the minister's statement made two days ago. I drew his attention to that fact just after he made his statement, pointing out that I hoped it would not be considered that his statement contained a reply to the questions in those two orders. When the minister looks at the record for January 28, I think he will agree that the answers are by no means covered by his statement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF DIRECTOR OF FILM BOARD TO DIPLOMATIC POST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Resources and Development. On April 4, 1950, I asked him if an embassy post was to be given to Mr. Irwin, the director of the national film board, within three years. At that time both the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and the Minister of Resources and Development said no. Now I would like to ask the minister if Mr. Irwin is resigning from the national film board. If so, has his appointment been made or is it being made as high commissioner to Australia?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask a question. In reply I would say that my answer to his earlier question in 1950 was correct at that time.

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

Mr. Irwin was first appointed commissioner of the national film board on February 1, 1950. He was reappointed on February 1, 1952. Since his appointment he has given outstanding service, which has been reflected in the work of the film board itself. He has those qualities of outstanding administrative ability, vigour and imagination which are so necessary for anyone in his present capacity.

However, an opportunity has presented itself for Mr. Irwin to continue his public service in another and broader field. This is a matter which my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has had under discussion with me for some weeks now. As a result the government has asked Mr. Irwin to represent Canada in one of the nations of the commonwealth, and my colleague has authorized me to say that he will be appointed high commissioner to Australia.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the minister if the plum tree was planted when he was appointed director of the film board?

Mr. Abbott: No plum trees around here.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF COBALT BOMBS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. During the debate on the setting up of the atomic energy committee the minister made reference to the cobalt bomb. In this connection I should like to ask the minister, in view of the greatly increased use of this bomb for medical purposes, principally in connection with cancer, if he can give the house any more information as to the progress that is being made in its production and how soon it is expected that a sufficient supply will be available to meet the requirements of the principal hospitals in Canada.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Cobalt 60 is being produced as fast as the operation of the pile at Chalk River will permit. As I said yesterday six bombs have been built already and two more are practically finished. Others will be built just as rapidly as production will permit. If the interest is in a particular project and those anxious to acquire equipment would care to take up their problem with the man in charge of that branch of the work at Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, I am sure he would give them an approximate date as to when their requirements could be fulfilled.

FISHERIES

STORM DAMAGE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries if any decision has yet been taken regarding compensation for the losses suffered by the fishermen of Newfoundland during the storms last fall.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): A similar question was asked by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) on December 4 and the answer given at that time was that this was primarily a matter for provincial responsibility and so far we had received no request from the provincial government. To date we have still not received any request from the provincial government.

POSTAL SERVICE

PORT CREDIT—LAKEVIEW—DOOR TO DOOR SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Postmaster General if he can report any progress with respect to the institution of door to door mail delivery service in Port Credit and Lakeview.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): May I first thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. As my hon. friend was informed on January 15, the result of the inquiry held was that only 68 per cent of the population have so far installed the necessary receptacles for the inauguration of this service. According to the postal regulations 90 per cent of the population must provide such receptacles before a service is given. However, a new survey will be made at the beginning of March.

Mr. Graydon: May I point out that this matter was under discussion during the debate on the Post Office Department and I thought the minister was going to make some further move in connection with the survey.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): If the proper receptacles are not provided, we cannot give a service. It is up to my hon. friend to co-operate and tell these people to provide the necessary receptacles. As soon as the required proportion have done so we will be only too glad to start the service.

Mr. Graydon: If that were the whole story it would be all right, but it is not.

COAL

REFERENCE TO ANSWER IN SESSIONAL PAPER NO. 77A

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time on a question of privilege in connection with an answer contained in sessional paper No. 77A, brought down on February 4. This answer was provided by the Department of National Revenue and it is completely in error. Question No. 4 was as follows:

> What are the names of the companies in Canada who import American coal?

The answer was as follows:

> It is contrary to the practice of this department to furnish information which would disclose the private transactions of importers or exporters at customs.

I think the minister will agree that that answer is completely in error. I am not asking for the details of the business of importers or exporters, I merely ask for the names of companies in Canada that import United States coal. I wonder if the minister would be good enough to amend that answer and give me the information asked for. I think it is a complete evasion of the question. I did not ask that question for fun; I had a good reason for asking it. I should like the minister to tell me now if he will undertake to amend the answer, or should I put the question again on the order paper for a proper answer?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I submit that under the circumstances the answer is a proper one. It has been the custom to provide information as to the quantities of imports or exports, but not the names of individuals making those importations or exportations.

Mr. Gillis: That is not an answer. I did not ask for either the quantities, the qualities or the details of any business transactions. I merely asked for the names of the companies.

Mr. McCann: It is not in the public interest to divulge the private business of people. We never give names.

An hon. Member: Oh, no?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I can allow any further debate on the question at this time.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if any order in council has been passed in recent days under the Emergency Powers Act which has not yet been tabled in the house?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would be very much surprised if there were any. I do not know of any that have been passed within weeks, but I shall make inquiry and bring down a positive answer.

Mr. Fleming: Is the Prime Minister aware of the reference in yesterday's press to some such order?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I have not seen anything, except a reference to one passed several weeks or perhaps several months ago. There was an order passed granting authority to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to cancel radio licences for pilots of aeroplanes or to cancel the licence of the pilot himself for security reasons, but that order was included in the summaries produced here.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to ask the Postmaster General if any progress has been made in setting up the committee of the house with regard to the Post Office Department.

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): We hope we will soon have the second reading of the bill, and then the committee will be set up to study the whole matter.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

PROVISION TO EXTEND OPERATION FOR A FURTHER PERIOD, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 17, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, to extend its operation for a further period by closing out on March 31, 1953, in lieu of February 28, 1954, the present three year pool of loans guaranteed by the government under the act and by providing for a new three year pool commencing April 1, 1953, and ending March 31, 1956; to provide further that the maximum amount of bank loans made in the new period and guaranteed under the act shall be three hundred million dollars.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned last night the hon. member for Assiniboia had asked me if the last table that I had placed on Hansard dealt only with single loans. The answer is yes. When the hon. member for Assiniboia interjected his question I was in the course of answering a question asked by the hon. member for Souris, who had inquired if consideration had been given by the government to increasing the ceiling of $3,000 on farm improvement loans. I said that consideration had been given, but it had not been felt that the pressure was such as to warrant an increase at this time. I pointed out when placing on Hansard the table giving the number of maximum loans since the inception of the act that those loans represented only 2 per cent of the total loans made. I may add that in the first nine months of operation in 1952 the average loan was $1,180. May I also say that I know farmers quite well. I represent a farming constituency, and I have learned that whenever farmers have complaints or representations to make they usually voice them quite readily. According to my information, no individual farmer and no farmers' associations have made representations either to those administering the act or to the Department of Finance asking for an increase in the ceiling of $3,000.

I believe it is important to remember that the principle of the Farm Improvement Loans Act is to provide the average farmer with credit facilities for intermediate and short term loans. For longer term loans—the hon. member for Souris said yesterday up to $10,000—the facilities of the farm loan board are available to them. Moreover, there are other institutions in the provinces which look after credit for farmers.

Mr. Cardiff: Is there any limitation on age?

Mr. Lesage: No.

Mr. Charlton: What has been done by the government to acquaint farmers in the east with the possibility of obtaining money by way of loan from the government under the Farm Improvement Loans Act?

Mr. Lesage: Farmers in the east should be as well aware of the facilities available under the act as farmers in the west. When I made my statement last night I gave what were in my opinion the reasons why farmers in the east have not in the past made use of the facilities available under the act as much as farmers in the west. I also added that farmers in the east were using them more and more as they heard about the facilities and as they became aware of the existence of the act. But there will always be the fundamental difference that farms in the west are newer, that farmers of the west require more expensive farm machinery than eastern farmers, and that farms in the east are smaller and much older. Farms in the east have been operated for 100, 200 or 300 years. There are many more relatively new farms in the west which require the buying of more machinery, and more expensive machinery.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Following up the question which my colleague asked the parliamentary assistant, I should like to know if any efforts are made on behalf of either the Department of Finance or the Department of Agriculture to draw the attention of the farmers of Newfoundland to the benefits that are available. In looking over the list here I find that in 1949 not one loan was made in Newfoundland under this act. I believe that the only publicity that has been given the act in Newfoundland is the publicity that I have given it. I have been trying to tell the people there of the benefits they can get under this legislation. But they were up against the fact that the bankers themselves were not familiar with the legislation and shied clear of it. If you look at the figures, you will see that it was not until last year that any substantial amount was loaned.

Since January 1, 1951, there have been thirty-three loans made in Newfoundland. Thirty of them were in 1952. In 1950 there were only two loans of less than $1,000. In 1951 there were only three, and the total amount loaned in Newfoundland up to date is only $41,000 out of an over-all total of $337 million up to the end of 1952. It seems to me that someone is slipping up there. There is not much good in having legislation for the benefit of two or three provinces. Every province should receive the benefit of it. Inasmuch as Newfoundland has come into confederation and the people of Newfoundland have not received the benefit of the publicity that the people of western Canada get, it seems to me that some special effort should be made to draw these things to their attention.

I have in my hand several of the booklets that have been issued by the Department of Finance. One is entitled "Your Invisible Farmhand". It is an illustrated booklet showing farmers how they can get assistance to improve their homes. Another is entitled "What the Western Dailies Say About the Farm Improvement Loans Act". It contains extracts from different papers in the prairie provinces in 1945 praising this legislation. Then there is one entitled "Farm Improvement Loans". It is an illustrated pamphlet showing all the different purposes for which loans can be had and all the details concerning them. I should like to know if the parliamentary assistant is in a position to tell me how much of this literature has been circulated in Newfoundland. What efforts have really been made to draw the provisions of the act and the benefits that can be obtained under it to the attention of the farmers of Newfoundland?

Mr. Lesage: Quite a few pamphlets outlining the advantages of the act have been published by the Department of Finance. They are available at the request of bank managers all over the country. The head offices of the banks see to it that their branches get the publicity. I do not know how it is in Newfoundland. These pamphlets are at the disposal of the bank managers and the farmers themselves. According to my information the best publicity has been given—I will take my own constituency, if you wish, where the number of loans increased sharply in the last years—by dealers in farm implements, farm tractors and so on, who have convinced their clients that it is a very good way to obtain credit to pay for farm implements, trucks and tractors.

The hon. member is surprised that there has not been a larger amount of loans in Newfoundland. We must not forget that according to the 1951 census there are only 3,626 farms in Newfoundland, and out of that total 2,840 are operated by part-time farmers or are farms where the value of the products sold is less than $250 a year. Of the balance of 786 farms, 583 are such that the value of the products sold is less than $2,500 a year. That leaves in the whole of Newfoundland only 203 farms, the products of which sold for more than $2,500 in 1951.

I have never had the advantage of visiting Newfoundland but I understand that the principal occupation there is fishing. I understand that many fishermen have small pieces of land and are part-time farmers, but their main occupation is not farming. Therefore when you take into account the fact that there are only slightly over 200 farms which yield an income of more than $2,500 a year, it is not surprising that the amount and the number of loans have been so low.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The point I am making is that if we are so backward in the development of our land—

Mr. Lesage: No, I never said that the province of Newfoundland was backward. What I said was that farming was not the most important occupation in Newfoundland, which is quite different.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The point is that our people as well as the people of other provinces deposit money in the savings banks. I do not know what the figures are. Has the parliamentary assistant the figures as to how much money is deposited in the branches of banks in Newfoundland?

Mr. Lesage: No, sir, I have not that information available at this time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Approximately $350 million has been lent, and only $40,000 has been lent in Newfoundland. This is a very insignificant amount of money and I do not think it would purchase one farm of any size in western Canada. What I am trying to stress—I am glad the Minister of Agriculture is here and I wish he would listen to what I am going to say—is that in Newfoundland you have to build up the farmers and draw attention to these benefits. The parliamentary assistant says that information has gone to the bank managers. I have been talking to the bank managers, and, as I said at the beginning, most of the publicity given to this measure in Newfoundland has been given by me.

There are still many farmers who do not realize that this piece of legislation is on the statute books at all and that loans can be made. There is another point I wish to make, and perhaps the parliamentary assistant can answer it. Some farmers tell me that they can make just as good a deal through the sellers of agricultural equipment. Is that correct? I am told that they get the same terms from the dealer as they can get from the bank.

Mr. Lesage: If they can do that now, then it is a very good thing and the act has had that added benefit. Before the introduction of the act I understand that if a farmer wanted to finance a loan on a farm truck the rate of interest was around 15 per cent or more, and for farm implements it was around 8 per cent or more. If, as my hon. friend says, since the inception of the act the same conditions can be obtained from ordinary sources of credit as can be obtained under the act, so much the better; that is another advantage that has accrued from it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that 90 per cent of this money has been lent for the purchase of tractors, combines and machinery of that kind. Is there any special reason for that? Has that feature of the benefits of the act been stressed more than the actual improvement of the farm as set out in the illustrated booklet in which the stress is put on improvements within the home itself by the introduction of electrical facilities and so on?

Mr. Lesage: So far as the department is concerned there has been no more stress put on loans for agricultural implements than on loans for improvement of the farm itself.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

What I said a few moments ago applies here. I told my hon. friend that a lot of advertising had been put out by the dealers of farm implements, farm trucks or tractors, concerning the advantages of using the facilities of the act, and that had been used as a selling point.

Mr. Jutras: Just on that point, I think it follows from the nature and purpose of the act that, particularly in western Canada, the greatest benefit of this measure would come from the financing of farm machinery. This is exactly the way the development has occurred in the west. I want to take this opportunity of joining with others to say that, in my estimation, this scheme is the best one ever devised in a great many years. It has had a great effect on agriculture throughout the western provinces. This measure has contributed to the peace of mind of the farmers, and has contributed greatly to the security of the farmers.

I believe it would be fair to say that this legislation was devised primarily for the purpose of assisting farmers in securing machinery and equipment. It will be recalled that some years ago there was an investigation into the cost of farm machinery. Before this measure came into being the implement companies had to have their own credit organizations. There were a number of collectors attached to these organizations, who had to go throughout the country visiting the farmers individually before the crop was harvested to make sure when it would be harvested. Then, a second trip was necessary when the crop was harvested so the collector would be the first one to get the money. Really, these people were chasing the farmers up and down the country continuously. Naturally this was a costly procedure for them, and they had to charge from 7 per cent to 12 per cent interest on the money that they were advancing to the farmer to purchase machinery. This proved to be a costly operation for the farmer.

Now, when this system came into being the farmer was able to go to the bank and secure a loan at 5 per cent. He could pay cash for the farm implements, so that from then on he had nothing more to do with the equipment company. When he sold his grain he got his money, went to the bank, and paid what he owed the bank and that was the end of it. In this respect, the act has been of great benefit to the farmers. In passing, I might say that I feel this measure is a living memorial to the late Dr. Clark. I think it is to the credit of this government as well that they had the vision to recognize the merit of this proposition, and the courage to put it into force.

It is obvious that in western Canada the main purpose of this act is to enable loans to be secured for farm implements. In the last annual report for which we have complete figures, we find that 92 per cent of the money lent under this act was for financing the purchase of farm implements, and this amounted to $78 million. It is interesting to note that this $78 million represented a credit of $137 million in farm equipment. As the parliamentary assistant pointed out last night, it is estimated that that represents 45 per cent of all the new farm trucks purchased and 60 per cent of all the new combines purchased, so that one can see that the act has a great bearing on financing in western Canada.

At this point I should like to say something about the risk in agriculture. For some years past farmers have not been considered a good risk. I believe that this report provides a glowing tribute to the farmer, and shows clearly that he has been careful about his debts. It shows he has been faithful to his obligations. During the first year of operation there were no losses to the government at all. During the second and third years there were no losses to the country. During the last complete year for which we have figures, 1951, there were eighteen claims made on the government totalling about $6,000; that is eighteen claims out of 75,000 loans and $6,000 claimed out of $85 million lent. It is interesting to note that since the inception of the act there have been 54 claims out of 248,000 loans, with a loss to the government of $26,000 out of a total of $255 million lent. You can see that this measure has cost the country very little and has unlocked a great source of credit.

As we have seen, in the case of farm machinery, the loans of $78 million represented $137 million, so that by the same token it could almost be said that for this slight cost we have put practically a half billion dollars at the disposal of agriculture.

I just want to say a word on the question raised by the hon. member for Souris; I refer to the question of increasing the maximum of $3,000. As the parliamentary assistant has pointed out, there does not appear to be great pressure to have the $3,000 increased. According to the figures tabled, for instance those in Manitoba who have availed themselves of the total loan of $3,000 since the inception of the act amount to approximately 700 out of a total of 44,000. There therefore does not seem to be great pressure on the ceiling. Personally I must confess that I have never had any demands for it, and I do not know of any farm organization which has raised the question. There may be a case for it but at the present time I am not aware of it.

But there is one thing that I think we should not lose track of and about which we should be careful in our consideration of this act. We have a good act. We have one that is doing a wonderful job and is serving a definite purpose. I think we should be careful not to attempt to stretch it to do something it was not meant to do. For instance, it was never meant to replace what the Canadian Farm Loan Act, for instance, has been set up to do. These two pieces of legislation should be made to go together and to supplement one another. We should be careful that we do not do anything whereby one will supersede the other.

As I said, the act as it is now has been most successful. It has done a wonderful job. There may be a case for increasing the ceiling, but I do not think there is a great case for it at the moment. Before we increase the ceiling my suggestion is that we be extremely careful that we do not weaken the act by attempting to make it do too much. It was made to do a job, and it is doing it. Let us be sure that we keep it that way.

Mr. Thatcher: In my constituency, Mr. Chairman, this is fairly important legislation. Most farmers feel that it is good legislation; but I think they also feel that it does not go far enough. As the parliamentary assistant has pointed out, its main purpose is to provide credit facilities for farmers. It is an unfortunate fact that in Canada most farmers cannot avail themselves of the ordinary credit facilities which most of us have—such as loan companies, finance companies and so on—because these credit companies seem to feel that lending to farmers involves risks that are too great. Thus there is today a real gap in credit facilities for agriculture.

As I understand it, this legislation is going to do two things; I refer to the new amendments. First of all, it is going to extend the act to March 31, 1956. Second, it is going to increase the amount which the government is guaranteeing to the banks from $200 million to $300 million.

Mr. Lesage: No.

Mr. Thatcher: If the parliamentary assistant wishes to correct me, I should be glad to allow him to do so.

Mr. Lesage: No; it is not an increase from $200 million to $300 million. It creates a new period from April 1, 1953, to March 31, 1956. The new amount which will be at the disposal of the farmers is an initial $300 million.

Mr. Thatcher: I understand. That is now clear. But the criticism which we in this group have of the legislation is that we still feel even when it is passed, and even with the existence of the Canadian farm loan board and everything else, it still falls short of meeting the credit needs of Canadian agriculture. We still think that many farmers are not going to be able to get the credit they need. We suggest that there are several steps which could be taken to strengthen this legislation.

As every hon. member knows, in recent years there has been a drift of farmers away from the farms into the city. That situation has been caused by a number of factors. One of the main ones is that young farmers are finding it harder and harder to get together adequate capital with which to finance farm operations. If they are young farmers starting out, they find that the price of land is extremely high; the price of machinery has skyrocketed; the price of livestock is out of reach. If they are established farmers and want to expand their operations they find it extremely difficult to get capital.

We think there are three or four steps that could be taken to make this legislation more effective. In the first place, I cannot agree with the hon. member for Provencher when he says that the ceiling on loans should not be increased. We think that the ceiling should be increased from $3,000 to at least $6,000. After all, if you buy a tractor out west today, it costs more than $3,000. One hon. member pointed out last night, I think, that a combine costs about $6,000. Therefore the present ceiling in the act is not practical as far as western farmers are concerned.

The second proposal we would suggest is that the banks lending under the provisions of this act be more liberal. We think they should be more generous in making loans. Quite frequently today farmers who really need money cannot get it. The banks lend money under orthodox banking principles and frequently marginal farmers are considered to be too great a risk. Even where the farmer is a good risk we quite frequently find that the banks will not lend the full $3,000. I think evidence of that fact was given last night by the parliamentary assistant.

An hon. Member: Would you?

Mr. Thatcher: Possibly I would not; but that is the point I am making. Last night the parliamentary assistant said that out of 300,000 loans made only 2 per cent had been for the full $3,000. I think that fact indicates the need for some government guarantee which would permit the banks to extend credit more generously. Possibly the answer would be to increase the guarantee to the banks from 10 per cent to 15 per cent; I do not know.

I think the third step which could be taken under this act is for down payments to be lowered. Down payments on agricultural equipment now are 33⅓ per cent. Perhaps they could be reduced to 20 per cent. On home and building repairs the down payment is 20 per cent. I think possibly that could be reduced to 10 per cent. The time limit of seven years is fairly short if we are going to increase the amount of the loan. Possibly that limit should be extended to ten years.

I suggest that amendments of this kind would not cost the taxpayer any money or, at worst, a very small amount. After all, total losses under the act have been $36,000 in eight years. That is less than $5,000 a year. I therefore believe that we could bring in reforms of this kind, and do it without their costing the taxpayers any additional sums of money. As I say, the main purpose of this act is to create better credit facilities for farmers. Today we have not those credit facilities and we are not going to have them unless the government steps into the field. I suggest that agriculture is far too important in this country to be restricted as it is today by lack of credit.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, might I make only one or two observations? Might I draw the attention of the hon. member for Moose Jaw to the fact that on December 31, 1952, there were 28,906 loans in default. One therefore has to be careful before talking about enlarging the facilities under the act. The original amount of those loans was $35,862,886. The present amount owing is $23,977,936. The total amount of arrears is over $12 million.

Mr. Thatcher: Might I draw to the attention of the parliamentary assistant the annual report, page 7, where it is stated that claims paid by the government in 1951 amounted to $6,500.

Mr. Lesage: The total claims paid—I gave the figure last night—amounted to about $38,000 all told, but I am not talking about the claims.

Mr. Thatcher: This is—

Mr. Lesage: The claims are paid by the government to the banks only if the banks have exhausted all means of collection, but I am talking about loans in default at the bank, of people who are late in their payments. That is quite a different thing.

Mr. Thatcher: Am I not correct in stating they have been included in the report?

Mr. Lesage: They have been up until now, but according to some information that we have there have been some loans on livestock, quite a few of them in 1950 and 1951, I believe, for which we might be expected to pay heavier claims. That is why I am talking about loans in default at the present time.

Hon. members talk about the establishment of young farmers on farms. I am not sure that is the responsibility of the federal government. It has something to do with land tenure, which of course is under provincial jurisdiction. Moreover, the provinces have entered into that field. For instance, in my own province of Quebec grants are given to young farmers to establish themselves under the provincial law, and the farm loan board of that province is extending loans to them.

In Ontario the government last year adopted an act to incorporate the Ontario junior farmer establishment loan corporation for the purpose of assisting young farmers. It has been looked upon as the responsibility of the province. My hon. friend, who has great confidence in the government of his own province, might advise his own friends there to put up something.

Mr. Ferrie: The provincial government of Saskatchewan cancelled the act.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to say I am glad to support the measure. We think the legislation has provided a very valuable service to farmers. I think it represents the culmination of demands by farm organizations to have a low rate of interest and in order that the capital borrowed may be repaid over a longer period of time.

Before this legislation came down the banks used to make money available to farmers at 8 per cent, but they lent it for a period of three months only, which would be extended at the end of that period. But it became evident that loans to farmers have to be made over a longer period than three months or six months to meet their needs. This I believe provides for a period of two years, with 30 per cent paid down by the farmer when the machine is bought, and another 30 per cent has to be paid in the fall and the next 30 per cent the year after.

I would agree that in many cases it would help if the ceiling were raised, and also if the period of the payment could be extended. But I notice that the parliamentary assistant points out that it is really not necessary to raise the ceiling because only a very small percentage of the farmers are borrowing up to that amount. Immediately the hon. member for Moose Jaw jumped to the conclusion that the banks will not lend more, but in the area that I represent that is not the case. The banks are anxious to lend just as much as they can under this act, but in many instances the farmers cannot meet the cash payment. That is the trouble; and therefore if they do not have so much cash they have to borrow less in order to pay down 30 per cent. That is the reason in many instances why the farmers are not borrowing more under this legislation.

I will admit that in many cases that has been got around by the machine companies accepting the trade-in as the first payment. They have been very good in doing that. I do not know that that was intended originally under the act; I know it is happening in many cases, where the old machine is accepted as down payment, so actually no cash is paid; but I think all farmers would appreciate it if the period of repayment could be extended another year, because no doubt, if that were done, after a while they would try to get it extended another year. But when you consider the cost of machinery today and the hazards the farmers face—for instance they are apt to run into crop failures owing to hail or one thing and another—repayment over two years would be a great help, although I will admit that when a crop failure does come the banks seem to be quite reasonable, because apparently they have the power to extend it and they grant the extension. I think the act has been working very well. I know that is so in so far as the area I represent is concerned.

Mr. Robichaud: I should like to make a few suggestions on this farm assistance legislation with reference most especially to the very small benefits that have accrued to the junior farmers and settlers in my province of New Brunswick, particularly in my own constituency, within the ambit of the provisions of this act.

I may say at the very outset that I am very much in favour of this act. It may be said that our farmers and our settlers probably do not take the trouble to derive the benefits to which they are entitled under this act. But in answer to this possible objection may I say that I am fully in accord with the remarks of some of the hon. members, particularly the hon. member for St. John's West, who has rightly said—and this situation applies to my province and county—that probably not all the channels of publicity have been explored and taken advantage of by the department concerned.

I heard the parliamentary assistant say—I may be wrong, but I interpreted his remarks in this way—that the main channel of publicity which was being utilized and exploited by the department was the banks. May I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that in my constituency most of my farmers and settlers are not regular and assiduous patrons of the banks. Moreover, the banks are located or centralized in the town of Bathurst, with branches in Shippigan, Caraquet and Tracadie, and that is the sum total of our banking institutions in the county of Gloucester, which is the largest rural county in the province of New Brunswick, with a population of over 50,000 people. May I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that publicity through our agricultural societies would be in my opinion the best means of reaching the common people, the farmers and the settlers. This of course could be done very easily if the literature or pamphlets were forwarded to the provincial department of agriculture, which would distribute them through the various agricultural societies of our province. I ask the parliamentary assistant whether he could not make arrangements so that I, as the representative of Gloucester county, could receive some of these pamphlets. If I did, I would make a point of distributing them myself where I know they would do the most good.

The reason I rose in my place, Mr. Chairman, was to say a few words about the Farm Improvement Loans Act. When I read the annual report of 1951 I was amazed at the small benefits which accrued to our farmers, and particularly our settlers under this act. I read for instance that in the construction of new houses there was only one loan in the province of New Brunswick out of a total of 587 loans throughout Canada. This one loan appears in schedule "D", and was for $2,000 out of a total of $941,960.35 in 1951.

With respect to repairs and alterations to buildings, the report mentions 23 loans for New Brunswick out of a total of 1,155 throughout Canada, representing an amount of $19,602 for our province as against $1,097,812.39 for the whole of Canada. But what amazed me more particularly was the one single and unique loan made under the provisions of this act in the province of New Brunswick which is reported in schedule "E" for brushing and breaking new land in 1951. We received one loan to an extent of $200 out of a total of 900 loans throughout Canada. That was all we got in New Brunswick, out of a total of $424,397.45. My amazement is based particularly on the fact that in my own province, and especially in my constituency, during the last ten or fifteen years we have had a considerable program of colonization. I venture to say that in the constituency of Gloucester we have probably the best settlers and the best junior farmers in the whole of New Brunswick. These are found in places such as Allardville, D'Aulnay, St. Sauveur, Nicholas Denys, Sormany, and Doucetville.

In those places we have hundreds of young men with families doing exactly those things this act was intended to assist, namely the brushing and breaking of new land. I may be under some misapprehension, but that is my understanding of the purpose of the act. Those young men simply do not know that these benefits are available to them. Hence the submission I made at the outset of my remarks, that more publicity should be given to the benefits our farmers and settlers may derive from this act.

I now return to that one unique loan for $200 for brushing and breaking new land, out of a total, as I said before, of $424,397.45 for the whole of Canada. It seems to me that if proper publicity were given, our junior farmers and settlers might derive from this act the benefits that should be available to them, and that in this way the act would become beneficial. As it is now we do not benefit from it.

It seems to me it was properly pointed out by the parliamentary assistant that in his native province of Quebec there are provisions in the provincial law for grants and loans to settlers and junior farmers. However, there is no such provision in New Brunswick law.

Mr. Lesage: You did not say that in the last provincial election in New Brunswick.

Mr. Robichaud: I certainly did. I blamed the McNair government, and we trimmed his government on that and other points. I blamed them, and I repeat we have not as yet any such provisions in our New Brunswick law. I submit therefore that if more publicity were given to this very beneficial provision our junior farmers and younger settlers would derive the full benefits of the act. Let me repeat what I said a few moments ago, that if it were possible for me as the federal member from Gloucester county—the member for the time being, at any rate—to obtain these pamphlets and literature in quantities from the department, I would promise to be the distribution agency and would see that they reached those junior farmers and settlers.

Mr. Lesage: We will be pleased to hand to the hon. member for Gloucester the pamphlets he wishes to have, if he will but tell us the number required. However, it would be useless to hand them to settlers because this act is not for settlers; it is for farmers. Colonization is a provincial matter under provincial jurisdiction, and my hon. friend knows that as well as I do. He should know, if he does not.

So far as the number of farmers in New Brunswick is concerned, the 1951 census figures show that, of a total of 26,000 farms in that province, 14,766 are exploited by part-time farmers, or are farms where the value of products sold is less than $250. There were 8,349 farms the products of which sold at less than $2,500 each. There were only 2,200 farms on which products sold to a value of more than $2,500. This is at least one reason why the act has not been used to a greater extent in that province; there is a great number of part-time farmers and settlers who do not use the facilities under the act.

Mr. Robichaud: There is one point I should like to clarify. I can assure the parliamentary assistant that I am well aware of the laws in New Brunswick governing colonization, but I would point out, as he well knows, that all our farmers today, both in his province and mine, were ab initio settlers. I agree of course with the statistics he has placed on record, but I would suggest that they are only for income tax purposes.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, no; those are census figures.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, may I say something about this measure, upon which I congratulate the department. May I add that I am pleased to see the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet piloting this measure so ably.

I listened to the hon. member for St. John's West and the hon. member for Gloucester making reference to the lack of publicity given to this law. I would point out to them that in a democracy it is the duty of everyone to help publicize the law. I was going to say to those hon. members that, even though they are on the opposition side, it is their duty to do their share by way of publicity in their counties, as I do in mine, despite the fact that they do not support the government.

Dealers in farm implements are giving a great deal of publicity to this law, and I know that in my county many farmers have benefited from its advantages. The hon. member for Gloucester has complained about the small number of loans in his county. He should keep in mind that in his province, as well as in Ontario and Quebec, most of the farms are what we would call family farms. They have passed from the fathers to the sons and, on a high average, would run from 150 to 200 acres. In three of the four western provinces the acreages are much larger. In Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba we do not find the number of small family farms that we find in the provinces I have just referred to. I have the statistics of the last census to prove my contention.

If members of parliament will do their duty, if the banks will carry out their function and if the agricultural organizations will do their part, I think more publicity could be given to this measure. I know if that were done there would be more loans in my province in the next year. I am sure this extension will be approved by hon. members, and I submit that farmers should be made aware of what they can obtain under this act. The speeches which have been delivered in this house and the statements made in the press along with the incentive given by all good democrats on both sides of the house in their respective counties will do much to increase the scope of this legislation.

Only 10,000 loans have been issued in my province where there are 134,336 farms. I repeat that more publicity should be given to this measure. I support what the hon. member for Gloucester has said. I would like to see the department send our pamphlets to hon. members and to the organizations in our counties. If my memory is correct, l'union catholique des cultivateurs of Quebec has provided some publicity in two or three numbers of the periodical put out by the department. Seeing that my hon. friends opposite are supporting the measure I know they will be ready to thank the government for having given this extension. I congratulate them upon that stand.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have a number of farmer constituents who have taken advantage of this valuable legislation throughout the years, and for that reason I want to say just a word or two. My remarks are the result of conversations I have had with various farmers, either those who have borrowed money or who would like to take advantage of the act. Before proceeding I want to say that I think this act is a good demonstration of the value of government-sponsored credit in order to increase production. Most of the funds provided under the terms of this act are used for the clearing of land, the extension or improvement of homes and buildings and the purchase of machinery.

I am different from the hon. member for Assiniboia, who represents much larger land owners than those whom I represent. Many of the farmers in my constituency settled on forest land which had to be cleared. In discussing this question, as recently as last fall, many have suggested that the amount of money available under this act should be raised from a maximum of $3,000 to $5,000.

That seemed to be the major criticism. Even those who told me that they thought it excellent legislation, even those who had been able to do things that they would not have been able to do without the legislation, thought that it would improve the effectiveness of the legislation and make it more helpful if the maximum could be raised from $3,000 to $5,000.

When you consider when this legislation was brought into effect and the prices that prevailed at that time I think you must admit that the argument is quite valid. I suppose the over-all cost of things between 1944 and the present time has doubled, particularly materials required for home and building improvements as well as machinery costs.

A number of farmers in my constituency have had to clear their lands. We have a provincial land clearing scheme under which farmers can rent heavy equipment, I believe by the hour. By the use of such equipment they are able to clear in a few days as much land as it would have taken them ten years to clear by hand. This act has been most useful to men who have wanted to clear their land, because under the provincial arrangement they must pay for the clearing of the land in a much shorter time than they can borrow under this act.

I have talked to one or two men who have borrowed money with which to clear land by means of this heavy equipment and they have found that they were able to pay off their loans before they were due from the production of the land so cleared. I think that is sound evidence of the effectiveness of this act.

I want to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant that there is a general demand and need for the raising of the maximum that can be borrowed from $3,000 to $5,000. I cannot quite agree with the argument of the parliamentary assistant that because only 2 per cent have borrowed the maximum of $3,000—

Mr. Lesage: Two per cent of the loans.

Mr. Herridge: In number. I can quite understand that because possibly the greater number of loans would be made in eastern Canada where the farms are smaller and the amounts required would therefore be smaller. But in western Canada and British Columbia the amounts required would be somewhat larger. I have had suggestions from farmer constituents and from farm organizations that it would be of advantage if the time for repayment was lengthened by a year or so and the interest rate reduced from 5 to 4 per cent. I see the parliamentary assistant seems to be frowning at me. I realize it is quite easy to advocate longer periods for repayment and lower interest rates, but I have made some study of agricultural credit on the North American continent and in England and in Europe, and it has been found throughout the years that where credit is extended for agricultural development on sound security the land should not be required to pay more than 4 per cent interest on the capital loaned. I bring that to the attention of the parliamentary assistant.

I have just one other reference to make, similar to those made by previous speakers. I think a greater effort should be made to inform farmers of the benefits of this legislation. I have found the banks in my constituency most sympathetic. I think the act has been very well administered by the officials of the department, and the co-operation by local branch managers has been excellent. But I do not think the placing of a few dozen pamphlets in a rack in a bank lobby provides sufficient advertising to bring this legislation to the attention of all farmers. They should be told not only that there is an act but what can be done under the act. I have found many men completely uninformed or only partially informed.

I would suggest that both the provincial and federal departments of agriculture should do more to publicize this act through their officials in the field. Those men should take advantage of their meetings with farm organizations, or even at fairs and things of that sort, to direct the attention of the farmers of this country to the benefits that can be obtained under this legislation.

My suggestion is not quite the same as that of the hon. member for Gloucester. I do not want a large number of pamphlets given to me for election purposes. I would suggest that it should be done through agricultural organizations. From my contact with the farmers of my constituency, farm organizations and farmers of the country generally who have taken advantage of the act, I can say that they consider it sound legislation. It simply needs modest improvement.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to tell the parliamentary assistant that if he wants to increase the number of loans made under the act in Ontario he certainly must advertise more than has been done in the past. I do not think many farmers know anything at all about it. I have been approached at different times for information about these loans. It is true that the bank managers make the loans to the farmers, but when a farmer comes into a bank for a loan and the banker can lend him money as a good risk without using this particular act, he will lend the money directly from the bank and will not mention the act at all. I think that is one of the reasons the provisions of the act are not advertised as much as they should be. Another reason is the fact that the interest rate is too high. I understand it was 4½ per cent but I believe it is now 5 per cent, is it not?

Mr. Lesage: It is 5 per cent.

Mr. Cardiff: I think the rate is too high. Another reason you do not make as many loans in Ontario is the fact that the rate of interest is only 4 per cent, I believe, under the junior farmers' establishment and improvement act.

Mr. Lesage: It is a maximum of 5 per cent. The banks are not forced to charge 5 per cent.

Mr. Low: Have there been any cases where the banks have lent money at a lower rate?

Mr. Lesage: No.

An hon. Member: The maximum is the minimum.

Mr. Lesage: Not as far as we are concerned.

Mr. Cardiff: I think the interest rate is too high. If you want to make the benefits of the act widely available, I think the interest rate should be lower. It is a good act and should do a lot of good for the country, but the interest rate is too high and there is also the fact that I do not think the banks make the provisions of the act sufficiently well known to individual farmers who go to banks for loans. If the farmer is a good credit risk, the bank lends him money directly and not under the act.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I want to say a few words about this measure. I am one who believes that any regulation or assistance which provides relief for primary producers is something that I should wholeheartedly support. I realize that the agricultural industry is also one that can have good years and poor years. After a poor year assistance is necessary in many cases and is appreciated. With respect to farmers being aware of the assistance that is available to them, I think one member who spoke a little while ago hit the nail on the head when he said that members of the house may be a little negligent in not giving the act the publicity that is required. I think the provisions of the act might have been known by a great many more farmers in my own county if I had given it a little more publicity.

As has been stated, however, the implement manufacturers and dealers are always anxious to sell machinery and the bankers always want to lend money, and as a result a great deal of publicity is given by such people. But there was a statement made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Gloucester with which I must deal briefly. He asked a question of the parliamentary assistant and in answering it the parliamentary assistant put figures on the record with respect to the incomes of the farmers of New Brunswick. When he sat down the hon. member for Gloucester suggested that those figures would be for income tax purposes, or in other words that they would not be correct.

I take issue with that statement, because I believe the farmers of New Brunswick pay their income taxes to the same extent as farmers in other parts of the Dominion of Canada. I do not like that sort of implication to go on the record, and for that reason I want to state what I believe to be the fact. I believe the figures they would give for income tax purposes would be exactly the same as the figures they would give for any other purpose. I do not like the insinuation that the figures for income tax purposes would not be correct.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, yes, he did.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He certainly did.

Mr. Lesage: I had to correct him.

An hon. Member: He did not intimate that at all.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He certainly made the statement I have just put on the record. He said that the figures would be for income tax purposes. I am going to watch Hansard. Those are the exact words he used. He said these figures would be for income tax purposes. I do not want anyone to get the idea that the farmers of New Brunswick give one set of figures for income tax purposes and another set for some other purpose.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I will watch Hansard very carefully.

Mr. Cardiff: He did not say that.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I am sure you will find that some of the people who are interrupting me now were not in the house at the time.

Mr. Cardiff: I was sitting right here.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am sure that the statement he made—and it will be on the record—was that these figures were for income tax purposes. I resent that statement.

I believe it casts a reflection on the farmers of New Brunswick which is not warranted.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, some members have been making the point that in various provinces—

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, I want to speak to a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member wants to raise a point of order?

Mr. Ferguson: It is apropos of what my hon. friend said a few minutes ago.

The Chairman: There was no point of order before the chair. The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: A number of members have made the point that in certain provinces the act apparently is not being given a great deal of publicity. If that is correct, and I am sure it must be, I would say that the bank managers must not be the best businessmen, because surely they are the people who should be promoting loans under the act when such loans comply with all the regulations and provisions of the act. If they are good businessmen for their particular banks they should be out to obtain business under the act. Surely it is good business for the banks. They cannot lose, because if the farmer does not pay, the government does. Therefore I think the bank managers in some provinces must not be pressing it as they should. Certainly ample publicity has been given to the act in western Canada, because the farmers there know about it.

An hon. Member: They are smarter.

Mr. Argue: I do not know who has been publicizing these loans to the farmers, because they are often termed government loans which you go to the bank to get.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The implement dealers tell them.

Mr. Argue: One farmer will say to another: "I need a combine but I have not enough cash". His neighbour will say: "Go and get a government loan through your bank". I do not know whether or not the government party, the Liberal party, has been doing a sales job on this particular legislation, but certainly it is well known. It is used extensively and to the advantage of the agricultural industry.

The point has been made that the interest rate of 5 per cent is too high. I would not say that it should not be lower, but in relation to other interest rates at the present time it is not as high as when the act was first passed. We know that there has been a tendency in recent months for interest rates to increase, and I am certainly pleased that nothing is being done to increase the maximum interest rate under the act.

I feel strongly, however, that there should be an increase in the maximum amount that can be loaned to a farmer by a bank under the act. When the legislation was first brought into parliament in 1944 it contained the present maximum of $3,000. That maximum is still in the act, but since that time the price of machinery has gone up tremendously. If I read the legislation correctly, when the act became operative in 1945 the down payment on an implement loan was 25 per cent. In other words, if a farmer had $1,000 cash in 1945 he could buy farm equipment worth $4,000 by getting a $3,000 loan under the act. In 1945 one could buy a lot of farm equipment for $4,000. You cannot buy any more than half as much at the present time, and possibly not even that.

One of the farmer members of our group was speaking to me a few minutes ago, and said that in 1945 he had purchased a large self-propelled combine for $2,800. He purchased a similar combine last fall and it cost $5,800. While the ceiling on loans made under the act is the same, certainly the price of implements—and one purpose for which this act was drafted was the purchase of these implements—has not remained the same. Indeed, in this particular instance the price has more than doubled. If a man had $4,000 in 1945 he could buy a combine and a medium-sized tractor, and he needed only $1,000 cash. Today, if he wants a combine of the same type the price is $6,000. The maximum loan is $3,000, so the farmer must put up $3,000 himself.

Mr. Lesage: Unless he has one to trade.

Mr. Argue: Yes; he must put up the $3,000 cash himself. A man who is starting out and has nothing to trade must forget all about buying that medium-sized tractor which he could have purchased in 1945, and must also pay $3,000 cash. I feel, therefore, that a mistake has been made in not amending this legislation to double the $3,000 maximum loan in keeping with the increases in the cost of farm implements. Today it costs a lot of money to equip a western farm. It costs more to equip a western farm than a farm in the maritimes or in central Canada. Even though it does cost more, a farmer still has to have the equipment. All farmers want a full line of equipment. Naturally, they are progressive and they are anxious to get modern equipment. If they purchase a full line of equipment, a truck, a combine, a tractor, a one-way seeder, cultivator, a grain loader, and all the other things that make up a full line of equipment, it will cost them about $20,000. Under this act the maximum amount that can be borrowed is $3,000. I say that the $3,000 figure was reasonable in 1945, but if you are to have a ceiling in the act today that will provide the same purchasing power to the farmer then that $3,000 must be greatly increased.

The parliamentary assistant gave us some very interesting figures on the number of loans that have been made in the amount of $3,000. He says they amount to 2 per cent. I am asking him how many loans have been made in the amount of $2,999; that surely would be close enough to the maximum to be included in that category. When one says that 2 per cent of the loans were made for the maximum of $3,000, that does not indicate very much. When his statement covers single loans in single transactions, it tells even less. What about a farmer who comes along in the spring and borrows $1,000, and then comes in again in the fall and borrows an additional $2,000? He has taken advantage of the maximum loan under the act, yet that transaction would not appear in the 2 per cent table. I say, therefore, that the figures the parliamentary assistant tabled showing that only 2 per cent of the loans by number were for $3,000 do not provide a fair indication of the demand for that type of loan.

If he could give us figures showing the number of farmers who, during the period this act was in operation, have had loans totalling between $2,500 and $3,000 at any one time, then that would be a fair indication of whether or not there is need for increasing the maximum amount. When he brings in these figures and says that only 2 per cent of the loans made were in the $3,000 category, that does not indicate very much. It does indicate, I believe, that the demand for an increase in the maximum is most prevalent in the prairie provinces. Of the loans that were made for the maximum of $3,000, as I add them up quickly, 90 per cent were made in the three prairie provinces. It may be true to say there is no great demand for such an increase in the maritimes or in the province of Quebec, where the parliamentary assistant says there are long-established farms which have been equipped for many years. However, when these figures show that 90 per cent of the maximum loans have been made in the three prairie provinces, I think it indicates that at least in that area there is a need for an increase in the maximum amount provided under this act.

When this point has been pressed, the parliamentary assistant has said one of the reasons the government does not want to increase the maximum is that the act has been operating well and they do not want to jeopardize anything that has been done under it. I believe he mentioned—he can correct me if I am wrong—that there was about $12 million in overdue payments under this act. Well, that does not prove anything to me unless he gives me some further explanation. I would hazard a guess that probably half the loans in the three prairie provinces, up to a few months ago, were overdue because most of those loans become due on the 1st of November. The quotas were low and the farmer had all kinds of grain at home, but he was very short of cash in November. If the note had come due in April when the 20 cent payment was being made, and another quota might be available, the story might be different.

I am not saying the due date should be April instead of November. All I am saying is that because of the quota system and the difficulty in marketing this grain readily, the note will become overdue through no fault of the farmer. The bank manager is not worried, because he knows the farmer has grain on the farm. It is just a matter of time until the farmer will be in a position to pay off his obligation.

The parliamentary assistant has said this is a very good act. There has been a total of $355 million lent under it, and so far the government has had to pay over to the banks in the way of losses only $38,000. The 1951 annual report points out that so far the losses have been only ·01 per cent. Surely if the act is that good, and that is all it has cost the federal treasury, there should be no risk involved in increasing the maximum amount. The 1951 annual report points out that the moneys the government may have to pay out by way of losses will increase as the aggregate loans have increased, but it makes the statement that the increased losses are not likely to increase any faster than the increase in aggregate loans. The 1951 report would seem to indicate that the ·01 per cent loss rate is likely to be maintained.

If that is the case, then certainly there should be no reason why the ceiling cannot be increased. You cannot have it both ways. Either this is costing the federal treasury very little or else it is costing the federal treasury a great deal of money and it is extremely hazardous. If it is as good as the parliamentary assistant says it is and as good as the annual reports say it is, then certainly the $3,000 should be increased, particularly when you keep in mind the fact that $3,000 today will not purchase any more than half as much in the way of farm implements as it would purchase when the act was first implemented.

Mr. Charlton: In view of the fact that the parliamentary assistant more or less criticized the hon. member for Gloucester for even suggesting that settlers should come under this act, I should like to have him explain schedule E, part 1 of the 1951 annual report, where it gives the number of dollars, namely $424,397.45 for brushing and breaking new land in 1951 and also a total—up to date so far, under the act—of $3,257,000. If it does not include settlers, what is the parliamentary assistant's definition of a settler?

Mr. Lesage: According to what I know—and I have quite a number of settlers in my riding—a settler is a man who goes out on new land, opens the lot, cuts the first trees and then breaks new land. I understand that the loans made under this act by the banks for the breaking of new land have been made to farmers who wanted to increase their acreage. That is what it is. But you have to be a bona fide farmer to obtain a loan under this act. Settlers, as we call them and as we know them, who are settling on brand new land, are to my knowledge the responsibility of the province.

I should like to say a word about what the hon. member for Assiniboia has said. I do not want to go back to all the arguments I gave at the start of the discussion this afternoon when I explained that it had been felt that an increase in the ceiling was not warranted at this time. The hon. member for Assiniboia was saying that the western farmer needs normally about $20,000 worth of machinery.

Mr. Argue: For a whole line of new machinery.

Mr. Lesage: Yes; a whole line of new machinery. May I draw his attention to the fact that I do not believe it is possible for western farmers—in spite of the fact that I understand they are getting a large income from their farms—to repay any such amount as $20,000 on short terms. Let me tell my hon. friend that under the farm loan board loans may be granted for these purposes, and I am quoting from the annual report of the farm loan board for the year ended March 31, 1952:

> Loans may be granted to refinance existing farm indebtedness, to purchase livestock and equipment, to make improvements including . . .

And so on. But these are long-term loans which are to be repaid over a greater number of years, so the ceiling can be higher. I understand that at present it is a total of $12,000. I am informed that the ceiling would be a total of $12,000.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is $10,000 for land and $2,000 for equipment.

Mr. Argue: I have just one little comment to make on that point. I am glad the parliamentary assistant mentioned the farm loan board and the provisions with respect to loans. I cannot quote them from memory, but I know that recently the amount of money that a farmer can obtain from the farm loan board has been doubled. It has been realized that the value of land has increased. The value of anything the farmer might use that kind of long-term credit for has gone up. That fact has been recognized in reference to the farm loan board.

All I am asking is that the same thing be recognized in relation to short and intermediate-term credit. I did not mean to imply, if I did so, that I wanted provision to be made so that a farmer could go to a bank and get $20,000 to buy equipment. I do not think any farmer is foolish enough to accept that large amount of credit on a short-term basis or even on a long-term basis for equipment only. The whole point I was trying to make was that when it cost $20,000 for a full line of new, modern equipment for the western farmer, $3,000 in relation to that sum of money is not good enough. In my opinion, with the increased cost of equipment, the $3,000 should now be $6,000. That would, of course, still be less than one-third of the amount necessary to buy that particular line of equipment.

Mr. Ferguson: The parliamentary assistant stated that the hon. member for Gloucester had made a statement—and it was verified by what the hon. member for Charlotte had said—with respect to the figures he had given. He asked a question whether that was for income tax or not. Is that right?

Mr. Lesage: After I had finished quoting the figures—and I remember the incident very well—the hon. member for Gloucester told me that those figures were given for income tax purposes. I corrected him. I said no, for census purposes. That is exactly what happened.

Mr. Ferguson: That is exactly what I thought you said and that is exactly what I thought he said. That is what I thought was the question he asked or the statement he made—

Mr. Lesage: It was a statement, not a question.

Mr. Ferguson: —in order to correct in his mind—

Mr. Lesage: I was not in his mind.

Mr. Ferguson: I know that.

Mr. Lesage: And I do not want to be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is not in the house and is not able to answer for himself.

Mr. Ferguson: What I am getting at is this. If the parliamentary assistant will just carry out the role he is supposed to be there for and answer this question, I shall be greatly obliged. Then he will know what I am driving at, I am sure, and not before. That question was asked because there is a difference when you are quoting income tax figures. Sometimes there is an exemption of $2,000. Motives should not be imputed with respect to a man's question. He may have wanted to know whether that was the total income or whether it was the income tax figures less the exemption of $2,000. That is quite a sane question. But the hon. member for Charlotte gets to his feet with crocodile tears in his eyes because any man would suggest that the farmer is having something said about him in the House of Commons that was not quite fair. That is the gentleman who will probably have to apologize to the tobacco farmers for smuggling cigarettes across the border, on his own admission.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will realize, of course, that I should have stopped him before since this matter is one which is not between the hon. member for Simcoe North and the hon. member for Charlotte. It is one that has to be settled between the hon. member for Charlotte and the hon. member for Gloucester.

An hon. Member: They are out settling it now.

The Chairman: It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Gloucester was not here when the hon. member for Charlotte spoke.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is in committee, where he has to be.

The Chairman: His language was not offensive and therefore I could not stop him. But now it is unfortunate that the hon. member for Charlotte and the hon. member for Gloucester are not here.

Mr. Ferguson: That is right.

The Chairman: I would suggest that we leave this particular matter to be settled between the two of them. If anything has to be withdrawn, I think the Chair can be relied upon to have the proper withdrawals made, if need be.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, may I proceed with this other matter, now that I have said that. This farm loan provision in our part of the country is certainly a great boon to the farmers. I do not know whether this is exactly the right time to mention this matter, but the parliamentary assistant's department is giving great aid to the farmers. But in the community in which I live it is very difficult for men in other occupations of life to obtain small necessary loans, owing to the fact that there is a great building boom going on in the larger centres and mortgages are hard to obtain by people to build themselves modest and necessary houses. At this time I would certainly suggest that the parliamentary assistant have his department look into the advisability of making money available to these people I have mentioned on the same basis as it is made available to farmers. I refer to small industrialists and workers—

Mr. Lesage: Housing is under the Department of Resources and Development, not under the Department of Finance. This is out of order.

Mr. Graydon: The lending of money is under your department.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member is one of my very good friends, as he knows. I am not prepared to answer his question or his suggestion.

Mr. Ferguson: I understood that the parliamentary assistant was representing the Department of Finance, and that he could be spoken to regarding this matter of finance. You make loans to the farmers and I was suggesting that on a similar basis money be made available to people who are desirous of having roofs over their heads. The lending companies will not do it because they are too busy lending money at high interest rates in the larger cities. They admit that quite freely. The same relief should be given to workmen in shipyards, such as the people in my community, and people in various other types of business.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, I am not going to start a discussion of housing at this time.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member was just concluding his remarks. I know he will not pursue the matter, because this resolution has to do with farm improvements and not housing, even for farmers.

Mr. Montgomery: I do not intend to take very much time. In fact I do not intend to enter into this debate, but I discovered from figures quoted by the parliamentary assistant this afternoon that most of the farmers in New Brunswick must be in my constituency. If I got the figures correctly, there are only about 2,000 farmers in New Brunswick who would qualify under the act. Is that right?

Mr. Lesage: No. I gave some figures which I took out of the census of 1951, giving the number of farms in Newfoundland and New Brunswick in the various brackets of income they were getting from their farms. The act and regulations do not mention that a farmer must have such and such an income to qualify under the act. The requirement is that his main occupation must be farming, but the question of his income is one of the factors which is taken into account by the bank manager, as any businessman would take into account the income of a borrower before lending him money.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He must be a good credit risk.

Mr. Lesage: Well, he must not necessarily be a very good credit risk, because there is the government guarantee behind the loan and that is the reason for the government guarantee. But there must be a fair chance of recovery.

Mr. Montgomery: Thank you; that does make it clearer. The two points I wanted to mention in particular, however, were these. It is quite true that the income of a great many farmers in New Brunswick is not large. That is one of the handicaps under which we operate, and it is something about which I have no doubt hon. members will hear more before this session is over. However, in all fairness I think the explanation of the small amount loaned in the east, and especially in my section of my province, is the fact that they utilize the Canadian Farm Loan Act rather than this act to repair buildings and to improve their farms. I find in my experience of the last year or two that a great many people know about this act. I think it is well advertised in my constituency, and it is very generally used for the purchase of farm machinery and such things. It is pretty well administered, because it is administered by the chartered banks.

After having listened this afternoon to the arguments pro and con increasing the amount that might be available, I must say I have had no such requests, nor have I heard any complaints, because in our part of the province when a farmer has to borrow $3,000 for the purchase of farm machinery he has to think twice about how he is going to pay it back. Our farmers are in a hazardous occupation. There is no stability in their markets, and they do not like to risk too much; therefore I do not think I would press for an increase in the amount that may be borrowed. However, if it was going to benefit the farmers in other places, then I can see no particular risk in increasing the ceiling, because the governor in council and the banks have put adequate limitations in the regulations which require security that would protect the loan up to $5,000 just as it does up to $3,000.

As I said before, this act is well administered because it is administered through the banks. I know that in my part of the country the bankers are pretty sound businessmen. Probably another reason for the low percentage we are getting under this act—I do not blame the act nor the government; I do not blame anybody for that small amount that is coming to New Brunswick—is that as far as my section of the province is concerned it is a well-known policy that the banks will not lend money if they do not think there is a reasonable chance of getting the money back, and I think it is a sound policy.

This brings me back again to my province, and I think this is something which is worthy of the attention of this parliament. We are affected in many ways. We have two classes of farmers. They are all farmers, and they depend entirely on farming, but we have a farmer who has a small income. He is working hard to get it. He is eking out a living. That man cannot go into the bank and give a statement which indicates that he can pay back a loan of $400 or $500 for certain within a year or two.

Then we have the other man who is a larger farmer, he grows potatoes mainly. He is in a different position, because as I said once before in this house, it seems that the policy is driving our people into two classes. The rich are doing better but the poor are getting poorer. The other class of farmer does not need to use this act so much because he can finance himself. A good farmer can go to his bank and borrow on bonds—a good many of them might have them—and he can borrow at less than 5 per cent. Therefore as a matter of business he does not use this legislation.

The other man who may need it to get some farm machinery cannot satisfy the bank that he can grow sufficient crops and market them at a profit sufficiently high to repay that loan within three or four years. I am not blaming the act; I think it only fair, from what has been said here this afternoon, to say that in my particular part of the province this act is well known. It has been well advertised, and it is utilized by those who can use it. It is a good thing. I am very much in favour of extending it. I would support raising the ceiling, because I believe it is in good hands. Even if the ceiling is raised it may not assist many down in my part of the dominion, but it might assist other people in the dominion. It might assist some farmers, and if so I do not see that the government will lose anything on it because it is in the hands of the banks and the banks are good administrators of this type of business.

Therefore I am not going to take up more time on this matter, except to say that I am willing to support it as it is, and I would be quite willing to support it if the ceiling were raised.

Mr. Pearkes: Has the parliamentary assistant a breakdown of the tables showing the amounts and numbers of loans as between Vancouver island and the rest of British Columbia? I have received complaints about the difficulty of obtaining loans on Vancouver island. Is it correct to say that application has to be made to New Westminster for final approval, or can it be done on Vancouver island?

Mr. Lesage: I would have to inquire about that. Referring to the first part of the question, I believe that we can work out approximately the amount of the loans for Vancouver island, and between now and the time we reach the second reading stage we will attempt to do so.

Mr. Pearkes: That would be satisfactory.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This is of particular interest to my constituency, because I have noted that a higher percentage of farmers in Prince Edward Island have taken advantage of the loans under the act than in any other province of Canada, with the exception of the three prairie provinces. In other words it is the fourth province, so far as the percentage of farmers using the act is concerned.

Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would consider the points I shall now place before him. In his statement last night he pointed out that 92 per cent of the loans were for farm machinery and implements, and 4 per cent for the purchase of livestock. It follows therefore that only 4 per cent of the total loans was used for such purposes as the improvement of buildings and fences, drainage, plumbing, heating and the like.

That state of affairs is most unfortunate, not because a large number of loans are made for the purchase of farm machinery but rather because so few are made to improve the standard of living of the people on the farms. I realize this is not the fault of the act itself, because excellent publicity was given to the fact that loans can be made for those purposes. I am wondering however if that side of the picture could be floodlighted so more farmers would realize that they can obtain loans not only to purchase farm machinery but for the installation of water systems, plumbing, sewage disposal units and so on.

I believe strongly that in this day and age it is more important for a farmer to live in a home with the proper outbuildings, and with a supply of running water and an adequate sewage system, than it is for him to own a small truck, for instance. In any case this is something to which I would direct the attention of the parliamentary assistant, with a view to publicizing that side of the picture a little more.

Then in this pamphlet published by the authority of the minister it says that loans under the act are obtainable for clearing, breaking and irrigating, and for reclaiming land, soil conservation, the prevention of erosion, the planting of trees and shelter belts, the sinking, construction, installation, repair, alteration or improvement of wells, dugouts, or an ice well. I notice that it does not specifically say that loans may be obtained for the purchase of agricultural lime.

In the part of the country I come from, where there is heavy rainfall, it is the natural tendency for the soil to become acid. In that area one of the fundamental factors in soil conservation is the application of lime. I think no loan would be better justified, so far as farm improvements are concerned, than those for agricultural lime. I believe I am correct in saying that farm improvements under the Veterans Land Act include loans for the purchase of lime, and I was wondering if consideration could be given to this matter under the act now under discussion.

Mr. Lesage: The department would have to be satisfied that the purchase of lime would be for the permanent improvement of the farm land. According to my information, that has been considered a permanent improvement by the administration. It might be that some bank managers have given a different interpretation, and I am sure the administration here in Ottawa would like to know about any other interpretation that has been given. If attention were drawn to it, it could be corrected.

I understand that we are coming to the end of the discussion, and I wish to assure hon. members that every consideration will be given to the very helpful suggestions that have been made, so far as the giving of publicity to the act is concerned. I thank hon. members for their co-operation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the parliamentary assistant closing the discussion?

Mr. Lesage: There is no closing in committee.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I understood him to say it was the end, and I still have two or three questions to ask.

Mr. Fleming: He means it is the end of the government.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member said that $300 million was the new amount the government would be allowing the banks to grant by way of loans.

Mr. Lesage: It is a new amount of $300 million the banks will be permitted to loan, with the guarantee of 10 per cent, when the bill is passed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the parliamentary assistant say what actual amount was owing to the banks under the previous arrangement, as of December 31?

Mr. Lesage: I gave that information last night.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I would like to have the actual amount owing at that time.

Mr. Lesage: The actual amount loaned since the inception of the—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No; I want the amount owing.

Mr. Lesage: I gave that information in three parts last night. I believe on September 30, 1952 the total was $145,700,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What was the amount at the end of December?

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member will understand that it takes some time before we can get complete reports from the banks.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the parliamentary assistant expect that the whole amount of $200 million will be used up before the expiration date?

Mr. Lesage: The $200 million was allowed by parliament in February of 1951 for a period extending from March 1, 1951 to March 1, 1954. On December 31, $183 million had been loaned out of this total of $200 million. That is why we have to come to parliament at this session to create a new three-year period with a new amount of $300 million. The $200 million provided for the last period would lapse in April or May of this year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If there was $183 million outstanding at the end of December, presumably there must be nearly $200 million outstanding now; is that not right?

Mr. Lesage: The $183 million was not the amount outstanding; that was the total of the loans made during the immediately preceding period. A loan outstanding is a loan which has not been repaid, and the total amount of the loans outstanding since the inception of the act is, as I have just said, $145,700,000. If my hon. friend wants a breakdown of that amount as between the three periods, he will find it in what I said last night.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is it not correct to say that for the next three years the maximum amount will be $300 million, and you cannot have any more than that $300 million at any one time?

Mr. Lesage: Unless we do as we are doing now. If this government—I am sure we will be here at the time—after two years finds that the amount of $300 million is not sufficient to cover the three-year period, it may come to parliament, as it has come this year, and say, "We are closing out this period and opening up a new one."

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the parliamentary assistant has not this information at the moment perhaps he can give it when we are in committee on the bill. Can he indicate the number of losses and the total amount in each province, and the purpose for which the loan was made where a loss has been suffered?

Mr. Lesage: I understand that my hon. friend wants a breakdown of the 80 claims that have been paid by the federal government up to December 31, 1952, by provinces, and also the purposes for which the loans were made. I can give that to the hon. member when we reach the committee stage after second reading.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question or two on this subject. Will it be possible to apply this act in the northern section of my riding where areas have been long since used for agricultural purposes but where there are other areas that have been lumbered? Would it be possible for someone to buy up some of these old farms, borrow money and plant trees? It would be more or less a reforestation scheme.

Mr. Lesage: The amendment made to the regulations in 1951 covered only fruit trees.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution carries I should like to say a word or two in respect to this measure. I want to congratulate the government on expanding the amount of money to be available for loans of this kind, but I also want to draw attention to the general idea which has been advanced by the hon. member for Assiniboia. There are many large farms in my constituency, and I find that a good many farmers there feel unhappy because no provision is made to assist young men establishing themselves on farms.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out, it costs at least $20,000 to set up a farm in these areas where the size ranges from half a section to probably two and a half sections. With that amount being required it is sometimes impossible to devise any means whereby young men can get started. The result is that we lose a great number of our young men who would be admirable farmers, who have the skill and desire for farming, just because they cannot get established.

I would say that is exceedingly bad business for the country. We want the finest of our young men to stay in Canada. We want our young men on farms where they can support themselves and raise Canadians for the future. If we lose them to the United States or to the cities where they undertake work which may not be permanent, we suffer a serious loss.

There is a general feeling in my constituency that the maximum is far too low, which would naturally follow from what I have just said. I am not prepared to say that this is the particular measure under which provision should be made for larger loans, but I do submit that the government should keep that in mind and devise a scheme before too long to take care of the situation which I have just pointed out.

The interest rate is far too high. Five per cent is unnecessary. I should like to draw the attention of the house once more to the fact that the Bank of Canada can create money today by just printing on paper without having any gold backing whatever. We passed a measure last year making it possible to do that on the basis of bonds. It is simply ridiculous, it is a reflection upon the intelligence of the people in this house to expect our young people or even our older people to pay 5 per cent interest on money which the Bank of Canada can run off just as rapidly as it can print it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: That is the actual fact. The big trouble is that people are relying upon the concept of money which their grandfathers had. They are not up to date. Some hon. members were laughing a few minutes ago. I would like to get those members before me in a committee and I wager I would take all the laughs right out of them. They just are not in touch with what is actually going on today.

We should remember what can be done under the Bank of Canada Act. All these members from Saskatchewan who seem to know so much should listen to this, and I will give them the source of my information so they can verify it. On pages 140 and 141 of "The Canadian Banking System" by Professor James Holladay—I am sure I am right —it is pointed out that the Bank of Canada working in conjunction with Canadian chartered banks can take one dollar gold and upon that dollar of gold establish $84 of currency and credit in Canada. Just try to laugh that off. Try to fit that into the silly laughs we had a minute ago. Let us keep in mind what are the actual facts.

I do not intend to enter into a discussion of finance, but the fact is that under this measure we are charging 5 per cent interest on money. I say that is simply not in accordance with common sense under the financial system we have at the present time. I maintain that the interest rate is far too high.

I am not saying that the banks should be called upon to lend money at a rate lower than 5 per cent, but I am saying that it ought to be possible for the federal government through the instruments which it has at its disposal to grant assistance to the banks, to subsidize them, so that they can lend at 3 per cent. I do not think anyone can successfully show that that cannot be done without cost to the federal treasury. So I repeat that the interest rate is far too high.

As I said a moment ago, the term of the loan is not long enough. A young fellow buying a combine at $10,000 will have to pay one-third of the cost down, another third inside of a year and a half and another third inside of two years. Then if he has to pay 5 per cent interest at the same time it means that we certainly are providing a set-up under which it is practically impossible for him to operate unless he has the very best of success and unless he is sure of a good crop, a good market and good prices. I maintain that the term is too short and that the limit on the money that is available is altogether too low.

There is one matter to which the parliamentary assistant referred a few minutes ago.

I do not know whether or not he considered what he said carefully, and I am not sure that I caught the exact purport of his remarks, but I thought he implied—and he will correct me if I am wrong—that when it came to establishing young people on the land you were really dealing with property and civil rights and consequently you were going into the realm of provincial responsibility. I am not sure that I got him right; if I did not he can correct me. He went on to cite measures that had been adopted by various provinces under which they advanced loans to young people of their provinces to establish them, and I think that is where I got the impression. Have I the right idea of what he had in mind, that the establishment of young people would be largely a provincial responsibility? Is that correct?

Mr. Lesage: What I said was that the establishment of settlers or young farmers on new farms, new land, was related to land tenure which certainly was a provincial responsibility, and that no doubt that was the reason some of the provinces at least had considered that that was their responsibility and had acted accordingly.

Mr. Blackmore: That is what I wanted from the parliamentary assistant. I was not sure whether I had interpreted him aright. May I point out that there are at least five provinces in the dominion that simply do not possess the financial ability to back their young people in becoming established. I refer to the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Saskatchewan. These provinces simply have not the ability to provide the necessary money. I maintain that that fact must be recognized. Alberta is in a somewhat more fortunate position at the present time because of the discovery of oil, but that oil is expendable and will become exhausted in due time so there will not be any more revenue from it. Then the same thing will apply to Alberta.

There is no doubt in the world that if we are going to establish our young people all over the dominion on the land and have them care for the land and produce the crops we want them to produce, we must find some means whereby the dominion government can assist the provinces in advancing money to establish young men on the land. I merely wished to make those comments before the resolution carried.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Garson (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 143, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

PROVISION FOR CONTINUATION OF ACT FROM MAY 31, 1953 TO MAY 31, 1954

The house resumed, from Friday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Powers Act to provide for the continuation of the act for a further period of one year, that is, from the thirty-first day of May, 1953, to the thirty-first day of May, 1954.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) rises to continue the debate which he adjourned the other day, I should like to state on a point of order, if I may, that now that the Speaker has taken under consideration the point of order that I raised before during this debate and after further debate on that point of order is going to make a ruling upon it, I withdraw any objections I have to making a statement on points of substance in this present debate. If I may have the unanimous consent of the house, I would be glad to make my statement after the hon. member has finished his speech. If the house does not wish that I should do so, then I may say that I will make a full statement as soon as the house gets into committee. My only purpose the other day was to affirm the point of order which is now, I hope, in the process of being established.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It sounds like an alibi.

Mr. Garson: It is not, though.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I was going to draw attention to the fact that the point of order which was under discussion when this matter was previously before the house is now receiving consideration under another arrangement, and that therefore it is not necessary to proceed with arguments on that score. I should like to refer to the Emergency Powers Act, which I have before me, and which certainly seems to me to require some statement from the minister before any extension should be granted. I would recommend that all members should read carefully the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) which I think brings out most of the arguments why it is not expedient that we should adopt this resolution.

I would refer especially to the very few occasions upon which the government found it necessary during the past two years to resort to the Emergency Powers Act. If the Emergency Powers Act was necessary during the past years there should be some evidence of it, but all we find is that five orders in council were passed under it. I believe they were the only purposes for which the act was used. None of those orders in council is of a very serious nature or is such as should require to be passed under the Emergency Powers Act. They could have been passed under other acts or by special legislation that could have been introduced when the house was in session. Actually I believe the house was in session when all these orders in council were passed. Therefore there was no need to have the Emergency Powers Act at all.

Inasmuch as we have on the statute books an act which covers far more ground than the Emergency Powers Act, and which can be brought into effect immediately by the stroke of a pen as soon as there is any necessity for it, it seems to me there is no reason why we should extend the Emergency Powers Act for another year. Therefore I would be of the same opinion as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who said that the Attorney General will have to produce very strong reasons to convince him that the Emergency Powers Act should be extended.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do hon. members wish to grant the minister unanimous consent to make his speech at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that has impressed me more than anything else about this measure is that the house was unanimous in 1951 in having it placed upon the statute books. When the principle of it was discussed on second reading it received unanimous support, and it was only upon third reading of the bill that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said that it should be passed upon division. The house was likewise unanimous in renewing it in 1952—

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no.

Mr. Garson: —and although some members who took part in the earlier portion of the present debate seemed to be in disagreement with the government's position in this matter, I wish to submit that actually they were not. We really are all in agreement at the present time in respect of the present extension once we properly understand the real nub of the legislation and the real purpose of the extension of it which the government is now seeking. In this connection, I suggest that nothing is more important to a proper understanding of this matter than that we should comprehend with some precision the nature of the emergency which is the basis for the validity of this legislation. I think it is equally important that we understand quite clearly the distinction between the emergency which is the basis for this legislation, and the emergency which was the basis for the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, to which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made reference earlier in this debate.

I would submit that if the hon. member for Lake Centre objects to the term which I applied to the present emergency, namely that it is a post-Korean emergency—I still think that is as apt a three-word phrase as can be applied to it—then surely at least he will agree that the present emergency is an emergency of apprehended war. I believe he will agree also that the true nature of the emergency which was the foundation of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act was the emergency of the changeover from war to peace, and was not an emergency of apprehended war. This distinction is of very considerable importance; for the basic fact of our present position, I suggest, is that the emergency upon which we are depending for the validity of the act now under discussion is now the emergency of apprehended war. This emergency of apprehended war is one which could have been, and could now be, invoked for the purpose of the government without any reference to this parliament at all exercising the almost unlimited powers provided by the War Measures Act, which are wider than those in the legislation now under discussion, and can be invoked without reference to parliament. Moreover the War Measures Act does not require that the orders in council passed under it shall be tabled in parliament, nor does it provide that such orders in council shall be open to annulment proceedings by parliament.

When my hon. friends of the opposition parties who have taken part in this debate say, therefore, that they do so because they wish, upon the one hand, to restrict the powers of the executive, and upon the other to uphold the supremacy of parliament, I applaud their sentiments. I agree with them, and I think they agree with us. It was precisely to achieve those two ends that, instead of invoking the emergency of apprehended war by taking unto ourselves the wide powers under the War Measures Act without reference to parliament at all, we brought this present Emergency Powers Act into parliament. We said, "No, we are not going to invoke these unlimited powers under the War Measures Act without reference to parliament. Instead, we are going to ask parliament to say, in the Emergency Powers Act, just what powers parliament is prepared to give to the government under these present conditions of apprehended war. Far from using these unlimited War Measures Act powers without reference to parliament, we have proposed that the orders in council which we pass under the Emergency Powers Act shall be immediately tabled in parliament and be open for inspection by every member of parliament who wishes to see them. If any member objects to the manner in which we have invoked these powers or objects to the terms of an order in council which we pass under them, he may immediately by annulment proceedings in parliament, for which the Emergency Powers Act makes provision, attack such order in council, and he will be able to have it set aside if he can persuade the majority of members to support him in that regard."

Hon. members will recall that the Emergency Powers Act was before parliament first in 1951. If I recall correctly one of the members of the official opposition—I believe it was the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)—said to me through you, Mr. Speaker, "You know perfectly well that if a private member brings in a resolution of annulment in this way it will go down to the bottom of the order paper. Then, if the government used its control over the order paper with some tactical skill, this resolution will not be dealt with promptly, and perhaps not at all". Hon. members will recall that an undertaking was given by myself, after consultation with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), that the government would give priority to any resolution of that sort seeking annulment of orders passed under the present legislation.

Now, that being the case, it seems to me —and I offer this suggestion with great respect—that actually those members of the opposition who have said they were in favour of restricting the powers of the executive and of protecting the civil rights of the subject, and of upholding the supremacy of parliament, must support the extension of this bill. If they do not do so, then the position would be that the powers that are now available to the government under the War Measures Act in the present emergency of apprehended war are much more extensive and under less parliamentary control than those which are available under the Emergency Powers Act. We can exercise those War Measures Act powers without coming to parliament at all. That does not require that we table the orders in council passed thereunder. The orders in council which are passed by the government under the War Measures Act are not directly open to attack in parliament. Therefore the position of those in this house who are in favour of restricting the powers of the executive and supporting the supremacy of parliament is that, if they mean what they say, then they must support the extension of the Emergency Powers Act which we now seek.

Lest there be any misapprehension on this point—which I think would have been quite obvious from a perusal of the Emergency Powers Act had opposition speakers in this debate taken the trouble, as it seems they did not, to have read that act—let me refer hon. members to the debate which took place when the Prime Minister was discussing the resolution introducing that act in February, 1951. First of all, let me quote from his remarks as reported in Hansard of that year, page 497, as to the nature of the emergency. The hon. member for Lake Centre will recall that there was an interchange between us as to the nature of the emergency upon which this act is based.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not here in February, 1951.

Mr. Garson: No, I meant the other day in this debate. The hon. member rather scoffed at my idea that there was any distinction between the emergency under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, which was involved in the Nolan case, and the emergency which was involved here. He will recall that he read from the preamble of the Emergency Powers Act itself. He read:

> Whereas an international emergency exists that threatens the security of Canada.

He then argued that that is the full statement of the present emergency that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has to rely upon. But in the debate, in February 1951, leading to the introduction of the Emergency Powers Act, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said:

> The question may be asked, what is the nature of the emergency which we are facing?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will my hon. friend allow a question at this point?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What the Prime Minister said would not have any effect in a court of law. The preamble would be the preamble relied upon to interpret the emergency, and not any undertaking by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Garson: Yes. My hon. friend is quite right. But at a later point I will endeavour to convince my hon. friend that the language which is used in the preamble to the act has reference to the same thing and means the same thing as the language of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 497 of Hansard of February 20, 1951:

> The question may be asked, what is the nature of the emergency we are facing? In the opinion of the government, it is as defined in the following language in the speech from the throne:
> "The increased menace in the Far East reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by force or the fear of force, and that the only hope of maintaining peace with freedom lies in the rapid increase of the combined strength of the free nations."

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if my hon. friend had taken the trouble to read the language which I have just quoted, he might have had a more adequate impression of the language which he quoted from the preamble of the act, namely "whereas an international emergency exists that threatens the security of Canada"; because the emergency which is recited in the act in those terms is the same emergency which is described rather more fully in the speech from the throne which the Prime Minister quoted. I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, or to any hon. member whether it is or is not a reasonable submission that these two sets of language were referring to the one and the same fact, and that fact is the emergency upon which the whole validity of the Emergency Powers Act depends.

In addition, the Prime Minister at that time made it quite clear; and shortly I am going to show that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew)—in an excellent and thoughtful speech that shows that he understood these points thoroughly—agrees with all of these points of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, I say, went on to point out further down in his remarks:

> Since that is so, it might afford justification for bringing into effect the War Measures Act, on the ground that we are in a state of apprehended war. I believe the dictionary definition of "apprehended" —perceived or feared—would be met in this instance. There is no doubt that the possibility of war is perceived. There is no doubt that it is gravely feared. If that is so, why not use the War Measures Act?

That is a question which certainly members of the opposition who have taken part in this debate have been re-echoing. Here is the answer. I am still quoting from the Prime Minister's speech:

> One reason why we have not proclaimed the War Measures Act is that the government fears such a course might add to the feeling, already too prevalent here and in other countries, that war is inevitable. Since its passage in 1914 the War Measures Act has been used on two very critical occasions, but they were both occasions of actually existing war. It has seemed to us we should do everything possible to avoid any suggestion that we believe war is no longer likely to be prevented. I believe we must increase our efforts to prevent a world war.

Then the Right Hon. Prime Minister goes on to point out that it will not assist our efforts to prevent a world war if we create amongst our own people and the people of other free countries an impression that war is inevitable.

In firmly establishing these points which are very apposite to the matter which we are now considering, let me quote further from the Prime Minister's statement, at page 498 of Hansard of 1951:

> There are additional considerations which weighed on the government. The conditions being different from those which have at previous times led to the proclamation of the War Measures Act,—

Let those who say that they want to uphold the supremacy of parliament and limit the powers of the executive listen to this:

> —the government feels it is preferable that there should be a departure from the normal constitutional distribution of powers, and that a decision as to the emergency should not be made merely on the judgment of the governor in council as to the present situation, but should rest with the people's representatives in this parliament.

Mr. Fleming: At what page is that?

Mr. Garson: At page 498. I continue:

> In view of the possibility that the state of emergency may be of an indeterminate length—

We have today a condition of emergency which is unique in our history. It is an emergency of apprehended war; but unlike war emergencies of the past this present emergency, as the Prime Minister here points out, may be of indeterminate length. I suggest that it is not desirable, as the government recognizes, that for a period of indeterminate length the government should be invoking the wider powers of the War Measures Act, without any control by parliament. I suggest that it is much more desirable, as the Prime Minister has indicated, that in the precise kind of emergency with which we are now faced we should follow the course which we in fact followed of coming to parliament, and that we should follow the course which we are following right now in asking parliament for an extension of the specified powers granted by parliament under the Emergency Powers Act. I continue this quotation:

> In view of the possibility that the state of the emergency may be of an indeterminate length, the government considers that all the powers transferred by the War Measures Act to the governor in council need not be available immediately. These powers are far-reaching, and they include the capacity to affect not only the ordinary property and civil rights of Canadian citizens, but their personal rights as well.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is always—and properly so; it is much to his credit—deeply concerned with the civil liberties of the subject. He knows perfectly well that the War Measures Act includes the powers of arbitrary arrest, detention, deportation and exclusion, none of which are contained in the present legislation.

Mr. Fleming: You can thank the official opposition for the fact they are not in it.

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Garson: No. I suggest that my hon. friend cannot thank the official opposition; because if he will refresh his memory just slightly he will recall that the Emergency Powers Act, when it was introduced by the government, never included any such powers and expressly excluded them. I admit that in connection with arrest—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege on that statement; because in November, 1945, the bill introduced by the government contained those powers; and we took the strongest objection, on a Friday as I remember it. On Monday there was a meeting of the dominion-provincial conference and they took the same objection that we took and withdrew them, or forced the government to withdraw them.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend speaks of 1945.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: But we are now talking about the Emergency Powers Act of 1951. My hon. friend is still back on the Nolan case and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. He should no confuse these two statutes.

Mr. Fulton: On that point may I say this. My hon. friend will remember that an amendment was introduced as a result of the suggestion of the official opposition on that occasion.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: We had considerable argument before it was accepted.

Mr. Garson: Yes. My hon. friend is quite right; there was an amendment introduced in relation to the Emergency Powers Act upon the subject of arrest. But if my hon. friend will carefully recollect, it was explained at that time that the only power of arrest which the original draft of the Emergency Powers Act intended, and as we thought did provide, was the power of arrest in relation to offences against regulations passed pursuant to the Emergency Powers Act. I see my hon. friend from Kamloops nods his head in assent to that. That is right, and it was very clear that the government did not at any stage of the Emergency Powers Act seek to include in it the power which is in the War Measures Act to make arbitrary arrest or detention within the meaning of the War Measures Act. There was at that time quite a long exchange between the hon. member for Kamloops and myself, the result of which was that although we of the government continued to think and to assert that the only power of arrest authorized by the Emergency Powers Act was confined to contraventions of orders in council passed pursuant to the Emergency Powers Act itself, we did accept an amendment from my hon. friend which cleared up that point beyond any peradventure of doubt.

Mr. Fulton: And it was drafted by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Garson: It was drafted by the Prime Minister, as my hon. friend says. But my hon. friend will agree that at no time under the emergency powers bill did we seek anything remotely approaching extraordinary remedies of the War Measures Act which would adversely affect the liberty of the subject.

Let me quote further from the Prime Minister's remarks, as reported at page 498 of Hansard of February 20, 1951:

> As this resolution indicates, it will provide for restrictions on this general power. While providing adequate powers to deal with the type of situation which may be expected to arise, the government has endeavoured to avoid taking powers of the grave character which no democratic government wishes to have, as a government, unless those powers are really necessary for the safety of the state.

In other words, we were saying to parliament, we have available under an emergency of apprehended war the wide powers of the War Measures Act without reference to parliament at all. Instead of invoking those wide powers we are asking parliament to give us certain specific powers to be named in this emergency powers bill which we are introducing. We agree that if we exercise these powers to pass orders in council or regulations, we shall in every case table these promptly in parliament within a matter of days after they have been passed. In this way every member of parliament shall have access to them to see if they are proper or not. If any member thinks that an order in council is improper, he has the right to bring into parliament, by machinery which the act provides for that purpose, a resolution seeking the annulment of these orders in council to which he objects.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when one member after the other of the opposition rises in his place and says he wants to know what orders in council the government has passed under this legislation, why are we so secretive about them, they surely have not read the act, because if they had read the act they would know that within a matter of days after parliament is in session the orders in council have to be tabled. When they are tabled they appear in the Votes and Proceedings, and then they go downstairs to the parliamentary papers branch where the text of them is available to any hon. member to see. And if they say they do not know what they are I say this in all kindness, I mean this in a very kindly way, I say they have only themselves to blame. I am not saying that because I do not wish to specify the orders in council which have been passed; I shall do that in due course.

What was the position of the opposition with regard to this matter and with regard to the arguments put up by my leader. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), in one of the finest speeches that I have ever heard him make—it seems to me he was much more sensible and to the point in this speech than in many statements I have heard him make from time to time—

Mr. Casselman: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Graydon: You may not be a very good judge yourself.

Mr. Garson: I may not be; I am just speaking—

Mr. Pearkes: Do you want to be?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is not going to prevent me from praising his leader, surely.

Mr. Graydon: No; I would like you to make it more general, that is all.

Mr. Garson: First of all, with regard to the emergency, this is what the Leader of the Opposition had to say. He is referring to the Prime Minister, and this is what he said at page 500 of Hansard of February 20, 1951:

> He has indicated that the emergency is the increased menace in the Far East—

I recommend this particularly to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who seems to be in some doubt as to the nature of the emergency. This is what his leader said:

> He has indicated that the emergency is the increased menace in the Far East, which demonstrates the full extent of the threat of communist imperialism. He has quoted from some words I used in the debate on the speech from the throne. I agree that those words were intended to convey my own belief that there is an emergency of the nature which he described.

Mr. Fulton: What year was that?

Mr. Garson: This is at page 500 of Hansard of February 20, 1951, and is in the very same debate as that in which the Prime Minister spoke. As soon as the Prime Minister took his seat the Leader of the Opposition rose, and this is one of the first paragraphs of his speech. Then he goes further. He not only agrees but he says:

> I would point out, however, that this emergency is not new. I would point out that when another bill was introduced in this house last September we sought to emphasize that there was an emergency of this very nature. True, the seriousness of the emergency is being recognized more generally, but the emergency that exists today was the emergency which existed in just as definite reality last September.

And might I say, Mr. Speaker, in order to bring this up to date, as to the necessity of extending these powers at the present time, it is not more than a week or so since the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in a statement that was more detailed than either of those that I have quoted, gave a most excellent description of the nature of the emergency with which we are now faced.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister said there was no emergency.

Mr. St. Laurent: The Prime Minister is quite willing to have his language, which is on Hansard, construed by anyone who wishes to read it and it will not bear out the construction suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green).

Mr. Green: Just as much as the statement of the hon. member for Nanaimo bears out the construction that the minister has put on it.

Mr. Garson: We are agreed upon the emergency. As to the propriety of the method by which we were seeking to deal with it, let me quote again from the Leader of the Opposition as follows at page 500:

> Having said that on that occasion and at a time when we were seeking to point out the dangers of the indefinite and almost unlimited powers which were being sought, at that time, I wish to indicate my own support for the proposition now placed before us that such emergency measures as are to be adopted shall be brought clearly before parliament and shall be the results of actual decision of members of this house.

That is precisely what the government was doing under this Emergency Powers Act. The Prime Minister indicated the position of the government. We did not wish to invoke the War Measures Act. What does the Leader of the Opposition have to say as to that? I quote again. He said referring to the Prime Minister:

> He has said that he does not regard it as desirable that the War Measures Act should be invoked because it might convey the impression that war is inevitable.
> Since the Prime Minister has referred to this may I point out that never at any time last September, before then or since then, have I suggested that we proceed under the wide powers of that act. When I referred last September to the existence of an emergency I was expressing my own opinion that if legislation is to be effective which bases its validity upon the existence of an emergency so that it may give to the government of Canada, powers ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the provinces, it is desirable to declare that there is in fact an emergency.
> I find that the suggestion has been made that on that occasion I was urging that the War Measures Act be invoked. I was not, and I am not now.

Now, if I recall what some of the members of the official opposition have said in the present debate, they were, if I mistake not, repudiating their leader's suggestion—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Garson: —that the War Measures Act should not be invoked, when they said to us "you do not need to use this Emergency Powers Act because you have the War Measures Act".

Mr. Fulton: We were discussing the nature of the emergency itself, that is all.

Mr. Garson: No, let me read one more quotation from the Leader of the Opposition. He said, as reported at page 501 of Hansard of February 20, 1951:

> I most heartily endorse the suggestion by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that whatever we say and do here should seek to convey to the people of Canada the thought that a general war is not inevitable. I think that is of immense importance. The spirit in which our people accept whatever deprivations may be necessary as a result of the heavily increased burden of defence will be largely measured by the degree of hope they have in their minds that what is being done now may preserve that peace which every sensible person in the world desires so much today.

Now, if that is the case, and if those are the reasons on which the Leader of the opposition, leading his party, later supported on second reading the principle of this legislation, then I suggest that they apply with just the same force today—if not even greater force—than they did at that time.

Mr. Fleming: May I interrupt the minister. He will agree, I think, that those remarks were not made on second reading of the bill. They were on the resolution stage.

Mr. Garson: That is right. I said that these remarks were made on the resolution stage.

Mr. Fleming: No, on second reading.

Mr. Garson: No; I said that the Leader of the Opposition and his party supported this measure on second reading—and they did support it.

Mr. Fleming: You mean simply that there was not a division.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at the record, as I have done, he will see that on second reading there was not an indication even that it passed on division. The house was not divided. And he will see that, after having approved of the principle on second reading, it was only on third reading that the words were added by the Leader of the Opposition, almost as a footnote, when he interjected, "on division".

Mr. Pearkes: How do you do it, then?

Mr. Casselman: Do you stand up and turn a somersault?

Mr. Garson: Surely if it was proper to pass the bill in 1951, and to renew it in 1952 unanimously—

Mr. Fleming: No, no.

Mr. Garson: There was no division in 1952 on the resolution which was put before the house at that time, and my hon. friend knows that.

Mr. Fleming: That was after the Leader of the Opposition had spoken against it. The minister knows the reason there was not a division.

Mr. Garson: I certainly do know how it came about, that there was no division. It means, when there is no division, that members of the opposition do not call for a division. The only proper way in which the opposition members can express disapproval of a measure of this sort is by a certain number of them rising in their places and calling for a division. And they did not do that, with regard to the Emergency Powers Act.

The position today with regard to the emergency is surely as serious as it was in 1951 or 1952. If any member of the opposition thinks that it is not, then I would refer him to the classical description of the present emergency as set out by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in a debate on a matter connected with the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Green: And the statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the contrary.

Mr. Garson: I cannot say as to that. I am very wary when my hon. friends quote the Prime Minister. I find, with respect, that such quotations are almost uniformly inaccurate. I wish the hon. member would not ask me to agree or to disagree with his quotations of the Prime Minister's remarks.

But I still say that, whether we look at Iran or at the Balkan states, or Malaya, or Indo-China, or Korea, or Tunisia or Morocco or South Africa, or many other places in the world today—or, indeed, regarding the continuation of the war in Korea—there is no less of an emergency today than there was in 1951 or 1952.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What has South Africa to do with it?

Mr. Garson: Unrest, wherever it may be, does not add to the feeling of security, so far as an emergency is concerned.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question? Is it his belief that so long as there are situations such as those in Iran and the other places he mentioned, that the government should have emergency powers?

Mr. Garson: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that where an emergency of an apprehended war faces a democratic government, that has on its statute books an act like the War Measures Act, the proper course for that democratic government is to come to parliament and ask it to give certain specified emergency powers, under proper precautions as to the tabling of the orders in council and proper precautions as to the control that parliament will have over all the acts done under those emergency powers. And I say that it is quite reasonable that that special act should remain upon the statute books during the continuation of such emergency, rather than that the government and parliament should have to fall back upon the much wider powers of the War Measures Act.

Mr. Green: Even though that condition continues over a period of years?

Mr. Garson: Yes, surely.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would point out that it is now six o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister finished?

Mr. Garson: No. I think I had better adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Garson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue consideration of this resolution of the Prime Minister respecting the Emergency Powers Act. Then if the Leader of the Opposition is in the house we will take up the resolution to revise the Yukon Act, to continue the discussion of the point of order under standing order 60. Then we will go on with Bill No. 48, respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Fisheries to approve and confirm the international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, signed by Canada, the United States and Japan. Then if we have time we will take up the following bills: Nos. 44, 46, 38 and 39.

Then everyone knows that at eight o'clock the Minister of Finance will make his budget speech.

Mr. Fleming: When is it the intention to call again the government resolution proposing the setting up of the special committee on radio broadcasting, the debate on which was adjourned three weeks ago last night?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall consult with my colleague and give an answer later to the hon. member.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 19, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STUART—REFERENCE TO REMARKS BY HON. MEMBER FOR GLOUCESTER

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I rise on a question of privilege. During the debate that took place yesterday in this chamber with regard to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, I took issue with a statement which was made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). When I placed on the record what I believed I had heard him say I was interrupted by several members on my left who stated that the interpretation, or the statement I had put on the record, was incorrect. I have yesterday's Hansard, and I should like to read briefly from the remarks that I made, as reported at page 2071 of Hansard:

But there was a statement made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Gloucester—

Mr. Graydon: Where is the privilege?

Mr. Casselman: That was in debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Gloucester also rose on a question of privilege.

Mr. Weir: They had better go outside and settle it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Casselman: And the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) could be referee.

Mr. McCann: You are the one who would not come.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: Big talk.

Mr. Speaker: Since both the hon. member from Charlotte and the hon. member for Gloucester would like to settle some question, with the consent of the house they might have this opportunity, if they wish to do it at this time. We cannot go into a long debate.

Mr. Casselman: No; this is debate.

Mr. Speaker: If I do not allow the hon. member for Charlotte to speak I cannot allow the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I be permitted to continue, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: From what I have heard it seems to me that this would appear to be some matter that took place during a debate in the house. Whether it should have been raised at that time or whether the debate should be renewed—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): My question of privilege had to do with the statement I put on the record. I was informed by hon. members to my left that it was incorrect. I have Hansard of yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I can allow that as a question of privilege.

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Speaker, during my absence from the house, when I was attending the committee on the revision of the Criminal Code, the hon. member for Charlotte—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs and moved that it be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

Second report of the standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria).

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

STATEMENT CONCERNING ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to complete an answer I gave yesterday to a question of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) about recent orders in council under the Emergency Powers Act. The order in council to which I referred as having been passed several weeks ago, or perhaps several months ago, was in fact passed on October 30, 1952, and was No. 4410. It was published in the Canada Gazette, part II, of November 12, 1952, and tabled in the house on November 20, 1952.

Questions

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

ALLEGED INADEQUACY OF ANSWER TO QUESTION

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with the answer to a question I received yesterday concerning Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The question was as follows:

1. How many officers and officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation receive salaries in excess of $7,000 per year, giving names and positions held?

2. Have any salaries been increased in such categories during the year 1952, and the present year to date? If so, what are the names of such persons and the respective amounts of the increases?

Now, what purports to be an answer was as follows:

1. (a) There are 27 officers and officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation receiving salaries in excess of $7,000 per year.

(b) It is not the policy of the government to ask Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to disclose the names of this group, because of the quasi-commercial nature of the corporation and its competitive position in securing and retaining staff in the mortgage and construction fields.

My point of privilege is this, that the reply is a travesty of parliament. I understand that these men have raised their salaries recently, in one case up to $20,000 a year; and the Canadian taxpayer has a right to know what expenditures are being made of his money.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, I anticipated that the hon. member would raise a question in the house, so I brought a copy of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act with me. The question has been asked on a number of occasions by hon. members on both sides of the house, and that is the type of answer that has always been given.

Section 14 (1) of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act reads as follows:

(1) The corporation may on its own behalf employ such officers and employees for such purposes and on such terms and conditions as may be determined by the executive committee and such officers and employees are not officers or servants of His Majesty.

That should, of course, now be "Her Majesty". That statute, including the subsection I have quoted, was enacted by this parliament. I understand therefore that the answer I tabled yesterday was in accordance with the wishes of parliament when it enacted the legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That does not answer the Canadian people.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

PENITENTIARIES

TABLING OF REPORT OF COMMISSIONER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table printed copies in English and in French of the annual report of the commissioner of penitentiaries for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, which have now been received from the queen's printer. Hon. members will recall that photostat copies of the material contained in the report were tabled on December 1, 1952, in order to comply with the provisions of section 14 of the Penitentiary Act.

QUESTIONS

RONALD POWER

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of Justice been drawn to the case of Ronald Power, Toronto, who served 10 months in the Don jail for an armed robbery he did not commit?

Mr. Garson:

1. Yes.

2. No. The administration of justice, including the enforcement of the criminal law, is, by the terms of the British North America Act, the responsibility of the provincial or local authorities. The prosecution in this case was initiated and conducted accordingly by provincial or local authorities and without reference to the Department of Justice or other department of the government of Canada. Consequently, any claim for redress should not be addressed to the government of Canada.

2. When was this policy definitely adopted?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

2. In 1945 after the cessation of hostilities, in connection with the post-war building program.

"TWO MINUTES OF EMPLOYMENT FACTS"

Mr. Fraser:

1. How many copies of "Two Minutes of Employment Facts" were printed during the year 1952?
2. How many were printed during the first month of 1953?
3. What was the cost of printing during 1952?
4. What was the cost of printing during January, 1953?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

2. 62,400 copies were printed during January, 1953. (2 issues).

3. The total cost of printing during 1952 was $8,034.49.

4. The cost of printing the January 1953 issue was $796.88. This last named figure is approximate since final billings have not yet been received.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CHIROPODISTS AND CHIROPODY KITS

Mr. Fraser:

1. Did the government, during the last year, buy 72 chiropody kits, including instruments, etc?
2. If so, what department of the government ordered these kits, and were they ordered from a United States firm?
3. Has the government any chiropodists in its employ?
4. If so, are they registered Canadian chiropodists?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR FEWER NEWS BROADCASTS CONCERNING THE ROSENBERGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, would the government have any objection to notifying the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to reduce from thrice daily to once daily the broadcast instalments of the lethal Rosenberg serial? I do not ask for an answer, but I expect action.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR TELEVISING CORONATION CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue, under whose department the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is administered.

Has the British Broadcasting Corporation made arrangements with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the broadcasting of the coronation ceremony over television, free of charge, in line with the announcement of the C.B.C. this morning at eight o'clock that the British corporation would give the American broadcasting companies absolutely free television of the coronation, so long as no advertising was used?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Not having had any notice of the question, I shall take it as notice and give an answer at a later date.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question was rather long. I am not suggesting that it be put on the order paper because there is a great deal of general public interest in the question. But I would ask hon. members to make their questions more brief.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD BLOCKADE OF CHINA COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of Mr. Dulles' statement of yesterday, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, referring to a possible blockade of the China coast, has the government made known its views to the United States government on this matter? If not, will they do so now?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think the report to which my hon. friend refers merely indicated that the state department in Washington was intensively studying any action, including naval blockade, which might be effective in stopping the flow of strategic materials to communist China. The attitude of the Canadian government on this question is well known and has been made known to the United States authorities.

UNITED NATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION ON COMMITTEE ON KOREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Arising out of the reply given by the minister, I would like to ask him who is the representative of Canada at the meeting being convened today by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge and composed of representatives of 16 nations whose troops are in Korea. What is the purpose of that meeting?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There is nothing unusual in the meeting to which reference has been made in the press. When the United Nations general assembly is meeting from time to time, representatives of member states actively participating in the Korean operation meet and discuss developments. I take it that this is one of those meetings in connection with the resumed session of the United Nations general assembly and that it is being called on this occasion by the United States delegate to the United Nations. Our representative at the meeting will be the permanent representative to the United Nations, Mr. Johnson.

POTATOES

DROP IN PRICE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and I am sorry that I did not have time to give him notice. Perhaps the minister will accept this as notice. Has the minister received any complaints with regard to the serious drop in the price of potatoes in Prince Edward Island and that United States potatoes from Maine are being dumped on the Montreal market? Can the minister indicate whether the government is taking any action in the matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I will take that as a notice of the question and reply later.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

PROVISION FOR CONTINUATION OF ACT FROM MAY 31, 1953 TO MAY 31, 1954

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Powers Act to provide for the continuation of the act for a further period of one year, that is from the thirty-first day of May, 1953, to the thirty-first day of May, 1954.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last evening at six o'clock I was engaged in pointing out that if our hon. friends opposite, as many of them appear to do, were basing their refusal to extend the Emergency Powers Act upon the fact that the emergency which had called it into existence in 1951 had passed, there really was no basis in fact for their argument. I indicated yesterday afternoon the reasons for suggesting that it would be a great mistake upon their part to think that the world is not a dangerous world at the present time because we on the North American continent occupy an island of some tranquillity and prosperity in the midst of it. I suggest that they should not forget that at the present time we have Canadian troops in Korea and on the Elbe and that events could take place in very short order that might require legislative action, or as an alternative, action by order in council, in a matter of hours.

In addition to any argument which might be brought forward to the effect that the emergency has passed, it has been urged by a number of members of the opposition who have taken part in this present debate that the legislation which we are discussing has not been used by the government to any great extent. That is quite correct, but I would point out that when we sought these powers in the first place we told parliament at that time that we would use them as little as possible. That is what we have done.

Last year, in moving the address in the house leading to the extension of the Emergency Powers Act, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) outlined in considerable detail the 19 orders in council which had been passed under this statute during the first year of its existence. Inasmuch as the details of those orders in council are set out in considerable detail on pages 2558 and 2559 of Hansard of May 26, 1952, I do not think there would be any purpose served in my repeating them now. But perhaps I should indicate the orders in council which were passed under this legislation during the past year and which are five in number.

The first was order in council P.C. 389, of January 1, 1952, which did nothing more than revoke a previous order in council P.C. 3415, which had been passed under this legislation in the year previous.

The second was P.C. 3197 of May 30, 1952. This was the last in a series of orders in council relating to the great lakes seamen's securities regulations.

The third was P.C. 4116 of September 24, 1952, which again revoked a previous order in council P.C. 5122 of September 26, 1951, deferring the weigh-over of grain.

The fourth was P.C. 4525 of November 19, 1952, revoking P.C. 1608 passed on April 4, 1951, which latter was covered in the list of orders in council mentioned last year by the Prime Minister.

The fifth order in council which was passed last year is the only one which dealt with an entirely new subject. This was P.C. 4410 of October 30, 1952, which deals with the licensing of pilots under the Aeronautics Act and the issuing of certificates of proficiency for radio operators under the Radio Act, in order to provide in relation to that field additional security along the lines of the orders in council relating to the great lakes seamen's security regulations.

I suggest that if all these orders in council are examined it will be seen that they can be divided into those which were passed for the time being and were later replaced by legislation passed by parliament as soon as it was possible to secure it, into those which have since been revoked by some of these which I have referred to as having been passed during the past year, and that the notable exceptions to these two groups were the great lakes seamen's security regulations and the regulations for airplane pilots. I suggest that the very good reason why we have passed these security regulations pursuant to the Emergency Powers Act is that they are the kind of regulations the need for which rises out of the cold war. I suggest that we have dealt with them as such and have thereby clearly indicated that we regard these regulations as arising out of the cold war and that we did not wish to have them written into the main body of the statute law of the country with the implication of permanency which their being written into the main body of the law would create.

But even so, if my hon. friends will examine these regulations they will see that they do no more than provide reasonable security against communist sabotage in our great lakes shipping and in the operation of our airplanes along the very same lines that we provide the same type of protection in the vulnerable parts of our civil service. If my hon. friends will examine these orders in council they will see that the civil liberties of the subject are amply protected by their terms, that there is provision for appeal against decisions rendered under them, that no one is deprived of a chance to make a living, as has been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), and that it has only been a very small fraction of the total number of men whose records have been examined who have had records which could not stand up to the tests. In relation to this small fraction all that has happened is that they have been denied access to fields in which they could, if they so desired, carry on espionage and sabotage.

It has been suggested that, because no such similar regulations have been applied to ocean shipping, therefore they should not be applied to great lakes shipping; but I should think it should be very obvious to anyone that the possibility of sabotage upon the part of seamen whose boat is going through the Welland canal or the Sault Ste. Marie canal is much greater than on the part of men who are working upon ships in the ocean itself. I would and do maintain that these regulations in no way prejudice the freedom or civil liberties of the subject, and I am informed that they have worked very satisfactorily indeed in practice.

When hon. members argue that such powers are not necessary because we have not used them to a large extent, after we had undertaken that we would not use them excessively or abuse them in any way, I think they are betraying a complete misconception as to the nature of emergency powers. Anyone who has given the matter any thought at all must realize at an early stage what is comprehended in the essential character of emergency powers. They are powers which are taken in an emergency to deal with matters which must be dealt with more rapidly than parliament can deal with them whether it is in session or prorogued. It is because such matters are more likely to arise during a condition of emergency than during normal times that these powers are taken in the first place. The mere fact that over the past year we have not needed to use these powers extensively is no reason at all, I suggest, that we might not need to use them inside the next twenty-four hours, the next week, the next month or the next six months. A man who has been carrying fire insurance upon his belongings and home, for the period of say twenty-five years, should not cancel his insurance because his house had not burned down during the preceding year. He therefore who argues that we should not have the emergency powers extended because during the past year no occasion for their use by us has arisen is surely taking a position which is an untenable one. If the fact that we have used them so little proves anything, it proves our good faith in the undertaking we gave to parliament that we would use these emergency powers as little as possible. For this reason I suggest that those of the opposition who have urged the supremacy of parliament, who have urged that the powers of the executive should be limited as much as possible and that parliament should have as much control as possible over the orders in council which are passed under legislation of this sort, should support the extension of this legislation. They cannot be taken very seriously in their support of these three objectives I have named unless they do support this legislation. The fact is that there is a genuine emergency, which they have admitted, and no sensible man can argue that it does not still continue.

Upon a reasonable interpretation of the War Measures Act that emergency entitles the government to invoke its wide powers which are more extensive than those in the Emergency Powers Act. In the War Measures Act no provision is made for supervision by parliament. Instead of invoking these wide War Measures Act powers the government has come to parliament with a specific list of powers that have been incorporated in the Emergency Powers Act, with a view to vesting in parliament some control over the actions of the government when it invokes these powers. For parliament to refuse extension at the present time will, in practical effect, leave the government in the position of having if necessary to fall back on the very wide powers provided in the War Measures Act by the government of Sir Robert Borden in 1914, which act every succeeding government has seen fit to leave upon the statute books. This will leave parliament in relation to the exercise of emergency powers in a very much worse position than it will be if extension of the Emergency Powers Act is now granted.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it may not be amiss to point out that we are debating a resolution introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which contemplates the introduction of a bill to extend the Emergency Powers Act for a period of one year from the 31st of May, 1953, to the 31st of May, 1954.

Several interesting things have occurred during the course of this debate which I think are worthy of comment. I have mentioned that this is a resolution introduced by the Prime Minister. Thus far the Prime Minister has not chosen to speak in the debate. It is also worth while recalling what occurred on February 6, as recorded at page 1712 of Hansard. When my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), rose to speak he drew attention to the fact that the Prime Minister was at that moment apparently about to leave the chamber and offered the comment that the Prime Minister apparently thought so little of his own resolution that he was leaving the house at that moment. The Prime Minister is recorded as making this response:

> Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Prime Minister has other things to do than to listen to the hon. gentleman, when he is using that tone.

The tone in question was, I take it, a tone of criticism. The Prime Minister apparently did not like the tone and thereupon left the chamber, giving as his reason for so doing that he disapproved of the tone used by the hon. member for Kamloops in referring to him and his attitude in the debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Fleming: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that when the Prime Minister spoke on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kamloops on February 10 he seemed to think that the addition of the words "when he is using that tone" removed everything invidious from his comment. I think it makes it so much the worse.

Mr. St. Laurent: You are entitled to your opinion.

Mr. Fleming: Nobody expects the Prime Minister to be in this house at all times. We all know that he has important duties to perform. Necessarily the Prime Minister, like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), cannot be in the house all the time. But, Mr. Speaker, I think the house is entitled to a better reason for the Prime Minister leaving the house than that he dislikes the tone in which an hon. member of the opposition is proceeding to criticize a government measure and the failure of the Prime Minister to speak on a measure that he himself has introduced.

An hon. Member: You are splitting hairs.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, suppose those who follow the Prime Minister had chosen to follow his example on that occasion. It would simply have meant that we would have had a house which was largely empty if the members who normally support the Prime Minister had chosen to follow his example on that occasion; and the reason would have been that they disliked the tone of criticism. Let us have due regard, Mr. Speaker, for that fact in addressing ourselves to a measure under which the government is inviting parliament to vest in the government, for another period of a year, extraordinary and sweeping powers. Here we have a government that is so impatient of criticism in this house that the Prime Minister assigns as his sufficient reason for leaving the house the fact that he dislikes the tone in which an hon. member of the opposition is proceeding to criticize a government measure and the failure of the Prime Minister to speak in the debate. From that statement of the Prime Minister I suppose hon. members of the opposition can take due notice that they had better beware of the tone of their criticism. That seems to be the inference that is intended to be taken. I observed yesterday that the Prime Minister sat in the house, as he did again today, throughout the entire speech of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. St. Laurent: He was discussing the matter before the house.

Mr. Fleming: I infer that the tone used by the Minister of Justice met with the approval of the Prime Minister.

I wish to comment on the fact that at this late stage in the debate the Minister of Justice—on whom has fallen the burden of supporting this measure owing to the non-participation of the Prime Minister in this debate—has at last found his tongue. He had an interesting time on February 6 in this house with respect to his obstinate refusal to support the motion then introduced and now under debate, and for his refusal to participate in it or to make any statement to the house as to his reasons for asking the house to approve this resolution designed to open the way for a bill to vest in the government these sweeping and extraordinary powers. For that obstinate refusal he hid behind the wrenching of a ruling. Even at that late stage last night we are glad that the minister found his tongue and that he has given to the house a statement of reasons—however poor, however inadequate, however far-fetched—for asking the house to approve this resolution. Personally, I am glad he spoke, I am glad the house gave unanimous consent to his speaking again in the debate. It was the first time he had attempted to give any merits for the resolution. I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, that he spoke again. He clarified some matters and he expounded some doctrines which I think are going to be highly interesting to this country.

In the first place the Minister of Justice proceeded to wrench and to distort beyond all recognition the history of this measure as it has been unfolded in this house in two previous sessions. As I recall it, Mr. Speaker, this measure is two years old. It was debated in the 1951 session and in the 1952 session of parliament. The minister, with full access to the Hansard record available to him, undertook to tell this house something that is a monstrous distortion of the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: He said that this measure had been passed with the unanimous approval of the house in the two previous years. Nothing could be farther from the fact, Mr. Speaker, as I shall proceed to show. The Minister of Justice is utterly wrong in what he has said.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask a question?

Mr. Fleming: With pleasure.

Mr. Garson: Did his party or any member of it vote against the bill or against its extension?

Mr. Fleming: I am going to give the minister the whole story. He is not going to get away today with some of his general references as he did last night. I am going to go over every stage of this measure.

Mr. Sinnott: Answer the question.

An hon. Member: He will.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member answer my question?

Mr. Fleming: The minister will hear the whole story. I see that the Prime Minister is leaving the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: All I can hope is—

Mr. St. Laurent: It is suggested that "the whole story" is going to take forty minutes, and I think I can use the forty minutes to better advantage.

Mr. Fleming: I ask nothing further on the part of the Prime Minister than that abject confession of the fact that he is impatient of parliamentary processes.

An hon. Member: And parliamentary criticism.

Mr. Fleming: And that he has no time in which to listen to criticism of government measures in this house. The Prime Minister dislikes the tone of criticism. For the second time in this debate he has chosen to leave the house. He had plenty of time to come into the house and to listen to the forty-minute speech of the Minister of Justice but he has not time to listen to opposition members dealing with his bill. That is a highly interesting commentary, Mr. Speaker, on the attitude of the government which is demanding at the hands of parliament renewal of those sweeping, extraordinary and unwarranted powers.

I had occasion to refer to what the Minister of Justice had to say. I recall that on February 6, as found at page 1701 of Hansard, he undertook to refer to me. Incidentally, this apparently was intended to have reference to some stage in earlier years—I take it in 1951—of the debate on this measure. He says:

> I remember that on one particular occasion I conferred with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and a wording was adopted. I asked him on the floor of the house if he was satisfied with it and he expressed his complete satisfaction.

That is apparently put forward by the Minister of Justice as proof of the fact that there was not opposition to the bill; but the fact of the matter is otherwise. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that when he is pretending to the house that I am in agreement with him on anything, he be very sure of his facts. I say that on this occasion the only circumstance under which there could be any truth in the statement which the minister made and from which I have just quoted is if he is referring to two amendments that were made to this bill in committee of the whole in 1951; I refer to amendments introduced by the opposition. I see the minister is nodding his agreement. I am glad to see that he has got straightened out on that matter, because that is the only point at which I recall that we have been in agreement on this measure at any stage. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, those amendments were introduced by the opposition. They had so much reason and cogency behind them that the government accepted two of them; there were others they did not accept. But that is the only place where I found myself in agreement with the Minister of Justice.

What did happen in 1951? It was quite evident at the time that there was a variety of opinions in the house. It is also evident that opinions have changed in certain quarters very considerably since then. We had evidence on February 6 that the view taken by the C.C.F. members with reference to this measure has changed drastically since the debate in 1951. But I want to recall this fact. The minister will not find, in any of the contributions I made to the debate on this measure in 1951, any support for this measure; and I spoke on it on three occasions.

I have said there were differing opinions in 1951. The Minister of Justice sought to content himself with references to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition in 1951, at the resolution stage, before the Leader of the Opposition or any of us had seen the text of this measure. Well, the Leader of the Opposition did speak on the subject of the emergency, and he did agree that it was not proper to invoke powers under the War Measures Act. But, Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition saw the text of this bill, he expressed a very different point of view in this house. Let me make this quite clear at once. The Leader of the Opposition was not here during the debate on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Sinnott: He is not here today, either.

Mr. Fleming: He was not here on that occasion.

An hon. Member: Where is he now?

Mr. Fleming: He is attending a funeral, if the questioner wants to know in his insensible way.

When the Leader of the Opposition was here, and had the opportunity of participating in this debate, it was then that he called for a division on this bill. This bill passed third reading on division, and the record so shows. The minister cannot deny that.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Is he arguing that his party is incapable of forming an opinion on the second reading of the bill in the absence of their leader?

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has attempted to make a curious suggestion. It is not one that many members of the house would make. I will say to him that I am giving him the reason why he does not find on the record any speech by the Leader of the Opposition during second reading. Had the Leader of the Opposition been here, he would have taken precisely the position on second reading that he took on third reading. The members of the opposition who did speak on this measure on second reading were the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and myself. We did seek to give the house reasons why the house should not approve a measure of this kind. We did our best to point out flaws in this bill, and the position of the opposition is shown on third reading where it is recorded that the measure was given third reading on division.

Let us go forward now to 1952. Here again the Minister of Justice distorted the facts out of all recognition during his speech last night. What he said was that this measure was unanimously approved in 1952. It was no such thing, Mr. Speaker. What happened was this. The Leader of the Opposition spoke on this measure at some length. He spoke very strongly against this measure, and pointed out the danger to the supremacy of parliament involved in the extension of such legislation. Nothing could have been more explicit than the reasons for the strong opposition he voiced against this bill. I have to take some personal responsibility for what happened on that occasion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) followed the Leader of the Opposition, and he had spoken for about twenty-five minutes before the six o'clock adjournment. I had expected to follow him. At six o'clock he indicated that he would be just a few more minutes, but he did not indicate to me that he was going to stop in a matter of five minutes.

The fact of the matter is that when I arrived in this house, at five minutes after eight o'clock after having attended to some business in the Hansard offices on the way down which could not be attended to earlier, I arrived in the house with an armful of books and papers with the intention of speaking. It was our intention also that, if the opportunity presented itself, there would be a division forced. I found that the member for Winnipeg North Centre had finished off his speech in record time, and the house had passed on to the next item of business. I take personal responsibility for the fact that the house was not divided on that occasion, because I had a speech prepared for that occasion, much of which I am going to give today. It is for that reason that there was no formal division on this measure in 1952. The Leader of the Opposition did state, however, in the plainest terms, the position of His Majesty's opposition, which was a position diametrically opposed to the continuation of this measure. No fair-minded member of this house can or dare attempt to read the speech of the Leader of the Opposition to any other effect than that.

Now, it is interesting to note that if the Prime Minister had followed the course of giving time enough to offer the house some information on this measure, one would have liked to know, for instance, why it was that in 1952 what was brought in was simply a resolution in pursuance of section 4 of the bill to extend the first three sections of the act for a period of one year? There was not a resolution, and no statement in advance concerning the approval of the Governor General, so far as I am aware. It was a motion for an address and there was a one-stage discussion. Had it been the case that we have this year, with a resolution introduced leading up to a bill, you may be sure there would not have been one division but several divisions on the measure at the successive stages. Last year there was only one stage to this measure. This year there is to be an opportunity to divide this house on all the stages of the measure, and I think that the appetite of the Minister of Justice for divisions will be satisfied before the house has disposed of this measure.

Much has been heard, Mr. Speaker, of the word "emergency" in this debate. If there is one word in the vocabulary of this government that has been worked to death, it is that word "emergency". I have been in this house eight years, beginning with the fall session of 1945. In every session in that period we have had to deal with legislation arising out of what the government has called an emergency. There has been a great succession of emergency measures, the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act and the Emergency Powers Act. With each extension of these measures year by year there has been some legislation introduced under the guise of an emergency. I have been looking over the general files I have on the subject of "emergency", and I find that I have already accumulated half a drawer full of files relating to the debates on these measures the government has been introducing year by year on this subject. The result has always been the same. The government has come out of these debates with extraordinary powers; that has been the purpose they had in mind in promoting this legislation.

The house will understand more clearly than ever before that the result of the decision of the privy council in the Nolan case is that once parliament declares that there is in existence an emergency, the courts will not make any inquiry whatever into the truth of that statement. No longer can those who value freedom, no longer can those who respect the constitution of Canada depend upon the courts to inquire into a statement of that kind, no matter how erroneous it may be. No longer do the courts afford any hope whatever of redress in matters of this kind. Such a statement in legislation passed by this parliament is now to be taken as conclusive so far as the courts are concerned.

The Supreme Court of Canada did not go that far, sir, but the Minister of Justice, after having denounced appeals to the privy council as a badge of colonialism, took an appeal to the privy council and has come out of it with such a doctrine as this. In the hands of the majority of parliament they virtually have the right to destroy the constitution of this country and the rights and privileges of Canadians if they choose to do so. In other words, Mr. Speaker, whenever parliament itself declares the existence of an emergency all constitutional power in this country flows to parliament just by reason of that parliamentary ipse dixit. The courts are left in a strait-jacket. It remains for parliament, and parliament alone, to address itself to the propriety of this question.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, the third one.

Mr. Garson: Does he deny that there is, in fact, the emergency of apprehended war in Canada?

Mr. Fleming: If the Minister of Justice will possess his soul in patience, he will have my views on that subject. In the meantime, I can assure him that I am going to take up the points he dealt with, and I shall deal with them fully without the necessity for any interruption from the raucous chorus section over there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the measure under discussion, in section 2, we have a reference to the existing international emergency which parliament declared in 1951; and when we of the opposition on that occasion, as on previous occasions, urged that the emergency so-called should be described and defined in the legislation, and that only powers commensurate with the emergency should be asked for by the government, we were met with the refusal to spell out in the legislation itself the nature of the emergency. The Minister of Justice has to refer now to the statement made in the house in the debate by the Prime Minister to find his evidence of the existence of this international emergency.

Well, now, on whatever ground the government sought to support the alleged existence of the emergency when the debate on that measure began in 1951 it became quite apparent, before the debate on the measure was concluded, that the ground upon which the majority of the members of this house were supporting such legislation, as I read the debates, was the threat of inflation. Now that may have arisen partly out of government policies following Korea, but partly only. Nevertheless it was inflation that absorbed the attention of most hon. members in this house during the course of that debate. Let us not forget that, Mr. Speaker, in approaching the question whether there was or is now a state of apprehended war.

Last night the Minister of Justice did clarify one thing at least. He did make it quite clear at least that the government now says that the emergency that exists today—not the one referred to in the preamble to the bill that existed in 1951, although I think his words could be properly applied retroactively to 1951, in view of what he said last night—is a state of apprehended war. His remarks on that are quite clear.

The government has been very squeamish up till now about making any such statement but the minister did come out last night with an interesting doctrine, when he expounded the idea that the War Measures Act could be invoked now. Do we realize fully what that means? No member of the opposition has at any time, with reference to this measure in 1951, 1952 or now, said that the government should invoke the War Measures Act. Nobody has said that; nobody proposes that. But the Minister of Justice has said that a state of apprehended war does exist and it follows as the night the day from that statement that the War Measures Act could in their view be invoked by the government.

I do not share the view that the Minister of Justice has expounded. I do say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Garson: Your leader did in 1951. He said it in the debate in 1951.

Mr. Fleming: The Leader of the Opposition in 1951 said that the government ought not to invoke the War Measures Act. He opposed it very strenuously. He said in 1951 it would be quite improper for the government to invoke the War Measures Act, and the Minister of Justice has agreed with that. I say, Mr. Speaker, and we of the official opposition say, that no such emergency exists as justifies this parliament in preserving this measure or continuing the extraordinary powers it confers on the government.

The emergency that does exist in Canada today is to a considerable extent of the government's own creation. I know the emergency the government has created in the pocketbooks of the taxpayers.

Let us examine, sir, the powers under this bill and what the Minister of Justice had to say in relation to the powers. He said last night—and he should have known much better if he had read the bill—that this bill confers "certain specified emergency powers" on the government, and he sought to make a point of great distinction between this bill and the War Measures Act. Well, Mr. Speaker, anyone who examines the language of these two measures will not find that what is conferred by this bill upon the government are certain specified emergency powers.

What is it that this bill confers upon the government? Sir, the language of section 2 is clear:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existing international emergency deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

Can you imagine any language any broader than that? That is the identical language of the War Measures Act. The only difference between that general provision in section 2 of this act and the War Measures Act is that this bill refers to the existing international emergency; whereas the War Measures Act refers to invasion, insurrection, war, real or apprehended. That is the only difference. The powers are the same up to that point. And beyond that point what does this bill say? The present measure goes on:

> . . . and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

And then the language that follows, with the exception of one clause, Mr. Speaker, is a repetition of the language verbatim of the War Measures Act. Therefore, let us not be deluded by the kind of nonsense we heard last night from the Minister of Justice. The only point at which the powers conferred by this act can be distinguished from the powers conferred by the War Measures Act is in section 2 of this bill which purports to except from the breadth of the powers conferred upon the governor in council certain designated exceptions. I remind you, sir, these are only three in number, and one of them, the most important of the three, was put in on the pleas of the opposition in 1951. So let us not be misled by silly talk such as we heard from the minister last night.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, there were time in this debate to review the bill and the breadth of the powers that are enjoyed by the government under this measure, powers virtually without limit. The limits, the only powers that are excepted, are arrest, except as incidental to proceedings under section 3, detention, exclusion or deportation of any person; censorship or the control and suppression of publications; expenditure of money other than in accordance with an appropriation by parliament. Apart from that, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to confer upon the government absolute legislative power in Canada, without limit, abatement or limitation. That is just how broad this measure is. It is absolute apart from a few relatively insignificant exceptions. It is absolute; it is the conferring of sovereign power upon the government. That is what this bill is and nothing less.

What has the government said? Well, they said they have not made much use of it, therefore let them have it again. Is that a reason for extending these grand and absolute powers to the government, the fact that even in the midst of all their outpourings on the subject of the existence of an international emergency they have not been able to show any greater reason for it than they have? And let us examine those occasions a little more closely. If we do we will find in the first year of the existence of this measure there were 19 orders passed under it. During the passing of every one of these measures this parliament was in session. I do not say that parliament was sitting every day, because parliament did not sit in July and August, 1951. But parliament was sitting that year from January 30 to December 29. Therefore we are faced with this situation. Every one of these 19 measures was passed while parliament was in session, and yet this government tells us that they must have these powers to legislate while parliament is in session. What is parliament for, if not to legislate? Why should parliament make a travesty of our obligations and our duties today to those who sent us here by handing over to twenty men opposite the power to legislate while parliament is in session? Sir, it is unthinkable if you have any respect whatever for our responsibilities as a sovereign parliament of the Canadian people.

What happened in this past year? The Minister of Justice pointed out this afternoon, as did the Leader of the Opposition in his speech of February 6, that five orders in council had been passed during the whole of last year. And I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that parliament was sitting while three of these five orders were passed. Of the other two, one was a measure to revoke a previous order in council. Then the minister says: These are so important, do not deprive us of our absolute powers. We must have them. But what do we find? How important are these? One of these measures has to do with the amount of steel that can be put in the coining of a five-cent piece. Is this the kind of measure that justifies the assertion that a state of national or international emergency exists, or that justifies the handing over by parliament of sovereign and absolute powers to twenty men? I say it is not.

Out of his own mouth the Minister of Justice has given away the whole case the government apparently hoped to make. And it is not the first time. Now, if this is an emergency, is there any occasion for a reenactment of this measure? I say there is not; because there are already on the statute books ample powers—yes, more than ample—to meet any situation the government is likely to be confronted with.

I would like to read in full the provisions of the Essential Materials (Defence) Act, passed at the second session in 1950. It is chapter 6, and I draw attention particularly to sections 3 and 4. You will find there a conferring upon the governor in council of very extensive powers to—> —do and authorize such acts and things and make from time to time such orders and regulations as he deems necessary for the purposes of this act to control and regulate the production, processing, distribution, acquisition, disposition or use of essential materials or the supply or use of essential services.

Mr. Speaker, it is left largely to the government to say what are essential services, and what are essential materials. And the enumeration of the powers that follows shows that the government already has virtually absolute power with respect to what may be considered as essential materials or essential services.

And that is not the only measure of the kind; because if hon. members will refer to the Defence Production Act, which is in the 1951 statutes, chapter 4, they will see in section 15 what are virtually absolute powers given to this government with reference to the whole matter of defence production. I just wish there were time to put on the record the terms of that legislation. And for any government to say, after considering that legislation, that they need more power, is to confess that what this government is interested in is one thing, and one thing only, and that is to possess absolute and untrammelled legislative powers.

Sir, it will be the same thing next year. The Minister of Justice was at pains last night to tell us that this was a continuing emergency, and that it might go on and on. This emergency will go on, you may be sure of it, so long as this government is in office; because if by any chance an election should not be held before May 31, 1954, you may be sure that this government will be back again within that time asking for an extension of these absolute powers. And they will be telling us again that there is an emergency. Certainly, there will continue to be an emergency as long as this government is in office.

An hon. Member: So long as you are here.

Mr. Fleming: This measure raises directly the whole question of the relationship between parliament and the government. It raises directly the whole question of the constitution, and the rather tenuous hold that the provinces possess now upon their legislative powers under the British North America Act.

Our position in this official opposition is crystal clear. We say that it is in parliament that legislating should be done, not behind closed doors or by secret methods such as has been the case with orders in council. And as to the relationship between the dominion and the provinces, we point out that the doctrine expounded in this house last night by the Minister of Justice means just this, that the provinces hold their legislative and constitutional powers in this country today simply at the whim of this government; and that the moment this government decides to invoke a particular measure, then all legislative power flows to Ottawa; and under a measure of this kind, it then flows on through parliament into the hands of the government.

There is a vicious combination. That is the extent to which constitutional government in this country is confronted with peril, both in the House of Commons and throughout the country. And we will not forget that along with this filching of legislative power by this government at the expense of the provinces, and in violation of the constitution, they have gone on at the same time changing the constitution by the extent to which they have been absorbing all tax revenues. In 1939 the dominion government took 51 per cent of the tax dollar in Canada. In 1951, just twelve years later, they took 77 per cent.

I wish to sum this matter up in this way: Parliament, historically, is the champion of the rights of the people. Let parliament transfer its powers to a group called the cabinet, who meet in secret, and Mr. Speaker, you have done more to place in jeopardy the rights of Canadian citizens than by any other action I know of. You are paving the way for a situation where the government can destroy the rights of the people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A modern star chamber.

Mr. Fleming: A modern star chamber, indeed. We see here once again an expression of that mentality which was so clearly exposed in this chamber two years ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he said, with a jeer, "If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?" Well, if this government derives a continuation through this measure of absolute and untrammelled powers, then there will be nothing that can stop this government. This measure presents the whole question of responsible government as an inescapable issue in this house. Notwithstanding the extent to which the Prime Minister outside the house rhapsodizes about the virtues of our parliamentary system we are faced in this measure with what can be the death knell of our parliamentary system.

In such a measure we have a marrying of three dangerous circumstances under the mischievous doctrine expounded last night by the Minister of Justice: First the doctrine that apprehended war exists and that, therefore, under the constitution, all power flows to Ottawa—from which flows the corollary that the provincial legislatures and the courts are powerless—

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege.

Mr. Fleming: I have only a moment more.

Mr. Speaker: A point of privilege has been raised.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quoting me quite falsely. I never said any such thing as that which he has just said. What I said was that, not under the constitution, but under the War Measures Act passed by a Conservative government under Sir Robert Borden, in a condition of apprehended war, these powers go to the government. That is not what the hon. member has said.

Mr. Fleming: When the Minister of Justice talks about apprehending he had better apprehend things better himself, because he has just misapprehended what I said, just as he has misapprehended everything that went on in 1951 and 1952.

What I said was that the Minister of Justice expounded last night the doctrine that a state of apprehended war exists; and therefore I say that under the constitution, and in the light of what he said last night, all power—all legislative power—flows to Ottawa, and that the provincial legislatures and the courts of this country are powerless, in the light of what the privy council has held, to stop or prevent that flow of legislative power to Ottawa—given the circumstances that the minister expounded last night.

Mr. Garson: Again on a point of privilege. My hon. friend is incorrect in what he says. What I said was that legislative powers flow there by virtue of the War Measures Act, and for no other reason.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, it flows from what the government has said as to the extent of the emergency which now exists; because this government has declared, through the mouth of the Minister of Justice, that this situation does exist today, which gives the governor in council power to invoke the War Measures Act.

That being the case, then it follows as night follows day that under the Nolan decision of the privy council neither the provincial legislatures nor the courts of this land will have any powers to prevent the flow of absolute power from the provinces to Ottawa.

The second circumstance in this dangerous combination is that parliament is being invited by this bill to transfer virtually all its legislative powers, thus swollen, to the cabinet.

There is still a third circumstance. While it may not exist much longer, we have here a government which loves power and which is determined to hold on to it at all costs, as is evidenced by the conduct of the Prime Minister in this debate and his great impatience over words of criticism.

That is the situation created by this dangerous combination. You have present all the elements that are needed to transform Canadian democracy into a dictatorship and Canadian confederation into a unitary form of government.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, following the debate on February 6 we in this group are going to oppose the passage of this resolution. We did not make that decision until the debate had gone on for some time. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) did not give us the advantage of speaking on that day and explaining why the government wanted the Emergency Powers Act continued. Even if he had I do not think we would have arrived at any other decision.

The Minister of Justice seems to be very good at interrupting and interjecting when speeches are being made by members of the opposition. It seems to me that he excels in that regard, but when it came to making his case as to why the government should have this measure passed he was not as good.

When we supported the Emergency Powers Act in 1951 we hoped that the government might use it to prevent runaway inflation. We hoped that the government would use it to impose controls and prevent the cost of living from increasing so rapidly. The government did not use it in that regard and we see no reason to believe that the government will use this measure even though a similar inflation recurs. And further at the present time we are not faced with inflation; we seem to be faced with the possibility of a recession.

I listened yesterday to the Minister of Justice and I listened to him today. I do not really know why the government wants this measure. He said, "We are in an emergency; the world is in an emergency." He then went to Morocco, South America and Malaya and told us that there were emergencies there and that therefore Canada must have an Emergency Powers Act.

If the government needs the Emergency Powers Act it must be because the ordinary peacetime methods of obtaining legislation are inadequate. I do not think that that is the case at all. This house is now in session for the major part of any given year. It seems to be the practice when a session is finished for the government to adjourn parliament and have the members on call. With modern transportation facilities and means of communication parliament can be called together in a matter of twenty-four or forty-eight hours to pass the kind of legislation for which the Emergency Powers Act is now being used.

I have not gone over all these orders in council, but the minister has placed them in three categories. He said that there were orders in council passed for the time being; that is a certain class. Surely these "time being" orders could be dealt with by parliament. Then he said that other orders revoked orders that had been passed in the past. They would seem to be "time being" orders also. They are temporary measures. If those measures are necessary, surely parliament can deal with them by passing the necessary legislation in the ordinary way.

The minister went on to say that there were two exceptions. I did not hear the one, but the other had to do with great lakes security regulations. He said that he did not want that written into the main body of law because it would suggest permanency. It seems to me that such a condition could have been overcome in ordinary legislation. If the government did not want legislation to be on a permanent basis they could have provided for it to expire after one year. Then if the government felt that power was needed after that given time parliament could be asked to approve an extension.

As has been mentioned a number of times, surely it was no great emergency that caused the government to reduce the nickel content of the Canadian five-cent piece. That would not seem to be a world-shaking emergency which would require the Emergency Powers Act.

Another way in which this act was used was to deal with the weigh-over provided by the Canada Grain Act. I notice that that order in council was passed on Wednesday, September 26, 1951, and two weeks later parliament was in session. This kind of legislation would lead any government, composed as it is of human beings, into inefficiency and carelessness. They might say, "Oh, well, we will not have to pass legislation at this session to deal with something that might happen after the session is over because we have the Emergency Powers Act and if anything comes up we will do it under that act".

Looking over the orders in council to which the government has referred, as far as I can see, with the exception of the secret one about which I know nothing, they all could have been done by legislation brought before parliament in the ordinary way. I do not see any reason why we in this house should allow the government to take over the legislative functions that should be the prerogative of parliament.

It seemed to me that in the argument the minister made last night he was threatening us. He said, "If you do not give us the broad powers we want we will use the War Measures Act". He was holding that threat of using the War Measures Act over the heads of members of parliament. He was saying, "If you do not give us these wide powers under this act we have the other measure that could be used, so you have to support us anyway".

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, I think my hon. friend will admit on reflection that I conveyed no threats, express or implied, in any remarks that I made. What I said was that if the powers under the Emergency Powers Act were not granted and facts arose which made it necessary to act promptly, we would be forced in the absence of the Emergency Powers Act to use the War Measures Act.

Mr. Argue: I do not think I have wrongly interpreted the minister. If he did say, as he now says he did, that they could use it, if an emergency arose, why then did he say initially in his speech that we are now in the emergency of an apprehended war? I will read what the minister did say, as found in the last paragraph of the first column on page 2082 of Hansard for yesterday. He said:

> Now, that being the case, it seems to me—and I offer this suggestion with great respect—that actually those members of the opposition who have said they were in favour of restricting the powers of the executive and of protecting the civil rights of the subject, and of upholding the supremacy of parliament, must support the extension of this bill. If they do not do so, then the position would be that the powers that are now available to the government under the War Measures Act in the present emergency of apprehended war are much more extensive and under less parliamentary control than those which are available under the Emergency Powers Act. We can exercise those War Measures Act powers without coming to parliament at all.

I will let that stand as the minister has stated it; but if it means anything at all it means that if we do not pass this measure, if parliament does not give the government this legislation, then, because the minister claims we are in a state of apprehended war, the government is going to use the War Measures Act. I think the Minister of Justice should be a little more careful in his terminology when he calls the present emergency an emergency of apprehended war. In introducing this measure in 1951 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that anything that was said in the house should not lead the Canadian people to believe that we were likely soon to be faced with an all-out war. He said that kind of thing should not be done. I suggest to the minister that the type of speech he made yesterday and today implies a far greater emergency than actually exists.

I for one do not believe that we are facing the immediate possibility of a global war. I will not admit that. I am certainly no lawyer but I would think if we are in a state of apprehended war it should be clear to the majority of members in the house that we are likely to be facing a global war very shortly, in a matter of days or in a matter of hours. The minister shakes his head. Perhaps that just proves that I am not a lawyer. In any case, from the point of view of a layman reading the statement of the minister, I think the minister made the present emergency appear to be greater than the actual emergency that exists.

I do not mean by what I have said that we are not facing a substantial emergency throughout the world. I know that, but I do not think it is an emergency of apprehended war at the moment. As I have said, as far as I can see from reading the minister's speech, and from the way the legislation has been used, everything the government wants to do could be done by parliament in the ordinary way by the government bringing down legislation to deal with particular problems, and that is the way parliament should function at the present time.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to express a personal view with respect to these matters, but I think I can judge fairly well that what I am about to say will represent the attitude that the Social Credit group takes with regard to this measure. Fundamentally and basically we believe in freedom. I think the minister does. Perhaps we would all say that we believe in freedom. Freedom is a principle, and as a principle it is basic to our democratic way of life. If we believe in the principle of freedom as being basic to our democratic way of life, where does the measure before us lead us? Is it not a reversal of that principle of freedom?

We hear a lot about democracy. We hear a lot about our parliamentary institution and our democratic way of life. I think that sometimes those terms need to be defined, but nevertheless we accept in a general way the fact that we are still a democracy. What is needed in this nation and in many of the free nations is not only the window dressing of democracy but an effective democracy. What we need is legislation that will make democracy effective. I have expressed my views on this matter before in the house. The general conception is that democracy is the expression of the will of the people but in actual practice it appears to me that democracy works about one day every four or five years. It works when the people have the opportunity of putting a little piece of paper in a box we call the ballot box. They walk away and from then on democracy ceases to be democracy in practice.

I agree with what the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) have said with respect to democracy, but I go a step further. The question I would ask is simply this: Is our parliamentary system today, in its operation side by side with the political party system, as effectively democratic as it should be? I know that technically and legally our parliamentary institution is democratic but in actual practice I doubt very much whether it is effectively democratic. Instead of the minister bringing in a measure asking parliament to grant more powers to the cabinet, I should like to see him bringing in a bill that would give a little more power to parliament than it has and make parliament reflect the true democratic principle upon which our way of life is built.

I believe that the measure now before us takes away from parliament the rights and the dignity that are expected of it. It is a reversal of the rights and the dignity of parliament itself. Dictators rise, plunge and rule and take the free nations into slavery. How can they do that? They can do that only when free nations lose the power of their democracy. This has largely been done in places where democracy has not functioned effectively. Power placed in the hands of governments depreciates and, I would say, nullifies the power of the people. The people themselves have placed the privilege of exercising their power, at least in legislative functions, in the hands of their elected representatives. Might I say this. In reality the people did not elect this government. The people elected this parliament.

Mr. Fleming: This House of Commons.

Mr. Hansell: What we are asked to do in this measure is to take the power of the people and place it in the hands of eighteen or twenty men who were not elected as a government by the people. To my mind that is really a serious thing, particularly when we already have on the statute books what is known as the War Measures Act.

I am not going to enter into any legal exactitudes as to the difference between the War Measures Act and the Emergency Powers Act. That is meat for the lawyers and I am not one. Instead of dealing with the legal aspects of this thing, I like to deal with the philosophic aspects of it. I like to deal with the principle of it rather than the legal technicalities of it. The principle is this. Are we going to have an effective democracy that will reflect the freedom of the people, or are we going to place powers in the hands of a centralized body?

I again deplore the party system which largely renders parliament ineffective. I know that individual members have their arguments; but you do not sit in this parliament very long before you discover that what we really have is democracy in reverse. I am now talking about how it works out in practice. Instead of this parliament having a free hand and passing such legislation as parliament desires to pass and then saying to the government, "This is the people's wish; you are the executive body that should administer it," it works in the very opposite way. The government have the legislation. They have already decided upon it. They bring it down and they say, "We want you to make it legal". That is what is happening.

I must say that, as we sit here year in and year out, we have a tendency to feel that it is a sort of futile proposition. I walk down the corridor and meet a member who says to me, "Who is up?" I feel like saying, "Up where? Up a tree?" Then there is a mental action that takes place in my mind and I say to myself, "Why does he ask who is up? What difference does it make anyway?" That is the situation. Just what difference does it make? We come here and we speak. We talk. But governments have already decided. As a result of our party system it does not make any difference, Mr. Speaker, who wins the argument. We call this debate. Who is to be the judge as to who wins the debate? In our debating societies we have judges, debates are judged on certain points, and a decision is rendered.

Mr. Jeffery: The people decide that.

Mr. Hansell: What did somebody say?

Mr. Fraser: That the people decide that.

Mr. Hansell: The people decide who wins? I am just going to suggest that almost half the people in my friend's constituency do not know whether he is in Ottawa or in some other place.

Mr. Fraser: Timbuctoo.

Mr. Hansell: Maybe they do not care. The people decide who wins the debate? It is won already. I know how this debate is going to be decided.

Mr. Fleming: The government will crack the whip again.

Mr. Hansell: It is going to be decided in favour of the bill. I know that now.

An hon. Member: Do not waste time.

Mr. Hansell: It does not make any difference what arguments I may put up.

Mr. Fulton: They may win the vote but they will not win the debate. They are two different things.

Mr. Hansell: There is a point there. My friend the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) points out that there is a slight difference between the vote and the debate. He says they may win the vote but they will not win the debate. That raises another serious point. What is going to happen is this. There is going to be an overwhelming vote for those who have lost the debate.

Mr. Fulton: That is right. It happens all the time.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member says it happens all the time. No one will say that my friend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) or the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton)—I might go around further but I am not sufficiently acquainted with all their professions—are not able to debate. These men are lawyers. I have heard them speak in debate here. They have clever legal minds. No one will say that they are not able to debate. They certainly are able to do so. We are going to tell them that they are already decided against. We get our names in the paper. Somebody is built up as being a great and mighty force in this parliament. But oh, if people only knew! Now what we are being asked to do is to make the thing a great deal worse.

Mr. Speaker, I like to cast my eyes your way, surrounded as you are with all the dignity of that hand-carved chair and of these walls. The tourists come in and the constables say: "You see that ceiling there? It is made of linen, hand-painted with 22-karat gold leaf. The chair was donated by the British parliament and is all hand-carved." The Speaker walks in here attired as he should be in his robes and little three-cornered hat. There we have all that dignity. What for? Mr. Speaker, you have a high position. I like to think of it as being analogous to the status of a judge. The only difference is this. The judge administers the law and you preside over that body which makes the law. It is a high office; but in reality, Mr. Speaker, I think all that you are is the chairman of a debating society which in the end never wins the debate by a vote. Be that as it may, what we are asked to do in this measure is to give the government more power. You cannot give them more power without releasing it from yourself. You cannot retain power and give it away at the same time. When they ask parliament to give them more power, then they are asking parliament to retain less power. You cannot have it both ways. There are no legal technicalities involved there; that is just plain common sense. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot support this measure.

I believe that under the War Measures Act there is plenty of power to act in a war emergency or what has been termed as apprehended war. I do long for the day when we can really have an effective democracy in Canada which will, at all times, reflect the will of the people. Furthermore, I am going to say this. Just as long as we continue the way we are, the less interest will the people of the country take in their parliamentary institution.

Mr. Mott: Like B.C., where private members cannot speak.

Mr. Fulton: We have not heard from that side.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to hear some of the private members on the government side once in a while if they dare open their mouths.

Mr. Hansell: Democracy, as an effective instrument in Canada, is not becoming stronger. I am afraid that the people themselves, Mr. Speaker, are losing the consciousness they should have of their parliamentary institution. I am afraid that what we need in Canada is legislation that will strengthen in the minds of our people the appearance of our parliamentary institution in the world as an institution for an effective democracy. How often do we hear people talk about politics being dirty. There should be no reason for that. To some people politics is something to be abhorred; that should not be. The actual meaning of the word "politics" is simply the science of government. It should be a thing in which the people are extremely interested at all times. They will not be interested unless we can reflect from this parliament something that is effective, something that will make the people realize that when they send a man to parliament he is going to look after their interests when legislation is introduced.

Why do we talk in this house about a free vote? Why do we say that? Why do we occasionally jump up and ask, "Will the minister permit a free vote"? To me, that is a terrible thing. It is an indictment upon this parliament, and the indictment is that we are not free as we should be. I say that what we need is not legislation giving the government more power; what we need is legislation to bring our parliamentary institution to a place where the power is in the hands of the people through their representatives.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I would not have taken part in this debate, had it not been for the eulogistic remarks made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) last night concerning the small contribution that I had offered previously. Never in my life had my wildest dreams led me to believe that the Minister of Justice would have referred to my humble effort as "excellent" and as a classic description of certain affairs. However, I was merely endeavouring to clarify a situation which I found confused, and which I think had been confused very largely by the conflicting statements which have been made by the members of the government at various times.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had repeatedly declared that we were not engaged in a war but that, as a member of the United Nations, we were engaged in a police action in Korea. A few days ago, on February 16, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was asked a definite question as to whether or not we were at war. He replied, as recorded at page 1962 of Hansard for that date, as follows:

> . . . we have never declared or proclaimed a state of war. We are fighting in Korea and the fighting there certainly is tough.

At other times the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has referred to the twilight situation in which we now find ourselves. Then again he has referred to the fact that we do, in fact, agree—the "we" being the government—that war is being waged in Korea. He went on to explain that young Canadians would not volunteer for action in Korea, offering their lives, if they did consider it as an ordinary police action. I did, therefore, endeavour to point out to the house such an emergency as I thought existed at the present time, and that was the reason and origin of the remarks that I offered. I am very much indebted to the Minister of Justice for the rather exaggerated and over-complimentary remarks he made regarding that offer.

I should like to offer a few words regarding this Emergency Powers Act which, so far as I can tell, has the purpose of submitting to the executive powers which are usually retained and exercised by parliament itself. This is not the kind of legislation which, in a country which is operating under a democratic system, a government really enjoys, because as has been said repeatedly this afternoon it provides a way for the cabinet to make decisions behind closed doors where there have not been free discussions amongst the various groups having different shades of opinion. Discussion of this type can be made public through the reports in the press and the reports of Hansard, so that the general public may decide on the merits or demerits of the legislation which is brought forward under these orders in council.

This legislation provides certain powers which, once they have been conceded, very quickly become deep-rooted, which the minister and the cabinet are very disinclined to realize. It confers those powers upon the cabinet to deal with matters, as has been explained during this debate, touching a great many aspects of the life of this nation. The desire to have those powers seems to me to conform with the pattern, to the danger of which I have in the past called attention. The grave danger this country faces is that we are allowing ourselves to drift into a one-party form of government.

A few days ago I called attention to a very remarkable book entitled "The Passing of Parliament" by Professor Keeton. My remarks drew some attention from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who took advantage of a nation-wide broadcast to quote something that I was reported as having said, and what I actually did say, namely that in some respects we have travelled a long way on the road to Moscow. The Secretary of State for External Affairs in commenting over the network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation said:

> The Canadian people will certainly be interested to learn that that grim despot, our modest and respected Prime Minister, is leading them to the Kremlin.

Well, of course, never in my life did I suggest that anybody in his right mind would think that the Prime Minister was a grim despot. At the same time, modest people can blindly stumble on the wrong road that is not always clear. They do not always know whither they are going, and I do suggest that the road we have stumbled upon now, with many twistings and turnings, will eventually lead us into the kind of government which is exercised in Russia, if we follow it to the conclusion toward which it seems to me to be heading.

In that book to which I have referred the second chapter is headed "The Road to Moscow". The author points out certain elements which are the first requisites of a dictatorship. He enumerates those basic elements in this way:

> 1. A one-party organization in which, although there is wide power of criticism within the party, no external opposition is tolerated.
> 2. An all-powerful executive, which can put into effect the program decided upon by the party, without substantial impediment or modification, especially that which might emanate from an independent parliament.
> 3. An economy which is moulded within the framework of a comprehensive plan, and in which all the more significant activities are government monopolies subservient only to executive control.

One might specify these three elements as being the growth of despotism, the machinery of dictatorship, and the delegation of administration to public corporations and administrative tribunals. I do suggest that those elements perhaps exist in this country today. I am not going to say that we have entirely a one-party organization as yet, but there is a great desire to see the present government and the party which supports the present government continue forever. The supporters of this party believe their government is infallible, and they do resent, as has been shown quite recently, criticism from the opposition. It is very hard for them to tolerate criticism, even though it is offered in a good-natured and a constructive manner.

Secondly, this very act emphasizes the power of the executive, which was the second requisite mentioned by Professor Keeton before a dictatorship could be introduced. One must also remember that we are fast losing the effectiveness of a second chamber, in that through the natural course of events the opposition in the second chamber is numerically very, very weak.

I do not think it is necessary to comment upon the fast-growing number of government monopolies and administrative tribunals which today are strangling some of our industries. This situation does exist in this country, and it is high time the people realize the danger of following the road which we have easily and inadvertently stumbled upon, the road to Moscow, the road which leads eventually—perhaps it is a long way off—to the form of government which we dislike so intensely, the form of government that is practised in Soviet Russia.

In fact we have taken the first steps on that road. It would be quite easy to follow it along and slip from the present position into an even keener and more intense dictatorship. Therefore I feel that at the present moment we are living on the edge of a dictatorship, and that the transition from this present stage, if we have many more bills such as this emergency powers bill introduced, will be swift and easy.

Mr. A. H. Jeffery (London): I do not think I would be fair to my constituents, to myself or to my profession, if I did not rise in this debate and say that the indignation of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is second only to mine with regard to this type of legislation. I believe any government is inclined to take the easy way of getting things done, and I think it is no excuse to say that no government will abuse the power. However, though I do not approve of this act, nevertheless I would hate to see any government—and believe me I have all the faith in the world in this government—using the War Measures Act at this time.

I will not be voting against this measure for the reason that this bill is to be put into effect between May, 1953 and May, 1954. In my opinion in that period there is bound to be an election. That means there will be 60 days when this parliament will not or cannot be in session.

Mr. Garson: Not even in existence.

Mr. Jeffery: Cannot be called; yes. For that reason I feel we should pass this measure, and should not leave it to the War Measures Act. There is too much power there. If there is no apprehended war, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has said, then we cannot use the War Measures Act. I think we must return to the Emergency Powers Act so that, for the 60 or more days during the calling of an election, the government can carry on with the current emergency, and other emergencies that might arise.

Mr. Fleming: Would the hon. member permit a question, and I ask it seriously. If there should not be an election before May 31, 1954; or if there should be an election and the government of the day should ask for a continuation of this legislation for a further period beyond May 31, 1954, if the hon. member is a member of parliament at that time, will he vote against the continuation of these powers beyond May 31, 1954?

Mr. Jeffery: The hon. member is a lawyer, as I am. I am sure he would not give a definite answer to that question. I will say this, that if there is no more emergency than I see at the present time, and always depending upon circumstances, I would take the stand that I am against this type of legislation.

Mr. Sinclair: May I point out that I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in his basic assumption that this government is going to be the government after the next election.

Mr. Fleming: No such assumption.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister would clear up the point as to whether there is going to be an election, so the hon. member would know how to vote.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: Not you; I was speaking to the minister who might know.

The house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I shall wait until hon. members who are not interested in this measure have found their way out of the chamber. I propose to speak at this stage of the proceedings in connection with the measure because I did not have the opportunity to hear any explanation by the government at an earlier stage before I spoke, when the motion was originally put that the Speaker leave the chair. The Minister of Justice, with the consent of the house, decided to present his views as to why it is expedient that the measure be dealt with. We are now at the second stage in the consideration of the proposal of the government that it is expedient to extend the Emergency Powers Act.

In the committee stage an opportunity will be presented to every member of the house not only to put his opinion before the house with regard to what has already been said, but also to deal with what is really before us for consideration at this time. What we have before us now is a declaration that it is expedient to consider an amendment which will have the effect of extending the Emergency Powers Act. We sought to indicate reasons why members of the house should declare that it is not expedient. The vote that has just been taken was for the purpose of dealing with that declaration. That vote has been taken. We are now in committee. We have the opportunity to ask the government for explanations with regard to the resolution.

Although the Minister of Justice dealt primarily with the measure itself, he did indicate reasons why he thought it was expedient that the act should be extended. Therefore we are called upon to take the vote that has just been counted as a vote by the supporters of the government that in their opinion they wish the Speaker to leave the chair and the house to go into committee to consider the matter. Before we proceed to ask those questions that can be asked in committee, I suggest that it is wise and proper to place before hon. members in committee the reasons why we should not proceed one step further with a course of action which is in direct contravention of every fundamental principle upon which the procedure of this house is founded.

The Minister of Justice has not given one single reason why it is expedient that we should extend the Emergency Powers Act, and he did misinform the house as to what had taken place on earlier occasions. When he says that members of the house unanimously approved of the act he is either in ignorance of what took place or has not been informed as to what the situation actually was. The record is perfectly clear, and I can well remember the impatience of the Minister of Justice upon an earlier occasion at the time some effort was being made to impress upon the government why it was so unwise to proceed with a measure of this kind in the period through which we are now passing.

There is an added reason, however, why the danger of legislation of this kind should be in the mind of every hon. member of the house. Since the act was originally placed on the statute books the government carried a case to the privy council which produced a judgment leaving no doubt about the wide and unrestricted powers of the government under emergency legislation of this kind. The trial court and the Supreme Court of Canada did indicate their opinion that there would be certain restrictions upon the government in its actions under emergency legislation of this nature. The government, which had indicated its disbelief in the privy council, nevertheless carried an appeal to it and from that judicial body obtained a decision which in effect means that once such emergency legislation has been placed upon the statute books of the country, the government may declare an emergency at any time and may make such orders as can be made within the broad framework of that act; that it will not be competent for the courts of the country to challenge the declaration of the government that there is an emergency justifying such conduct, and that it would only be in the most extraordinary circumstances that any order of the government would be declared beyond their powers. In fact it would only be if the government dealt with one of the very limited reservations contained in the act.

The Minister of Justice expressed his opinion that the members of the opposition who have been opposing the legislation had apparently not read it. I think what is apparent is that the members of the opposition have read it, and that they are more conscious of the principles of parliament than is the Minister of Justice whose primary responsibility is to be the custodian of both the traditions and the laws of this land.

The Minister of Justice bases his argument upon a complete and utter fallacy. He says that if we did not have an emergency act of this kind it would be necessary to resort to the War Measures Act. Where is there evidence of any kind before the house at this time that anything has occurred which would make it necessary for the government to resort to the War Measures Act? Where is there the slightest suggestion before this house at this time that, under any conceivable circumstance we can now foresee, it would be necessary for the government to resort to the War Measures Act? It is only necessary to look at what the government did during the past year to see how unnecessary it is for them to resort to the War Measures Act. The things they dealt with were things that never should have been dealt with under emergency legislation at any time. They were things that could and should have been dealt with in this House of Commons, where the members have been sitting for most of the year because of the inefficient way the government has been directing the affairs of parliament throughout the time it has been in office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Yes. The laughter of the members of the other side merely indicates how little they realize how much the business of this house could be expedited by some attempt to bring that business under some orderly procedure which indicated to the members in advance when discussions were going to take place. Instead of that—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman; I am on my feet and I am speaking.

Mr. Garson: —on a point of order—

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to have the Minister of Justice making interruptions constantly, as he does.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the Minister of Justice is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Drew: He did not say so. What is the minister rising on? Is it a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege. My question of privilege is this. I refer to my hon. friend's statement that the points which he is now discussing have not been dealt with. I dealt with them earlier this afternoon when he was at another place, no doubt on an engagement. He therefore should not now be suggesting that they have not been dealt with by the government.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I now find it necessary to deal with the implication left by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the night before last, and that now left by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I dislike doing it, but I am going to tell hon. members that the reason I was out of the house earlier in the week and the reason I was out of the house earlier today was the death of one very dear to the members of my family. I was at a funeral this morning and just got back by air this afternoon in time to come into the house when I did.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I would not want my hon. friend to think I made any implication that it was improper for him to be absent because, as a matter of fact, it was explained in his absence by one of his colleagues that he was attending a funeral. I am simply making the point that at an earlier stage I dealt with those points which he is now discussing. I do so just for his information, so he will not detain the house by going all over them again.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, when I came into the house I ascertained immediately what had occurred. I then took pains to find out what the minister had said; and I would say that he has explained nothing which in any way offers a reason why we should be proceeding with this act at this time.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend would know better if he had been here, but he was not here.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Justice is well aware of the fact that there is a simple procedure by which it is possible for members to ascertain what has been said. I have ascertained what the Minister of Justice said earlier this afternoon; and I repeat that he has placed before this chamber no single argument that supports the proposition now before us, namely that it is expedient to proceed with the extension of this Emergency Powers Act.

I want to emphasize another point in connection with this matter. The minister leaves the impression that we are being told what powers the government would have. He said that if the government wanted to avail themselves of the War Measures Act, they could do so. Of course he has put forward no reason why it would be necessary for them to avail themselves of its provisions. As reported at page 2082 of Hansard, the minister said:

> Instead, we are going to ask parliament to say, in the Emergency Powers Act, just what powers parliament is prepared to give to the government under these present conditions of apprehended war.

Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what the government do not do. The government do not place before us the powers they will have or the details of the powers which they are going to invoke. They introduce an act which is so wide and so general in its terms that the government are able, by the simple procedure of declaring that an emergency exists within the terms of this act, to suspend for all practical purposes the powers of this parliament; and they are able to do something more which has not been sufficiently emphasized in this discussion. They are able to suspend all real authority of the provincial legislatures in Canada, in spite of the authority those legislatures were given under our constitution. Those are the powers that are conferred by this act. It is not enough to say, as was said by one hon. member this afternoon and as other hon. members have said on other occasions, "We have complete confidence in the members of this government".

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member for Fort William says "hear, hear".

Mr. McIvor: Surely; and I mean it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, we hear a chorus of "hear, hears" from Liberal members who seem to forget that the way in which democracy died in country after country was with the declaration by the people of those countries that they trusted the government and were prepared to give them unlimited and unqualified powers for the efficient operation of the affairs of the country at that time. Today people are in slavery in different parts of the world simply because those who forgot the fundamental principles of the parliamentary system were prepared to accord to governments powers under which those governments declared that parliament was no longer necessary.

We are not discussing the intention of any individual member of this government. We are not discussing the possibility that any member of this government would consciously or willingly dispose of all the powers of parliament and of the provincial legislatures. We are dealing with what this act does. We are dealing with what can happen under this act. We say that parliament has no right to delegate to the executive its authority and its responsibility, with the only reservation that the wide and dangerous powers it delegates are going to be exercised by men in whom they have complete confidence. That is not democracy. That is not our parliamentary system. It is time we refreshed our memories as to what this parliamentary system of ours really is.

This parliamentary system of ours is now threatened by the intrusion of dangers which would destroy it and also by the distant clouds being built up by those who, by threat of force if not by force itself, seek to limit the freedom of people throughout the world. This system is being threatened as it has not been threatened in generations, even in the midst of great wars that have passed. This system rests upon two great fundamental principles, namely the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law. Both those principles are challenged by legislation of this kind at a time when we are seeking to carry forward normal democratic processes in Canada today.

The supremacy of parliament is concerned because under this act the executive would have power to do the things parliament should do, even though parliament were sitting, and even though parliament were not sitting but could be brought together within 48 hours with the swift transportation now available. The rule of law is challenged by virtue of the fact that under legislation of this kind no one knows from day to day what the laws will be. The laws are made by orders in council passed behind closed doors, and then people are expected to conform with those laws passed by the executive. These laws only find their way to the public a long time afterwards through the provision that orders in council will later be tabled.

What measure of protection is that? What measure of protection is there in the fact that orders in council which can affect the freedom of the individual, and the economy of this country, are going to be tabled at some later time? Within that period things may have been done which challenge our whole concept of freedom here in Canada. Even those five things that were done under this act last year constituted a serious challenge to our system. Not one of them needed to be done under an emergency act.

Let us recall that one of the things done by the government under this emergency act was to deal with what they regarded as the threat of communism on the great lakes. They decided that, by order in council, they would make provision for the screening of those who are working on the ships in our waters. No one has been more persistent in his demands that we deal with the procedure by which communists seek to undermine our democratic system than I have both in this house and outside. I have never suggested, and I repeat, that communism should be outlawed under that name. I recognize that the easiest thing in the world is to adopt another name for communism, just as the Labour-Progressive party has done in this country and as the various false fronts have done which have been set up in this and other countries. I repeat that if it is possible to know what communism is in dealing with the right of individuals to work on the ships in our waters under the procedure set up by the government, then it must be also possible to define communism or define the acts related to communism in a similar way under laws that the people will understand.

I hate communism and all it stands for. I wish that we could and would define—I believe we can—the traitorous actions which, in support of the Kremlin, seek to undermine our democracy. But I do not believe that if we say here in this house that we cannot define that offence, then the government should be empowered, secretly and behind closed doors, to say that they will deal with that offence by a police force under orders in council whereby none of the ordinary procedures of justice are available to the individuals affected. I do not believe this government has that prescience, that omnipotence, that they are able to define the indefinable when they have secret powers, and cannot define it when the powers are asked for in the open and under laws that the people can read and respect or disrespect under the rule of law.

We are constantly speaking of the fact that this is a parliamentary system; that we respect and preserve the supremacy of parliament and that the rule of law is part and parcel of the parliamentary system. We sometimes forget that there is a deep and important difference between our parliamentary system and the parliamentary system at Westminster. We sometimes forget something of which all Canadians should be proud, something which is part of our history and part of the genius of our people. We sometimes forget that, in Canada, we had the first parliamentary democracy in the world. Britain is a parliamentary democracy in which there is one parliament. We have a federal parliamentary democracy in which there is a national parliament and there are also ten provincial legislatures. We have a constitution which defines the division of authority between the central government and the governments charged with the vitally important responsibilities they assume within each of the provinces of Canada. The parliament at Westminster can pass any law which does not breach those ancient traditions which they would not at any time attempt to destroy. We all remember the statement that in Britain parliament can do anything except make a man into a woman.

The situation here is different. This parliament has not unlimited powers of legislation. This parliament should respect the limitation on its powers, not only the limitation in respect of members of parliament but also the limitations that are imposed upon it by its position within a federal system. This emergency act now before us not only offends the basic principle of parliamentary responsibility and the principle of the rule of law; it also challenges our federal constitution, and challenges the authority of the provincial legislatures.

It is all very well to say that this government has at no time done anything to limit the responsibility or authority of the provincial legislatures under these emergency powers. Of course it has, on many occasions, under other emergency powers. Under this Emergency Powers Act it could override the authority of the provincial legislatures in many ways. Under this act and the Defence

Production Act, which is complementary, it would be possible for this government by the simple device of declaring an emergency to take the operation of all the hydroelectric developments in Canada under its sole and exclusive authority and without asking any provincial government if they thought that was wise or reasonable.

Under this act, if the government so desired, by the declaration of an existing emergency and the appropriate order in council they could take over complete control of the highways in this country. They could take over every transportation system in Canada, and the regulation of those systems. There is not a single phase of the daily life of the people of this country in relation to production or work which could not be taken over by this government under order in council, without a word to parliament or to the provincial legislatures, if the government decided it was wise and proper to do that under the terms of this act. Moreover, it would be possible for this government to decide that, in spite of the reservation to the provincial governments of property and civil rights, it could assume authority, over all those extremely important aspects of public business which are now in the hands of the municipal councils under the provincial acts of this country and under our constitution.

Where in this act is there any reservation of power, any restraint of power which would make it impossible for this government by order in council to declare that it was expedient that some authority be set up to direct the actions of the municipal councils in relation, shall we say, to civil defence, the operation of their own highways, the maintenance of their bridges or various things of that kind? That, conceivably, by some stretch of the imagination, might be regarded under an emergency as part of the combined effort of this country.

Not one word I am saying is to be construed or misconstrued as a suggestion that this country should not do everything humanly possible to build its strength in every possible way to face the threat that confronts us. But, Mr. Chairman, we have been told that this cold war, this twilight war, as it has been described by the government, may go on for 25 or 50 years. Are we for the rest of our lifetime going to live under a system which gives to parliament only such measure of authority and responsibility as they choose to leave it? One hon. member said this afternoon that this is only an extension for a year. We have learned in the past that once an act of this kind becomes embedded in our statute books this government are strangely reluctant to give up the powers conferred in that way although they have no need to exercise them.

An hon. Member: Do you hope to change it?

Mr. Drew: I heard a question asked, "Do you hope to change it?" At the appropriate time the people of Canada will have their chance to say what government they wish to conduct the business of this country.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): And they will say "no change".

Mr. Drew: The people of this country will make that decision, not the members of this parliament and not those who make the interjections which we have been hearing at various times this afternoon. As we address ourselves to this measure now before us I hope the members who are giving it consideration will bear in mind that we are not called upon to deal with legislation as though we were going to guess the outcome of any election.

I have no hesitation in saying that if, in the wisdom of the people of this country, we should be called upon to form the government, we would return to the supremacy of parliament, the rule of law and the federal system. There need be no doubt on that score. We will uphold the constitution; we will uphold the supremacy of parliament; we will uphold the rule of law and we will uphold the federal parliamentary democracy which is the special genius of Canada itself, the country which first gave that system to the world.

When we consider what we are going to do in connection with this act, let us remember that it is only by a discussion of this kind that we can clarify in the minds of the members, and in the minds of people beyond parliament itself, what the views of this parliament really are and what it is that this government and the supporters of this government are really seeking to do by the resolution now before us, and by the subsequent introduction of the bill when it comes before the house.

I have no intention of testing the tender sensibilities of those who are so concerned about any hint of lack of independence in their voting on the part of those who so regularly support this government. I only point out that in this particular case it is significant that once again there is that measure of unanimity that we see displayed so consistently whenever a measure of this kind is put forward. On other occasions we have heard member after member on the other side explain that they really believed in the resolution that was before the house, but that they could not vote for it because in all conscience they could not vote against this government.

We heard that a few days ago; I need not mention the debate, because every hon. member will recall it. But once again this afternoon we had an hon. member seek to clear his own conscience by saying that he disliked this measure as much as anyone in this house, but he was going to vote for it because we were going to have an election inside of a year. It did not make any difference how bad the legislation was, he was going to continue it while this government was in power. That is a strange way of clearing one's conscience in regard to matters of this kind.

Now we are told that they are completely independent, and of course we must accept their statements. But it is interesting the way in which they assert their own belief in the very views we are putting forward, and then find some palatable excuse from their own point of view for deciding that they should not exercise that measure of independence which would certainly refresh so many Canadians at this time and restore their belief that members were voting exactly as they thought, without seeking to find some excuse for not doing so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me what is most conspicuous in the views that have been expressed by those who seek to declare that it is expedient that we should extend this legislation is the apparent unconcern they display in regard to this challenge to our parliamentary system. If the regular procedure in parliament cannot operate now, at a time when we are called upon to sit in this house for eight or nine months a year, then when is it likely that we ever will be free again to exercise parliamentary freedom within the lifetime of any member of this house? This is the time for us to say that we believe we can operate our parliamentary system. At such time as there is any disturbance so affecting our systems of communication or transportation that the members of parliament could not be called quickly together, then and then only would it be time for us to pass legislation of this kind.

The Minister of Justice describes this as a twilight war. Mr. Chairman, the passing of legislation of this kind, when we have before us the judgment of the privy council in the Nolan case, which extends so far emergency authority of this kind, is indeed carrying us into the twilight zone; but it is not a twilight war. It is the twilight of democracy.

The hon. member for Nanaimo has referred to a book which it would be well for every hon. member to read. He has referred to the chapter in the book under the heading "The Road to Moscow". I have seen comments to the effect that it is inappropriate that anyone should draw any comparison here between the statements made in that very carefully written and objective book and the benign gentlemen who now make up this government. I remember the question: Is it appropriate to speak about "The Road to Moscow" when we look at the benign gentlemen who are administering our affairs at this time?

Well, you know, the strange part of it is that, so far as I have learned from the textbooks, the people now living in the countries beyond the iron curtain have exactly the same number of bones in their bodies, they have two eyes and two ears, a nose and a mouth and, except for their language or their statements, seem strangely like ourselves. And, in fact, they are strangely like ourselves, because many members in this house trace their ancestry back to the same blood as some of those who are now under communist slavery.

We must not for a moment think it is appropriate to change a system simply because we feel that those temporarily entrusted with the responsibility are benign gentlemen, unlikely to abuse the authority that would be conferred. Let us carry that one stage further, to a point that some may regard as carrying the argument to an absurdity, but which it seems to me does illustrate the point I would like to make. Supposing a government—I do not say this government—came before parliament and said that in view of the continuing emergency it was expedient that we should pass legislation which would suspend this parliament for a period of five years, is it thinkable that a single member in the house would say, "Oh, it is quite all right; let us do that".

To say that these benign gentlemen would not abuse their powers and would exercise the emergency powers given them in the intervening period in a way that would be perfectly satisfactory for the people of Canada, is not a sufficient answer. I can imagine someone saying, "But there is no similarity." Where is the dissimilarity? We are simply a parliament by tolerance under this act, that is all.

It is true that the government does not go so far as to say, as has been said under our system on an earlier occasion, "You can go home; you are no use here." The government does not say that in this case; but they do say by the act—whether they put it into words or not—"We ask you to trust us so completely that we want you to pass an act which, under the judgment in the Nolan case, we can exercise at any time to override the powers of every provincial legislature in this country, to withhold from parliament its ordinary responsibilities, and to deal with any aspect of the economic and personal life of the people of this country, subject only to the minor and relatively meaningless reservations contained in the act".

What is the difference? In one case we continue to meet and to discuss the matter. I agree there are some members who think we should not be discussing this subject. Only this afternoon the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) said, "We know what is going to happen. This thing will pass. The resolution will pass at this stage, and then the act will pass." And then a voice on the other side said, "Then what is the use of discussion?"

That is the attitude. They know it will pass, and they say, "What is the use of discussion?" Well, Mr. Chairman, meeting day by day and exchanging ideas as we do in our personal contacts, as well as in the house, it is difficult for many members to see the danger in the course they are being asked to follow.

We are not saying what this government will or will not do. We are simply saying that the government through this measure, under the decision in the Nolan case, is asking for dangerous and unparalleled authority which those who still respect the supremacy of parliament should not confer upon this or any other government in Canada.

If the statement made in the house this afternoon that "this is going to pass; why discuss it" were to be regarded as the views of hon. members generally, then I would recall the words of Cromwell when, upon dismissing parliament, he said there was nothing to be gained by keeping them there any longer, and that they could go home. If members on the other side of the house are simply to be counted as voting dummies, and if members on this side of the house are simply to be counted as those whose opinions should not be expressed because we must know that an overwhelming vote is going to support any proposition put forward by the government, then indeed we have come closer than anyone seems to realize to that day in Britain when for a time democracy was ended and a dictatorship was set up.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: The laughter I hear from the member on the opposite side is the kind of laughter which it would be well for the people of this country to hear. I grant that the member who laughed is not one of those members we would expect to understand a matter of this kind. In fact the hon. member who laughs has seen the consequences of the failure of those elected by the people to defend the rights of the people through their elected representatives. Nevertheless there are members in the house who have had occasion to study this matter.

That is what is before us here. What we are really being asked now is whether it is expedient that by legislation we should confer upon this government or any other government the right to by-pass the responsibility of the Commons and of parliament, and to override the rights and authority of the provincial legislatures under our constitution by perpetuating this measure for another year, and by that act invite the perpetuation of a system which is so contrary to the genius of our federal parliamentary democracy.

It is not for us to decide whether the Minister of Justice is right when he calls the present a period of twilight war. It is necessary for us to decide whether this is in fact a parliament which can be carried on as a free parliament under conditions which may be carried forward for a great many years.

We hope we do not face the prospects of another world war. We hope so with all our hearts; we hope it above everything else. We hope we will be able to preserve our freedom without another war; we hope we will be able to retain our parliamentary system for long years and keep the strength that comes alone from freedom, and through that strength build the combined power of free nations until at some time in the still distant future those countries now beyond the iron curtain shall assert their desires for their own systems of government, whatever those systems may be.

It will be recalled that there were many times during the great war when the parliament of the United Kingdom, from which we accepted the basic principles of our system, was called upon to meet under actual bombing or in uncomfortable places far removed from the ordinary associations of parliament. When future historians are examining the important events of the last war it may be that they will not point to Dunkirk or to El Alamein or to the invasion of Normandy or to the crossing of the Rhine as the great and outstanding event of the war which decided the course of free men and women throughout the years ahead. It may well be that historians examining what took place during the war will decide that the most important thing that happened was that in Great Britain, the home of our parliamentary system, although the House of Commons had been bombed out, although for a time they met in an ordinary subway station, although they met under actual bombing, they never chose to abandon the supremacy of parliament or the rule of law.

It may well be that those who examine events from the distant and objective view of history will recall that at a time when London was under the heaviest bombing the British House of Commons sat for two days and discussed the freedom of men then held on the Isle of Man. London could be bombed, buildings could be destroyed, but the rule of law and the supremacy of parliament must be preserved at every expense. That may well be regarded as the most important thing because it stands before us today as an example that we should follow when conditions not only do not justify any argument for the abandonment of the supreme authority of this parliament, but demand an insistence upon the rule of law and respect of our federal system under our constitution.

We are in committee; members can ask questions and can express their views, but once again I urge the government—and I urge them in all earnestness—to reconsider their course, to remember that they have not put before us a single reason why it would be necessary to resort to the War Measures Act if this act were not passed. In fact everything that has been said shows that it would not be necessary to resort to the War Measures Act unless we were under the immediate threat of war and had difficulty in transportation and communication. That would be the only justification.

I also urge the government in all earnestness to recall that they have not shown us any reason why they need these wide powers. They have referred to the fact that last year they used the act so little that we need not be concerned about it. If they needed the act so little last year, why do they need these wide powers today?

Every argument put forward by the Minister of Justice is an argument which should, on reflection, impress upon the government the desirability of coming to this house and saying: We have listened to the arguments put forward; we do believe there is reason for the concern expressed; we do not accept these arguments as criticism of individuals now in office, but we have been impressed with the fact that any law now passed may affect those who will be called upon to assume responsibility at some future time, and we do not think we should pass on powers of this kind to another government because we sometimes have not indicated our confidence in others to do things as well as we do them.

Those who now argue that they have complete confidence in this government, if they still believe that Canada is a democracy and that the people of Canada are free to decide what government they will have, should be the ones to impress upon the government that consistent with the opinions they have expressed they should not pass on such wide powers because they might not be convinced that another government would be so all-wise, so omniscient as some of them seem to believe this government is.

I know some hon. members do not feel that we should be discussing this legislation at the length at which it has been discussed. That is what members of other parliaments have contended from time to time in the past. Without reflecting upon the motives of a single member of this government or of this house, it should be decided that it is not consistent with our federal parliamentary democratic system that at any time when parliament can easily be called together there should be handed to a government the power to declare by order in council that the rights of parliament or of provincial legislatures can be suspended in the way that can be done under this act.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year I began the practice of tabling the budget white paper the day before the presentation of the budget speech. I believe that this procedure met with general approval, and I have followed the same policy this year. I hope that the house as in other years will give unanimous consent to having the white paper printed as part of today's Hansard.

With the common consent of all groups in this house the work of this session has been planned so as to begin and conclude our deliberations six or eight weeks ahead of the usual times, so that adjournment can take place well in advance of the date appointed by Her Majesty for her coronation. Consequently it has been necessary to bring down the budget nearly two months before the customary date. Hon. members will appreciate that this makes it difficult to obtain complete information for the year under review. Many of the figures given in the white paper are of necessity the best current estimates and will be subject to change as later information becomes available.

I have again transferred to the white paper the greater part of the general economic review which forms an essential introduction to the budget. Accordingly I shall confine myself this evening to a brief summary of the main features of recent economic developments and of the outlook for the future. Before doing so, however, I hope the house will allow me to pay a brief tribute to the late Dr. W. Clifford Clark.

Under our system of parliamentary government deputy ministers occupy a position which is difficult to explain to those who are not familiar with the actual operation of our political and administrative system. They carry heavy administrative responsibilities, but they are charged with no political responsibility. In the Department of Finance, however, it is particularly difficult wholly to separate administration and public policy. The Minister of Finance accepts full responsibility for all decisions of policy, but the deputy minister must concern himself with an extraordinarily wide and varied range of policy questions, because almost all such questions sooner or later involve revenue or expenditure. The deputy minister has a constant duty to advise, suggest, warn and point out the short and the long-run implications of alternative policies. At the same time the final decisions are not in his hands and he must be ready to carry out and administer whatever decisions are reached.

Dr. Clark for more than twenty years was a great deputy minister. He was always forthright and vigorous in his presentation of the relevant considerations and the implications of whatever matter was under discussion. He was always completely loyal in carrying out whatever decisions were reached. His capacity for work and his tireless devotion to duty were extraordinary. At the same time he was a quiet and unassuming man, who shunned all personal publicity. His personal and intellectual integrity was of the highest order, his appreciation of the public interest and his love of Canada were intense. His technical skill in matters of financial administration held the admiration of all who knew him, not least among them those in other countries who had occasion to consult or negotiate with him. His sudden and unexpected death was a great shock to me and has been a severe personal loss to his many friends in this house. The people of Canada owe him a greater measure of gratitude than they realize. He has left a lasting imprint on the quality of public service in Canada, and his life and work will remain an inspiration to those who follow.

ECONOMIC TRENDS

Turning now to recent economic developments and the outlook for the future, 1952 has been in most respects a successful year in world affairs. The nations of the free world are in a stronger position than they were a year ago to protect themselves against aggression. The North Atlantic community has achieved an important increase in its defensive strength. Our production lines have begun to turn out in substantial quantity the modern military equipment we need. The defence construction program in western Europe and on this continent is well under way. In Korea, Malaya and Indo-China aggressive communist forces are being held in check. While much remains to be done and we cannot relax our efforts the accomplishments of the past year and the continued development of close co-operation among our allies have provided a more enduring basis for peace and security.

In the economic sphere, there has been a noteworthy reduction in inflationary pressures in many parts of the world. Prices over a wide area have stopped rising and the prices of many of the raw materials, which rose so steeply after the outbreak of the war in Korea, have receded to more normal levels.

There has been a growing recognition of the close relationship between internal financial stability and the balance of payments. The success of many countries in damping down excessive demand internally has brought about a significant improvement in the world exchange situation during the past year. At the end of 1951 the central reserves of the sterling area were falling rapidly, and most sterling countries were running substantial deficits. By the last half of 1952 the reserves were again rising, and at the commonwealth economic conference which the Prime Minister and I attended some two months ago, the representatives of the other commonwealth countries were able to report substantial progress toward their objective of a better balance in their external accounts. These improvements make possible a renewed effort to remove the barriers and restrictions which continue to hamper world trade.

While 1952 saw an abatement of world inflationary pressures and brought some improvement in world trade, international economic relations today are far from satisfactory. Since the war tariffs have been reduced by many countries, but quantitative restrictions, discrimination and inconvertibility of currencies still persist over a wide area.

These continuing difficulties can no longer be ascribed primarily to wartime losses of productive facilities. The efforts of the people of Europe and elsewhere, with the assistance given by North America, have been successful in making good much of the damage caused by the war, and production in most countries is now greater than ever before. By 1950 it appeared that the post-war inflation had about run its course. However, the outbreak of hostilities in Korea caused world prices again to surge upward and brought intensified inflationary pressures and renewed difficulties in trade and payments.

This setback is being overcome but many of the underlying problems remain unsolved. The greater economic stability and the better balance of trade achieved in 1952 now give the nations of the free world a new opportunity to move forward.

The major instruments for international economic co-operation which were drawn up immediately after the war, namely the Bretton Woods agreement and the general agreement on tariffs and trade, envisaged that convertibility of currencies and multilateral trade would have been restored over a large part of the world by now. These agreements have constituted a valuable means of international co-operation and we need constantly to examine the manner in which they can best be used to facilitate a more rapid attainment of our objectives. Moreover, the bindings of tariff items under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, which were last extended by negotiations held at Torquay in 1950, will run out at the end of this year and further negotiations on a wide scale will be necessary to continue them in effect on a firm basis. These are some of the major tasks for the coming year. It is clear that the time has come for new initiatives.

The commonwealth economic conference which was held in London in December made a significant beginning. The conference decided——that a more positive policy can now be adopted, both by the commonwealth countries themselves and in concert with other friendly countries, to promote expansion of world production and trade.

The commonwealth countries stated that it is their aim——to secure international agreement on the adoption of policies by creditor and debtor countries which will restore balance in the world economy on the lines of "trade not aid" and will by progressive stages and within reasonable time, create an effective multilateral trade and payments system covering the widest possible area.

If this beginning is to lead to concrete results, there must be close and continuing co-operation between the important trading nations. No lasting solution can be found, of course, without the active and adequate participation of the United States. Early in March the foreign secretary and the chancellor of the exchequer of the United Kingdom will visit Washington to begin exploratory discussions on a collective approach to trade and currency problems. It is to be hoped that this initiative will lead to constructive action. Canada has participated fully in the commonwealth discussions which have led up to this new approach. I need hardly add that we are prepared to play our full part in any common efforts which are designed to achieve a prosperous and expanding world trade.

We here in Canada over the past decade have experienced a period of growth and prosperity unrivalled in our history. As a nation, we have become accustomed annually to breaking new records in production, foreign trade, investment, employment and income. Each year our people set their sights a little higher; we expect almost as a matter of course that we will do better than we did the year before.

Even against such a background of prosperous growth, 1952 stands out as a remarkable year. Last year I based my budget on the expectation that gross national production would rise to $22½ billion. Actually our gross national output reached $23 billion, an increase of more than 7 per cent in value over 1951. With prices relatively stable, most of this increase was brought about by a greater volume of production. The record wheat crop was an important factor in this increase, but many other industries also achieved substantial gains.

It is necessary to point out that the aggregates of total production in 1951 and 1952 obscure some rather significant changes during both of these years. Production was at a high level in the first part of 1951 but fell off noticeably towards the end. The year 1952 started out from these lower levels, but business picked up very early in the year and a remarkably steady expansion in production took place during the remainder of the year.

The increased output represents an impressive rise in the productivity of the Canadian economy. While the improvement resulting from the record wheat crop may be regarded as largely fortuitous, our people as a whole are beginning to reap the benefits of the enormous investments in new plant, equipment and development that have been made since the war. I might add that the record grain crop could scarcely have been harvested had it not been for the heavy post-war investment by our farming community in labour-saving machinery.

The total of salaries and wages earned by Canadian workers during 1952 rose by 12 per cent, an increase which is considerably larger than the rise in gross national output. For example, the average weekly earnings of labour in nine leading industries were $54.13 in 1952, an increase of $4.52 over 1951.

While production, employment and wages rose in 1952 to the highest levels in our history, it is gratifying to note that prices have not followed a similar rising course. The index of wholesale prices fell by nearly 7 per cent during the year; the index of consumer prices declined by 2 per cent. We have been able to expand our production and income without any apparent renewal of inflation. The strength of our dollar in foreign exchange markets, the fall in world prices of many of the commodities which we import and the general restraint in our monetary and fiscal policy have all contributed to this stability in our general price level.

The rise in labour income, combined with the downward trend of prices, meant that in 1952 most Canadians experienced a substantial improvement in real income. We have had periods of rapid growth before, and periods when our production has risen as sharply as in 1952, but it is difficult to recall a time when we have been able to carry out such a degree of expansion and at the same time maintain a stable price level. 1952 can be justly described as a year of prosperity without inflation.

The stability of prices and the abatement of inflationary pressure made it possible to remove during the year some of the more direct anti-inflationary measures which had been introduced after Korea. Last May the consumer credit regulations were lifted. That same month the Bank of Canada expressed the view to the chartered banks that the special restrictions on bank credit which had been in effect for the previous fifteen months could be removed. Towards the end of the year it was also possible to announce that the deferred depreciation provisions in the Income Tax Act would not apply to property acquired after December 31, 1952. It will be recalled that these regulations were adopted in the 1951 budget as a financial deterrent to expenditure on capital expansion of a less essential nature. It was hoped by this to reduce the competitive bidding up of prices of scarce materials which were required for more essential purposes. The improvement in the supply situation during 1952, particularly in respect of steel, made the regulations no longer necessary.

The containment of inflation and the stability of the general price level in 1952 have been to me a particular source of gratification. Since I became Minister of Finance nearly seven years ago, I have been faced with many economic and financial problems, but none more serious nor more persistent than that of inflation. It would be foolish indeed for me to predict that this problem has been permanently solved. Our experience in 1952 has shown, however, that those who argued in 1950 that we were in for a siege of indefinite inflation have been just as wrong as the pessimists who since the end of the war have been persistently predicting a new depression.

The annual presentation of the budget is a time for national stocktaking, and I think it is desirable before looking at the prospects ahead to examine some of the basic forces which are operating in the economy. We have had high and rising levels of employment, real income has been increasing steadily, the level of production is at an all-time high. The question we have to consider is whether the dynamic forces which have brought this about are likely to continue.

It is difficult to analyse briefly all the factors which affect the level of economic activity. There are four principal forces that provide the basic demand for a country's output of goods and services. These are the expenditures by individual consumers, the investment in new capital goods, the foreign demand for the country's products, and the combined expenditures of governments on goods and services. Needless to say these groups are interdependent; the level of consumers' expenditures, for example, will depend in part upon the level of income, which is in turn related to the over-all demand for goods.

Possibly the most buoyant element on the demand side in 1952 was the sharp rise in consumption expenditures which began in the early spring. Retail sales in the second quarter of the year were more than 25 per cent above those in the first quarter, and nearly 10 per cent above the same period in 1951. This rate of increase was maintained through the remainder of the year. It is evident that the rise in consumer buying was due to a number of favourable circumstances. In part it represented a reaction from the falling off in sales late in 1951 and early in 1952. The decline in prices and the removal of the credit restrictions also contributed to the pick-up in purchases. Probably most important of all was the steady rise in consumer income throughout the year.

In spite of the very significant rise in consumer spending and retail credit outstanding, there was little apparent change in the pattern of net personal saving as compared with the previous year. In 1951 the net personal saving of Canadians amounted to nearly $1,250 million, or almost 8 per cent of disposable personal incomes. In 1952 it increased to about $1,300 million or 7½ per cent of total disposable incomes. It is noteworthy that the rise in consumer expenditures was financed primarily out of the increased incomes. The rate of personal saving has been maintained and compares most favourably with that of any other country and with previous periods in our history.

Investment in new productive facilities continued unabated through 1952. Natural resource development of a long-range character was again a striking feature. The Kitimat aluminum and Quebec-Labrador iron ore projects were brought closer to completion. New oil pipe lines were being constructed and successful exploration for oil and gas continued at a high rate. It is gratifying that the new discoveries of the past year, including the recent promising finds in New Brunswick, have extended developmental activity to an increasingly wider area of our country. New investment in our manufacturing industry was greater than in any previous year.

While investment in capital goods, equipment, and resource development was higher in 1952 than in 1951, the investment in additional inventories was substantially reduced. The rise in inventories in 1951, amounting to more than $1½ billion, absorbed a large portion of the total increase in national production for that year. The increase in inventories in 1952, however, is estimated to be under $200 million so that almost all of the increase in national production was available for other purposes, including the increased requirements for defence and higher expenditures by consumers.

The use of productive resources for defence was considerably greater in 1952 than in the previous year due to the fact that the production lines for major items such as aircraft, ammunition and electronics were getting into volume production. Except for defence, and purchases in connection with the support of farm prices, there has been virtually no increase in the physical volume of goods and services devoted to the requirements of the federal government.

In 1952 Canada's foreign trade again broke all previous records both in volume and value. Exports were 10 per cent higher in value than in 1951, and about 12 per cent greater in physical volume. Total imports in 1952 were slightly lower in value than in 1951, owing to a fall of about 12 per cent in the average prices of imports, thus offsetting a similar increase in quantity. In fact, during the past year we experienced a significant improvement in our terms of trade, or the ratio between the prices of the goods we export and the prices of the goods we import. While the prices we pay for our imports declined, the prices of our exports were largely maintained. Taking due account of non-merchandise transactions we had a current account deficit in our balance of payments for 1951 amounting to $524 million. In 1952 we had a surplus of $150 million. The improvement in the terms of trade and the strength of the Canadian dollar were factors of considerable importance in the economy during the past year. These two factors contributed materially to the improvement in our balance of payments and also to the general stability of the price level and the rise in real incomes.

A noteworthy feature of our foreign trade in the past year was the attainment of a wider distribution of markets. Exports to the United States were maintained at the 1951 level, in spite of the embargo on our cattle and meat exports which prevailed through most of the year. A somewhat larger proportion of our exports than last year went to the sterling area. Sales to the United Kingdom increased by about $100 million. However, our exports to all other overseas countries, including Latin America and continental Europe, increased by more than $200 million or over 25 per cent during the past year. Our sales to the world outside the United States and the commonwealth made up nearly one-fourth of our total exports, equal to the highest proportion in our history. For example, exports to Latin America, recently visited by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), amounted to $272 million in 1952, more than double our exports to that area in 1949.

The improvement in our balance of payments contributed to the strength shown in the Canadian dollar during the year. From a position of approximate parity with the United States dollar in the first two months of the year, the Canadian dollar rose to a premium of about 4 per cent in September, and then fell off slightly to a premium of about 3 per cent at the end of the year.

The other major factor in the exchange market was the movement of capital across our borders. The inflow of capital for direct investment in oil and mineral development and for the building of new industries was maintained. The inflow derived from the placing of new issues of Canadian securities in the United States, less the retirements of existing issues, was also substantial, although somewhat below the 1951 level. At the same time there was a large outflow of other forms of capital from Canada induced in part by the premium on the Canadian dollar. The outflow resulted mainly from the sales by non-residents of outstanding Canadian securities, and from the shifts in commercial accounts and balances. Taking all capital movements together, long-term and short-term, we were a net exporter of capital in 1952. In effect the total savings inside the country, taken as a whole, were more than equivalent to the expenditures on our entire domestic investment program.

The combined result of our current account surplus and the net outflow of capital is reflected in the movement in our exchange reserves, which rose by $81 million over the year to a level of $1,860 million at December 31, 1952. As I have stated before, our policy has been to allow the exchange rate to be determined by the normal play of economic forces without official intervention, except to ensure orderly conditions in the foreign exchange market. No attempt is made to reverse persistent trends, but only to smooth out excessive short-run fluctuations.

Although the over-all picture of the Canadian economy in 1952 was highly favourable, the past year was not without its problems and difficulties. The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease and the ensuing embargo on cattle and meat exports to the United States seriously disrupted the livestock industry. The government took measures to relieve the effects of this disaster by compensation payments and by purchases of meat under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. In addition special arrangements were made for the shipment of Canadian meat to the United Kingdom in exchange for New Zealand meat which was diverted to the United States. The thorough measures which were taken to stamp out the disease have been successful and it is expected that the normal market outlets will shortly be re-established.

In the early part of the year some of our industries were affected by a falling-off in demand for their products, notably textiles and consumers' durable goods. However, the pick-up in domestic business and a more buoyant export demand brought about a significant improvement in the position of most of these industries in the latter half of the year, which has since been maintained.

I now wish to turn to the outlook for 1953. If we look first to the prospective level of capital investment, present indications are that expenditures on the expansion of industry and the development of resources will continue at a high level. The level of activity in the construction industry generally will be affected favourably by the removal of the regulations regarding deferred depreciation, and by the rise in the number of housing starts which is indicated.

The demand for our exports depends upon business conditions and circumstances in other countries, particularly in the United States. It is, consequently, difficult to forecast, but well-informed opinion seems agreed on a continuing high level of activity in the United States for the near future which should sustain demand for our products in that important market. In respect of overseas countries our main exports consist primarily of essential goods and materials which should continue to be in a favourable competitive position.

The general increase in consumer expenditures which took place during 1952 has been sustained during the early part of this year. This increase appears to have been based primarily on a substantial rise in real personal incomes. With labour and other incomes at present running well above the 1952 average, there is strong ground for expecting a continued high level of consumer demand in 1953.

Translating these prospects into monetary terms, I think that we can look forward with some confidence to a gross national product in 1953 greater than the $23 billion achieved in 1952. I based my last budget on an anticipated increase in physical output of 4 or possibly 5 per cent. The record grain crop pushed the actual increase up to around 6 per cent. This is the third successive year in which the expansion in volume of total production was of the order of 6 per cent. In the three years since the beginning of 1950, the total output of our economy has increased by nearly 20 per cent. In trying to assess the prospective increase in production in 1953 we can get some guide from the index of industrial production which for the last quarter of 1952 was from 5 to 6 per cent above the average for the year as a whole. If industrial activity continues at about this rate through 1953, total non-agricultural production would be substantially higher than in 1952. On the other hand, we cannot assume another record grain crop. If we make the usual assumption of an average crop, total agricultural production would be lower than it was in 1952.

Taking all these factors into account I am basing my budget on the expectation that gross national product in 1953 will be in the neighbourhood of $24 billion, an increase of about 4 per cent. I expect this increase will consist very largely of an expansion in the physical output of goods and services since prices are now below the average for 1952. My estimate assumes, of course, that we will not experience extensive crop failures nor serious industrial work stoppages.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1952-53

I turn now to a brief review of the government accounts for the year which will end six weeks hence. These are set out in the usual comprehensive detail in the white paper tabled yesterday. As explained there, it is not possible at this date to estimate our year-end position with the usual degree of accuracy. At the time we had to go to press we had final figures to the end of December only, preliminary figures for January, but only forecasts for February, March and the March supplementaries.

The over-all results can be briefly stated. Our total budgetary revenues are expected to amount to $4,375 million, our expenditures $4,327 million and our surplus $48 million.

Our total tax revenues will be $4,010 million which is $31 million greater than I had forecast a year ago, and this amount, roughly the equivalent of our additional tax receipts this year arising out of the Ontario tax rental agreement, differed from the forecast by only three-quarters of 1 per cent. Non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits were $64 million greater than my forecast. $45 million, or nearly three-quarters of this excess, has arisen by our taking into revenue this year one-half of our balance in the provincial corporation tax suspense account. This suspense account is still subject to considerable adjustments as final tax assessments on corporations are completed during the coming year, but I have felt it right to bring half the amount into revenue this year, and bring all or most of the remainder into revenue next year.

Our expenditures this year will be $4,327 million, which is $57 million or about 1¼ per cent more than I had forecast. Two large items have come into our expenditures this year for which I could make no provision in the forecast which I made in the budget a year ago. One is the payment of $123 million to Ontario under the tax rental agreement signed in October. The other is the $42 million which is our estimate of losses which should be taken into this year's accounts in connection with our price support policy for beef and pork which in turn was a result of the difficulties ensuing from the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease last spring. But for these two items our expenditures would have been about $110 million less than my forecast, which in turn is largely the result of the defence program having been unable to get delivery of all the equipment and material expected.

The surplus of $48 million represents just about 1 per cent of our total revenues. In other words we came about as close to a virtual balance of revenue and expenditure as is possible in dealing with the magnitudes reflected in our budget. I should, of course, remind the house that neither our revenues nor our expenditures include the payments into and out of the old age security fund.

I am not going into much greater detail of our expenditures and revenues. These, so far as they are available, are fully disclosed in the white paper. The increase in expenditure, compared with the previous year, is $594 million, but if we have regard to the change in the treatment of our interest payments from a cash to an accrual basis, the proper comparable figure is about $680 million. In round figures national defence expenditures increased $490 million, subsidies and tax rental payments to the provinces increased $210 million, the service of the debt $20 million, family allowances and veterans' benefits $40 million, and agricultural prices support expenditures $40 million. These major items total $800 million of increased expenditure.

On the other hand the new old age security system has relieved the budget of $110 million, there is a decrease of $70 million in our special contribution to the civil service superannuation fund, and the disappearance of the deficit for the Canadian National Railways has saved us about $15 million. These major reductions add up to $195 million.

This means that all other government expenditures for all other purposes have increased $75 million during the year. These increases have been due chiefly to higher salary and wage scales and higher costs of materials and construction, some increases in services supplied and further increases in our projects of scientific and resource development.

The government has not relaxed its efforts toward maximum economy and efficiency in all government operations. There is and there always will be room for further improvement, and we shall continue to press our efforts in this direction. We are, for example, this year inaugurating a suggestion awards plan in the civil service which we are confident will, over the course of time, result in many major and minor improvements in efficiency of operation and will contribute to still further improvement in the morale and esprit de corps of the public service.

On the revenue side tax receipts are $350 million higher than a year ago and total revenues are up about $400 million. The principal increases, in round figures, are personal income taxes up $210 million, or 22 per cent, corporate income taxes up $100 million, or 9 per cent, commodity taxes up $40 million, and special receipts and credits up $40 million. Of our total revenues 58 per cent have come from direct taxes, 34 per cent from indirect taxes and 8 per cent from non-tax sources.

As usual I want to say a word about our over-all cash position. Apart from and outside the budget we have had to find the very large sum of $625 million for a variety of loans, investments and advances. These are all set out in detail in the white paper. The large items are $125 million to the Canadian National Railways, $65 million for agricultural price support inventories, $75 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, $50 million to the exchange fund, $35 million to the defence production revolving fund and $100 million to the old age security fund.

To meet this cash requirement for $625 million outside the budget we have had available about $450 million from non-budgetary sources. The most significant items are receipts of $65 million from repayment of loans, and of $170 million in accumulations in various pension and annuity accounts. Full details will be found in the white paper.

To sum up, our non-budgetary receipts were $178 million less than our non-budgetary outlays. We have our budget surplus to apply against this, leaving a remaining cash requirement of $130 million. To meet this cash requirement we have increased our funded debt on balance $141 million, which means we will end up the year with $11 million more cash on hand than we had at the beginning.

This leads me to our operations in the field of the public debt. Again I am using round figures; the exact amounts are detailed in the white paper. During the year our gross liabilities increased by $275 million, our net active assets increased by $325 million, which means that our net debt declined by about $50 million which is, of course, the amount of our surplus. During the year we issued new securities in the very large amount of $3,330 million and we paid off old securities in the amount of $3,190 million, or as I said a moment ago we had a net increase of $140 million in our funded debt.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Our net debt still stands at a high figure in absolute terms but thanks to the reductions we have been able to make during the past 7 years and thanks to the rapid increase in our national productivity it now represents a much more tolerable burden than at the close of the war. I should like with the permission of the house to insert here in the record a short table showing our net debt at the end of each year since 1939, and also showing it in per capita terms and as a percentage of our annual gross national product.

Table I

Net debt of Canada, 1939-1953

As at March 31	Net Debt (In millions of $)	Net Debt Per Capita	Net Debt as a Percentage of Gross National Product
1939	$ 3,153	$ 280	60·2
1940	3,271	287	57·3
1941	3,649	317	53·1
1942	4,045	347	47·5
1943	6,183	524	58·7
1944	8,740	732	78·2
1945	11,298	936	94·5
1946	13,421	1,092	113·3
1947	13,048	1,040	108·5
1948	12,372	965	89·9
1949	11,776	899	75·4
1950	11,645	849	70·7
1951	11,433	816	62·8
1952	11,185	775	52·1
1953	11,137	752	48·5

I commend this table to the attention of hon. members who will see that while our total net debt has declined by 17 per cent since 1946, the per capita debt has fallen from $1,092 to $752 or 31 per cent. In 1939 our net debt was equal to 60 per cent of our gross national product for that year, in 1946 it was 113 per cent of our gross national product, and it now stands at only 48 per cent. To put it in more realistic terms, our 1939 debt represented 31 weeks of the nation's output, in 1946 it was about 60 weeks, but today's debt could be covered by the product of 25 weeks' work. The real burden of our debt has been considerably more than halved over the past 7 years.

As hon. members know, interest rates have risen over the past two years and that has had its reflection in the average interest rate paid on the total funded debt. Two years ago this average was 2·60 per cent, last year it was 2·67 per cent, and this year it will average 2·76 per cent.

FORECAST OF REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE FOR 1953-54

So much for last year. I turn now to my forecast of revenue and expenditure for the year that will begin on April 1 next.

I said earlier this evening that I expect our present level of prosperity to continue throughout this calendar year and I expect a continuation of about the present rate of industrial and general economic expansion. I came to the conclusion that, assuming average crops, we can look forward to a 4 per cent growth in total national output. On these assumptions I expect that our present tax structure would bring in total revenues in the coming year amounting to $4,710 million. I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker, for unanimous consent to insert in Hansard at this point the usual table showing the constituents of this total.

Table II

On the expenditure side I have already tabled the main estimates which total $4,405 million of budgetary expenditure. These estimates have been prepared with the greatest possible care, but there will be, as always, the inevitable supplementaries. There are likely to be some further losses in respect of government holdings of beef and pork which will not have been sold before the end of this fiscal year, and I would think it prudent at the end of the year to set aside some further modest reserve against our active assets. On the other hand there is certain to be some lapsing of authorized expenditure, though with the increasing care with which the estimates are compiled and screened this is not likely to be as great as we have experienced in some earlier years. All in all, I have come to the conclusion that our total expenditure next year will be about $4,450 million.

With prospective revenues of $4,710 million and expenditures of $4,450 million our present tax structure would yield a budget surplus of $260 million in the coming year.

Before going on to discuss our tax policy, I should inform the house of our probable position on non-budgetary account in the coming year. Apart from and outside the budget we shall have to find cash for loans, investments and advances. The largest items here are likely to be loans to the Canadian National Railways and to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and I expect the revenues in the old age security fund will still fall short of payments, although by a smaller amount than this year. On the other hand, there will again be non-budgetary receipts mainly from loan repayments and from the various pension and annuity accounts. It is not feasible to estimate what changes, if any, there may be in the exchange fund and in the year-end amount of cheques outstanding and other float items. Apart from this, it would appear that our net non-budgetary requirements, excluding funded debt transactions, may be about the same as in the current year, that is of the order of $175 million.

TAX POLICY AND TAX CHANGES

With the economic outlook and the budget prospects as I have just stated them, I have had to decide what tax policy for the coming year best fits these circumstances.

Mr. Graydon: Special circumstances.

Mr. Abbott: Two years ago, when it became clear that our own interests required us to assume an important role in a collective program for ensuring international security, we approached the financial problem with vigour and determination. We had to frame a policy, severe though it might be, which would carry us through this difficult period, and it was bound to affect the everyday lives and fortunes of all of us. This has been done. The result is that a large part of the productive resources of the country, instead of being available to turn out goods and services for immediate enjoyment and use, has been used to meet the threat of aggression. I think no one who knows the facts, either in this country or elsewhere, will accuse this government of having shirked the task of imposing the taxes necessary to pay for our major undertakings in the field of defence. We have insisted on balancing our accounts. To have done less would have been both imprudent and dangerous. The tax measures adopted in the fall of 1950 and in the spring of 1951 were designed to build a revenue structure which would support the added burden of the defence program, and they have done so.

A year ago, upon re-examining this revenue structure it seemed desirable to remove certain anomalies in the income tax structure and to give some relief where needed in the special excise tax structure. In doing this we had to forgo revenue which on a full year basis would have amounted to about $146 million. Fortunately there was leeway enough to enable this to be done and still anticipate a balanced budget. As it turned out the results for the year, as I stated a few minutes ago, were very close to the estimates made a year ago, our tax revenues being within three-quarters of 1 per cent of our forecast.

For the coming year I propose to follow this same policy of budgeting for a balance. This means, from the figures I gave a few moments ago, that something close to $250 million can now be devoted to tax relief. That this can be done in spite of the estimated increase in the coming year of about 3 per cent in total expenditures is, I think, a great tribute to the Canadian people.

In a very real sense this surplus for tax reduction is the direct result of increased production, efficiency and plain hard work on the part of a united Canadian people. Here is a real social dividend, not one that has been conjured up out of thin air, but one that has been well and truly earned by our people. Greater productivity, increased efficiency and a willingness to work hard and vigorously for good wages, salaries and profits —these are the things that power our country today and make possible this surplus for tax relief.

INCOME TAX CHANGES

With about $250 million available for tax relief it seemed desirable that a substantial portion of this should be applied to easing the strain of the personal income tax. Income tax rates if too high can do harm in many directions. Tax laws should avoid placing too great a penalty on successful effort. Every reasonable incentive should be given to people to work hard, move to better-paid jobs, take risks and expand their businesses without keeping one eye continually on the tax-gatherer. This is particularly important in a growing and expanding country such as ours where there is so much to be accomplished.

Two years ago the house will recall the income tax was increased by means of a 20 per cent surcharge which I stated at that time was a temporary measure. Last year in discarding the surcharge device and in revising the rate structure about two-thirds of the full weight of this surcharge was built into the new schedule of rates. It is now proposed to drop this remaining portion of the surcharge entirely. This proposal will be given effect to simply by repealing the present rates and re-enacting the 1950 rate schedule upon which the 20 per cent surcharge was originally imposed. The effect of this change will be that the average taxpayer will have his personal income tax reduced after July 1 by a little more than 11 per cent. This reduction, of course, does not apply to the old age security tax which stands unchanged.

Because we are on the pay-as-you-go system the present rate of the withholding from wages and salaries will have to remain in force for several months before changes can be introduced; accordingly the changeover giving effect to the tax reduction will, as usual, be made in the middle of the year. From July 1 onward the income tax deducted from the wages and salaries will be reduced for the average taxpayer by about 11 per cent.

Since the reduced rates will have been in force for only six months in this calendar year the average individual's tax bill for the year as a whole will reflect, of course, only one-half the full reduction. The full rate of reduction, however, will, as I said, be reflected from July on. It is estimated that on a full year basis this change will cost in revenue about $155 million, and for the coming fiscal year about $87 million.

With the consent of the house I am placing on Hansard the usual tables showing the income tax payable

(1) for the calendar year 1952;

(2) for the calendar year 1953 if no changes were made;

(3) for the calendar year 1953 with the new rates in force;

(4) for a full twelve month period after the new rates are in force.

NOTE (1) The old age security tax of 1 per cent of taxable income (maximum tax $30) in 1952 and 2 per cent of taxable income (maximum tax $60) in 1953 is payable in addition to above amounts.

(2) The above figures show the actual income tax liability of a taxpayer with family allowance children but in order to arrive at his true net position the amount of family allowances received for his children must be offset against his tax liability.

(3) In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that where incomes are in excess of $30,000, that part of the income which is in excess of $30,000 is from investments, but no account has been taken of the tax credit for dividends from Canadian corporations.

For some years I have expressed concern over the high level of taxes on corporate profits. It seemed appropriate, therefore, that part of the amount available for tax abatement should be applied in this direction. At present the tax, excluding the old age security tax of 2 per cent, takes 20 per cent from the first $10,000 of profit, and 50 per cent from the excess over $10,000. In the first place it is now proposed to increase from $10,000 to $20,000 the bracket to which the low rate applies. This, it seems to me, is a useful way to give relief to relatively small businesses which generally have to do their financing out of their own earnings.

While by far the greater part of our corporation tax revenue comes from large corporations, the small corporations are by far the most numerous. All corporations, of course, both large and small, will be affected by this widening of the low tax bracket. It is estimated that as a result of increasing the $10,000 figure to $20,000 fewer than 30 per cent of our corporate taxpayers will in future be paying the standard rate of tax or, stated another way, about 70 per cent of corporate taxpayers will pay not more than the low rate on all their profits.

My second recommendation in this field is for a moderate reduction in tax rates. I propose reducing the standard rate of corporation tax from the present 50 per cent rate to 47 per cent, and to apply an 18 per cent rate instead of the present 20 per cent rate to the first bracket which, as I have said, will in future be $20,000. As a result of these two changes the new rate structure applying to profits earned on and after January 1, 1953, will be 18 per cent, plus 2 per cent old age security tax, on the first $20,000, and 47 per cent plus 2 per cent on profits in excess of $20,000. It is estimated that as a result of these changes in the corporate tax structure the revenue loss for a full year will be about $120 million, and for the coming fiscal year about $85 million.

In 1949 provision was made in the Income Tax Act for a credit against personal income tax of 10 per cent of the dividends received from Canadian tax-paying corporations. At that time I said this was a first step in dealing with the situation under our present tax structure where, after taxing corporate profits at a very high rate, the individual is required to pay at graduated rates on the dividends paid out of corporate profits. I now propose a second step of the same length and in the same direction. That is to say, for dividends received in the calendar year 1953 and thereafter the tax credit will be increased from 10 per cent to 20 per cent. Canada is fortunate these days in being able to attract enterprising foreign capital. This is desirable and we welcome it. At the same time it would seem to be a good thing if Canadians were encouraged, where they can safely do so, to join in a wider participation of equity ownership in the expanding industrial wealth of our country. This dividend credit of 20 per cent should, I think, be of considerable assistance in encouraging our people to increase their stake in Canada's future. On a full year basis this addition to the tax credit is estimated to cost $20 million in revenue, and $12 million for the coming fiscal year.

During the past year or so there has been considerable discussion in this house and elsewhere regarding the income tax deduction for medical expenses. At present the law recognizes unusual medical expenses, that is, expenses in excess of 4 per cent of the taxpayer's income. The government has been urged to consider removing this 4 per cent floor and, in effect, to allow a deduction for usual as well as for unusual medical expenses. As the house knows, I have given very careful consideration to this widely-supported proposal. Quite recently in speaking on the resolution dealing with this subject, sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I gave my reasons for not being able to recommend complete removal of the 4 per cent floor. I shall not repeat these reasons now. At that time, however, I promised to look further into the question of the level of the floor and to consider whether some lowering of it might be justified. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), has also considered this matter and has carefully reviewed the latest statistical data in this field. From this review he concludes that while the broad field of medical expenses as commonly understood may on the average be at least 4 per cent of income—it is 5 per cent in the United States—it would appear that the range of medical expenses which would qualify for inclusion in the deduction under the Income Tax Act would not on the average exceed 3 per cent of income. On the basis of this further consideration of the data it is now proposed that the 4 per cent floor in the present law be lowered to 3 per cent with effect this year. This move is estimated to cost about $10 million on a full year basis.

There are quite a number of other income tax matters which deserve mention. For example, it is proposed in future to allow parents to claim a deduction for dependent children attending university even though the children are over 21 years of age. The figure of $600 now prescribed as the upper limit of income which a dependent may earn and still be regarded as a dependent will be increased to $750. Expense allowances for elected municipal officials will be made deductible for income tax purposes if they conform with the limits established in respect of the allowances for federal and provincial elected members, that is, they will qualify to the extent that they do not exceed one-half the amount payable by way of salary, indemnity and other remuneration. Special provision will be made to alleviate the tax on refunds paid out as a result of reorganizations of pension plans. This will apply, of course, in the case of the Canadian National Railways pension plan reorganization which has been of interest to many hon. members.

During the past year certain other features of the income tax have given rise to considerable concern. The subjects are quite technical and, accordingly, they are not appropriate for full elaboration in the budget speech but I should like to comment briefly on some of them. For example, the income tax appeal board in a number of cases involving the sale of tickets for goods or services to be delivered or performed in the future have dismissed appeals against assessments which disallowed claims for certain so-called reserves. In the meantime this general question has been given careful study, and while I cannot here go into all the details I can say that I believe a proper solution has been found for most of the problems of this sort.

The taxation of interest on bonds sold between the dates on which interest is payable has caused some concern in the financial world and various briefs from national organizations have urged consideration of this problem. Amendments will be made which I think will take care of this problem satisfactorily.

Numerous complaints have been received in past months from persons who have incurred considerable tax liability through the acquisition by certain companies of their outstanding preferred shares. Under the law this premium over the par value paid in the purchase price is taxable income to the seller. It has been established that on selling these shares people were not aware of the fact that the issuing company was the actual purchaser of the shares. In order, therefore, to make sure that the law has not operated unfairly in these circumstances it is proposed to repeal, effective January 1, 1949, this provision which places a tax on the shareholder when a company acquires its shares at a premium other than upon redemption after notice. At the same time an amendment will provide that the amount of the premium paid by the company to shareholders upon acquisition during the period covered by the retroactive repeal of this tax on the shareholder will not be allowed as a deduction by the company in computing undistributed income on hand. Where notice is given by a company of the redemption of an outstanding issue the shareholders ordinarily can be expected to govern themselves accordingly.

For the future it is proposed also to repeal the tax on premium received upon redemption of preferred shares. I shall be recommending that henceforth any company paying a premium on redemption or acquisition of preferred shares must charge such premium paid against its tax-paid undistributed income on hand or, alternatively, pay a tax of 20 per cent on the amount of premium so paid to shareholders.

Other recommendations in the income tax field will include the extension for an additional year of the allowances now granted for mineral and petroleum expenses, including the special provision for deep-test wells. Also, an additional year will be added to the period within which, upon coming into production, new mines will be given a three-year exemption.

In addition to the renewal of these allowances there are two new provisions which will be recommended and which, I think, deserve mention here. The first of these is that mining companies be allowed a deduction in respect of oil or gas exploration expenses. This, I think, is a sensible proposition having regard to the similarities in these two fields of natural resource development. For the future, therefore, these two groups will be combined for purposes of the allowances in respect of exploration expenses. It is hoped that the result of this amendment will be greater participation by Canadian capital in the oil and gas industry.

The other proposal in this field is to include among deductible expenses the so-called bonus payments for leases which turn out to have been unproductive. The deduction will be allowed in the year of abandonment of the lease in respect of which the bonus was paid. This provision should considerably improve the competitive position among companies bidding for oil leases in our western provinces.

The income tax amending bill will as usual contain numerous technical changes of which mention cannot be made here. To a large extent these changes follow upon representations from responsible organizations and they are important in keeping our law up to date and as fair as possible.

I shall be proposing no amendments this year to the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

I should now like to say something about the general problem of federal-provincial financial relations, because the budget speech has traditionally been the occasion for reviewing broadly the main problems in the field of financing the services of government.

All federal states are inevitably faced with some conflict of jurisdiction between different levels of government. Just as inevitably the problem, in an ever-changing world, is bound to be a recurring one. No solution can ever be more than temporary. In view of the fundamental changes in the situation facing all levels of government in Canada which have taken place over the past few decades it is not surprising that federal-provincial relations should have thrust up new problems. The wonder is that our confederation instead of breaking down under the strains has gained strength and stability from decade to decade.

May I illustrate what I mean by reviewing the situation confronting the federal government today. The budget I am presenting this evening—a peacetime budget mind you—calls for the collecting and spending of some $4¾ billion. Of the main items making up this total, over $2 billion is needed for defence. Interest on the national debt, which can be almost entirely ascribed to past wars, amounts to about $450 million. These two items taken together add up to more than $2½ billion. Together they can be regarded as the price for international security.

The general field of what might be called welfare expenditure absorbs about another billion dollars. This amount can be described as the current bill for social security. Thus, out of total federal expenditures of $4¾ billion, $3½ billion, or nearly three-quarters of the total goes towards maintaining either international security or social security. If now we look back to federal budgets of, say, 25 years ago these two items which today absorb $3½ billion, or nearly three-quarters of our total expenditure, were scarcely in the picture at all, or were small according to present-day standards.

If the federal budget of today consisted only of the sort of expenditure which, under the prevailing ideas of only a few short years ago, was regarded as all that was necessary or proper for the federal government to undertake, I could come very close to balancing my budget if I had only at my disposal the traditional nineteenth century sources of the federal government revenue which were liquor, tobacco and customs duties. In such a situation I could probably with safety recommend the complete repeal of all federal income taxes on individuals and corporations. The general sales tax of 10 per cent, and the 15 per cent excise taxes, along with succession duties, could all be wiped out. These fields of taxation then could all be left to the provinces. Under these conditions there would, I think, be no very difficult problems in the field of federal-provincial financial relations.

If the federal government did not have to tax to obtain $3½ billion for defence, welfare and war debts, the tax fields would certainly not be so crowded. There would, I think, be ample room for the provinces, certainly for the more wealthy ones. I am not so sure, however, that even this would enable all provinces to finance their requirements independently of the federal treasury.

I do not believe the majority of the people in any province of Canada would favour discontinuing the present billion dollar nation-wide program of welfare expenditure. Nor do I believe that in any province the majority of the people would have had the federal government do otherwise than embark, in common with other countries, upon a defence program of the present proportions against communist aggression. If I am right in this belief, then it seems to me that the federal government should scarcely be blamed if the expansion of provincial taxation has become more difficult. Of course the extent of federal taxes does make substantial tax increases by provincial governments more difficult. No royal commission is needed to discover this truth. I have good reason to know the sort of problems which provincial ministers of finance have to face, and I think they know that they have my sympathy.

But no group of men at Ottawa is responsible for this problem. It finds its origin in the will of the majority of the people of the ten provinces which, of course, is Canada. No one in Ottawa has any liking for centralization as a principle or objective. No one wishes to deprive provincial governments of their rights or to take over their responsibilities. No one has any desire to aggravate the already difficult problems facing provincial governments which, in common with the federal government, have to meet the rising demands for government expenditure in a democratic country.

The government at Ottawa over the past 20 years has done its utmost to find fair and reasonable solutions from time to time over this period when, because of desperate conditions or swiftly changing events, the old workable pattern of federal-provincial relations has become so obviously inadequate.

In the late 1930's the federal government appointed the Rowell-Sirois commission to make an exhaustive study of all aspects of federal-provincial relations. This commission made a very thorough and penetrating study and its recommendations were far-reaching. They were found to be not acceptable to the provinces. Perhaps some on re-examining these proposals today would conclude that they were too drastic and did call for a surrender of some provincial jurisdiction.

The rejection of the Rowell-Sirois recommendations of course left the federal minister of finance, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, under the necessity during the desperate days of the early 1940's of speedily improvising some workable compromise for the war period. The good faith of the provinces and their willingness to co-operate in helping to find a proper solution was reflected in their acceptance of the plan embodying the wartime tax agreements.

After the war the problem was still there and the federal government put forward on its own account a comprehensive plan to take up where the wartime tax agreements left off. This plan was also unacceptable to the provinces. Again, it is possible to argue that this post-war plan attempted too much, too quickly. Undoubtedly it did propose a far-reaching overhaul of the status quo not only in revenue fields but in the expenditure pattern as well.

Again Mr. Ilsley had to devise some temporary workable arrangement for the post-war era.

As the house knows, his proposals took the form of optional agreements relating solely to taxes, known popularly as tax rental agreements. The virtue of this approach was that it was not dependent for success on the unanimous acceptance by all provinces. A cardinal principle in the offer was that no pressure, direct or indirect, should be placed on any province to accept an agreement. This has been a fundamental position in the federal government's attitude ever since.

In the present tax rental agreements, an undertaking is given that upon expiry of the agreement the federal government will allow a credit against its corporate income tax equal to 7 per cent of the profits earned by companies in that province. This, of course, is to enable any province to re-impose its own tax up to this 7 per cent level without penalty to corporations in that province. I now propose to increase the 5 per cent tax credit at present being allowed in our Income Tax Act in respect of profits in any province which has not entered into an agreement to this same level of 7 per cent. The general effect of this will be to place corporations in Quebec, which is without a tax rental agreement, on the same basis as those operating in other provinces in respect of the burden of corporate income tax. The loss of revenue to the federal treasury in a full year will be approximately $17 million.

The federal government has, I think, demonstrated its desire to avoid, wherever possible, encroaching upon tax fields used by the provinces. After the war, for instance, we abandoned the taxes on gasoline, amusements, parimutuels, and electric power because the provinces were depending upon the use of these taxes. I propose to make a further move of this sort and repeal the federal tax on the transfer of securities, a tax which is also imposed on a parallel basis by the two central provinces.

This will mean a loss of revenue to the federal treasury of some $3 million per annum.

One does not have to study for very long the problem of overlapping tax jurisdictions to realize there is no easy answer. A re-allocation of tax sources between the two levels of government does not seem to be a workable solution. This approach might be helpful if the various tax sources were of equal value to all provinces which, of course, they are not. Accordingly, in giving up tax sources sufficient for the needs of the wealthier provinces, the less well-off provinces would be left without enough to meet their requirements.

Some students of this problem have been attracted by the idea of straight fiscal need subsidies to less well-off provinces as a supplement to some undertakings or arrangements regarding the use of certain tax fields. This double-barrelled system would, I think, imply the unanimous acceptance by all provinces before it could be adopted. This might never be possible. As a matter of fact, I am by no means sure if I were a provincial minister of finance that I would agree to such an arrangement. I am afraid I would find something repugnant in the idea that an outside body—a board, council or commission—would be investigating provincial affairs and determining the size of the fiscal needs for a particular period which amount in turn would be the measure of the federal grant.

In the United States, where they have the same problem to an acute degree, the question of federal-state relations has for many years been the subject of much painstaking study but nothing by way of a general solution has been achieved. In the absence of any over-all plan, the majority of the states levy personal income taxes, corporation taxes and retail sales taxes. It is estimated, for example, that about 60 per cent of the tax revenue of the states is obtained from retail sales taxes. Those who are at times critical of the Canadian situation might do well to examine the situation which obtains south of the line.

After reviewing what other countries have accomplished, I must say that I think we have done reasonably well in Canada in working out a common-sense method of accommodating federal-provincial financial relations to the major upheavals of the past few decades.

Certain aspects of the tax rental agreements may, perhaps, cause some mild concern to the purely logical mind. The pattern for these agreements is found in no treatise or text book. No royal commission produced the formulae. The provisions of these agreements have been hammered out on the anvil of hard experience. Our approach has been essentially a pragmatic one and our solution is one which does lend itself to the practical realities of the situation in which it must operate.

Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that I may have imposed on the patience and good nature of the house in commenting at such length on this subject. It is an important one, however. It has deep implications for our existence as a federal state. Our national unity must always be built on a foundation which gives practical effect to the constitutional distribution of sovereign powers and administrative responsibilities between the central and the provincial authorities.

I hope that the statement which I have made will have been of some value in clarifying the issues, establishing the facts and in revealing the sincerity of the federal government's desire to work amicably toward reasonable solutions in this field of our relations with provincial governments.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

The budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff which I am tabling contain proposals respecting certain tariff items where reductions in duty are desirable. In a number of cases I am proposing changes in wording and classification which would remove uncertainties, anomalies, and administrative difficulties which have arisen. No increases in duty are proposed.

Reductions in duty are proposed on particular items which enter into the costs of production of our primary industries. I am proposing to add some additional items to the already extensive list of equipment and materials which enter duty free for use in agriculture. Reductions are proposed on two important categories of equipment used in the fishing industry, namely gasoline engines and wire rope. In the case of the mining industry the proposals include reductions on certain specialized equipment.

I am proposing to widen somewhat the existing classifications under which universities, schools and public hospitals may bring in scientific and medical apparatus free of duty. It is proposed also to extend the existing classification which grants free entry to certain articles used for religious purposes. Finally, the customs tariff resolutions contain a proposal for the establishment of a new item under which personal and household goods acquired abroad by members of the Canadian armed forces may be entered free upon their return to Canada under certain conditions which are specified.

COMMODITY TAXES

I now turn to the field of commodity taxes. With some regret I have come to the conclusion that I cannot this year recommend any change in either the general sales tax rate or in the special excise tax rate. Broadly speaking I believe we have achieved in this country a pretty sensible balance in our tax structure between direct and indirect taxes. I am aware, of course, how acceptable it would be if substantial tax reductions could be made in the field of commodity taxes, but it is quite clear that the moderate leeway at my disposal this year will not permit this to be done.

While the general rate structure in these fields must be maintained, a few important changes can be accommodated without too great loss of revenue. A further reduction in the levy on cigarettes seems desirable. It is clear that following the reduction made last year there was a quite definite increase in cigarette sales which, from the point of view of the revenue collector, is very encouraging. Smuggling, I regret to say, is still a difficult problem. I have accordingly decided to recommend that the excise duty, and correspondingly the customs duty, on cigarettes be reduced by $2.00 per thousand which, for a package of twenty cigarettes, means four cents off. Not knowing in advance what effect this further cut will have on the volume of consumption, or the amount of smuggling, it is impossible to estimate what the revenue loss from this move will be. A fair estimate is that it will not be more than $17 million.

It is proposed to repeal the stamp tax on cheques, money orders and other instruments. This tax is definitely of the nuisance variety and I am sure that only the Minister of Finance, who has to forgo about $12 million of revenue, will mourn its passing.

Another amendment, and one in which I am quite happy to join in acclaiming, will repeal the sales tax on books. I have been impressed with the breadth and sincerity of the representations for this action, and I have been convinced that it would be in the public interest to forgo the modest amount of revenue now received from this source. Concurrently with this repeal of the sales tax on books the tax will likewise be withdrawn from materials used in the production of magazines, books and newspapers. This will eliminate the difficult task we have had to wrestle with in recent years of drawing a clear and acceptable line between newspapers and magazines.

Materials used in the manufacture of the list of foods now included in the schedule of exemptions will be freed from sales tax. Similarly a group of items which along with the so-called "consumable materials" are expended in the process of production will be exempt from sales tax.

All these changes in the sales tax will result in a loss of revenue of about $8 million. As usual it will be provided that all the above commodity tax changes will be effective from midnight tonight. In accordance with standard practice my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) has asked me to give notice that no claims for refunds arising out of tax reductions in respect of goods on which tax has been paid will be entertained.

There will be a number of other minor amendments included in the bill amending the Excise Tax Act but these need not detain us here.

There is one further subject on which I have important changes to announce. The government has been seeking a fair and effective source of revenue for the national system of television broadcasting being developed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in accordance with the general policy that was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The government's policy is to have the cost of the national television service paid, as far as that is practicable, by those who benefit from such service. It also wishes the C.B.C. to have a direct source of revenue, on which it can budget over a period, and not to be dependent upon annual appropriations to finance its operations. We wish to emphasize that it is a separate corporate body, under the general control of parliament but not a part of the government.

Television operations have just recently commenced and their development has been financed by loans specifically authorized in the estimates. It is now expected that, in addition to commercial television revenues, the C.B.C. will require about $6 million in the next fiscal year to meet operating costs of television, including interest on loans. This requirement will increase over the next few years, perhaps to about $10 million. Some part of these needs during the development period may properly be met from loans, and paid from future revenues, but we should start now with a plan to provide adequate revenues over the long run.

It is therefore proposed that the Canadian Broadcasting Act should be amended to provide that the corporation should in future receive from month to month the amount of revenue yielded by the present 15 per cent special excise tax on television sets and the picture tubes for such sets, and on such parts and accessories for television sets as are taxable under the excise act. In this way those who buy sets, or the replacement tubes for them, will be providing the basic revenue necessary for C.B.C. television services. In order to make this plan effective, it will be necessary to revise the regulations to provide that tourists returning to Canada may not include as baggage eligible for free entry television sets or the picture tubes for use in them.

Having decided upon this plan in regard to television, we have now come to the conclusion that a similar transfer of the 15 per cent special excise tax revenue can and should be made to assist in financing radio broadcasting, in place of the present licence fee. Although the continuation of this fee had been recommended by the Massey commission, experience has convinced us that it is uneconomical to collect such a small individual fee from such a high proportion of Canadian families, if any satisfactory alternative is open. We believe that payment to the C.B.C. of the amount of revenue received from the 15 per cent special excise tax on radio sets and the taxable parts and accessories for them does provide a satisfactory alternative, at least for the next few years until the present statutory grant for radio broadcasting is reviewed at the end of its five-year term. Consequently we are proposing that the broadcasting act should provide for this transfer of revenue, as well as that for television, and that the order in council under the Radio Act setting the present licence fees of $2.50 should be revoked with effect from April 1.

Mr. Fraser: It should never have been put on.

Mr. Abbott: Don't you like this, Gordon?

I estimate that the amount of revenue to be received by the C.B.C. under these arrangements will be approximately $12 million in the next fiscal year, the amount in respect of radio probably exceeding somewhat that for television. The public will be relieved of paying something over $6 million in radio licence fees, this next fiscal year, and our expenditure in collecting such fees, anticipated at $700,000 in the estimates, will be saved.

SUMMARY OF TAX CHANGES

I am now in a position to summarize the total effect of all these tax changes on the balancing of the budget, and I ask leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, to insert in Hansard at this point the usual summary tables.

The net reductions in taxes which I have proposed amount to $237 million in this fiscal year, and to $361 million in a full fiscal year. Radio licence fees have never been treated as part of our tax revenue, but including the dropping of this item the full saving to the public in the coming fiscal year will be about $243 million.

Of the tax reductions in the coming year $100 million is on the personal income tax, $97 million is on the corporate income tax and $40 million is on commodities.

In a full year the reduction in the personal income tax will be $185 million, in the corporate income tax $136 million and in the commodity field $40 million.

My revised forecast shows revenues at $4,473 million. My forecast of expenditures will, however, have to be increased to $4,462 million to take account of the proposed transfer to the C.B.C. On this basis the forecast surplus is $11 million. As was the case last year, this is, of course, budgeting in fact for an even balance.

That, Mr. Speaker, concludes the presentation of my budget. This is the eighth budget which I have had the honour to bring down. The years covered by these budgets have been remarkable years. They have had their difficulties—serious difficulties—yet they have been years of sustained progress unmatched in our previous history. These achievements have been the collective achievements of the Canadian people—rapidly growing in numbers—who have been busy about their own affairs, working, developing and exploring, saving and investing in the future. The task of government in these times has been to promote a healthy climate for sound development, to promote a climate in which both wealth and welfare can flourish, in which we can all enjoy the highest combination of freedom and security in both social and national terms.

The record of this Liberal government in the past four years is one of which we can all be proud. We have expanded and improved our earlier programs of social welfare and we have introduced a sound system of universal old age security. We have provided large financial assistance to improved health services in every province. By our expansion of scientific services and technical surveys we have been steadily rolling back our frontiers. In reply to threats of external aggression we have played a significant role in developing an effective system of regional collective security and we have financed our proper share of its cost. We have balanced our budgets and reduced our public debt. The threatening surge of inflation has been halted, and indeed has been reversed. We have enormously improved, even if we have not wholly solved, the complicated relationships of federal-provincial finance, and we have done this in a growing atmosphere of good will and of mutual respect and understanding.

The outbreak of aggression in Korea compelled us for a while to reverse the steady march of tax reductions, but within 18 months we were able to resume our course. A year ago taxes were reduced by $146 million a year. This evening I have proposed further reductions totalling $361 million a year. This makes the very substantial total of $507 million of tax reduction in two years, and means that we have been able to withdraw two-thirds of the additional tax burden imposed in September, 1950, and April, 1951, and still carry our proper share of the costs of collective defence.

This is a record of which I am frankly proud. It is a record of which we can all be proud, but those of us who have consistently supported the policies on which it has been based are perhaps entitled to a special sense of satisfaction.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now table the resolutions which I will move when the house is in committee.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the confident rumours about the change of plans of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) have made me decide that no doubt there will be another occasion on which I can speak in a personal way, and tonight I propose to stick wholly to business.

It would appear that this budget is popular amongst those who think they are going to benefit from it, but it remains to be seen how far that will go throughout the Canadian people. It looks to me at the moment as though it going to benefit most those who perhaps need it least.

Mr. Speaker, the political cycle has turned full circle, and we are around again to tax reductions which of course, as we know, means an election year. I have tried in this house to speak with moderation, but I confess that when I find this old game worked again it fills me with a great deal of questioning, not to say indignation. It seems to me a pity that it is accepted practice, apparently, that tax reductions are timed, not having regard to the interests of those concerned, namely the taxpayers, but rather having regard to the interests of the government, of the party in office. And I think that this is all wrong. I think we have got to the stage where it seems that the quip of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) about fooling the public is something that has become a matter of government policy. What kind of people does the government think Canadians are?

An hon. Member: Good Liberals.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am talking about the Canadian people, not the people in this House of Commons. Does the government think the Canadian people will forget what happened in 1949? Do they think the taxpayers will forget to ask how much of their money the government is taking, as well the little which they are giving back? Do they think the people of this country will forget to ask whether this money comes from savings or merely from further exactions?

We have been told by the minister that $400 million more was taken this year, and in the coming year there would have been another $300 million. If the minister had added $250 million more he could have given us back $500 million instead of $250 million. So it depends upon how much he took to begin with.

I think the people will remember when they compare this with the effort of four years ago that taxes then were about half what they are today. In 1949-50 they were $2,300 million. Now they are about $4,400 million. No wonder we have angry taxpayers who say, "Let the government have the whole thing, and just give us back a little money for ourselves."

It is a sort of cat and mouse game. Every few years the cat—that is, the tax collector—treats the mouse well for a year, and gives him a little cheese—we have plenty of cheese in this country. He gives him a little cheese, and fattens him a bit, so he will be available for further exactions in the year following.

Now, I have asked whether there is any saving, and of course the answer is that there is not. And let no one imagine that it is all in the defence department that there are extra expenditures. It is nothing of the kind. There is plenty of additional expenditure in other departments, as I shall point out briefly. For instance freight, express and cartage in 1949-50 was only $8,800,000; it is now $18 million; telephone and other communications charges are up from $8 million to about $13 million.

I wish also to refer to the tax rebate we have at the moment. This will do precious little for the small man, with the small reduction that he gets. The man with $2,400 will have his tax reduced from $17 in 1953, at the existing rate, to a rate of $16 for the last six months of 1953; and when the full-year rate comes into effect it will be down to $15. In other words he will get, as I figure it roughly, one-thousandth of a cent per meal. And that is all he will get out of it. It seems to me that this method of a flat rate reduction is not fair to those who are receiving small amounts, at the lower end of the scale. Of course it may be comforting to the man with $200,000, who will get a reduction of $15,000, or the man with $100,000 who gets about $7,000. But it will not assist very much the man who has been given one or two dollars.

Those people would have been much better off if the minister had seen his way clear to reduce the sales tax; but the minister has been obdurate about the sales tax. We tried two years ago to get him to forgo the increase in the sales tax made at that time, but he would not hear of it. And still he refuses. So those people who are getting practically nothing out of the reduction in the income tax will also get nothing from any sales tax reduction.

But my real concern about all this is that these reductions could have been far more if it were not for the waste and extravagance which pervades the whole government program. Of course we hear about these reductions. The minister and I will not gain from the reduction on tobacco as much as some people, because we do not smoke. But people cannot live on tobacco or on cigarettes. And that 4 cents a package will not help very much the man who gains only $1 of reduction in his income tax.

Now I wish to come to the question of waste and extravagance. We have listened to what the minister had to say. Of course it has been avidly snapped up by those whose business it is to believe in everything the government does. That is their stock in trade. Let us have a look at the waste and extravagance. There is plenty of it about. So that I may be quite fair—and in this party we always want to be fair—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —let me read from that great Liberal stalwart, that great Liberal journal, the Winnipeg Free Press. Let us see the word of condemnation which they have for this government; let us see what they have to say. This is in the issue of January 31, 1953, in case any of you gentlemen wish to educate yourselves by looking it up. They say:

> To suggest that large scale economies cannot be made in so huge an outlay is most unhelpful. On every hand, evidence of waste and extravagance accumulates.

And let us see about that accumulation. Again I read from the Winnipeg Free Press. They seem to be indignant because $24,278 was spent on a broadcast from Montreal to South America. They do not seem to think very much of that. And now we come to what I think is the most astounding bit of waste and extravagance I have run across, and this is also confirmed in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 5 where it says:

> The excessive costs of the C.B.C. television stations and studios compared to those in the United States. The C.B.C. Toronto and Montreal stations and studios cost $3 million each. But a new and powerful United States television station is now going up at Bellingham, just across the United States border from Vancouver and Victoria, at a cost of some $80,000.

I said at first surely that could not be; it must be that we were not comparing like with like. I made an investigation into the matter. Upon investigation it appears the C.B.C. attempted to explain away these figures. But the C.B.C. explanation will not wash. I think a great part of the explanation was given to me by a man, in very simple words that I believe the people of this country will believe. He said, "It all depends upon the attitude you take toward money." And that, I think, is exactly the truth.

To give a very small illustration, the same man told me that he had seen specifications for a building that was to last for only 90 days for some C.B.C. purpose. In the specifications there was provision for three coats of waterproof paint, and that for only 90 days.

I come now to the Department of National Defence. That I believe is the great sinkhole of government waste and extravagance. The situation there is really fantastic. Apparently the government is taking the position that the people of Canada are not to be allowed to have a look at the state of their business. I need not detain the house by reminding you of the relevant facts—the anonymous letter with regard to Petawawa, the appointment of Mr. Currie, the appearance of Mr. Currie before the committee—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —as reported in the press.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow reference to the proceedings in a committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Not in the press, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I will say that there has been no breakdown in this house of anything that Mr. Currie has said. I refer also to the facts in the report of the Auditor General and his reference to eight different systems of accounting. Ask any businessman what that would mean in the conduct of business. The Auditor General in a letter to the department has referred to the posting of the ledgers as inaccurate and in arrears, and that was in the pay department. In the face of that it is almost unbelievable that the government should refuse to permit any kind of independent examination.

There can be no motive at all except fear of the result. What other motive could there be? If Liberal members of this house think it is a joke to suggest that, they have a queer idea of humour. It just shows what we have always been saying, that there is great danger of irresponsibility.

Let me state the facts again which are now on the records of this house. Mr. Currie investigated something like one-tenth of one per cent—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is in the report which is in Hansard; that has nothing to do with the committee. Mr. Currie investigated about one-tenth of one per cent of the expenditures and there is now a refusal in this house to permit the matter to be carried further.

However comforted the minister may be by the ovation he has had tonight; however much the minister may look like the cat that swallowed the canary, I think if we can get these things to the people of Canada they will say, "We will take this sop which we have been given but we will take it only on account." However, when many of them examine it they are going to find that there is precious little for them in it. When it is digested there will be a large number of people who will say, "Where are those who are getting benefits from this? It is not us." I think they will also say that they are not satisfied and are not going to be fooled.

If we look back just four short years we can see what happened then. In 1949 the minister came along with little reductions here and there on things like candy and chocolate bars. Those were trivial things and did not have much effect upon the economy, but they were things with which he was reaching out for votes here and there. Then they were all repealed shortly after.

Having regard to the large increases in the expenditures of non-defence departments since 1949; having in mind the outrageous waste, and I repeat the words "outrageous waste" in these instances I have brought before the house; having in mind particularly the huge unexplored seas of expenditure in the Department of National Defence; having in mind such carelessness as is reported in the evening papers where reference is made to the expenditure of $135,000 on a house in Ottawa without authority, apparently in the most careless manner; having regard to all these things I consider it is reasonable to say that on the evidence of waste and inefficiency before us any reasonable person would say that the kind of savings that might be made would be not in millions or tens of millions, they could run into scores of millions and perhaps even into hundreds of millions if these things were pursued.

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) the debate was adjourned.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue the consideration of the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister concerning the Emergency Powers Act. Then if the Leader of the Opposition is in the house we will take up the resolution to revise the Yukon Act so we may continue to discuss the point of order under standing order 60.

Mr. Drew: What does the minister mean by "if the Leader of the Opposition is in the house"?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am repeating what I announced yesterday, because I was not sure that the Leader of the Opposition would be here.

Mr. Drew: I rise on a question of privilege. I noticed certain remarks that were made. I have explained already why I was not present. The Speaker was informed why I was not going to be present. I will be here to discuss this matter when it comes up.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I withdraw that part of what I have said, and the Leader of the Opposition will be here tomorrow. We shall then go on to Bill No. 48, respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices.

Mr. Drew: Will you ask the Prime Minister to stay in at the same time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have enough to do to take care of the Leader of the Opposition; I cannot take care of everybody.

Mr. Casselman: Better look after yourself.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the house wishes to know the business for tomorrow I am ready to give it. We shall then take the resolution in the name of the Minister of Fisheries to approve and confirm the international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, signed by Canada, the United States and Japan. I hope we will have time to take up the following bills: Nos. 44, 46, 38 and 39.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BUDGET PAPERS

FOREWORD

The purpose of these Papers is twofold:

1. to present a general economic review of 1952, bringing together in one place and in convenient form some of the more comprehensive indicators of economic conditions prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other Government Agencies, together with brief comments;

2. to present a preliminary review of the Government accounts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953.

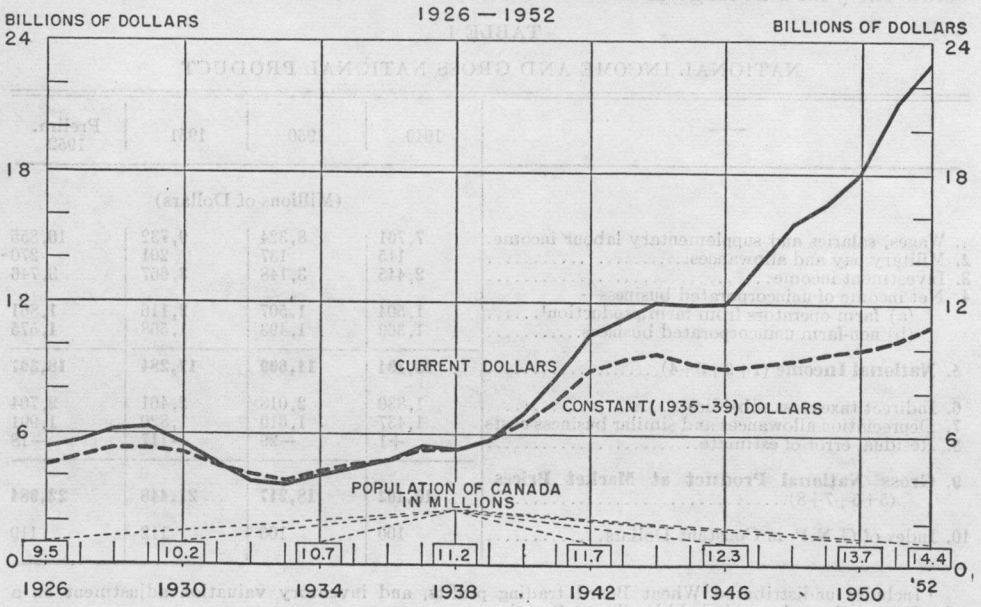
The tables in this Budget Paper are based upon estimates provided by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other Government Departments. Some of the figures appear for the first time; others have been published elsewhere. All 1952 estimates are preliminary and subject to revision.

THE NATIONAL ACCOUNTS



National Income, Product and Expenditure

National Income is the total of the annual earnings of Canadian residents from the production of goods and services. As such it includes salaries, wages and other forms of employee earnings in cash or in kind, as well as military pay and allowances. It includes corporation profits, interest, net rent, and the net income of farmers and others who are in business on their own account.

Gross National Product is the value at market prices of all the goods and services produced in a year by the labour, capital, and enterprise of Canadian residents. It is measured by adding together the costs of production. Part of these costs of production are the factor costs or, more simply, the earnings of the factors of production, labour, capital and enterprise; and the total of these factor costs or earnings is National Income. Indirect taxes and other costs such as depreciation allowances also enter into the cost of goods and services although they do not form part of the income of Canadians. They are, therefore, added to National Income to obtain Gross National Product. Subsidies on the other hand may be regarded as offsets to costs of production and are therefore deducted.

Gross National Expenditure measures the same aggregate as Gross National Product but in a different way. The goods and services produced in a year are either sold at home or abroad or added to inventories. Thus Gross National Expenditure is obtained by adding together all sales and adjusting them for imports and changes in inventories. While Canadian expenditure on imported goods and services is included in the total sales to consumers, to governments, and to business for capital account, it is not part of the disposition of Canadian production and is therefore deducted. But since foreign expenditures on Canadian goods and services, i.e., exports, form part of the earnings of Canadians in the Gross National Product, they are included in Gross National Expenditure.

National Income and Product

Preliminary estimates indicate a gross national product of about $23 billion for 1952. After allowing for the fact that prices averaged somewhat higher in 1952 than in 1951, it is estimated that the increase in terms of volume or real product was about 6 per cent.

While these estimates of change in real product are only approximate, they indicate that 1952 was the third successive year in which the growth in real product was of the order of 5 to 6 per cent. For the three-year period, 1950–1952 inclusive, the total gain has amounted to about 19 per cent, or in per capita terms to a little more than 10 per cent. This rate of gain in real product is more than double that of the preceding three-year period.

As in 1951, a substantial part of the estimated increase in total real product, perhaps a quarter, was the result of increased agricultural production. This increase in agricultural product was almost entirely due to the record western grain crop since other branches of agricultural production did little more than maintain 1951 levels. There were also significant increases in the construction industry, in transportation, communication and storage, in public utilities, in trade and in the service industries which together accounted for more than half of the total increase in real product. Manufacturing production appears to have been about 2 per cent above 1951 levels.

The index of industrial production for the first eleven months of 1952 shows a modest gain of 2 per cent over the comparable period of 1951; and for the year as a whole will probably be 3 per cent above 1951. But it is important to note that these averages obscure significant differences in the pattern of industrial activity in the two years. The year 1951 started off very strongly and the index of industrial production reached a peak of 237·3 in June, from which point it declined steadily to a low of 211·6 in December. In the year 1952, on the other hand, the index of industrial production rose steadily from 212·1 in January to 248·1 in November, or by 17 per cent. In other words, the index of industrial production is estimated to have ended 1952 at about 3 per cent above the year's average of 233, while in 1951 it ended the year about 7 per cent below the year's average of 226·5.

[1] Includes undistributed Wheat Board trading profits, and inventory valuation adjustment on a calendar year basis for grain held by Wheat Board.

The increase in labour income, the largest component of national income, is estimated at $1123 million for 1952—$100 million greater than the increase in national income itself. As a percentage of national income, labour income rose from 56 per cent in 1951 to 59 per cent in 1952. For the year as a whole, total salaries and wages increased by 12 per cent over 1951 and the increase was continuous throughout the year. Most of the gain was due to higher earnings but there was also an expansion of about 3 per cent in the number of paid workers.

Despite the record western grain crop, net farm income showed a decline of about 12 per cent from the very high level of 1951, but remained 24 per cent above the levels of 1949 and 1950. This was largely the result of lower prices for livestock. A special factor in the decline in Canadian livestock prices was the loss of the United States cattle market following the outbreak of foot and mouth disease in Western Canada; but even before this outbreak, the downward trend in United States meat prices was reducing the yields to Canadian livestock producers. The impact of this downward movement in market prices was mitigated by federal government price support action.

Investment income is estimated to have increased by 2 per cent in 1952 compared with increases of 16 per cent in 1951, 29 per cent in 1950 and a decrease of 1 per cent in 1949. This slower rate of growth in total investment income during 1952 can be ascribed to the estimated decline in corporation profits. Corporation profits constitute about two-thirds of total investment income and were very buoyant in 1950 and 1951. Such evidence as is available suggests that the trend in corporation profits is again upward from the lower levels reached in the latter part of 1951 and the early part of 1952.

National Expenditure

During 1952 the volume of Canadian production increased by 6 per cent. At the same time, the amount of inventory accumulation was much smaller in 1952 than in 1951. Consequently the volume increase in goods and services used during 1952 for purposes other than additions to inventory was much closer to 9 per cent than to 6 per cent. This increase was distributed across all the broad categories of expenditure, but consumer expenditure and government expenditure together absorbed about 80 per cent of it.

Consumer expenditure rose from $13,234 million in 1951 to $14,290 million in 1952, an increase of 8 per cent in value and 6 per cent in real terms. This is in sharp contrast with the year 1951 when consumer expenditure in real terms remained almost constant. As noted above, however, there was in 1952 a much smaller drain on production for purposes of increasing inventories than in 1951. The expansion in consumer expenditure, and in defence expenditure, and capital investment as well, may be thought of in part as replacing the demand for inventory accumulation which fell so sharply.

About two-thirds of the $1,010 million increase in government expenditure on goods and services was the result of the increase in defence spending. In real terms the increase in defence and non-defence spending on goods and services was a little larger than the increase in consumer expenditure. Investment in plant, equipment and housing increased by $328 million, an increase of 9 per cent in value and 5 per cent in volume. Inventory accumulation as a whole was lower than at any time since 1949. There were large increases in both the value and volume of farm inventories and grain held in commercial channels but the value of business inventories declined during the year. However, this decrease in the value of business inventories was the result of lower prices rather than a volume reduction.

Personal Income and its Disposition

For the purpose of showing the relationship between the incomes, spending and saving of Canadians, Personal Income is a more useful concept than National Income.

Personal Income differs from National Income in a number of ways. It is defined as the sum of current receipts of income regardless of whether these receipts are earnings from production. Thus it includes only that part of corporation profits which is actually received by Canadian persons as dividends. Similarly deductions must also be made from employees' total earnings for unemployment insurance contributions or pensions contributions which, although forming part of the compensation for services performed, are not actually received by the employee within the year. On the other hand, transfer payments such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' benefits and charitable contributions of corporations, are part of personal income although they are not payments for services and, therefore, do not form part of National Income.

A special adjustment is necessary for farm income since the farmer does not receive full payment for his grain at the time it is delivered to the Wheat Board. An initial payment is made upon delivery and subsequent payments are determined on the basis of the price realized by the Board. Thus for a time a part of the farmer's income accumulates with the Wheat Board. For purposes of national income, net farm income is shown in Table 1 on an accrued basis and includes income accumulated with the Wheat Board on behalf of farmers. For purposes of personal income, however, an adjustment is necessary to exclude such accumulated income and to include only the disbursements of the Wheat Board whether in respect of current or prior years' deliveries.

Total personal income rose by $1,294 million or 8 per cent during 1952 despite a substantial decline in farm income from its record 1951 level. This increase in personal income was almost wholly a gain in real income since consumer prices as represented by the consumer price index averaged only 2·5 per cent higher than in 1951. The gain in real income was somewhat greater in the latter part of the year as prices continued a gradual downward movement while incomes continued to expand.

The increase in personal income was due in the main to two factors, the steady expansion in salaries and wages and the beginning of the old age security payments. About 85 per cent of the increase in personal income was the result of the 12 per cent rise in labour income net of employer and employee contributions to social insurance and government pension funds. Government transfer payments rose by $336 million, two-thirds of which was accounted for by the increase in old age security payments. Military pay and allowances were $69 million higher, or 34 per cent above the 1951 level.

Net income received by farmers declined by 14 per cent from the record level of 1951 but was about 25 per cent above the average of 1949 and 1950. The decline in farm receipts was mainly the result of lower prices for agricultural products, although lower Wheat Board disbursements were a contributing factor. As mentioned above, the volume of agricultural production was considerably higher than in 1951. Income of unincorporated business other than farming is estimated to have increased slightly. Dividends paid out by corporations decreased somewhat but investment income from other sources was higher.

There were also significant differences from 1951 in the disposition of income. Payments for personal direct taxes increased by $291 million or 28 per cent. This was partly because of the fact that it was the first full year for which the higher rates imposed after Korea had been in effect, but most of the increase can be attributed to the rise in incomes.

While disposable income, or personal income after taxes, increased by $1,003 million, personal expenditure rose by $1,056 million. Thus Canadians enjoyed a substantially higher level of consumption in 1952 without materially affecting their rate of savings. In fact, if we deduct saving in the form of farm inventories, which is subject to special influences, the estimated $1,295 million saved in 1952 was higher than the amount saved in 1951. Personal saving, excluding saving in the form of farm inventories, was 8·2 per cent of disposable income in 1952 compared with 8·3 per cent in 1951, 4·8 per cent in 1950 and 9·0 per cent in 1949.

Purchases of durable consumer goods declined rapidly after the first quarter of 1951 and this situation continued until the spring of 1952. At that time a number of factors appear to have combined to cause an increase in retail sales. Consumer credit restrictions were withdrawn and the special excise taxes on certain goods were reduced. In general, the restraint in consumer buying over the preceding months had contributed to lower prices and this, together with the rise in money incomes, resulted in a continuous increase in the buying potential. Moreover, the slower pace of spending during the preceding twelve months had probably created a new backlog of demand. At any rate, the increase in durable goods sales was such that for 1952 as a whole they exceeded 1951 by 12 per cent in value and about 10 per cent in volume. There was a sharp increase in consumer debt associated with the pick-up in sales of durables which occurred in the last eight months of the year. In the non-durable group there were also sizeable increases in both food and clothing, and services continued to expand. After allowing for price changes, the volume of total consumer expenditure rose by about 6 per cent or in per capita terms by about 3 per cent.

Source and Disposition of Saving

Saving is the source from which investment expenditure is financed. Income arising out of production may either be spent or saved. At the same time production will be absorbed either by consumption expenditure, or by investment expenditure at home for new plant, equipment, housing, or additions to inventory, or by investment abroad. It is, therefore, possible to construct tables which show, on the one hand, the sources of saving and, on the other, the use of these savings to finance gross investment at home or investment abroad.

In addition to personal saving which was mentioned above, there can be government saving and business saving. If, for example, governments have a surplus of revenue over expenditure, this surplus constitutes part of the nation's saving, as presented in the national accounts. If there are government deficits they are an offset to the total of private saving by individuals and businesses.

During 1952 it is estimated that the nation as a whole saved $530 million less than in 1951, a decline of 11 per cent. This was not due, however, to any decline in the rate of private saving. But the total surplus for all levels of government combined dropped by $733 million or from $1,034 million in calendar year 1951 to $301 million in calendar year 1952. Thus the amount saved during the year by persons and businesses, although substantially unchanged from 1951 in absolute amount, became relatively more important and constituted 94 per cent of total saving in 1952 compared with 82 per cent in the previous year.

Personal saving for 1952 is estimated at $1,538 million or almost 10 per cent of personal disposable income. It constituted 34 per cent of the nation's total saving from all sources compared with 32 per cent in 1951. If saving in the form of farm inventories is excluded, personal saving was somewhat higher than in 1951. This fact, taken in conjunction with the rise in the volume of consumer expenditure, directs attention to the noteworthy improvement in real income which occurred during the year.

In 1952, about 7 per cent of the nation's total saving was made up of the combined surplus of federal, provincial and municipal governments compared with about 21 per cent in 1951. This reduction in government saving was entirely the result of the reduction in the federal surplus as estimated for national accounts purposes.

It is estimated that our total receipts from abroad on current account exceeded our total payments by $150 million in 1952 and there was, therefore, a net increase of like amount in our foreign assets. This was in sharp contrast to both 1950 and 1951 when there were substantial net inflows of capital from abroad. Thus the nation's total investment in 1952 comprised not only gross domestic investment in plant, equipment and housing but a modest foreign investment or increase in our net foreign assets. These transactions are treated more fully in the section on the Balance of International Payments.

Business saving consists for the most part of amounts set aside for depreciation and of undistributed profits. The preliminary estimate of corporation profits before taxes indicates a reduction tentatively set at $120 million or about 4 per cent below the 1951 total. Since this decrease in corporation profits is larger than the estimated reduction in corporation taxes and dividend payments, some decline in undistributed profits seems probable. However, it is too early in the year to estimate any of these aggregates with confidence.

Investment and Capital Expenditure

It is estimated that investment in plant, equipment and housing amounted to $4,138 million in 1952, an increase of $328 million or 9 per cent over 1951. It was approximately 18 per cent of gross national expenditure in both years. The largest increase was in non-residential construction which was 17 per cent above 1951 in value and 10 per cent in volume. Housing rose by almost 3 per cent in value terms but after allowances are made for price changes the indicated volume was virtually unchanged. However, residential building activity rose markedly in the last half of the year with housing starts running at the annual rate of more than 90,000 compared with 70,000 for 1951. Investment in machinery and equipment was larger than in 1951 by 5 per cent in value and 4 per cent in volume but this increase was much less pronounced than the 27 per cent value increase of 1951. The most significant change in the pattern of investment during 1952 was the much lower percentage of total production diverted to increasing business inventories. Business inventories are estimated to have increased by 1 per cent in volume compared with the 11 per cent increase of 1951. In 1951 the large inventory build-up together with the increase in defence spending placed a considerable strain on the economy and absorbed about 80 per cent of the increase in output for that year. In 1952, on the other hand, the decline in the rate of inventory accumulation freed production for other purposes and was great enough to make room for not only all of the increase in investment in plant, equipment and housing but more than one-half of the increase in consumer spending as well.

Table 9 gives an industrial distribution of business capital expenditures and brings them together with public capital outlays included under government expenditure in Table 2. The total of public and private capital expenditures increased by $545 million or 12 per cent during 1952. In real terms the increase is estimated at 8 per cent. The most noteworthy feature of the 1952 capital programme was the increase in expenditure by those industries contributing directly to the defence effort and those engaged in developing the strategic natural resources of the nation. The increased emphasis on investment in large scale resource development projects became apparent after 1948. The demand generated by Western re-armament after the outbreak of war in Korea provided a further incentive for this type of development. At the same time government measures encouraged the deferment of less essential forms of capital investment.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

During 1952 the increase in capital outlays in four groups, utilities, manufacturing, mining and government departments was slightly greater than the total increase in capital expenditure. Capital outlays by government departments increased by $183 million or 31 per cent and accounted for one-third of the total increase in capital expenditure during 1952. Almost all of this increase was for federal government defence projects and for capital assistance to industries filling defence contracts. Capital expenditure in utilities, mining and manufacturing increased by $376 million or 20 per cent. Included in the sectors showing important gains over 1951 were new developments in iron ore mining, asbestos mining and oil well drilling. In manufacturing the largest increases were in chemicals, iron and steel, oil refineries, non-ferrous metals, transportation equipment and in electric apparatus and supplies. In the utilities group the largest single increase was in oil and gas pipe lines. Steam railways, telephones, central electric stations, water works and water transport also showed important gains. These increases were offset to some extent by significant declines in trade, finance and commercial services, and to a lesser extent in some manufacturing industries catering to consumer needs.

Revenue and Expenditure of All Governments

In Table 10 "Government Transactions Related to the National Accounts" an attempt is made to bring together in one statement and under uniform headings, the activities of all governments in Canada on a calendar year basis.

The table is designed to include only those transactions which have relevance for the National Accounts, and consequently the surpluses or deficits shown here do not agree with those shown in the various public accounts. It has been necessary to adjust the conventional accounting statements of fiscal year revenue and expenditure to exclude certain transactions such as those relating to reserves, write-offs, amortization, and other non-cash items, as well as the purchase and sale of existing capital assets; and to include the transactions of extra-budgetary funds such as unemployment insurance, old age security, workmen's compensation and government pension funds. Government loans and investments, and debt retirement, are not included in government expenditure.

In the federal accounts, some of the more substantial adjustments are as follows: elimination of reserve for possible losses on active assets, elimination of reserve for veterans' conditional benefits, elimination of expenditures charged with respect to the assumption of Newfoundland debt in 1949, elimination of expenditures charged with respect to shipment from stocks of military equipment to N.A.T.O. countries, addition of expenditures out of Defence Equipment Replacement Account, elimination of write-down of active assets to non-active account, adjustment of corporation taxes to an accrual basis, inclusion of the change in inventories of government commodity agencies and the Defence Production Revolving Fund, adjustment of interest on the public debt from an accrual to a due date basis in 1952, and elimination of sales of war assets. In addition, the federal figures are adjusted to a calendar year basis by using the monthly figures published by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Municipalities are for the most part on a calendar year basis but the provincial figures are based on the provincial fiscal years. Because of the lack of current information the 1952 figures for provincial and municipal governments involve a considerable element of estimation.

Federal government expenditure on goods and services increased by $815 million or 48 per cent in the calendar year 1952. About 84 per cent of this increase was the result of increased defence spending which rose from $1,149 million in 1951 to $1,832 million in 1952. This increase in defence spending absorbed almost one-half of the nation's total increase in real product in 1952. From the standpoint of direct use of resources, the significance of defence spending is also demonstrated by the fact that it constituted almost 75 per cent of the federal government's total expenditure on goods and services in 1952. Excluding the increase in government held inventories, largely associated with price support, federal non-defence spending on goods and services rose by 7 per cent in value and perhaps 1 per cent in volume. The increase in provincial and municipal expenditure on goods and services for 1952 is estimated at a little less than 13 per cent of which about half is estimated to be due to price increases.

Federal transfer payments increased sharply from $987 million in 1951 to $1,378 million in 1952 or by 40 per cent. About two-thirds of this increase is accounted for by the commencement of federal old age security payments of $40 per month to Canadians 70 years of age and over. There were also substantial increases in unemployment insurance benefits and veterans' pensions, and a steady growth in family allowance payments. The combined total of provincial and municipal transfer payments declined because the assumption by the federal government of the cost of old age pensions for those 70 years and over more than offset increases in other items.

Federal government revenues did not increase as rapidly in 1952 as did expenditures. Thus, total federal revenues for the calendar year 1952 are estimated to have increased by $538 million compared with a rise of $1,271 million in expenditures. More than half of the increase in federal revenue came from personal income tax collections which rose by $286 million or 32 per cent. Higher incomes were the major factor in the higher yield of the personal income tax. At the same time, while the higher tax rates effective July 1, 1951 were not substantially changed in 1952, the average reduction of 6 per cent in tax rates being more or less offset by the addition of the old age security levy of 2 per cent on income, they applied in the latter year to a full twelve month period. In contrast to the large increase in personal income tax collections, revenue from corporation taxes was practically unchanged in 1952. There was an estimated increase of $87 million in accrued liability for corporation taxes at the federal level but this was more than offset by the decline in provincial yields. These offsetting changes were largely the result of Ontario's withdrawal from the corporation tax field under the 1952 tax rental agreement and the change in the 1952 tax rental agreements whereby the 5 per cent corporation tax previously levied by the provinces was absorbed into the federal tax structure. During 1952 federal revenues from indirect taxes rose by $100 million or 7 per cent compared to an increase of $100 million or 9 per cent for provincial and municipal governments combined. At the federal level the 10 per cent sales tax applicable for twelve months instead of nine in the previous year and the expansion in consumer spending outweighed the reduction in certain excise tax rates which took effect in April, 1952.

For all levels of government combined, indirect taxes exceeded direct taxes by 22 per cent in 1949, 15 per cent in 1950 and 4 per cent in 1951; but in 1952 they were almost equal.

As indicated above, federal expenditures for the calendar year 1952 increased a great deal more rapidly than did revenues. Consequently the surplus, as calculated for national accounts purposes, fell from $1,006 million in the calendar year 1951 to $273 million in 1952. It constituted 6 per cent of the nation's total saving in 1952 compared with 20 per cent in 1951. The combined surplus of all provincial and municipal governments is estimated at $28 million for 1952, unchanged from 1951.

The federal surplus shown for National Accounts purposes differs substantially from the public accounts surplus, not only because of the difference between the calendar and fiscal year, but because of other adjustments made to both revenues and expenditures to make the presentation consistent with figures shown for other sectors of the economy. A reconciliation table has, therefore, been appended to the government table which summarizes the major adjustments.

GOVERNMENT DIRECT AND INDIRECT TAXATION

Direct taxes include taxes on personal and corporate income, succession duties and personal fees.
Indirect taxes include taxes on commodities, services, real property and business fees.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

When goods are exported, unless they are given away, they give rise to payments or debts in favour of Canada. Similarly, when goods are imported they give rise to payments or debts in favour of the rest of the world. Other transactions such as interest and dividend payments, the tourist trade, freight and shipping charges, also give rise to similar payments or debts in either direction. The difference between the debits and credits arising from these current transactions is referred to as the net balance of international payments on current account. When total debits exceed total credits within a year, as was the case in 1950 and 1951, Canada goes into debt to the rest of the world or the rest of the world pays off some of its debt to Canada. When total credits exceed total debits as was the case in 1952, the net position is, of course, reversed.

During 1952 there was a pronounced improvement in Canada's overall balance of payments position. Exports increased in value by about 10 per cent and imports fell by about 1 per cent. After taking account of adjustments to these merchandise figures and of changes in the service and non-merchandise items, the current surplus for the year is estimated to be about $150 million, in contrast to the deficit of $524 million in 1951.

A significant factor in the improvement of about $674 million in our current position was the change in the terms of trade, the ratio of export prices to import prices. Imports and exports both increased in volume by about 12 per cent in 1952 compared with the previous year. However, 1952 export prices were only slightly below those prevailing in 1951, and the prices of imports declined by more than 12 per cent. Almost all of the change in the terms of trade was concentrated in the last half of 1951 and the first half of 1952. In recent months import and export prices have tended to stabilize, with the terms of trade remaining more or less constant.

The change in the current account between the two years was also affected by the substantial prepayments in 1951 for military equipment for future delivery. In 1952 actual imports of military equipment were larger than payments. Adjustments to the current account arising out of these prepayments tended to increase the size of the deficit in 1951, and improved the net balance in 1952. The deficit for the non-merchandise items in the 1952 current account was somewhat lower than in 1951. Higher net payments on travel account were more than offset by lower net payments for interest and dividends and for other current services.

The sustained level of export prices, at a time when many world prices were declining, reflected the continuing strong demand for Canadian products abroad. Exports of wheat, newsprint and the base metals showed the largest gains during the year, although exports of some manufactures such as automobiles and trucks rose sharply. On the imports side, the main increases were in military equipment, machinery and other manufactures. Imports of some basic primary commodities such as wool and cotton were substantially lower than in 1951.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

Trade with the United States showed no pronounced changes, with exports to that country slightly higher in spite of the embargo on cattle and meat sales arising out of the foot and mouth outbreak. The outstanding change in the direction of trade was the rise in exports to overseas countries. Exports to the United Kingdom increased by over $100 million, and to other non-sterling markets by nearly $250 million. The net improvement in the current account was largely the result of increased sales to these overseas countries and some decline in the level of Canadian overseas imports.

Direct investment in Canada and sales of new Canadian issues abroad amounted in magnitude to around $500 million, and provided a further element of strength in the balance of payments. However, the outward movement of capital, largely in the form of liquidations by non-residents of holdings of Canadian securities and the change in commercial accounts receivable and payable and in short-term balances, was even larger than the inflow for direct and long-term investment. There was also an increase in the official reserves of gold and U.S. dollars which rose during 1952 by $82 million, and reached a level of $1,860 million by the end of the year. The net outflow of capital which includes the increase in official reserves of gold and U.S. dollars, was of course equal to the current account surplus.

The strength in the overall balance of payments position contributed to the rise in the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar during the year. From a position of approximate parity with the United States dollar in January 1952, the Canadian dollar appreciated to a premium of 4 per cent in September. Subsequently it declined slightly and ended the year at a premium of about 3 per cent. The strong exchange rate tended to reduce the Canadian dollar prices of both exports and imports, and was an important factor contributing to the decline in the domestic price level.

EMPLOYMENT AND EARNINGS

Canadian labour income is estimated at $10·9 billion for 1952, an increase of 12 per cent over 1951. Although this rise in money income was considerably smaller than the 17 per cent increase in 1951, it was a more significant gain in terms of purchasing power. This is apparent from the fact that the consumer price index rose by 10·5 per cent from 1950 to 1951 but by only 2·5 per cent from 1951 to 1952.

The gain in labour income was common to all the broad industrial categories. Manufacturing, where about one-third of total labour income originates, showed a gain of slightly more than 10 per cent on the basis of ten months' information. An increase of similar amount occurred in the next most important group, which includes public utilities, transportation, communication, storage and trade. The increase in the service industries was somewhat larger. The primary industries, on the other hand, recorded an increase of a little less than 10 per cent. By far the largest gain occurred in the construction industry which showed an increase of 24 per cent.

To some extent the 12 per cent rise in total labour income during 1952 was due to the expansion in employment. On a per capita basis the gains over 1951 have therefore been somewhat less. The annual average earned income per paid worker rose by $200 from $2,600 in 1951 to $2,800 in 1952. This increase of almost 8 per cent was possible because higher rates of pay more than offset the slight decline in the number of hours worked per week. In manufacturing, for example, the drop in hours worked per week was from 41·8 hours in 1951 to 41·4 hours in 1952. Hourly earnings in manufacturing were $1.32 at the end of 1952 compared with $1.24 a year earlier. Average weekly earnings in nine leading non-agricultural industries were $54.13 in 1952, an increase of $4.52 over 1951.

The average civilian labour force, which includes both the employed and the unemployed, grew during 1952 to a total of 5,304,000 persons, an increase of 73,000 or 1·4 per cent over 1951. The average number of persons employed during the year was 5,174,000 or 51,000 more than in 1951. The number of persons with jobs in agriculture declined by 55,000. There was an increase of 106,000 in the number of persons employed in the non-agricultural occupations.

Compared with the previous year, there was a decline of 69,000 in the number of people on short-time work. This drop was particularly noticeable during the latter part of 1952 and indicates an improvement in employment conditions.

Persons without jobs and seeking work averaged 130,000 during 1952 or 2·5 per cent of the labour force, compared with 108,000 or 2·1 per cent in 1951. However these figures are not a complete indication of the difference in employment conditions in the two years. In the first place, the comparison of annual averages hides the improvement in the employment situation during the second half of 1952. In the second place, the total of those without jobs and seeking work is only one indicator of employment conditions. As noted above, there was, particularly in the latter part of 1952, a significant reduction in the number of persons working part time.

During 1952, 53·4 per cent of the non-institutional civilian population over 14 years of age were in the civilian labour force compared with 53·7 per cent in 1951. In addition to the civilian labour force, there were 101,000 in the armed forces at the end of 1952 compared with 88,000 at the end of 1951.

PRICE TRENDS

The period of rapidly rising prices which followed the outbreak of war in Korea carried prices to new peaks. In the case of the wholesale price index the peak was reached in July, 1951 after a rise of 16·5 per cent from June, 1950. Consumer prices were slower to reflect the renewal of inflationary pressure but continued their advance until January, 1952, at which point they were 16 per cent above the June 1950 level. The price declines of 1952 carried the indexes back some distance from their previous high points. The drop in the wholesale price index during 1952 amounted to 6·6 per cent and in the consumer price index to 2 per cent. But all price movements were not consistent with the downward trend in the indexes nor were all groups affected in the same degree. Most noteworthy were the declines in the prices of certain foods and primary products which had risen sharply in the previous advance. At the same time the rise in the value of the Canadian dollar substantially reduced the cost of imports and thus affected a large part of our price structure. But the prices of services and of many goods in which the domestic labour content is high, tended to advance moderately under the pressure of rising wage costs and real incomes.

The index of wholesale prices fell off by 6·6 per cent during the course of the year and for the year as a whole averaged 5·8 per cent lower than in 1951. The more rapid decline occurred during the first five months of the year and amounted to more than 5 per cent. A slight upturn in June and July was again followed by steady month-to-month decreases for the balance of the year, though at a slower rate than for the early months. The decline of the index from 243·7 in July, 1951 to 221·2 in December, 1952, amounted to 9·2 per cent and brought wholesale prices back to a level lower than that which prevailed in the month of September, 1950.

The index of industrial materials fell more rapidly than any other major price component in the wholesale index.

NOTE:—1952 indexes are preliminary.

The decline for the year was almost as great as the decline in the index of farm prices. Fully and chiefly manufactured goods followed a moderate downward trend over the twelve-month period with prices at December, 1952 about 5 per cent below the level at the beginning of the year. The comparative price stability of general building materials is an example of resistance to the general trend. This index moved during the course of the year within a narrow range set by a high of 289·6 in February and a low of 286·2 in April.

The commentary on consumer prices is in terms of the new consumer price index (basis 1949=100) because it is a more complete and up-to-date index of movements in consumer prices than the cost-of-living index which it will soon replace. However, the charts use the old cost-of-living index because its base period (1935-39=100) corresponds to the base periods of the indexes with which it is compared.

Unlike the wholesale price index, the consumer price index did not average less in 1952 than in 1951, although the trend was downward in the early part of the year. At the year-end the index was 0·6 per cent below the average for the year as a whole and 2 per cent below the level at the beginning of the year. This was the first time since 1944 that the index had ended the year lower than it had begun. But as indicated above this movement in the total index must be viewed in the light of the exceptional advance of the previous year and the influence of lower import prices.

[1] Adjusted series United States Consumers' Price Index from January, 1950, forward.

The greatest reduction in the consumer price index for 1952 occurred in the food group. The index of food prices fell by almost 7 per cent during the year, the drop in meat prices being particularly noticeable. This downward adjustment in food prices has been almost continuous since the peak was reached in November, 1951 but the major decline took place in the first half of 1952. The food group was the only group in which prices averaged less for 1952 than for 1951. There was no comparable drop in United States' food prices during 1952; but the percentage rise during 1951 had been little more than one-third as great as in Canada. Prices for clothing also followed a downward trend during 1952. The largest upward movement took place in rents, while the cost of household operation remained practically unchanged. In general, the price of services was higher while the price of goods was lower.

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1952-53

1. INTRODUCTION

Because of the early date at which the budget is being brought down, the figures which are presented in this Part for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953, must be regarded as preliminary and subject to revision. Moreover, while the government's fiscal year ends on March 31, the books must remain open for several weeks after that date in order to record various adjusting entries and to take into account all payments up to and including April 30 made on account of expenditures originating in, and properly chargeable to, the fiscal year 1952-53.

Final figures for each year's operations are not available before some time in August. Normally the Budget White Paper figures are based upon eleven months actual and one month estimated. This year the figures are based on nine months actual and three months estimated. It may well be that the final figures when they become available next August will show somewhat greater variations than usual from those given in the following pages.

2. HIGHLIGHTS OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1952-53

The revenues of the Government for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953, are now estimated at $4,375 million. This is approximately $96 million or just over 2 per cent more than the amount of $4,279 million forecast last year at the time of the budget and about $394 million or nearly 10 per cent more than the total collected in the preceding year. Expenditures are estimated at $4,327 million. On the basis of these figures the indicated surplus is $48 million, compared with $248 million for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952. The fiscal year 1952-53 is therefore the seventh consecutive year in which the financial operations of the Government will result in a budgetary surplus. As a result, the Government's net debt (the excess of total liabilities over total active assets) will be reduced by an equivalent amount, bringing to a total of $2,284 million the amount by which the Government will have reduced its net debt during those seven years. This represents a reduction of more than one-fifth of the total increase in net debt during the entire period of the war and is approximately equivalent to the amount by which the net debt increased during the first three and one-half years after the outbreak of war in 1939.

Although the budgetary surplus for 1952-53 is estimated at $48 million, the Government made loans, advances and other non-budgetary disbursements of about $627 million, while, at the same time, the unmatured funded debt in the hands of the public increased by only $141 million. The manner in which this has been achieved can be understood more readily by taking an over-all view of the Government's cash transactions for the fiscal year.

As explained in greater detail in the section on "The Cash Position", the estimated budgetary surplus of $48 million for the fiscal year does not reflect the full impact of Government operations upon the Canadian economy. Substantial amounts are received and paid out for extra-budgetary purposes (such as the loans and advances which the Government is required to make and the transactions in connection with the many superannuation, insurance, pension, annuity and deposit and trust accounts which it has undertaken to hold or administer).

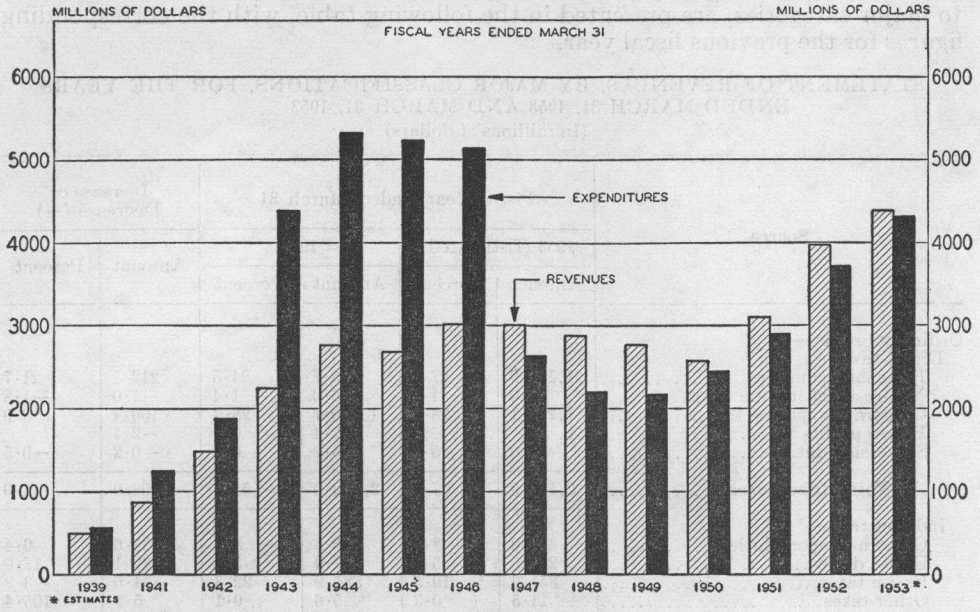
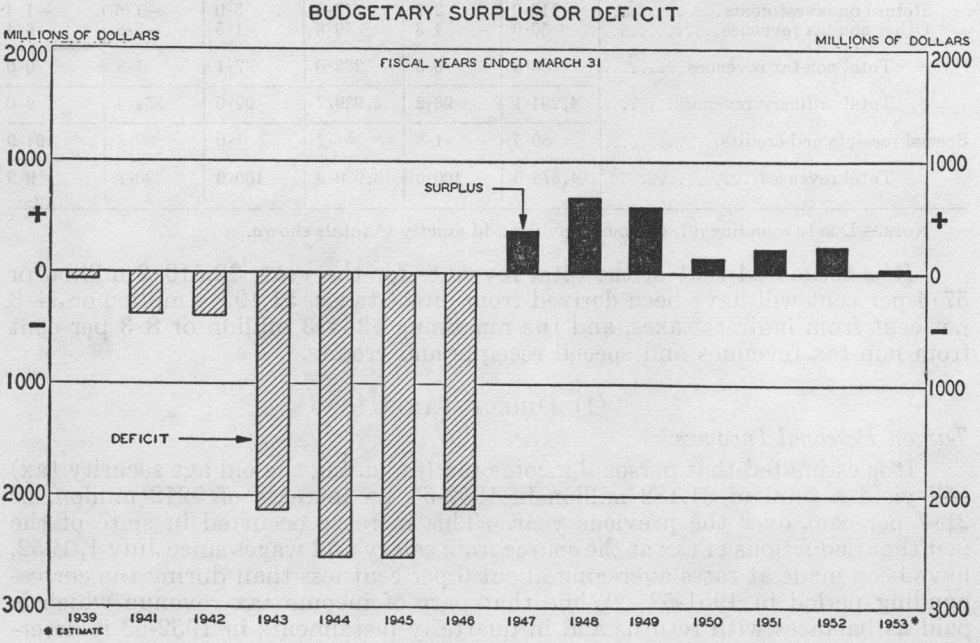
These non-budgetary disbursements are estimated at $627 million and include $125 million to the C.N.R. for capital expenditures on additions and betterments and the acquisition of new rolling stock and equipment, $76 million advanced to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for house construction and for housing loans, $67 million to the Agricultural Prices Support Account, $50 million to the Exchange Fund to finance the increase in our foreign exchange reserves, some $34 million advanced to the Defence Production Revolving Fund to acquire materials essential to Canada's defence programme, about $100 million to finance pension payments out of the Old Age Security Fund which were not covered by old age security tax receipts, $31 million representing the decrease in the Provincial 5 per cent corporation income tax suspense account, and $109 million reflecting a decrease in outstanding cheques and interest and accounts payable. Offsetting these are non-budgetary receipts and credits amounting to $449 million, including $171 million from net annuity, pension and other liability account receipts, $64 million for repayments of sundry loans and investments, the increase of $75 million in the reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets and sundry other items amounting in the aggregate to $139 million.

After taking into account the budgetary surplus of $48 million and the net requirements of $178 million for these non-budgetary transactions it is now estimated the amount that had to be financed by net new borrowing will amount to approximately $130 million. As unmatured funded debt in the hands of the public is expected to increase by approximately $141 million during the year, the Government's cash balances will increase by $11 million.



3. THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS

The table which follows gives a summarized statement of estimated revenues and expenditures and surplus for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, with the comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years:



—	Fiscal Years Ended March 31
	1949	1950	1951	1952	1953 (Estimated)

Surplus	595·5	131·5	211·3	248·0	47·8

Total revenues, estimated at $4,374·6 million for 1952-53, are expected to show an increase of $393·7 million over the total for the previous fiscal year. Total expenditures are estimated at $4,326·8 million or $593·9 million more than the corresponding total for 1951-52.

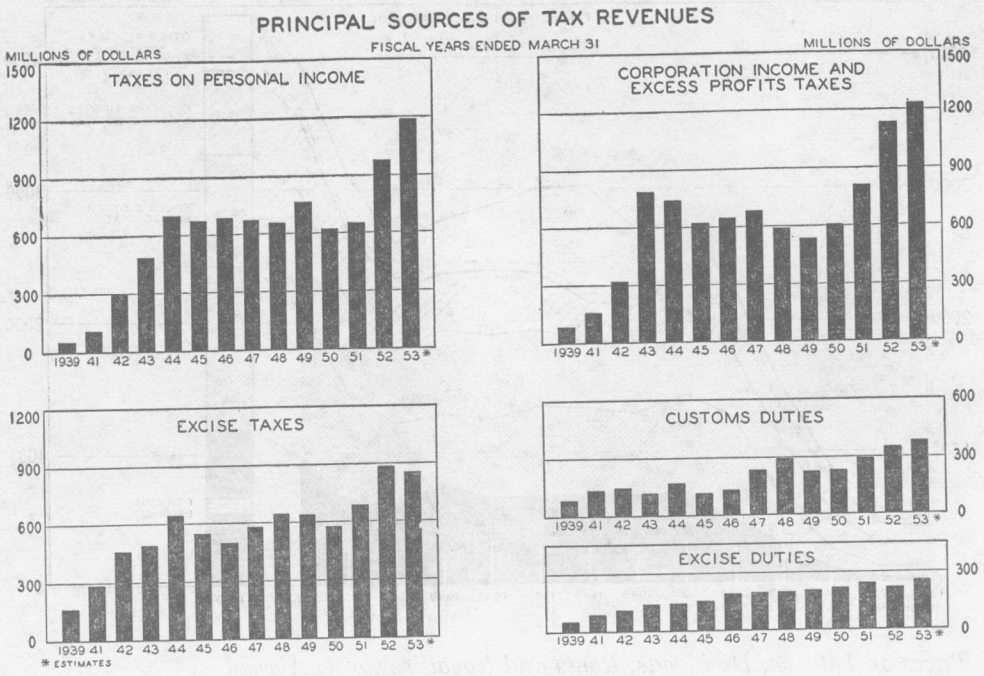
Note.—Due to rounding off, columns may not add exactly to totals shown.

It is estimated that of the total revenues for the year, $2,510·9 million or 57·4 per cent will have been derived from direct taxes, $1,499·4 million or 34·3 per cent from indirect taxes, and the remaining $364·3 million or 8·3 per cent from non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits.

(1) Direct Taxes

Tax on Personal Incomes

It is estimated that personal income tax (excluding the old age security tax) will yield a total of $1,188 million in 1952-53, an increase of $212 million, or 21·7 per cent over the previous year. This increase occurred in spite of the fact that deductions of tax at the source from salary and wages since July 1, 1952, have been made at rates averaging about 6 per cent less than during the corresponding period in 1951-52. While that part of income tax revenue which is paid as balances with returns and in quarterly instalments in 1952-53 is determined by somewhat higher rates than in the previous fiscal year, the greater part of the increase in revenue is attributable to a substantial increase in personal incomes during the year.



Taxes on Interest, Dividends, Rents and Royalties Going Abroad

Revenues under this heading are derived from withholding taxes on payments of interest, dividends, rents and royalties made to non-residents. The estimated total of $54 million is $1 million less than in the previous year.

Corporation Income Tax

Collections from this tax (excluding the old age security tax) are expected to amount to approximately $1,231 million, an increase of 9 per cent over the previous year's total of $1,130·7 million. This increase, which occurred despite the fact that corporation profits for 1952 were lower than in 1951, is due to the changes in the federal rates of tax announced in the 1952 Budget and to the fact that the Province of Ontario entered into a tax rental agreement withdrawing from the corporation tax field as from January 1, 1952. The 5 per cent corporation income tax levied by all provinces except Ontario and Quebec under provisions of the tax rental agreements signed in 1947 was not levied by the provinces on profits earned after December 31, 1951. The 1952 Budget announced that this tax would be incorporated into the federal rates of tax commencing January 1, 1952, increasing the federal rates for 1952 from 15 per cent on the first $10,000 of profits and 45·6 per cent on profits in excess of $10,000, to rates of 20 per cent and 50 per cent respectively. In those provinces which did not enter into a tax agreement, corporations were allowed to take a credit against their federal tax equal to 5 per cent of their profits attributable to operations therein. This reduced the effective federal rate on profits earned in Quebec to 15 per cent on the first $10,000 and 45 per cent on profits in excess of $10,000. As a result of the Province of Ontario entering into a tax agreement, corporations paid federal tax at the full rates of 20 per cent and 50 per cent on their 1952 profits earned in that Province.

The total revenue from corporation income tax includes $8 million paid by corporations paying the 15 per cent tax on their undistributed income. This is $6 million less than that collected from this source in 1951-52.

Succession Duties

Revenue from succession duties is estimated at $38 million for 1952-53, as compared with $38·2 million in the previous year.

(2) Indirect Taxes

Customs Import Duties

Net revenue from customs import duties for the year is estimated at $379 million, an increase of $32·6 million over the total for 1951-52. The total value of imports is not expected to show much change from the previous year, but there appears to have been some reduction in the proportionate value of non-dutiable and low duty goods imported as compared with the quantities and prices of goods subject to higher rates of duty.

Excise Duties

Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. (Additional taxes are levied on tobacco products under the Excise Tax Act). The revenue from these taxes for the year is estimated at $257 million, an increase of $39·1 million over the previous year's total of $217·9 million. This increase is mainly due to increased sales of cigarettes and beer. Gross receipts from excise duties, before deducting refunds, are divided as follows: $136 million from alcoholic beverages ($120·9 million in 1951-52), and $124 million from tobacco products ($100·7 million in 1951-52).

Excise Taxes

Net excise tax collections (excluding the 2 per cent old age security sales tax) are estimated at $852 million in 1952-53, a decrease of $34 million from the previous year.

The principal tax levied under the Excise Tax Act from the standpoint of revenue is the sales tax. The gross revenue from sales tax is estimated at $584 million, a decrease of $3·2 million from the previous year. The decrease is due to the fact that in 1952-53 the sales tax rate levied under the Excise Tax Act is 8 per cent, whereas in 1951-52 the rate was 10 per cent for the first nine months of the fiscal year and 8 per cent after January 1, 1952, when the 2 per cent sales tax provided by the Old Age Security Act came into effect. (The 2 per cent old age security sales tax is expected to yield $142 million as compared with $24·3 million in 1951-52).

It is estimated that excise taxes other than sales tax will yield approximately $284 million, as compared with $312 million in 1951-52. The decrease in revenue from these taxes is due to the tax reductions introduced in April, 1952. At that time items which had been taxed at 25 per cent became taxable at 15 per cent, the 15 per cent tax on stoves, washing machines, and refrigerators, was repealed, the 30 per cent tax on soft drinks was reduced to 15 per cent, and the tax on cigarettes was reduced $1.50 per thousand.

Next to the sales tax the largest revenue source among the excise taxes is the tax on tobacco products which will yield an estimated $107·5 million, an increase of $1·2 million over the previous year. The most important item in this group is the revenue from the tax on cigarettes which is expected to be only about $5 million less than in the previous year despite the reduction in the rate of tax introduced in April, 1952. The revenue from the tax on manufactured tobacco will show a sharp increase for the year.

Most of the other excise taxes will show a decrease in revenue in 1952-53 due to the lower rates in effect for the year. The largest decrease will be in the revenue from the tax on automobiles, tires and tubes, which will yield an estimated $87 million, $13·9 million less than in 1951-52. The tax on soft drinks which was reduced from 30 per cent to 15 per cent, will yield an estimated $13 million as compared with $19·2 million in 1951-52.

Other Indirect Taxes

The taxes under this heading are the tax on premium income of insurance companies, the tax on the export of electrical energy from Canada, and the tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories. These taxes will yield an estimated total of $11·5 million, an increase of $5·9 million over 1951-52. The tax on premium income of insurance companies will yield an estimated $10·7 million as compared with $4·8 million in 1951-52. This increase was brought about by the Province of Ontario's repeal of a similar tax which had been deductible from the federal tax.

(3) Non-Tax Revenues

The total of non-tax revenues for 1952-53 is estimated at $283·8 million compared with $281·9 million for 1951-52. The following table presents a comparative summary of revenues under this heading for the past two years:

NON-TAX REVENUES FOR THE FISCAL YEARS ENDED MARCH 31, 1953 AND MARCH 31, 1952

Gross Post Office receipts for 1952-53 are expected to amount to $129·5 million. After making authorized disbursements from revenue of $17·8 million for salaries and rent allowances at semi-staff and revenue offices, commissions at sub-offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through or delivered in foreign countries, etc., net Post Office receipts credited to budgetary revenues are estimated at $111·7 million. The increase of $7·1 million over the corresponding amount received in 1951-52, is due primarily to the fact that the new postal rates were in effect for nine months in 1951-52 and for twelve months in 1952-53. As costs of operating the Post Office during 1952-53 (excluding the $17·8 million charged to revenue) are expected to total $106·2 million, net revenue will exceed net costs by approximately $5·5 million. However, in making this comparison it is to be noted that the total shown for Post Office revenues does not reflect the value of services rendered free of charge to other departments, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises occupied by the Post Office Department or for certain accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

Return on investments is expected to yield $116 million, a decrease of $1·6 million, compared with the total of $117·6 million received in 1951-52. Due to the conversion of fifty per cent of the C.N.R.'s total fixed interest bearing debt into 4 per cent preferred stock under the provisions of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, interest on loans received from this Company decreased by $21·1 million. This decrease, however, is offset by increases in the profits of the Bank of Canada and the Exchange Fund during 1952 estimated at $4·7 million and $2·2 million respectively and by an amount of $9·7 million received from Polymer Corporation Limited representing dividends and interest on debentures.

A comparative summary of estimated receipts during 1952-53 with actual receipts during 1951-52 under this heading is given in the following table:

The amount credited to premium, discount and exchange in 1952-53 is estimated at $6·8 million compared with a credit of $17·7 million in 1951–52. This revenue item is due mainly to book-keeping adjustments in asset and liability accounts reflecting a reduction in U.S. dollar and sterling exchange rates from those operative in the fiscal year 1951-52. It is estimated that the Canadian dollar equivalent of outstanding debt payable in sterling and in United States dollars will be reduced in consequence of this revaluation by $6·8 million offset by $0·8 million reduction in assets payable in these currencies. The result is a net credit in the premium, discount and exchange account of $6 million. Net differences in rates on current gold and foreign exchange transactions are expected to account for a further credit of $0·8 million resulting in a net revenue item of $6·8 million.

(4) Special Receipts and Credits

Special receipts and credits are estimated at $80·3 million for the fiscal year 1952-53 as compared with total receipts of $41·2 million in the previous year. The following table presents a comparative summary of the sources of special receipts and other credits for the last two years:

SPECIAL RECEIPTS AND OTHER CREDITS FOR THE FISCAL YEARS ENDED MARCH 31, 1953, AND MARCH 31, 1952

Sundry other special receipts and credits	3·0	2·4	0·6

The amount of $7·8 million realized from the disposal of surplus Crown assets represents the estimated receipts during the fiscal year from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation after allowing for transfers to active assets of amounts applicable to "Balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets". It does not include the residual cash balances nor the value of accounts receivable carried by the Corporation as at March 31, 1953.

It is estimated that $8·6 million will be received from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of which $2 million represents surplus funds in excess of the $5 million reserve established by the Corporation, $5·5 million the proceeds of the sale of Wartime Housing properties, and $1·1 million a depreciation reserve built up in previous years on properties that have now been sold by the Corporation. This is in addition to the $9·2 million interest on loans to the Corporation credited to "Return on Investments."

The amount of $45 million represents the transfer to revenue of approximately one-half of the balance of provincial 5 per cent corporation income tax suspense account. For a fuller explanation see sundry suspense (liability) accounts in the section on "Estimated Balance Sheet Position at March 31, 1953".

The other principal items are the transfer to revenue of certain surpluses received in 1948 from The Canadian Wheat Board with respect to oats and barley accounts which had been held in suspense; the estimated surplus of Canadian Arsenals Limited for the year ended March 31, 1952; and a credit consequent upon the issue of 4,800 shares of common stock to the Government of Canada by Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited in exchange for assets comprising the Atomic Energy Project at Chalk River, Ontario, which were transferred to the Company as at April 1, 1952. This transaction represents a write-up of previous years' expenditures and consequently appears in the Government's assets under Loans and Investments in Crown Agencies.

(5) Comparison of Actual Revenue with Budget Forecast

Total budgetary revenues, excluding revenue from the old age security taxes, for 1952-53 as now estimated will be about $96 million more than the forecast made in the budget speech of April 8, 1952. This is a difference representing in terms of the total amounts involved an excess over the amount forecast of only slightly more than 2 per cent. It is expected that revenues from personal income tax, corporation income tax, non-resident income taxes, and succession duties, will be less than the amounts forecast, while revenues from customs import duties, excise duties, sales tax and excise taxes (other than sales tax), will be larger than expected. The following table shows in detail the extent to which it is expected that actual revenues will differ from the budget forecast.

It is estimated that the revenue from personal income tax will be about 1 per cent less than the budget forecast. The short fall is due mainly to the fact that refunds of tax were larger than expected.

The budget forecast of corporation income tax revenue was based on the assumption that corporation profits in 1952 would equal those realized in 1951. However, on the basis of preliminary information, it would appear that 1952 profits did not reach the 1951 level. The adverse effect on corporation income tax revenue arising from the reduction of profits has been to some extent offset by the withdrawal of the Province of Ontario from the corporation tax field but the additional revenue arising from this development has not been sufficient to entirely offset the shortfall caused by the reduction in corporation profits, and it is estimated that when the accounts for the year are closed receipts will have fallen short of expectations by about 3 per cent.

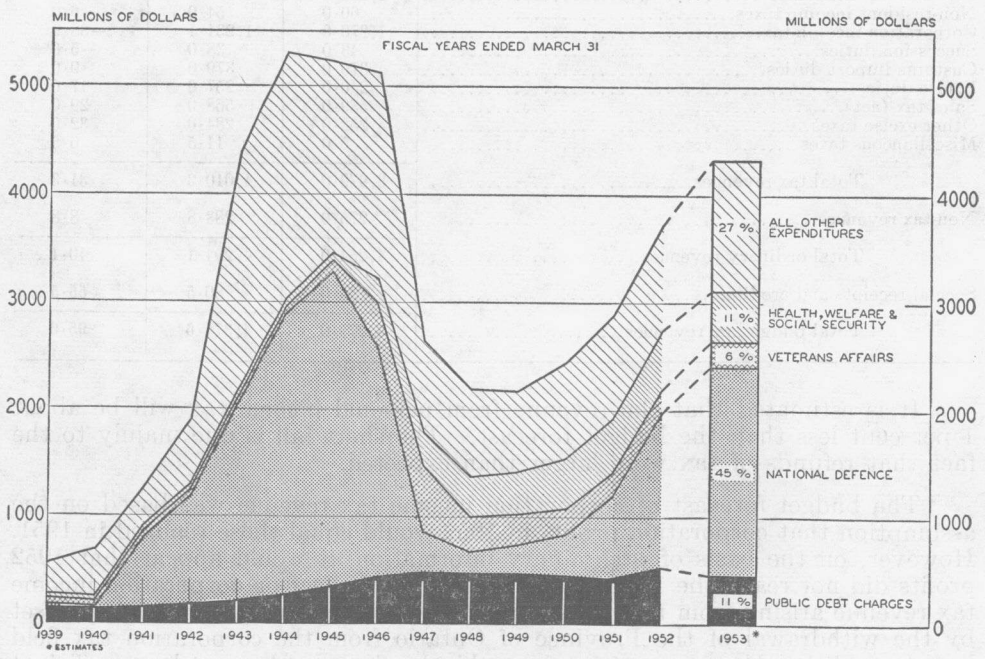
Revenue from succession duties will fall considerably short of the amount forecast. It is impossible to forecast revenue from this source with any high degree of accuracy.

Customs duty collections are expected to exceed the budget forecast by about $9 million or less than 3 per cent due mainly to the higher proportion of dutiable goods in total imports.



Revenue from excise duties in 1952-53 is expected to exceed the budget forecast by about 7 per cent mainly because the increase in the revenue from the excise duty on cigarettes has been greater than anticipated.

Revenue from the sales tax is expected to exceed the budget forecast by $29 million or 5 per cent, reflecting some acceleration in consumer spending, and a somewhat greater output of the country's industry than had been expected.

It is expected that revenue from excise taxes other than the sales tax will exceed the amount forecast by about $32 million because of the strong consumer demand for such durable and semi-durable goods as automobiles, furs, radios, and television sets. In addition, the increased consumption of cigarettes has come closer to offsetting the effects of the reduction in the rate of excise tax to a greater extent than had been expected.

The principal item among the miscellaneous taxes is the tax on the premium income of insurance companies. This tax is expected to yield about $6 million more than forecast because on signing the tax rental agreement with the Federal Government the Province of Ontario repealed a similar tax which had been deductible from the premium tax payable to the Federal Government.

BUDGETARY EXPENDITURES BY CLASSES

The excess of estimated non-tax revenue receipts over the budget forecast is due mainly to the amount of $6·8 million for premium, discount and exchange arising for the most part from a revaluation of the government's sterling and United States dollar assets and liabilities from exchange rates used in operations in the previous year. Post Office receipts and return on investments are each expected to be approximately $1 million lower than the forecast while estimated miscellaneous non-tax revenues, are some $4 million higher than forecast.

Special receipts and credits, always impossible to estimate with any high degree of accuracy, are expected to be $55 million higher than the arbitrary budget forecast of $25 million. The greater part of this excess arises because of the amount of $45 million transferred to revenue on account of collections of the Provincial 5% corporation income tax. At the time of the budget forecast it was expected that amounts held by the Federal Government from collections of this Provincial tax would be turned over to the Provinces but the new tax agreements signed during 1952-53 relieved the Federal Government from all further obligation to the Provinces in respect of these collections and these amounts, which under the former agreements would have served to reduce Federal expenditures for tax rental payments, will now come into the accounts as revenue.

B. Expenditures

The table which follows presents a comparative summary of estimated expenditures by departments and principal purposes for the fiscal year 1952-53, with actual expenditures for the preceding fiscal year.

National Defence and Defence Production

The magnitude of Canada's expenditures for defence is more completely seen when the expenditures of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production are considered together. Estimated expenditures of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year 1952-53 are $1,845·2 million as compared with $1,415·5 million for 1951-52, an increase of $429·7 million, while the Department of Defence Production expenditures are estimated at $94 million, an increase of $63 million over the total of $31 million for the previous fiscal year. Consequently the combined expenditures of the two departments amounting to $1,939·2 million for the year under review are $492·7 million greater than the total of $1,446·5 million for 1951-52. Thus, defence expenditures constitute approximately 45% of all government expenditures in 1952-53 again making defence, by a considerable margin, the largest class of government expenditures.

The following table shows a comparative summary of expenditures for the two departments for the last two fiscal years:

Expenditures for the army, navy and air services are estimated at $1,516·4 million for 1952-53 as compared with $1,217·6 million for 1951-52, an increase of $298·8 million. Expenditures for Defence Research and Development are expected to amount to $41·7 million for 1952-53, an increase of $6·3 million as compared with $35·4 million for the preceding year.

The Government's contribution to the Permanent Services Pension Account which is equivalent to one and two thirds times the contributions by permanent services personnel is estimated at $30 million for 1952-53, or $0·7 million less than the amount contributed in 1951-52. Approximately $26·9 million relates to current contributions and $3·1 million to contributions for arrears. In 1951-52 the corresponding amounts were $18·4 million and $12·3 million respectively.

Expenditures under the Mutual Aid programme which are authorized by section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950 are expected to amount to $234·7 million in 1952-53. This represents an increase of $108·3 million over the 1951-52 total of $126·4 million. Under the provisions of this section of the Act, defence equipment and supplies are transferred from Canadian stocks to other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. The value of the equipment and supplies transferred is charged to this appropriation on the basis of the estimated present value, and an equivalent amount is credited to a special Defence Equipment Replacement Account from which payment may be made when replacements are obtained. The estimated expenditure of $234·7 million in 1952–53 consists of approximately $58 million for equipment and supplies transferred from Canadian stocks to North Atlantic Treaty countries and $176·7 million for direct cash outlays for mutual aid by the Government of Canada, representing costs incurred in acquiring and supplying new military equipment to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty and in the training in Canada of air crews from allied countries. In 1951–52 stock transfers amounted to $74·9 million and direct aid to $51·5 million.

Contributions made by Canada towards the military costs of NATO are charged to the National Defence appropriations. These payments comprise Canada's share of the NATO military budgets and infrastructure costs as well as certain ex-infrastructure costs. The percentage share borne by the particular nations is as suggested by the North Atlantic Council subject to the agreement of the respective governments. The 1952–53 expenditures for this purpose are estimated at $16·9 million.

Expenditures for the Department of Defence Production are estimated at $94 million for 1952-53, an increase of $63 million over the total of $31 million for the previous year. Capital assistance to private contractors, Crown plants operated on a management fee basis, and Crown corporations undertaking contracts essential to the defence programme, is estimated at $83·9 million, an increase of $61·2 million over the total of $22·7 million for the previous fiscal year. Administration and general expenditures of the department are expected to amount to $10·1 million compared with $8·3 million in 1951-52.

In addition to the foregoing budgetary expenditures, the Department of Defence Production has made additional cash outlays out of the Defence Production Revolving Fund for the procurement of materials for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. For purposes of accounting and control, materials so acquired are treated as assets in the books of the government until they are billed to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. It is estimated that net cash payments of approximately $34 million will be made in 1952–53 for the acquisition of materials as compared with $82·4 million in 1951–52.

The replacement of equipment and supplies transferred to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty also involved cash outlays which were not reflected as budgetary expenditures in the year under review. It is estimated that an amount of $13 million will be disbursed in 1952-53 for this purpose compared with $49 million in 1951-52. The cost of such replacements is charged to the Defence Equipment Replacement Fund which is credited with the estimated value of the defence equipment and supplies when these are transferred from Canadian stocks to NATO countries.

Public Debt Charges

Public debt charges in 1952-53, as in 1951-52, will constitute the second largest single item of government expense. The total for the year, which is estimated at $460·9 million, represents 10·7 per cent of the aggregate expenditures in 1952-53 compared with a total of $531 million or 14·2 per cent in 1951-52. However, when making this comparison it should be noted that the total for 1951-52 includes a non-recurring charge of $87·5 million representing the additional amount required to place interest on public debt on an accrual basis. If this amount were excluded from the comparison, there would be a net increase of $15·1 million in this expenditure category.

Interest on funded debt payable in Canada, London and New York is expected to show a small decrease of $1·2 million from the previous year.

It is estimated that interest on deposit and trust accounts will increase by $0·2 million, but as insurance, pension and guaranty accounts continued to increase substantially during the year, interest on these accounts is expected to increase by $16·1 million. Of this increase, $13·3 million is for interest on the civil service superannuation account, $2·4 million on the government annuities account, and $1·6 million on the permanent services pension account; offset in part by decreases of $1 million for returned soldiers insurance and $0·3 million for veterans insurance accounts. Interest on these latter accounts was terminated as of April 1, 1952.

Other public debt charges are estimated at $13·4 million, as compared with $11·1 million in 1951–52. The increase of $2·3 million is due chiefly to the increase of $2 million in the annual charges for amortization of bond discounts and commissions.

The following table presents a summary of public debt charges for 1952-53 and the corresponding figures for the previous year:

Subsidies and Tax Rental Payments to Provinces

Payments to the provinces during 1952-53 for statutory subsidies, the transitional grant to Newfoundland, rentals under the 1947 and 1952 tax rental agreements and the transfer of certain public utility tax receipts are estimated at $338 million compared with $127·2 million in 1951-52. A comparative summary of the payments for the two years is given in the following table:

	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1953 (Estimated)	1952

	338·0	127·2	210·8

Statutory subsidy payments in 1952-53, as in 1951-52, were based on the 1951 census totals of population.

Payments under the tax rental agreements increased by $211·7 million as a result of the new agreements signed in 1952 and the entry of the Province of Ontario into a tax agreement. The new tax rental agreements provide for larger guaranteed minimum payments and the adjusted rental payments are based on the increase in the gross national product per capita and the provincial population in the year preceding the year of payment instead of the average of the three preceding years as under the 1947 agreements. In addition to larger rental payments the new agreements also provide that all the instalments in respect of a year shall be paid within that fiscal year. Thus payments made in 1952-53 include the four instalments payable under the 1952 agreements in respect of 1952-53 as well as the concluding payment made under the 1947 agreements. A further reason for the larger amount shown for tax rental payments in 1952-53 arises from the discontinuance of the provincial 5% corporation income taxes which were levied by the agreeing provinces during the period when the 1947 agreements were in force. These taxes were administered and collected by the federal government and the proceeds thereof, when finally assessed, were turned over to the provinces. The amount turned over to the provinces (less small amounts representing the collection of interest and penalties) was deducted from the stipulated tax rental payments and in 1951-52 this reduced the federal budgetary expenditure shown on this account by $25 million. In keeping with the terms of the new tax agreements, these provincial corporation income taxes were not levied on profits earned after December 31, 1951, and the amount now held by the federal government on account of collections of these taxes is to remain in its hands. Accordingly nothing was turned over to the provinces on account of these taxes in 1952-53 and there were no deductions from the tax rental payments made to the provinces on this account corresponding to the deductions made in previous years.

The amount of the transfer of public utility tax receipts to the provinces is expected to be the same as in the previous year. Section 7 of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947, authorized the payment to the provinces, whether participating in the agreements or not, of a portion of the income tax collected from corporations, whose main business was the distribution to, or the generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam. Provision for similar payments was also made in the Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1952.

A summary of payments, by provinces during 1952–53 is given in the following table:

Government Contributions to the Civil Service Superannuation Account

It is estimated that $38·8 million will be charged to expenditures in 1952-53 in connection with the Civil Service Superannuation Account as compared with $110·9 million in 1951-52.

The government's contribution of an amount equal to the estimated payments by individual contributors in the previous year on account of current and prior service is estimated at $13·8 million representing an increase of $0·9 million over the total of $12·9 million in the previous fiscal year. In March, 1952, the policy of showing the full estimated actuarial liability in respect of the operation of the Superannuation Account on the government balance sheet was adopted. The amount of $214 million, by which this actuarial liability exceeded the balance of the account at the end of the fiscal year, was set up in 1951-52 as a deferred charge to be written off to budgetary expenditures as special contributions were voted by Parliament in future years. In 1952-53 an amount of $25 million is included in the expenditures for the year as a contribution to be applied to the reduction of this amount.

Provision for reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets

An amount of $75 million will be transferred during the year to the general reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets with a corresponding amount being shown as an expenditure in the government's accounts. This will bring the balance in the reserve at the end of the fiscal year to $545·9 million which is equivalent to approximately 7 per cent of the aggregate active assets. No charge or write-off to the reserve is expected during the fiscal year.

Family Allowances, Old Age Assistance and Pensions to Blind Persons

Payments for family allowances are estimated at $334·1 million for 1952-53 representing approximately 7·7 per cent of the total expenditures as compared with $320·5 million or approximately 8·6 per cent of the total in 1951–52. This estimated increase of $13·6 million is attributable chiefly to the natural increase in population in the eligible age groups.

Payments in respect of old age assistance and blind pensions (excluding pensions paid from the Old Age Security Fund) are estimated at $22·1 million for 1952-53 as compared with $83·2 million in 1951-52.

The present scheme of old age and blind pensions came into force on January 1, 1952, so that 1952-53 was the first full fiscal year of operations thereunder. Up to that time both of these types of pension were available under the Old Age Pensions Act to those who were 70 years and over, or 21 years and over if blind, who satisfied the means and residence tests. Thereafter under the Old Age Security Act all persons 70 years and over who satisfied the residence requirements could receive pensions of $40 a month from the federal government out of the Old Age Security Fund which was established in accordance with that Act. At the same time the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act came into force. Under the first of these new Acts the federal government reimbursed the provinces by paying 50 per cent of the lesser of $40 monthly or the amount of assistance given by the provinces in the form of monthly pensions to eligible persons in need who were in the age group of 65 to 69. The same procedure was followed by the federal government in reimbursing provinces under the terms of the Blind Persons Act for pensions paid to eligible blind persons in need over the age of 21.

Payments in respect of old age assistance and blind pensions are estimated at $22·1 million for the full fiscal year 1952-53, whereas in the previous fiscal year only $6 million was expended on the same groups in the form of $3·7 million on blind pensions for the whole year and $2·3 million for old age assistance in the last quarter. During the first nine months of 1951-52, $77·2 million was spent on old age pensions under the old Act.

A comparative summary of the estimated payments for 1952-53 and actual outlays for 1951-52 is given in the following tables:

Unemployment Insurance Act Administration and Government's Contribution

Expenditures relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act (excluding the Government's payment as an employer) are estimated at $56·7 million for 1952-53, an increase of $2·9 million over the total of $53·8 million for 1951-52.

Unemployment insurance benefit payments are not charged directly to budgetary expenditures, but to the Unemployment Insurance Fund which is financed by contributions from employers and employees, by interest earned on investments, and by the Government's contribution of an amount equal to one-fifth of the combined employer-employee payments.

The Government's contribution to the Fund for 1952-53 is estimated at $31·2 million compared with $29·9 million in 1951-52. Administration costs are estimated at $25·4 million or $1·5 million more than the total of $23·9 million for the previous fiscal year.

Agriculture

Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture are estimated at $117·3 million for 1952-53 compared with $67·1 million for 1951-52. The estimated increase of $50·2 million is due chiefly to increases of $40·3 million in the net operating loss of the Agricultural Prices Support Account, $6 million in freight assistance on western feed grains and $2 million in outlays on rehabilitation and reclamation projects. A reduction of $1·7 million in assistance to apple growers is expected to be slightly more than offset by increased costs of the science, production, marketing and experimental farms services and by the premium payments on hog carcasses.

The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures of the department for the last two years:

The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for the last two fiscal years:

External Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs are estimated at $39·1 million for 1952-53 or $1·5 million more than the total outlay of $37·6 million in the previous year. Assistance to other countries directly or through international organizations is estimated at $26·1 million for 1952-53 compared with $26·4 million in 1951-52, the principal item in the category being the amount of $25 million provided under the Colombo Plan for assistance to countries in South and South-East Asia. Outlay for membership in commonwealth and international organizations is estimated at $3·5 million and administrative and general expenditures of the department are expected to amount to $9·5 million. The corresponding expenditures in 1951-52 were $2·7 million and $8·5 million respectively.

Finance

The major items of expenditure for the Department of Finance have already been dealt with, in comparative form, under the headings "Public Debt Charges", "Subsidies and Tax Rental Payments to Provinces", "Provision for reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets" and "Government's Contribution to the Civil Service Superannuation Account".

In addition, it is estimated that amounts totalling $30·8 million will be spent in 1952-53 compared with $29·5 million in 1951-52. The following table presents a comparative summary of these expenditures for the past two fiscal years:

Mines and Technical Surveys

Expenditures of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are estimated at $29·7 million for 1952-53 compared with $27·8 million for 1951-52. The increase of $1·9 million is due chiefly to increases of $1·4 million in the expenses of the Dominion Coal Board and $1·7 million in general and administration expenditures, offset by a decrease of $1 million in expenditures under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance programme.

National Health and Welfare

Family Allowances, Old Age Assistance and Pensions to the Blind constitute the major items of expenditure for the Department of National Health and Welfare and because of their importance in relation to the total government expenditures, they have been dealt with separately under their respective headings in preceding paragraphs. It is estimated that the department's expenditures for all other services will amount to $55·9 million in 1952-53 as compared with $45·4 million in 1951-52. General health grants to assist the provinces in hospital construction, the strengthening of general public health services and the control of diseases are estimated at $31 million, an increase of $6·7 million compared with $24·3 million for 1951-52. Administration and general expenses, including Indians' and Eskimos' health services, are estimated at $24·9 million, an increase of $3·8 million over the total of $21·1 million for 1951-52.

National Research Council and Atomic Energy Control Board

The National Research Council expenditures for 1952-53 are estimated at $16·5 million indicating an increase of $3·7 million over the total of $12·8 million for 1951-52. Expenditures of the Atomic Energy Control Board are estimated at $12·7 million for 1952-53 compared with $12·3 million in the previous fiscal year.

National Revenue

Expenditures for the Department of National Revenue are estimated at $47·7 million for 1952-53 compared with $45·8 million for 1951-52. Of the total increase of $1·9 million, $1·7 million is for the Customs and Excise Divisions and $0·2 million for the Taxation Division.

The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures of the department for the last two fiscal years:

	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1953 (Estimated)	1952

Post Office

Gross expenditures of the Post Office Department for 1952-53, including payments from revenue, are estimated at $124 million, an increase of $8·3 million over the total of $115·7 million for 1951-52. Remunerations of postmasters, staffs at revenue and semi-staff offices and commissions at sub-offices are paid from revenue. These payments, included in the total of $124 million, are estimated at $17·8 million for 1952-53 compared with similar payments amounting to $17·7 million in the previous fiscal year. Other disbursements which are charged to budgetary expenditures are estimated at $106·2 million for 1952-53 while the corresponding total for the previous fiscal year was $98 million.

The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for 1952-53 and 1951-52:

Public Works

Expenditures of the Department of Public Works for 1952-53 are estimated at $81 million compared with a total of $77·5 million for 1951-52. The following table presents a comparison of expenditures for the last two fiscal years:

Increases totalling $4·2 million for the operation and maintenance of federal public buildings are more than offset by decreases of $4·4 million in other expenditures of the Architectural Branch. Expenditures of the Engineering Branch are estimated at $28·9 million for 1952-53, an increase of $3·7 million over the total of $25·2 million in 1951-52.

Resources and Development

Estimated expenditures of $35·6 million for the Department of Resources and Development for 1952-53 are $3·8 million greater than the total of $31·8 million for 1951-52. The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for the last two fiscal years:

Expenditures of the Engineering and Water Resources Branch are estimated at $17.1 million, of which $13 million represents the Government's contribution to the provinces in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway. In 1951-52 the contribution was $12·8 million.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Expenditures for 1952-53 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are estimated at $32·1 million compared with a total of $27·3 million for 1951-52. The following table presents a comparison of expenditures for the last two fiscal years:

	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease(−)

Government contribution to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Account	0·5	0·9	−0·4
Administration and general	2·0	1·8	0·2
	32·1	27·3	4·8

Expenditures for land services are estimated at $28·2 million in 1952-53 compared with $23·5 million in the previous fiscal year. Increases of $0·1 million in marine services, $0·2 million in aviation services and $0·2 million in administration and general are largely offset by a decrease of $0·4 million in the Government's contribution to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Account.

Trade and Commerce

Expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce are estimated at $17·1 million for 1952-53, a decrease of $4·7 million from the total of $21·8 million for 1951-52. The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for the last two fiscal years:

	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease(−)
	1953 (Estimated)	1952
	(In millions of dollars)
Trade Commissioner Service	2·3	2·1	0·2

Canada Grain Act	4·8	3·8	1·0
Administration and General	2·8	4·0	−1·2
	17·1	21·8	−4·7

The decrease of $4·8 million in expenditures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics is largely attributable to the absence in 1952-53 of expenditures comparable to those in 1951-52 for the census of population and agriculture and the 1951 census of distribution. Increases of $0·2 million in outlay for the Trade Commissioner Services, $0·1 million for the Standards Division and $1·0 million for expenditures under the Canada Grain Act are largely offset by a decrease of $1·2 million in administration and general expenditures which are estimated at $2·8 million. The decrease in this latter category is due mainly to a non-recurring expenditure in 1951-52 of $1·6 million representing a payment with respect to the Greater Winnipeg Dyking Board.

Transport

Expenditures of the Department of Transport are estimated at $107·6 million for 1952-53, an increase of $7·7 million over the corresponding total of $99·9 million for 1951-52, as shown in the following table:

	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)

Government-owned enterprises	5·3	18·2	−12·9
Departmental administration and sundry	3·3	3·4	−0·1
	107·6	99·9	7·7

Estimated expenditures for air services reflect increases of $1·4 million for the telecommunications division, $0·7 million for the meteorological division and $2·5 million for civil aviation. Outlays in canal services are expected to total $10 million, an increase of $2 million over the previous year while marine services expenditures are estimated at $22·6 million, or $5·1 million more than in 1951-52. Railway services, at $21·9 million, are expected to be $9·6 million higher than in 1951-52. Of the total increase in the latter category, $3·8 million is due to payments under the Railway Act, Chap. 22, sec. 18, (Statutes 1951) to the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways for the maintenance of trackage on the railways' transcontinental lines in certain areas of Northern Ontario. These increases which reflect increased activity in the airport, vessel and other construction programmes of the department, larger payments under the Maritime Freight Rates Act and general increases in the costs of normal continuing services, are offset in part by estimated reductions of $0·5 million in the expenditures of the Canadian Maritime Commission and $12·9 million in deficits and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for deficits of, and non-active advances to, government-owned enterprises for 1952-53 and 1951-52.

Loans and Advances, Non-Active—
National Harbours Board	1·9	1·2	0·7
	5·3	18·2	−12·9

The expected decrease of $12·9 million in this category is due to the fact that the C.N.R. mainly because of the change in its capital structure which reduced interest charges, as authorized by the C.N.R. Capital Revision Act, 1952 did not incur a deficit in the calendar year 1952. In 1951 the Railway's deficit was $15 million.

Veterans Affairs

Total expenditures for the Department of Veterans Affairs are estimated at $242·5 million for 1952-53, an increase of $26·5 million compared with the total of $216 million for 1951-52. The table which follows presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for the two fiscal years:

—	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1953 (Estimated)	1952
	(In millions of dollars)
Pensions (World Wars I and II and Northwest Rebellion 1885)	127·1	103·7	23·5
Treatment Services	42·0	39·6	2·4
War Veterans' allowances and other benefits	30·9	29·6	1·3
War service gratuities and re-establishment credits	11·1	9·8	1·3
Post-discharge rehabilitation benefits	4·0	6·6	—2·6
Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts— Administration and general	5·7	5·9	—0·2
Provision for reserve for conditional benefits	8·0	7·6	0·4
Departmental, district and pensions administration and miscellaneous payments	13·7	13·2	0·5
	242·5	216·0	26·5

The increase of $26·5 million in the department's expenditures for 1952-53 is due mainly to increased rates of pension which became payable in January 1952 as a result of amendments to the Pension Act. Consequently, the revision which was applicable for only three months of 1951-52 was in effect for all of 1952-53.

The provision for the reserves for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act is estimated at $8 million, an increase of $0·4 million over the previous year. Conditional grants are made to veterans who enter into agreements with the director for sales of land and chattels provided they fulfil the terms of the agreements for a period of ten years. The amount charged to expenditures during 1952-53 under this heading covers one-tenth of the conditional benefits included in sales to veterans prior to April, 1953.

4. THE CASH POSITION

In the preceding sections of this Part the budgetary transactions of the Government for the fiscal year 1952-53 have been described in some detail and the estimated budgetary revenues and expenditures and surplus have been analyzed and compared with the actual figures for the preceding fiscal year. However, the budgetary accounts do not reflect the full scope of the Government's financial operations which extend beyond the collection of revenues or the making of expenditures in the strict or narrow accounting or budgetary meaning of those terms. While a substantial part of all governmental activities is directly reflected in the budgetary accounts, large amounts of cash are received and disbursed in connection with extra-budgetary transactions and these receipts and disbursements must be taken into account when measuring the impact of the Government's financial operations upon the economy or analyzing the implications of Government spending and the methods by which that spending is financed.

Consequently in determining the over-all cash surplus or deficit for the fiscal year, the cash available from or required for non-budgetary as well as budgetary transactions must be taken into account.

The non-budgetary receipts and disbursements relate to transactions which result in increases or decreases in the Government's assets and liabilities. They do not appear in the Government's income account nor do they enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit. On the assets side, they consist, for the most part, of advances to and repayments of loans by Crown corporations and other government agencies, foreign, provincial and municipal governments and other borrowers, investments in government securities and outlays for the acquisition of inventories of materials which will be used in the future, and for services rendered in one year but applicable to the accounts of subsequent years. On the liabilities side, the transactions relate primarily to receipts and payments in connection with the numerous deposit and trust, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the Government.

The following summary shows how the non-budgetary transactions and the budgetary surplus affect the Government's funded debt and cash position in 1952-53. For purposes of comparison the corresponding figures for 1951-52 are also shown:

* Adjusted for changes in Securities Investment Account and Sinking Fund

As the table shows, non-budgetary disbursements are expected to amount to $627·3 million in 1952-53 and non-budgetary receipts to $449·1 million, resulting in a non-budgetary deficit of $178·2 million compared with a surplus of $5·1 million for 1951–52. Deducting from this sum the budgetary surplus of $47·8 million, a net cash deficit of $130·4 million remains to be financed by additional borrowing from the public. In 1951-52, a cash surplus of $253·1 million was available for debt redemption.

Non-budgetary disbursements, which are estimated at $627·3 million, include $124·8 million to the Canadian National Railways, $75·8 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing construction and housing loans, $100 million in temporary loans to the Old Age Security Fund to cover the excess of pension payments over tax receipts, $66·7 million for advances to the Agricultural Prices Support Account, $50 million for advances to the Exchange Fund, $34·4 million for advances to the Defence Production Revolving Fund for the acquisition and stockpiling of defence materials, $15·1 million for miscellaneous loans, investments and working capital advances (including $7·1 million for loans to veterans), $8·7 million for discounts and commissions on loan flotations, $30·7 million for the decrease in the balance of the Provincial 5 per cent corporation income tax suspense account, $108·6 million for the decrease in outstanding cheques, interest due and accounts payable, $4·7 million representing the decrease in the cash balances of the Unemployment Insurance Fund, and $7·8 million in disbursements from sundry accounts.

Non-budgetary receipts, amounting to an estimated total of $449·1 million, are made up of $62·1 million from net Government Annuities Account receipts, $109·2 million from insurance, pension and liability account receipts, $64·3 million from repayments of sundry loans and investments (of which $58·5 million was from the United Kingdom and other foreign governments), $75 million representing the increase in the general reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets, $66·1 million the increase in the Defence Equipment Replacement Account, and $72·4 million receipts from sundry accounts.

To finance the over-all cash deficit of $130·4 million on budgetary and non-budgetary account, unmatured funded debt in the hands of the public will increase during 1952-53 by $141·7 million, with the result that the Government's cash balances will be increased by $11·3 million.

5. ESTIMATED BALANCE SHEET POSITION AT MARCH 31, 1953.

The following table presents in summary form the Government's estimated balance sheet position at March 31, 1953, with the comparable figures for March 31, 1952.

Net Debt (Excess of liabilities over net active assets)	11,137·5	11,185·3	—47·8

The aggregate liabilities of the Government as at March 31, 1953, are estimated at $17,807·1 million, an increase of $274·9 million over the corresponding total at the end of the previous year. Unmatured funded debt outstanding, including bonds, treasury bills and deposit certificates, accounts for $14,837·6 million or approximately 83 per cent of all liabilities. Of the total unmatured funded debt now outstanding, only $389·7 million or approximately 2·6 per cent is payable in foreign currencies—$337·6 million in United States dollars and $52·1 million in pounds sterling. A complete statement in tabular form of the Government's unmatured funded debt as at March 31, 1953 with details of interest rates, dates of maturity, annual interest charges and amounts of principal outstanding for each loan may be found at the end of this Part.

Floating debt, consisting of outstanding cheques and interest, matured funded debt and similar obligations payable on demand and accounts payable (cheques issued in April in payment of accounts relating to 1952-53), is estimated at $739·1 million. Insurance, pension and guaranty accounts are expected to total $1,557·9 million.

The other liability items are: sundry suspense accounts (where some uncertainty as to disposition exists), $345·5 million; deposit and trust accounts (consisting of moneys deposited with or held by the Receiver General for various purposes), $185·1 million; deferred credits (consisting of balances whose ultimate accounting treatment is known, but which are held until certain conditions are fulfilled), $130 million and province debt accounts (representing settlements arising out of agreements at the time of Confederation), $11·9 million.

Offsetting these liabilities and in a measure explaining their existence—as a substantial portion of the total debt is attributable to them—are the Government's active assets. These, for the most part, consist of assets that yield interest, profits or dividends, very liquid assets such as cash and departmental working capital funds, and certain prepaid expenditures and sundry suspense accounts.

It is expected that the aggregate active assets of the Government as at March 31, 1953 will amount to $7,215·5 million. The totals of the principal active asset categories as at that date are estimated at: cash and other current assets, $2,516·7 million; loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies, $1,687·9 million; other loans and investments (including loans to provincial, municipal, United Kingdom and other governments, subscriptions to international organizations and a number of miscellaneous advances to veterans and others), $2,528·2 million; deferred charges, $252 million; sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured funded debt, $27·1 million; province debt accounts, $2·3 million and sundry suspense accounts, $201·3 million.

The reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets which now stands on the books at $545·9 million is shown on the balance sheet as a deduction from the total of active assets, bringing the net active asset total to $6,669·6 million.

A. Changes in Principal Liability Classifications During 1952-53

The increase in the gross liabilities of the Government during the fiscal year is estimated at $274·9 million. The most important increase is in the outstanding unmatured funded debt of the Government which is expected to increase by $142·2 million from $14,695·4 million at March 31, 1952 to an estimated amount of $14,837·6 million at March 31, 1953. Other increases are $141·6 million in insurance, pension and guaranty accounts, $41 million in sundry suspense accounts, $53·3 million in deposit and trust accounts and $5·4 million in deferred credits. These increases, however, are offset by a decrease of $108·6 million in floating debt.

Floating Debt

It is estimated that floating debt will decrease by $108·6 million during the fiscal year due chiefly to decreases of $63·9 million in outstanding cheques and warrants and $32 million in accounts payable. The latter is a new account set up to record cheques issued in April in payment of accounts pertaining to the year ended March 31st, which formerly were shown as outstanding cheques. For purposes of comparison the corresponding liability as at March 31, 1952 is shown on the same basis.

The changes in floating debt during 1952-53 are shown in the following table:

FLOATING DEBT AS AT MARCH 31, 1953 AND MARCH 31, 1952
(In millions of dollars)

—	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1953 (Estimated)	1952
Matured funded debt outstanding	18·1	24·7	—6·6
Notes and other obligations payable on demand	284·8	289·6	—4·8
Interest due and outstanding	55·2	56·5	—1·3
Outstanding cheques and warrants	145·0	208·9	—63·9
Accounts payable (year-end adjustment account)	221·0	253·0	—32·0
Post Office (net liability for money orders, etc.)	15·0	15·0	.....
	739·1	847·7	—108·6

Deposit and Trust Accounts

It is estimated that there will be an increase of $53·3 million during the fiscal year in deposit and trust accounts. Contractors' holdback accounts are expected to total $24·1 million and the balance of the Colombo Plan Fund which it is proposed to establish and to which will be credited the undisbursed portion of the amount voted by Parliament to provide for assistance to countries in South and South-east Asia is estimated at $17 million. It is also expected that there will be increases of $5·4 million in contractors' security cash deposits and $5·9 million in the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund.

Insurance, Pension and Guaranty Accounts

Insurance, pension and guaranty accounts show an estimated increase of $141·6 million during the fiscal year 1952-53. The following table shows the changes in the various accounts in this category.

INSURANCE, PENSION AND GUARANTY ACCOUNTS AS AT MARCH 31, 1953 AND MARCH 31, 1952
(In millions of dollars)

—	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1953 (Estimated)	1952
Government Annuities	738·0	675·9	62·1
Permanent Services Pension Account	154·3	111·0	43·3
Civil Service Superannuation Account	555·0	520·3	34·7
Other	110·6	109·1	1·5
	1,557·9	1,416·3	141·6

The Government Annuities Account is expected to show an increase of $62·1 million during the year 1952-53. The increase of $34·7 million in the Civil Service Superannuation Account reflects the amount by which the sum of employees' current and prior service contributions, the Government's contribution of an amount equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in the previous fiscal year, and interest accretions are expected to exceed payments from the account. An estimated increase of $43·3 million in the Permanent Services Pension Account represents the amount by which the contributions by permanent services personnel for current service and arrears, the Government's contribution (which is made at the rate of one and two-thirds times the current contributions and contributions for arrears) and interest accretions exceed payments from this account.

Deferred Credits

Deferred credits are expected to show a net increase of $5·4 million during the fiscal year; of this amount $7 million is attributable to the increase in interest accrued on public debt.

Sundry Suspense Accounts

Sundry suspense accounts are expected to show an increase of $41 million during the fiscal year. Of this total, $66·1 million is due to transactions relating to the Defence Equipment Replacement Account reflecting an increase in the undisbursed balance of the credits to the account under section 3 of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950 and subsequent votes of Parliament for the same purpose. Under the terms of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, the value of defence materials and supplies transferred to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization may be credited to the account and these credits may be used in subsequent years to purchase equipment or supplies for the naval, army or air services of the Canadian Forces. The net increase in the account during the year represents the amount by which the value of defence materials and supplies transferred exceeds cash disbursements for replacements.

Replacement of material, section 11, National Defence Act, account is expected to show an increase of $13·7 million. This increase represents the amount realized from the sale of material that has not been declared surplus to requirements but has been authorized by Governor in Council to be sold to other countries less the amount which has been paid out of the account for the procurement of replacement material.

The interim payment of $6·3 million from the Canadian Wheat Board on account of surplus which had been held in suspense and transferred to revenue in the fiscal year 1952-53 and the transfer of the amount of $2 million in the German Reparations Suspense Account to the War Claims Fund, account for the principal decreases in the sundry suspense accounts.

Also recorded under this heading is the amount held by the Government in respect of collections of the 5 per cent corporation income tax levied by the provinces that were party to a tax agreement with the Federal Government in the period 1947 to 1951. Under terms of collection agreements with the provinces, this tax was collected by the Federal Government and the proceeds thereof, when returns were finally assessed, were turned over to the provinces. The amount turned over to the provinces, (less any small amounts which represented collection of interest and penalties) was deducted from the stipulated tax rental payments and thus reduced the Federal expenditures shown on this account.

This arrangement was not continued under the new tax agreements signed for a further five years in 1952 and the provincial corporation income tax was not levied on profits earned after Dec. 31, 1951. However, substantial amounts have been collected throughout 1952-53 in respect of tax liability for 1951 and previous years and the account now contains approximately $92 million. The new tax agreements with the Provinces, signed in 1952, contain a provision releasing the Federal Government from all further obligations to the Provinces in respect of amounts it has collected of the provincial corporation income tax. Accordingly nothing has been turned over to the Provinces in 1952-53 from this account. Prior to 1952-53 amounts in this account, when turned over to the Provinces, served to reduce Federal Government expenditures but under the new arrangement the amount in the account will be taken into Federal revenue as assessments for the taxation years 1947 to 1951 are completed and as amounts still owing under the provincial 5 per cent corporation income tax are collected and necessary refunds made. In 1952-53 it is expected that $45 million or approximately one-half of the balance remaining in the account will be transferred to revenue as "Special Receipts and Credits."

Province Debt Accounts

It is expected that there will be no increase or decrease during the fiscal year in the Government's liability in respect of the province debt accounts. These amounts have remained unchanged for many years.

Funded Debt Unmatured

It is estimated that unmatured funded debt will amount to $14,837·6 million at the close of the fiscal year, an increase of $142·2 million over the corresponding total at March 31, 1952. An increase of $149 million in debt payable in Canada is offset by decreases in the Canadian dollar equivalent of debt payable in London and in New York of $1 million and $5·8 million respectively. The details of the various loan redemptions, flotations and adjustments resulting in this net increase are described more fully in the section on "The Public Debt".

B. Changes in Principal Active Asset Classifications During 1952-53

It is estimated that there will be an increase of $397·7 million in the total of active assets during the fiscal year under review. However, with the provision of an additional $75 million for the reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets, active assets are expected to show a net increase of $322·7 million at the close of the fiscal year 1952-53. It is expected that estimated increases of $186·5 million in cash and other current assets, $215·2 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies, $1·2 million in sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured funded debt and $74·2 million in sundry suspense accounts will be offset by decreases of $63·1 million in other loans and investments and $16·3 million in deferred charges.

Cash and Other Current Assets

An increase of $186·5 million in cash and other current assets is estimated for the fiscal year as shown in the following table which summarizes changes expected in the various accounts in this category:

CASH AND OTHER CURRENT ASSETS AS AT MARCH 31, 1953 AND MARCH 31, 1952

(In millions of dollars)

Other	90·1	35·3	54·8
Crown corporations	27·0	23·9	3·1
	2,516·7	2,330·2	186·5

The principal changes as shown in the table were increases of $11·3 million in cash in current and special deposits, $100 million in temporary loans to the Old Age Security Fund, $34·4 million in the Defence Production Revolving Fund, and $54·8 million in other departmental working capital advances. These are offset in part by a decrease of $23·6 million in the Exchange Fund Account.

The decrease in advances to the Exchange Fund reflects additional cash advances of $50 million required during the year to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange offset by $73·6 million equivalent to the increase in the Fund's revaluation deficit during 1952 which is deducted from the total advances and carried to sundry suspense accounts. The Fund's revaluation deficit at December 31, 1952, was $199·2 million compared with $125·6 million at the end of the preceding year.

Working capital advances are estimated at $333·9 million an increase of $192·3 million over the previous year.

An amount of $100 million is included under this heading for temporary advances to the Old Age Security Fund. Under authority of the Old Age Security Act temporary loans may be made and credited to the fund sufficient to make up the difference between the amount of pensions paid under the act and the amount of Old Age Security tax collected and credited to the fund. As pensions payments from the Fund are estimated at $324 million and tax receipts credited to the Fund at only $224 million, the deficit for 1952-53 is expected to amount to $100 million which will be covered by temporary advances to the Fund.

Working capital advances to the Department of Agriculture are expected to show an increase of $56·9 million for the year. This increase is due principally to the expansion of the Agricultural Prices Support program resulting from the effect of the foot and mouth disease in Canada and the subsequent embargo on the export of live stock and live stock products to the United States. The estimated loss of $42 million on operations for 1952-53 is included as a charge in the year's expenditures.

Loans to, and Investments in, Crown Agencies

It is estimated that loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies will increase $215·2 million during the year. The estimated changes during the fiscal year in this category are shown in the following table:

—	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1953 (Estimated)	1952
Bank of Canada Capital Stock	5·9	5·9	.....
Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—
Capital Advances	25·0	25·0	.....

National Harbours Board	106·9	106·9	.....
Polymer Corporation Limited	36·0	38·0	−2·0
Other Crown Agencies	45·7	30·7	15·0
	1,687·9	1,472·7	215·2

Loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the year are estimated at $80·5 million, of which $66 million is for lending purposes, $7 million for construction and $7·5 million for Federal-Provincial housing projects. Repayments estimated at $4·7 million will bring the net increase in advances for the year to $75·8 million.

It is estimated that in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953, the Government will have made net advances to the Canadian National Railway Company of $101 million for capital purposes, retirement of funded debt in the hands of the public and to cover the deficit arising in the first three months of 1953. In addition, to assist the company to finance additional capital expenditures, the Government will have purchased an estimated amount of $23·8 million of the Company's 4 per cent Preferred Stock. This stock is issued under the authority of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, in an amount equal to three per cent of the gross revenues of the Company.

No change is expected in the advances to the National Harbours Board, the amount outstanding remaining at $106·9 million. These advances represent outstanding advances in connection with harbour developments at Montreal and Vancouver and are the only advances to the National Harbours Board which are classified as active assets in the Government's accounts.

The Government's investment in Polymer Corporation Limited, a crown corporation engaged in the manufacture of synthetic rubber, is expected to be reduced by $2 million during the year, representing a further payment of $1 million on the debenture issue in addition to the $1 million repayment of the serial debenture due March 31, 1953.

The advances to the Canadian Farm Loan Board are estimated at $28·9 million, an increase of $1·6 million for the fiscal year.

Loans to, and investments in other Crown agencies are expected to total $45·7 million at the close of the year, an increase of $15 million over the corresponding total at the end of the previous year. The total of $45·7 million includes loans to, or investments in, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, $11·2 million; North-west Territories Power Commission, $8·4 million; Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited, $8·2 million; Export Credits Insurance Corporation, $5 million; and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited $9·2 million.

Other Loans and Investments

This group of assets includes loans to the United Kingdom and various foreign governments, the Government's subscriptions to the capital of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, loans to provincial and municipal governments and a number of miscellaneous loans and investments, the chief of which are the loans to veterans under the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts. The following table shows the estimated changes in this category during the fiscal year.

OTHER LOANS AND INVESTMENTS AS AT MARCH 31, 1953 AND MARCH 31, 1952
(In millions of dollars)

Miscellaneous Loans and Investments	17·5	17·3	0·2
	2,528·2	2,591·3	−63·1

The loans to the United Kingdom and other governments consist of loans to the Government of the United Kingdom under the authority of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, and the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, and to other countries under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act and miscellaneous foreign loans. The changes during the fiscal year in each of these categories are shown in the following table:

	1,867·2	1,925·7	−58·5

It is estimated that during 1952–53 the Government of the United Kingdom will have repaid $23·5 million of the $700 million interest-free loan granted under the provisions of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, reducing the balance outstanding of this loan to $196·9 million at March 31, 1953. In addition the Government of the United Kingdom will have repaid $14·3 million during the year on account of the $1,185 million loan made under the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, reducing the balance outstanding at March 31, 1953, to $1,156·7 million.

It is estimated that the total of outstanding advances made under the authority of Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act will be $461·9 million at March 31, 1953, a decrease of $19 million from the balance at the close of the previous year. Advances under this act represent loans made to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada. A classification of these advances by recipient governments, showing the estimated repayments during the year and the balances outstanding at the year end, is given in the following table:

ADVANCES TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS UNDER PART II OF THE EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT
(In millions of dollars)

Sinking Fund and Other Investments held for the Retirement of Unmatured Funded Debt

It is estimated there will be an increase of $1·2 million in these assets which are held for the retirement of the 3 per cent Newfoundland 1943–63 guaranteed stock, the balance at March 31, 1953, being $27·1 million.

Deferred Charges

It is estimated that Deferred Charges will decrease $16·3 million during the year. It is expected that the balance of $214 million which was set up as a deferred charge and credited to the Civil Service Superannuation Account in 1951–52 will be reduced by $25 million and that an equivalent amount will be written off to expenditure during the year. There will, however, be a net increase of $8·7 million in unamortized discounts and commissions on loans, due to the payment of $20·4 million for discounts and commissions on new loans offset by the annual amortization charges of $11·7 million applicable to and included in the expenditures for 1952–53.

Sundry Suspense Accounts

The estimated increase of $74·2 million in this asset classification is due mainly to the change in the deficit arising from exchange revaluations of the assets and liabilities in the Exchange Fund Account as at December 31, 1952, which amounted to $199·2 million at that date as compared with $125·6 million at the end of the previous year.

Reserve for Possible Losses on Ultimate Realization of Active Assets

The sum of $75 million will be added to the reserve during 1952–53 and a corresponding amount will be shown as an expenditure in the Government's accounts. No charge or write-off to the reserve is expected during the year, the balance at March 31, 1953, being estimated at $545·9 million.

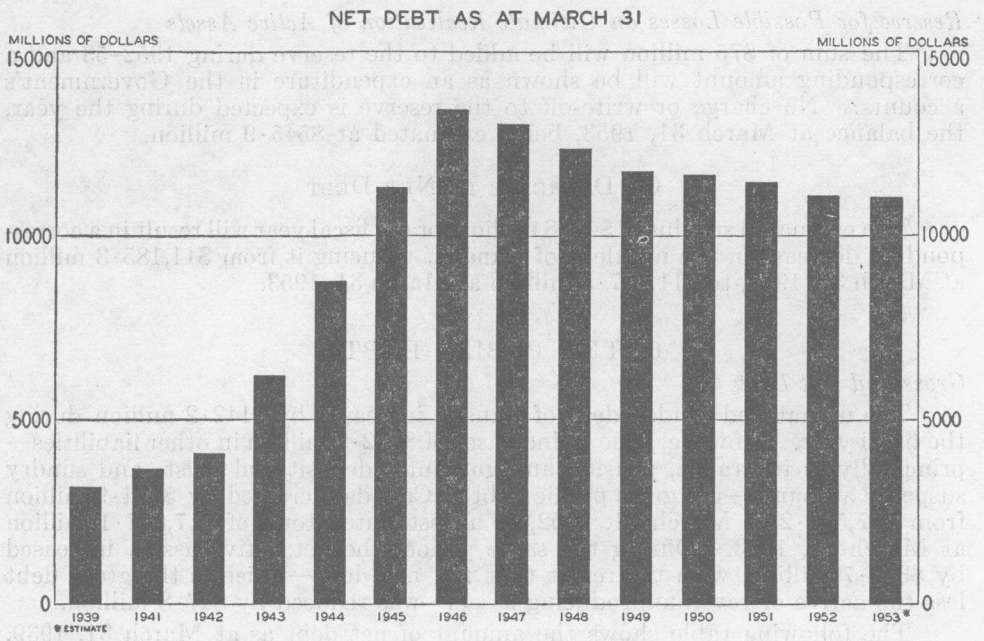
C. Decrease in Net Debt

The estimated surplus of $47·8 million for the fiscal year will result in a corresponding decrease in the net debt of Canada, reducing it from $11,185·3 million at March 31, 1952, to $11,137·5 million at March 31, 1953.

6. THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and Net Debt

The unmatured funded debt of Canada increased by $142·2 million during the fiscal year. However, due to increases of $132·7 million in other liabilities—principally in insurance, pension and guaranty, deposit and trust, and sundry suspense accounts—the gross public debt of Canada increased by $274·9 million from $17,532·2 at March 31, 1952, to an estimated total of $17,807·1 million at March 31, 1953. During the same period, the net active assets increased by $322·7 million, with the result that the net debt—which is the gross debt less the active or revenue producing assets—was reduced by $47·8 million.



The following table shows the amount of net debt as at March 31, 1939, to March 31, 1953, inclusive, with the amount of annual increase or decrease.

NET DEBT
(In millions of dollars)

1951	11,433·3	−211·3
1952	11,185·3	−248·0
1953 (Estimated)	11,137·5	− 47·8

Unmatured Funded Debt

The unmatured funded debt of Canada is expected to total $14,837·6 million at March 31, 1953. This is $142·2 million more than at the end of the previous year, but $1,969·6 million less than at March 31, 1946. Notwithstanding this substantial decrease it is still $11,451·9 million more than the total of $3,385·7 million at March 31, 1939, the end of the last pre-war year. Interest charges on the funded debt amounted to $389·5 million in 1952-53, an increase of approximately 230 per cent over the total of $118·1 million in 1938-39. However, as the gross national product rose from $5,233 million in 1938 to $22,984 million in 1952, an increase of approximately 340 per cent, the relative burden of the funded debt, measured in terms of interest charges as a percentage of the gross national product, actually decreased from 2·3 per cent in 1938-39 to 1·7 per cent in 1952-53.

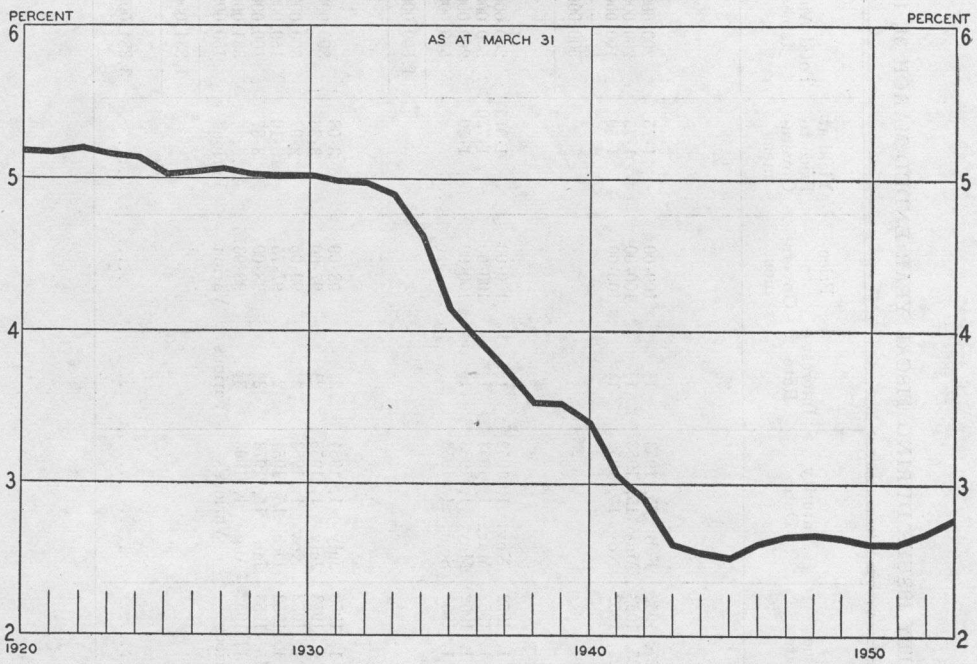
Summary of Security Issues and Redemptions in the Year

During the fiscal year it is estimated that the Government will have issued securities payable in Canadian dollars in the principal amount of $3,334 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature fortnightly) and refunded maturing issues in the amount of $3,186 million. The following is a summary of these transactions:

	In millions of dollars
New Issues:
Canada Savings Bonds Series VII (Net)	334
Twenty-five year loan	100
Increase in Treasury Bills	150
Deposit Certificates	100
By refunding or conversion into new issues—Deposit Certificates	400
Other	2,250
	3,334
Less redemptions	3,186
Net increase	148

The increase of $150 million in Treasury Bills outstanding which is shown in the table, together with a further increase of $50 million which is scheduled to take place in April 1953, will provide funds to enable the Government to retire the $200 million of Deposit Certificates presently outstanding.



The Canadian dollar value of the Government's external funded debt is expected to decrease by $6·8 million during the fiscal year. Of this amount $5·8 million is in respect of indebtedness payable in United States dollars and

$1 million in respect of sterling debt. These reductions result from the revaluation of liabilities payable in those currencies consequent upon the change in the exchange rates as compared with the previous fiscal year end.

As unmatured funded debt payable in Canada increased by $149 million ($148 million as shown in the preceding table and $1 million accrued interest added to War Savings Certificates outstanding), and as debt payable in sterling and United States dollars decreased by $6·8 million, the net increase in the funded debt was $142·2 million.

The average coupon rate of the Government's outstanding funded debt at the close of the fiscal year is estimated at 2·76 per cent compared with 2·67 per cent at the close of the previous fiscal year.

AVERAGE INTEREST RATE ON FUNDED DEBT

More complete details of redemptions and new issues of securities during the fiscal year are set out in the following table:

Indirect or Contingent Liabilities

It should be noted that the Government has certain indirect or contingent liabilities which are in addition to the direct debt set out in the balance sheet. Included under this heading, for example, are the Government's guarantees of certain securities issued by various Government owned enterprises such as the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, and the Saint John Harbour Commission; the guarantee of deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada; guarantees of certain loans made by chartered banks to veterans or farmers for certain authorized purposes; guarantees under the Export Credits Insurance Act; and certain commitments under the housing legislation.

The following table gives details of the bonds and debenture stocks guaranteed by the Government, and also indicates the nature and approximate extent of the Government's other guarantees and contingent liabilities.
